Prefatory Memoir.

THE 'Life' of the REV. WILLIAM LAW has been fully, even diffusively, set forth in his Biography written by CANON OVERTON and published by Longmans in the year 1881: and to that work—of which the more interesting particulars are drawn from the late MR. WALTON'S* Collections and DR. BYROM'S 'Journal'—such readers of William Law's Works who desire to obtain some general idea of their Writer's life, are referred.

Unfortunately, Canon Overton's Work, excellent and painstaking as is its compilation, conveys to the earnest reader only a very vague and unsatisfactory impression of William Law himself: being composed chiefly of well-selected extracts from Law's publications with criticisms thereon and numerous explanations and conjectures in well-meant but misplaced, elucidations of motives and actions. In fact, Canon Overton has performed a kind of literary autopsy upon William Law: quite in the manner of biographical writing of the day; unimpeachable, indeed, in respect of 'scholarly' execution, although occasionally lapsing into ill-chosen expressions as when he describes his subject as a 'grand specimen of Humanity,' instead of example; as if poor Law were some Museum specimen to be gazed at and remarked upon, with due pedantry accordingly. This too, in the absence of any authentic portrait of William Law, represses the curiosity of the expectant reader; who, abandoning the Biography, consoles himself with the remark made by Miss HESTER GIBBON—when requested to write a 'Life' of William Law—that his Life was in his Works.

William Law was born at King's Cliffe a considerable Village in Northamptonshire so long ago as the year 1686, in the Reign of James the Second. His father was a 'Grocer and Chandler' in the Village, residing in a house of his own; but, Canon Overton tells us 'his social standing was different from that of an ordinary 'Village tradesman of the present day.' From various evidence it appears that the Laws were not of humble origin in respect of 'Gentility'; and mention is made by Walton of a Tradesman's token, dated 1659, which bore their 'Coat of Arms'—an evidence of 'Gentility' of more account at that time of 'Heraldic Visitations' than it would be at the present. It may be remembered that William Law's great Contemporary BISHOP BUTLER, was the son of a Linen-Draper; and other instances might be recalled—SHAKESPEARE for example—of what has been accomplished by members of that class.

* CHRISTOPHER WALTON, a 'Diamond Jeweller,' of Ludgate Street, London, and apparently a man of considerable literary ability—of a peculiar kind—who had a most enthusiastic veneration for WILLIAM LAW. He printed in the year 1856 a 'Cyclopædia of Pure Christian Theology and Theosophic Science in Elucidation of the Sublime Genius and Theosophian 'MISSION OF WILLIAM LAW,' containing nearly 700 pages of the smallest and closest printing, which is perhaps the most laborious and generally unreadable compilation ever printed—excepting the Biographical footnotes relating to Law commencing at page 334.

William Law was the fourth son of a family of eight sons and three daughters. His early disposition appears to have been noticed by his father, who alone of all his sons, sent William to the University; and he entered as a Sizar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in the year 1705. He proceeded to the Arts Degrees in the usual course; and was elected to a Fellowship of his College and ordained in the year 1711—no doubt therefore, well fulfilling his father's expectations of him. His political principles (never mere 'Views' with him), obliged him to decline the Oath of Allegiance to George the First in the year 1716; which deprived him of his College Fellowship and of all prospect of advancement in the Church. In a note which he wrote to his eldest brother on that occasion he says: 'My prospect indeed is 'melancholy enough. . . . The benefits of my education seem 'partly at an end, but that same education had been more miserably lost, if I had not learnt to fear something worse than misfortunes.' In this great, though providential disappointment to his hopes and those of his family respecting him, his father did not live to share, having died two years previously.

It is said that on leaving Cambridge, William Law came to London: and there is some tradition that he officiated as Curate at S. Mary's Church in the Strand. Various vague reports are current respecting him at that period; but little is known of him until he published his first letter to Dr. HOADLY, the latitudinarian Bishop of Bangor, followed by his other letters on that Controversy. These Letters were written between the years 1717-1719, when William Law was about 31 years of age, and are generally considered to have been the most important contribution to that Controversy.

The following 'Rules for my Future Conduct' drawn up by *William Law—it is said, when he was at Cambridge—are worthy of being reproduced with his Works:—

* Walton's 'Cyclopædia,' Footnotes, pp. 345-6.

TO fix it deep in my Mind, that I have one business upon my hands—to seek for eternal happiness, by doing the Will of God.

II. To examine everything that relates to me in this view, as it serves or obstructs this only end of Life.

III. To think nothing great or desirable, because the World thinks it so ; but to form all my judgments of things from the infallible Word of God, and direct my Life according to it.

IV. To avoid all concerns with the World, or the ways of it, but where Religion and Charity oblige me to act.

V. To remember frequently, and impress it upon my Mind deeply, that no condition of this Life is for enjoyment, but for trial ; and that every power, ability, or advantage we have, are all so many Talents to be accounted for, to the Judge of all the World.

VI. That the Greatness of Human Nature consists in nothing else but in imitating the Divine Nature. That therefore, all the Greatness of this World, which is not in good actions, is perfectly beside the point.

VII. To remember, often and seriously, how much of Time is inevitably thrown away, from which I can expect nothing but the charge of Guilt ; and how little there may be to come, on which an Eternity depends.

VIII. To avoid all excess in eating and drinking.

IX. To spend as little time as I possibly can, among such persons as can receive no benefit from me, nor I from them.

X. To be always fearful of letting my time slip away without some fruit.

XI. To avoid all idleness.

XII. To call to mind the Presence of God, whenever I find myself under any Temptation to sin, and to have immediate recourse to Prayer.

XIII. To think humbly of myself ; and with great Charity of all others.

XIV. To forbear from all evil speaking.

XV. To think often of the Life of Christ, and to propose it as a pattern to myself.

XVI. To pray, privately, thrice a day, besides my morning and evening Prayer.

XVII. To keep from——* as much as I can without offence.

XVIII. To spend some time in giving an account of the day, previous to Evening Prayer : how have I spent this day? what Sin have I committed? what Temptations have I withstood? have I performed all my Duty?

It was about the year 1727 that William Law having achieved a good reputation by his Controversial writings, Christian Perfection, &c., became Tutor in the Gibbon family, residing at Putney, in particular to the father of the Historian Gibbon whom he accompanied to Emmanuel College ; and on his pupil's departure thence upon his travels, Law returned to Putney where he continued to reside for the next twelve years in the capacity of Spiritual Director with the Gibbon family, by whom he was much esteemed. It was during his residence at Putney that he produced his fame-piece, but not perhaps his master-piece, the Serious Call, by which he is now most generally known. It appears to have been at Putney also, that he became acquainted with the writings of Jacob Behmen the German Mystic, for whom and his Commentators, he acquired a great veneration which deepened with him until his death.

On leaving Putney, Law returned to King's Cliffe to reside ; where shortly afterwards Mrs. Hutcheson, a Widow lady, and Miss Hester Gibbon, who were each possessed of ample means and of strict piety, joined him and devoted themselves and the greater part of their joint income* to the relief of the Poor in a most benevolent, but it would seem, indiscriminate manner. Their Charity becoming notorious, attracted to them all the Vagrants from the whole country round, demoralizing the Village of King's Cliffe ; and exciting the rebuke of the then Incumbent administered to them from his pulpit.

Some interesting particulars of the daily life of William Law's household at King's Cliffe were collected many years ago by Mr. Walton, and are abridged, as follows :

MR. LAW rose early each morning, probably about five o'clock, spending some time in devotion ; after which he breakfasted, generally on a cup of chocolate in his bedroom, and then commenced study. . . . Mr. Law kept four cows, the produce of which, beyond what was required for his household, he gave to the poor, distributing the milk every morning with his own hands. . . . At nine o'clock a bell was rung for family devotion, of which the Collects and Psalms for the day formed a portion. From . . . the performance of this duty Mr. Law retired in silence to his chamber, where he passed the morning in study ; not unfrequently, indeed, interrupted by the message of some poor mendicant for aid, which never failed to secure his immediate attention . . . he inquired into the particular needs of his suppliants, and caused relief to be administered in the shape either of money, apparel, or food. . . . He manifested displeasure if room was not found on the kitchen fire for a vessel for the poor ; and sometimes he has been known to quit his studies in order to taste the broth which had been made for them. . . . In the winter season, he occasionally added ale and wine to these charitable provisions. . . . Amongst the articles of clothing which he provided for the indigent were shirts made of strong coarse linen ; and, that he might not give away what he himself could not thankfully receive, he always wore them himself first . . . after which they were washed and distributed. . . . Instances of hypocrisy are narrated of mendicants, who have been known to change their better clothing, sheltered by the projecting buttresses of the neighbouring church, for rags, and, thus disguised, repair again for relief to the well-known window. Though suspicions at times crossed his mind, Mr. Law would give his suppliants the benefit of a doubt, the result of all which was that King's Cliffe became the resort of the idle and worthless, and obtained a character for Pauperism which the place did not deserve ; and so much annoyance did it cause to the inhabitants that the Rector . . . endeavoured to put an end to the alleged mistaken benevolence of Mr. Law and his companions by openly preaching against them from the Pulpit. . . . At noon in winter, and at one in summer, dinner was laid upon the table, of which Mr. Law partook very moderately, allowing himself one glass of wine. . . . Immediately after dinner they reassembled (for devotional exercises). That duty performed, Mr. Law once more retired to his study and remained there a few hours, again rejoining the ladies at the tea-table. Of this refreshment he did not ordinarily partake, but supplied its place with a raisin or two from his pocket, generally standing and indulging in cheerful conversation. After tea exercises of piety were resumed, and varied by the servants in turn reading a chapter from the Bible. . . . Mr. Law and his companions, Mrs. Hutcheson and Miss Gibbon, were constant in their attendance at Church whenever Divine Service was performed. After the morning service on Wednesdays and Fridays, it was their custom to ride out for an airing, Mr. Law and Miss Gibbon being on horseback, and Mrs. Hutcheson, with the Honourables the Misses Hatton, their neighbours (who usually dined with them every alternate Friday) . . . in the carriage. . . . As regards the regular occupations of the ladies,* apart from the time dedicated to outward offices of charity among their Neighbours, or spent in private devotion, it would appear that they consisted in storing their minds with the instructions of Wisdom, and the impressions of Eternity, by transcribing daily portions out of the writings of the ancient . . . divines as in the way of school exercises. . . . As no authentic portrait of Mr. Law is in existence . . . we give a sketch of his personal appearance, as nearly as can be gathered from the testimony left upon record, assisted by our knowledge of his character.† . . . In stature . . . rather over than under the middle size, his frame not corpulent, but stoutly built. . . . The general form of his countenance was round; and he possessed a blunt, felicitous expression of utterance. . . . He had well-proportioned features . . . a cheerful, open expression. . . . His face was ruddy, his eyes grey, clear, vivacious. . . . His general manner was lively and unaffected, and, though his walk and conversation among his friends was that of a Sage . . . he was accustomed to see company, and was a man of free conversation. . . . A sister of the . . . Wesleys describes him as the very picture of the Law itself for severity and gravity. . . . Perhaps the gravity of his looks and demeanour was a little heightened by the soberness of his dress, which was usually a clerical hat with the loops let down, black coat, and grey wig.

* Mrs. HUTCHESON'S income is said by Walton to have been £2,000, and Miss GIBBON'S between five and seven hundred pounds yearly. It also appears that WILLIAM LAW gave the profits of only the first editions of his Works to the Bookseller, so that there would be a considerable income from that source.

* Mrs. HUTCHESON and Miss HESTER GIBBON, each of whom survived WILLIAM LAW; and are buried at the foot of his grave in King's Cliff Churchyard. Canon Overton, in his 'Biography of Law,' rather ungallantly and frivolously records a foolish tradition 'that during Law's lifetime the ladies dressed in the severely simple style recommended in the Serious Call, but that after his death the feminine 'love of finery broke out,' and 'Miss Gibbon appeared resplendent in yellow 'stockings' as if Miss Gibbon's stockings had been an apparent and prominent rather than an obscured and withdrawn portion of her apparel; for which supposition there is no evidence, although Dr. Byrom reports on hearsay that 'she was said to be a very good lady, though some people thought 'she was mad.'

† Mr. WALTON here adds the following note (p. 502), which will be read with a shudder: 'If our endeavours to obtain possession of his Skull should be crowned with success, we shall then, perhaps, be enabled to offer a more just and complete delineation of his exterior . . . ; his hardy, economic physical training and classically tutored mind rendering it probable that nature in 'him was regular and true'—and very unlike what it was in poor Mr. WALTON!

Of the many who applied to William Law for spiritual advice and guidance, and who for a time implicitly followed his directions, the most notable was John Wesley : of whom Law subsequently wrote, 'I was at one time a sort of Oracle with Mr. Wesley.' The occasion of their estrangement was because in Wesley's opinion, William Law's teaching did not sufficiently dwell upon the Saving Merits of the Atonement ; and the instantaneous kind of Salvation comprehended in the Divine words 'Believe ; and thou shalt be saved.' This Doctrine Wesley in a lengthy but rather weak and petulant, note charged Law with neglecting to teach him ; and asks him 'How will you justify it 'to our common Lord that you never gave me this advice'—of instantaneous Salvation—'Why did I scarcely ever hear you 'name the name of Christ, never so as to ground anything on 'faith in His blood ?' ; and concludes with some personal reflections upon William Law's morose disposition, which he thinks cannot be the result of a living faith, &c., and which certainly might have been spared. To this Law sent a most admirable and charitable reply, sweeping away Wesley's insinuations like so many cobwebs ; in which he says 'A holy man you say taught 'you this "Believe and thou shalt be saved." I am to suppose that till you met with this holy man you had not been 'taught this Doctrine. Did you not above two years ago give a 'new translation of Thomas à Kempis. Will you call Thomas to 'account and to answer it to God, as you do me for not teaching 'you that doctrine ? Or will you say that you took upon you to 'restore the true sense of that Divine Writer, and instruct others 'how they might profit by reading him, before you had so much 'as a literal knowledge of the most plain, open, and repeated 'doctrine in his book. You cannot but remember what value I 'always expressed of à Kempis, and how much I recommended 'it to your meditations. You have had a great many conversations with me, and I dare say you never was with me half an 'hour without my being large upon that very doctrine which you 'make me totally silent and ignorant of . . . I am to suppose 'that you had been meditating upon an Author that of all others 'leads us the most directly to a real living Faith in Jesus Christ : 'after you had judged yourself such a master of his sentiments 'and doctrines as to be able to publish them . . . after you had 'done this you had only the faith of a Judas.' And concluding : 'Your last paragraph, concerning my sour, rough behaviour, I 'leave in its full force. Whatever you can say of me of that 'kind, without hurting yourself, will be always well received by me.'

William Law's veneration for Jacob Behmen and belief in his System of Philosophy; and what has been termed, his own 'mysticism,' has by many been misunderstood and misrepresented. His latest Biographer, Canon Overton, places too much stress upon a quotation from a letter written by William Law to a friend; in which, probably in an unguarded moment of strong enthusiasm, he says 'All pretences and endeavours to hinder the 'opening of this Mystery revealed' in Jacob Behmen 'and its 'bearing down all before it, will be as vain as so many attempts 'to prevent or retard the coming of the last day'—and this statement made in the privacy of correspondence—Canon Overton describes as a 'Prophecy' unfulfilled. It is therefore, only fair to William Law's memory to quote the following extract from a letter written by him five years later—and within two years of his death, to a friend: 'Next to the Scriptures, my only book is 'the illuminated Behmen. And him I only follow so far as he 'helps to open in me that which God had opened in him, concerning 'the death and the life of the fallen and redeemed man. The 'whole Kingdom of Grace and Nature was opened in him; and 'the whole Kingdom of Grace and Nature lies hid in myself. 'And, therefore, in reading of him, I am always at home and 'kept close to the Kingdom of God that is within me.'

Another of the charges brought against Law is, that he was a 'declared Universalist.' The final Restitution of all things, was a subject upon which he spoke and wrote most guardedly; in one instance as follows:—'Put away all needless curiosity in 'Divine matters; and look upon everything to be so but that 'which helps you to die to yourself, that the Spirit and Life of 'Christ may be found in you.'

William Law retired to King's Cliffe when he was fifty-one years of age, and he resided there until his death, twenty-two years later. It appears that at Eastertide in the year 1761, when occupying himself as usual about the annual audit of the Schools, which he had founded and endowed in his native place, he caught cold, producing inflammation of the kidneys; which, after a few days' acute suffering, ended his life here. His death occurred between seven and eight o'clock in the morning of Thursday, 9th April, 1761. 'When near expiring,' it is reported, 'he sang a hymn with a strong and very clear voice;' and Miss Gibbon, who was present, wrote:—'This death-bed instead of 'being a state of Affliction, was, providentially, a state of Divine 'Transport. As to THE TRUTH, all his behaviour bore full 'testimony to it, and the gracious words that proceeded out of

LETTER to Dr. SNAPE in

ANSWERED.

And the Dangerous Nature of some Doctrines
in his Preservative,

Set forth in a Letter to his Lordship.

By WILLIAM LAW, M. A.

LONDON:

Printed for W. INNYS and J. RICHARDSON, in Pater-noster-Row. 1753.

The First Letter to the Bishop of Bangor.

My Lord,

THAT your Lordship may be prepared to receive what I here presume to lay before you, with the greater Candor, I sincerely profess, that it does not proceed from any Prejudice; but from certain Reasons, upon which I find myself invincibly obliged to differ from your Lordship in Opinion.

To prevent all Suspicion of my designing anything injurious to your Lordship's Character in this Address, I have prefixed, what otherwise I should have chosen to conceal, my Name to it.

Your Lordship is represented as at the Head of a Cause, where every Adversary is sure to be reproached, either as a furious Jacobite, or Popish Bigot, or an Enemy to the Liberty of his Country, and the Protestant Cause. These hard Names are to be expected, my Lord, from a Set of Men who dishonour your Lordship with their Panegyrics upon your Performances; whose Praises defile the Character they would adorn.

When Dr. Snape represents your Lordship as no Friend to the good Orders, and necessary Institutions of the Church, you complain of the ill Arts of an Adversary, who sets you out in false Colours, perverts your Words on purpose to increase his own Imaginary Triumphs. But, my Lord, in this, Dr. Snape only thinks with those who would be counted your best Friends; and would no longer be your Friends, but that they conclude, you have declared against the Authority of the Church. Does your Lordship suppose, that the T—ds, the H—ks, the B—ts, would be at so much Expense of Time and Labour, to justify, commend and enlarge upon your Lordship's Notions, if they did not think you engaged in their Cause? There is not a Libertine, or Loose-Thinker in England, but he imagines you intend to dissolve the Church as a Society, and are ready to offer Incense to your Lordship for so meritorious a Design. It is not my Intention to reproach your Lordship with their Esteem, or to involve you in the Guilt of their Schemes ; but to show, that an Adversary does not need any Malice to make him believe you no Friend to the Constitution of the Church, as a Regular Society, since your greatest Admirers every Day publish it by necessary Construction to the World in Print.

After a Word or two concerning a Passage in your Lordship's Preservative, I shall proceed to consider your Answer to Dr. Snape. In the 98th Page you have these Words: But when you are secure of your Integrity before God, — this will lead you (as it ought all of us) not to be afraid of the Terrors of Men, or the vain Words of Regular Uninterrupted Successions, Authoritative Benedictions, Excommunications, — Nullity, or Validity of God's Ordinances to the People upon Account of Niceties and Trifles, or any other the like Dreams.

My Lord, thus much must be implied here : Be not afraid of the Terrors of Men, who would persuade you of the Danger of being in this, or that Communion, and fright you into particular Ways of Worshipping God, who would make you believe such Sacraments, and such Clergy, are necessary to recommend you to his Favour. For these, your Lordship affirms, we may condemn, if we be but secure of our Integrity.

So that if a Man be not a Hypocrite, it matters not what Religion he is of. This is a Proposition of an unfriendly Aspect to Christianity : But that it is entirely your Lordship's, is plain from what you declare, p. 90 : That every one may find it in his own Conduct to be true, that his Title to God's Favour cannot depend upon his actual being or continuing in any particular Method ; but upon his real Sincerity in the Conduct of his Conscience. Again, p. 91 : The Favour of God follows Sincerity, considered as such, and consequently equally follows every equal Degree of Sincerity. So that I hope I have not wrested your Lordship's Meaning, by saying, that, according to these Notions, if a Man be not a Hypocrite, it matters not what Religion he is of. Not only sincere Quakers, Ranters, Muggletonians, and Fifth Monarchy-Men, are as much in the Favour of God, as any of the Apostles ; but likewise sincere Jews, Turks and Deists, are upon as good a Bottom, and as secure of the Favour of God, as the sincerest Christian.

For your Lordship saith, it is Sincerity, as such, that procures the Favour of God. If it be Sincerity, as such, then it is Sincerity independent and exclusive of any particular Way of Worship. And if the Favour of God equally follows every equal Degree of Sincerity, then it is impossible there should be any Difference, either as to Merit or Happiness, between a sincere Martyr and a sincere Persecutor; and he that burns the Christian, if he be but in earnest, has the same Title to a Reward for it, as he that is burnt for believing in Christ.

Your Lordship saith, you can't help it, if People will charge you with* Evil Intentions and Bad Views. I intend no such Charge: But I wonder your Lordship should think it hard, that anyone should infer from these Places, that you are against the Interest of the Church of England.

For, my Lord, cannot the Quakers, Muggletonians, Deists, Presbyterians, assert you as much in their interest as we can? Have you said anything for us, or done anything for us in this Preservative, but what you have equally done for them? Your Lordship is ours, as you fill a Bishopric; but we are at a loss to discover from this Discourse what other Interest we have in your Lordship. For you openly expose our Communion, and give up all the advantages of it, by telling all sorts of People, if they are but sincere in their own Way, they are as much in God's Favour as anybody else. Is this supporting our Interest, my Lord?

Suppose a Friend of King George should declare it to all Britons whatever, that though they were divided into Five thousand different Parties, to set up different Pretenders; yet if they were but sincere in their Designs, they would be as much in the Favour of God, as those who are most firmly attached to his Majesty. Does your Lordship think, such a one would be thought any great Friend to the Government? And, my Lord, is not this the Declaration you made as to the Church of England? Have you not told all Parties, that their Sincerity is enough? Have you said so much as one Word in Recommendation of our Communion: Or, if it was not for your Church-Character in the Title-Page of this Discourse, could anyone alive conceive what Communion you were of? Nay, a Reader, that was a Stranger, would imagine, that he who will allow no Difference between Communions, is himself of no Communion. Your Lordship, for aught I know, may act according to the strictest Sincerity, and may think it your Duty to undermine the Foundations of the Church. I am only surprised, that you should refuse to own the Reasonableness of such a Charge.

Your Lordship hath cancelled all our Obligations to any particular Communion, upon pretence of Sincerity.

I hope, my Lord, there is Mercy in store for all sorts of People, however erroneous in their Way of worshipping God; but cannot believe, that to be a sincere Christian, is to be no more in the Favour of God, than to be a sincere Deist, or a sincere Destroyer of Christians. It will be allowed, that Sincerity is a necessary Principle of true Religion ; and that without it, all the most specious Appearances of Virtue are nothing worth. But still, neither common Sense, nor plain Scripture, will suffer me to think, that when our Saviour was on Earth, they were as much in the Favour of God, who sincerely refused to be his Disciples, and sincerely called for his Crucifixion, as those who sincerely left all and followed him. If they were, my Lord, where is that Blessedness of Believing so often mentioned in the Scripture ? Or, where is the Happiness of the Gospel Revelation, if they are as well, who refuse it sincerely, as those who embrace it with Integrity ?

Our Saviour declared, that those who believed, should be saved ; but those who believed not, should be damned. Will your Lordship say, that all Unbelievers were insincere ; or, that though they were damned, they were yet in the same Favour with God, as those who were saved ?

The Apostle assures us, that there is no other Name under Heaven given unto Men, whereby they can be saved, but Jesus Christ. But your Lordship hath found out an Atonement, more universal than that of his Blood ; and which will even make those blessed and happy, who count it an unholy Thing. For seeing it is Sincerity, as such, that alone recommends us to the Favour of God, they who sincerely persecute this Name, are in as good a Way, as those that sincerely worship it. Has God declared this to be the only Way to Salvation ? How can your Lordship tell the World, that Sincerity will save them, be they in what Way they will ? Is this all the Necessity of Christ's Satisfaction ? Is this all the Advantage of the Gospel Covenant, that those who sincerely condemn it, are in as good a State without it, as those that embrace it ?

My Lord, here is no Aggravation of your Meaning. If Sincerity, as such, be the only thing that recommends us to God, and every equal Degree of it procures an equal Degree of Favour ; it is a Demonstration, that Sincerity against Christ is as pleasing to God, as Sincerity for him. My Lord, this is a Doctrine which no Words can enough decry. So I shall leave it, to consider what Opinion St. Paul had of this kind of Sincerity. He did not think, when he persecuted the Church, though he did it ignorantly, and in Unbelief, and out of Zeal towards God, that he was as much in the Favour of God, as when he suffered for Christ. I am the least, saith he, of the Apostles, not fit to be called an Apostle ; because I persecuted the Church of Christ. The Apostle does not scruple to charge himself with Guilt, notwithstanding his Sincerity.

A little Knowledge of human Nature will teach us, that our Sincerity may be often charged with Guilt; not as if we were guilty because we are sincere; but because it may be our Fault that we are hearty and sincere in such or such ill-grounded Opinions. It may have been from some ill Conduct of our own, some Irregularities, or Abuse of our Faculties, that we conceive things as we do, and are fixed in such and such Tenets. And can we think so much owing to a Sincerity in Opinions, contracted by ill Habits and guilty Behaviour? There are several faulty Ways, by which People may cloud and prejudice their Understandings, and throw themselves into a very odd Way of thinking; for some Cause or other God may send them a strong Delusion, that they should believe a Lie. And will your Lordship say, that those who are thus sunk into Errors, it may be, through their own ill Conduct, or as a Judgment of God upon them, are as much in his Favour, as those that love and adhere to the Truth? This, my Lord, is a shocking Opinion, and has given Numbers of Christians great Offence, as contradicting common Sense and plain Scripture; as setting all Religion upon the Level, as to the Favour of God.

The next thing that, according to your Lordship, we ought not to be concerned at, is, the vain Words of Regular and Uninterrupted Successions, as Niceties, Trifles, and Dreams. Thus much surely is implied in these Words, that no kind of Ordination or Mission of the Clergy is of any Consequence or Moment to us. For if the Ordination need not be Regular, or derived from those who had Authority from Christ to Ordain, it is plain, that no one particular kind of Ordination can be of any more Value than another. For no Ordination whatever can have any worse Defects, than as being Irregular, and not derived by a Succession from Christ. So that if these Circumstances are to be looked on as Trifles and Dreams, all the Difference that can be supposed betwixt any Ordinations, comes under the same Notion of Trifles and Dreams; and consequently, are either Good alike, or Trifling alike. So that Quakers, Independents, Presbyterians, according to your Lordship, have as much Reason to think their Teachers as useful to them, and as True Ministers of Christ, as those of the Episcopal Communion have to think their Teachers. For if Regularity of Ordination and Uninterrupted Succession be mere Trifles, and nothing; then all the Difference betwixt us and other Teachers, must be nothing: for they can differ from us in no other respects. So that, my Lord, if Episcopal Ordination, derived from Christ, hath been contended for by the Church of England, your Lordship hath in this Point deserted her: And you not only give up Episcopal Ordination, by ridiculing a Succession; but likewise by the same Argument exclude any Ministers on Earth from having Christ's Authority. For if there be not a Succession of Persons authorised from Christ to send others to act in his Name, then both Episcopal and Presbyterian Teachers are equally Usurpers, and as mere Laymen as any at all. For there can't be any other Difference between the Clergy and Laity; but as the one hath Authority derived from Christ, to perform Offices which the other hath not. But this Authority can be no otherwise had, than by an Uninterrupted Succession of Men from Christ, empowered to qualify others. For if the Succession be once broke, People must either go into the Ministry of their own Accord, or be sent by such as have no more Power to send others, than to go themselves. And, my Lord, can these be called Ministers of Christ, or received as his Ambassadors? Can they be thought to act in his Name, who have no Authority from him? If so, your Lordship's Servant might Ordain and Baptize to as much purpose as your Lordship: For it could only be objected to such Actions, that they had no Authority from Christ. And if there be no Succession of Ordainers from him, everyone is equally qualified to Ordain. My Lord, I should think it might be granted me, that the Administering of a Sacrament is an Action we have no Right to perform, considered either as Men, Gentlemen, or Scholars, or Members of a Civil Society. Who then can have any Authority to interpose, but he that has it from Christ? And how that can be had from him, without a Succession of Men from him, is not easily conceived. Should a private Person choose a Lord Chancellor, and declare his Authority good; would there be any thing but Absurdity, Impudence and Presumption in it? But why he cannot as well commission a Person to act, sign and seal in the King's Name, as in the Name of Christ, is unaccountable.

My Lord, it is a plain and obvious Truth, that no Man, or Number of Men, considered, as such, can any more make a Priest, or commission a Person to officiate in Christ's Name, as such, than he can enlarge the Means of Grace, or add a New Sacrament for the Conveyance of spiritual Advantages. The Ministers of Christ are as much positive Ordinances, as the Sacraments; and we might as well think, that Sacraments not instituted by him, might be Means of Grace, as those pass for his Ministers, who have no Authority from him.

Once more, all things are either in common in the Church of Christ, or they are not. If they are, then everyone may Preach, Baptize, Ordain, &c. If all things are not thus common, but the Administering of the Sacrament, and Ordination, &c., are Offices appropriated to particular Persons ; then I desire to know how, in this present Age, or any other since the Apostles, Christians can know their respective Duties, or what they may, or may not do, with respect to the several Acts of Church-Communion, if there be no Uninterrupted Succession of Authorised Persons from Christ : For until Authority from Christ appears, to make a Difference between them, we are all alike ; and anyone may officiate as well as another. To make a Jest therefore of the Uninterrupted Succession, is to make a Jest of Ordination ; to destroy the sacred Character, and make all Pretenders to it, as good as those that are sent by Christ.

If there be no Uninterrupted Succession, then there are no Authorised Ministers from Christ ; if no such Ministers, then no Christian Sacraments ; if no Christian Sacraments, then no Christian Covenant, whereof the Sacraments are the Stated and Visible Seals.

My Lord, this is all your own. Here are no Consequences palmed upon you ; but the first, plain, and obvious Sense of your Lordship's Words — and yet, after all, your Lordship asks Dr. *Snape, Why all these Outcries against you ? Indeed, my Lord, you have only taken the main Supports of our Religion away : You have neither left us Priests, nor Sacraments, nor Church : Or, what is the same thing, you have made them all Trifles and Dreams. And what has your Lordship given us in the room of all these Advantages ? Why, only Sincerity : This is the great Universal Atonement for all. This is that, which, according to your Lordship, will help us to the Communion of Saints hereafter, though we are in Communion with anybody, or nobody here.

The next Things we are not to be afraid of, are, The vain Words of Nullity and Validity of God's Ordinances, i.e., whether they are administered by a Clergyman or a Layman. This indeed I have shown was included in what you said about the Trifle of Uninterrupted Succession. But, for fear we should have overlooked it there, you have given it us in express Words in the next Line.

Your Lordship tells Dr. Snape, That you know no Confusion, Glorious or Inglorious, that you have endeavoured to introduce into the Church.†

My Lord, If I may presume to repeat your own Words, Lay your Hand on your Heart, and ask yourself, Whether the encouraging all manner of Divisions, be not endeavouring to introduce Confusion ? If there were in England Five thousand different Sects, has not your Lordship persuaded them to be content with themselves; not to value what they are told by other Communions; That if they are but sincere, they need not have regard to anything else? Is not this to introduce Confusion? What is Confusion, but Difference and Division? And does not your Lordship plainly declare to the World, that there is no need of uniting? That there is no particular Way or Method, that can recommend us more to the Favour of God, than another? Has your Lordship so much as given the least Hint, that it is better to be in the Communion of the Church of England, than not? Have you not exposed her Sacraments and Clergy; and, as much as lay in you, broke down every thing in her, that distinguishes her from Fanatical Conventicles? What is there in her, as a Church, that you have left untouched? What have you left in her, that can any way invite others into her Communion? Are her Clergy authorised more than others? For fear that should be thought, you make a Regular Succession from Christ, a Trifle. Are her Sacraments more regularly administered? Lest that should recommend her, you slight the Nullity or Validity of God's Ordinances. Is there any Authority in her Laws, which enjoin Communion with her? Lest this should be believed, you tell us, that our being or continuing in any particular Method (or particular Communion) cannot recommend us more to the Favour of God than another.

I must observe to your Lordship, that these Opinions are very oddly put in a Preservative from ill Principles; or, An Appeal to the Consciences and common Sense of the Laity. Are they to be persuaded not to join with the Nonjurors, because no particular Priests, no particular Sacraments, no particular Communion, is anything but a Dream and Trifle; and such things as no way recommend us to the Favour of God more than others? Are the Nonjurors only thus to be answered? Is the Established Church only thus to be defended? Your Lordship indeed has not minced the Matter: But, I hope, the Church of England is to be supported upon better Principles, or not at all.

If I should tell a Person that put a Case of Conscience to me, that all Cases of Conscience are Trifles, and signify nothing; it would be plain, that I had given him a direct Answer: But if he had either Conscience, or common Sense, he would seek out a better Confessor.

Your Lordship tells Dr. Snape, that the saith and unsaith, to the great Diversion of the Roman Catholics.* But if your Lordship would unsay some things you have said, it would be a greater Mortification to them, than all that ever you said or writ in your Life.

To deny the Necessity of any particular Communion, to expose the Validity of Sacraments, and rally upon the Uninterrupted Succession of Priests, and pull down every Pillar in the Church of Christ, is an Errand on which Rome hath sent many Messengers. And the Papists are no more provoked with your Lordship for these Discourses, than they were angry at William Penn, a reputed Jesuit, for preaching up Quakerism. So long as they rejoice in our Divisions, or are glad to see the City of God made a mere Babel, they can no more be angry at your Lordship, than at your Advocates.

Dr. Snape says, you represent the Church of Christ as a Kingdom, in which Christ neither acts himself, nor hath invested anyone else with Authority to act for him. At this your Lordship cries, p. 22, Lay your Hand upon your Heart, and ask, Is this a Christian, Human, Honest Representation of what your own Eyes read in my Sermon?

My Lord, I have dealt as sincerely with my Heart as it is possible; and I must confess, I take the Doctor's Representation to be Christian and Honest. For though you sometimes contend against Absolute and Indispensable Authority; yet it is plain, that you strike at all Authority, and assert, as the Doctor saith, that Christ hath not invested anyone on Earth with an Authority to act for him.

Now, my Lord, is not this saying, that he has left no Authority at all? For Christ came with no other Authority Himself but as to Conscience and Salvation, he erected a Kingdom which related to nothing but Conscience and Salvation: And therefore they who have no Authority as to Conscience and Salvation, have no Authority at all in his Kingdom. Conscience and Salvation are the only Affairs of that Kingdom.

Your Lordship denies, that anyone has Authority in these Affairs; and yet you take it ill to be charged with asserting, that Christ hath not invested anyone with Authority for him. How can anyone act for him, but in his Kingdom? How can they act in his Kingdom, if they have nothing to do with Conscience and Salvation, when his Kingdom is concerned with nothing else?

—Again, Page 16, your Lordship saith, that no one of them (Christians) any more than another, hath Authority either to make new Laws for Christ's Subjects, or to impose a Sense upon the old ones; or to Judge, Censure, or Punish the Servants of another Master, in Matters purely relating to Conscience.

I can meet with no Divine, my Lord, either Juror or Non-Juror, High or Low, Churchman or Dissenter, that does not think your Lordship has plainly asserted in these Passages, what the Doctor has laid to your Charge, that no one is invested with Authority from Christ to act for him.

Your Lordship thinks this is sufficiently answered, by saying, you contend against an Absolute Authority. You do indeed sometimes join Absolute with that Authority you disclaim. But, my Lord, it is still true, that you have taken all Authority from the Church: For the Reasons you everywhere give against this Authority, conclude as strongly against any Degrees of Authority, as that which is truly Absolute.

First, You disown the Authority of any Christians over other Christians, because they are the Servants of another Master, p. 16. Now this concludes as strongly against any Authority, as that which is Absolute: For no one can have the least Authority over those that are entirely under another's Jurisdiction. A small Authority over another's Servant, is as inconsistent as the greatest.

Secondly, You reject this Authority, because of the Objects it is exercised upon, i.e. Matters purely relating to Conscience and Salvation. Here this Authority is rejected, because it relates to Conscience and Salvation; which does as well exclude every Degree of Authority, as that which is Absolute. For if Authority and Conscience cannot suit together, Conscience rejects Authority, as such; and not because there is this or that Degree of it. So that this Argument banishes all Authority.

Thirdly, Your Lordship denies any Church Authority, because Christ doth not *interpose to convey Infallibility, to assert the true Interpretation of His own Laws. Now, this Reason concludes as full against all Authority, as that which is Absolute. For if Infallibility is necessary to found an Obedience upon in Christ's Kingdom, it is plain, that nobody in Christ's Kingdom hath any Right to any Obedience from others, nor consequently any Authority to command it; no Members, or Number of Members of it, being infallible.

Fourthly, Another Reason your Lordship gives against Church-Authority, is this; That it is the taking Christ's Kingdom out of his Hands, and placing it in their own, p. 14. Now this Reason proves as much against Authority in general, or any Degrees of it, as that which is Absolute. For if the Authority of others is inconsistent with Christ's being King of his own Kingdom, then every Degree of Authority, so far as it extends, is an Invasion of so much of Christ's Authority, and usurping upon his Right.

The Reason likewise which your Lordship gives to prove the Apostles not Usurpers of Christ's Authority, plainly condemns every Degree of Authority which any Church can now pretend to. *They were no Usurpers, because he then interposed to convey Infallibility; and was in all that they ordained: So that the Authority was his in the strictest Sense. So that where he does not interpose to convey Infallibility, there every Degree of Authority is a Degree of Usurpation; and consequently, the present Church having no Infallibility, has no Right to exercise the least Degree of Authority, without robbing Christ of his Prerogative.

Thus it plainly appears, that every Reason you have offered against Church-Authority, concludes with as much Strength against all Authority, as that which is Absolute. And therefore Dr. Snape has done you no Injury in charging you with the Denial of All Authority.

There happens, my Lord, to be only this Difference between your Sermon and the Defence of it, that That is so many Pages against Church-Authority, as such, and This is a Confutation of the Pope's Infallibility. It is very strange, that so clear a Writer, who has been so long inquiring into the Nature of Government, should not be able to make himself be understood upon it: That your Lordship should be only preaching against the Pope; and yet All the Lower House of Convocation should unanimously conceive, that your Doctrine therein delivered, tended to subvert all Government and Discipline in the Church of Christ.

And, my Lord, it will appear from what follows, that your Lordship is even of the same Opinion yourself; and that you imagined, you had banished all Authority, as such, out of the Church, by those Arguments you had offered against an Absolute Authority. This is plain from the following Passage, where you ridicule that which Dr. Snape took to be an Authority, though not Absolute. When Dr. Snape said, That no Church-Authority was to be obeyed in anything contrary to the Revealed Will of God, your Lordship triumphs thus: Glorious Absolute Authority indeed, in your own Account, to which Christ's Subjects owe no Obedience, till they have examined into his own Declarations; and then they obey not this Authority, but him.†

Here you make nothing of that Authority which is not Absolute; and yet you think it hard to be told, that you have taken away all Church-Authority. That which is Absolute, you expressly deny; and here you say, that which is not Absolute, is nothing at all. Where then is the Authority you have left? Or how is it that Christ has empowered anyone to act in his Name?

Your Lordship fights safe under the Protection of the Word Absolute; but your Aim is at all Church-Power. And your Lordship makes too hasty an Inference, that because it is not Absolute, it is none at all. If you ask, Where you have made this Inference, it is on occasion of the above-mentioned Triumph; where your Lordship makes it an insignificant Authority, which is only to be obeyed so long as it is not contrary to Scripture.

Your Lordship seems to think all is lost, as to Church-Power; because the Doctor does not claim an Absolute one, but allows it to be subject to Scripture: As if all Authority was Absolute, or else nothing at all. I shall therefore consider the Nature of this Church-Power, and show, that though it is not Absolute, yet it is a Real Authority, and is not such a mere Notion as your Lordship makes it.

An Absolute Authority, according to your Lordship, is what is to be always obeyed by every Individual that is subject to it, in all Circumstances. This is an Authority that we utterly deny to the Church. But, I presume, there may be an Authority inferior to this, which is nevertheless a Real Authority, and is to be esteemed as such, and that for these Reasons:

First, I hope it will be allowed me, that our Saviour came into the World with Authority. But it was not lawful for the Jews to receive him, if they thought his Appearance not agreeable to those Marks and Characters they had of him in their Scriptures. May not I here say, My Lord, Glorious Authority of Christ indeed, to which the Jews owed no Obedience, till they had examined their Scriptures; and then they obey, not Him, but Them!

Again; The Apostles were sent into the World with Authority: But yet, those who thought their Doctrines unworthy of God, and unsuitable to the Principles of Natural Religion, were obliged not to obey them. Glorious Authority indeed of the Apostles, to whom Mankind owed no Obedience, till they had first examined their own Notions of God and Religion; and then they obeyed, not the Apostles, but Them.

I hope, my Lord, it may be allowed, that the Sacraments are Real Means of Grace: But it is certain they are only conditionally so, if those that partake of them are endowed with suitable Dispositions of Piety and Virtue. Glorious Means of Grace of the Sacraments, which is only obtained by such pious Dispositions ; and then it is owing to the Dispositions, and not the Sacraments. Now, my Lord, if there can be such a thing as instituted Real Means of Grace, which are only conditionally applied, I cannot see, why there may not be an instituted Real Authority in the Church, which is only to be conditionally obeyed.

Your Lordship has written a great many Elaborate Pages to prove the English Government Limited ; and that no Obedience is due to it, but whilst it preserves our Fundamentals ; and, I suppose, the People are to judge for themselves, whether these are safe, or not. Glorious Authority of the English Government, which is to be obeyed no longer than the People think it their Interest to obey it !

Will your Lordship say, There is no Authority in the English Government, because only a conditional Obedience is due to it, whilst we think it supports our Fundamentals? Why then must the Church-Authority be reckoned nothing at all, because only a Rational Conditional Obedience is to be paid, whilst we think it not contrary to Scripture? Is a Limited, Conditional Government in the State, such a Wise, Excellent, and Glorious Constitution? And is the same Authority in the Church, such Absurdity, Nonsense, and nothing at all, as to any actual Power?

If there be such a thing as Obedience upon Rational Motives, there must be such a thing as Authority that is not absolute, or that does not require a Blind, Implicit Obedience. Indeed, Rational Creatures can obey no other Authority ; they must have Reasons for what they do. And yet because the Church claims only this Rational Obedience, your Lordship explodes such Authority as none at all.

Yet it must be granted, that no other Obedience was due to the Prophets, or our Saviour and his Apostles : They were only to be obeyed by those who Thought their Doctrines worthy of God. So that if the Church has no Authority, because we must first consult the Scriptures before we obey it ; neither our Saviour, nor his Apostles, had any Authority, because the Jews were first to consult their Scriptures, and the Heathens their Reason, before they obeyed them. And yet this is all that is said against Church-Authority ; That because they are to judge of the Lawfulness of its Injunctions, therefore they owe it no Obedience : Which false Conclusion I hope is enough exposed.

If we think it unlawful to do anything that the Church requires of us, we must not obey its Authority. So, if we think it unlawful to submit to any Temporal Government, we are not to comply. But, I hope, it will not follow, that the Government has no Authority, because some think it unlawful to comply with it. If we are so unhappy as to judge wrong in any Matter of Duty, we must nevertheless act according to our Judgments; and the Guilt of Disobedience either in Church or State, is more or less, according as our Error is more or less voluntary, and occasioned by our own Mismanagement.

I believe I have shown, First, That all your Lordship's Arguments against Church-Authority, conclude with the same Force against all Degrees of Authority: Secondly, That though Church-Authority be not Absolute in a certain Sense; yet if our Saviour and his Apostles had any Authority, the Church may have a Real Authority: For neither he, nor his Apostles, had such an Absolute Authority, as excludes all Consideration and Examination: Which is your Notion of Absolute Authority.

Before I leave this Head, I must observe, that in this very Answer to Dr. Snape, where you would be thought to have exposed this Absolute Authority alone, you exclude all Authority along with it. You ask the Doctor,* Is this the whole you can make of it, after all your boasted Zeal for Mere Authority? You then say, Why may not I be allowed to say, No Man on Earth hath an Absolute Authority, as well as you? My Lord, there can be no understanding of this, unless Mere Authority and Absolute Authority be taken for the same thing by your Lordship.

But, my Lord, is not the smallest Particle of Matter, Mere Matter? And is it therefore the same as the Whole Mass of Matter? Is an Inch of Space, because it is Mere Space, the same as Infinite Space? How comes it, then, that Mere Authority is the same as Absolute Authority? My Lord, Mere Authority implies only Authority, as a Mere Man implies only a Man: But your Lordship makes no Difference between this, and Absolute Authority; and therefore hath left no Authority in the Church, unless there be Authority, that is not Mere Authority, i.e. Matter that is not Mere Matter; or Space that is not Mere Space.

When the Church enjoins Matters of Indifference, is she obeyed for any Reason, but for her Mere Authority? But your Lordship allows no Obedience to Mere Authority; and therefore no Obedience even in Indifferent Matters.

Thus do these Arguments of yours lay all waste in the Church: And I must not omit one, my Lord, which falls as heavy upon the State, and makes all Civil Government unlawful. Your words are these: As the Church of Christ is the Kingdom of Christ, He himself is King; and in this it is implied, that He is the sole Law-giver to his Subjects, and Himself the sole Judge of their Behaviour in the Affairs of Conscience and Salvation. If there be any Truth or Force in this Argument, it concludes with the same Truth and Force against all Authority in the Kingdoms of this World. In Scripture we are told, the Most High ruleth in the Kingdom of Men (Dan. iv. 17), that the Lord is our Law-giver, the Lord is our King (Isa. xxxiii. 22). Now, if because Christ is King of the Church, it must be in this implied, that he is sole Law-giver to his Subjects; it is plain to a Demonstration, that because God is King and Law-giver to the whole Earth, that therefore He is sole Law-giver to his Subjects; and consequently, that all Civil Authority, all Human Laws, are mere Invasions and Usurpations upon God's Authority, as King of the whole Earth.

Is nobody to have any Jurisdiction in Christ's Kingdom, because He is King of it? How then comes anyone to have any Authority in the Kingdoms of this World, when God has declared himself the Law-giver, and King of the whole World? Will your Lordship say, that Christ hath left us the Scriptures, as the Statute-Laws of his Kingdom, to prevent the Necessity of After-Laws? It may be answered, That God has given us Reason for our constant Guide; which, if it were as duly attended to, would as certainly answer the Ends of Civil Life, as the Observance of the Scriptures would make us good Christians.

But, my Lord, as human Nature, if left to itself, would neither answer the Ends of a Spiritual or Civil Society; so a constant Visible Government in both, is equally necessary: And, I believe, it appears to all unprejudiced Eyes, that in this Argument at least, your Lordship has declared both equally Unlawful.

Your Lordship saith,* The Exclusion of the Papists from the Throne, was not upon the Account of their Religion. Three Lines after you say, I have contended indeed elsewhere, that it was their unhappy Religion which alone made them incapable in themselves, of governing this Protestant Nation by the Laws of the Land. My Lord, I can't reconcile these two Passages. Popery alone, you say, was their Incapacity. From which it may be inferred, they had no other Incapacity. Yet your Lordship saith, They were not excluded upon the Account of their Religion. A little after you say, The Ground of their Exclusion was not their Religion, considered as such; but the Fatal, Natural, Certain Effects of it upon themselves to our Destruction.

As for Instance, your Lordship may mean thus: If a Man of a great Estate dies, he loses his Right to his Estate; not upon the Account of Death, considered as such; but for the Certain, Fatal, Natural Effect of it upon himself. Or, suppose a Person be excluded for being an Idiot; it is not for his Idiocy, considered as such; but for the Certain, Fatal, Natural Effect of it upon himself to our Destruction.

My Lord, this is prodigious deep: I wish it be clear; or, that it be not too refined a Notion for common Use on this Subject. Likewise I do not conceive, my Lord, what you can call the Fatal, Natural, Certain Effects of any one's Religion. I am sure, among Protestants there are no Natural, Certain Effects of their Religion upon them; that their Practices don't Fatally follow their Principles: Neither is there any demonstrative Certainty, that a Bishop cannot be against Episcopacy.

If the Papists are so unalterably sincere in their Religion, that we can prove their certain Observation of it, it's pity but they had our Principles, and we had their Practice. I have not that good Opinion of the Papists, which your Lordship hath: I believe several of them sit as loose to their Religion, as other Folks.

Does you Lordship think, that all Papists are alike? That natural Temper, Ambition and Education, don't make as much Difference amongst them, as the same things do amongst us? Are all Protestants loose and libertine alike? Why should all Papists be the same Zealots? If not, my Lord, then these Effects you call Fatal, Natural, and Certain, may be not to be depended upon.

Your Lordship knows, that it was generally believed, that King Charles the Second was a Papist: But I never heard of any Fatal, Natural, and Certain Effects of his Religion upon him. All that one hears of it is, that he lived like a Protestant, and died like a Papist. I suppose your Lordship will allow, that several who were lately Papists, are now true Protestants. I desire therefore to know, what is become of the Fatal, Certain, and Natural Effects of their Religion?

My Lord, I beg of you to lay your Hand again upon your Heart, and ask, Whether this be strict Reasoning? Whether it is possible in the very Nature of the thing, that such Fatal, Natural, and Certain Effects should follow such a Giddy, Whimsical, Uncertain Thing, as Human and Free Choice? My Lord, is it neither possible for Papists to change or conceal their Religion for Interest, or leave it through a conscientious Conviction? If the former is impossible, then, according to your Lordship, it is the safest Religion in the World; because they are all sure of being sincere, and consequently, the First Favourites of God. If the latter is impossible, then a great many fine Sermons and Discourses have been written to as wise Purposes, as if they had been directed to the Wind.

I come now to your Lordship's Definition of Prayer, a Calm and Undisturbed Address to God. It seems very strange, that so great a Master of Words as your Lordship, should pick out Two so very exceptionable, that all your Lordship's Skill could not defend them, but by leaving their first and obvious Sense. Who would not take Calm and Undisturbed to be very like Quiet and Unmoved? Yet your Lordship dislikes those Expressions. But if these do not give us a true Idea of Prayer, you have made a very narrow Escape, and have given us a Definition of Prayer as near to a wrong one as possible.

Prayer chiefly consisteth of Confession and Petition. Now, to be Calm, and free from all worldly Passions, is a necessary Temper to the right Discharge of such Duties: But why our Confession must be so Calm, and free from all Perturbation of Spirit; why our Petitions may not have all that Fervour and Warmth, with which either Nature or Grace can supply them, is very surprising.

My Lord, we are advised to be Dead to the World; and I humbly suppose, no more is implied in it, than to keep our Affections from being too much engaged in it; and that a Calm, Undisturbed, i.e. Dispassionate Use of the World is very consistent with our being dead to it. If so, then this Calm, Undisturbed Address to Heaven, is a kind of Prayer that is very consistent with our being dead to Heaven.

We are forbid to love the World; and yet no greater Abstraction from it is required, than to use it Calm and Undisturbed. We are commanded to set our Affections on Things above; and yet, according to your Lordship, the same Calm, Undisturbed Temper is enough. According to this therefore we are to be affected, or rather unaffected alike, with this and the next World; since we are to be Calm and Undisturbed with respect to both.

The Reason your Lordship offers for this Definition of Prayer, is this; because you* look upon Calmness and Undisturbedness to be the Ornament and Defence of human Understanding in all its Actions. My Lord, this plainly supposes, there is no such thing as the Right Use of our Passions: For if we could ever use them to any Advantage, then it could not be the Ornament of our Nature to be dispassionate alike in all its Actions. It is as much the Ornament and Defence of our Nature, to be differently affected with Things according to their respective Differences, as it is to understand or conceive different Things according to their real Difference. It would be no Ornament or Credit to us, to conceive no Difference betwixt a Mountain and a Mole-Hill: And our Rational Nature is as much disgraced, when we are no more affected with great Things than with small. It is the Essential Ornament of our Nature, to be as sensibly affected in a different Manner with the different Degrees of Goodness of Things, as it is to perceive exactly the different Natures or Relations of Things. Passion is no more a Crime, as such, than the Understanding is, as such. It is nothing but mistaking the Value of Objects, that makes it criminal. An Infinite Good cannot be too passionately desired, nor a Real Evil too vehemently abhorred. Mere Philosophy, my Lord, would teach us, that the Dignity of Human Nature is best declared by a Pungent Uneasiness for the Misery of Sin, and a passionate warm Application to Heaven for Assistance.

Let us now consult the Scripture. St. Paul describes a godly Sorrow something different from your Lordship's Calm and Undisturbed Temper, in these Words: When ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what Carefulness it wrought in you! Yea, what Indignation, yea, what Fear, yea, what Zeal, yea, what Revenge! (2 Cor. vii. 11). My Lord, I suppose these are not so many Words for Calm and Undisturbed. Yet, as different as they are, the Apostle makes them the Qualities of a godly Sorrow. And all this, at the Expense of that Calmness which your Lordship terms the Ornament of human Nature. Dr. Snape pleads for the Fervency and Ardour of our Devotions, from our Saviour's praying more earnestly before his Passion.

Your Lordship replies, that this can give no Directions as to our daily Prayers; because it was what our Saviour himself knew nothing of, but this once. The Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews knew nothing of this way of Reasoning. For, as an Argument for daily Patience, he bids us look to Jesus, who endured the Cross, because he died for us, leaving us an Example.

Our Saviour, my Lord, suffered and died but once; yet is it made a Reason for our daily Patience, and proposed as an Example for us to imitate.

If therefore, my Lord, his Passion, so extraordinary in itself, and as much above the Power of human Nature to bear, as the Insenseness of his Devotions exceeded our Capacities for Prayer, be yet proposed as an Example to us in the ordinary Calamities of Life; how comes it, that his Devotion at that time should have no manner of Use or Direction in it as to our Devotions, especially in our Distress? How comes it, that his Suffering should have so much of Example in it, so much to be imitated; but the Manner of his Devotion then have nothing of Instruction, nothing that need be imitated by us? All the Reason that is offered, is the Singularity and Extraordinariness of it, when the same may be said of his Passion; yet that is allowed to be an Example.

Your Lordship is pleased, for the Information of your Unwary Readers, to reason thus upon the Place: If this be the Example of our Saviour, to assure us of his Will about the Temper necessary to Prayer, it will follow that our Blessed Lord Himself never truly prayed before this time: And yet again, if he prayed more earnestly, it will follow, that he had prayed before; and consequently, that this Temper in which He now was, was not necessary to Prayer.

My Lord, one would think this Elaborate Proof was against something asserted. Here you have indeed a thorough Conquest; but it is over nobody. For did anyone ever assert, that such Extraordinary Earnestness was necessary to Prayer? Does Dr. Snape, or any Divines, allow of no Prayers, except we sweat Drops of Blood? Will your Lordship say, that the Necessity of this Temper is implied in the Quotation of this Text, as a Direction for Prayer? I answer, just as much as we are all obliged to die upon the Cross, because his Sufferings there are proposed to us as an Example.

The plain Truth of the Matter, my Lord, I take to be this: Our Saviour's Sufferings on the Cross were such as no Mortal can undergo; yet they are justly proposed as an Example to us to bear with Patience such Sufferings as are within the Compass of human Nature. His earnest Devotion before this Passion, far exceeded any Fervours which the Devoutest of Mankind can attain to: Yet it is justly proposed to us as an Example, to excite us to be as fervent as we can; and may be justly alleged in our Defence, when our warm and passionate Addresses to God in our Calamities, are condemned as superstitious Folly. My Lord, must nothing be an Example, but what we can exactly come up to? How then can the Life of our Saviour, which was entirely free from Sin, be an Example to us? How could it be said in the Scripture, Be ye holy, for I am holy? Can anyone be Holy as God is?

My Lord, one might properly urge the Practice of the Primitive Christians, who parted with all they had for the Support of their Indigent Brethren, as an Argument for Charity, without designing to oblige People to part with all they have. And he that should, in answer to such an Argument, tell the World, that Charity is only a calm, undisturbed Good Will to all Mankind, would just as much set forth the true Doctrine of Charity, as he that defines Prayer to be a calm and undisturbed Address to Heaven, for no other Reason, but because no certain Degrees of Fervour or Affection are necessarily required to constitute Devotion. My Lord, has Charity nothing to do with the Distribution of Alms, because no certain Allowance is fixed? Why then must Prayer have nothing to do with Heat and Fervency, because no fixed Degrees of it are necessary?

Therefore, my Lord, as I would define Charity to be a pious Distribution of so much of our Goods to the Poor, as is suitable to our Circumstances; so I would define Prayer, an Address to Heaven, enlivened with such Degrees of Fervour and Intenseness, as our Natural Temper, influenced with a true Sense of God, could beget in us.

Your Lordship says, you only desire to strike at the Root of superstitious Folly, and establish Prayer in its room; and this is to be effected by making our Addresses calm and undisturbed: By which we are to understand, a Freedom from Heat and Passion, as your Lordship explains it, by an Application to yourself.

If therefore anyone should happen to be so disturbed at his Sins, as to offer a broken and contrite Heart to God, instead of one calm and undisturbed; or, like holy David, his Soul should be athirst for God, or pant after him, as the Hart panteth after the Water-brooks, this would not be Prayer, but superstitious Folly.

My Lord, Calmness of Temper, as it signifies a Power over our Passions, is a happy Circumstance of a Rational Nature, but no farther: When the Object is well chosen, there is no Danger in the Pursuit.

The Calmness your Lordship hath described, is fit for a Philosopher in his Study, who is solving Mathematical Problems. But if he should come abroad into the World, thus entirely empty of all Passion, he would live to as much Purpose, as if he had left his Understanding behind him.

What a fine Subject, my Lord, would such a one make, who, when he heard of Plots, Invasions, and Rebellions, would continue as calm and undisturbed, as when he was comparing Lines and Figures? Such a calm Subject would scarce be taken for any Great Loyalist.

Your Lordship, in other Places, hath recommended an open and undisguised Zeal,* and told us such things as ought to alarm the coldest Heart.† Sure, my Lord, this is somewhat more than Calm and Undisturbed: And will your Lordship, who hath expressed so much Concern for this Ornament and Defence of human Understanding, persuade us to part with the least Degree of it upon any Account? I am, my Lord, (with all Respect that is due to your Lordship's Station and Character),

Obedient Servant,

The Second Letter to the Bishop of Bangor.

My Lord,

A Just Concern for Truth, and the First Principles of the Christian Religion, was the only Motive that engaged me in the Examination of your Lordship's Doctrines, in a former Letter to your Lordship. And the same Motive, I hope, will be thought a sufficient Apology for my presuming to give your Lordship the Trouble of a Second Letter.

Amongst the Vain Contemptible Things, whereof your Lordship would create an Abhorrence in the Laity, are, the Trifles and Niceties of Authoritative Benedictions, Absolutions, Excommunications.* Again, you say, that to expect the Grace of God from any Hands, but his own, is to affront him—† And that all depends upon God and ourselves; That Human Benedictions, Human Absolutions, Human Excommunications, have nothing to do with the Favour of God.‡

It is evident from these Maxims (for your Lordship asserts them as such) that whatever Institutions are observed in any Christian Society, upon this Supposition, that thereby Grace is conferred through Human Hands, or by the Ministry of the Clergy, such Institutions ought to be condemned, and are condemned by your Lordship, as trifling, useless, and affronting to God.

There is an Institution, my Lord, in the yet Established Church of England, which we call Confirmation: It is founded upon the express Words of Scripture, Primitive Observance, and the Universal Practice of all succeeding Ages in the Church. The Design of this Institution is, that it should be a Means of conferring Grace, by the Prayer and Imposition of the Bishop's Hands on those who have been already Baptized. But yet against all this Authority, both Divine and Human, and the express Order of our own Church, your Lordship teaches the Laity, that all Human Benedictions are useless Niceties ; and that to expect God's Grace from any Hands but his own, is to affront him.

If so, my Lord, what shall we say in Defence of the Apostles ? We read (Acts 8. 14) that when Philip the Deacon had baptized the Samaritans, the Apostles sent Peter and John to them, who having prayed, and laid their Hands on them, they received the Holy Ghost, who before was fallen upon none of them ; only they were baptized in the Name of the Lord Jesus.

My Lord, several things are here out of Question ; First, That something else, even in the Apostolical Times, was necessary, besides Baptism, in order to qualify Persons to become complete Members of the Body, or Partakers of the Grace of Christ. They had been baptized, yet did not receive the Holy Ghost, till the Apostles' Hands were laid upon them. Secondly, That God's Graces are not only conferred by means of Human Hands, but of some particular Hands, and not others. Thirdly, That this Office was so strictly appropriated to the Apostles, or Chief Governors of the Church, that it could not be performed by inspired Men, though empowered to work Miracles, who were of an inferior Order ; as Philip the Deacon. Fourthly, That the Power of the Apostles for the Performance of this Ordinance, was entirely owing to their superior Degree in the Ministry, and not to any extraordinary Gifts they were endowed with : For then Philip might have performed it ; who was not wanting in those Gifts, being himself an Evangelist, and Worker of Miracles : Which is a Demonstration, that his Incapacity arose from his inferior Degree in the Ministry.

And now, my Lord, are all human Benedictions Niceties and Trifles ? Are the Means of God's Grace in his own Hands alone ? Is it wicked, and affronting to God, to suppose the contrary ? How then comes Peter and John to confer the Holy Ghost by the Imposition of their Hands ? How comes it, that they appropriate this Office to themselves ? Is the Dispensation of God's Grace in his own Hands alone ? And yet can it be dispensed to us by the Ministry of some Persons, and not by that of others ?

Were the Apostles so wicked as to distinguish themselves by a Pretence to vain Powers, which God had reserved to himself ; And which your Lordship supposes, from the Title of your Preservative, that it is inconsistent with common Sense, to imagine that God could or would have communicated to Men ?

Had any of your Lordship's well-instructed Laity lived in the Apostles' Days, with what Indignation must they have rejected this senseless chimerical Claim of the Apostles? They must have said, Why do you, Peter or John, pretend to this Blasphemous Power? Whilst we believe the Gospel, we cannot expect the Grace of God from any Hands but his own. You give us the Holy Ghost! You confer the Grace of God! Is it not impious to think, that he should make our Improvement in Grace depend upon your Ministry; or hang our Salvation on any particular Order of Clergymen? We know, that God is Just, and Good, and True, and that all depends upon Him and ourselves, and that human Benedictions are Trifles. Therefore whether you Peter, or you Philip, or both, or neither of you lay your Hands upon us, we are neither better nor worse; but just in the same State of Grace as we were before.

This Representation has not one Syllable in it, but what is founded in your Lordship's Doctrine, and perfectly agreeable to it.

The late most Pious and Learned Bishop Beveridge has these remarkable Words upon Confirmation: 'How any Bishops in our Age dare neglect so considerable a Part of their Office, I know not; but fear they will have no good Account to give of it, when they come to stand before God's Tribunal.*'

But we may justly, and therefore I hope, with Decency, ask your Lordship, how you dare perform this Part of your Office? For you have condemned it as Trifling and Wicked; as Trifling, because it is an human Benediction; as Wicked, because it supposes Grace conferred by the Hands of the Bishop. If therefore any baptized Persons should come to your Lordship for Confirmation, if you are sincere in what you have delivered, your Lordship ought, I humbly conceive, to make them this Declaration:

'My Friends, for the sake of Decency and Order, I have taken upon me the Episcopal Character; and, according to Custom, which has long prevailed against common Sense, am now to lay my Hands upon you: But I beseech you, as you have any regard to the Truth of the Gospel, or to the Honour of God, not to imagine there is anything in this Action, more than an useless empty Ceremony: For if you expect to have any Spiritual Advantage from human Benedictions, or to receive Grace from the Imposition of a Bishop's Hands, you affront God, and in effect, renounce Christianity.'

Pray, my Lord, consider that Passage in the Scripture, where the Apostle speaks of Leaving the Principles of the Doctrine of Christ, and going on unto Perfection; not laying again the Foundation of Repentance from dead Works, of Faith towards God, of the Doctrine of Baptisms, and of Laying on of Hands, and of the Resurrection of the Dead, and of eternal Judgment (Heb. vi. 1, 2).

My Lord, here it is undeniably plain, that this Laying on of Hands (which is with us called Confirmation) is so fundamental a Part of Christ's Religion, that it is called one of the first Principles of the Doctrine of Christ; and is placed amongst such primary Truths, as the Resurrection of the Dead, and of Eternal Judgment.

St. Cyprian speaking of this Apostolical Imposition of Hands, says, The same is now practised with us; they who have been baptized in the Church, are brought to the Presidents of the Church, that by our Prayer and Imposition of Hands, they may receive the Holy Ghost, and be consummated with the Lord's Seal.

And must we yet believe, that all human Benedictions are Dreams, and the Imposition of human Hands trifling and useless; and that to expect God's Graces from them, is to affront him; though the Scriptures expressly teach us, that God confers his Grace by means of certain particular human Hands, and not of others; though they tell us, this human Benediction, this Laying on of Hands, is one of the first Principles of the Religion of Christ, and as such a Foundation-Doctrine, as the Resurrection of the Dead, and Eternal Judgment; and though every Age since that of the Apostles, has strictly observed it as such, and the Authority of our own Church still requires the Observance of it?

I come now, my Lord, to another sacred and Divine Institution of Christ's Church, which stands exposed and condemned by your Lordship's Doctrine; and that is, the Ordination of the Christian Clergy; where, by means of a human Benediction, and the Imposition of the Bishop's Hands, the Holy Ghost is supposed to be conferred on Persons towards consecrating them for the Work of the Ministry.

We find it constantly taught by the Scriptures, that all Ecclesiastical Authority, and the Graces whereby the Clergy are qualified and enabled to exercise their Functions to the Benefit of the Church, are the Gifts and Graces of the Holy Spirit. Thus the Apostle exhorts the Elders to take heed unto the Flock, over which the Holy Ghost had made them Overseers (Eph. iv. 7). But how, my Lord, had the Holy Ghost made them Overseers, but by the laying on of the Apostles' Hands? They were not immediately called by the Holy Ghost; but being consecrated by such human Hands as had been authorised to that Purpose, they were as truly called by him, and sanctified with Grace for that Employment, as if they had received an immediate or miraculous Commission. So again, St. Paul puts Timothy in mind to stir up the Gift of God that was in him, by laying on of his Hands (2 Tim. ii. 6).

And now, my Lord, if human Benedictions be such idle Dreams and Trifles; if it be affronting to God, to expect his Graces from them, or through human Hands; do we not plainly want new Scriptures? Must we not give up the Apostles as furious High-Church Prelates, who aspired to presumptuous Claims, and talked of conferring the Graces of God by their own Hands? Was not this Doctrine as strange and unaccountable then, as at present? Was it not as inconsistent with the Attributes and Sovereignty of God at that Time, to have his Graces pass through other Hands than his own, as in any succeeding Age? Nay, my Lord, where shall we find any Fathers or Councils, in the primitive Church, but who owned and asserted these Powers? They that were so ready to part with their Lives, rather than do the least Dishonour to God, or the Christian Name, yet were all guilty of this horrid Blasphemy, in imagining that they were to bless in God's Name; and that by the Benediction and laying on of the Bishop's Hands, the Graces of the Holy Ghost could be conferred on any Persons.

Agreeable to the Sense of Scripture and Antiquity, our Church uses this Form of Ordination: The Bishop laying his Hands on the Person's Head, saith, Receive the Holy Ghost, for the Office and Work of a Priest in the Church of God, committed unto thee, by the Imposition of our Hands. From this Form, it is plain, First, That our Church holds, that the Reception of the Holy Ghost is necessary to constitute a Person a Christian Priest. Secondly, That the Holy Ghost is conferred through human Hands. Thirdly, That it is by the Hands of a Bishop that the Holy Ghost is conferred.

If, therefore, your Lordship is right in your Doctrine, the Church of England is evidently most corrupt: For if it be dishonourable and affronting to God, to expect his Grace from any human Hands, it must of Necessity be dishonourable and affronting to him, for a Bishop to pretend to confer it by his Hands. And can that Church be any ways defended, that has established such an Iniquity by Law, and made the Form of it so necessary? How can your Lordship answer it to your Laity, for taking the Character or Power of a Bishop from such a Form of Words? You tell them it is affronting to God, to expect his Grace from human Hands; yet, to qualify yourself for a Bishopric, you let human Hands be laid on you, after a Manner which directly supposes you thereby receive the Holy Ghost! Is it wicked in them to expect it from human Hands? And is it less so in your Lordship, to pretend to receive it from human Hands? He that believes it is affronting to God, to expect his Grace from human Hands, must likewise believe, that our Form of Ordination, which promises the Holy Ghost by the Bishop's Hands, must be also affronting to God. Certainly he cannot be said to be very jealous of the Honour of God, who will submit himself to be made a Bishop by a Form of Words derogatory, upon his own Principles, to God's Honour.

Suppose your Lordship were to have been consecrated to the Office of a Bishop by these Words; Take thou Power to sustain all Things in Being, given thee by my Hands. I suppose your Lordship would think it entirely unlawful to submit to the Form of such an Ordination. But, my Lord, Receive thou the Holy Ghost, &c., is as impious a Form, according to your Lordship's Doctrine, and equally injurious to the eternal Power and Godhead, as the other. For if the Grace of God can only be had from his own Hands, would it not be as innocent in the Bishop to say, Receive thou Power to sustain all Things in Being, as to say, Receive the Holy Ghost, by the Imposition of my Hands? And would not a Compliance with either Form be equally unlawful? According to your Doctrine, in each of them God's Prerogative is equally invaded, and therefore the Guilt must be the same.

It may also well be wondered, how your Lordship can accept of a Character, which is, or ought to be, chiefly distinguished by the Exercise of that Power which you disclaim, as in the Offices of Confirmation and Ordination. For, my Lord, where can be the Sincerity of saying, Receive the Holy Ghost by the Imposition of our Hands, when you declare it affronting to God, to expect it from any Hands but his own? Suppose your Lordship had been preaching to the Laity against owning any Authority in the Virgin Mary, and yet should acquiesce in the Conditions of being made a Bishop in her Name, and by recognising her Power; could such a Submission be consistent with Sincerity? Here you forbid the Laity to expect God's Grace from any Hands but his; yet not only accept of an Office, upon Supposition of the contrary Doctrine; but oblige yourself according to the Sense of the Church wherein you are ordained a Bishop, to act frequently in direct Opposition to your own Principles.

So that, I think, it is undeniably plain, that you have at once, my Lord, by these Doctrines condemned the Scriptures, the Apostles, their martyred Successors, the Church of England, and your own Conduct; and have thereby given us some Reason (though I wish there were no Occasion to mention it) to suspect, whether you, who allow of no other Church, but what is founded in Sincerity, are yourself really a Member of any Church.

I shall now proceed to say something upon the Consecration of the Lord's Supper, which is as much exposed as a Trifle, by your Lordship's Doctrine, as the other Institutions. St. Paul says, The Cup of Blessing which we bless, is it not the Communion of the Blood of Christ? My Lord, is not this Cup still to be blessed? Must there not therefore be such a Thing as a human Benediction? And are human Benedictions to be all despised, though by them the Bread and Wine become Means of Grace, and are made the spiritual Nourishment of our Souls? Can anyone bless this Cup? If not, then there is a Difference between human Benedictions: Some are authorised by God, and their Blessing is effectual; whilst others only are vain and presumptuous. If the Prayer over the Elements, and the Consecration, be only a Trifle and a Dream, and it be offensive to God to expect they are converted into Means of Grace by a human Benediction; why then did St. Paul pretend to bless them? Why did he make it the Privilege of the Church? Or, why do we keep up the same Solemnity? But if it be to be blessed only by God's Ministers, then how can your Lordship answer it to God, for ridiculing and abusing human Benedictions, and telling the World that a particular Order of the Clergy are not of any Necessity, nor can be of any Advantage to them? For if the Sacrament can only be blessed by God's Ministers, then such Ministers are as necessary as the Sacraments themselves.

St. Paul says, the Cup must be blessed; If you say, anyone may bless it, then, though you contemn the Benedictions of the Clergy, you allow of them by everybody else: If every Body cannot bless it, then you must confess; that the Benedictions of some Persons are effectual, where others are not.

My Lord, the great Sin against the Holy Ghost, was the Denial of his Operation in the Ministry of our Saviour. And how near does your Lordship come to it, in denying the Operation of that same Spirit, in the Ministers whom Christ hath sent? They are employed in the same Work that he was. He left his Authority with them, and promised that the Holy Spirit should remain with them to the End of the World; that whatsoever they should bind on Earth, should be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever they should loose on Earth, should be loosed in Heaven; and that whosoever despises them, despises him, and him that sent him. And yet your Lordship tells us, we need not to trouble our Heads about any particular Sort of Clergy, that all is to be transacted betwixt God and ourselves ; that human Benedictions are insignificant Trifles.

But pray what Proof has your Lordship for all this ? Have you any Scripture for it ? Has God anywhere declared that no Men on Earth have any Authority to bless in his Name ? Has he anywhere said, that it is a wicked, presumptuous Thing, for anyone to pretend to it ? Has he anywhere told us that it is inconsistent with his Honour to bestow his Graces by human Hands ? Has he anywhere told us that he has no Ministers, no Ambassadors on Earth ; but that all his Gifts and Graces are to be received immediately from his own Hands ? Have you any Antiquity, Fathers, or Councils, on your Side ? No ; the whole Tenor of Scripture, the whole Current of Tradition is against you : Your novel Doctrine has only this to recommend it to the Libertines of the Age, who universally give into it, that it never was the Opinion of any Church, or Churchman. It is your Lordship's proper Assertion, That we offend God in expecting his Graces from any Hands but his own.

Now it is strange, that God should be offended with his own Methods, or that your Lordship should find us out a Way of pleasing him, more suitable to his Nature and Attributes, than what he has taught us in the Scriptures. I call them his own Methods ; for what else is the whole Jewish Dispensation, but a Method of God's Providence, where his Blessings and Judgments were dispensed by human Hands ? What is the Christian Religion but a Method of Salvation, where the chief Means of Grace are offered and dispensed by human Hands ? Let me here recommend to your Lordship, the excellent Words of a very learned and judicious Prelate on this Occasion.

'This will have no Weight with any reasonable Man, against the Censures of the Church, or any other Ordinance of the Gospel, that they make the Intervention of other Men necessary to our Salvation ; since it has always been God's ordinary Method, to dispense his Blessings and Judgments by the Hands of Men.'*

Your Lordship exclaims against your Adversaries as such romantic strange sort of Men, for talking of Benedictions and Absolutions, and of the Necessity of receiving God's Ordinances from proper Hands : Yet, my Lord, here is an excellent Bishop, against whose Learning, Judgment, and Protestantism, there can be no Objection ; who says, if a Person has but the Use of his Reason, he will have nothing to object to any Ordinances of the Gospel, which make the Intervention of other Men necessary towards the Conveyance of them, since that has always been God's ordinary Method. The Bishop does not say, it is necessary a Man should be a great Divine to acknowledge it ; so he be but a reasonable Man, he will allow it. Yet your Lordship is so far from being this reasonable Man, that you think your Adversaries void both of Reason and common Sense, for teaching it. You expressly exclude all Persons from having any Thing to do with our Salvation, and say, it wholly depends upon God and ourselves.

You tell us, that *authoritative Benediction is another of the Terms of Art used by your Protestant Adversaries ; in which they claim a Right, in one regular Succession, of blessing the People. An ingenious Author, my Lord, (in the Opinion of many, if not of most of your Friends) calls the Consecration of the Elements Conjuratation : † Your Lordship calls the Sacerdotal Benediction a Term of Art ; too plain an Intimation, though in more remote and somewhat softer Terms, that in the Sense of a certain Father of the Church, her Clergy are little better than so many Jugglers.

Your Lordship says, If they only meant hereby to declare upon what Terms God will give his Blessings to Christians, or to express their own hearty Wishes for them, this might be understood. So it might, my Lord, very easily ; and I suppose every Body understands that they may do this, whether they be Clergy or Laity, Men or Women : For I presume anyone may declare what he takes to be the Terms of the Gospel, and wish that others may faithfully observe them. But I humbly presume, my Lord, that the good Bishop above-mentioned meant something more than this, when he spake of Ordinances which make the Intervention of other Men necessary to our Salvation, and of God's dispensing his Blessings in virtue of them through their Hands.

There is a superstitious Custom (in your Lordship's Account it must be so) yet remaining in most Places, of sending for a Clergyman to minister to sick Persons in imminent Danger of Death : Even those who have abused the Clergy all their Lives long, are glad to beg their Assistance when they apprehend themselves upon the Confines of another World. There is no Reason, my Lord, to dislike this Practice, but as it supposes a Difference between the Sacerdotal Prayers and Benedictions, and those of a Nurse.

We read, my Lord, that God would not heal Abimelech, though he knew the Integrity of his Heart, till Abraham had prayed for him : He is a Prophet, said God, he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live (Gen. xx. 7).

Pray, my Lord, was not God just, and good, and true, in the Days of Abraham, as he is now? Yet you see, Abimelech's Integrity was not available itself. He was to be pardoned by the Prayer of Abraham, and his Prayer was effectual; and so represented, because it was the Prayer of a Prophet.

Suppose, my Lord, that Abimelech had said with your Lordship, That it is affronting to God, that we should expect his Graces from any Hands but his own; that all is to be transacted between God and ourselves; and so had rejected the Prayer of Abraham, as a mere Essay of Prophet-Craft; he had then acted with as much Prudence and Piety as your Lordship's Laity would do, if you could persuade them to despise Benedictions and Absolutions, to regard no particular sort of Clergy; but entirely depend upon God and themselves, without any other Assistance whatever.

We read also, that Joshua was full of the Spirit of Wisdom, for Moses had laid his Hands upon him (Deut. xxxiv. 9). Was it not as absurd, my Lord, in the Days of Joshua, for human Hands to bless, as it is now? Did there not then lie the same Objection against Moses, that there does now against the Christian Clergy? Had Moses any more natural Power to give the Spirit of Wisdom, &c., by his Hands, than the Clergy have to confer Grace by theirs? They are both equally weak and insufficient for these Purposes of themselves, and equally powerful when it pleases God to make them so.

Again, when Eliphaz and his Friends had displeased God, they were not to be reconciled to God by their own Repentance, or transact that Matter only between God and themselves; but they were referred to apply to Job. My Servant Job shall pray for you, for him will I accept (Job xlii. 8). Might not Eliphaz here have said, shall I so far affront God, as to think I cannot be blessed without the Prayers of Job? Shall I be so weak or senseless, as to imagine, my own Supplications and Repentance will not save me; or that I need apply to any one but God alone, to qualify me for the Reception of his Grace?

Again, The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, speak unto Aaron and his sons, saying, on this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless and keep thee, &c., and I will bless them (Numb. vi. 22).

Again, The Priests of the Sons of Levi shall come near; for them hath the Lord thy God chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the Name of the Lord (Deut. xxi. 5).

Now, my Lord, this is what we mean by the authoritative Administrations of the Christian Clergy; whether they be by way of Benediction, or of any other kind. We take them to be Persons whom God has chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in his Name. We imagine that our Saviour was a greater Priest and Mediator than Aaron, or any of God's former Ministers. We are assured that Christ sent his Apostles, as his Father had sent him, and that therefore they were his true Successors: And since they did commission others to succeed them in their Office, by the Imposition of Hands, as Moses commissioned Joshua to succeed him; the Clergy who have succeeded the Apostles, have as divine a Call and Commission to their Work, as those who were called by our Saviour; and are as truly his Successors, as the Apostles themselves were.

From the Places of Scripture above-mentioned, it is evident, and indeed from the whole Tenor of Sacred Writ, that it may consist with the Goodness and Justness of God to depute Men to act in his Name, and be ministerial towards the Salvation of others; and to lay a Necessity upon his Creatures of qualifying themselves for his Favour, and receiving his Graces by the Hands and Intervention of mere Men.

But, my Lord, if there be now any Set of Men upon Earth that are more peculiarly God's Ministers than others, and through whose Administrations, Prayers, and Benedictions, God will accept of returning Sinners, and receive them to Grace; you have done all you can to prejudice People against them: You have taught the Laity that all is to be transacted between God and themselves, and that they need not value any particular Sort of Clergy in the World.

I leave it to the Great Judge and Searcher of Hearts, to judge from what Principles, or upon what Motives your Lordship has been induced to teach these Things; but must declare, that, for my own Part, if I had the greatest Hatred to Christianity, I should think it could not be more expressed than by teaching what your Lordship has publicly taught. If I could rejoice in the Misery and Ruin of Sinners, I should think it sufficient Matter of Triumph, to drive them from the Ministers of God, and to put them upon inventing new Schemes of saving themselves instead of submitting to the ordinary Methods of Salvation appointed by God.

It will not follow from anything I have said, that the Laity have lost their Christian Liberty, or that no Body can be saved but whom the Clergy please to save; that they have the arbitrary Disposal of Happiness to Mankind. Was Abimelech's Happiness in the Disposition of Abraham, because he was to be received by Means of Abraham's Intercession? Or could Job damn Eliphaz, because he was to mediate for him, and procure his Reconciliation to God?

Neither, my Lord, do the Christian Clergy pretend to this despotic Empire over their Flocks. They do not assume to themselves a Power to damn the Innocent, or to save the Guilty; but they assert a sober and just Right to reconcile Men to God, and to act in his Name, in restoring them to his Favour. They received their Commission from those whom Christ sent with full Authority to send others, and with a Promise that he would be with them to the End of the World. From this they conclude, that they have his Authority, and that in consequence of it, their Administrations are necessary, and effectual to the Salvation of Mankind; and that none can despise them, but who despise him that sent them; and are as surely out of the Covenant of Grace, when they leave such his Pastors, as when they openly despise, or omit to receive his Sacraments.

And what is there in this Doctrine, my Lord, to terrify the Consciences of the Laity? What is there here to bring the profane Scandal of Priestcraft upon the Clergy? Could it be any Ground of Abimelech's hating Abraham, because that Abraham was to reconcile him to God? Could Eliphaz justly have any Prejudice against Job, because God would hear Job's Intercession for him? Why then, my Lord, must the Christian Priesthood be so horrid and hateful an Institution, because the Design of it is to restore Men to the Grace and Favour of God? Why must we be abused and insulted for being sent upon the Errand of Salvation, and made Ministers of eternal Happiness to our Brethren? There is a Woe due to us if we preach not the Gospel, or neglect those ministerial Offices that Christ hath entrusted to us. We are to watch for their Souls, as those who are to give an Account. Why then must we be treated as arrogant Priests, or popishly affected, for pretending to have any Thing to do in the Discharge of our Ministry with the Salvation of Men? Why must we be reproached with blasphemous Claims, and absurd senseless Powers, for assuming to bless in God's Name, or thinking our Administrations more effectual than the Office of a common Layman?

But farther, To what Purpose does your Lordship except against these Powers in the Clergy, from their common Frailties and Infirmities with the rest of Mankind? Were not Abraham and Job, and the Jewish Priests, Men of like Passions with us? Did not our Saviour command the Jews to apply to their Priests, notwithstanding their personal Faults, because they sat in Moses' Chair? Did not the Apostles assure their Followers that they were Men of like Passions with them? But did they therefore disclaim their Mission, or Apostolical Authority? Did they teach, that their natural Infirmities made them less the Ministers of God, or less necessary to the Salvation of Men? Their personal Defects did not make them depart from the Claim of those Powers they were invested with, or desert their Ministry, but, indeed, gave St. Paul Occasion to say, We have this Treasure in earthen Vessels, (i.e., this Authority committed to mere Men) that the excellency of it may be of God, and not of Men. The Apostle happens to differ very much from your Lordship: He says, such weak Instruments were made use of that the Glory might redound to God. Your Lordship says, to suppose Instruments to be of any Benefit to us, is to lessen the Sovereignty of God, and, in Consequence, his Glory.

Your Lordship imagines you have sufficiently destroyed the sacerdotal Powers, by showing, that the Clergy are only Men, and subject to the common Frailties of Mankind. My Lord, we own the Charge, and do not claim any sacerdotal Powers from our personal Abilities, or to acquire any Glory to ourselves. But, weak as we are, we are God's Ministers, and if we are either afraid or ashamed of our Duty, we must perish in the Guilt. But is a Prophet therefore proud, because he insists upon the Authority of his Mission? Cannot a Mortal be God's Messenger, and employed in his Affairs, but he must be insolent and assuming, for having the Resolution to own it? If we are to be re-proved for pretending to be God's Ministers, because we are but Men, the Reproach will fall upon Providence; since it has pleased God, chiefly to transact his Affairs with Mankind by the Ministry of their Brethren.

Your Lordship has not one Word from Scripture against these sacerdotal Powers; no Proof that Christ has not sent Men to be effectual Administrators of his Graces: You only assert, that there can be no such Ministers, because they are mere Men.

Now, my Lord, I must beg Leave to say, that if the natural Weakness of Men makes them incapable of being the Instruments of conveying Grace to their Brethren; if the Clergy cannot be of any Use or Necessity to their Flocks, for this Reason; then it undeniably follows, that there can be no positive Institutions in the Christian Religion that can procure any spiritual Advantages to the Members of it; then the Sacraments can be no longer any Means of Grace. For, I hope, no one thinks that Bread and Wine have any natural Force or Efficacy to convey Grace to the Soul. The Water in Baptism has the common Qualities of Water, and is destitute of any intrinsic Power to cleanse the Soul, or purify from Sin. But your Lordship will not say, because it has only the common Nature of Water, that therefore it cannot be a Means of Grace. Why then may not the Clergy, though they have the common Nature of Men, be constituted by God, to convey his Graces, and to be ministerial to the Salvation of their Brethren? Can God consecrate inanimate Things to spiritual Purposes, and make them the Means of eternal Happiness? And is Man the only Creature that he cannot make subservient to his Designs? The only Being, who is too weak for an Omnipotent God to render effectual towards attaining the Ends of his Grace?

Is it just and reasonable, to reject and despise the Ministry and Benedictions of Men, because they are Men like ourselves? And is it not as reasonable, to despise the Sprinkling of Water, a Creature below us, a senseless and inanimate Creature?

Your Lordship therefore, must either find us some other Reason for rejecting the Necessity of human Administrations, than because they are human; or else give up the Sacraments, and all positive Institutions along with them.

Surely, your Lordship must have a mighty Opinion of Naaman the Syrian, who, when the Prophet bid him go wash in Jordan seven times, to the end he might be clean from his Leprosy, very wisely remonstrated, Are not Abana and Pharpar, Rivers of Damascus, better than all the Waters of Israel?

This, my Lord, discovered Naaman's great Liberty of Mind; and it is much, this has not been produced before, as an Argument of his being a Free-Thinker. He took the Water of Jordan to be only Water; as your Lordship justly observes a Clergyman to be only a Man: And if you had been with him, you could have informed him, that the washing seven Times was a mere Nicety and Trifle of the Prophet; and that since it is God alone who can work miraculous Cures, we ought not to think, that they depend upon any external Means, or any stated Number of repeating them.

This, my Lord, is the true Scope and Spirit of your Argument: If the Syrian was right in despising the Water of Jordan, because it was only Water; your Lordship might be right in despising any particular Order of Clergy, because they are but Men. Your Lordship is certainly as right, or as wrong, as he was.

And now, my Lord, let the common Sense of Mankind here judge, whether, if the Clergy are to be esteemed as having no Authority, because they are but Men; it does not plainly follow, that everything else, every Institution that has not some natural Force and Power to produce the Effects designed by it, is not also to be rejected as equally trifling and ineffectual.

The Sum of the Matter is this : It appears from many express Facts, and indeed, from the whole Series of God's Providence, that it is not only consistent with his Attributes, but also agreeable to his ordinary Methods of dealing with Mankind, that he should substitute Men to act in his Name, and be authoritatively employed in conferring his Graces and Favours upon Mankind. It appears, that your Lordship's Argument against the authoritative Administrations of the Christian Clergy, does not only contradict those Facts, and condemn the ordinary Method of God's Dispensations ; but likewise proves the Sacraments, and every positive Institution of Christianity, to be ineffectual, and as mere Dreams and Trifles, as the several Offices and Orders of the Clergy.

This, I hope, will be esteemed a sufficient Confutation of your Lordship's Doctrine, by all who have any true Regard or Zeal for the Christian Religion ; and only expect to be saved by the Methods of divine Grace proposed in the Gospel.

I shall now in a word or two set forth the Sacredness of the Ecclesiastical Character, as it is founded in the New Testament ; with a particular regard to the Power of conferring Grace, and the Efficacy of human Benedictions.

It appears therein that all sacerdotal Power is derived from the Holy Ghost. Our Saviour himself took not that Ministry upon him, till he had this Consecration : And during the time of his Ministry, he was under the Guidance and Direction of the Holy Ghost. Through the Holy Spirit he gave Commandment to the Apostles whom he had chosen. When he ordained them to the Work of the Ministry, it was with these Words, Receive the Holy Ghost. Those whom the Apostles ordained to the same Function, it was by the same Authority : They laid their Hands upon the Elders, exhorting them to take care of the Flock of Christ, over which the Holy Ghost had made them Overseers.

Hereby they plainly declared, that however this Office was to descend from Man to Man through human Hands, that it was the Holy Ghost which consecrated them to that Employment, and gave them Authority to execute it.

From this it is also manifest, that the Priesthood is a Grace of the Holy Ghost : That it is not a Function founded on the Natural or Civil Rights of Mankind, but is derived from the special Authority of the Holy Ghost ; and is as truly a positive Institution as the Sacraments. So that they who have no Authority to alter the Old Sacraments, and substitute New ones, have no Power to alter the Old Order of the Clergy, or introduce any other Order of them.

For why can we not change the Sacraments? Is it not because they are only Sacraments, and operate as they are instituted by the Holy Ghost? Because they are useless ineffectual Rites without this Authority? And does not the same Reason hold as well for the Order of the Clergy? Does not the same Scripture tell us, they are equally instituted by the Holy Ghost, and oblige only by virtue of his Authority? How absurd is it therefore to pretend to abolish, or depart from the settled Order of the Clergy, to make new Orders, or think any God's Ministers, unless we had his Authority, and could make new Sacraments, or a new Religion?

My Lord, how comes it, That we cannot alter the Scriptures? Is it not, because they are Divinely inspired, and dictated by the Holy Ghost? And since it is express Scripture, That the Priesthood is instituted and authorised by the same Holy Spirit, Why is not the Holy Ghost as much to be regarded in one Institution, as in another? Why may we not as well make a Gospel, and say, it was writ by the Holy Ghost, as make a new Order of Clergy, and call them his? Or esteem them as having any relation to him?

From this it likewise appears, That there is an absolute Necessity of a strict Succession of authorised Ordainers from the Apostolical Times, in order to constitute a Christian Priest. For since a Commission from the Holy Ghost is necessary for the exercise of this Office; no one now can receive it, but from those who have derived their Authority in a true Succession, from the Apostles. We could not, my Lord, call our present Bibles the Word of God, unless we knew the Copies from which they are taken were taken from other true ones, till we come to the Originals themselves. No more could we call any true Ministers, or authorised by the Holy Ghost, who have not received their Commission by an uninterrupted Succession of lawful Ordainers.

What an excellent Divine would he be, who should tell the World, it was not necessary that the several Copies and Manuscripts through which the Scriptures have been transmitted through different Ages and Languages, should be all true ones, and none of them forged? That this was a Thing subject to so great Uncertainty, that God could not hang our Salvation on such Niceties? Suppose, for Proof of this, he should appeal to the Scriptures; and ask, where any mention is made of ascertaining the Truth of all the Copies? Would not this be a Way of Arguing very Theological? The Application is very easy.

Your Lordship has not one Word to prove the uninterrupted Succession of the Clergy a Trifle or Dream; but that it is subject to so great Uncertainty, and is never mentioned in the Scriptures. As to the Uncertainty of it, it is equally as uncertain, as whether the Scriptures be Genuine. There is just the same sufficient Historical Evidence for the Certainty of one as the other. As to its not being mentioned in the Scripture, the Doctrine upon which it is founded, plainly made it unnecessary to mention it. Is it needful for the Scriptures to tell us, that if we take our Bible from any false Copy, that it is not the Word of God? Why then need they tell us, that if we are ordained by usurping false Pretenders to Ordination, nor deriving their Authority to that end from the Apostles, that we are no Priests? Does not the thing itself speak as plain in one Case as in the other? The Scriptures are only of use to us, as they are the Word of God: We cannot have this Word of God, which was written so many Years ago, unless we receive it from authentic Copies and Manuscripts.

The Clergy have their Commission from the Holy Ghost: The Power of conferring this Commission of the Holy Ghost, was left with the Apostles: Therefore the present Clergy cannot have the same Commission, or Call, but from an Order of Men, who have successively conveyed this Power from the Apostles to the present time. So that, my Lord, I shall beg leave to lay it down, as a plain, undeniable, Christian Truth, that the Order of the Clergy is an Order of as necessary Obligation as the Sacraments; and as unalterable as the Holy Scriptures; the same Holy Ghost being as truly the Author and Founder of the Priesthood, as the Institutor of the Sacraments, or the Inspirer of those Divine Oracles. And when your Lordship shall offer any fresh Arguments to prove that no particular sort of Clergy is necessary; that the Benedictions and Administrations of the present Clergy of our most excellent Church, are trifling Niceties; if I cannot show that the same Arguments will conclude against the Authority of the Sacraments and the Scriptures, I faithfully promise your Lordship to become a Convert to your Doctrine.

What your Lordship charges upon your Adversaries, as an absurd Doctrine, in pretending the Necessity of one regular, successive, and particular Order of the Clergy, is a true Christian Doctrine; and as certain from Scripture, as that we are to keep to the Institution of particular Sacraments; or not to alter those particular Scriptures, which now compose the Canon of the old and new Testament.

By authoritative Benediction, we do not mean any natural or intrinsic Authority of our own: But a Commission from God, to be effectual Administrators of his Ordinances, and to bless in his Name. Thus, a Person who is sent from God, to foretell things, of which he had before no Knowledge or Notion; or to denounce Judgments, which he has no natural Power to execute; may truly be said to be an authoritative Prophet; because he has the Authority of God for what he does. Thus, when the Bishop is said to confer Grace in Confirmation, this is properly an authoritative Benediction; because he is then as truly doing what God has commissioned him to do, as when a Prophet declares upon what Errand he is sent.

It is in this Sense, my Lord, that the People are said to be authoritatively blessed by the regular Clergy; because they are God's Clergy, and act by his Commission; because by their Hands the People receive the Graces and Benefits of God's Ordinances; which they have no more Reason to expect from other Ministers of their own Election, or if the Word may be used in an abusive Sense, of their own Consecration, than to receive Grace from Sacraments of their own Appointment. The Scriptures teach us, That the Holy Ghost has instituted an Order of Clergy: We say, a Priesthood, so authorised, can no more be changed by us, than we can change the Scriptures, or make new Sacraments; because they are all founded on the same Authority, without any Power of a Dispensation delegated to us in one Case more than another. If therefore we have a Mind to continue in the Covenant of Christ, and receive the Grace and Benefit of his Ordinances, we must receive them through such Hands as he has authorised for that Purpose, to the end we may be qualified to partake of the Blessings of them. For as a true Priest cannot benefit us by administering a false Sacrament; so a true Sacrament is nothing, when it is administered by a false uncommissioned Minister. Besides this Benediction which attends the Ordinances of God, when they are thus performed by authorised Hands, there is a Benediction of Prayer, which we may justly think very effectual, when pronounced or dispensed by the same Hands.

Thus when the Bishop or Priest intercedes for the Congregation, or pronounces the Apostolical Benediction upon them, we do not consider this barely as an Act of Charity and Humanity, of one Christian praying for another; but as the Work of a Person who is commissioned by God to bless in his Name, and be effectually ministerial in the Conveyance of his Graces; or as the Prayer of one who is left with us in Christ's stead, to carry on his great Design of saving us; and whose Benedictions are ever ratified in Heaven, but when we render ourselves in one Respect or other incapable of them.

Now, my Lord, they are these sacerdotal Prayers, these authorised Sacraments, these commissioned Pastors, whom the Holy Ghost has made Overseers of the Flock of Christ, that your Lordship encourages the Laity to despise. You bid them contemn the vain Words of Validity or Invalidity of God's Ordinances; to heed no particular sort of Clergy, or the pretended Necessity of their Administrations.

Your Lordship sets up in this Controversy for an Advocate for the Laity, against the arrogant Pretences, and false Claims of the Clergy. My Lord, we are no more contending for ourselves in this Doctrine, than when we insist upon any Article in the Creed. Neither is it any more our particular Cause, when we assert our Mission, than when we assert the Necessity of the Sacraments.

Who is to receive the Benefit of that Commission which we assert, but they? Who is to suffer, if we pretend a false one, but ourselves? Sad Injury, indeed, offered to the Laity! that we should affect to be thought Ministers of God for their Sakes! If we really are so, they are to receive the Benefit; if not, we are to bear the Punishment.

But your Lordship comes too late in this glorious Undertaking, to receive the Reputation of it; the Work has been already, in the Opinion of most People, better done to your Lordship's Hands. The famous Author of The Rites of the Christian Church, has carried this Christian Liberty to as great Heights as your Lordship. And though you have not one Notion, I can recollect, that has given Offence to the World, but what seems taken from that pernicious Book; yet your Lordship is not so just as ever once to cite or mention the Author; who, if your Lordship's Doctrine be true, deserves to have a Statue erected to his Honour, and receive every Mark of Esteem which is due to the greatest Reformer of Religion.

Did not mine own Eyes assure me that he has cast no Contempt upon the Church, no Reproach upon the Evangelical Institutions, or the Sacred Function, but what has been seconded by your Lordship, I would never have placed your Lordship in the same View with so scandalous a Declaimer against the Ordinances of Christ. Whether I am right, or not, in this Charge, I freely leave to the Judgment of those to determine, who are acquainted with both your Works. Yet this Author, my Lord, has been treated by the greatest and best Part of the Nation, as a Free-thinking Infidel. But for what, my Lord? Not that he has declared against the Scriptures; not that he has rejected Revelation; (we are not, blessed be God, still so far corrupted with the Principles of Infidelity) but because he has reproached every particular Church, as such, and denied all Obligation to Communion ; because he has exposed Benedictions, Absolutions, and Excommunications ; denied the Divine Right of the Clergy, and ridiculed the pretended Sacredness and Necessity of their Administrations, as mere Niceties and Trifles, though commonly in more distant, I was going to say more decent Ways : In a Word, because he made all Churches, all Priests, all Sacraments, however administered, equally valid, and denied any particular Method necessary to Salvation. Yet after all this profane Declamation, he allows, my Lord, that *Religious Offices may be appropriated to particular Men, called Clergy, for Order sake only ; and not on the Account of any peculiar Spiritual Advantages, Powers, or Privileges, which those who are set apart for them, have from Heaven.

Agreeable to this, your Lordship owns, that you are not against the Order, or Decency, or Subordination belonging to Christian Societies.†

But, pray, my Lord, do you mean any more by this, than the above-mentioned Author ? Is it for any Thing, but the Sake of a little external Order or Conveniency ? Is there any Christian Law that obliges to observe this kind of Order ? Is there any real essential Difference between Persons ranked into this Order ? Is it a Sin for any Body, especially the Civil Magistrate, to leave this Order, and make what other Orders he prefers to it ? This your Lordship cannot resolve in the Affirmative ; for then you must allow, that some Communion is safer than others, and that some Clergy have more Authority than others.

Will your Lordship say, that no particular Order can be necessary ; yet some Order necessary, which may be different in different Communion ? This cannot hold good upon your Lordship's Principles ; for since Christ has left no Law about any Order, no Members of any particular Communion need submit to that Order ; since it is confessed by your Lordship, That in Religion no Laws, but those of Christ, are of any Obligation. So that though you do not disclaim all external Order and Decency yourself, yet you have taught other People to do it if they please, and as much as they please.

Suppose, my Lord, some Layman, upon a Pretence of your Lordship's Absence, or any other, should go into the Diocese of Bangor, and there pretend to ordain Clergymen ; could your Lordship quote one Text of Scripture against him ? Could you allege any Law of Christ, or his Apostles, that he had broken ? Could you prove him guilty of any Sin ? No, my Lord, you would not do that ; because this would be acknowledging such a Thing as a Sinful Ordination; and if there be Sinful Ordinations, then there must be some Law concerning Ordinations: For Sin is the Transgression of the Law: And if there be a Law concerning Ordinations, then we must keep to the Clergy lawfully ordained; and must confess, after all your Lordship has said, or can say, that still some Communions are safer than others.

† Answer to Dr. Snape, p. 48.

If you should reprove such a one, as an Englishman, for acting in Opposition to the English Laws of Decency and Order; he would answer, That he has nothing to do with such Trifles; That Christ was sole Lawgiver in his Kingdom; That he was content to have his Kingdom as orderly and decent as Christ had left it; and since he had instituted no Laws in that Matter, it was presuming, for others to take upon them to add any Thing by way of Order or Decency, by Laws of their own: That as he had as much Authority from Christ to ordain Clergy as your Lordship, he would not depart from his Christian Liberty.

If he should remonstrate to your Lordship in these, or Words to the like Effect, he would only reduce your Lordship's own Doctrine to Practice. This, my Lord, is part of that Confusion the learned Dr. Snape has charged you with being the Author of, in the Church of God: And all Persons, my Lord, whom you have taught not to regard any particular Sort of Clergy, must know (if they have the common Sense to which you appeal) that then no Clergy are at all necessary; and that it is as lawful for any Man to be his own Priest, as to solicit his own Cause. For to say that no particular Sort of Clergy are necessary, and yet that in general the Clergy are necessary, is the same as to say, that Truth is necessary to be believed; yet the Belief of no particular Truth is necessary.

The next Thing to be considered, my Lord, is your Doctrine concerning Absolutions. You begin thus: *The same you will find a sufficient Reply to their presumptuous Claim to an authoritative Absolution. An infallible Absolution cannot belong to fallible Man. But no Absolution can be authoritative, which is not infallible. Therefore no authoritative Absolution can belong to any Man living.

I must observe here, your Lordship does not reject this Absolution, because the Claim of it is not founded in Scripture; but by an Argument drawn from the Nature of the Thing: Because you imagine such Absolution requires Infallibility for the Execution of it; therefore it cannot belong to Men. Should this be true, it would prove, that if our Saviour had really so intended, he could not have given this Power to his Ministers. But, my Lord, who can see any Repugnancy in the Reason of the Thing itself? Is it not as easy to conceive, that our Lord should confer his Grace of Pardon by the Hands of his Ministers, as by Means of the Sacraments? And may not such Absolution be justly called authoritative, the Power of which is granted, and executed by his Authority?

* Preservative, p. 92.

Is it impossible for Men to have this Authority from God, because they may mistake in the Exercise of it? This Argument proves too much, and makes as short Work with every Institution of Christianity, as with the Power of Absolution.

For if it is impossible that Men should have Authority from God to absolve in his Name, because they are not infallible; this makes them equally incapable of being entrusted with any other Means of Grace; and consequently supposes the whole Priest's Office to imply a direct Impossibility in the very Notion of it.

Your Lordship's Argument is this: Christians have their Sins pardoned upon certain Conditions; but fallible Men cannot certainly know these Conditions: Therefore fallible Men cannot have Authority to absolve.

From hence I take Occasion to argue thus: Persons are to be admitted to the Sacraments on certain Conditions; but fallible Men cannot tell whether they come qualified to receive them according to these Conditions: Therefore fallible Men cannot have Authority to administer the Sacraments.

2ndly, This Argument subverts all Authority of the Christian Religion itself, and the Reason of every instituted Means of Grace. For if nothing can be authoritative, but what a Man is infallibly assured of, then the Christian Religion cannot be an authoritative Method of Salvation; since a Man, by being a Christian, does not become infallibly certain of his Salvation: Nor does Grace infallibly attend the Participation of the Sacraments. So that though your Lordship has formed this Argument only against this absolving Power, yet it has as much Force against the Sacraments, and the Christian Religion itself. For if it be absurd to suppose that the Priest should absolve anyone, because he cannot be certain that he deserves Absolution; does it not imply the same Absurdity, to suppose that he should have the Power of administering the Sacraments, when he cannot be infallibly certain that those who receive them are duly qualified? If a Possibility of Error destroys the Power in one Case, it as certainly destroys it in the other. Again, if Absolution cannot be authoritative, unless it be infallible; then it is plain that the Christian Religion is not an authoritative Means of Salvation; because all Christians are not infallibly saved: Nor can the Sacraments be authoritative Means of Grace, because all who partake of them do not infallibly obtain Grace.

Your Lordship proceeds with your Laity by way of Expostulation : *If they amuse you with that Power which Christ left with his Apostles, Whose soever Sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them ; and whose soever Sins ye retain, they are retained unto them :

But why amuse, my Lord ? Are the Texts of Holy Scripture to be treated only as Matter of Amusement ? Or does your Lordship know of any Age in the Church when the very same Doctrine which we now teach, has not been taught from the same Texts ?

Do you know any Successors of the Apostles that thought the Power there specified did not belong to them ? But, however, your Lordship has taught your Laity to believe what we argue from this Text, all Amusement ; and told them, They may securely answer, that it is impossible for them to depend upon this Right as anything certain, till they can prove to you that everything spoken to the Apostles, belongs to Ministers in all Ages.† The Security of this Answer, my Lord, is founded upon this false Presumption, viz, That the Clergy can claim no Right to the Exercise of any Part of their Office, as Successors of the Apostles, till they can prove that every Thing that was spoken to the Apostles, belongs to them.

This Proposition must be true, or else there is no Force or Security in the Objection you here bring for the Instruction of the Laity. If it is well founded, then the Clergy cannot possibly prove they have any more Right to the Exercise of any Part of their Office than the Laity. Do they pretend to ordain, confirm, to admit or exclude Men from the Sacraments ? By what Authority is all this done ? Is it not because the Apostles, whose Successors they are, did the same Things ? But then, say your Lordship's well-instructed Laity, this is nothing to the Purpose : Prove yourselves Apostles ; prove that every Thing said to the Apostles belongs to you ; and then it will be allowed, that you may exercise these Powers, because they exercised them : But as this is impossible to be done, so it is impossible for you to prove that you have any Powers or Authorities, because they had them.

And now, my Lord, if the Case be thus, what Apology shall we make for Christianity, as it has been practised in all Ages ? How shall we excuse the Noble Army of Martyrs, Saints, and Confessors, who have boldly asserted the Right to so many Apostolical Powers? Could any Men in these Ages pretend, that everything that was spoken to the Apostles, belonged to themselves? False, then, was their Claim, and presumptuous their Authority, who should pretend any Apostolical Powers, because the Apostles had them; when they could not prove, that everything that was spoken to the Apostles, belonged to them.

Farther; To prove that the above-mentioned Text does not confer the Power of Absolution in the Clergy, you reason thus: *Whatever contradicts the Natural Notions of God, and the Design and Tenor of the Gospel, cannot be the true Meaning of any Passage in the Gospel: But to make the Absolution of weak and fallible Men so necessary, or so valid, that God will not pardon without them; or that all are pardoned who have them pronounced over them, is to contradict those Notions, as well as the plain Tenor of the Gospel.

Be pleased, my Lord, to point out your Adversary; name any one Church of England Man that ever taught this romantic Doctrine which you are confuting. Who ever taught such a Necessity of Absolutions, that God will pardon none without them? Who ever declared that all are pardoned who have them pronounced over them? We teach the Necessity and Validity of Sacraments; but do we ever declare that all are saved who receive them? Is there no Medium between two Extremes? No such Thing, my Lord, as Moderation! Must every Thing be thus absolute and extravagant, or nothing at all?

In another Page we have more of this same Colouring: But to claim a Right to stand in God's Stead, in such a Sense, that they can absolutely and certainly bless, or not bless, with their Voice alone: This is the highest Absurdity and Blasphemy as it supposeth God to place a Set of Men above himself; and to put out of his own Hands the Disposal of his Blessings and Curses.†

If your Lordship had employed all this Oratory against worshipping the Sun or Moon, it had just affected your Adversaries as much as this. For who ever taught that any Set of Men could absolutely bless, or withhold Blessing, independent of God? Who ever taught, that the Christian Religion, or Sacraments, or Absolution, saved People on course, or without proper Dispositions? Whoever claimed such an absolving Power, as to set himself above God, and to take from him the Disposal of his own Blessings and Curses? What has such extravagant Descriptions, such romantic Characters of Absolution, to do with that Power the Clergy justly claim? Cannot there be a Necessity in some Cases of receiving Absolution from their Hands, except they set themselves above God? Is God robbed of the Disposal of his Blessings, when, in Obedience to his own Commands, and in virtue of his own Authority, they admit some as Members of the Church, and exclude others from the Communion of it? Do they pretend to be Channels of Grace, or the Means of Pardon, by any Rights or Powers naturally inherent in them? Do they not in all these Things consider themselves as Instruments of God, that are made ministerial to the Edification of the Church, purely by his Will, and only so far as they act in Conformity to it? Now if it has pleased God to confer the Holy Ghost in Ordination, Confirmation, &c., only by them, and to annex the Grace of Pardon to the Imposition of their Hands, on returning Sinners; is it any Blasphemy for them to claim and exert their Power? Is the Prerogative of God injured, because his own Institutions are obeyed? Cannot he dispense his Graces by what Persons, and on what Terms he pleases? Is he deprived of the Disposal of his Blessings, because they are bestowed on Persons according to his Order, and in Obedience to his Authority? If I should affirm, that Bishops have the sole Power to ordain and confirm, would this be robbing God of his Disposal of those Graces that attend such Actions? Is it not rather allowing and submitting to God's own Disposal, when we keep close to those Methods of it which himself has prescribed?

Pray, my Lord, consider the Nature of Sacraments. Are not they necessary to Salvation? But is God therefore excluded from any Power of his own? Has he for that Reason, set Bread and Wine in the Eucharist, or Water in Baptism, above Himself? Has he put the Salvation of Men out of his own Power, because it depends on his own Institutions? Is the Salvation of Christians less his own Act and Deed, or less the Effect of his own Mercy, because these Sacraments in great measure contribute to effect it? Why then, my Lord, must that Imposition of Hands that is attended with his Grace and Pardon, and which has no Pretence to such Grace, but in Obedience to his Order, and in virtue of his Promise, be thus destructive of his Prerogative? Where is there any Diminution of his Honour or Authority, if such Actions of the Clergy are made necessary to the Salvation of Souls in some Circumstances, as their washing in Water, or their receiving Bread and Wine? Cannot God institute Means of Grace, but those Means must needs be above himself? They owe all their Power and Efficacy to his Institution, and can operate no farther than the Ends for which he instituted them. How then is he dethroned for being thus obeyed?

My Lord, you take no notice of Scripture; but in a new Way of your own, contend against this Power, from the Nature of the Thing : Yet I must beg leave to say, this Power stands upon as sure a Bottom, and is as consistent with the Goodness and Majesty of God, as the Sacraments. If the annexing Grace to Sacraments, and making them necessary Means of Salvation, be a reasonable Institution of God ; so is his annexing Pardon to the Imposition of Hands by the Clergy on returning Sinners. The Grace or Blessing received in either Case, is of his own giving, and in a Method of his own prescribing. And how this should be any Injury to God's Honour, or Affront to his Majesty, cannot easily be accounted for.

The Clergy justly claim a Power of reconciling Men to God, from express Terms of Scripture ; and of delivering his Pardons to penitent Sinners. Your Lordship disowns this Claim, as making fallible Men the absolute Dispensers of God's Blessings, and putting it in their Power to damn and save as they please. But, my Lord, nothing of this Extravagance is included in it. They are only entrusted with a conditional Power ; which they are to exercise according to the Rules God has given ; and it only obtains its Effect when it is so exercised. Every instituted Means of Grace is conditional ; and it is only then effectual, when it is attended with such Circumstances, as are required by God. If the Clergy, through Weakness, Passion or Prejudice, exclude Persons from the Church of God, they injure only themselves. But, my Lord, are these Powers nothing, because they may be exercised in vain ? Have the Clergy no right at all to them, because they are not absolutely infallible in the Exercise of them ?

Can you prove, my Lord, that they are not necessary, because they have not always the same Effect ? May not that be necessary to Salvation, which is only effectual on certain Conditions ? Is not the Christian Religion necessary to Salvation, though all Christians are not saved ? Are not the Sacraments necessary Means of Grace, though the Means of Grace obtained thereby is only conditional ? Is everyone necessarily improved in Grace, who receives the Sacrament ? Or is it less necessary, because the salutary Effects of it are not more universal ? Why then must the Imposition of Hands be less necessary, because the Grace of it is conditional, and only obtained in due and proper Circumstances ? Is Absolution nothing, because if withheld wrongfully, it injures not the Person who is denied it ; and if given without due Dispositions in the Penitent, it avails nothing ? Is not this equally true of the Sacraments, if they are denied wrongfully, or administered to unprepared Receivers ? But do they therefore cease to be standing and necessary Means of Grace ?

The Argument therefore against this Power, drawn from the Ignorance or Passions of the Clergy, whereby they may mistake or pervert the Application of it, can be of no Force ; since it is as conditional as any other Christian Institution. The Salvation of no Man can be endangered by the Ignorance or Passions of any Clergymen in the Use of this Power : If they err in the Exercise of it, the Consequences of their Error only affect themselves. The Administration of the Sacraments is certainly entrusted to them : But will anyone say, that the Sacraments are not necessary to Salvation ; because they may, through Ignorance or Passion, make an ill Use of this Trust ?

There is nothing in this Doctrine to gratify the Pride of Clergymen, or encourage them to lord it over the Flock of Christ. If you could suppose an Atheist or a Deist in Orders ; he might be arrogant and domineer in the Exercise of his Powers : But who, that has the least Sense of Religion, can think it matter of Triumph, that he can deny the Sacraments, or refuse his Benediction to any of his Flock ? Can he injure or offend the least of these ; and will not God take Account ? Or, if they fall through his Offence, will not their Blood be required at his Hands ?

Neither is there anything in it that can enslave the Laity to the Clergy ; or make their Salvation depend upon their arbitrary Will. Does anyone think his Salvation in danger, because the Sacraments (the necessary means of it) are only to be administered by the Clergy ? Why then must the Salvation of Penitents be endangered, or made dependent on the sole Pleasure of the Clergy ; because they alone can reconcile them to the Favour of God ? If Persons are unjustly denied the Sacraments, they may humbly hope, that God will not lay the Want of them to their Charge. And if they are unjustly kept out of the Church, and denied Admittance, they have no Reason to fear but God will notwithstanding accept them, provided they be in other respects proper Objects of his Favour.

But to proceed, your Lordship says, The Apostles might possibly understand the Power of remitting and retaining Sins, to be that Power of laying their Hands upon the Sick.

Is this possible, my Lord ? Then it is possible, the Apostles might think, that in the Power here intended to be given them, nothing at all was intended to be given them. For the Power of healing the Sick, was already conferred upon them. Therefore, if no more was intended to be given them in this Text, it cannot be interpreted, as having entitled them properly to any Power at all.

2. The Power mentioned here, was something that Jesus promised he would give them hereafter : Which plainly supposes they had it not then : But they then had the Power of Healing ; therefore something else must be intended here.

3. The Power of the Keys has always been looked upon as the highest in the Apostolical Order. But if it related only to the Power of Healing, it could not be so : For the Seventy, who were inferior to the Apostles, had this Power.

4. The very Manner of Expression in this Place, proves, that the Power here intended to be given, could not relate to Healing the Sick, or to anything of that Nature ; but to some spiritual Power, whose Effects should not be visible ; but be made good by virtue of God's Promise. Thus, whomsoever ye shall heal on Earth, I will heal in Heaven, borders too near upon an Absurdity. There is no Occasion to promise to make good such Actions as are good already, and have antecedently produced their Effects. Persons who were restored to Health, to their Sight, or the Use of their Limbs, did not want to be assured, that the Apostles, by whom they were restored, had the Power to that End ; the Exercise of which Power proved and confirmed itself. There was no need therefore of a Divine Assurance, that a Person that was healed, was actually healed in virtue of it. But when we consider this Promise, as relating to a Power whose Effects are not visible, as the Pardon of Sins, the Terms whereby it is expressed, are most proper ; and it is very reasonable to suppose God promising, that the spiritual powers exercised by his Ministers on Earth, though they do not here produce their visible Effects, shall yet be made good and effectual by him in Heaven.

These Reasons, my Lord, I should think, are sufficient to convince anyone, that the Apostles could not possibly understand these Words in the Sense of your Lordship.

Let us now consider the Commission given to Peter. Our Saviour said to him, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, and the Gates of Hell shall not prevail against it : And I will grant unto thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven ; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven ; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven.

Now, my Lord, how should it enter into the Thoughts of Peter, that nothing was here intended, or promised by our Saviour, but a Power of Healing ; which he not only had before, but also many other Disciples, who were not Apostles ? I will give unto thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven ; that is, according to your Lordship, I will give thee Power to heal the Sick. Can anything be more contrary to the plain obvious Sense of the Words? Can anyone be said to have the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, because he may be the Instrument of restoring People to Health? Are Persons Members of Christ's Kingdom, with any regard to Health? How then can he have any Power in that Kingdom; or be said to have the Keys of it, who is only empowered to cure Distempers? Could anyone be said to have the Keys of a temporal Kingdom, who had no temporal Power given him in that Kingdom? Must not he therefore who has the Keys of a spiritual Kingdom, have some spiritual Power in that Kingdom?

Christ has told us, that his Kingdom is not of this World. Your Lordship has told us, that it is so foreign to everything of this World, that no worldly Terrors or Allurements, no Pains or Pleasures of the Body, can have anything to do with it. Yet here your Lordship teaches us, that he may have the Keys of this spiritual Kingdom, who has only a Power over Diseases. My Lord, are not Sickness and Health, Sight and Limbs, Things of this World? Have they not some relation to bodily Pleasures and Pains? How then can a Power about Things wholly confined to this World, be a Power in a Kingdom that is not of this World? The Force of the Argument lies here: Our Saviour has assured us, that his Kingdom is not of this World: Your Lordship takes it to be of so spiritual a Nature, that it ought not, nay, that it cannot be encouraged or established by any worldly Powers. Our Saviour gives to his Apostles the Keys of this Kingdom: Yet you have so far forgotten your own Doctrine, and the Spirituality of this Kingdom, that you tell us, he here gave them a temporal Power of Diseases; though he says, they were the Keys of his Kingdom which he gave them. Suppose any Successor of the Apostles should from this Text pretend to the Power of the Sword, to make People Members of this Kingdom: Must not the Answer be, that he mistakes the Power, by not considering, that they are only the Keys of a spiritual, not of a temporal Kingdom, which were here delivered to the Apostles.

I humbly presume, my Lord, that this would be as good an Answer to your Lordship's Doctrine, as to theirs who claim the Right of the Sword, till it can be shown that Health and Sickness, Sight and Limbs, do not as truly relate to the Things of this World as the Power of the Sword.

If this Power of the Keys must be understood, only as a Power of inflicting or curing Diseases; then the Words, in the proper Construction of them, must run thus: Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, i.e., a peculiar Society of healthful People, and the Gates of Hell shall never prevail against it, i.e., they shall always be in a State of Health. I will give unto thee the Keys of this Kingdom of Heaven, i.e., thou shalt have the Power of inflicting and curing Distempers; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven, i.e., on whomsoever thou shalt inflict the Leprosy on Earth, he shall be a Leper in Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven, i.e., whomsoever thou shalt cure of that Disease on Earth, shall be perfectly cured of it in Heaven.

This, without putting any Force upon the Words, is your Lordship's own Interpretation; which exposes the Honour and Authority of Scriptures as much as the greatest Enemy to them can wish. If our Saviour could mean by these Words, only a Power of healing Distempers; or if the Apostles understood them in that Sense, we may as well believe that when he said, His Kingdom was not of this World, that he meant, it was of this World; and that the Apostles so understood him too.

But, however, for the Benefit and Edification of the Laity, your Lordship has another Interpretation for them: You say, if they (the Apostles) did apply this Power of remitting Sins to the certain Absolution of particular Persons, it is plain, they could do it upon no other Bottom but this; that God's Will and good Pleasure about such particular Persons was infallibly communicated to them.

Pray, my Lord, how, or where is this so plain? Is it plain that they never baptized Persons till God had infallibly communicated his good Pleasure to them about such particular Persons? Baptism is an Institution equally sacred with this other, and puts the Person baptized in the same State of Grace that Absolution does the Penitent. Baptism is designed for the Remission of Sin. It is an Ordinance to which Absolution is consequent; but I suppose Persons may be baptized without such infallible Communication promised, as your Lordship contends for. If therefore it be not necessary for the Exercise of Absolution by Baptism, why must it be necessary for Absolution by the Imposition of Hands?

Can Pastors without Infallibility baptize Heathens, and absolve, or be the Instruments of absolving them thereby from their Sins? Are they not as able to absolve Christian Penitents, or restore those who have apostatised? If human Knowledge, and the common Rules of the Church, be sufficient to direct the Priest to whom he ought to administer the Sacraments; they are also sufficient for the Exercise of this other Part of the sacerdotal Office.

But your Lordship proceeds thus: Not that they themselves absolved any.

No, my Lord, no more than Water in Baptism of itself purifies the Soul from Sin. This baptismal Water is, notwithstanding, necessary for the Remission of our Sins.

Again, you say, Not that God was obliged to bind and loose the Guilt of Men according to their Declarations, considered as their own Decisions, and their own Determinations. No, my Lord, who ever thought so? God is not obliged to confer Grace by the baptismal Water, considered only as Water; but he is, considered as his own Institution for that End and Purpose. So if these Declarations are considered only as the Declarations of Men, God is not obliged by them: But when they are considered as the Declarations of Men whom he has especially authorised to make such Declarations in his Name, then they are as effectual with God, as any other of his Institutions whatever.

I proceed now to a Paragraph that bears as hard upon our Saviour, as some others have done upon his Apostles and their Successors; where your Lordship designs to prove, that though Christ claimed a Power of remitting Sins himself, or in his own Person, yet that he really had no such Power.

You go on in these Words: *If we look back upon our Saviour himself, we shall find, that when he declares that the Son of Man had Power upon Earth to forgive Sins, even he himself either meant by it the Power of a miraculous releasing Man from his Affliction; or if it related to another more spiritual Sense of the Words, the Power of declaring, that the Man's Sins were forgiven by God.

The Words of our Saviour, which we are to look back upon, are these: Whether it is easier to say, thy Sins are forgiven thee; or to say, arise, take up thy Bed and walk? But that ye may know, the Son of Man hath Power on Earth to forgive Sins (Mark ii. 9, 10); As if he had said, 'Is not the same Divine Authority and Power required? Is it not a Work as peculiar to God, to perform miraculous Cures, as to forgive Sins? The Reason therefore why I now choose to declare my Authority, rather by saying, Thy Sins are forgiven thee, than by saying, Arise and walk, was purely to teach you this Truth, that the Power of the Son of Man is not confined to Bodily Cures; but that he has Power on Earth to forgive Sins.'

This, my Lord, is the first obvious Sense of the Words; and therefore I take it to be the true Sense. But your Lordship can look back upon them, till you find that Christ has not this Power, though he claims it expressly; but that he only intends a Power of doing something or other, which no more imports a Power of forgiving Sins, than of remitting any temporal Debt or Penalty.

If our blessed Saviour had intended to teach the World that he was invested with this Power, I would gladly know how he must have expressed himself, to have satisfied your Lordship that he really had it? He must have told you, that he had not this Power, and then possibly your Lordship would have taught us, that he had this Power. For no one can discover any Reason why you should deny it him, but because he has in express Words claimed and asserted it. I hope your Lordship has not so low an Opinion of our Saviour's Person, as to think it unreasonable in the Nature of the Thing, that he should have this Power. Where does it contradict any Principle of Reason, to say, that a King should be able to pardon his Subjects? Since there is no Absurdity then in the Thing itself, and it is so expressly asserted in Scripture; it is just Matter of Surprise, that your Lordship should carry your Reader from a plain consistent Sense of the Words, to either this or that, Something or other, the Origin whereof is only to be sought for in your Lordship's own Invention; rather than not exclude Christ from a Power which he declared he had, and declared he had it for this very Reason, that we might know that he had it. Our Saviour has told us that the Way to Heaven is narrow. Your Lordship might as reasonably prove from hence, that he meant, it was broad, as that he did not mean that he could forgive Sins, when he said, that ye may know, that the Son of Man hath Power on Earth to forgive Sins.

Your Lordship has rejected all Church Authority, and despised the pretended Powers of the Clergy, for this Reason; because Christ is the sole King, sole Lawgiver, and Judge in his Kingdom. But, it seems, your Lordship, notwithstanding, thinks it now Time to depose him: And this sole King in his own Kingdom, must not be allowed to be capable of pardoning his own Subjects.

This Doctrine, my Lord, is delivered, I suppose, as your other Doctrines, out of a hearty Concern and Christian Zeal for the Privileges of the Laity; and to show that your Lordship is not only able to limit as you please the Authority of temporal Kings; but also to make Christ himself sole King, and yet no King, in his Spiritual Kingdom. For, my Lord, the Kingdom of Christ is a Society founded in order to the Reconciliation of Sinners to God. If therefore Christ could not pardon Sins, to what End could he either erect, or how could he support his Kingdom, which is only, in the great and last Design of it, to consist of absolved Sinners? He that cannot forgive Sins in a Kingdom that is erected for the Remission of Sins, can no more be sole King in it, than he that has no temporal Power, can be sole King in a temporal Kingdom. Therefore your Lordship has been thus mighty serviceable to the Christian Laity, as to teach them that Christ is not only sole King, but no King in his Kingdom.

This is not the first Contradiction your Lordship has unhappily fallen into, in your Attempts upon kingly Authority. Nor is it the last which I shall presume to observe to the common Sense of your Laity.

Again, in this Account of our blessed Saviour, your Lordship has made no Difference between him and his Apostles, as to this absolving Authority. For you say, the great Commission given to them implied either a Power of releasing Men from their bodily Afflictions; or of declaring such to be pardoned, whom God had assured them that he had pardoned: And this all that you here allow to Christ himself.

Your Lordship's calling him so often King, and sole King, &c., in his Kingdom, and yet making him a mere Creature in it, is too like the Insult, and designed Sarcasm of the Jews, who, when they had nailed him to the Cross, writ over his Head, This is the King of the Jews.

But to proceed: Your Lordship proves, That our Saviour had not the Power of forgiving Sins; because His Way of Expression was, Thy Sins are forgiven thee. This was plainly to acknowledge, and keep up that true Notion, that God alone forgiveth Sins.

Let us therefore put this Argument in Form. Christ hath affirmed, that he had Power to forgive Sins: But his Way was to say, Thy Sins are forgiven thee: Therefore Christ had not Power to forgive Sins. Q. E. D.

It is much your Lordship did not recommend this to your Laity, as another invincible Demonstration. For by the Help of it, my Lord, they may prove that our Saviour could no more heal Diseases, than forgive Sins. As thus; Christ indeed pretends to a Power of healing Diseases; but his usual Way of speaking to the diseased Person was, thy Faith hath made thee whole; therefore he had not the Power of healing Diseases. The Argument has the same Force against one Power, as against the other. If he did not forgive Sins, because he said, Thy Sins are forgiven thee; no more did he heal Diseases, because he said, Thy Faith hath made thee whole.

I have a Claim of several Debts upon a Man; I forgive him them all, in these Words, Thy Debts are remitted thee. A philosophical Wit stands by, and pretends to prove, that I had not the Power of remitting these Debts; because I said, Thy Debts are remitted thee. What can come up to, or equal such profound Philosophy, but the Divinity of one who teaches, our Saviour could not forgive Sins, because he said, Thy Sins are forgiven thee?

But your Lordship says, the Reason why our Saviour thus expresseth himself, Thy Sins are forgiven thee, 'was plainly to 'keep up that true Notion, that God alone forgiveth Sins.' Therefore, my Lord, according to this Doctrine, our Saviour was obliged not to claim any Power that was peculiar or appropriated to God alone. For if this be an Argument, why he should not forgive Sins, it is also an Argument that he ought not to claim any other Power, any more than this; which is proper to God, and only belongs to him. But, my Lord, if he did express himself thus, that he might not lay Claim to any Thing that was peculiar to God, how came he in so many other Respects to lay Claim to such Things as are as truly peculiar to God, as the Forgiveness of Sins? How came he in so many Instances to make himself equal to God? How came he to say, Ye believe in God, believe also in me? And that Men should worship the Son, even as the Father? That he was the Son of God, that he was the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

Are not evangelical Faith, Worship, and Trust, Duties that are solely due to God? Does he not as much invade the Sovereignty of God, who lays Claim to these Duties, as he that pretends to forgive Sins? Did not Christ also give his Disciples Power and Authority over Devils and unclean Spirits, and Power to heal all manner of Diseases?

Now if Christ did not assume a Power to forgive Sins, because God alone could forgive Sins, it is also as unaccountable that he should exercise other Authorities and Powers, which are as strictly peculiar to God as that of forgiving Sins. As if a Person should disown that Christ is omniscient, because Omniscience is an Attribute of God alone; and yet confess his Omnipotence, which is an Attribute equally divine.

But farther, my Lord: Did our Saviour thus designedly express himself, lest he should be thought to assume any Power which was divine, then it is certain (according to this Opinion) that if he had assumed any such Power, or pretended to do what was peculiar to God, he had been the Occasion of misleading Men into Error. For if this be a plain Reason why he expressed himself so as to disown this Power, it is plain that if he had owned it, he had been condemned by this Argument, as teaching false Doctrine.

Now if this would have been interpretatively false Doctrine in Christ, to take upon himself any Thing that was peculiar to God, the Apostles were guilty of propagating this false Doctrine. For there is scarce any known Attribute or Power of God, but they ascribe it to our Saviour. They declare him eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, &c. Is it not a true Notion, that God alone can create, and is Governor of the Universe? Yet the Apostles expressly assure us of Christ, that all Things were created by him, and that God hath put all Things in Subjection under his Feet. 'Tis very surprising that your Lordship should exclude Christ from this Power of forgiving Sins, though he has expressly said he could forgive Sins, because such a Power belongs only to God: When it appears through the whole Scripture, that there is scarce any divine Power which our Saviour himself has not claimed, nor any Attribute of God but what his Apostles have ascribed to him. They have made him the Creator, the Preserver, the Governor of the Universe, the Author of eternal Salvation to all that obey him; and yet your Lordship tells us, that he did not pretend to forgive Sins, because that was a Power peculiar to God.

Here is then (to speak in your Lordship's elegant Style) an immovable Resting-place for your Laity to set their Feet upon; here is an Argument that will last them for ever: They must believe that our Saviour did not forgive Sins, because this was a Power that belonged to God, though the Scriptures assure us, that every other divine Power belonged to Christ. That is, they must believe, that though our Saviour claimed all divine Powers, yet not this divine Power, because it is a divine Power. And, my Lord, if they have the common Sense to believe this, they may also believe, that though our Saviour took human Nature upon him, yet that he had not a human Soul, because it is proper to Man. They may believe, that any Person who has all kingly Power, cannot remit or reprieve a Malefactor, because it is an Act of kingly Power to do it; or that a Bishop cannot suspend any Offender of his Diocese, because it is an Act of episcopal Power to do it. All these Reasons are as strong and demonstrative, as that Christ who claimed all divine Powers, could not forgive Sins, because it was a divine Power.

Lastly, In this Argument your Lordship has plainly declared against the Divinity of Christ, and ranked him in the Order of Creatures. Your Lordship says, Christ did not forgive Sins, because it is God alone who can forgive Sins; as plain an Argument as can be offered, that in your Lordship's Opinion Christ is not God: For if you believed him, in a true and proper Sense, God, how could you exclude him from the Power of forgiving Sins, because God alone can forgive Sins? It is inconsistent with Sense and Reason to deny this Power to Christ because it is a divine Power, but only because you believe him not to be a divine Person. If Christ was God, then he might forgive Sins, though God alone can forgive Sins : But you say, Christ cannot forgive Sins, because God alone can forgive Sins ; therefore it is plain, that, according to your Lordship's Doctrine, Christ is not truly, or in a proper Sense, God.

Here, my Lord, I desire again to appeal to the common Sense of your Laity ; let them judge betwixt the Scriptures and your Lordship. The Scriptures plainly and frequently ascribe all divine Attributes to Christ : They make him the Creator and Governor of the World ; God over all, blessed for ever. Yet your Lordship makes him a Creature, and denies him such a Power, because it belongs only to God.

You yourself, my Lord, have allowed him to be absolute Ruler over the Consciences of Men ; to be an arbitrary Dispenser of the Means of Salvation to Mankind ; than which Powers, none can be more divine : And yet you hold, that he cannot forgive Sins, because Pardon of Sin can only be the Effect of a divine Power.

Is it not equally a divine Power (even according to your Lordship), to rule over the Consciences of Men, to give Laws of Salvation, and to act in these Affairs with an uncontrollable Power, as to forgive Sins ?

My Lord, let their common Sense here discover the Absurdity (for I must call it so) of your new Scheme of Government in Christ's Kingdom. Christ is absolute Lord of it, (according to yourself) and can make or unmake Laws relating to it ; can dispense or withhold Grace as he pleases in this spiritual Kingdom, all which Powers are purely divine ; yet you say he cannot forgive Sins, though every express Power which you have allowed him over the Consciences of Men, be as truly a divine Power as that of forgiving Sins. Has not Christ a proper and personal Power to give Grace to his Subjects ? Is he not Lord over their Consciences ? And are not these Powers as truly appropriated to God ? And has not your Lordship often taught them to be so, as that of Forgiveness of Sins ? Is it not as much the Prerogative of God to have any natural intrinsic Power, to confer Grace, or any spiritual Benefit to the Souls of Men, as to forgive Sins ? Has not your Lordship despised all the Administrations of the Clergy, because God's Graces can only come from himself, and are only to be received from his own Hands ? The Conclusion therefore is this, either Christ has a personal intrinsic Power to confer Grace in his Kingdom, or he has not ; if you say he has not, then you are chargeable with the Collusion of making him a King in a spiritual Kingdom, where you allow him no spiritual Power: If you say he has, then you fall into this Contradiction, that you allow him to have divine Powers, though he cannot have divine Powers; that is, you allow him to give Grace, though it is a divine Power, and not to forgive Sins, because it is a divine Power. My Lord, I wish your Laity (if there be any to whom you can render it intelligible) much Joy of such profound Divinity. Or if there are others who are more taken with your Lordship's Sincerity, I desire them not to pass by this following remarkable Instance of it: Your Lordship has here as plainly declared, as Words can consequentially declare any Thing, that you do not believe Christ to be God, yet profess yourself Bishop of a Church, whose Liturgy in so many repeated Testimonies declares the contrary Doctrine, and which obliges you to express your Assent and Consent to such Doctrine. My Lord, I here call upon your Sincerity; either declare Christ to be perfect God, and then show why he could not forgive Sins; or deny him to be perfect God, and then show how you can sincerely declare your Assent and Consent to the Doctrine of the Church of England.

This, my Lord, has an Appearance of Prevarication, which you cannot, I hope, charge upon any of your Adversaries, who if they cannot think, that to be sincere is the only Thing necessary to recommend Men to the Favour of God, yet may have as much, or possibly more Sincerity, than those who do think so.

Before I take Leave of your Lordship, I must take Notice of a Resting-place, a strong Retreat, a lasting Foundation, i.e., a Demonstration in the strictest Sense of the Words, that all Church-Communion is unnecessary.

Your Lordship sets it out in these Words:

I am not now going to accuse you of a Heresy against Charity, but of a Heresy against the Possibility and Nature of Things. As thus, Mr. Nelson (for Instance) thinks himself obliged in Conscience to communicate with some of our Church. Upon this you declare he hath no Title to God's Mercy; and you and all the World allow, that if he communicates with you whilst his Conscience tells him it is a Sin, he is self-condemned, and out of God's Favour. That Notion (viz. the Necessity of Church-Communion) therefore, which implies this great invincible Absurdity, cannot be true.

Pray, my Lord, what is this wondrous Curiosity of a Demonstration, but the common Case of an erroneous Conscience? Did the strictest Contenders for Church-Communion ever teach, that any Terms are to be complied with against Conscience? But it is a strange Conclusion to infer from thence, that there is no Obligation to Communion, or that all Things are to be held indifferent, because they are not to be complied with against one's Conscience.

The Truths of the Christian Religion have the same Nature and Obligation, whatever our Opinions are of them, and those that are necessary to be believed, continue so, whether we can persuade ourselves to believe them or not. I suppose your Lordship will not say, that the Articles of Faith and necessary Institutions of the Christian Religion, are no other ways necessary, than because we believe them to be so, that our Persuasion is the only Cause of the Necessity; but if their Necessity be not owing merely to our Belief of them, then it is certain that our Disbelief of them cannot make them less necessary. If the Ordinances of Christ, and the Articles of Faith are necessary, because Christ has made them so, that Necessity must continue the same, whether we believe and observe them or not.

So that, my Lord, we may still maintain the Necessity of Church-Communion, and the strict Observance of Christ's Ordinances, notwithstanding that People have different Persuasions in these Matters, presuming that our Opinions can no more alter the Nature or Necessity of Christ's Institutions, than we can believe Error into Truth, Good into Evil, or Light into Darkness. I shall think myself no Heretic against the Nature of Things, though I tell a conscientious Socinian, that the Divinity of Christ is necessary to be believed, or a conscientious Jew, that it is necessary to be a Christian in order to be saved. But if your Lordship's Demonstration was accepted, we should be obliged to give up the Necessity of every Doctrine and Institution, to every Disbeliever that pretended Conscience. We must not tell any Party of People that they are in any Danger for being out of Communion with us, if they do but follow their own Persuasion.

Your Lordship's invincible Demonstration proceeds thus :

We must not insist upon the Necessity of joining with any particular Church, because then conscientious Persons will be in Danger either Way; for if there be a Necessity of it, then there is a Danger if they do not join with it, and if they comply against their Consciences, the Danger is the same.

What an inextricable Difficulty is here! How shall Divinity or Logic be able to relieve us?

Be pleased, my Lord, to accept of this Solution, in lieu of your Demonstration.

I will suppose the Case of a conscientious Jew; I tell him that Christianity is the only covenanted Method of Salvation, and that he can have no Title to the Favour of God, till he professes the Faith of Christ. What, replies he, would you direct me to do? If I embrace Christianity against my Conscience, I am out of God's Favour; and if I follow my Conscience, and continue a Jew, I am also out of his Favour. The Answer is this, my Lord; The Jew is to obey his Conscience, and to be left to the uncovenanted, unpromised Terms of God's Mercy, whilst the conscientious Christian is entitled to the express and promised Favours of God.

There is still the same absolute Necessity of believing in Christ, Christianity is still the only Method of Salvation; though the sincere Jew cannot so persuade himself; and we ought to declare it to all Jews and Unbelievers whatsoever, that they can only be saved by embracing Christianity: That a false Religion does not become a true one, nor a true one false, in Consequence of their Opinions; but that if they are so unhappy as to refuse the Covenant of Grace, they must be left to such Mercy as is without any Covenant. And now, my Lord, what is become of this mighty Demonstration? Does it prove that Christianity is not necessary, because the conscientious Jew may think it is not so? It may as well prove that the Moon is no larger than a Man's Head, because an honest ignorant Countryman may think it no larger.

Is there any Person of common Sense, who would think it a Demonstration that he is not obliged to go to Church, because a conscientious Dissenter will not? Could he think it less necessary to be a Christian, because a sincere Jew cannot embrace Christianity? Could he take it to be an indifferent Matter whether he believed the Divinity of Christ, because a conscientious Socinian cannot? Yet this is your Lordship's invincible Demonstration, that we ought not to insist upon the Necessity of Church-Communion, because a conscientious Disbeliever cannot comply with it.

A small Degree of common Sense, would teach a Man that true Religion, and the Terms of Salvation, must have the same obligatory Force, whether we reason rightly about them or not; and that they who believe and practise according to them, are in express Covenant with God, which entitles them to his Favour; whilst those who are sincerely erroneous, have nothing but the Sincerity of their Errors to plead, and are left to such Mercy of God, as is without any Promise. Here, my Lord, is nothing frightful or absurd in this Doctrine; they who are in the Church which Christ has founded, are upon Terms which entitle them to God's Favour; they who are out of it, fall to his Mercy.

But your Lordship is not content with the Terms of the Gospel, or a Doctrine that only saves a particular Sort of People; this is a narrow View, not wide enough for your Notions of Liberty. Particular Religions, and particular Covenants, are demonstrated to be absurd, because particular Persons may disbelieve, or not submit to them.

Your Lordship must have Doctrines that will save all People alike, in every way that their Persuasion leads them to take: But, my Lord, there needs be no greater Demonstration against your Lordship's Doctrine, than that it equally favours every Way of Worship; for an Argument which equally proves every Thing, has been generally thought to prove nothing; which happens to be the Case of your Lordship's important Demonstration.

Your Lordship indeed only instances in a particular Person, Mr. Nelson; but your Demonstration is as serviceable to any other Person who has left any other Church whatever. The conscientious Quaker, Muggletonian, Independent, or Socinian, &c., has the same Right to obey Conscience, and blame any Church that assumes a Power of censuring him, as Mr. Nelson had; and if he is censured by any Church, that Church is as guilty of the same Heresy against the Nature of Things, as that Church which censured Mr. Nelson, or any Church that should pretend to censure any other Person whatever.

I am not at all surprised that your Lordship should teach this Doctrine, but it is something strange that such an Argument should be obtruded upon the World as an unheard-of Demonstration, and that in an Appeal to common Sense. Suppose some Body or other in Defence of your Lordship, should take upon him to demonstrate to the World that there is no such Thing as Colour, because there are some People that cannot see; or Sounds, because there are some who do not hear them; He would have found out the only Demonstration in the World that could equal your Lordship's, and would have as much Reason to call those Heretics against the Nature of Things, who should disbelieve him, and insist upon the Reality of Sounds, as your Lordship has to call your Adversaries so.

For is there no Necessity of Church-Communion, because there are some who do not conceive it? Then there are no Sounds, because there are some who do not hear them; for it is certainly as easy to believe away the Truth and Reality, as the Necessity of Things.

Some People have only taught us the Innocency of Error, and been content with setting forth its harmless Qualities; but your Lordship has been a more hearty Advocate, and given it a Power over every Truth and Institution of Christianity. If we have but an erroneous Conscience, the whole Christian Dispensation is cancelled ; all the Truths and Doctrines in the Bible are demonstrated to be unnecessary, if we do not believe them.

How unhappily have the several Parties of Christians been disputing for many Ages, who, if they could but have found out this intelligible Demonstration (from the Case of an erroneous Conscience), would have seen the Absurdity of pretending to necessary Doctrines, and insisting upon Church-Communion ; but it must be acknowledged your Lordship's new-invented Engine for the Destruction of Churches ; and it may be expected the good Christians of no Church will return your Lordship their Thanks for it.

Your Lordship has thought it a mighty Objection to some Doctrines in the Church of England, that the Papists might make some Advantage of them : But yet your own Doctrine defends all Communions alike, and serve the Jew and Socinian, &c., as much as any other sort of People. Though this sufficiently appears, from what has been already said, yet that it may be still more obvious to the common Sense of everyone, I shall reduce these Doctrines to Practice, and suppose, for once, that your Lordship intends to convert a Jew, a Quaker, or Socinian.

Now in order to make a Convert of any of them, these Preliminary PROPOSITIONS are to be first laid down according to your Lordship's Doctrine.

Some Propositions for the Improvement of true Religion.

Proposition I. That we are neither more or less in the Favour of God, for living in any particular Method or Way of Worship, but purely as we are sincere. Preserv., p. 90.

Prop. II. That no Church ought to unchurch another, or declare it out of God's Favour. Preserv., p. 85.

Prop. III. That nothing loses us the Favour of God, but a wicked Insincerity. Ibid.

Prop. IV. That a conscientious Person can be in no Danger for being out of any particular Church. Preserv., p. 90.

Prop. V. That there is no such Thing as any real Perfection or Excellency in any Religion, that can justify our adhering to it, but that all is founded in our personal Persuasion ; which your Lordship thus proves : When we left the Popish Doctrines, was it because they were actually corrupt ? No ; The Reason was, because we thought them so. Therefore if we might leave the Church of Rome, not because her Doctrines were corrupt, but because we thought them so, then the same Reason will justify anyone else, in leaving any Church, how true soever its Doctrines are ; and consequently there is no such Thing as any real Perfection or Excellency in any Religion considered in itself, but is right or wrong according to our Persuasions about it. Preserv., p. 85.

Prop. VI. That Christ is sole King and Lawgiver in his Kingdom, that no Men have any Power of Legislation in it; that if we would be good Members of it, we must show ourselves Subjects of Christ alone, without any Regard to Man's Judgment.

Prop. VII. That as Christ's Kingdom is not of this World, so when worldly Encouragements are annexed to it, these are so many Divisions against Christ and his own express Word. Serm., p. 11.

Prop. VIII. That to pretend to know the Hearts and Sincerity of Men, is Nonsense and Absurdity. Serm., p. 93.

Prop. IX. That God's Graces are only to be received immediately from himself. Serm., p. 89.

These, my Lord, are your Lordship's own Propositions, expressed in your own Terms, without any Exaggeration.

And now, my Lord, begin as soon as you please, either with a Quaker, Socinian, or Jew; use any Argument whatsoever to convert them, and you shall have a sufficient answer from your own Propositions.

Will you tell the Jew that Christianity is necessary to Salvation? He will answer from Prop. I. That we are neither more or less in the Favour of God for living in any particular Method or Way of Worship, but purely as we are sincere.

Will your Lordship tell him, that the Truth of Christianity is so well asserted, that there is no Excuse left for Unbelievers? He will answer from Prop. V. That all Religion is founded in personal Persuasion; that as your Lordship does not believe that Christ is come, because he is actually come, but because you think he is come; so he does not disbelieve Christ because he is not actually come, but because he thinks he is not come. So that here, my Lord, the Jew gives as good a Reason why he is not a Christian, as your Lordship does why you are not a Papist.

If your Lordship should turn the Discourse to a Quaker, and offer him any Reasons for embracing the Doctrine of the Church of England, you cannot possibly have any better Success; anyone may see from your Propositions, that no Argument can be urged, but what your Lordship has there fully answered. For since you allow nothing to the Truth of Doctrines, or the Excellency of any Communion as such, it is demonstrable that no Church or Communion can have any Advantage above another, which is absolutely necessary in order to persuade any sensible Man to exchange any Communion for another.

Will your Lordship tell a Quaker, that there is any Danger in that particular Way that he is in?

He can answer from Prop. I., III., and IV. That a conscientious Person cannot be in any Danger of being out of any particular Church.

Will your Lordship tell him that his Religion is condemned by the universal Church?

He can answer from Prop. II. That no Church ought to unchurch another, or declare it out of God's Favour.

Will you tell him that Christ has instituted Sacraments as necessary Means of Grace, which he neglects to observe?

He will answer you from Prop. IX. That God's Graces are only to be received immediately from himself. And to think that Bread and Wine, or the sprinkling of Water, is necessary to Salvation, is as absurd, as to think any Order of the Clergy is necessary to recommend us to God.

Will your Lordship tell him that he displeases God, by not holding several Articles of Faith, which Christ has required us to believe?

He can reply from Prop. III. That nothing loses us the Favour of God but a wicked Insincerity. And from Prop. V. That as your Lordship believes such Things, not because they are actually to be believed, but because you think so; so he disbelieves them, not because they are actually false, but because he thinks so.

Will your Lordship tell him he is insincere?

He can reply from Prop. VI. That to assume to know the Hearts and Sincerity of Men, is Nonsense and Blasphemy.

Will your Lordship tell him that he ought to conform to a Church established by the Laws of the Land?

He can answer from Prop. VIII. That this very Establishment is an Argument against Conformity? For as Christ's Kingdom is not of this World, so when worldly Encouragements are annexed to it, they are so many Decisions against Christ, and his own express Words. And from Prop. VII. That seeing Christ is sole King and Lawgiver in his Kingdom, and no Men have any Power of Legislation in it, they who would be good Members of it, must show themselves Subjects to Christ alone, without any Regard to Man's Judgment.

I am inclined to think, my Lord, that it is now demonstrated to the common Sense of the Laity, that your Lordship cannot urge any Argument, either from the Truth, the Advantage, or Necessity of embracing the Doctrines of the Church of England, to either Jew, Heretic, or Schismatic, but you have helped him to a full Answer to any such Argument, from your own Principles.

Are we, my Lord, to be treated as popishly affected for asserting some Truths, which the Papists join with us in asserting? Is it a Crime in us not to drop some necessary Doctrines, because the Papists have not dropped them? If this is to be popishly affected, we own the Charge, and are not for being such true Protestants, as to give up the Apostles' Creed, or lay aside the Sacraments, because they are received by the Church of Rome. I cannot indeed charge your Lordship with being well affected to the Church of Rome, or of England, to the Jews, the Quakers, or Socinians; but this I have demonstrated, and will undertake the Defence of it, that your Lordship's Principles equally serve them all alike, and do not give the least Advantage to one Church above another, as has sufficiently appeared from your Principles.

I will no more say your Lordship is in the Interest of the Quakers, or Socinians, or Papists, than I would charge you with being in the Interest of the Church of England; for as your Doctrines equally support them all, he ought to ask your Lordship's Pardon, who should declare you more a Friend to one than the other.

I intended, my Lord, to have considered another very obnoxious Article in your Lordship's Doctrines concerning the Repugnancy of temporal Encouragements to the Nature of Christ's Kingdom; but the Consistency and Reasonableness of guarding this spiritual Kingdom with human Laws, has been defended with so much Perspicuity and Strength of Argument, and your Lordship's Objections so fully confuted by the judicious and learned Dean of Chichester, that I presume this Part of the Controversy is finally determined.

I hope, my Lord, that I have delivered nothing here that needs any Excuse or Apology to the Laity, that they will not be persuaded, through any vain Pretence of Liberty, to make themselves Parties against the first Principles of Christianity; or imagine, that whilst we contend for the positive Institutions of the Gospel, the Necessity of Church-Communion, or the Excellency of our own, we are robbing them of their natural Rights, or interfering with their Privileges. Whilst we appear in the Defence of any part of Christianity, we are engaged for them in the common Cause of Christians; and I am persuaded better Things of the Laity, than to believe that such Labours will render either our Persons or Professions hateful to them. Your Lordship has indeed endeavoured to give an invidious Turn to the Controversy, by calling upon the Laity to assert their Liberties, as if they were in Danger from the Principles of Christianity.—But, my Lord, what Liberty does any Layman lose, by our asserting, that Church-Communion is necessary? What Privilege is taken from them by our teaching the Danger of certain Ways and Methods of Religion? Is a Man made a Slave because he is cautioned against the Principles of the Quakers, against Fanaticism, Popery, or Socinianism? Is he in a State of Bondage because the Sacraments are necessary, and none but episcopal Clergy ought to administer them? Is his Freedom destroyed because there is a particular Order of Men appointed by God to minister in holy Things, and be serviceable to him in recommending him to the Favour of God? Can any Person, my Lord, think these Things Breaches upon their Liberty, except such as think the Commandments a Burden? Is there any more Hardship in saying thou shalt keep to an episcopal Church, than thou shalt be baptized? Or in requiring People to receive particular Sacraments, than to believe particular Books of Scripture to be the Word of God? If some other Advocate for the Laity should, out of Zeal for their Rights, declare that they need not believe one-half of the Articles in the Creed, if they would but assert their Liberty, he would be as true a Friend, and deserve the same Applause, as he who should assert the Necessity of Church-Communion is inconsistent with the natural Rights and Liberties of Mankind.

I am, my LORD,

Your Lordship's most

Humble Servant,

William Law.

Postscript.

I HOPE your Lordship will not think it unnatural or impertinent, to offer here a Word or two in Answer to some Objections against my former Letter.

To begin with the Doctrine of the uninterrupted Succession of the Clergy.

I have, as I think, proved that there is a divine Commission required to qualify any one to exercise the priestly Office, and that seeing this divine Commission can only be had from such particular Persons as God has appointed to give it, therefore it is necessary that there should be a continual Succession of such Persons, in order to keep up a commissioned Order of the Clergy. For if the Commission itself be to descend through Ages, and distinguish the Clergy from the Laity; it is certain the Persons who alone can give this Commission, must descend through the same Ages, and consequently an uninterrupted Succession is as necessary, as that the Clergy have a divine Commission. Take away this Succession, and the Clergy may as well be ordained by one Person as another; a Number of Women may as well give them a divine Commission, as a Congregation of any Men; they may indeed appoint Persons to officiate in holy Orders, for the Sake of Decency and Order; but then there is no more in it, than an external Decency and Order; they are no more the Priests of God, than those that pretended to make them so. If we had lost the Scriptures, it would be very well to make as good Books as we could, and come as near them as possible; but then it would be not only Folly, but Presumption, to call them the Word of God. But I proceed to the Objections against the Doctrine of an uninterrupted Succession.

First, It is said, that there is no mention made of it in Scripture, as having any Relation to the Being of a Church.

Secondly, That it is subject to so great Uncertainty, that if it be necessary we cannot now be sure we are in the Church.

Thirdly, That it is a popish Doctrine, and gives them great Advantage over us.

I begin with the first Objection, that there is no mention made of it in the Scriptures, which though I think I have sufficiently answered in this Letter, I shall here farther consider.

Pray, my Lord, is it not a true Doctrine, that the Scriptures contain all Things necessary to Salvation? But, my Lord, it is nowhere expressly said, that the Scriptures contain all Things necessary to Salvation. It is nowhere said, that no other Articles of Faith need be believed. Where does it appear in Scripture, that the Scriptures were writ by any divine Command? Have any of the Gospels or Epistles this Authority to recommend them? Are they necessary to be believed, because there is any Law of Christ concerning the Necessity of believing them?

May I reject this uninterrupted Succession, because it is not mentioned in Scripture? And may I not as well reject all the Gospels? Produce your Authority, my Lord, mention your Texts of Scripture, where Christ has hung the Salvation of Men upon their believing that St. Matthew or St. John wrote such a Book seventeen hundred years ago. These, my Lord, are Niceties and Trifles which are not to be found in Scripture, and consequently have nothing to do with the Salvation of Men.

Now if nothing be to be held as necessary, but what is expressly required in so many Words in Scripture, then it can never be proved that the Scriptures themselves are a standing Rule of Faith in all Ages, since it is nowhere expressly asserted, nor is it anywhere said, that the Scriptures should be continued as a Rule of Faith in all Ages. Is it an Objection against the Necessity of a perpetual Succession of the Clergy, that it is not mentioned in the Scripture? And is it not as good a one against the Necessity of making Scripture the standing Rule of Faith in all Ages, since it is never said that they were to be continued as a standing Rule in all Ages? If Things are only necessary for being said to be so in Scripture, then all that are not thus taught are equally unnecessary, and consequently it is no more necessary that the Scripture should be a fixed Rule of Faith in all Ages, than that there should be Bishops to ordain in all Ages.

Again, Where shall we find it in Scripture, that the Sacraments are to be continued in every Age of the Church? Where is it said that they shall always be the ordinary Means of Grace necessary to be observed? Is there any Law of Christ, any Text of Scripture, that expressly asserts, that if we leave the Use of the Sacraments, we are out of Covenant with God? Is it anywhere directly said, that we must never lay them aside, or that they will be perpetually necessary? No, my Lord, this is a Nicety and Trifle not to be found in Scripture: There is no Stress laid there upon this Matter, but upon Things of a quite different Nature.

I now presume, my Lord, that every one who has common Sense plainly sees, that if this Succession of the Clergy is to be despised, because it is not expressly required in Scripture; it undeniably follows, that we may reject the Scriptures, as not being a standing Rule of Faith in all Ages; we may disuse the Sacraments, as not the ordinary Means of Grace in all Ages; since these are no more mentioned in the Scriptures, or expressly required, than this uninterrupted Succession.

If it be a good Argument against the necessity of episcopal Ordainers, that it is never said in Scripture that there shall always be such Ordainers; it is certainly as conclusive against the Use of the Sacraments in every Age, that it is nowhere said in Scripture they shall be used in all Ages.

If no Government or Order of the Clergy is to be held as necessary, because no such Necessity is asserted in Scripture; it is certain, this concludes as strongly against Government, and the Order itself, as against any particular Order. For it is no more said in Scripture that there shall be an Order of Clergy, than that there shall be any particular Order; therefore if this Silence proves against any particular Order of Clergy, it proves as much against Order itself.

Should therefore any of your Lordship's Friends have so much Church-Zeal, as to contend for the Necessity of some Order, though of no particular Order; he must fall under your Lordship's Displeasure, and be proved as mere a Dreamer and Trifler, as those who assert the Necessity of episcopal Ordination. For if it be plain that there need be no episcopal Clergy, because it is not said there shall always be episcopal Clergy; it is undeniably plain that there need be no Order of the Clergy, since it is nowhere said, there shall be an Order of Clergy: Therefore whoever shall contend for an Order of Clergy, will be as much condemned by your Lordship's Doctrine, as he that declares for the episcopal Clergy.

The Truth of the Matter is this; if nothing is to be esteemed of any Moment, but counted as mere Trifle and Nicety among Christians, which is not expressly required in the Scriptures; then it is a Trifle and Nicety, whether we believe the Scriptures to be a standing Rule of Faith in all Ages, whether we use the Sacraments in all Ages, whether we have any Clergy at all, whether we observe the Lord's Day, whether we baptize our Children, or whether we go to public Worship; for none of these Things are expressly required in so many Words in Scripture. But if your Lordship, with the rest of the Christian World, will take these Things to be of Moment, and well proved, because they are founded in Scripture, though not in express Terms, or under plain Commands; if you will acknowledge these Matters to be well asserted, because they may be gathered from Scripture, and are confirmed by the universal Practice of the Church in all Ages, (which is all the Proof that they are capable of,) I do not doubt but it will appear, that this successive Order of the Clergy is founded on the same Evidence, and supported by as great Authority, so that it must be thought of the same Moment with these Things by all unprejudiced Persons.

For, my Lord, though it be not expressly said, that there shall always be a Succession of Episcopal Clergy, yet it is a Truth founded in Scripture itself, and asserted by the universal Voice of Tradition in the first and succeeding Ages of the Church.

It is thus founded in Scripture: There we are taught that the Priesthood is a positive Institution; that no Man can take this Office unto himself; that neither our Saviour himself, nor his Apostles, nor any other Person, however extraordinarily endowed with Gifts from God, could, as such, exercise the priestly Office, till they had God's express Commission for that Purpose. Now how does it appear, that the Sacraments are positive Institutions, but that they are consecrated to such Ends and Effects, as of themselves they were no way qualified to perform? Now as it appears from Scripture that Men, as such, however endowed, were not qualified to take this Office upon them without God's Appointment; it is demonstratively certain, that Men so called are as much to be esteemed a positive Institution, as Elements so chosen can be called a positive Institution. All the personal Abilities of Men conferring no more Authority to exercise the Office of a Clergyman, than the natural Qualities of Water to make a Sacrament: So that the one Institution is as truly positive as the other.

Again, The Order of the Clergy is not only a positive Order instituted by God, but the different Degrees in this Order are of the same Nature. For we find in Scripture, that some Persons could perform some Offices in the Priesthood, which neither Deacons nor Priests could do, though those Deacons and Priests were inspired Persons, and Workers of Miracles. Thus Timothy was sent to ordain Elders, because none below his Order, who was a Bishop, could perform that Office. Peter and John laid their Hands on baptized Persons, because neither Priests nor Deacons, though Workers of Miracles, could execute that Part of the sacerdotal Office.

How can we imagine that the Apostles and Bishops thus distinguished themselves for nothing? That there was the same Power in Deacons and Priests to execute those Offices, though they took them to themselves? No my Lord; if three Degrees in the Ministry are instituted in Scripture, we are obliged to think them as truly distinct in their Powers, as we are to think that the Priesthood itself contains Powers that are distinct from those of the Laity. It is no more consistent with Scripture, to say that Deacons or Priests may ordain, than that the Laity are Priests or Deacons. The same divine Institution making as truly a Difference betwixt the Clergy, as it does betwixt Clergy and Laity.

Now if the Order of the Clergy be a divine positive Institution, in which there are different Degrees of Power, where some alone can ordain, &c., whilst others can only perform other Parts of the sacred Office; if this (as it plainly appears) be a Doctrine of Scripture, then it is a Doctrine of Scripture, that there is a Necessity of such a Succession of Men as have Power to ordain. For do the Scriptures make it necessary that Timothy (or some Bishop) should be sent to Ephesus to ordain Priests, because the Priests who were there could not ordain? And do not the same Scriptures make it as necessary, that Timothy's Successor be the only Ordainer, as well as he was in his Time? Will not Priests in the next Age be as destitute of the Power of ordaining, as when Timothy was alive? So that since the Scriptures teach, that Timothy, or Persons of his Order, could alone ordain in that Age, they as plainly teach, that the Successors of that Order can alone ordain in any Age, and consequently the Scriptures plainly teach a Necessity of an episcopal Succession.

The Scriptures declare there is a Necessity of a divine Commission to execute the Office of a Priest; they also teach, that this Commission can only be had from particular Persons: Therefore the Scriptures plainly teach, there is a Necessity of a Succession of such particular Persons, in order to keep up a truly commissioned Clergy.

Suppose when Timothy was sent to Ephesus to ordain Elders, the Church had told him, We have chosen Elders already, and laid our Hands upon them; that if he alone was allowed to exercise this Power, it might seem as if he alone had it; or that Ministers were the better for being ordained by his particular Hands; and that some Persons might imagine they could have no Clergy, except they were ordained by him, or some of his Order; and that seeing Christ had nowhere made an express Law, that such Persons should be necessary to the Ordination of the Clergy; therefore they rejected this Authority of Timothy, lest they should subject themselves to Niceties and Trifles.

Will your Lordship say, that such a Practice would have been allowed of in the Ephesians? Or that Ministers so ordained would have been received as the Ministers of Christ? If not, why must such Practice or such Ministers be allowed of in any After ages? Would not the same Proceeding against any of Timothy's Successors have deserved the same Censure, as being equally unlawful? If therefore the Scripture condemns all Ordination but what is episcopal, the Scriptures make a Succession of episcopal Ordainers necessary. So that I hope, my Lord, we shall be no more told that this is a Doctrine not mentioned in Scripture, or without any Foundation in it.

The great Objection to this Doctrine is, that this episcopal Order of the Clergy is only an apostolical Practice; and seeing all apostolical Practices are not binding to us, surely this need not.

In Answer to this, my Lord, I shall first shew, that though all apostolical Practices are not necessary, yet some may be necessary. Secondly, That the divine unalterable Right of Episcopacy is not founded merely on apostolical Practice.

To begin with the first; The Objection runs thus, All apostolical Practices are not unalterable or obligatory to us, therefore no apostolical Practices are. This, my Lord, is just as theological, as if I should say all Scripture-Truths are not Articles of Faith, or Fundamentals of Religion, therefore no Scripture-Truths are: Is not the Argument full as just and solid in one Case as the other? May there not be the same Difference between some Practices of the Apostles and others, that there is betwixt some Scripture Truths and others? Are all Truths equally important that are to be found in the Bible? Why must all Practices be of the same Moment that were apostolical? Now if there be any Way, either divine or human, of knowing an Article of Faith, from the smallest Truth, or most indifferent Matter in Scripture, they will equally assist us in distinguishing what apostolical Practices are of perpetual Obligation, and what are not. But it is a strange Way of Reasoning, that some People are fallen into, who seem to know nothing of Moderation, but jump as constantly out of one Extreme into another, as if there was no such Thing as a middle Way, or any such Virtue as Moderation. Thus either the Church must have an absolute uncontrollable Authority, or none at all; we must either hold all apostolical Practices necessary, or none at all.

Again, If no apostolical Practices can be unalterable, because all are not, then no apostolical Doctrines are necessary to be taught in all Ages, because all apostolical Doctrines are not; and we are no more obliged to teach the Death, Satisfaction, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, than we are obliged to forbid the eating of Blood and Things strangled. If we must thus blindly follow them in all their Practices, or else be at Liberty to leave them in all, we must for the same Reason implicitly teach all their Doctrines, or else have a Power of receding from them all.

For if there be any Thing in the Nature of Doctrines, in the Tenor of Scripture, or the Sense of Antiquity, whereby we can know the Difference of some Doctrines from others, that some were occasional temporary Determinations, suited to particular States and Conditions in the Church, whilst others were such general Doctrines as would concern the Church in all States and Circumstances; if there can be this Difference betwixt apostolical Doctrines, there must necessarily be the same Difference betwixt apostolical Practices, unless we will say, that their Practices, were not suited to their Doctrines. For occasional Doctrines must produce occasional Practices.

Now may we not be obliged by some Practices of the Apostles, where the Nature of the Thing, and the Consent of Antiquity, shews it to be equally necessary and important in all Ages and Conditions of the Church, without being tied down to the strict Observance of every Thing which the Apostles did, though it plainly appears that it was done upon accidental and mutable Reasons? Can we not be obliged to observe the Lord's Day from apostolical Practice, without being equally obliged to lock the Doors where we are met, because in the Apostle's Time they locked them for Fear of their Enemies.

My Lord, we are to follow the Practices of the Apostles, as we ought to follow every Thing else, with Discretion and Judgment, and not run headlong into every Thing they did, because they were Apostles, or yet think that because we need not practise after them in every Thing, we need do it in nothing. We best imitate them, when we act upon such Reasons as they acted upon, and neither make their occasional Practices perpetual Laws, nor break through such general Rules as will always have the same Reason to be observed.

If it be asked how we can know what Practices must be observed, and what may be laid aside? I answer, as we know Articles of Faith from lesser Truths; as we know occasional Doctrines from perpetual Doctrines; that is, from the Nature of the Things, from the Tenor of Scripture, and the Testimony of Antiquity.

Secondly, It is not true, that the divine unalterable Right of Episcopacy is founded merely upon apostolical Practice.

We do not say that Episcopacy cannot be changed merely because we have apostolical Practice for it, but because such is the Nature of the Christian Priesthood, that it can only be continued in that Method, which God has appointed for its Continuance. Thus Episcopacy is the only instituted Method of continuing the Priesthood; therefore Episcopacy is unchangeable, not because it is an apostolical Practice, but because the Nature of the Thing requires it: A positive Institution being only to be continued in that Method which God has appointed; so that it is the Nature of the Priesthood, and not the apostolical Practice alone, that makes it necessary to be continued. The apostolical Practice indeed shews, that Episcopacy is the Order that is appointed, but it is the Nature of the Priesthood that assures us that it is unalterable: And that because an Office which is of no Significancy, but as it is of divine Appointment, and instituted by God, can no otherwise be continued, but in that Way of Continuance which God has appointed.

The Argument proceeds thus: The Christian Priesthood is a divine positive Institution, which as it could only begin by the divine Appointment, so it can only descend to After-ages in such a Method as God has been pleased to appoint.

The Apostles (and your Lordship owns, Christ was in all that they did*) instituted Episcopacy alone, therefore this Method of Episcopacy is unalterable, not because an apostolical Practice cannot be laid aside, but because the Priesthood can only descend to After-ages in such a Method as is of divine Appointment.

So that the Question is not fairly stated, when it is asked whether Episcopacy, being an apostolical Practice, may be laid aside? But it should be asked, whether an instituted particular Method of continuing the Priesthood be not necessary to be continued? Whether an appointed Order of receiving a Commission from God be not necessary to be observed, in order to receive a Commission from him? If the Case was thus stated, as it ought, to be fairly stated, anyone would soon perceive, that we can no more lay aside Episcopacy, and yet continue the Christian Priesthood, than we can alter the Terms of Salvation, and be in Covenant with God.

I come now, my Lord, to the second Objection, That this uninterrupted Succession is subject to so great Uncertainty, that if it be necessary, we can never say that we are in the Church.

I know no Reason, my Lord, why it is so uncertain, but because it is founded upon historical Evidence. Let it therefore be considered, my Lord, that Christianity itself is a Matter of Fact only conveyed to us by historical Evidence: That the Canon of Scripture is only made known to us by historical Evidence; that we have no other Way of knowing what Writings are the Word of God; and yet the Truth of our Faith, and every other Means of Grace depends upon our Knowledge and Belief of the Scriptures. Must we not declare the Necessity of the Succession of Bishops, because it can only be proved by historical Evidence, and that for such a long Tract of Time?

Why then do we declare the Belief of the Scriptures necessary to Salvation? Is not this equally putting the Salvation of Men upon a Matter of Fact, supported only by historical Evidence, and making it depend upon Things done seventeen hundred Years ago? Cannot historical Evidence satisfy us in one Point, as well as in the other? Is there any Thing in the Nature of this Succession, that it cannot be as well asserted by historical Evidence, as the Truth of the Scriptures? Is there not the same bare Possibility in the Thing itself, that the Scriptures may in some important Points be corrupted, as that this Succession may be broke? But is this any just Reason why we should believe, or fear, that the Scriptures are corrupted, because there is a physical

* Answer to Dr. Snape.

Possibility of it, though there is all the Proof that can be required of the contrary? Why then must we set aside the Necessity of this Succession from a bare Possibility of Error, though there is all the Proof that can be required, that it never was broken, but strictly kept up?

And though your Lordship has told the World so much of the Improbability, Nonsense, and Absurdity of this Succession, yet I promise your Lordship an Answer, whenever you shall think fit to show, when, or how, or where, this Succession broke, or seemed to break, or was likely to break.

And till then, I shall content myself with offering this Reason to your Lordship, why it is morally impossible it ever should have broken in all the Term of Years, from the Apostles to the present Times.

The Reason is this; it has been a received Doctrine in every Age of the Church, that no Ordination was valid but that of Bishops: This Doctrine, my Lord, has been a constant Guard upon the episcopal Succession; for seeing it was universally believed that Bishops alone could ordain, it was morally impossible that any Persons could be received as Bishops, who had not been so ordained.

Now is it not morally impossible that in our Church anyone should be made a Bishop without episcopal Ordination? Is there any Possibility of forging Orders, or stealing a Bishopric by any other Stratagem? No, it is morally impossible, because it is an acknowledged Doctrine amongst us, that a Bishop can only be ordained by Bishops. Now as this Doctrine must necessarily prevent anyone being a Bishop without episcopal Ordination in our Age, so it must have the same Effect in every other Age as well as ours; and consequently it is as reasonable to believe that the Succession of Bishops was not broke in any Age since the Apostles, as that it was not broke in our own Kingdom within these forty Years. For the same Doctrine which preserves it forty Years, may as well preserve it forty hundred Years, if it was equally believed in all that Space of Time. That this has been the constant Doctrine of the Church, I presume your Lordship will not deny; I have not here entered into the historical Defence of it; this, and indeed every other Institution of the Christian Church, has been lately so well defended from the ecclesiastical Records by a very excellent and judicious Writer.*

We believe the Scriptures are not corrupted, because it was always a received Doctrine in the Church, that they were the standing Rule of Faith, and because the Providence of God may well be supposed to preserve such Books as were to convey to every Age the Means of Salvation. The same Reasons prove the great Improbability that this Succession should ever be broken, both because it was always against a received Doctrine to break it, and because we may justly hope the Providence of God would keep up his own Institution.

I must here observe, that though your Lordship often exposes the Impossibility of this Succession, yet at other times, even you yourself, and your Advocates, assert it. Thus you tell us, *That the Papists have one regular Appointment or uninterrupted Succession of Bishops undefiled with the touch of Lay-hands.

Is this Succession then such an improbable impossible Thing, and yet can your Lordship assure us that it is at Rome; that though it be seventeen hundred Years old there, yet that it is a true one? Is it such Absurdity, and Nonsense, and every Thing that is ridiculous, when we lay Claim to it; and yet can your Lordship assure us that it is not only possible to be, but actually is in Being, in the Church of Rome; What Arguments or Authority can your Lordship produce, to shew that there is a Succession there, that will not equally prove it to be here?

You assert expressly, that there is a true Succession there; you deny that we have it here; therefore your Lordship must mean, that we have not episcopal Ordination when we separated from the Church of Rome. And here the Controversy must rest betwixt you and your Adversaries, whether we had episcopal Ordination then; for as your Lordship has expressly affirmed that there is this uninterrupted Succession in the Church of Rome, it is impossible that we should want it, unless we had not episcopal Ordination at the Reformation.

Whenever your Lordship shall please to appear in Defence of the Nag's-Head Story, or any other Pretence against our episcopal Ordination when we departed from Rome, we shall beg Leave to shew ourselves so far true Protestants, as to answer any Popish Argument your Lordship can produce.

Here let the common Sense of the Laity be once more appealed to: Your Lordship tells them that an uninterrupted Succession is improbable, absurd, and morally speaking, impossible, and, for this Reason, they need not trouble their Heads about it; yet in another Place you positively affirm, that this true uninterrupted Succession is actually in the Church of Rome: That is, they are to despise this Succession, because it never was, or ever can be; yet are to believe that it really is in the Romish Church. My Lord, this comes very near saying and unsaying, to the great Diversion of the Papists. Must they not laugh at your Lordship's Protestant Zeal, which might be much better called the Spirit of Popery? Must they not be highly pleased with all your Banter and Ridicule upon an uninterrupted Succession, when they see you so kindly accept theirs: And think it only Nonsense and Absurdity when claimed by any other Church? Surely, my Lord, they must conceive great Hopes of your Lordship, since you have here rather chosen to contradict yourself, than not vouch for their Succession: For you have said it is morally impossible, yet affirm that it is with them.

* Preservative, p. 80.

The third Objection against this uninterrupted Succession is this, that it is a Popish Doctrine, and gives Papists Advantage over us.

The Objection proceeds thus, We must not assert the Necessity of this Succession, because the Papists say it is only to be found with them. I might add, because some mighty zealous Protestants say so too.

But if this be good Argumentation, we ought not to tell the Jews, or Deists, &c., that there is any Necessity of embracing Christianity, because the Papists say Christians can only be saved in their Church.

Again, we ought not to insist upon a true Faith, because the Papists say that a true Faith is only in their Communion. So that there is just as much Popery in teaching this Doctrine, as in asserting the Necessity of Christianity to a Jew, or the Necessity of a right Faith to a Socinian, &c.

I shall only trouble your Lordship with a Word or two concerning another Point in my former Letter. I there proved that your Lordship has put the whole of our Title to God's Favour upon Sincerity, as such, independent of every Thing else. That no Purity of Worship, no Excellence of Order, no Truth of Faith, no Sort of Sacraments, no Kind of Institutions, or any Church, as such, can help us to the least Degree of God's Favour, or give us the smallest Advantage above any other Communion. And consequently, that your Lordship has set sincere Jews, Quakers, Socinians, Muggletonians, and all Heretics and Schismatics, upon the same Bottom, as to the Favour of God, with sincere Christians.

Upon this, my Lord, I am called upon to prove that these several Sorts of People can be sincere in your Account of Sincerity. To which, my Lord, I make this Answer, Either there are some sincere Persons among Jews, Quakers, Socinians, or any kind of Heretics and Schismatics, or there are not; if there are, your Lordship has given them the same Title to God's Favour, that you have to the sincerest Christians; if you will say there are no sincere Persons amongst any of them, then your Lordship damns them all in the Gross ; for surely Corruptions in Religion, professed with Insincerity, will never save People.

I have nothing to do to prove the Sincerity of any of them ; if they are sincere, what I have said is true ; if you will not allow them to be sincere, you condemn them all at once.

Again, I humbly supposed a Man might be sincere in his religious Opinions, though it might be owing to some ill Habits, or something criminal in himself, that he was fallen into such or such a Way of thinking. But it seems this is all Contradiction ; and no Man can be sincere, who has any Faults, or whose Faults have any Influence upon his Way of thinking.

Your Lordship tells all the Dissenters, that they may be easy if they are sincere ; and that it is the only Ground for Peace and Satisfaction. But pray, my Lord, if none are to be esteemed sincere, but those who have no Faults, or whose Faults have no Influence upon their Persuasions, who can be assured that he is sincere, but he that has the least Pretence to it, the proud Pharisee ? If your Lordship, or your Advocates, were desired to prove your Sincerity, either before God or Man, it must be for these Reasons, because you have no ill Passions or Habits, no faulty Prejudices, no past or present Vices, that can have any Effect upon your Minds. My Lord, as this is the only Proof that any of you could give of your own Sincerity, in this Meaning of it, so the very pretence to it, would prove the Want of it.

The Third Letter to the Bishop of Bangor.

My Lord,

I BEG leave to trouble your Lordship and the World once more with my Remarks upon the Doctrines you have lately delivered. Your Sermon and Preservative I have already considered in the most impartial manner I could; and shall now examine your Answer to the Representation of the Learned Committee, both as it is an Answer to that, and as it contains Opinions contrary to the fundamental Articles of Christianity.

I have less need of excusing to your Lordship this third Address, since you can so easily acquit yourself from the Trouble of making any Reply to whatever comes from me. It seems I have too small a Reputation to deserve your Notice; but if the Dean of Chichester would but declare for the Doctrines delivered in my Letters, and put but a little of his Reputation upon the issue, then, you say, you would submit to the Employment of an Answer.*

My Lord, I readily confess that I have neither Reputation nor Learning, nor any Title to recommend me to your Lordship's Notice; but I must own, that I thought the very want of these would, in your Opinion, qualify me to make better Enquiries into Religious Truths, and raise your Esteem of me as a Correspondent in these Matters. For you expressly declare, that if Learning or Literature is to be interested in this Debate, then the most learned Man has certainly a Title to be the Universal Judge.† So that no Man ought to shew any Regard to Learning, as a Qualification in religious Disputes, unless he will own that the most learned Man has a Title to be a Pope, or as you express it, the Universal Judge. Yet your Lordship, in spite of this Protestant Doctrine so lately delivered, has despised and overlooked all my Opinions in Religion merely for my want of Character and Learning, and has promised to undertake the needless Task of examining those Opinions with another Gentleman, merely upon account of his Character and Reputation. So that though it is perfect Popery, and making the most learned Man the universal Judge, to allow anything to Learning; yet your Lordship is so true a Protestant, and pays so great a Regard to Learning, that you will not so much as examine a Doctrine with a Person of no Character for Learning.

* Ans. to Condit. of our Saviour vindicated, p. 112.

Again you say; *Nothing has been seen to administer so many Doubts and Differences (in Religion) as Learning, and that none are seen to be less secure from Error than learned Men.

Now is it not strange, my Lord, that after this noble Declaration against Learning, as the greatest Cause of Doubts and Differences, this extraordinary Preference given to Ignorance, as a more likely Guide to Truth, you should despise anyone as below your Notice in religious Disputes, because he wants that Learning which so blinds the Understanding? Can you ascribe thus much Honour to Learning, which in your Opinion does so much Dishonour to Religion? Will you interest those Qualities in this Debate, which if they are allowed to have any Interest in it, will make the Man of the greatest Abilities the Universal Judge.

Again, As a farther Reason why you have taken no notice of me, you say, as considerable a Writer as Mr. Law is, I hope the Committee, as a Body, are much more considerable in the Dean's Eyes; I am sure, they are in mine: And the Dean himself, I have thought a much more considerable writer than Mr. Law, and so have spent all my time upon Him and the Committee.

Now, my Lord, though I readily acknowledge this to be exceeding true, and have so far at least a just Opinion of myself, as to be afraid to be compared to much less Persons than the Dean, or any of the learned Committee, yet, my Lord, this Reason, which, if urged by anyone else, might pass for a good one, cannot be urged by you, without contradicting a principal Doctrine maintained in your Answer to the Representation. For there you bid us look into the Popish Countries; and see whether one illiterate honest Man be not as capable of judging for himself in Religion, as all their learned Men united; even supposing them met together in a General Council, with all possible Marks of Solemnity and Grandeur.†

Here we see a Person merely for his want of Literature made as good a Judge in Religion, as a General Council of the most learned Men, acting with the utmost Solemnity. We see a Council in its utmost Perfection contemptuously compared to, and even made less considerable than a private illiterate Person. And this we may fairly suppose was intended to shew your Contempt of the English Convocation. But a few Weeks after, when you had another Design in your Head, you tell us to this purpose, that you disregarded the Writings of a single Person of no Figure in the learned World, to pay your respect to the Committee as a Body, which, as such, is much more considerable in your Eyes. So that here an illiterate Person is made a great Judge in Religion in regard to a Body of learned Men, because he is illiterate; and here that same Person is made of no Consideration in Points of Religion in regard to a Body of learned Men, merely because he is private and illiterate.

It will be of no Advantage to your Lordship, to say that you have only replied to the Dean, in relation to me; in the same Words that he used to you, in relation to Mr. Sykes.

For, my Lord, that Reply might be proper enough from the Dean, if he judged right of Mr. Sykes's Performance; it being very reasonable to overlook an Adversary that has neither Truth, Abilities, or Reputation to support his Cause.

But though this might be right in the Dean, who pays a true Regard to the Authority and Learning of great Men, yet it cannot be defended by your Lordship. For though my Learning or Reputation were ever so low, they are so far from unqualifying me for Religious Enquiries, that if you would sincerely stand to what you have said, you ought, for the want of these very Accomplishments, to esteem me the more, and even choose me out as a Correspondent in this Debate.

But however, without any farther Regard to the Opinion your Lordship has either of me or my Abilities, I shall proceed to the most impartial Examination of your Book that I possibly can.

Of the Nature of the Church.

TO begin with your Lordship's Description of a Church; *The number of Men, whether small or great, whether dispersed or united, who truly and sincerely are Subjects to Christ alone in Matters of Salvation.

The learned Committee calls this your Lordship's Description of a Church.

* Serm., p. 17.

Your Lordship answers; *I wonder to hear this called my Description of A Church; whereas I pretend, in those Words to describe no other, but The Universal Invisible Church. It is a Description, not of A Church, in our modern way of speaking; but of The Church, the Invisible Church of Christ.

May not we also wonder, my Lord, that you should so describe The Church, that it will not bear being called A Church? If I should say it is a Description of no Church, I have your Lordship's Confession, that it is not A Church; so that it is something betwixt a Church and no Church, that is, it is The Church.

Suppose, my Lord, somebody or other should have a mind to be of your Church, if he betakes himself to A Church, he is wrong; you do not mean A Church, but The Church. Your Lordship owns that this is not a Description of a Church in the modern way of speaking; I humbly presume to call upon your Lordship to shew that it is a Description according to the ancient way of speaking. To call the Number of Believers the Invisible Church, is a way of speaking, no more to be found in the Scriptures, than the Company of Præ-Adamites.

There is, no doubt of it, an Invisible Church, i.e., a Number of Beings that are in Covenant with God, who are not to be seen by human Eyes; and we may be said to be Members of this Invisible Church, as we are entitled to the same Hopes and Expectations. But to call the Number of Men and Women who believe in Christ and observe his Institutions, whether dispersed or united in this visible World, to call these The Invisible Church, is as false and groundless, as to call them the Order of Angels, or the Church of Seraphims. The Profession of Christians is as visible as any other Profession, and as much declared by visible external Acts. And it is as proper to call a Number of Men practising Law or Physic, an Invisible Society of Lawyers and Physicians, as to call the Church on Earth the Invisible Church. For all those Acts and Offices which prove People to be Christians, or the Church of Christ, are as visible and notorious, as those which prove them to be of any particular secular Employment. Would it be proper to call the Number of Infidels and Idolaters the Invisible Church of the Devil? Are they not visibly under the Dominion of the Powers of Darkness? Are they not visibly out of Christ's Church? Must it not therefore be as visible who is in this Church, as who is not in it?

If anyone should tell us that we are to believe Invisible Scriptures, and observe Invisible Sacraments, he would have just as much Reason and Scripture of his side, as your Lordship has for this Doctrine. And it would be of the same Service to the World to talk of these Invisibilities, if the Canon of Scripture was in dispute, as to describe this Invisible Church, when the Case is, with what Visible Church we ought to unite.

Our Saviour himself tells us, that *the Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a Net that was cast into the Sea, and gathered of every kind; which, when it was full, they drew to shore and sat down, and gathered the good into Vessels, but cast the bad away. And then says, so shall it be at the end of the World.

This, my Lord, is a Description of the State of Christ's Church given us by himself. Is there anything in this Description that should lead us to take it for an Invisible Kingdom, that consists of one particular sort of People invisibly united to Christ? Nay, is it not the whole Intent of this Similitude to teach us the contrary, that his Kingdom is to consist of a Mixture of good and bad Subjects till the End of the World? The Kingdom of Christ is said here to gather its Members, as a Net gathers all kinds of Fish; it is chiefly compared to it in this respect, because it gathers of all kinds; which I suppose is a sufficient Declaration, that this Kingdom consists of Subjects good and bad, as that the Net that gathers of every kind of Fish, takes good and bad Fish. Let us suppose that the Church of Christ was this Invisible Number of People united to Christ by such internal invisible Graces; is it possible that a Kingdom consisting of this one particular sort of People invisibly good, should be like a Net that gathers of every kind of Fish? If it was to be compared to a Net, it ought to be compared to such a Net, as gathers only of one kind, viz. good Fish and then it might represent to us a Church that has but one sort of Members.

But since Christ who certainly understood the Nature of his own Kingdom, has declared that it is like a Net that gathers of every kind of Fish; it is as absurd to say, that it consists only of one kind of Persons (viz., the invisibly good) as to say, that the Net which gathers of every kind, has only of one kind in it. Farther; when it was full they drew it to shore, and gathered the good into Vessels, but cast the bad away; so shall it be at the end of the World. Now as it was the bad as well the good Fish which filled the Net, and the Church is compared to the Net in this respect; so it is evident that bad Men as well as good are Subjects of this Kingdom. And I presume they are Members of that Kingdom which they fill up, as surely as the Fish must be in the Net before they can fill it. All these Circumstances plainly declare that the Church or Kingdom of Christ shall consist of a Mixture of good and bad People to the End of the World.

Again ; Christ declares that the Kingdom of Heaven is like to a certain King which made a marriage for his Son, and sent his Servants out into the High-ways, who gathered together all as many as they found, both good and bad, and the Wedding was filled with Guests.*

Nothing can be more evident than that the chief Intent of this Parable is to shew that the Church of Christ is to be a Mixture of good and bad People to the end of the World. It is like a Feast where good and bad Guests are entertained ; but can it be like such a Feast if only the invisibly virtuous are Members of it? If the Subjects of this Kingdom are of one invisible kind, how can they bear any Resemblance to a Feast made up of all kinds of Guests? Nay, what could be thought of, more unlike to this Kingdom, if it was such a Kingdom as you have represented it?

How could our blessed Saviour have more directly guarded against such a Description of his Kingdom as your Lordship has given us, than he has done in these Parables? He compares it to a Quantity of good and bad Fish in a Net, to a Number of good and bad Guests at a Feast. Are there any Words that could more fully declare his Meaning to be, that his Kingdom consisted of good and bad Subjects? Could anyone more directly contradict this Account of our Saviour, than by saying that his Kingdom is an invisible Kingdom consisting of a particular sort of People invisibly virtuous?

Your Lordship professes a mighty Regard for the Scriptures, and a great Dislike to all Doctrines that are not delivered there; pray, my Lord, produce but so much as one Text of Scripture; tell us the Apostle or Evangelist that ever declared the Number of Believers whether dispersed or united on Earth, to be the Universal Invisible Church; shew us any one Passage in Scripture which teaches us, that none are of the Church of Christ, but those who have such Invisible Virtues, and cannot be known to be so.

There is as much Authority from Scripture to prove that the Church is a Kingdom without any Subjects, as that they are only of it, who have such Invisible Graces. And it is as easy to prove from those sacred Writings, that neither Christ or his Apostles were ever Visible on Earth, as that the Number of People on Earth who believe in Christ constitute the Invisible Church.

* Matth. xxii. 2.

In the Parables above mentioned it is out of all doubt that our Saviour describes his Universal Kingdom or Church: It is also certain that the Universal Invisible Church, which you call Christ's Church, cannot be this Universal Church that is made up of a Mixture of good and bad Members. I therefore beg of your Lordship to let us know where Christ has taught us, that he has two Universal Churches on Earth; for if you cannot shew that he has declared that he has these two Universal Churches, you must allow that this which you have described, is a Church of your own setting up, not only without any Authority, but even against the express Word of Scripture.

Your Lordship says that the Doctrines which the Learned Committee have condemned, if they be of that evil Tendency, must be so *either with Regard to the Universal Invisible Church, made up of all those who sincerely in their Hearts believe in Christ; or with respect to the Universal Visible Church made up of all, who in all Countries (whether sincerely or insincerely) openly profess to believe in Christ; or with respect to some particular Visible Church.

It may be justly expected, my Lord, that you should shew us some Grounds for this Distinction. Where does our blessed Lord give us so much as the least Hint that he has founded two Universal Churches on Earth? Did he describe his Church by halves when he likened it to a Net full of all kinds of Fish? Has he any where let us know that he has another Universal Kingdom on Earth besides this, which in the Variety of its Member is like a Net full of all sorts of good and bad Fish.

Let your Lordship, if you can, shew any Subtilties in Popery which are more of human Invention, or more contrary to Scripture than this refined Distinction. The Opus Operatum in the Sacraments, the temporal Satisfactions for Sins, Works of Supererogation, or any of the nicest Arts of Jesuitism, are not less founded in Scripture than this nice Distinction, of injuring either the Universal Invisible, or the Universal Visible, or a particular Visible Church. For, my Lord, the Church of Christ is as truly one and the same Church, as the Sacrament of Baptism is one and the same Baptism; and he no more instituted several sorts of Churches, than he instituted several kinds of Baptism.

Pray, my Lord, therefore be no longer angry at Human Arts in Religion; why may not Popery have its Peculiarities in Doctrine as well as your Lordship; the Church of Rome, with all its Additions and Corruptions, and pompous Ornaments, is as much like the Church as it was in the Apostles' Times, as your

* Answ. to Repr., p. 5.

Invisible Church is like that which Christ declared to be his Church. When they set out the Church as Infallible, they do but reason like your Lordship, when you describe it as Invisible.

That there are good and bad Church-men, is past all doubt; but that People are of the Church by means of Invisible Virtues, is as false, as that only good Men came to the Feast in the Gospel. We are assured that many are called, but few are chosen; i.e., that many shall be made Members of Christ's Church, but few shall be saved; and who these few are that truly work out their Salvation, may be invisible to us; but those many that were called, that is, who were in the Church, though they did not live up to all the Intents of Church-Communion, yet were as truly of the Church, as the bad Fish were really in the Net.

But to proceed; I shall Illustrate this Reply of your Lordship concerning an Universal Visible, and Universal Invisible, and particular Visible Church, with the following Instances.

Let us suppose any one was charged with writing against the Sacraments; if he should with your Lordship reply, that this Charge against him must either relate to the Universal Visible Sacraments, or Universal Invisible Sacraments, or particular Visible Sacraments, he would have just as much Scripture or Reason to support that Distinction, as your Lordship has for dividing the Church into Universal Visible, and Universal Invisible, and particular Visible. For the Profession of Christianity, or Church-Membership, is as external and visible a thing, as the Sacraments are external visible Institutions. So that it is as contrary to Scripture, and as mere an human Invention to make Pretence of an Universal Invisible Church, when the Dispute is concerning Christ's Church on Earth, as it is to have recourse to Invisible Sacraments, if the Question was concerning Christ's Sacraments.

They are both equally external and visible; and as the Sacraments may be received without any spiritual Advantage, so Persons may be of the Church and yet not be saved. And as the Sacraments are not less Sacraments, though they may not convey the designed Benefits to the Receiver; so neither are such a Number of People not of the Church, though they do not obtain that Salvation which is the intended Consequence of Church-Communion.

Your Lordship cannot give any one Reason for introducing this Distinction with Regard to the Church, which will not equally hold for the same Distinction in Regard to the Sacraments; and there is exactly the same Quakery and Fanaticism in one Doctrine as the other.

For as they are the Sacraments which chiefly constitute the Church, so no Distinctions or Divisions can with any tolerable Propriety be applied to the Church, but such as may be also applied to the Sacraments, that constitute the Church. And therefore the Terms Universal and Particular, Visible and Invisible, have no more to do with Christ's Church which he has instituted in this World, than with the two Sacraments which he also instituted, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord.

Again, If anyone was accused of writing against the Christian Revelation, he might answer with your Lordship, if this Accusation be true, it must be so either with regard to God's Universal Visible Revelation in all the Canonical Books, or with regard to his Universal Invisible Revelation whereby he speaks inwardly to all sincere People, or with respect to some particular Part of his visible Revelation. Let all the World judge, whether if a Person so accused should make this Reply, it would not plainly appear, either that he was a downright Enthusiast, or a crafty Dealer in Cant and artificial Words. I am sure your Lordship cannot shew that you have more Authority to divide the Church on Earth into Universal Visible, and Universal Invisible, and particular Visible, than he had to divide the Christian Revelation into Visible and Invisible. Neither was it less to the purpose for such a one to talk of Invisible Scriptures, if he was accused of denying the Gospel of St. John, than it is for your Lordship under your present Accusation to have recourse to the Invisible Church; but your Lordship will find no Advantage in this Retreat.

Again; Suppose a Person was charged with writing Treason against the Government, and in his Defence should thus distinguish; The Treason that I am charged with against the Government, must relate either to Universal Government in this World, or to Universal Government in the other World, or to some particular Government in this World.

It would be as ingenuous, as sincere, and as pertinent for a Person thus accused to talk of Governments that had no relation to the Case, but in his own Imagination, as for your Lordship in the present Dispute to talk of Universal Visible, and Universal Invisible, and particular Visible Churches. For besides this, that there is no Foundation for such a Distinction, yet if there was such an Invisible Church, how is it possible your Lordship should hurt it? How is it possible the Learned Committee should mean to charge you with injuring it? They might as well think your Lordship capable of forming a Design to arrest a Party of Spirits, as to attack an Invisible Church that neither you nor they know anything of, or where to find.

Your Lordship saith, That if you have unjustly laid anything down in this Description of the Invisible Church, to the Prejudice or Injury of any Particular Visible Church, you acknowledge that it is your part to answer for it.*

I believe it appears already that your Lordship has a great deal to answer for upon this Head ; and I shall now farther shew, that you have set up this Invisible Church in Opposition to all other Churches whatever. This will appear from the following Passage in your Sermon ; This Inquiry will bring us back to the first, which is the only true Account of the Church of Christ or Kingdom of Christ in the Mouth of a Christian, viz. the Number of Men whether small or great, † &c.

We have your Lordship's Confession that you only here pretend to describe the Universal Invisible Church of Christ ; you also here plainly declare, that it is the only true Account of Christ's Church or Kingdom in the Mouth of a Christian.

Is not this, my Lord, expressly declaring, that any other Account of Christ's Church is not a true one ; for you say this is the only true one ? Is it not directly affirming that any other Description of Christ's Church cannot become the Mouth of a Christian ; for you say that this is the only true one in the Mouth of a Christian ? So that if we call the Universal Visible Church, the Church of Christ, we give a false Account of Christ's Church, and such a one as is unfit for the Mouth of a Christian.

Could your Lordship have thought of anything more shocking, than to say that the Description of your Invisible Church is the only true Account of Christ's Church, and fit for the Mouth of a Christian, when our Saviour has given us a quite contrary Account of it from his own Mouth ? He compares it to a Net full of good and bad Fish, to a Feast full of good and bad Guests ; this surely, my Lord, is not an Account of your Invisible Church, where there are only Invisible Members. Your Lordship cannot say that Christ has here described the Invisible Church ; you directly say that your Description of the Invisible Church, is the only true Account of Christ's Church in the Mouth of a Christian ; and consequently this Account which our Saviour himself has given of his Church, stands condemned by your Lordship as a false Account of Christ's Church unfit for the Mouth of a Christian. I appeal to the common Sense of every Reader, whether I have laid anything to your Charge, but what your own express Words amount to. The short is this ; If Christ has in these Parables described the Universal Church as Visible, then it is plain that this Account of Christ's Church is a false one in the Mouth of a Christian ; for you say your

* Answ. to Rep., p. 70.

† P. 16.

Account of the Invisible Church is the only true Account of Christ's Church in the Mouth of a Christian; so that nothing can secure this Account which our Saviour has given of his Church from your Lordship's Censure, but shewing that it is the very same Account of the Invisible Church that you have given; which I believe is more than your Lordship will undertake to prove; it being as hard to prove that a Net full of good and bad Fish, or a Feast full of good and bad Guests, should represent an Invisible Kingdom of only one sort of Subjects, as that the Net and Feast, though both full, should represent a Kingdom that had not one Subject in it.

If a Fanatic should describe the Christian Sacraments, as Spiritual and Invisible Sacraments, and then affirm that that was the only true Account of Christian Sacraments in the Mouth of a Christian, could we charge him with less than writing against all Sacraments but Invisible Sacraments? It is just thus far that your Lordship has proceeded against the External Visible Church; you have declared the Invisible one to be the only true Church, fit to be spoken of by a Christian, which I think is laying down a Position highly injurious to the Visible Church, since it is here condemned as false in the Mouth of a Christian.

From all this it appears, that the Learned Committee have justly disliked your Lordship's Description of the Church of Christ.

First; As you describe it as an Invisible Church, directly contrary to the Scripture Representations of it, as given by our Saviour himself.

Secondly; As it is in Disparagement of the Article of our Church, which gives quite another Description of the Church.

That the Church described in the Article falls under your Lordship's Censure, is very plain. For you declare that your Description of the Invisible, is the only true Account of Christ's Church; therefore the Description in the Article cannot be a true one, because it is different from yours, which is the only true one.

Secondly; You declare that you consider the Church under this Description, viz. as Invisible, because every other Notion of it, is made up of inconsistent Images:* Therefore the Account of the Church in the Article is thus inconsistent.

Now what does your Lordship answer here? Only this, that the Article speaks of the Visible Church, and you speak of the Invisible one.†

This Answer, my Lord, proves the Charge upon you to be just. For since you own that you describe another Church than that which is described in the Article, and expressly affirm that your Account of this other Church is the only true Account of Christ's Church in the Mouth of a Christian; you plainly declare that the other Church is a false one in the Mouth of a Christian. Yet your Lordship rests satisfied with this Reply, as if you had cleared yourself by it. Whereas this is the very Charge itself, That you have described the Church otherwise than it is in the Article, and have called this different and new Account of it, the only true Account of it; and if it be the only true one, then that which is given in the Article must be a false one.

* Serm., p. 10.

Your Lordship goes on, *The Article declares what it is, that makes every such Congregation, the Visible Church of Christ; and I describe what it is that makes every particular Man, a Member of Christ's Universal Invisible Church. The Article describes those outward Acts, which are necessary to make a Visible Church; and I describe that inward Sincerity, and Regard to Christ himself, which make Men Members of the Invisible Church of Christ. And where is the Contradiction contained in all this?

Suppose, my Lord, anyone should affirm that there is a Sincere, Invisible Bishop of Bangor, who is the only true Bishop of Bangor in the Mouth of a Christian. Would your Lordship think here was no Reflection intended upon yourself? Would you think this Account no Contradiction to your Right as Bishop of Bangor? Does your Lordship believe such an Assertion could come from anyone that owned your Right to your Bishopric, and was a Friend to you in it? Would you imagine that nothing was meant against you, because the other Bishop was said to be Invisible? Your Lordship cannot but know, that though he is said to be Invisible, yet if he is the only true Bishop of Bangor in the Mouth of a Christian, then any other Bishop of Bangor, whether Visible or Invisible, must be a false one in the Mouth of a Christian.

Thus it is your Lordship has dealt with the Visible Church; you have set another up as the only true Church, and yet think all is well: that there is no Contradiction, because you call this other an Invisible Church, whereas if it be the only true Church, it contradicts every other Church in the highest Sense. And though it does not contradict it as a Visible Church, yet it does as a True Church, which is of more Consequence.

Your Lordship here puts a Question in favour of the Visible Church. Can it be supposed by this learned Body, that a Man's *being of the Invisible Church of Christ, is inconsistent with his joining himself with any Visible Church?

No, my Lord, it cannot be supposed. It cannot be supposed by any Body that a Man's being of the Invisible Church, is inconsistent with his joining himself to the Royal Society, or College of Physicians. But pray, my Lord, is this all that your Invisible Church will allow of? Dare your Lordship proceed no farther, than only to grant that it is no Inconsistency, no Contradiction for a Member of your Invisible Church to join with any Visible Church? If you would sincerely shew that you have said nothing to the Prejudice of the Visible Church, you ought to declare that the Members of your Invisible Church, may not only consistently join with that which is Visible, but that it is their Duty, and that they are obliged to join with it in order to be of yours that is Invisible. For if you have set up an Invisible Church, which will excuse its Members from being of any that is Visible, then you have plainly destroyed it, by making it useless. And it is but a poor Apology for it to say, there is no Inconsistency in joining with it, after you have made it needless and unnecessary to join with it. And it will be pretty difficult to give a consistent Reason, why any Person should join himself to a needless Church.

Your Lordship has here made great Discoveries of the Nature of your Invisible Church, which appears to have nothing visible or external in it.

For first, you declare that the Article describes one Church, and you another. But how does this appear? How does your Lordship prove this? 1st. Because the Article declares what it is that makes every such Congregation the Visible Church.† Now, my Lord, if this shews that the Article does not describe your Church, then it is plain that the Article here describes something that does not belong to your Church; for if it equally belonged to your Church, it could be no Proof that it did not describe your Church. But you expressly say that it describes a different Church from yours; therefore it must describe something that does not belong to yours.

Now if that which makes any Congregation the Visible Church, be not necessary to make Persons Members of your Church, it follows that they may be Members of yours, without being of any Visible Church.

Again; Another Reason why the Article does not describe your Invisible Church is this; Because it describes those outward Acts, which are necessary to make a Visible Church. These outward Acts are, the Preaching the pure Word of God, and administering the Sacraments. Now, my Lord, seeing these outward Acts shew that the Church here described is not your Invisible Church, does not this evidently declare that such outward Acts are not necessary to your Church? For if they did equally belong to both Churches, and were alike necessary to them, how could they more describe one than another? But you say, it is the mentioning of these outward Acts, that shews that your Invisible Church is not described; therefore it is plain, that you do not include these outward Acts as essential to your Invisible Church, and consequently it is a Church to which neither public Worship, nor visible Sacraments are necessary. For if these outward Acts are necessary to your Invisible Church, why does not your Lordship mention them as such? You own you describe what it is that makes every particular Man a Member of the Invisible Church; yet you not only take no notice of these outward Acts, but say that the Article describes not your Church, because it mentions these outward Acts, which is a Demonstration, that these outward Acts do not belong to your Church.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 79.

† Answ. to Repr., p. 70.

Farther; When the Learned Committee has charged your Lordship with the Omission of preaching the Word and administering of the Sacraments, you answer, *they might have added, He omits likewise the very public Profession of Christianity. And is not the Reason plain? because I was not speaking of the Visible Church; to which alone, as such, visible outward Signs, and verbal Professions belong: but of the Universal Invisible Church.

My Lord, the Reason is very plain, and it is as plain that is not a good Reason. For if the preaching of the Word, the administering of the Sacraments, and the public Profession of Christianity, be necessary to make anyone a Member of your Invisible Church, then there was as good Reason to mention them in your Description, as if you had been describing the Visible Church.

If they are not necessary, then you have set up a Church exclusive of the Visible Church. The Case stands thus; If these outward Acts be as necessary to make Persons be of the Invisible as of the Visible Church, then they ought to come equally into the Description of both Churches, being equally necessary to both: If you say they are not equally necessary, then you must allow that there is no Necessity that the Members of your Church should be in any external Communion.

It is therefore no Apology, to say that you describe the

* Answ. to Repr., p. 80.

Invisible Church, unless you will say that a Man may be of it, without any outward Acts, or Communion with any Visible Church. If a Person may be of this Invisible Church without having anything to do with Visible Sacraments, or Worship in a Visible Communion, then you have an Excuse, why you did not mention these outward Professions in your Description of the Church; but if he cannot be of this Invisible Communion without observing these outward Ordinances, then it was as necessary to mention these outward Ordinances in your Account of this Church, as if you had been describing a Church, which consisted of nothing else but outward Ordinances.

So that the short of the Case is this; If the Observation of external Ordinances be not necessary to make Men Members of your Invisible Church, then indeed there is a plain Reason why your Lordship should omit them; and it is also plain, that this Doctrine sets aside the Gospel, if this Invisible Church, the only true Church in the Mouth of a Christian, be excused from Gospel Ordinances. But if these external Ordinances be necessary to constitute the Invisible Church, then there was as plain a Reason to mention them, in the Description of your Church, as if you had been describing the Visible Church.

So that if your Lordship will give a good plain Reason why you have omitted these outward Acts, it must be because they do not belong to it; for otherwise the calling it Invisible is no Excuse, unless it has no occasion for such outward Performances.

And indeed this has appeared to be your Doctrine in almost every Page, that you set up this Invisible Church in Opposition to Outward and Visible Ordinances. For you all along set out the Opposition or Difference betwixt the Visible and Invisible Church in respect to external Ordinances: Thus the one is Visible, because to it alone belong external Signs, or verbal Professions.* The other is Invisible for the want of these. Yet this Invisible Church thus destitute, and even necessarily destitute of external Ordinances, is by you called, the only true Church in the Mouth of a Christian.

One may, I acknowledge, easily conceive in one's Mind a Number of People, whose Internal and Invisible Graces may entitle them to the Favour of God; and these may be called an Invisible Number, or Congregation, or Church, because it is Invisible to us where it is, or how great it is. But then, my Lord, it is a great Mistake if this Invisible Church is opposed to, or distinguished from the Visible Church in respect of external

* Answ. to Repr., p. 81.

Ordinances. For in these things they are both equally obliged to be Visible. And the Invisible Church is not so called, in Contradistinction to those who attend Visible Communions, and observe external Ordinances, but in Contradistinction to those who are invisibly bad, and are not what their external Profession promises. This is the only Number of People or Church, which the Invisible Church is opposed to. For as the Invisible Church intends a Number so called, because of their Invisible Graces; so this Invisibly good Church can be truly opposed only to the Invisibly bad Church, or such as are not such Persons inwardly, as they profess to be outwardly.

But, contrary to this, your Lordship has all along considered and described this Invisible Church in Opposition to the Visible, and made those outward Acts which are necessary to the Visible Church, so many Marks to distinguish it from that which is Invisible. Thus you say, *that you were not speaking of the Visible Church, to which alone, as such, visible outward Signs, or verbal Professions belong: but of the Universal Invisible Church.

Here you plainly make external Signs, and outward Professions, distinguish the Visible from the Invisible Church; whereas it is not Invisible in this respect, as being without these external Professions, or in Contradistinction to a Visible Church; but it is only Invisible in those Graces, which human Eyes cannot perceive. Thus they are said to be the Invisible Church, because they are a Number of Men, who are such inwardly, as they profess to be outwardly. But this shews, that they cannot be so called in Contradistinction to outward Professions, since they must have an outward Profession themselves before they can be inwardly sincere in it; and consequently they are not opposed to, or distinguished from a Number of outward Professors, for this they are obliged to be themselves, but from a Number of outward Professors, who are not sincere in what they outwardly profess.

If I should describe charitable Men to be an Invisible Church of Persons sincerely well affected to Mankind, and this in Contradistinction to others who are externally charitable, and perform outward Acts of Love; or if I should describe chaste Men to be an Invisible Church of Persons inwardly chaste and pure, and this in Contradistinction to others externally chaste and visibly pure as to outward Acts; I should just have the same Authority either from Reason or Scripture to set up these Invisible Churches of charitable and chaste Men, in Opposition to persons outwardly charitable and chaste, as your Lordship has to set up this invisible sincere Church, in Contradistinction to the visible external Church. For, first, this Sincerity no more makes a Church, than Charity and Chastity make a Church, or than Honesty makes a Man a Member of a Corporation, or an Officer in the Army; these, being private personal Virtues, do not constitute a Church or Society, but concern Men, as Men, in every Estate of Life.

Secondly, Outward Ordinances and Visible Professions, are as necessary to make Men true Christians, as outward Acts of Love and external Purity are necessary to make Men charitable or chaste. For Christianity as truly implies external Acts and Professions, as Chastity implies outward Purity.

Now, my Lord, suppose the Question was, whether Adultery or Fornication or any other Impurity was lawful, and that the World was divided upon this Controversy; Would he not be an excellent Preacher of Chastity, that should never tell us whether any or all of these were unlawful, but should pretend to decide the Controversy, by telling the World, that chaste Men, are an Invisible Church of Persons inwardly pure, and this in Contradistinction to Persons externally pure? Suppose he should tell them, that their Title to Chastity did not depend upon their being or not being of the Number of any outwardly pure or impure Persons, but upon their inward Purity; What Apology could even Charity itself make for such a Teacher?

The Controversy on foot is this; Whether external Communion with any sort of Fanatics be lawful? Whether it be as safe to be in one external visible Communion as in another? The Word is divided upon this Subject; and your Lordship comes in to end the Controversy. But how? Is it by examining the Merits of the contending Parties? Is it by telling us what is right and what is wrong in the different Communions? Is it by telling us that one external Communion is better than another? Is it by shewing us that any is dangerous? Is it by directing us, with which we ought to join, or indeed that we ought so much as to join with any? No: This right and wrong, or good and bad in external Communions, though it was the whole Question, is wholly skipped over by your Lordship; and you preach up an Invisible Church as the only true Church in the Mouth of a Christian, and this in Contradistinction to all Visible Churches: And only declare, that our Title to God's Favour cannot depend upon our being or continuing in any particular Method, but upon our Sincerity.

Your Lordship says; *I have laid down a Description of the Universal Invisible Church or Kingdom of Christ. Your Lordship had been as well employed if you had been painting of Spirits, or weighing of Thoughts. The main Question, you say, *is whether this Description be true and just.

This, my Lord, is not the main Question; nor indeed does it concern us at all whether your Lordship is ingenious, or not, in this Description.

For suppose your Lordship had been describing an Invisible King to the People of Great Britain, do you think the main Question amongst the Lords and Commons would be, whether you had hit off the Description well? No, my Lord, the main Question would be, To what Ends and Purposes you had set up such a King, and what Relation the Subjects of Great Britain had to him; whether they might leave their Visible, and pay only an internal Allegiance to your Invisible King? If your Lordship should farther describe him as the only true King in the Mouth of a Britain, I believe it would be thought but a poor Apology to appeal to your fine Painting, that you had described him justly, and set him out as Invisible. The Application is here very easy; it is a very trifling Question, and only concerns your Lordship's Parts, Whether your Description of your Invisible Church be just or not? But it is the Use and the End of setting up this Church, which is any Matter of Question to us. Your Lordship might erect as many Churches as you please, if you did it only for speculative Amusement, and to try your Abilities in fine Drawing; but if you pretend to unsettle the Christian Church, by your new Buildings, or to destroy the Distinction between the Church and Conventicle, by your Invisibles, we must beg your Lordship's Excuse, and can no more admire the Beauty or Justness of your fine Descriptions, than you would admire a just Description of an Invisible Diocese, if it was set out in order to receive your Lordship.

You add; But of this (Description) they (the Committee) have not said one word; but rather chosen to go off to an article of the Church of England, which defines not the Universal Invisible Church. And your Lordship might as well observe, that they have not said one word about Plato's Republic. For how they should imagine that you were describing an Invisible Church, or if they did, why they should trouble their Heads with such a Description, is not easily conceived.

For, my Lord, if it was your primary Intention only to appear in Defence of an Universal Invisible Church, what can we conceive in our Minds more surprising? What can be more extraordinary, than that a Visible Bishop at a Visible Court, should with so much Solemnity preach in Defence of a Church which can neither be defended nor injured? Are there any Rights in your Invisible Church which can possibly be lost? If not, to what purpose does your Lordship come in as a Defender? Can the Sight of any Men find it, the Malice of any Men attack it, or the Good-will of any Men support it? No: Yet though it is as invisible as the Centre of the Earth, and as much out of our reach as the Stars, yet your Lordship has very pathetically preached a Sermon, and published some Volumes, lest this Invisible Church, which nobody knows where to find, should be run away with.

Should the same Christian Zeal induce your Lordship to appear, at some other solemn Occasion, in the Cause of the Winds, your Pains would be as well employed; for it would be as reasonable to desire that they might rise and blow where they list, as that an Invisible Church, nowhere to be known or found by us at present, may not be injured.

If therefore the Learned Committee had so far forgot that Visible Church of which they are Members, as to have engaged with your Lordship about your Invisible Church, the Dispute would have been to as much purpose, as a Trial in Westminster Hall about the Philosopher's Stone.

But you complain that they rather chose to go off to an Article of the Church of England. My Lord, this is very hard indeed, that they should go off to the Church of England, when you had an Invisible Church ready for them; or that this Learned Body cannot dispute about Churches, but they must needs bring the Church of England into the Question.

Suppose, as in the above-mentioned Instance, your Lordship should lay down a fine and just Description of your Invisible King of Great Britain, a Number of Tories should, instead of examining the Truth of your Description, go off to the Act of Settlement, which declares a Visible King of Britain: This would be to use your Lordship just as the Learned Committee have done; who, instead of dwelling upon the Beauty and Justness of this Description, have gone off to an old Article in the Church of England, which indeed only describes an old-fashioned Visible Church, as Churches went in the Apostles' Days: That is, a Congregation of faithful Men, in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments duly administered.*

I am of Opinion, that the Apostolical Church would not have thought themselves too Invisible to be thus described, or that this was too Visible a Description of the Church of Christ to take in its sincere Members.

Whether therefore your Lordship has given a true Description of the Invisible Church, that is, a Church of Thoughts and Sentiments, I shall not consider, but thus much I must observe, that it is a very false Description; first, as it pretends to describe THE Church,* and the only true Church in the Mouth of a Christian. For the Church of Christ, as has been shewn, is as truly a Visible external Society, as any Civil or Secular Society in the World: And it is no more distinguished from such Societies by the Invisibility, than by the Youth or Age of its Members.

The holy consecrated Elements differ from common Bread and Wine, but they do not so differ from it, as to cease to be as Visible, as common Bread and Wine. Thus the Holy Catholic Church, the Kingdom of Christ, differs from worldly Societies and Kingdoms, but not in point of Visibility, but in regard to the Ends and Purposes for which it is erected, viz., the eternal Salvation of Mankind.

Secondly, This Description contradicts the nineteenth Article of the Church of England. For though it is not set up as another Visible Church, so as to contradict it in point of Visibility, yet seeing it is described as THE Church, and the only true Church, it plainly contradicts it in point of Truth; for if it be the only true Church, every other must be a false one.

Thirdly, This Description is a mere speculative Conjecture, a Creature of the Imagination, which can serve no Purposes, but is entirely foreign to the present Dispute, and must be so to any Dispute which ever can arise between contending Communions. It no more serves to inform anyone, whether he should go to the Visible Church, or Visible Conventicle, than whether he should study the Law or Physic. It may indeed serve to make Persons regardless of any Visible Church, but can be of no use to them, if they desire to know with what Visible Church they ought to join.

It may now be worth our while to observe, how your Lordship came by this Account of Christ's Kingdom, which you say is the only true one. Jesus answered, my Kingdom is not of this World, is the Text to your Sermon. You say, you have chosen these Words in which our Lord declares the Nature of his Kingdom:†

Now, my Lord, one would imagine, that you hereby mean, that our Lord has in these Words declared what his Kingdom is; for without this, it cannot be true that he hath declared the

* Answ. to Repr., p. 70.

Nature of his Kingdom. Whereas it is so far from being true, that he hath in these Words declared what his Kingdom is, that he has only, and that in one particular Respect, declared what it is not. If he had said that his Kingdom was not a Jewish Kingdom, would this be declaring the Nature of his Kingdom? If a Person should say that his Belief was not the Belief of the Church of England, would he in these Words declare the Nature of his Belief? Would it not still be uncertain whether he was an Arian or Socinian, or something different from them both? Thus our Saviour's saying that his Kingdom is not of this World, no more declares the Nature of his Kingdom, than a Person by saying such a one was not his Son, would in these Words declare how many Children he had.

My Kingdom is not of this World, are very indeterminate Words, and capable of several Meanings, if we consider them in themselves. But as soon as we consider them as an Answer to a particular Question, they take one determinate Sense. The Question was, whether our Saviour was the (Temporal) King of the Jews? Jesus answered, my Kingdom is not of this World. Now as these Words may signify no more than the Denial of what was asked; as there is nothing in them that necessarily implies more, than that he was not a King as the Jewish or other Temporal Kings are; as the Question extends the Answer no farther than this Meaning; so if we enlarge it, or fix any other Meaning to it, it is all human Reasoning, without any Warrant from the Text.

Now, taking the Words in this Sense, what a strange Conclusion is this that your Lordship draws from it: That because Christ said his Kingdom was not a Temporal Kingdom as the Jewish and other Kingdoms were; therefore his Kingdom is Invisible. Is it denied to be a Temporal Kingdom, because a Temporal Kingdom is Visible? If not, it will by no means follow, that it must be Invisible, because it is said not to be Temporal. Must it be in every respect contrary to a Temporal Kingdom, because it is said not to be Temporal? Then it must have no Subjects, because in Temporal Kingdoms there are Subjects; then there must be no King, because in such Kingdoms there are Kings. I suppose the Sacraments may in a very proper Sense be said to be not Temporal Institutions, though they are as external and Visible as any thing in the World; and consequently the Church may be not Temporal in a very proper Sense, without implying that it must therefore be Invisible. Indeed I cannot conceive how your Lordship could have thought of a more odd Conclusion, than this which you have drawn from them. If you had concluded that because Christ's Kingdom is not a Temporal Kingdom, therefore its Members are all of an Age; it had been as well as to say, therefore they are Invisible.

Nothing can be more surprising, than to see your Lordship throughout your whole Sermon describing this Kingdom, with all the Accuracy and Exactness imaginable, and even demonstrating every particular Circumstance of its Nature, from this little Negative, that it is not a Temporal Kingdom. Your Lordship must be very excellent at taking a Hint, or you could never have found out this Kingdom of God so exactly from so small a Circumstance. It seems, had this little Text been all the Scripture that we had left in the World, your Lordship could have revealed the rest by the help of it. For there is nothing that relates to this Kingdom, or the Circumstances of its Members, but you have purely by the Strength of your Genius, unassisted by any other Scripture proved and demonstrated from this single Passage.

If a Foreigner should tell your Lordship, that his House in his own Country was not as the Houses are in this Kingdom, would it not be very wonderful in your Lordship, to be able to demonstrate its Length and Breadth, to tell how many Rooms there are on a Floor, and to describe every Beauty and Convenience of the Structure, merely from having been told that it was not like the Houses in this Kingdom? But it would not be more wonderful, than to see your Lordship describe the Nature of Christ's Kingdom, and explain every Circumstance that concerns its Members, from having been told this Negative Circumstance. Nor indeed is it much to be wondered, seeing you set out upon this bottom, if you give as false an Account of Christ's Kingdom, as you would do of an House, that you only knew what it was not.

Again, you say, As the Church of Christ is the Kingdom of Christ, he himself is King; and in this it is implied that he is himself the sole Law-giver to his Subjects, and himself the sole Judge of their Behaviour in the Affairs of Conscience and Salvation.*

What a pretty fine-spun Consequence is this, to be drawn from the above mentioned Text. Your Lordship here advances a mere human Speculation founded upon no other Authority, than the uncertain Signification of the Words, King and Kingdom; you say it is in this implied that because Christ is King of his Kingdom, he is the sole Law-giver to his Subjects. Pray, my Lord, why is it in this implied? Do the Words, King and Kingdom always imply the same thing? Has a King in one

* Serm., p. 11.

Kingdom the same Powers, which every King hath in another Kingdom? Has the King of England the same Power, which a King of France, or any Sovereign hath in his Kingdom? Would it be any reason why the King of England should be sole Law-giver to his Subjects, because there are Kings who are sole Law-givers to their Subjects? Now if the word, King, does not necessarily imply the same Power in every Kingdom, how can there be any Conclusion, that because Christ is King of his Kingdom, he is sole Law-giver to his Subjects? Yet your Lordship's whole Argument is founded upon this weak and false bottom, that the word, King, is to be taken in one absolute and fixed Sense: For you expressly say, it is in this implied, that because he is King, he is sole Law-giver. Now it is impossible it should be implied in this, unless the word, King, always implies the same Power: For if there be any Difference in the Constitutions of Kingdoms, though they all have Kings, then it is plain nothing certain as to the Nature and Condition of any Kingdom, can be drawn from its having a King. But your Lordship has described the Constitution of Christ's Kingdom, the Circumstances of its Subjects, and in short everything that can concern it, as absolutely, and with as much Certainty, from Christ's being King of it, as if the word, King, had but one Meaning, or every King the same Power.

Again, you tell us; The grossest Mistakes in Judgment, about the Nature of Christ's Kingdom or Church, have arisen from hence, that Men have argued from other Visible Societies, and other Visible Kingdoms of this World, to what ought to be Visible and Sensible in his Kingdom.

Is it thus, my Lord? Are all our gross Errors owing to this way of Reasoning? How then comes your Lordship to fall into this grossest of Errors? How come you to state the very Nature of Christ's Kingdom from the Consideration of Temporal Kingdoms, or Absolute Monarchies? How come you to argue from the Relation between a King and his Kingdom, to what ought to be in Christ's spiritual Kingdom? Are not Kings and Kingdoms Temporal Institutions? Is not the Relation betwixt a King and his Kingdom a Temporal Relation? How then can you argue from these Temporal Kingdoms, to anything concerning Christ's Kingdom? Why will your Lordship fall into so gross an Error, as to assert that Christ must be sole Law-giver to his Subjects, because there are some Temporal Kings who are sole Law-givers to their Subjects? Is there any Consequence in this Argument? Nay, are not all our Errors owing to this mistaken way of arguing?

The only way to know the Constitution of this Kingdom, is not to reason from what is implied in the Words King and Kingdom, for they do not imply any fixed, or absolute Sense, but from the Laws and Institutions of it, whether they admit of or require the Authority of under Magistrates. Thus, if it appears that Christ has commissioned others to act in his Name, to exercise Authority in his Kingdom, and govern his Subjects in such a manner as he has commissioned them to govern; Is it any Answer to this, to say that the Church is a Kingdom, and Christ is a King, and consequently sole Law-giver in it? Is there nothing in this Text, Whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth shall be bound in Heaven, &c., because Christ is King of his Church?

The whole Scheme of all your Doctrines is raised out of this single Text, My Kingdom is not of this World; which certainly implies no more, than if Christ had said, I am not the Temporal King of the Jews. Let us therefore see how your Lordship's Doctrines appear, if we bring them to the Principle from whence you had them: As thus, Jesus is not the Temporal King of the Jews, therefore there is no such thing as Church-Authority, no Obligation to join in any particular Communion. Jesus is not the Temporal King of the Jews, therefore Absolutions, Benedictions, and Excommunications are Dreams and Trifles; therefore no Succession or Order of Clergy is better than another.

Jesus is not the Temporal King of the Jews, therefore the Invisible Church is the only true Church in the Mouth of a Christian; therefore Sincerity alone, exclusive of any particular Communion, is the only Title to God's Favour. Now if the Papists should say, Jesus is not the Temporal King of the Jews, therefore there is a Purgatory, therefore we are to pray to Saints; they would shew as much true Logic and Divinity, as your Lordship has shewn in the Proof of your Doctrines from the above-mentioned Text. And I dare say, that every Reader of this Controversy knows, that you have not pretended to any other Proof from the Scriptures for your Doctrine, than what your Oratory could draw from this single Text.

This therefore, I hope, every Reader will observe, that all which you have advanced against the Universally Received Doctrines of Christianity, is only an Harangue upon this single Text, which everyone's common Sense will tell him, contains nothing in it that can possibly determine the Cause, which you are engaged in. For who can imagine, that it is as well to be a sincere Turk as a sincere Christian, or that a sincere Quaker is as much in the Favour of God as a sincere Churchman, because our blessed Lord told Pilate, that his Kingdom was not of this World; and that in such a manner, and upon such an occasion, as only to imply that he was not that King which he enquired after? Who can conceive that there is no particular Order of the Clergy necessary, no Necessity of any particular Communion, no Authority in any Church, nor any Significancy in the sacerdotal Powers, for this reason, because there is a Text in Scripture, which denies that Christ was the Temporal King of the Jews.

Your Lordship has said much of the Plainness and Simplicity of the Gospel, and of its peculiar Fitness to be judged of, by the ordinary common Sense of Mankind; you have also interposed in this Controversy, to deliver them from the Authority of the Church, and turn them loose to the Scriptures. But, my Lord, if this Text, My Kingdom is not of this World, which seems to common Sense to contain only the Denial of a particular Question, contains, as you have pretended, the whole Christian Religion; and every other seemingly plain Part of the Gospel is to take its Meaning from this Passage; if it be thus, my Lord, what can we conceive more mysterious than the Scripture? Or more unequal to the common, ordinary Sense of Men?

For how should it come into a plain honest Man's Head, that this Text, which is nothing but the Denial of a certain Question, should be the Key to all the rest of Scripture? How should he know that the plainest Texts in Scripture were not to be understood in their apparent Meaning, but in some Sense or other given them from this Text? Thus, when it is said, Go ye and disciple all Nations; and lo I am with you to the end of the World: The first apparent Sense of these Words is this, that as Christ promised to be with the Apostles in the Execution of their Office, both as to Authority and Power, so he promises the same to their Successors, the Bishops, since he could no otherwise be with them to the End of the World, than by being with their Successors. Now, my Lord, how should an ordinary Thinker know that this plain Meaning of the Words was to be neglected, and that he was to go to the above-mentioned Text, to learn to understand, or rather disbelieve them? For what is there in this Text, My Kingdom is not of this World, to shew either that Christ did not authorise the Apostles to ordain Successors, who should have his Authority, or that the Bishops alone, are not such Successors? Is there anything in this Text which can any way determine the Nature, the Necessity, or the Significancy of such a Succession?

Again it is said, that There is no other Name under Heaven given unto Men, whereby they may be saved but Jesus Christ. Now how should a Man that has only common Sense imagine, that he must reject this plain Meaning of the Words, and believe that a sincere Turk is as much in the Favour of God as a sincere Christian, for this only reason, because Christ's Kingdom is not of this World? It must not be common ordinary Sense which can reason and discover at this rate.

Lastly, it is said, Whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven, &c. Now how shall anyone that has only sober Sense find out, that there is nothing at all left in this Text, that it only gave something or other to the Apostles, but gives no Authority to any Persons now, because the Kingdom of Christ is not of this World.

Our Saviour told his Disciples, that they were not of this World, but is that an Argument that they therefore became immediately invisible? Was neither St. Peter, nor St. Paul, &c., ever to be seen afterwards? Why then must the Kingdom of Christ become immediately invisible, because it is said not to be of this World, any more than its first Members were Invisible, who were also declared to be not of this World?

Had St. Peter or St. Paul no visible Power and Authority over the Presbyters and Deacons, because they were not of this World? If they had, why may not some Persons have Authority over others in Christ's Kingdom, though it is not of this World?

For our blessed Lord's saying that his Disciples were not of this World, does as strictly prove that St. Peter and St. Paul had no distinct Powers from Presbyters and Deacons, as his saying, that his Kingdom was not of this World, proves that there is no real or necessary Difference betwixt Bishops and Presbyters in his Kingdom. And it is as good Logic, to say the Disciples of Christ were not of this World, therefore there was no Necessity, that some should have been Apostles, and others Presbyters, &c., as to say Christ's Kingdom is not of this World, therefore there is no Necessity that some should be Bishops and others Presbyters in it.

I have been the more particular in examining the Text to your Sermon, and bringing your Doctrines close to it, that every Reader who has common Sense, may be able to perceive that they have no more Relation to that Text from which you would be thought to have them, than if you had deduced them from the first Verse in the first Chapter of Genesis.

And yet thus much every Reader must have observed, that it is your Explication of this Text alone, which has led you to condemn all that Authority, to censure all those Institutions as Dreams and Trifles, which the holy Scriptures, and the first and purest Ages of Christianity, have taught us to esteem as sacred in themselves, being ordained by God; and of the greatest Benefit to us, being means of obtaining his Grace, and Favour.

Thus far concerning the Nature of Christ's Church.

Of Church Authority.

I COME now to consider what your Lordship has delivered upon the Article of Church Authority, as it is invested in the Governors of the Church. And here I have little else to do, but to clear it from those false Characters, under which you have been pleased to describe it.

Thus you begin; *If there be an Authority in any to judge, censure, or punish the Servants of another Master, in Matters purely relating to Conscience and eternal Salvation; then Christ has left behind Judges over the Consciences and Religion of his People; then the Consciences and Religion of his People are subject to them whom he has left Judges over them; and then there is a Right in some Christians to determine the Religion and Consciences of others. And what is more, if the Decisions of any Men can be made to concern or affect the State of Christ's Subjects with regard to the Favour of God, then the Salvation of some Christians depends upon the Sentence passed by others.

Here is the Sum of what you have advanced from Reason and the Nature of the Thing against the Authority of Church Governors; which you would have pass for a strict Proof, that if they have any Authority in Matters purely relating to Conscience derived to them from Christ, that then their Authority can damn or save at pleasure.

But, my Lord, in this same strict way of Reasoning, and by only using your own Words, I will as plainly prove that a Father hath not Authority even to send his Children of an Errand.

For, 'If the Christian Religion authorises a Father to judge 'the Servants of another Master in Matters purely relating to 'Motion, then Christ has left behind him Judges over the Motion 'of his People, then the Motion of his People is subjected to them 'whom he has left Judges over it; and then there is a Right in 'some Christians to determine the Motion of others. And what 'is more, if the Determinations of any Men can concern or affect

* Answ. to Repr., p. 27.

‘ the State of Christ’s Subjects with regard to Motion, then the ‘ Lives of some Christians depend upon the Determination passed ‘ by others; because they may determine them to move from the ‘ top of a Precipice to the bottom.’

Here, my Lord, I freely leave it to the Judgment of common Sense, whether I have not in your own Words proved it as absurd and unreasonable, that a Father should have any Power over his Son, so as to send him of an Errand, as to allow the Church to have Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation; and the Consequence, according to your Argument, is equally dreadful in both Cases: For it is as plain that if Fathers have Authority in Matters of Motion, then they may move their Sons to the bottom of a Precipice; as that if the Church hath Authority in Matters of Salvation, then it may save or damn at pleasure; and it is as well proved, that Fathers have no Authority in Matters of Motion, because they have no Authority to command their Children to destroy themselves, as that the Church hath no Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, because they have not an Authority to damn People for ever: For there is the same room for Degrees in the Authority of the Church, which there is for Degrees in the Authority of Parents; and it is as justly concluded that Parents have no Authority in Matters of any particular Nature, because they have not unlimited Authority in things of that particular Nature, as that the Church hath no Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, because it has not an absolute unlimited Authority in these Matters.

Yet this is the whole of your Argument against Church Authority, that it cannot relate to Matters of Conscience and Salvation, because an Authority in these Matters, is an absolute Authority over the Souls of others; which is just as true, as if anyone should declare that a Father hath no Authority in Matters purely relating to the Body of his Son, because an Authority in these Matters, is an absolute Authority to dispose of his Body as he pleases.

Suppose it should be said, that a Father hath Authority over his Son in Civil Affairs; Will it be an Argument that he has no such Authority, because he has not all, or an unlimited Authority in Civil Affairs? Will it be an Argument that he has no Authority in such Matters, because his Son is not wholly and entirely subjected to him in such Matters? Has a Father no Right to choose an Employment for his Son, or govern him in several things of a Civil Nature, because he cannot oblige him to resign his Title to his Estate, or take from him the Benefit of the Laws of the Land?

If he has an Authority in these Matters, though not all, why cannot the Governors of the Church have an Authority in Matters of Conscience, though they have not all, or an unlimited Authority in Matters of Conscience? How does it follow that they have no such Authority, because Christians are not wholly and absolutely subjected to them in such Matters? Why can there not be Bounds to an Authority in Matters of Conscience, as well as Bounds to an Authority in Civil Affairs? And if a Father may have Authority over his Son in Civil Affairs, though that Authority is limited by the Laws of the Land, and the superior Authority of the Civil Magistrate; why may not the Church have an Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, though that Authority is limited by the Scriptures, and the supreme Authority of God?

He therefore who concludes the Church hath no Authority in Matters of Salvation, because it cannot absolutely save or damn People, reasons as strictly, as he who concludes a Person has no Authority in Civil Affairs, because he cannot grant or take away Civil Privileges of the highest Nature.

What therefore your Lordship has thus logically advanced against the Authority of the Church, concludes with the same Force against all Authority in the World. For if the Church hath no Authority in Matters of Conscience, for this demonstrative Reason, because it hath not an unlimited Authority in Matters of Conscience; then it is also demonstrated that no Persons have any Authority in any particular Matters, because they have not an absolute unbounded Authority in those particular Matters.

As thus; A Prince hath no Authority to oblige his Subjects to make War against such a People, because he hath not an unlimited Authority to oblige his Subjects to fight where, and when, and with whom he pleases.

A Father has no Authority over the Persons or Affairs of his Children, because he cannot dispose of the Persons and Affairs of his Children in what manner he will.

Masters have no Authority to command the Assistance of their Servants, because they cannot oblige them to assist in a Rebellion or Robbery.

Thus are all these particular Authorities, as plainly confuted by your Argument, as the Authority of the Church is confuted by it.

But now, my Lord, have neither Masters, nor Fathers, nor Princes, any Authority in these particular Matters, because they have no Authority to command at any rate, or as they please in these Matters? If they have, why may not the Governors of the Church have an Authority in Matters of Conscience, though they cannot oblige Conscience at any rate, or as they please? Why may not they have an Authority in Matters of Salvation, though they have not Power absolutely to damn or save?

Your Lordship would therefore have done as much Justice to Truth, and as much Service to the World, if, instead of calling Christians from the Authority of the Church, you had publicly declared that neither Masters, nor Fathers, nor Princes, have, properly speaking, any real Authority over their respective Servants, Sons, and Subjects, and that because they are none of them to be obeyed but in such and such Circumstances, and upon certain supposed Conditions. For you have plainly declared there is no Authority in the Church, that it has no power of obliging, because we are only to obey upon Terms and certain supposed Conditions. If therefore this conditional Obedience proves that there is, properly speaking, no Authority in the Church, then that conditional Obedience of Servants, Sons, and Subjects, proves that neither their Masters, Fathers, or Princes, have any Authority properly speaking.

You say; *If there be a Power in some OVER others in Matters of Religion, so as to determine these others; then all Communions are upon an equal foot, without any regard to any intrinsic Goodness; or whether they be right or wrong; then no Religion is in itself preferable to another, but all are alike with respect to the Favour of God.

Now, my Lord, all this might, with as much Truth, be said of any other Authority, as of Church Authority.

As thus; 'If there be a Power in the Prince, or in some over others in Matters of War and Fighting, so as to determine those others; then all Wars and Fightings are upon an equal foot, without any regard to any intrinsic Goodness; or whether they be right or wrong; then no Wars or Fightings are in themselves preferable to others, but all are alike with respect to the Favour of God.'

And now, my Lord, what must we say here? Has the Prince no Right or Power to command his Subjects to wage War with such a People? Or if he has this Power over them, does this make all Wars alike? Does this Authority leave nothing to the Justice or Equity of Wars, but make all Wars exactly the same with regard to the Favour of God?

Does this Authority of the Prince make all Engagements equally lawful to the Subject that engages by his Authority? Is he neither more or less in the Favour of God, for whatever Cause he fights in, because he has the Authority of his Prince? Is it as pleasing to God that under such Authority he should make War upon the Innocent, plunder and ravage the Fatherless and Widows, as engage in the Cause of Equity and Honour?

* Answ. to Repr., p. 114.

Now, my Lord, if all Wars are not alike to the Persons who are concerned in them, as to the Favour of God; if there can be any Cases supposed, where it is not only lawful, but honourable and glorious for Soldiers to disobey the Orders of their Prince; then it is past doubt, that Soldiers may and ought to have some regard to the Nature and Justice of the Orders they have from their Prince.

But we have your Lordship's Assurance, that if they may have any regard to the Nature and Justice of their Orders, then there is an end of all Authority, and an end of all Power of one Man over another in such Matters.

So that you have as plainly confuted all Authority of the Prince over his Soldiers in Matters purely Military, as you have confuted all Authority of the Church in Matters purely of Conscience. For it is plain to every Understanding, that if there is an end of all Authority in Religion, because Persons may have some regard to the intrinsic Goodness of things,* that therefore there is an end of all Regal Authority over Soldiers, if Soldiers may have any regard to the Nature and Justice of their Military Orders.

Your Argument against Church Authority consists of two Parts; the first Part is taken from the Nature of Authority, and proceeds thus: If there be an Authority in Matters of Conscience, it must be an absolute Authority over Conscience, so as to be obeyed in all its Commands of what kind soever; which is as false as if it were said, that if a Father hath Authority over the Person of his Son, then he hath an absolute Authority to do what he will with his Person; or if he hath Authority over his Son in Civil Affairs, then he hath an absolute unlimited Authority in the Civil Affairs of his Son.

The other Part of your Argument, is taken from the Nature of Obedience, and proceeds in this manner: If Persons may have some regard to the intrinsic Goodness of things in Religion, then there is an end of all Authority in Matters of Religion; which is as false as to say, that if a Soldier may have some regard to the Nature and Justice of the Military Orders of his Prince, then there is an end of all Authority of the Prince over his Soldiers in Military Affairs; or if a Servant may have some regard to the

* Answ. to Repr., p. 115.

Lawfulness of the Commands of his Master, then there is an end of all Authority of Masters over their Servants as to such Matters.

So that if there be any such thing as Authority either in Masters, or Fathers, or Princes, then both Parts of your Argument are confuted; for none of these have any other than a limited Authority, nor do their respective Servants, Sons, or Subjects, owe them any other active Obedience, but such as is conditional.

Now if it can be any way proved that Obedience to our Masters, Parents, and Princes is a very great Duty, and Disobedience a very great Sin; though they cannot oblige us to act against the Laws of God, or the Laws of our Country; then it will follow that Obedience to our Spiritual Governors may be a very great Duty, and Disobedience a very great Sin; though they cannot oblige us to submit to their sinful or unlawful Commands.

And if common Reason, the Laws of God, and our Country be sufficient to direct us, where to stop in our active Obedience to our Masters, Fathers, or Princes, though they have Authority from God to demand our Obedience; the same Guides will with the same Certainty teach us where to stop in our Obedience to the Authority of the Church, though that Authority be set over us by God himself.

Though this might be thought sufficient to shew the Weakness of your Arguments against the Authority of the Church, yet I shall beg leave to examine them a little farther in another manner.

You say the Authority which you deny, is only an Authority in Matters relating purely to Conscience and eternal Salvation, an Authority whose Laws and Decisions affect the State of Christ's Subjects with regard to the Favour of God; and the reason of your denying it is this, that if this Authority, or Laws, or Decisions of Men can concern or affect the State of Christ's Subjects with regard to the Favour of God, then the eternal Salvation of some Christians depends upon the Sentence passed by others.*

In order to lay open the Weakness of this Reasoning, I shall state the Meaning of the Propositions of which it consists.

And, first, I suppose an Authority may be properly said to affect the State of People with regard to the Favour of God, when their Obedience to such an Authority procures his Favour, and their Contempt of it raises his displeasure; and I believe that this is not only a proper Sense, but the only proper Sense which the Words are capable of.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 28.

It is certainly true that the Authority of our blessed Saviour, was an Authority which affected the State of the Jews with regard to the Favour of God ; but yet it no otherwise affected their State, than as their Obedience to his Authority was pleasing to God, and their Disobedience to it, the Cause of his farther Displeasure. This is the only way in which the Authority of Christ affected the State of People with regard to the Favour of God ; and therefore is the only manner in which any other Authority can be supposed to affect Persons with regard to the Favour of God.

Secondly ; Any Things or Matters may be properly said to relate to Conscience and eternal Salvation, when the Observance of them is a Means of obtaining Salvation, and the Neglect of them, an Hindrance to our Salvation. Thus Baptism and the Supper of the Lord, are Matters relating to Conscience and eternal Salvation, but then they are only so, for this reason, because the partaking of these Sacraments, is a Means of obtaining Salvation, and the Refusal of them, is an Hindrance of our Salvation. He therefore who hath Authority in such things, as by our observing of them we promote our Salvation, and by our neglecting of them, we hinder our Salvation, he has in the utmost Propriety of the Words, an Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation.

Hence it appears that it is not peculiar or appropriate to the Authority of the Church alone, to relate to Matters of Conscience and eternal Salvation, but equally belongs to every other Authority which can be called the Ordinance of God.

Now all lawful Authority, whether of Masters, Fathers, or Princes, is the Ordinance of God, and the respective Duties of their Servants, Children, and Subjects, are as truly Matters of Conscience and eternal Salvation, as their Observance of any Part of the Christian Religion is a Matter of Conscience and eternal Salvation: And it is not more their Duty to receive the Sacrament, or worship God in any particular manner, than to obey their respective Governors ; nor does it more concern or affect their State with regard to the Favour of God, whether they neglect those Duties which particularly regard his Service, or those Duties which they owe to their proper Governors. So that Conscience and eternal Salvation are equally concerned in both Cases.

For things may as well be Matters of Conscience and eternal Salvation, though they are of a Civil or Secular Nature, as the positive Institutions of Christ are Matters of Conscience and Salvation.

For Baptism has no more of Religion in its own Nature, nor has of itself any more concern with our Salvation, than any Action that is merely Secular or Civil. But as Baptism by Institution becomes our Duty, and so is a Matter of Conscience and Salvation; so when Actions merely Secular and Indifferent, are by a Lawful Authority made our Duty, they are as truly Matters of Conscience and Salvation, as any Parts of Religion.

The Difference betwixt a Spiritual and Temporal Authority does not consist in this, that one relates to Matters of Conscience and Salvation, and concerns and affects our State with regard to the Favour of God, and the other does not; but the Difference is this, that one presides over us in things relating to Religion and the Service of God, the other presides over us in things relating to Civil Life; and as our Salvation depends as certainly upon our Behaviour in things relating to Civil Life, as in things relating to the Service of God, it follows that they are both equally Matters of Conscience and Salvation: And as the Temporal Authority is the Ordinance of God, to which we are to submit, not only for Wrath, but also for Conscience's sake, it undeniably follows, that this Temporal Authority as truly concerns and affects our State with regard to the Favour of God, as any Authority in Matters purely relating to Religion. For such an Authority could in no other Sense affect our State with regard to the Favour of God, than by our Obedience or Disobedience to it; but our State with regard to the Favour of God is as truly affected by our Obedience, or Disobedience to our Lawful Sovereign, as by our observing or neglecting any Duty in the World; and consequently the Temporal Authority as truly affects our State with regard to the Favour of God, as any Authority in Matters of Religion.

Seeing therefore, by an Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, by an Authority which can affect our State with regard to the Favour of God, nothing more is implied, than an Authority to which our Obedience is a Duty, and our Disobedience a Sin, which is the Case of every Lawful Authority; it plainly appears, that all those frightful Consequences, those Dangers to the Souls of Men which you have charged upon such Church Authority, are as truly chargeable upon Masters, Fathers, and Princes, and make their several Authorities as dangerous Powers over the Salvation of others, as the Authority of the Church.

Thus, when your Demonstration proceeds in this manner: If there be an Authority in some over others in Matters purely relating to Conscience and Salvation, then the Salvation of some People will depend upon others. Which, if we set it in a true Light, ought to proceed thus; If there be an Authority in Matters of Religion, to which our Obedience is a Duty, and our Disobedience a Sin, then the Salvation of some People depends upon others.

But, my Lord, what a Sagacity must he have who can see this dismal Consequence? Who can see that Masters, Fathers, and Princes, have a Power over the Souls of others, either to damn or save them, because Obedience to their Authority is a Duty, and Disobedience a Sin?

Your Lordship cannot here say, that an Authority in Matters purely relating to Conscience and eternal Salvation, is not expressed high enough, by being described as an Authority to which our Obedience is a Duty, and our Disobedience a Sin. For, my Lord, no Authority, however concerned in things of the greatest Importance in Religion and Salvation, can possibly be an Authority of an higher Nature, than that Authority to which our Obedience is a Duty, and our Disobedience a Sin. It was in this Sense alone, that the Authority of our Saviour himself affected the state of the Jews with regard to the Favour of God; his Authority was of an high and concerning Nature to them only for this Reason, because their Obedience to it was their Duty, and their Disobedience their Sin.

If we now consider this Authority in the Church, in this true Manner in which it ought to be considered, your Lordship's Argument against it, either proves a deal too much, or nothing at all.

Thus, if the Consequence be just, that if it be Sin to disobey the Church, then the Church hath a Power of damning us; then it is as good a Consequence in regard to other Authority; as thus, It is a Sin to disobey our Parents, therefore our Parents have a Power of damning us; it is a Sin to disobey our Prince, therefore our Prince has a Power of damning us. These Consequences are evidently as just and true, as that other drawn from Church Authority; so that all those dismal Charges which you have fixed upon Church Authority, are as false Accounts of it, as if you had asserted that every Father, or Master, or Prince, who demands Obedience from his Child, Servant, or Subject, in point of Duty, or by declaring that their Disobedience is a Sin, does thereby prove himself to be a Pope, and to have the Souls of others at his Disposal. For it is out of all doubt, that if the Governors of the Church by demanding Obedience to them in point of Duty, or by declaring Disobedience to be Sin, do thereby assert the Claims of Popery, and assume a Power to dispose of the Souls of the People; that any other Authority which requires this Obedience as a Duty of Conscience, and forbids Disobedience as Sin, does thereby claim the Authority of the Pope, and pretend to a Power over the Souls of others.

So that if your Lordship has destroyed Church Authority, which pretends Obedience to be a Duty, as a Popish Claim; you have also as certainly destroyed every other Authority which demands Obedience as a Duty, as being equally a Popish Presumption.

Whenever therefore you shall please to call away Servants, Children, or Subjects from their respective Masters, Fathers, and Princes, you have as many Demonstrations ready to prove them all Papists, if they will stick by their Obedience to them as a Duty of Conscience, and to prove their Governors all Popes, if they declare their Disobedience to be Sin, as you have to prove Church Authority to be a Popish Claim. And I must beg leave to affirm, that they are as much misled who follow your Lordship against the Authority of the Church, as if they should follow you in the same Argument against owning any Authority of their Parents and Princes.

The Intent of all this is only to shew, that though there is an Authority in the Church, to which our Obedience is a Duty and our Disobedience a Sin (which is as high an Authority as can be claimed) yet this Authority implies no more a frightful Power of disposing of our Souls, than any other Lawful Authority, which it is a Sin to disobey, implies such a Power.

For where is the Danger to our Souls? How is our Salvation made subject to the Pleasure of our Church Governors, because God has appointed them to direct us in the manner of worshipping him, and to preside over things relating to Religion, and made it our Duty to obey them? How does this imply a dangerous Power over our Salvation? If we sin against this Authority, we endanger our Salvation as we do by neglecting any other Ordinance of God; and our Damnation is no more affected by any Power in the Persons, whom we may be damned for disobeying, than a Person that is damned for killing his Father, is damned by any Power of his Father's.

Neither is it in the Power of the Governors in the Church, though they have Authority in Matters of Salvation, to make our Salvation any more difficult to us, than if they had no such Authority.

For all their Injunctions must be either Lawful, or Unlawful; if they are Lawful, then by our Obedience to an Ordinance of God, we recommend ourselves to the Favour of God; and sure there is no harm in this Authority thus far. And if their Commands are Unlawful, then by our not obeying them, we still please God, in choosing rather to obey him than Men, where both cannot be obeyed. And where, my Lord, is the Terror of this Authority so much complained of? How does this make our Salvation lie at the Mercy of our Church Governors? We are still as truly saved or damned by our own Behaviour, as though they had no such Authority over us; and though we may make their Authority the Occasion of our Damnation, by our rebelling against it, yet it is only in such a manner as anyone may make Baptism, or the Supper of the Lord, the Occasion of his Damnation, by a profane Refusal of them.

Upon the whole of this Matter, it appears, First, that when the Authority of the Church is said to be an Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, or an Authority which concerns and affects our State with regard to the Favour of God; that this is the only true Meaning of those Propositions, viz., an Authority in Matters of Religion, to which Obedience is a Duty, and Disobedience a Sin.

Secondly, That this Authority to which we are thus obliged, is as consistent with our working out our own Salvation, and no more puts our Souls into the Disposal of such Authority, than our Salvation is at the Mercy of our Parents and Princes, because to obey their Authority is a great Duty, and to disobey it, a great Sin.

Your Lordship has yet another Argument against Church Authority, taken from the Nature of our Reformation, which it seems cannot be defended, if there was then this Church Authority we have been pleading for.

Thus you say; *If there be a Church Authority, I beg to know, how can the Reformation itself be justified.

My Lord, I cannot but wonder this should be a Difficulty with your Lordship, who has writ so famous a Treatise to inform People, how they not only may, but ought in point of Duty to get rid of a real Authority; I mean in your Defence of Resistance.

I suppose it is taken for granted, that James the Second was King of England, that he had a Regal Authority over all the People of England, and that they all of what Station soever were his Subjects; yet granting this Regal Authority in him, and this State of Subjection in all the People of England, your Lordship knows how to set aside that Government, and set up another Government; and even to make it our Duty as Men and Protestants to set up another Government.

Now since you know how to get rid of this Authority in so Christian and Protestant a manner, one cannot but wonder how you should be at a loss to justify the Reformation, without supposing that the Church at that time had no Authority.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 117.

For did you ever justify the Revolution, because James the Second had no Kingly Authority, or that the People of England were not his Subjects? Nay, did you not defend it upon the quite contrary Supposition, that though James the Second had a Regal Authority, though all the People of England were his Subjects, and had sworn to be his faithful Subjects, yet in spite of all these Considerations, did you not assert that they not only might, but ought to set him aside and choose another Governor in his stead?

And yet after all this, you know not how to defend the Reformation, it is a perfectly lost Cause, and not a word to be said for it, unless we suppose that there was no Authority in the Church when we reformed from it. Surely if your Lordship loved to defend the Reformation, as well as you loved to defend the Revolution, you would not have so many Reasons for one, and none for the other.

For supposing an Authority in the Church, will not Tyranny, Breach of Fundamentals, and unlawful Terms of Communion, defend our Departure from a real Authority in the Church, as well as any Grievances or Oppressions will defend our leaving a real Authority in the State?

What a pitiful Advocate, what a Betrayer of the Rights of the People would you reckon him, who should say, If there was any Regal Authority in James the Second, if the People of England were his Subjects; I beg to know, how can the Revolution itself be justified?

Yet just such an Advocate are you, just such a Betrayer of the Reformation, you cannot defend it, it has no bottom to stand upon; and if there was any Authority in the Church before the Reformation, you beg to know, how the Reformation itself can be justified?

My Lord, I do not urge this to shew either that the Revolution and Reformation are equally justifiable, or that they both are to be justified upon the same Reasons; but to shew that your Lordship from your own Principles, needed not to have wanted as good Reasons for the Reformation, as you have produced for the Revolution, even supposing the Church of Rome had as real an Authority over us as James the Second had, and that we were as truly in a State of Subjection to that Church before the Reformation, as we were in a State of Subjection to that King before the Revolution.

Again, you proceed thus; For there was then (at the Time of the Reformation) a Church, and an Order of Church-men, vested *with all such spiritual Authority, as is of the Essence of the Church. There was therefore a Church Authority to oblige Christians; and a Power in some over others. What was it therefore to which we owe this very Church of England?

Now, my Lord, I hope you will grant, that just at the Time of the Revolution, 'there was then a King, vested with all such Civil 'Authority as is of the Essence of a King. There was therefore 'a Regal Authority to oblige the People of England, and a Power 'in one over others. What was it therefore to which we owe this 'very Revolution in England?'

I suppose you will say that we owe it, not to any Want of Authority in the late King James, but to his Abuse of his Authority: Why therefore is it not as easy to account for the Reformation, not from the Want, but the Abuse of Authority in the Church of Rome? Is it an Argument that the People of England were no Subjects, under no Government, nor had any King, because they would no longer submit to the Oppressions and Grievances of a late Reign, but asserted their Liberties and appealed to the Conditions of the Original Contract?

If not, why is it an Argument that the Church had no Authority, because some Years ago the People of England would no longer submit to the Corruptions, and unlawful Injunctions of the Church of Rome, but appealed to the Scriptures, and the Practice of the first and purest Ages of Christianity?

If your Lordship was so entirely consistent with yourself as you tell us you are; if you never pursued an Argument farther than the plain Reason of it led you; how is it possible that you, who have so strenuously defended the Resistance of People against a Legal King† (for so you expressly call him), should declare that our Separation from the Church of Rome cannot be justified, without supposing that the Church of Rome had never any Authority over us?

For supposing that Church had been really our Sovereign in Affairs of Religion, is it not strange that you, who have asserted that our present Settlement is owing entirely to the taking up Arms, and adhering to such as were in Arms against their Sovereign,‡ should yet declare that our opposing the Church of Rome, cannot be justified but by supposing, that she never had any Sovereignty over us?

Is it not yet stranger, that you, who have defended the Revolution by comparing it to the Reformation, should yet declare that the Reformation cannot be justified without supposing that the Church of England was under no Authority of the Church of Rome?

* Answ. to Repr., p. 118.

† Sev. Tracts, p. 332.

For, my Lord, if the Church of England had not been under the Authority of the Church of Rome, how could our opposing that Church be compared to the resisting of King James? How could our Separation from that Church be a Defence of our withdrawing our Allegiance from King James, without supposing that the Church before that Separation, had as Real and Legal Authority as that King had before the Revolution?

Your Words are these; *Why should that (i.e., Resistance) be absolutely and entirely condemned, as a damnable Sin, any more than Church Separation, by which we got rid of the Tyranny of Rome? And again, All Church Reformation is not Church Destruction; Why therefore must all Resistance be called Rebellion?

Now is it not very strange, my Lord, that after this, you should assert that the Church had no Authority before the Reformation; and that if it had any Authority, then our Separation from it cannot be justified? Is not this very strange, after you had used it as an Argument to justify the withdrawing of our Allegiance from King James the Second?

For let us suppose with you, that there was no Church Authority at the time of the Reformation, and then see how excellent an Argument you have found out in Defence of the Revolution, which, upon this Supposition, must proceed in this manner.

The Church of England might separate from the Church of Rome, who had no Authority over her; therefore the People of England might resist their Legal King, who had a Regal Authority over them. Again, The Clergy of England, who were no Subjects of the Church of Rome, might separate from that Church; therefore the People of England, who were Subjects to King James the Second, might withdraw their Allegiance from him.

Thus absurd is your Argument made, by supposing that the Church had not as real and rightful an Authority before the Reformation, as James the Second had before the Revolution.

Farther; Let us suppose with your Lordship, that if there was a real Authority in the Church at the time of the Reformation, then the Reformation has no bottom, but is altogether unjustifiable; let us suppose that this Doctrine is true, and then see how consistently you have argued upon this Supposition.

You say the Reformation cannot be justified; it has no bottom to stand upon, if the Church of Rome had a real Authority; yet this Opposition, which is so entirely wrong, because an Opposition to Authority, is brought by you as a parallel Case to prove that the Resistance against the Authority of King James was entirely right. This Reformation, which if it was brought about against any Church Authority, is said to be for that very Reason without any bottom, and to have no Foundation, is used by your Lordship to point out the true Bottom and firm Foundation of the Revolution.

And here let all the World judge, whether Reason and Religion alone can induce anyone to maintain the Truth, the Justice, the Honour, the Christianity of the Revolution, as founded upon Resistance to a Legal King ; and yet condemn at the same time the Reformation, as having neither Reason, nor Truth, nor Justice to support it, as founded upon a Departure from a real Authority in the Church of Rome. For Reason and Religion do as plainly give leave to depart from the highest Authority in the Church, when the Laws of God cannot be observed without departing from it, as in any other Case ; and there is no more Necessity of supposing or proving that there was no rightful Authority in the Church, to justify our departing from it, than it is necessary to prove such a Person not to be my Father, or to have no Authority over me, in order to justify my disobeying his unlawful Commands.

Again, your Lordship is farther at a loss about the Reformation, which cannot possibly be justified, if afterwards, an Authority in Matters of Conscience and Salvation, be still claimed.

Thus you say ; Nor can I ever understand, upon this bottom (viz., the claiming such Authority) *what it was that could move or justify those, who broke off from the Tyranny of the Church of Rome ; unless it be sufficient to say, that it was only that Power might change Hands.

Here your Lordship cannot conceive anything more unjustifiable than the Reformation, if Church Authority is still to be kept up ; nor can you upon this Claim assign any other Pretence for reforming, but only that Power might change Hands.

Did your Lordship then never hear of the Justice of removing one Authority, and setting up another ? Can you think of no Case, where Equity, Honour, and Duty, called upon a People to resist one Power, and yet make another to succeed ?

Now if this Practice can be equitable and honourable, and is asserted to be so by your Lordship, can it be conceived, that Reason alone should induce you to load the Reformation with so much Guilt and Injustice, to condemn it as so groundless an

* Answ. to Repr., p. 48.

Undertaking; because though it set aside the Tyrannical Authority of the Church of Rome, yet it asserted a true Church Authority, and made Obedience to it necessary to obtain the Favour of God.

Suppose some Friend to the Revolution, after hearing that the Prince of Orange was proclaimed King, and a Regal Authority set up, should then have said in your Lordship's Words, I can never understand, upon this bottom, what it was that could move or justify those, who broke off from the Tyranny of the late King James; unless it was sufficient to say, that it was only that Power might change Hands.

I appeal to your Lordship, whether anything could be more extravagant and senseless, than such a Declaration as this from a Friend to the Revolution.

And I as freely appeal to the common Sense of everyone, whether your own Declaration expressed in the same Words with regard to the Reformation, sets you out to any better Advantage in relation to that.

For it is full as good Sense to say, where is the Justice of the Revolution, or what Foundation has it in the Reason of Things, if there is still a King to be acknowledged, and a Regal Authority to be submitted to? as to call out for the Justice, and Equity, and Reason of the Reformation, if there is still a Church Authority which we are obliged to obey. And it is as certainly the Shame and Reproach and Injustice of the Revolution, that a Government and Regal Authority is still maintained, as it is the Shame, and Reproach, and Injustice of the Reformation, that a Church Authority is still asserted.

And there was no more Necessity in the Nature or Reason of the Thing, that the Reformation should disown all Authority properly so called, in Matters of Religion, than that the Revolution should have rejected all Authority properly so called in Civil Affairs. Neither does the Reformation any more contradict itself, or undermine its own Foundation, and give the Papists an Advantage over it, by claiming and asserting a Church Authority, than the Revolution contradicted itself, or conspired its own Ruin, by setting up a King, and maintaining a Government in the State. And it had been just as wise, as prudent, and politic Management, if the Revolution had set up no Government, but left every Man to himself in Civil Affairs, in order to have prevented the Return of the late King James; as if the Reformation had maintained no Church Authority, but left every Person's Religion to himself, in order to keep out Popery. And it is just as much Matter of Joy and Triumph to the Papists, to see this Authority asserted in the Church of England, as it was Matter of Joy to the late King James, to find that a Regal Authority was set up against him.

But to go on ; your Argument, when put in form, will proceed in this manner.

The Church of England departed from the Authority of the Church of Rome, therefore we may lawfully depart from any Church Authority. And again ; at the Reformation we lawfully separated from the Communion of the Church of Rome, therefore we may as lawfully separate from any particular Communion.

And now, my Lord, can any Argument be more trifling, or draw more absurd Consequences after it, than this? And yet, absurd as it is, it is one of your best, and which you seem to take great Delight in : Thus are we told in almost every Page, that if we will stand by the Reason and Justice of the Reformation, we must give up all Authority in Matters of Religion ; and not pretend to a Necessity of being of any particular Church, if we would justify our leaving the Romish Church.

But pray, my Lord, you have told us, that the People of England of all Stations did lawfully and honourably, &c., resist the late King James ; but does it therefore follow, that they may as lawfully and honourably resist King George? If not, how does it follow, that because we might justly separate from the Church of Rome, therefore others may as justly separate from the Church of England?

Is it inconsistent with the Principles of the Revolution to declare Men Rebels, because it was founded (as you affirm) upon Resistance? If not, why must it be inconsistent with the Principles of the Church of England, to declare any people Schismatics, because she separated from the Church of Rome? Now if you will say that all who take Arms at any time against any King, are justified by those, who took Arms against the late King James ; then you would have some Pretence to make our Separation from the Church of Rome a Justification of every other Separation in the World. But since you cannot say this, but have pretended to demonstrate the contrary, that though sometimes Resistance is not Rebellion, yet sometimes Resistance certainly is Rebellion, you are particularly hard to the Reformation, to make it either unjustifiable in itself, or else to be a Justification of every other pretended Reformation.

But however, as hard as you are upon the Reformation in this Place, making it, considered as a Separation, a Defence of all other Separations from the Church of England ; yet you yourself, to shew your equal regard to both sides of a Contradiction, have asserted the contrary, and declared that as all Resistance is not Rebellion, so neither is all Separation Schism.

Now, I suppose, when you say that all Resistance is not Rebellion, it is certainly implied that some Resistance may be Rebellion; and likewise by declaring in the same manner all Separation not to be Schism, it must as necessarily be implied that some Separation may be Schism. Here therefore you plainly teach us, that some Separation may be Schism, and some Separation may not be Schism; yet your present Argument is founded upon the contrary Supposition, that either all Separations are Lawful, or none are Lawful; for it is the constant Complaint in every Chapter of your Book, that the Church of England should assert any Necessity or Obligation upon others of conforming to her, when she herself denied the Necessity of her conforming to the Church of Rome. So that the Lawfulness or Justice of her Separation from Rome, is urged to shew the equal Lawfulness and Justice of all Separations from the Church of England; which Argument is plainly founded upon this Proposition, that all Separations from any Churches, are either equally Lawful, or equally Unlawful. Which is directly contrary to this other Proposition, that some Separation may be Schism, and some Separation may not be Schism. Which Contradiction is just as palpable, as if you had said, all Resistance is not the Sin of Rebellion; yet all Resistance is either equally lawful, or equally unlawful.

But to go on, you say that all Resistance is not Rebellion, and for a Proof of it, say, that all Church Separation is not Schism; which plainly implies, that there is at least as much Difference betwixt some Separations from different Churches, as there is betwixt some armed Resistances against different Kings. Now if, according to your Lordship, there is as much Difference betwixt Resistances, as there is betwixt an Action that is a Duty, and an Action that is a Sin, and you have proved this Difference, by comparing those Resistances to different sorts of Separations, then it will necessarily follow that there may be, nay must be, as much Difference betwixt one Separation and another Separation, as there is betwixt one Action that is a Duty, and another Action that is a Sin. This being the true State of the Case, your Lordship's Argument in Defence of the Separatists, taken from our Separation from the Church of Rome, will stand thus.

We separated from the Church of Rome, because such Separation was our Duty, therefore the Fanatics may separate from the Church of England, though such Separation is a Sin: Which is as rational an Argument, as if it should be said, such a one killed a Man lawfully, therefore anyone else may kill a Man unlawfully. For if some Separation may be a Duty, and some Separation a Sin, it is as false and ridiculous to infer, that if our Separation is just, it justifies all other Separations; as to conclude, that because we may do our Duty, others may transgress their Duty. For there is manifestly, and from your own Acknowledgment, this great Difference between one Separation and another Separation, that one Separation in such Circumstances, will no more justify a Separation in other Circumstances, than the Lawfulness of killing a Man in some Cases, will prove it lawful to kill a Man in all other Cases.

Now if your Lordship has any Demonstrations ready, to show that Resistance in some Circumstances is a Christian Duty, and Resistance in some other Circumstances is a damnable Sin; and that it may be as great a Sin to resist some Princes, as it is a Duty to resist others; if you can help us to any plain Rule, any certain Signs to know an honest Christian Resister, from a Resister who is a Rebel and in danger of Damnation; I hope there may be found as plain Rules to shew us who separates lawfully, and who separates unlawfully from any particular Church. If you can give any Reasons why the late King James might be resisted then, and yet show it a Sin to resist King George now, it is something strange that you cannot find any Reasons, why it was our Duty to separate from the Church of Rome then, and yet shew it a Sin to separate from the Church of England now.

For I would suppose at least, that there is as much Difference between separating from the Church of England and separating from the Church of Rome, as there is betwixt Resistance against a good King, and Resistance against a Tyrannical Oppressor; and if there be this Difference, then you must allow, that it is as false to argue from the Lawfulness of separating from one Church, to the Lawfulness of separating from the other, as it would be to argue, that because oppressive Tyrants may be resisted, therefore just and good Kings may be resisted. I have been the longer in examining this Doctrine, in this particular View in relation to Resistance, that it may be seen with how much Truth you say, you have *recommended such Principles as serve to establish the Interest of our common Country and our common Christianity, of human Society and true Religion, upon one uniform, steady, and consistent Foundation.

For it is evident that these Principles, if put in Practice, directly tend to the utter Ruin of our common Country, and our common Christianity; for I have shewn that all the Arguments which you have advanced against Church Authority, if they have any Force, conclude with the same Force against all sorts of Authority in the World.

I shall now proceed to a most remarkable evasive Denial of everything you have said relating to Church Authority, from your own Mouth.

A Remarkable Evasion of your Lordship's in relation to Church Authority.

THE Learned Committee charged your Lordship with *denying all Authority to the Church, and leaving it without any Authority to judge, censure, or punish Offenders in the Affairs of Conscience and eternal Salvation. To support this Charge, they quoted these Words of your Sermon; Christ is sole Lawgiver to his Subjects, and himself sole Judge of their Behaviour in the Affairs of Conscience and Salvation; in these Points he hath left behind him no visible human Authority.

Now how is it that your Lordship has cleared yourself from this Charge? Why truly by declaring, that by a Denial of all Church Authority, you only meant to deny to the Governors of the Church a Power of passing the irreversible Sentence, or that Christ has left no visible Authority here to judge People at the last Day. When you talked so much of Church Authority in Matters of Religion, and of an Authority left behind, it was very reasonable to think that you were speaking of an Authority which related to the Church in this World. But it seems, all you have denied in relation to Church Authority, is only this, that anyone but Christ shall pass the irreversible Sentence, or judge us at the last Day.

For you say; As Christ is to pass the irreversible Sentence, thus he is judge alone. And what I affirm of him, I deny of others in the same Sense in which I affirm it of him: And in no other Sense can I be supposed to deny it, because it answers no Purpose.†

Therefore when you say no Men have any Authority in Affairs of Religion and Conscience, you only say that no Men have Authority to pass the irreversible Sentence at the last Day. For you declare that thus it is that Christ alone is Judge, and you only deny that of others, which you affirm of him, and consequently the only Authority which you deny them, is that of judging the World at the last Day.

* Repres., p. 4.

Strange! my Lord, that after so many elaborate Pages for ecclesiastical Liberty, so many Compliments received for your successful Attacks upon Church Authority; that after all, you should declare, that you have not so much as touched upon Church Authority, but have only been labouring to demonstrate that the Judgment of the last Day is committed to Christ alone.

*Christ, you say, is in no other Sense Judge of the Behaviour of Christians in these Points, than as their Condition must and will be determined by his Sentence. And when I deny this of Men, I do not, I cannot, mean to deny this of them in any other Sense, but that in which I affirm it of Christ.

So that when you in plain Words seem to deny all Authority in the Church, as by saying, that Christ alone is Judge of the Behaviour of Christians, in Matters of Religion, and that he left behind him no visible human Authority in these Points; and such like Phrases, as seem to ordinary Understandings to deny all Rule and Authority in the Church; you only mean, that no one but Christ is to pass the Sentence at the last Day. This is the Key your Lordship has given us to your Writings, which indeed gives them quite another Face, and makes them such a Course of Amusements, as exceeds all which have yet been seen in that kind; as will appear from the following Particulars.

Thus when you say, that in the Affairs of Conscience and Salvation, Christ hath left no visible human Authority behind him. The Meaning is this, that Christ hath left no body behind him in this World, to pass the irreversible Sentence in the next World, i.e., hath left no one to do that here, which cannot be done till hereafter. This is the sublimest Sense which this Passage is capable of, from your own Construction.

Again, you say, the Church of Christ is the Number of Persons who are sincerely and willingly Subjects to him as their Lawgiver and Judge; † which according to this new Key, is to be thus understood; The Church of Christ is the Number of Persons who will sincerely and willingly submit to the Sentence of Christ at the last Day. For you say, we are to submit to him as our Judge; and you expressly say, he is in no other Sense judge of the Behaviour of Christians, than as he is to pass the irreversible Sentence; therefore if we are to be willingly and sincerely subject to him as Judge, our Obedience or Subjection to him as Judge, can be no otherwise expressed, than by our Submission to his Sentence then pronounced.

So that this Definition comes at last to signify a Number of Persons, who sincerely and willingly submit, some to be saved, and some to be damned at the last Day ; for this will be the Effect of Christ's Sentence as Judge.

This is as sound Divinity, as if I should define the Church of Christ, to be a Number of Persons, who sincerely and willingly submit, some to live, and some to die.

Again, you say, that your Doctrines relating to the Authority of the Church, is the very Foundation on which the Church of England stands ; and that they are so necessary for its continuance, that without them it is impossible to defend its Cause against the Roman Catholics.

Now your Doctrine concerning Church Authority, you have over and over declared to be only this, that Christ alone shall judge the World at the last Day. For you expressly say, that you deny the Church an Authority of judging in no other Sense, than in the Sense in which you affirm it of Christ.

Now, my Lord, how comes this Doctrine to be the Support of the Church of England ? How can it possibly have any relation to the Merits of the Cause ? Does it follow that the Pope had no Legal Authority in England, that Transubstantiation is false, that Purgatory is a groundless Fiction, and Prayers to Saints are unlawful, because Christ alone shall judge the World ? This is what you have affirmed of Christ, this is all which you have denied of Men ; and this Doctrine it seems about Church Authority, as you are pleased to call it, is the only Support of the Church of England, and the very Foundation on which it stands.

A Roman Catholic tells me that Transubstantiation is true ; I answer him no, that cannot be, and that for this reason, because no Order of Men shall judge us at the last Day ; Christ alone should do it. Could anything be more extravagant, or more foreign to the Purpose, than such an Answer as this to a Roman Catholic ? And yet, according to your Account of the Matter, this is the only Answer which can be defended. For you have denied no Authority to the Church, but that which peculiarly belongs to Christ as Judge at the last Day ; and yet you say that your Doctrine relating to Church Authority, is the very Foundation and Support of the Reformation.

Now if this Doctrine be our only Defence against the Church of Rome, and what alone supports us against that Church, then the Presbyterians, the Independents, Quakers, and all sorts of Fanatics, who own this Doctrine, that Christ alone shall pass the last Sentence, are by it as well defended against the Church of England, as she is against the Church of Rome ; so that it makes us as much wrong in regard to the Dissenters, as it makes us right in regard to the Papists; and though it should give us Victory over the Papists, yet it makes us fall a Conquest to the Fanatics. For it is certainly as proper for a Quaker to reply to the Church of England, that his Reformation is justified against the Authority of the Church of England, because Christ alone shall judge the World at the last Day; as for the Church of England to make that Answer to the Church of Rome.

Your Lordship says, for you to deny Church Authority in any other Sense, answers no Purpose. Pray, my Lord, what Purpose does this manner of denying answer? Here is a Dispute about Church Authority, and the Powers of Ecclesiastical Governors: Your Lordship interposes, and declares that no Man shall pass the irreversible Sentence at the last Day. To what Purpose, my Lord, is this Declaration? Does it strike any Light into the Controversy, or any way point out the Merits of the Cause? Does this inform us whether there is any such thing as Church Authority, or where it is seated? If two Families were trying their Title to the same Estate, and the Judge should pretend to determine the Matter, by saying that God alone is sole Proprietor of all Things, it would be as much to the Purpose, as to tell us in the Controversy about Church Authority, that Christ alone shall judge the World. Does this any way prove that there is no human Authority in the Church, or that Christians are no way concerned with it? What an excellent Argument is this? Christ alone shall judge the World, therefore no Men have any Authority in Religion, therefore it can no way affect you with regard to the Favour of God, whether you submit or not, to such human Authority?

Whether your Lordship is forced upon this Method of explaining yourself, by any other Motives than those of Sincerity and Conviction, is what I shall not presume to say; but I believe, if a Person should be called to account for saying the King had no Right to create Peers, and should afterwards defend himself, by saying that he only meant he could not create in that Sense, in which God alone could create; I am apt to think such a Defence would be no great Recommendation of his Sincerity. But, my Lord, it would be as proper and as ingenuous for a Person so accused to make such a Defence, or rather such an Escape, as for your Lordship, after the most express repeated Denials of all Church Authority, to declare that you only meant to exclude it from passing the irreversible Sentence at the last Day. And the Nature of Church Authority is as much settled and determined by this Declaration, as the King's Power in his Kingdom, as to the Creation of Peers, is declared by saying that God alone can create.

For is it any Argument that no Persons have any particular Authority to baptize others, to admit to the holy Sacrament, and exclude unworthy Persons from it, because they are not to judge the World at the last Day? Is it a Proof that Bishops have no Authority to ordain, to confirm; no Commission from God to take care of Religious Matters, and see that all Things in the Divine Service be done decently and in order, because Christ alone is to pass Judgment upon all at the last Day? Does it follow that Men are under no Church Authority, but may choose any Government, or no Government as they please, because Christ alone shall call the World to Judgment? There is as much Logic in saying that Jesus Christ suffered under Pontius Pilate, therefore Bishops have no more Authority than Laymen; as to say they have no Authority in Religious Affairs, because Christ is to judge the World.

Yet you say this was the only proper Sense in which you could be supposed to deny it. Now, my Lord, I should have thought it had been more to the Purpose, to have denied Church Authority in some such Sense, as it had been falsely claimed by somebody or other, that it might have been said that you had an Adversary somewhere or other. But in this Matter, you have not so much as an Adversary in this World; for no one pretends to be Judge, as Christ is Judge, or sets up the Authority of the Church in Opposition to the last Tribunal; yet this is the only manner of Judging, the only sort of Authority, which you say you have denied to others; therefore you have only denied that which was never claimed; you have only denied that which no more relates to Church Authority, than it relates to Church Music. The Pope himself neither pretends to pass Sentence at the last Day, nor that his Judgments here will have any Effect in the next World, but conditionally, that is, Clave non errante. Now this is not a Sense in which Christ alone is Judge, therefore it is not a Sense in which you have denied it to others. So that notwithstanding this long elaborate Treatise against Church Tyranny and Popish Claims, Popery itself is as safe and sound as ever it was. For you have denied this Power of Judging in no other Sense, than as you have affirmed it of Christ, as he is to pass the last irreversible Sentence at the Day of Judgment; but the Pope does not claim it in that Sense, therefore the Papal Power is untouched by your Lordship.

Here I must observe, how your Lordship has evaded the great Points in Dispute, both concerning the Nature of the Church, and Church Authority. When you were charged with describing the Church contrary to Scripture and the Article in the Church of England; your Answer was, that you had only described the Invisible Church; which was saying in other Words, that in a Dispute amongst Visible Churches, and about Church-Communion, you described a Church which had no relation to the Matter, nor ever can have to any Dispute amongst Christians. This, my Lord, to speak tenderly of it, may be called only an Evasion.

Again, as to Church Authority, your Lordship has been charged with denying it all, and leaving it no right to judge or censure in the Affairs of Conscience. Your Answer is this, that you have only denied that Christ has left any Men here to judge us at the last Day. That is, in a Controversy about the Existence of Church Authority, the Extent and Obligation of its Laws, you have only denied such an Authority as nobody claims, nor ever will be executed, till all Visible Churches, and Disputes about them, will be at an end, viz., at the Day of Judgment.

This, my Lord, is another Evasion, and that in the very chief Point in Dispute, where Sincerity should have obliged you to have been open, clear, and express. But no sooner are you touched upon this Point, but you fly into the Clouds, and the very Dissenters themselves lose sight of you.

Thus when you had plainly said, that Christ hath left behind him no visible human Authority in the Affairs of Conscience, the Dissenters might justly think they had nothing to be charged with for their Disobedience to Bishops; they might well think that they were left to any Government, or no Government in Religion, as they pleased, since Christ had left no visible human Authority; but then how must they be astonished, my Lord, to find that your Assertion about Church Authority, does not at all relate to the Church in this World, but to the Exercise of a certain Authority in the next World, after all Churches on the Earth are at an end? To find that you have denied no Authority to any Men, but that which peculiarly belongs to Christ at the last Day? That is, that you denied no Authority which ever was claimed either by Protestant or Popish Churches, or indeed which relates to the Church in this World?

Suppose, when his Majesty was last at Hanover, anyone should have asserted, that the Regency had no Authority in Civil Matters; would the Regency have thought it any Excuse, if he had said that he only meant they were not the Governors of Hanover? Yet, my Lord, it would be as proper an Apology for him who had denied the Power of the Regency in Great Britain, to say he only meant they had not the supreme Power in Hanover, as for your Lordship, after a Denial of all Visible Church Authority in this World, to say you only denied an Authority to pass the irreversible Sentence in the next World.

Thus has your Lordship left the Dispute, and only pretended to deny that which nobody ever claimed, viz., that any Men have Authority to judge the World in Christ's stead, or pass the irreversible Sentence at the last Day. Your Lordship is here apprehensive, that you shall be charged with fighting without an Adversary, and therefore you point out several, and say, I meant it against those, who are so very free in declaring others of Christ's Subjects out of God's Favour; and in obliging Almighty God, to execute the Sentences of Men.

There has been indeed, my Lord, a Number of Men, ever since Christianity appeared in the World, who have been very free in declaring Heretics and Schismatics out of God's Favour, and who have maintained that these Heretics and Schismatics, when censured by the Church, cannot be received into God's Favour, but by their submitting to, and returning to the Church. But now, if your Lordship means your Doctrine against these, you are still without an Adversary, and might as well mean it against no Body; for these Men never pretended to judge others in Christ's stead, or to erect an Ecclesiastical Authority in Opposition to the Great Tribunal, which is the only Authority you pretend to deny.

You go on: If we had not such amongst Protestants; yet it might be pardonable to guard our People against the Presumptions of the Roman Catholics; who assume to themselves that Power of Judgment, which Christ alone can have.

Surely your Lordship must have so great an Aversion to Popery, that you never could so much as look into their Books; for otherwise I cannot conceive how you should not know, that the Roman Catholics pretended to no Power of Judging so as to affect People, but upon certain Conditions, as Clave non errante; but I suppose this is not a Power of Judging which belongs to our Saviour; Clave non errante has no Place in his Judgments. How then can your Lordship charge the Papists with assuming his Power, when that which they assume, cannot be ascribed to him without Blasphemy? So that, my Lord, it is just as pardonable to guard your People against these Presumptions, as it is to alarm them with false and imaginary Dangers.

Again you say; But how lately is it, that we have had People terrified with this very Presumption, even by Protestants; and the Terms of Church Power, and the spiritual fatal Effects of Church Censures, made use of to frighten Men into a separate Communion?

My Lord, I shall not here enter into the Merits of that Controversy, which your Lordship here points at; it being the Doctrine itself which your Lordship blames, and not the Misapplication of it. Thus you censure them, not because they would draw People from a true Church to a false one, but because they pretend to frighten Men out of one Communion into another. This is your Lordship's heavy Charge against them, that they should presume to talk of the Differences of Communions, and prefer one Communion to another. So that whoever thinks any way of Worship to be dangerous, and endeavours to withdraw People from it, is here censured by your Lordship, as pretending to judge in Christ's stead, and setting up an Authority in Opposition to the last Day.

Your Lordship saith, it is with this very Presumption (viz., that they can pass the irreversible Sentence) that these Men have endeavoured to frighten People into a separate Communion. If I should say, that it is upon Presumption that Christ never appeared in the World, that your Lordship has delivered your late Doctrines, I should freely submit to the Charge of Calunny; and I am sure your Lordship has ventured as far, in saying that it was with this very Presumption that these Men delivered such Doctrines. And your Lordship has as much reason to charge them with Atheism, as with this very Presumption; for they no more presume to judge in Christ's stead, or pass the irreversible Sentence, than they presume there is no God.

Your Lordship has still, it seems, another Adversary, a late Writer (the Dean of Chichester) *who has spoken unwarily of the Effects of the spiritual Punishments, the Church inflicts, being generally suspended till the Offender comes into the other World.

This first Censure is very modest, carrying it no farther than an unwary Expression; but presently the Charge advances; and, you say, if it be thus, you confess you think the Condition of Christians much worse than the Condition in which St. Paul describes the Heathens, who are left to their own Consciences and the righteous Judgment of God. So that at last it comes to this, that the Dean has taught such Doctrine, as makes it more desirable to be a Heathen than a Christian.

Let us therefore try how this Charge is supported: The Dean has said, the Effects of spiritual Punishments are generally suspended till the Offender comes into another World; † therefore, says your Lordship, the Condition of Christians is much worse than that of Heathens, and the Reason is this, because Heathens are left to their own Consciences and the righteous Judgment of God; so that if spiritual Punishments signify anything to

* Answ. to Repr., p. 35.

† Serm., p. 8.

Offenders in the other World, or have any Effect there, then such People are in your Lordship's Judgment, not left to their own Consciences and the righteous Judgment of God.

Pray, my Lord, how does it follow that if spiritual Punishments have any Effect in the other World, that then Offenders are not left to the righteous Judgment of God?

Is it an Argument that People are not left to the righteous Judgment of God, because they are to be punished in the other World? Or is it an Argument that they are excluded from God's righteous Judgment, because they are not punished till they come thither? I should have thought it a plain Argument for the direct contrary, and that one could not give a stronger Proof that such Offenders were left to the righteous Judgment of God, than by saying that the Effects of such Punishments are not felt till the Offender comes into the other World; I should have thought this a manifest Declaration that the Offender was to fall to the righteous Judgment of God, since he was not to feel any Punishment till he was fallen into God's Hands. If the Dean had intended to teach that Church Punishments have no Effect, but such as the righteous Judgment of God gives them, how could he have better signified his Intention, than by declaring, that the Effects of such Punishments are generally suspended till the Offender comes into the other World? How could the Dean more expressly guard against any horrible Apprehensions of Church Censures, or more directly refer the Cause to God, than he has done here? His Words are a plain Declaration, that such Offenders must fall to the righteous Judgment of God, since they are to fall into his Hands before they feel the Effects of such Punishment.

If any discontented Offender against the Church should tell me, that if the Censures of the Church can signify anything to him, he should be glad to be a Heathen, and have his Fate amongst them; would it not be sufficient Matter of Satisfaction to tell him, that these Punishments will have no Effect but in the other World, where there can be no Injustice; and that it is the same God who judges the Heathens, who will judge Christians?

Yet this Declaration, which is the only Ground for Satisfaction to Men of Conscience, under the Censures of the Church, is by your Lordship pretended to be such an Evil, as to make us rather resign our Christianity, than submit to it. This is all which the Dean has said to make it more desirable to be a Heathen than a Christian.

Suppose, my Lord, the Matter had been worded stronger, and instead of saying that the Effects of spiritual Punishments are generally suspended till the Offenders come into the other World, it had been said, the spiritual Censures of the Church shall rise in the Judgment and condemn Offenders. If it had been thus expressed, what Complaints might you not have made against such unwary Expressions? What Cruelties and Hardships might you not have charged on such Doctrine? And how advantageously might you have compared the Felicity of Heathenism to such Christianity?

But, my Lord, that Divine Person who has reserved to himself the righteous Judgment of the World, has yet declared to a certain Generation, that the Men of Nineveh shall rise up in the Judgment with them and condemn them, because those repented at the preaching of Jonas, but these did not, though a greater than Jonas was with them.*

Now, my Lord, here lies the same Objection against this Doctrine, which there does against the Dean's. For is it not full as hard that the Repentance of the Men of Nineveh, or anywhere else, should have any Effect upon the Impenitent at the Day of Judgment, as that the Censures of the Church should have any Effect upon Offenders in the other World? Is it not as cruel that the Impenitent shall have their Guilt aggravated by other People's preaching or Repentance, as by other People's Censures? And would it not be as proper here to say, if this be so, happy they who never heard of Preaching or Repentance, as to set forth the Happiness of Heathens, because they are free from Church Censures? If the Sentence of the Church will rise in Judgment and condemn Offenders, then you say such Persons do not fall to the righteous Judgment of God. But is not this as true of the Men of Nineveh, that if they shall rise up in Judgment and condemn the Impenitent, that then such Persons are not left to the righteous Judgment of God?

So that had you been one of our Saviour's Hearers, you must have been as much astonished at his Doctrine, as at the Dean's unwary Expression, and have been obliged to say then, as you have said now, that you have such Notions of the Goodness of God, and of his gracious Designs in the Gospel, that you think it your Duty to declare your Judgment, that the Supposition is greatly injurious to the Honour of God and of the Gospel, and the thing itself impossible to be conceived.†

Your Lordship has here only advanced this Argument against the Significancy of Church Censures, but anyone else may as justly, and to as much Purpose urge it against every Part of Christianity.

Thus it may serve to prove that it would be better never to have had the Scriptures; for if any Texts of Scripture shall rise in Judgment and condemn those who disbelieved them, or disregarded their Doctrine, then it may be said, much happier are the Heathens, who have nothing of this to fear from any Scriptures, but are left to their own Consciences and the righteous Judgment of God.

Again; As this Argument proves even the Scriptures to be an Unhappiness, so will it prove every Advantage in human Life to be a Misery.

For it is certain that the Examples of religious Men, the good Advice of our Friends, and the virtuous Commands of our Parents and Governors, will, if neglected, affect our Condition; and though, like the spiritual Corrections of the Church, they may not be felt here, yet hereafter they will rise in Judgment and condemn us. May I not here say with your Lordship, if the Case be thus; if other People's Wisdom, Virtue, Advice or Commands, can affect our State in the next World, then more happy are those who never saw a good or wise Man in their Lives, and who have nothing to fear from the Advice or Commands of any, but are left to their own Consciences and the righteous Judgment of God.

So that you cannot condemn the Dean's Doctrine as horrible, without condemning it as an horrible thing, that the Men of Nineveh should rise in Judgment and condemn the impenitent Jews; or an horrible thing that the Light of the Gospel, the Blessings of Christianity, and the Advantages of Education, should have any Effect in the next World upon those, who despised them in this World.

Of the Authority of the Church, as it relates to Excommunication.

IN order to vindicate this Doctrine thoroughly, and shew upon what bottom it is founded, I shall, as briefly as I can, state the Nature and Intent of spiritual Punishments, and shew what Effects they have upon Offenders in the other World; from whence, I persuade myself, it will farther appear, that such Effects do no more exclude Persons from the righteous Judgment of God, than the Heathens are excluded from his righteous Judgment.

Now that corrupt Members may be cut off from Christian Communion, till by their Amendment they recommend themselves to a Re-admission, is plain from Scripture. This is even granted by your Lordship, that *Christians may set a Mark upon Notorious Offenders, even by refusing to them the peculiar Tokens and Marks of Christian Communion, as well as by avoiding their Company and Conversation. But then your Lordship makes no more of it, than a Right which all Christians have to avoid an open, wilful, and scandalous Sinner;† so that this Excommunication, considered as a Church Act, is only the same Power in a Body or Society, of avoiding Persons they abhor; which is the common Privilege of every single Person, whether in or out of the Church, to shun those he dislikes.

And all the Excommunication you allow, is this, that as private Persons have a Right to shun and avoid those they dislike, so the Church may exclude such Members as are disapproved of; and that this judging, or excommunicating, is a Right equally invested in all Christians, and entirely without any Effect upon the Person excommunicated, so as to make his Condition either better or worse before God.

I shall therefore, my Lord, beg leave to shew that the Power of Excommunication, is a Judicial Power, which belongs to particular Persons, which they have a Right to exercise from the Authority of Christ; and that Persons so excommunicated, are not to be looked upon as Persons who are only to be abhorred and avoided by Christians, as any Man may avoid those he dislikes, but as Persons who are to be avoided by Christians, because they lie under the Sentence of God, and are by his Authority turned out of his Kingdom.

That Excommunication is a Power which belongs only to particular Persons, will appear from the Nature of the Thing itself, as it is an Exclusion of Persons from the Christian Worship: for as only particular Men can officiate in the Christian Worship, and admit People into Communion; so only those Persons can refuse the Sacrament, and exclude Offenders from Communion. Nothing can be more plain, than that those who can alone administer the Sacrament, can alone exclude Men from it.

All Persons are admitted conditionally into the Christian Covenant, and have only a Title to the Benefits of it, or the ordinary Means of Grace, as they perform the Conditions of their Admission; and those same Persons who have alone the Authority to admit them into the Church upon those Conditions, have alone the Authority to exclude them for Non-performance.

And their Act of Exclusion is as effectual towards the taking from them all the Privileges of Christians, and as truly makes them Aliens from the Kingdom of God, as their Act of Admission at first entitled them to all the Benefits of Church-Communion. For as they have as much Authority to exclude some, as they have to admit others into the Church, the Authority being the same in both Cases, it must be in both Cases equally effectual.

If your Lordship will say that all People, are equally qualified to admit Persons into the Church, that, Go ye, and baptize all Nations, conferred the same Powers on all Christians; then indeed it must be granted that Excommunication, or Exclusion from the Church, is a Right equally invested in all Christians. But as sure as Christ gave peculiar Powers to his Apostles, as sure as they left particular Men to succeed them in their Powers, so sure is it that only such Successors can either admit or exclude Persons from Christian Communion.

Secondly; That Excommunication belongs to particular Persons, will appear from the Institution of it in Scripture.

*If thy Brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his Fault between thee and him alone. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an Heathen Man, and a Publican. Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven.

Here, my Lord, is as plain an Institution of Excommunication, as can well be conceived; and he who can doubt of it, may doubt whether Baptism be instituted in Scripture.

First, We may observe that here is an Authority given to the Church over the Offender, and that such an Authority, as neither belonged to private Men, either separate or united together; for the Offender here had first been admonished, by a single Person, then by one or two more, i.e., an indefinite Number, but still here is nothing granted but Admonition; but as soon as he is brought before the Church, there an Authority appears, and the Offender is to feel its Sentence, let him be unto thee as an Heathen.

Secondly; That this Authority did not belong to the Church, considered only as a greater Number of Christians, but as it signified particular Persons who had this Authority from Christ, for the Edification of his Church.

* Matth. xviii. 15.

For Christ expressly declares in the following Verse, that where two or three are met together in his Name, there is He in the midst of them.

Here is the Description of that Church before whom the Offender was to be brought, and whose Authority Christ promises to support; it is two or three met together in his Name.

Now the Church had not this Authority over the Offender, considered as a Number, i.e., as two or three; for we see that the Offender had been already before such a Church; he had been before two or three; and after Neglect of them, he was brought before another two or three, met together in Christ's Name. Which is a plain Proof that the Offender was not censured by the Church, as it signifies a Number of Christians, but as it implies particular Persons acting in the Name of Christ, and with his Authority.

Thirdly; We may observe that the Authority here granted to the Church is a Judicial Authority, such an Authority as affects and alters the Condition of the Person excommunicated, implied in these Words, *Let him be unto thee as an Heathen; that is, as the Bishop of Oxford observes, in the most natural and common Sense of the Words, they should look upon him no longer as a Member of the Church, but place him amongst Infidels, and again, as reduced into the State of Heathens.†

Now unless it can be said, that a Person who is turned out of the Kingdom of God, and reduced into the State of Heathens, is in the same Condition which he was, when he was in the Church, and had a Right to all the Benefits of Communion; unless we can say that a Person thus rejected from the Means of Grace, by the Commission of Christ, is in the same Condition with him, who is continued in the Church by the same Commission of Christ; it must be allowed that here is a Judicial Power granted to the Church, and such as affects the Condition of the Offender in the Sight of God.

Fourthly; It is to be observed, that this Authority of the Church is made Judicial by the express Promise of God to ratify and confirm it. For after it is said, let him be unto thee as an Heathen, it is declared, that whatsoever they should thus bind on Earth, should be bound in Heaven.

From all this, it plainly appears, that Excommunication is as truly a Divine Positive Punishment, as Baptism is a Divine Positive Blessing; and that the one as certainly excludes us from the Kingdom of God, as the other admits us into it. For since here is as plainly Christ's express Authority to take from some Men the ordinary Means of Grace, and exclude them from the common Benefits of Christianity, as there is his Authority to go and baptize all Nations; I desire to know, why one is not as truly a Divine Positive Institution as the other? Is not Christ's Authority as effectual and significant in excluding, as in admitting Persons into his Kingdom? Is not that same Power as able to take away the Privileges of Church-Membership, as it was at first to grant them?

If therefore there be any Blessing or Happiness in our being admitted into the Church; there must be as much Misery and Punishment in our Exclusion from it. For as it implies the Loss of all those Privileges and Favours we were made Partakers of by our Admission into the Church; so we must needs be punished in the same degree that we were happy.

If therefore Baptism, a Divine Positive Institution to admit us into the Privileges of Christianity, makes any Alteration in our Condition, as to the Favour of God, i.e., if we are brought any nearer to God by Baptism, than we were before; then it plainly follows, Excommunication, a Divine Positive Institution, which deprives us of all these Privileges of Christianity, and, as the Bishop of Oxford expresses it, reduces Offenders into the State of Heathens, must needs affect our Condition with regard to the Favour of God.

For if there be anything in Baptism which is just Matter of Joy, there is something equally Terrible in Excommunication; which, when rightly executed, as effectually makes us Aliens from the Promises of God, as Baptism, when rightly administered, makes us Children of God, and Heirs of eternal Life. So that he who can ridicule and expose the Terrors and Effects of Excommunication, is acting just as Christian a part, as he who derides and despises the Benefits and Advantages of Baptism.

Seeing therefore the Church hath as express an Authority to turn some Men out of the Church, as it hath to admit others into it, it is as false an Account of Excommunication, to make it only that common Right which every Man has, to avoid those he dislikes; as if it should be said, that Admission into the Church by Baptism, implies no more, than that common Right which every Man has to do good Offices for those he likes. Now, my Lord, is Baptism to be administered, because Persons may do good Offices for one another? Is there a Power in the Church to increase its Members, by admitting others into Communion, for this reason, because People have a common Right to choose their Company? If not, my Lord, how comes the Exclusion of Members to be nothing but a common Right of avoiding those we dislike? Are not Persons excluded from all the Benefits of their Admission? So that if there was any Authority required for the Admission of Persons into the Church, if this Authority was only from God, it is certain that an Exclusion from these Church-Privileges, cannot be executed but by the same Authority, which first granted them. For no Person can be deprived of any Privileges, but by that Power which at first granted them.

When therefore your Lordship recurs to the common Right of Persons to avoid, if they can, those they dislike, in order to state the Nature of Excommunication; it is just as much to the Purpose, as if I should get a Chemist to examine the natural Qualities of Water, in order to state the true Efficacy of Baptism: for Men no more act by any Powers of their own when they exclude Offenders, than they baptize others into Communion by their own Authority, or than Water unites them to Christ by its natural Qualities.

Yet your Lordship sets forth the Nature of Excommunication, and the Right the Church has to it, only from that common Right, which all Christians have of avoiding if they can those they dislike. Thus you say, the Church may excommunicate, because every Person has a Right to judge, may he cannot help judging of the Behaviour of Men;* that every Man will judge him to be a Murderer, who takes away his Neighbour's Life unjustly.

This comes up as truly to the Nature of Excommunication, and is as just an Account of it, as if anyone should set forth the Authority of a British Judge, and show the Extent of his Judicial Power, by saying, he indeed may judge and condemn a Murderer, for this is the Right of every Person to judge, and no one can help judging and condemning a Murderer. It is as consistent with Sense, thus to set out the Power of the Judge, as it is with Reason and Scripture, to compare Excommunication to that private Power of Judging and Thinking which everyone enjoys.

For, my Lord, can it be supposed that when our Saviour tells them, that they should reject such a Person out of the Church, and look upon him as an Heathen, and that he would bind, i.e., confirm their Sentence; can it be supposed, that he only meant they might think and judge a wicked Person to be a wicked Person, only in such a manner as every Man cannot help Thinking and Judging? If our blessed Lord only here intended this, what occasion was there for his Promise to ratify their Judgment? What need is there of an Assurance, that they shall privately judge, what they cannot help privately judging? Or indeed to what Purpose is any Promise at all made here, if nothing is to be effected? If this Sentence be only a private, unauthorised Declaration, like the Opinion or Judgment of private Men, what Room can there be for this Ratification of our Saviour? If no Effects are intended in the Judgment of the Church, what can be the meaning of this Promise? Or rather, since our Saviour has here instituted the Authority, and promised to ratify the Exercise of it, how dares any Christian to compare it to a private personal Power of Judging, or declare that it is without any Effect upon the Condition of Christians? For, my Lord, either something is here promised to the Sentence of the Church, or there is not; if there is something promised, then the Sentence of the Church is no more like the personal Sentence of private Men, than the Power of a Judge is like the Power of a private Man; if you will say there is nothing here promised in these Words, whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven, &c., then you must say that there is nothing at all meant in them; for it is impossible to shew that they can have any other Meaning, than that of a Promise; so that if no Promise is made, they are certainly so many dead Letters.

Again; That this is a Judicial Power, is also evident from the Case of the incestuous Corinthian. St. Paul says, What have I to do, to judge them also which are without? Now the Apostle could not have put this Question, if by Judging here had been meant no Authority, but a private Power of judging and thinking a Sinner to be a Sinner. For a Man can no more help judging a Murderer to be a Murderer, which is without the Church, than if he were within the Church. And it is as proper for us to judge and think aright of those who are out of the Church, as of those who are within it. So that St. Paul could not mean, What have I to do to think a Murderer to be a Murderer which is without the Church, it being every Man's Duty to think as truly of all Things and Persons as he can? Seeing therefore he plainly intimates that he had a Power of Judging in the Church, which did not belong to him out of the Church, it follows that this Power was Judicial and Authoritative; for a private Power of Judging and Thinking, belongs to every Man with regard to every Thing.

We shall more easily understand what is meant by the Effects of spiritual Punishments, if we consider them under this Division.

First, Such as are the primary and intended Effects; secondly, Such as are only the accidental Effects of them.

Now as to the primary and intended Effects of spiritual Punishments, they are these.

First, To preserve the Honour of God and his Church, that ill Members being cut off, it might be *presented a glorious Church, not having Spot or Wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it might be Holy, and without Blemish.

Secondly, To reform Offenders, and reclaim them from their Vices; it is a Discipline given to the Church for the Edification, and not the Destruction of its Members. Thus St. Paul says, the incestuous Corinthian was to be delivered over to Satan, for the Destruction of the Flesh, that his Spirit might be saved in the Day of the Lord.†

Thirdly, To preserve the rest of the Church from the ill Influence of their Example, and that by such Punishments exercised upon others, they might fear, and learn from thence not to offend.

These are the intended Effects of the Punishments which the Church inflicts, to preserve it a Holy Society, and save the Souls of its Members.

God Almighty has instituted several Means for the Advancement of Virtue, and the Salvation of Mankind; and amongst others, he has set up this Authority of the Church to promote the same Ends. It is his human, ordinary Means for the Preservation of his Church; and therefore as it cannot operate infallibly, or affect People with a Divine Certainty, it is only conditional, and is to prevail towards the Salvation of Mankind, as far as human and conditional Means can prevail.

And indeed, it is an Institution which has a very natural Tendency to produce the Effects designed by it. For, considering Christianity as a Covenant with God, wherein our Title to Happiness depends upon our Use of the ordinary instituted Means of Grace, nothing can more naturally induce us to live worthy of such Means, than this Authority in the Church to withdraw them upon our Abuse, and expel us from the Terms of the Covenant. Men would not dare to transgress, when they saw they could neither break the Laws, nor corrupt the Faith of Christianity, without being turned out of the Church, by such a Power as Christ hath set up for that Purpose, and with his Promise to make good its Decrees. They must be very obstinate Sinners, who could be content to lie under a Sentence, which as effectually takes from them all Pretension to Christian Happiness, as their Baptism entitled them to those Pretensions at first.

The chief Reason why Sinners are generally so little affected with the Horror of their Condition, is because they look upon their Punishment at the future Judgment, as a great Distance off; and since they are within the Church, and enjoy the ordinary Means of Grace, they think they can repent in time. But now Christ, by instituting this Church Authority, has suited his Discipline to the Weakness and Frailty of our Nature; and they who are only to be affected with Things present, have a present Judgment to fear; which, though it is only the Judgment of Men, yet is the Judgment of such Men as are commissioned to pronounce it in Christ's Name, and with his Promise to ratify and confirm it. So that they have as much reason to look upon themselves as effectually cast out by God in that Sentence, as they were received into Covenant with God by Baptism; for there is the same Divine Authority to support them both.

* Ephes. iv. 25.

As to those other Effects of spiritual Punishments in the other World, they are not the intended, but accidental Effects of such Punishments, which are brought upon Offenders by their own wicked Behaviour under them.

Thus the Salvation of Mankind is the primary intended Effect of Christianity; yet it may have such Effect upon some Men by their own Impiety in it, as to make it better for them if they had never heard of the Name of Christ. For Christianity may become so much a Punishment to some Persons in the other World, that their Condition may be less tolerable than that of Sodom and Gomorrhah. But then this is not the intended Effect of Christianity, but an accidental Effect which such Persons bring upon themselves; who by their own ill Conduct turn a Mercy into a Judgment, and make that which was intended to save them, the accidental Cause of their greater Ruin.

Thus it is with spiritual Punishments; they are the merciful Corrections of God intended to prevent our future Misery, but if disregarded, will certainly increase it. This will easily explain what is meant by the Effects of spiritual Punishments in the other World, or how they are suspended till the Offender comes thither. It is not the direct intended Effect of Church Punishments to increase the Misery of Sinners, or damn them in the other World; no more than it is the direct intended Effect of Christianity to increase People's Damnation: But as Christianity, if abused, will be the accidental Cause of their greater Damnation who so abuse it; so the Censures of the Church, when despised, will have this accidental Effect, as to increase the Punishment of those who so despised them. This is the Nature of those Effects, which spiritual Punishments will have upon the Impenitent in another World.

As for Instance, a Person who is turned out of the Church, may all this while be lusty and strong, and flourish in all the Advantages of this Life; but when he comes into the other World, he may then find that the spiritual Punishment was a sore Evil, that it is ratified by Christ, has increased his Guilt, and will be Matter of Punishment hereafter.

He will then find that the Censure of the Church has increased his Guilt in these Respects.

First, As it was a Judicial Sentence pronounced by Christ's Authority, and therefore not to be despised or neglected without great Impiety; so that let the Sinner have been what he will before, when he continues in his Sins in Contempt of this Tribunal set up in Christ's Name, his Guilt is thereby exceedingly increased.

Secondly, As it is the most powerful Means, and the very utmost which God can do to reclaim, or even terrify Sinners from their Impiety, as it is the most awakening Call to Repentance, an Institution only less terrible than the last Judgment; those who are not affected with it, must be rendered more odious in the Sight of God, and made ripe for a severer Punishment.

These, my Lord, are the Effects of spiritual Punishments in the other World; it is thus that they alter the Condition of Offenders in the Sight of God in regard to his Favour. They are certainly under greater Displeasure, after they have despised the Censures of Church Authority, and have resisted an Institution, which is the last possible Means to recover them.

In former Times, God has been pleased to send his Prophets to forewarn Sinners of their Destruction, as Jonah to the Men of Nineveh: But in the Christian Dispensation, he governs us by his ordinary Providence; and though he does not send express Messengers to recall Sinners, yet he has instituted a standing Authority in his Church, to censure Offenders, and give them up to Destruction in his Name, unless they immediately repent. And what can we think more dreadful than a Sentence thus pronounced against us by God's Authority, and with his Promise to confirm it?

Was there anything more awakening or more dreadful in the Preaching of Jonah, than in this Declaration? Jonah could only preach and declare, he could execute nothing himself; it was his being sent in God's Name, which created all the Terror, and was the Motive to Repentance. Now though the Church can only censure and declare, yet since it is as truly commissioned to censure in God's Name, as Jonah was sent in God's Name, there is as much reason to dread the Consequences of neglecting the Church, as of not repenting at the Message or Preaching of any Prophet from God.

I must now beg leave here, my Lord, to lament an Assertion from the Hands of a Christian and Protestant Bishop; where you declare, that the Excommunication of the incestuous Corinthian, neither added to God's Displeasure, nor would the want of it have at all diminished it. Neither if he had died in an impenitent Condition, would that Sentence have had any Effect in the other World.*

This, my Lord, plainly supposes that there is neither Authority nor Advantage in Excommunication; for if there were, it is certain that our Abuse of it as an Advantage, and our Contempt of it as an Authority, must needs increase our Guilt, and consequently God's Displeasure. Yet your Lordship here teaches the World, that if the incestuous Corinthian, though justly censured, and that by an Apostle directing, and the whole Congregation joining, had died impenitent, that Sentence would have had no Effect in the other World.

Let us therefore suppose that some great Patron of Christian Liberty had gone to the disconsolate Corinthian, sorrowing under the Sentence of the Church, and endeavoured to quiet him after this manner.

'Why do you disquiet yourself with vain Fears about the Censure of the Church, which neither hath nor can have an Effect upon your Condition as to the Favour of God. Let the Apostle and Church be as solemn as they please in the Denunciation; let them in the Name of Christ deliver you over to Satan; yet take Courage, and fear nothing from all this; for you may depend upon it, that, after all, you are but just where you were, before this Sentence were passed. And if you die impenitent, you have no Effects of this Censure to fear in the other World.'

Now this is the Doctrine your Lordship has taught for the Consolation of those who are, or are likely to be under the Sentence of the Church; which if it be now found Doctrine, it was as proper to be told the Corinthian then, as it is for your Lordship to teach it now. And if your Lordship had lived then, it would have been as proper to have told the Corinthian, as to tell us now; and you must have lain under the same Christian Necessity of delivering him from vain Fears, which now constrains you to set all at liberty from the like Apprehensions.

St. Paul, speaking of the Sentence passed upon the Corinthian, says, Sufficient to such a Man was this Punishment.† Now, my Lord, if it have nothing of the Nature of a Punishment, if it has no Effect where it is inflicted, if the Person said to be punished can feel no Effect from it, what strange Language is this? Can that be called a Punishment, or a sufficient Punishment, which can in no degree be felt, which produces no Effects, or makes no Alteration in the Person where it falls?

† 2 Cor. ii. 6.

Again St. Paul tells us, that he had amongst others which had corrupted the Faith, *delivered Hymeneus and Alexander to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme.

Now if this Sentence can have no Effect, if it cannot signify anything to them, if they are just in the same Condition after it, which they were before, why should it teach them not to blaspheme? Why should a Sentence which they had nothing to fear from, make them any longer afraid to continue in their Errors? Here was therefore either a pious Fraud made use of by the Apostle, to fright Men from their Heresies by something which was in itself vain and insignificant, or else your Lordship has mightily mistaken the Matter, in declaring that it is vain and insignificant. The Apostle plainly inflicts these Censures, as a Terror to Offenders, and to frighten them from continuing in their evil Courses; but if, as you say, Persons be just in the same Condition after this Sentence, in which they were before, if it has no Effect upon them, though they are rightly censured, and yet die impenitent, which is what you expressly say of this Corinthian, then it is plain they are only pretended Terrors, and that when the Apostles use them as such, they must be charged with using them as a pious Fraud. And it must be owned that your Lordship has very frankly made the Discovery.

But whoever has Piety enough to believe those First Ambassadors of Christ, will clear them from such a Charge, and rather think it possible that you may mistake in your Philosophy, than they in their Divinity.

To proceed; You declare that though the incestuous Corinthian had died in an impenitent Condition, the Sentence of the Church would have had no Effect in the other World: By which you must mean, that it could not affect his Condition there, so as to increase his Punishment, and that because the Sentence did not add to God's Displeasure, which he incurs solely upon account of his own Behaviour, and not the Sentence of Men.† As thus, I suppose, your Lordship means, that if an Adulterer is censured by the Church, he is under God's Displeasure solely on account of his Adultery, and not more so, on account of the Sentence of the Church; which cannot make him more an Adulterer, or more guilty in the Sight of God. It is for this reason that Church Censures are so insignificant, so void of all Effect in the other World ; because it is our Sins alone, and not the Sentence of Men, which loses us the Favour of God.

Let us therefore, my Lord, suppose that God himself had delivered this Sentence against the Corinthian which the Church did, your Lordship's Doctrine would have procured him the same Ease and Quiet, and taught him to be no more concerned about it, than if it had been a mere Church Censure. For it is as true in your Lordship's Sense, that the Sentence of God did not add to his Displeasure against him, that he was not angry at him because of his Sentence, but upon account of the Offender's Behaviour. But, my Lord, will it therefore follow, that there is nothing to be dreaded in such a Sentence? Will it follow, that if the Person dies impenitent under it, that it would have no Effect in the other World? Would your Lordship go about, and preach Liberty to Persons under such a Sentence, and assure them that the Sentence itself could have no Effect, that they were but just where they were before it was pronounced? Would you think it proper to deliver Men from such Apprehensions, and persuade them that they are in no Danger from the Sentence of God? And that because it is not his own Sentence, but their Behaviour which increases his Displeasure.

This may perhaps appear a little too shocking, to set up for an Advocate for the Laitie against the Sentence of God ; but, my Lord, if you were to do so, you would have the same Argument to defend yourself against any Effect in the Divine Sentence, which you now have against any Effect in the Sentence of the Church. It would be then as much to the Purpose to say, that God is not displeas'd with them, on the account of his own Sentence, but purely for their own Behaviour; as it is to tell Offenders, that it is not the Sentence of the Church, but their Behaviour which brings them under the Divine Displeasure.

I must here therefore, my Lord, beg leave to call this a strict Demonstration, that if the Sentence of the Church is not to be feared ; if it hath no Effect, because it is not the Sentence, but our own Behaviour which alone procures us the Divine Displeasure ; if this be true, it is Demonstration, that if God himself was to pronounce this Church Sentence, and turn Offenders out of Communion, that there would be nothing to be feared from it, that it could have no Effect in the other World ; for God's Displeasure against them, would not be occasioned by his own Sentence, but by their Behaviour. So that were the Discipline of the Church in God's own Hands, and were he with his own Voice to threaten Sinners, as the Church now doth, your Lordship would be as much obliged to comfort the Laitie against any Apprehension of any Effect from the Sentence itself, as you are now to deliver them from the Fear of Man's Judgment.

Again ; If the Sentence of the Church is not to be dreaded, if, it can have no Effect in the other World, because we incur the Divine Displeasure solely on account of our own Behaviour ; then it is certain, that the Sentence of Christ himself at the last Day can have no Effect in the other World.

If therefore any unwary Divine, should endeavour to alarm his Congregation with the Effects of Christ's Sentence at the last Day, your Lordship has taught anyone to reject the Doctrine, as greatly injurious to the Honour of God ; and that such Doctrine was also impossible in itself to be conceived, he might presume strictly to demonstrate.*

A Sentence which makes not a Tittle of Alteration in the Condition of a Man, in the Eyes of God, with regard to his Favour or Displeasure, cannot be said to have any Effect in the other World.† But the Sentence of Christ at the last Day is of this sort.

Therefore the Sentence of Christ makes not a Tittle of Alteration in the Condition of a Man, in the Eyes of God, with regard to his Favour or Displeasure.

That the Sentence of Christ makes no Alteration in the Condition of a Man with regard to the Favour or Displeasure of God, is plain from hence ; that Men incur the Divine Displeasure solely on account of their own Behaviour.

Thus, my Lord, it is demonstratively certain, that as you have argued against the Effects of the Church's Sentence in the other World, you have taught anyone to argue against any Effect in the Sentence of Christ in the next World ; and consequently it must be as unwary Doctrine, to frighten People with the Effects of Christ's Sentence, as to terrify them with the Effects of the Sentence of the Church. And you have offered such an Argument for the utter Insignificancy of this Sentence, as would make it equally insignificant, and void of all Effect, though it was pronounced by God himself. So that as much as you often seem to expose it as the Sentence of weak and fallible Men, yet your Argument does not reject it as a fallible Sentence, but as it is a Sentence far from having any Effect. So that if it was pronounced by God himself, it must be as much without Effect, and every Sentence which ever can be pronounced by God, must be without any Effect as to his Favour or Displeasure, because that is solely occasioned by our own Behaviour. Therefore an infallible Sentence can no more have any Effect, than a fallible one, because it is our Behaviour alone which can affect us.

This, my Lord, will be of great use to some People, who will be glad to find that they have no more Effects to fear from God's Sentence, either in this World or the next, than your Lordship has from the Church.

Again; if there be no Effect in the Sentence of the Church in the other World, because our Behaviour alone incurs the Divine Displeasure, then nothing which God inflicts upon us here, can have any Effect in the other World.

If therefore God's Judgments were visibly fallen upon some Town or Country, and an unwary Preacher should take occasion to excite them to a speedy Repentance, from the sad Effects such Judgments would have in the other World, if they had not their designed Effects in this, and declare that if they died impenitent under them in this World, they would feel worse Effects of them in the other World: A Disciple of your Lordship's might thus reprove the Falseness and Cruelty of such Doctrine. 'How can you terrify People with such vain Fears about God's Judgments? Is he provoked against us by his own Thunder and Lightning? Do his own Judgments add anything to his Displeasure against us? Can anything but our own Sins and Behaviour create his Displeasure? Therefore we are certainly in the same Condition, as to that, which we were in before his Judgments fell upon us; and if we die impenitent under them, they can have no Effect in the other World. False then and greatly dishonourable to God is your Doctrine, which supposes anything can have any Effect of that kind, but our own Behaviour. To alarm us therefore with the Effects of such Judgments, is to put false Fears into our Minds, and teach us to dread things which are impossible; for it is impossible that anything but our own Behaviour should increase our Punishment.'

Now, my Lord, is it cruel and unwary Doctrine to awaken Sinners under God's Judgments to Repentance, from a Sense of the worse Effects of those Judgments in the other World, if they do not bring them to Repentance in this? If it is not, I desire to know, why it is not as Reasonable to alarm People with the Effects of spiritual Punishments, if disregarded, as with the Effects of God's Judgments, if they are neglected? What is there in the Nature of the Thing, why one Punishment may have Effect in the other World, and not the other? They are both equally God's Punishments, intended for the same Ends.

When Persons are rightly turned out of the Church, and denied the Ordinary Means of Grace, they are as truly under God's special Judgment, as a Country which is oppressed with Famine or Pestilence; the one is his instituted, ordinary Judgment, to terrify Men from Iniquity; the other is his extraordinary Judgment, his miraculous Call to Repentance. It is therefore as sound a Christian Doctrine, to say, that if Persons die impenitent under God's extraordinary Judgment, that such Judgment will have no Effect in the other World; as to say, that if the incestuous Corinthian had died impenitent under the just Sentence of the Church, i.e., God's ordinary Judgment, that such Sentence or Judgment would have had no Effect in the other World. And consequently, to endeavour to terrify Sinners with the Effects of God's Judgments in the other World, if they disregard them here, is as much condemned by your Lordship, as the Dean of Chichester's Doctrine concerning the Effects of spiritual Punishments in the next World.

Lastly; Our blessed Saviour told the Jews that if he had not come, they had not had Sin; but now they have no Cloak for their Sin: Which plainly implies, that his coming into the World altered their Condition as to the Favour of God, because it made them more guilty in his Sight than they were before he came. Yet your Lordship's Argument against the Effects of Church Punishments, directly denies this Doctrine. For your Objection against any Effects in Church Punishments, is full as strong against any Effects in Christ's coming into the World. And if People may be more guilty in the Sight of God, after Christ is come, they may be more guilty after they have been censured by the Church, for the Reason is the same in both Cases. For there can be no Reason given, why Christ's coming should affect their Condition with regard to the Favour of God, but that he had a Divine Mission, and was an Authoritative Call to Repentance; but this is equally true of Excommunication, that it is a Divine Institution, an Authoritative Call to Repentance; therefore they must either both be allowed to affect People's Condition with regard to the Favour of God, or neither; for the Reason is exactly the same in both Cases.

If therefore a learned Pharisee, seeing a relenting Publican touched with this Declaration of our Saviour's, should have reproved him after this manner:

'You need not be concerned at this Person's coming into the World, for his coming does not increase God's Displeasure against you, which can only be raised by your own Behaviour; it is solely on account of that, that you can be out of God's Favour. Sinners are out of God's Favour, if this Person had never come, and his coming does not add to God's Displeasure against them; neither if they die in an impenitent Condition after he is come, will his coming have any Effect in the other 'World, where their Condition will not be determined by his coming, but by their own Behaviour.'

I should be glad, my Lord, to know what you could have said against such a Declaration, or how a Person who would have told the incestuous Corinthian, that if he died impenitent under the Censure of the Church, that it would have no Effect in the other World, could have anything to object to the Pharisee, who tells the Publican, if he died impenitent after Christ's coming, that his coming will have no Effect in the other World.

The Pharisee has exactly the same Reason, to tell the Publican, that he was neither the more, nor the less, out of God's Favour for Christ's coming, that you have to tell the Corinthian, that he was neither the more, nor the less, out of God's Favour for what was done by the Church. For the Censure here was right and infallible, and passed in the Name and by the Authority of Christ; it was passed by an Apostle, and you affirm that Christ was in all that the Apostles did; therefore it may be truly said, that Christ himself came to the Corinthian in this Sentence, it was his Authority and Infallibility which censured him; and yet you say that if he had died impenitent under this Censure, he had been just where he was before, and it would have had no Effect in the other World.

Pray therefore, my Lord, let us know how anyone can be more guilty for Christ's coming, or why it shall have any Effect in the other World upon those who die impenitent? A few Reasons against this Pharisee, would be so many Reasons against your Lordship's Doctrine. For Christ as truly comes to Christians in his Institutions, as he came to the Jews in Person; and it is as dangerous to disregard him in the one Appearance, as in the other.

This Account of Excommunication will, I hope, be thought a sufficient Answer to your Lordship's strict Demonstration, that it has no Effects in the other World, nor adds anything to God's Displeasure. For from this it appears, that when you say, that supposing no such Punishment inflicted upon a wicked Christian, he is under the Displeasure of Almighty God to an equal Degree, as he would be if it were inflicted :* It is as false as to say, that a wicked Jew was under the same Displeasure of God before Christ came, as he was afterwards; or that a Person impenitent under an extraordinary Judgment, is no more out of God's Favour afterwards, than he was before, or if God had never visited him. It is as false as to say, that if God himself was to pronounce the Sentence of the Church, that Persons under it would be just in the same Degree of Favour they were before, or that the Sentence of Christ at the last Day will have no Effect.

The other Part of your Demonstration proceeds thus ; Excommunication has no Effect, because *supposing it wrongfully inflicted upon a Christian, he is still equally in the Favour of God.

The whole of this Argument amounts to this, that a right Censure of the Church hath no Effect, because a wrong one hath not. I should think anyone in a mighty want of Proof, who should say that the Excommunication of the incestuous Corinthian could have no Effect, because the Excommunication of some virtuous Person will not have any Effect ; yet this is your Lordship's Demonstration, that it can signify nothing when it is right, because it signifies nothing when it is wrong.

Is it an Argument, my Lord, that when a Bullet flies through a Man's Head it has no Effect upon him, because it will have no Effect if it miss him ? Is it a Proof that Motion cannot produce Heat, because Rest cannot produce Heat ?

If not, how comes it to be an Argument that a right Sentence hath no Effect, because a wrong one hath not the same Effect ?

A right Sentence is as opposite to a wrong one, as Motion is to Rest ; and it is as good Sense to say Motion has no such Effect, because Rest has no such Effect ; as to say a right Sentence has no Effect, because a wrong one has not the same.

A right Sentence, is the only Excommunication which Christ hath instituted, and to which alone this Effect belongs ; but it is strange Logic to infer, that this Institution cannot have such an Effect, because something which Christ hath not instituted, hath not the same Effect.

A wrong Sentence is as truly a Breach and Transgression of that Excommunication which Christ hath instituted, as Adultery is a Breach of the seventh Commandment ; it is therefore as absurd to say, that Chastity hath not such an Effect, because Adultery hath not the same Effect, as to affirm that a right Sentence hath not such an Effect, because a Violation of that right Sentence hath not the same Effect. Your Lordship's Argument is this, that the Sentence hath not such an Effect in some Circumstances, because it hath not the same Effect in all Circumstances : Which resolves itself into this Proposition, That nothing can produce any particular Effect, unless it produce the same Effect in all Circumstances.

Your Lordship might as well have called it a Demonstration against all Effects in the World, as against the Effects of spiritual Censures: For there is nothing in the World, no Powers either Natural, Moral, or Political, which produce their Effects but in some supposed right Circumstances; yet this Ecclesiastical Power is demonstrated away by your Lordship, because it does not produce the same Effect in all Circumstances.

Farther; If there is no Effect in a right Sentence of the Church, because there is no Effect in a wrong one; then it will follow, that there is no Effect in either of the Sacraments when rightly received, because they want such Effect in Persons who do not rightly receive them. It may as often happen that the Sacraments are administered in wrong Circumstances, and as void of that Effect for which they were intended, as any wrong Sentence of the Church be pronounced; but does it therefore follow, that there is no Effect in the Sacraments, that they are empty and useless to those who receive them rightly, because they are so to those who receive them otherwise? Your Lordship must either affirm that the Sacraments have no Effect, or that the Opus operatum is always effectual; for if you say they have Effect, though not always, then it is certain that the Sentence of the Church may have Effect, though not always. Whether your Lordship will own the Popish Doctrine of the Opus operatum, or deny the Sacraments to be* Means of Grace, that is, to have any Effect, I cannot tell; but sure I am, if you do not hold one of these Doctrines, you must own the Sacraments to have conditional Effects in supposed Circumstances, which will sufficiently confute your own strict Demonstration, that Excommunication can have no Effect, because it has not in all Circumstances.

Again; I presume it may very justly be said, that the Christian Revelation hath some Effect towards the Salvation of Mankind; but then it hath not this Effect always and in all Cases, it is only effectual upon certain Conditions. Now if Excommunication can have no Effect, because it is not effectual when it is wrongfully pronounced, then the Christian Revelation can have no Effect towards saving those who embrace it as they should, because it has no such Effect on those who embrace it otherwise. The Reason of the Thing is the same in both Cases, and anyone may as justly set forth the Vanity and Insignificancy of the Christian Revelation, because it does not save all its Professors, as your Lordship exposes the Weakness and Vanity of spiritual

* See the Demonstration of the gross and fundamental Errors, in the Plain Account of the Sacrament, &c.

Censures, because they do not absolutely, and in all Cases, throw People out of God's Favour.

I hope I have here said enough, to vindicate the Authority and Effects of the spiritual Punishments of the Church, against all your Lordship has advanced against them.

I shall make an Observation or two more upon this Head, and then proceed to the other Parts of your Answer.

You say, the incestuous Corinthian *was never the more or the less in God's Favour for what was done in the Church. This Doctrine I have already confuted, and shall now only set this Passage in another Light. Let us suppose that you had said, that no Man is more in God's Favour for being rightly baptized by the Church. Now if a Person is not more in God's Favour after he is rightly baptized by the Church, than he was before, then it is certain, that there is no need of Baptism by the Church; for anything is sufficiently proved needless or useless in Religion, if it neither procures nor loses the Favour of God. This is undeniably certain, that if we are not more in the Favour of God for being duly baptized by the Church, than if we were not baptized at all, that then that Baptism is a useless Trifle.

Now this is the Doctrine which your Lordship has taught; for he that says the incestuous Corinthian, though justly turned out of the Church, was neither the more or the less in God's Favour for what was done by the Church; says likewise, that he who is duly baptized into Covenant with God by the Church, is never the more or the less in God's Favour for being duly baptized by the Church. For if it be a mere Trifle, and altogether insignificant to us, as to the Favour of God, to be turned out of the Church, by such an Authority; it must be as mere a Trifle to be admitted into the Church by the same Authority. So that he who declares the one, plainly declares the other: For this is evidently plain, that if nothing be lost as to the Favour of God, by our being duly turned out of the Church, that then nothing is got as to the Favour of God, by our being duly admitted into the Church.

For if our being in the Church was any Step towards God's Favour, or rendered us more acceptable to him, those Degrees of Favour and Acceptance must be certainly lost, by our losing that which was the Cause of them.

He therefore who asserts it is a Trifle to be turned out of the Church, must also assert, that it is as fruitless and trifling a thing to be admitted into the Church. So that all your Lordship's Raillery and Contempt thrown upon human Excommunications, falls as directly upon human Baptisms; and makes them as truly fruitless Trifles without any Advantage, as it makes Excommunication a Trifle without any Punishment.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 43.

This therefore is the Sum of your new Religion, set up out of pure Tenderness to the Laity, to deliver them from the Weight and Burden of Ordinances; this is to be their Support against human Excommunications, human Benedictions, human Baptisms, &c., that whether before or after Baptism, whether before or after Excommunication, they are still the same Children of God.

Again, you say, If it be supposed (as it sometimes is upon this Subject) that a Person behaves himself under the most undeserved Censures, with any degree of Impatience, Pride, or Stubbornness, and that this displeaseth Almighty God; it is plain that he incurs no part of that Displeasure, upon account of the Sentence of Men, but solely upon the account of his own Behaviour; it being his own Behaviour alone, and not the Sentence of Men, which has any such Effect.

Here, my Lord, your Philosophy is upon the stretch, and rather than a Christian Institution should have any Force or Effect, you have let it run such lengths, as to make even the Ten Commandments as mere Trifles as the Sentence of Men.

As for Instance: Suppose a Person should tell a Friend that he had a great liking to some of his Neighbour's Goods, but that the eighth Commandment made him afraid to take them from him; if his Friend were but a Master of your Philosophy, he might soon convince him of the Folly of such a Fear. He might tell him, that if it be supposed (as it sometimes is supposed in this Case) that by his manner of taking Goods from his Neighbour, that he displeaseth Almighty God; it is plain that he incurs no Part of that displeasure upon Account of the Commandment, but solely upon the Account of his own Behaviour; it being his own Behaviour alone, and not the Commandment, which has any such Effect. He might also assure him, that the Commandment itself cannot hurt him, that he is not more or less in God's Favour, for what that Commandment says, but purely for what he himself does.

I now, my Lord, freely submit it to the Judgment of common Sense, whether your profound Philosophy, does not as truly make void and set aside the Force and Effect of the Commandment, as the Effect of Excommunication.

For it is plainly as reasonable to tell a Thief, that the eighth Commandment cannot hurt him; that if he steals, it is not the Commandment, but his own Behaviour alone, which will have any Effect; as to declare, that an impenitent Offender is neither more or less in the Favour of God for what is done by the Church, because even supposing God to be angry at him for his Behaviour towards the Sentence of the Church, yet it is not the Sentence, but his own Behaviour, which causes the Divine Displeasure; therefore the Sentence, says your Lordship, is a Trifle without Effect. And therefore may it also be said, that the eighth Commandment is a Trifle without Effect; for it is as true of the Commandment in this Sense, and your Lordship is as much obliged to say that it is our Behaviour against the Commandment, and not the Commandment itself, which will raise God's Displeasure, as to say it is our Behaviour under the Sentence, and not the Sentence itself, which brings God's Displeasure upon us; so that it is undeniably plain, that if for this reason the Sentence of the Church be a Trifle without any Effect, that for the same reason the Commandment must be equally a Trifle, and equally without any Effect.

And now, my Lord, need we not heed the Commandments, because it is not the Commandments themselves which will have any Effect upon us? Why then are we to be exhorted, and preached up into a Contempt of the Sentence of the Church, because it is not the Sentence itself will have any Effect upon us? Is it safe to sin against the Authority of the Commandment, because it is not the Commandment itself which can punish us? If not, where is the Sense, or Reason, or Christianity of telling us, that we need not heed the Sentence of the Church, because the Sentence itself cannot punish us?

Suppose some High Churchman had writ a Treatise against Stealing, and had carried the Matter so very far, as to talk of the fatal Effect which the eighth Commandment would have upon Offenders, when it should rise up in Judgment and condemn them.

Would your Lordship think yourself obliged in regard to the Liberty of those who want other People's Goods, to tell them, that indeed they ought to take care to act with Sincerity in their acquiring the temporal Things of this Life, that they ought to consider with the utmost Impartiality the Nature of Property, and the Conditions of that Original Contract, which first settled the Rights and Bounds of it, and gave every Man a Right in such or such a Part of the Things of this Life; but that if they should through Impatience of Want, or Pride, or any other Passion or Prejudice, make too free with their Neighbour's Property, and so displease Almighty God; would you think yourself obliged to tell them, that the fatal Effects of the eighth Commandment, and its pretended rising up in Judgment hereafter, is all Sham and Banter; and that however God may be displeased with them, yet that Commandment will have no Effect upon them? Would your Love of Liberty, your Concern for the Laity, engage you to give so much Comfort, and preach such smooth things to such a Class of People?

Thus much may be fairly affirmed, that you might as well deliver such a sort of People from their Fear of the Commandment, as to endeavour to persuade impenitent Offenders not to fear the Sentence of the Church. For as the Guilt of Stealing is aggravated by being contracted against the Authority of the eighth Commandment; so the Guilt of Impenitence is heightened, by a Continuance in it against that Authority in the Church, which is as truly founded by God to prevent the Growth of Sin, as the eighth Commandment was given by God to prevent Stealing. So that he who teaches Offenders to disregard this Sentence, which is authorised by God to awaken and terrify them into Repentance, does the same as if he should teach Thieves to disregard the eighth Commandment, which was given by God to affright People from stealing.

If it should be here objected, that there is a very great difference betwixt the Duty we owe to the eighth Commandment, and our Duty to the Sentence of the Church; because the Commandment is always right and the same, whereas the Church may err in its Sentence.

To this it may be answered, that granting all this, that the Church may sometimes err in its Sentence; yet if it is ever in the right, if it ever can be a fault, or dangerous for Sinners not to submit to, and be corrected by it, this will condemn your Doctrine, which sets it out constantly, and in all Circumstances, as a Dream and Trifle, and without any Effect.

Secondly; Here is no room left for you to plead the Uncertainty of the Church's Sentence, in regard to the Certainty of the Commandment; because you directly set forth your Doctrine in a Case (that of the incestuous Corinthian) where all was right and just, and yet declare that in that Case it was without any Effects; and that if the incestuous Corinthian had continued impenitent under it, and disregarded it as long as he had lived, it had signified no more to him than if it had never been pronounced. And in this Case, my Lord, and upon this Supposition, that the Authority judges and condemns such Sinners as it ought to do, it is as abominable to tell such that they have nothing to fear from the Judgment of the Church, as to tell a Thief that he has nothing to fear from the eighth Commandment. And I here challenge all the Reason which ever appeared against the Doctrines of Christianity, to show me, why it is not as agreeable to the Scripture to declare, that if a Thief lives and dies in his Sins of Stealing, that he has nothing to fear from the eighth Commandment; as to declare that an impenitent Offender, though justly censured by the Authority of the Church, has nothing to fear from such a Censure, though he lives and dies in the Contempt of it.

Thirdly and lastly; Though the Church may sometimes err in its Authority, and the Commandment is always right; yet your Doctrine makes it as reasonable to declare the Commandment without any Effect, as to declare the Sentence of the Church to be without any Effect. For you do not say that Excommunication is a Trifle without any Effect, because it is a Sentence which may sometimes be wrong; but because, though we should displease God under the Sentence of the Church, yet that Displeasure would not have been occasioned by the Sentence, but by our Behaviour alone. And this Doctrine plainly makes all the Commandments as mere Trifles and void of all Effect, as it makes the Sentence of the Church so. For it is as true in your Sense, and you are as much obliged to say, that if we sin against the Commandments, and incur the Displeasure of God, that it is not the Commandments, but our Behaviour alone which causes it: And so the Commandments of God have no more to do with the Favour of God, but are as mere Dreams without any Effect, as the human Excommunications you have so much exposed. This, my Lord, is a very compendious Confutation both of the Law and the Gospel; and is a good reason, why so many of those who have no regard for either, but think Zeal in Religion a Meanness of Spirit, are yet great Zealots for your Lordship's Opinions.

Of Church-Authority, as it relates to external Communion.

YOUR Lordship says, *I know of no Church Authority to oblige Christians to external Communion, nor anything to determine them but their own Consciences. But to show your Desire to be informed, your Lordship frequently calls upon the Learned Committee to declare what the Authority of the Church is. It is something strange, that you should have been so long writing down the Authority of the Church, and yet not know what is meant by

* Answ. to Repr., p. 112.

Church Authority ; that you should take so much pains to oppose (as you say) only absolute Authority, and yet not know whether there be any else, or what Authority you have left in the Church, It is yet something stranger that a Bishop of the Church, should be frightening the Laity from a kind of Church Authority which is not claimed over them, and yet be at the same time pretendedly ignorant of what sort of Church Authority they are under. Here you have been preaching against that, which they are not concerned with ; but when you should tell them what kind of Authority they are concerned with, you have not one word of Instruction ; but call upon the Committee to declare, whether there be any such thing as Church Authority which is not absolute. My Lord, if there be not, to what purpose have you so often taken Refuge in the word Absolute ? Or where is the Honesty or Reason of saying you have not denied all Authority, but only that which is absolute, if you believe there is no Authority but what is absolute ? If therefore your Lordship has made this Distinction with any degree of Sincerity, if you intended anything more by it, than an artful playing with Words ; it plainly lies at your Door to shew what Authority you have not touched ; and that in supposing that which is absolute, you neither have, nor intended to oppose all Authority and Jurisdiction in Matters of Religion. But, instead of this, if the Learned Committee should explain to your Lordship what that Authority is, which is not absolute ; you only venture so far as to say, that if there is any such Authority, you are, for aught that you have said, at liberty to declare for it.* Mighty cautiously expressed, my Lord ! Had a Courtier, who rather intends to amuse than inform, and talk artfully than sincerely, delivered himself in such inconclusive Terms, it had not been much Matter either of Wonder or Complaint. But for a Bishop, who makes Sincerity to be of more worth than all the Christian Religion ; for this Bishop, in a Cause which he declares himself ready to die in ; in such a Cause, as is of the last Consequence to us all, as Men, Christians, and Protestants ; for this Bishop to say, if there be such an Authority, instead of declaring whether there is or not ; and to say, he is at liberty to declare for it, instead of plainly saying whether he ought or not ; however consistent it may be with Sincerity, I am sure it has too much the Appearance of the contrary.

For seeing you are charged with denying all Authority in the Church, if you consulted Plainness and Sincerity, if you regarded the Information of the Vulgar, and the Peace of the Church, which way could these Considerations lead you to defend yourself; but either to shew that there was a real Authority in the Church, which you had not opposed; or else plainly to own that you had denied all Authority, because all Authority of every kind is to be denied? But instead of declaring yourself openly and plainly for the sake of Truth, Peace, and Sincerity, you take Refuge in Words, and secure yourself behind a Cloud of Property's and Absolutely's, to the Disturbance of honest Minds, and to the Satisfaction of the Profane.

Since your Lordship calls out so often to be told what that Authority is which obliges us to external Communion, I shall beg leave to offer these following Considerations upon this Head, and hope they will sufficiently both assert and explain that Church Authority or Obligation, which we are all under to join in external Communion.

Your Lordship says; *I know of no Church Authority to oblige any Christians to external Communion; nor anything to determine them, but their own Consciences. I shall therefore beg leave to observe to your Lordship, what Authority there is to oblige All Christians to external Communion; and to show, that they are no more left at liberty in this Matter, than they are at liberty to steal or murder.

I suppose it is not proper or true, to say, that you know of no Authority to oblige any Christians, or anything to keep them from the Practice of Stealing, but their own Consciences; because there is the express Authority of God against this Practice. Now if it would be improper and false to say this, because the Authority of God has so plainly appeared in it; I shall easily prove, that it is as false and improper to say, that we have nothing but our Consciences to determine us in the Case of external Communion, since the Authority of God is as express in obliging us to this external Communion, as in requiring us to be just and honest in all our Dealings.

I desire no more to be granted me here, than that it is necessary to be a Christian, and that we are called upon by the Authority of God to embrace this Religion as necessary to Salvation. This, my Lord, is the express Doctrine of the Scriptures; so that I hope I may presume upon it, as granted by your Lordship, that there is an Authority to oblige People to be Christians, and that this Authority makes it as necessary, that they should be Christians, as it is necessary to obey God, and conform to his Will.

vation, then we are necessarily obliged to external Communion ; for we can no other way appear to be Christians, either to ourselves or others, but by this external Communion. A Person who lives in a Cloister, may as well be taken for a Field General, as he who is not in external Communion, for a Christian. For the Christian Religion is a Method of Worship distinct from all others, in those Offices and Duties which constitute external Communion ; so that if you are so far obliged to be a Christian, as to serve God differently from other People, you are obliged to external Communion, because that Service which distinguishes the Christian Worshipper from all other People, is such a Service as cannot be performed but in an external Communion in such and such Offices, viz., Professions of Faith, joint Prayers, and the Observance of the Sacraments. External Communion is only another Word for the Profession of Christianity, because the several Duties and Obligations which concern anyone as a Christian, and distinguish him from other People, are Duties which as necessarily imply external Communion, as walking implies Motion. Therefore to ask whether a Christian be obliged to external Communion, is to ask whether a Person who is obliged to walk, be obliged to move. The short is this ; No Man can be a Christian, but by taking upon him the Profession of Christianity ; the Profession of Christianity is nothing else but external Communion with Christians ; therefore it is as necessary to be in external Communion, as to be a Christian.

I hope I need not prove to your Lordship, that there is an Authority to oblige People to the Profession of Christianity ; intending here only to prove, that the same Authority obliges us to external Communion.

Had your Lordship therefore declared to the World, that you know of no Authority to oblige People to be Christians, it had been as innocent and true a Declaration, as this you have made concerning external Communion ; there being plainly the same Authority obliging us to the one, as to the other. For, my Lord, what is implied in external Communion, but our communicating with our Fellow Christians in those Acts of Worship and Divine Service which Christianity requires of us ? And what Marks or Tokens can we shew of our Christianity, but that we are of the Number of those who are baptized into Christ's Church, for the joint Worship of God in that particular Service which the Christian Religion has taught us ? So that if we prove ourselves Christians, we must prove ourselves in this external Communion, because to be a Christian implies no more, than the being of the Number of those who visibly unite and join in such Acts and Offices of Divine Worship, as are proper to Christians. If therefore there be no Authority to oblige us to external Communion, then no one is obliged to be a Christian.

Secondly ; If there be no Authority to oblige, or anything to determine Christians to external Communion but their own Consciences, then it is plain, it is as lawful for all Christians to be their own Priests, and confine themselves to a private Worship separate from every Christian in the World, as to join in external Communion. For where there is no Authority or Obligation to determine our Practice, there the thing must needs be indifferent ; and to do it or let it alone, must be equally lawful. If there was no Authority which obliged us to be baptized, it would not only be lawful to let it alone, but idle to trouble our Heads about it. The same is true of this external Communion ; if we are under no Law concerning it, it is no part of our Duty either to do it, or let it alone.

It cannot here be said, that though we are not obliged to external Communion with this or that Church, yet we ought to join with some particular Persons, and not worship God constantly by ourselves, and perform no Offices with other People. For if we are obliged to communicate with any one Person in the World, we are to hold Communion with the whole Church of Christ. For we are not obliged to communicate with this or that particular Person on account of any Civil or Natural Relation, but as we are Christians, and from the Common Nature of our Christianity. Since therefore our Obligation to communicate with any particular Persons, does not arise from any private particular Relation, but from the common Nature of our Religion ; this does equally oblige us to hold Communion with all Christians, as with any particular Christians, they being all equally related to us as Christians ; and consequently it is as necessary to hold Communion with the external visible Church, as with any particular Christian. From this also it is plain, that it is as lawful to avoid Communion with every particular Christian in the World, as to refuse Communion with any sound Part of the Church on Earth.

I beg of your Lordship to produce but one Argument, why any two or three should meet together for the Service of God, which will not equally prove it necessary that Christians should join in external Communion. May it all be laid aside, my Lord ? Need there be any more of this assembling ourselves together for performing of Duties, which we thought we could not perform separately ?

I have shown in my second Letter, that your Lordship cannot consistently with your Principles, urge any Reasons to any Dis-senters to come over to the Church of England ; and here, my Lord, it will appear, that you have not one Argument against the Absenters from all Public Worship. For it would be as odd and unreasonable in your Lordship to offer any Argument to such an Absenter, why he should join in some Public Worship, after you have denied an Authority which obliges us to external Communion, as it would be for an Atheist who had denied the Necessity of any Religion, to persuade a Man to be a sincere Mahometan.

If your Lordship should tell this Absenter from all Communion, that he ought to join with some Communion or other in the Worship of God; might he not fairly ask your Lordship, how you came to tell the World that you know of no Authority to oblige any Christians, or anything to determine them to external Communion? Can anyone be obliged to join in Divine Service, who is not obliged to external Communion? Could anyone imagine that if he was not obliged to join in external Communion, that it was not lawful to stay at home? Could he think that when your Lordship was declaring against any Obligation to Church Communion, that you meant he ought to join himself with some of the Dissenters? Had your Lordship plainly declared, that no Christian need read any Book in the World, could you consistently with yourself offer any Arguments why he should read the Bible? Yet this is as consistent, as to desire any Person to communicate with any Body of Christians, after you have plainly disowned any Obligation to external Communion.

For whatever Arguments your Lordship can offer to an Absenter from all Public Worship, may be answered in this manner. 'Either your Arguments for my joining with any Christians are invented by yourself, and of your own making, or they are not; if they are Fictions of your Lordship's, and destitute of any Foundation in the Will or Authority of God, then they are vain and to no Purpose; but that all such Arguments are mere Fictions and Inventions of your own, is plain from your Lordship's express Declaration, that you knew of no Authority, or anything to oblige or determine Christians to external Communion; so that all the Arguments you can offer for my external Communion, are declared by yourself to be such as are of no Authority, or have anything in them to determine me to external Communion.'

And indeed, had your Lordship first declared that there was no such thing as Figure in Bodies, and then pretended to prove that the World is round, it would be no more miraculous, than first to give out, that no Christians are obliged to external Communion, and afterwards take upon you to persuade anyone to join himself to some Body of Christians. Here therefore your Lordship has so preached up and advanced this Kingdom of Christ, that consistently with yourself, you cannot so much as require anyone to be a visible Member of it, or offer the least Shadow of an Argument, why an Absenter should rather go to some Church, than trust to his own Religion at home. Your Lordship wrote a Treatise some Years ago on the Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England. But pray, my Lord, where is the Reasonableness of conforming, if we are under no Obligation to conform? Where is the Reasonableness of doing that, which is not our Duty to do? Where can be the Reasonableness of going two or three Miles to Church for the sake of external Communion, if there be no Authority, or anything to determine us to external Communion? Can it be reasonable to spend our Time and some Part of our Wealth in making up such Meetings, as God has not required at our Hands?

Your Lordship must either therefore retract what you have said, and allow that there is an Authority to oblige us to external Communion, or acknowledge that no Christians are under any Obligations to serve God in any Communion, but may confine themselves to a private Religion, separate from every other Christian in the World. That is, that no one is obliged to worship God in the public Assembly, or join with anyone else in the Service of God.

Thirdly; If there be no Authority to oblige us to external Communion, then it may well be questioned, how your Lordship can answer for your joining in external Communion in the Church of England. Your Lordship knows that the Communion of the Church of England, gives great Offence to the Papist and Protestant Dissenters of all kinds; how then can your Lordship justify your doing that, which you need not do, which gives so much Scandal to so many tender Consciences?

Will your Lordship be of a Church, though it is this very Church Communion that is so very offensive? Your Lordship knows that the Animosities and Church Divisions amongst Christians is one of the most sore Evils under the Sun; that all the Party Heats and Controversies are concerning whom we are to communicate with, and in Defence of particular external Communions. Now, my Lord, what should that Christian do, who is all Sincerity, who believes there is no Obligation to external Communion, and who sees that the pretended Necessity of it, causes all the Difference and Division amongst Christians? Can that sincere Person who believes and knows all this, keep at the Head of a particular Communion? Can he support so unnecessary, so needless an Evil? Can that sincere Person be a Bishop in that Communion, which stands distinguished from other external Communions, chiefly as it is episcopal Communion, when he allows there is no Necessity of being in Communion either with Bishops or anybody else? Could that Pope be reckoned sincere, who should declare that he knew of no Authority, or anything to determine him to exercise the papal Powers, could he be a sincere Christian, if he yet continued to exercise them to the Scandal and Offence of so many Christian Countries? If he could, so might your Lordship for continuing at the Head of an external Communion, which divides and disturbs Christians, though you know of no Authority to oblige, or anything to determine you to this external Communion.

Surely your Lordship will have more Compassion at last for your dissenting Brethren, more Concern for the Peace of Christ's Kingdom, than to keep up such unnecessary Communions, and disturb so many weak Consciences, by joining externally in the Church of England, when you know of no Authority, or anything to oblige you to join with any Body.

Suppose the Peace of Great Britain was miserably destroyed by Party Rage and Dispute about the Stars. Would your Lordship head one Party of Star-gazers against another? Would you join yourself to such a vain and useless Cause at the Expense of the public Peace? Now, my Lord, if there be nothing to oblige us to external Communion, it is all a Trifle, and mere Star-gazing; and a Person who appears in the Cause, and at the Head of this external Communion, can be no more a Friend to Christianity, by keeping up such an unnecessary Cause of Division, than he could be a good Subject, who should join in the needless idle Quarrels of Star-gazing Party-men. In a Word, if your Lordship knows of anything that obliges you to continue in the Church of England, you ought not to have said that you know of no Authority to oblige, or anything to determine any Christian to external Communion: But if you know of nothing that obliges you to continue in the Church of England, then you ought rather to leave it, than to bear a part in so needless a Community, and which gives so much Offence to all those who dislike the Terms of it.

Fourthly; If there be no Authority to oblige us to external Communion, how comes there to be such a Sin as Schism? How comes the Schismatic, or Divider of Communions, to be so frequently in the Scriptures ranked amongst the most guilty Offenders?

Can it be a Sin to be divided, unless we are under some Obligation to be united?

It has been always granted that Schism is the Separation of ourselves from such a Communion of Christians, as we ought to have held Communion with. Now if separate Worship from any Christians in the World be the Sin of Schism, then there must be some Law that obliges those Schismatics to join with those Christians, from whom they separate, and consequently there is an Authority which obliges Christians to external Communion.

Your Lordship must either shew that Schism does not consist in refusing to communicate with some Christians, or that though it be the damnable Sin of Schism to refuse Communion with some Christians, yet there is no Authority to oblige us to external Communion with any Christians, i.e., that though Schism be a Sin, yet it is the Transgression of no Law.

The Apostle says, Mark those who cause Divisions contrary to the Traditions which ye have learned of me, and avoid them. My Lord, what strange Language is this, if there is nothing to oblige us to external Communion? If there is no Obligation to be united, why must they be marked who cause Divisions? If there be no Authority that requires external Communion at our Hands, why must those Persons be avoided who prevent external Communion?

Either the Apostle, or your Lordship must be mightily mistaken; the Apostle tells us that Divisions in the Church are contrary to the Doctrine which he had taught, and therefore there is the express Authority of the Apostle to oblige us to external Communion. But your Lordship says there is no Authority to oblige us to this Duty, therefore you must either maintain that the Apostle taught no such Doctrine, though he said he had, or that there is no Authority in his Doctrine to oblige us.

I suppose, my Lord, that the Apostle by Divisions here means external visible Divisions, because he bids them mark those who cause them, and avoid them; for invisible internal Divisions can no more be marked, or invisible Schismatics avoided, than we can mark People's Thoughts, or lock out a Spirit. If therefore the Division here spoken of be external Division, then the Sin here condemned is a Breach of external Communion, and consequently we are here required by the Apostle to join in external Communion; unless we can suppose, that the Apostle could condemn those who were externally divided, without meaning that they ought to be externally united.

Fifthly; If there be no Authority to oblige us to external Communion, then there is no Authority to oblige us to be baptized. For Baptism is an external visible Ordinance of God, which as plainly implies external Communion with others, as any Contract in the World implies Correspondence with others. And any Person might as well be obliged to bargain and merchandise with others, without being obliged to be concerned with others, as be obliged to be baptized, without being obliged to external Communion.

For as we cannot baptize ourselves, this shows that the Christian Religion is not suited to the State of single independent Persons, but requires our external Communion to the Performance of its Obligations. And as we cannot be baptized by others, but by resigning up ourselves to the Observance of new Laws, this plainly proves that the Person is baptized into a State of Society and external Communion. That Baptism does not leave the baptized Person to a separate independent Worship, is very plain from the following Instances.

The Church of England, in the Office for Baptism, thus expresses herself: We receive this Person into the Congregation of Christ's Flock, &c. Again, Seeing now—This Person is regenerated and grafted into the Body of Christ's Church, &c. I should think it very plain, my Lord, to every Reader, that these Passages show that Baptism necessarily implies external Communion, and puts it out of the Power of every baptized Person to refuse external Communion, unless he will break through the Conditions of his Baptism. For can we be received into the Congregation of Christ's Flock, without being obliged to keep up this Congregation, or to perform any Duties or Offices considered as a Congregation or Flock? Can we in any Sense be considered as a Congregation or a Flock, but in our Communion in those Offices which shew us to be Christ's Flock? Can we be said to be grafted into the Body of Christ's Church, if we are at liberty never to meet as a Church, or act as a Church?

The Apostle says, *For by one Spirit we are all baptized into one Body. What can more manifestly denote external Communion, than this Account of Baptism? Can we be baptized into one Body, and not be obliged to act as a Body? Can we act as a Body, by running away from one another, and refusing to unite in that Service, into which we are baptized? I suppose we are here to be considered as a Christian Body; but how a Number of People can be a Christian Body, who are not united in Christian Worship, is hard to conceive.

When therefore you declare that you know of no Authority to oblige Christians to external Communion, you desert the Doctrines of Christ, as plainly as if you said, that you know of no Authority which obliges People to be baptized.

Sixthly; If there be no Authority to oblige, nor anything to determine us to external Communion, then there is no Authority to oblige, nor anything to determine us to communicate in the blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. For if there is any Law which obliges us to join externally in the Observance of this Institution, then it is out of all doubt, that we are obliged to external Communion. Now if you will say that there is no Law of God as to this Matter, then the thing itself must needs be indifferent, and private Mass must be allowed to be as right and lawful, as a joint Communion in the Holy Sacrament. Either therefore you must defend private Mass, or show some Authority against it; if you can produce any Authority against it, then you produce an Authority for external Communion, and contradict your other Declaration, where you give out, that you do not know of anything to determine us to external Communion.

From all this it plainly appears, what kind of Authority that is, which obliges us to external Communion; it is that same Authority which obliges us to be baptized, to receive the Communion, to profess the same Faith, to worship God in the public Assemblies, and to avoid the Sin of Schism; or, in a word, that same Authority which obliges us to be Christians.

For all the Offices of Christian Worship and Devotion which constitute external Communion, are everyone expressly required by God; and therefore external Communion, which consists only of these Offices, is equally required by God.

And this Authority may be very justly called Church Authority, because it arises from the very Nature of the Church, because it is the Institution of the Church, from whence this Obligation to Communion ariseth. For Christ has instituted this Church, in order to oblige Mankind to enter into it for the Salvation of their Souls: As the Church therefore is instituted for this End, the Existence of the Church lays an Obligation upon all, who have any Opportunity, of entering into it; and this Obligation will last as long as the Church of Christ shall last. The short is this; God has instituted an Order or Society of People, for the particular manner of serving and worshipping him; this Society is not a voluntary one, which we may be Members of, or not, as we please; but it carries, in its very Nature and Institution, an Authority obliging us all, as we hope for Happiness, to be Members of it; we are obliged to be of the Church, because Christ has instituted the Church; therefore it is the Institution of the Church, which lays us under an Obligation of entering into it; and this, and no other, is that Church Authority which obliges all People to external Communion.

Farther; This may be very properly called Church Authority, because it was in the Church, or that Order of Men, which Christ had instituted, before the Scriptures were written.

When there was only this Order of Men, before the Writings of the New Testament were in being, there was then this Authority arising from that instituted Order of Men, which obliged others to enter into Communion with them; therefore this Authority which began with the Existence of the Church, and flowed from the very Nature of the Church, may very justly be called Church Authority.

If it should be asked, whether this Authority be absolute? I answer, it is just as absolute, as that Authority which obliges us to be baptized. Our Saviour has told us, that if we are not baptized, we shall be damned: Here therefore is an Authority for Baptism; the Scripture has not said whether this be so absolutely obliging, that there is no room in any Case for a Dispensation; therefore it is no Case which concerns us. Now the Authority which obliges us to external Communion, is just upon the same Terms; the thing is as plainly required as Baptism; but whether in any Cases it will be dispensed with, is what we have nothing to do with. If there be any Sincerity, any Weakness, any Ignorance, or the Want of anything which will excuse those who refuse to be baptized, those same Considerations may excuse the Refusal of external Communion with the Church.

This, my Lord, is the Nature of that Church Authority, which obliges to external Communion; it is that very same Authority which obliges us to the Profession of Christianity, or to enter into Covenant with God. For he who is in external Communion with the Church of Christ, is of the Church of Christ, or in Covenant with God; and he who is not in external Communion, is not of the Church of Christ, nor in Covenant with God; and consequently it is that same Authority which obliges us to be Christians, or in Covenant with God, which obliges us to external Communion.

So that when you say, you know of no Church Authority to oblige, or anything to determine People to external Communion, it is directly saying, that you know of no Church Authority to oblige, or anything to determine them to the Profession of Christianity, or to enter into Covenant with God.

If your Lordship should here say, that you only meant, you know of no human Authority to oblige People to external Communion, &c.

To this it may be answered, that you might as well have meant nothing at all by it, as have meant this. For,

First; Suppose the Question had been, whether there be any Authority, or what Authority it is, which obliges People to be baptized? and that in order to settle this Point, you had here declared, that you know of no Church Authority to oblige, or anything to determine them to be baptized, but their own Consciences.

Could it be thought, my Lord, after this, that you had not denied all Authority for Baptism? Could it be supposed, that by this Declaration, you only meant to deny, that the Authority which obliges us to be baptized, is Human or Civil Authority? Could anyone who only meant thus much, express himself in this manner?

Yet thus it is, that you have expressed yourself in the Dispute concerning our Obligations to external Communion, you know of no Church Authority to oblige, or anything to determine People to it; which makes it equally absurd to suppose, that you only deny that our Obligation to external Communion arises from any human or civil Authority.

Secondly; If you only meant to deny an human or civil Authority in this Matter, how came you not to say so? How came you not to tell us what Divine or Scripture Authority there is to oblige us? Is it not as proper and as necessary in a Dispute about this Authority, to declare the true and right Authority, as to protest against the wrong Authority? But indeed nothing can be more trifling than to say, that you have only denied any human or civil Authority in this Matter.

For, my Lord, whoever imagined that our Obligations to profess Christianity, that is, to be Members of Christ's Church, could proceed from any human Authority? Human Authority may and ought to encourage us in the Practice of our Christian Duties; but that our Obligation to serve God as Christians, that is, in the external Communion of the Church, should arise from any human Authority, can be supposed by none, but those who imagine Christianity to be a Creature of the State.

Thirdly; You not only say that you know of no Church Authority to oblige, but also add these Words, nor anything to determine People to external Communion, but their own Consciences.

Now, my Lord, if you only meant to deny a human Authority in this Matter; if you intended to own a Divine Authority to oblige us to external Communion; how come you to express yourself thus contrary to your Meaning? For if you believe there is a Scripture or Divine Authority which obliges us to external Communion, surely this Authority is something, and has some Right to determine us to external Communion; yet you expressly say that you do not know of anything to determine Christians to external Communion.

If it was asked, whether Christians are obliged to pray for their Enemies, and you should answer, I do not know any thing to determine them to pray for their Enemies; would it not be Nonsense, and Contradiction after this Declaration, to suppose, that you acknowledge that the Scriptures require Christians to pray for their Enemies?

But to suppose, that you acknowledge a Divine or Scripture Authority which obliges to external Communion, after you have expressly declared that you do not know of anything to determine us to external Communion, is equally contradictory.

Lastly; You say you do not know of anything to determine Christians to external Communion, but their own Consciences.

Now this farther shews, that you deny all Divine as well as Human Authority to determine us to external Communion. For if there was a Divine Law which required this Practice, we are no more left solely to our own Consciences in this Practice, than if it was determined by an express human Law.

For can it be said that the Jews had nothing but their own Consciences to determine them to abstain from Blood? Can it be said that Christians have nothing but their own Consciences to determine them to receive the Holy Sacrament? If this cannot be said, because there is a Divine Law in both these Cases; then it is as false and absurd to say, that there is nothing but our own Consciences to determine us to external Communion, if there be a Divine Authority which requires this Practice. And consequently, you have plainly denied all Divine or Scripture Authority for external Communion, when you say that you do not know of anything to determine People to external Communion, but their own Consciences. The short is this; if you will say, that you own a Divine and Scripture Authority which obliges us to external Communion; and if you will allow this Authority to be something, then your Contradiction in this Matter, is as palpable and gross as ever appeared in any Writings; for you have expressly said, that you do not know of anything to determine us to external Communion: But if you own a Scripture Authority that obliges us to external Communion, then your Contradiction proceeds thus, that you do know of something, but you do not know of anything to determine us to external Communion. If you will not assert both Parts of this Contradiction, then you must stand to that which you have asserted, viz., that you do not know of anything to determine us to external Communion, which I have already shown, is the same thing as declaring, you know of no Authority, or anything to determine People to profess Christianity, or enter into Covenant with God. But to proceed,

If you should say that you do not deny an Authority that obliges us to external Communion in General, but only an Authority that can oblige us to any particular external Communion.

To this I answer, that this is a groundless, false Distinction ; for our Obligation to external Communion with the Church of Christ in general, and our Obligation to external Communion with this or that particular Church, is exactly one and the same Obligation.

For we are not obliged to join with this or that particular Church, for any private, particular Reasons, but because we are obliged to be Christians, or of the Church of Christ. And as no sound Part of Christ's Church, is more his Church than another sound part, so if we separate from any sound part, we are as truly out of Christ's Church, as if we had separated from every part. And we can give no Reasons for separating from such a part, but such as will equally justify our separating from every part of Christ's Church ; and consequently there can be no Reasons offered why we should be Christians, or of the Church of Christ, but will equally oblige us to enter into that particular part of Christ's Church which offers itself to us. For the whole Intent of entering into this or that particular Church, is only to be a Christian, or of the Church of Christ, and therefore it must be one and the same Authority which obliges us to be Christians, that obliges us also to be of any particular Church.

There is a Scripture Authority which obliges us to forgive our Enemies : Now it would be as proper to say, that though there is an Authority which obliges us to forgive our Enemies in general, yet that Authority does not oblige us to forgive our particular Enemies, as to say, that though we are obliged to be of the Church of Christ in general, yet we are not obliged to be of this or that particular part of Christ's Church.

For the Church of Christ in general, as truly consists of these particular Parts, as our Enemies in general, consist of our particular Enemies.

So that, as it is one and the same Authority which obliges us to forgive our Enemies, that obliges us to forgive our particular Enemies, for it is one and the same Authority that obliges us to be Christians, that obliges us also to communicate with that particular sound part of Christ's Church where we live.

There is therefore no room for this Distinction, to suppose, that though we may be obliged to be of Christ's Church, yet we are not obliged to be of this or that particular sound part of Christ's Church ; it being fully as absurd, as to suppose that we may be obliged to be Christians, and yet not be obliged to be Christians.

When therefore you declare, that you know of no Church Authority to oblige, or anything to determine us to external Communion, it will be to no purpose to say, that you do not mean Communion with the Church of Christ in general, but only with any particular part of Christ's Church; for I have shown that this Distinction is false, and fully as absurd, as to imagine, that we may be obliged to obey Christ's Commands in general, but not be obliged to obey his particular Commands.

From what has been said upon this Subject, these following Propositions are plainly true :

First; That as our entering into any particular part of the Church, implies our entering into the Church of Christ, or in other Words, our embracing Christianity; it evidently follows, that the same Authority which requires us to embrace Christianity, requires us also to enter into that sound part of Christ's Church where we live.

Secondly; That this Authority does not arise from any human Laws, or the Power which any Men in what Station soever have over others, but is the Authority of God, who has instituted this Church, in order to oblige all Mankind to enter into it.

Thirdly; That this Authority from God, may be very properly called Church Authority, because God manifested this Authority to the World by the Institution of the Church, because it began with the Church, and flowed from its very Nature; Mankind being therefore obliged to enter into this Church, because there was such a Church instituted by God.

Fourthly; That this Account does not in the least make it either unjust or improper, in our spiritual or temporal Governors, to make Laws for our Conformity to this or that part of Christ's Church; for though the Authority which makes it necessary that we should enter into such a part of Christ's Church, is from God, yet this no more excludes our Governors from requiring the same thing by their Laws, than they are excluded from requiring us to observe any moral Duties, because the same moral Duties are made necessary by the Authority of God. And as our Violation of any moral Duties that are commanded, both by Divine and Human Laws, receives an higher Aggravation, so the Guilt of opposing any sound part of Christ's Church is enhanced, by our breaking through the Laws both of God and Man.

Fifthly; From this Account of the Authority which obliges us to external Communion, it will be very easy to discover the Weakness and Fallacy of several of your Lordship's Arguments upon this Matter.

Thus when you say, *It is evident that there is no Choice of Judgment left to Christians, where there is a superior Authority to oblige them ;—that in Italy, or Spain, or France, they are as much obliged by the Church Authority in Italy, Spain, or France, as Christians in England are obliged to a particular external Communion in England, by any human Authority, as such, in England.

Now, my Lord, what could you have thought of less to the Purpose, than these Words thus put together? For does any one say, that our Obligation to be of the Church of England, arises from any human Authority, as such, in England? No, my Lord, if human Authority should not only desert the Church, but make the severest Laws against it, yet we should be still under the same Necessity of communicating with it; because that Necessity is independent of human Laws, is founded upon the Authority of God, and constantly obliges in the same Degree, let the Laws of the State be what they will.

Granting therefore, my Lord, that the human Authority, as such, in France or Spain, obliges the People of those Kingdoms to conform to those Churches, as truly as the Laws of England oblige the People of England to conform to the Church of England. What follows? Does it follow that therefore the People of France or Spain are as truly obliged to Communion with the Church in those Kingdoms, as the People of England are obliged to Communion with the Church in England? No, this will by no means follow; for since we should hold the same Necessity of joining with the Episcopal Church in England, though all the human Laws in England should forbid us; since we allow only an accidental and conditional Authority in human Laws as they establish any particular Religion, it follows, that in France and Spain, &c., they ought to pay the same regard to human Laws, and no more continue in their Church because it is established, than we ought to leave our Church though it was persecuted. The short is this:

The Church Authority which obliges us to external Communion with any particular part of Christ's Church, is that same divine Authority which calls upon us to be baptized, and enter into Covenant with God.

Now if human Laws, whether of Church or State, strike in with this Authority, then they oblige us, as they do in other Cases, where they require us to do that, which the Laws of God required before; but if human Laws, whether of Church or State, require us to enter into such a Communion, as hath not the Authority of Christ for it, or forbid our joining with such a Communion as is a true part of Christ's Church, such Laws are no more to be observed, than if they had established Idolatry, or forbid the Worship of the true God. For human Laws are not supposed to make it our Duty to enter into such a Communion, but are applied as proper means to induce us to do that, which the Laws of God had made it our Duty to do before. And it is undeniably true, that though there should be ever so many human Laws to command us to enter into any particular Communion, that we must not comply with such Laws, unless it be in regard to such a Communion, as it was our Duty to enter into, though no such human Laws were in being.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 115.

So that human Laws create no Necessity of external Communion, any more than they create the Necessity of praying to God; but they may be applied as very proper means to induce People to perform the Duty of external Communion, and to perform the Duty of Prayer to God.

The Question therefore in any Country is not this, whether the Laws either of their Church or State require us to enter into such a Communion, but whether it be such a Communion, as it would be our Duty to enter into, were there no human Laws to enjoin it, whether it be a part of Christ's Church, which we are obliged to enter into on Pain of everlasting Damnation.

When therefore you say, if the People of England are obliged by an human Authority, as such, to enter into the Church of England, then the People of France, Spain and Italy, are as truly obliged by the human Authority there to enter into those particular Communion; you say exceedingly true, but to no more purpose, than if you had made the following Declaration.

If the People of England are obliged to enter into Communion with the Church of England by any Military Authority, as such; then the People of France, Spain, and Italy, are obliged to Communion with the Churches in Spain, France, and Italy, by the Military Authority, as such, in Spain, France, and Italy.

This, my Lord, is as much to the Purpose as what you have said; for our Obligation to enter into a particular Part of Christ's Church, is no more founded in any human Laws, as such, than in any Military Authority, as such; but is founded in the Will of God, who has instituted the Church on Earth, and made our Salvation depend upon our Entrance into it. This is the Authority which obliges, this is the Necessity which lies upon us, to enter into any Part of Christ's Church.

If therefore you would show, that in Spain, or France, &c., they are under the same Necessity of being of the Church in those Kingdoms, which the People of England are of being Members of the Episcopal Church in England; you ought to show that the Established Church in Spain, or in France, is as truly a sound Part of the Church of Christ, as the Established Church in England is a sound Part of the Church of Christ; and that the way of Worship there, is as certainly that necessary Method of Salvation which Christ has instituted, as the way of Worship in the Church of England, is that necessary Method of Salvation which Christ has instituted.

For this is the only Authority or Necessity, which obliges us to enter into any Church in any Part of the World; namely, a Necessity of being Christians, by entering into that Church which Christ has instituted; so that if this same Church be in Spain, and France, and England, then there is an equal Necessity of being of the Church in each Kingdom; but if the Church in Spain be not the Church which Christ has instituted, and the Church in England be that Church which Christ has instituted, then there is as great a Necessity of refusing to communicate with the Church in Spain, as of joining in Communion with the Church of England.

This therefore being the Nature of the Authority or Necessity which obliges to external Communion, nothing can be more trifling, than to argue from the Necessity of complying with the Church in one Kingdom, to a Necessity of complying with the Church in all other Kingdoms; unless you could demonstrate, that because the Established Church in one Kingdom is the true Church of Christ, therefore the Established Church in every other Kingdom is the true Church of Christ.

Yet your Lordship has spent a great many Pages, in declaiming against any Authority or Necessity which can oblige People to communicate with the Church of England; because then there would be the same Necessity that the People of Spain, and France, and Italy, should communicate with the Church in those Kingdoms. But I hope the most ordinary Reader will be able to tell your Lordship, that there is no more good Sense, much less Divinity, in this way of instructing the World, than if you had said, there is no Necessity that the People of England should believe things which are true, because then the People of Spain will be under the same Necessity of believing things which are false; and again, that there is no Necessity that in this Kingdom we should comply with good Laws, because in other Kingdoms People will be under the same Necessity of complying with wicked Laws.

But to conclude this Point; I have here stated the Nature of that Authority or Necessity which obliges us to external Communion, that it does not arise from the Laws of any Men, whether in Church or State, but from the Will and Authority of Christ, who has instituted such external Communion, as a necessary Method of Salvation.

I have shown also, that human Laws, though they, as such, do not create a Necessity of external Communion, yet they have a very proper Significancy, and are as useful in this Matter, as in any other Parts of our Duty.

Of Sincerity and Private Judgment.

IF you should here say, that by denying the Necessity of external Communion to arise from human Laws, as such, I have resolved the Choice of a particular Communion into private Judgment.

To this I answer ;

First ; That by entering into any particular Communion, we are to understand the same thing as entering into the Church of Christ, or embracing the Religion which Christ has instituted.

Secondly ; That when Christ came into the World, People were left to their choice, whether they would embrace Christianity.

Thirdly ; That Christianity is still upon the same Terms with Mankind, and it is still left to everyone's private Judgment, whether he will comply with the Terms of Salvation.

Fourthly ; That this does not destroy the Force and Obligations of Authority, or make it without any Effect upon the Condition of Men. For it does by no means follow, that there is no Authority, or that there are no Effects to be feared from such Authority, because Men may disown it if they please. For to say there is nothing in Authority, that it is insignificant and without any Effect upon the Condition of Men, if they may use their private Judgments, is as ridiculous as to say, there is nothing in the Happiness of Heaven, or Torments of Hell, that they can have no Effect upon the Condition of Men, because Men may judge of these things as they please.

Fifthly ; There is a Choice of Judgment left to us in every Part of our Duty ;

Whether we will believe a God,
 Whether we will worship him,
 Whether we will believe in Jesus Christ,
 Whether we will acknowledge a World to come,
 Whether we will believe there is such a Place as Hell.

And now, my Lord, is there no Authority for these things, because we are not forced to believe them against our Judgments? Have those who refused to believe in Christ, nothing to fear from his Authority, because he appealed to their Reason, and left them to determine for themselves? Is there no Authority for the Torments of Hell, or nothing to be feared from that Authority, by those who deny there is any such Place.

Now if there can be an Authority in these Matters, though the Use of private Judgment is allowed in these same Matters, if this Authority will condemn those who acted contrary to it; then it is certain, that there may be an Authority or Necessity which obliges us to be of such a particular Religion, though the Exercise of our private Judgment is allowed in the Choice of our Religion; and that we may have as much to fear from acting contrary to such Authority, though by following our own Opinions, as they have who act contrary to the Will of God in any other Respect, though by following their own Opinions.

So that an Authority or Necessity which obliges us to be of this or that particular Communion, that is, particular Religion, is as consistent with the Exercise of private Judgment, as the Necessity of believing a God, and worshipping him, is consistent with the Exercise of our private Judgment.

And if you will say, there is an end of all Authority, if Men may choose one Communion before another; you must also say, that if Men might consider whether they should follow Christ, then there was an end of all Authority in Christ over them.

And again; If Men may reason and consider whether there be a God, or Providence, then there is an end of all Necessity of believing either a God, or Providence.

If they may consider whether the Scriptures are the Word of God, or any particular Doctrines be contained in Scripture, then there is an end of all Necessity of believing the Scriptures to be the Word of God, or of believing any particular Doctrines to be contained in Scripture.

If they may consider and examine whether any particular Religion comes from God, then there is an end of all Necessity of receiving any particular Religion from God.

All this Reasoning is full as just, as to conclude that there is an end of all Authority to oblige People to any particular Communion, if they may consider the Excellency of one Communion above another, which is what you over and over declare.

Now, my Lord, let us suppose that the Question was, Whether it be necessary to believe the Scriptures to be the Word of God? Would it not become every honest Man, not only to assert this Necessity, but to show wherein it is founded, and explain to every one that Authority, which calls upon us to receive the Scriptures as the Word of God, and which will rise up in Judgment against us, if neglected.

And what might we not justly think of him, who, instead of showing the Authority or Necessity which obliges us to receive the Scriptures as the Word of God, should deliver himself in this manner.

‘ You are reasoning whether there be any Authority or Necessity which obliges you to receive the Scriptures as the Word of God. ‘ Whereas your very Reasoning upon this Matter, shows there is ‘ no Necessity or Authority to which you are obliged to submit. ‘ For since you are allowed to reason and enquire whether this ‘ be necessary, it is certain, there is an end of all Authority or ‘ Necessity, to oblige you to receive the Scriptures as the Word ‘ of God; and if you do but sincerely follow your own private ‘ Persuasions, you are entitled to the same Degrees of God’s ‘ Favour, whether you receive the Scriptures as his Word or ‘ not.’

Now, my Lord, thus it is that you have instructed the World, in relation to the Authority which obliges us to external Communion.

The Question is, Whether there be any Authority which obliges us to any particular external Communion?

Now, my Lord, what has anyone to do in this Dispute, but to show whether Christ has instituted external Communion, or not? For on this alone must the Necessity of it depend. And if it appears that external Communion be instituted by our Saviour as a Method of Salvation, then it will follow, that we are under a Necessity, as we hope for Salvation, of being in that particular Method or Manner of external Communion, which Christ has instituted; so that unless it can be shown, that all pretended Christian Communions, are as truly that Method, or particular Communion which Christ has instituted, as any other Communion is; it must be as necessary to be in some one particular Communion, as it is necessary to obey Christ; and as dangerous to join in some other Communions, as it is dangerous to despise his Authority.

But now your Lordship, instead of considering what external Communion is instituted, and what Necessity arises from such Institution, or where we may find such external Communion, amongst the many pretended Christian Communions, has wholly passed over this Point, and determined the Question, by telling us, that since we are allowed the Use of our Reason in the Choice of Religion, it matters not what Authority we oppose, either of God or Man, and that there can be no Necessity of our being of any particular Communion, but where our private Judgment sincerely directs us.

Thus you say; *If the Excellency of one Communion above another may be regarded, then there is an End of all human Authority to oblige us to one particular external Communion. And to show that you can as easily destroy all Divine Authority or Necessity of any particular Communion, or Religion, you tell us, that our Title to God's Favour cannot depend upon our actual being or continuing in any particular Method, but upon our real Sincerity.† So that here the Sincerity of private Judgment as effectually destroys all divine Authority and Necessity of any particular Communion or Religion, as it destroys that which is human; and we are rendered as happy and as high in the Favour of God, for breaking his Laws, as if we had observed them.

For here it is proved, that there is no Necessity of any particular Communion or Religion, not because there is none instituted by God, but because, whether instituted or not, our sincere Persuasion will equally justify us, whether it complies with or opposes such Institution.

But to proceed.

I shall now show, how this Doctrine of yours of Sincerity exposes all the Terms of Salvation as delivered in Scripture.

In the Scripture we find that Baptism is made a Term of Salvation; but if Sincerity without Baptism be as certain a Title to the Favour of God, as Sincerity with Baptism, then it is plain, that not to be baptized, is as much a Condition or Term of Salvation, as Baptism is a Term of Salvation. For, if Baptism with Sincerity was more a Term or Condition of God's Favour, than no Baptism with Sincerity, then it is certain that it is not Sincerity alone that procures the Favour of God: And it is as certain, that if Sincerity alone procures us the Favour of God, then Baptism is no more a Term of Salvation, than the Refusal of Baptism is a Term of Salvation. So that this Doctrine makes Baptism, and the Refusal of Baptism, either equally Terms, or equally no Terms of Salvation; equally advantageous, or equally insignificant.

When therefore our Blessed Saviour says, that except we are baptized we cannot enter into the Kingdom of God,‡ and he that is not baptized shall be damned; according to this Doctrine of yours, we may also say just the contrary, that except we refuse Baptism we cannot enter into the Kingdom of God; and he that is baptized shall be damned.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 115.

† Preserv., p. 90.

‡ Job iii. 3.

This, my Lord, is very shocking; but I shall easily show that these Assertions are as proper and as just, as the contrary Assertions, if your Doctrine of Sincerity be right.

For, since your Doctrine puts the sincere Acceptance, and the sincere Refusal of Baptism, upon the same Foot as to the Favour of God, there can be no more Danger in sincerely refusing Baptism, than in sincerely accepting of Baptism. Now if there is no more Danger in the one Practice than in the other, it must be plain to the most ordinary Understanding, that it is as just and proper to declare one Practice dangerous as the other; that is, it must be as proper to say, he that is baptized shall be damm'd, as to say, he that is not baptized shall be damm'd.

Now I know your Lordship cannot, upon these Principles, show, that it is more dangerous to refuse Baptism sincerely, than to receive Baptism sincerely; and so long as this is granted, you must allow that it is as just to fix danger upon Baptism itself, as upon the want of Baptism. And consequently, all your Reasonings upon this Subject are one continued Censure upon our Blessed Saviour's Doctrine in relation to Baptism, which according to your Notions, is only as just and proper, as the quite contrary would have been.

Again, our Saviour tells us, that *except we eat the Flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his Blood, we have no Life in us.

Here we see, the eating the Flesh and drinking the Blood of the Son of Man is an instituted Term of Salvation, and insisted upon by our Saviour; but if your Doctrine be true, we may as well declare the contrary to be a Term of Salvation, and say, except we sincerely refuse to eat the Flesh and drink the Blood of the Son of Man, we have no Life in us.

For, my Lord, if Sincerity in refusing to eat this Flesh, be the same Title to God's Favour that the eating of it with Sincerity is, it is plain, there is no more Advantage in eating, than in not eating; and consequently it is as well to say, that except we forbear eating the Flesh of the Son of Man we have no Life in us, as to say, that except we eat the Flesh of the Son of Man we have no Life in us; there being plainly from this Doctrine, no more Danger in forbearing to eat, than in eating; nor any more Necessity of eating, than of forbearing to eat, since both these Practices are equally good and advantageous with Sincerity, and equally bad and insignificant without it.

And now, my Lord, let the World judge, whether you could have thought of a Doctrine more contradictory to the express Words of our Saviour, and all the instituted Terms of Salvation, than this of yours about Sincerity, which makes it no more necessary to observe the instituted Terms of Salvation, than to break them; and which also makes it as proper, to declare it as dangerous to observe such Institutions, as to reject them. This I have shown particularly in Baptism, where your Doctrine makes it as proper to say, he that is baptized shall be damned, as to say, that he who is not baptized shall be damned; and in the same manner does it contradict and confound the Scriptures, and make the contrary to every Institution as much a Means of Salvation, as the Institution itself.

Your Lordship has given us a Demonstration, as you call it, that your Doctrine of Sincerity and private Persuasion is right.

Thus you ask: What is it that justified the Protestants — in setting up their own Bishops? Was it, that the Popish Doctrines were actually corrupt, or that the Protestants were persuaded in their own Consciences, that they were so? The latter without doubt. And then comes your Demonstration, in this manner; *take away from them this Persuasion, and they are so far from being justified, that they are condemned for their Departure; give them this Persuasion again, they are condemned if they do not separate.

You want to be shown the Fallacy in this Demonstration, which I hope I shall show to your Satisfaction.

It is granted, that Corruption in Religion is no Justification of those who leave it, unless they are persuaded of that Corruption.

It is also granted, that they who are fully persuaded that a Religion is sinful, are obliged to separate from it, though it should not be sinful. But then it does by no means follow, that they who leave a true Religion, and they who leave a false Religion, through their particular Persuasions, are equally justified, or have an equal Title to the same Degree of God's Favour.

Here lies the great Fallacy in this Argument, that you use the same Word (viz., justified) in relation to both these People in the very same Sense; whereas if they are justified (if this Word must be used) it is in a very different Sense and different Measure, and they are not entitled to the same Degree of God's Favour. Now, a Fallacy in this Point destroys the whole Demonstration, for the Question wholly turns upon this Point, Whether they who are sincere in a true Religion, and they who are sincere in a false Religion, are equally justified and entitled to the same Degrees of God's Favour?

This very Thing was objected to you by the learned Committee, who said, *that an erroneous Conscience was never, till now, allowed wholly to justify Men in their Errors.

To which you have no better Answer to make than this, That it must either justify them, or not justify them. It must either wholly justify them, or not justify them at all.†

My Lord, I suppose a Man is justified by his living soberly, righteously, and godlily in this present World. I ask therefore, Does his living soberly justify him wholly, or does it not justify him at all? If it justifies him wholly, then there is no occasion of his living righteously and godlily; if it does not justify him at all, then there is no need of his living soberly.

Your Answer to the Committee has just as much Sense or Divinity in it, as there is in this Argument.

Here I must desire, that it may be observed, that the Question is not, Whether Sincerity in any Religion, does not recommend us to the Favour of God? But whether we are entitled to the same Degrees of God's Favour, whether we are sincere in a true or false way of Worship?

I shall therefore farther consider this Point.

First; If true and right Religion hath anything in its own Nature to recommend us to God, then Sincerity in this true and right Religion must recommend us more to God, than Sincerity in a false and wrong Religion; because we have a Recommendation from our Religion, as well as from our Sincerity in it. For instance, if it be in any Degree in the World more acceptable to God, that we should follow Christ, than Mahomet, our Sincerity in following Christ, must recommend us to just so much more of God's Favour, than our Sincerity in following Mahomet; as it is more acceptable to him that we should follow one than the other. Now to say that true and right Religion, has nothing in its own Nature to recommend us to God, is saying, that things true and right are no more acceptable to God, than things false and wrong; but as it would be Blasphemy to say this, so it is very little less, to say, that Sincerity in a false and wrong Religion, is just the same Justification or Recommendation to the Favour of God, that Sincerity in the true and right Religion is.

Farther; The whole End and Design of Religion, is to recommend us to the Favour of God. If therefore we can suppose a Religion instituted by God, which does no more, as such, recommend us to the Favour of God, than a Religion invented by Men or Devils, as such, recommends us to the Favour of God; then we must also suppose, that God has instituted a Religion, which does not at all answer the general End and Design of Religion, viz., the recommending us to the Favour of God.

* Repr., p. 7.

Unless therefore we will profanely declare, that God has instituted a Religion, which, as such, does us no Service, nor any better promotes the general End of Religion, than any corrupt Inventions of Men, we must affirm, that Sincerity in his Religion will entitle us to greater Degrees of his Favour, than Sincerity in a Religion not from Him.

Secondly; If there be any real Excellency or Goodness in one Religion, which is not in another, then it is certain, that Sincerity does not equally justify us in any Religion; and on the contrary, it is as certain, that if Sincerity in any Religion does entitle us to the same Degrees of God's Favour, then there is no such thing as any real Excellency or Goodness in one Religion, which is not in another.

When you are charged with destroying all Difference between Religions, by this Account of Sincerity, you retreat to an Answer as weak as could possibly have been thought of. Thus you say; *What I said about private Persuasion, relates to the Justification of the Man before God, and not to the Excellency of one Communion above another, which it leaves just as it found it.

Here, my Lord, you suppose that one Religion may very much exceed another Religion in Goodness and Excellency, and yet that this Goodness and Excellency has nothing to do with the Justification of Persons; for you say, you were not speaking of the Excellency of one Communion above another, but of what relates to the Justification of a Man, &c., which plainly shows, that you do not allow the Excellency of Religion to have anything to do with the Justification of Men; for if you did, it must have been necessary to speak of the Excellency of one Religion above another, when you were speaking of what it is which justifies a Man before God.

Now, my Lord, to grant that there is an Excellency and Goodness in some Religion, and yet exclude this excellent and good Religion, from having any more in it to justify and recommend us to the Favour of God, than what is to be found in any other Religion less excellent; is just as good Sense, as to allow, that some Food is much more excellent and proper than other Food; and yet exclude this most excellent proper Food, from having anything in it to preserve Health and Strength, more than in any other Food.

For the Goodness and Excellency of Religion, is as truly a relative Goodness and Excellency, as the Goodness and Excellency of Food is a relative Goodness and Excellency. And as that Food can only be said to be better than another Food, because it has a better Effect upon the Body than any other Food; so that Religion can only be said to be better than another, because it raises us higher in the Favour of God than any other Religion.

* Answ. to Repr., p. 113.

It is therefore most certain, that if any one Religion can be said to be better than another, it must be, because one Religion may be of more Advantage to us than another.

For as Religion in general is good, because it does us good, and brings us into Favour with God; so the particular Excellency and Goodness of any Religion, must consist in this, that it does us a more particular Good, and raises us to higher Degrees of God's Favour, than a less excellent Religion would have done.

So that when your Lordship talks of the Excellency of one Religion above another, as having nothing in it, as such, to recommend us to higher Degrees of God's Favour, or effect our Justification; it is full as absurd, as to say, that though one kind of Learning may be more excellent than another kind of Learning, yet no Men are more excellent or valuable, for having one kind of Learning rather than another.

For as no kind of Learning can be said to be peculiarly excellent, but because it gives some peculiar Excellency to those who are Masters of it; so no kind of Religion can be said to be more excellent than another, unless those who profess it, reap some Advantage from it, which is not to be had from a Religion less excellent.

From all this it appears, first, that there can be no such thing as any Goodness or Excellency in one Religion above another, but as it procures a peculiar Good and Advantage to those who profess it.

Secondly; That your Lordship can allow no other Goodness or Excellency in Religion, even from your own express Words, but what implies as great an Absurdity, as to allow of good Food, good Learning, or good Advice, which can do nobody any good at all.

For since you expressly exclude the Goodness or Excellency of any Religion, from having any part in recommending us to the Favour of God, and will only allow it to carry us so far, as Sincerity in a worse Religion will carry us; it is certain, that this good and excellent Religion, is just as good as that, which does us no good at all.

So that whether you will yet own that you have destroyed all the difference betwixt Religions, or not, I cannot tell; yet I imagine, everyone will see that you have only left such a Good- ness in one Religion above another, as can do nobody any good at all.

The short is this; If you will own there is no Excellency in one Religion above another, then you are guilty of making Christianity no better than Mahometanism; but if you will acknowledge a Goodness and Excellency in one Religion above another, and yet contend that it is Sincerity alone, which does us any Good, or recommends us to the Favour of God, in all Religions alike, this is as absurd, as to say, such a thing is much better for us than any other thing, and yet assert, that any other thing will do us as much good as that.

I have, I hope, sufficiently confuted your Doctrine of Sincerity, from the Nature of Religion. I shall now, in a word or two, examine it farther, by considering the Nature of Private Persuasion, which can do all these mighty things.

And, first, I deny that Persuasion was the only thing which justified the Protestants, or which recommends People to the Favour of God in the Choice of a Religion; and that, because if their private Persuasion was founded in Pride, Prejudice, worldly Interest, or anything, but the real Truth, and the Justice of the Cause, that their private Persuasion did not justify them before God; nor had they, upon this Supposition, so good a Title to his Favour, as those who did not reform.

If you say, that Persons cannot be sincere in their Persuasions, who are influenced by Pride, or Prejudice, or any false Motive: To this I answer;

First; That according to your own Principles, that Man is to be esteemed sincere, who thinks himself to be sincere. For, as it is a first Principle with you, that a Man is justified in point of Religion, not because he observes what in its own Nature is true and right Religion, but because he observes that which he thinks to be true and right Religion; so according to this Principle, a Man is to be accounted sincere, not because he acts up to true and just Principles of Sincerity, but because he thinks in his own Mind, that he does act up to such just and true Principles of Sincerity. So that, my Lord, Sincerity it seems is as truly a private Persuasion, as Religion is a private Persuasion; and therefore anyone may as easily think himself truly sincere, and yet not have true Sincerity, as he may think himself in the true Religion, and yet not be in the true Religion.

Unless therefore you will maintain, that a Person who is mistaken in his Sincerity, and mistaken in his Religion too, who hath neither true Religion, or true Sincerity, hath as good a Title to the Favour of God as he who is truly sincere, and in a true Religion, you must give up this Cause of Sincerity. For it is demonstrable from your own Principles, that anyone may as often happen to be mistaken in his Sincerity, and take that for Sincerity which is not Sincerity, as he may be mistaken in his Religion, and take that for Religion which is not Religion.

And consequently it is as reasonable to talk of sincere Persons who are influenced by wrong Motives, as to talk of Persons being justified in Religion, who live in a false Religion.

So that, my Lord, this is the Result of your Doctrine, that Persons neither truly sincere, nor in the true Religion, are yet entitled to the same Degrees of God's Favour, with those who are truly sincere in the true Religion.

The short is this, according to a Maxim of your own, you are obliged to acknowledge that Man to be sincere, who thinks himself to be sincere; because you say a Man is to be esteemed Religious, not because he practices true Religion, but because he thinks he practices true Religion; therefore you must say, that a Man is sincere, not because he is truly sincere, but because he thinks himself to be sincere.

It is also as possible and as likely for a Man to be mistaken in those things which constitute true Sincerity, as in those things which constitute true Religion.

And therefore if this Sincerity be the only and the same Title to God's Favour in any Religion, it follows, that Sincerity, though influenced by false Motives, and in a false way of Worship, is as acceptable to God, as a sincere Persuasion governed by right Motives, in a true and instituted way of Worship.

So that all the fine things which you have said of Sincerity, as implying in it all which is rational and excellent, are come to nothing; and you are as strictly obliged to allow that Man to be sincere, who mistakes the Grounds and Principles of true Sincerity, because he thinks himself to be sincere, as to allow that Person to be justified in his Religion, who mistakes the true Religion, because he thinks himself in the true Religion.

So that it is not Sincerity, as it contains all that is rational and excellent which alone justifies, but as it may be an idle, vain, whimsical Persuasion, in which People think themselves in the right. This Persuasion, though founded in the Follies, Passions, and Prejudices of human Nature, consecrates every Way of Worship, and makes the Man thus persuaded as acceptable to God, as he who through a right use of his Reason, serves God in that Method which he has instituted.

I shall end this Point with only this Observation, that however hearty a Friend you may be to the Christian Religion yourself, this I dare say, that the heartiest Enemy it has, will thank you for thus defending it. And they who with all the Distinctions betwixt Religions confounded, and maintain that we have nothing to hope or fear but from our own Persuasions, are the only Persons who can call you their proper Defender.

Of the Reformation.

I PROCEED now, in a Word or two, to show, that the Necessity of Communion with any particular Church, and the Effects of Excommunication, are perfectly consistent with the Principles of the Reformation.

You say, *If there be a Church Authority to oblige People to external Communion,——I beg to know, How can the Reformation itself be justified?——For there was then an Order of Churchmen, vested with all spiritual Authority;——there was therefore a Church Authority to oblige Christians, a Power of some over others. What was it therefore to which we owe this very Church of England?

To this it may be answered,

First ; That this Argument proceeds upon a false Supposition, namely, that it is the Laws of any Men, which obliges us to external Communion. Which I have already shown to be as false, as to suppose that it is the Laws of any Men which obliges us to be Christians.

Secondly ; That there may be a real and a great Authority which obliges us to external Communion, though this Authority be not founded in any human Laws ; for there is as real and apparent an Authority for Baptism and the Supper of the Lord, and other Parts of external Communion, as if they were the express Matter of any human Laws.

Thirdly ; That the Laws of Men in this Affair of Religion, are of the same Obligation and Force that they are in other Matters. If they command Things indifferent, they are to be obeyed for the Authority of the Command ; if they enjoin Things in their own Nature good, the Necessity of Obedience is greater ; but if they command Things unlawful, we are not to comply, but obey God rather than Man.

Fourthly ; The Question therefore at the Reformation was not, Whether the Laws of the Pope or the Prince were on the side of the Church of Rome ? But whether that Faith and those Institutions which constitute the Christian Religion, were with the Reformers, or with the Papists. For the Church Authority which obliged them then, and which obliges now to external Communion, was not an Authority which obliged them to comply with any number of Bishops, or any State Laws, but to enter into Communion with that Bishop or Bishops, who observed that way of Worship which Christ had instituted. The Necessity of being in external Communion, does not oblige us to be in Communion with the Pope or any Number of Bishops as such, whose Authority we may happen to be born under; but it obliges us to be in that Communion, which is that Way or Method of Salvation which Christ has instituted.

So that though we should grant, that at the Reformation we broke through the human Laws of the Church, which required us to continue in Communion with the Church of Rome, it will by no means follow, that we broke through that Authority which obliges us to external Communion, because that Authority is not founded in any human Laws, but is the Authority of Christ, requiring us to observe all those things which constitute external Communion. For as it is the Authority of Christ which obliges us to be Christians, so that same Authority obliges us to enter into that Communion, where the Institutions and Faith of Christ are preserved.

When therefore you say, if Church Authority (meaning human Laws) be a sufficient Obligation upon them to determine them, then our Forefathers ought not in Conscience to have separated from the Church of Rome :*

This, my Lord, is no more to the Purpose, than if you had said, if the King of France has a Right to be obeyed all over Europe, then all over Europe they ought in Conscience to obey him.

For since it is neither pretended, nor allowed, that human Laws are a sufficient Obligation to external Communion, to argue from this Supposition is as foreign to the Purpose, as to suppose that the King of France was Governor of all Europe.

The next Step you take is also very extraordinary, where having rejected human Authority from being a sufficient Obligation to external Communion, you thus proceed, But if Men are their own Judges by the Laws of God and of Christ in this Matter ; if they have a Right to use their Judgment, and be determined by it ;—then here is a Justification of the Reformation, and particularly of the Protestant Church of England.†

The most complaisant Justification, my Lord, that could possibly have been thought of, because it as peculiarly justifies all the Enemies of the Church of England, of what kind soever, as it justifies the Protestant Church of England.

For your Argument proceeds thus ; if there be no human Authority to which we are absolutely obliged to submit, but have a Right to use our own Judgments, then the Reformation is justified. Here we see the Doctrines of the reformed Church are not taken into the Question ; she is not said to be justified, as being a true Church, or as preserving those Orders and Institutions, which constitute the true Church ; but is justified, because Men may use their Reason, and not enter into any Communion which human Laws have happened to establish. Now if we of the Church of England are justified in the Choice of our Religion, because no human Laws have an absolute Power to oblige us to be of any particular Religion, then all People, whether Papists or Protestants, whether Quakers, Ranters, Jews, Turks, and Infidels, are equally justified in the Choice of their particular Ways of Worship, because human Laws have not an absolute Power to oblige them to be of any particular Religion. So that though you call this a Justification of the Protestant Church of England, you might as justly have called it a Justification of Quakers, Jews, Turks, and Infidels: For it is as truly a Justification of every one of them, as it is a Justification of the Church of England.

But to proceed.

How comes it, my Lord, that the Reformation is justified, because People may use their Reason, and are not under a Necessity from human Laws of being of this or that Church? Why must the Reformation be right and just, because human Laws are not sufficient to hinder a Reformation. Is there no other Authority that can make any particular Religion necessary, because human Authority cannot? May it not be our Duty to be of this Communion, and a Sin to enter into another Communion, though human Laws as such cannot make the one a Duty, or the other a Sin? Does Baptism, the Supper of the Lord, and a Belief in Jesus Christ, cease to be necessary, because that necessity does not arise from human Laws?

Now if Things may be necessary to Salvation, though they are not made so by human Authority, then it is no Justification of the Reformation to say, that the Reformers might use their Reason, and not choose that Religion which human Laws commanded them to choose ; this will be no Justification, till it appears, that they chose that Religion which the Authority of God required them to choose.

For it would be Nonsense to say, People are justified for having such a sort of Baptism, because the Necessity of Baptism does not arise from human Laws. Yet this is as good Sense, as to say, such a People are justified in their Religion, because no Religion is made necessary by human Laws. For as they are only justified in Point of Baptism, who observe such Baptism, as the Authority of God has appointed, so are they only justified in their Religion, who enter into that Religion which the Authority of God has instituted.

But your Lordship has no sooner shown that human Authority, as such, cannot oblige us to be of any particular Religion, but you presently congratulate your Readers upon an entire Freedom from all Authority in Religion, and without once mentioning that the Reformation is right and just, because of the Orders, Doctrines or Institutions, which it maintains; you say it is justified for such a Reason, as justifies in an equal Degree every Religion, and every Change of Religion in the World. You have so far justified it, as to show that it is as well to be of it, as of any other Church, and as well to be of any other Church as of it.

Who would not think, my Lord, that the instituted Terms of Salvation had something to do with the Justification of Christians? Yet you can justify People without any regard to them. Who would not think that a Religion is unjustifiable, if it is contrary to the Religion instituted by Christ? Yet your Lordship has justified all Changes in Religion, without any regard to the Institutions of Christ solely for this Reason, because Men may use their own Judgment, and not submit to the Laws of Men, as such, in the Choice of Religion. As if, because they are not to be altogether governed by the Commands of Men in the Choice of a Religion, neither are they to be determined by the Authority of God, or any more tied down to his Institutions, than to human Laws. Who would think that no Change in Religion is dangerous, because Religion is only instituted by God, and has his Authority to make it necessary? Yet your Lordship banishes all Danger from every Change of Religion, and pronounces the same Safety in every Opinion, because People are under no absolute human Authority.

It is very surprising, after all this, to see your Lordship breaking out into passionate Expressions for the Cause of the Reformation, and so often declaring, that it is for the sake of the Reformation that you have taken so much Pains, and with so much Pleasure, in your late Writings.

Now it seems, your Adversaries have undermined the very Foundations of the reformed Church of England; and that in this Manner.

First; They justify the Church of England, by showing that it maintains all those Orders, Institutions, and Doctrines, which Christ has made necessary to Salvation; that it is a true Church, because it consists of all those Things, which by the Institution of Christ constitute a true Church.

For this, your Lordship rebukes them as Enemies to the Reformation, as Friends to Popery; and declares that the Protestants are not justified because they have chosen a true and right Religion, but because they think they have chosen a true and right Religion.

Again, your Adversaries insist upon the Necessity of entering into Communion with the Church of England, because it is a true Church of Christ; and declare those guilty of the heinous Sin of Schism, who separate from her Communion.

Here again you condemn them, as conspiring the Ruin of the Reformation, because if the Dissenters are not justified in their Separation from the Church of England by their private Persuasion, neither is the Church of England to be justified for its Separation from Rome. So that the Difference between your Lordship and your Adversaries, in relation to the Reformed Church of England is this.

They support and recommend this Church, because it contains all the necessary Doctrines and Institutions of Christ, and consequently give it an Advantage over every other way of Worship, which is either corrupted or defective, in these Doctrines and Institutions of Christ.

But you support and recommend it (pardon the Expressions) not from anything which relates to it at all, but from private Persuasion; and consequently allow every Religion in the World to be as just, and good, and safe, if Men are but so persuaded.

They defend the Church of England, by showing what it is, and by asserting the Truth of its Doctrines.

You have no Title to be mentioned amongst its Defenders, but as you may be called a Defender of Quakers and Fanatics, Jews and Turks, and every Religion in the World, which any one thinks to be right.

To proceed; As a farther Defence of the Reformation, you ask, How did the first Reformers behave themselves? Did they not think and speak of them (viz., Absolution and Excommunication) as having nothing to do with the Favour of God, as human Engines, and mere Outcries of human Terror? And did they mean by this to claim to themselves the Right of Absolution, which they had denied to others, because they were fallible and weak Men; or to assert a Power of Excommunication, so as to affect Men's eternal Salvation, to themselves in one Church, which *they had disregarded and trampled upon in another? No: They treated all Excommunications as alike, and upon an equal foot; and could upon no other Account neglect and disregard them as they did, but because God had not given to any Man the Disposal of his Mercy or Anger.

The Argument, my Lord, here proceeds thus: First; That all Absolutions and Excommunications must have been esteemed alike, and equally insignificant by our Reformers, because they were not terrified at the Excommunications of the Church of Rome, nor thought an Absolution from that Church necessary.

Secondly; That the Reformers having thus disregarded these Powers in that Church, ought not to pretend, that the same Powers have any more Effect when they exercise them in this Church.

To this it may be answered, that if we ought not to pretend to any Effects in Absolution or Excommunication, because we disregarded those Powers as exercised by the Church of Rome; that then we ought not to pretend the Necessity of any Faith, because we disregarded the Faith of the Romish Church; nor the Necessity of any Sacraments, nor the Necessity of the Canonical Writings, because we disregarded the Canonical Books of the Church of Rome. And it is as good Sense to cry out here, 'Did they not treat their Sacraments as mere Inventions of Men? Did they mean by this to claim to themselves a Power to make Sacraments necessary in one Church, which Power they had trampled upon in another? Did they deny the Necessity of seven Sacraments there, in order to assert the Necessity of two Sacraments here? No: They treated all Sacraments as alike, and upon an equal foot with respect to God's Favour, and could upon no other Account neglect and disregard them as they did, but because God's Favour or Displeasure was no ways affected by any Sacraments.'

Here let common Sense judge, whether this Argument of yours, showing the Unreasonableness of pretending to any Significancy in Excommunication, because we disregarded the Excommunication of the Church of Rome, does not prove it as unreasonable to insist upon the Necessity of any Faith, or any Sacraments, or any Canonical Books, because we denied the Romish Creed, the Romish Sacraments, and Canon of Scripture?

For our Reformers no more intended to show that Excommunication was a Dream and Trifle, because they disregarded the Excommunication of the Church of Rome, than they intended to show that all Sacraments, all Faith, and all Scripture, were Dreams and Trifles, by their not owning either the Sacraments, or the Creed, or the Canon of the Church of Rome. And, my Lord, what a worthy Defender of Christianity and the Reformation would he be, who should ask us what we mean by the Necessity of Sacraments, or Faith, or Scripture, since we have not allowed the Necessity either of the Romish Sacraments, Faith, or Scripture? Yet such a Defender is your Lordship, who contends that we ought to reject Excommunication as a Trifle and Dream, because we disregarded the Excommunication of the Church of Rome.

* Answ. to Repr., pp. 121, 122.

I have now gone as far in the Examination of your Doctrines, as my present Design will allow me, and am apt to think that in this and my former Letters, I have gone so far, as to show, that a few more such Defences of Christianity and the Reformation, as you have given us, would complete their Ruin, as far as human Writings can complete it.

And had you meant ever so much harm to Christianity and the Reformation, I believe no one who wishes their Confusion, would have thought you could have taken a better way to obtain that End, than by writing as you have lately written.

For he must be a very Bitter Enemy to them both, who would not think it sufficient to set Christianity and Mahometanism, the Reformation and Quakerism, upon the same foot.

And he must be very slow of Apprehension, who does not see that to be plainly done, by resolving all into private Persuasion, and making Sincerity in every Religion, whether true or false, the same Title to the same Degrees of God's Favour.

I shall not with your Lordship make any Declarations about my own Sincerity; I am content to leave that to God, and to let all the World pass what Judgment they please about it.

I am, Your Lordship's

Most Humble Servant,

William Law.

Postscript.

THE Learned Committee observed to your Lordship, that an erroneous Conscience was never, till now, allowed wholly to justify Men in their Errors.

This Observation I have shown to be true and just, as it implies, that though Sincerity in an erroneous way of Worship should in some degree or other recommend Men to the Favour or Mercy of God, yet it is not that entire Recommendation to his Favour, which is effected by our sincere Obedience in the true way of Salvation: That is, though it should justify them in some degree, yet it cannot justify them in that degree, in which they are justified, who sincerely serve God, in that true Religion which he himself has instituted.

Now our Justification, as it is effected by the Merits of Christ, is in one and the same degree; but as our Justification is effected by our own Behaviour, it is as capable of different degrees, as our Virtue and Holiness is capable of different degrees; and it is also necessary that our Justification be more or less, according as our Holiness is more or less.

Yet in answer to this Observation of the Learned Committee, you say, it must either justify them, or not justify them; it must either justify them wholly, or not justify them at all. This, my Lord, is as contrary to the Scripture, as it is to the Observation of the Committee. For our blessed Saviour, speaking of the Publican, says, *I tell you, this Man went down to his House justified, rather than the other.

Here, my Lord, is as plain a Declaration of Degrees in Justification, as can well be made, so far as Justification can be effected by our own Behaviour.

For, it is plain, the Publican was not wholly justified, because then there would be no need of his embracing Christianity; it is also plain, that he was justified in part, or else he could not be said to be justified rather than the Pharisee.

If therefore your Answer confutes the Observation of the Learned Committee, it must also confute this Passage of Scripture. I shall only add one word in relation to another Point.

I have already shown the Falseness and evil Tendency of your Argument against Excommunication, which you asserted to be a Dream and Trifle without any Effect, because it is our own Behaviour alone which can signify anything to us with regard to the Favour of God. Now, my Lord, this Philosophy strikes at the very Vitals of the Christian Religion: For, if this Sentence can have no Effect, if it is a Dream and Trifle, because it is our Behaviour alone on which the Favour of God depends; then how shall we account for these Passages of Scripture, which attribute our Justification to the Merits and Death of Christ. As thus;

* Luke xviii. 10, &c.

*Jesus Christ, who gave himself for our sins;

In whom we have Redemption through his Blood;†

Being justified by his Blood, we shall be saved from wrath.‡

It is the constant, uniform Doctrine of Scripture, that our Reconciliation and Peace with God, our Justification and Sanctification before God, is owing to the Merits and Death of Christ. But if what you have said be true, that it is our Behaviour alone, which procures the Favour of God, then the Blood of Christ must be as truly without any Effect, as Excommunication is without any Effect.

For if the Favour of God depends entirely upon our Behaviour alone, then it can depend upon nothing else; and if it depend upon nothing else, then everything else is equally trifling and without any Effect as to that Purpose; and consequently every Passage in Scripture which ascribes our Acceptance with God to the Merits and Blood of Christ, is as much condemned by your Doctrine, as the Effects of Excommunication are condemned by it.

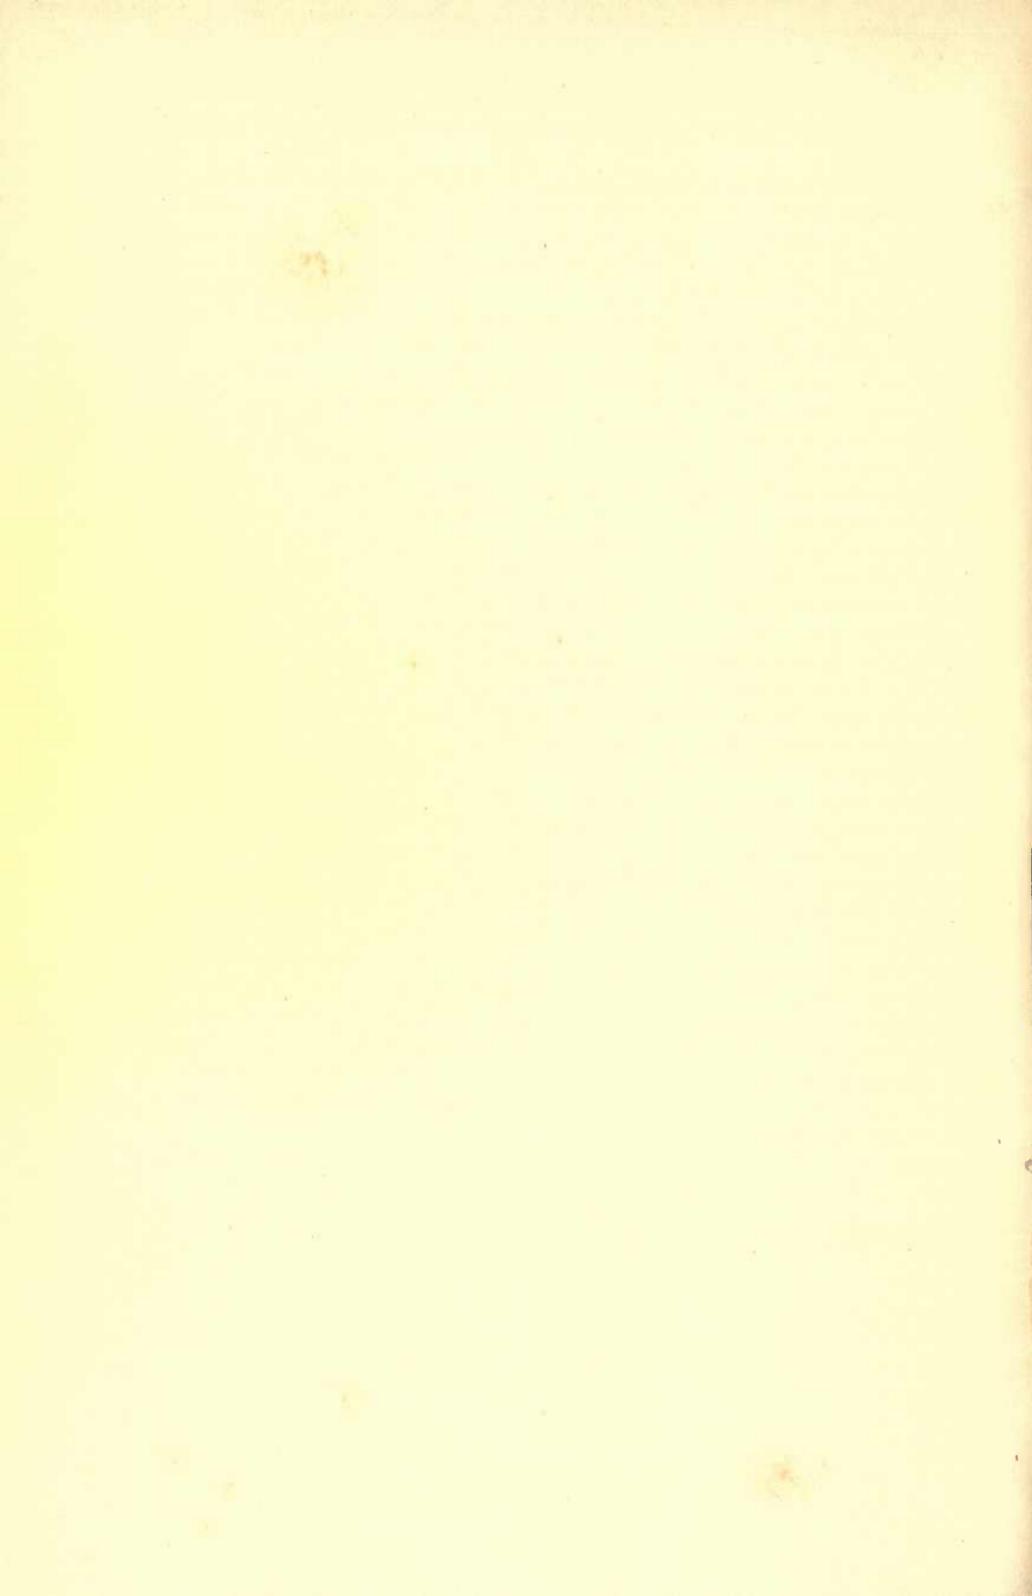

Whether your Lordship did not perceive the Inconsistency of this Doctrine, with that Satisfaction and Redemption which the Scriptures teach; or whether you knowingly intended to oppose this Doctrine, is, what I shall leave to everyone's own Judgment. Thus much I shall only say, that as you have here directly contradicted this first Principle of the Christian Religion, if it is not what you intended, I hope you will, for the sake of Christianity, venture to declare, that though you have asserted, that it is our Behaviour alone, yet it is not our Behaviour alone, but more particularly the Merits and Death of Christ, which recommends us to the Favour of God.

I. Remarks upon 'The Fable of the Bees.'

WILLIAM LAW'S second publication was, like his first, of a controversial nature, although his opponent was a very different personage from Doctor Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor; of whom a few very general particulars should have been given in the previous volume; which omission is now supplied, by way of brief digression, here. Benjamin Hoadly was born in the year 1676; educated at Catherine College, Cambridge; Bishop of Bangor in 1715, which See he held at the breaking out of the Bangorian Controversy, to which William Law's three Letters—written between the years 1717-1719, when he was about thirty-one years of age—are considered to have been the most important contribution. His Lordship was translated successively to the Sees of Hereford, Salisbury and Winchester; and of the last See he was Diocesan for above twenty-six years. He died in the year 1761, aged 85 years, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral.

BERNARD DE MANDEVILLE, who was William Law's second opponent, was of Dutch extraction, a Native of Holland and an Author of a very temporary and unenviable kind of celebrity. Having graduated in Medicine at one of the Continental Universities he came to London, where he practised his profession; but does not appear to have been held in much repute by medical men. He therefore wrote a Satire upon them, which appears to have passed unnoticed. In the year 1714, when he was about forty-four years of age, he published a Poem entitled 'The Grumbling Hive; or Knaves turned Honest,' setting forth a Hive of Bees who having by dishonest practices acquired wealth and luxury agreed to abandon them and to 'turn honest,' which reduced them to poverty; and occasioned their grumbling—in prose and verse of a very lame and doggerel kind. In this effusion, Mandeville not only ridicules the expediency of being Honest as the best Policy—a treatment perhaps which that time-honoured but most worldly-wise maxim well merits—but entirely rejects 'virtue' and 'reason,' affirming that man like the brutes, is governed by mere instincts and passions. He enlarged and republished this work in the year 1723, with the Title of 'The Fable of the Bees; or Private Vices, Public 'Benefits'—when it achieved the notoriety of being 'presented' by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, as dangerous to Religion and Order. William Law also 'presented' the book in a very masterly manner in his 'Remarks' upon it; which he wrote the same year and published early in the year 1724. Mandeville attempted to vindicate his 'philosophy' in the London Journal in August, 1723; when William Law had written, ready for the press, as far as page 45 of this volume; and this 'Vindication' occasioned further strictures from that Writer.

Of Mandeville's later life, little is known. He is said to have resided in obscure lodgings; and to have written in the London Journal as a Medical Man, in favour of the use of spirituous liquors—for which he was well paid by the Distillers. He died in January, 1733, aged 63 years.

The French Writer, PIERRE BAYLE, upon whose works William Law in a Postscript makes 'an Observation or two,' is probably known to some readers as the Compiler of the 'Critical Dictionary' and otherwise, as a voluminous and rather unedifying writer. He died 'of a decay of the lungs, after he had been 'writing the greatest part of the day'—wrote himself to death, poor man!—in the year 1706.

The 'Remarks upon the Fable of the Bees' is Law's earliest work which has been republished in later times. This was done in the year 1844 under the Editorship of MR. MAURICE upon the suggestion of JOHN STERLING, who described Law's 'Remarks' as one of the most remarkable philosophical Essays he had ever seen in English: of which the first Section 'has all the 'highest beauty of' Law's 'polemical compositions, and a weight 'of pithy right reason such as fills one's heart with joy. I have 'never seen in our language the elementary ground of a rational 'ideal philosophy as opposed to empiricism, stated in nearly the 'same clearness, simplicity and force.' In MR. MAURICE'S re-issue Mandeville's Fable is also partly included—a course almost as impracticable here, as it would be to recite all the arguments of the Bangorian Controversy. Readers of William Law's Works scarcely need to be reminded that he always renders full justice to his opponents; and generally quotes whole paragraphs from their writings, so that both sides of the question are fairly and comprehensively stated; which is of great assistance to the modern reader. At the time of writing the 'Remarks,' William Law was about 37 years of age.

II. The Case of Reason ; or Natural Religion fairly and fully stated.

ALTHOUGH 'The Case of Reason' appears as William Law's third publication in the collected edition of his works issued after his decease, and is here, for convenience, so retained ; yet it is not the third, but the sixth, in the order of publication. It was not published until the year 1731, after the excellent Pamphlet respecting the 'Unlawfulness of the Stage-Entertainment'; the 'Practical Treatise on Christian Perfection' and the 'Serious Call' had appeared : and when William Law was forty-five years of age and well known.

The Case of Reason was written in reply to DR. TINDAL, 'the Christian Deist's' work entitled 'Christianity as old as the Creation'; which was published in the year 1730 and excited much controversy at the time.

WILLIAM LAW had a curious variety of opponents to contend with. BISHOP HOADLY with his Invisible Church, disregard for outward and visible Ordinances, and Salvation by Sincerity : BERNARD MANDEVILLE with his rejection of anything of the moral nature beyond mere brute instinct ; and DR. TINDAL with his supreme dependence upon Reason or Natural Religion : against each of whom William Law most effectually turned their own weapons.

MATTHEW TINDAL is said to have been born in the year 1657. He was a Doctor of Laws and wrote various books of which the most important was that replied to by William Law. His 'Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church'—incorrectly reprinted as 'Rites' in the Bangorian Letters—was burnt by Order of the House of Commons. His other works, of a nature sufficiently indicated by the subjects of which they treat, 'Jacobitism, Perjury, Popery, Law of Nations, Rights of 'Sovereigns,' &c., appear to have long since passed with their Author—who died in the year 1733—into Oblivion.

III. The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage-Entertainment fully demonstrated.

THIS Pamphlet is WILLIAM LAW'S third work in the order of publication; published in the year 1726, when he was about forty years of age. It has been severely censured by Law's so-called Admirers; and a late writer describes it as written with greater zeal than knowledge of the facts—a description which is more epigrammatic than just. Even CANON OVERTON gravely considers it his duty as 'a faithful Biographer' not to shrink from admitting the weaknesses of his Subject—very gratuitously and unnecessarily we think in this case; which reveals to us how little real insight he had into the life of William Law. JOHN DENNIS a kind of 'Critic' and an ex-Playwright, replied to it in 'The Stage Defended from Scripture, Reason, Experience and 'the Common Sense of Mankind for 2,000 years'—by which he is usually misrepresented as having completely vanquished poor Law. Two thousand years ago takes him back to classical times—and he naturally refers to the Grecian stage; as if the London Play-house of Law's time, could possibly be compared with the Athenian or Corinthian stages. His Scriptural Authorities, according to CANON OVERTON, appear to be quite negative—e.g., St. Paul did not condemn the Athenian stage of his time. From Reason no less than from Experience, William Law sufficiently condemns such Entertainments; and the 'Common Sense of Mankind for the last 2,000 years' can scarcely be received as an authority upon any important subject. Disregarding all Criticism: is it possible for any truly pious-minded man to answer the following interrogatory respecting the Stage-Entertainment, which William Law puts at page 156, in the affirmative?

'Is it conformable to that Heavenly Affection, that Love of 'God, that Purity of Heart, that Wisdom of Mind, that Perfection of Holiness, that Contempt of the World, that Watchfulness and Self-denial, that Humility and Fear of Sin, which 'Religion requires?'

Remarks upon a Book entitled
'The Fable of the Bees.'

Sir,

I HAVE read your several Compositions in favour of the Vices and Corruptions of Mankind ; and hope I need make no Apology, for presuming to offer a Word or two on the Side of Virtue and Religion.

I shall spend no Time in Preface, or general Reflections, but proceed directly to the Examination of such Passages as expose moral Virtue, as a Fraud and imposition, and render all Pretences to it, as odious and contemptible.

Though I direct myself to you, I hope it will be no Offence, if I sometimes speak, as if I was speaking to a Christian, or show some ways of thinking, that may be owing to that kind of worship which is professed amongst us. Ways of thinking derived from revealed Religion are much more suitable to our low Capacities, than any arrogant Pretences to be wise, by our own Light.

Moral Virtue, however disregarded in Practice, has hitherto had a speculative Esteem amongst Men ; her Praises have been celebrated by Authors of all kinds, as the confessed Beauty, Ornament, and Perfection of Human Nature.

On the contrary, Immorality has been looked upon as the greatest Reproach and Torment of Mankind ; no Satire has been thought severe enough upon its natural Baseness and Deformity, nor any Wit able to express the Evils it occasions in private Life, and public Societies.

Your Goodness would not suffer you to see this part of Christendom, deluded with such false Notions, of I know not what Excellence in Virtue, or Evil in Vice, but obliged you immediately to compose a System (as you call it) wherein you do these three things.

1st. You consider Man, merely as an Animal, having, like other Animals, nothing to do but to follow his Appetites.

2dly. You consider Man as cheated and flattered out of his natural State, by the Craft of Moralists, and pretend to be very sure, that the 'moral Virtues are the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride.'

So that Man and Morality are here both destroyed together ; Man is declared to be only an Animal, and Morality an Imposture.

According to this Doctrine, to say that a Man is dishonest, is making him just such a Criminal, as a Horse that does not dance.

But this is not all, for you dare further affirm in praise of immorality, 'That Evil, as well moral, as natural, is the solid Basis, the Life and Support of all Trades and Employments without exception ; that there we must look for the true Origin of all Arts and Sciences ; and that the Moment Evil ceases, the Society must be spoiled, if not dissolved.'*

These are the principal Doctrines, which with more than Fanatic Zeal you recommend to your Readers ; and if lewd Stories, profane Observations, loose Jest, and haughty Assertions, might pass for Arguments, few People would be able to dispute with you.

I shall begin with your Definition of Man. 'As for my part, say you, without any Compliment to the courteous Reader, or myself, I believe, Man (besides Skin, Flesh, Bones, &c., that are obvious to the Eye) to be a Compound of various Passions, that all of them as they are provoked, and come uppermost, govern him by turns whether he will or no.'†

Surely this Definition is too General, because it seems to suit a Wolf, or a Bear, as exactly as yourself, or a Grecian Philosopher.

You say, 'you believe Man to be,' &c., now I cannot understand to what part of you, this believing Faculty is to be ascribed ; for your Definition of Man makes him incapable of believing anything, unless believing can be said to be a Passion, or some Faculty of Skin or Bones.

But supposing such a Belief as yours, because of its blindness, might justly be called a Passion, yet surely there are greater things conceived by some Men, than can be ascribed to mere Passions, or Skin and Flesh.

That Reach of Thought, and strong Penetration which has carried Sir Isaac Newton through such Regions of Science, must truly be owing to some higher Principle. Or will you say, that all his Demonstrations, are only so many blind Sallies of Passion ?

If Man had nothing but Instincts and Passions, he could not dispute about them; for to dispute is no more an Instinct, or a Passion, than it is a Leg, or an Arm.

If therefore you would prove yourself to be no more than a Brute, or an Animal, how much of your Life you need alter I cannot tell, but you must at least forbear writing against Virtue, for no mere Animal ever hated it.

But however, since you desire to be thought only Skin and Flesh, and a Compound of Passions, I will forget your better part, as much as you have done, and consider you in your own way. You tell us, 'that the moral Virtues are the political Offspring, which Flattery begot upon Pride.'*

You therefore, who are an Advocate for moral Vices, should by the Rule of Contraries, be supposed to be acted by Humility; but that being (as I think) not of the number of the Passions, you have no Claim to be guided by it.

The prevailing Passions, which you say have the sole Government of Man in their turns, are Pride, Shame, Fear, Lust, and Anger; you have appropriated the moral Virtues to Pride, so that your own Conduct must be ascribed either to Fear, Shame, Anger, or Lust, or else to a beautiful Union and Concurrence of them all.

I doubt not, but you are already angry, that I consider you only as an Animal, that acts as Anger, or Lust, or any other Passion moves it, although it is your own Assertion that you are no better.

But to proceed, 'Sagacious Moralists, say you, draw Men like Angels, in hopes, that the Pride at least of some, will put them upon copying after the beautiful Originals, which they are represented to be.†

I am loath to charge you with Sagacity, because I would not accuse you falsely; but if this Remark is well made, I can help you to another full as just; viz., 'That Sagacious Advocates for Immorality, draw Men like Brutes, in hopes, that the Depravity at least of some, will put them upon copying after the base Originals, which they are represented to be.'

The Province you have chosen for yourself, is to deliver Man from the Sagacity of Moralists, the Encroachments of Virtue, and to replace him in the Rights and Privileges of Brutality; to recall him from the giddy Heights of rational Dignity, and Angelic likeness, to go to Grass, or wallow in the Mire.

Had the Excellence of Man's Nature, been only a false Insinua- tion of crafty Politicians, the very falseness of the thing, had made some Men at Peace with it ; but this Doctrine coming from Heaven, its being a principle of Religion, and a foundation of solid Virtue, has roused up all this Zeal against it.

And God said, Let us make Man in our own Image, after our Likeness.

This was a Declaration of the Dignity of Man's Nature, made long before any of your Sagacious Moralists had a Meeting. As this Doctrine came thus early from Heaven, so in the several Ages of the World, God has had his Oracles, and Prophets, to raise Men's Thoughts to their first Original ; to preserve a Sense of their Relation to God, and Angelic Natures, and encourage them to expect a State of Greatness suitable to that Image after which they were created. To assure them, that *they that sleep in the Dust of the Earth shall awake, some to Everlasting Life, and some to shame and everlasting Contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the Firmament, and they that turn many to Righteousness, as the Stars for ever and ever.

The last Revelation which God has made to the World, by his Son Jesus Christ, is greatly Glorious in this respect, that it has more perfectly brought Life and Immortality to light ; that it turns our Thoughts from the low satisfactions of Flesh and Sense, to press and aspire after that deathless State of Greatness, where we shall be as the Angels of God.

It is not therefore the Sagacity and Cunning of any Philosophers that has tricked Men into Notions of Morality, as a thing suitable to a pretended Dignity of Nature within them.

But it is God himself, who first declared the Excellence of human Nature, and has made so many Revelations since, to fill Men's Minds with high and noble Desires suitable to it.

Before I proceed to consider your Inquiry into your Origin of moral Virtue, I shall take Notice of the Apology that you make to Jews and Christians.

You are sensible that what you have said is inconsistent, both with the Old and New Testament, and therefore thus excuse yourself to your scrupulous Reader.

That in 'your Inquiry into the Origin of moral Virtue, you speak neither of Jews nor Christians, but Man in his State of Nature and Ignorance of the true Deity.' †

The Absurdity of this Apology will appear from hence ; Let us suppose that you had been making an Inquiry into the Origin of the World, and should declare that it arose from a casual Concourse of Atoms, and then tell your scrupulous Reader, by way of

Excuse, that you did not mean the World, which Jews and Christians dwell upon, but that which is inhabited by Man in his State of Nature and Ignorance of the true Deity: Could anything be more weak or senseless than such an Apology? yet it is exactly the same as that which you have here made.

For the difference of Jew or Heathen, no more supposes or allows of two different Origins of Morality, than it supposes or allows of two different Origins of the World.

For as the Creation of the World was over, and owing to its true Cause, before the Existence of either Jew or Heathen, so Morality was in being, and sprung from its proper Source, before either Jew or Heathen came into the World. And consequently, neither the Origin of the one or the other admits of any different Account, because in the after Ages of the World, some People were called Jews, and others Heathens. Besides, if you contradict the Religion of Jews and Christians, in your Account of Morality, is it less a Contradiction, or less false, because you pretend that your Face was turned towards Pagans?

If you were to assert that there was no God, or true Religion, could it be any Excuse, to say that you were speaking to a Mahometan?

2dly. To defend your Account of the Origin of Morality, you suppose Man in a State of Nature, savage and brutal, without any Notions of Morality or Ideas of Religion.

Now this very Supposition, is so far from being any Apology for you, that it enhances your Accusation: For you suppose such a State of Nature (as you call it) as the Scripture makes it morally impossible, that Men should ever have been in.

When Noah's Family came out of the Ark, we presume, they were as well educated in the Principles of Virtue and moral Wisdom, as any People were ever since; at least we are sure they were well instructed in the true Religion.

There was therefore a Time, when all the People in the World were well versed in moral Virtue, and worshipped God according to the true Religion.

He therefore that gives a later Account of the Origin of moral Virtue, gives a false Account of it.

Now as all Parts of the World were by degrees inhabited, by the Descendants of such Ancestors, as were well instructed both in Religion and Morality, it is morally impossible that there should be any Nation of the World, amongst whom there were no Remains of Morality, no Instances of Virtue, no Principles of Religion derived from their Ancestors.

At least it is absolutely impossible for you to show that there was any such Nation, free from all Impressions of Religion, and Morality. This you can no more do, than you can show that all the World are not descended from Adam.

So that your Origin of moral Virtue supposes a State of Man, which the Scriptures make it morally impossible ever to happen, and which it is absolutely impossible for you to show, that it really did ever happen.

But supposing some of the Posterity of Noah, in some Corner of the World, should have become so degenerate, as to have not the least Remains of Virtue or Religion left among them; and suppose some Philosophers should get among them, and wheedle and flatter them into some Notions of Morality; could that be called an Account of the Origin of moral Virtue, when moral Virtue from the beginning of the World had been practised and taught, by the virtuous Ancestors of such a depraved Offspring?

To make the taming of some such supposed Savage Creatures the Origin of Morality, is as just a way of thinking, as to make the History of the curing People in Bedlam, a true Account of the Origin of Reason.

3dly. Your Apology to your scrupulous Reader, as if your Origin of Morality related not to Jews or Christians, is false and absurd.

Because, the Observations which you have made upon human Nature, on which your Origin of moral Virtue is founded, are only so many Observations upon the Manners of all Orders of Christians. 'Tis their Falseness, Hypocrisy, Pride, and Passion, that have induced you to consider Morality, as having no rational Foundation in Man's Nature, but as the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride.

And yet you, good Man, are not talking about Christians, or Jews.

But every Page of your Book confutes that Excuse, and indeed needs must; for how should your Observations relate to any but to those People, whose Natures and Practices have furnished you with them?

'I have, say you, searched through every Degree and Station of Men;' at last, you tell us, you went to the Convents, but even there you found that all was Farce and Hypocrisy.*

You tell us also, that whoever searches thus deep into human Nature will find, that moral Virtue is the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride. Yet this searching into all Orders of Men, into Convents, and from thence making this Discovery, that Morality is all owing to Pride and Policy, is not pronouncing anything upon Christians.

Nothing can be more weak than to form your Opinion of human Nature, upon the Tempers and Practices of all Orders of Christians, and then pretend you are only treating of Man in such a State of Nature, as you never saw one in, in your Life.

For how can your Observations upon Men, under the Power of Education, Custom, Laws, and Religion, tell you what Man is, in a supposed State, where all these are wanting?

Or will you say that you are acquainted, and intimately acquainted with Men, so entirely divested of all the Ideas of Religion, Morality, and Virtue, that you can make their Natures a true Specimen of Man in his most savage, brutal Condition?

Though your Knowledge of human Nature was great, yet you were forced, it seems, to visit the Convents, before you could pronounce anything of them. It seems therefore necessary, in order to know what Creatures Men are in a State of brutality, destitute of all Sense of God and Virtue, that you should know where to visit them.

Again, this Apology of yours, happens to be inconsistent with the first and main Principle upon which your fine Discourse is founded. I mean your Definition of Man, whom you define to be, besides Skin, Flesh, and Bones, &c., a compound of various Passions. This is the vile, abominable, false, proud Animal, that you treat of under the Name of Man. In your Excuse you tell us, this is Man only in a State of Nature, but in your Introduction, you tell us, that to forbear complimenting, that Definition belongs both to yourself, and the courteous Reader.

So that you must either allow, that you and your courteous Readers are all Savages, in an unenlightened State of Nature, or else that the Man you have described, belongs to all Orders of Christians.

Having shown the weakness and folly of your Apology, I proceed now to your more particular Account of the Origin of moral Virtue.

You are pleased to impute its Origin to Pride alone, that having the same Cause as fine Clothes, we may wear as much, or as little, or as we please, without incurring any greater Offence, than a little variation in Dress.

If Pride be the only foundation of Virtue, then the more vicious anyone is, the more humble he ought to be esteemed; and he who is the most humble is at the greatest distance he can be placed from moral Virtue. And a perfect Humility (which by most Moralists has been reckoned a Virtue) must according to this Account, render anyone incapable of any Virtue; for such a one not only wants that which you make the only Cause of Virtue, but is possessed of the contrary Quality.

Having carefully considered human Nature, you have at last discovered, that 'the moral Virtues are the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride.'

You are so fond of this Discovery, that you cannot help showing us how you made it.

The first Moralists or Philosophers, say you, 'thoroughly examined all the Strength and Frailty of our Nature, and observing that none were either so savage, as not to be charmed with Praise, or so despicable, as patiently to bear Contempt, justly concluded, that Flattery must be the powerful Argument that could be used to human Creatures.'

What a Graphical Description is here ! One would think that you had been an Eye witness to all that passed, and that you had held the Candle to those first Philosophers, when they were so carefully peeping into human Nature. You do not love to dwell upon little Matters, or else you could have told us the Philosopher's Name, who first discovered this Flattery; how long he looked before he found it; how he proved it to be agreeable to Pride; what Disputes happened upon the Occasion; and how many Ages of the World had passed, before this Consultation of the Philosophers.

But however, you pass on to more material Points: 'They, say you, (that is the Philosophers) making use of this bewitching Engine, extolled the Excellence of our Nature above other Animals. Having by this artful way of Flattery, insinuated themselves into the Hearts of Men, they begun to instruct them in the Notions of Honour and Shame;—they laid before them how unbecoming it was the Dignity of such sublime Creatures, to be solicitous about gratifying those Appetites, which they had in common with Brutes, &c.'

This you take to be a sufficient Proof, 'that the moral Virtues are the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride.'

I can go no further, till I present you with a fine Speculation of an Abstract-thinker, upon the Origin of the erect posture of Mankind.

'It was his Opinion, that the nearer we search into human Nature, the more we shall be convinced, that walking upon our Feet with our Body erect, was the political offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride.'

'The first Legislators, says he, having examined the Strength and Weakness of Man's Body, they discovered, that he was not so top heavy, but that he might stand upright on his Feet; but the Difficulty was how to raise him up.'

‘Some Philosopher more sagacious than the rest found out, that though Man crept on the Ground, yet he was made up of Pride, and that if Flattery took hold of that, he might easily be set on his Legs.

‘Making use of this bewitching Engine, they extolled the excellence of his Shape above other Animals, and told him what a grovelling thing it was, to creep on all fours like the meanest Animals.

‘Thus did these first Philosophers shame poor Man out of his natural State of creeping, and wheedled him into the Dignity and Honour of walking upright, to serve their own ambitious Ends, and that they might have his Hands to be employed in their Drudgery.’

This Gentleman being deeply learned in the Knowledge of human Nature, has much the same Curiosities concerning the Origin of Speech, and the first Invention of Truth, which he thinks upon a strict Research into Nature, may very justly be ascribed to Pride and Flattery.

But to return to your History. The next Thing your Philosophers did, was this :

‘In order to introduce an Emulation amongst Men, they divided the whole Species into two Classes, vastly different from one another. The one consisted of vile grovelling Wretches, which they said were the Dross of their Kind, and having only the Shape of Men, differed from Brutes only in their outward Figure; but the other Class of Men were made up of high Spirited lofty Creatures.’*

Chronology, and Geography, I presume, are Studies not polite enough for your Attention, or else I suppose you would have told us the Time when, and the Place where all this happened.

For it is material to know what the World was doing before these Philosophers made this Division; whether before this, there was any Fear of God, any Belief of a Providence, any Duty to Parents, any Sense of Equity, any Notions of Faith, or any Regard to Truth.

For if the Inquiry was about the Origin of Seeing, or Hearing, and you should be ever so exact in telling me the manner how some cunning Philosophers first brought that Matter to bear, I should be very scrupulous about it, unless you told me the Time when, and the Place where they met, what they were doing before, how they came thither, and how they knew when they were there.

Now there is just this same Difficulty in your Account of the Origin of moral Virtue.

For let me tell you, Sir, moral Virtue came amongst Men, in the same manner, as Seeing and Hearing came amongst them.

Had there ever been a Time, when there was nothing of it in the World, it could no more have been introduced, than the Faculties of Seeing and Hearing could have been contrived by Men who were blind and deaf.

Were not the first Principles and Reasons of Morality conatural to us, and essential to our Minds, there would have been nothing for the moral Philosophers to have improved upon.

Nor indeed can any Art or Science be formed, but in such Matters, as where Nature has taken the first Steps herself, and shown certain Principles to proceed upon.

Perspective supposes an agreement in the different Appearances of Objects.

Music supposes a confessed Perception of various Sounds; and moral Philosophy supposes an acknowledged difference of Good and Evil.

Were we not all naturally Mathematicians and Logicians, there would be no such Sciences; for Science is only an improvement of those first Principles or Ways of thinking, which Nature has given us.

Take away the Mathematicians' Postulata, or those first Elements and Principles of Reason, which are allowed by the common Sense of Mankind, and were Philosophers even as cunning as yourself, they must give up all the Science.

Do but suppose all to be invented, and then it will follow that nothing could be invented in any Science.

It is thus in all Sciences; the rationality of our Nature contains the first Rules, or Principles, and it is the Speculation of Man that builds and enlarges upon them.

As the Mathematician, seeing the acknowledged Differences and Proportions of Lines and Figures, proceeded upon them to enlarge Men's Knowledge in such matters; so the moral Philosophers, seeing the acknowledged Difference between Right and Wrong, Good and Evil, which the common Reason of Man consented to, they proceeded to enlarge and improve upon them.

So that their Labours are but Speculations and Harangues upon those common Principles of Morality, which were as conatural to the Reason of Man, as the first Principles of any other Science.

Moral Philosophy may be compared to Eloquence; it is an Improvement upon the common Reason of Man, as Eloquence is an Improvement upon Speech.

Now should some Connoisseur take it into his Head to inquire into the Origin of Speech, and tell the World, 'That once upon a time, some Orators seeing that Man had something in his Mouth, by the Movement of which, he could make a particular Sound, they told him of the Dignity and Honour of uttering such Sounds, and so through the pride of his Nature taught the Animal to speak, though in reality, it was neither natural to him, nor any true Excellence; but ambitious Men flattered him into it, that he might be the fitter to go on their Errands.'

Should any profound Thinker give this Account of the Origin of Speech, you would have a Right to say, that he had stole the Discovery from you, who have given us just the same false and ridiculous Account of the Origin of Morality.

For it is full as reasonable, to make Eloquence the Origin of forming articulate Sounds, as to make the Harangues or Labours of moral Philosophers, the Origin of moral Virtue.

Could it be supposed, that an Understanding so fine as yours, could be conveyed to your Descendants, and that you should ever have a Grandson as wise as yourself, it may be expected that he will be able to teach that Generation of Men, that Seeing, was first introduced into the World, by Sir Isaac Newton's Treatise upon Optics.

To inquire into the Origin of moral Virtue, is to inquire into the Origin of Reason, Truth, and the Relations of Things.

And to fancy that some Politicians contrived moral Virtue, is to fancy that some Politician contrived Reason and Truth, and invented the Difference between one Action and another.

There is nothing that began to be, but what may be destroyed or cease to be; but as Truth and Reason can never cease to be, so it implies a Contradiction in Terms, for Truth and Reason ever to have had a Beginning.

It is the same in moral Virtue, which is Truth and Reason, considered in relation to Actions; and the Difference between one Action and another, is as immutable and eternal, as the Difference between one Line and another, and can no more be destroyed.

As things are different by their own proper Natures, independent of our Wills, so Actions have their own peculiar Qualities from themselves, and not from our Thoughts about them. In these immutable Qualities of Actions, is founded the fitness and reasonableness of them, which we can no more alter, than we can change the Proportions or Relations of Lines and Figures.

And it is no more the Pride of Man, that has made this Difference between Actions, than it is the Pride of Man, that makes the Difference between a Circle and a Square.

Moral Virtue therefore, if considered in itself, as the Rule or Law of intelligent Beings, had no Origin; that is, there never was a time when it began to be; but it is as much without Beginning as Truth and Goodness, which are in their Natures as Eternal as God.

But moral Virtue, if considered as the Object of Man's Knowledge, begun with the first Man, and is as natural to him, as it is natural to Man to think and perceive, or feel the Difference between Pleasure and Pain.

For his rational Nature, as much implies a fitness to perceive a Difference in Actions, as to Right and Wrong, as it implies a fitness to perceive a Difference in things as to great and small, pleasing or painful.

It may now be inquired, whether this moral Virtue be our Law, and how it appears, that we are under any Obligations to behave ourselves, according to this Difference of Right and Wrong that appears in Actions?

Now the reasonableness and fitness of Actions themselves is a Law to rational Beings, and the sight of that reasonableness carries an Obligation.

The different Magnitude of things, is a Reason to us, to acknowledge such Difference; and he that affirms anything contrary to the sight of his Mind, offends against the Law of his Nature.

The different nature of Actions, is a Reason for us to act according to such Differences, and he who does anything contrary to the sight of his Mind in that respect, sins against the Law of his Nature.

Now that this is not an imaginary Obligation, or a Law fancied by Moralists, may appear from hence; that this is a Law to which even the Divine Nature is subject; for God is necessarily Just and Good, not from any external Force, but from the Excellence of Justice and Goodness. Reason is his Law because it is Reason. That therefore which is a Law to God because of its Excellence, must surely be a Law to all Beings whom he has created capable of discerning that Excellence. For if the Reason or Excellence of the thing, be of sufficient Force to determine the Action of God, certainly it ought not to be thought too little to determine us in our Actions.

Nor can that be said to be an imaginary speculative Law to intelligent Beings, which is an inviolable Law to the most perfect, intelligent Nature.

2dly. It is the Will of God, that makes moral Virtue our Law, and obliges us to act reasonably.

If you ask how this Will of God appears, I must beg leave at present, only to suppose, that God is of infinite Justice, and Goodness, and Truth; and then the Thing proves itself: For such a God must necessarily Will, that all his Creatures in their several Proportions, be Just, and Good, and True.

Few mathematical Demonstrations conclude stronger than this. There is only one Objection to be made against it, which is to suppose, that God is neither Just nor True.

If rather than yield, you will put the Epicurean upon me, and say that God may disregard us, and neither Will one Way, nor the other. It may be answered, that this is inconsistent with the Idea of God just laid down; for a God of infinite Goodness and Truth, can no more fail to Will Goodness and Truth in every Instance, than an infinite Being can fail to be present in every Place, or an omnipotent Being be deficient in any Acts of Power. So that it is absolutely necessary to say, either that God, is not of infinite Goodness and Truth, or to allow that He requires all his Creatures in their several Capacities, to be Just, and True, and Good.

Here, Sir, is the noble and divine Origin of moral Virtue, it is founded in the immutable Relations of Things, in the Perfections and Attributes of God, and not in the Pride of Man, or the Craft of cunning Politicians.

As the Reasons and Obligations to moral Virtue have always been in being, so has Mankind always had Sight of them: It being as essential and natural, for a rational Being to perceive these Differences of Actions, as it is for an extended Being to occupy Space.

And the Creation of a rational Nature, as much implies a Sight of the reasonableness of things, as the Creation of an extended Being, implies its Possession of so much Space.

Matter of Fact also supports this Observation: For History tells us of no Age or Country, where Men have not agreed to ascribe Justice, Goodness, and Truth, to the Supreme Being.

Now this shows, that they always not only knew, what Goodness, Justice, and Truth were, but also that they took them to be such excellent Qualities, as ought to be ascribed to the highest and best Being.

How monstrous is it therefore, to impute these fine moral Virtues to the Contrivance of Politicians, when all Ages of the World have agreed to ascribe them to God, and number them amongst his glorious Attributes!

God is Just, therefore there is such a thing as Justice, independent of the Will and Contrivance of Man, is a way of reasoning that cannot be refuted.

It is in vain to say, that there may be a Divine Justice and Goodness, and yet what we call Goodness and Justice amongst Men, may be only a human Contrivance.

For to this it may be answered, that we cannot ascribe anything to God, of which we have not some Conception ourselves, Did we not perceive some degrees of Wisdom, we could not call him All-wise; did we not feel Power, and understand what it is, we could not ascribe Omnipotence to God. For our Idea of God is only formed by adding Infinite to every Perfection that we have any Knowledge of.

So that had we not from the rationality of our Nature, as plain a Sight of Justice, Goodness, and Truth, as we have of Power, Existence, or anything else, we could not attribute them to God.

That we are rational Beings, is as plain, as that we have Bodies, and bodily Senses. As there is no Man so refined and elevated, but gives frequent Proof, that he is subject also to Instincts and Passions; so there is no one so addicted to an Animal Life, as to show no Signs of an higher Principle within him.

It is this rationality of our Nature, that makes us both capable of, and obliged to practise moral Virtue, and brings us into a kind of Society with God and all other intelligent Beings.

For our Reason gives us a share in that common Light, which all intelligent Beings enjoy, and by making us Partakers of the same Things, so far makes us of one Society.

By our Reason we know some Truths, which God, and all intelligent Beings know; and apprehend some Perfections, and different Qualities in Things and Actions, which all intelligent Beings apprehend.

Now by being let into this Region of Truth, by being able to see some Truths which God also sees, and to know some Perfections which he also knows, we are as plainly declared to be rational Beings, and that Reason is one Law of our Nature, as the Principles of Flesh and Blood show us to be Animals, and subject to the Instincts of an Animal Life.

For how weak is it to suppose, that the Animal Life should be the Foundation of Laws of Nature, so as to make it fit for us to act agreeable to its Wants and Desires; and that the Rationality of our Beings, which is, in some degree, a Likeness to God, should be the Foundation of no Laws of Nature, so as to make it fit for us to act suitable to its Perfection and Happiness.

The short is this. Truth and Reason is the Law by which God acts; Man is, in some degree, made a Partaker of that Truth and Reason; therefore it is a Law to him also. The more we act according to Order, Truth and Reason, the more we make ourselves like to God, who is Truth and Reason itself.

This is the strong and immovable Foundation of moral Virtue, having the same Certainty as the Attributes of God.

Away then, I beseech you, with your idle and profane Fancies about the Origin of moral Virtue. For once turn your Eyes towards Heaven, and dare but own a just and good God, and then you have owned the true Origin of Religion and moral Virtue.

Thus much will, I presume, be thought sufficient to vindicate the Excellence and Obligations of moral Virtue, from the false and impious Accounts you have given of its Origin.

I proceed to consider in the next place, some other Methods that are made use of to render moral Virtue odious and contemptible.

Section II.

THE most boasted Objection against the Reality of Virtue which is urged by Men, who appropriate the Knowledge of human Nature to themselves, is this, that no Action is performed by us through a Love of Goodness, or upon a rational Principle of Virtue, but that it is Complexion, natural Temper, Education, Pride, Shame, or some other blind Impulse, that moves us in all our Actions that have the Appearance of Virtue. Thus a man who relieves an Object of Compassion, only gratifies his commiserating Temper; he is subject to Pity, 'which is a Frailty of our Natures, and of which the weakest Minds have generally the greatest Share, as may be seen in Women and Children.'^{*} Again, 'The humblest Man alive, say you, must confess, that the Reward of a virtuous Action, which is the Satisfaction that ensues upon it, consists in a certain Pleasure he procures to himself in contemplating his own Worth; which Pleasure, together with the Occasion of it, are as certain Signs of Pride, as looking pale and trembling at any imminent Danger are the Symptoms of Fear.'[†]

Now, Sir, if this be a true Account of the humblest Man alive, then by the Rule of Contraries, this must be a true Account of the proudest Man alive; that the Satisfaction he enjoys in being so, consists in a certain Pleasure he procures to himself by contemplating his own Vileness.

This accurate Description you have given us of the Pleasure of the humblest Man alive, must be owing to such a feeling Sense as the blind Man had of Light, who being asked what it was like, answered that it was like the Sound of a Trumpet.

But to consider this Charge against human Virtue, that it is nothing but Education, natural Temper, or Complexion; this being so laboured a Point, I shall state the whole Matter as clearly as I can.

1st. It is granted, that an Action is only then virtuous when it is performed, because it is agreeable to Reason, and those Laws which God requires us to observe.

Now this Virtue is Man's Duty, not as a Task that is imposed upon him, but as it is the only Practice, that is the natural Pleasure and proper Good of his being.

Virtue having that natural Fitness to a rational Soul, that fine Sights have to the Eye, or harmonious Sounds to the Ear.

A rational Being is in order, in its right State and Frame, when it is acting reasonably.

The infinite Goodness of God makes him infinitely happy; and the Perfection of every Being is its Happiness; and the greater and more perfect the Virtue of anyone is, the more perfect is his Happiness.

Now it is here to be observed, that an Action is not less virtuous, or loses any of its Excellence, because the Soul is delighted and made happy by it; for it is the very Nature of Virtue to produce such Effects, and it shows the Rectitude of the Soul, when it can act virtuously with Delight, and feel its Happiness in so doing.

This is being virtuous upon Principle, and through a Love of Goodness; for Goodness is loved for itself, when it is loved for what it is, the true Good and proper Delight of a rational Being.

Now will anyone say that there is no Excellence in Virtue, that it is mere Nature and Temper, because it is so agreeable, so proper to our rational Natures; Then let him say there is no Excellence in the Goodness and Justice of God, because they are so suitable to his Nature, and constitute his Happiness.

Granting therefore that Virtue was its own Reward, as it elevates and perfects the Soul, and keeps it in a State of right enjoyment, it would not be the less reasonable, on that Account.

For Happiness is the only reasonable End of every Being.

An action is not good, or virtuous, because it is Self-denial, but because it is according to Duty; and he who through long habits of Goodness, has made the Practice of Virtue to have less of Self-denial in it, is the most virtuous Man.

Now, it is no Objection against the Reality of Goodness, that as rational Beings, we are naturally and complexionally disposed to practise and delight in it; or that this natural Disposition, may by Exercise, Meditation and Habits, be heightened and increased.

For Custom, Habit, and natural Temper, are proper Assistances of our most virtuous Actions, and cannot be said to make them less reasonable, unless it be a Fault or Imperfection, to be habitually and strongly disposed to Goodness.

Thus much therefore is true of us considered only as rational Beings; that we must even in that State be by Nature and Temper formed to perceive Pleasure, from some particular ways of acting; and that the very excellence of our Natures, consists in a Fitness and Disposition for virtuous Actions, which the more we improve and strengthen by Meditation and Habit, the more reasonable we make ourselves.

It has pleased God in the Formation of Man, so to unite this rational Nature to a Body of Flesh and blood, that they shall generally act together; and that the Soul shall as well be influenced by bodily Instincts, and Motions of the Blood and Spirits, as by its own Thoughts and reflections.

Thus, a delightful Thought conceived ever so secretly in the Mind, shall, at its first Conception, have the Blood and Spirits join in the Pleasure.

So that every right Judgment of the Mind, every proper Aversion, or regular Love, has as much the Concurrence of the Blood and Spirits, as if they were the only Agents.

The Body being thus visible an Agent in all that we do, has made some weak Heads imagine, that we are nothing else but Body; as from the same want of Thought some have concluded, that there is nothing besides the material World, because nothing else is obvious to their Eyes.

The Soul being thus united to the Body, no Act of the Man is less reasonable, or virtuous, because it has the Concurrence of the Blood and Spirits: For this was the Intention of the Union, that a Creature of such a Form, should exert its Instincts and Passions in conformity to Reason.

For Instance, suppose anyone should meditate upon the Attributes and Perfections of God, till the great Idea had raised and warmed his Spirits; though the Reflection is then supported by the Agitation of bodily Spirits, yet the Meditation is not less religious, or less devout, or reasonable, because the Heat of bodily Spirits assisted in it.

Suppose anyone should so often reflect upon an eternal state of Darkness, and Separation from God, till his Blood and Spirits join in increasing the Horror; such an Horror would not be less reasonable, because the Body joined in keeping it up.

The mechanical Influence which our Spirits and Temperament have upon our Actions, does not take away from the reasonableness of them, any more than the rational Frame of our Minds, which is naturally disposed to acquiesce in the Reason of things, destroys the reasonableness of Actions.

As it would be no Excellence in a pure thinking Being, to be equally inclined to Truth or Falsehood, so it would add no Merit to such a mixt Nature as ours is, if our bodily Temperaments were neither more or less inclined to, or delighted with one sort of Actions than another.

Let us only suppose, that a rational Soul and an animal Nature, were united to act in a State of Personality.

It cannot be, that the Reasonableness of its Actions should be impaired by the Body's appearing to have a Share in them, because it does not act according to its Nature, unless the Body does concur; and in such a mixt Being, it is no more required that its Actions should be performed abstractly by pure Reason, than it is allowed that its Motions should be merely Animal.

Yet this is the false Judgment, which Men who are not the greatest Friends of Virtue make, because the Influence of the animal Nature is visible in the best of Men; and because such Enquirers generally converse intimately only with the worst, they rashly conclude against all Force of Principle, and deny Reason to have any Share in our Actions.

From what has been said, we may easily support the Reality of Virtue, from all the Objections of these Critics upon human Nature.

For granting the Force of Education, the Power of Custom, and the Influence of our bodily Instincts and Tempers; yet nothing can thence be concluded against the Share that Reason and Principle are required to have in our Actions.

For both Reason and Religion direct us to use the Influence and Assistance of all these Helps; and consequently they no more lessen or take from the Reality of virtuous Actions, when we are assisted by them, than Fasting or Prayer make our Piety less excellent, because it was assisted by them.

And it is as suitable to our Natures to strengthen and establish our Virtue, by Education, Custom, Complexion, and bodily Instincts, as it is suitable to Religion, to improve and heighten it by Fasting and Prayer.

And he who says, that such or such Actions have no Principle of Virtue or Religion in them, because they are made easy by Education, Temper, and Practice, thinks as weakly, as if he should affirm, that such Actions have no Reality of Principle in them, because they are the Effects of Meditation, and Habits of Attention; for good Habits of Body no more lessen the Excellence of Virtue, than good Habits of Mind.

An Action is virtuous, because it is an Obedience to Reason, and the Laws of God; and does not cease to be so, because the Body is either formed by Use, or created by Disposition, easy and ready for the Performance of it.

A good Education would be a Sin, if the Benefit that is received from it, or the Facility of performing good Actions, took away from their Goodness.

Nay, all Habits of Virtue would, upon this foot, be blamable, because such Habits must be supposed to have rendered both Body and Mind more ready and exact in Goodness.

All these Absurdities necessarily follow from this Argument, that there is no virtuous Principle in our good Actions, because Custom, Education, Temper, and Complexion, have their Share in them.

2dly. This Objection against the Reality of Virtue, is rather a Calumny, than any just Charge against it.

For as it is as certain, that we think and reason, as that we are subject to bodily Instincts and Habits; nothing can prove that our Reason and Reflection do not principally concur in any Action, but the Impossibility of it. He therefore that would prove that my Mind does not act upon a Principle of Reason, where he thinks that Temper or Complexion may carry me through it, can never prove it, till he can show that there was no Principle of Reason, no proper Motive, no Precept of Duty to move me to it: For if there be a plain Reason in the Thing, if there be a Precept of Duty to excite my Mind, as well as a natural Disposition in my Temper to perform the Action, it is impossible for the most penetrating Genius to prove, that my Temperament had a greater Share in the Action, than the Reason of my Mind; and consequently this Objection is a mere Calumny, and an ill-natured Suspicion, which can never prove itself to be justly made.

Now, that Reason is the Chief Principle in the Performance of good Actions, may, in some Degree, be learnt from hence; that reasonable and wise Actions never occasion any Sorrow or Repentance in the Mind; but, on the contrary, in violent Actions, where the Fermentation of the Blood and Spirits may be supposed to have blindly hurried on the Action, that Fermentation is no sooner abated, but there arises a Pain in the Mind, and Reason condemns the Action; which Condemnation chiefly consists in this, that Reason had not the Guidance of it; which is a plain Confession, that it is the way of our Nature to have Reason govern the Instincts and Motions of the Spirits, and that she shrinks, and is uneasy at those Actions, where she was not the principal Agent.

If therefore Actions only satisfy and content us, by being approved by our Reason, it is a manifest Proof, that our Reason is the principal Agent in our good Actions.

Nor will it be any Objection to this, to say, that many People are satisfied with false Notions of Virtue and Religion; for this only shows that the Principle of Reason may be weak, and of very little discerning Force in some People; but still it is their Faculty of Reason, such as it is, that gives them Peace, when it presides; and it is living contrary to Reason, that gives them Pain, as it gives Pain to others who enjoy a more enlightened Mind.

If the religious Turk abhors the Abomination of Wine, it cannot be said, that such Abhorrence is only the Effect of Temper, bodily Instincts, and Custom, unless it could be shown that he would equally abhor it, though he was fully persuaded that Mahomet was a Cheat.

From this Account of human Nature, we may be able to reject all those Reproaches which are cast upon Virtue and Religion, as if they were never founded upon any rational Principle, but were the casual blind Effects of Custom, Education, Temper, or Complexion.

1st. As it appears, that in our rational Natures, we are naturally and complexionally formed to practise and delight in reasonable Actions, and that such a Tendency of Temper or Nature towards Virtue, no more lessens the Excellence of it, than the Rectitude of God's Nature, takes away the Excellence of his Actions.

2dly. That Actions are not less virtuous for being suitable to any Disposition, whether natural or acquired, than for being suitable to the Reason of the Mind.

3dly. That Education, Custom, Habits, Complexion, &c., are so far from taking away the Reasonableness of our Actions, that we could not be said to act reasonably, unless we endeavoured to make a greater Progress in Virtue by their Assistance.

4thly. That it is impossible, even in those Actions, where Custom, Education, Complexion, and Habit seem to be in full Power, for anyone to prove that Reason and Principle have not the greatest Share in them.

5thly. That Peace of Mind, which attends our good Actions, is a plain Proof of the Power which our Reason had in the Performance of them.

To come now to a particular Instance or two.

1st. Philo's Charity and Compassion is no Virtue, you say, because it is mere Complexion and Temper; he gratifies his Pity, and acts in Conformity to his Blood and Spirits.

Now this is so far from proving that he has not the Virtue of Charity, that it might be urged as a Proof of his having it.

For his Body is in that Disposition that it should be, supposing that his Mind had been long exercised and indued with Habits of Charity; it gives that further Pleasure in charitable Acts, which the right Turn of the Instincts, and Blood and Spirits, should give to the Mind in every virtuous Action.

For as I have observed, Man is then in his best State, when the Course of the Blood and Spirits act in Concurrence with his Reason; so that when my Body with its Instincts and Motions, joins with the right Judgments of my Mind, what I so perform has all the Perfection that an human Creature is able to exert.

This Complexion therefore, or bodily Disposition towards charitable Acts, is so far from implying that therefore the Mind has no Share in the Action, that were the Mind in its best State, and in its full Power (as at first created) it would use a greater and more constant Concurrence of all bodily Tempers in the Performance of its Duty.

So that when Complexion, or bodily Temperament readily joins in the Performance of good Actions, this is so far from implying any Defect of Principle, or want of rational Motive, that it shows, in some degree, the Remains of that primitive Rectitude of Body and Mind before the Fall.

2dly. To say that Philo's Charity is mere Complexion, is a Calumny, and groundless Accusation; it is a Suspicion as ill-grounded, as if I were to suspect that a Man had no Pride in his Mind, because there appeared an Haughtiness in his Carriage; or no Humility within, because of a natural Lowliness without: It is a Suspicion thus founded against all the Appearances of Truth, and is forced to make those the Proofs of the Absence of a Thing, which are the natural Signs of its Presence.

And as it is thus unreasonable, so is it utterly impossible that it should ever justify itself.

For seeing it is not only possible, but natural for this com-plexional Disposition to act in Conformity to the internal Principle of the Mind, it can never be proved that it does not.

It can never be proved, that Reason and Religion have not a greater Share in Philo's Charity, than his Complexion. How far some Precept of Religion, some Principle of Reason may influence his Mind, cannot be known by the most sagacious Philosopher; therefore the Charge against his Charity, as the mere Effect of Complexion, must be always ill-natured, unjust, and groundless.

Further, granting that Philo was complexionally disposed to Pity and Compassion, even before he could be supposed to act upon a Principle of Virtue and Religion, yet even this Supposition will make nothing against it afterwards.

For will anyone argue, that a Man can never fear, love, or hate, upon Principles of Reason, because Children fear, love, and hate, before Reason is of any Force to direct them?

Yet this is as wise, as to suppose that a Man's Complexion is never made to concur with a Principle of Reason, because such Complexion appeared, before Reason could be supposed of sufficient Power to guide it.

As to what you say, 'That Pity is as much a Frailty of our Nature, as Anger, Pride, &c., That the weakest Minds have generally the greatest Share of it, for which Reason none are more compassionate than Women and Children.'*

Two Things may be observed. First, The Inconsistency of this Assertion with the rest of your Book.

Here you derive the Compassion of Women, from a supposed Weakness of Mind, which supposes, that their Tempers depend upon their Minds, and are subject to them, and influenced by them, though in this very Page, you make Pity to be only an Impulse of Nature, and it is your chief Design throughout your Book to show, that all our Tempers and Passions are mere Mechanism, and Constitution, founded only in the Temper and Tone of our bodily Spirits.

So that according to your deep Philosophy, Pity is only an Impulse of Nature, and bodily Temper; yet Women are more pitiful than Men, because they have (as you suppose) weaker Minds.

That is, their Minds, because weak, have a Power over their Tempers, and form their Dispositions; but Men's Minds being strong, have no such Power.

To what Temper of Mind such Philosophy as this, is to be imputed, need not be observed.

2dly. To say that Women have the weakest Minds, is saying more than you are able to prove. If they are more inclined to Compassion, through a Tenderness of Nature, it is so far from being a Weakness of their Minds, that it is a right Judgment, assisted, or made more easy, by a happy Tenderness of their Constitutions.

And it is owing, perhaps, to this Make of their Spirits, that they are commonly more affected with the Truths of Religion, than the Generality of Men are.

When our Minds are once softened, by whatever Cause it is, we are generally in the best Disposition for the Impressions of Religion; so that Pity is so far from being as much a Frailty, as Pride and Anger, that they are as different in their Effects, as a Heart of Flesh and a Heart of Stone, which Holy Scripture makes as different as a Blessing and a Curse.

But to return (if this be a Digression) to my Subject.

Let us now further suppose, that Philo's Charity is greatly owing to his Nature and Complexion; that the quality of his Spirits began the Disposition, and helped to recommend this Virtue to the Mind; yet may such a Virtue be as truly rational and religious, as if it had been let into the Mind any other way.

Sickness, Poverty, and Distress, have a natural Tendency to correct our Follies, and convert our Minds towards our true Good. These Conditions of Life may make it as easy for a Man to be humble and compassionate, as any bodily Complexion whatever; yet are such Humility and Compassion not to be esteemed void of Principle or Reason, because such Causes contributed towards them, and led the Mind into them.

For the Mind is acting according to the truest Principles of Reason and Religion, when it makes Advantage of these external Helps, and turns Ease and Pain, Sickness and Health, into occasional Causes of greater Piety.

Nor is it any more a Diminution of the Reality of Philo's Charity, to say, that bodily Temper first prepared and inclined his Mind towards it, than it is a Diminution of the Reality of anyone's Repentance, to say, that it was some Misfortune or cross Accident that first disposed and fitted his Mind for it.

David said (without fear of destroying the Reality of his Piety) It is good for me, that I have been afflicted.

Now if Actions, or Ways of Life may be good, though Afflictions contributed towards them, surely they may be equally good, though some Bodily Tempers proved in some degree the Occasions of them.

And it is as consistent with true and real Virtue, to owe its Rise to some bodily Constitution or Temper, as it is consistent with solid and substantial Piety, to owe its Beginning to some particular Calamity or Action of God's Providence.

But to proceed : It is further objected, that Philo's Charity must be mere Complexion, and not Virtue, for if it were Virtue he would not allow himself in the Neglect of other Duties.

This, again, is a false Conclusion ; for a Man may perform one Duty upon a Principle of Virtue, and Sense of Duty, and yet through Mistake, or Negligence, be deficient in others.

Such great Judges of human Nature, should consider, that even in worldly Affairs, a Man does not always act up to the same Principle in everything he does.

Will anyone say, that Avarus does not consider Gain, when he is making Bargains, because at some other Times he seems not to value Expense ?

If not, why then must Philo be looked upon as not at all influenced by a Sense of Duty in his Acts of Charity, because at some other Times and Occasions, he seems not to be governed by it.

Our present State, is a State of great Weakness and Imperfection, and our Reason, weak as it is, has a Thousand Impediments to hinder and divert its Force. In the Affairs of Civil Life, we are neither perfectly wise, nor wholly foolish ; and we are almost the same Men in the Things that relate to God. In some Instances, Reason and Religion get more Power over us, and guide us under a Sense of Duty ; whilst in other Parts of our Life, it may be very apparent, that Reason has a less Share in our Actions.

But to conclude that Reason, or a Principle of Virtue, does not influence us in any Part of our Behaviour, because it does not act equally and constantly in every other Part of our Lives, is as absurd, as to affirm, that we do not think at all in any Thing that we do, because we do not think with the same Exactness or Attention in every Thing that is done by us.

If Philo lives in the Neglect or Violation of some Duties, this shows that he is a weak, imperfect Man ; but it does not show that he is the same weak and imperfect Man, and as devoid of any Principle of Virtue, when he does his Duty, as when he neglects it : For it is as possible for him to be charitable upon a Principle of Duty, and yet fail in some other Respects, as it is possible for a Man to use his Reason in some Things, and not in others ; or to reason right in some Points, and yield to Folly in others.

So that to impute Actions seemingly virtuous, solely to natural Temper or Complexion, or some other blind Motive, because the Man is not uniform in his Life, is groundless and absurd ; all that can with any Truth be affirmed of such a Man, is this, that he is not uniform in his Actions, and that through some Mistake, or Negligence, he is not so careful of his Duty in some Respects as in others.

Our Understanding and Reason, even in Matters of mere Speculation, are well nigh as weak and inconstant, as in Points of Duty and Conscience.

Few Systems of Philosophy, but obtrude some Errors upon us with as much Assurance, as they affirm the Truth: Descartes asserted a Plenum; Sir Isaac Newton has proved a Vacuum.

Now will anyone say, that it was not the Reason or Understanding of Descartes that demonstrated so many solid Truths, because he yielded to Falsity and Error in the Doctrine of a Plenum? Yet it would be much more reasonable to affirm this, in Matters of mere Speculation, than to affirm, that in Points of Practice and Duty, a Man is in no Actions governed by Reason and Principle, because in some Instances he acts weakly, and not according to Reason.

For, produce but the true Reason why a Philosopher may be said to proceed in some Speculations according to strict Reason and Truth, and yet hold some Tenets contrary to them, and then you will show that it is possible, nay, highly probable, that a Man may, in some Points of Duty, act upon a Principle of Reason and Virtue, though in some Things he may swerve from them.

There is, I acknowledge, a great Difference in bodily Temperaments, so that one Man may be born with better Dispositions for the Practice of some Virtues than others, yet it is Reason within, that is the chief Principle that actuates all of them; for the finest Spirits are things as blind and senseless of themselves, as the Hands and Feet, or the grosser Parts of the Body.

Wit and Understanding depend much upon bodily Temperaments; yet who is so weak as to imagine, that therefore the Reason of the Mind has no Share in Arts and Sciences.

It is the same in Virtue, or at least, as to some particular Virtues; there may be a kind Disposition in the animal Spirits to produce them, but it is great Weakness to suppose that Reason and Judgment have no Part in them.

It is impossible for our stinted Capacities to explain or calculate the exact Powers, that are to be attributed to our Souls and Bodies in the performance of Actions, because we have no clear ideas of them; but we know enough, to affirm the united Operation of both, and to show that he reasons falsely, who would ascribe an Action wholly to the Body, because it appears to have some Share in it; because, supposing it to take its Rise wholly from Reason, the Union of the Soul and Body requires, that the Body should appear to have the same Part in the Production of the Action.

There are nothing more various, imperceptible, or more out of our Sight, than the Motives of human Actions. We know no more how Arguments and Opinions, act upon the Mind, or how far they contribute to our Choice, than we can tell how far the Air, and how far the Sun, operates in the Growth of Plants.

When a Free-Thinker asserts, that our religious Belief and Persuasions are not at all the Causes of human Actions, he proceeds upon as good Grounds, as if he had said, that Air is not at all the Cause of the Circulation of the Blood.

For it is as easy to show that Air has no Influence upon our Bodies, as that Reason and Opinions have no Power over our Minds.

And it is more possible to tell how far the Fluids, and how far the Solids in an human Body, contribute to bodily Action, than it is to affirm how far Opinions and Judgments, and how far Temper and Complexion, operate in human Actions.

Nay, these Gentlemen themselves, to make their Philosophy still more ridiculous, are frequently wondering at the strange and monstrous Contradictions, which they think they discover in human Nature.

As if they should say, That finding human Nature to be unaccountable, they therefore take upon them to give certain and positive Accounts of its manner of acting.

I shall be pardoned for insisting so long upon this Article, because it is that on which some celebrated Wits have spent so much Pains, to the Prejudice of Religion and Morality. It is not easy to imagine the fatal Effects that Mr. Bayle's and Esprit's Writings have had upon People's Minds, by denying the Power of Reason and Religion, and ascribing all human Actions to Complexion, natural Temper, &c.

It is an easy Thing to be a Wit, and a Philosopher, if you will but write against Religion and Virtue; for I need not say all Arguments, but all Fancies, are admired as Demonstrations on that Side; and the bolder Steps you take, the surer you are of being esteemed a Genius.

Had Mr. Bayle filled his Books with the most useful, noble Truths, he had not had half so many Admirers, as for one single Sentence, which the most thoughtless Rake might have said through the mere Assurance of his own Extravagancies.

Speaking of Fornication, I question, says he, whether one Man in a Hundred is clear of the Guilt.

Could he have said a more extravagant Thing, that had reflected more upon Morality, and the Power of Religion, he had still been more admired. It is thus that Mr. Bayle and Esprit have purchased the Esteem, and increased the Numbers, of Infidels and Libertines.

These Gentlemen are dead, and their Ashes safe, if the Death of Men implies no more than the Fall of Leaves.

What Reasons you have to appear in the same Cause of Immorality, or what Security you have against the Power of God, is, I dare say, not known to yourself.

Infidelity and Irreligion have few Topics for Reflection ; they have not so much as one Argument on their Side.

You can no more show that you are not immortal, than you can show what was doing before the Creation of the World.

To fancy that all expires with the Body, is as well supported, as if you were to fancy that there are no Beings but what are visible to your Eyes. To suppose that Man will never be called to an Account, is as much to be depended upon, as if you supposed, that there will be nothing in Being a Thousand Years hence.

Yet these are the strong Foundations of Infidelity and Profaneness ; these are the solid Principles upon which great Philosophers establish deluded (or as they call themselves) Free-thinkers.

A Revelation from God, that justifies itself from the Creation of the World ; that tells you every Truth that a wise Man would be glad to hear ; that is supported with all the Authority that an omnipotent God can give ; that is confirmed with all the Assurance that human Testimony can afford ; is of no Weight against a few bold Assertions of weak Mortals, who exceed their Fellow-Creatures only in Arrogance and Presumption.

Section III.

ONE would imagine, by what has already passed, that you had sufficiently vented your Passion upon moral Virtue, and that you had hardly any more Arrows to draw against it ; but you proceed to show us, that however you may fail in Argument, you will never be wanting in Inclination to attack it.

You set yourself with an Air of Satisfaction, as if Morality and Religion lay at your Feet, to examine into the Pulchrum and Honestum of the Ancients ; that is, 'to inquire whether there be 'any real Excellence or Worth in Things, a Pre-eminence of one Thing above another.*

And to show that there is no such Thing as any real Worth or Excellence in Things or Actions, but that all is mere Whim and Fancy, you proceed thus :

'In the Works of Nature, Worth and Excellence are as uncertain. How whimsical is the Florist! Sometimes the Tulip, sometimes the Auricula, shall engross his Esteem. What Mortal can decide which is the handsomest, abstract from the Mode in being, to wear great Buttons, or small ones?†

'In Morals, say you, there is no greater Certainty.‡

So that according to your Philosophy, he who prefers Equity to Injustice, is but like him that chooses a great Button rather than a small one; and he who prefers Fidelity to Falseness, as whimsical as the Florist, who admires the Auricula more than the Tulip.

Now if there be only this Difference between Actions, then there can be no greater Difference between Agents, the best of Men can only excel the vilest of their Race, as a Tulip may excel an Auricula.

Nay, if Truth and Falsehood be no otherwise different from one another, than as one Button differs from another, then it must follow, that there can be no greater Difference between the Author of the one, and the Author of the other.

Now, the Religion of our Country tells us, that God is Truth, and the Devil the Author of Lies.

This, Sir, you see is the direct, immediate Blasphemy of your Notions, and not drawn from them by any distant or remote Consequences.

And if I should ask you, why one should be worshipped rather than the other? I should puzzle your profound Philosophy, as much as if I asked you which was the finest Flower? for you cannot tell me that one of these Beings is really good, and the other really evil, and yet maintain, that there is no real Goodness in Truth, nor any real Evil in Lies and Falsehood.

It is utterly impossible to answer this Question, without giving up your Uncertainty in Morals, and allowing that there is something certain and immutable in the Worth and Excellence of Things and Actions.

Should anyone charge you with the grossest Villanies, and most flagrant Immoralities that were ever committed by Man, you could have no more Pretence to be angry at the Imputation, than if he had said, you were particularly fond of little Buttons.

To proceed : *'Which is the best Religion, say you, is a Question that has caused more Mischief, than all other Questions together.'

Religion never comes in your way, but it puts you in a Passion; though I daresay, you never had any harm by it in your Life. This is a heavy Charge upon Religion, and upon the best Religion, for that is it which is inquired after. You charge a great deal of Mischief to this Inquiry after the best Religion, on purpose to enhance, I suppose, your own Merit, that you may appear to do a more public Good, who endeavour to destroy the very Idea of it.

But as Mischievous as you reckon this Inquiry to be, I am of another Opinion, taken from him who made the Inquiry necessary, who is God himself.

Thou shalt have no other God besides me, was setting up the best Religion; and thou shalt not make to thyself any graven Image, &c., was a Determination against Paganism. Now I look upon the best Religion to be a Matter of great Moment, because God has commanded it; and take the Inquiry after it to be well authorised, because God has forbid all false Worship.

If you like it the worse for having this Authority, and should be better pleased with Religion, if it was some Politician's Invention, I shall only say, that you are fonder of Cheats than I am.

Again; I do not allow myself to be angry at the Inquiry after the best Religion, because I find that our blessed Saviour came into the World to teach Men the best Religion, and with the highest Rewards and Punishments to persuade Men to seek after and embrace it. This is Life eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. And again, Go ye and teach all Nations, baptizing them in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the End of the World.

This convinces me, that the Inquiry after the best Religion, is the noblest, the most happy and beneficial of all others, because it is an Inquiry after eternal Happiness: But since you take it to have done more Mischief than all other Inquiries, you know now where to charge it, you know who it was that sent Twelve Apostles, indued with resistless Power, to persuade all the Nations of the World to inquire after, and receive the one best Religion. 'Ask it, say you (i.e., which is the best Religion), at Peking, at Constantinople, at Rome, and you will receive three distinct Answers, extremely different from one another, yet all of them equally positive and peremptory. Christians are well assured of the Falsity of the Pagan and Mahometan Superstitions; but

'inquire of the several Sects they are divided into, which is the true Church of Christ? and all of them will tell you it is theirs.*'

Then comes your Golden Conclusion. 'It is manifest, then, that the hunting after this Pulcrum and Honestum, is not much better than a wild Goose Chase,' &c.

Here I observe, that very consistently indeed with yourself, having rejected all moral Virtue, and natural Religion, you treat Revelation in the same manner. Christianity and Paganism are put upon the same Foot, and the Inquiry which is the best, esteemed no better than a wild Goose Chase, &c. Is this Declaration of yours the Effect of a serious Inquiry into the Merits of different Religions? That cannot be, it reflects too much upon so fine an Understanding as yours, to suppose, that you could ever have been seriously chasing of wild Geese.

The Acuteness of your Parts, must have always prevented the Inquiry. You knew, I suppose ab origine, from your Cradle, that there was no God, or you could not have been always so clear about the Insignificance of any Religion? For if there be a God, it is more than probable that he is to be worshipped, and it is hardly to be supposed that all Ways of Worship are equally acceptable to him.

You represent the Inquiry after the best Religion, as a mere wild Goose Chase, because, if the Question is put at Peking, Constantinople, or amongst the various Sects of Christians, all of them claim the only true Worship.

Now, Sir, I will remove the Question from the Disciples and Followers, to the Authors of these Religions. You shall put the Question thus, Ask Jesus, ask Mahomet, ask some Pagan Impostor, and you will receive three distinct Answers, extremely different from one another, and yet equally positive and peremptory.

Will you stand to your Conclusion here, that therefore it is Madness to concern ourselves more about the one than the other?

Is there any Creature so absurd, as to think this an Argument against Christ, or that the Inquiry after Him is Folly, because there was one Mahomet called for Disciples?

Yet the Argument is full as just and cogent against Christ himself, as against the Religion which he has instituted; for if the Religion of Christ and that of Mahomet have nothing to distinguish them, and Christianity is to be ridiculed and despised, because there is such a Religion as Mahometanism, then it undeniably follows, that Christ, when on Earth, might be justly rejected, because there have been other Persons who have pretended to come from God.

This Argument of yours (if it proves anything) proves it impossible that there ever should be any Revelation or Religion from God, which Mankind would be obliged to receive, so long as there were either wicked Spirits, or wicked Men in the World. For evil Spirits and evil Men will have evil Designs, and will oppose the Wisdom and Providence of God, in setting up Ways of Religion suitable to their own Tempers and Designs. But according to your Argument, no Religion has any Pretence to our Regard, when once it is opposed; nor need we trouble our Heads about the Truth of any, because there is more than one that lays Claim to it; which is as good Sense, as if you were to affirm, that a Lie was a Demonstration, that there was no such thing as Truth.

Whereas, the very Possibility of a false Religion, implies the Possibility of a true one, as much as Falsehood implies the Possibility of Truth, or Wrong supposes Right.

The wisest Speech therefore that you can make to your sagacious Followers, is this:

‘Gentlemen, I would not have you to eat or drink, because Physicians differ very much about Diet, and Poisons are generally conveyed that way; nor would I have you take any Money, because there is counterfeit Coin in the World.

‘There are a great many false Accounts of Things, therefore you need not, nay, ought not to trouble yourselves about any that are true.

‘You may laugh at David, when he says, the Heavens declare the Glory of God, and the Firmament showeth his handiwork; because there is a contrary Opinion; a Fool that hath said in his Heart there is no God.

‘You need not regard Christianity, or its divine Institution, because there are other Religions at Peking and Constantinople; nor need you worship the true God, because in Egypt they worshipped Leeks and Onions: Nay, you need not hold that there is any true God, because there are People who have invented false Deities.

‘When any History is urged upon you, you may answer, That of Robinson Crusoe is called a true Account; or if anyone pretends to be positive on the side of Virtue, you may confute his Arrogance, by saying, It can never be proved that the Auricula exceeds the Tulip.

‘These are strong and short Maxims, which will support you against the Wisdom of all Ages; they confute whole Volumes of Prophets and Apostles with a Word speaking.

‘These are Doctrines that require no Study or Application, and you may believe them to be proper, by their Fitness for use. You may drink, debauch, eat, and sleep as you please, without hindering your Progress in these Doctrines. Luxury, and Wantonness will improve your Readiness; and your very Dulness will make you more acute.

‘Nay, the more you sink into Sensuality and the animal Life, the more you will feel and relish the Truth of these Sentiments. Though you are to fly from all Appearance of Truth, and avoid all Concern about any Religion, as you would avoid the Folly of chasing of wild Geese, yet you must remember, that you are my Scholars: For I am an Abstract-Thinker, and in these my abstract Speculations, you must be my diligent and dutiful Scholars. Though Christianity may be despised, because other Religions are set up against it, yet you must value me the more, for being contrary to the wisest Men of all Ages in the World.

‘Though there is nothing certain or valuable in religious Truths, though moral Virtue is the Offspring of Pride, the Invention of Philosophers, and all mere Whim and Fancy; yet my Speculations having the utmost Contrariety to all that is virtuous, moral, or religious, you may safely put your whole Trust and Confidence in them.’

This is the best Speech that you can possibly make to your deluded Followers; and I dare say, if your Principles would allow of greater Stupidity or Dulness, you would not be without a Party, who, to avoid Salvation, would join with an Enemy to Virtue, merely for the Sake of his Cause.

The Infidelity of the present Age is very great, and shows such a Contempt of sacred Things, as was hardly ever heard of before.

If one inquires into the Grounds of it, it seems founded on such an implicit Faith reposed in Men of wanton and sensual Minds, as is looked upon to be mean and slavish, when yielded to the highest Evidence in Matters of the last Moment.

To believe Moses and the Prophets, is ridiculed, because it is believing; but to be a Slave to a wanton Infidel, and blindly swear into his Opinions, is glorious and manly, because it is Free-thinking.

Deists and Free-thinkers are generally considered as Unbelievers; but upon Examination, they will appear to be Men of the most resigned and implicit Faith in the World; they would believe Transubstantiation, but that it implies a believing in God; for they never resign their Reason, but when it is to yield to something that opposes Salvation.

For the Deist's Creed has as many Articles as the Christian's, and requires a much greater Suspension of our Reason to believe them. So that if to believe Things upon no Authority, or without any Reason, be an Argument of Credulity, the Free-thinker will appear to be the most easy, credulous Creature alive. In the first place, he is to believe almost all the same Articles to be false, which the Christian believes to be true.

Now, it may easily be shown, that it requires stronger Acts of Faith to believe these Articles to be false, than to believe them to be true.

For, taking Faith to be an Assent of the Mind to some Proposition, of which we have no certain Knowledge, it will appear that the Deist's Faith is much stronger, and has more of Credulity in it than the Christian's. For instance, the Christian believes the Resurrection of the Dead, because he finds it supported by such Evidence and Authority, as cannot possibly be higher, supposing the Thing was true; and he does no more Violence to his Reason in believing it, than in supposing that God may intend to do some Things, which the Reason of Man cannot conceive how they will be effected.

On the contrary, the Deist believes there will be no Resurrection. And how great is his Faith! for he pretends to no Evidence or Authority to support it; it is a pure, naked Assent of his Mind to what he does not know to be true, and of which no Body has, or can give him any full Assurance.

So that the Difference between a Christian and a Deist, does not consist in this, that the one assents to Things unknown, and the other does not; but in this, that the Christian assents to Things unknown, on the account of Evidence; the other assents to Things unknown, without any Evidence at all.

Which shows, that the Christian is the rational Believer, and the Deist the blind Bigot.

Ask a Deist or a Free-thinker, why he believes Christianity to be an Imposture, you must not expect to have any Arguments offered you; but however, all Arguments aside, he can tell you, that the Inquiry after the best Religion has done more Mischief, than all other Inquiries together; that it is, at best, but a wild Goose Chase; he will tell you how Jesus has been called the Galilean by way of Contempt; that there are various Readings in the Scriptures; that Mr. Whiston is the most learned and sincere Divine of the Age; that he has called the present Doctrine of the Trinity an Apostasy; and says, that the present Text of the Old Testament, is not that which was used in our Saviour's Time: He may, perhaps, crack a Jest upon some Text of the New Testament, and tell you how such a one used to say, that working a Miracle, was like showing a Trick.

If you have Strength enough to maintain your Ground against such Attacks as these, the Deists can get no Power over you: But it must be confessed, that idle and foolish as these Arts appear in Point of Reason, yet they are very fatal in their Effects upon the Minds of Men.

Religion requires a serious and wise Use of our Reason, and can only recommend itself to us, when we are in a Disposition to reason and think soberly; it preserves its Power over our Minds no longer, than whilst we consider it as the most serious, important, and sacred Thing in the World.

Hence it appears, why we are generally so little affected with Religion, because we are seldom in a State of sober thinking. The Concerns of the World keep our Spirits in a constant Hurry, and prevent our judging rightly of those Things, which are not to be judged of, but by cool Reason.

Every one knows, that Sickness, Adversity, and the Approach of Death, are advantageous Seasons for the Truths of Religion to affect us; whereas they carry no other Advantage, than as they bring a Man into such a State, as disposes him to think seriously. For this Reason, they who only laugh at Religion, may be said to have used the strongest Argument against it, for there is no coming at it any other Way; it is only to be attacked by little Jest, lewd flings of Wit, such as may betray the Mind into Levity, and corrupt the Imagination, which so far as it is effected, so far is the Power of Religion lessened.

It is not the Deist's Business to reason soberly, and consider the Weight and Moment of Things with Exactness; for, to reason soberly, is to act against himself, and put his Reader into that State of Mind, in which Religion has its chief Force.

But idle Stories about Gods and Goddesses, and pagan Mysteries, saucy Jest, lewd Innuendoes, and Nick-names given to serious Things, serve the Cause of Infidelity, much better, than any Arguments it has yet found out.

For these not only serve to confound and distract the Mind, and lessen the Difference of Things, but they also gratify and engage the most immoral and wicked Men, as they furnish them with a Confutation of Religion at so cheap a Rate.

How many fine Gentlemen must have been forced to have owned themselves Christians, had not such short Confutations of Christianity been provided to their Hands! But as the Cause is now managed, no one can be too dull, senseless, or debauched, to be a powerful Deist; a poor inflamed Wretch, who never had the Use of his Reason in his Life, may easily call Religion a Dulcinea del Tobosa, and all who would procure any regard to it, Saint Errants; and when he has done this, he may reckon himself a great Genius, and to have shown as much Learning in favour of Deism, as the first Rate Infidel of the Age.

How many lively Beaux had buried their Parts in Swearing and Obscenity, had not all Jest upon Scripture been allowed as true Proofs of Deism and Politeness!

And though the Fraternity now boasts of its Numbers (as every Vice if it could speak might do the same) yet, if no one was to be allowed to be a Deist, till he had examined the Truths and Authority of Religion, as he would examine the Title to an Estate, even the present Age, would be able to show more Squarers of the Circle, or Discoverers of the Longitude, than Professors of Deism.

Nay, was one to ask the most philosophical amongst them, to show the great Danger of being a good Christian, or the fatal Consequences of living in Expectation of the Resurrection, and Judgment to come; was he asked to show the certain Safety of Infidelity, or why an Infidel can be no Sufferer for rejecting the Offers of the Gospel; he could give you as plain an Answer, as if you had asked what State this Globe of Earth will be in, five thousand Years hence.

But indeed, it seems needless to observe, that Prudence and common Sense have no Hand in Infidelity. Self-murder does not more directly prove Lunacy, than Infidelity proves the loss of Reason.

There is no one that seems more to depend upon the Folly and Madness of his Readers, than you do.

You tell them, that you are a mere Animal governed by Appetites over which you have no Power; that is, you describe yourself as a Machine that would look well in a Bridle, and then pretend to talk of God, and Providence, and Religion, and Morality, and to pierce into the inmost nature of Things and Actions, with as much Ease, as if you were some superior Form, that was made up of pure Wisdom and Intelligence.

But the thing is, you knew what side you had chosen, and that if you were not wanting in Impiety, Lewdness, and Reproaches upon Virtue, you might abound in Nonsense as much as you pleased.

And indeed it must be confessed, that as hardly any Authority is sufficient to recommend a Person, that comes from God, to do us good; so is there scarce any Folly great enough to expose another, that comes a Missioner from the Kingdom of Darkness to do us Harm.

Section IV.

YOU are at last so sensible of the Abilities, which you have discovered, in laying open the Mysteries of human Nature, that you think it but a necessary piece of Civility, to make an Apology to the World, for showing such a superior Knowledge.

Thus say you, 'What Hurt do I do to Man, if I make him more known to himself than he was before?'

'But we are so desperately in Love with Flattery, that we can never relish a Truth that is mortifying.'

To prove the Justice of this Remark, you say, 'I do not believe the Immortality of the Soul would even have found so general a Reception in human Capacities as it has, had it not been a pleasing one, that extolled and was a Compliment to the whole Species.'*

This Remark supposes that the Mortality of the Soul is a Truth, for you make our not believing it to be Mortal, a Proof that we cannot relish a Truth that is mortifying. You also impute our Opinion of the Soul's Immortality, to a desperate love of Flattery; which is giving it as sure a Mark of an Error, as you could well have thought of.

The reasonableness of this Remark, is founded upon that Advantage and Dignity which arise from Immortality; this is what induces you to think that its Reception in human Capacities is owing to a love of Flattery.

You might have made the same Remark upon the Belief of the Being and Providence of God, that they had never had so general a Reception in human Capacities, were not Men desperately in love with Flattery, and not able to relish a Truth that is mortifying.

For the Being and Providence of God, are the most pleasing Truths, and more extol and elevate Man's Nature and Condition, than anything else; and whilst we assert the Providence of God, we assert our own Happiness, as being the Care and Concern of so great and glorious a Nature.

But how ought that Man to be treated, who should bring the Belief of a Divine Being as an Instance of the Power of Flattery over human Nature, or allege the Doctrine of Providence as a Proof, that we cannot relish a Truth that is mortifying.

Yet this would be as well, as to instance, as you have done, in the Immortality of the Soul. For it is as reasonable to rejoice in the Immortality of our Souls, as in the Being of God; and it is as impious to say, that we hold its Immortality, because we cannot relish a Truth that is mortifying, as to say that we believe the Providence of God for the same Reason.

What an Aversion must you have to the Force of this Principle, that when you were to show, that we cannot relish a Truth that is mortifying, you could like no Instance so well, as the general disbelief of the Soul's Mortality? Can it be supposed that you would have instanced in this Opinion, if you had not wished, that it should lose its Force upon Men's Minds, and be no longer considered as the corner Stone of Religion, but as a Notion founded in the Falseness, Pride, and Flattery of Man's Nature?

Was anyone ever so angry as the Macedonian Hero's Vanity of being a God, need he have reproached him more, than by imputing it to a desperate love of Flattery?

Yet this is the tender Method, in which you have chosen to expose the Belief of the Soul's Immortality, as owing to a desperate love of Flattery.

You will perhaps say, Have I denied the Soul's Immortality?

In express Terms you have not denied it; such a flat denial would have signified much less than what you have said.

You knew very well, that to impute the Belief of it to Falseness and Flattery, was the best Way of denying it.

It is rejected here in a manner that highly suits the Temper of Irreligion, by being considered not only as false, but as arising from the basest Qualities of human Nature, Pride and a desperate Love of Flattery.

These Things serve not only to raise a Disbelief, but to excite an Indignation against a Principle owing to such reproachful Causes; and what is still a greater Point gained, they teach People to look with Contempt and Dislike on those Persons and that Religion, which teach such a Principle.

Our blessed Saviour saith, I am the Resurrection and the Life, he that believeth in me shall never die.

Now, according to your Philosophy, this Speech of our Saviour's, must be reckoned an artful Application to the Weakness and Vanity of Human Nature, an Address to the blind Side of Man, to increase his Love of Flattery, and keep him from a true Knowledge of himself.

For if Man believes the Immortality of his Soul, through a desperate Love of Flattery, certainly he who comes to encourage and establish such a Belief, comes to encourage and establish that Immoderate Love of Flattery.

Nay, this Doctrine of yours, not only serves to expose the Opinion of the Immortality of the Soul, and reproaches the Christian Religion which teaches it, but it prepares a Man to be Proof against all Doctrines of Religion that have any Happiness in them; for whatever is believed or practised that tends any way to raise or exalt the Condition of Man, is equally subject to this Reproach, that it is received through an excessive Fondness of Flattery.

So that your wise Philosophy comes to this, that if there was no Honour or Happiness in Religion, no Greatness to be acquired by our obeying God, it could not be charged upon our Pride and Vanity; but since Religion is in order to Happiness, and since our worshipping of God, implies our having a great and glorious Friend and Benefactor, such a Religion may be owing to a Vice of our Nature, a desperate Love of Flattery.

And the same may be said of every virtuous Action, that it is practised through a desperate Love of Flattery, in as much as Virtue is supposed to make us Friends and Favourites of God, and so dignifies and exalts our State.

Nay, this way of arguing proves, that the greater and more glorious the Idea is, which we form of God, the more we may be influenced by an ill Motive; for the greater and more glorious we represent the Nature of God, the more we raise and dignify ourselves, who are related to so great a Being, and are in Covenant with him.

So that to clear ourselves of a desperate Love of Flattery, and to show that we can relish Truths that are mortifying, we should conceive very low and mean Notions of God, and such as would make it neither our Honour nor Happiness to worship him.

Such a Religion as this, that had nothing in it worthy of God or Men, might, according to your Account, be owing to some rational Principle, and not capable of being imputed to the Pride or Vanity of Man's Nature.

For since you impute the Belief of the Soul's Immortality, to a desperate Love of Flattery, because such Belief sets us out to great Advantage, and adds Dignity to our Nature, the same Imputation is equally chargeable upon every Doctrine, or Practice, that promises any Happiness or Honour to us; and no Religion or Opinions can be free from that Charge, but such as are of no Benefit or Advantage to us.

From this therefore we may believe, that had we a Religion which proposed nothing worthy of God, or beneficial to Man, the Deists and Wits of your Size, would all of them turn Priests, and devoutly wait at its Altars.

To speak now a Word or two concerning Pride.

Pride is an Error or a Vice, as Covetousness is a Vice ; it is a notable Desire, ill directed : It is a right Desire, earnestly to desire Happiness ; but that Desire is sinful, when it is wholly set upon Gold, or any other false Good.

So a Desire of Greatness is an excellent Desire, a right Turn of Mind ; but when it fixes upon a false Honour, it is a vicious Irregularity. To desire the highest Exaltation of which our Nature is capable, is as right a Disposition, as to desire to be as like to God as we can.

Now, had you said that the Belief of the Soul's Immortality, was assisted and strengthened in us through a Desire of Greatness, you had said as reasonable a Thing, as to say, that Christianity makes a stronger Impression upon the Minds of Men through a Desire of Happiness.

For had we not these Dispositions, neither Religion, nor anything else that was of any Advantage to us, could take any hold of us : For, what would the Happiness or Greatness of any Proposal signify to Beings, whose Natures were not affected with them ?

Now, to say that Religion is better received through this Tendency of our Nature, is no more a Reproach, than it is to say that our Understanding and Reason recommend Religion to us.

For these Dispositions or Inclinations constitute the Excellence of our Nature, and give us all the Dignity that we have.

It being as right a Judgment of the Mind, to desire to be as like to God as our Natures will allow, as it is to prefer Truth to Falsehood.

But to impute our Belief of the Immortality of the Soul to Pride, is as ridiculous, as to impute our Desire of eternal Happiness to Avarice.

For Pride, considered as a Vice, is no more the Cause of our Approbation of Immortality, than Avarice is the Cause of our setting our Affection on Things above.

Pride is as earthly and down-looking a Vice as Covetousness, and as truly sinks the Soul into a State of Meanness.

A Delight in false Honour as much debases and hinders the Mind from aspiring after its true Greatness, as a Fondness for empty Riches keeps the Soul averse from the Approbation of her true Good. That this is the Effect of Pride, that it debases the Mind, and makes it unable to relish its true Greatness, that it unfits it for the Reception of Doctrines which exalt and raise our Nature, may be also learnt from Him, who came to lead us unto all Truth.

Speaking of vain-glorious Men, says our blessed Saviour, How *can ye believe, which receive Honour one of another, and seek not that Honour, which cometh from God alone?

But you make the Pride of Man, the Cause of his believing divine Truths, though they are as opposite to one another, as Avarice and Heavenly-mindedness, Light and Darkness. To make some Apology for yourself, you say, 'What Hurt do I do to a Man, if I make him more known to himself than he was before?'

You should have put the Question thus: What Hurt do I do to a Man, if I make him more vicious than he was before, if I deprave his Understanding, and lead him into a Contempt and Dislike of the strongest Principles of Religion?

For if there is any Danger either to yourself or others, in corrupting their Minds, and destroying the Motives to Religion and Virtue, you are capable of no other Apology, but what that Being may make, who goeth about as a roaring Lion, seeking whom he may devour.

The Arrow that flieth by Day, and the Pestilence that walketh in Darkness, are mere Blessings, if compared to the Man who infuses vicious Opinions into the Mind, which weaken the Power of Religion, and make Men less devoted to the Worship and Service of God.

How can you say, that you have only made Man more known to himself, by teaching him that the general Belief of the Soul's Immortality, is owing to a desperate Love of Flattery?

Have you proved, that he does not know himself, if he thinks it is owing to any other Cause? Have you so much as attempted to show, that it can have no other Foundation? That it is not founded in Reason, Religion, and the Attributes of God?

But proving (I recollect) is no Talent of yours; and if you may be allowed to shine in anything, it is in loose Insinuations, positive Assertions, and vain Conjectures.

Section V.

YOU come now to give us a Taste of your Skill in Phraseology, or the Force and Propriety of Words. All sorts of Learning seem to be at your Service, and you are so constant to yourself, as to make them all conspire in one and the same Design against Religion. Hope, being a Word of great Consolation in the Christian

* St. John v. 44.

Religion, you have pitched upon that, as most deserving the kind Assistance of your learned Hand.

' All hope, say you, includes Doubt; a silver Inkhorn may pass in Speech, because every Body knows what we mean by it; but a certain Hope cannot; the Epithet destroys the Essence of the Substantive; it is palpable Nonsense. The Reason therefore why it is not so shocking to some, to hear a Man speak of certain Hope, as if he should talk of hot Ice, or liquid Oak, is not because there is less Nonsense contained in the first, than in either of the latter, but because the Word Hope, I mean the Essence of it, is not so clearly understood by the Generality of the People, as the Words and Essences of Ice and Oak are.'*

What a Triumph is here over Religion! And with how much Ease do you reject an Article of Faith with a Noun Substantive!

In our Burial Service we have these Words, In sure and certain Hope of a Resurrection, &c.

This it seems cannot pass in Speech, without the Destruction of a Substantive; it is shocking, and palpable Nonsense.

Let it first be observed, that Hope implies the Belief, Dependence, or Expectation of something that shall come to pass. Now I should think that a Thing may as well be expected with Certainty, as Uncertainty; and that its being certain to happen, is no Inconsistency in the Expression. It can hardly be denied, but that a Man may be certain that some Things will never happen; and where is the Contradiction of supposing him as certain that some Things will happen?

But to come to your own Arguments.

All Hope, say you, includes Doubt. This as much contradicts my Understanding, as if you had said, that all Trust includes Diffidence; and I cannot trust a Man, unless I distrust him. The Apostle says, By Hope we are saved; according to you, he must mean, by Doubting we are saved; for if Hope necessarily includes Doubting, and Hope be necessary to Salvation, it evidently follows, that Doubting is necessary to Salvation; and every Exhortation to hope in God, is an exhortation to doubt of God.

Our blessed Saviour said, If ye have Faith, and doubt not, &c. Now had you been present at this saying, you could have shown the Impossibility of what he exhorted them to; that Faith or Hope implied Doubting; and that to talk of certain Hope or Faith, was as shocking to a fine Understanding, as to talk of hot Ice, or liquid Oak.

Certain Hope, you say, is palpable Nonsense, because the Epithet destroys the Essence of the Substantive.

So that Doubting is the Essence of Hope, and consequently whatever else belongs to Hope, is only accidental; the Essence of Hope is Doubting.

Now if Doubting is the Essence of Hope, then where there is the most Doubting, there must be the most of Hope; for where there is most of the Essence of a Thing, there must necessarily be most of the Thing itself.

Now it seems to me as ridiculous, to make Doubting the Essence of Hope, as to make Fear the Essence of Courage. For Hope, so far as it goes, as much excludes Doubting as Courage, so far as it extends, banishes Fear. There may be a weak Hope which is mixed with Doubt, as there may be a half Courage that is attended with Fear, but a thorough Hope as truly rejects Doubt, as a perfect Courage shakes off all Fear. And it is just such shocking Nonsense to talk of a certain Hope, as to speak of a fearless Courage: And there is just as much Murder of the Substantive in one Case, as the other.

Hope, or Expectation, does not imply Uncertainty, but Futurity, that the things expected, are not in being, but are to come to pass; this is all that is of the Essence of Hope; it is only the Futurity of things that makes it.

Let the things come to pass, and the Hope ceases, this is the only way of destroying it. But whether the things to come be with Certainty, or Uncertainty expected, no more destroys that Disposition of Mind, which is called Hope, than the Passion of Fear is destroyed, by exerting itself reasonably, or unreasonably.

Hope is uncertain, not because we cannot hope or expect with Certainty, but because the things we hope for are generally not in our Power, so as we can be secure of the Event.

But you ridiculously suppose, that Hope, or Expectation, as a Faculty of the Mind, necessarily includes Uncertainty, as if a Man cannot expect or hope for that, which he is sure will answer his Expectation; or that he must cease to expect things, because he has certain grounds to expect them. These are the Absurdities which you plunge into, rather than allow a certain Hope of the Resurrection of the Dead.

Hope is as the things hoped for. In uncertain things it is uncertain. But if God is pleased to inform us of things to come, we are with certain Hope and Expectation to depend upon them.

Agreeable to this, St Paul says, In hope of eternal Life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the World began.

Here we have an Apostle's Authority for a certain Hope, made as undeniable as the Veracity of God.

But this must be very shocking to a Gentleman of your refined

Understanding; and must give you a farther uneasiness, to behold the Destruction of a whole Noun Substantive, to establish only an Article of Religion.

You compare certain Hope, to hot Ice, or liquid Oak, and say that the Expressions would be equally shocking, were the Nature of Hope as well understood, as the Nature of Ice and Oak.

Had you not been used to understand everything wrong, you had never made this Observation; for the contrary to this happens to be true, that the Expression is not so shocking in one Case as the other, because the Nature of Hope is well understood, as that of Ice, &c.

It is not shocking to say certain Hope, because Hope is known to be founded upon some degrees of Assurance.

But does Ice suppose some degrees of Heat in order to its Existence? Is Ice hotter or colder, as Hope is more or less assured? Hope is stronger and better, the more it has of Assurance, and the less it is opposed with Doubts; but is Ice the stronger and harder, the more it has of Heat, or the less it is surrounded with Cold?

Your Comparison also of certain Hope, to liquid Oak, is equally ingenious and worthy of yourself; for it supposes that an Oak changes from solid to liquid, as Hope fluctuates from Doubts to Belief. For were not an Oak as various in its Nature, as to liquid and solid, as Hope is various in its Nature, as to Doubt and Assurance, it must be shocking Nonsense, to make a liquid Oak the same thing as an assured Hope.

I have been the longer upon this Point, because it is levelled at the very Foundation of our Religion, and would teach People to doubt of its greatest Articles, through the mere force of a Word or two, and for the sake of a Noun Substantive.

Section VI.

I HAD now taken my Leave of you, if the Letter you published in the London Journal, in defence of your Book, had not been just put into my Hands.

Having seen your Talent at Apology, I expected no great Matter from you in that Way; but however I am now convinced, that your Book gives us but a small Essay of your Abilities, and that you can exceed it as much as you please.

For who would imagine that the Author of so poor a Rhapsody, could produce such masterly Strokes as these in the Defence of it.

'My Vanity, say you, I never could conquer, so well as I could wish, and I am too proud to commit Crimes.'

Surely no one after this will venture to lay anything to your Charge, since great must be your Innocence, if Pride be the Guardian of it.

But if any one should chance to humble you, you must then fall into a defenceless State. But if you are not to be proved guilty, till you can be shown to be deficient in Pride, it may require some time to effect it.

Since you ground your Vindication so much upon your Pride, it may not be amiss to recollect the Definition you have given us of it in your own Book. 'Pride, say you, is that natural Faculty, by which every Mortal, that has any Understanding, overvalues and imagines better things of himself, than any impartial Judge, thoroughly acquainted with all his Qualities and Circumstances, would allow him.'*

A pretty Qualification indeed, for a Man to found his Innocence upon! Yet you (with a more than ordinary Brightness) own that you are governed by this Vice, to prove yourself to be Faultless.

Should a blind Man who had lost his Way, allege his Blindness, as a Proof that he could not lose it, he would show that he was just as well acquainted with the Advantages of Blindness, as you are with the Effects of Pride.

The next ingenious Step that you take, is this: 'The Fable of the Bees, say you, was designed for the Entertainment of People of Knowledge and Education;—it is a Book of severe and exalted Morality, that contains a strict Test of Virtue.'

Had you said that the Author was a Seraphim, and that he never was any nearer the Earth than the fixed Stars, I should have thought you in as sober a Way as you now appear to be in.

That you intended it for the Entertainment of People of Knowledge and Education, is what I cannot say is false, for if your Pride is such as you assert, you may be capable of intending anything; I know of nothing too monstrous for you to go about.

But if you can believe, that you have wrote a Book of severe and exalted Morality, you must not laugh at those who believed Stocks and Stones to be Objects of Worship, or took a Leek or an Onion to be a Deity.

You are happy in this, that you have made an Assertion which an Adversary cannot further expose, because there is no superior Degree of Extravagance to which it can be compared.

For if a Person will write a Book to prove, that Man is a mere Animal, and that moral Virtue is the political Offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride, and then call it a Book of severe and exalted Morality, he has this Satisfaction, that no Skill can aggravate his Nonsense.

‘Such as it is, you say, you are satisfied it has diverted Persons of great Probity and Virtue.’

Pray, Sir, how does this appear? Where do you find these People of great Virtue? When you wrote your Book, you knew of no such People. Virtue was then nowhere to be found: For you tell us, that having in vain sought for it in the World, you at last went to the Convents, but even there it had no Existence. But now, it seems, rather than want an Apology, you will suppose even what confutes your Book, and what you most hate, that there is such a Being as a Man of great Virtue.

‘I lay it down, you add, as a first Principle, that in all Societies, great or small, it is the Duty of every Member of it to be good; that Virtue ought to be encouraged, Vice discountenanced, the Laws obeyed, and the Transgressors punished; and then, you say, there is not a Line in the whole Book that contradicts this Doctrine.’

This comes so oddly from you, that it need not be exposed to the Reader; if you had intended it as a public Recantation of all that you had delivered before, there had been something in it; but to say, that there is not a Line in your Book that contradicts this, is trusting too much to the Weakness of your Readers: For, can you pretend to have a first Principle, or to talk of Duty or Virtue, after you have declared, that the moral Virtues are all a Cheat, by making them the political Offspring which Flattery begot upon Pride?

Can you recommend Goodness, who have compared the Pulchrum and Honestum in Actions, to the whimsical Distinctions of Flowers and made the Difference between Good and Evil as fanciful, as the Difference between a Tulip and an Auricula.

When therefore you pretend to lay it down as a first Principle, that it is the Duty of every Man to be good, &c.

It amounts to as much, as if you had said, Having shown, that there is nothing but Fancy in the Preference of Flowers, I lay it down as a first Principle, that it is the Duty of every Man to admire the Tulip above all other Flowers; that the Love of Tulips ought to be encouraged; and that of Auriculas discountenanced, &c.

But however, lest any of your Readers should imagine that you meant something more than this, and to clear yourself from all Suspicion of Gravity or Seriousness in your Recommendation of Virtue and Goodness, you immediately add this Explication of yourself.

*'Would you banish Fraud and Luxury, prevent Profaneness and Irreligion, and make the Generality of the People charitable, good, and virtuous ; break down the Printing-Presses, melt the Founts, and burn all the Books in the Island ; knock down Foreign Trade, prohibit all Commerce with Strangers, and permit no Ships to go to Sea ; restore to the Clergy, the King, and the Barons, their ancient Privileges, Prerogatives, and Possessions ; build new Churches, and convert all the Coin you can come at, into sacred Utensils ; erect Monasteries and Alms-houses in Abundance, and let no Parish be without a Charity-School ; let the Clergy preach Abstinence and Self denial to others, and take what Liberty they please for themselves : let no Man be made Lord-Treasurer but a Bishop.—By such pious Endeavours, and wholesome Regulations, the Scene would soon be altered.—Such a Change would influence the Manners of the Nation, and render them temperate, honest, and sincere ; and from the next Generation we might reasonably expect an harmless, innocent, and well meaning People, that would never dispute the Doctrine of Passive-Obedience, nor any other Orthodox Principles, but be submissive to Superiors, and unanimous in Religious Worship.'

It must be owned, that you never so much exceeded yourself as in this Flight of your Oratory. And had your teeming Imagination been able to have produced one more Evil or Folly, it had been added to the lovely Idea you have formed of a People intending to live like Christians.

He that can now suspect you guilty of one sober Thought in relation to Religion, or Morality, must be acknowledged to be very senseless.

For, mention your Regard to Religion or Virtue as often as you please, you have here taken care to assure us, that you wish their Prosperity as heartily, as you wish to see the Kingdom full of Monasteries, and all our Money converted into sacred Utensils.

But I beg pardon for supposing, that what you have so clearly said, to show your Abhorrence of Religion, and Contempt of Virtue, needs any illustration.

But to carry on the Banter, you still add, 'If I have shown the Way to worldly Greatness, I have always without Hesitation preferred the Road that leads to Virtue.'

Had there been one Instance of this kind in your Book, I suppose you would have referred us to it. But enough has been already observed, to show what Virtue implies in your System. I shall however produce one Passage to show, how you always and without Hesitation prefer the Road that leads to Virtue.

Speaking of Lust you say, 'The artful Moralists have taught us cheerfully to subdue it. And then cry out, Oh! the mighty Prize we have in view for all our Self-denial! Can any Man be so serious as to abstain from Laughter, when he considers that for so much Deceit and Insincerity practised upon ourselves as well as others, we have no other Recompense, than the vain Satisfaction of making our Species appear more exalted, and remote from that of other Animals than it really is, and we in our own Consciences know it to be.'*

Thus it is, that without Hesitation you give your Approbation of Virtue; you make the Moderation of our Passions to be even a Sin against our own Consciences, as acting deceitfully, contrary to what we know becomes us.

You make Self-denial, or any Restraints which distinguish us from Brutes, to be so ridiculous a Thing, as ought to excite the Laughter and Contempt of every Creature.

Thus is your prostitute Pen wantonly employed, to put out, as far as you can, the Light of Reason and Religion, and deliver up mankind to Sensuality and Vileness.

Should I now lament the miserable Fruits of Free-thinking, which thus tend not only to set us loose from the Regards of Religion, but to destroy whatever is reasonable, decent, or comely in human Nature, though as a Friend of Religion I might be censured by some, yet surely as an advocate for the Dignity of Man, I might be pardoned by all.

But is it our peculiar Unhappiness as Clergymen, that if we sit loose to the Duties of Religion, we are doubly reproached, and if we firmly assert its Doctrines, we fall under as great Condemnation.

In all other Causes, a Man is better received, because it is his proper Business to appear, yet that which should recommend our Pleadings, happens to make them less regarded: We are worse heard, because God has made it our Duty to speak.

But I wave this Topic; for if, when we assert the common Doctrines of Christianity, we are thought too much interested, we shall hardly be reckoned less selfish, when we plead for common Equity towards ourselves.

You have therefore picked out a right Body of Men to ridicule; and your manner of doing it shows you knew, that no want of Wit would make you less successful.

We often suffer from Porters and Carmen, who venture to be smart upon us, through an Assurance, that we must lose by replying. A Security like this has encouraged you to be very liberal of your Mirth, and such Mirth as might pass for Dulness upon any other Subject.

I will not say how infinite your Wit has been upon our Dress and Habit, or what uncommon Vivacity you have shown upon the Beaver Hat, whether new or old.

Had you spared our 'Majestic Gait, slick Faces kept constantly shaved, handsome Nails diligently pared, and Linen transparently curious,'* nothing of the Sublime had been found in your Book. It must be confessed, this is a heavy Charge against the Priesthood; but we may see you were loath to enhance it, or you might have mentioned the black Eyes, the high Foreheads, and the dimpled Chins, which may be proved upon several of them, which they show in the Face of the World at Noon-Day.

But since I have charged you with Wit, I do not think it fair to leave you under so gross an Accusation, without something to support your Spirits. Read therefore the following Words of the most excellent Bruyere.

Have the Libertines, says he, who value themselves so much upon the Title of Wits, have they Wit enough to perceive, that they are only called so by Irony?

You can hardly relish anything of mine, after this taste of so fine a Writer, I shall therefore trouble you but little further.

If you wonder, that I have taken no Notice of the dreadful Evils you charge upon Charity-Schools, and the sad Effects which such catechising Houses must have upon a Kingdom that is both Christian and Protestant, I must tell you that I purposely avoided it. Some Things are so plain, that it is yielding too much, to offer to defend them.

Christians, I hope, will have so much common Sense as to know, that no Christian can call such Houses an evil; and as to Complaints from other hands, Who would not wish that the Enemies of Christianity may have every Day more reason to complain?

As to your Part, they will observe, that in these very Writings, where you complain of the Evil of Charity-Schools, you make moral Virtue a Cheat, the Offspring of Pride, and the Inquiry after the best Religion, but a wild Goose Chase. A very worthy Person indeed to talk of either Good or Evil!

Whilst we can preserve but the very Name of Religion, a charitable Contribution to educate Children in it, must be reckoned amongst our best Works.

Charity-Schools can never need a Defence in a Kingdom, that boasts of having the Scriptures in the vulgar Tongue. For if it be our Glory and Happiness to have the Bible in English, surely it must be in some Degree glorious, to teach our Natives how to read it.

You say, If anyone can show the least Tittle of Blasphemy or Profaneness in your Book, or any Thing tending to Immorality, or a Corruption of Manners, you will burn it yourself, at any Time or Place your Adversary shall appoint. I appoint the first Time, and the most public Place, and if you keep your Word, shall be your humble Servant.

Postscript.

HAVING in my Second Section mentioned Mr. Bayle, as the principal Author amongst those, whose Parts have been employed to arraign and expose Virtue and Religion, as being only the blind Effects of Complexion, natural Temper, and Custom, &c. It may not be improper to recommend to his Admirers, the following Instances of that Gentleman's great Penetration and Clearness on this Subject.

Mr. Bayle engaged in a Cause, where he found it necessary to assert, that a Society of Atheists might be as virtuous Men, as a Society of other People professing Religion; and to maintain this Opinion, he was further obliged to declare, that religious Opinions and Beliefs, had no Influence at all upon Men's Actions.

This Step was very necessary to be taken; for if religious Opinions or Beliefs were allowed to have any Influence upon our Actions, then it must also have been allowed, that a Society of Atheists must have been less virtuous, than a Society of People holding religious Opinions.

Mr. Bayle therefore roundly denied, that religious Opinions have any Influence upon us, and set himself to prove, that Complexion, natural Temper, Custom, &c., are the only Causes of our Actions.

'Thus he says, he is persuaded that Man is that kind of Creature, who with all his boasted Reason, never acts by the Principles of his Belief.* Again, It cannot be denied, that Man acts continually against Principles. And again, I pretend to have demonstrated that Men never act by Principle.'

* Miscell. Reflect.

Mr. Bayle has often diverted himself with the Unreasonableness of those Divines, who first declare the Sublimity and Inconceivableness of the Christian Mysteries, and then pretend to explain them. But they may laugh at him in their Turn, who happens to be as weak and unreasonable even in his Philosophic Chair.

For he can give it you out as an undeniable Maxim, 'that the Mind of Man being subject to infinite Caprice and Variety, no Rule can be laid down concerning it, not liable to a thousand Objections ;'* and then tell you he has demonstrated, that Man never acts by Principle: As if he had said, I give you here a certain and infallible Rule concerning the Mind of Man, not liable to one Objection, though I assure you, that no Rule can be laid down, not liable to a thousand Objections.

Mr. Bayle, to show that his Society of Atheists might be as virtuous as other Men, affirms, 'that a wicked Inclination neither arises from our Ignorance of God's Existence, nor is checked by the Knowledge of a supreme Judge who punishes and rewards. And that an Inclination to Evil, belongs no more to a Heart void of the Sense of God, than one possessed with it, and that one is under no looser a Rein than the other.†

With how much Reason and Freedom of Mind Mr. Bayle asserts this, may be seen from what he says in other Places. Thus in his Historical Dictionary he can tell you, 'that there is nothing so advantageous to Man, if we consider either the Mind or the Heart, as to know God rightly."‡

He can commend the Saying of Silius Italicus, as very pertinently spoken of the Carthaginians, 'Alas, miserable Mortals! your Ignorance of divine Nature, is the original Cause of your Crimes. Again, I will not deny there have been Pagans, who making the utmost Use of their Notion of the divine Nature, have rendered it the Means of abating the Violence of their Passions.'§

These Contradictions need no Illustration; I shall pass on to show you a few more of the same Kind.

Mr. Bayle affirms, that Man never acts by the Principles of his Belief. Yet see how often he teaches the contrary. Speaking of the strange Opinions and Practices of some Pagans, who, though persuaded of a Providence, denied nothing to their Lusts and Passions; he gives this as the Reason of their Conduct, 'Either that they must suppose the Gods approved these Ways, or else that one need not trouble one's self whether they did or no.'||

See here this elevated Free-Thinker asserting, that Man never

* Miscell. Reflect., p. 279.

† Ibid., p. 294.

‡ Vol. iv., p. 2683.

acts by his Belief, and yet making it necessary, that the Pagans must have had such or such a Belief, or else they could never have acted as they did.

Instances of this Kind are very numerous. In the Article of the Sadducees, he says, 'The good Life of the Sadducees might have been an Effect of their believing a Providence. Again, the Orthodox will feel the Activity of that Impression, as well as the Sadducees, and being moreover persuaded of a future State, Religion will have a greater Influence upon their Lives.*

Here a Belief of a Providence in this World, is allowed to be the Cause of a good Life, and a Persuasion of a future State affirmed to have a still greater Influence upon our Lives; and yet the same great Reasoner demonstrates, that Men always act without any Regard to their Beliefs or Persuasions.

To demonstrate that Beliefs and Opinions have no part in the forming our Lives, Mr. Bayle appeals to the Lives of Christians; 'For, were it otherwise, says he, how is it possible that Christians, so clearly instructed from Revelation supported by so many Miracles, that they must renounce their Sins, in order to be eternally happy, and to prevent eternal Misery, should yet live as they do, in the most enormous Ways of Sin and Disobedience?'

This is Mr. Bayle's invincible Demonstration, that Beliefs and Persuasions have no Effect upon us, and that Man never acts by Principle; though you shall see that he can as well demonstrate the contrary to this.

In the Article of Sommona-codom, speaking of this Doctrine, viz., 'That an old Sinner who has enjoyed all the Pleasures of Life, will be eternally happy, provided he truly repents on his Death-Bed;' he makes this Remark, 'Doubtless, this may be the Reason why the Fear of God's Judgments, or the Hopes of his Rewards, make no great Impressions upon worldly People.†

Here you see this learned Philosopher urges the Lives of Christians, as a Demonstration that Men never act by Persuasion; and yet tells you, as a Thing past all doubt, that they live as they do, through a Persuasion that a Death-Bed Repentance will set all right.

Take another Instance of the same kind.

Religion and Principle have no Effect upon us: 'This must be the Case, says Mr. Bayle, or the ancient Pagans, who were under the Yoke of numberless Superstitions, continually employed in appeasing the Anger of their Idols, awed by infinite Prodigies, and firmly persuaded the Gods dispensed Good or Evil, according to the Life they lead, had been restrained from all the abominable Crimes they committed.‡

* Hist. Dict.

† Ibid.

‡ Miscell. Reflect., 275.

This Paragraph is to show, that religious Persuasions have no Effect upon us, because if they had, the Persuasions of the Pagans must have made them good Men.

But Mr. Bayle here forgets, that he himself has affirmed, that the 'Pagan Religion not only taught ridiculous Things, but that it was besides a Religion, authorising the most abominable Crimes.'* That they were led to their Crimes by their very Religion; that it must have been a Point of Faith with them, that to make themselves Imitators of God, they ought to be Cheats, Envious, Fornicators, Adulterers.

So that this Philosopher shows, with great Consistency, that the Religion of the Pagans engaged them in abominable Crimes; and that the Pagans did not act by their Religion, because they were guilty of abominable Crimes.

But I proceed no further at present; this Specimen of Mr. Bayle's Absurdities and Contradictions on this very Article, where he has been most admired, may suffice to show, that if he has gained upon Men's Minds, it has been by other Arts than those of clear Reasoning. I would not by this insinuate, that he was not a Man of fine Parts; Bellarmin's Absurdities, though ever so many, still leave room to acknowledge his great Abilities. This seems to have been Mr. Bayle's Case; he was no Jesuit or Papist, but he was as great a Zealot in his way. Bellarmin contradicted himself for the sake of Mother Church; and Mr. Bayle contradicted himself as heartily, for the sake of an imaginary Society, a Society of Atheists.

I have inserted these few contradictory Passages, for the sake of such as are Proselytes to Mr. Bayle's Philosophy; let them here see, that in following him, they only leave Religion, to follow Blindness and Bigotry in Systems of Profaneness.

When Clergymen contradict one another, though it be but upon a Ceremony of Religion, Infidels make great Advantage of it; for Irreligion having no Arguments of its own, is forced to catch at every Foreign Objection.

But Mr. Bayle's Self-contradictions upon the chief Article of his Philosophy, may perhaps, not lessen his Authority with our Men of Reason.

For whether our Free-Thinkers are not such Bigots, as to adore Mr. Bayle's Contradictions, is what I will not presume to say.

I will promise for nothing, but their little Minds, and blind Zeal, to have a Share in every Error that can give Offence to well-minded Men.

THE INTRODUCTION, Shewing the State of the Controversy.

THE Infidelity which is now openly declared for, pretends to support itself upon the sufficiency, excellency, and absolute perfection of Reason, or Natural Religion.

The author with whom I am here engaged, makes no attempt to disprove or invalidate that historical evidence on which Christianity is founded; but by arguments drawn from the nature of God, and natural Religion, pretends to prove, that no Religion can come from God, which teaches anything more than that, which is fully manifest to all mankind by the mere light of nature.

His chief principles may be reduced to these following propositions.

1. That human reason, or natural light, is the only means of knowing all that God requires of us.

2. That reason, or natural light, is so full, sufficient, plain, and certain a rule or guide in all religious duties, that no external divine revelation can add anything to it, or require us to believe or practise anything, that was not as fully known before. A revelation, if ever made, can only differ from natural religion, in the manner of its being communicated. It can only declare those very same things externally, which were before equally declared by the internal light of nature.

3. That this must be the case of natural and revealed religion, unless God be an arbitrary Being. For if God be not an arbitrary Being, but acts according to the reason and nature of things; then he can require nothing of us by revelation, but what is already required by the nature and reason of things. And therefore, as he expresses it, *reason and revelation must exactly answer one another like two tallies.

4. That whatever is at any time admitted as matter of religion, that is not manifest from the reason of the thing, and plainly required by the light of nature, is gross superstition.

5. That it is inconsistent with the divine perfections, to suppose, that God can by an external revelation give any religious light or knowledge, at any time to any people, which was not equally given at all times, and to all people.

This is the state of the controversy. As to the railing accusations, and scurrilous language, which this author pours out, at all adventures, upon the Christian Clergy, I shall wholly pass them over ; my intention being only to appeal to the reason of the Reader, and to add nothing to it, but the safe, unerring light of divine Revelation.

Chapter I.

Enquiring, whether there be anything in the nature and condition of man, to oblige him to think, that he is not to admit of any doctrines or institutions, as revealed from God, but such as his own Reason can prove to be necessary from the nature of things.

I BEGIN with enquiring what there is to oblige a man to hold this opinion, because if there is not some strong and plain proof arising from the nature and condition of man, to oblige him thus to abide by the sole light of his own Reason ; it may be so far from being a duty, which he owes to God, that it may be reckoned amongst his most criminal presumptions. And the pleading for this authority of his own Reason, may have the guilt of pleading for his greatest vanity. And if, as this Writer observes, spiritual pride be the worst sort of pride,* a confident reliance upon our own Reason, as having a right to determine all matters between God and man, if it should prove to be a groundless pretension, bids fair to be reckoned the highest instance of the worst kind of the worst of sins.

Every other instance of vanity, every degree of personal pride, and self-esteem, may be a pardonable weakness in comparison of this. For how small is that pride which only makes us prefer our own personal beauty or merit to that of our fellow creatures, when compared with a self-confiding Reason, which is too haughty to adore anything in the divine counsels, which it cannot fully comprehend ; or to submit to any directions from God, but such as its own wisdom could prescribe ? Thus much is certain, that there can be no medium in this matter. The claiming this authority to our own Reason, must either be a very great duty, or amongst the greatest of sins.

If it be a sin to admit of any secrets in divine providence, if it be a crime to ascribe wisdom and goodness to God in things we cannot comprehend. If it be a baseness and meanness of spirit to believe that God can teach us better, or more than we can teach ourselves. If it be a shameful apostasy from the dignity of our nature, to be humble in the hands of God, to submit to any mysterious providence over us, to comply with any other methods of homage and adoration of him, than such as we could of ourselves contrive and justify; then it is certainly a great duty to assert and maintain this authority of our own Reason.

On the other hand; If the profoundest humility towards God, be the highest instance of piety. If everything within us and without us, if everything we know of God, everything we know of ourselves preaches up humility to us, as the foundation of every virtue, as the life and soul of all holiness. If sin had its beginning from pride, and hell be the effect of it, if devils are what they are through spiritual pride and self-conceit, then we have great reason to believe, that the claiming this authority to our Reason, in opposition to the revealed wisdom of God, is not a frailty of flesh and blood, but that same spiritual pride which turned Angels into apostate Spirits.

Since therefore this appealing to our own Reason, as the absolutely perfect measure and rule of all that ought to pass between God and man, has an appearance of a pride of the worst kind, and such as unites us both in temper and conduct with the fallen spirits of the kingdom of darkness, it highly concerns every pleader on that side, to consider what grounds he proceeds upon, and to ask himself, what there is in the state and condition of human nature, to oblige him to think that nothing can be divine or holy, or necessary, in religion, but what human Reason dictates?

I hope the reader will think this a fair state of the case, and that all the light we can have in this Matter, must arise from a thorough consideration of the state and condition of man in this world. If without revelation he is free from mysteries as a moral and religious agent, then he has some plea from his state and condition to reject revealed mysteries.

But if in a state of natural religion, and mere morality, he cannot acknowledge a divine providence, or worship and adore God, without as much implicit faith, and humble submission of his Reason, as any revealed mysteries require; then his state and condition in the world, condemns his refusal of any revelation sufficiently attested to come from God. This enquiry therefore into the state and condition of man, being so plainly the true point of the controversy, I hope to obtain the reader's impartial attention to it.

Had mankind continued in a state of perfect innocence, without ever failing in their duty either to God or man, yet even in such a state, they could never have known what God would or would not reveal to them, but by some express revelation from him. And as God might intend to raise them to some higher, and unknown state of perfection ; so he might raise them to it by the revelation of such things as their own Reason, though innocent and uncorrupt, yet could not have discovered.

But if man, in a state of innocence, could have no pretence to set himself against divine revelation, and make his own Reason the final judge of what God could, or could not reveal to him ; much less has he any pretence for so doing in his present state of sin, ignorance, and misery, His nature and condition is so far from furnishing him with reasons against revelation, against any supernatural help from God ; that it seems to be inconsolable without it ; and every circumstance of his life prepares him to hope for terms of mercy and deliverance from his present guilt and misery, not according to schemes of his own contrivance, not from his own Knowledge of the nature, and reason, and fitness of things, but from some incomprehensible depth of divine goodness.

For if sin, and misery, and ignorance, cannot convince us of our own weakness, cannot prepare us to accept of any methods of atonement for our guilt, but such as our own guilty disordered Reason can suggest, we are not far from the hardened state of those miserable spirits that make war against God.

For to insist upon the prerogative of our own nature, as qualifying us to make our own peace with God, and to reject the atonement which he has provided for us, because we esteem it more fit and reasonable, that our own repentance should be sufficient without it, is the same height of pride and impiety, as to affirm, that we have no need of any repentance at all.

For as mankind, if they had continued in a state of Innocence, could not have known how their innocence was to be rewarded, or what changes of state God intended them for, but as revelation had discovered these things unto them : So after they were fallen into a state of guilt and sin, they could never know what effects it was to have upon them, what misery it would expose them to, or when, or how, or whether they were ever to be delivered from it, and made as happy as if they had never sinned ; these are things that nothing but a revelation from God could teach them.

So that for a Sinner to pretend to appoint the atonement for his own Sins, or to think himself able to tell what it ought to be, or what effect it must have with God, is as foolish and vain a presumption, as if man in innocence should have pretended to appoint his own method of being changed into a Cherubim.

The Writers against Revelation appeal to the Reason and Nature of things, as infallibly discovering everything that a Revelation from God can teach us.

Thus our Author; *If the relations between things, and the fitness resulting from thence, be not the sole Rule of God's actions, must not God be an arbitrary Being? But if God only commands what the nature of things shew to be fit, it is scarce possible that men should mistake their duty; since a mind that is attentive can as easily distinguish fit from unfit, as the Eye can beauty from deformity.

It is granted, that there is a fitness and unfitness of actions founded in the nature of things, and resulting from the relations that persons and things bear to one another. It is also granted, that the reasonableness of most of the duties of children to their parents, of parents to their children, and of men to men, is very apparent, from the relations they bear to one another; and that several of the duties which we owe to God, plainly appear to us, as soon as we acknowledge the relation that is between God and us

But then, all this granted, this whole argument proves directly the contrary to that which this author intended to prove by it.

I here therefore join with this Author: I readily grant, that the Nature, Reason and Relations of things and persons, and the fitness of actions resulting from thence, is the sole rule of God's actions. And I appeal to this one common and confessed principle, as a sufficient proof that a man cannot thus abide by the sole Light of his own Reason, without contradicting the nature and reason of things, and denying this to be the sole Rule of God's actions.

For if the fitness of actions is founded in the nature of things and persons, and this fitness be the sole Rule of God's actions, it is certain that the Rule by which he acts, must in many instances be entirely inconceivable by us, so as not to be known at all, and in no instances fully known, or perfectly comprehended.

For if God is to act according to a fitness founded in the nature of things, and nothing can be fit for him to do, but what has its fitness founded in his own divinely perfect and incomprehensible nature, must he not necessarily act by a Rule above all human comprehension? This argument supposes that he cannot do what is fit for him to do, unless what he does has its fitness founded in his own Nature; but if he must govern his actions by his own nature, he must act by a Rule that is just as incomprehensible to us as his own nature.

And we can be no farther competent judges of the fitness of the conduct of God, than we are competent judges of the divine nature; and can no more tell what is, or is not infinitely wise in God, than we can raise ourselves to a state of infinite wisdom.

So that if the fitness of actions is founded in the particular nature of things and persons, and the fitness of God's actions must arise from that which is particular to his nature, then we have from this argument, the utmost certainty that the Rule or Reasons of God's actions must in many cases be entirely inconceivable by us, and in no cases perfectly and fully apprehended; and for this very reason, because he is not an arbitrary being, that acts by mere will, but is governed in everything he does, by the reason and nature of things. For if he is not arbitrary, but acts according to the nature of things, then he must act according to his own nature. But if his own nature must be the reason, rule and measure of his actions; if they are only fit and reasonable because they are according to this Rule and Reason, then it necessarily follows, that the fitness of many of God's actions must be incomprehensible to us, merely for this reason, because they have their proper fitness; such a fitness as is founded in the divine nature.

How mistaken therefore is this author, when he argues after this manner. If God requires things of us, whose fitness our Reason cannot prove from the nature of things, must he not be an arbitrary being? For how can that prove God to be an arbitrary agent, which is the necessary consequence of his not being arbitrary?

For supposing God to be an arbitrary Being, there would then be a bare possibility of our comprehending the fitness of everything he required of us. For as he might act by mere will, so he might choose to act according to our nature, and suitable to our comprehensions, and not according to his own nature, and infinite perfections.

But supposing God not to be an arbitrary Being, but to act constantly, as the perfections of his own nature make it fit and reasonable for him to act, then there is an utter impossibility of our comprehending the reasonableness and fitness of many of his actions.

For instance; look at the reason of things, and the fitness of actions, and tell me how they moved God to create mankind in the state and condition they are in. Nothing is more above the reason of men, than to explain the reasonableness and infinite wisdom of God's providence in creating man of such a form and condition, to go through such a state of things as human life has shewn itself to be. No revealed mysteries can more exceed the Comprehension of man, than the state of human life itself.

Shew me according to what fitness, founded in the nature of things, God's infinite wisdom was determined to form you in such a manner, bring you into such a world, and suffer and preserve such a state of things, as human life is, and then you may have some pretence to believe no revealed doctrines, but such as your own reason can deduce from the nature of things and the fitness of actions.

But whilst your own form, whilst Creation and Providence are depths which you cannot thus look into, 'tis strangely absurd to pretend, that God cannot reveal anything to you as a matter of religion, except your own reason can shew its foundation in the nature and reason of things.

For does not your own make, and constitution, the reasonableness of God's providence, and the fitness of the State of human life, as much concern you, as any revealed doctrines? Is it not as unfit for God to create man in such a state, subject to such a course of providence, as he cannot prove to be founded in the fitness and reasonableness of things; as to reveal to him such truths, or methods of salvation, as he cannot by any arguments of his own prove to be necessary

Revelation, you say, is on your account, and therefore you ought to see the reasonableness and fitness of it. And don't you also say, that God has made you for your own sake, ought you not therefore to know the reasonableness and fitness of God's forming you as you are? Don't you say, that providence is for the sake of Man? is it not therefore fit and reasonable, in the nature of things, that there should be no mysteries, or secrets, in providence, but that man should so see its methods, as to be able to prove all its steps to be constantly fit and reasonable?

Don't you say, that the world is for the sake of man; is it not therefore fit and reasonable that man should see, that the past and present state of the world has been such as the reason and fitness of things required it should be?

Now if the imperfect state of human nature, the miseries and calamities of this life, the diseases and mortality of human bodies, the methods of God's continual providence in governing human affairs, are things that as much concern us, and as nearly relate to us, as any methods of revealed religion; and if these are things that we cannot examine or explain, according to any fitness or unfitness founded in the nature of things, but must believe a great deal more of the infinite wisdom of God, than we can so explain; have we any reason to think, that God cannot, or ought not to raise us out of this unhappy state of things, help us to an higher order of life, and exalt us to a nearer enjoyment of himself, by any means, but such as our own poor Reason can grope out of the nature and fitness of things?

Now what is the reason, that all is thus mysterious and unmeasurable by human Reason, in these matters so nearly concerning human nature? 'Tis because God is not an arbitrary Being, but does that which the incomprehensible perfections of his own nature, make it fit and reasonable for him to do. Do but grant that nothing can be fit for God to do, but what is according to his own infinite perfections: Let but this be the rule of his actions, and then you have the fullest proof, that the fitness of his actions must be above our comprehension, who can only judge of a fitness according to our own perfections; and then we must be surrounded with mystery for this very reason, because God acts according to a certain rule, his own Nature.

Again: What is the nature of a human soul, upon what terms, and in what manner it is united to the body, how far it is different from it, how far it is subject to it, what powers and faculties it derives from it; are things wherein the wisdom and goodness of God, and the happiness of man are deeply concerned. Is it not necessary that these things should have their foundation in the reason, and fitness of things, and yet what natural Reason, un-inspired from above, can shew that this state of soul and body is founded in the reason and fitness of things?

Again: The origin of the soul, at what time it enters into the body, whether it be immediately created at its entrance into the body, or comes out of a pre-existent state, must have its fitness or reasonableness founded in the nature of things.

For who can say, that it is the same thing, whether human souls are created immediately for human bodies, or whether they come into them out of some pre-existent state? Now one of these ways may be exceeding fit and wise, and the other as entirely unjust and unreasonable, and yet when Reason left to its own light examines either of these ways, it finds itself equally perplexed with difficulties, and can affirm nothing with certainty about it.

Again: Who can say that it is the same thing to man, as a moral agent, or that he is to have the same treatment from God, or that the same kinds or degrees of piety must be exactly required, whether human souls be fallen spirits, that pre-existed before the creation of bodies, or were immediately created, as bodies were prepared for them?

Now here comes another act of implicit faith in natural religion, in a point of the greatest moment to the moral world. For as to God's proceeding in this matter of the greatest justice or injustice in his conduct over us, mere Reason has no ability to examine into it by any pretended fitness or unfitness founded in the nature of things; but must be forced to believe that God deals with us according to infinite wisdom and goodness, or else be amongst those judicious believers, that believe there is no God.

Again : The origin of sin and evil, or how it entered into the world consistently with the infinite wisdom of God, is a mystery of natural religion, which reason cannot unfold. For who can shew from the reason and nature of things, that it was fit and reasonable, for the providence of God to suffer sin and evil to enter, and continue in the world as they have? Here therefore the man of natural religion must drop his method of reasoning from the nature and fitness of things, and that in an article of the highest concern to the moral world, and be as mere a believer, as he that believes the most incomprehensible mystery of revealed religion.

Now as there have been in the several ages of the world, some impatient, restless and presuming spirits, who because they could not in these points explain the justice of God's providence, have taken refuge in horrid Atheism, so they made just the same sober use of their reason, as our modern unbelievers, who because they cannot comprehend, as they would, the fitness and necessity of certain Christian doctrines, resign themselves up to an hardened infidelity. For it is just as wise and reasonable to allow of no mysteries in Revelation, as to allow of no mysteries or secrets in Creation and Providence.

And whenever this writer, or any other, shall think it a proper time, to attack natural religion with as much freedom, as he has now fallen upon revealed, he need not enter upon any new hypothesis, or different way of reasoning. For the same turn of thought, the same manner of cavilling may soon find materials in the natural state of man, for as large a bill of complaints against natural religion, and the mysteries of providence, as is here brought against revealed doctrines.

To proceed : If the fitness of actions is founded in the nature and relations of beings, then nothing can be fit for God to do, but so far as it is fit for the Governor of all created beings, whether on earth, or in any other part of the universe ; and he cannot act fitly towards mankind, but by acting as is fit for the Governor of all beings.

Now what is fit for the Governor of all created nature to do in this or that particular part of his creation, is as much above our reason to tell, as it is above our power to govern all beings. And how mankind ought to be governed, with relation to the whole creation, of which they are so small a part, is a matter equally above our knowledge, because we know not how they are a part of the whole, or what relation they bear to any other part, or how their state affects the whole, or any other part, than we know what beings the whole consists of.

Now there is nothing that we know with more certainty than that God is Governor of the whole, and that mankind are a part of the whole; and that the uniformity and harmony of divine providence, must arise from his infinitely wise government of the whole; and therefore we have the utmost certainty, that we are vastly incompetent judges of the fitness or unfitness of any methods, that God uses in the government of so small a part of the universe, as mankind are.

For if the actions of God cannot have their proper fitness, unless they are according to the incomprehensible greatness of his own nature, and according to his incomprehensible greatness, as Lord and Governor of all created nature; have we not the most undeniable certainty, that the fitness of the divine providence over mankind, cannot possibly be seen by those, who are resolved to know nothing of God, but that which their own Reason can teach them?

Again: If the fitness of actions is founded in the relations of beings to one another, then the fitness of the actions of God's providence over mankind, must be in many instances altogether mysterious and incomprehensible to us.

For the relation which God bears to mankind, as their all-perfect Creator and continual Preserver, is a relation that our Reason conceives as imperfectly, and knows as little of, as it does of any of the divine attributes. When it compares it to that of a Father and his children, a Prince and his subjects a Proprietor and his property, it has explained it in the best manner it can, but still has left it as much a secret, as we do the divine nature when we only say, it is infinitely superior to everything that is finite.

By the natural Light of our Reason we may know with certainty, several effects of this relation, as that it puts us under the care and protection of a wise, and just, and merciful providence, and demands from us the highest instances of humility, duty, adoration and thanksgiving. But what it is in its own nature, what kind of state, or degree of dependency it signifies, what it is to exist in and by God, what it is to see by a light that is his, to act by a power from him, to live by a life in him; are things as incomprehensible to Reason, left to itself, as what it is to be in the third heavens, or to hear words that cannot be uttered.

But if this relation consists in these inconceivable things, in a communication of life, light, and power, if these are enjoyed in God, and in ourselves, our own and yet his, in a manner not to be explained by anything that we ever heard, or saw ; then we must necessarily be poor judges of what is fit for God to require of us, because of this relation. It teaches us nothing but the superficialness of our own knowledge, and the unfathomable depths of the divine perfections.

How little this Writer has considered the nature and manner of this relation between God and Man, may be seen by the following paragraphs. The Holy Ghost, says he, cannot deal with men as rational creatures, but by proposing arguments to convince their understandings, and influence their wills, in the same manner as if proposed by other agents. As absurd, as to say, God cannot create us as rational beings, unless he creates us by such means, and in the same manner, as if we were created by other agents. For to suppose that other agents can possibly act upon our understanding, and will, in the same manner that God does ; is as gross an absurdity, as to suppose that other agents can create us in the same manner that God creates us.

And to confine the manner of the Holy Ghost's acting upon us, to the manner of our acting upon one another by arguments and syllogisms, is as great weakness, as to confine the manner of God's creating us, to the manner of our making a Statue with tools and instruments.

But he proceeds and says, *For to go beyond this, would be making impressions on men, as a seal does on wax ; to the confounding of their reason, and their liberty in choosing ; and the man would then be merely passive, and the action would be the action of another being acting upon him, for which he could be no way accountable.

Here you see the Holy Spirit has but these two possible ways of acting upon men, it must either only propose an argument, just as a man may propose one, or it must act like a seal upon wax.

I only ask this writer, Whether God communicates life, and strength, and understanding, and liberty of will to us, only as men may communicate anything to one another ? or as a seal acts upon wax ? If so, it may be granted, that the Holy Ghost cannot act upon us any other way.

But it must be affirmed, that we do, by a continual influx from God, enjoy all these powers, and receive the continuance of all these faculties from him, not as men receive things from one another, nor as wax receives the impression of the seal, but in a way as much above our conception, as creation is above our power ; if we have all our power of acting, by a continual communication from him, and yet are free-agents, have all our light from him, and yet are accountable intelligent Beings: then it must be great weakness to affirm, that the Holy Ghost cannot act upon us in the same manner: For it would be saying, God cannot act upon us as he does act upon us.

The short of the matter is this. Either this writer must affirm, that our rational nature, our understanding faculties, our power of action, our liberty of will, must necessarily subsist without the continual action of God upon them, or else he must grant, that God can act upon our understandings and wills without making us as merely passive as the wax under the seal.

This writer says, Though the relation we stand in to God, is not artificial, as most are amongst men——yet this does not hinder, but that we may know the end he had in being related to us as Creator and Governor, and what he requires of his creatures and subjects. But how are we to know this? This, says he, the Divine Nature, which contains in it all perfection and happiness, *plainly points out to us.

If he had said, since God must act over us as Creator and Governor, according to his own infinite perfection and happiness, therefore his conduct over us may be very mysterious, he had drawn a plain conclusion. But he proves all to be plain, because God is to govern us according to something that is not plain, according to his own incomprehensible nature.

His argument therefore proceeds thus. God must govern us according to his own infinite perfection and happiness; but we do not know what his infinite perfections and happiness are:

Therefore we plainly know how he is to govern us.

Now if this Writer is capable of taking such an argument as this to be demonstrative, it is no wonder that all his principles of Religion are founded upon demonstration.

But if he knows no more of what arises from the Relation between God and his creatures, than he has here demonstrated, he might be very well content with some farther knowledge from Divine Revelation.

It is because of this incomprehensible Relation between God and his creatures, that we are unavoidably ignorant of what God may justly require of us either in a state of innocence or sin. For as the fitness of actions between Beings related, must result from their respective Natures, so the incomprehensibility of the Divine Nature, on which the Relation between God and man is founded, makes it utterly impossible for mere natural reason to say, what kind of homage, or worship, he may fitly require of man in a state of innocence; or what different worship and homage he may, or must require of men, as *sinner*s.

And to appeal to the infinite Perfections of God, as plainly pointing this out, is the same extravagance, as to appeal to the incomprehensibility of God, as a plain proof of our comprehending what God is.

As to the obligations of moral or social duties, which have their foundation in the conveniences of this life, and the several relations we bear to one another, these are the same in the state of Innocence or Sin, and we know that we truly act according to the Divine Will, when we act according to what these relations require of us.

But the question is, What distinct kind of Homage, or Service, or Worship, God may require us to render to Him, either in a state of Innocence or Sin, on account of that Relation he bears to us as an all-perfect Creator and Governor?

But this is a question that God alone can resolve.

Human Reason cannot enter into it, it has no principle to proceed upon in it. For as the necessity of Divine Worship and Homage, so the particular matter and manner of it, must have its reason in the Divine Nature.

Sacrifice, if considered only as a human Invention, could not be proved to be a reasonable service. Yet considered as a Divine Institution, it would be the greatest folly not to receive it as a reasonable service. For as we could see no reason for it, if it was of human invention, so we should have the greatest reason to comply with it, because it was of Divine Appointment. Not as if the Divine Appointment altered the nature and fitness of things; but because nothing has the nature and fitness of Divine Worship, but because it is of Divine Appointment.

Man therefore, had he continued in a state of Innocence, and without Revelation, might have lived in an awful fear, and pious regard of God, and observed every duty both of moral and civil life, as an act of obedience to him. But he could have no foundation either to invent any particular matter or manner of Divine Worship himself, or to reject any that was appointed by God, as unnecessary. It would have been ridiculous to have pleaded his innocence, as having no need of a Divine Worship? For who can have greater reason, or be fitter to worship God, than innocent Beings? It would have been more absurd, to have objected the sufficiency and perfection of their reason; for why should men reject a revealed method and manner of Divine Worship and Service, because God had given them sense and reason of their own, sufficient for the duties of social and civil life?

And as reason in a state of such innocence and perfection, could not have any pretence to state, or appoint the matter or manner of Divine Worship, so when the state of innocence was changed for that of sin, it then became more difficult for bare reason to know what kind of Homage, or Worship could be acceptable to God from sinners.

For what the Relation betwixt God and sinners makes it fit and reasonable for God to require or accept of them, cannot be determined by human reason.

This is a new State, and the foundation of a new Relation, and nothing can be fit for God to do in it, but what has its fitness resulting from it. We have nothing to help our conceptions of the forementioned relative Characters of God, as our Governor and Preserver, but what we derive from our idea of human Fathers and Governors. Which idea only helps us to comprehend these relations, just as our idea of human power helps us to comprehend the Omnipotence of God. For a father or governor, no more represents the true state of God as our Governor and Preserver, than our living in our Father's family, represents the true manner of our living in God.

These relations are both very plain and very mysterious; they are very plain and certain, as to the reality of their existence; and highly mysterious and inconceivable, as to the manner of their existence.

That which is plain and certain, in these relative characters of God, plainly shews our obligations to every instance of duty, homage, adoration, love and gratitude.

And that which is mysterious and inconceivable in them, is a just and solid foundation of that profound humility, awful reverence, internal piety, and tremendous sense of the divine Majesty, with which devout and pious persons think of God, and assist at the offices and institutions of religion. Which excites in them a higher zeal for doctrines and institutions of divine revelation, than for all things human; that fills them with regard and reverence for all things, places, and offices, that are either by divine or human authority, appointed to assist and help their desired intercourse with God.

And if some people, by a long and strict attention to Reason, clear ideas, the fitness and unfitness of things, have at last arrived at a demonstrative certainty, that all these sentiments of piety and devotion, are mere bigotry, superstition, and enthusiasm; I shall only now observe, that youthful extravagance, passion, and debauchery, by their own natural tendency, without the assistance of any other guide, seldom fail of making the same discovery. And though it is not reckoned any reflection upon great wits, when they hit upon the same thought, yet it may seem some disparagement of that reason and philosophy, which teaches old men to think and judge the same of religion, that passion and extravagance teaches the young.

To return: As there is no state in human life, that can give us a true idea of any of the forementioned relative characters of God, so this relative state of God towards sinners is still more remote, and less capable of being truly comprehended by anything observable in the relations, betwixt a judge and criminals, a creditor and his debtors, a physician and his patients, a father or prince, and their disobedient children and subjects.

For none of these states separately, nor all of them jointly considered, give us any just idea, either of the nature and guilt of sin, or how God is to deal with sinners, on the account of the relation he bears to them.

And to ask, whether God in punishing sinners, acts as a physician towards patients, or as a creditor towards debtors, or as a prince towards rebels, or a judge over criminals; is the same weakness, as to ask, whether God as our continual preserver, acts as our parents, from whom we have our maintenance, or as a prince, that only protects us. For as the maintenance and protection that we receive from our parents and prince, are not proper and true representations of the nature and manner of our preservation in God, but only the properest words that human language affords us, to speak of things not human, but divine and inconceivable in their own proper natures: So a physician and his patients, a creditor and his debtors, a prince and his rebels, or a judge over criminals, neither separately nor jointly considered, are proper and strict representations of the reasons and manner of God's proceedings with sinners, but only help us to a more proper language to speak about them, than any other states of human life.

To ask, whether sin hath solely the nature of an offence, against a prince or a father, and so is pardonable by mere goodness; whether it is like an error in a road or path, and so is entirely at an end, when the right path is taken; whether its guilt hath the nature of a debt, and so is capable of being discharged, just as a debt is; whether it affects the soul, as a wound or disease affects the body, and so ought only to move God to act as a good physician? all these questions are as vain, as to ask, whether knowledge in God is really thinking, or his nature a real substance. For as his knowledge and nature cannot be strictly defined, but are capable of being signified by the terms thinking and substance, so the nature of sin is not strictly represented under any of these characters, but is capable of receiving some representation from every one of them.

When sin is said to be an offence against God, it is to teach us, that we have infinitely more reason to dread it on God's account, than to dread any offence against our parents, or governors.

When it is compared to a debt, it is to signify, that our sins make us accountable to God, not in the same manner, but with the same certainty, as a debtor is answerable to his creditor; and because it has some likeness to a debt, that of ourselves we are not able to pay.

When it is compared to a wound, or disease in the body, it is not to teach us, that it may as justly and easily be healed as bodily wounds, but to help us to conceive the greatness of its evil; that, as diseases bring death to the body, so sin brings a worse kind of death upon the soul.

Since therefore the nature and guilt of sin can only so far be known, as to make it highly to be dreaded, but not so known as to be fully understood, by anything we can compare it to.

Since the relation which God bears to sinners, can only be so known, as to make it highly reasonable to prostrate ourselves before him, in every instance of humility and penitence; but not so fully known as to teach us how, or in what manner, God must deal with us; it plainly follows, that if God is not an arbitrary Being, but acts according to a fitness, resulting from this relation, he must, in this respect, act by a rule or reason known only to himself, and such as we cannot possibly state from the reason and nature of things.

For if the nature of things, and the fitness of actions resulting from their relations, is to be the rule of our Reason, then Reason must be here at a full stop, and can have no more light or knowledge to proceed upon, in stating the nature, the guilt, or proper atonement of sin in men, than of sin in Angels.

For Reason, by consulting the nature and fitness of things, can no more tell us, what the guilt of sin is, what hurt it does us, how far it enters into, and alters our very nature, what contrariety to, and separation from God, it necessarily brings upon us, or what supernatural means are, or are not, necessary to abolish it; our Reason can no more tell this, than our senses can tell us, what is the inward, and what is the outward light of Angels.

Ask Reason, what effect sin has upon the soul, and it can tell you no more, than if you had asked, what effect the omnipresence of God has upon the soul.

Ask Reason, and the nature of things, what is, or ought to be, the true nature of an atonement for sin, how far it is like paying a debt, reconciling a difference, or healing a wound, or how far it is different from them? and it can tell you no more, than if you had asked, what is the true degree of power that preserves us in existence, how far it is like that which at first created us, and how far it is different from it.

All these enquiries are, by the nature of things, made impossible to us, so long as we have no light but from our own natural capacities, and we cannot take upon us to be knowing, and philosophers, in these matters, but by deserting our Reason, and giving ourselves up to vision and imagination.

And we have as much authority from the reason and nature of things, to appeal to hunger and thirst, and sensual pleasure, to tell us how our souls shall live in the beatific presence of God, as to appeal to our reason and logic, to demonstrate how sin is to be atoned, or the soul altered, prepared, and purified, for future happiness.

For God has no more given us our Reason to settle the nature of an atonement for sin; or to find out what can, or cannot, take away its guilt, than he has given us senses and appetites to state the nature, or discover the ingredients, of future happiness.

And he who rejects the atonement for sins made by the Son of God, as needless, because he cannot prove it to be necessary, is as extravagant, as he that should deny that God created him by his only Son, because he did not remember it. For our memory is as proper a faculty to tell us, whether God at first created us, and all things, by his only Son, as our Reason is to tell us, whether we ought to be restored to God, with, or without the mediation of Jesus Christ.

When therefore this writer says, *Can anything be more evident, than that if doing evil be the only cause of God's displeasure, that the ceasing to do evil, must take away that displeasure?

Just as if he had said, if conversing with a leper has been the only cause of a man's getting a leprosy, must not departing from him, be the removal of the leprosy? For if anyone, guessing at the guilt of sin, and its effects on the soul, should compare it to a leprosy in the body, he can no more say, that he has reached its real, internal evil, than he, that comparing the happiness of heaven to a crown of glory, can be said to have described its real happiness.

This writer has no occasion to appeal to reason, and the nature of things, if he can be thus certain about things, whose nature is not only obscure, but impossible to be known. For it is as impossible for him to know the guilt and effects of sin, as to know the shape of an Angel. It is as impossible to know by the mere light of reason what God's displeasure at sin is, what contrariety to, or separation from sinners it implies, or how it obliges

God to deal with them ; as to know what the internal essence of God is. Our author therefore has here found the utmost degree of evidence, where it was impossible for him to have the smallest degree of knowledge.

For though it is very evident, that in the case of sin, Reason can prescribe nothing but repentance ; yet it is equally evident, that Reason cannot say, nothing more is required, to destroy the effects of sin, and to put the sinner in the same state, as if it had never been committed.

If a man, having murdered twenty of his fellow creatures, should afterward be sorry for it, and wish that he had a power to bring them to life again, or to create others in their stead, would this be an evident proof, that he was no murderer, and that he had never killed one man in his life ? Will his ceasing to kill, and wishing he had a power to create others in their stead, be a proof, that he is just in the same state with God, as if he had never murdered a man in his life ? But, unless this can be said, unless a man's repentance sufficiently proves that he never was a sinner, it cannot be evident, that repentance is sufficient to put a man in the same state, as if he never had sinned.

He therefore that says, If sin be the only cause of God's displeasure, must not ceasing from sin take away his displeasure ? has just as much sense and reason on his side, as if he had said, if a man's murdering of himself, is the cause of God's displeasure, must not his restoring himself to life again, take away God's displeasure ?

For there is as much foundation in reason, and the nature of things, to affirm, that the soul of a self-murderer must have a sufficient power to undo the effects of murder, and put him in his former state ; as to affirm, that every sinner must have a sufficient natural power of undoing all the effects of sin, and putting himself in the same state as if he had never sinned.

This objection therefore, against any super-natural means of atoning for sin, taken from the sufficiency of our own repentance, is as clear and philosophical, as that knowledge that is without any ideas ; and as justly to be relied upon, as that conclusion which has no premises.

This writer has two more objections against the atonement for sin, made by Jesus Christ. First, as it is an human sacrifice, which nature itself abhors ; and which was looked upon as the great abomination of idolatrous pagan worship.

The cruelty, injustice, and impiety, of shedding human blood in the sacrifices of the pagan religion, is fully granted : but Reason cannot thence bring the smallest objection against the sacrifice of Christ, as it was human.

For how can Reason be more disregarded, than in such an argument as this? The pagans were unjust, cruel, and impious, in offering human blood to their false gods, therefore the true God cannot receive any human sacrifice for sin, or allow any persons to die, as a punishment for sin.

For, if no human sacrifice can be fit for God to receive, because human Sacrifices, as parts of pagan worship, were unjust and impious; then it would follow, that the mortality, to which all mankind are appointed by God, must have the same cruelty and injustice in it. Now that death is a punishment for sin, and that all mankind are by death offered as a sacrifice for sin, is not only a doctrine of revealed Religion, but the plain dictate of Reason. For, though it is Revelation alone that can teach us, how God threatened death, as the punishment of a particular sin, yet reason must be obliged to acknowledge, that men die, because they are sinners. But, if men die because they are sinners, and reason itself must receive this, as the most justifiable cause of death; then reason must allow, that the death of all mankind is received by the true God, as a sacrifice for sin. But if reason must acknowledge the death of all mankind, as a sacrifice for sin, then it can have no just objection against the sacrifice of Christ, because it was human.

Revelation therefore teaches nothing more hard to be believed on this point, than reason teaches. For if it be just and fit in God, to appoint and devote all men to death, as the proper punishment, and means of their deliverance from their sins; how can it be proved to be unjust and unfit in God, to receive the death of Jesus Christ, for the same ends, and to render thereby the common death and sacrifice of mankind truly effectual?

I need not take upon me to prove the fitness and reasonableness of God's procedure in the mortality of mankind; Revelation is not under any necessity of proving this; because it is no difficulty that arises from revelation, but equally belongs to natural religion; and both of them must acknowledge it to be fit and reasonable; not because it can be proved to be so from the nature of things, but is to be believed to be so, by faith and piety.

But if the necessary faith and piety of natural religion, will not suffer us to think it inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God, to appoint all mankind victims to death on the account of sin, then reason, or natural religion, can have no objection against the sacrifice of Christ, as it is an human sacrifice.

And all that revelation adds to natural religion, on the point of human sacrifice, is only this; the knowledge of one, that gives merit, effect, and sanctification, to all the rest.

Secondly, It is objected, that the atonement made by Jesus Christ represents God as punishing the innocent and acquitting the guilty; or, as punishing the innocent instead of the guilty.

But this proceeds all upon mistake: for the atonement made by Jesus Christ, though it procures pardon for the guilty, yet it does not acquit them, or excuse them from any punishment, or suffering for sin, which reason could impose upon them. Natural religion calls men to repentance for their sins: the atonement made by Jesus Christ does not acquit them from it, or pardon them without it; but calls them to a severer repentance, a higher self-punishment and penance, than natural religion, alone, prescribes. So that reason cannot accuse this atonement, of acquitting the guilty; since it brings them under a necessity of doing more, and performing a severer repentance, than reason, alone, can impose upon them.

God therefore does not by this proceeding, (as is unreasonably said) shew his dislike of the innocent and his approbation of the wicked.

For how can God be thought to punish our blessed Saviour out of dislike, if his sufferings are represented of such infinite merit with him? Or how can he shew thereby his approbation of the guilty, whose repentance is not acceptable to him, till recommended by the infinite merits of Jesus Christ?

Reason therefore has nothing that it can justly object, against the atonement made by our blessed Lord, either as it was an human sacrifice, or as freeing the guilty, and punishing the innocent in their stead; because this very sacrifice calls people to a higher state of suffering and punishment for sin, than reason, alone, could oblige them to undergo.

As to the fitness and reasonableness of our blessed Lord's sufferings, as he was God and man; and the nature and degree of their worth; reason can no more enter into this matter, or prove or disprove anything about it, than it can enter into the state of the whole creation, and shew, how it could, or could not, be in the whole, better than it is.

For you may as well ask any of your senses, as ask your reason this principal question, Whether any supernatural means be necessary for the atonement of the sins of mankind? Or, supposing it necessary, whether the mediation, death, and intercession of Jesus Christ, as God and man, be that true supernatural means?

For as the fitness or unfitness of any supernatural means, for the atonement of sin, must result from the incomprehensible relation God bears to sinners, as it must have such necessity, worth, and dignity, as this relation requires, and because it requires it; it necessarily follows, that if God acts according to this relation, the fitness of his actions cannot be according to our comprehension.

Again : Supposing some supernatural means to be necessary, for destroying the guilt and power of sin ; or that that mediation, sufferings, and intercession, of the Son of God incarnate, is that true supernatural means, it necessarily follows, that a revelation of such, or any other supernatural means, cannot possibly be made obvious to our reason and senses, as the things of human life, or the transactions amongst men are ; but can only be so revealed, as to become just occasions of our faith, humility, adoration, and pious resignation, to the divine wisdom and goodness.

For, to say that such a thing is supernatural, is only saying, that it is something, which, by the necessary state of our own nature, we are as incapable of knowing, as we are incapable of seeing spirits.

If therefore supernatural and divine things are by the letter of Scripture ever revealed to us, they cannot be revealed to us, as they are in their own nature : for if they could, such things would not be supernatural, but such as were suited to our capacities.

If an angel could appear to us, as it is in its own nature, then we should be naturally capable of seeing angels ; but, because our nature is not capable of such a sight, and angels are, as to us, supernatural objects ; therefore, when angels appear to men, they must appear, not as they are in themselves, but in some human, or corporeal form, that their appearance may be suited to our capacities.

It is just thus, when any supernatural or divine matter is revealed by God, it can no more possibly be revealed to us, as it is in its own nature, than an Angel can appear to us, or make itself visible by us as it is in its own nature ; but such supernatural matter can only be revealed to us, by being represented to us, by its likeness to something, that we already naturally know.

This revelation teaches us this supernatural matter ; that Jesus Christ is making a perpetual intercession for us in heaven : For Christ's real state, or manner of existence with God in heaven, in regard to his Church, cannot, as it is in its own nature, be described to us ; it is in this respect ineffable, and incomprehensible. And therefore, this high and inconceivable manner of Christ's existence with God in heaven, in regard to his church, is revealed to us under an idea, that gives us the truest representation of it, that we are capable of ; viz., the idea of a perpetual intercession for his church.

But if anyone should thence infer, that the Son of God must therefore either be always upon his knees in acts of mental or vocal prayer, or prostrate in some humble form of a supplicant, he would make a very weak inference.

Because this revealed Idea of Christ, as a perpetual Intercessor in heaven, is only a comparative representation of something, that cannot be directly and plainly known as it is in its own nature; and only teaches us, how to believe something, though imperfectly, yet truly and usefully, of an incomprehensible matter.

Just as our own ideas of wisdom and goodness do not teach us what the divine wisdom and goodness are in their own natures, but only help us to believe something truly and usefully of those perfections of God, which are in themselves inconceivable by us.

But then there is no inferring anything from these ideas, by which divine and supernatural things are represented to us, but only the truth and certainty of that likeness under which they are represented.

Thus from our own idea of goodness in ourselves, we can infer nothing concerning goodness, as it is a perfection inherent in God, but only this, that there certainly is in God some inconceivable, infinite perfection, truly answerable to that which we call goodness in ourselves, though as infinitely different from it, as Omnipotence is infinitely different from all that we naturally know of power.

But then we can proceed no farther than to the truth and certainty of this likeness; we cannot by any farther considerations of the nature and manner of goodness, as it is in ourselves, infer anything farther, as to the nature and manner of the divine goodness. This is as impossible, as to state the real nature and manner of Omnipotence, by considering the particulars of human power.

In like manner, our revealed idea of Jesus Christ as an Intercessor for us in heaven, gives us the utmost certainty that he is in heaven for our benefit, in a manner truly and fully answerable to that of a powerful Intercessor. But if from considering our own ideas of human Intercessors, we should thence pretend to infer the real supernatural manner of Christ's existence in heaven, we should fall into the same absurdity, as if we undertook to represent the true nature of Omnipotence, by considering what we knew of the nature and manner of human power.

Again: When it is by the letter of Scripture revealed to us, that the blessed Jesus is the one Mediator between God and man; that he is the Atonement, the Propitiation, and Satisfaction for our sins: These expressions only teach us as much outward knowledge of so great a mystery, as human language can represent. But they do not teach us the real or perfect nature of Christ's state between God and sinners. For that being a divine and supernatural matter, cannot by any outward words be revealed to us as it is in its own Nature, any more than the essence of God can be made visible to our eyes of Flesh.

But these expressions teach us thus much with certainty, that there is in the state of Christ between God and sinners, something infinitely and inconceivably beneficial to us; and truly answerable to all that we mean by meditation, atonement, propitiation, and satisfaction.

And though the real, internal manner, of this meditation and atonement, as it is in its own nature, is incomprehensible to the natural man, yet this does not lessen our knowledge of the truth and certainty of it, any more than the incomprehensibility of the divine nature, lessens our certainty of its real existence.

And as our idea of God, though consisting of incomprehensible perfections, helps us to a real and certain knowledge of the divine nature; and though all mysterious, is yet the solid foundation of all piety; so our idea of Jesus Christ, as our mediator and atonement, though it be mighty incomprehensible in itself, as to its real nature, yet helps us to a certain and real knowledge of Christ, as our mediator and atonement; and, though full of mystery, is yet full of motives to the highest degrees of piety, devotion, love, and gratitude unto God.

All objections therefore, raised from any difficulties about the nature of atonements, propitiations, and satisfactions, as these words are used to signify in human life, and common language, are vain, and entirely groundless.

For all these objections proceed upon this supposition, that atonement, or satisfaction, when attributed to Jesus Christ, signify neither more nor less, nor operate in any other manner, than when they are used as terms in human laws, or in civil life: Take away this supposition, and all objections are entirely removed with it.

Thus our author thinks this an unanswerable difficulty in the present case, when he asks, *How Sins freely pardoned, could want any expiation? Or how, after a full equivalent paid, and adequate satisfaction given, all could be mercy, and pure forgiveness?

And yet all this difficulty is founded upon this absurd supposition, that atonement and satisfaction, when attributed to Jesus Christ, signify neither more nor less, than atonements and satisfactions, when spoken of in human laws, and human life.

Which is full as absurd, as to suppose, that power and life, when attributed to God, signify neither more nor less, than when they are spoken of men: For there is no reason why we should think there is anything mysterious and incomprehensible in power and life, when attributed to God; but what is the same reason for our thinking, that atonement and satisfaction, when ascribed to the Son of God, must be mysterious and incomprehensible.

To return: I have granted this writer his great principle, that the relations of things and persons, and the fitness resulting from thence, is the sole rule of God's actions: and I have granted it upon this supposition, that it must thence follow, that God must act according to his own nature; and therefore nothing could be fit for God to do, or worthy of him, but what had the reason of its fitness in his own nature: and if so, then the rule of his actions could not fall within our comprehension. And consequently, reason alone, could not be a competent judge of God's proceedings; or say, what God might, or might not, require of us: and therefore I have, by this means, plainly turned his main argument against himself, and made it fully confute that doctrine, which he intended to found upon it.

But though I have thus far, and for this reason, granted the nature and relations of things and beings, to be the rule of God's actions, because that plainly supposes, that therefore his own nature must be the rule of his actions; yet since our author, and other modern opposers of revealed doctrines of religion, hold it in another sense, and mean by it, I know not what eternal, immutable reasons and relations of things, independent of any being, and which are a common rule and law of God and man, I entirely declare against it, as an erroneous and groundless opinion.

Thus, when the writer says, If the relations between things, and the fitness resulting from thence, be not the sole rule of God's actions, must he not be an arbitrary being? As he here means some eternal, immutable relations, independent of God; so, to suppose, that God cannot be a wise and good being, unless such eternal, independent relations, be the sole rule of his actions, is as erroneous, as to affirm, that God cannot be omniscient, unless mathematical demonstrations be his sole manner of knowing all things. And it is just as reasonable to fix God's knowledge solely in mathematical demonstrations, that we may thence be assured of his infallible knowledge, as to make I know not what independent relations of things, the sole rule of his actions, that we may thence be assured, he is not arbitrary, but a wise and good Being.

And we have as strong reasons to believe God to be, in the highest degree, wise and good, without knowing on what, his wisdom and goodness is founded; as we have to believe him to be omniscient, and eternal, without knowing on what, his omniscience is founded; or to what, his eternity is owing. And we have the same reason to hold it a vain and fruitless enquiry, to ask what obliges God to be Wise and Good, as to ask what obliges him to be Omniscient, or Eternal.

And as it would be absurd to ascribe the Existence of God to any cause, or found it upon any independent relations of things, so it is the same absurdity, to ascribe the infinite wisdom and goodness of God to any cause, or found them upon any independent relations of things.

Nor do we any more lose the notion, or lessen the certainty of the Divine Wisdom and Goodness, because we cannot say on what they are founded, or to what they are to be ascribed, than we lose the notion of God, or render his existence uncertain, because it cannot be founded on anything, or ascribed to any cause.

And as in our account of the existence of things, we are obliged to have recourse to a Being, whose existence must not be ascribed to any cause, because everything cannot have a cause, no more than everything can be created, so in our account of Wisdom and Goodness, there is the same necessity of having recourse to an infinite Wisdom and Goodness, that never began to be, and that is as different as to its reason and manner of existence, from all other wisdom and goodness, that have a beginning, as the existence of God is different from the existence of the creatures.

But if it be necessary to hold, that there is an infinite wisdom and goodness that never began to be, then it is as necessary to affirm, that such wisdom and goodness can no more be founded upon the relations of things, than the unbeginning existence of God can be founded upon the existence of things. And to seek for any reasons of a wisdom and goodness that could not begin to be, but was always in the same infinite state, is like seeking the cause of that which can have no cause, or asking what it is that contains infinity.

But to derive the wisdom and goodness of God from the directions he receives from the Relations of things, because our wisdom and goodness is directed by them, is as weak and vain, as to found his knowledge upon sensation and reflection, because our rational knowledge is necessarily founded upon them.

When therefore this writer saith, Infinite wisdom can have no commands, but what are founded on the unalterable reason of things ;* he might as justly have said, an infinite Creator can have no power of creating, but what is founded on the unalterable nature of creatures.

For the reason of things, is just as unalterable, as the nature of creatures. And if the reasons and relations of things are nothing else but their manner of existence, or the state of their nature, certainly the relations of things must have the same beginning, and the same alterable or unalterable nature, as the things from whence they flow. Unless it can be said, that a thing may exist in such a manner, though it does not exist at all.

Nothing is more certain, than that the relations of things is only the particular state of their nature, or manner of existence ; there can therefore no eternal, and unalterable relations exist, but of things that eternally and unalterably exist. Unless a thing may be said to exist eternally and unalterably in such a particular state of nature, or manner of existence, and yet have no eternal existence.

When therefore he says again, The will of God is always determined by the nature and reason of things ;† It is the same as if he had said, the omnipotence of God is always determined by the nature of causes and effects. For as all causes and effects are what they are, and owe their nature to the omnipotence of God, so the relations of things are what they are, and owe their nature to the wisdom and will of God.

Nor does this dependence of the relations of things on the will of God, destroy the nature of relations, or make them doubtful, any more than the existence of things depending on the power of God, destroys the certainty of their existence, or renders it doubtful. For as God cannot make things to exist, and not to exist at the same time, though their existence depends upon his power, so neither can he make things to have such relations, and yet not to have such relations at the same time, though their relations depend upon his will.

So that the ascribing the relations of things to the will of God, from whence alone they can proceed, brings no uncertainty to those duties or rules of life, which flow from such relations, but leaves the state of nature with all its relations, and the duties which flow from them, in the greatest certainty, so long as nature itself is continued ; and when that either ceases entirely, or is only altered, it is not to be wondered at, if all its relations cease, or are altered with it.

Our author says, Dare anyone say, that God's laws are not founded on the eternal reason of things ?‡

I dare say it with the same assurance, as that his existence is not founded on the eternal existence of things. And that it is the same extravagance to say, that God's laws are founded on the eternal reasons of things, as to say, that his power is founded on the eternal capacities of things. For the capacities of things have just the same solidity and eternity, as the relations of things have, and are just such independent realities, as they are : And are just the same proper materials to found the omnipotence of God upon, as the relations of things are, to found his infinite wisdom upon.

And as we can say, that the omnipotence of God in preserving and supporting the creation, will certainly act suitably to itself, and consistent with that omnipotence which first made things be what they are, and put nature into such a state of causes and effects as it is in ; so we can say, that the infinite wisdom of God in giving laws to the world, will act suitably to itself, and consistent with that wisdom which at first made the nature and relations of the rational world be what they are.

But then as the omnipotence of God, though it acts suitably to the laws and state of the creation, and the nature of causes and effects, which it first ordained, yet cannot be said to be founded upon the nature of causes and effects, because neither causes nor effects have any nature, but what they owe to omnipotence ; so the infinite wisdom of God, though in giving laws to the world, it acts suitably to the natures and relations of rational beings, yet cannot be said to be founded upon such relations, because such relations are the effects of the divine wisdom, and owe their existence to it.

And the reason or relations of things shew God's antecedent wisdom, and are effects of it, just as the nature of causes and effects shew his antecedent power, and are the effects of it. And as he is infinitely powerful, but not from the nature of causes and effects ; so he is infinitely wise, but not from the reason and nature of things.

Again ; if God is infinite wisdom, then his wisdom cannot be founded on the relations of things, unless things finite, and relations that began to be, can be the foundation of that wisdom which is infinite, and could not begin to be.

And to ask what their finite wisdom of God can be founded upon, if it is not founded upon the natures and relations of things, is the same absurdity, as to ask, How God's wisdom could be without a beginning, if we cannot tell how it began ? For if his wisdom is infinite, it can no more be founded upon anything, or have any reason of its existence, than it can have anything before it.

Therefore to ask, what it is founded upon, when it can have no foundation upon anything, is asking, what an independent being is dependent upon, or how that began, which could have no beginning?

And to ask the reason or foundation of anyone of the divine attributes, is the same as asking the reason or foundation of them all. And to seek for the reason or foundation of all the divine attributes, is seeking for the cause of God's existence.

And as we do not come to God's existence, till we come to the end of causes, so nothing that is divine, can be attributed to any cause.

Nor is it any more a contradiction to say, there is something whose nature is without any cause or foundation of its existence, than to say, something exists without ever beginning to exist. For as nothing can have a beginning, but as it proceeds from some cause; so that which can have no beginning, can have no cause. If therefore the divine wisdom ever began to be infinite, and we could know when that beginning was, we should have some pretence to search for that, upon which its infinity was founded; but if it never could begin to be, then to seek for its reason, or foundation, is seeking for its beginning.

This writer affirms, that God's wisdom and goodness must be founded on the nature and reason of things, otherwise it could not be proved, that God was not an arbitrary being.

Now to seek for reasons to prove that God is not an arbitrary being, that is, a being of the highest freedom and independency, that does everything according to his own will and pleasure, is as vain, as to seek for reasons to prove, that all things and all natures are not the effect of his will. For if everything besides God, received its existence from him; if everything that exists, is the effect of his will, and he can do nothing, but because he wills the doing it, must he not be free and arbitrary in as high a manner, as he is powerful?

For if God is omnipotent, he must act according to his own will. And to say, that his will must be governed and directed by his wisdom and goodness, is the same, as to say his omnipotence must be governed by something more powerful. For if either his will, or his omnipotence wanted to be governed, there could be nothing to govern them; unless we could suppose, that he had a will superior to his will, and a power superior to his omnipotence. And though will and power when considered, as blind, or imperfect faculties in men, may pass for humour and caprice, yet as attributes of God, they have the perfection of God.

This writer says, It is not in our power to love the Deity, whilst *we consider him to be an arbitrary being, acting out of humour and caprice.

But if God's will is as essentially opposite to humour and caprice, as his omnipotence is essentially opposite to weakness and inability; then it is as absurd to suppose, that God must act according to humour and caprice, because he acts according to his own will, as to suppose that he must act with inability, because he acts by his omnipotence.

And if the will of God, as such, is in the highest state of perfection, then we have the highest reason to love and adore God, because he is arbitrary, and acts according to his own all-perfect will. And if it be asked, what it is that makes the will of God all-perfect, it may as well be asked, what it is that makes him omnipotent, or makes him to exist. For, as has been already observed, we have not found out a God, till we have found a being that has no cause; so we have not found the will of God, till we have found a will, that has no mover, or director, or cause of its perfection. For that will which never began to be, can no more be anything, but what it is in itself, than it can begin to be.

And if any of God's attributes wanted to be governed and directed by the other, it might as well be said, that his infinite goodness was governed by his will, as that his will was governed by his goodness, because he cannot be good against his will.

That which makes people imagine, that will alone is not so adorable, is because they consider it as a blind imperfect faculty that wants to be directed. But what has such a will as this to do with the will of God?

For if the will of God is as perfect a will, as his omniscience is a perfect knowledge, then we are as sure, that the will of God cannot want any direction, or will anything amiss, as we are, that his omniscience cannot need any information, or fall into any mistake. And if the will of God wanted any direction or government, it is impossible it should have it; for having no superior, it could only be so governed, because it willed it, and therefore must be always under its own government.

All the perfection therefore that can be ascribed to God, must be ascribed to his will, not as if it was the production of his will (for nothing in God is produced) but as eternally, essentially, and infinitely inherent in it.

And as God's will has thus all the perfection of the divine nature, and has no rule, or reason, or motive to any goodness, that comes from it, but its own nature and state in God; so this great will is the only law of all creatures, and they are all to obey and conform to it, for this reason, because it is the will of God.

Nothing has a sufficient moral reason, or fitness to be done, but because it is the will of God that it should be done.

It may be asked, Is there then no reason or nature of things? Yes; as certainly as there are things. But the nature and reason of things, considered independently of the divine will, or without it, have no more obligation in them, than a divine worship considered independently of, and without any regard to the existence of God. For the will of God is as absolutely necessary to found all moral obligation upon, as the existence of God is necessary to be the foundation of religious worship. And the fitness of moral obligations, without the will of God, is only like the fitness of a religious worship without the existence of God.

And it is as just to say, that he destroys the reason of religion and piety, who finds it upon the nature and existence of God, as to say, he saps the foundation of moral obligations, who finds them upon the will of God. And as religion cannot be justly or solidly defended, but by shewing its connection with, and dependence upon God's existence; so neither can moral obligations be asserted with strength and reason, but by shewing them to be the will of God.

It may again be asked, Can God make that fit in itself, which is in itself absolutely unfit to be done?

This question consists of improper terms. For God's will no more make actions to be fit in themselves, than it makes things to exist in, or of themselves. No things, nor any actions have any absolute fitness, of and in themselves.

A gift, a blow, the making a wound, or shedding of blood, considered in themselves, have no absolute fitness, but are fit or unfit according to any variety of accidental circumstances.

When therefore God by his will makes anything fit to be done, he does not make the thing fit in itself, which is just in the same state considered in itself, that it was before, but it becomes fit for the person to do it, because he can only be happy, or do that which is fit for him to do, by doing the will of God.

For instance, the bare eating a fruit, considered in itself, is neither fit nor unfit. If a fruit is appointed by God for our food and nourishment, then it is as fit to eat it, as to preserve our lives. If a fruit is poisonous, then it is as unfit to eat it, as to commit self-murder. If eating of a fruit is prohibited by an express order of God, then it is as unfit to eat it, as to eat our own damnation.

But in none of these instances is the eating or not eating, considered in itself, fit or unfit; but has all its fitness, or unfitness, from such circumstances, as are entirely owing to the will of God.

Supposing therefore God to require a person to do something, which according to his present circumstances, without that command, he ought not to do, God does not make that which is absolutely unfit in itself, fit to be done; but only adds new circumstances to an action, that is neither fit, nor unfit, moral, nor immoral in itself, but because of its circumstances.

To instance in the case of Abraham, required to sacrifice his son. The killing of a man is neither good nor bad, considered absolutely in itself. It was lawful for Abraham to kill his son, because of the circumstances he was in with regard to his son. But when the divine command was given, Abraham was in a new state, the action had new circumstances, and then it was as lawful for Abraham to kill his son, as it was lawful for God to require any man's life, either by sickness, or any other means he should please to appoint.

And it had been as unlawful for Abraham to have disobeyed God in this extraordinary command, as to have cursed God at any ordinary calamity of providence.

Again, it is objected, If there is nothing right or wrong, good or bad, antecedently and independently of the will of God, there can then be no reason, why God should will, or command one thing, rather than another.

It is answered, first, That all goodness, and all possible perfection, is as eternal as God, and as essential to him as his existence. And to say, that they are either antecedent or consequent, dependent or independent of his will, would be equally absurd. To ask therefore, whether there is not something right and wrong, antecedent to the will of God, to render his will capable of being right, is as absurd, as to ask for some antecedent cause of his existence, that he may be proved to exist necessarily. And to ask, how God can be good if there is not something good independently of him, is asking how he can be infinite, if there be not something infinite independently of him. And to seek for any other source or reason of the divine goodness, besides the divine nature, is like seeking for some external cause and help of the divine omnipotence.

The goodness and wisdom, therefore, by which God is wise and good, and to which all his works of wisdom and goodness are owing, are neither antecedent, nor consequent to his will.

Secondly, Nothing is more certain, than that all moral obligations and duties of creatures towards one another, began with the existence of moral creatures. This is as certain, as that all physical relations, and corporeal qualities and effects, began with the existence of bodies.

As therefore nothing has the nature of a cause or effect, nothing has any quality of any kind in bodies, but what is entirely owing to matter so created and constituted by the will of God ; so it is equally certain, that no actions have any moral qualities, but what are wholly owing to that state and nature in which they are created by the will of God.

Moral obligations therefore of creatures have the same origin, and the same reason, that natural qualities and effects have in the corporeal world, viz., the sole will of God. And as in a different state of matter, bodies would have had different qualities and effects ; so in a different state of rational beings, there would be different moral obligations, and nothing could be right or good in their behaviour, but what began then to be right and good, because they then began to exist in such a state and condition of life. And as their state and condition could have no other cause or reason of its existence, but the sole will of God, so the cause and reason of right and wrong in such a state, must be equally owing to the will of God.

The pretended absolute independent fitnesses, or unfitnesses of actions therefore in themselves, are vain abstractions, and philosophical jargon, serving no ends of morality, but only helping people to wrangle and dispute away that sincere obedience to God, which is their only happiness. But to make these imaginary absolute fitnesses the common law both of God and man, is still more extravagant. For if the circumstances of actions give them their moral nature, surely God must first be in our circumstances, before that which is a law to us, can be the same law to him.

And if a father may require that of a son, which his son, because of his different state, cannot require of his brother ; surely that which God may require of us, may be as different from that, which a father may require of a son, as God is different from a father.

Thus this writer speaking of the law founded on absolute fitnesses, says, *It is a law by which God governs his own actions, and expects that all the rational world should govern theirs. And lest you should think that God is not in the same state of necessary subjection and obedience to this law, he farther adds, that God cannot dispense, either with his creatures, or himself, for not observing it.†

Now to say, that the reason of things is the same law to God that it is to us, is saying, that God is in the same state with regard to the nature of things, as we are. For as things are a law to us, because we are in such a state; if they are the same law to God, it must be because God is in the same state that we are.

Again, if God is as much under a law as we are, then he is as much under authority; for law can no more be without authority, than without a law-giver. And if God and we are under the same law, we must be under the same authority.

But as God cannot be under any law in common with us his creatures, any more than he can be of the same rank or order with us; so neither can he be under any law at all, any more than he can be under any authority at all.

For that which is the rule, or reason of God's actions, is no more different from his own will, than his power is different from his will.

And though God is not to be looked upon as an arbitrary being, in the sense of this author, who will not distinguish arbitrary from humour and caprice; yet in a better, and only true sense of the word, when applied to God, he must be affirmed to be an arbitrary being, that acts only from himself, from his own will, and according to his own pleasure.

And we have no more reason to be afraid to be left to a God without a law, than to a God that had no beginning; or to be left to his will and pleasure, than to be left under the protection and care of a being, that is all love, and mercy, and goodness. For as the existence of God, as such, necessarily implies the existence of all perfection; so the will of God, as such, necessarily implies the willing everything, that all perfection can will.

And as the existence of God, because it contains all perfection, cannot for that reason have any external cause; so the will of God, because it is all perfection, cannot, for that reason, have any external rule or direction. But his own will is wisdom, and his wisdom is his will. His goodness is arbitrary, and his arbitrariness is goodness.

To bring God therefore into a state of moral obligation and subjection to any external law or rule, as we are, has all the absurdity of supposing him to be a finite, dependent, temporary, imperfect, improvable, governable being as we are.

But this writer does not only thus bring God into this state of law and obligation with us, but makes farther advances in the same kind of errors.

Hence, says he, *we may contemplate the great dignity of our rational nature, since our reason for kind, though not for degree, is of the same nature with that of God's.

Here you see our reason, that is, our faculty of reasoning, for reason cannot be called our's in any other respect, has no other difference from reason as it is in God, but that of degree. But what greater absurdity can a man fall into, than to suppose, that a being whose existence had a beginning but a few years ago, differs only in degree from that which could not possibly have a beginning; or that a dependent and independent being, should not be different in kind, but only in degree. For if nothing that had a beginning, can be without a beginning; if nothing that is dependent can be independent, then no faculties or powers of dependent beings that began to be, can be of the same kind with the powers of that independent being, that could not begin to be.

For to say, that the faculties of a dependent and independent being, may be of the same kind, is as flat a contradiction, as to say, the same kind of thing may be dependent, and independent, as it is the same kind of thing.

How extravagant would he be, who should affirm, existence, life, happiness, and power, to be of the same kind and nature in us, as they are in God, and only to differ in degree?

And yet it would be more extravagant to suppose, that though God cannot possibly have our kind of existence, life, happiness, and power, yet he must have our kind of reason.

Reason belongs to God and man, just as power, existence, life, and happiness, belong to God and man. And he that can from happiness being common to God and man, prove our happiness to be of the same kind and nature with God's, may also prove reason in God and man to be of the same kind.

This writer indeed says, Our happiness is limited, because our reason is so; and that God has unlimited happiness, because he alone has unlimited reason.*

But if that which is necessarily limited, is certainly different from that which is necessarily unlimited, then we have proof enough from this very argument, that a reason necessarily limited, cannot be of the same kind with that reason, which is necessarily unlimited. Unless it can be said, that necessary and unnecessary, limited and unlimited, finite and infinite, beginning and unbeginning, have no contrariety in kind, but only differ, as a short line differs from a long one.

The truth of the matter is this; reason is in God and man, as power is in God and man. And as the divine power has some degree of likeness to human power, yet with an infinite difference from it; so that perfection which we call reason in God, has some degree of likeness to reason as it is in man, yet is infinitely and beyond all conception different from it.

Nor can anyone shew, that we enjoy reason in a higher degree in respect of God, than we enjoy power ; or that the manner, or light of our reason, bears any greater likeness to the light and knowledge of God, than the manner and extent of our power bears to the omnipotence of God.

And as our enjoyment of power is so limited, so imperfect, so superficial, as to be scarce sufficient to tell us, what power is, much less what omnipotence is ; so our share of reason is so small, and we enjoy it in so imperfect a manner, that we can scarce think or talk intelligibly of it, or so much as define our own faculties of reasoning.

Chapter II.

Shewing from the state and relation between God and man, that human reason cannot possibly be a competent judge of the fitness and reasonableness of God's proceedings with mankind, either as to the time, or matter, or manner of any external revelation.

AS our author has laid it down as an undeniable rule of God's actions, that he must, if he be a wise and good being, act according to the relation he stands in towards his creatures ; so I proceed upon this principle, to prove the incapacity of human reason, to judge truly of God's proceedings in regard to divine revelation.

For if the fitness of actions results from the nature and relations of beings, then the fitness of God's actions, as he is an omniscient creator and governor, to whom everything is eternally foreknown, over beings endued with our freedom of will, must be to us very incomprehensible.

We are not so much as capable of comprehending by our own reason the possibility of this relation, or how the foreknowledge of God can consist with the free agency of creatures. We know that God foreknows all things, with the same certainty as we know there is a God. And if self-consciousness is an infallible proof of our own existence, it proves with the same certainty the freedom of our will. And hence it is, that we have a full assurance of the consistency of God's foreknowledge with freedom of will.

Now this incomprehensible relation between an eternally fore-knowing creator and governor, and his free creatures, is the relation from whence arises the fitness of God's providence over us. But if the relation itself is incomprehensible, then those actions that have their fitness from it, must surely be incomprehensible. Nothing can be fit for God to do, either in Creation or Providence, but what has its fitness founded in his own fore-knowledge of everything that would follow, from every kind of creation, and every manner of providence : But if nothing can be fit, but because it is according to this fore-knowledge of everything that would follow from every kind of creation, and every manner of providence ; then we have the utmost certainty, that the fitness of God's actions as a fore-knowing Creator, and Governor of free agents, must be founded upon reasons that we cannot possibly know anything of.

And a child that has but just learned to speak, is as well qualified to state the fitness of the laws of matter and motion by which the whole vegetable world is preserved, as the wisest of men is qualified to comprehend, or state the fitness of the methods, or proceedings, which a fore-knowing providence observes over free agents. For every reason on which the fitness of such a providence is founded, is not only unknown to us, but by a necessity of nature impossible to be known by us.

For if the fitness of God's acting in this, or that manner, is founded in his fore-knowledge of everything that would happen, from every possible way of acting, then it is just as absolutely impossible for us to know the reasons, on which the fitness of his actions are founded, as it is impossible for us to be omniscient.

What human reason can tell, what kind of beings it is fit and reasonable for God to create, on the account of his own eternal fore-knowledge ? And yet this is as possible, as for the same reason to tell, how God ought to govern beings already created, on the account of his own eternal fore-knowledge ; and yet God can neither create, nor govern his creatures, as it is fit and reasonable he should, unless he creates and governs them in this or that manner, on the account of his own fore-knowledge. And therefore, if he acts like himself, and worthy of his own nature, the fitness of his proceedings must for this very reason, because they are fit, be vastly above our comprehension.

Who can tell what different kinds of rational creatures, distinguished by variety of natures, and faculties, it is fit and reasonable for God to create, because he eternally foresaw what would be the effect of such different creations? Who can explain the fitness of that vast variety there is amongst rational creatures of the same species, in their rational faculties, or shew that all their different faculties ought to be as they are? And yet the fitness of this providence has its certain reason in the divine fore-knowledge, and it could not be fit, but because of it.

Who can tell what degree of reason rational creatures ought to enjoy, because they are rational; or what degrees of new and revealed knowledge it is fit and reasonable for God to give, or not give them, because they seem, or seem not to themselves to want it, are disposed, or not disposed to receive it? For as mankind cannot tell why it was fit and reasonable for God to create them of such a kind, and degree, as they are of; so neither can they tell how God ought, or ought not to add to their natural knowledge, and make them as differently accountable for the use of revealed rules of life, as for the use of their natural faculties.

And as the reason why God created them of such a kind, and with such faculties, was because of his own fore-knowledge of the effects of such a creation; so if ever he does reveal to them any supernatural knowledge, both the doing it, the time, and manner and manner of it, must have their fitness in his own eternal fore-knowledge of the effects of such a revelation.

The reasons therefore on which the fitness of this or that revelation, why or when, of what matter, in what manner, and to whom it is to be made, must, from the nature and reason of things, be as unsearchable by us, as the reasons of this or that creation of rational beings, at such a time, of such a kind, in such a manner and in such a state.

This may help us to an easy solution of those unreasonable questions, which this writer puts in this manner.

*If the design of God in communicating anything of himself to men was their happiness, would not that design have obliged him, who at all times alike desires their happiness, to have at all times alike communicated it to them? If God always acts for the good of his creatures, what reason can be assigned, why he should not from the beginning have discovered such things as make for their good, but defer the doing it till the time of Tiberius: since the sooner this was done, the greater would his goodness appear?

And again, *How is it consistent with the notion of God's being universally benevolent, not to have revealed it to all his children, when all had equal need of it? Was it not as easy for him to have communicated it to all nations, as to any one nation or person? Or in all languages, as in one?

Now all this is fully answered, by our author's own great and fundamental principle.

For if the relations between things and persons, and the fitness resulting from thence, be the sole rule of God's actions,† as he expressly affirms: then the sole rule or reason of God's revealing anything to any man, or men, at any time, must have its fitness resulting from the divine fore-knowledge of the effects of such a revelation, at such a time, and to such persons. If God does not act thus, he does not act according to the relation betwixt a fore-knowing Creator, and his free creatures. But if he does act according to a fitness resulting from this relation, and makes, or does not make revelations, according to his own fore-knowledge of the fitness of times, and persons for them; then to ask how a God, always equally good, can make a revelation at any time, and not make the same at all times, is as absurd as to ask, how a God, always equally good, can reveal that at one time, because it is a proper time for it, and not reveal it at every other time, though every other time is improper for it.

God's goodness, directed by his own fore-knowledge of the fitness of times, and of the state and actions of free agents, deferred a certain revelation to the time of Tiberius, because he foresaw it would then be an act of the greatest goodness, and have its best effects upon the world: To ask therefore, what reason can be assigned, why so good and beneficial a revelation was not sooner, or even from the beginning made to the world, is asking, What reason can be assigned, why God is good, and intends the greatest good by what he does, or stays for the doing anything, till such time, as makes it a greater good than if he had done it sooner; it is asking, why God should act, according to his own fore-knowledge of the state and actions of free agents, and order all things, according to a fitness resulting from such a fore-knowledge.

These questions suppose, that if God shewed his goodness to mankind by a revelation at such time, he must be wanting in goodness before that time, because he did not make it sooner; whereas if his deferring it till such a time, was owing to his fore-knowledge of the actions and state of free agents, and of the effects of his revelation, and because it would then have its best effects, then God is proved to be equally good before he made it, for this very reason, because he did not make it before its proper time; and he had been wanting in goodness, if he had not deferred it till that time.

Now this appealing to God's fore-knowledge of the state and actions of free agents, as the cause of all that is particular in the time and manner of any revelation, and deducing its fitness from thence, cannot be said to be begging the question in dispute, but is resolving it directly according to the rule, which this writer lays down for God to act by, which is this: That the relations between things and persons, and the fitness resulting from thence, must be the sole rule of God's actions, unless he be an arbitrary being.

But if this is the sole rule, then God in giving any revelation, must act as the relation betwixt a fore-knowing Creator and his free creatures requires; and his actions must have their fitness resulting from his fore-knowledge of the state and actions of free agents. And if this is God's sole rule, made necessary to him from the nature of things, then to ask why this or that revelation only at such a time, is to ask why God only does that which is fit for him to do. And to ask, why not the same revelation at any other time, is asking why God does not do that, which it is not fit for him to do.

This writer asks, How it is consistent with the notion of God's being universally benevolent, not to have revealed it to all his children, who had equal need of it? But if they had equal need of it, yet if they were not equally fit for it, but prepared only to have their guilt increased by it, and so be exposed to a greater damnation by refusing it; then God's goodness to them is very manifest, by withholding such information from them, and reserving it for those that would be made happier by it.

Judas and Pontius Pilate, and the Jews that called for our Saviour's crucifixion, had equal need of a Saviour with those that believed in him. Chorazin and Bethsaida wanted the light of the Gospel as much as those that received it; but if the rest of the world had been, at that time, as much indisposed for the light of the Gospel, as they were, God's goodness had been greater to that age, if he had left them as they were, and reserved the light of the Gospel till a better age had succeeded.

So that this argument, founded on the equal need of all, or former ages, has no force, unless it could be shewn, that the same revelation made to any of these former ages, would have produced all those good effects, which God foresaw would follow, from its being reserved for such a particular time and state of things and persons.

He asks again, Was it not as easy for God to have communicated it to all nations, as to any one nation or person? Or in all languages, as in any one? This argument is built upon the truth and reasonableness of this supposition, That God does things because they are easy, or forbears things because they are difficult to be performed. For it can be no argument, that God ought to have revealed such things to all nations or persons, because it was as easy to him, as to do it to any one nation or person; unless it be supposed, that the easiness of a thing is a reason why God does it, and the difficulty of a thing a reason why he does not do it. But if this supposition be very absurd, then the argument founded upon it must be liable to the same charge.

But if God does things, not because they are easy, but because they are infinitely good and fit to be done, and founded in the relation of a fore-knowing Creator to his free creatures; then the reason why God has afforded different revelations, to different ages and persons, is this, That his manner of revealing everything, might be worthy of his own fore-knowledge of the effects of it, and that everything that is particular in the time or manner of any revelation, might have its fitness resulting from the relation betwixt a good God and his creatures, whose changing state, different conduct, tempers and actions, are all eternally fore-known by him.

If it should here be said, that this writer only means, that it is as possible for God to make the same revelation, have the same effects, and produce as much good in one age as in another;

This is only saying, It is as possible for God to destroy the difference of times and states, to overrule the nature of things, and turn all mankind into mere machines, as it is to govern and preside over them according to their natures. For if the natures of things are not to be destroyed; if the nature, and state, and tempers of men, and the freedom of their wills, are to be suffered to act according to themselves; then to say, it is as possible for God to make the same revelation to have the same effect in one age as in another, is as absurd as to say, it is as possible for him to make the same heat of the Sun, have the same effects upon any one place of the earth, that it has upon another, upon rocks and barren sands, as it has upon a fertile soil, without altering the nature of rocks and sands.

Again, it is objected, that a divine revelation must either be the effect of justice, or else of mercy and free goodness; but in either of these cases it ought to be universal; for justice must be done to all. But if it is the effect of mercy and free goodness, this writer asks, How a being can be denominated merciful and good, who is so only to a few, but cruel and unmerciful to the rest?*

It is answered, That there is neither justice in God without mercy, nor mercy without justice; and to ascribe a revelation to either of them separately, in contradistinction to the other, has no more truth or reason in it, than to ascribe the creation separately either to the Wisdom, or Power of God, in contradistinction to the other.

Secondly, A divine revelation is not owing to the justice or free goodness of God, either separately or jointly considered; but to the goodness, mercy, and justice of God, governed and directed by his eternal fore-knowledge of all the effects of every revelation, at any, or all times.

God ordains a revelation in this, or that manner, time, and place; not because it is a justice that he cannot refuse, not because it is matter of favour or free goodness, and therefore may be given in any manner at pleasure; but because he has the whole duration of human things, the whole race of mankind, the whole order of human changes and events, the whole combination of all causes and effects of human tempers, all the actions of free agents, and all the consequences of every revelation, plainly in his sight; and according to this eternal fore-knowledge, every revelation receives everything that is particular in it, either as to time, matter, manner, or place.

He shews his goodness in a revelation to this part of the world, not because it is a part that alone wants it, not because he can bestow his favours as he pleases, but because by acting so with such a part, he best shews his goodness and regard to the whole. He reveals himself at such a time, not because he at that time begins to have a partial or particular kindness, but because by so timing his goodness, he best shews his care and goodness throughout the whole duration of human things, from the beginning to the end of the world. And it is because he had the same good will towards mankind in every age, that he does what he does in any particular age.

And if by the particular time and manner of any revelation, the whole race of mankind receive more benefit from it; if more are raised to happiness by it, and fewer are made miserable by a blamable using or refusing it, than could have happened by any other time, or manner of giving it to the World, consistent with the natural freedom of men; then God, by being particular in the time and place of giving it, is not merciful to a few, and cruel to many, but is most merciful to all; because he only chose such time, and place, and persons, because all would receive more benefit from it, than they possibly could from the choice of any other time, or place, or persons.

All complaints therefore about that which is particular, or seemingly partial in the time and manner of any revelation, are very unjustifiable; and shew, that we are discontented at God's proceedings, because he acts like himself, does what is best and fittest to be done, and governs the world, not according to our weak imaginations, but according to his own infinite perfections.

We will not allow a Providence to be right, unless we can comprehend and explain the reasonableness of all its steps; and yet it could not possibly be right, unless its proceedings were as much above our comprehension, as our wisdom is below that which is infinite.

For if the relations of things and persons, and the fitness resulting from thence, be the rule of God's actions; then all the revelations that come from God, must have their fitness resulting from the relation his fore-knowledge bears to the various states, conditions, tempers, and actions of free agents, and the various effects of every manner of revelation.

But if God cannot act worthy of himself in any manner of revelation, unless he acts according to a fitness resulting from this relation; then we have the highest certainty, that he must act by a rule that lies out of our sight, and that his Providence in this particular must be incomprehensible to us; for this very reason, because it has that very fitness, wisdom and goodness in it, that it ought to have.

CHAPTER III.

Shewing how far human reason is enabled to judge of the reasonableness, truth and certainty of divine Revelation.

THE former chapter has plainly shewn, from the state and relation between God and man, that we must be strangers to the true reasons on which a divine revelation is founded, both as to its time, matter, and manner.

But it is here objected, If God by reason of his own perfections must be thus mysterious and incomprehensible, both in the matter and manner of divine revelation ; How can we know what revelations we are to receive as divine ? How can we be blamed for rejecting this, or receiving that, if we cannot comprehend the reasons on which every revelation is founded, both as to its matter and manner ?

Just as we may be blamed for some notions of God, and commended for others, though we can have no notions of God, but such as are mysterious and inconceivable. We are not without some natural capacity of judging right of God, of finding out his perfections, and proving what is, or is not worthy to be ascribed to him. Yet what the divine perfections are in themselves, what they imply and contain in their own nature and manner of existence, is altogether mysterious and inconceivable by us at present. If therefore a man may be blamable, or commendable, for his right or wrong belief of a God ; then a man may be accountable for a right or wrong belief of such matters, as are in their own nature too mysterious for his comprehension. And though a man knows the reasons of a divine revelation, either as to its matter or manner, as imperfectly as he knows the divine nature ; yet he may be as liable to account for believing false revelations, as for idolatry ; and as full of guilt for rejecting a true revelation, as for denying the only true God.

Secondly, Though we are insufficient for comprehending the reasons, on which the particular matter or manner of any divine revelation is founded ; yet we may be so far sufficient judges, of the reasons for receiving or not receiving a revelation as divine, as to make our conduct therein justly accountable to God.

For if God can shew a revelation to proceed from him, by the same undeniable evidence, as he shews the creation to be his work ; if he can make himself as visible in a particular extraordinary manner, as he is by his general and ordinary providence ; then, though we are as unqualified to judge of the mysteries of a revelation, as we are to judge of the mysteries in creation and providence ; yet we may be as fully obliged to receive a revelation, as to acknowledge the creation to be the work of God ; and as highly criminal for disbelieving it, as for denying a general Providence.

Adam, Noah, Abraham, and Moses, were very incompetent judges, of the reasons on which the particular revelations made to them were founded ; but this did not hinder their sufficient assurance, that such revelations came from God, because they were proved to come from God in the same manner, and for the same reasons, as the creation is proved to be the Work of God.

And as Adam and Noah must see everything wonderful, mysterious, and above their comprehensions, in those new worlds into which they were introduced by God ; so they could no more expect, that he should require nothing of them, but what they would enjoin themselves, than that their own frame, the nature of the creation, the providence of God, or the state of human life, should be exactly as they would have it.

And if their posterity will let no messages from heaven, no prophecies and miracles persuade them, that God can call them to any duties, but such they must enjoin themselves ; or to the belief of any doctrines, but such as their own minds can suggest ; nor to any methods of changing their present state of weakness and disorder for a happy immortality, but such as suit their own taste, temper, and way of reasoning ; it is because they are grown senseless of the mysteries of creation and providence with which they are surrounded, and forget the awful prerogative of infinite wisdom, over the weakest, lowest rank of intelligent beings.

For the excellence of a revelation is to be acknowledged by us, for the same reason that we are to acknowledge the excellence of creation and providence ; not because they are wholly according to human conception, and have no mysteries, but because they are proved to be of God.

And a revelation is to be received as coming from God, not because of its internal excellence, or because we judge it to be worthy of God ; but because God has declared it to be his, in as plain and undeniable a manner, as he has declared creation and providence to be his.

For though no revelation can come from God, but what is truly worthy of him, and full of every internal excellence ; yet what is truly worthy of God to be revealed, cannot possibly be known by us, but by a revelation from himself.

And as we can only know what is worthy of God in creation, by knowing what he has created ; so we can no other way possibly know what is worthy of God to be revealed, but by a revelation. And he that pretends, independently of any revelation, to shew how, and in what manner God ought to make a revelation worthy of himself, is as great a Visionary, as he that should pretend, independently of the creation, or without learning anything from it, to shew how God ought to have proceeded in it, to make it worthy of himself. For as God alone, knows how to create worthy of himself, and nothing can possibly be proved to be worthy to be created by him, but because he has already created it ; so God alone knows what is worthy of himself in a revelation, and nothing can possibly be proved worthy to be revealed by him, but because he has already revealed it.

Hence we may see how little this writer is governed by the reason and nature of things, who proceeds upon this as an undeniable principle, that we could not know a revelation to be divine, unless we knew, antecedently to revelation, what God could teach or require of us by it. Thus, says he, *Were we not capable by our reason of knowing what the divine goodness could command, or forbid his creatures, antecedently to any external revelation, we could not distinguish the true instituted religion from the many false ones.

Just as wild and visionary, as if it was said, Were we not capable by our reason of knowing what kind or order of beings God ought to create, independently of anything we learn from the creation, we could never prove this or that creation to proceed from him. Did we not, antecedently to facts and experience, know by our own reason what ought to be the method and manner of divine providence, we could never prove that the providence which governs nations and persons is a divine providence.

For if a revelation could have no proof that it was divine, unless we by our reason, antecedently to all revelation, knew all that any revelation could contain, or require of us; then it undeniably follows, that no providence or creation could be proved to be divine, unless we by our reason, independently of creation and providence, could tell what kind of beings God ought to create, or what manner of providence he ought to observe.

For that which cannot be ascribed to God in revelation, because it is unworthy of his wisdom and goodness, cannot be ascribed to God in creation and providence.

Again, He proceeds to shew, that a revelation from God cannot contain anything, but what human reason can prove from the nature of things; for this reason, because if God could require anything more of us, than what our own reason could thus prove, he must then require without reason, be an arbitrary being, and then there is an end of all religion.

Now this argument proceeds thus; If God does not act according to the measure of human reason, he cannot act according to reason itself. If he requires anything more of us, than what we think the nature of things requires of us, then he cannot act according to the nature of things. If he makes anything a rule or law to us, which we would not impose upon ourselves, then he must make laws by mere will, without any reason for them. If he requires us to believe anything of his own nature, or our nature, more than we could have known of ourselves, then he must act by caprice and humour, and be an arbitrary being. If his infinite wisdom is in any matters of revelation greater than ours; if it is not in everything he reveals measurable by ours, it cannot be wisdom at all, much less can it be infinite wisdom.

That is, if he is more powerful than we are, he cannot be omnipotent; if he is more perfect than we are, he cannot be all perfection; if he acts upon greater, or higher, or more reasonable motives than we do, he cannot be a reasonable being.

Now if these absurdities are not plain and manifest to every common understanding, it is in vain to dispute about anything; but if they are, then it is as plain, this writer's great argument against Christianity, and first principle of his rational religion, is in the same state of undeniable absurdity, as being solely built upon them.

Thus, says he, *Natural religion takes in all those duties which flow from the reason and the nature of things. That is, natural religion takes in all those things that bare human reason can of itself discover from the nature of things. This is granted; but what follows? Why, says he, Consequently, was there an instituted religion which differs from that of nature, its precepts must be arbitrary, as not founded on the nature and reason of things, but depending on mere will and pleasure, otherwise it would be the same with natural religion.†

That is, since natural religion contains all that bare human reason can of itself discover, if God was to reveal anything more than human reason can discover, he must be an arbitrary being, and act by mere will and pleasure; otherwise his revelation would be the same with, and nothing more than human reason.

Here you see all the absurdities just mentioned, are expressly contained in this argument. God is all humour, caprice, and mere arbitrary will, if his revelation is not strictly, in every respect, the same with human reason. That is, he is without wisdom, without reason, if his wisdom and reason exceed ours. He has no reason, nor wisdom, if his reason and wisdom are infinite.

Secondly, This argument, if it were allowed, leads directly to atheism. For if a revelation cannot be divine, if it contains anything mysterious, whose fitness and necessity cannot be explained by human reason, then neither creation nor providence can be proved to be divine, for they are both of them more mysterious than the Christian revelation. And revelation itself is therefore mysterious, because creation and providence cannot be delivered from mystery. And was it possible for man to comprehend the reasons, on which the manner of the creation and divine providence are founded, then revelation might be without mysteries.

But if the mysteries in revelation are owing to that, which is by the nature of things incomprehensible in creation and providence, then it is very unreasonable to reject revelation, because it has that which it must necessarily have, not from itself, but from the nature and state of things. And much worse is it, to deny revelation to be divine, for such a reason, as makes it equally fit to deny creation and providence to be of God.

For if everything is arbitrary, whose fitness and expedience human reason cannot prove and explain, then surely an invisible over-ruling providence, that orders all things in a manner, and for reasons, known only to itself; that subjects human life, and human affairs, to what changes it pleases; that confounds the best laid designs, and makes great effects arise from folly and imprudence; that gives the race not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; that brings good men into affliction, and makes the wicked prosperous; surely such a providence must be highly arbitrary.

And therefore if this argument is to be admitted, it leads directly to atheism, and brings us under a greater necessity of rejecting this notion of divine providence, on the account of its mysteries, than of rejecting a revelation that is mysterious in any of its doctrines. And if, as this writer frequently argues, God cannot be said to deal with us as rational agents, if he requires anything of us, that our reason cannot prove to be necessary; surely he cannot be said to deal with us as rational and moral agents, if he overrules our persons and affairs, and disappoints our counsels, makes weakness prosperous, and wisdom unsuccessful, in a secret and invisible manner, and for reasons and ends that we have no means of knowing.

And if it may be said, To what purpose has he given us reason, if that is not solely to give laws to us; surely it may better be said, To what purpose has he given us reason to take care of ourselves, to provide for our happiness, to prepare proper means for certain ends, if there is an overruling providence that changes the natural course of things, that confounds the best laid designs, and disappoints the wisest counsels?

There is nothing therefore half so mysterious in the Christian revelation, considered in itself, as there is in that invisible providence, which all must hold that believe a God. And though there is enough plain in providence, to excite the adoration of humble and pious minds, yet it has often been a rock of atheism to those, who make their own reason the measure of wisdom.

Again, Though the creation plainly declares the glory, and wisdom, and goodness of God; yet it has more mysteries in it, more things, whose fitness, expedience, and reasonableness, human reason cannot comprehend, than are to be found in Scripture.

If therefore he reasons right, who says, *If there may be some things in a true Religion, whose fitness and expedience we cannot see, why not others: Nay, why not the whole; since that would make God's laws all of a piece? And if the having of these things is no proof of its falsehood, how can any things fit and expedient (which no Religion is without) be a proof of the truth of any one Religion? If, I say, this is right reasoning, then it may be said, If there are things in the creation whose fitness we cannot see, why not others: Nay, why not the whole; since that would make all God's works of a piece? And if the being of such things as these in the creation, is not a proof of its not being divine, How can the fitness and expedience of any creation prove that it is the work of God?

Thus does this argument tend wholly to Atheism, and concludes with the same force against creation and providence, as it does against revelation.

This is farther plain from our author's account of the works and laws of God. It is a first principle with him, that God's laws and works must have the same infinite wisdom in them. That they both alike have the character of infinite wisdom impressed on them, and both alike discover their divine original.†

But if so, then nothing can prove any works to be of divine original, but that which will prove any laws to be of divine original. And nothing can shew any laws to be unworthy of God, but what would equally shew any works to be unworthy of God. But we have already seen, that no laws can come from God, or be fit for him to make, but such as human reason can prove to be fit and expedient; therefore no works can proceed from God, or be worthy of him, but such as human reason can prove to be fit and expedient.

Either therefore there is nothing in the works of the creation, whose fitness and expedience cannot be proved; nothing in God's providence over whole nations, and particular persons, whose fitness and expedience cannot be explained and justified by human reason, or else neither creation nor providence can be ascribed to God.

He says, It is impossible men should have any just idea of the perfections of God, who think that the dictates of infinite Wisdom, *do not carry their own evidence with them, or are not by their own innate worth discoverable to all mankind.

* First Address to the Inhabitants of London, page 57.

But if so, then we are obliged, out of regard to the divine perfections, to deny every creature, or part of the creation, to proceed from God, which does not carry its own evidence of infinite wisdom, and discover its own innate worth to all mankind.

Anyone must easily see, that I put no force upon this writer's arguments, to give them this atheistical tendency, but barely represent them as they are in his book.

For since it is his own avowed and repeated principle, that God's works and laws are both of a kind, and that they must both alike discover their divine original; it necessarily follows, that if any law or command must be unfit for God to make, because its fitness cannot be proved by human reason; then every creature, or part of the creation, whose fitness and expedience cannot be proved by human reason, must be rejected as unworthy of God. So that this argument leads to Atheism, not by any remote consequence, but by its first and immediate tendency.

For according to it, a man is obliged, out of regard to the divine perfections, to deal with creation and providence, as this writer does with Scripture; and to allow no more of either of them, than suits with his own notions of that which God ought to do in creation and providence.

The true grounds and reasons on which we are to believe a revelation to be divine, are such external marks and signs of God's action and operation, as are a sufficient proof of it. And if God has no ways of acting that are peculiar and particular to himself, and such as sufficiently prove his action and operation, then revelation can have no sufficient proof that it comes from God.

And if a revelation had no other proof of its Divinity, but such an internal excellency and fitness of its doctrines, as is fully known and approved of by human reason; such an internal excellency would be so far from being a sufficient proof of its Divinity, that it would be a probable objection against it. For it has an appearance of great probability, that God would not make an external revelation of that only, which was sufficiently and fully known to the natural man, or mere Reason, without it.

Although therefore no revelation can come from God, whose doctrines have not an internal excellency, and the highest fitness; yet the non-appearance of such excellency and fitness to our reason, cannot be a disproof of its Divinity, because it is our ignorance of such matters without revelation, that is the true ground and reason of God's revealing anything to us.

The credibility therefore of any external divine revelation with regard to human reason, rests wholly upon such external evidence, as is a sufficient proof of the divine operation, or interposition. If there be no such external evidence possible; if God has no ways of acting so peculiar to himself, as to be a sufficient proof to human reason of his action; then no revelation can be sufficiently proved to be a divine, external revelation from God.

I appeal therefore to the miracles and prophecies on which Christianity is founded, as a sufficient proof, that it is a divine revelation. And shall here consider, what is objected against the sufficiency of this kind of proof.

1. It is objected, That miracles cannot prove a false, or bad doctrine, to be true and good; therefore miracles, as such, cannot prove the truth of any revelation.

But though miracles cannot prove false to be true, or bad to be good; yet they may prove, that we ought to receive such doctrines, both as true and good, which we could not know to be true and good without such miracles. Not because the miracles have any influence upon the things revealed, but because they testify the credibility of the revealer, as having God's testimony to the truth of that which he reveals.

If therefore miracles can be a sufficient proof, of God's sending any persons to speak in his name, and under his authority; then they may be a sufficient proof of the truth and divinity of a revelation, though they cannot prove that which is false, to be true.

Our author therefore brings a farther objection against this use of miracles.

*If, says he, evil beings can impress notions in men's minds as strongly as good beings, and cause miracles to be done in confirmation of them; is there any way to know to which of the two notions thus impressed are owing, but from their nature and tendency, or internal marks of wisdom and goodness?—And if so, Can external proofs carry us any farther, than the internal proofs do?

This objection supposes, that no miracles, as such, can be a sufficient proof of the divinity of a revelation, for this reason, because we do not know the extent of that power, which evil spirits have, of doing miracles. But this objection is groundless. For, granting that we do not know the nature and extent of that power which evil spirits may have; yet if we know enough of it to affirm, that the creation is not the work of evil spirits; if we can securely appeal to the creation, as a sufficient proof of God's action and operation; then we are fully secure in appealing to miracles, as a sufficient proof of a divine revelation.

For, if the creation must of necessity be allowed to be the work of God, notwithstanding any unknown degree of power in evil spirits; if we can as certainly ascribe it to God, as if we really knew there were no such spirits; then in some cases, miracles may be as full a proof of the operation, or interposition of God, as if we really knew there were no such spirits in being.

I do not ask, Whether the same divine perfection is necessary to foretell such things as are foretold in Scripture, and work such miracles as are there related, as is necessary to create? I do not ask, Whether any power less than divine can do such things? I only ask, Whether there is any certainty, that the creation is the work of God? Whether we can be sure of the divine operation, from the existence of that creation that we are acquainted with? Or, Whether we are in any doubt or uncertainty about it, because we do not know the true nature or degree of power, that may belong to evil spirits?

For if it can be affirmed with certainty, that the creation is the work of God, notwithstanding our uncertainty about the degree of power that may belong to evil spirits; then we have the same certainty, that the prophecies and miracles recorded in Scripture, are to be ascribed to God, as his doing, notwithstanding our uncertainty of the power of evil spirits.

And this is affirmed, not because prophecies and miracles require the same degree of divine power, as to create (for that would be affirming we know not what,) but it is affirmed, because the creation cannot be a better, farther, or different proof of the action or operation of God, than such miracles and prophecies are.

For every reason for ascribing the creation to God, is the same reason for ascribing such miracles and prophecies to God; and every argument against the certainty of those miracles and prophecies coming from God, is the same argument against the certainty of the creation's being the work of God; for there cannot be more or less certainty in one case than in the other.

For, if evil spirits have so the creation in their hands, that by reason of their power over it, no miracles can prove the operation of God, then the operation of God cannot be proved from the creation itself.

For the creation cannot be proved to be the operation of God, unless it can be proved that God still presides over it.

And if all that which is extraordinary and miraculous may be accounted for, without the interposition of God ; then nothing that is ordinary and common, according to the course of nature, can be a proof of the action of God. For there can be no reason assigned, why that which is ordinary should be ascribed to God, if all that is, or has been, or can be miraculous, may be ascribed to evil spirits.

Either therefore it must be said, that there are, or may be miracles, which cannot be the effects of evil spirits ; or else nothing that is ordinary and common, can be a proof of the operation of God. For if nothing miraculous can be an undeniable proof of God's action, nothing created can be a proof of it.

The matter therefore stands thus : There are, and may be miracles, that cannot be ascribed to evil spirits, without ascribing the creation to them ; and which can no more be doubted to come from God, than we can doubt of his being the Creator of the world. There may be miracles therefore, which, as such, and considered in themselves, are as full a proof of the truth of that which they attest, as the creation is of the fitness of that which is created.

And though the matter of a revelation is to be attended to, that we may fully understand it, and be rightly affected with it ; yet the reason of our receiving it as divine, must rest upon that external authority, which shews it to be of God.

And the authority of miracles, sufficiently plain and apparent, are of themselves a full and necessary reason for receiving a revelation, which both as to its matter and manner, would not be approved by us without them.

It seems therefore to be a needless, and too great a concession, which some learned divines make in this matter, when they grant, that we must first examine the doctrines revealed by miracles, and see whether they contain anything in them absurd, or unworthy of God, before we can receive the miracles as divine. For,

I. Where there can be nothing doubted, nor any more required, to make the miracles sufficiently plain and evident, there can be no doubt about the truth and goodness of the doctrine they attest. Miracles in such a state as this are the last resort, they determine for themselves, and cannot be tried by anything farther.

And as the existence of things, is the highest and utmost evidence of God's having created them, and not to be tried by our judgments about the reasonableness and ends of their creation; so a course of plain undeniable miracles, attesting the truth of a revelation, is the highest and utmost evidence of its coming from God, and not to be tried by our judgments about the reasonableness or necessity of its doctrines.

And this is to be affirmed, not because God is too good to suffer us to be brought into such a snare, but because we can know nothing of God, if such a course of miracles is not a sufficient proof of his action and interposition. For if doctrines revealed by such an undeniable change in the natural course of things, have not thence a sufficient proof, that they are divine doctrines; then no laws that are according to the natural state of things, can have thence any proof, that they are divine laws.

For if no course of miracles can be of itself a sufficient proof, that that which is attested by them, is attested by God; then no settled, ordinary state of things can of itself be a proof, that that which is required by the natural state of things, is required by God.

2. To try miracles, sufficiently plain and evident, by our judgments of the reasonableness of the doctrines revealed by them, seems to be beginning at the wrong end. For the doctrines had not been revealed, but because of our ignorance of the nature and reasonableness of them; nor had the miracles been wrought, but to prevent our acquiescing in our own judgments about the worth and value of them.

3. To say, That no miracles, however plain and evident are to be received as divine, if they attest any doctrine that appears to human reason to be absurd, or unworthy of God, is very unreasonable. For what is it that can be called human reason in this respect? Is it anything else than human opinion? And is there anything that mankind are in greater uncertainty, or more contrary to one another, than in their opinions about what is absurd, or unworthy of God in religion? And is it not the very end and design of a divine revelation, to help us to a rule that may put an end to the divisions of human reason, and furnish us with an authority for believing such things, as we should not think it reasonable to believe without it?

And how weak and useless must that revelation be, which has not sufficient authority to teach us new notions of religion, and persuade us to believe that to be reasonable and worthy of God, which we could not believe to be so upon a less authority?

But if this be the case, as it seems clearly to be, then we are not to try plain and evident miracles of the highest kind, by our judgments of the reasonableness of the doctrines revealed by them ; but miracles are to be received, as of sufficient authority, to form and govern our opinions about the reasonableness of the doctrines.

It may perhaps be said, though the authority of miracles, is sufficient to govern our opinions in doctrines that are only mysterious, and above the comprehension of our reason, yet that which is plainly and grossly absurd, or unworthy of God, cannot, nor ought to be received upon any authority of the greatest miracles.

This objection is vain and absurd ; it is vain, because it relates to a case that never was the case of miracles ; and it is absurd, because it is providing against a case, that never can happen to miracles. For to suppose anything in its own nature grossly absurd, or unworthy of God, to be attested with the highest evidence of miracles, is as impossible, and contradictory a supposition, as to suppose God to create rational beings wicked in their nature, that they might thereby be of service to the devil. These two suppositions have not the smallest difference, either in absurdity, or impossibility.

Again ; The history of magical wonders, and extraordinary things done by evil spirits, is no objection against the sufficiency of that proof, that arises from miracles. For the question is not, whether nothing that is extraordinary can be done by evil spirits, in any circumstances, but whether nothing that is miraculous can, as such, be a proof of its being done by God. For these two cases are very consistent. It may be very possible for evil spirits, to do things extraordinary in some circumstances, as where people enter into contracts with them, and resign themselves up to their power, and yet that miracles may in other circumstances, merely as miracles, be a sufficient proof of their being done by God.

Thus the case of the Egyptian magicians, is so far from abating the weight of miracles, that it is a great proof of their authority, considered in themselves ; for the Magicians could proceed but a little way in their contention with Moses, they were soon made to feel his superior power in the same manner, as the rest of the Egyptians did, and to confess, that his miracles were done by the finger of God. This very instance therefore fully shews, that miracles, as such, may be a sufficient proof of God's interposition. For if, in the case of a contention, the superior power must be ascribed to God, then miracles, as such, or of such a kind, as having none equal to them, or able to stand against them, must in such a state be a sufficient proof of their being done by God, and give a sufficient warrant, to receive any doctrine that is attested by them.

For, let it be supposed, that the Egyptian Magicians had destroyed the power of Moses, and brought all the miraculous evils upon the Israelites, as enemies of the Egyptian Gods, which he brought upon them ; what consequence must reason have drawn from such an event ? Could reason have proved, that the God that made the world was one God, and that he alone ought to be worshipped ? Or that the Egyptians ought to have left their Gods, who had the whole creation in their hands in such a manner, as to change the nature of things as they pleased, and destroy every power that opposed them ?

Now either the case here supposed is possible, or it is impossible. If it is possible, then all the reasons for worshipping the one true God, taken from the nature and state of the creation, may entirely cease, and be so many reasons for idolatrous worship. For no one can have any reasons for worshipping the one true God, from the nature and state of the creation, if other Gods have the greatest power over it, and can turn everything into a plague upon those that do not worship them.

But if this case is impossible, then it necessarily follows, that miracles, as such, and considered in themselves, may be certain and infallible proofs of God's interposition. For this case can only be impossible, because the greatest, plainest miracles, cannot possibly be on the side of error. But if this cannot be, then the greatest, plainest miracles, as such, and considered in themselves, are an infallible mark of truth.

And he that abides by miracles in such circumstances, as proofs of the operation of the one true God, has the same certainty of proceeding right, as he that takes the state, and nature of the creation, to be the effect of the one true God.

And as miracles thus considered in themselves, are the highest and most undeniable evidence of the truth and divinity of any external revelation ; so Christianity stands fully distinguished from all other religions, by the highest and most undeniable evidence ; since it has all the proof that the highest state of miracles can give, and every other religion is without any support from them.

And though this writer, with a boldness worthy of himself, often puts all traditional religions upon a level : yet he might have shewn himself as much a friend to truth and sobriety, by asserting, that all arguments are equally conclusive, all tempers equally virtuous, all designs equally honest, and all histories and fables equally supported by evidence of fact.

But his prodigious rashness in asserting, at all adventures, whatever he pleases, is not confined to matters of fact, but is as remarkably visible in that part of his book which pretends to argument ; as may be fully seen by the following paragraphs.

‘ It is the observation, says he, of naturalists, that there is no ‘ species of creatures, but what have some innate weakness, which ‘ makes them an easy prey to other animals that know how to ‘ make the advantage of it. Now the peculiar foible of mankind ‘ is superstition, which at all times has made them liable to be ‘ practised on, not by creatures of different species, but by those ‘ of their own ; who by a confident pretence of knowing more ‘ than their neighbours, have first circumvented the many, the ‘ credulous, and unwary ; and afterwards forced the free-thinking ‘ few into an outward compliance.’* Here it is to be observed :

1. That superstition is the peculiar foible in man ; as natural and intrinsic to him, as an innate weakness in animals. He has it therefore from God and nature, in the same manner as animals have their innate weakness. And therefore it must be as unnatural for men to be without superstition, or not act according to it, as for animals to be without their innate weakness.

2. Mankind are, according to this account, in their natural state, entirely incapable of knowing any true religion. For if, as our author saith, superstition be the opposite to true religion ; if this superstition be the innate peculiar foible of human nature ; if mankind are not only to begin and end their lives among those that have all the same foible, but, what is worse, have at all times had this innate foible increased and practised upon by the crafty pretenders of their own species ; are they not inwardly and outwardly fixed in superstition, the opposite to true religion ?

Judge therefore by this, what our author really thinks of the excellency and perfection of the light of nature ; and how much meaning he has in such exclamations as these : And now let any-one say, how it is possible God could more fully make known his will to all intelligent creatures, than by making everything within and without them, a declaration of it†?

That is, How can they have a better inward guide to true religion, than by having an innate peculiar foible contrary to it ? How can they have a better outward call to the true religion, than by having all the world conspiring to fix them in superstition ?

For this, he says, is their state ; this innate peculiar foible has been at all times increased and practised upon by the more cunning of their species, and the free-thinking few forced into an outward compliance. It is this inward and outward state of Man, that throws our author into so much transport at its absolute perfection, as to matters of religion.

Again; Judge from this with what piety and sincerity he speaks of God, when he says, *Infinite wisdom, directed by infinite goodness, will certainly give us equal degrees of evidence for religious truths, which so much concerns us, as it has done for truths of less importance. For if our Author believed himself in this assertion, how could he believe superstition to be the peculiar inborn foible of man? For can religious truths have the same degrees of evidence with things of less importance, if man's peculiar foible relates to religion?

Again; He cries out, In what point is it, that men of the meanest abilities may not know their duty to God? Cannot they tell what sentiments inspire them with love and reverence for the deity?† Now put these things together, and then his argument will proceed thus: If superstition is contrary to true religion, and superstition be the innate peculiar foible of all men, how can the weakest man be in any mistake about what is right or wrong in religion? Let the reader here judge, whether I put any force upon his words.

Judge again, how serious this Author must be in a variety of such arguments as these: If, says he, men have been at all times obliged to avoid superstition, and embrace true religion, there must have been at all times sufficient marks of distinction. And again: Nothing, says he, can be a greater libel on the true religion, than to suppose it does not contain such internal marks, as will, even to the meanest capacity, distinguish it from all false religions.‡ But if superstition is the innate, peculiar foible of mankind, where must a man of the meanest capacity look for the internal marks of true religion? And if all the world is, and always was, over-run with superstition, and the free-thinking few have always been forced into an outward compliance, where must such a man look for the outward marks of true religion?

To give you one instance more of this writer's extravagant and inconsistent notions:

He makes reason, or natural religion, to be God's internal revelation, differing only from external revelation in the manner of its being communicated. He rejects external revelation as unworthy of God, because it has not been sufficiently made known at all times, and in all places; yet he sets up an internal revelation, as worthy of God, which has never been made known to any one man of any time or place in the world. For what one man ever knew that reason was God's internal revelation, to which nothing could be added by any external revelation?

It is a mighty complaint with our author against Christianity, that so much happiness should be deferred till the time of Tiberius, and that it should be communicated to no greater a part of the world, than Christianity hath been. But is not this a judicious complaint in the mouth of a person, that is setting up a religion, that has been communicated to nobody but himself?

I know nothing that can be said for our author, in excuse of so much confusion and self-contradiction, unless it be the particular hardships of his sect. The free-thinking few, he says, are forced into an outward compliance; and that which forces a man into a state of hypocrisy, may force him into a great deal of confusion and self-contradiction.

To return: I have from a consideration of the state and condition of man, and the several relations which God stands in towards his creatures, shewn that it is utterly impossible for human reason to be a competent judge of the fitness, or unfitness, of all that God may, or may not require of us. The two following chapters shall state the nature and perfection of reason, considered in itself, or as it is a faculty, or principle of action in human nature.

Chapter IV.

Of the state and nature of reason, as it is in man; and how its perfection in matters of religion is to be known.

THIS writer and others, who take to themselves the names of free-thinkers, make their court to the world, by pretending to vindicate the right that all men have, to judge and act according to their own reason. Though, I think, the world has no more to thank them for on this account, than if they had pretended to assert the right that every man has, to see only with his own eyes, or to hear only with his own ears.

For their own reason always did, does, and ever will, govern rational creatures, in everything they determine, either in speculation or practice. It is not a matter of duty for men to use their own reason, but of necessity: and it is as impossible to do otherwise, as for a being that cannot act but from choice, to act without choice. And if a man were to try, not to act according to his own reason or choice, he would find himself under the same difficulty, as he that tries to think, without thinking upon something.

And if God were to command us, by fresh revelations every day of our lives, not to act from a principle of reason and choice, such revelations could have no more effect upon us, than if they came from the weakest amongst mankind. For, as our principle of acting is not derived from ourselves, so it is no more in our power to alter it, or contradict it, than it is in the power of matter not to gravitate, or to exist, without taking up some place.

Man is under the same necessity of acting from his own choice, that matter is of not acting at all ; and a being, whose principle of action is reason and choice, can no more act without it, or contrary to it, than an extended being can be without extension.

All men therefore are equally reasonable in this respect, that they are, and must be, by a necessity of nature, equally directed and governed by their own reason and choice.

For, as the principle of action, in human nature, is reason and choice, and nothing can be done, or believed, but for some reason, any more than a thing can be chosen and not be chosen ; so the acting according to one's own reason is not the privilege of the philosopher, but essential to human nature ; and as inseparable from all persons, as self-consciousness, or a sense of their own existence.

The dispute therefore betwixt Christians and unbelievers, concerning reason, is not, whether men are to use their own reason, any more than whether they are to see with their own eyes ; but whether every man's reason must needs guide him by its own light, or must cease to guide him, as soon as it guides him by a light borrowed from revelation ? This is the true state of the question, not whether reason is to be followed, but when it is best followed ? not whether it is to be our guide, but how it may be made our safest guide ?

The free-thinkers, therefore, rather appeal to the passions, than reason of the people, when they represent the Clergy and Christianity as enemies to reason, and just thinking, and themselves as friends and advocates for the use of reason.

For Christians oppose unbelievers, not because they reason, but because they reason ill. They receive revelation, not to suppress the natural power, but to give new and heavenly light to their reason ; not to take away their right of judging for themselves, but to secure them from false judgments.

If therefore a poor peasant should call upon our free-thinkers, to lay aside their bigotry to ideas, arguments, and philosophy, and govern themselves by reason; it would be no more absurd, than for them to exhort Christians to lay aside their bigotry to creeds and doctrines of revelation, and to govern themselves by reason.

For it may as well be affirmed, that a man departs from the use of his reason, because he depends upon ideas, arguments, and sylogisms; as that he departs from the use of his reason, because he proceeds upon prophecies, miracles, and revelations.

And if he uses his reason weakly, and is subject to delusion in these points, he no more renounces his reason, or goes over to another direction, than Hobbes, Spinoza, Bayle, Collins, or Toland, renounce their reason, when they take their own fancies to be demonstrations.

Christians therefore do not differ from unbelievers in the constant use of their reason, but in the manner of using it: As virtuous men differ from rakes, not in their desire of happiness, but in their manner of seeking it.

And though this writer is very free in his charge of bigotry upon Christians, yet I may venture to challenge him to shew, that there can possibly be more bigotry on the side of religion, than there may be against it. For as bigotry is nothing but weak reasoning, so infidels are entitled to as large a share of it, as believers; and to suppose that bigotry may be charged upon those who have a zeal for Christianity, but cannot be charged on them that are zealous against it, is as just a way of proceeding, as to say of two brothers, that one is to be charged with passion, because he loves his father, but the other cannot be charged with passion, because he hates his father.

And as men that write against religion, are as much concerned to have it false, as those who write for it, are to have it true; so all that there is to blind and prejudice the latter, has the same power to blind and prejudice the former.

It appears from what has been said, that every man's own reason is his only principle of action, and that he must judge according to it, whether he receives, or rejects revelation.

Now although every man is to judge according to the light of his own reason, yet his reason has very little light that can be called its own. For, as we derive our nature from our parents, so that which we generally call natural knowledge, or the light of nature, is a knowledge and light that is made natural to us, by the same authority, which makes a certain language, certain customs, and modes of behaviour, natural to us.

Nothing seems to be our own, but a bare capacity to be instructed, a nature fitted for any impressions; as capable of vice as virtue; as ready to be made a vicious animal, as a religious rational creature ; as liable to be made a Hottentot, by being born among Hottentots, as to be a Christian, by being born among Christians.

It is not my intention by this, to signify, that there is not a good and evil, right and wrong, founded in the nature of things ; or that morality has any dependence upon the opinions or customs of men ; but only to shew, that we find out this right and wrong, come to a sense of this good and evil, not by any inward strength, or light, that our natural reason of itself affords, but by such external means, as people are taught articulate language, civility, politeness, or any other rules of civil life.

Men do not prefer virtue to vice, from a philosophical contemplation of the fitness of the one, and the unfitness of the other, founded in the nature of things ; but because it is a judgment as early in their minds, as their knowledge of the words, virtue and vice.

And it can no more be reasonably affirmed, that our knowledge of God and divine things, our opinions in morality, of the excellency of this, or that virtue, of the immortality of our souls, of a future life of rewards and punishments, are the effects of our natural light ; than it can be reasonably affirmed, that our living in society, our articulate language, and erect posture, are owing to the light of nature.

For, as all mankind find themselves in this state, before any reasoning about it ; as education, and human authority have set our bodies upright, taught us language, and accustomed us to the rules and manners of a social life ; so education, and the same human authority, have impressed and planted in our minds, certain notions of God and divine things, and formed us to a sense of good and evil, a belief of our soul's immortality, and the expectation of another life.

And mankind are no more left to find out a God, or the fitness of moral virtue, by their own reason, than they are left by their own reason to find out who are their parents, or to find out the fitness of speaking an articulate language, or the reasonableness of living in society.

On the contrary ; we know that our manner of coming into the world, subjects us, without any choice, to the language, sentiments, opinions, and manners, of those amongst whom we are born. And although when we come to any strength, or art of reasoning, or have a genius for philosophic inquiries, we may thence deduce proofs of the Being and Attributes of God, the reasonableness of religion and morality, the nature of our souls, and the certainty of a future state, and find that the opinions and tradition of mankind concerning these things are well founded ; yet these are an after-knowledge, not common to men, but accidental confirmations of that knowledge and belief of a God, religion and morality, which were before fixed in us, more or less, by education, and the authority of those amongst whom we have lived.

And as no Philosopher ever proved the fitness of human nature for a social life, from principles of reason and speculation, who had not first been taught the nature and advantage of Society another way ; so no one ever pretended to prove the Being and Attributes of God, or the excellency of moral virtue, who had not first been taught the knowledge of God, and moral virtue some other way.

Now if this is the state of reason, as it is in man ; if this is all the light that we have from our own nature, a bare capacity of receiving good or bad impressions, right or wrong opinions and sentiments, according to the state of the world that we fall into ; then we are but poorly furnished, to assert and maintain the absolute perfection of our own reason.

If our light is little more than the opinions and customs of those amongst whom we live, and it be so hard for a man to arrive at a greater wisdom, than the common wisdom of the place or country which gave him birth and education ; how unreasonably do we appeal to the perfection and sufficiency of our own reason, against the necessity and advantage of divine revelation ?

If we are nothing without the assistance of men ; if we are a kind of foolish, helpless animals, till education and experience have revealed to us the wisdom and knowledge of our fellow-creatures ; shall we think ourselves too wise and full of our own light, to be farther enlightened with a knowledge and wisdom revealed to us by God himself ?

This gentleman, speaking of education, saith, *Education is justly esteemed a second nature ; and its force is too strong, that few can wholly shake off its prejudices, even in things unreasonable and unnatural ; and must it not have the greatest efficacy in things agreeable to reason, and suitable to nature ?

All that I shall add to this account, is only this, That we are, by the circumstances and condition of human life, necessarily subjected to this second nature, and cannot avoid coming under its power.

But here let me ask this pleader for the sufficiency of the light of nature, how those that resign themselves up to the light of their own nature, shall know, whether it is their first, or their second nature that directs them ?

Here are, it seems, two natures ; they may be as different as good and evil ; yet as they are both natures, both internal light, how shall a man know which he follows ? He does not know which was first, or why he should call one first, and the other second ; they are both internal, and without anything to distinguish them. And as he is not to resist the motions of nature, or stifle its directions ; so he must be as obedient to the directions of the second, as of the first nature, because he does not perceive their difference, nor has any means to distinguish their operations.

He therefore that asserts the light of nature to be a sufficient unerring guide in divine matters, ought either to shew, that our second nature is as safe a guide as the first ; or that though it is nature, yet it has no natural power over us.

For since every man is necessitated to take upon him a second nature, which he does not know to be a second, or when it began, or how far it has proceeded, or how contrary it is to his first nature ; he that would prove the light of nature to be so perfect, that nothing can be added to it, is obliged to prove, that our second nature, which we receive by education, has the same degree of perfection. For so far as our second nature is different from the first, so far it has changed the first ; and if we are to follow nature exclusive of revelation, we may take revenge, self-murder, incontinence, sensuality, pride, haughtiness, self-conceit, and a contempt of all things sacred, to be the true dictates and directions of nature.

For as it may be very easy, and I am afraid often happens to people, to be thus educated ; so if education is a second nature, and nature is to be esteemed a true and perfect guide ; a man thus educated, has all his vices made so many glorious laws of nature ; and through the strength of his natural light, he condemns humility, self-denial, and devotion, as foolish bigotry.

This writer says, Natural religion, that is, the religion of nature, is a perpetual standing rule for men of the meanest, as well as the highest capacities, and carries its own evidence with it, those internal, inseparable marks of truth.* But if education is a second nature, and, as this writer affirms, has the force of a second nature even in things unreasonable and unnatural ; then this second nature has not only its natural religion, which is also a perpetual standing rule for men of the meanest, as well as the highest capacities ; which carries its own evidence with it, those internal, inseparable marks of truth ; but it may also have a natural religion, both unreasonable and unnatural ; since it is here affirmed, that education has the force of nature even in things of this kind.

Again ; If education has this force of nature even in things unreasonable and unnatural, and still greater force in things agreeable to nature ; if it is also absolutely necessary for all men to come under the power of some second nature ; what can be more vain or groundless, than to pretend to state the light, or rectitude of human nature, since it must be for the most part in every man, as the uncertainty, variety, happiness or unhappiness of education has rendered it ?

And our author can no more tell, what man would be, without human education, or what nature would do for those who had no foreign instruction, than he can tell what sort of beings dwell in the moon. And yet he that does not know this, how can he know what the light of nature is in itself ?

For if most of our judgments, opinions, tempers, and ways of thinking, are owing to education, and the authority of that part of the world where we dwell ; if these impressions have the power of a second nature upon us, then the light of nature can no more be distinguished from the light of education, than the strength which we have from nature, can be distinguished from the strength which we have from our food.

So that to declare the light of nature so absolutely perfect, as to be incapable of all improvement even by divine revelation, is no less an extravagance, than to declare the education of mankind to be absolutely perfect in the same degree.

For if nature not only wants, but cannot possibly avoid education ; if this necessary unavoidable education becomes another nature, undiscernible from the first ; then nothing can possibly be affirmed of the perfection of the light of nature, but what must be affirmed in the same degree of the perfection of education. And he that affirms that mankind have had, at all times, and in all places of the world, the same sufficient, perfect light of nature, must affirm, that mankind have had, at all times and in all places of the world, the same perfect, unerring education.

When therefore it is just, and fitting for all people, to abide by the absolute perfection of their education, the infallible light of their second nature, as the unerring standard, measure, and rule of all that is to be esteemed moral, religious, and divine ; then it may be just to appeal to the natural light of all men, of all ages, and all places, as a sufficient teacher of all that ought, or ought not to be a matter of religion.

For till it can be shewn, that men are not liable to a second nature from education, or that there is, or can be any nature without it ; the state of nature must differ all over the world, and in every age of the world, just as the light, and advantages of education, have differed in the several parts, and ages of the world.

In a word, the religious and moral light of our first nature, is just as great as the first strength of infants; and the religious and moral light of our second nature, is just as perfect as our education, and as much of our own growth, as the first language that we are taught to speak.

May not therefore one justly wonder, what it is that could lead any people into an imagination of the absolute perfection of human reason? There seems no more in the state of mankind, to betray a man into this fancy, than to persuade him, that the reason of infants is absolutely perfect. For sense and experience, are as full and strong a proof against one, as against the other.

But it must be said for these writers, that they decline all arguments from facts and experience, to give a better account of human nature; but with the same justice, as if a man was to lay aside the authority of history, to give you a truer account of the life of Alexander.

They argue about the perfection of human reason, not as if it were something already in being, that had its nature and condition, and shewed itself to be what it is; but as if it were something that might take its state and condition, according to their fancies and speculations about it.

Their objection against revelation is founded upon the pretended sufficiency, and absolute perfection, of the light and strength of human reason, to teach all men all that is wise, and holy, and divine, in religion. But how do they prove this perfection of human reason? Do they appeal to mankind as proofs of this perfection? Do they produce any body of men, in this, or any other age of the world, that without any assistance from revelation, have attained to this perfection of religious knowledge? This is not so much as pretended to: The history of such men is entirely wanting. And yet the want of such a fact as this, has even the force of demonstration against this pretended sufficiency of natural reason.

Because it is a matter not capable of any other kind of proof, but must be admitted as certainly true, or rejected as certainly false, according as fact and experience bear witness for, or against it.

For an inquiry about the light, and strength, and sufficiency of reason, to guide and preserve men in the knowledge and practice of true religion, is a question, as solely to be resolved by fact and experience, as if the inquiry was about the shape of man's body, or the number of his senses. And to talk of a light and strength of reason, natural to man, which fact and experience have never yet proved, is as egregious nonsense, as to talk of natural senses, or faculties of his body, which fact and experience have never yet discovered.

For as the existence of man cannot be proved, but from fact and experience; so every quality of man, whether of body or mind, and every degree of that quality, can only be proved by fact and experience.

The degrees of human strength, the nature of human passions, the duration of human life, the light and strength of human reason in matters of religion, are things not possible to be known in any other degree, than so far as fact and experience prove them.

From the bare consideration of a rational soul in union with a body, and bodily passions, we can neither prove man to be strong or weak, good or bad, sickly or sound, mortal or immortal: all these qualities must discover themselves, as the eye discovers its degree of sight, the hand its degree of strength, &c.

To inquire therefore, whether men have by nature light and strength sufficient to guide, and keep them in the true religion; is the same appeal to fact and experience, as to inquire, whether men are mortal, sickly, or sound; or how far they can see and hear. For nothing that relates to human nature, as a quality of it, can possibly have any other proof.

As therefore these Gentlemen are, in this debate, without any proof, or even pretence of proof, from fact and experience, so their cause ought to be looked upon to be as vain and romantic, as if they had asserted, that men have senses naturally fitted to hear sounds, and see objects at all distances, though fact and experience, the only means of knowing it, if it was so, has, from the creation to this time, proved the quite contrary.

For he that asserts the sufficiency of the light and strength of reason, to guide men in matters of religion, is not only without any positive proof from fact or experience on his side, but has the history of all ages, for near six thousand years past, fully demonstrating the quite contrary.

If some other enquirers into human nature, should affirm, that there is in mankind a natural instinct of mutual love, sufficient to make every man, at all times, love every other man, with the same degree of affection, as he loves himself; I suppose such an opinion would be thought too absurd and extravagant, to need any confutation. And yet all the absurdity of it would lie in this, that it affirmed something of the sufficiency of a natural quality in man, which could not be supported by a single instance of any one man, and was contrary to the experience and history of every age of the world.

Now this is exactly the case of these gentlemen : their opinion has neither more nor less absurdity in it : they only affirm such a sufficiency of light and reason to be natural to all men, as cannot be supported by a single instance of any one man, that ever lived, and is fully contradicted by the experience and history of every age since the creation of the world.

By what has been here said, I hope the reader will observe, that this inquiry about the perfection or imperfection, the strength or weakness, of reason in man, as to matters of religion, rests wholly upon fact and experience ; and that therefore all speculative reasonings upon it, are to be looked upon as idle, and visionary, as a sick man's dreams about health ; and as wholly to be rejected, as any speculative arguments that should pretend to prove, in spite of all facts and experience, the immortality, and unalterable state of human bodies.

Our author himself seems very sensible, that the argument drawn from facts and experience pressed hard upon his cause ; and therefore has given the best answer to it, he can yet think of.

It cannot, says he, be imputed to any defect in the light of nature, that the Pagan world ran into idolatry ; but to their being entirely governed by priests, who pretended Communication with their Gods, and to have thence their revelations, which they imposed on the credulous, as divine oracles.

The truth and justness of this assertion, will fully appear by the following illustration.

‘ It cannot be imputed to any defect in the health, and soundness of man's natural constitution, that the world has, in all ages, been over-run with diseases and distempers ; but to their being entirely governed by physicians, who pretended to I know not what secret knowledge of medicines, which they imposed on the sickly, as infallible remedies.’

For, as a perfect state of health, conscious to itself of a sufficiency of natural strength to keep clear of all diseases, seems to be out of all danger from physicians : so had mankind been ever conscious to themselves, of a sufficient natural knowledge of what is true or false in religion ; or, as this author saith, such as *enabled men of the meanest capacity to distinguish between religion and superstition, what room had there been for frauds and impostures in religion ?

If a man whose business it was to provide himself with a quantity of pure gold, should be continually buying lead, and brass, and iron, instead of it ; would you say, that his falling into such mistakes, was not to be imputed to any defect in his knowledge of pure gold, or how to distinguish it from other metals : but to the lies and affirmations of those who told him, that such lead, and brass, and iron, were pure gold ?

Farther ; This author saith, the world did not run into idolatry through any defect in the light of nature, but because they were credulous.

Now credulity, so far as it goes in any matter, supposes an equal degree of ignorance in that matter, whatever it is. No man is credulous of false accounts, or fabulous relations, where he knows the truth.

Children are exceeding credulous, because they are exceeding ignorant ; and in the same degree as their knowledge increases, their credulity abates. So that to say, men ran into idolatry, not through want of light, or ignorance of what is true and false in religion, but because they were credulous ; is as nice a distinction, as if it should be said, that children believe any fable that you can tell them, not because they are ignorant of what is true or false, but because they are credulous.

Or as it may be said, in another matter, with the same justness of thought, that such an army ran away from the enemy, not through any defect in natural courage, but because they were affrighted.

For men may as justly be said to have a perfect courage, and yet be governed by their fears, as to have perfect knowledge of that which is true in religion, and yet be credulous of that which is false.

This Anti-pastor, in his second Address says, *Can the superstition of the Pagans be imputed to any defect, or insufficiency in the light of reason, when it was wholly owing to their abandoning that divine light ; and in defiance of it, running into senseless traditions ?

But how came it, that they ran into senseless traditions ? What was it that admitted these traditions, as just and good ? Why, it was that faculty which judges of everything, and which this writer recommends as an unerring guide. And to say, a man's superstition is not owing to any defect or weakness of his reason, but to his admitting senseless traditions, is as vain an observation, as to say, a man's false reasoning is not owing to any weakness of his reason, but to his admitting and proceeding upon foolish, and absurd arguments.

For, foolish and absurd arguments do not more shew the state of his reason, who proceeds upon them, than senseless traditions shew the state of his reason, who admits them : For they are as much the objects of his reason, as arguments ; and all that is senseless and absurd in either of them, must either be charged equally upon the reason of him that admits them, or both equally removed from it. So that if senseless traditions, are not a proof of the weakness of their reason that approve of them, neither are foolish and absurd arguments a proof of the weakness of their reason, who proceed upon them.

Again ; Supposing, as he saith, that the Pagans, in defiance of their reason, received such traditions : Does this do any credit to the light of reason ? For how can a man renounce his reason, but by an act of his reason ?

But, is it not as great a reproach to reason, to renounce itself, as to credit a false tradition ? For a reason that can, knowingly, lay aside itself, is in a more defective and disordered state, than a reason that is only capable of being deluded. But if reason, in this case, lays aside itself, without knowing it, then, I suppose, such an accident may be fairly attributed to some weakness and defect of reason.

He proceeds thus : *It is certainly no good argument against the sufficiency of the divine light of nature, that men could not err, except they left it, and followed vain traditions.

This observation has just the same sense and acuteness in it, as if it had been said, It is certainly no good argument against the sufficiency of the divine healthfulness of human nature, that men could not be sickly, except they left it, and fell into various distempers : Or, against the sufficiency of the divine strength of natural courage, that men could not be timorous, till they left it, and followed vain fears. For, to prove that reason is sufficient, because everything that is absurd, is contrary to reason, is like proving our healthfulness to be sufficient, because all distempers are contrary to it ; or our courage to be sufficient, because fears and cowardice are contrary to it.

Besides, how is it that men leave their reason ? Why, just as ignorant men leave their knowledge ; as dull people leave their wit, or cowards leave their courage. The first part of this paragraph tells you of a sufficiency of the divine light of nature : Well ; what has this divine light of nature done ? what sufficient effects has it had ? Why, it has covered all the world with darkness. For, as a proof of the sufficiency of this divine light, he adds, in the very next words, Whoever considers how all mankind, even the wisest nations, have been imposed on by senseless tales, and idle stories, consecrated by length of time ; well, what then ? what should he conclude from this consideration ? Ought he not to conclude, that the reason of the wisest men of all nations, runs very low in matters of religion? This is the only conclusion that common sense can draw from such an observation: But, our author says, Whoever considers this, will not be very fond of relying upon tradition in matters of religion.

As if he had said, Whoever considers how all mankind, even the wisest of men, have been imposed upon by absurd arguments, will not be very fond of relying upon arguments. For idle tales, and senseless traditions in matters of religion, impose upon men, in no other manner, than false arguments, and absurd conclusions, impose upon them. And as it is their own reason, that gives the strength and appearance of truth to a senseless argument; so it is their own reason, that gives the credibility, and appearance of truth to senseless traditions.

And to lay the fault upon tradition, and not upon reason that approves it, is as just, as to lay the fault upon an abominable argument, and not upon reason, that proceeds upon it.

Again; Supposing that all mankind, even the wisest nations, have for this six thousand years been thus imposed upon, not knowing how to distinguish idle tales and senseless traditions from true religion; is not this a noble foundation for this writer to build the sufficiency of the divine light of nature upon? For supposing it had been in the greatest degree insufficient, what other effect could have followed from it, but only this, that all mankind, even the wisest nations, should have been over-run with error? And is it not strange, that effects should bear no proportion to their causes; that the same things should follow from the sufficiency of the divine light of nature, which must have followed from its greatest imperfection and insufficiency?

And must not the enemies of reason and free-thinking be forced to confess, that this writer has chosen an excellent guide for himself; since he so fully acknowledges, that no one yet has been rightly guided by it? Must not his present undertaking be granted to be the effect of cool and sober deliberation, since it only calls people of all, even the meanest capacities, to such an use of their reason, as the wisest of men and nations have always been strangers to?

Again; It is pretended, that the absurdities of the Pagan world are not owing to any defect of reason, but to their undue use of reason. The Bishop of London very justly observes, that such a pretence is begging the question. Our author thinks not. I will therefore grant, that it was through an undue use of their reason. For granting that mankind fell into all those absurdities, by an undue use of their reason, the charge against reason is rather increased than abated. For an undue use of it, is as great an accusation of reason, as any weakness or blindness that can be attributed to it. For to distinguish betwixt the defect of reason, and the undue use of reason, is as solid, as to distinguish betwixt the perfection of reason, and a due use of reason. For is not a due use of reason, so far as it proceeds, a certain sign of its perfection? Must not therefore the undue use of reason, so far as it proceeds, be an equally certain sign of its imperfection?

For what can make an undue use of reason, but itself? And if reason is so universally liable to an undue use of itself, that the universal ignorance and corruption of mankind is to be ascribed to it, then this undue use of reason, is as great a sign of its universal weakness and imperfection, as anything else can be.

This undue use of reason, is either voluntary and known, or involuntary and unknown. If it is the latter, then it resolves itself into that natural weakness and infirmity, which his Lordship has so fully proved to belong to human reason. If it is the former, then it may justly be reckoned a greater disorder, and such as makes reason more unfit to be a guide, than all the weakness, blindness, and corruption, which his Lordship hath accused it of.

Chapter V.

Shewing, that all the mutability of our tempers, the disorders of our passions, the corruption of our hearts, all the reveries of the imagination, all the contradictions and absurdities that are to be found in human life, and human opinions, are strictly and precisely the mutability, disorders, corruption, and absurdities of human reason.

IT is the intent of this chapter to shew, that although common language ascribes a variety of faculties and principles to the soul, imputing this action to the blindness of our passions, that to the inconstancy of our tempers; one thing to the heat of our imagination, another to the coolness of our reason; yet, in strictness of truth, everything that is done by us, is the action and operation of our reason, and is to be ascribed to it, as the sole faculty or principle from whence it proceeded, and by which it is governed and effected.

This writer takes a great deal of pains to prove, by long quotations, what nobody denies, that there is a law or light of reason common to men. All this is as freely granted, as that love and hatred, feeling and sensation, are common to men; and is granting no more, than that men are by nature intelligent and rational beings: For the faculties of man, as he is an intelligent being, as necessarily perceive some difference in actions, as to good and bad, as they perceive some things they like, and some things they dislike. In this sense there is a law or light of reason common to all men: And the law of reason is in men, as the law of thinking, of liking, and disliking, is in men.

And the different degrees of reason are in men, as the different degrees of love and aversion; as the different degrees of wit, parts, good nature, or ill nature, are in men.

And as all men have naturally more or less of these qualities, so all men have naturally more or less of reason: And the bulk of mankind are as different in reason, as they are in these qualities.

As love is the same passion in all men, yet is infinitely different; as hatred is the same passion in all men, yet with infinite differences; so reason is the same faculty in all men, yet with infinite differences.

And as our passions not only make us different from other men, but frequently and almost daily different from ourselves, loving and hating under great inconstancy; so our reason is not only different from the reason of other men, but is often different from itself; by a strange inconstancy, setting up first one opinion, and then another.

So that when we talk of human reason, or a reason common to mankind, we talk of as various, uncertain, and unmeasurable a thing, as when we talk of a love, a liking, an aversion, a good nature, or ill nature, common to mankind; for these qualities admit of no variation, uncertainty, or mutability, but such as they directly receive from the reason of mankind.

For it is as much the reason of man that acts in all these tempers, and makes them to be just what they are, as it is the reason of man that demonstrates a mathematical proposition.

Was our reason steady, and of one kind, there would be just the same steadiness and regularity in our tempers; did not reason fall into mistakes, follies and absurdities, we should have nothing foolish or absurd in our love or aversion. For every humour, every kind of love or aversion, is as strictly the action or operation of our reason, as judgment is the act of our reason.

And the tempers and passions of a child, differ only from the tempers and passions of a man, exactly in the same degree, as the reason of a child differs from the reason of man.

So that our passions and tempers, are the natural actions and real effects of our reason, and have no qualities, either good or bad, but such as are to be imputed to it.

A laudable good nature, or a laudable aversion, is only reason acting in a certain manner; a criminal good nature, or a criminal aversion, is nothing else but an ill-judging reason; that is, reason acting in another certain manner.

But still it is reason, or our understanding that is the only agent in our bad passions, as well as good passions; and as much the sole agent in all our passions and tempers, as in things of mere speculation.

So that the state of reason in human life, is nothing else but the state of human tempers and passions: And right reason in morality, is nothing else but right love, and right aversion.

And all our tempers and ways of liking and disliking, are as much the acts and operations of our reason, as the wisest actions of our life; and they only differ from reason, as reason differs from itself, when it judges rightly, and when it judges erroneously.

All that therefore which we commonly call the weakness, blindness, and disorder of our passions, is in reality the weakness, blindness, and disorder of our reason. For a right love, or wrong love, denotes only reason acting in a certain, particular manner.

So that if anything can be said precisely, or with exactness, of love, aversion, good nature, or ill nature, as common to mankind; the same may be said of reason, as common to mankind.

And if it would be very foolish and absurd, to ascribe an absolute perfection to human love, making it alone a sufficient guide to all good, or an absolute perfection to human hatred, as a sufficient preservative from all vice; it is equally absurd to ascribe the same perfection to human reason, because neither love nor hatred have anything perfect or imperfect, good or bad in them, but what is solely the action and operation of reason.

For the distinction of our reason from our passions, is only a distinction in language, made at pleasure; and is no more real in the things themselves, than the desire and inclination are really different from the will. All therefore that is weak and foolish in our passions, is the weakness and folly of our reason; all the inconstancy and caprice of our humours and tempers, is the caprice and inconstancy of our reason.

It is not flattery that compliments vice in authority ; it is not corruption that makes men prostitute their honour ; it is not sensuality that plunges men into debauchery ; it is not avarice that makes men sordid ; it is not ambition that makes them restless ; it is not bribery that makes men sell their consciences ; it is not interest that makes them lie, and cheat, and perjure themselves. What is it therefore ? Why, it is that absolutely perfect faculty, which our author sets up as the unerring standard of all that is wise, holy and good ; it is in his strong language, reason, the use of reason, human reason, that does all this.

For whether anything be fit to be done, it is, as he says, reason alone which must judge ; as the eye is the sole judge of what is visible, the ear of what is audible, so reason of what is reasonable.

Everything therefore that is done, everything that is chosen or preferred in human life before anything else, is as strictly done, or chosen by reason, as everything that is seen, is seen by the eye ; and everything that is heard, is heard by the ear.

To suppose that reason permits itself to be governed by passions or tempers, but is not the immediate, full agent of all that is done by them, is as absurd, as to suppose that reason permits itself to be governed by the hand when it is writing falsely, or the tongue when it is talking profanely, but is not the immediate, direct agent of all that is written and spoken by them.

Brutes are incapable of imprudence and immorality, because none of their actions are the actions of reason : Everything therefore that is imprudence, immorality, baseness, or villainy in us, must be the act of our reason ; otherwise it could no more be imprudent or immoral, than the actions of brutes.

If therefore, as this author often saith, reason be the only faculty that distinguisheth us from brutes ; it necessarily follows, that those irregularities, whether of humour, passions, or tempers, which cannot be imputed to brutes, must be solely attributed to that faculty by which we are distinguished from brutes ; and consequently everything that is foolish, vain, shameful, false, treacherous, and base, must be the sole express acts of our reason ; since if they were the acts of anything else, they could have no more vanity, falseness, or baseness, than hunger and thirst.

As therefore all that is faithful, just, and wise, can only be attributed to that which is done by our reason ; so by plain consequence, all that is vain, false, or shameful, can only be imputed to any acts, as they are the acts of reason.

It is not my intent in the least to censure, or condemn our common language, which considers and talks of reason and the passions, as if they were as different as a governor and his subjects.

These forms of speech are very intelligible and useful, and give great life and ornament to all discourses upon morality ; and are even necessary for the Historian, the Poet, and the Orator.

But when certain persons ascribe to human reason, as a distinct faculty of human nature, I know not what absolute perfection, making it as immutable, and incapable of any addition or improvement, as God himself ; it is necessary to consider human reason, and human nature, not as it is represented in common language, but as it is in reality in itself.

Notwithstanding therefore in common language, our passions and the effects of them, are very usefully distinguished from our reason, I have here ventured to shew, that all the disorders of human nature, are precisely the disorders of human reason, and that all the perfection or imperfection of our passions, is nothing else but the perfection or imperfection of our reason.

And we may as well think, that judgment, prudence, discretion, are things different from our reason, as that humour, temper, approbation, or aversion, are really different from our reason.

For, as it is a right exercise of reason, that denominates its actions to be prudence, judgment, and discretion ; so it is a wrong exercise of reason, that denominates its actions to be humour, temper, and caprice.

And it would be as absurd to condemn humour and caprice, if they were not the actions and operations of reason, as to commend a prudence and discretion that were the effects of an irrational principle.

Our follies therefore and absurdities of every kind, are as necessarily to be ascribed to our reason, as the first, immediate, and sole cause of them, as our wisdom and discretion are to be ascribed to it in that degree.

The difference between reason assenting to the properties of a square, and reason acting in motions of desire or aversion, is only this, that in the latter case, it is reason acting under a sense of its own good or evil, in the former case, it is reason acting under a sense of magnitude.

And as the relations of magnitude, as they are the objects of our reason, are only the objects of its assent or dissent ; so good and evil, as they are objects of our reason, are only the objects of its desire or aversion : And as the assent or dissent, in matters of speculation, whether right or wrong, is solely the act of our reason; so desire or aversion, in human life, whether right or wrong, is equally the act of our reason.

All the good therefore, that there is in any of the desires or aversions of the mere natural man, is the good of our reason; and all the evil or blindness that there is in any of our passions, is solely the evil and blindness of our reason.

Because love, desire, aversion, considered as operations proceeding from mere nature alone, denote nothing else but our reason acting in a certain manner; just as prudence, discretion, and judgment, when considered as our own abilities, or strength, denote nothing else but our reason acting in a certain manner.

We often say, that our passions deceive us, or persuade us; but this is no more strictly so, than when we say, our interest deceived, or a bribe blinded us. For bribes and interest are not active principles, nor have any power of deception; it is only our reason that gives them a false value, and prefers them to a greater good.

It is just so in what we call the deceit of our passions: They meddle with us no more than bribes meddle with us; but that pleasurable perception, which is to be found in certain enjoyments, is by our reason preferred to that better good, which we might expect from a self-denial.

We say again, that our passions paint things in false colours, and present to our minds vain appearances of happiness.

But this is no more strictly true, than when we say, our imagination forms castles in the air. For the imagination signifies no distinct faculty from our reason, but only reason acting upon our own ideas.

So when our passions are said to give false colours to things, or present vain appearances of happiness, it is only our reason acting upon its own ideas of good and evil, just as it acts upon its own ideas of architecture, in forming castles in the air.

So that all that which we call different faculties of the soul, tempers and passions of the heart, strictly speaking, means nothing else, but the various acts and operations of one and the same rational principle, which has different names, according to the objects that it acts upon, and the manner of its acting.

In some things it is called speculative, in others it is called practical reason. And we may as justly think our speculative reason, is a different faculty from our practical reason, as that our tempers, aversions, or likings, are not as fully and solely to be ascribed to our reason, as syllogisms and demonstrations.

It was as truly reason that made Medea kill her children, that made Cato kill himself, that made Pagans offer human sacrifices to idols; that made Epicurus deny a providence, Mahomet pretend a revelation; that made some men sceptics, others bigots, some enthusiasts, others profane; that made Hobbes assert all religion to be human invention, and Spinosa to declare trees, and stones, and animals, to be parts of God; that makes free-thinkers deny freedom of will, and fatalists exhort to a reformation of manners; that made Vaux a conspirator, and Ludlow a regicide; that made Muggleton a fanatic, and Rochester a libertine: It was as truly human reason that did all these things, as it is human reason that demonstrates mathematical propositions.

Medea and Cato acted as truly according to the judgment of their reason at that time, as the confessor that chooses rather to suffer, than deny his faith.

And the difference between them does not consist in this, that one power or faculty of the mind acted in one of them, and another faculty or power of the mind acted in another; that is, that reason acted in one of them, and passion in another; but purely in the different state of their reason. For had not Medea and Cato thought it best to do what they did, at the time they did it, they would no more have done it, than the confessor would choose to suffer rather than deny his faith, unless he had judged it best so to do.

It may indeed be well enough said in common language, that passion made Medea and Cato to do as they did, just as it may be said of a man that affirms a plenum, or holds any speculative absurdity, that it is blindness, or prejudice, that keeps him in it. Not as if blindness and prejudice were powers or faculties of his mind, but as they signify the ill state of his reason. Just so the passions may be said to govern men in their actions; not as if they were powers of the mind, but as they denote the disordered state of reason. And whenever anything is imputed to the strength and violence of our passions, strictly speaking, it only means the weakness and low condition of our reason at that time.

For reason governs as fully, when our actions and tempers are ever so bad, as it does when our actions and tempers are sound and good. And the only difference is, that reason acting well governs in the one case, and reason acting ill governs in the other.

Just as it is the same reason that sometimes judges strictly right, which at other times judges exceeding wrong, in matters of speculation.

When therefore we say, that reason governs the passions, it means no more, in strict truth, than that reason governs itself; that it acts with deliberation and attention, does not yield to its first judgments or opinions, but uses second, and third thoughts.

So that guarding against the passions, is only guarding against its own first judgments and opinions; that is, guarding against itself.

To all this it may, perhaps, be objected, that our passions and tempers arise from bodily motions, and depend very much upon the state of our blood and animal spirits, and that therefore what we do under their commotions, cannot be attributed to our reason.

It is readily granted, that the body has this share in our passions and tempers: But then the same thing must be granted of the body, in all the acts and operations of the mind. So that if our desires and aversions cannot be imputed to our reason, as its acts, because of the joint operation of the animal spirits in them; no more can syllogisms and demonstrations be attributed to our reason, as its operations, because the operation of bodily spirits concurrerth in the forming of them.

For the most abstract thought, and calm speculation of the mind, has as truly the concurrence, and conjunct operation of bodily spirits, as our strongest desires or aversions. And it is as much owing to the state of the body, that such speculations are what they are, as it is owing to the state of the body, that such passions are what they are.

For the motions of the bodily spirits are inseparable from, and according to, the state and action of the mind: When reason is in speculation of a trifle, they concur but weakly; when reason speculates intensely, their operation is increased. And sometimes the attention of the mind is so great, and has so engaged and called in all the animal spirits to its assistance, that the operations of our senses are suspended, and we neither see, nor feel, till the attention of the mind has let the spirits return to all the parts of the body.

Now will anyone say, that these intense thoughts are less the acts of the mind, because they have a greater concurrence of bodily spirits, than when it is acting with indifference, and so has a lesser quantity of bodily spirits?

Yet this might as well be said, as to say, that the assent or dissent, in speculation, is the act of our reason; but liking or disliking, loving or hating, are not so the acts of our reason, because they have a greater concurrence, and different motions of bodily spirits.

For, as the mind is in a different state when it desires good, or fears evil, from what it is when it only compares two triangles; so the motions or concurrence of the bodily spirits, have only such a difference, as is strictly correspondent to these two states of the mind. They act and join as much in comparing the triangles, as in the desire of good, or fear of evil. And the mind is just so much governed by the body, in its passions, as it is governed by it in its calmest contemplations.

For as the gentle, quiet operation of the animal spirits is then strictly correspondent, and entirely owing to the state and action of the mind; so in all our passions, the strong and increased motion of the animal spirits, is then strictly correspondent, and entirely owing to the state and action of the mind.

So that reason is neither more nor less the agent, in all our tempers and passions, than it is in our most dry and sedate speculations.

It may, and often does happen, that a man may have as great an eagerness and impatience, in the solving a mathematical problem, as another hath to obtain any great good, or avoid any great evil.

But may it therefore be said, that it is not reason that solves, or desires to solve, the problem, because the bodily spirits are so active in it?

In a word; if our passions and tempers might not be imputed to our reason, as its own genuine acts and operations, because they have such a concurrence of bodily spirits, neither could arguing, or reasoning, be attributed to our reason, as its proper act and operation, because in all argumentation, the bodily spirits are necessarily employed; and the better and closer the reasoning is, the more they are excited and employed.

If it should farther be objected, that reason is only right reason, and therefore cannot be said to act or operate, but where, and so far as, right reason acts.

This is as absurd as to say, that love signifies only pure love, and hatred just hatred; and that therefore a man cannot be said to love, or hate, but when, and so far as, his love is pure, and his hatred just.

To draw now some plain consequences from the foregoing account.

First, If reason be, as above represented, the universal agent in the natural man; if all the difference among such men, either in speculation, or practice, is only such a difference as reason makes, then nothing can be more extravagant, than to affirm anything concerning the degree of perfection, or imperfection of reason, as common to man. It is as wild and romantic, as to pretend to state the measure of folly and wisdom, of fear and courage, of pride and humility, of good humour and ill humour, common to mankind: For as these states of the mind, are only so many different states of reason ; so no uncertainty belongs to them, but what, in the same degree, belongs to reason.

Secondly, Granting that all matters of religion, must be agreeable to right, unprejudiced reason ; yet this could be no ground for receiving nothing in religion, but what human reason could prove to be necessary ; for human reason, is no more right unprejudiced reason, than a sinner is sinless, or a man an angel.

Granting again, that a man may go a great way towards rectifying his reason, and laying aside its prejudices ; yet no particular man can be a better judge of the rectitude of his own reason, than he is of the rectitude of his own self-love, the sagacity of his own understanding, the brightness of his own parts, the justness of his own eloquence, and the depth of his own judgment.

For there is nothing to deceive him in self-love, in the opinion of his own merit, wit, judgment, and eloquence, but what has the same power to deceive him, in the opinion of his own reason. And if, as our author says, it be the fate of most sects to be fondest of their ugliest brats,* none seem so inevitably exposed to this fatality, as those whose religion is to have no form, but such as it receives from their own hearts.

Thirdly, A man that has his religion to choose, and with this previous privilege, that he need not allow anything to be matter of religion, but what his own right reason can prove to be so, is in as fair a way to be governed by his passions, as he that has his condition of life to choose, with the liberty of taking that which his own right reason directs him to.

Does anyone suppose now, that nothing but right reason would direct him in the choice of his condition ? Or that he would make the better choice, because he proceeded upon this maxim, that nothing could be right, but that which was agreeable to his own reason ? Or that his tempers, his prejudices, his self-love, his passions, his partiality, would have no influence upon his choice, because he had resigned himself to his own right reason ?

For as our choice of a condition of life is not a matter of speculation, but of good and evil ; so however it is recommended to our reason, it chiefly excites our passions. And our choice will be just as reasonable, as our tempers and passions are. And he that is made the most positive, of the sufficiency of his own right reason, will be the most likely to be governed by the blindness of his own passions.

Now it is just the same in the choice of a religion, as in the choice of a condition of life : As it is not a matter of speculation, but of good and evil ; so if it is left to be stated and determined by our own reason, it rather appeals to our tempers, than employs our reason; and to resign ourselves up to our own reason, to tell us what ought, or ought not to be a matter of religion, is only resigning ourselves up to our tempers, to take what we like, and refuse what we dislike in religion.

For it is not only natural and easy for him, who believes that nothing can be a part of religion, but what his reason can prove necessary to be so, to take that to be fully proved, which is only mightily liked; and all that to be entirely contrary to reason, which is only vastly contrary to his tempers; this, I say, is not only natural and easy to happen, but scarce possible to be avoided.

In a word: When self-love is a proper arbitrator betwixt a man and his adversary; when revenge is a just judge of meekness; when pride is a true lover of humility; when falsehood is a teacher of truth; when lust is a fast friend of charity; when the flesh leads to the spirit; when sensuality delights in self-denial; when partiality is a promoter of equity; when the palate can taste the difference between sin and holiness; when the hand can feel the truth of a proposition; then may human reason be a proper arbitrator between God and man, the sole, final, just judge of all that ought, or ought not to be matter of a holy, divine and heavenly religion.

Lastly, If this be the state of reason, as has been fully proved, then to pretend, that our reason is too perfect to be governed by anything but its own light, is the same extravagance, as to pretend, that our love is too pure to be governed by anything but its own inclinations, our hatred too just to be governed by anything but its own motions. For if all that is base and criminal in love, all that is unjust and wicked in hatred, is strictly and solely to be imputed to our reason; then no perfection can be ascribed to our reason, but such as is to be ascribed to our love and hatred.

THE ABSOLUTE
UNLAWFULNESS

STAGE-ENTERTAINMENT

FULLY DEMONSTRATED.

By WILLIAM LAW, M. A.

L O N D O N :

Printed for M. RICHARDSON, in Pater-noster-
Row. 1726.

The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage-Entertainment.

I AM sensible that the Title of this little Book will, to the Generality of People, seem too high a Flight; that it will be looked upon as the Effect of a fanatical Spirit, carrying Matters higher than the Sobriety of Religion requires. I have only one Thing to ask of such People, that they will suspend their Judgment for awhile, and be content to read so small a Treatise as this is, before they pass any Judgment, either upon the Merits of the Subject, or the Temper of the Writer.

Had a Person some Years ago, in the Time of Popery, wrote against the Worship of Images, as a Worship absolutely unlawful, our Ancestors would have looked upon him as a Man of a very irregular Spirit. Now it is possible for the present Age to be as much mistaken in their Pleasures, as the former were in their Devotions, and that the allowed Diversions of these Times may be as great a Contradiction to the most essential Doctrines of Christianity, as the Superstitions and Corruptions of the former Ages. All therefore that I desire, is only a little Free-thinking upon this Subject; and that People will not as blindly reject all Reason, when it examines their Pleasures, as some blindly reject all Reason, when it examines the Nature of their Devotions.

It is possible that something that is called a Diversion, may be as contrary to the whole Nature of Religion, as any invented Superstition, and perhaps more dangerous to those that comply with it. As the Worship of Images was a great Sin, though under a Pretence of Piety, so the Entertainment of the Stage may be very sinful, though it is only intended as a Diversion.

For if the Worship of Images did not cease to be sinful, though it was intended for pious Purposes, it must be great Weakness to imagine, that the Entertainment of the Stage cannot be any great Sin, because it is only used as a Diversion.

Yet this is a Way of reasoning that a great many People fall into: They say, Diversions are lawful; that the Stage is only a Diversion ; that People go to it without meaning any Harm, and therefore there can be no Sin in it.

But if these People were to hear a Man say, that Religion is lawful ; that the Worship of Images was an Act of Religion ; that he used Images as a Means of religious Devotion, and therefore there could be no Sin in it ; they would mightily lament the Bigotry and Blindness of his Mind. Yet surely this is as wise and reasonable, as for a Person to say, I go to a Play only as to a Diversion : I mean no Harm, and therefore there can be no Sin in it. For if Practices may be exceeding sinful, though they are intended for pious Ends, certainly Practices may be very abominable, though they are only used as Diversions.

When therefore we condemn the Blindness of some Christian Countries, for conforming to such gross Corruptions of Religion, we should do well to remember, that they have thus much to be pleaded in their Excuse, that what they do is under a Notion of Piety ; that it is in Obedience to the Authority both of Church and State, and that they are at the same time kept entire Strangers to the Scriptures. But how justly may the same Blindness be charged upon us, if it should appear, that without having any of their Excuses, our Public Stated Diversions are as contrary to Scripture, and the fundamental Doctrines of Religion, as any of the grossest Instances of Superstition ? If we hold it lawful to go to wicked sinful Diversions, we are as great Strangers to True Religion, as they who are pleased with buying Indulgences, and worshipping Pieces of holy Wood.

For a Sinful Diversion is the same Absurdity in Religion, as a Corrupt Worship, and it shews the same Blindness of Mind, and Corruption of Heart, whether we sin against God in the Church, or in our Closets, or in the Play-House. If there is anything contrary to Religion in any of these Places, it brings us under the same Guilt. There may perhaps be this difference, that God may be less displeas'd with such Corruptions as we comply with through a blind Devotion, than with such as we indulge ourselves in through a Wantonness of Mind, and a Fondness for Diversions.

The Matter therefore stands thus : If it should appear that the Stage-Entertainment is entirely sinful ; that it is contrary to more Doctrines of Scripture than the Worship of Images ; then it follows, that all who defend it, and take their Share of it, are in the same State as they who worship Images, and defend Drunkenness and Intemperance. For to defend or support any sinful Diversion, is the same Thing as supporting or defending any other sinful Practice. It therefore as much concerns us to know whether our Diversions are reasonable, and conformable to Religion, as to know whether our Religion be reasonable and conformable to Truth. For if we allow ourselves in Diversions that are contrary to Religion, we are in no better a State than those whose Religion is contrary to Truth.

I have mentioned the Worship of Images, because it is so great a Corruption in Religion, so contrary to Scripture, and so justly abhorred by all the Reformed Churches; that the Reader may hence learn what he is to think of himself, if the Stage is ever his Diversion: For I am fully persuaded, that he will here find Arguments against the Stage, as strong and plain as any that can be urged against the Worship of Images, or any other Corruption of the most corrupt Religion.

Let it therefore be observed, that the Stage is not here condemned, as some other Diversions, because they are dangerous, and likely to be Occasions of Sin; but that it is condemned, as Drunkenness and Lewdness, as Lying and Profaneness are to be condemned, not as Things that may only be the Occasion of Sin, but such as are in their own Nature grossly sinful.

You go to hear a Play: I tell you, that you go to hear Ribaldry and Profaneness; that you entertain your Mind with extravagant Thoughts, wild Rants, blasphemous Speeches, wanton Amours, *profane Jest*s, and impure Passions. If you ask me, Where is the Sin of all this? You may as well ask me, Where is the Sin of Swearing and Lying? For it is not only a Sin against this or that particular Text of Scripture, but it is a Sin against the whole Nature and Spirit of our Religion.

It is a Contradiction to all Christian Holiness, and to all the Methods of arriving at it. For can anyone think that he has a true Christian Spirit, that his Heart is changed as it ought to be, that he is born again of God, whilst he is diverting himself with the Lewdness, Impudence, Profaneness, and impure Discourses of the Stage? Can he think that he is endeavouring to be holy as Christ is holy, to live by his Wisdom, and be full of his Spirit, so long as he allows himself in such an Entertainment? For there is nothing in the Nature of Christian Holiness, but what is all contrary to the whole Spirit and Temper of this Entertainment. That Disposition of Heart which is to take Pleasure in the various Representations of the Stage, is as directly contrary to that Disposition of Heart which Christianity requires, as Revenge is contrary to Meekness, or Malice to Good-will. Now that which is thus contrary to the whole Nature and Spirit of Religion, is certainly much more condemned, than that which is only contrary to some particular Part of it.

But this is plainly the Case of the Stage: It is an Entertainment that consists of lewd, impudent, profane Discourses, and as such is contrary to the whole Nature of our Religion. For all the Parts of Religion, or its whole Nature has only this one Design, to give us Purity of Heart, to change the Temper and Taste of our Souls, and fill us with such holy Tempers, as may make us fit to live with God in the Society of pure and glorious Spirits.

An Entertainment therefore which applies to the Corruption of our Nature, which awakens our disordered Passions, and teaches to relish Lewdness, immoral Rant, and Profaneness, is exceeding sinful, not only as it is a Breach of some particular Duty, but as it contradicts the whole Nature, and opposes every Part of our Religion.

For, this Diversion, which consists of such Discourses as these, injures us in a very different manner from other Sins. For as Discourses are an Application to our whole Soul, as they entertain the Heart, and awaken and employ all our Passions, so they more fatally undo all that Religion has done, than several other Sins. For as Religion consists in a right Turn of Mind ; as it is a State of the Heart ; so whatever supports a quite contrary Turn of Mind and State of the Heart, has all the Contrariety to Religion that it can possibly have.

St. John says, Hereby we know that he abideth in us by the Spirit which he hath given us. There is no other certain Sign of our belonging to Christ ; every other Sign may deceive us : All the external Parts of Religion may be in vain ; it is only the State of our Mind and Spirit, that is a certain Proof that we are in a true State of Christianity. And the Reason is plain, because Religion has no other End, than to alter our Spirit, and give us new Dispositions of Heart, suitable to its Purity and Holiness. That therefore which immediately applies to our Spirit, which supports a wrong Turn of Mind, which betrays, our Hearts into impure Delights, destroys all our Religion, because it destroys that turn of Mind and Spirit, which is the sole End and Design of all our Religion.

When therefore you are asked, Why is it unlawful to swear ? You can answer, Because it is contrary to the Third Commandment. But if you are asked, Why is it unlawful to use the Entertainment of the Stage ? You can carry your answer farther, Because it is an Entertainment that is contrary to all the Parts, the whole Nature of Religion, and contradicts every holy Temper which the Spirit of Christianity requires. So that if you live in the use of this Diversion, you have no Grounds to hope that you have the Spirit and Heart of a Christian.

Thus stands the first Argument against the Stage : It has all the Weight in it, that the whole Weight of Religion can give to any Argument.

If you are only for the Form of Religion, you may take the Diversion of the Stage along with it. But if you desire the Spirit of Religion, if you desire to be truly religious in Heart and Mind, it is as necessary to renounce and abhor the Stage, as to seek to God, and pray for the Guidance of his Holy Spirit.

Secondly. Let the next Argument against the Stage be taken from its manifest Contrariety to this important Passage of Scripture: Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good, to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace to the hearers. And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption.

Here we see, that all corrupt and unedifying Communication is absolutely sinful, and forbidden in Scripture, for this Reason, because it grieves the Holy Spirit, and separates Him from us. But if it be thus unlawful to have any corrupt Communication of our own, can we think it lawful to go to Places set apart for that Purpose; to give our Money, and hire Persons to corrupt our Hearts with ill Discourses, and inflame all the disorderly Passions of our Nature? We have the Authority of Scripture to affirm, that evil Communication corrupts good Manners, and that unedifying Discourses grieve the Holy Spirit.

Now the Third Commandment is not more plain and express against Swearing, than this Doctrine is plain and positive against going to the Play-House. If you should see a Person that acknowledges the Third Commandment to be a divine Prohibition against Swearing, yet going to a House, and giving his Money to Persons who were there met to Curse and Swear in fine Language, and invent Musical Oaths and Imprecations, would you not think him mad in the highest Degree? Now consider whether there be a less Degree of Madness in going to the Play-House. You own that God has called you to great Purity of Conversation; that you are forbid all foolish Discourse, and filthy Jestings, as expressly as you are forbid Swearing; and that you are told to let no corrupt Communication proceed out of your mouth, but such as is good, for the use of edifying: And yet you go to a House set apart for corrupt Communication: You hire Persons to entertain you with all manner of Ribaldry, Profaneness, Rant, and Impurity of Discourse, who are to present you with vile Thoughts, lewd Imaginations, in fine Language, and to make wicked, vain, and impure Discourse more lively and affecting, than you could possibly have it in any ill Company. Now is not this Sinning with as high a Hand, and as grossly offending against plain Doctrines of Scripture, as if you were to give your Money to be entertained with Musical Oaths and Curses?

146 The Absolute Unlawfulness

You might reasonably think that Woman very ridiculous in her Piety, that durst not swear herself, but should nevertheless frequent Places to hear Oaths. But you may as justly think her very ridiculous in her Modesty, who though she dares not to say, or look, or do an immodest Thing herself, should yet give her Money to see Women forget the Modesty of their Sex, and talk impudently in a Public Play-House. If the Play-House was filled with Rakes and ill Women, there would be nothing to be wondered at in such an Assembly: For such Persons to be delighted with such Entertainments, is as natural, as for any Animal to delight in its proper Element. But for Persons who profess Purity and Holiness, who would not be suspected of immodest or corrupt Communications, for them to come under the Roof of a House devoted to such ill Purposes, and to be pleased Spectators of such Actions and Discourses, as are the Pleasures of the most abandoned Persons; for them to give their Money to be thus entertained, is such a Contradiction to all Piety and common Sense, as cannot be sufficiently exposed.

Consider now, if you please, the Worship of Images. You wonder that any People can be so blind, so regardless of Scripture, as to comply with such a Devotion. It is indeed wonderful, But is it not as wonderful, that you should seek and delight in an Entertainment made up of Lewdness, Profaneness, and all the extravagant Rant of disordered Passions, when the Scripture positively charges you to forbear all corrupt Communication, as that which grieves the Holy Spirit, and separates him from us? Is not this being blind and regardless of Scripture in as high a degree? For how can the Scripture speak higher, or plainer, or enforce its doctrines with a more dreadful Penalty, than that which is here declared? For without the Holy Spirit of God, we are but Figures of Christians, and must die in our Sins.

If it was said in Scripture, Forbear from all Image-Worship, because it grieves and removes the Holy Spirit from you, perhaps you would think the Worshippers of Images under greater Blindness, and Corruption of Heart, than they now are. But observe, that if you go to the Stage, you offend against Scripture in as high a degree as they, who should worship Images, though the Scriptures forbid it as grievous to the Holy Spirit.

If therefore I was to rest here, I might fairly say, that I had proved the Stage to be as contrary to Scripture, as the Worship of Images is contrary to the Second Commandment. You think it a strange Contrariety, to see People on their Knees before an Image at a Time that the Heart and Mind should raise itself to God. But then, is it not as strange a Contrariety, that a Person should indulge himself in the lewd profane Discourses of the Stage, who should have his Heart and Mind preserved in the Wisdom, the Purity, and Spirit of Religion? For an Image is not so contrary to God, as Plays are contrary to the Wisdom, the Purity, and the Spirit of Scripture. An Image is only contrary to God, as it has no Power or Perfection: But Plays are contrary to Scripture, as the Devil is contrary to God, as they are full of another Spirit and Temper. He therefore that indulges himself in the wicked Temper of the Stage, sins against as plain Scripture, and offends against more doctrines of it, than he that uses Images in his Devotions.

I proceed now to a Third Argument against the Stage.

When you see the Players acting with Life and Spirit, Men and Women equally bold in all Instances of Profaneness, Passion, and Immodesty, I daresay you never suspect any of them to be Persons of Christian Piety. You cannot, even in your Imagination, join Piety to such Manners, and such a Way of Life. Your Mind will no more allow you to join Piety with the Behaviour of the Stage, than it will allow you to think two and two to be ten. And perhaps you had rather see your Son chained to a Galley, or your daughter driving Plough, than getting their Bread on the Stage, by administering in so scandalous a manner to the Vices and corrupt Pleasures of the World. Let this therefore be another Argument, to prove the Absolute Unlawfulness of going to a Play. For consider with yourself, Is the Business of Players so contrary to Piety, so inconsistent with the Spirit and Temper of a true Christian, that it is next to a Contradiction to suppose them united, how then can you take yourself to be innocent, who delight in their Sins, and hire them to commit them?

You may make yourself a Partaker of other Men's Sins, by Negligence, and for want of reproofing them: But certainly, if you stand by, and assist Men in their evil Actions, if you make their Vices your Pleasures and Entertainment, and pay your Money to be so entertained, you make yourself a Partaker of their Sins in a very high degree; and consequently, it must be as unlawful to go to a Play, as it is unlawful to approve, encourage, assist, and reward a Man for Renouncing a Christian Life.

Let therefore all Men and Women that go to a Play, ask themselves this Question; Whether it suits with their Religion, to act the Parts that are there acted? Perhaps they would think this as inconsistent with that degree of Piety that they profess, as to do the vilest Things. But let them consider, that it must be a wicked and unlawful Pleasure to delight in anything, that they dare not to do themselves. Let them also consider, that they are really acting those Indecencies and Impieties themselves, which they think is the particular Guilt of the Players. For a Person may very justly be said to do that himself, which he pays for the doing, and which is done for his Pleasure.

You must therefore, if you would be consistent with yourself, as much abhor the Thoughts of being at a Play, as of being a Player yourself. For to think that you must abhor the one, and not the other, is as absurd as to suppose, that you must be temperate yourself, but may assist, encourage, and reward other People for their Intemperance. The Business of a Player is profane, wicked, lewd, and immodest: To be anyway therefore approving, assisting, or encouraging him in such a Way of Life, is as evidently sinful, as it is sinful to assist and encourage a Man in Stealing, or any other Wickedness.

This Argument is not far-fetched, or founded in any Subtilties of Reasoning, but is so plain and obvious, that the meanest capacity must needs understand it. I may venture to challenge anyone to shew me, that the Business of the Player is a more Christian Employment than that of Robbers. For he must know very little of the Nature of Religion, that can look upon Lust, Profaneness, and disorderly Passions, to be less contrary to Religion, than the taking Money from the right Owner. And a Person who devotes himself to this Employment, to get his Bread by gratifying the corrupt Taste of the World with wanton, wild, profane Discourses, may be justly supposed to have a more corrupt Heart himself, than many a Man who has taken unlawful Ways of relieving his Wants.

I speak to this Matter with thus much Plainness, because there is so plain Reason for it; and because I think, there is as much Justice and Tenderness in telling every Player that his Employment is abominably sinful, and inconsistent with the Christian, as in telling the same Thing to a Thief. As it ought to be reckoned no Sign of Enmity or Ill-will, if I should attempt to prove to Malefactors the horrid Nature of their Sins, and the Necessity of a sincere Repentance, so I hope it will not be looked upon as a Sign of ill Temper, or Anger at any particular Persons, that I set the Business of Players among the most abominable Crimes. For it is with no other Intent, but that they themselves may avoid the dreadful Guilt of so wicked a Profession, and that other People may not dare any longer to support them in it. For it certainly concerns all People, who are not so void of Religion as to be Players themselves, to be strictly careful that they have no Share in the Guilt of so unchristian a Profession.

This we reckon very good Reasoning in all other Cases. A Person that dares not steal, thinks it equally sinful to encourage Theft. Anyone that abhors Perjury, or Murder, knows that he commits those Sins, if he encourages other People in them. What therefore must we think of ourselves, if the Blasphemy, Profaneness, Lewdness, Immodesty, and wicked Rant of Plays, are Parts that we dare not act ourselves, yet make it our Diversion to be delighted with those that do? Shall we think ourselves more enlightened, or more reasonable, than those that worship Images? The Second Commandment cannot fright them from the use of Images, but it is because they have had a superstitious Education, are taught to be blindly obedient, and have the Pretence of Piety for what they do. But all the grossest Sins of the Stage cannot fright us from it, though we see the Sins, and have nothing to pretend for Compliance, but mere idleness and Diversion.

If anyone was to collect all the foolish vain Devotions, which poor mistaken Creatures have paid to Images, it would sufficiently justify our Abhorrence of them, and shew the Wisdom of the Reformation in abolishing the Use of them. But if a Person was to make a Collection of all the wicked, profane, blphemous, lewd, impudent, detestable Things, that are said in the Play-House only in one Season, it would appear to be such a Mass of Sin, as would sufficiently justify anyone in saying, that the Business of Players is the most wicked and detestable Profession in the World.

All People therefore who ever enter into their House, or contribute the smallest Mite towards it, must look upon themselves, as having been so far Friends to the most powerful Instruments of Debauchery, and to be guilty of contributing to a bold, open, and public Exercise of Impudence, Impurity, and Profaneness. When we encourage any good Design, either with our Consent, our Money, or Presence, we are apt to take a great deal of Merit to ourselves; we presently conclude that we are Partakers of all that is good and praise-worthy in it, of all the Benefit that arises from it, because we are Contributors towards it. A Man does not think that he has no Share in some public Charity, because he is but one in ten thousand that contributes towards it; but if it be a religious Charity, and attended with great and happy Effects, his Conscience tells him that he is a Sharer of all that great Good to which he contributes. Now let this teach us, how we ought to judge of the Guilt of encouraging anything that is bad, either with our Consent, our Money, or our Presence. We must not consider how much our single Part contributes towards it, nor how much less we contribute than several thousands of other People, but we must look at the whole thing in itself, and whatever there is of Evil in it, or whatever Evil arises from it, we must charge ourselves with a Share of the whole Guilt of so great an Evil. Thus it is that we hope and desire to partake of the Merit of all good Designs, which we any way countenance and encourage; and thus it is that the Guilt of all wicked things, which we countenance and assist, will certainly be laid to our Charge.

To proceed now to a fourth Argument. When I consider Churches, and the Matter of Divine Service, that it consists of holy Readings, Prayers, and Exhortations to Piety, there is Reason to think that the House of God is a natural Means of promoting Piety and Religion, and rendering Men devout, and sensible of their Duty to God. The very Nature of Divine Assemblies, thus carried on, has this direct Tendency: I ask you whether this is not very plain, that Churches thus employed should have this Effect? Consider therefore the Play-House, and the Matter of the Entertainment there, as it consists of Love-Intrigues, blasphemous Passions, profane Discourses, lewd Descriptions, *filthy Jest*s, and all the most extravagant Rant of wanton profligate Persons of both Sexes, heating and inflaming one another with all the Wantonness of Address, the Immodesty of Motion, and Lewdness of Thought, that Wit can invent; consider, I say, whether it be not plain, that a House so employed is as certainly serving the Cause of Immorality and Vice, as the House of God is serving the Cause of Piety? For what is there in our Church Service that shews it to be useful to Piety and Holiness, what is there in Divine Worship to correct and amend the Heart, but what is directly contrary to all that is doing in the Play-House? So that one may with the same Assurance affirm, that the Play-House, not only when some very profane Play is on the Stage, but in its daily common Entertainments, is as certainly the House of the Devil, as the Church is the House of God. For though the Devil be not professedly worshipped by Hymns directed to him, yet most that is there sung is to his Service; he is there obeyed and pleased in as certain a manner, as God is worshipped and honoured in the Church.

You must easily see, that the Charge against the Play-House is not the Effect of any particular Temper, or Weakness of Mind; that it is not an uncertain Conjecture, or religious Whimsy; but it is a Judgment founded as plainly in the Nature and Reason of Things, as when it is affirmed, that the House of God is of Service to Religion: And he that absolutely condemns the Play-House, as wicked and of a corrupting Nature, proceeds upon as much Truth and Certainty, as he that absolutely commends the House of God, as holy and tending to promote Piety.

When therefore anyone pretends to vindicate the Stage to you, as a proper Entertainment for holy and religious Persons, you ought to reject the Attempt with as much Abhorrence, as if he should offer to shew you, that our Church Service was rightly formed for those Persons to join in, who are devoted to the Devil. For to talk of the Lawfulness and Usefulness of the Stage is full as absurd, and contrary to the plain Nature of Things, as to talk of the Unlawfulness and Mischief of the Service of the Church. He therefore that tells you, that you may safely go to the Play-House, as an innocent useful Entertainment of your Mind, commits the same Offence against common Sense, as if he should tell you, that it was dangerous to attend at Divine Service, and that its Prayers and Hymns were great Pollutions of the Mind.

For the Matter and Manner of Stage-Entertainments are as undeniable Proofs, and as obvious to common Sense, that the House belongs to the Devil, and is the Place of his Honour, as the Matter and Manner of Church Service prove that the Place is appropriated to God.

Observe therefore, that as you do not want the Assistance of anyone to shew you the Usefulness and Advantage of Divine Service, because the thing is plain, and speaks for itself, so neither, on the other hand, need you anyone to shew the Unlawfulness and Mischief of the Stage, because there the thing is equally plain, and speaks for itself. So that you are to consider yourself as having the same Assurance, that the Stage is wicked, and to be abhorred and avoided by all Christians, as you have, that the Service of the Church is holy, and to be sought after by all Lovers of Holiness. Consider therefore, that your Conduct, with relation to the Stage, is not a Matter of Nicety, or scrupulous Exactness, but that you are as certain that you do wrong in as notorious a manner, when you go to the Play-House, as you are certain that you do right, when you go to Church.

Now it is of mighty Use to conceive Things in a right manner, and to see them as they are in their own Nature. Whilst you consider the Play-House only as a Place of Diversion, it may perhaps give no Offence to your Mind, there is nothing shocking in the Thought of it; but if you would lay aside this Name of it for awhile, and consider it in its own Nature, as it really is, you would find that you are as much deceived, if you consider the Play-House as only a Place of Diversion, as you would be, if you considered the House of God only as a Place of Labour.

When therefore you are tempted to go to a Play, either from your own Inclination, or from the Desire of a Friend, fancy that you was asked in plain Terms to go to the Place of the Devil's Abode, where he holds his filthy Court of evil Spirits; that you was asked to join in an Entertainment, where he was at the Head of it; where the whole of it was in order to his Glory, that Men's Hearts and Minds might be separated from God, and plunged into all the Pollutions of Sin and Brutality. Fancy that you are going to a Place that as certainly belongs to the Devil, as the heathen Temples of old, where Brutes were worshipped, where wanton Hymns were sung to Venus, and drunken Songs to the God of Wine. Fancy that you are as certainly going to the Devil's Triumph, as if you were going to those old Sports, where People committed Murder, and offered Christians to be devoured by wild Beasts, for the Diversion of the Spectators. Now whilst you consider the Play-House in this View, I suppose you can no more go to a Play, than you can renounce your Christianity.

Consider now therefore, that you have not been frightening yourself with groundless Imaginations, but that which you have here fancied of the Play-House is as strictly true, as if you had been fancying, that when you go to Church you go to the House of God, where the heavenly Hosts attend upon his Service; and that when you read the Scriptures, and sing holy Hymns, you join with the Choirs above, and do God's Will on Earth as it is done in Heaven. For observe, I pray you, how justly that Opinion of the Play-House is founded. For was it a Joy to God to see Idols worshipped, to see Hymns and Adorations offered up to impure and filthy Deities? Were Places and Festivals appointed for such Ends justly esteemed Places and Festivals devoted to the Devil? Now give the Reason why all this was justly reckoned a Service to the Devil, and you will give as good a Reason why the Play-House is to be esteemed his Temple.

For what though Hymns and Adorations are not offered to impure and filthy Deities, yet if Impurity and Filthiness is the Entertainment, if immodest Songs, profane Rant, if Lust and Passion entertain the Audience, the Business is the same, and the Assembly does the same Honour to the Devil, though they be not gathered together in the Name of some Heathen God.

For Impurity and Profaneness in the Worshippers of the True God is as acceptable a Service to the Devil, as Impurity and Profaneness in Idolators; and perhaps a lewd Song, in an Assembly of Christians, gives him a greater Delight than in a Congregation of Heathens.

If therefore we may say, that a House or Festival was the Devil's, because he was delighted with it, because what was there done, was an acceptable Service to him, we may be assured that the Play-House is as really the House of the Devil, as any other House ever was. Nay, it is reasonable to think, that the Play-Houses in this Kingdom are a greater Pleasure to him, than any Temple he ever had in the Heathen World. For as it is a greater Conquest to make the Disciples of Christ delight in Lewdness and Profaneness, than ignorant Heathens, so a House that, in the Midst of Christian Churches, trains up Christians to Lewdness and Profaneness, that makes the Worshippers of Christ flock together in Crowds, to rejoice in an Entertainment that is as contrary to the Spirit of Christ, as Hell is contrary to Heaven; a House so employed may justly be reckoned a more delightful Habitation of the Devil, than any Temple in the Heathen World.

When therefore you go to the Play-House, you have as much Assurance that you go to the Devil's peculiar Habitation, that you submit to his Designs, and rejoice in his Diversions, which are his best Devices against Christianity, you have as much Assurance of this, as that they who worshipped filthy Deities were in reality Worshippers of the Devil.

Hence it appears, that if instead of considering the Play-House, as only a Place of Diversion, you will but examine what Materials it is made of; if you will but consider the Nature of the Entertainment, and what is there doing; you will find it as wicked a Place, as sinful a Diversion, and as truly the peculiar Pleasure of the Devil, as any wicked Place, or sinful Diversion in the Heathen World. When therefore you are asked to go to a Play, do not think that you are only asked to go to a Diversion, but be assured that you are asked to yield to the Devil, to go over to his Party, and to make one of his Congregation. That if you do go, you have not only the Guilt of buying so much vain Communication, and paying People for being wicked, but are also as certainly guilty of going to the Devil's House, and doing him the same Honour, as if you were to partake of some Heathen Festival. You must consider, that all the Laughter there is not only vain and foolish, but that it is a Laughter among Devils, that you are upon profane Ground, and hearing Music in the very Porch of Hell.

Thus it is in the Reason of the thing. And if we should now consider the State of our Play-House, as it is in Fact, we should find it answering all these Characters, and producing Effects suitable to its Nature. But I shall forbear this Consideration, it being as unnecessary to tell the Reader, that our Play-House is in Fact the Sink of Corruption and Debauchery; that it is the general Rendezvous of the most profligate Persons of both Sexes; that it corrupts the Air, and turns the adjacent Places into public Nuisances; this is as unnecessary, as to tell him that the Exchange is a Place of Merchandise.

Now it is to be observed, that this is not the State of the Play- House through any accidental Abuse, as any innocent or good thing may be abused ; but that Corruption and Debauchery are the truly natural and genuine Effects of the Stage-Entertainment. Let not therefore anyone say, that he is not answerable for those Vices and Debaucheries which are occasioned by the Play-House, for so far as he partakes of the Pleasure of the Stage, and is an Encourager of it, so far he is chargeable with those Disorders which necessarily are occasioned by it. If Evil arises from our doing our Duty, or our Attendance at any good Design, we are not to be frightened at it ; but if Evil arises from anything as its natural and genuine Effect, in all such Cases, so far as we contribute to the Cause, so far we make ourselves guilty of the Effects. So that all who any way assist the Play-House, or ever encourage it by their Presence, make themselves chargeable, in some degree, with all the Evils and Vices which follow from it. Since therefore it cannot be doubted by anyone, whether the Play-House be a Nursery of Vice and Debauchery, since the evil Effects it has upon People's Manners is as visible as the Sun at Noon, one would imagine, that all People of Virtue and Modesty should not only avoid it, but avoid it with the utmost Abhorrence ; that they should be so far from entering into it, that they should detest the very Sight of it. For what a Contradiction is it to common Sense, to hear a Woman lamenting the miserable Lewdness and Debauchery of the Age, the vicious Taste and irregular Pleasures of the World, and at the same time dressing herself to meet the lewdest Part of the World at the Fountain-head of all Lewdness, and making herself one of that Crowd, where every abandoned Wretch is glad to be present ? She may fancy that she hates and abominates their Vices, but she may depend upon it, that till she hates and abominates the Place of vicious Pleasures ; till she dares not come near an Entertainment, which is the Cause of so great Debauchery, and the Pleasure of the most debauched People ; till she is thus disposed, she wants the truest Sign of a real and religious Abhorrence of the Vices of the Age.

For to wave all other Considerations, I would only ask her a Question or two on the single Article of Modesty. What is Modesty ? Is it a little mechanical outside Behaviour, that goes no farther than a few Forms and Modes at particular Times and Places ? Or is it a real Temper, a natural Disposition of the Heart, that is founded in Religion ? Now if Modesty is only a mechanical Observance of a little outside Behaviour, then I can easily perceive how a modest Woman may frequent Plays ; there is no Inconsistency for such a one to be one thing in one Place, and another in another Place ; to disdain an immodest Conversation, and yet at the same Time relish and delight in immodest and impudent Speeches in a public Play-House. But if Modesty is a real Temper and Disposition of the Heart, that is founded on the Principles of Religion, then I confess I cannot comprehend, how a Person of such Modesty should ever come twice into the Play-house. For if it is Reason and Religion that have inspired her with a modest Heart, that make her careful of her Behaviour, that make her hate and abhor every Word, or Look, or Hint in Conversation that has the Appearance of Lewdness, that make her shun the Company of such as talk with too much Freedom; if she is thus modest in common Life, from a Principle of Religion, a Temper of Heart, is it possible for such a one (I do not say to seek) but to bear with the Immodesty and Impudence of the Stage? For must not Immodesty and Impudence, must not loose and wanton Discourse be the same hateful things, and give the same Offence to the modest Mind, in one Place as in another? And must not that Place, which is the Seat of Immodesty, where Men and Women are trained up in Lewdness, where almost every Day in the Year is a Day devoted to the foolish Representations of Rant, Lust, and Passion; must not such a Place of all others be the most odious to the Mind, that is truly modest upon Principles of Reason and Religion? One would suppose, that such a Person should as much abominate the Place, as any other filthy Sight, and be as much offended with an Invitation to it, as if she was invited to see an immodest Picture. For the Representations of the Stage, the inflamed Passions of Lovers there described, are as gross an Offence to the Ear, as any Representation that can offend the Eye.

It ought not to be concluded, that because I affirm the Play-House to be an Entertainment contrary to Modesty, that therefore I accuse all People as void of Modesty whoever go to it. I might affirm, that Transubstantiation is contrary to all Sense and Reason; but then it would be a wrong Conclusion, to say that I affirmed that all who believe it are void of all Sense and Reason.

Now as Prejudices, the Force of Education, the Authority of Numbers, the Way of the World, the Example of great Names, may make People believe, so the same Causes may make People act against all Sense and Reason, and be guilty of Practices which no more suit with the Purity of their Religion, than Transubstantiation agrees with common Sense.

To proceed. Trebonia thus excuses herself for going to the Play-House. I go but seldom; and then either with my Mother or my Aunt: We always know the Play beforehand, and never go on the Sacrament-Week: And what harm pray, says she, can there be in this? It breaks in upon no Rules of my Life. I neglect no Part of my Duty: I go to Church, and perform the same Devotions at home, as on other Days.

It ought to be observed, that this Excuse can only be allowed, where the Diversion itself is innocent: It must therefore first be considered, what the Entertainment is in itself; whether it be suitable to the Spirit and Temper of Religion: For if it is right and proper in itself, it needs no Excuse; but if it be wrong and contrary to Religion, we are not to use it cautiously, but to avoid it constantly.

Trebonia must be told, that it is no Proof of the Innocence of a Thing, that it does not interfere with her Hours of Duty, nor break the Regularity of her Life; for very wicked Ways of spending Time may yet be consistent with a regular Distribution of our Hours. She must therefore consider, not only whether such a Diversion hinders the Regularity of her Life, or breaks in upon her Hours of Devotion, public or private, but whether it hinders, or any way affects the Spirit and Temper which all her Devotions aspire after. Is it conformable to that heavenly Affection, that Love of God, that Purity of Heart, that Wisdom of Mind, that Perfection of Holiness, that Contempt of the World, that Watchfulness and Self-denial, that Humility and Fear of Sin, which Religion requires? Is it conformable to those Graces, which are to be the daily Subject of all her Prayers? This is the only way for her to know the Innocence of going to a Play. If what she there hears and sees, has no Contrariety to any Grace or Virtue that she prays for; if all that there passes, be fit for the Purity and Piety of one that is led by the Spirit of Christ, and is working out her Salvation with fear and trembling; if the Stage be an Entertainment that may be thought to be according to the Will of God; then she disposes of an Hour very innocently, though her Mother or her Aunt were not with her.

But if the contrary to all this be true; if most of what she there hears and sees be as contrary to the Piety and Purity of Christianity, as Feasting is contrary to Fasting; if the House which she supports with her Money, and encourages with her Presence, be a notorious Means of Corruption, visibly carrying on the Cause of Vice and Debauchery; she must not think herself excused for being with her Mother.

Trebonia would perhaps think it strange, to hear one of her virtuous Acquaintance giving the like Reason for going now and then to a Masquerade.

Now this Diversion is new in our Country; and therefore most People yet judge of it in the manner that they ought, because they are not blinded by Use and Custom. But let anyone give but the true Reasons, why a Person of Virtue and Piety should not go to Masquerades, and the same Reasons will as plainly shew, that Persons of Virtue and Piety should keep at as great a distance from the Play-House. For the Entertainment of the Stage is more directly opposite to the Purity of Religion, than Masquerades, and is besides as certain a Means of Corruption, and serves all bad Ends in as great a degree as they do. They only differ, as bad Things of the same Kind may differ from one another. So that if the evil Use, and ill Consequences of Masquerades, be a sufficient Reason to deter People of Piety from partaking of them, the same evil Use, and ill Consequences of the Stage, ought to keep all People of Virtue from it. If People will consult their Tempers only, they may take the Entertainment of one, and condemn the other; as following the same Guide, they may abhor Intemperance, and indulge Malice: But if they will consult Religion, and make that the Ground of their Opinions, they will find more and stronger Reasons for a constant Abhorrence of the Stage, than of Masquerades.

Again: If Trebonia should hear a Person excusing her Use of Paint in this manner; That truly she painted but very seldom; that she always said her Prayers first; that she never used it on Sundays, or the Week before the Communion: Trebonia, would pity such a Mixture of Religion and Weakness. She would desire her to use her Reason, and either to allow Painting to be innocent, suitable to the Sobriety and Humility of a Christian, or else to think it is as unlawful at one Time, as at another. But, Trebonia, would you not think it still stranger, that she should condemn Painting as odious and sinful, and yet think that the Regularity of her Life, and the Exactness of her Devotions, might make it lawful for her to paint now and then?

I doubt not but you plainly see the Weakness and Folly of such a Pretence for Painting, under such Rules, at certain Times. And if you would but as impartially consider your Pretences for going sometimes to the Play-House, under the same Rules, you would certainly find them more weak and unreasonable. For Painting may with more Reason be reckoned an innocent Ornament, than the Play-House an innocent Diversion. And it supposes a greater Vanity of Mind, a more perverted Judgment, and a deeper Corruption of Heart, to seek the Diversion of the Stage, than to take the Pleasure of a borrowed Colour. Painting, when considered in itself, is undoubtedly a great Sin; but when it is compared to the Use of the Stage, it is but as the Mote compared to the Beam.

I know you are offended at this Comparison, because you judge by your Temper, and Prejudices, and do not consider the things as they are in themselves, by the pure Light of Reason and Religion. Painting has not been the way of your Family; it is supposed to be the Practice but of very few; and those who use it endeavour to conceal it: This makes you readily condemn it. On the contrary, your Mother and your Aunt carry you to the Play; you see virtuous People there, and the same Persons that fill our Churches; so that your Temper is as much engaged to think it lawful to go sometimes to a Play, as it is engaged to think the Use of Paint always odious and sinful.

Lay aside therefore these Prejudices for a while, and fancy that you had been trained up in some Corner of the World in the Principles of Christianity, and had never heard either of the Play-House or Painting. Imagine now that you was to examine the Lawfulness of them by the Doctrines of Scripture; you would first desire to be told the Nature of these Things, and what they meant. You would be told, that Painting was the borrowing of Colours from Art, to make the Face look more beautiful. Now though you found no express Text of Scripture against Painting, you would find that it was expressly against Tempers required in Scripture; you would therefore condemn it, as proceeding from a Vanity of Mind, and Fondness of Beauty. You would see that the Harm of Painting consisted in this, that it proceeded from a Temper of Mind contrary to the Sobriety and Humility of a Christian, which indeed is harm enough; because this Humility and Sobriety of Mind is as essential to Religion, as Charity and Devotion. So that in judging according to Scripture, you would hold it as unreasonable to paint sometimes, as to be sometimes malicious, indevout, proud, or false.

You are now to consider the Stage; you are to keep close to Scripture, and fancy that you yet know nothing of Plays. You ask therefore first, what the Stage or Play-House is? You are told that it is a Place where all sorts of People meet to be entertained with Discourses, Actions, and Representations, which are recommended to the Heart by beautiful Scenes, the Splendour of Lights, and the Harmony of Music. You are told that these Discourses are the Invention of Men of Wit and Imagination, which describe imaginary Intrigues and Scenes of Love, and introduce Men and Women discoursing, raving, and acting in all the wild indecent Transports of Lust and Passion. You are told, that the Diversion partly consists of lewd and profane Songs sung to fine Music, and partly of extravagant Dialogues between immodest Persons talking in a Style of Love and Madness, that is nowhere else to be found, and entertaining the Christian Audience with all the Violence of Passion, Corruption of Heart, Wantonness of Mind, Immodesty of Thought, and Profane Jest, that the Wit of the Poet is able to invent. You are told, that the Players, Men and Women, are trained up to act and represent all the Descriptions of Lust and Passion in the liveliest manner, to add a Lewdness of Action to lewd Speeches; that they get their Livelihood by Cursing, Swearing, and Ranting for three Hours together to an Assembly of Christians.

Now though you find no particular Text of Scripture condemning the Stage, or Tragedy or Comedy, in express Words; yet what is much more, you find that such Entertainments are a gross Contradiction to the whole Nature of Religion; they are not contrary to this or that particular Temper, but are contrary to that whole Turn of Heart and Mind which Religion requires. Painting is contrary to Humility, and therefore is to be avoided as sinful; but the Entertainment of the Stage, as it consists of blasphemous Expressions, wicked Speeches, swearing, cursing, and profaning the Name of God, as it abounds with impious Rant, filthy Jest, distracted Passions, gross Descriptions of Lust, and wanton Songs, is a Contradiction to every Doctrine that our Saviour and his Apostles have taught us. So that to abhor Painting at all times, because it supposes a Vanity of Mind, and is contrary to Humility, and yet think there is a lawful Time to go to the Play-House, is as contrary to common-Sense, as if a Man should hold that it was lawful sometimes to offend against all the Doctrines of Religion, and yet always unlawful to offend against any one Doctrine of Religion.

If therefore you were to come (as I supposed) from some Corner of the World, where you had been used to live and judge by the Rules of Religion, and upon your Arrival here had been told what Painting and the Stage was; as you would not expect to see Persons of religious Humility carrying their Daughters to Paint-Shops, or inviting their pious Friends to go along with them, so much less would you expect to hear, that devout, pious, and modest Women carried their Daughters, and invited their virtuous Friends to meet them at the Play. Least of all could you imagine, that there were any People too pious and devout to indulge the Vanity of Painting, and yet not devout and pious enough to abhor the Immodesty, Profaneness, Ribaldry, Immorality, and Blasphemy of the Stage.

To proceed. A *polite Writer of a late Paper thought he had sufficiently ridiculed a certain Lady's Pretensions to Piety, when, speaking of her Closet, he says,

Together lie her Prayer-Book and Paint,
At once to improve the Sinner and the Saint.

* Spectator, No. 79.

160 The Absolute Unlawfulness

Now, whence comes it that this Writer judges so rightly, and speaks the Truth so plainly, in the Matter of Painting? Whence comes it that the generality of his Readers think his Observation just, and join with him in it? It is because Painting is not yet an acknowledged Practice, but is for the most part reckoned a Shameful Instance of Vanity. Now as we are not prejudiced in favour of this Practice, and have no Excuses to make for our own Share in it, so we judge of it impartially, and immediately perceive its Contrariety to a Religious Temper and State of Mind. This Writer saw this in so strong a Light, that he does not scruple to suppose, that Paint is as natural and proper a Means to improve the Sinner, as the Prayer-Book is to improve the Saint.

I should therefore hope, that it need not be imputed to any Sourness of Temper, Religious Weakness, or Dulness of Spirits, if a Clergyman should imagine, that the Profaneness, Debauchery, Lewdness, and Blasphemy of the Stage, is as natural Means to improve the Sinner, as the Bottle of Paint: Or if he should venture to shew, that the Church and the Play-House are as ridiculous a Contradiction, and do no more suit with the same Person, than the Prayer-Book and Paint.

I shall now make a Reflection or two upon the present celebrated Entertainment of the Stage, which is so much to the Taste of the People, that it has been acted almost every Night one whole Season.

The first Scene is said to be a magnificent Palace discovered: Venus attended with Graces and Pleasures.

Now how is it possible, that such a Scene as this should be fit for the Entertainment of Christians? Can Venus and her Graces and Pleasures talk any Language that is like themselves, but what must be unlike to the Spirit of Christianity? The very proposing such a Scene as this, supposes the Audience to be fit for the Entertainment of Lust and Wantonness. For what else can Venus and her Pleasures offer to them? Had we any Thing of the Spirit of Christianity in us, or were earnestly desirous of those holy Tempers, which are to render us pure in the Eyes of God, we should abominate the very Proposal of such a Scene as this, as knowing that it must be an Entertainment fitter for public Stews, than for People who make any Pretences to the Holiness and Purity of the Spirit of Christ. The Scripture says, Mortify therefore your members which are upon earth, fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence. This is the Religion by which we are to be saved. But can the Wit of Man invent anything more contrary to this, than an Entertainment from Venus attended with her Pleasures?

That People should have such a Religion as this, and at the same time such an Entertainment, is an astonishing Instance of the Degeneracy of the present State of Christianity among us. For if the first Scene had been the Devil attended with Fiends, cursing and blaspheming, no one could shew that such a Scene was more contrary to the Religion of Christians, than a Scene with Venus and her Pleasures. And if the Devil himself had been consulted by our Stage Wits, which of these Scenes he had rather have, he would certainly have chosen Venus and her Pleasures, as much fitter to debauch and corrupt a Christian Audience, than a Scene of cursing and blaspheming.

The Scripture thus describes the Infatuation of the old Idolaters. *And none considereth in his heart, neither is there knowledge nor understanding to say, I have burnt part of it in the fire; yea, I have also baked bread upon the coals thereof, and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination? Shall I fall down to the Stock of a Tree? It is here reckoned a strange Instance of their Blindness, that they did not make so easy a Reflection upon the nature of Things. But how near are we to this Blindness, if we do not make as easy a Reflection upon this Entertainment; for the very mentioning of such a Scene as this, is as plain a Demonstration that the Entertainment is contrary to our Religion, as the burning of Wood, and its falling into Ashes, is a Demonstration that Wood is of a Nature contrary to God. How are we therefore more enlightened, if none of us considers in his Heart, neither is there Knowledge nor Understanding in us to say, These are the filthy Deities of the Devil's Invention, with which he polluted and defiled the Heathen World. And shall we still preserve their Power among us? Shall we make such Abominations our Diversion?

For if we worship the God of Purity, if we cannot worship him but with hearts devoted to Purity, what have we to do with these Images of Lewdness? If we dress a Venus, and celebrate her Power, and make her Graces and Pleasures meet us in wanton Forms, and wanton Language, is it not as absurd, as contrary to our Religion, as to set up a Baal in the Temple of God? What greater Contradiction is there, either to Reason or Religion, in one Case than in the other? Baal is as fit for our Devotions, as Venus is for our Rejoicings and Praises.

So that the very naming of such a Scene as this is unlawful Language, and carries as great a Contrariety to our Religion, as the Worship of Baal.

Two Women (whom I suppose to be baptized Christians) represent Venus and Diana, singing, and celebrating their Lusts and Wantonness, as the Sweets that Life improve.

* Isaiah xliv. 19.

Now, if a common Prostitute was to come drunk out of a Brandy-Shop singing their Words, she would act like herself. No one could say that she had forgot her Character, or was singing one way, and living another. And I dare say, there is no Rake in the Audience so debauched, as not to think this a sufficient Celebration of the Praises and Happiness of his Pleasures.

But what do other People do here? Is there any Entertainment in this Place for pious, sober, and devout Minds? Does it become them to sing the Praises of Debauchery, or sit among those that do?

When we hear of a Witches' Feast, we do not hear of any but Witches that go to it: The Mirth and Joy of such Meetings is left wholly to themselves. Now if these impudent Celebrations of Venus and her Pleasures were left wholly to Rakes and Prostitutes; if we reckoned it an Entertainment as contrary to Religion, as a Witches' Feast; it would only shew, that we judged as rightly in the one Case as in the other. And indeed, one would think, that no Christian need to be told, that Venus and her Graces are as much the Devil's Machinery as Witches and Imps.

To proceed. If a Person in Conversation was to address himself to a Modest Lady in the words of this Entertainment, she would think herself very ill-used, and that she ought to resent such Treatment. She would think, that her Modesty might well be questioned, if she bore such Language.

But how it is consistent with such Modesty, to hire People to entertain her with the same Language in Public, is a Difficulty not easily to be explained. Can Fathers and Mothers, who sit here with their Children, recommend Purity to them at home, when they have carried them to hear the Praises of Lewdness, as the Sweets which Life improve?

If a Person was to make a public Harangue in favour of Image-Worship, telling us, that it was the finest Means of raising the Heart to a Delight in God, we should think him a very wicked Man, and that the Ears and Hearts of Christians ought to detest such Discourses. Yet Christian People can meet in Crowds, and give their Money to have repeated in their Ears, what are here said to be the Sweets which Life improve. This, it seems, is no Idolatry.

We are told in Scripture, that Covetousness is Idolatry; and the Reason is, because it alienates the Heart from God, and makes it rest in something else. The covetous Man is an Idolater, because his Heart says, that Gain and Bags of Gold are the Sweets which Life improve. And can we think that that corrupt Heart, that celebrates Lust and Wantonness, as the Sweets which Life improve, is guilty of less Idolatry, than he that says the same thing of Riches? As sure as there is such a Sin as Idolatry, as sure as the sordid Miser is guilty of it, so sure is it that these words are chargeable, not only with excessive Immodesty, but plain Idolatry. For how do we think that the Pagans worshipped Venus? We cannot suppose that it was with Fasting and Prayer, or any serious Devotion. No; they paid her such a Devotion, as the Stage now does; they called upon her in lewd Songs, and praised her, in praising the Pleasures of Lust and Impurity, in rejoicing in her mighty Power, and celebrating her Pleasures, as the Sweets which Life improve.

These Women go on, and with Music and Voices, as wanton as their Words, are employed to make a deeper Impression on the Hearts of the Audience. Then enter Bacchus, Pan, and Silenus, attended with Satyrs, Fawns, and Sylvans.

And indeed, they enter very properly; for the Discourse is very agreeable to their Nature. But what have Christians to do with this Company? Do they come here to renounce their Religion? Or can they think that this Society, with the most beastly Images that the Heathen World could invent, is a Society that they may partake of without Renouncing Christ?

Our Religion charges us, not to keep company, if anyone that is called a Brother be a fornicator,* &c. But where have we left our Religion, if we not only accompany with People devoted to Impurity, but make their Company our Delight, and hire them to entertain us with all the lewd Imaginations that can be invented? If we are not content with this, but conjure up all the impure Fictions of the Heathen World, and make their imaginary Deities more vile and wanton than ever they made them, to render them agreeable to our Christian Minds, shall we reckon this among our small Sins? Shall we think it a pardonable Infirmary, or partake of such an Entertainment as this?

The Apostle says, Ye cannot drink the Cup of the Lord, and the Cup of Devils: Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's Table, and the Table of Devils.† And can we think that we are not drinking the Cup of Devils, or that we are not at the Devil's Table, when his most favourite Instruments of Impiety, Venus, Bacchus, Silenus, Satyrs and Fawns, are the Company that we meet to be entertained with? If this is not being at the Devil's Table, he had no Table in the Heathen World. For surely they who call up Devils to their Entertainment, who cannot be enough delighted unless the Impious Demons of the Heathen

World converse with them, are in a stricter Communication with the Devil, than they who only eat of that Meat which had been offered in Sacrifice.

Our blessed Saviour says, He that looketh upon a Woman to lust after her, hath already committed Adultery with her in his Heart. Can we reckon ourselves his Disciples, who hire our Fellow-Christians, and Christian Women, whose chief Ornament is a sincere Modesty, to sing in merry Assemblies such Words as are used in this Entertainment.

Who can say that I carry Matters too high, when I call this renouncing Christianity? For, can any Words be more expressly contrary to the Doctrine of our Saviour, and that in so important a Point? And does he not sufficiently renounce Christianity, who renounces so great a Doctrine, that has Christ for its Author?

If we were to make a Jest of the Sacraments in our merry Assemblies, we should shew as much Regard to Christianity, as by such Discourses as these. For all lewd Discourses are as plainly contrary to essential Doctrines of Scripture, as any Ridicule upon the Sacraments that can be invented. It may be you could not sit in the Play-House, if you saw Baptism made a Jest of, and its Use reproached. But pray, why do not you think that there is as much Profaneness and Irreligion in impudent Speeches and Songs? Has not Christ said as much about Purity of Heart, as about either of the Sacraments? Has not he made Chastity of Heart as necessary to Salvation as the Sacraments? How comes it then, that an impudent Praise of Lust and Wantonness is not as profane, as a ridicule upon the Sacraments? What Rule of Reason or Religion do you go by, when you think it highly sinful to sit and hear the Sacraments jested upon, and yet are cheerful and delighted with such Songs and Discourses, as ridicule Chastity of Heart, and religious Modesty? Can you suppose, that in the Eyes of God you appear as a better Christian, than those who make merry with profaning the Sacraments? If you can think this, you must hold that the Sacraments are more essential to Religion than Purity of Heart; and that it is more acceptable to God to wash, than to be clean; more pleasing to him to treat the Altar as holy, than to live in Holiness of Heart.

The Sacraments have nothing valuable in their own Nature; they are only useful to Christians, and to be treated with Reverence, because Christ has appointed them as Means of Holiness. But Purity and Chastity of Heart is an essential and internal Excellence, that by its own Nature perfects the Soul, and renders it more acceptable to God. To abhor therefore a Jest upon the Sacraments, and yet divert ourselves with impure Rant, and lewd Songs, is being like those who abhor Idols, and yet commit Sacrilege.

All therefore who partake of this sinful Entertainment, who take their Share of Mirth in such Scenes of Impurity and Lewdness, must look upon themselves, not only as Offenders against the Laws of Purity, but also as chargeable with such Irreligion and Profaneness, as they are who are merry in such Meetings as ridicule and deride the Use of the Holy Sacraments.

It is a great Aggravation of the Guilt of these Assemblies, that Women are employed to lay aside the peculiar Ornament of their Sex, and to add an Immodesty of Action and Address to immodest Speeches. If we knew of an Assembly, where Clergymen met to ridicule the sacred Rites of Religion for the sake of entertaining the Audience with Eloquence; if we should find that great Part of the Audience were Clergymen, who could not forbear an Entertainment so contrary to their Profession; it would easily be seen, that such a sinful Entertainment was more unreasonable, because Clergymen acted in it, and Clergymen came to be entertained with it.

Now this is the Case with the Stage-Entertainment. Women are as particularly called to a singular Modesty, as Clergymen are to the Duties of their Profession. If therefore Women act Parts in lewd and impudent Entertainments, they have as much forgot themselves, and appear as detestable, as Clergymen that talk profanely. And if other Women come to delight themselves with seeing their Sisters acting so contrary to themselves, and the peculiar Duties of their Condition, they as much forget themselves as those Clergy who should meet to see their Brethren raise Diversion out of Profaneness. When therefore virtuous and prudent Women think they may go to the Stage, where Women so openly depart from the Decencies which are necessary to their Sex, let them consider what they would think of such virtuous and prudent Divines, as should meet to see Clergymen openly contradict the Duties of their sacred Office. For it is the same Absurdity, for modest Women to take Pleasure in a Diversion where Women are immodest, as for a good Clergyman to be pleased with a Meeting where Clergymen are profane. This must be owned to be strictly true, unless it can be shewn, that Impudence and Immodesty are not so contrary to the Duties of Women, as Profaneness is contrary to the Duty of a Clergyman. For if there is the same Contrariety, then it must be equally monstrous for Women to encourage a Number of Women in an immodest way of Life, as for Bishops and Priests to encourage a Number of Clergymen in a State of Profaneness.

Let us now take one Step farther in this Entertainment. The Stage has now upon it, Venus, Bacchus, Silenus, Pan, Satyrs, Fawns, Sylvans, Bacchanals, and Bacchantes. Now if there were really such Beings as these, one would not wonder to see them got together. As they have all one common Nature of Vileness, they are sufficiently recommended to one another. But is it not astonishing, that these fictitious Beings, which are only imaginary Representations of such Lust, Sensuality, and Madness, as never had any real Existence, but were invented by the Devil for the Delusion of the Heathen World, should be preserved to talk their filthy Language to Congregations of Christians? And perhaps Silenus never so publicly recommended Lust and Impudence in any Heathen Assembly, as he does here among Christians. For our Stage has made him a fine Singer, that his Lewdness may have all the Recommendation which can be had from it.

Surely no one will now think that I carried the Charge too high, when I called the Play-House the House of the Devil; for if his fictitious Beings, talking his Language, and acting such Parts as they do, be not a sufficient Proof that it is his Work that is here carrying on, it is in vain to pretend to prove anything: There is no Certainty that two and two are four.

If our Eyes could shew us the holy Angels in our Church-Assemblies, it would not be a stronger Proof of the Divine Presence, than the seeing such Images as these and hearing their Language is a Proof that the Stage is the Devil's Ground. For how can he more certainly assure us of his Presence in any Place, than by Satyrs, Bacchanals, Bacchantes, and such like Images of Lewdness? He cannot appear to us as a Spirit; he must therefore get such Beings as these to appear for him; or, what seems to be more to his Purpose, make deluded Christians supply their Places. If therefore there be any certain Marks of the Devil's Power or Presence in any Assemblies, Places, or Temples of the Heathen World, the same are as certain Marks of his Power and Presence in our Play-House.

Again: Is it any Argument that the Church is God's House, because we there meet the Ministers of God, who act in his Name; because we there sing divine Hymns, hear holy Instructions, and raise our Hearts unto God and heavenly Matters; is this any Proof that we are then drawn near to God? If therefore there be a Place set apart for lewd and profane Discourses, where the same Beings are introduced as filled Heathen Temples, where we celebrate their Power, and praise their Being with wanton Songs and impure Rant, and where we open our Hearts to the Impressions of wild and disordered Passions, is not this as certain a Proof, that such a Place must belong to some Being that is contrary to God, and that we are then as certainly drawn near to him? He that does not see this with a sufficient Clearness, could never have seen that the Devil had any Power or Worship in the Heathen World. You must therefore observe, the Play-House is not called the House of the Devil, only by way of Terror, and to fright you from a bad Place; but it is called so, because it really is so in the strictest fullest Sense of the Words.

Let us now suppose, that the Disorders of the Stage cannot drive you from it; and that you are no more offended at the Meeting of these filthy Dæmons of the Heathen World, than if you were to meet your Friends.

If this be your Case, how will you prove that your Religion has had any Effect upon you, or that it has done you the least good? For if the same Lewdness and Immorality please you, which pleased the Worshippers of Venus; if you delight in such Rant and Madness, as was the Delight of Bacchanals, and Bacchantes, is not this a Proof that you have the same Heart and Temper that they had? And if you are like Idolaters in that which constituted their Idolatry, have you any Reason to think that Christianity has had any Effect upon you? It would even be Profaneness in anyone to pretend to the true Spirit of Christianity, so long as he can take pleasure in such an Entertainment as this. For what is there that is unlike to the Spirit of Christ, if this is not? Who that can rejoice in the Lewdness and Beastiality of Silenus, and the impure Rant of vile Dæmons, can make any Pretences to a reasonable Piety? Does this Company look as if we had anything holy and divine in our Tempers? Is this living in the Spirit of Christ? Is this the way to be as the Angels of God when we die? Shall we go from the Pleasures of Bacchus, Silenus, Bacchanals, and Bacchantes, to the Choir of blessed Spirits that are Above? Is there any Reasonableness or Fitness in these Things? Why should we think, that such a Life as this will have an End so contrary to it?

We reckon it strange Grossness of Mind in the Turks, to expect a Paradise of carnal Delights. But what a Degree of Grossness it is in us, to know the God of Purity, and hope for a Heaven which only the pure in Heart shall enjoy, and yet call up all the vile Fictions of Lust and Sensuality that corrupted the Heathen World to entertain our Hearts, that from their Mouths we may hear the Praises of Debauchery and Wantonness? Let any one but consider this, as everything ought to be considered, by the pure Light of Reason and Religion, and he will find that the Use of the Stage may be reckoned amongst our worst Sins, and that it is as great a Contradiction to our Religion, as any Corruption or vile Practice of the Heathen World.

I have made these few Reflections upon this Entertainment, not because it exceeds the ordinary Wickedness of the Stage, but for the contrary Reason, because it is far short of it, and is much less offensive than most of our Plays. That by shewing the Stage to be so impious and detestable, so contradictory to all Christian Piety, in an Entertainment that is moderate, if compared with almost all our Plays, there might be no room left for sober Christians to be at any Peace with it. They who would see how much the Impieties of the Stage exceed what I have here observed of this Entertainment, may consult Mr. Collier's short View of the Stage, Sir Richard Blackmore's Essays, and A Serious Remonstrance, &c., by Mr. Bedford.

To return : Levis hears all these Arguments against the Stage; he owns they are very plain, and strictly prove all that they pretend to; he does not offer one word against them; but still Levis has an Answer for them all, without answering any one of them. 'I have, says he, my own Experience, that these Diver'sions never did me any hurt, and therefore I shall use them.'

But Levis does not consider, that this very Answer shews, that he is very much hurt by them; that they have so much disordered his Understanding, that he will defend his Use of them in the most absurd manner imaginable, rather than be driven from them by any Arguments from Religion. For how can a Man shew that he is more hurt by any Practice, or that it has more blinded and perverted his Mind, than by appealing to his own inward Experience in Defence of it, against the plain Nature and Reason of things? Let Levis look at this way of reasoning in other Matters. If a Person that prays in an unknown Tongue, should disregard all the Arguments that are brought to shew the Absurdity of it, and rest contented with saying, that it never hurt his Devotion, but that he was as much affected in that way, as he could possibly be in any other, Levis would certainly tell such a one, that he had lost his Understanding, and that his long Use of such absurd Devotions made him talk so absurdly about them.

Again: If a Worshipper of Images was, in Answer to the Second Commandment, only to say, that he had his own Experience that he found no hurt by them; and that he had the same Devotion of Heart to God, as if he did not worship Images; Or, suppose another Person to keep very ill Company; and when he is told that Evil communications corrupt good manners, should content himself with saying, that he would still use the same ill Company, because he was sure it did him no hurt, nor made any Impression upon him : Now as Levis would be sure that a Man was notoriously hurt by the Worship of Images, that should thus blindly defend them, and that the other is sufficiently hurt by ill Company, who should so obstinately stick to it, so he ought to be as sure, that he himself is sufficiently hurt either by Plays, or something else, when with an equal Blindness he defends his Use of them.

Farther : When Levis says, that he is sure that the Use of Plays does him no harm, let him consider what he means by that Speech. Does he mean, that though he uses the Diversion of the Stage, yet he finds himself in the true State of Religion ; that he has all those holy Tempers in that degree of Perfection which Christianity requires ? Now if he cannot say this ; how can he say, he is sure that Plays do him no harm ? If a Person was to affirm, that Intemperance did him no hurt, it would be expected that he should own that he was in a perfect State of Health ; For if he had any Disorder or ill Habit of Body, he could not say, that his Intemperance did not contribute towards it. In like manner, if Levis will maintain that Plays do no ways disorder him, or corrupt his Heart ; he must affirm, that he has no Disorder or Corruption of Heart belonging to him ; for if he has, he cannot say that the Use of Plays does not contribute towards it.

When therefore Levis says, Plays do me no harm at all ; it is the same thing as if he had said, I have no Disorder at all upon me ; my Heart and all my Tempers are in that exact State of Purity and Perfection that they should be.

Again : Let Levis consider, that his Taste and Relish of the Stage is a Demonstration that he is already hurt by something or other ; and that his Heart is not in a right State of Religion. Levis thinks this is a very censorious Accusation, because he is known to be a very good Churchman, to live a regular Life for the most part, to be charitable, and a Well-wisher to all good Designs. All this is true of Levis : But then it is as strictly true, that his Taste for Plays is a Demonstration, that his Heart is not in a right State of Religion. For does Levis think, that his frequenting the Church is any Sign of the State of his Heart ? Am I to believe, that he has inward Dispositions that suit with the holy Strains of Divine Service, because he likes to be at Church ? I grant, I am to believe this ; there is good Reason for it. But then, if Levis uses the Play-House, if the disordered Passions, the lewd Images, the profane Rant, and immodest Parts that are there acted, are a Pleasure to him, is not this as strong a Demonstration, that he has some Dispositions and Tempers that suit with these Disorders ? If I am to conclude anything from a Man's liking and frequenting Divine Service, is there not as certain a Conclusion to be drawn from a Man's liking and using the Stage? For the Stage can no more be liked, without having some inward Corruptions that are suitable to the Disorders that are there represented, than the Divine Service can be a Pleasure to anyone, that has no Holiness or Devotion in his Heart.

It is infallibly certain, that all Pleasures shew the State and Condition of our Minds; and that nothing can please us, but what suits with some Dispositions and Tempers that are within us; so that when we see a Man's Pleasures, we are sure that we see a great deal of his Nature. All Forms of Life, all outward Actions, may deceive us. We cannot absolutely say, that People have such Tempers because they do such Actions; but wherever People place any Delight, or receive any Pleasures, there we have an infallible Token of something in their Nature, and of what Tempers they have within them.

Diversions therefore and Pleasures, which are reckoned such uncertain Means of judging of the State of Men's Minds, are of all Means the most certain; because nothing can please us, or affect us, but what is according to our Nature, which finds something within us that is suitable to it. Had we not inward Dispositions of Tenderness and Compassion, we should not find ourselves softened and moved with miserable Objects. Had we not something harmonious in our Nature, we should not find ourselves pleased with Strains of Music. In like manner, had we not in our Nature lively Seeds of all those Disorders which are acted upon the Stage, were there not some inward Corruption that finds itself gratified by all the irregular Passions that are there represented, we should find no more Pleasure in the Stage, than blind Men find in Pictures, or deaf Men in Music.

And, on the other Hand, if we were full of the contrary Tempers, were our Hearts full of Affections contrary to those on the Stage, were we deeply affected with Desires of Purity and Holiness, we should find ourselves as much offended with all that passes upon the Stage, as mild and gentle Natures are offended at the Sight of Cruelty and Barbarity. These Things are of the utmost Certainty.

All People therefore, who use the Stage, have as much Assurance that their Heart is not in a right State of Religion, as they possibly can have of anything that relates to themselves.

I hope, none of my Readers will think this too general, or too rash an Assertion; but that they will rather observe, that it is founded on such Evidence of Reason as cannot be rejected, without rejecting everything that is plain and certain in Human Nature. They must not think it a sufficient Answer to this, to consider either how good they are themselves, or how many excellent Persons they know who do not abstain from the Stage. For this is a way of Reasoning, that is not allowed in any other Case.

Now when it is affirmed, that all Persons who are pleased with the Stage must have some Corruptions of Heart, that are gratified with the corrupt Passions which are there acted, is not this as plain and evident, as if it was said, that all who are pleased with seeing barbarous Actions, must have some Seeds of Barbarity in their Nature? If you are delighted with the Stroke of the Whip, and love to see the Blood fly, is it not past all doubt, that you have a Barbarity within you? And if impure Speeches, if wanton Amours, if wild Passions, and immoral Rant, can give you any Delight, is it not equally past all doubt, that you have something of all these Disorders in your Nature? Is it any more uncharitable to affirm this, than to affirm, that all who love to see the Blood fly have something barbarous in their Nature? Is there any more Rashness or Severity in it, than in saying, that all who love such or such Strains of Music have some Disposition in their Nature that is gratified by them?

It signifies nothing therefore to say, that you know such or such excellent Persons who are pleased with the Stage, whom no one ought to suspect to be defective in Piety; it is as absurd as to say, that you know excellent Persons who are pleased with seeing barbarous Actions, whom no one ought to suspect to be defective in Tenderness. If you delight in barbarous Sight, and are pleased with the Groans and Pains of the Afflicted, I do not suspect you to be defective in Tenderness, you have put your Case out of all Suspicion, you have proved that you have a Barbarity in your Nature. So if you delight in the Stage, if you taste and relish its Entertainment, I do not suspect you to be defective in Piety; you have put your Case beyond Suspicion; you have proved that you have Dispositions in your Nature, that are gratified by the disorderly Passions of the Stage.

Again, consider it in another View: How is it possible that anyone should delight in the Stage, but through a Defect in Piety? For is not the Stage guilty of Impurity, Profaneness, Blasphemy, and Immorality? Now though People may differ about the Degree in which they will make this Charge, yet all must own it in some degree. Now if the Charge be but true in any degree, must there not be a Want of Piety in those that can partake of an Entertainment chargeable with Impurity, Profaneness, and Immorality? If People were so pious that they could not bear such an Entertainment as this, if nothing could persuade them to be present at it, this would be no Proof that they were Saints ; for to abhor an Entertainment loaded with so much Guilt, is but a small Instance of an advanced Piety. But surely, if they cannot only bear it, but be pleased with it, it is Proof enough, that their Hearts want several Degrees of Piety which become Christians. Besides, can pious Persons, who use the Stage, tell you of any one Play for this forty or fifty Years, that has been free from wild Rant, immodest Passions, and profane Language? Must they not therefore be defective in Piety, who partake of a Diversion that is at no time free from this Guilt in some degree or other? But supposing there was such a thing as an innocent Play once or twice in an Age (which is like supposing innocent Lust, sober Rant, or harmless Profaneness) could this make it at all allowable for pious Persons to use the Stage? Could this be any Proof that Persons of real Piety might take Pleasure in it? For could it be consistent with an enlivened Piety to use a Diversion, which in its common ordinary State is full of monstrous Impiety and Profaneness, because it sometimes happened in a Number of Years, that it might be innocent for a Day or two? But even this does not happen. The Stage never has one innocent Play; not one can be produced that ever you saw acted in either House, but what abounds with Thoughts, Passions, and Language, contrary to Religion. Is there therefore any Rashness or Severity in saying, That Persons who use a Diversion, which in its ordinary State is full of monstrous Wickedness and Impiety, and in its best State is never free from Variety of Sin, must be defective in Piety? How can we know anything with Clearness and Evidence, if we know not this to be clear and evident? For surely it is a necessary Part of Piety to abhor Lewdness, Immorality, or Profaneness, wherever they are; but they who are so pious, as not to be able to be pleased where any of those are, have a Piety that will not permit them ever to see a Play.

There is no Doctrine of our Blessed Saviour, that more concerns all Christians, or is more essential to their Salvation, than this: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Now take the Stage in its best State, when some admired Tragedy is upon it, are the extravagant Passions of distracted Lovers, the impure Ravings of inflamed Heroes, the Joys and Torments of Love, and gross Descriptions of Lust; are the indecent Actions, the amorous Transports, the wanton Address of the Actors, which make so great a Part of the most sober and modest Tragedies; are these things consistent with this Christian Doctrine of Purity of Heart? You may as well imagine, that Murder and Rapine are consistent with Charity and Meekness.

It is therefore as necessary, as reasonable and as consistent with Christian Charity, to tell Levis that his Use and Delight in the Stage is as certain a Proof of his want of Piety, as to tell the same thing to a malicious, intemperate, or revengeful Person. Some People who are guilty of Personal Vices may have some Violence of Temptation, some natural Disorder to plead in their Excuse; they perhaps may be so tender as to desire to conceal them, and be afraid to encourage others in the like Practices; but the Use and Encouragement of the Stage has no Excuses of this kind; it has no Infirmity, Surprise, or Violence of Temptation, to appeal to; it shews no Tenderness of Mind, or Concern for others, but is a deliberate, continued, open and public Declaration in favour of Lewdness, Immorality, and Profaneness. Let anyone but collect, not all the Wickedness that has appeared on the Stage since he first used it, but only so much as passes there in anyone Season, and then he will see what a dreadful Load of Guilt he has brought upon himself. For surely no one can be so weak as to imagine, that he can use and encourage a wicked Entertainment, without making himself a full Sharer of all its Wickedness.

Archbishop Tillotson treats the Stage in this manner. 'I shall 'now speak a few Words concerning Plays, which, as they are 'now ordered among us, are a mighty Reproach to the Age and 'Nation.—As now the Stage is, they are intolerable, and not 'fit to be permitted in a civilized, much less a Christian Nation. 'They do most notoriously minister to Infidelity and Vice.— 'And therefore I do not see how any Person pretending to 'Sobriety and Virtue, and especially to the pure and holy 'Religion of our Blessed Saviour, can without great Guilt, and 'open Contradiction to his holy Profession, be present at such 'lewd and immodest Plays, as too many are; who yet would 'take it very ill to be shut out of the Community of Christians, 'as they would most certainly have been in the first and purest 'Ages of Christianity.*

Here let it be observed, that this Archbishop, who has generally been reckoned eminent for his Moderation, and gentle manner of treating everything, says of Plays, that they are a mighty Reproach to the Nation; that they are intolerable, and not fit to be permitted in a Civilized, much less a Christian Nation; that they notoriously minister to Infidelity and Vice.

Now this, I suppose, is as high a Charge, as he would have brought against the worst Articles of Popery. If I have said, that People cannot use the Stage without being defective in

* Sermon upon Corrupt Communication.

Piety, I have not said it in a declaiming way, but have asserted it from Variety of plain Arguments: But this great Man, so much admired for his tender Remarks upon Persons and Things, goes much farther. He does not say, that People of real and advanced Piety cannot use the Stage, but he makes it inconsistent with so much as pretending to Sobriety and Virtue, much less the Purity of the holy Religion of our Blessed Saviour. He does not say, that such People cannot be Excellent and Exemplary Christians, or that they must be defective in Piety, but he charges them with great Guilt, and open Contradiction to their holy Religion, and assures them, that if they had lived in the first and purest Ages of Christianity, they would have been excommunicated.

I have appealed to this great Name, for no other End, but to prevent the charge of Uncharitableness. For surely, if such an eminent Instance of a charitable and gentle Spirit can roundly affirm, that the Use of such a Stage as ours is an open Contradiction to Christianity, and such a scandalous Offence, as would certainly have been punished in the first and purest Ages of the Church with the dreadful Punishment of Excommunication; surely it can be no Proof of an uncharitable Spirit in me, that I shew by Variety of Arguments, that the Use of such a Stage cannot consist with the true Spirit of Christianity, but that there must be some Defect in their Piety, who are able to use it.

Jucunda resolves in great Cheerfulness to hear no Arguments against the Stage: She says it can be but a small Sin; and considering the Wickedness of the Age, that Person is in a very good State, that is only guilty of going to Plays. Desire her ever so often only to consider the plainest Arguments in the World, she puts all off with only this Reply, God send I may have no greater Sin to answer for, than seeing a Play!

Jucunda thinks a Clergyman would do better, to insist only upon the material Parts of Religion, and not lay so much Stress upon Things that are only Diversions, lest by making Religion to contradict People in everything, Religion itself should be brought into Dislike. Jucunda desires, that she may be instructed in some greater Things, than the Sinfulness of going to a Play; for she is resolved to hear no more of that.

But pray, Jucunda, consider all that you have here said. You say it can be but a small Sin. How is it that you know it is but a small Sin? What care have you taken to understand its true Magnitude? You shut your Eyes, and stop your Ears, and resolve against all Information about it, and then call it a small Sin. But suppose it was but a small Sin; is that a Reason why you should be guilty of it? Does the Smallness of Sins recommend them to your Choice? Our blessed Saviour says,* If thy foot offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire. Now this passage, I suppose, does not mean, If thou art guilty of some great Sin, either of Murder, Perjury, or the like, thou must cut them off. For the Comparison of a Foot and an Eye, must signify something that is not directly sinful in itself, but only dangerous in its Use; as it sets us too near to some Sins, or is become too full of Temptation. Yet such Ways of Life as these, which are only dangerous, and expose our Virtue to too great a Hazard, however pleasant and useful, though like an Eye, or Foot, are yet to be entirely cut off, that we may not fall into Hell-fire. Can it be supposed that Jucunda is of this Religion, who pleases herself with a Diversion, because it is but a small Sin? Will she ever think of saving herself by cutting off a Foot, or plucking out an Eye?

Indeed, to talk of a small Sin, is like talking of a small Law of God: For as there is no Law of God but is a great one, because it comes from God, so every Sin, as it is a Transgression of some Law of God, must needs be a great one. There may be Sins that have a smaller degree of Guilt, because they are committed through Infirmity, Ignorance, or Surprise; but no Sin is small, that is either carelessly or wilfully continued in. If it be a Sin therefore to use the Stage, it cannot be a small one, because it has none of those Circumstances which render a Sin a small one. It becomes a very great one to Jucunda, because she carelessly and wilfully resolves to continue in it, merely for the sake of a little Diversion.

Let Jucunda consider again, what she means by wishing that she may have no greater Sin to answer for than going to a Play. It is a Wish that is silly in itself, because she is not to wish to die in small Sins, but in a perfect Repentance and Abhorrence of all kind of Sin; but it is much sillier still, when it is given as a Reason for going to a Play. For it is saying, I expect to die guilty of greater Sins than of going to a Play, and therefore there is no Occasion to forbear from that. Now, if she understands herself, she must know, that this is the plain Meaning of her Words. Yet who that understands anything of Religion, or that has any Desire of Holiness, can talk at this rate? It is a Language that is fitter for an Atheist, than for a Person that is but half a Christian. If a Tradesman that allows himself only to lie in the Prices of his Goods, should content himself with saying, God send I may have no greater Sin to answer for, no one would suppose him to be much concerned about Religion. Yet as many Christian Reasons might be produced, to shew these Lies to be but small Sins, as to shew that the Use of the Stage is but a small Sin.

* Mark ix. 45, 47.

Jucunda would have a Clergyman insist upon the most material Parts of Religion, and not lay so much stress upon Things that are only Diversions. I am of your mind, Jucunda, that a Clergyman ought to insist upon the most material Parts of Religion; but then it does not follow, that he must not lay much Stress upon things that are Diversions. For as something that is called a Diversion may be entirely sinful, so if this should happen, it is as necessary for a Clergyman to call all Christians from it, as it is necessary to exhort them to keep the Commandments. Religion seems to have as little to do with Trades, as with Diversions; yet if a Trade be set up, that is in its own Nature wicked, there is nothing more material in Religion, than to declare the Necessity of forsaking such an Employment. But after all, Jucunda, the most essential, and most material Parts of Religion, are such as relate to common Life, such as alter our Ways of living, such as give Rules to all our Actions, and are the Measure of all our Conduct, whether in Business or Diversion. Nothing is so important in Religion to you, as that which makes you sober and wise, holy and heavenly-minded, in the whole Course of your Life. But you are for such material Parts of Religion, as should only distinguish you from a Jew or an Infidel, but make no Difference in common Life betwixt you and Fops and Coquettes. You are for a Religion that consists in Modes and Forms of Worship, that is tied to Times and Places, that only takes up a little of your time on Sundays, and leaves you all the Week to do as you please. But all this, Jucunda, is nothing. The Scripture has not said in vain, He that is in Christ is a new Creature. All the Law and the Gospel are in vain to you; all Sacraments, Devotions, Doctrines, and Ordinances, are to no purpose, unless they make you this new Creature in all the Actions of your Life. He teaches you the most material Parts of Religion, who teaches you to be of a religious Spirit in everything that you do; who teaches you to eat and drink, to labour and rest, to converse and divert yourself in such degrees, and to such ends, as best promote a pious Life.

If Sots and Gluttons should desire a Clergyman to insist upon the most material Parts of Religion, and not lay so great a stress upon Gluttony and Intemperance, which are things which only relate to eating and drinking, they would shew that they understood Religion as well as Jucunda. For everyone must see, that some Diversions may as much disorder the Heart, and be as contrary to Religion, as Gluttony and Intemperance. And perhaps as many People have lived and died unaffected with Religion, through a Course of Diversions and Pleasures, as through Gluttony and Intemperance.

If it displeases People to be told, that Religion is to prescribe Rules to their Diversions, they are as unreasonable as those are, who are displeas'd that Religion should prescribe Rules to their Tempers, and Passions, and Inclinations. For as Diversions are only the Gratifications of our Tempers, so if Religion is to forbear us in our Diversions, it is to forbear our Tempers, Passions, and Inclinations. But the Truth is, we ought to be more religiously cautious and watchful about our Diversions, than any other Part of common Life, not only because they take such deep hold of us, but because they have no necessary Foundation in Nature, but are our own Inventions. Trade and Business, though they are necessary for great Ends of Life, are yet to be subject to the strictest Rules of Religion; surely therefore Diversions, which are but like so many Blanks in Life, that are only invented to get rid of Time, surely such things ought of all others to have no mixture of anything that is sinful in them. For if the thing itself be hardly pardonable, surely it must be a high Crime to add to it the Sin of doing it in a sinful manner. For as Diversions are at best only Methods of losing Time, the most innocent have something in them that seems to want a Pardon; but if we cannot be content with such as only pass away our Hours, unless they gratify our disordered Passions, we are like those who are not content to sleep away their time, unless they can add the Pleasure of sinful Dreams.

Jucunda therefore is much mistaken, if she thinks that Religion has nothing to do with her Diversions, for there is nothing that requires a more religious Exactness than they do. If we are wrong in them, it is the same thing as if we are wrong in our Religion, or sinful in our Business. Nay, Sin in our Diversions is less excusable, and perhaps does us more harm than in anything else. For such as our Diversions are, such are we ourselves. If Religion therefore is to have any Power over us, if it is to enter into our Hearts, and alter and reform the State of our Souls, the greatest Work that it has to do, is to remove us from such Pleasures and Ways of Life as nourish and support a wrong State of our Souls.

If dying Sinners that go out of the World under a Load of Guilt could see what brought them into that State, it would often be found, that all their Sins, and Impieties, and Neglect of Duty, were solely owing to their Diversions; and perhaps were they to live their Lives over again, there would be no other possible way of living better than they had done, but by renouncing such ways of Life as were only looked upon as Diversions and Amusements.

People of Fashion and Quality have great Advantage above the Vulgar ; their Condition and Education gives them a Liveliness and Brightness of Parts, from whence one might justly expect a more exalted Virtue. How comes it then, that we see as ill Morals, as open Impiety, as little religious Wisdom, and as great Disorders among them, as among the most rude uneducated Part of the World? It is because the Politeness of their Lives, their Course of Diversions and Amusements, and their Ways of spending their Time, as much extinguishes the Wisdom and Light of Religion, as the Grossness and Ignorance of the dullest Part of the World. A poor Creature that is doomed to a stupid Conversation, that sees nothing but Drudgery, and Eating, Drinking, and Sleeping, is as likely to have his Soul aspire to God, and aim at an exalted Virtue, as another that is always in the Brightness and Gaiety, of polite Pleasures. It is the same thing, whether the good Seed be burnt up with the Heat and Brightness of the Sun, or be lost in Mud. Many Persons that live and die in a Mine, that are confined to Drudgery and Darkness, are just so fatally destroyed by their way of Life, as others that live in a Circle of Pleasures and polite Engagements are destroyed by their way of Life. Everyone sees and owns the Effects of such a gross way of Life ; it is not usual to expect anything wise, or holy, or truly great, from Persons that live and die digging Coals. But then it is not enough considered, that there are other ways of Life, of a contrary Appearance, that as certainly and unavoidably produce the same Effects. For a Heart that is devoted to polite Pleasures, that is taken up with a Succession of vain and corrupt Diversions, that is employed in Assemblies, Gaming, Plays, Balls, and such like Business of a genteel Life, is as much disposed of, and taken as far out of the way of true Religion, and a divine and holy Life, as if it had been shut up in a Mine. These are plain and certain Truths, if there is anything plain and certain, either in the Nature of Religion, or the Nature of Man. Who expects Piety from a Tapster, that lives among the Rudeness, Noise, and Intemperance of an Ale-House? Who expects Christian Holiness from a Juggler, that goes about with his Cups and Balls? Yet why is not this as reasonable, as to expect Piety and Christian Holiness from a fine Gentleman that lives at a Gaming-Table? Is there any more reason to look for Christian Fortitude, divine Tempers, or religious Greatness of Mind, in this State of Life?

Had such a one been born in low Life with the same turn of Mind, it had in all probability fixed him in an Ale-House, or furnished him with Cups and Balls.

The sober honest Employments of Life, and the reasonable Cares of every Condition in the World, make it sufficiently difficult for People to live enough to God, and to act with such holy and wise Tempers as Religion requires. But if we make our Wealth and Fortunes the Gratifications of idle and disordered Passions, we may make it as difficult to be saved in a State of Politeness and Gentility, as in the basest Occupations of Life.

Religion requires a steady resolute Use of our best Understanding, and an earnest Application to God for the Light and Assistance of his Holy Spirit.

It is only this watchful Temper, that is full of Attention to everything that is right and good, that watches over our Minds, and guards our Hearts, that desires Wisdom, and constantly calls upon God for the Light and Joy of his Holy Spirit; it is this Temper alone that can preserve us in any true State of Christian Holiness. There is no Possibility of having our Minds strengthened and fixed in wise and reasonable Judgments, or our Hearts full of good and regular Motions, but by living in such a way of Life, as assists and improves our Mind, and prepares and disposes us to receive the Spirit of God. This is as certainly the one only way to Holiness, as there is but one God that is Holy. Religion can no more subsist in a trifling vain Spirit, that lives by Humour and Fancy, that is full of Levity and Impertinence, wandering from Passion to Passion, giddy with silly Joys, and burdened with impertinent Cares, it can no more subsist with this State of the Soul, than it can dwell in a Heart devoted to Sin.

Any way of Life therefore that darkens our Minds, that mis-employs our Understanding, that fills us with a trifling Spirit, that disorders our Passions, that separates us from the Spirit of God, is the same certain Road to Destruction, whether it arises from stupid Sensuality, rude Ignorance, or polite Pleasures. Had anyone therefore the Power of an Apostle, or the Tongue of an Angel, he could not employ it better, than in censuring and condemning those ways of Life, which Wealth, Corruption, and Politeness, have brought among us. We indeed only call them Diversions; but they do the whole Work of Idolatry and Infidelity, and fill People with so much Blindness and Hardness of Heart, that they neither live by Wisdom, nor feel the want of it, but are content to play away their Lives, as regardless of everything that is wise, and holy, and divine, as if they were mere Birds, or Animals, and as thoughtless of Death, and Judgment, and Eternity, as if these were Things that had no Relation to human Life.

Now all this Blindness and Hardness of Heart is owing to that way of Life which People of Fortune generally fall into. It is not gross Sins, it is not Murder, or Adultery, but it is their Gentility and Politeness that destroys them: It fills them with such Passions and Pleasures, as quite extinguish the gentle Light of Reason and Religion. For if Religion requires a sober Turn of Mind; if we cannot be reasonable, but by subduing and governing our blind Tempers and Passions; if the most necessary Enjoyments of Life require great Caution and Sobriety, that our Souls be not made earthly and sensual by them; what way of Life can so waste and destroy our Souls, so strengthen our Passions, and disorder our Hearts, as a Life of such Diversions, Entertainments, and Pleasures, as are the Business of great Part of the World?

If Religion is to reform our Souls, to deliver us from the Corruption of our Nature, to restore the divine Image, and fill us with such Tempers of Purity and Perfection, as may fit us for the Eternal Enjoyment of God, what is the polite Part of the World doing? For how can anyone more resist such a Religion as this; how can more renounce the Grace of God, and hinder the Recovery of the Divine Image, than by living in a Succession of such Enjoyments, as the Generality of People of Fashion are devoted to? For no one who uses the Stage has any more Reason to expect to grow in the Grace of God, or to be enlightened and purified by his Holy Spirit, than he that never uses any Devotion. So that it is not to be wondered at, if the Spirit and Power of Religion is wanted, where People so live, as neither to be fit to receive, nor able to co-operate with the Assistance and Light of God's Holy Spirit.

We are taught, that Charity covereth a multitude of sins; and that alms shall purge away sins. Now let this teach some People how to judge of the Guilt of those Gifts and Contributions, which are given contrary to Charity. I do not mean such Money, as is idly and impertinently squandered away, but such Gifts and Contributions as are to support People in a wicked Life. For this is so great a Contradiction to Charity, that it must certainly have Effects contrary to it: It must as much cover our Virtues, as Charity covers our Sins.

It is no strange Thing, to hear of Ladies taking care of a Benefit-Night in the Play-House. But surely they never reflect upon what they are doing. For if there is any Blessing that attends Charity, there must as great a Curse attend such Liberalities, as are to reward People for their Wickedness, and make them happy and prosperous in an unchristian Profession. How can they expect the Blessings of God, or to have their Virtues and Charities placed to their Account, when they have blotted them out, by their Contributions and Generosities to the most open Enemies of the Purity and Holiness of Christ's Religion? He that is thus in the Interest of the Play-House, is most openly against God, and is as certainly opposing Religion, as he that rewards those that labour in the Cause of Infidelity.

It is no uncharitable Assertion to affirm, that a Player cannot be a living Member of Christ, or in a true State of Grace, till he renounces his Profession with a sincere and deep Repentance. Christianity no more allows such Plays and Players as ours are, than it allows the grossest Vices. They are Objects of no other Charity or Kindness, than such as may reduce them to a sincere Repentance. What a Guilt therefore do they bring upon themselves, who make Players their Favourites, and public Objects of their Care and Generosity; who cannot be in the Favour of God, till they cease to be such as they encourage them to be, till they renounce that Life for which they esteem and reward them?

When an Object of Distress is offered to People, it is common to see them very scrupulous in their Charity; they seem to think there may be such a thing as a blamable Charity; they desire to know whether the Person be worthy, whether his Distress is not owing to his Follies and Extravagances, that they may not relieve such a one as ought to feel the Punishment of his Follies. But what must we say to these things, if those who are thus nice in their Alms are yet unreasonable in their Generosities; who are afraid of assisting a poor Man, till everything can be said in his Favour, and yet eager to make another rich, who is only recommended by his Follies? What shall we say to these things, if Persons who have so many Rules to govern and restrain their Piety to poor Men, have yet no Rules to govern their Liberalities and Kindness to Libertines, if they should have a Benefit-Night upon their hands, not to relieve the Poverty, but to reward the Merit of a Player, that he may have the Substance of a Gentleman from Christians, for a way of Life that would be a Reproach to a sober Heathen? Shall we reckon this among our small Offences? Is this a pardonable Instance of the Weakness of human Nature? Is it not rather an undeniable Proof, that Christianity has no hold of our Reason and Judgment? And that we must be born again from such a State of Heart as this, before we can enter into the Spirit of Christianity?

I have now only one thing to desire of the Reader, not that he would like and approve of these Reflections, but that he will not suffer himself to dislike or condemn them, till he has put his Arguments into Form, and knows how many Doctrines of Scripture he can bring against those things that I have asserted. So far as he can shew that I have reasoned wrong, or mistook the Doctrine of Scripture, so far he has a Right to censure. But general Dislikes are mere Tempers as blind as Passions, and are always the strongest where Reasons are most wanted. If People will dislike because they will, and condemn Doctrines only because it suits better with their Tempers and Practices, than to consider and understand them to be true, they act by the same Spirit of *Poper*y as is most remarkable in the lowest Bigots, who are resolute in a general Dislike of all Protestant Doctrines, without suffering themselves to consider and understand upon what Truth they are founded.

I can easily imagine that some People will censure these Doctrines, as proceeding from a rigid, uncharitable Temper, because they seem to condemn so great a Part of the World. Had I wrote a Treatise against Covetousness, or Intemperance, it had certainly condemned great Part of the World; but surely he must have strangely forgot himself, that should make that a Reason of accusing me of an uncharitable Temper. Such People should consider also, that a Man cannot assert the Doctrines of Christian Charity and Meekness themselves, without condemning a very great Part of the World. But would it be an Instance of an uncharitable Spirit; to preach up the Necessity of an universal Charity, because it might condemn a very great Part of the World? And if the Holiness of Christianity cannot be asserted, without condemning the Pleasures and Entertainments of the fashionable Part of the World, is there any more Uncharitableness in this, than in asserting the Doctrine of universal Love? Does this any more shew an unchristian rigid Spirit, than when the beloved Apostle said, All that is in the World, the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, and the Pride of Life, is not of the Father, but is of the World?

But I shall not now consider any more Objections, but leave all that I have said to the Conscience and Reason of every Person. Let him but make Reason and Religion the Measure of his Judgment, and then he is as favourable to me as I desire him to be.

It is very common and natural for People to struggle hard, and be loath to own anything to be wrong that they have long practised. Many People will see so much Truth in these Arguments against the Stage, that they will wish in their own Minds that they had always foreborne it. But then finding that they cannot assent to these Arguments, without taking a great deal of Blame to themselves, they will find strong Inclinations to condemn the plainest Reasonings, rather than condemn themselves. Let but a Person forget that he has any Guilt in relation to the Stage, let him but suppose that he has never been there, and that he will go or stay away, just as he finds Reason, when he has examined all that can be said against it, let a Man but put himself in this State of Mind, and then he will see all the Arguments against the Stage as plain and convincing, as any that can be brought against the grossest Vices.

If we could look into the Minds of the several Sorts of Readers, we should see how differently People are affected with Arguments, according to the State that they are in. We should see how they, who have never used the Stage, contend with the whole Force of their Minds, and see the Certainty and Plainness of every Argument against it. We should see others struggling and contending against all Conviction, in proportion to the Use that they have made of the Stage. They that have been its Friends and Advocates, and constant Admirers, will hate the very Name of a Book that is written against it, and will condemn every Argument, without knowing what it is. They who have used the Stage much, though in a less degree than this, will perhaps vouchsafe to read a Book against it; but they will read with Fear, they will strive not to be convinced, and be angry at every Argument, for proving so much as it does. Others, that have used the Stage in the most moderate degrees, have yet great Prejudices: They perhaps will own, that the Stage is blamable, and that it is very well to persuade People from it: But then, these People will not assent to the whole Truth. They will not condemn the Stage, as they ought, because having been there sometimes themselves, it suits better with their own Practice only to condemn it in the general, than to declare it to be sinful in such a degree, as should condemn those who ever use it.

These are the several Difficulties, which this Treatise has to contend with: It is to oppose an evil Practice, and charge it with such a Degree of Guilt, as few can consent to, without taking some Part of that Guilt to themselves.

I have mentioned these several Degrees of Prejudice, to put People upon suspecting themselves, and trying the Stage of their Hearts. For the only way to be wise and reasonable, is to suspect ourselves, and put Questions to ourselves in private, which only our own Hearts can answer. Let anyone who reads this Treatise, ask himself, Whether he reads it, as he reads those things which have no Relation to himself? When he reads a Treatise against Image Worship, or Prayers to Saints, he knows that he attends to the whole Force of the Arguments ; that he desires to see them in their full Strength, and to comprehend every Evil that they charge upon it. Now everyone can tell, whether he reads this Treatise with this Temper, or whether he comes heavily to it, and unwilling to be convinced by it. If this is his State, he ought to charge himself with all that, which he charges upon the most absurd and perverse People in Life. For it is only this Temper, an Inclination not to be convinced, that makes People so positive and obstinate in Ways and Opinions, that appear so shocking to all reasonable Men. It is this Temper, that makes the Jew, the Infidel, the Papist, and the Fanatic of every kind. And he that is not reasonable enough to read impartially a Treatise against the Stage, has no Reason to think that his Mind is in better Order than their's is, who cannot freely consider a Book that is wrote against the Worship of Images, and Prayers to Saints.

There is but one Thing for reasonable People to do in this Case, either to answer all the Arguments here produced against the Stage, or to yield to the Truth of them, and regulate their Lives according to them. Our Conduct in this Affair is far from being a small Matter. I have produced no Arguments, but such as are taken from the most Essential Parts of Religion : If therefore there is any Truth in them, the Use of the Stage is certainly to be reckoned among great and flagrant Sins.

I have now only to advise those, who are hereby made sensible of the Necessity of renouncing the Stage, that they will act in this Case, as they expect that others should act in Cases of the like nature ; that they will not think it sufficient to forbear the Stage themselves, but be instrumental as far as they can in keeping others from it ; and that they will think it as necessary to make this Amends for their former Compliance, and ill Example, as it is necessary to make Restitution in cases of Injury. The Cause of Religion, the Honour of God, the Good of their Neighbour, and the Peace and Satisfaction of their own Minds, necessarily require this at their Hands. For as no one can tell how far his Example may have influenced others, and how many People may have been injured by his means, so it is absolutely necessary, that he do as much good as he can by a better Example, and make his own Change of Life a Means of reducing others to the same State of Amendment.

THIS Treatise is WILLIAM LAW'S fourth Work in the Order of Publication; published in the year 1726, when he was about forty years of age.

MR. WALTON records a Tradition to the effect that shortly after the publication of the 'Christian Perfection,' when William Law was one day waiting 'in the Shop of his Publisher, in London, a person, habited as a Gentleman's servant, accosted him, inquiring if he were the Rev. Mr. Law; and being answered in the affirmative, placed a letter in his hands and departed. Upon opening the letter, it was found to contain a Bank-note for £1,000 from some anonymous individual.' Walton suggests that 'if this anecdote be true,' it was probably with this donation that William Law endowed the Girls' School in his Native place of King's Cliffe: and it is equally probable that the publication of this excellent Treatise procured him the appointment of Tutor in the Gibbon family.

In the course of William Law's controversial writings his mind may have become impressed with the importance of setting forth in a practical manner the True Profession of Christianity, as the best method of further refuting erroneous doctrines and opinions; such as he had already felt called upon in the defence of True Christianity to expose—hence this Treatise.

The 'Christian Perfection' has exercised an immense influence over the lives of many of its readers; and it may indeed be regarded as a Practical Guide to Christianity. It is the first Work of William Law's which really, as a Beacon, directs the Wayfarer through the strait gate into that narrow way, with its pitfalls and manifold difficulties which he knew so well, and along which he himself has passed. The popularity of this Work has however been exceeded by that of the 'Serious Call,' which was William Law's next work ; but is for the most part merely the 'Christian Perfection' reduced into a Formula or System of Religion, with Rules for Devotion, appointed Hours for, and Subjects of, Prayer. Hence the extreme but unmerited, popularity of the 'Serious Call' far beyond William Law's other writings—for 'Man is a bundle 'of Habits,' and the majority of even religious people, from want of sufficient earnestness, require to be led and instructed by 'Rules' at every step, as if they were mentally and spiritually blind.

It is in the 'Christian Perfection' that the following sentence respecting the Light of Revelation occurs : which, in the infinite comprehensiveness of its idea, is amongst the most beautiful that William Law ever wrote :

' This Light (of Revelation) has dispersed all the Anxiety of ' Man's vain Conjectures. It has brought him acquainted with ' God ; and, by adding Heaven to Earth and Eternity to Time, ' has opened such a glorious View of Things as makes Man, even ' in his present Condition, full of a Peace of God which passes all ' Understanding.'

An Exhortation to Christian Perfection 232

A Practical Treatise
UPON
Christian Perfection.

The Introduction.

CHRISTIAN Perfection will perhaps seem to the common Reader to imply some State of Life which everyone need not aspire after ; that it is made up of such Strictnesses, Retirements, and Particularities of Devotion, as are neither necessary, nor practicable by the Generality of Christians.

But I must answer for myself, that I know of only one common Christianity, which is to be the common Means of Salvation to all Men.

If the Writers upon Christian Perfection have fancied to themselves some peculiar Degrees of Piety, or extraordinary Devotions which they call by that Name, they have not done Religion much Service, by making Christian Perfection to consist in anything, but the right Performance of our necessary Duties.

This is the Perfection which this Treatise endeavours to recommend ; a Perfection that does not consist in any singular State or Condition of Life, or in any particular Set of Duties, but in the holy and religious Conduct of ourselves in every State of Life.

It calls no one to a Cloister, but to a right and full Performance of those Duties, which are necessary for all Christians, and common to all States of Life.

I call it Perfection, for two Reasons, first, because I hope it contains a full Representation of that Height of Holiness and Purity, to which Christianity calls all its Members : Secondly, that the Title may invite the Reader to peruse it with the more Diligence, as expecting to find not only a Discourse upon moral Virtues, but a regular Draught of those holy Tempers which are the perfect Measure and Standard of Christian Piety.

Now as Perfection is here placed in the right Performance of our necessary Duties, in the Exercise of such holy Tempers as are equally necessary and equally practicable in all States of Life, as this is the highest Degree of Christian Perfection, so it is to be observed, that it is also the lowest Degree of Holiness which the Gospel alloweth. So that though no Order of Men can pretend to go higher, yet none of us can have any Security in resting in any State of Piety that is lower.

And I hope this will be taken as a Sign that I have hit upon the true State of Christian Perfection, if I show it to be such, as Men in Cloisters and religious Retirements cannot add more, and at the same time such, as Christians in all States of the World must not be content with less.

For consider, what can Christian Perfection be, but such a right Performance of all the Duties of Life, as is according to the Laws of Christ? What can it be, but a living in such holy Tempers, and acting with such Dispositions as Christianity requires? Now if this be Perfection, who can exceed it? And yet what State, or Circumstance of Life, can allow any People to fall short of it?

Let us take an Instance in some one particular Temper of Christianity. Let it be the Love of God, Christians are to love God with all their Heart and all their Strength. Now can any Order of Christians exceed in this Temper? Or is there any Order of Christians who may be allowed to be defective in it?

Now what is thus true of the Love of God, is equally true of all other religious Duties; and consequently all those holy Tempers of Heart which constitute the Perfection of Christian Piety, are Tempers equally necessary for all Christians.

As there is but one Faith and one Baptism, so there is but one Piety, and one Perfection, that is common to all Orders of Christians.

It will perhaps be here objected, that this supposes that all People may be equally good, which seems as impossible in the Nature of Things, as to suppose that all People may be equally wise.

To this it may be answered, that this is neither altogether true, nor altogether false.

For to instance in Charity, it is true that all People may be equally charitable; if we understand by Charity that Habit of the Mind which stands rightly disposed to all Acts of Charity; in this Sense all People may be equally charitable. But if we take Charity for Alms-giving, or a liberal Assistance of the Poor, in this Sense it is false, that all People may be equally charitable.

Now as it is the Hábit of the Miñd, that constitutes the Excellency of Charity, so this is the Charity to which Christians are called, and in which they may all be equally perfect.

Again, are not all People obliged to be equally honest, just, and true and faithful? In these Virtues all are to be eminent and exact in the same Degree, there are no Abatements to be made for any Rank or Order of People.

Now as to the external Exercise of these Duties, there may be great Difference. One Man may have great Business in the World, and be honest and faithful in it all; another may have small Dealings and be honest in them; but provided that there be in both of them the same Justice and Integrity of Mind, they are equally honest, though their Instances of Honesty, as to external Acts of it, are as different, as great Things are different from small.

But as it is the Habit of the Mind, which is the Justice which Religion requires, so in this Respect all People may be equally just.

Now this may serve to show us in what Respect all People may be equally virtuous, and in what Respect they cannot.

As to the external Instances or Acts of Virtue, in these they must differ according to the Difference of their Circumstances, and Condition in the World; but as Virtues are considered as Habits of the Mind, and Principles of the Heart, in this Respect they may all be equally virtuous, and are all called to the same Perfection.

A Man cannot exercise the Spirit of Martyrdom, till he is brought to the Stake; he cannot forgive his Enemies till they have done him Wrong, till he suffers from them. He cannot bear Poverty and Distress till they are brought upon him. All these Acts of Virtue depend upon outward Causes, but yet he may have a Piety and heroic Spirit equal to those who have died for their Religion. He may have that Charity of Mind which prays for its Enemies, he may have that Meekness and Resignation to the Will of God, as disposes People to bear Poverty and Distress with Patience and humble Submission to the Divine Providence.

So that they are only the external Instances and Acts of Virtue, which depend upon outward Causes and Circumstances of Life; a Man cannot give till he has something to give; but the inward Piety of the Heart and Mind which constitutes the State of Christian Perfection, depends upon no outward Circumstances. A Man need not want Charity because he has no Riches, nor be destitute of a forgiving Spirit, because he has no Persecutors to forgive.

Although therefore we neither are, nor can be all in the same Circumstances of Life, yet we are to be all in the same Spirit of Religion; though we cannot be all equal in Alms-giving, yet we are to be all alike in Charity ; though we are not all in the same State of Persecution, yet we must be all in the same Spirit that forgives and prays for its Persecutors ; though we are not all in Poverty and Distress, yet we must all be full of that Piety of Heart which produces Meekness, Patience, and Thankfulness, in Distress and Poverty.

From these Considerations it is easy to apprehend, how Persons may differ in Instances of Goodness, and yet be equally good ; for as the Perfection of Piety is the Perfection of the Heart, so the Heart may have the same Perfection in all States and Conditions of Life. And this is that Perfection which is common to all States, and to which all Orders of Christians are equally called.

Again, There may be another Difference of Virtue founded in the different Abilities of Persons ; one may have a more enlightened Mind than another, and so may see further into his Duty, and be able to practise it with greater Exactness, but then as his Goodness seems to consist in this, that he is true and faithful to what he knows to be his Duty, so if another is as true and faithful to that Measure of Light and Knowledge which God has given him, he seems to be as good a Man, as he that is true and faithful to a greater Light.

We can hardly reconcile it with the Divine Goodness to give one Man two Talents, and another five, unless we suppose that he is as high in his Master's Pleasure who makes the right use of two, as he that makes the right use of five Talents.

So that it still holds good, that it is the Perfection of the Heart, that makes the Perfection of every State of Life.

It may perhaps be further objected, that the different Degrees of Glory in another Life, supposes that good Men and such as are accepted of God, do yet differ in their Degrees of Goodness in this Life.

I grant that it does.

But then this is no Proof that all Men are not called to the same Goodness, and the same Perfection.

Perhaps it cannot be said of the best of Men that ever lived, that they performed their Duty in such Perfection in all Instances, as they might have done.

Now as it suits with the Divine Mercy to admit Men to Happiness, who have not been in every Respect so perfect as they might have been, notwithstanding that he gave them such a Rule of Perfection ; so it equally suits with the Divine Mercy to admit Men to different Degrees of Happiness, on Account of their different Conduct, though he gave them all one common Rule of Perfection.

Did not God pardon Frailties and Infirmities, the best of Men could not be rewarded. But consider now, does God's pardoning of Frailties and Infirmities in the best of Men, prove that the best of Men were not called to any other Perfection, than that to which they arrived? Does this prove that God did not call them to be strictly good, because he receives them to Mercy with some Defects in Goodness? N6, most surely.

Yet this is as good an Argument, as to say, that all Men are not called to the same State of Goodness, or Perfection, because they are admitted to different Rewards in the other Life.

For it is as right Reasoning, to say, God rewards frail and imperfect Men, therefore they were called to no higher Perfection; as to say that because God rewards different Degrees of Goodness, therefore Men are not called to one and the same Goodness.

For as God could reward none, unless he would reward such as had Failings, so their Difference in their Failings may make them Objects of his different Mercy and Rewards, though the Rule from which they failed, was common to them all.

It therefore plainly appears, that the different Degrees of Glory in another Life, are no more a Proof that God calls some Persons to different and lower States of Goodness, than others, than his pardoning Variety of Sinners is a Proof that he allowed of those Kinds of Sin, and did not require Men to avoid them. For it is full as good an Argument to say, God pardons some Sinners, therefore he did not require them to avoid such Sins, as to say God rewards different Degrees of Goodness, therefore he did not call People to higher Degrees of Goodness.

So that the different Degrees of Glory in the World to come are no Objection against this Doctrine, that all Christians are called to one and the same Piety and Perfection of Heart.

Lastly, it may be farther objected, that although the Law of God calls all Men to the same State of Perfection, yet if there are different Degrees of Glory given to different Degrees of Goodness, this shows that Men may be saved, and happy, without aspiring after all that Perfection to which they were called.

It may be answered, That this is a false Conclusion: For though it may be true, that People will be admitted to Happiness, and different Degrees of Happiness, though they have not attained to all that Perfection to which they were called; yet it does not follow that any People will be saved who did not endeavour after that Perfection. For surely it is a very different Case, to fall short of our Perfection after our best Endeavours, and to stop short of it, by not endeavouring to arrive at it. The one Practice may carry Men to a high Reward in Heaven, and the other cast them with the unprofitable Servant into outer Darkness.

There is therefore no Foundation for People to content themselves in any lower Degrees of Goodness, as being sufficient to carry them to Heaven, though not to the highest Happiness in Heaven.

For consider, thou hearest there are different Degrees of Glory; that they are proportioned to different States of Goodness in this Life, thou wilt therefore content thyself with a lower Degree of Goodness, being content to be of the lowest Order in Heaven. Thou wilt have only so much Piety as will save thee.

But consider how vainly thou reasonest; for though God giveth different Rewards, it is not in the Power of Man to take them of himself. It is not for anyone to say I will practise so much Goodness, and so take such a Reward. God seeth different Abilities and Frailties in Men, which may move his Goodness to be merciful to their different Improvements in Virtue: I grant thee that there may be a lower State of Piety which in some Persons may be accepted by God.

But consider, that though there is such a State of Piety that may be accepted, yet that it cannot be chosen, it ceases to be that State as soon as thou chooseth it.

God may be merciful to a low Estate of Piety, by reason of some pitiable Circumstances that may attend it; but as soon as thou chooseth such an Estate of Piety, it loses those pitiable Circumstances, and instead of a low State of Piety, is changed into a high State of Impiety.

So that though there are meaner Improvements in Virtue, which may make some Persons accepted by God, yet this is no Ground for Content or Satisfaction in such a State; because it ceases to be such a State, and is quite another thing, for being chosen and satisfied with.

It appears therefore from these Considerations, that notwithstanding God may accept of different Degrees of Goodness, and reward them with different Degrees of Glory in another Life, yet that all Christians are called to one and the same Perfection, and equally obliged to labour after it.

Thus much may suffice to give the Reader a general Notion of Perfection, and the Necessity of endeavouring after it.

What it is, and what holy Tempers it requires, will, I hope, be found sufficiently explained in the following Chapters.

Chapter I.

The Nature and Design of Christianity, that its sole End is to deliver us from the Misery and Disorder of this present State, and raise us to a blissful Enjoyment of the Divine Nature.

THE Wisdom of Mankind has for several Ages of the World, been inquiring into the Nature of Man, and the Nature of the World in which he is placed.

The Wants and Miseries of human Nature, and the Vanity of worldly Enjoyments, has made it difficult for the wisest Men to tell what human Happiness was, or wherein it consisted.

It has pleased the infinite Goodness of God, to satisfy all our Wants and Inquiries by a Revelation made to the World by his Son Jesus Christ.

This Revelation has laid open the great Secrets of Providence from the Creation of the World, explained the present State of Things, and given Man all the Information that is necessary to quiet his Anxieties, content him with his Condition, and lead him safely to everlasting Rest and Happiness.

It is now only necessary, that the poor Wisdom of Man do not exalt itself against God, that we suffer our Eyes to be opened by him that made them, and our Lives to be conducted by him, in whom we live, move, and have our Being.

For Light is now come into the World, if Men are but willing to come out of Darkness.

As Happiness is the sole End of all our Labours, so this Divine Revelation aims at nothing else.

It gives us right and satisfactory Notions of ourselves, of our true Good and real Evil; it shows us the true State of our Condition, both our Vanity and Excellence, our Greatness and Meanness, our Felicity and Misery.

Before this, Man was a mere Riddle to himself, and his Condition full of Darkness and Perplexity. A restless Inhabitant of a miserable disordered World, walking in a vain Shadow, and disquieting himself in vain.

But this Light has dispersed all the Anxiety of his vain Conjectures; it has brought us acquainted with God, and by adding Heaven to Earth, and Eternity to Time, has opened such a glorious View of Things, as makes Man even in his present Condition, full of a Peace of God which passes all Understanding.

This Revelation acquaints us, that we have a Spirit within us, that was created after the Divine Image, that this Spirit is now in a fallen corrupt Condition, that the Body in which it is placed, is its Grave, or Sepulchre, where it is enslaved to fleshly Thoughts, blinded with false Notions of Good and Evil, and dead to all Taste and Relish of its true Happiness.

It teaches us, that the World in which we live, is also in a disordered irregular State, and cursed for the Sake of Man; that it is no longer the Paradise that God made it, but the Remains of a drowned World, full of Marks of God's Displeasure, and the Sin of its Inhabitants.

That it is a mere Wilderness, a State of Darkness, a Vale of Misery, where Vice and Madness, Dreams and Shadows, variously please, agitate, and torment the short, miserable Lives of Men.

Devils also, and evil Spirits, have here their Residence, promoting the Works of Darkness, and wandering up and down seeking whom they may devour.

So that the Condition of Man in his natural State, seems to be, as if a Person sick of a Variety of Diseases, knowing neither his Distempers, nor his Cure, should be enclosed in some Place, where he could hear, or see, or feel, or taste of nothing, but what tended to inflame his Disorders.

The Excellency therefore of the Christian Religion appears in this, that it puts an End to this State of Things, blots out all the Ideas of worldly Wisdom, brings the World itself to Ashes, and creates all anew. It calls Man from an animal Life and earthly Conversation, to be born again of the Holy Ghost, and be made a Member of the Kingdom of God.

It crushes into nothing the Concerns of this Life, condemns it as a State of Vanity and Darkness, and leads Man to a Happiness with God in the Realms of Light.

It proposes the Purification of our Souls, the enlivening us with the Divine Spirit; it sets before us new Goods and Evils, and forms us to a glorious Participation of the Divine Nature.

This is the one sole End of Christianity, to lead us from all Thoughts of Rest and Repose here, to separate us from the World and worldly Tempers, to deliver us from the Folly of our Passions, the Slavery of our own Natures, the Power of evil Spirits, and unite us to God, the true Fountain of all real Good. This is the mighty Change which Christianity aims at, to put us into a new State, reform our whole Natures, purify our Souls, and make them the Inhabitants of heavenly and immortal Bodies.

It does not leave us to grovel on in the Desires of the Flesh, to cast about for worldly Happiness, and wander in Darkness and Exile from God, but prepares us for the true Enjoyment of a divine Life.

The Manner by which it changes this whole State of Things, and raises us to an Union with God, is equally great and wonderful.

I am the Way, the Truth and the Life, saith our blessed Saviour, no Man cometh unto the Father but by me.

As all Things were at first created by the Son of God, and without him was not anything made that was made, so are all Things again restored and redeemed by the same Divine Person.

As nothing could come into Being without him, so nothing can enter into a State of Happiness or Enjoyment of God, but by him.

The Price and Dignity of this Redemption at once confounds the Pride, and relieves the Misery of Man. How fallen must he be from God, how disordered and odious his Nature, that should need so great a Mediator to recommend his Repentance!— And on the other Hand, how full of Comfort, that so high a Method, so stupendous a Means should be taken, to restore him to a State of Peace and Favour with God!

This is the true Point of View in which every Christian is to behold himself. He is to overlook the poor Projects of human Life, and consider himself as a Creature through his natural Corruption falling into a State of endless Misery, but by the Mercy of God redeemed to a Condition of everlasting Felicity.

All the Precepts and Doctrines of the Gospel are founded on these two great Truths, the deplorable Corruption of human Nature, and its new Birth in Christ Jesus.

The one includes all the Misery, the other all the Happiness of Man.

It is on these great Doctrines, that the whole Frame of Christianity is built, forbidding only such Things as fasten us to the Disorders of Sin, and commanding only those Duties which lead us into the Liberty and Freedom of the Sons of God.

The Corruption of our Nature makes Mortification, Self-denial, and the Death of our Bodies necessary. Because human Nature must be thus unmade, Flesh and Blood must be thus changed, before it can enter into the Kingdom of Heaven.

Our new Birth makes the Reception of God's Spirit, and the Participation of the holy Sacraments necessary, to form us to that Life to which the Resurrection of Jesus Christ has entitled us.

So that would we think and act and live like Christians, we must act suitably to these Terms of our Condition, fearing and avoiding all the Motions of our corrupted Nature, cherishing the secret Inspirations of the Holy Spirit, opening our Minds for the Reception of the Divine Light, and pressing after all the Graces and Perfections of our new Birth.

We must behave ourselves conformably to this double Capacity, we must fear, and watch, and pray, like Men that are always in Danger of eternal Death, and we must believe and hope, labour and aspire, like Christians, that are called to fight the good Fight of Faith, and lay hold on eternal Life.

This knowledge of ourselves, makes human Life a State of infinite Importance, placed upon so dreadful a Point betwixt two such Eternities.

Well might our blessed Saviour say to one, that begged first to go and bury his Father, Follow me, and let the Dead bury their Dead.

For what is all the Bustle and Hurry of the World, but dead Show, and its greatest Agents, but dead Men, when compared with the State of Greatness, that real Life, to which the Followers of Christ are redeemed?

Had we been made only for this World, worldly Wisdom had been our highest Wisdom; but seeing Christianity has redeemed us to a contrary State, since all its Goods are in Opposition to this Life, worldly Wisdom is now our greatest Foolishness.

It is now our only Wisdom to understand our new State aright, to let its Goods and Evils take Possession of our Hearts, and conduct ourselves by the Principles of our Redemption.

The Nature and Terms of our Christian Calling is of that Concern, as to deserve all our Thoughts, and is indeed only to be perceived by great Seriousness and Attention of Mind.

The Christian State is an invisible Life in the Spirit of God, supported not by sensible Goods, but the spiritual Graces of Faith and Hope; so that the natural Man, especially while busied in earthly Cares and Enjoyments, easily forgets that great and heavenly Condition in which Religion places him.

The Changes which Christianity maketh in the present State of Things, are all invisible, its Goods and Evils, its Dignities and Advantages, which are the only true Standards of all our Actions, are not subject to the Knowledge of our Senses.

In God we live, and move, and have our Being, but how unseen, how unfelt is all this!

Christ is the Lamb slain from the Foundation of the World, the true Light, that lighteth every Man that cometh into the World. He is the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and End of all Things. The whole Creation subsists in him and by him; nothing is in any Order, nor any Person in any Favour with God, but by this great Mediator. But how invisible, how unknown to all our Senses, is this State of Things!

The Apostle tells us, that we Christians are *come unto Mount Sion, and unto the City of the Living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable Company of Angels, and to the general Assembly of the First-born, which are written in Heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the Spirits of just Men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Covenant, &c.

But our Senses see or feel nothing of this State of Glory, they only show us a Society amongst vain and worldly Men, labouring and contending for the poor Enjoyments of a vain World.

We are Temples of the Holy Ghost, consecrated to God, Members of Christ's mystical Body, of his flesh and of his Bones, receiving Life, Spirit, and Motion from him our Head.

But our Senses see no farther than our Parents and Kindred according to the Flesh, and fix our Hearts to earthly Friendships and Relations.

Religion turns our whole Life into a Sacrifice to God, a State of Probation, from whence we must all appear before the Judgment-Seat of Christ, that everyone may receive the Things done in his Body, &c.†

But our Senses, the Maxims of this Life, and the Spirit of the World, teach quite another Turn of Mind; to enjoy the good Things of Life as our Portion, to seek after Riches and Honours, and to dread nothing so much as Poverty, Disgrace, and Persecution. Well may this Life be deemed a State of Darkness, since it thus clouds and covers all the true Appearances of Things, and keeps our Minds insensible, and unaffected with Matters of such infinite Moment.

We must observe, that in Scripture Christianity is constantly represented to us, as a Redemption from the Slavery and Corruption of our Nature, and a raising us to a nearer Enjoyment of the Divine Glory.

It knows of no Misery, but the Death and Misery which Sin has made, nor of any Happiness, but the Gifts and Graces of the Holy Ghost, which form us to a greater Likeness of God.

Thus saith the Apostle, Jesus Christ gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all Iniquity.‡

He was manifested to take away our Sins.§

* Heb. xii. 22.

† 2 Cor. v. 9.

‡ Tit. ii. 13.

§ 1 John iii. 5.

Who gave himself for our Sins, that he might deliver us from this evil World.

The same Scriptures teach us, that as we are redeemed from this State of Sin, so we are raised to a new Life in Christ, to a Participation of the Divine Nature, and a Fellowship with him in Glory.

Thus our blessed Saviour prayeth for all his Followers, *That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us. And the Glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one. I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.

Happy he that hath Ears to hear, and a Heart to feel the Majesty and Glory of this Description of our new Life in Christ!

For surely could we understand what our Saviour conceived, when he sent up this Prayer to God, our Hearts would be always praying, and our Souls ever aspiring after this State of Perfection, this Union with Christ in God.

To proceed, In my Father's House, saith Christ, are many Mansions. I go to prepare a Place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also.†

The Apostle tells us, that as we have borne the Image of the Earthly, we shall also bear the Image of the Heavenly.‡

And that when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in Glory.§

Beloved, saith St. John, now we are the Sons of God, and it doth not yet appear, what we shall be: but we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.¶

I cannot leave this Passage, without adding the Apostle's Conclusion to it. And every Man that hath this Hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

Which teaches us this Lesson, that no Man, whatever he may think of his Christian Improvement, can be said to have this Hope in him, unless he shows it by such a Purification of himself, as may resemble the Purity of Christ.—But to return.

St. Paul thus breaks forth into the Praises of God, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual Blessings in heavenly Places in Christ.¶¶ And again, *God, who is rich in Mercy, for his great Love where-with he loved us. Even when we were dead in Sins, hath quickened us together with Christ; and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly Places in Christ Jesus.

upon Christian Perfection. 17

These Passages teach us, that Christianity introduceth us into a new State, made up of invisible Goods, and spiritual Blessings, that it so alters our Condition, as to give us a new Rank and Degree even in this Life; which the Apostle expresses by making us sit together in heavenly Places.

So that though we are still in the Flesh, yet, as the Apostle saith, need we know no Man after the Flesh; though we are still Inhabitants of this Vale of Misery, yet are we ranked and placed in a certain Order amongst heavenly Beings in Christ Jesus.

Would we therefore know our true Rank and Condition, and what Place we belong to, in the Order of Beings, we must search after a Life that is hid with Christ in God. We must consider ourselves as Parts of Christ's mystical Body, and as Members of a Kingdom of Heaven. In vain do we consider the Beauty and Strength of our Bodies, our Alliances with Men, the Privileges of Birth, and the Distinctions of this World, for these Things no more constitute the State of human Life, than rich Coffins, or beautiful Monuments, constitute the State of the Dead.

We justly pity the last poor Efforts of human Greatness, when we see a breathless Carcass lying in State. It appears to us to be so far from any real Honour, that it rather looks like ridiculing the Misery of our Nature. But were Religion to form our Judgments, the Life of a proud, voluptuous, and sensual Man, though shining in all the Splendour of the World, would give us no higher an Idea of human Dignity, than that of a poor Corpse laid in State.

For a Sinner, when glorying in the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, and the Pride of Life, shows us a more shocking Sight of a Misery ridiculed, than any Pageantry that can expose the Dead.

We have an Apostle's Authority to say, that he who liveth in Pleasure is dead while he liveth.

This shows us, that when we enquire what our Life is, or wherein it consists, we must think of something higher than the Vigour of our Blood, the Gaiety of our Spirits, or the Enjoyment of sensible Pleasures; since these, though the allowed Signs of living Men, are often undeniable Proofs of dead Christians.

When therefore we would truly know what our Life, our State, our Dignity, our Good, or our Evil is, we must look at nothing that is temporal, worldly, or sensible. We may as well dig in the Earth for Wisdom, as look at Flesh and Blood, to see what we are, or at worldly Enjoyments, to find what we want, or at temporal Evils to see what we have to fear.

Our blessed Saviour put an absolute End to all Enquiries of this kind, when he said, *Be not afraid of them that kill the Body, and after that have no more that they can do.

Here our Bodies and all bodily Enjoyments are at one Dash struck out of the Account of Happiness, and the present State of Things made so very low, and insignificant, that he who can only deprive us of them, has not Power enough to deserve our Fear.

We must therefore, if we would conceive our true State, our real Good and Evil, look further than the Dim of Eyes of Flesh can carry our Views, we must, with the Eyes of Faith, penetrate into the invisible World, the World of Spirits, and consider our Order and Condition amongst them, a World which (as St. John speaks) has no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon, to shine in it, for the Glory of God doth lighten it, and the Light of the Lamb. For it is there, amongst external Beings, that we must take an eternal Fellowship, or fall into a Kingdom of Darkness and everlasting Misery. ✓

Christianity is so divine in its Nature, so noble in its Ends, so extensive in its Views, that it has no lesser Subjects than these, to entertain our Thoughts.

It buries our Bodies, burns the present World, triumphs over Death by a general Resurrection, and opens all into an eternal State.

It never considers us in any other Respect, than as fallen Spirits; it disregards the Distinctions of human Society, and proposes nothing to our Fears, but eternal Misery, nor anything to our Hopes, but an endless Enjoyment of the Divine Nature.

This is the great and important Condition in which Christianity has placed us, above our Bodies, above the World, above Death, to be present at the Dissolution of all Things, to see the Earth in Flames, and the Heavens wrapt up like a Scroll, to stand at the general Resurrection, to appear at the universal Judgment, and to live for ever, when all that our Eyes have seen, is passed away and gone.

Take upon thee therefore, a Spirit and Temper suitable to this Greatness of thy Condition; remember that thou art an eternal Spirit, that thou art for a few Months and Years in a State of Flesh and Blood, only to try, whether thou shalt be for ever happy with God, or fall into everlasting Misery with the Devil.

Thou wilt often hear of other Concerns, and other Greatness in this World; thou wilt see every Order of Men, every Family, every Person pursuing some fancied Happiness of his own, as if

* Luke xii. 4.

upon Christian Perfection. 19

the World had not only Happiness, but a particular kind of Happiness for all its Inhabitants.

But when thou seest this State of human Life, fancy that thou sawest all the World asleep, the Prince no longer a Prince, the Beggar no longer begging, but every Man sleeping out of his proper State, some happy, others tormented, and all changing their Condition as fast as one foolish Dream could succeed another.

When thou hast seen this, thou hast seen all that the World awake can do for thee ; if thou wilt, thou mayst go to sleep for awhile, thou mayst lie down and dream ; for, be as happy as the World can make thee, all is but sleeping and dreaming, and what is still worse, it is like sleeping in a Ship when thou should be pumping out the Water ; or dreaming thou art a Prince, when thou shouldst be redeeming thyself from Slavery.

Now this is no imaginary Flight of a melancholy Fancy, that too much exceeds the Nature of Things, but a sober Reflection justly suited to the Vanity of worldly Enjoyments.

For if the Doctrines of Christianity are true, if thou art that Creature, that fallen Spirit, that immortal Nature which Religion teaches us, if thou art to meet Death, Resurrection, and Judgment, as the Forerunners of an eternal State, what are all the little Flashes of Pleasure, the changing Appearances of worldly Felicities, but so many Sorts of Dreams ?

How canst thou talk of the Happiness of Riches, the Advantages of Fortune, the Pleasures of Apparel, of State, and Equipage, without being in a Dream ?

Is the Beggar asleep, when he fancies he is building himself fine Houses ? Is the Prisoner in a Dream, when he imagines himself in open Fields, and fine Groves ? And canst thou think that thy immortal Spirit is awake, whilst it is delighting itself in the Shadows and Bubbles of worldly Happiness ?

For if it be true, that Man is upon his Trial, if the Trial is for Eternity, if Life is but a Vapour, what is there that deserves a serious Thought, but how to get well out of the World, and make it a right Passage to our eternal State ?

How can we prove that we are awake, that our Eyes are open, but by seeing, and feeling, and living according to these important Circumstances of our Life ?

If a Man should endeavour to please thee, with fine Descriptions of the Riches, and Pleasures, and Dignities, of the World in the Moon, adding that its Air is always serene, and its Seasons always pleasant, would'st thou not think it a sufficient Answer, to say, I am not to live there ?

When thy own false Heart is endeavouring to please itself with worldly Expectations, the Joy of this or that way of Life, is it not as good a Reproof, to say to thyself, I am not to stay here?

For where is the Difference betwixt an earthly Happiness, from which thou art to be separated for ever, and a Happiness in the Moon, to which thou art never to go? Thou art to be for ever separated from the Earth, thou art to be eternal, when the Earth itself is lost, is it not therefore the same Vanity to project for Happiness on Earth, as to propose a Happiness in the Moon? For as thou art never to go to the one, so thou art to be eternally separated from the other.

Indeed the Littleness and Insignificancy of the boasted Honours of human Life, appears sufficiently from the Things themselves, without comparing them to the Subjects of Religion.

For see what they are in themselves.

Ahasuerus, that great Prince of the eastern World, puts a Question to Haman, his chief Minister of State, he asks him, *what shall be done unto the Man, whom the King delighteth to honour?

Haman imagining that he was the Person whom the King had in his Thoughts, answered in these Words,

Let the royal Apparel be brought which the King useth to wear, and the Horse that the King rideth upon, and the Crown Royal which is set upon his Head; and let this Apparel and Horse be delivered to the Hand of one of the King's most noble Princes, that they may array the Man withal, whom the King delighteth to honour, and bring him on horseback through the Street of the City, and proclaim before him, thus shall it be done to the Man whom the King delighteth to honour.

Here you see the Sum total of worldly Honours.

An ambitious Haman cannot think of anything greater to ask; Ahasuerus, the greatest Monarch in the World, has nothing greater to give to his greatest Favourite; powerful as he is, he can only give such Honours as these.

Yet it is to be observed, that if a poor Nurse was to please her Child, she must talk to it in the same Language, she must please it with the same fine Things, and gratify its Pride with Honours of the same kind.

Yet these are the mighty Things, for which Men forget God, forget their Immortality, forget the Difference betwixt an Eternity in Heaven, and an Eternity in Hell.

There needs no great Understanding, no mighty Depth of Thought, to see through the Vanity of all worldly Enjoyments;

* Esther vi. 6.

upon Christian Perfection. 21

do but talk of them, and you will be forced to talk of Gewgaws, of Ribbons, and Feathers.

Every man sees the Littleness of all Sorts of Honours, but those which he is looking after himself.

A private English Gentleman, that is half distracted till he has got some little Distinction, does at the same time despise the highest Honours of other Countries, and would not leave his own Condition, to possess the ridiculous Greatness of an Indian King. He sees the Vanity and Falseness of their Honours, but forgets that all Honour placed in external Things, is equally vain and false.

He does not consider that the Difference of Greatness, is only the Difference of Flowers and Feathers; and that they who are dressing themselves with Beads, have as just a Taste of what adorns their Persons, as they who place the same Pride in Diamonds.

When we read of an eastern Prince, that is too great to feed himself, and thinks it a Piece of Grandeur to have other People put his Meat into his Mouth, we despise the Folly of his Pride.

But might we not as well despise the Folly of their Pride, who are ashamed to use their Legs, and think it adds to their State, to be removed from one Place to another by other People.

For he that thinks it stately to be carried, and mean to walk on Foot, has as true Notions of Greatness, as he who is too haughty to put his Meat in his own Mouth.

Again, It is the Manner of some Countries in the Burial of their Dead, to put a Staff, and Shoes, and Money, in the Sepulchre along with the Corpse.

We justly censure the Folly and Ignorance of such a poor Contrivance to assist the Dead; but if we did but as truly understand what Life is, we should see as much to ridicule in the poor Contrivances to assist the Living.

For how many Things in Life do People labour after, break their Rest and Peace to get, which yet when gotten, are of as much real Use to them, as a Staff and Shoes to a Corpse under Ground? They are always adding something to their Life, which is only like adding another Pair of Shoes to a Body in the Grave.

Thou mayst hire more Servants, new paint thy Rooms, make more fine Beds, eat out of Plate, and put on richer Apparel, and these will help thee to be happy, as golden Staves, or painted Shoes, will help a dead Man to walk.

See here therefore the true Nature of all worldly Show and Figure, it will make us as great as those are, who are dreaming that they are Kings, as rich as those who fancy that they have Estates in the Moon, and as happy as those, who are buried with Staves in their Hands.

Now this is not carrying Matters too high, or imposing upon ourselves with any Subtleties of Reasoning, or Sound of Words; for the Value of worldly Riches and Honours can no more be too much lessened, than the Riches and Greatness of the other Life can be too much exalted. We don't cheat ourselves out of any real Happiness, by looking upon all worldly Honours as Bubbles, any more than we cheat ourselves by securing Honours that are solid and eternal.

There is no more Happiness lost by not being great and rich, as those are amongst whom we live, than by not being dressed and adorned as they are, who live in China or Japan.

Thou art no happier for having painted Ceilings, and marble Walls in thy House, than if the same Finery was in thy Stables; if thou eatest upon Plate, it maketh thee just as happy, as if thy Horses wore silver Shoes.

To disregard Gold, Jewels, and Equipage, is no more running away from any real Good, than if we only despised a Feather or a Garland of Flowers.

So that he who condemns all the external Show and State of Life as equally vain, is no more deceived, or carried to too high a Contempt for the Things of this Life, than he that only condemns the Vanity of the vainest Things.

You don't think yourself imposed upon, or talked out of any real Happiness, when you are persuaded not to be as vain and ambitious as Alexander.

And can you think that you are imposed upon, or drawn from any real Good, by being persuaded to be as meek and lowly as the holy Jesus?

There is as much sober Judgment, as sound Sense in conforming to the Fulness of Christ's Humility, as in avoiding the Height and Extravagance of Alexander's Vanity.

Don't therefore think to compound Matters, or that it is enough to avoid the Vanity of the vainest Men. There is as much Folly in seeking little as great Honours; as great a Mistake in needless Expense upon thyself, as upon anything else. Thou must not only be less vain and ambitious than an Alexander, but practise the Humility of the blessed Jesus.

If thou rememberest that the whole Race of Mankind are a Race of fallen Spirits, that pass through this World as an Arrow passes through the Air, thou wilt soon perceive, that all Things here are equally great and equally little, and that there is no Wisdom or Happiness, but in getting away to the best Advantage.

If thou rememberest that this Life is but a Vapour, that thou art in the Body, only to be holy, humble, and heavenly-minded, that thou standest upon the Brinks of Death, Resurrection, and Judgment, and that these great Things will suddenly come upon thee, like a Thief in the Night, thou wilt see a Vanity in all the Gifts of Fortune, greater than any Words can express.

Do but therefore know thyself, as Religion has made thee known, do but see thyself in the Light, which Christ has brought into the World, and then thou wilt see that nothing concerns thee, but what concerns an everlasting Spirit that is going to God; and that there are no Enjoyments here that are worth a Thought, but such as may make thee more perfect in those holy Tempers which will carry thee to Heaven.

Chapter II.

Christianity requires a Change of Nature : a new Life perfectly devoted to God.

CHRISTIANITY is not a School, for the teaching of moral Virtue, the polishing our Manners, or forming us to live a Life of this World with Decency and Gentility.

It is deeper and more divine in its Designs, and has much nobler Ends than these, it implies an entire Change of Life, a Dedication of ourselves, our Souls and Bodies unto God, in the strictest and highest Sense of the Words.

Our blessed Saviour came into the World not to make any Composition with it, or to divide Things between Heaven and Earth, but to make War with every State of Life, to put an End to the Designs of Flesh and Blood, and to show us, that we must either leave this World, to become Sons of God, or by enjoying it, take our Portion amongst Devils and damned Spirits.

Death is not more certainly a Separation of our Souls from our Bodies, than the Christian Life is a Separation of our Souls from worldly Tempers, vain Indulgences, and unnecessary Cares.

No sooner are we baptized, ie. as believers, for we are not to be as new and holy Persons, that are entered upon a new State of Things, that are devoted to God, and have renounced all, to be Fellow-heirs with Christ, and Members of his Kingdom.

There is no Alteration of Life, no Change of Condition, that implies half so much, as that Alteration which Christianity introduceth.

It is a Kingdom of Heaven begun upon Earth, and by being made Members of it, we are entered into a new State of Goods and Evils.

Eternity altereth the Face and Nature of everything in this World, Life is only a Trial, Prosperity becometh Adversity, Pleasure a Mischief, and nothing a Good, but as it increaseth our Hope, purifieth our Natures, and prepareth us to receive higher Degrees of Happiness.

Let us now see what it is, to enter into this State of Redemption.

Our own Church in Conformity with Scripture, and the Practice of the purest Ages, makes it necessary for us to renounce the Pomps and Vanities of the World, before we can be received as Members of Christian Communion.

Did we enough consider this, we should find, that whenever we yield ourselves up to the Pleasures, Profits, and Honours of this Life, that we turn Apostates, break our Covenant with God, and go back from the express Conditions, on which we were admitted into the Communion of Christ's Church.

If we consult either the Life or Doctrines of our Saviour, we shall find that Christianity is a Covenant, that contains only the Terms of changing and resigning this World, for another, that is to come.

It is a State of Things that wholly regards Eternity, and knows of no other Goods, and Evils, but such as relate to another Life.

It is a Kingdom of Heaven, that has no other Interests in this World, than as it takes its Members out of it, and when the Number of the Elect is complete, this World will be consumed with Fire, as having no other Reason of its Existence than the furnishing Members for that blessed Society which is to last for ever.

I cannot here omit observing the Folly and Vanity of human Wisdom, which full of imaginary Projects, pleases itself with its mighty Prosperities, its lasting Establishments in a World doomed to Destruction, and which is to last no longer, than till a sufficient Number are redeemed out of it.

Did we see a Number of Animals hastening to take up their Apartments, and contending for the best Places, in a Building that was to be beat down, as soon as its old Inhabitants were got safe out, we should see a Contention full as wise, as the Wisdom of worldly Ambition.

upon Christian Perfection. 25

To return. Christianity is therefore a Course of holy Discipline, solely fitted to the Cure and Recovery of fallen Spirits, and intends such a Change in our Nature, as may raise us to a nearer Union with God, and qualify us for such high Degrees of Happiness.

It is no Wonder therefore, if it makes no Provision for the Flesh, if it condemns the Maxims of human Wisdom, and indulges us in no worldly Projects, since its very End, is, to redeem us from all the Vanity, Vexation, and Misery, of this State of Things, and to place us in a Condition, where we shall be Fellow-heirs with Christ, and as the Angels of God.

That Christianity requires a Change of Nature, a new Life perfectly devoted to God, is plain from the Spirit and Tenor of the Gospel.

The Saviour of the World saith, *that except a Man be born again, of the Water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. We are told, that to as many as received him, to them he gave Power, to become the Sons of God, which were born, not of Blood, nor of the Will of the Flesh, nor of the Will of Man, but of God.†

These Words plainly teach us, that Christianity implies some great Change of Nature, that as our Birth was to us the Beginning of a new Life, and brought us into a Society of earthly Enjoyments, so Christianity, is another Birth, that brings us into a Condition altogether as new, as when we first saw the Light.

We begin again to be, we enter upon fresh Terms of Life, have new Relations, new Hopes and Fears, and an entire Change of everything that can be called good or evil.

This new Birth, this Principle of a new Life, is the very Essence and Soul of Christianity, it is the Seal of the Promises, the Mark of our Sonship, the Earnest of the Inheritance, the Security of our Hope, and the Foundation of all our Acceptance with God.

He that is in Christ, saith the Apostle, is a new Creature, and if any Man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.‡

And again, He who is joined to the Lord, is one Spirit.§

It is not therefore any Number of moral Virtues, no partial Obedience, no Modes of Worship, no external Acts of Adoration, no Articles of Faith, but a new Principle of Life, an entire Change of Temper, that makes us true Christians.

If the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the Dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the Dead, shall also quicken

* John iii. 5.

† John i. 12.

‡ Rom. viii. 9.

§ 1 Cor. vi. 17.

your mortal Bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the Sons of God.*

Since therefore the Scriptures thus absolutely require a Life suitable to the Spirit and Temper of Jesus Christ, since they allow us not the Privilege of the Sons of God, unless we live and act according to the Spirit of God; it is past Doubt, that Christianity requires an entire Change of Nature and Temper, a Life devoted perfectly to God.

For what can imply a greater Change, than from a carnal to a spiritual Mind? What can be more contrary, than the Works of the Flesh are to the Works of the Spirit? It is the Difference of Heaven and Hell.

Light and Darkness are but faint Resemblances of that great Contrariety, that is betwixt the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of the World.

Its Wisdom is Foolishness, its Friendship is Enmity with God.

All that is in the World, the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, and the Pride of Life, is not of the Father.†

Worldly Opinions, proud Reasonings, fleshly Cares, and earthly Projects, are all so many false Judgments, mere Lies, and we know who is the Father of Lies.

For this Reason, the Scripture makes the Devil the God and Prince of this World, because the Spirit and Temper which reigns there, is entirely from him; and so far as we are governed by the Wisdom and Temper of the World, so far are we governed by that evil Power of Darkness.

If we would see more of this Contrariety, and what a Change our new Life in Christ implies, let us consider what it is to be born of God.

St. John tells us one sure Mark of our new Birth, in the following Words, He that is born of God, overcometh the World.‡

So that the new Birth, or the Christian Life, is considered with Opposition to the World, and all that is in it, its vain Cares, its false Glories, proud Designs, and sensual Pleasures, if we have overcome these, so as to be governed by other Cares, other Glories, other Designs, and other Pleasures, then are we born of God. Then is the Wisdom of this World, and the Friendship of this World, turned into the Wisdom and Friendship of God, which will for ever keep us Heirs of God, and Joint-heirs with Christ.

Again, the same Apostle helps us to another Sign of our new Life in God. Whosoever, saith he, is born of God, doth not

* Rom. viii. 11.

† 1 John ii. 16.

‡ 1 Ep. v. 4.

upon Christian Perfection. 27

*commit Sin, for his Seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

This is not to be understood, as if he that was born of God, was therefore in an absolute State of Perfection, and incapable afterwards of falling into anything that was sinful.

It only means, that he that is born of God, is possessed of a Temper and Principle, that makes him utterly hate and labour to avoid all Sin ; he is therefore said not to commit Sin, in such a Sense as a Man may be said not to do that, which it is his constant Care and Principle to prevent being done.

He cannot sin, as it may be said of a Man that has no Principle but Covetousness, that he cannot do Things that are expensive, because it is his constant Care and Labour to be sparing, and if Expense happen, it is contrary to his Intention ; it is his Pain and Trouble, and he returns to saving with a double Diligence.

Thus is he that is born of God, Purity and Holiness is his only Aim, and he is more incapable of having any sinful Intentions, than the Miser is incapable of generous Expense, and if he finds himself in any Sin, it is his greatest Pain and Trouble, and he labours after Holiness with a double Zeal.

This it is to be born of God, when we have a Temper and Mind so entirely devoted to Purity and Holiness, that it may be said of us in a just Sense, that we cannot commit Sin. When Holiness is such a Habit in our Minds, so directs and forms our Designs, as Covetousness and Ambition directs and governs the Actions of such Men, as are governed by no other Principles, then are we alive in God, and living Members of the mystical Body of his Son Jesus Christ.

This is our true Standard and Measure by which we are to judge of ourselves ; we are not true Christians unless we are born of God, and we are not born of God, unless it can be said of us in this Sense that we cannot commit Sin.

When by an inward Principle of Holiness we stand so disposed to all Degrees of Virtue, as the ambitious Man stands disposed to all Steps of Greatness, when we hate and avoid all Kinds of Sins, as the covetous Man hates and avoids all Sorts of Loss and Expense, then are we such Sons of God, as cannot commit Sin.

We must therefore examine into the State and Temper of our Minds, and see whether we be thus changed in our Natures, thus born again to a new Life, whether we be so spiritual, as to have overcome the World, so holy, as that we cannot commit Sin; since it is the undeniable Doctrine of Scripture, that this State of Mind, this new Birth is as necessary to Salvation, as the believing in Jesus Christ.

To be eminent therefore for any particular Virtue, to detest and avoid several Kinds of Sins, is just nothing at all; its Excellency (as the Apostle saith of some particular Virtues) is but as sounding Brass and a tinkling Cymbal.

But when the Temper and Taste of our Soul is entirely changed, when we are renewed in the Spirit of our Minds, and are full of a Relish and Desire of all Godliness, of a Fear and Abhorrence of all Evil, then, as St. John speaks, *may we know that we are of the Truth, and shall assure our Hearts before him, then shall we know, that he abideth in us by the Spirit, which he hath given us.

We have already seen two Marks of those that are born of God, the one is, that they have overcome the World, the other, that they do not commit Sin.

To these I shall only add a third, which is given us by Christ himself, I say unto you, love your Enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you, that you may be the Children of your Father which is in Heaven.†

Well may a Christian be said to be a new Creature, and Christianity an entire Change of Temper, since such a Disposition as this, is made so necessary, that without it, we cannot be the Children of our Father which is in Heaven; and if we are not his Children, neither is he our Father.

It is not therefore enough, that we love our Friends, Benefactors, and Relations, but we must love like God, if we will show that we are born of him. We must like him have a universal Love and Tenderness for all Mankind, imitating that Love, which would that all Men should be saved.

God is Love, and this we are to observe as the true Standard of ourselves, that he who dwelleth in God, dwelleth in Love; and consequently he who dwelleth not in Love, dwelleth not in God.

It is impossible therefore to be a true Christian, and an Enemy at the same time.

Mankind has no Enemy but the Devil, and they who partake of his malicious and ill-natured Spirit.

There is perhaps no Duty of Religion that is so contrary to Flesh and Blood as this, but as difficult as it may seem to a worldly Mind, it is still necessary, and will easily be performed by such as are in Christ, new Creatures.

For take but away earthly Goods and Evils, and you take away all Hatred and Malice, for they are the only Causes of those base Tempers. He therefore that hath overcome the World, hath overcome all the Occasions of Envy and ill Nature; for having put himself in this Situation, he can pity, pray for, and forgive all his Enemies, who want less Forgiveness from him, than he expects from his heavenly Father.

* 1 Ep. iii. 19, 24.

† Matt. v. 44.

Let us here awhile contemplate the Height and Depth of Christian Holiness, and that god-like Spirit which our Religion requireth. This Duty of universal Love and Benevolence, even to our bitterest Enemies, may serve to convince us, that to be Christians, we must be born again, change our very Natures, and have no governing Desire of our Souls, but that of being made like God.

For we cannot exercise, or delight in this Duty, till we rejoice and delight only in increasing our Likeness to God.

We may therefore from this, as well as from what has been before observed, be infallibly assured, that Christianity does not consist in any partial Amendment of our Lives, any particular moral Virtues, but in an entire Change of our natural Temper, a Life wholly devoted to God.

To proceed,

This same Doctrine is farther taught by our blessed Saviour, when speaking of little Children, he saith, Suffer them to come unto me, for of such is the Kingdom of God. And again, *Who-soever shall not receive the Kingdom of God, as a little Child, shall in no wise enter therein.

If we are not resolved to deceive ourselves, to have Eyes and see not, Ears and hear not, we must perceive that these Words imply some mighty Change in our Nature.

For what can make us more contrary to ourselves, than to lay aside all our manly Wisdom, our mature Judgments, our boasted Abilities, and become Infants in Nature and Temper, before we can partake of this heavenly State?

We reckon it Change enough, from Babes to be Men, and surely it must signify as great an Alteration, to be reduced from Men to a State of Infancy.

One peculiar Condition of Infants is this, that they have everything to learn, they are to be taught by others what they are to hope and fear, and wherein their proper Happiness consists.

It is in this Sense, that we are chiefly to become as Infants, to be as though that we had everything to learn, and suffer ourselves to be taught what we are to choose, and what to avoid; to pretend to no Wisdom of our own, but be ready to pursue that Happiness which God in Christ proposes to us, and to accept it with such Simplicity of Mind, as Children, that have nothing of our own to oppose to it.

But now, is this Infant-temper thus essential to the Christian Life? Does the Kingdom of God consist only of such as are so affected? Let this then be added as another undeniable Proof, that Christianity requires a new Nature, and Temper of Mind; and that this Temper is such, as having renounced the Prejudices of Life, the Maxims of human Wisdom, yields itself with a Child-like Submission and Simplicity to be entirely governed by the Precepts and Doctrines of Christ.

Craft and Policy, selfish Cunning, proud Abilities, and vain Endowments, have no Admittance into this holy State of Society with Christ and God.

The Wisdom of this World, the Intrigues of Life, the Designs of Greatness and Ambition, lead to another Kingdom, and he that would follow Christ, must empty himself of this vain Furniture, and put on the meek Ornaments of infant and undesigning Simplicity.

*Where is the Wise? Where is the Scribe? Where is the Disputer of this World? saith the Apostle, Hath not God made foolish the Wisdom of this World?

If therefore we will partake of the Wisdom of God, we must think and judge of this World, and its most boasted Gifts, as the Wisdom of God judgeth of them; we must deem them Foolishness, and with undivided Hearts labour after one Wisdom, one Perfection, one Happiness, in being entirely devoted to God.

This Comparison of the Spirit of a Christian, to the Temper of Children, may also serve to recommend to us a certain Simplicity of Manners, which is a great Ornament of Behaviour, and is indeed always the Effect of a Heart entirely devoted to God.

For as the Tempers of Men are made designing and deceitful, by their having many and secret Ends to bring about, so the Heart that is entirely devoted to God, is at Unity with itself, and all others; it being wholly taken up with one great Design, has no little Successes that it labours after, and so is naturally open, simple, and undesigning in all the Affairs of Life.

Although what has been already observed in the foregoing Pages might be thought sufficient to show, that Christianity requires a new Nature, a Life entirely devoted to God; yet since the Scriptures add other Evidences of the same Truth, I must quote a Passage or two more on this Head.

* 1 Cor. i. 20.

The Holy Spirit of God is not satisfied with representing that Change which Christianity introduceth, by telling us, that it is a new Birth, a Being born of God, and the like, but proceeds to convince us of the same Truth by another Way of speaking, by representing it as a State of Death.

Thus saith the Apostle, *ye are dead, and your Life is hid with Christ in God.

That is, you Christians are dead as to this World, and the Life which you now live, is not to be reckoned by any visible or worldly Goods, but is hid in Christ, is a spiritual Enjoyment, a Life of Faith, and not of Sight; ye are Members of that mystical Body of which Christ is the Head, and entered into a Kingdom which is not of this World.

And in this State of Death are we as Christians to continue till Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, and then shall we also appear with him in Glory.†

To show us that this Death begins with our Christian State, we are said to be buried with him in Baptism; so that we entered into this State of Death at our Baptism, when we entered into Christianity.

Know ye not, says the Apostle, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his Death? Therefore we are buried with him, by Baptism into Death.‡

Now Christians may be said to be baptized into the Death of Christ, if their Baptism puts them into a State like to that, in which our Saviour was at his Death. The Apostle shows this to be the Meaning of it, by saying, if we have been planted together in the Likeness of his Death, that is, if our Baptism has put us into a State like that of his Death.

So that Christian Baptism is not only an external Rite, by which we are entered into the external Society of Christ's Church, but is a solemn Consecration, which presents us an Offering to God, as Christ was offered at his Death.

We are therefore no longer alive to the Enjoyments of this World, but as Christ was then nailed to the Cross, and devoted entirely to God, that he might be made perfect through Sufferings, and ascend to the Right Hand of God; so is our old Man to be crucified, and we consecrated to God, by a Conformity to the Death of Christ, that like as Christ was raised from the Dead by the Glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of Life, and being risen with Christ, should seek those Things which are above.

This is the true undeniable State of Christianity; Baptism does not make us effectually Christians, unless it brings us into a State of Death, consecrates us to God, and begins a Life suitable to that State of Things, to which our Saviour is risen from the Dead. This, and no other than this, is the Holiness, and spiritual Temper, of the Christian Life, which implies such a Resignation of Mind, such a Dedication of ourselves to God, as may resemble the Death of Christ. And on the other Hand, such a Newness of Life, such an Ascension of the Soul, such a holy and heavenly Behaviour, as may show that we are risen with Christ, and belong to that glorious State, where he now sits at the Right Hand of God.

* Col. iii. 3.

† Ibid., 4.

It is in this Sense, that the holy Jesus saith of his Disciples, they are not of this World, even as I am not of this World; being not left to live the Life of the World, but chosen out of it for the Purposes of his Kingdom, that they might copy after his Death, and Oblation of himself to God.

And this is the Condition of all Christians to the Consummation of all Things, who are to carry on the same Designs, and by the same Means raise out of this corrupted State, a Number of Fellow-heirs with Christ in everlasting Glory. The Saviour of the World has purchased Mankind with his Blood, not to live in Ease and pleasurable Enjoyments, not to spend their Time in Softness and Luxury, in the Gratifications of Pride, Idleness, and Vanity, but to drink of his Cup, to be baptized with the Baptism that he was baptized with, to make War with their corrupt Natures, humble themselves, mortify the Desires of the Flesh, and like him be made perfect through Sufferings.

St. Paul so well knew this to be the Design and Spirit of Religion, that he puts his Title to the Benefits of Christ's Resurrection upon it, when he says,

*That I may know him and the Power of his Resurrection, and the Fellowship of his Sufferings, being made conformable to his Death.

It is his being made conformable to his Death, on which he founds his Hopes of sharing in the Resurrection of Christ. If Christians think that Salvation is now to be had on softer Terms, and that a Life of Indulgence and sensual Gratifications is consistent with the Terms of the Gospel, and that they need not now be made conformable to his Death, they are miserably blind, and as much mistake their Saviour, as the Worldly Jews who expected a temporal Messiah to deliver them.

Our Redemption is a Redemption by Sacrifice, and none are redeemed, but they who conform to it. If we suffer with him we shall also reign with him.

* Phil. iii. 10.

We must then, if we would be wise unto Salvation, die and rise again like Christ, and make all the Actions of our Life holy by offering them to God. Whether we eat, or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must do all to the Glory of God.

Since therefore, he that is called to Christianity, is thus called to an Imitation of the Death of Christ, to forbear from Sin, to overcome the World, to be born of the Spirit, to be born of God, these surely will be allowed to be sufficient Evidences, that Christianity requireth an entire Change of our Nature, a Life perfectly devoted to God.

Now if this is Christian Piety, it may serve to instruct two Sorts of People :

First, those who are content with an outward Decency and Regularity of Life : I don't mean such as are hypocritical in their Virtues ; but all those who are content with an outward Form of Behaviour, without that inward Newness of Heart and Spirit which the Gospel requireth.

Charity, Chastity, Sobriety, and Justice, may be practised without Christian Piety : a Jew, a Heathen, may be charitable and temperate ; but to make these Virtues become Parts of Christian Piety, they must proceed from a Heart truly turned unto God, that is full of an infant Simplicity, that is crucified with Christ, that is born again of the Spirit, that has overcome the World. Temperance or Justice without this Turn of Heart, may be the Temperance of a Jew or a Heathen, but it is not Christian Temperance till it proceed from a true Christian Spirit. Could we do and suffer all that Christ himself did or suffered, yet if it was not all done in the same Spirit and Temper of Christ, we should have none of his Merit.

A Christian therefore must be sober, charitable, and just, upon the same Principles, and with the same Spirit, that he receives the Holy Sacrament, for ends of Religion, as Acts of Obedience to God, as Means of Purity and Holiness, and as so many Instances of a Heart devoted to God.

As the bare eating of Bread, and drinking Wine in the Holy Sacrament, is of no use to us, without those religious Dispositions which constitute the true Frame of a pious Mind, so is it the same in all other Duties ; they are mere outward Ceremonies, and useless Actions, unless they are performed in the Spirit of Religion : Charity and Sobriety are of no Value, till they are so many Instances of a Heart truly devoted to God.

A Christian therefore is to be sober, not only so far as answers the Ends of a decent and orderly Life, but in such a Manner as becomes one, who is born of the Holy Spirit, that is made one with Christ, who dwells in Christ and Christ in him. He must be sober in such a measure as best serves the Ends of Religion, and practise such Abstinence as may make him fittest for the Holiness, Purity, and Perfection of the Christian Life.

He must be charitable, not so far as suits with Humanity and good Esteem amongst Men, but in such a Measure as is according to the Doctrines and Spirit of Religion.

For neither Charity, nor Temperance, nor any other Virtue, are Parts of Christian Holiness, till they are made holy and religious by such a Piety of Heart, as shows that we live wholly unto God.

This is what cannot be too much considered by a great many People, whose Religion has made no Change in their Hearts, but only consists in an external Decency of Life, who are sober without the Piety of Sobriety, who pray without Devotion, who give Alms without Charity, and are Christians without the Spirit of Christianity.

Let them remember that Religion is to alter our Nature, that Christian Piety consists in a Change of Heart, that it implies a new Turn of Spirit, a spiritual Death, a spiritual Life, a dying to the World, and a Living wholly unto God.

Secondly, This Doctrine may serve to instruct those who have lived Strangers to Religion, what they are to do to become true Christians.

Some People who are ashamed of the Folly of their Lives, and begin to look towards Religion, think they have done enough, when they either alter the outward Course of their Lives, abate some of their Extravagances, or become careful of some particular Virtue.

Thus a Man, whose Life has been a Course of Folly, thinks he has made a sufficient Change, by becoming temperate. Another imagines he has sufficiently declared for Religion, by not neglecting the public Worship as he used to do. A Lady fancies that she lives enough to God, because she has left off Plays and Paint, and lives more at home, than in the former Part of her Life.

But such People should consider, that Religion is no one particular Virtue; that it does not consist in the Fewness of our Vices, or in any particular Amendment of our Lives, but in such a thorough Change of Heart, as makes Piety and Holiness the Measure and Rule of all our Tempers.

It is a miserable Error to be content with ourselves, because we are less vain, or covetous, more sober, and decent in our Behaviour, than we used to be; yet this is the State of many People, who think they have sufficiently reformed their Lives, because they are in some Degree different from what they were. They think it enough to be changed from what they were, without considering how thorough a Change Religion requires.

But let such People remember, that they who thus measure themselves by themselves are not wise. Let them remember that they are not Disciples of Christ, till they have like him offered their whole Body and Soul as a reasonable and lively Sacrifice unto God; that they are not Members of Christ's mystical Body, till they are united unto him by a new Spirit; that they have not entered into the Kingdom of God, till they have entered with an infant Simplicity of Heart, till they are so born again as not to commit Sin, so full of an heavenly Spirit, as to have overcome the World.

Nothing less than this great Change of Heart and Mind can give anyone any Assurance, that he is truly turned to God. There is but this one Term of Salvation, He that is in Christ, is a new Creature. How insignificant all other Attainments are, is sufficiently shown in the following Words: *Many will say to me in that Day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy Name? And in thy Name have cast out Devils? And in thy Name have done many wonderful Works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work Iniquity.

So that there is no Religion that will stand us in any stead, but that which is the Conversion of the Heart to God; when all our Tempers are Tempers of Piety, springing from a Soul that is born again of the Spirit, that tends with one full Bent to a Perfection and Happiness in the Enjoyment of God.

Let us therefore look carefully to ourselves, and consider what manner of Spirit we are of; let us not think our Condition safe, because we are of this or that Church or Communion, or because we are strict Observers of the external Offices of Religion, for these are Marks that belong to more than belong to Christ. All are not his, that prophecy or even work Miracles in his Name, much less those, who with worldly Minds and corrupt Hearts are only baptized in his Name.

If Religion has raised us into a new World, if it has filled us with new Ends of Life, if it has taken Possession of our Hearts, and altered the whole Turn of our Minds, if it has changed all our Ideas of Things, given us a new Set of Hopes and Fears, and taught us to live by the Realities of an invisible World, then may we humbly hope, that we are true Followers of the Holy Jesus, and such as may rejoice in the Day of Christ, that we have neither run in vain, nor laboured in vain.

Chapter III.

Christianity requireth a Renunciation of the World, and all worldly Tempers.

THE Christian Religion being to raise a new, spiritual, and as yet invisible World, and to place Man in a certain Order amongst Thrones, Principalities, and spiritual Beings, is at entire Enmity with this present, corrupt State of Flesh and Blood.

It ranks the present World along with the Flesh and the Devil, as an equal Enemy to those glorious Ends, and that Perfection of human Nature, which our Redemption proposes.

It pleased the Wisdom of God to indulge the Jews in worldly Hopes and Fears.

It was then said, Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments, which I command you this Day, that ye may be strong, and go in and possess the Land, whither you go to possess it.

The Gospel is quite of another Nature, and is a Call to a very different State, it lays its first Foundation in the Renunciation of the World, as a State of false Goods and Enjoyments, which feed the Vanity and Corruption of our Nature, fill our Hearts with foolish and wicked Passions, and keep us separate from God, the only Happiness of all Spirits.

My Kingdom, saith our blessed Saviour, is not of this World; by which we may be assured, that no Worldlings are of his Kingdom.

We have a further Representation of the Contrariety, that there is betwixt this Kingdom and the Concerns of this World. A certain Man, saith our Lord, made a great Supper, and bade many, and sent his Servant at supper-time, to say to them that were bidden: Come, for all Things are now ready; and they all with one Consent began to make Excuse. The first said, I have bought a Piece of Ground, and I must needs go and see it; another said, I have bought five Yoke of Oxen, and I go to prove them, I pray thee have me excused; another said, I have married a Wife, and therefore I cannot come.

We find that the Master of the House was angry, and said, *None of those Men which were bidden, shall taste of my Supper.

Our Saviour a little afterwards, applies it all in this Manner,

* Luke xiv. 16.

*Whosoever he be of you, that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my Disciple. We are told, that when the Chief Priests and Pharisees heard our Saviour's Parables, they perceived that he spoke of them.

If Christians hearing the above-recited Parable, are not pricked in their Hearts, and don't feel that our Saviour speaks of them, it must be owned that they are more hardened than Jews, and more insincere than Pharisees.

This Parable teaches us, that not only the Vices, the Wickedness and Vanity of this World, but even its most lawful and allowed Concerns, render Men unable to enter, and unworthy to be received into the true State of Christianity.

That he who is busied in an honest and lawful Calling, may on that Account be as well rejected by God, as he who is vainly employed in foolish and idle Pursuits.

That it is no more pardonable to be less affected to the Things of Religion, for the Sake of any worldly Business, than for the Indulgence of our Pride, or any other Passion, it further teaches us, that Christianity is a Calling that puts an End to all other Callings; that we are no longer to consider it as our proper State, or Employment, to take care of Oxen, look after an Estate, or attend the most plausible Affairs of Life, but to reckon every Condition as equally trifling, and fit to be neglected, for the Sake of the one thing needful.

Men of serious Business and Management, generally censure those who trifle away their Time in idle and impertinent Pleasures, as vain and foolish, and unworthy of the Christian Profession.

But they don't consider that the Business of the World, where they think they show such a manly Skill and Address, is as vain as Vanity itself; they don't consider that the Cares of an Employment, an Attention to Business, if it has got hold of the Heart, renders Men as vain and odious in the Sight of God, as any other Gratification.

For though they may call it an honest Care, a creditable Industry, or by any other plausible Name, yet it is their particular Gratification, and a Wisdom that can no more recommend itself to the Eyes of God, than the Wisdom of an Epicure.

For it shows as wrong a Turn of Mind, as false a Judgment, and as great a Contempt of the true Good, to neglect any Degrees of Piety, for the Sake of Business, as for any the most trifling Pleasures of Life.

The Wisdom of this World gives an Importance, and Air of

* Matt. xxi. 45.

Greatness to several Ways of Life, and ridicules others as vain and contemptible, which differ only in their kind of Vanity; but the Wisdom from above condemns all Labour, as equally fruitless, but that which labours after everlasting Life. Let but Religion determine the Point, and what can it signify, whether a Man forgets God in his Farm, or a Shop, or at a Gaming-Table? For the World is full as great and important in its Pleasures, as in its Cares; there is no more Wisdom in the one, than in the other; and the Christian that is governed by either, and made less affected to Things of God by them, is equally odious and contemptible in the Sight of God.

And though we distinguish betwixt Cares and Pleasures, yet if we would speak exactly, it is Pleasure alone that governs and moves us in every State of Life. And the Man, who in the Business of the World would be thought to pursue it, because of its Use and Importance, is as much governed by his Temper and Taste for Pleasures, as he who studies the Gratification of his Palate, or takes his Delight in running Foxes and Hares out of Breath.

For there is no Wisdom or Reason in anything but Religion, nor is any Way of Life less vain than another, but as it is made serviceable to Piety, and conspires with the Designs of Religion to raise Mankind to a Participation and Enjoyment of the Divine Nature.

Therefore does our Saviour equally call Men from the Cares of Employments, as from the Pleasures of their Senses, because they are equally wrong Turns of Mind, equally nourish the Corruption of our Nature, and are equally nothing when compared to that high State of Glory, which by his Sufferings and Death he has merited for us.

Perhaps Christians who are not at all ashamed to be devoted to the Cares and Business of the World, cannot better perceive the Weakness and Folly of their Designs, than by comparing them with such States of Life, as they own to be vain and foolish, and contrary to the Temper of Religion.

Some People have no other Care, than how to give their Palate some fresh Pleasure, and enlarge the Happiness of Tasting. I desire to know now wherein consists the Sin or Baseness of this Care.

Others live to no other Purpose than to breed Dogs, and attend the Sports of the Field.

Others think all their Time dull and heavy, which is not spent in the Pleasures and Diversions of the Town.

Men of sober Business, who seem to act the grave Part of Life, generally condemn these Ways of Life.

Now I desire to know upon what Account they are to be condemned. For produce but the true Reason why any of these Ways of Life are vain and sinful, and the same Reason will conclude with the same Strength against every State of Life, but that which is entirely devoted to God.

Let the ambitious Man but show the Folly and Irregularity of Covetousness, and the same Reasons will show the Folly and Irregularity of Ambition.

Let the Man who is deep in worldly Business, but show the Vanity and Shame of a Life that is devoted to Pleasures, and the same Reasons will as fully set forth the Vanity and Shame of worldly Cares, So that whoever can condemn Sensuality, Ambition, or any Way of Life, upon the Principles of Reason and Religion, carries his own Condemnation within his own Breast, and is that very Person whom he despises, unless his Life be entirely devoted to God.

For worldly Cares are no more holy or virtuous, than worldly Pleasures, they are as great a Mistake in Life, and when they equally divide or possess the Heart, are equally vain and shameful, as any sensual Gratifications.

It is granted that some Cares are made necessary by the Necessities of Nature; and the same also may be observed of some Pleasures; the Pleasures of Eating, Drinking, and Rest, are equally necessary; but yet if Reason and Religion do not limit these Pleasures by the Necessities of Nature, we fall from rational Creatures, into Drones, Sots, Gluttons, and Epicures.

In like Manner our Care after some worldly Things is necessary, but if this Care is not bounded by the just Wants of Nature, if it wanders into unnecessary Pursuits, and fills the Mind with false Desires and Cravings, if it wants to add an imaginary Splendour to the plain Demands of Nature, it is vain and irregular, it is the Care of the Epicure, a longing for Sauces and Ragouts; and corrupts the Soul like any other sensual Indulgence.

For this Reason our Lord points his Doctrines at the most common and allowed Employments of Life, to teach us that they may employ our Minds as falsely, and distract us as far from our true Good, as any Trifles and Vanity.

He calls us from such Cares, to convince us, that even the Necessities of Life must be sought with a kind of Indifference, that so our Souls may be truly sensible of greater Wants, and disposed to hunger and thirst after Enjoyments that will make us happy for ever.

But how unlike are Christians to Christianity! It commands us to take no Thought, saying what shall we eat, or what shall we drink, yet Christians are restless and laborious till they can eat in Plate.

It commands us to be indifferent about Raiment, but Christians are full of Care and Concern to be clothed in Purple and fine Linen; it enjoins us to take no Thought for the Morrow, yet Christians think they have lived in vain, if they don't leave Estates at their Death. Yet these are the Disciples of that Lord, who saith, Whosoever he be of you, that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my Disciple.

It must not be said that there is some Defect in these Doctrines, or that they are not plainly enough taught in Scripture, because the Lives and Behaviour of Christians are so contrary to them; for if the Spirit of the World, and the Temper of Christians, might be alleged against the Doctrines of Scripture, none of them would have lasted to this Day.

It is one of the Ten Commandments, Thou shalt not take the Name of the Lord thy God in vain; our Saviour has in the most solemn Manner forbid Swearing; yet where more Swearing than amongst Christians, and amongst such Christians as would think it hard to be reckoned a Reproach to the Christian Name?

The Scripture says of Christians, that they are born of God, and have overcome the World; can they be reckoned of that Number, who have not so much as overcome this flagrant Sin, and to which they have no Temptation in Nature?

Well therefore may the Doctrines of Humility, Heavenly-mindedness, and Contempt of the World, be disregarded, since they have all the Corruptions of Flesh and Blood, all the innate and acquired Pride and Vanity of our Nature to conquer, before they can be admitted.

To proceed.

I know it is pretended by some, that these Doctrines of our Saviour, concerning forsaking all, and the like, related only to his first Followers, who could be his Disciples upon no other Terms, and who were to suffer with him for the Propagation of the Gospel.

It is readily owned that there are different States of the Church, and that such different States may call Christians to some particular Duties, not common to every Age.

It is owned also, that this was the Case of the first Christians, they differed from us in many Respects.

They were personally called to follow Christ; they received particular Commissions from his Mouth, they were empowered to work Miracles, and called to a certain Expectation of Hatred and Sufferings from almost all the World.

These are Particulars in which the State of the first Church differed from the present.

But then it is carefully to be observed, that this Difference in the State of the Church, is a Difference in the external State of the Church, and not in the internal inward State of Christians. It is a Difference that relates to the Affairs and Condition of the World, and not to the personal Holiness and Purity of Christians.

The world may sometimes favour Christianity, at other Times it may oppose it with Persecution; now this Change of the World makes two different States of the Church, but without making any Difference in the inward personal Holiness of Christians, which is to be always the same, whether the World smiles or frowns upon it.

Whatever Degrees therefore of personal Holiness or inward Perfection, were required of the first Followers of Christ, is still in the same Degree and for the same Reasons required of all Christians to the End of the World.

Humility, Meekness, Heavenly Affection, Devotion, Charity, and a Contempt of the World, are all internal Qualities of personal Holiness, they constitute that Spirit and Temper of Religion, which is required for its own Excellence, and is therefore of constant and eternal Obligation. There is always the same Fitness and Reasonableness in them, the same Perfection in practising of them, and the same Rewards always due to them.

We must therefore look carefully into the Nature of the Things, which we find were required of the first Christians; if we find that they were called to Sufferings from other People, this may perhaps not be our Case; but if we see they are called to Sufferings from themselves, to voluntary Self-denials, and renouncing their own Rights, we may judge amiss, if we think this was their particular Duty, as the first Disciples of Christ.

For it is undeniable, that these Instances of making themselves Sufferers from themselves, of voluntary Self-denial, and Renunciation of all worldly Enjoyments, are as truly Parts of personal Holiness and Devotion to God, as any Instances of Charity, Humility, and Love of God, that can possibly be supposed.

And it will be difficult to show, why all Christians are now obliged in Imitation of Christ to be meek and lowly in Heart, if they, like the first Christians, are not obliged to these Instances of Lowliness and Meekness, or if they are obliged still to imitate Christ, how can they be said to do it, if they excuse themselves from these plain and required Ways of showing it.

If therefore Christians will show that they are not obliged to those Renunciations of the World, which Christ required of his first Followers, they must show that such Renunciations, such voluntary Self-denials, were not Instances of personal Holiness and Devotion, did not enter into the Spirit of Christianity, or constitute that Death to the World, or new Birth in Christ, which the Gospel requireth. But this is as absurd to imagine, as to suppose that praying for our Enemies, is no part of Charity.

Let us therefore not deceive ourselves, the Gospel preaches the same Doctrines to us, that our Saviour taught his first Disciples, and though it may not call us to the same external State of the Church, yet it infallibly calls us to the same inward State of Holiness and Newness of Life.

It is out of all Question that this Renunciation of the World was then required, because of the Excellency of such a Temper, because of its Suitableness to the Spirit of Christianity, because of its being in some Degree like to the Temper of Christ, because it was a Temper that became such as were born again of God, and were made Heirs of eternal Glory, because it was a right Instance of their loving God with all their Heart, and with all their Soul, and with all their Strength, and with all their Mind, because it was a proper Way of showing their Disregard to the Vanity of earthly Comforts, and their Resolution to attend only to the one Thing needful.

If therefore we are not obliged to be like them in these Respects, if we may be less holy and heavenly in our Tempers, if we need not act upon such high Principles of Devotion to God, and Disregard of earthly Goods, as they did, we must preach a new Gospel of our own, we must say that we need not be meek and lowly as the first Christians were, and that those high Doctrines of Charity, of blessing and doing Good to our worst Enemies, were Duties only for the first State of the Church.

For this is undeniable, that if any Heights of Piety, any Degrees of Devotion to God, of Heavenly Affection, were necessary for the first Christians, which are not so now, that the same may be said of every other Virtue and Grace of the Christian Life.

All our Saviour's divine Sermon upon the Mount, may as well be confined to his first Disciples, as these Doctrines, and it is as sound in Divinity, as well founded in Reason, to assert, that our Saviour had only Regard to his first Disciples, when he said, Ye cannot serve God and Mammon, as when he saith, Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my Disciple.

For let anyone think, if he can find the least Shadow of a Reason, why Christians should at first be called to higher Degrees of Heavenly Affection, Devotion to God, and Disregard of the World, than they are now.

It will be as easy to show that they were obliged to a stronger Faith, a more lively Hope, than we are now.

But if Faith and Hope are Graces of too excellent a Nature, too essential to the Life and Spirit of a Christian, to admit of any Abatements in any Age of the Church, I should think, that heavenly Affection, Devotion to God, and dying to the World, are Tempers equally essential to the Spirit of Religion, and too necessary to the Perfection of the Soul, to be less required in one Age, than in another.

Besides, it is to be considered, that these Tempers are the natural and genuine Effects of Faith and Hope, so that if they are changed, or abated, Faith and Hope must have so far suffered Abatements, and failed in their most proper and excellent Effects.

All Men will readily grant, that it would be very absurd, to suppose, that more Articles of Faith should have been necessary to be believed by our Saviour's first Followers, than by Christians of After-ages.

Let it then be considered, why this would be absurd, and it will plainly appear, that the same Reason, which makes it absurd to suppose, that anything which was once necessary to be believed, should ever lose that Necessity, will equally show, that it is alike absurd to suppose, that anything that was once necessary to be done, should ever be lawful to be left undone.

For is it absurd to suppose, that Articles of Faith, should not have always the same Relation to Salvation? And is it not equally absurd to suppose the same of any Graces or Virtues of the Soul? That the Kingdom of Heaven should at such a time be only open to such Degrees of Piety, of heavenly Affection, and dying to the World, and at other Times make no Demand of them.

Again, I believe all Men will readily grant, that whenever the Church falls into such a State of Persecution as was in the Beginning, that we are then to suffer for the Faith as the first Christians did.

Now I ask why we are to do as they did, when we fall into the like Circumstances?

Is it because what they did was right and fit to be done? Is it because their Example is safe and agreeable to the Doctrines of Christ? Is it because we must value our Lives at no higher a Rate, than they valued theirs? Is it because suffering for the Faith, is always that same excellent Temper, and always entitled to the same Reward?

If these are the Reasons, as undoubtedly they are, why we must suffer as they did, if we fall into such a State of the Church as they were in, do not all the same Reasons equally prove that we must use the World as they did, because we are in the same World that they were in?

For let us here put all the same Questions, in Relation to their Self-denials, and Renunciation of Riches, was not what they did in this Respect right and fit to be done? Is not their Example safe and agreeable to the Doctrines of Christ? Are we to value our worldly Goods, more than they valued theirs? Is not the renouncing earthly Enjoyments for the Sake of Christ, always that same excellent Temper, and always entitled to the same Reward?

Thus we see that every Reason, for suffering as the first Disciples of Christ did, when we fall into the same State of Persecution, that they were in, is as strong and necessary a Reason for our contemning and forsaking the World, as they did, because we are still in the same World that they were in.

If it can be shown, that the World is changed, that its Enjoyments have not that Contrariety to the Spirit of Christianity, that they had in the Apostles Days, there may be some Grounds for us Christians to take other Methods than they did. But if the World is the same Enemy it was at the first, if its Wisdom is still Foolishness, its Friendship still Enmity with God, we are as much obliged to treat this Enemy, as the first Disciples of Christ did, as we are obliged to imitate their Behaviour towards any other Enemies and Persecutors of the common Christianity.

And it would be very absurd to suppose, that we were to follow the Doctrines of Christ in renouncing the Flesh and the Devil, but might abate of their Enmity in Regard to the World, when it is by our Use of worldly Goods, that both the Flesh and the Devil gain almost all their Power over us.

Having said thus much to show that the Gospel belongs to us in all its Doctrines of Holiness and Piety, I shall proceed to enquire, what Heavenly Affection, what Renunciation of the World, and Devotion to God, is required of Christians in the Holy Scriptures.

We find in the Passage already quoted, with several others to the like Purpose, that our Saviour saith, as a common Term of Christianity, That whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my Disciple.

St. Mark tells us, There came one running, and kneeled to him, and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit Eternal Life? And Jesus said unto him, thou knowest the Commandments, do not commit Adultery, do not Kill, do not Steal, do not bear false Witness, defraud not, honour thy Father and Mother.*

And he answered and said unto him, Master, all these have I observed from my Youth.

Then Jesus beholding him, loved him, and said unto him, one thing thou lackest, go thy way and sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the Poor, and thou shalt have Treasure in Heaven, and come take up the Cross and follow me.

And he was sad at that Saying, and went away grieved, for he had great Possessions.

In St. Matthew it is thus, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, &c.

Some have imagined, that from our Saviour's using the Expression, If thou wilt be perfect, that this was only a Condition of some high uncommon Perfection, which Christians as such, were not obliged to aspire after; but the Weakness of this Imagination will soon appear, if it be considered, that the young Man's Question plainly showed what Perfection it was that he aimed at; he only asked what he should do that he might inherit Eternal Life. And it was in answer to this Question, that our Saviour told him, that though he had kept the Commandments, yet one thing he lacked.

So that when our Saviour saith, if thou wilt be perfect, it is the same thing as when he said, if thou wilt not be lacking in one thing, that is, if thou wilt practise all that Duty which will make thee inherit eternal Life, thou must not only keep the Commandments, but sell that thou hast and give to the Poor.

It plainly therefore appears, that what is here commanded is not in order to some exalted, uncommon Height of Perfection, but as a Condition of his being a Christian, and securing an Inheritance of Eternal Life.

This same thing is further proved from our Saviour's general Remark upon it; How hardly shall they that have Riches enter into the Kingdom of God.

By which it appears, that it was the bare entering into the State of Christianity, and not any extraordinary Height of Perfection, that was the Matter in question.

This Remark, and the other following one, where our Saviour saith, It is easier for a Camel to go through the Eye of a Needle, than for a rich Man to enter into the Kingdom of God, undeniably show us thus much, that what is here required of this young Man, is also required of all rich Men in all Ages of the Church, in order to their being true Members of the Kingdom of God.

For how could this be said of rich Men, that they can hardly and with more Difficulty enter into the Kingdom of God, if they were not obliged to the same, that this rich Man was obliged to.

For if they may enjoy their Estates, and yet enter into the Kingdom of God, the Difficulty is vanished, and they may enter with Ease, though this young Man was put upon much harder Terms.

If therefore we will but use common Sense in understanding these Words of our Saviour, we must allow that they relate to all rich Men, and that the same Renunciation of all Self-enjoyment is required of them, that was required of this young Man.

His Disciples plainly understood him in this Sense, by their saying, Who then can be saved? And it appears by our Saviour's Answer, that he did not think they understood him amiss; for he seems to allow their Remark upon the Difficulty of the thing, and only answers, That with God all things are possible; implying that it was possible for the Grace of God to work this great Change in the Hearts of Men.

Those who will still be fancying (for there is nothing but Fancy to support it) that this Command related only to this young Man, ought to observe, that this young Man was very virtuous; that he was so eager after Eternal Life, as to run to our Saviour, and put the Question to him upon his Knees, and that for these things our Saviour loved him.

Now can it be imagined, that our Saviour would make Salvation more difficult to one who was thus disposed than to others?

That he would impose particularly hard Terms upon one whose Virtues had already gained his Love?

And such hard Terms, as for their Difficulty might justly be compared to a Camel's going through the Eye of a Needle? Would he make him lacking in one thing, which other Men might lack in all Ages, without any hindrance of their Salvation? Would he send him away sorrowful on the account of such Terms, as are no longer Terms to the Christian World?

As this cannot be supposed, we must allow, that what our Saviour required of that young man, was not upon any particular Account, or to show his Authority of demanding what he pleased; but that he required this of the young Man for the Sake of the Excellency of the Duty, because it was a Temper necessary for Christianity, and always to be required of all Christians; It being as easy to conceive, that our Saviour should allow of less Restitution and Repentance in some Sinners than in others, as that he should make more Denial of the World, more Affection for Heaven, necessary to some, than to others.

I suppose it cannot be denied, that an Obedience to this Doctrine had shown an excellent Temper; that it was one of the most noble Virtues of the Soul; that it was a right Judgment of the Vanity of earthly Riches; that it was a right Judgment of the Value of heavenly Treasures; and that it was a proper Instance of true Devotion to God.

But if this was a Temper so absolutely, so excellently right then, I desire to know, why it has not the same Degree of Excellency still?

Hath Heaven or Earth suffered any Change since that time? Is the World become now more worth our Notice, or heavenly Treasure of less Value, than it was in our Saviour's Time? Have we had another Saviour since, that has compounded Things with this World, and helped us to an easier Way to the next?

Further, it ought to be observed, that when our Saviour commandeth the young Man to sell all and give to the Poor, he gives this Reason for it, and thou shalt have Treasure in Heaven.

This manifestly extends the Duty to all rich Men, since the Reason that is given for it, either equally obliges all, or obliges none; unless a Treasure in Heaven can be said to be a valuable Consideration to some, but not to others.

The Matter therefore evidently comes to this, either we must say that our Saviour did not make a reasonable Proposal to the young Man, that what he required of him, was not sufficiently Excellent in itself, and advantageous to him, or we must allow that the same Proposal is as Reasonable for us to accept of now, as it was in the first Ages of the Church.

We must Observe too, that if all the Reasons which pressed this Duty upon the young Man, equally recommend it to us, that if we neglect it, we are equally Unreasonable with him, who went away Sorrowful.

Let those who are startled at this Doctrine, and think it unnecessary now, deal Faithfully with their own Hearts, and ask themselves, whether they should not have had the same Dislike of it, had they lived in our Saviour's Days, or whether they can find any one Reason, why they should have been so Spiritual and Heavenly then, which is not as good and as strong a Reason for their being as Spiritual and Heavenly now.

Let them consider, whether if an Apostle was to rise from the Dead, calling all rich Men to this Doctrine, they would not drive their Coaches from such a Preacher, rather than be saved at such a Price.

To proceed, if this selling all, this Renunciation of worldly Wealth, was not required for the Excellency of the Duty, and its Suitableness to the Spirit of Christianity, it will be hard to show a Reason, why such voluntary Self-denial, such Renunciation of one's own Enjoyments, such Persecution of one's self, should be required at a Time, when Christianity exposed its Members to such uncommon Hatred and Persecution from other People.

Our Saviour allowed his Disciples when they should fall under Persecution, to flee from one City to another, though they were to be as harmless as Doves, yet he commanded them to be as wise as Serpents.

If therefore the Enjoyment of Riches had been a thing that had suited with his Religion; was not a Renunciation of all worldly Wealth, a Temper necessary and never to be dispensed with, one would suppose, that it would least of all have been imposed, at a Time when there were so many other unavoidable Burdens to be undergone.

Since therefore this forsaking and renouncing all by our own Act and Deed, since this Degree of Self-denial and Self-persecution was commanded at a Time, when all the World were Enemies to Christians, since they were not then spared or indulged in any pleasurable Enjoyments of their worldly Wealth, but were to add this Instance of Suffering, to all the Sufferings from their Enemies, we may be sure, that it was required because it was a necessary Duty, because it was a proper Behaviour of such as were born of God, and made Heirs of eternal Glory.

If this be true, then it must be owned, that it is still the same necessary Duty, and is now as well that proper Behaviour of those who are Sons of God, as ever it was.

For Christianity is just that same spiritual heavenly State, that it was then, the Dignity of Christians has suffered no Alteration since that Time, and a Treasure in Heaven, an Eternal Happiness are still the same great and important Things.

Chapter IV.

A Continuation of the same Subject.

ANYONE that is at all acquainted with Scripture must Observe, that the Doctrine of the foregoing Chapter, is not barely Founded on those particular Texts there considered, but that the same Spirit of renouncing the World, is the most common and repeated Subject of our Saviour's heavenly Instructions.

A certain Man said unto him Lord, I will follow thee whitherso-

upon Christian Perfection. 49

ever thou goest. And Jesus said unto him, the Foxes have Holes, and the Birds of the Air have Nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his Head.*

Another also said Lord, I will follow thee, but let me first go bid them farewell, that are at Home at my House.

And Jesus said unto Him, no Man having put his Hand to the Plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God.

These Passages are all of a kind with what our Saviour said to the young Man, they directly teach that same Renunciation of the World, as the first and principal Temper, the very Soul and Essence of Christianity.

This Doctrine is pressed, and urged upon us by various Ways, by every Art of Teaching, that it might enter into the Heart of every Reader.

The Kingdom of God, saith our Saviour, is like unto a Merchant-Man seeking goodly Pearls, who when he had found one Pearl of great Price, he went and sold all that he had and bought it.†

The Doctrine of this Parable needs no Interpretation, it is plain and strong, and presses home the Advice that our Saviour gave to the rich young Man.

When it says, that the Kingdom of God is a Pearl of great Price, I suppose it means, that a great deal is to be given for it, and when it says, that the Merchant went and sold all that he had and bought it, I suppose this is to teach us, that it cannot be bought at any less Price.

The modern Jews would be upon much easier Terms than those who lived in our Saviour's Days; if we can now tell them that the Kingdom of God is no longer like one Pearl of great Price, and that they need not sell all that they have and buy it; but may go on seeking Pearls as they used to do, and yet be good Members of the Kingdom of God.

Now if we may not preach such a new Gospel as this to the present Jews, I don't know how we can preach it to Christians.

This Parable does not suppose, that the Merchant went to Trading again, after he had sold all, and bought this Pearl of great Price. He was content with that, and did not want any other Riches.

If the Kingdom of God, is not Riches sufficient for us, but we must add another Greatness, and another Wealth to it, we fall under the Condemnation of this Parable.

To proceed. The peaceful, pleasurable Enjoyments of Riches, is a State of Life everywhere condemned by our Blessed Saviour.

* Luke ix. 57, 58.

† Matt. xiii. 45.

*Woe unto you that are Full, for ye shall Hunger, woe unto you that Laugh now, for ye shall Weep and Mourn.

If we can think that for all this, the Joys of Prosperity, and the gay Pleasures of Plenty, are the allowed Enjoyments of Christians, we must have done wondering at the Blindness and Hardness of the Jews' Hearts.

Woe unto you that are Rich, for ye have received your Consolation! It is not said woe unto you that are Rich, for ye have Enriched yourselves by evil Arts, and unlawful Means, but it is the bare Enjoyment, the Consolation that is taken in Riches, to which this Woe is threatened.

This same Doctrine is pressed upon us by a remarkable Parable, so plain and lively, that one would think that every Christian that has heard it, should be afraid of everything that looked like Self-indulgence, or Expense in his own Pleasures and Pride.

There was a certain rich Man, which was clothed in Purple and fine Linen, and fared sumptuously every Day.

And there was a certain poor Beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his Gate full of Sores, and desiring to be fed with the Crumbs which fell from the rich Man's Table: moreover the Dogs came and licked his Sores.

It came to pass, that the Beggar died, and was carried by the Angels into Abraham's Bosom. The rich Man also died, and was buried, and in Hell he lifted up his Eyes, being in Torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his Bosom.†

This Parable teacheth neither more nor less than what our Saviour taught, when he commanded the young Man to sell all that he had. For it is the bare pleasurable Enjoyment, the living in the usual Delights of a great Fortune, that the Parable condemneth. Here is no Injustice, no Villanies or Extortions laid to his Charge, it is only a Life of Splendour and Indulgence, that leaves him in Hell.

This we are further taught, by Abraham's Answer to him, Son, remember that thou in thy Life-time receivedst thy good Things: This is alleged as the sole Reason of his being in Torments.

It is to be Observed, that nothing is mentioned of Lazarus, but his low and afflicted State, and then it is, he is comforted, and thou art tormented.

Can anything more plainly show us the Impossibility of enjoying Mammon while we live, and God when we die? A rich Man enjoying the Pleasures of Riches, is for that Reason found in Torments, a Beggar patiently bearing Want, is for that Reason made the Care of Angels, and conducted to Abraham's Bosom.

* Luke vi. 25.

† Luke xvi.

Does not this manifestly teach us that same Renunciation of worldly Enjoyments, as if we had been expressly required to part with all that we have?

For if a Life of Splendour, and Pleasure, and sensual Grati-fications, is the Portion of those who choose to enjoy it, if it exposes us to so much Woe and Wrath hereafter, well might our Blessed Saviour tell the rich Man, that he lacked one Thing, that he was to sell all that he had and give to the Poor.

If therefore this Parable contains the Doctrine that it first taught, if Time has not worn away its Meaning, it contains a Doctrine that concerns all rich Men; it speaks as home to them, and calls as loudly for a Renunciation of all worldly Indulgences, as our Saviour did to the rich Man.

So that there is no Advantage got by considering our Saviour's Command, as a particular Charge, and given to a particular young Man; since it appears by other express Passages and Parables, that the same is required of all other rich Men, as they expect any other Consolation, than what is to be found in Riches.

If we will here also appropriate this Parable to this particular rich Man, we shall judge as reasonably, as if we should maintain that the Hell in which he was tormented was made only for him, and is a State which no one else has any Occasion to fear.

We must therefore, unless we will set aside the Gospel, and think ourselves not concerned in its Doctrines, take this as an undeniable Truth, that Christianity is still that same opposite State to the World that it was in our Saviour's Days; that he speaks to us the same Language that he spoke to the young Man in the Gospel; that if we will not hear his Voice, but indulge ourselves in the proud sensual Delights of Riches and Grandeur, our Fate is taught us in the rich Man in Torments; and to us belongs that dreadful Threatening, Woe unto you that are rich, for you have received your Consolation.

I know it has been said by some, that all that we are taught by the Command given to the young Man to sell all, is this, that whenever we cannot keep our Possessions without violating some essential Duty of a Christian, that then, and not till then, need we think that we are called upon by Christ to quit all and follow him.

I have, in Answer to this, already shown, that the Thing required of this young Man, was no particular Duty, but that our Saviour pressed it upon all, and by a Reason which made it equally conclusive for all People, namely, a Treasure in Heaven.

I have shown that the same Doctrine is taught in general, by comparing the Kingdom of God to one Pearl of great Price, which the Merchant could buy at no less a Price, than by selling all that he had ; by the Parable of the rich Man in Torments, on the Account of his living in the State and Pleasures of a Fortune ; and lastly, by a general Woe that is threatened to all who are rich, as having received their Consolation : So that this seems a full Answer to this Interpretation.

But I shall however consider it further.

Now if this be all that is taught us Christians, by the Case of the young Man in the Gospel, that we are to part with our Enjoyments and Possessions, when we cannot keep them without renouncing some great Truth of our Religion, and that till such a time happens, we may peacefully and pleurably enjoy the Delights and State of Plenty.

If this be the Case, I ask how a good Christian is to be assured that this is a safe and just Interpretation ? How shall he be satisfied that there is no Danger in following it ?

It is plainly an interpretation of our own making, it is not the open expressed Sense of the Words, it is an Addition of something to them, for which we have no Authority from the Passage itself. So that it may well be asked, how we can be sure that such an Interpretation may be safely complied with.

The Text saith, Sell all that thou hast ; this Interpretation saith, Ye need not sell yet, nay, that you need not sell at all, but that you may go on in the pleasurable Enjoyment of your several Estates, till such time as you cannot keep them without denying the Faith.

So that the Interpretation seems to have nothing to do with the Text, and only teaches a Doctrine, that might as well be asserted without this Text, as with it.

I ask therefore for what Reason we allow this Passage to teach us no more than this ? Is there any other Part of Scripture that requires us to make this Interpretation ? Does it better suit with the Spirit and Temper of the Christian Religion ? Is it more agreeable to its heavenly Designs, its Contempt of the World, than to take them in their apparent Sense ?

If this were true, then the first Followers of Christ, who observed this Doctrine in its literal Sense, and renounced all, acted less suitably to the Spirit of Christianity, than those who now enjoy their Estates.

This Absurdity is enough to expose any pretended Necessity of this Interpretation, which Absurdity must be granted, if we say that this new Interpretation is more suitable to the Spirit of Christianity, than to take the Words as still obliging in their first Sense.

But to cut off all Pretence of any Necessity from any other Part of Scripture, I have made it plainly appear, that the same Doctrine is certainly taught by many other express Passages of Scripture.

This Interpretation therefore is as contrary to many other Parts of Scripture, as to this Text ; it is contrary to the Spirit of Christianity, and is only brought in to soften the Rigours of Religion, that People may with quiet Consciences enjoy the Pleasures of Plenty, and those who want it, spend their Time in the Ways and Means of acquiring it.

If therefore there be not an entire Change in the Way to Heaven, if the once strait Gate be not now a wide and open Passage to all full, fat, and stately Christians ; if there is still any Meaning in these Words, Blessed are the Poor in Spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of God, the sober Christian may as well doubt of this Allowance of enjoying the Pleasures and Plenty of his Estate, till Persecution for the Faith drives him out of it, as if he was told, that he need not resist the Devil, till such time as he tempted him to deny the Faith, or give up some Truth of his Religion.

When our Saviour gave this Command to the young Man, and afterwards observed, upon his Refusal, that it was easier for a Camel to go through the Eye of a Needle, than for a rich Man to enter into the Kingdom of God, the Apostles took that Command to signify the common Conditions of entering into Christianity, and immediately declared that they had left all and followed him.

And our Saviour answered them in such a Manner, as showed, that the Doctrine then delivered, related to all Mankind in the same Sense, and had nothing particular in it, that related to one Man, or one Age of the Church, more than another.

*Verily I say unto you, there is no Man that hath left House or Brethren, or Sisters, or Father, or Mother, or Wife, or Children, or Lands, for my Sake, or the Gospel's, but he shall have an hundred fold now in this present time, and in the World to come Eternal Life.

Let it now be considered, that supposing it was barely lawful, to enjoy our Estates, and as the World says, live up to them, is this a State of any Merit? Is there any Reward annexed to it? If it is not our Sin, it is at best a losing our Time, and as unrewardable as Sleeping.

But on the other Side we are infallibly assured, that if we come up to the Doctrine of the Text, if we part with our worldly

* Mark x. 29.

Enjoyments and Gratifications for the Sake of Christ, that in this Life we shall receive an hundred fold, and in the World to come Eternal Life.

Now if such Persons as these, are to be thus blessed in this Life, and also so rewarded in the next, it is certain that they who are not such Persons, will not be so doubly blessed both in this Life and that which is to come.

But now what an Interpretation must that be, which leads Men from being an hundred times as happy as they might be in this Life, and from such an Height of Reward in the next?

Is not this enough to show us, that the Wisdom of this Interpretation, is not a Wisdom from above, that it savoureth not the Things that be of God?

For who can be so wise unto Eternal Life, who can make so much of his Plenty, as by thus parting with it?

Who that was governed by a Wisdom from above, would seek for an Evasion, where the open Sense, is not only safe, but entitled to so vast a Recompense both now and hereafter?

It is to me no small Argument, that our Saviour meant no such Allowance, as this Interpretation has found out, because it is so contrary to the Perfection of the Soul, and is so disadvantageous to those that follow it.

Our blessed Saviour and his Apostles both in Doctrine and Practice are on the Side of renouncing the Enjoyments of Riches, and who is he that dare preach up a worldly Peace and Indulgence, without either Text or Precedent from Scripture, and such a Peace as leads Men from such high Rewards both in this Life, and that which is to come?

When our Saviour told Peter of his Sufferings, Peter took him and began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee, Lord, this shall not be unto thee. But Jesus turned and said to Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan, thou art an Offence unto me, for thou savourest not the Things that be of God, but those that be of Men.

But after all, this Enjoyment of worldly Riches which this Interpretation pleads for, cannot be shown to be barely lawful, this I say cannot be shown, without showing at the same time, that this Passage, It is easier for a Camel to go through the Eye of a Needle, than for a rich Man to enter into the Kingdom of God, is so old as to be of no Significancy now, for if the Difficulty still continues, the rich Man must have as much to part with now, as he had then.

The same must be said of all those other Passages above-mentioned, concerning the Kingdom being compared to one great Pearl, the Case of the rich Man in Torments, and the general Woe that is denounced against such as are rich, as having received their Consolation ; all these, with a great Variety of other Texts, must have quite lost their first natural Meaning, if this Interpretation be admitted as barely lawful.

So that it is an Interpretation that runs away from the plain open Sense of the Words, and leads from those great Rewards that belong to it ; it is an Interpretation made without any Necessity, not supported by any Doctrine, or Practice of Scripture, contrary to the Practices of the first Christians, contrary to the heavenly Spirit of our Religion, and so contrary to various plain Passages of Scripture, that they must have lost their true Meaning, if this Interpretation be admitted.

Lastly, If all that can be concluded from this Command of our Saviour, is only this, that we are obliged to part with our Estates, when we cannot keep them, without selling the Truth ; if sell all thou hast and give to the Poor, and thou shalt have Treasure in Heaven, only means, when applied to us, thou mayest keep and enjoy thy Estate, till some wicked Terms of keeping it are imposed upon thee, this is no higher a Perfection, no greater Degree of Heavenly-mindedness, or Disregard to the World, than a Jew or honest Heathen would maintain.

For who does not know that it is better to be just and faithful, than to be rich, and that a Man is rather to part with his Estate, than to keep it at the Expense of his Virtue and Integrity ? This is only the Virtue of choosing rather to be poor, than a Thief.

But if Christians can think that this is the highest Renunciation of the World, the highest Degree of heavenly Affection, to which they are called, if they can think that this is all that is meant by their being crucified and dead to the World, by their being in Christ new Creatures, by their being born of God, and having overcome the World, they may be justly said to treat the Scriptures, as the Jews treated our Saviour, when they said, We will not have this Man to reign over us.

I have, I think, sufficiently shown that our Saviour required an entire Renunciation of the World, a forsaking all its Enjoyments, in order to be his true Disciples, and that the same is as certainly required of us, as he is the same Christ, and we Heirs of the same Glory.

It will now therefore, I know, be asked, whether all Christians are obliged to sell their Estates and give to the Poor, in order to inherit eternal Life ?

The Absurdity and Ridiculousness of such a thing, and the Disorder it must occasion in Life, will be thought sufficient to expose and confute all the foregoing Doctrine.

As to the Absurdity and Ridiculousness of this Doctrine in the Eyes of worldly Wisdom, that is far from being any Objection against it, since we are assured by God himself, that the Wisdom of this World is Foolishness with God, and that the Spirit of Christianity, and the Spirit of the World, are as contrary to one another, as the Kingdom of Light, and the Kingdom of Darkness.

What can be more contrary to worldly Greatness and Wisdom, than the Doctrine of the Cross, a crucified Saviour? Which way could anyone expose himself to more Jest and Ridicule, than by being too meek and humble to resent an Affront, and accept a Challenge?

Not only Rakes and Libertines, but the grave, the religious part of the World, talk of the Necessity of defending their Honour, and reckon it a Shame not to resent and fight when the Affront is given.

This makes the Spirit of the World, though it be as consistent with our Religion, to honour the Memory of Cain for killing his Brother, as to make it a part of Honour to give or accept a Challenge.

This may serve to show us, that we must disregard the Maxims and Wisdom of this World, and not form our Judgments of Christian Virtues with any Regard to it, since by it, Patience and Meekness may be reckoned shameful, and Revenge and Murder as Instances of Honour.

But I give now a direct Answer to the foregoing Question, and venture to affirm, upon the Proofs I have already produced, that all Christians are really and effectually obliged to do that, which our Saviour required of the young Man.

Our Saviour bid him sell all that he had and give to the Poor, that he might have Treasure in Heaven: that is, he required him to renounce the Self-enjoyment of his Estate, to live no longer in the Gratifications of his Plenty, but offer it all to God in Works of Charity and Relief of others.

Now the selling all, is only a Circumstance of parting with the Enjoyment of his Riches from himself, to all such Objects and Uses as are worthy of it in the Sight of God.

If our Saviour had told Sinners that they must repent in Sackcloth and Ashes, I should have thought, that Sackcloth and Ashes were only mentioned as a particular way of expressing a general Duty; and that though the Circumstance of Sackcloth and Ashes might be omitted, yet the Thing intended, the Degree of Humiliation and Sorrow, was always to be performed in the same Degree.

I take it to be the same in the Case before us. It is not necessary that a Man should sell all that he hath, because that was the Expression used to the young Man, but it is necessary that he comply with the Thing signified, and practise all that Disregard of the World, and heavenly Affection which is there taught.

He sufficiently selleth all, who parteth with the Self-enjoyment of it, and maketh it the Support of those that want it.

This seems to me to be the true and plain Meaning of the Passage. The Words sell all, are only used as a Form of Speech, as a general Way of expressing the parting with the Enjoyment of an Estate, as Sackcloth and Ashes were a general Way of expressing Repentance, and not as laying any direct Obligation of parting with an Estate in that particular Way, any more than Sackcloth is always necessary to a true Repentance.

A Person that was to give away his Estate, would surely comply with the Doctrine of the Text, which shows that it is the Thing signified, and not the particular Manner of doing it, that is required.

Yet it is the keeping to this literal Sense of the Words, as if the selling all, was the particular Thing enjoined, that has taught People to excuse themselves from the Doctrine there delivered.

For there was some Pretence to think, that so particular an Action as the selling all, could only relate to him, to whom it was enjoined.

But if Men would consider, that this selling all, is only a Circumstance of the Thing, as Sackcloth is a Circumstance of Repentance, and that the Thing required is heavenly Affection, and Devotion to God, they would find themselves as much concerned in the Doctrine there delivered, as in any other Doctrine of Scripture.

When our Saviour related the good Samaritan's Charity, and said unto the Man that talked with him, Go and do thou likewise, he is not exhorted to stay for an Opportunity of doing the same Action, but to do the same Thing which was implied by that Action.

Taking therefore the Words in this plain Sense, as an Exhortation to such a Degree of heavenly Affection, and disclaiming all Self-enjoyment of Riches, and not as to any particular Action of selling all, it must be affirmed, that they equally concern all rich Men to the End of the World, as that young Man to whom they were spoken.

For as he was called to that Temper of Mind, because it was a right Temper for a Christian, a proper Instance of his Faith and Hope, and Devotion to God, and a right Way of using the Things of this World; how can it be thought, that the same Temper is not equally right and Christian in every rich Man now ? Or how can it be thought that the rich Men of this Age, are not equally obliged to act conformably to the Temper and Spirit of Religion now, as well as in the Days of Christ ?

Are not Humility and Meekness to be practised in the same Fulness, that they were in our Saviour's Time ? But if they are, it will be impossible to show, why any other Virtues should admit of any Abatement.

Or can anyone show a better Instance of Humility and Meekness, than in departing from the splendid Enjoyments of his Fortune, to make it the Support and Relief of poor and distressed People ?

It ought also to be considered, whether it is not impossible to show that Meekness and Humility which was then required, unless he practises them in these Instances. Let it also be considered, that this Use of worldly Things is not only commanded, as suitable to the Graces and Virtues of the Christian Life, but that the Case of the rich Man in Torments, with the other Passages above-mentioned, are so many express Threatenings against our Disobedience.

So that it must be affirmed, that we are as much obliged to labour after the same Degrees of Faith, Hope, heavenly Affection, and Disregard of the World, as after the same Degrees of Humility, Charity, and Repentance, that ever were required of any Christians.

Let it also be considered, that the Command of selling all, is only particular in the Expression, but that Thing required, is the general Temper of Christianity ; as is expressed by being dead to the World, having our Conversation in Heaven, being born of God, and having overcome the World ; these Expressions have no proper Meaning, if they don't imply all that heavenly Affection, and Disregard of Riches, to which our Saviour exhorted the young Man.

God forbid, saith St. Paul, that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the World is crucified unto me, and I unto the World.*

Now I desire to know why any Christian should think it less dreadful, not to be crucified and dead to the World, than St. Paul thought it ? Is not the Temper and Spirit which the Apostle shows here, as much to be aspired after, as in any other Part of Scripture ?

But can those who spend their Estates in their own Indulgences, who live in the Pomp and Pleasures of Riches, can they without Profaneness say that of themselves, which the Apostle here saith of himself?

Or can they be said to have the Spirit of Christ, who are directed by a Spirit so contrary to that of the Apostle? Yet the Scripture says expressly, that if any Man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

Thus we see that this Renunciation of the World, which is thought too great an Extreme, to be taken from the Command given to the young Man in the Gospel, is the Common Temper of Christianity, and a Doctrine the most universally taught of any other. It is indeed the very Heart and Soul of Christian Piety, it is the natural Soil, the proper Stock from whence all the Graces of a Christian naturally grow forth, it is a Disposition of all others the most necessary and most productive of Virtue. And if we might now be more earthly, than in the Days of Christ, we must of necessity be proportionably wanting in all other Virtues. For heavenly Affection enters so far into the being of all Christian Virtues, that an Abatement in that, is like an Alteration in the first Wheel that gives Motion to all the rest.

I will now a little appeal to the Imagination of the Reader.

Let it be supposed, that rich Men are now enjoying their Riches, and taking all the common usual Delights of Plenty, that they are labouring for the Meat that perisheth, projecting and contriving Scenes of Pleasure, and spending their Estates in proud Expenses.

After this Supposition, let it be imagined, that we saw the Holy Jesus, who had not where to lay his Head, with his twelve Apostles, that had left all to follow him; let us imagine that we heard him call all the World to take up the Cross and follow him, promising a Treasure in Heaven, to such as would quit all for his Sake, and rejecting all that would not comply with such Terms, denouncing Woe and eternal Death, to all that lived in Fulness, Pomp, and worldly Delights. Let it be imagined that we heard him commanding his Disciples to take no Thought, saying what shall we Eat, or what shall we Drink, or where-withal shall we be Clothed, and giving this Reason for it, because after all these Things do the Gentiles seek.

Let it be imagined that we saw the first Christians, taking up the Cross, renouncing the World, and counting all but Dung, that they might gain Christ.

I do not now appeal to the Judgment or Reason of the Reader, I leave it with his Imagination, that wild Faculty, to determine, whether it be possible for these two different Sorts of Men, to be true Disciples of the same Lord.

To proceed.

Let us suppose that a rich Man was to put up such a Prayer as this to God.

‘O Lord, I thy sinful Creature, who am born again to a lively Hope of Glory in Christ Jesus, beg of thee, to grant me a thousand times more Riches than I need, that I may be able to gratify Myself and Family in the Delights of Eating and Drinking, State and Grandeur, grant that as the little Span of Life wears out, I may still abound more and more in Wealth, and that I may see and perceive all the best and surest Ways of growing Richer than any of my Neighbours: this I humbly and fervently Beg in the Name, &c.’

Such a Prayer as this should have had no Place in this Treatise, but that I have Reason to hope, that in proportion as it offends the Ear, it will amend the Heart.

There is no one, I believe, but would be ashamed to put up such a Prayer as this to God, yet let it be well Observed, that all are of the Temper of this Prayer, but those who have overcome the World.

We need not go amongst Villains and People of scandalous Characters, to find out those, who desire a thousand times more than they want, who have an Eagerness to be every Day richer and richer, who catch at all Ways of Gain that are not scandalous, and who hardly think anything enough, except it equals or exceeds the Estate of their Neighbours.

I beg of such that they would heartily condemn the profane and unchristian Spirit of the foregoing Prayer, and that they would satisfy themselves, that nothing can be more odious and contrary to Religion than such Petitions.

But then let them be assured also of this, that the same Things which make an unchristian Prayer, make an unchristian Life.

For the Reason why these Things appear so odious in a Prayer, is because they are so contrary to the Spirit of Religion. But is it not as bad to live and act contrary to the Spirit of Religion, as to pray contrary to it?

At least must not that Manner of Life be very blamable, very contrary to Piety, which is so shocking when put into the Form of a Prayer?

But indeed whatever we may think, as we live, so we really pray, for as Christ saith, where our Treasure is, there will our Heart be also; so as the Manner of our Life is, so is our Heart also, it is continually praying, what our Life is acting, though not in any express Form of Words,

To pursue this Argument a little, is this Prayer too shocking?

Dare we not approach God with such a Spirit? How dare we then think of approaching him with such a Life?

Need we any other Conviction, that this Manner of Life is contrary to the Spirit of Christianity, than this, that the praying according to it in Christ's Name, comes near to Blasphemy?

Does not this also sufficiently convince us of the Reasonableness of Christ's Command, to forsake the Fulness, the Indulgence, and Pride of Estates, since it is a State of Life, that our Reason dare not ask God to give us?

Let it be considered how we should abominate a Person, whom we knew to use such a Prayer, and let that teach us how abominable a Life that is like it, must make us to appear in the Eyes of God, and with this Addition of Folly joined to it, that we call the Prayer Profane, but think the Life, that answers to it, to be Christian.

Perhaps there cannot be a better way of judging of what Manner of Spirit we are of, than to see whether the Actions of our Life are such, as we may safely commend them to God in our Prayers.

For it is undeniable, that if they are such as we dare not mention to God in our Prayers, we ought in all Reason to be as fearful of acting them in his Presence.

We may indeed do several innocent Things, which on account of their Littleness, are unfit to be put into our Devotions, but if the chief and main Actions of our Life are not such, as we may justly beg the Assistance of God's Holy Spirit in the Performance of them, we may be assured, that such Actions make our Lives as unholy, as such Petitions would make our Prayers.

From all that has been above observed, I think it is sufficiently plain, that the present Disciples of Jesus Christ are to have no more to do with worldly Enjoyments, than those that he chose whilst he himself was on Earth, and that he expects as much Devotion to God, and heavenly Affection from us, as from any that he conversed with, and speaks the same Language, and gives the same Commands to all rich Men now, that he gave to the rich young Man in the Gospel.

Chapter V.

A further Continuation of the same Subject.

THE Subject of the two preceding Chapters is of such Importance, that I cannot leave it, without adding some further Considerations upon it.

For, notwithstanding the Scriptures are so clear and express on the side of the Doctrine there delivered, yet I must expect to encounter the Prejudices of Men, who are settled in other Opinions.

I know it will still be asked, Where can be the Impiety of getting or enjoying an Estate ?

Whether it be not honourable, and Matter of just Praise, to provide an Estate for one's Family ?

It will also be asked, What People of Birth and Fortune are to do with themselves, if they are not to live suitably to their Estates and Qualities ?

Anyone who has taken the trouble to read this Treatise, must have found, that the Doctrine here taught is none of mine, and that therefore I have no occasion to support it against such Questions as these.

The same Persons may as well ask, why the little Span of Life is made a State of Trial and Probation, in which Men of all Conditions are to work out their Salvation with Fear and Trembling.

But however to the first Question let it be answered :

Take no thought, saying, what shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed ; for after all these things do the Gentiles seek.

If to be careful and thoughtful about the Necessaries of Life, be a Care that is here forbidden, and that because it is such a Care as only becomes Heathens, surely to be careful and thoughtful how to raise an Estate, and enrich one's Family, is a Care that is sufficiently forbidden Christians. And he that can yet think it lawful and creditable to make it the Care and Design of his Life to get an Estate, is too blind to be convinced by Arguments. He may with as much Regard to Scripture say, that it is lawful to swear falsely, though it forbids him to speak falsely.

Our Saviour saith, Labour not for the Meat that perisheth, but

upon Christian Perfection. 63

for that Meat which endureth unto Everlasting Life.* He commands us not to lay up for ourselves Treasures on Earth; he assures us that we cannot serve God and Mammon.

Now these Places have no meaning, if it is still lawful for Christians to heap up Treasures, to labour for great Estates, and pursue Designs of enriching their Families.

I know it is easy to evade the Force of these Texts, and to make plausible Harangues upon the Innocency of labouring to be rich, and the Consistency of serving God and Mammon.

I don't question but the rich young Man in the Gospel, who had kept the Commandments of God from his Youth, could have made a very good Apology for himself, and have shown how reasonable and innocent a thing it was, for so good and so young a Man to enjoy an Estate.

The rich Man in Torments could have alleged how much Good he did with his Fortune, how many Trades he encouraged by his Purple and fine Linen, and faring sumptuously every Day, and how he conformed to the Ends and Advantages of Society by so spending his Estate.

But to return: The Apostle saith, Having Food and Raiment, let us be therewith content, that they who will be rich fall into a Temptation and a Snare, and into many foolish and hurtful Lusts, which drown Men in Destruction and Perdition.†

We may perhaps by some Acuteness of reasoning find out, that this Doctrine still leaves us at our liberty, whether we will labour to be rich or not, and if we do, we are as much enlightened as the Quakers, who find themselves at liberty from the use of the Sacraments.

We may pretend, that notwithstanding what the Apostle says, of a Snare, a Temptation, and foolish Lusts, yet that we can pursue the Means, and desire the Happiness of Riches, without any Danger to our Virtue.

But if so, we are as prudent as those Christians, who think they can secure their Virtue without Watching and Prayer, though our Saviour has said, Watch and pray that ye enter not into Temptation.

He therefore that neglects Watching and Prayer, though the appointed Means of avoiding Temptation, may show that he lives as much according to Scripture, as he that is careful and desirous of Riches and Wealth, though they are the declared Occasions of Sin, Snares, and Destruction.

If we will not be so humble and teachable, as to conform to Scripture in the Simplicity and Plainness of its Doctrines, there will be no End of our Errors, but we shall be in as much Darkness as where the Light of Scripture never appeared.

* John vi. 27.

† 1 Tim. vi. 8.

For if we could submit to its plain and repeated Doctrines, it would never be asked, what People of Birth and Fortune are to do with themselves, if they are not to live up to the Splendour and plenty of their Estates.

The rich Man in the Gospel was a Ruler, a young Man, and a good Man; if therefore there are any amongst us that are neither young nor good, it can hardly be thought that they have less to do to inherit Eternal Life, than the young Man in the Gospel.

And as for those who like him have kept the Commandments of God from their Youth, I dare not tell them that they are not under a necessity of offering all their Wealth to God, and of making their Estates, however acquired, not the Support of any foolish vain Indulgences, but the Relief of their distressed Brethren.

Suppose great People by Means of their Wealth could throw themselves into a deep Sleep of pleasant Dreams, which would last till Death awaked them, would anyone think it lawful for them to make such Use of their Riches?

But if it was asked why this is not as lawful, as a Life of high Living, vain Indulgences, and worldly Pleasures, it could not be easily told.

For such a Life as this, is no more like a State of Probation, than such a Sleep is like it; and he that has done nothing but sleep and dream to the Time of his Death, may as well say that he has been working out his Salvation with Fear and Trembling, as he that has been living in such Luxury, Splendour, and vain Gratifications, as his Estate could procure him.

The Gospel has made no Provision for Dignity of Birth, or Difference in Fortune, but has appointed the same strait Gate, the common Passage for all Persons to enter into Glory.

The Distinctions of civil Life have their Use, and are in some Degree necessary to Society, but if anyone thinks he may be less devoted to God, less afraid of the Corruptions of Pleasures, the Vanities of Pride, because he was born of one Family rather than another, he is as much mistaken, as he that fancies he has a Privilege to steal, because he was born of a Father that was poor.

Why may not poor People give themselves up to Discontent, to Impatience and Repining? Is it not because Christianity requires the same Virtues in all States of Life? Is it not because the Rewards of Religion are sufficient to make us thankful in every Condition?

But who sees not, that these same Reasons equally condemn the Gratifications, the sensual Indulgences of the Rich, as the Discontents and Repinings of the Poor ?

So that a great Man taking his Swing in worldly Pleasures, in the various Gratifications, which his Plenty can furnish, is as good a Christian, as careful of his Duty to God, as the poor Man who resigns himself up to Discontent, and spends his Time and Spirits in restless Complaints and Repinings.

And if the Joys of Religion, our Hopes in Christ, are sufficient to make us rejoice in Tribulation, and be thankful to God in the Hardships of Poverty, surely the same Hopes in Christ must be equally sufficient to make us forbear the Luxury and Softness, and all other Pleasures of imaginary Greatness.

If therefore the rich or great Man can find out a Course of Pleasures, that support no wrong Turn of Mind, a Luxury and Indulgence which don't gratify Sensuality, Delights, and Entertainments, which indulge no vain and weak Passions, if they can find out such Self-enjoyments of their Riches, as show that they love God with all their Strength, and their Neighbours as themselves ; if they can find out such Instances of Splendour and Greatness, as gratify neither the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, nor the Pride of Life, Religion has no Command against such Enjoyments.

But if this cannot be done, let it be remembered, that the Rich have no more Permission to live in sensual Pleasures, and vain Indulgences, than the Poor have, to spend their Time in anxious Complaints and unthankful Repinings.

Let it also be remembered, that if any Distinctions of Life make Men forget, that Sin is their only Baseness, and Holiness their only Honour, if any Condition makes them less disposed to imitate the low, humble Estate of their suffering Master, or forget that they are to return to God by Humiliation, Repentance, and Self-denial, instead of being of any real Advantage, it is their Curse, their Snare, and Destruction.

Had there been any other lawful Way of employing our Wealth, than in the Assistance of the Poor, our Saviour would not have confined the young Man in the Gospel to that one Way of employing all that he had.

Was there no Sin in pampering ourselves with our Riches, our Saviour had not said, Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your Consolation !

Had a Delight in the Splendour and Greatness of this Life, been an innocent Delight for People of Birth and Fortune, he had never said, Blessed are the poor in Spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Had worldly Mirth, and the noisy Joys of Splendour and Equipage, been any part of the Happiness of Christians, he had never said, Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

Thus does it appear, from almost every Part of Scripture, that a Renunciation of the World and all worldly Enjoyments, either of Pleasure or Pride, is the necessary Temper of all Christians of every State and Condition.

I know that to all this, it will still be objected, that the different States of Life, are Things indifferent in themselves, and are made good or evil, by the Tempers of the Persons who enjoy them. That a Man is not necessarily vain and proud, because he lives in great Show and Figure, any more than another is necessarily humble and lowly in Mind, because he lives in a low Estate.

It is granted, that Men may be of a Temper contrary to the State in which they live, but then this is only true of such as are in any State by Force, and contrary to their Desires and Endeavours.

A Man in a low Estate may be very vain and proud, because he is in such a State by Force, and is restless and uneasy till he can raise himself out of it. If the same can be said of any Man that lives in all the Splendour and Figure of Life, that he is in it by Force, and is restless and uneasy till he can lay all aside, and live in a humble lowly State, it may be granted that such a Man, though in the Height of Figure, may be as humble, as another in starving Circumstances may be proud.

But nothing can be more false, than to conclude, that because a Man may be in a low Estate, without having Lowliness of Mind, which Estate he is in by Force, that therefore another may live in all the Height of Grandeur, the Vanity of Figure which his Fortune will allow, without having any Height or Vanity of Mind, though the State of Life be according to his Mind, and such as he chooses before another that has less of Figure and Show in it.

Nothing can be more absurd than such a Conclusion as this ; it is as if one should say, that because a Man may be an Epicure in his Temper, though he is forced to live upon Bread and Water, therefore another who seeks after all Sorts of Dainties, and lives upon Delicacies out of Choice, may be no Epicure.

Again, Who does not know that a Man may give all his Goods to feed the Poor, and yet want Charity ? But will anyone therefore conclude, that another may keep all his Goods to himself, and yet have Charity ?

Yet this is as well argued, as to say, that because a Man has nothing to spend, he may yet be proud ; therefore though another may lay out his Estate in vain Expenses, he may yet have true Humility of Mind.

For as the Man in a low Estate, would be truly what his Estate is, if he liked it, and had no Desires that it should be otherwise than it is, so for the same Reason, if those who live in Pleasures, in Show and vain Expenses, live in such a State out of Choice, we must talk Nonsense, if we do not say, that their Minds are as Vain as the Vanity of their State.

Again, those who talk of People being Humble in a State, that has all the Appearance of Pride and Vanity, do not enough consider the Nature of Virtue. Humility and every other Virtue is never in a complete state, so that a Man can say, that he has finished his task in such or such a Virtue.

No Virtues have any Existence of this Kind in human Minds, they are rather continual Struggles with the contrary Vices, than any finished Habits of Mind.

A Man is humble not for what he has already done, but because it is his continual Disposition to oppose and reject every Temptation to Pride. Charity is a continual Struggle with the contrary Qualities of Self-Love and Envy.

And this is the State of every Virtue, it is a progressive Temper of Mind, and always equally labouring to preserve itself.

Those therefore who suppose, that People may be so finished in the Virtue of Humility, that they can be truly Humble in the Enjoyments of Splendour and Vanity, do not consider that Humility is never finished, and that it ceases to Exist when it ceases to oppose and reject every Appearance of Pride.

This is the true State of every Virtue, a resisting and opposing all the Temptations to the contrary Vice.

To suppose therefore a Man so truly Humble, that he may live in all the Appearances of Pride and Vanity, is as Absurd, as to suppose a Man so inwardly Sober, that he need refuse no strong Liquors, so inwardly Charitable that he need not avoid Quarrels, or so Holy that he need not resist Temptations to Sin.

Lastly, The Necessity of renouncing the World in whatever Condition of Life we are, besides what appears from particular Commands, may be proved from those great Degrees of Holiness, those divine Tempers, which Christianity requires.

Christians are to love God, with all their Heart, with all their Soul, with all their Mind, and with all their Strength, and their Neighbour as themselves.

Now it is absolutely impossible in the Nature of the Thing, that we should practise either of these Duties in any Christian Sense, unless we are so born of God, as to have overcome the World.

A Man that has his Head and his Heart taken up with worldly Concerns, can no more love God with all his Soul and with all his Strength, than a Man who will have his Eyes upon the Ground, can be looking towards Heaven with all the Strength of his Sight.

If therefore we are to love God with all our Heart and with all our Soul, it is absolutely necessary, that we be first persuaded, that we have no Happiness but in him alone, and that we are capable of no other good, but what arises from our enjoyment of the divine Nature.

But we may be assured that we never believe this Truth till we resign or renounce all Pretensions to any other Happiness. For to desire the Happiness of Riches, at the same time that we know that all Happiness is in God, is as impossible as to desire the Happiness of Sickness, when we are assured that no bodily State is happy but that of Health.

It is therefore certain in an absolute Degree, that we are as much obliged to renounce the World with all our Heart and all our Strength, as we are obliged to love God with all our Heart and all our Strength.

It being as impossible to do one without the other, as to exert all our Strength two different ways at the same time.

It is also certain in the same absolute Degree, that we unavoidably love everything in proportion, as it appears to be our Happiness, if it appears to be half of our Happiness, it will necessarily have half the Strength of our Love, and if it appears to be all our Happiness we shall naturally love it with all our Strength.

The Christian Religion therefore which requires the whole Strength of our Nature to aspire after God, lays this just Foundation of our Performing this Duty, by Commanding us to renounce the Happiness of the World, knowing it impossible to have two Happinesses, and but one Love.

And indeed what can be more ridiculous, than to fancy, that a Man who is labouring after Schemes of Felicity, that is taken up in the Enjoyments of the World, is loving God with all his Soul and all his Strength?

Is it not as absurd as to suppose a Man that is devoted to the Sports of the Field, is at the same time contemplating Mathematical Speculations with all the Ardour of his Mind?

Let anyone but deal faithfully with himself, consult his own Experience, the inward Feeling of his Mind, and consider, whether whilst his Soul is taken up with the Enjoyments of this Life, he feels that his Soul is loving God with all its Force and Strength; let any Man say, that he feels this strong Tendency of his soul towards God, whilst it tends towards earthly Goods, and I may venture to depart from all that I have said.

Nothing therefore can be more plain than this, that if we are to fill our Soul with a new Love, we must empty it of all other Affections, and this by as great a Necessity as any in Nature.

The Love of God, as I have said of every other Virtue, is never in any complete State, but is to preserve and improve itself by a continual Opposition and Resistance of other Affections.

It is as necessary therefore continually to renounce the World, and all its Objects of our Affections, in order to form the Love of God in our Hearts; as it is necessary to renounce and resist all Motives of Self-love and Envy, to beget the Habit of Charity.

And a Man may as well pretend, that little Envyies are consistent with true Charity, as that little Desires after the Vanities of the World, are consistent with an entire Love of God with all our Hearts.

It may be said, that though this Appears true in the Reason of the Thing, as considered in Speculation, yet that this is a Love for Angels, and not suited to the State of Man.

I answer, it is what God has required, and the same Objection may be made against all other Christian Virtues, for they are all required in a perfect Degree.

Secondly, if it is a Degree of Affection hardly attainable, this makes for the Doctrine, which I have delivered, and shows the absolute Necessity of having no more Enjoyments in the World than such as Necessity requires.

For if it is so hard to raise the Soul to this Degree of Love, surely it must be stupid to add to the Difficulty, by foolish and contrary Affections.

Thirdly, If this is the proper Love of Angels, this proves that it is as proper for us, who are taught by God to pray, that his Will may be done on Earth as it is in Heaven.

At least, if this is the Love of Angels, it shows us, that we are to imitate it as far as our Nature will allow, and to stop at no Degrees short of it, but such as we cannot possibly reach.

But can he be said to be doing his utmost to Love like an Angel, that is building Schemes of Felicity on Earth, and seeking Satisfaction in its imaginary Enjoyments?

As sure therefore as this is the Love of Angels, as sure as we are called to an Angelical State of Life with God, so surely are we obliged to lay aside every hindrance, to part with every Enjoyment, that may stop or retard the Soul in its Rise and Affection towards God.

We differ from Angels, as we are in a State of Probation, and loaded with Flesh ; and though till the Trial be over, we must bear with Infirmities and Necessities, to which they are not subject, yet we must no more choose Follies, or find out false Delights for ourselves, than if we were, like them, free from all Infirmities.

The Love of Enemies, is said to be a Love that becomes the Perfection of God, but yet we see, that we are so far from being excused from this Manner of Love, because it is Divine, and suits the Nature of God, that we are for that Reason expressly called to it, that we may be Children of our Father which is in Heaven.

If therefore we are called to that Spirit of Love, which becomes the Perfection of God, surely the manner of angelic Love is not too high for us to aspire after.

All therefore that we are to learn from this Matter is this, that a Renunciation of the World is necessary, that this holy Love cannot be attained, unless we only use the World so far as our Needs and Infirmities require, and think of no Happiness but what is prepared for us at the right Hand of God.

Fourthly, this entire Love of God is as possible, as the Attainment of several other Duties, which still are the Rules of our Behaviour, and such as we are obliged to aspire after in the utmost Perfection.

The sincere Love of our Enemies, is perhaps of all other Tempers the hardest to be acquired, and the Motions of Envy and Spite the most difficult to be entirely laid aside, yet without this Temper, we are unqualified to say the Lord's Prayer. We see Examples of this Love of God in the first Followers of our Saviour ; and though we cannot work Miracles as they did, yet we may arrive at their personal Holiness, if we would but be so Humble as to imitate their Examples.

Our Saviour told them the infallible Way of arriving at Piety, which was by renouncing the World, and taking up the Cross and following Him, that they might have Treasure in Heaven. This was the only way then, and it would still be as Successful now, had we but the Faith and Humility to put it in Practice.

But we are now it seems become so Wise and Prudent, we see so much further into the Nature of Virtue and Vice, than the Simplicity of the first Christians, that we can take all the Enjoyments of the World along with us in our Road to Heaven.

They took Christ at his word and parted with all, but we take upon us to Reason about the Innocency of Wealth, and stately Enjoyments, and so possess everything, but the Spirit of our Religion.

It is sometimes said in defence of the Dulness of our Affections towards God, that Affections are Tempers which we cannot command, and depend much upon Constitution, so that Persons who are possessed of a true Fear of God, may yet by Reason of their Constitution, feel less Vehemency of Love than others, who are less piously disposed.

This is partly true and partly false.

It is true, that our Affections are very much influenced by our Constitutions, but then it is false, that this is any Defence of our want of Affection towards God.

Two Persons that equally feel the want of something to quench their Thirst, may show a different Passion after Water, by a difference in their Constitutions, but still, thirst after Water is the ruling Desire in both of them.

Two Epicures, by a difference in their Constitutions, may differ in the manner of their Eagerness after Dainties, but still, it is the Love of Dainties, that is the governing Love in both of them.

It is the same thing in the case before us, two Persons may equally look upon God as their sole Happiness, by Reason of their different Tempers, one may be capable of greater Fervours of Desire of him than the other, but still, it is the ruling Desire of the other.

Therefore though good Men may content themselves, though they have not such Flames of Desire, as they may see or hear of in other People, yet there is no Foundation for this content, unless they know, that they seek and desire no other Happiness than God, and that their Love, though not so fervent as some others, is still the ruling and governing Affection of their Soul.

Notwithstanding the Difference in Constitution, we see all People are affected with what they reckon their Happiness: If therefore People are not full of a Desire of God, it is because they are full, or at least engaged with another Happiness; it is not any Slowness of Spirits, but a Variety of Enjoyments that have taken hold of their Hearts, and rendered them insensible of that Happiness that is to be found in God.

When any Man has followed the Counsels of our Blessed Saviour, when he has renounced the World, rejected all the flattering Appearances of worldly Happiness, emptied himself of all idle Affections, and practised all the Means of fixing his Heart upon God alone, he may be pardoned if he still wants such Warmth of Affection, as so great a Good might justly raise.

But till all this be done, we as vainly appeal to our Constitutions, Tempers, and Infirmities of our State, as the unprofitable Servant appealed to the Hardness of his Master, and therefore hid his Talent in the Earth.

And it is there said, Out of thine own Mouth will I Judge thee, thou wicked Servant, thou knewest that I was an austere Man, &c., wherefore then gavest not thou my Money into the Bank, &c.

So we may justly fear, that we shall be Judged out of our own Mouths, for if we know, the loving God with all our Heart and Soul, to be so difficult to the Temper and Infirmities of our Nature, why therefore do we not remove every Hindrance, renounce every vain Affection, and with double Diligence practise all the Means of forming this divine Temper? For this we may be assured of, that the seeking Happiness in the Enjoyments of Wealth, is as contrary to the entire Love of God, as wrapping up the Talent in a Napkin, is as contrary to improving it.

He that has renounced the World, as having nothing in it that can render him Happy, will find his Heart at liberty to aspire to God in the highest Degrees of Love and Desire; he will then know what the Psalmist means, by those Expressions, My Heart is athirst for God, when shall I appear before the Presence of God?

And till we do thus renounce the World, we are Strangers to the Temper and Spirit of Piety, we do but act the Part of Religion, and are no more affected with those Devotions which are put into our Mouths, than an Actor upon the Stage is really angry himself, when he speaks an angry Speech.

Religion is only what it should be, when its Happiness has entered into our Soul, and filled our Hearts with its proper Tempers, when it is the settled Object of our Minds, and governs and affects us, as worldly Men are affected with that Happiness which governs their Actions.

The ambitious Man naturally rejoices at everything that leads to his Greatness, and as naturally grieves at such Accidents as oppose it.

Good Christians that are so wise as to aim only at one Happiness, will as naturally be affected in this Manner, with that which promotes or hinders their Endeavours after it.

For Happiness in whatever it is placed, equally governs the Heart of him that aspires after it.

It is therefore as necessary to renounce all the Satisfactions of Riches and Fortune, and place our sole Happiness in God, as it is necessary to love him with all our Heart, and all our Soul, with all our Mind, and all our Strength.

Another Duty which also proves the Necessity of this Doctrine, is the Love of our Neighbour. Thou shalt love thy Neighbour as thyself.

Now he that thinks he can perform this Duty, without taking our Saviour's Advice of forsaking all and following him, is as much mistaken, as if he imagines that he loves his Neighbour as himself, though he heaps up Treasures for his own Self-enjoyments, and Self-gratifications.

If a Man would know what this Love of his Neighbour implies, let him look impartially into his own Heart, and see what it is that he wishes to himself, and then turn all those same Wishes to his Neighbour, and this will make him feel the just Measure of his Duty, better than any other Description.

This will also teach him, that this true Love of his Neighbour is as inconsistent with the Love of the World, as Duelling is inconsistent with Meekness and Forgiveness of Injuries.

This Love is a Temper of Mind that suits only such Beings, as have one common undivided Happiness, where they cannot be Rivals to one another ; now this is the State of Christians, who have as truly one common Happiness, as they have one common God ; but if we put ourselves out of this State, and project for ourselves other Felicities in the uncertain Enjoyments of this Life, we make ourselves as incapable of this neighbourly Love, as Wolves and Bears that live upon Prey.

Now one common undivided Happiness being the only possible Foundation for the Practice of this great Benevolence, it is demonstrable, that if we seek any other Happiness than this, if we don't renounce all other Pretensions, we cannot keep clear of such Tempers, as will show, that we do not love our Neighbour as ourselves.

This Love, as has been said of the entire Love of God, is suited to the State of Angels, it being not to be imagined that they have more Benevolence than this for one another ; they can readily perform this Duty, because they never vary from their one true Happiness ; and as this makes it easy to them, so nothing can make it possible for us, but by imitating them, in placing our only Happiness in the Enjoyment of our true Good.

If our Happiness depends upon Men, our Tempers will necessarily depend upon Men, and we shall love and hate People in Proportion, as they help or hinder us in such Happiness.

This is absolutely necessary, and we can never act otherwise, till we are governed by a Happiness where no Men can make themselves our Rivals, nor prevent our Attainment of it.

When we are in this State, it will be no harder to help our Neighbour as ourselves, than it is to wish them the Enjoyment of the same Light, or the same common Air ; for these being Goods, which may be enjoyed equally by all, are not the Occasions of Envy.

But whilst we continue eager Competitors for the imaginary Enjoyments of this Life, we lay a necessary Foundation for such Passions, as are all directly contrary to the Fruits of Love.

I take it for granted, that when our Saviour delivered this Doctrine of Love, he intended it should be a governing Principle of our Lives; it concerns us therefore, as we have any Regard to our Salvation, to look carefully to ourselves, and to put ourselves in such a State, as we may be capable of performing it.

Now in this State we cannot be, till we are content to make no more of this World, than a Supply of our Necessities, and to wait for one only Happiness in the Enjoyment of God.

I don't appeal to Niggards and Worldlings, to the Proud and Ambitious; let those who think themselves moderate in their worldly Desires and Enjoyments, let such deal faithfully with their own Breasts, and see whether their Prosecution of worldly Affairs, permits them to love all Christians as themselves.

Their Moderation may perhaps keep them from the bitter Envyings and Hatred, to which ambitious Worldlings are subject, but still they have as certainly in their Degree, and in Proportion to their Love of the World, their Envyings, and Hatreds, and Want of sincere Love, as other Men.

If anyone's Heart can bear him Witness, that in Thought, Word, and Deed, he treats all Men with that Love which he bears to himself, it must be one, whose Heart fervently cries out with the Apostle, God forbid that I should glory, save in the Cross of Jesus Christ, by which the World is crucified unto me, and I unto the World.

Any other Glory than this, any other Use of the World, than being thus crucified to it, is inconsistent with this Degree of brotherly Love.

For a further Proof of this Truth, we need only look into the World, and see the Spirit that appears amongst almost all Christians.

We need not go to wicked and loose People, let us go into any virtuous Family whatever, we shall find that it has its particular Friendships and Hatreds, its Envyings and Evil-speakings, and all founded in the Interests and Regards of the World.

Now all this necessarily proceeds from hence, that all Christians are busy in attending to their worldly Interests, intending only to keep clear of dishonest and scandalous Practices; that is, they use the World as far as honest Heathens, or Jews would do, and so consequently have such Tempers as Jews and Heathens have.

For it is not only Cheating and unlawful Practices, but the bare Desire of worldly Things, and the placing Happiness in them, that lays the Foundation of all these unchristian Tempers ; that begets particular Friendships and Enmities, and divides Christians into more Parties, than there are Families amongst them.

Were there no dishonest Persons amongst us, yet if Christians give themselves up to the Happiness and Enjoyments of this World, there would be still almost the same Want of the loving our Neighbours as ourselves.

So that it is purely the engaging so far in the World, as sober Christians do, it is their false Satisfaction in so many Things that they ought to renounce, it is their being too much alive to the World, that makes all, even the Devout and Religious, subject to Tempers so contrary to the Love of their Neighbour.

How comes it that most People find it so easy to love, forgive, and pray for all Men at the Hour of their Death? Is it not because the Reason of Enmity, Envy, and Dislike, then ceases? All worldly Interests being then at an End, all worldly Tempers die away with them.

Let this therefore teach us that it is absolutely necessary to die to the World, if we would live and love like Christians.

I have now done with this Subject of renouncing the World and all worldly Tempers. I hope I have been so plain and clear upon it, as is sufficient to convince any serious Reader, that it is a Doctrine of Jesus Christ, that it is the very Foundation of his Religion, and so necessary, that without it we can exercise no Christian Temper in the Manner that we ought.

Some People have imagined, that they only renounce the World, as it ought to be renounced, who retire to a Cloister, or a Monastery ; but this is as unreasonable, as to make it necessary to lay aside all Use of Clothes, to avoid the Vanity of Dress.

As there is a sober and reasonable Use of particular Things, so there is a sober reasonable Use of the World, to which it is as lawful to conform, as it is lawful to eat and drink.

They only renounce the World as they ought, who live in the midst of it without worldly Tempers, who comply with their Share in the Offices of human Life, without complying with the Spirit that reigneth in the World.

As it is right to go thus far, so is it wrong as soon as we take one Step further.

There is nothing right in eating and drinking, but a strict and religious Temperance. It is the same thing in other Compliances with the State of this Life ; we may dress, we may buy and sell, we may labour, we may provide for ourselves and our Families ; but as these Things are only lawful for the same Reason that it is lawful to eat and drink, so are they to be governed by the same religious Strictness, that is to govern our Eating and Drinking; all Variation from this Rule, is like Gluttony and Intemperance, and fills our Souls with such Tempers, as are all contrary to the Spirit of Christ and his Religion.

The first Step that our Desires take beyond Things of Necessity, ranks us amongst Worldlings, and raises in our Minds all those Tempers, which disturb the Minds of worldly Men.

You think yourself very reasonable and conformable to Christianity, because you are moderate in your Desires; you don't desire an immense Estate, you desire only a little Finery in Dress, a little State in Equipage, and only to have Things genteel about you.

I answer, if this be your Case, you are happy in this, that you have but little Desires to conquer; but if these Desires have as fast hold of you, as greater Desires have of other People, you are in the same State of Worldly-mindedness that they are, and are no more dead to the World, than they that are the fondest of it. A Fondness for three or four Hundred Pounds a Year, is the same Slavery to the World, as a Fondness for three or four Thousand; and he that craves the Happiness of little Fineries, has no more renounced the World, than he that wants the Splendour of a large Fortune.

You hate the Extravagance of Dress, but if you cannot depart from your own little Finery, you have as much to alter in your Heart, as they that like none but the finest of Ornaments.

Consider therefore, that what you call moderate Desires, are as great Contrarieties to Religion, as those which you reckon immoderate; because they hold the Heart in the same State of false Satisfactions, raise the same vain Tempers, and do not suffer the Soul to rest wholly upon God.

When the Spirit of Religion is your Spirit, when Heavenly-mindedness is your Temper, when your Heart is set upon God, you will have no more Taste for the Vanity of one sort of Life than another.

Further, imagine to yourself, that this Pretence in Favour of moderate Desires, and little Fineries, had been made to our blessed Saviour, when he was upon Earth, preaching his Doctrines of renouncing the World and denying ourselves.

I dare say your own Conscience tells you, that he would have rebuked the Author of such a Pretence with as much Indignation, as he rebuked Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan, for thou savourest not the Things that be of God.

Now the Spirit of Christianity is the same Spirit that was in Christ, when he was upon the Earth; and if we have Reason to think, that such a Pretence would have been severely condemned by Christ, we have the same Reason to be sure, that it is as severely condemned by Christianity.

Had our blessed Saviour a little before he left the World, given Estates to his Apostles, with a Permission for them to enjoy little Fineries, and a moderate State in genteel Show and Equipage, he had undone all that he had said of the Contempt of the World, and Heavenly-mindedness; such a Permission had been a Contradiction to the most repeated and common Doctrines that he had taught.

Had his Apostles lived in such a State, how could they have gloried only in the Cross of Christ, by which the World was crucified unto them, and they unto the World? How could they have said, Love not the World, nor the Things in the World, for all that is in the World, the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, and the Pride of Life, is not of the Father, but is of the World?

Had they lived in a little State, in a moderate Show of Figure, Equipage, and worldly Delights, how could they have said, that She that liveth in Pleasure, is dead whilst she liveth?

How could they have said, that They who will be rich, fall into a Temptation, and a Snare, and into many foolish and hurtful Lusts, which drown Men in Destruction?

For it is not the Desire of great Riches, but it is the Desire of Riches, and a Satisfaction in the Pleasures of them, that is the Snare, and the Temptation, and that fills Men's Minds with foolish and hurtful Lusts, that keeps them in the same State of worldly Folly, as they are whose Desires are greater.

Lastly, Had the Apostles lived in that Manner, how could they have said, that Whatsoever is born of God, overcometh the World?

For certainly he who is happy in the Pleasure and Figure of a small Estate, has no more overcome the World, than he who is happy in the Splendour of one that is greater.

Thus therefore Matters stand with Relation to our blessed Saviour and his Apostles; the Doctrines they taught made it impossible for them to take any Part, or seek any Pleasure in the Show, and Figure, and Riches, of this World.

One would think that this one Reflection, was alone sufficient to show us, what Contempt of the World, what heavenly Affection we are to aspire after.

For how blind and weak must we be, if we can think that we may live in a Spirit and Temper, which could not possibly be the Spirit and Temper of Christ and his Apostles?

Another Pretence for worldly Care, and Labour after Riches, is to provide for our Families.

You want to leave Fortunes to your Children, that they may have their Share in the Figure and Show of the World. Now consider, do you do this upon Principles of Religion, as the wisest and best Thing you can do, either for yourself, or your Children?

Can you be said to have chosen the one Thing needful for yourself, or the one Thing needful for them, who make it your chief Care, to put them in a State of Life, that is a Snare, and a Temptation, and the most likely of all others, to fill their Minds with foolish and hurtful Lusts?

Is it your Kindness towards them, that puts you upon this Labour? Consider therefore what this Kindness is founded upon; perhaps it is such a Kindness, as when tender Mothers carry their Daughters to all Plays and Balls; such a Kindness, as when indulgent Fathers support their Sons in all the Expense of their Follies; such kind Parents may more properly be called the Tempters and Betrayers of their Children.

You love your Children, and therefore you would leave them rich. It is said of our blessed Saviour, that he loved the young rich Man that came unto him, and as an Instance of his Love, he bid him sell all that he had, and give to the Poor. What a Contrariety is here? The Love which dwelleth in you, is as contrary to that Love which dwelt in Christ, as Darkness is contrary to Light.

We have our Saviour's express Command to love one another, as he hath loved us, and can you think that you are following this Love, when you are giving those Things to your Children, which he took away from his Friends, and which he could not possibly have given them, without contradicting the greatest Part of his Doctrines?

But supposing that you succeed in your Intentions, and leave your Children rich, what must you say to them when you are dying? Will you then tell them, that you have the same Opinion of the Greatness and Value of Riches that you ever had, that you feel the Pleasure of remembering how much Thought and Care you have taken to get them? Will you tell them, that you have provided for their Ease and Softness, their Pleasure and Indulgence, and Figure in the World, and that they cannot do better, than to eat and drink, and take their Fill of such Enjoyments as Riches afford? This would be dying like an Atheist.

But on the other Hand, if you will die like a good Christian, must you not endeavour to fill their Minds with your dying Thoughts? Must you not tell them, that they will soon be in a State, when the World will signify no more to them, than it does to you, and that there is a Deceitfulness, a Vanity, a Littleness, in the Things of this Life, which only dying Men feel, as they ought.

upon Christian Perfection. 79

Will you not tell them, that all your own Failings, the Irregularity of your Life, your Defects in Devotion, the Folly of your Tempers, the Strength of your Passions, and your Failure in Christian Perfection, has been all owing to wrong Opinions of the Value of worldly Things; and that if you had always seen the World in the same Light that you see it now, your Life had been devoted to God, and you would have lived in all those holy Tempers and heavenly Affections, in which you now desire to die?

Will you not tell them, that it is the Enjoyment of the World, that corrupts the Hearts, and blinds the Minds of all People, and that the only Way to know what Good there is in Devotion, what Excellence there is in Piety, what Wisdom in Holiness, what Happiness in heavenly Affection, what Vanity in this Life, and what Greatness in Eternity, is to die to the World, and all worldly Tempers?

Will you not tell them, that Riches spent upon ourselves, either in the Pleasures of Ease and Indulgence, in the Vanity of Dress or the Show of State and Equipage, are the Bane and Destruction of our Souls, making us blindly content with Dreams of Happiness, till Death awakes us into real Misery?

From this therefore it appears, that your Kindness for your Children, is so far from being a good Reason why you should so carefully labour to leave them rich, and in the Enjoyment of the State and Show of the World, that if you die in a Spirit of Piety, if you love them, as Christ loved his Disciples, your Kindness will oblige you to exhort them to renounce all Self-enjoyment of Riches, as contrary to those holy Tempers, and that heavenly Affection, which you now find to be the only Good and Happiness of human Nature.

Chapter VI.

Christianity calleth all Men to a State of Self-denial and Mortification.

CHRISTIANITY is a Doctrine of the Cross, that teaches the Restoration of Mankind to the Favour of God, by the Death and Sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

This being the Foundation of the Christian Religion, it shows us, that all Persons who will act conformably to the Nature and Reason of Christianity, must make themselves Sufferers for Sin.

For if there is a Reasonableness between Sin and Suffering, every Christian acts against the Reason of Things, that does not endeavour to pay some part of that Debt which is due to Sin.

Indeed it would be strange to suppose, that Mankind were redeemed by the Sufferings of their Saviour, to live in Ease and Softness themselves; that Suffering should be the necessary Atonement for Sin, and yet that Sinners should be excused from Sufferings.

Such an High Priest became us, says the Apostle, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from Sinners.

Now if the Holiness of Christ rendered his Sacrifice acceptable to God, does not this teach us that we must labour to be holy in order to be accepted of God?

But is there not the same Reason, and the same Example in the Sufferings of Christ, if they made God more propitious to Sin, must we not as well take this Way of Suffering, to make ourselves fitter Objects of Divine Pardon?

There is therefore the same Reason in the Nature of the Thing, for us Sinners to endeavour to conform ourselves to the Sufferings, as to labour after the Holiness of Christ; since they both jointly conspired to recommend the great Atonement for Sin, and must jointly conspire to render us proper Objects of the Benefits of it.

Nor is the sinless State of Christ a better Reason for us to avoid and flee from Sin, than his suffering State is a Reason for our renouncing all Softness and Indulgence in Pleasures.

Had Christ wanted either Holiness or Sufferings, his Sacrifice had been wanting in an essential Part. If therefore we think to be accepted of God by Holiness, without Suffering, we seem to contradict the Nature of our Religion as much, as if we thought to be accepted through Sufferings without Holiness.

It may perhaps be said, in the Words of our Liturgy, That Christ having by his one Oblation of himself once offered, made a full, perfect, and sufficient Sacrifice, Oblation, and Satisfaction, for the Sins of the whole World, that Christians have no Occasion to make any Suffering for Sin.

To this it may be answered,

That the Sacrifice of Christ is full and sufficient, first, as it takes away the Necessity of all the legal Sacrifices: Secondly, as it has no Need to be repeated again: And thirdly, as it fully reconciles God to accept of us upon the Terms of the New Covenant.

Now there is no Occasion to suffer for Sin, in order to make the Sacrifice of Christ more complete, or to add a further Value to the Atonement for Sin; but then it is to be considered, that if Self-suffering for Sin be a good and reasonable Duty in itself, and proper for a Sinner, that the Fulness of Christ's Sacrifice has no more taken away the Necessity of it, than it has taken away the Necessity of Humility, or any other Virtue.

Christ is as well said to be our Sanctification, our Holiness and Righteousness, as our Atonement for Sin, yet we should much mistake the Scripture, if we should think, that because he is our Holiness, therefore we need not endeavour to be Holy ourselves.

Yet this is as good a Conclusion, as to imagine, that we need not suffer for our Sins ourselves, because Christ's Sufferings are a full Atonement for Sin.

For they are no otherwise a sufficient Atonement for Sin, than as Christ is our sufficient Holiness, so that we may as well trust to his Holiness, without labouring to be Holy ourselves, as trust to his Sufferings, without making ourselves also Sufferers for Sin.

Let it now therefore be observed, that were there no particular Precepts or Doctrines, that expressly called us to a State of Self-denial, and Self-suffering, the very Nature of Religion, is an undeniable Argument, that the Way of Suffering, is the right and certain Way for Sinners to find God more Propitious to their Sin.

He that can doubt of this, must suppose, that God required a Way of Atonement in Jesus Christ, that had nothing of Atonement in it; for if it had, it must be undeniable, that all, who, as far as their Natures will allow, conform themselves to the Similitude of Christ's Sacrifice, must make themselves more acceptable to God.

That Christ's Sufferings have not made all other Sufferings for Sin needless, is plain from hence, that all Christians are still left subject to Death. For surely it may with Truth be affirmed, that Death is a Suffering for Sin.

Now since all Christians are to offer up their Bodies at Death, as a Sacrifice or Suffering for Sin, this plainly teaches us that a State of Self-denial and Suffering is the proper State of this Life. For surely it must be proper to make every Part of our Life suitable to such an End.

Does God unmake us, and dash our very Form into pieces? and can we think that a Life of Pleasure and Self-indulgence, can become us under such a Sentence?

What plainer Proof can we have, that we are devoted Sufferers for Sin, than that we are devoted to Death? for Death hath no place in a State of allowed Pleasure and Enjoyment. When the Suffering for Sin is over, there will be no more Death; but so long as Death lasts, so long are all Beings that are subject to Death, in a State that requires Humiliation and Suffering; and they rebel against God, if they do not make their Lives conformable to that Mark of divine Displeasure, which death signifies.

Thus as the Mortality of our Condition, is a certain Proof that our Life is in Disorder, and unacceptable to God, so is it also a Proof, that we ought to refuse Pleasures and Satisfactions, which are the Pleasures of a State of Disorder, and stay for Joy and Delights till we are removed to such a State of Perfection, as God will delight to continue to all Eternity.

The Apostle tells us that Flesh and Blood cannot enter into the Kingdom of God, must we not therefore be very unreasonable, if we can cast about for Mirth in such a Condition, or give up ourselves to the vain Pleasures and Indulgences of a Flesh and Blood, which are too corrupt, too unholy to enter into the Kingdom of God?

This may suffice to show us the Excellency and Reasonableness of our Saviour's Doctrine.

He said unto them all, if any Man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his Cross daily and follow me.

For whosoever will save his Life, shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his Life for my sake, the same shall save it.

Here is a common Condition proposed to all that would be Christ's Disciples, they are called to deny themselves, and take up their Cross daily. To show us that this belongs to all Christians, the Apostle saith, He said unto them all; St. Mark hath it thus, And when he had called the People unto him, with his Disciples also, he said unto them.

The Church of Rome refuses to give the Cup in the Holy Sacrament to the Laity. We reckon it a very good Argument against that Custom, that our Saviour when he delivered the Cup, said unto them, Drink ye all of this.

Now if it be an Argument that all Christians are to receive the Cup, because in the Institution of the Sacrament it is said, Drink ye all of this, is it not as good an Argument that all Christians are here called to deny themselves, and take up their Cross daily, because it is delivered in the same Manner, He said unto them all, and again, When he called the People unto him with his Disciples also, he said unto them?

To me this Place seems as general a Call to all Christians, as Drink ye all of this, is a general Command to all Christians.

Let anyone try to evade the Obligation of this Text, and he will find, that he must use such Arguments, as will equally serve to get rid of any other Part of Holy Scripture.

If this Passage only called the first Disciples of Christ to an external State of Sufferings, and Persecutions from other People, it might with some Pretence be supposed only to relate to People, when they are in such a State of Persecution.

But as it calls them to deny themselves, to take up their Cross daily, it is plain, that it calls them to a Suffering and Self-denial, which they were to inflict upon themselves.

Now if they are called thus to deny themselves, and subject themselves to a voluntary Cross in order to be Christ's Disciples, it will be hard to show, that Self-denials are not as lasting Terms of Christianity, as Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Water-Baptism is Necessary because our Saviour has Instituted it, and the Reason for continuing it, is the same as for observing it at first. But still, it is but an external Rite, or Sacrament, which in its own Nature hath nothing relating to Holiness and Purification of the Soul, but has all its Excellency from the Institution of Christ.

This cannot be said of these Sort of Sufferings, for they have an internal and essential Relation to Holiness and Purification in the present State of Man.

I say in the present State of Man, because though these Self-denials or Mortifications, are proper only to Man whilst he is in this State of Corruption, yet they are as true Parts of Holiness, and as essential Virtues, as those which will last for ever.

Charity to the Poor is founded in the Necessities and Infirmities of this Life, yet it is as real a Degree of Holiness, and as much to be performed for its own Sake, as that Charity which which will never have an End.

It is the same in these Self-denials, they only belong to a State of Sin, but whilst such a State continues, they are the indispensable Duty of Sinners, and as necessary and acceptable to God as relieving the Poor.

This must be allowed, or we must deny, that there was any real Atonement for Sin in the Sufferings and Death of Christ; for if there were any real Atonement in the Sufferings of Christ, if his Sufferings rendered God propitious and reconciled* to Sinners, it is undeniable, that all who suffer with the same Spirit that Christ suffered, must in their Degree recommend themselves to the Favour of God, on the same Account, and for the same Reasons that the Sufferings of Christ procured Peace and Reconciliation.

If Christ the Lord of all, and Head of the Church, is still making Intercession for us at the Right Hand of God, does not this plainly teach us, that we cannot be accepted by God, unless we live in a State of Supplication and Prayer for ourselves?

And if he who had no Sin of his own, was obliged to such Sufferings to make himself be heard as an Advocate for Sin:

*This is a necessary ground of peace to live

surely Sinners themselves cannot presume to sue for their own Pardon, without putting themselves in the like State of Humiliation and Suffering. For since the Atonement is made by Sufferings, this as truly recommends Sufferings to Sinners, as if it had been made by Prayer, that would have shown the Way of Prayer to have been the Way of finding Pardon.

Self-denial therefore and Sufferings are Duties essential to the present State of Sin, and recommend us to God, as Holiness and Purity recommend us, by their own Nature and intrinsic Fitness, that is, they are good, as Prayer, Humility, and Charity are good.

When we shall be removed to a State that is free from Sin, Self-Denial and Mortification will then be no Part of our Duty; but so long as this State of Sin lasts, so long does the Necessity and Reason of Self-denial and Mortification last; they are as necessary, as Prayers and Devotion, and are as truly essential Parts of Holiness, as Chastity and Humility.

For Repentance and Sorrow for Sin is as necessary to a being in a State of Sin, as necessary on its own Account, and from the Nature of the Thing, as the Love of God is necessary from a Being that receives all his Happiness from God.

For to express our Indignation, and inflict Punishment on that which displeases God, is as reasonable in itself, and as much an Act of Holiness, as to love and cherish that which God loves. So that all our Self-denials as Punishments of Sin, as Expressions of Sorrow for Guilt, and as Preventions of Temptation, may be considered as so many Instances of our Love of Purity.

Whilst therefore we continue in a State of Corruption, it is as necessary that we continue in a State of Repentance, Self-denial, and Sorrow, as it is necessary to continue our Desires and Endeavours after Purity.

If we can find a Time when we have no Sin to lament, no Occasion for the Severities of Repentance, it may be granted, that that would be a Time for the abstaining from Self-denial, and voluntary Sufferings.

But if human Life knows of no such Season, if we can never look at ourselves, but under the Weight of Sin, it is a Demonstration that Indignation at ourselves, and a voluntary Suffering for Sin, is the necessary constant State of Christians.

Indeed if it be allowed that Repentance and Sorrow for Sin is necessary, and that it ought to be the constant Habit of a Christian's Mind, till this Life be at an End, we need no stronger Proof of the constant Necessity of Self-denial and Mortification.

For what Reason can there be for Sorrow and Grief for Sin, which is not the same Reason for Self-denial, and the daily Cross? Is not Grief and Sorrow for Sin, a Suffering and Punishment for Sin? Or can we grieve and afflict ourselves for our Sins, unless we express that Grief by a hearty Indignation, and real Self-denial?

If therefore we consider the Reason and Fitness of Repentance, we see the Reason and Fitness of Self-denial, and voluntary Sufferings, and consequently we must acknowledge, that these Self-denials are not less necessary, nor less recommended to us, than Repentance and Sorrow for Sin.

For since they are of the same Nature, and for the same End, and also essential to true Repentance, it follows, that all Christians are obliged to be as constant in their Self-denials, and Mortifications, as they are to be constant in their Repentance.

Because such voluntary Sufferings have the same essential Relation to Holiness, that Charity and the Love of God have.

For though Charity and the Love of God will never cease, but this Self-denial will have an End, yet is this Self-denial during this State of Sin, as essential to the Holiness of Persons in such a State, as any other Virtue.

It being the same Degree of inward Purity, and as right a Spirit and Temper to mourn and afflict ourselves for our Sins, as to love that which God loves, or be thankful for his Mercies.

Now if a Person was to give himself up to Sorrow in a State of Happiness, or to Unthankfulness, though in the Midst of Mercies, he would act just as unreasonably, just as contrary to the Nature of Things, as he that gives himself up to Pleasures and Indulgences in a State of Corruption and Sin.

Let it therefore be carefully observed, that Self-denial and Mortification, are only other Words for Repentance and Sorrow for Sin, and he that can distinguish them from one another, may distinguish Grief from Sorrow.

He therefore that can doubt, whether Christians are called to a daily Practice of Self-denial, seems to know as little of true Religion, as if he doubted whether they were called to a daily Repentance. For when we may live in a State contrary to Repentance, then, and then only, may we live in a State contrary to Self-denial.

Let a Christian ever cease from Self-denial, let him ever forbear the Mortification of his Appetites, and at that Time he ceases to consider himself as a Sinner, and behaves himself as though he were then free from the Guilt and Danger of Sin.

But as he never is in this State of Freedom, so if he acts as if he were so, he acts as falsely, as if he took himself to be an Angel.

There is therefore as much Reason that the daily Cross, or Self-denial, should be imposed upon Christians, as a daily Prayer, or Repentance; and there is the same Impiety, the same false Judgment in refusing a daily Self-denial, as in refusing or ceasing from a daily Devotion and Sorrow for Sin.

For a Man may as well imagine that he prays or gives Thanks to God, when he only repeats the Words of a Prayer or Thanksgiving, as that he repents for his Sins, unless his Repentance be a real Punishment, a true State of Mortification.

We may now observe, that this Doctrine of Self-suffering is founded upon the most important fundamental Articles of our Religion.

If we consider our Redemption as an Atonement made by Suffering, does not this show us the Necessity of seeking Pardon by a Fellowship in the Sufferings of Christ?

Need we any other Argument, that there is no State so suitable to a Sinner as that of Suffering, when God has appointed Sufferings as the Atonement for Sin?

If we consider that we are devoted to Death, and under a Necessity of falling into Dust, as a Sacrifice for Sin, does not this teach us the Necessity of making our Life conformable to the Intention of such a Death?

For could there be any Necessity that we should die as a Sacrifice for Sin, if we might lead a Life of a contrary Nature? Or could we act more contrary to God, than by making that Life a State of Pleasure and Indulgence, which he has laid under the Curse of Death? Ought we to indulge a Life which God considers as too unholy to continue in Being?

Lastly, If we consider that Repentance is the chief, the most constant and perpetual Duty of a Christian, that our Holiness has hardly any other Existence, than what arises from a perpetual Repentance, can it be doubted, that Mortification and Self-denial are essential, perpetual Parts of our Duty?

For to suppose a Repentance without the Pain of Mortification, and the Punishment of Self-denial, is as absurd, as to suppose a Labour after Holiness, which takes not one Step towards it.

For if Repentance be not an Exercise of Mortification and Self-denial, it is no more a State of Repentance, than the lifting up our Hands, without our Hearts, is a State of Prayer and Devotion.

Repentance is a hearty Sorrow for Sin, Sorrow is a Pain or Punishment, which we are obliged to raise to as high a Degree as we can, that we may be fitter Objects of God's Pardon.

upon Christian Perfection. 87

So that Self-denial and Mortification is only another Word, for a real Repentance.

If Christians will still so far forget the Nature and Design of their Religion, as to imagine that our Saviour's Call to a daily Cross and Self-denial was only a Call to his first Disciples to expect Sufferings and Death from their Enemies, they are governed by as little Reason, as if they should think, Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at Hand, only obliged those to Repentance, who first entered into the Kingdom of God.

For there is nothing in the Nature of Repentance, that shows it to be a more constant Duty, or more essential to the Christian Life, than there is in this Mortification and Self-suffering.

It is also very absurd to suppose, that a Command to deny themselves and take up their own Cross daily, should mean only the enduring and expecting of Sufferings from others.

Let us now suppose the contrary, that Christians are not called to this State of Mortification, or Denial of their Appetites. Let us suppose that Christian Churches are full of fine gay People, who spend their Days in all the Pleasures and Indulgences which the Spirit of the World can invent.

Can it in any Sense be said of such, that they live in a State of Repentance and Sorrow for Sin? May they not with as much Regard to Truth, be said to live in Sackcloth and Ashes? Can their Hearts feel any Sorrow, or be mourning for the Weight and Misery of Sin, who live only to the studied Enjoyments of Ease and Pleasure? Can they be said to grieve at Guilt, or be afraid of Sin, who pamper all their Appetites, and seek all the Enjoyments that lead to Temptation? Can they who live in the Gratifications of the Flesh, and Scenes of Pleasure, be said to be working out their Salvation with Fear and Trembling? May they not as justly be said to be walking barefoot to Jerusalem?

If therefore we will not destroy the whole State of Religion, if we will but own it to be a State of Trial and Probation, we must also allow, that Self-denial and Abstinence from Pleasures are daily essential Duties of it.

For a Life of Sorrow for Sin, and mourning for the Guilt of it, and a Life of Pleasure and Indulgence, are inconsistent States, and as necessarily destroy one another, as Motion puts an End to Rest.

Repentance will have no Place in Heaven, because that will be a State of Perfection, and for the same Reason it ought never to be laid aside on Earth, because there is no Time, when we are not under the Guilt, and subject to the Danger of Sin.

This does not suppose, that we are always to be uttering

Forms of Confession from our Mouths, but it supposes, that we are always to live with so much Watchfulness, as becomes penitent Sinners, and never do anything, but what highly suits with a State of Repentance.

So that whenever we can abate our Self-denials, without abating our Sorrow for Sin, when we can find Pleasures that neither soften the Mind, nor make it less fearful of Temptation, then, and so far only, may we seek our Ease.

For Repentance whilst it is only a Lipwork at stated Times is nothing, it has not had its Effect, till it has entered into the State and Habit of our Lives, and rendered us as fearful of Sin in every Part of our Lives, as when we are making our Confessions.

Now this State of Penitence, which alone is suited to a State of Corruption and Infirmary, can no more exist without constant daily Self-denial, than we can daily govern our Appetites, without daily looking after them.

To proceed. Our Saviour saith, Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted.

Now this is another direct Call to Self-denial and Abstinence from Pleasures, as must appear to everyone, that knows Mourning to be different from Pleasure and Indulgence.

The Blessedness that is here ascribed to Mourning, must be understood in relation to Mourning, as it is a State of Life, and not as to any transient Acts, or particular Times of Mourning.

For no Actions are valuable, or rewardable, but as they arise from a State or Temper of Mind that is constant and habitual.

If it had been said blessed are the Charitable, it must have meant, blessed are they who live in a State and Habit of Charity. For the same Reason, are we to understand the Blessedness which is due to Mourning, to be only due to a State and Life of Mourning.

Secondly, Blessed are they that mourn, shows us that this Mourning concerns all Men as such, without any Distinction of Time or Persons, so that its Excellency and Fitness must be founded upon something that is common and constant to all times and all Persons. For if there was any time, when we might change this State of Mourning, or were there any Persons that might be excused from it, it could not be said in general, Blessed are they that mourn.

If therefore this Mourning be a reasonable and excellent Temper, that equally leads all Orders of Men to Blessedness, its Reasonableness must be founded in the common State and Condition of Man; that is, if Mourning be good for all Men, it must be, because the State and Condition of all Men as such, requires Mourning.

But if this Mourning be founded in the present State of Man, as suitable to his Condition in this Life, it must be always the same excellent and proper Temper, till Death changes his State, and puts him in a Condition, that requires another Temper.

Now what can this State of Mourning be, but a godly Sorrow founded upon a true Sense and Feeling of the Misery of our State, as it is a State of fallen Spirits, living in Sin and Vanity, and Separation from God ?

What can it be, but a ceasing to enjoy and rejoice in the false Goods and Enjoyments of this Life, because they delude and corrupt our Hearts, increase our Blindness, and sink us deeper in our Distance from God ?

What Mourning can be blessed, but such as mourns at that which displeases God, which condemns and rejects what the Wisdom of God rejects, which loosens us from the Vanity of the World, lessens the Weight of our Corruption, and quickens our Motions and Aspirings towards Perfection ?

This is not a Mourning that shows itself in occasional Fits of Sorrow, or Dejection of Mind, but it is a regular Temper, or rather a right Judgment, which refuses Pleasures, that are not only the Pleasures of a corrupted State, but such as also increase and strengthen our Corruption.

One constant Property of a true Mourning, is Abstinence from Pleasures ; and we generally reckon a Sorrow very near its End, when Diversions and Amusements begin to be relished.

This Mourning therefore to which this Blessedness is ascribed, must be a constant Abstinence from vain Joys ; it must preserve itself by rejecting and disrelishing all those worldly Delights and Satisfactions, which if admitted, would put an end to its State of Mourning.

Now what is all this, but that State of Self-denial and Daily-cross to which our Saviour called his Disciples ?

For we may imagine anything, if we can imagine, that a State of religious Mourning is not a State of religious Self-denial.

Unless therefore we will say, that the Blessedness of Mourning, was also only preached to Christ's first Followers, we must allow, that all Christians are equally called to that Daily-cross and Self-denial, which was then required.

It ought also here to be observed, that we are called to these Duties upon our Hopes of Happiness.

For Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted, is the same thing as saying, Miserable and cursed are they that do not mourn, for they shall not be comforted. Again, Blessed are the poor in Spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Nothing can carry a greater Denial and Contradiction to all the Tempers and Ways of the World than this Doctrine ; it not only puts an end to all that we esteem wicked and immoderate Desires of worldly Satisfactions, but calls us from all worldly Satisfactions, which anyway fasten the Soul to any false Goods, and make it less ardent after true Happiness. As the Christian Religion regards only the Salvation of our Souls, and restoring us to a Life with God in Heaven, it considers everything as ill, that keeps us in a State of any false Enjoyment, and nothing as good, but what loosens us from the World, and makes us less Slaves to its Vanities. Blessed are the poor in Spirit, because it is a Spirit of Disengagement and Disrelish of the World, that puts the Soul in a State of Liberty and Fitness, to relish and receive the Offers of true Happiness.

The Doctrine of this Text, is purely the Doctrine of Self-denial and Daily-cross, to which our Saviour called his Disciples.

For let anyone consider, how it is possible for a Man to be poor in Spirit, but by renouncing those Enjoyments, which are the proper Delights of such as are high, and rich in Spirit. Now a Man is high in Spirit, when his own State and Dignity give him a Pleasure, he is rich in Spirit who seeks and delights in the Enjoyments and Felicities which Riches afford, he is therefore poor in Spirit, who mortifies all vain Thoughts, rejects every Self-pleasure, and avoids and dislikes the empty Satisfactions which Riches and Fortune give.

Now this, which is undoubtedly the Doctrine of this Passage, is the very Essence and Soul of all Self-denial and Mortification, which is nothing else but a constant checking all our vain Tempers, and a denying ourselves such Enjoyments, as naturally strengthen and support them. So that the Blessedness of Poverty of Spirit, is the Blessedness of Self-denial and Mortification.

For surely if we are called to a constant Poverty of Spirit, we are called to a constant Refusal of all Enjoyments, but such as Poverty of Spirit requires.

For it is to be observed, that when it is said, Blessed are the poor in Spirit, that the Meaning is, Blessed are they that are governed by this Spirit, for that is only a Man's Spirit and Temper, which rules and directs his Actions.

An ambitious Man, is one that is governed by his Spirit of Ambition, so a Man is poor in Spirit, when that is the Spirit which governs his Actions.

As the rich in Spirit, are such as seek the Felicity and Gratifications of Riches, so the poor in Spirit is he, who avoids and dislikes all such Gratifications, and seeks such Things as properly suit with such a mortified Habit of Mind.

upon Christian Perfection. 91

So that no one is to reckon himself poor in Spirit, till it makes him not only reject all Instances of Pride and Self-enjoyment, but till he seeks and desires things that are as proper to a Poverty of Spirit, as Food is proper to Hunger, or Water to Thirst.

For as Hunger is known by its being a Desire of Food, and Thirst by its Desire of Liquor, so Poverty of Spirit can only be known, by its seeking such things, as are as true Signs of it, as the seeking of Water, is a Sign of Thirst.

For this is undeniable, that every Spirit or Temper must only be known, by the Nature of the Things it covets.

If we are High-minded, our Care will be exercised about high Things, and if we are lowly in Heart, we shall as certainly not only condescend, but seek after things that are lowly. Let a Man therefore, who would deal faithfully with himself, consider not only whether he is Proud, Luxurious, Indulgent of himself, and devoted to the Pleasures and Satisfaction of this Life, but let him consider whether he is poor in Spirit, whether the Things that he seeks, the Designs he has on foot, the Happiness he aims at, and the Course of his Life, be such as is really directed by a true Poverty of Spirit.

For he ought not to think that he is governed by this Spirit, till he finds himself an Enemy to every Pleasure, every Care, and every Labour that is contrary to it. When he hates Self-indulgence, as the Epicure hates Self-denial, when he studies Humility, as the ambitious Man aims at Greatness, when he avoids the Vanities of the World, as the Sailor avoids Rocks, then may he reckon himself entitled to that Blessedness, which belongs to those who are poor in Spirit.

This is that Self-denial, Holy-discipline, Daily-cross, to which all Christians are called; that by thus losing their Lives, that is, thus ceasing to live the Life of this World, they may purchase to themselves a Life of endless Happiness in another State.

I believe there are few Christians, who do not acknowledge that Christianity is still in some Degree a Doctrine of the Cross; and that the Texts above cited, have still some meaning with regard to all Christians; but then they believe this in some such loose and general Way, or live with so little regard to what they do believe of it, that they feel no Condemnation of themselves, whatever their Lives are, from hearing these Doctrines.

But notwithstanding all this, it is certain that Christians are as much obliged to conform exactly to these Doctrines of the Cross, as to the Observance of the Ten Commandments. For the Ten Commandments were not more certainly Laws to the Jews, than the Doctrines of Self-denial and Poverty of Spirit are Laws to all Christians.

Another plain and remarkable Instance of Self-denial, is to be seen in the following Words.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, an Eye for an Eye, and a Tooth for a Tooth, but I say unto you, that ye resist not Evil, but whosoever will smite thee on thy right Cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any Man will sue thee at Law and take away thy Coat, let him have thy Cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go with him a Mile, go with him twain.

Our Blessed Saviour's first Proposal was this, If any Man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his Cross daily, and follow me.

In the Text before us, he instructs them in several Instances, wherein this Self-denial and Daily-cross consisted, which are now the common Terms of Salvation to all Christians.

We are to deny ourselves, in not demanding a Tooth for a Tooth, we are to take up our Daily-cross by turning our Cheek to the Smiter, and suffering such ill Usage, as we could prevent by Resistance.

We are to deny ourselves, in not defending ourselves by Suits at Law; and must take up the Cross of one Injury after another, rather than appeal to the Contention of a Trial. This is sufficiently taught, by our being required to expose ourselves to the farther Loss of our Cloak, rather than have recourse to Law to secure our Coat.

The Words which deliver this Doctrine are so very plain and express, that they need no Illustration, it is as plain also, that they equally belong to all Christians of all Ages. The Manner of our Saviour's delivering himself upon these Points, puts it out of all question, that they were Doctrines of the Cross, which were to be perpetual Marks of his Followers.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, an Eye for an Eye, &c. But I say unto you, that ye resist not Evil, &c.

It was not possible for our Saviour to express himself in a more authoritative Manner than he has here done, or to show us more plainly, that he was here acting as the great Law-giver of Christians, and delivering Doctrines which should be perpetual Laws to all his Disciples, and such as should constantly distinguish them from all the World. Nor is it possible for anyone to evade the literal and open Meaning of these Doctrines, but in such a way as must destroy the Sense of any other Part of Scripture.

If it could be shown, that we are not obliged by the plain and express Doctrine of these Passages, it might as well be shown, that the next Doctrine, But I say unto you, love your Enemies, bless them that curse you, does not oblige us in the plain and literal Sense of the Words.

For both the Passages are equally supported by the same Authority of our Saviour, expressed in the same manner, I say unto you. This Degree also of Love which we are to show to our Enemies, is as much a Doctrine of the Cross, as contrary to all our natural Tempers, and worldly Interests, as that of Patience, Meekness, and Submission to those who treat us injuriously. These Virtues are also necessary to one another; we cannot thus Love and do good to our Enemy, unless we are thus patient under Sufferings, and deny ourselves all Instances of Anger and Uneasiness at them.

It is pretended by some that these Passages only forbid our Prosecution of spiteful and malicious Suits at Law.

But such People might as well pretend, that the Eighth Commandment only forbids wanton and spiteful Stealing, but allows it, when it is done Soberly and with no spiteful Intention.

For the Case which our Saviour put, is directly intended against such a Pretence as this.

It is the Case of a Man, who has a Suit commenced against him for his Coat, he is not allowed to consider that it is his own Coat, and that he enters no further into the Trial, than to secure his Coat; he is not allowed to show this Degree of Contention or Anger at Injustice, or Impatience under Suffering, but is patiently to permit his Coat to be taken from him, though that Patience be the Means of losing his Cloak also.

It is not therefore spiteful Prosecutions, but the most seemingly reasonable Self-defence that is here forbidden. Further, Malice and Revenge were not allowed to the Jews, yet we are here commanded to deny ourselves such Methods of Self-defence, and Rules of Justice as were allowed to them.

If Christians will still think that they may defend all their Rights, and enter into all such Contentions for them, as the Laws of the Land will support them in, if they will think that they need bear no other Injuries, but such as Courts of Law cannot redress, they are as much mistaken, as if they imagine, they need Practise no other Charity or Worship of God, but such as humane Laws Demand.

For Christian Meekness, Self-denial, and Patience under Sufferings, are no more to be formed by the Standard of human Laws, than our Devotion to God.

In these Things Jesus Christ is our only Lawgiver, and his Laws are to be complied with as the certain Terms of our Salvation.

Notwithstanding therefore we may be able either by personal Power or legal Contention to repel Injuries, return Evil for Evil, and demand a Tooth for a Tooth, yet as Disciples of Christ we are to turn our Cheek to the Smiter, let him that would take our Coat, have our Cloak also, and be rather content to suffer many Injuries, than by defending ourselves, raise our Passions, embitter our Tempers, and destroy that Charity which we owe to our Neighbour.

Now this Meekness and Self-denial is highly suitable to the Spirit and Temper of Christianity.

It is highly suitable to a Religion that restores Sinners to God by Sufferings, it is suited to such as have forsaken all to follow Christ, it is suited to such as are to be dead and crucified to the World, to such as are to be meek and lowly as Christ, it is suited to such as are commanded to love and do all Good to their most violent Enemies, and who are to love their Neighbour as themselves.

And whatever Pride, Self-love, or humane Wisdom may suggest against this Doctrine, may with equal Strength be Objected against all those other Doctrines, which are thus of a Spirit like unto it.

But let Christians consider, that it is of these Doctrines of the Cross, that our Saviour saith, Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my Words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own Glory and in his Father's, and of the holy Angels. Further,

This is my Commandment, saith Christ, that ye love one another, as I have loved you. Now this as plainly forbids all Strife and angry Contentions with others, as when we are commanded to part with our Coat rather than contend for it. For it is as impossible to love our Adversary whilst we are contending with him, as Christ loved us, as to follow Christ, and at the same time depart from him.

His Love towards Mankind (which is the Example for our Love) knew of no Enemies, nor refused any Sufferings, but was a continual Labour for the Salvation of all Men. If therefore we treat any Persons as our Enemies, or fly in the Face of those who injure us, and are impatient under Sufferings, we are fallen from that Love which is to govern all our Actions.

Men may fancy what they please of the Charity of their Temper, whilst they are resisting Evil, and carrying on the Contentions of Law, as others may think they have their Conversation in Heaven, whilst they are labouring after Riches on Earth; but if they would consider, that Christian Charity is to be like the Charity of Christ, who died for his Enemies, they would soon find, that it must be a Charity of another Kind, that allows them to contend with their Enemies.

Every Resistance or Contention of any Kind, is a Quarrel, and necessarily begets some Degrees of Spite and Ill-will, and though they may often be carried on with some Show of external Decency, yet the inward Temper partakes of the Contention, is tainted with some little and ill-natured Resentments, and destroys that divine Spirit of Love to which we are called.

So that to talk of the Charity of resisting, and contentious Suits at Law, is almost like talking of the Charity of Duels.

The only Way therefore to preserve our Christian Spirit, and show ourselves more like Christ than those who injure us, is to act as he did under Injuries, and bear them with Patience, for such Reasons as rendered him patient. We are sure that whilst we follow him, we follow the Way, the Truth, and the Life, but as soon as we resent and form Designs of conquering our Oppressor, we partake of his Spirit, and offend against Meekness and Charity, as he offended against Justice.

We must therefore bear with Injuries and Wrongs, not because it is difficult to redress them, but because it is difficult, and next to impossible, to resist and contend with our Adversaries, without forfeiting that Humility, Meekness, and Divine Love, to which we are called.

We must suffer with Patience, because such Patience is an Exercise of our Self-denial, that renders us more like our Lord and Master.

This cannot be doubted of, since we are told of our blessed Saviour, That though he were a Son, yet learned he Obedience, by the Things which he suffered.

Now if this be true, is it not true in the same Degree, that we are not only to bear Sufferings with Patience, but even receive them with Thankfulness, as proper Means to teach us Obedience to the Laws of God?

For if he who was a Son, who was without Sin, and so full of Divine Knowledge, yet received Instruction from Sufferings, surely we who are poor infirm Creatures, must want that Instruction which is to be learnt from them.

For to suppose, that we can be obedient to God without Sufferings, is to suppose, that we can do our Duty without such Helps as the Son of God had. Sufferings are therefore to be considered amongst the Graces of God, which purify our Souls, enlighten our Minds with Divine Knowledge, and prepare us to perfect Holiness in the Fear of God.

But how contrary to the Spirit of Christ do we act, if our Sufferings provoke us into Methods of Retaliation, and instead of teaching us Obedience to God, lead us into a State of Enmity towards our Brethren.

Further ; It became him, saith the Apostle, *for whom are all Things, and by whom are all Things, in bringing many Sons unto Glory, to make the Captain of their Salvation perfect through Sufferings.

We are here plainly taught not only that Christ was made perfect through Sufferings, but that it was fit he should be made perfect that Way, as the only Way that could bring many Sons unto Glory. not merely life.

So that we see one End of Christ's Sufferings before his being crowned with Glory and Honour, was to teach us, that Sufferings is the Way to arrive at Glory, and that those who desire to be Sons of Glory, must first be made perfect through Sufferings.

We therefore forget the Nature of our Religion, we mistake the one great Design of Christ's Sufferings, we go out of the Road to Glory, if we do not patiently submit to Sufferings, if we are not thankful that we suffer with Christ, that we may reign with him.

Christian Men in vain pretend that they only defend themselves against Injustice. For these are the very Hardships which Christ suffered, and which they are, if they would be guided by his Spirit, to suffer with Patience.

St. Peter speaking to Servants, saith, This is thank-worthy, if a Man for Conscience toward God endure Grief suffering wrongfully. If when ye do well and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God. For even hereunto were ye called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an Example, that ye should follow his Steps.

Here the Apostle finds the Duty of Servants being subject to Masters, who treat them injuriously, upon the common Doctrine of Christianity ; because to suffer wrongfully is thank-worthy before God, and because Christ's Example has called us to bear with Patience those injurious and wrongful Hardships.

Let it therefore be carefully observed, that as sure as the Apostle here speaks by the Spirit of God, so sure is it that our Behaviour is not thank-worthy or acceptable with God, unless we endure wrongful Sufferings with Patience, and that if we lay aside this Meekness, we leave the Example of Christ, who only saves such as follow his Steps.

I have now gone through several Instances of that Mortification, Self-denial, and Suffering, to which the Christian World are called.

* Heb. ii. 10.

If the Doctrines of this Chapter seem hard and grievous, they can only seem so to such, as have wrong Notions of human Life.

Too many People imagine this Life to be something, that is substantial in itself, and valuable for its own Goods, and look upon Religion as something that is added to it, to make a worldly Life more easy, regular, and happy; and so embrace Religion with no other Spirit, nor to any further Degree, than as it complies with the Ease, Order, and Happiness, of that Way of Life in which they live.

Our blessed Saviour has fully confuted this Opinion, by teaching us, that there is but one Thing needful. If therefore we are but so far Christians, as to believe that what our Saviour has here taught, is strictly true, then all the pretended Grievances of Self-denial and Suffering are all struck off at once.

For what though Meekness, Patience, and Humility, may often make us Sufferers, yet if such Sufferings make us only lose such Things as are not needful for us, where is any Ground for Complaint?

But further, such Sufferings are not only without any real Hurt, but they promote our Happiness, and become Matter of real and solid Joy.

*Blessed are ye, when Men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of Evil of you falsely for my Sake, rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your Reward in Heaven.

Christ does not endeavour to comfort us in this State, as if it were a hard or melancholy State, which we must bear because it is made easier with Patience, or because God has pleased to impose it upon us, but he looks at it in quite another View, not as needing Comfort, but as having Matter fit for Congratulation.

What Christians are they therefore, what Strangers to the Spirit of Christ, who reckon those Things amongst the Hardships of Religion, which Christ recommends to us as Reasons of rejoicing, and being exceeding glad?

The whole Matter therefore plainly comes to this, if our Sufferings, our Injuries, or Hardships, be such as we undergo, because we dare not depart from that Meekness, and Patience, and Charity, which Christ has taught, because we had rather love our Enemies than be revenged on them, rather suffer like Christ, and be full of his Spirit, than avoid Sufferings by a contrary Temper, such Sufferings are our greatest Gains.

If on the contrary, you know of any Meekness and Patience which is not after the Example of Christ, any Injuries or Sufferings which you can resist, and yet show that you follow the Example of Christ's Patience, and Meekness, and Charity, the Doctrine of this Chapter has no Recommendation of such Sufferings.

* Matt. v. 11.

You are only here exhorted to bear such Injuries and Sufferings as make you more like Christ, such as are true Instances of that Meekness, Patience, and Charity, which were the principal Tempers of his Spirit.

Now be the Hardships or Self-denials what they will, if they make us more like to Christ, they have done more for us, than all the Prosperity in the World can do; and he that defends himself at the Expense of any Temper, that was the Temper of Christ, has done himself an Injury, greater than the worst and most powerful of his Enemies can bring upon him.

And all this is founded upon this one Reason, because there is but one Thing needful, the Salvation of our Souls. It is this that changes the Natures of all human Things, and makes everything good or evil only so far as it promotes or hinders this one End of Life. The Salvation of the World is the only Happiness of the World, and he that has secured his Share in that, has secured to himself all the Joy and Gladness that can befall human Nature.

A Christian therefore that is not content with Salvation, that wants to add a worldly Joy and Pleasure to the great Things of Religion, is more senseless than the Man, who should think he had hard Usage to be saved from a Shipwreck, unless he were carried off upon a Cedar Plank. or a Sandal-wood, or Camphire.

Chapter VII.

Some further Considerations upon the Reasonableness of Self-denial.

BEFORE I proceed any further in other Instances of Self-denial, it may be proper to show in what the Duty of Self-denial is founded, or wherein the Reasonableness and Necessity of it consists.

Every Duty or Virtue of the Christian Life is founded in Truth and Reason, and is required because of its Fitness to be done, and not because God has Power to command what he pleases.

upon Christian Perfection. 99

If we are commanded to be meek and humble, it is because Meekness and Humility are as true Judgments, and as suitable to the Truth of our State, as it is a true Judgment and suitable to the State of every dependent Being to be thankful for Mercies.

If we are bid to rejoice, it is at something that is truly joyful; if to fear, it is to fear something that is really dreadful. Thus we are called to no Tempers but such as are so many true Judgments, and as truly founded in the Nature and Reason of Things, as if we were bid to believe two to be the half Part of four.

God is Reason and Wisdom itself, and he can no more call us to any Tempers or Duties, but such as are strictly reasonable in themselves, than he can act against himself, or contradict his own Nature.

As we can say with Assurance, that God cannot lie, so we may with the same Certainty affirm, that he cannot enjoin anything to rational Creatures, that is contrary to the Reason of their Nature, no more than he can enjoin them to love Things that are not lovely, or hate Things that are in their Nature not hateful.

When God speaks, we are as sure that infinite Reason speaks, as we are sure there is a God.

A little Reflection upon this Matter, will give us the utmost Assurance in such Reasonings as this.

As sure therefore as there is a God, so sure is it that a Religion from God has only reasonable Commands to reasonable Creatures. No Tempers can be imposed upon us by Way of Task and Imposition, which we might as reasonably be without, if it were not required of us. God can only will, that reasonable Creatures should be more Reasonable, more Perfect, and more like Himself, and consequently can enjoin us no Duties, or Tempers of Mind, but such as have this Tendency. All his Commands are for our Sakes, founded in the Necessities of our Natures, and are only so many Instructions to become more Happy, than we could be without them.

A good Man who enjoys the Use of his Reason, is offended at Madmen and Fools, because they both act contrary to the Reason of Things. The Madman fancies himself, and everything about him, to be different from what they are; the Fool knows nothing of the Value of Things, is ridiculous in his Choices, and prefers a Shell before the most useful Things in Life.

Now a good Man merely through the Love of Reason, is offended at their Conduct, and would do all that he could to abate the Frenzy of the one, and the Stupidity of the other.

Let this a little represent to us the Conduct of God towards fallen Man. God is Reason itself, how highly therefore must he be offended at the Follies and Stupidity of Mankind? If a Madman seems so unreasonable a Creature to us, because he fancies himself to be something that he is not, how unreasonable must fallen Man, who is fallen from all true Knowledge of himself, appear to him who is infinite Reason?

Again, God is Goodness itself, if therefore human Goodness is inclined to endeavour the Cure of Madmen and Fools, must not Goodness itself be much more inclined to correct the Madness and Folly of fallen Man?

We see that Men are said to be Mad, when they fancy themselves and the things about them to be different from what they are; they are said to be Fools, when they mistake the Value of Things. Now if this be true, as it most certainly is, it may serve to show us, that Man in his present State of Disorder and Ignorance, must appear to God, both as Fool and Mad; for every Sinner is truly Mad, as he imagines himself, and all things about him, to be what they are not; he is really a Fool, as he is ridiculous in his Choices, and mistakes the Value of Things.

Now Religion is our Cure, it is God's merciful Communication of such Rules and Discipline of Life, as may serve to deliver us from the Infatuation and Ignorance of our fallen State. It is to teach us the Knowledge of ourselves, and all things about us, that we may no longer act like Madmen; it is to teach us the true Value of Things, that we may know our good and evil, and not be as Idiots in the Choice of Things.

Now Fools and Madmen have their Paradise, and are pleased with their imaginary Happiness; this makes them averse from all Methods of Cure.

For this Reason, God presses his Instructions upon us with Terrors and Threatenings, and makes those Virtues which are the natural Good and Cure of our Souls, such Duties to him, as he will punish the Neglect of them.

So that the Power of God is mercifully employed to move us to such a reasonable Way of Life, as is necessary for our Happiness.

Some People are so weak, as to wonder, what we call Sin should be so odious to God, or what it can signify to God, whether we are Wise or Foolish.

Let such consider, that God is Wisdom and Reason itself, and consequently everything that is contrary to Reason and Wisdom, is contrary to his Nature; so that a State of Sin, is a State of Contrariety to God. To ask therefore why God hates all Sin, is the same thing as to ask, why God cannot tell any Sort of Lie, it is because every Deviation from Truth is contrary to his Nature, which is Truth itself, so every Instance of Sin, as it is an unreasonable Act, is contrary to his Nature, who is Reason itself.

There is therefore a necessity from the Nature of Things, that every Creature be delivered from Sin, before it can enter into the beatific Presence of God; for if God could reward wicked Beings, and make them Happy by the Enjoyment of his Presence, he would as much cease to act according to the Nature of Things, as if he should punish a Being that lived in Innocence, for to punish Innocence, and to reward Sin, are equally contrary to the Nature and Reason of Things.

This Observation may teach us to admire the Excellency of the Christian Religion, which restores Sinners to God by so great an Atonement for Sin, and which only admits the Repentance and Devotion of fallen Man, through the Merits and Mediation of the Son of God.

To return, Let such People also consider, that even reasonable Men have a necessary Dislike of Fools and Madmen, they cannot possibly make them the Objects of their Pleasure and Affection.

But now if some things are so odious in themselves, that even the Reason of Man cannot but abhor them, how much more odious, how much more contrary to the Perfection of the divine Nature, must the Folly and Madness of Sin be?

Thus if we consider what Reason is in ourselves, that it necessarily dislikes unreasonable Persons as well as Things, we may have some Notion, how all Sin and Sinners, that is, all Beings which act contrary to Reason, must be in a State of the utmost Contrariety to God, who is the highest Reason.

God is Love, yet it is certain, that he can only love such Things as are Lovely; so God is Goodness, yet he cannot make Sinners Happy, because there is as much Contradiction to Reason and Perfection in making Sinners Happy, as in loving things that are not truly Lovely, or in hating things, that are not Hateful. This may serve to give us in some Measure a true Idea of the Nature of Religion and the Nature of Sin.

That Religion is God's gracious Method of delivering us from the Unreasonableness and Corruption of our Natures, that by complying with its Rules and Discipline, we may be so altered in our Natures, so restored to Reason, as to be fit for the Rewards of an infinitely Wise and Perfect Being.

That Sin is the Misery and Disorder, the Madness and Folly of our Nature, which as necessarily separates us from God, as God is contrary to all Unreasonableness.

I have just mentioned these things, to help us to conceive rightly, what is meant by the Reasonableness and Necessity of those Tempers which Religion requires. As I hope this is sufficient to give anyone a positive Assurance, that Religion is so far from being an Imposition upon us, consisting of needless Duties, that it is founded in the Nature and Reason of Things, and is as necessary to restore us to the Enjoyment of God, as it is necessary that God should love things according as they are Lovely.

For let anyone carefully consider this Proposition, whether it be not absolutely certain, that God loveth all things, accordingly as they are Lovely. Is not this as certain as that God is Reason itself? Could he be infinitely Reasonable, or Reason in Perfection, if he did not regard things according to their Natures? hating only those things that are truly Hateful, and loving things so far as they are Lovely? To act by any other Rule, than the Reason and Nature of Things, is to act by Humour and Caprice.

Let this therefore teach us, that as we are in ourselves, so we are necessarily either odious, or acceptable to God.

So far as we cease from Sin, and suffer ourselves to be made Wise and Reasonable, by the Wisdom and Reason of Religion, so far we make ourselves Objects of the Love of that infinitely perfect Being, who necessarily loves Beings as they are lovely in their Nature.

And so far as we continue in the Madness and Folly of Sin, and neglect the Rules of Religion which would deliver us from the Guilt and Slavery of it, so far we make it necessary for that perfect Being to hate us, who cannot but hate things accordingly as they are in themselves Hateful.

Some People, either through Self-love, or some confused Opinion of God and Themselves, are always fancying themselves to be particular Favourites of God, imagining all their little Successes, or Blessings in their Health and Circumstances above other People, to be distinguishing Marks of God's particular Kindness towards them.

But such Persons must consider that God is Reason itself, that he is subject to no particular Fondness, no more than he is capable of Weakness, and that he can no more love them, with any particular Love, that is not an Act of the highest Reason, than he can lie, or act contrary to the Truth.

They should consider that the Things of this Life, its Successes and Prosperities, are so far from being Marks of God's particular Favour, that Afflictions have a much better Claim to it, for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, &c.

When such People fancy themselves in the particular Favour of God, they should consider, that to be loved by God, is to be loved by infinite Reason and Wisdom, and that Reason can only love or approve Things as they are conformable to it. To be approved by Reason, we must act conformably to Reason, and to be approved by the highest Reason, we must act conformably to the highest Reason.

So that when our Lives are conformable to the highest Reason, then may we believe that so far as they are such, so far are they in the Favour of God, who is the highest Reason. To fancy that anything else can make us Favourites of God, is mere Ignorance and Pride, and owing to the same Vanity and Self-love, which makes some People think that they are admired and esteemed by all that know them.

For so sure as God is Reason itself, so sure is it, that to be loved by God, and to be approved by the highest Reason, is the same thing; so that if he whose Life is not conformable to the highest Reason, imagines that he is particularly beloved by God, he is guilty of the same Absurdity, as if he believed that God is not the highest Reason, or Reason in Perfection.

It is not more certain that there is but one God, than it is certain that there is but one Way of making ourselves Objects of his Love, namely, by conforming and acting according to the highest Reason. When our Lives are agreeable to Reason, and the Nature of Things, then are our Lives agreeable to God.

Now so far as we act conformably to Religion, so far we act according to the highest Reason, and draw near to God, by a Wisdom that comes from God, and was revealed unto us, that it might make us such reasonable Beings, as to be fit Objects of his eternal Love.

For a Religion from God must be according to the Nature of God, requiring no other Change of Thoughts or Actions, but such as is conformable to Truth and Reason.

Now the Reasonableness of Actions consists in their Fitness to be done; there is a Reasonableness in being thankful for Mercies, there is a Reasonableness in rejoicing at Things that are joyful, and so in all other Actions or Tempers they are either reasonable or unreasonable, as they are agreeable or contrary to the Nature of Things.

This is what I would have understood by the Reasonableness of all religious Duties or Tempers; they are all required, because they are as suitable to the Nature and Reason of Things, as it is suitable to the Reason of Things, to be thankful for Mercies, or fear Things that are truly dreadful.

Thus for Instance, Humility is nothing else but a right Judg- ment of ourselves, and is only so far enjoined, as it is suitable to the Truth of our State; for to think worse of ourselves than we really are, is no more a Virtue, than to take five to be less than four.

On the contrary, he that is proud, offends as much against Truth and Reason, and judges as falsely of himself, as the Mad-man who fancies himself to be a King, and the Straw to which he is chained, to be a Throne of State.

Having observed thus much concerning the Reasonableness of Tempers or Duties, which Religion demands, I proceed now to show, wherein the Reasonableness and Necessity of Self-denial consists.

If a Person was to walk upon a Rope across some great River, and he was bid to deny himself the Pleasure of walking in silver Shoes, or looking about at the Beauty of the Waves, or listening to the Noise of Sailors, if he was commanded to deny himself the Advantage of fishing by the Way, would there be any Hardship in such Self-denial? Would not such Self-denials be as reasonable, as commanding him to love Things that will do him good, or to avoid Things that are hurtful?

Strait is the Gate, and narrow is the Way that leadeth unto Life, saith our blessed Saviour. Now if Christians are to walk in a narrow Way that leadeth to Eternal Life, the chief Business of a Christian must be, to deny himself all those Things which may either stop or lead him out of his narrow Way. And if they think that Pleasures and Indulgences are consistent with their keeping this narrow Way, they think as reasonably, as if the Man upon the Rope should think, that he might safely use silver Shoes, or stop in his Way to catch Fish.

Again, If a Man that was a Slave to Sottishness, and stupefying Pleasures, that rendered him averse from all Exercises of the Mind, was yet obliged in order to save his Life, to attain to such or such a Degree of mathematical Knowledge, must it not be as necessary for such a one to deny himself those Indulgences which increased his Stupidity, as it would be necessary to study the Relations of Figures?

Now this is the Foundation of all Christian Self-denial; we are born and bred in Slavery to Sin and corrupt Tempers, and are only to be saved by putting off this old Man, and being renewed in Holiness and Purity of Life. The Denials therefore of Religion, are only the necessary Means of Salvation, as they are necessary to lessen the Corruption of our Nature, destroy our old Habits, alter the Taste and Temper of our Minds, and prepare us to relish and aspire after Holiness and Perfection.

For since our Souls are in a State of Corruption, and our Life is a State of Probation, in order to alter and remove this Corruption, it is certain, that every Thing and every Way of Life which nourishes and increases our Corruption, is as much to be avoided, as those Things which beget in us Purity and Holiness, are to be sought after.

A Man who wants his Health, is as well and for the same Reasons to avoid such Things as nourish his Illness, as he is to take Medicines that have a healing Quality. Self-denial is therefore as essential to the Christian Life, as Prayer is, it being equally necessary to deny ourselves such Things as support our Corruption, as it is necessary to pray for those Things which will do us good, and purify our Natures.

The whole of the Matter is this, Christians are called from a State of Disorder, Sin, and Ignorance, to a State of Holiness, and Resemblance of the Divine Nature. If therefore there are any Things, or any Ways that corrupt our Minds, support our Vanity, increase our Blindness, or nourish Sensuality, all these are as necessarily to be avoided, as it is necessary to be holy.

If there are any Denials or Mortifications that purify and enlighten the Soul, that lessen the Power of bodily Passions, that raise us to a heavenly Affection, and make us taste and relish the Things that be of God, these are as necessarily to be practised, as it is necessary to believe in Jesus Christ.

So that the Matter comes to this, if there are no Indulgences in eating that do us Harm, then fasting is of no Use, but if there are, if they enslave the Soul, and give it a sensual Taste, then we are as much obliged to abstain from what does us this Harm, as we are obliged to pray for anything that can do us good.

No Christian who knows anything of the Gospel, can doubt whether fasting be a common Duty of Christianity, since our Saviour has placed it along with secret Alms, and private Prayer. *When thou fastest, anoint thy Head, and wash thy Face, that thou appear not unto Men to fast, but to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

So that the same Instructions and the same Reasons are given for private fasting, as for secret Alms and private Prayer, that thy Father who seeth in secret, may reward thee openly. Now as it is manifestly entitled to the same Reward, it is manifestly put upon the same Foot, as private Prayer, and as equally acceptable to God.

Eating and Drinking are the common Support of Life, but then as they are the Support of a corrupt Life, the Nourishment of a disordered Body that weighs down the Soul, whose Appetites and Tempers are in a State of Enmity with the Life and Purity of the Soul, it is necessary that we take care so to support the Life of the Body, as not to occasion the Sickness and Death of the Soul.

The Fall of Man consists very much in the Fall of the Soul into the Dominion and Power of the Body, whose Joy, and Health, and Strength, is often the Slavery, Weakness, and Infirmary, of the Soul.

How far our Bodies affect our Habits, or Ways of Thinking, may be seen by the Difference between Sickness and Health, Youth and Old Age. These different States of the Body, alter the whole Turn of our Minds, and give us new Ways of Thinking, all owing to the different Strength of bodily Appetites and Tempers. No sooner is the Body weakened by any Occasion, but the Soul is more at Liberty, speaks higher for itself, and begins to act more reasonably.

What is the Reason that a Midnight Reflection goes generally deeper than a Thought at any other time? No Reason can well be assigned, but the Peace and Tranquillity of the Body, which gives the Soul a Liberty of seeing further into Things, than at any other time.

The Difference between the same Man full and fasting, is almost the Difference of two Persons; a Man that in the Morning finds himself fit for any Meditations, is after a full Meal changed into another Creature, fit only for idle Amusements, or the Yawnings of an Animal.

He has not only created a Dulness in his Soul, but has perverted its Taste; for he can be pleased with a Romance or impertinent History, at the same time that he has no Relish for a Book of Devotion, that requires less Attention.

I mention this to show, that fasting has a nearer Relation to all religious Tempers, than is generally thought, and that indulgent or full Feeding does not only dull the Mind, but more particularly gives it a Dullness towards the Things of Religion. If it were not thus, a Book of religious Reflections would be as acceptable at such Times, as those other Books which require as much, or more Attention.

And the Reason of this is plain, because all our Tempers and Desires are always suitable to the State we are in; if we are in a State of sensual Joy, feeling the Happiness of a full Stomach and heated Blood, we relish or desire nothing but what suits with it. For this Reason Plays, and Romances, and vain Diversions, can entertain a Man that has eat as long as he could, but Lectures upon Morality, or Discourses upon Death and Judgment, would tire him into Sleep. What we observe of the Jaundice, that it makes us see all things yellow, is in a certain Degree true of every State of the Body; it makes us conceive things with some Degree of Likeness to the Condition it is then in. Every Alteration in the Body, gives some Alteration to our way of conceiving the same Things.

As he therefore that would see things in their proper Colours, must first cure himself of the Jaundice, so he that would apprehend things according to their Natures, must take care that his Body be so ordered, as to have as little a Share as possible in his Judgments.

When a Man has his Stomach full of Wind, and feels no pleasant Enjoyment of his Body, you can hardly propose anything to him, that will appear reasonable: Do but stay till his Stomach is altered, till he has had a full and cheerful Meal, and he will be as naturally in a better Temper, as any other Animal that has filled its Belly.

When Men have been unreasonably out of Temper, through the mere Motions of the Body, I believe they often condemn themselves afterwards, but then they do not consider, that the contrary State, is a State of the same Slavery to the blind Motions of the Body, and liable to the same Condemnation. For if a full and pleasant Meal, makes us so gay and cheerful, as to laugh and be pleased with the vainest Things, we are then as unreasonable, and as mere Slaves to our Bodies, as when a cold or empty Stomach shall make us angry at everything.

For it is as great a Contradiction to Reason and Wisdom, to be pleased with Things or Persons, because our Body is in a State of Joy, as it is to be Angry and Displeased at Things or Persons, because an easterly Wind, or an undigested Meal has soured our Spirits.

Now both these States, are equally States of Slavery to the Body, equally expose our Folly, and have the same Contrariety to Religion. A Man is as far from religious Wisdom, when full feeding has made him merry, vain, and trifling, as when a contrary State of Body makes him sour, angry and fretful.

It is the Business therefore of Religion, to put an end to these States of Slavery, to deliver Man from these blind Laws of Flesh and Blood, and give him a Wisdom and Constancy, a Taste and Judgment suitable to the Reason and Wisdom of the Laws of God. To fill our Souls with such Principles of Peace, as may give us Habits of Tranquillity, superior to the changeable Tempers of our Bodies.

Now Fasting, as it is a Denial of bodily Indulgences, as it disciplines the Body into a State of Obedience, and contradicts its Appetites, is the most constant and universal Means of procuring Liberty and Freedom of Mind.

For it is the Love of our Body, and too much Care of its Enjoyments, that makes us too sensible of its Demands, and subject to its Tempers. Whatever we nourish and cherish, so far gains an Interest in us, and rules us in the same Degree, that it has got our Affections. Till therefore Religion has entered us into a State of Self-denial, we live in a State that supports the Slavery and Corruption of our Natures.

For every Indulgence of the Body in Eating and Drinking, is adding to its Power, and making all our Ways of Thinking subservient to it.

A Man that makes every Day, a Day of full and cheerful Meals, will by Degrees make the Happiness of every Day depend upon it, and consider everything with regard to it.

He will go to Church or stay at home, as it suits with his Dinner, and not scruple to tell you, that he generally eats too heartily to go to the Afternoon Service.

Now such People are under a worse Disorder of Body, than he who has the Jaundice, and have their Judgment more perverted, than he who sees all Things yellow.

For how can they be said to perceive the Difference of Things, who have more Taste for the Preparations of the Kitchen, than for the Joys and Comforts of the House of God, who choose rather to make themselves unfit for Divine Service, than to balk the Pleasure of a full Meal? And this not by Chance, or upon some unusual Occasion, but by a constant intended Course of Life.

Let such People deal faithfully with themselves, and search out their Spirit. Can they think that they are born again of God, that they have the Spirit of Christ, who are thus subject to the Pleasures of Gluttony? Can they be said to treat their Bodies as Temples of the Holy Ghost, who make them unfit for the holy Service of public Worship? Can they be said to offer their Bodies unto God, as a reasonable, holy, and living Sacrifice? Can they be said to love God with all their Heart, and all their Soul, or to have forsaken all to follow Christ, who will not so much as forsake half a Meal for the sake of Divine Worship?

I know it will be thought too severe that I have called this Gluttony, because it is the Practice of Numbers of People of Worth and Reputation; but I hope they will turn their Dislike of the Name, into a Dislike of the Thing, for it is as certainly Gluttony, as picking of Pockets is stealing.

The Sin of Gluttony is the Sin of Over-eating, of being too much given to full Meals. Now this may be difficult in some Instances to state exactly, yet he who owns he eats so much as renders him indisposed for the public Worship of God, has determined against himself, and put his own Case out of all Question. For if there be such a Sin, as the Sin of Over-eating, it must surely then be committed when we eat too much to attend upon the Service of the Church.

Men may fancy that they are only chargeable with Gluttony, who eat till they surfeit their Bodies; they may think those only guilty of Drunkenness, who drink till they have lost their Senses. But there is a much surer Rule to go by, given them by the Spirit of God. Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the Glory of God. All therefore in Eating and Drinking that is not within the Bounds of the Glory of God, is offered to something that is not the Glory of God, it is offered to the Corruption and Sensuality of our Natures, it is the Sin of Intemperance, and has the Sin of Indevotion added to it, when it is indulged at a time, that keeps us from the public Worship of God.

Let such People examine their own Hearts, and see what Opinion they have of Divine Service. Can they look upon it, as doing God's Will on Earth as it is done in Heaven? Can they look upon it, as entering into the Presence of God, as approaching the Throne of Grace? Can they esteem it to be the Nourishment and Support of their Souls, a necessary Means of securing the Divine Assistance, as a most acceptable Way of pleasing God, and securing their eternal Happiness, who are not afraid to eat and drink till they are indisposed and unwilling to attend at it? If they still have just Notions of the Nature of Divine Service, let them think of these Words of our blessed Saviour, If ye know these Things, happy are ye if ye do them.

But if they look upon it as of less Concern than a full Meal, if they think that there is no Occasion for Exactness in it, it is time they were told, that they have not the Love of God abiding in them.

For if they did really hunger and thirst after Righteousness, which is the true Love of God, they would rejoice at every Opportunity of entering further into his Favour; they would go to the House of God, the Abode of his Presence, with more Joy than to any other Place, and think those Days the most happy, that were most devoted to the Cares and Joys of a Life with God to all Eternity.

They would cut off a right Hand, or pluck out a right Eye, rather than be hindered from those Helps, which are to raise their Hope, enliven their Faith, and form their Souls to a Delight and Joy in God.

If they want this Zeal towards God, they want a Zeal which is the Life and Spirit of a Christian, which distinguishes a Disciple of Christ from those who live without God in the World.

I have spoken the more home to this Point, because it is so allowed a Practice, which as unavoidably destroys the true Spirit and Temper of Religion, as any Things that are notoriously sinful.

Indeed a constant Course of full Feeding is the Death of the Soul, and every Day that is a Day of such Happiness, is a Day lost to Religion.

When a Man has rejoiced himself with full Eating and Drinking, he is like any other Animal, disposed only to Play or Idleness. He has no more Feeling of Sin than he has of Hunger, can no more perceive himself to be a miserable fallen Creature, than he can perceive himself to be a Beggar, and consequently is no more affected with any Forms of Confession or Repentance, than if he was every Day to confess, that he was a starving Beggar.

For this Course of Self-enjoyment is as contrary to Humility, Contrition, and a true Sense of Sin, as it is contrary to a State of Beggary and Want, and consequently a Man in such Happiness, can no more sincerely deplore the Weight of Sin, than he can feel himself in the Misery of Poverty.

If therefore Religion is to be the State and Temper of our Minds, if it is to be the ruling Taste and Relish of our Souls, if its Goods and Evils are to govern our Actions, it is as necessary to renounce Sensuality, and mortify our Bodies, as it is necessary to resist Temptations. For Abstinence or Self-denial is not only a good, advisable, and reasonable Practice, but is a constant, necessary, and universal Duty, and enters further into the Cure of our Souls, than any other Practice. It is as necessary for a Christian who would get rid of the Disorders of his Nature, and lessen the Weight of Sin, as it is necessary for a Man in a Dropsy to abstain from Drink, or a Man in a Fever to refrain from such Things as inflame his Blood.

Indeed this Self-denial is the chief and most general Exercise of the Christian Life, and is the very Form and Substance of every Virtue; for so far as we deny our natural Tempers, so far we seem to be advanced in Virtue.

We are so far humble, as we deny ourselves in the Instances of Pride, so far heavenly-minded, as we deny our earthly Inclinations, so far charitable, as we deny our Tempers of Self-love and Envy; and so in every Virtue, it seems to have its chief Foundation in the Denial of some corrupt Temper of our Natures.

upon Christian Perfection. III

I know some People object, that Fasting is not an universal Duty, that it is rather like some particular Medicine or Remedy, that is only necessary for some particular Cases, and particular Constitutions.

To this it may be answered, that if by Fasting, is meant an entire Abstinence from all Food for such or such a certain Space of Time, that Fasting in that Sense, is not an universal and constant Duty. But then it ought to be observed, that this is no more the Nature of Fasting, than any particular Form of Confession of such or such a Length, is the precise Nature of Repentance.

For as Repentance does not consist in any stated fixed Degrees of Sorrow and Pain for Sin, which is to be the common Repentance for all Men, in all States, and at all Times, but is such an Exercise of Grief and Contrition, as is suited to everyone's particular State, so Fasting is not any fixed Degree of Abstinence from all Food, which is to be the common Measure of Fasting to all Men, in all States, and at all Times, but is such an Exercise of Abstinence and Self-denial, as is proper to everyone's particular State.

Now if we understand Fasting in this Sense in which it ought to be understood, as an Abstinence from such Food and such Pleasures and Degrees of Feeding as are proper in every State of Life, to destroy Sensuality, lessen the Corruption of our Natures, and make us relish and taste spiritual Enjoyments, in this Sense Fasting is as constant and universal a Duty, as Repentance.

For as Repentance is an universal Duty, because the Reason of it is common to all Men, so this Fasting is necessary to all Men, because Sensuality, fleshly Lusts, and the Corruption of bodily Tempers, is the universal Corruption of all Men.

It is sometimes also objected, that Fasting cannot be an universal Duty, because some People's Constitutions will not suffer them to eat enough* for their Health.

To this it may be answered, that some People may be so infirm, that they cannot attend at the public Worship of God, yet surely public Worship is an universal Duty, though some People's Constitutions may make them incapable of going to it.

Secondly, This Objection is only of Weight against Fasting, as it signifies an entire Abstinence from all Food for a certain Space of Time, but is of no Force against such an Abstinence, as I have shown to be the common Duty of all Christians.

Thirdly, Persons of weak and infirm Constitutions, have often as much Necessity of Self-denial, as others of the most healthful Bodies; for their very State, it may be, has taught them Indulgence, by being accustomed to so much Care of themselves, they become no better than perpetual Nurses of themselves, and consequently are too much devoted to that, which is not the one Thing needful.

Weakly People may as well be Epicures, and have the same Sensuality to conquer, as other People, and consequently have the same Necessity of their Degree of Abstinence and Denial, that others have.

Let such People have recourse to the Example of Timothy, who was an apostolical Bishop. His History teaches us, that he was weakly, and subject to frequent Infirmities, who notwithstanding he may be supposed to have enjoyed the extraordinary Gifts of the Holy Ghost, yet in this state of Divine Greatness, and Bodily Weakness, he wanted the Authority and Advice of an Apostle to persuade him to drink anything besides Water. This we are sufficiently taught, by the Apostle's giving this Advice in his Epistle to him, Drink no longer Water, that is, nothing but Water, but use a little Wine for thy Stomach's Sake, and thine often Infirmities.

Lastly, The World abounds with People who are weakly and tender merely by their Indulgences; they have bad Nerves, low Spirits, and frequent Indispositions through Irregularity, Idleness, and Indulgence.

Now these People, it is true, are not fit for Fasting, and, perhaps if they were to deal faithfully with themselves, they would find that they are as unfit for most other Exercises of Religion; and consequently if their Condition might be pleaded as an Objection against the Necessity of Fasting, it might as well be pleaded against the Necessity of half the Duties of Christianity.

Upon the whole Matter it appears, that Fasting is a constant universal Duty, and that it is liable to no other Exceptions, than such as are common to several other great Duties of Religion.

It is no fixed Degree of Sorrow that is the common Repentance of all Men, it is no particular Sum of Money that is the common Charity of all Men, it is no fixed Form, or Length, or Hour of Prayer, that is the common Devotion of all Men, yet all these are constant and universal Duties.

In like Manner, though Fasting may be subject to all the same Variations, yet is it a constant and universal Duty.

Justus is a grave sober Man, he is very angry at those People who neglect or ridicule Fasting; he thinks they know nothing of Religion.

Thus far Justus is very right, and knowing thus much, one would wonder that he is so inconsistent with himself, for presently after this, Justus will tell you, that he never fasts but upon Good-Friday and the Thirtieth of January.

If Justus had lived before the Murder of King Charles, he had had but one Fast in the Year, yet in all Likelihood he would have then stood up for the Doctrine of Fasting.

If a Man were to be angry at those who neglect or despise the Service of the Church, as People who know nothing of Religion, and then tell you that he himself never goes thither, but on Good-Friday and the Thirtieth of January, you would say that he knew nothing of the Nature of Church-Service.

Now Justus shows the same Ignorance of the Nature of Fasting.

For if Prayer and Repentance, and the Service of the Church, were not common Acts of Devotion, and right and necessary Ways of worshipping God, they would not be necessary upon Good-Friday, or any other particular Day.

In like Manner, unless Fasting were a common and necessary Part of Religion, something that was always a proper Means of applying to God, it would neither be necessary, nor acceptable, on those particular Days.

For it is not the Day that makes the Duty to be necessary, but the Day happens to be a proper Occasion of exercising a necessary Duty.

Some great Calamity happens to you, you do very well to make it an Occasion of exercising great Devotion; but if you stay till some other Calamity happens, before you pray again, or think that Prayer is only proper in Times of Calamity, you know nothing of Devotion.

It is the same thing in Fasting; some great Occasion may justly call you to it, but if you forbear Fasting, till such great Occasions happen again, or think that Fasting is only proper for such public Occasions, you know nothing of the Nature of Fasting.

If Justus were to say that he never repents but on those public Days, he might as easily defend himself, as when he says, he only fasts at those Times.

For is there any Benefit in Fasting on those particular Days? Does it add anything to your Piety and Devotion? Does it make your Repentance and Sorrow for Sin more real and affecting? Does it calm and abate your Passions, lessen the Power of your Body, and put you in a better State of Devotion, than when you take your usual Meals? If it has not something of this Effect, where is the Use of it at such Times when you would have your Devotions the best performed? And if it has this Effect, how comes it that you will have but one or two such

Days in the Year? Why will you not thus affect your Soul, thus assist your Devotions, thus discipline your Body, thus allay your Passions, thus raise your Heart, thus humble yourself till the Day comes, on which King Charles was Murdered? Is not this like staying till then, before you repent?

Our Blessed Saviour saith, *But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine Head, and wash thy Face, that thou appear not unto Men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which is in secret shall reward thee openly.

Here our Saviour's Advice relates wholly to private Fasting, to which other People are to be Strangers, to such a Fasting as is a secret Service to God, who will therefore highly reward it. Yet Justus tells you that he fasts only twice in the Year, and that on public Days. Now what is this to be called, is it Weakness, or Perverseness?

If you were to ask me whether frequent, private Prayer, be a necessary Duty, I should think it sufficient to read to you the following Passage, But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy Closet, and when thou hast shut thy Door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

Nothing need be added to this Authority; the Necessity and Advantage of private Prayers is here so expressly taught, that there is no room left to doubt about it.

Justus readily acknowledges all this, how comes it then, Justus, that you know nothing of the Necessity and Advantage of private Fasting? How comes it that the same Authority and the same Words do not teach you as much in one place as in another? Has not our Saviour expressed himself exactly in the same Manner, and given the same Advice, and proposed the same Reward, to private Fasting, as to private Prayer?

Further, when the Disciples of our Lord, could not cast the evil Spirit out of a Man, who was a Lunatic, he not only tells them, that it was through want of Faith, but also gives them a very important Instruction in these Words, Howbeit this kind goeth not out, but by Prayer and Fasting.†

Now does this look, as if Fasting were an occasional Thing, only for a Day or two in the Year? Is it ranked with Prayer as having the same common Nature, as being equally prevailing with God? And is not this sufficient to teach us, that we must think of Fasting, as we think of Prayer; that it is a proper Way of Devotion, a right Method of applying to God? And if that Prayer is most prevailing, and enters furthest into Heaven, which

* Matt. vi. 17.

† Matt. xvii. 21.

upon Christian Perfection. 115

is attended with Fasting, it is proof enough surely, that Fasting is to be a common ordinary Part of our Devotion.

Is it sufficient and powerful enough to cast out Devils, and cure Lunatics, and shall we neglect it, when we pray against the evil Tempers and Passions which possess our Hearts? Shall we not pray to God in the most powerful prevailing Manner that we can?

If we were to Fast without Praying, would not this be a Way of Worship of our own Invention? And if we Pray and neglect Fasting, is it not equally choosing a Worship of our own? For he that has taught us the Use and Advantage of Prayer, has in the same Words taught us the same Things of Fasting, and has also joined them together, as having the same Power with God.

If therefore Justus will take his Religion from Scripture, he must own, that Fasting is of the Nature of Prayer, that it has the same Authority from Christ, and that he who only Fasts on a public Day or two in a Year, no more observes the whole Duty of Christian-fasting, than he who only attends some public yearly Days of Prayer, can be said to fulfil the whole Duty of Christian Devotion.

To proceed, we may also observe, that the Reason of Self-denial and Abstinence is constant and perpetual, because we are perpetually united to a Body, that is more or less fit to join with our Souls in Acts of Holiness, according to the State that it is in.

As therefore it is always necessary to take Care what Thoughts and Inclinations we indulge in our Minds, so it is equally necessary, that we be constantly careful, how we alter the State of our Bodies, or indulge them in such Gratifications, as may make them less fit for the Purposes of an holy Life.

For since there are States of the Body, which favour Holiness, and these States depend much upon our Manner of Living, it is absolutely necessary, that we avoid every Degree of Indulgence, every Kind of Irregularity and Idleness, or other Course of Life, that may make our Bodies less Active, less Pure, and less conformable to the Duties of Religion.

And this is to be done, as I said before, not only as a reasonable and advisable Thing, but as of the utmost necessity, it being as essential to Holiness, to purify our Bodies, and practise a strict Temperance, as it is necessary to practise a strict Charity.

Now Christian Temperance is no more that, which may pass for Temperance in the Sight of Men, than Christian Charity, is that which is visible to the World.

A worldly Man may think himself sufficiently Temperate, when he only abstains from such Excesses, as may make him fitter to enjoy an healthful Sensuality.

But Christian Temperance is of quite another Nature, and for other Ends, it is to put the Body into a State of Purity, and Submission, and give the Soul a divine and heavenly Taste.

It is therefore to be observed, that Christian Temperance is never enough practised, but when it puts the Body in the fittest State for Devotion and other Acts of Holiness, when our Bodies have all that Good done to them, have all that Purification, and right Tempers which Abstinence and Self-denial can give them, then do we practise Christian Temperance.

There is no other Rule than this to go by, for since Christian Temperance is in order to Holiness, Purity, and heavenly Affection, he can only be said to be truly Temperate, whose Temperance is most serviceable to the highest Degrees of Holiness.

And to stop short of any known Degrees of Temperance, is like stopping short of any known Degrees of Charity. It is therefore as necessary to practise all the Exercises of Self-denial, and strict Abstinence, as it is necessary to aspire after real Holiness.

For as our Bodies are constant and Home-Enemies, and have a mighty Influence in all our Actions, so far as we preserve them in a State suitable to Holiness, so far we preserve ourselves fit for the Exercise of Religion.

It is out of all question that there is a Purity and Impurity of our Bodies, as well as of our Souls, that is, there are some States and Tempers of our Bodies, that favour and incline to Acts of Virtue, and others that as much incline to all Sorts of Sensuality.

This is as certain, as that Gluttony and Drunkeness disposes Men to all Sorts of Sins, and give them a Disrelish for all Kinds of Holiness. For as these States of Life have the utmost Contrariety to Religion, so every Approach towards them, is in a certain Degree partaking of them.

A man who lives in such a State, as not to be called either a Glutton, or a Drunkard, may yet be so near them, as to Partake of those Tempers and Inclinations, which are the Effects of Gluttony and Drunkeness.

For there are such Degrees in these, as in other Ways of Life. A Man may be vain and uncharitable, yet not so as to be remarkable for his Vanity and Uncharitableness, so he may be also under the Guilt and evil Effects of Eating and Drinking, though not so as to be esteemed either a Glutton or Intemperate.

upon Christian Perfection. 117

So that the only Security for a good Christian, is to make it the Care of his Life, to resist all Enjoyments that cherish Vanity and Uncharitableness, not only in such Degrees as are scandalous and visible in the Eyes of Men, but such as inwardly hurt the Humility and Charity of his Mind.

In like manner as to eating and drinking, he is constantly to practise such Abstinence, as may secure him not only from Sensuality in the Sight of the World, but such as may best Alter, Purify, and Humble his Body, and make it the holy Habitation of a Soul devoted to a spiritual Life.

St. Paul saith, I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the Air. But I keep under my Body, and bring into subjection, lest that by any Means when I have preached to others, I myself should be a Castaway. ce (funk) die allowed - not allowed.

Let it here be observed, that the Apostle practised this Self-denial and Mortification, not only as a good and advisable Thing, and suitable to Holiness, but as of the last Necessity. It was not, as he was an Apostle, and that he might be fitter for the miraculous Gifts of the Holy Ghost, but it was to secure his Salvation, lest when he had preached to others, he should be a Castaway. ie as above - not in my sense of the word in English: but

Let it be considered that this Apostle, who lived in Infirmities, in Reproaches, in Necessities, in Persecutions, in Distresses for Christ's Sake, who was also full of Signs, and Wonders and mighty Deeds, and who had been caught up into the third Heavens, yet reckons all his Virtues as insecure, and his Salvation* in Danger, without this severity of Self-denial; he thought all his other Advancements in Piety, without this, to be as vain a Labour, as beating the Air.† will and is had enough his fallowing

of so: his Reward

So run I, saith he, not as uncertainly, by which he plainly teacheth us, that he who does not thus run, who does not thus mortify the Body, runs uncertainly, and fighteth to as little Purpose, as he that beateth the Air.

Can they therefore who live in Ease, and Softness, and bodily Indulgences, who study and seek after every Gratification, be said to be of St. Paul's Religion, or to be governed by that Spirit, which governed him? non, aliter!

An Apostle preaching the Gospel with Signs and Wonders in the midst of Distress and Persecution, thought his own Salvation* in Danger, without this Subjection of his own Body, and shall we who are born in the Dregs of Time, who have no Works like his to appeal to, think it safe to feed and indulge in Ease and Plenty?

* 1 Cor. ix. 26.

† 2 Cor. xii.

A Man may indeed practise the outward Part of a Christian, he may be Orthodox in his Faith, and regular in the Forms of Religion, and yet live in Ease and Indulgence. But if he would put on Christ, and be clothed with the Humility and Meekness of his true Disciples, if he would love his Enemies and be in Christ a new Creature, if he would live by Faith and have his Conversation in Heaven, if he would be born again of God, and overcome the World, he must lay the Foundation of all these Graces in the Mortification and Subjection of his Body. For not only Religion, but Reason, can show us, that almost every ill Temper, every Hindrance of Virtue, every Clog in our Way of Piety, and the Strength of every Temptation, chiefly arises from the State of our Bodies.

Chapter VIII.

The Subject of Self-denial further continued.

THERE are no Truths of Christianity more plainly delivered in the Scriptures, or more universally acknowledged by all Christians, than these two, viz., the general Corruption of human Nature, and the absolute Necessity of divine Grace. Now these two Doctrines make the Reason and Necessity of a continual Self-denial, plain and obvious to the meanest Capacity ; and extend it to all those Things or Enjoyments, which either strengthen the Corruption of our Nature, or grieve the Holy Spirit of God, and cause him to leave us.

Let anyone but reflect upon the Nature of these two fundamental Truths, and he will find himself soon convinced, that all those Enjoyments are to be abstained from, which either support our natural Blindness and Corruption, or resist and abate the Inspirations of the Holy Spirit.

He will find also, that this Self-denial must extend itself to every Day of our Lives, unless he can find a Day when he is free from Weakness, or out of the Way of all Temptations, a Day which offers nothing suitable to the Corruption of his Nature, or nothing contrary to the good Motions and Directions of the Holy Ghost. Most People acknowledge this in general, they think it right to avoid Things which strengthen our Corruption, and grieve the Spirit of God, but then not conceiving this with any sufficient Exactness, they think that an Abstinence from gross Sins, is a sufficient Security.

But let such People consider, that the Corruption of our Nature is like any other bodily Illness, that never keeps at one Stand, but is either increasing or abating by everything that we do.

A Dropsy or a Gangrene is not only increased by Drunkenness, or disorderly Indulgences, but receives constant Strength by all little Indulgences that suit with it.

Now the Corruption of our Nature is an inbred Distemper, that possesses us in the Manner of a Dropsy or Gangrene; if we give into notorious Sins, we become Slaves to this Corruption, and are straightway dead in Sin.

But though we keep clear of such great Offences, yet if we indulge or allow ourselves in such Practices, as suit with the Corruption of our Nature, we as certainly nourish a slow Death, and destroy ourselves by Degrees, as a Man in a Dropsy, who abstains from Drunkenness, yet allows himself in such Ways as will not suffer his Distemper to abate.

Now as little Allowances that continually increase a Distemper, will as certainly in Time make it mortal, as if it had been urged on by violent Methods, so little Indulgences which increase the Corruption of our Nature, as certainly tend to a spiritual Death, as other more irregular Methods.

It is therefore absolutely certain, that our Self-denial is to be as universal as the Means of our Corruption, that it is to last as long as our Disorder, and is to extend itself to every Thing and every Way of Life, that naturally increases it; and this, for as necessary a Reason, as a Man in a Dropsy, is not only to abstain from Drunkenness, but from every Indulgence that increases his Distemper.

A State of Regimen therefore, that is, a State of holy Discipline, is as necessary to alter the Disorder of our Nature, as it is necessary to remove any distempered Habit of Body.

Let it be considered, that the Corruption of our Nature is but very weakly represented, by comparing it to these Distempers; that they rather express the Manner of its Cure, and the Necessity of labouring after it, than set forth the Degree of the Disorder.

For a Man in these Distempers, may have only some Part affected with them; but the Corruption of our Natures is as extensive as our Natures: It is the Corruption of every Faculty and every Power, it is Blindness in our Understandings, it is Vanity in our Wills, Intemperance in our Appetites, it is Self-love, Anger, Lust, Pride, and Revenge, in our Passions, it is Falseness, Hypocrisy, Hatred, and Malice, in our Hearts. Now all this, and more than this, makes the miserable Corruption of human Nature.

So that it is as necessary that our Lives be a State of Regimen, that we live by such Rules as are contrary to this Variety of Disorders, as it is necessary for a Man under a Complication of habitual Distempers, to enter into a Course of Regularity.

I suppose it will be readily granted, that all Tempers are increased by Indulgence, and that the more we yield to any Disposition, the stronger it grows; it is therefore certain, that Self-denial is our only Cure, and that we must practise as many Sorts of Self-denial, as we have ill Tempers to contend with.

Pride, Hypocrisy, Vanity, Hatred, and Detraction, are all disorderly Indulgences, and have their only Cure in Self-denial, as certainly as Drunkenness and Sensuality.

To deny one's self all Indulgences of Pride and Vanity, all Instances of Falseness and Hypocrisy, of Envy, and Spite, requires greater Care and Watchfulness, and a more continual Self-denial, than to avoid the Motives to Intemperance.

And he who thinks to render himself humble, any other Way than by denying himself all Instances of Pride, is as absurd as he who intends to be sober, without abstaining from all Degrees of Intemperance. For Humility as truly consists in the Practise of Things that are humble, as Justice consists in the doing Things that are just.

Every Virtue is but a mere Name, an empty Sound, till it shows itself by an Abstinence from all Indulgences of the contrary Vice, till it is founded in this Self-denial.

Now this is readily granted to be true in all sensual Vices, that they are only to be cured by a perpetual Self-denial.

But the Practice of the same Self-denial is as absolutely required, to destroy every ill Temper of the Mind, as any sort of Sensuality.

Self-love, Pride, Vanity, Revenge, Hypocrisy, and Malice, are acknowledged to be very gross Sins, and indeed they are of the very Nature of the Devil, and as certainly destroy the Soul, as Murder and Adultery.

But the Misfortune is, that we govern ourselves in these Tempers, not by what is sinful according to the Principles of Religion, but by what is odious in the Eyes of the World. We don't labour to avoid the Sin, but are content to avoid what is scandalous in it.

Thus for Instance, People would not be thought proud, but then they are afraid of no Degrees of it, but such as the World condemns; they don't form their Lives by the Scripture-Rules of Humility, but only endeavour to be decent and fashionable in their Pride.

Others would be very sorry to be remarked for an envious and malicious Spirit, who at the same time make the Faults of their Acquaintance the Pleasure of their Lives, and turn all their Conversation into Evil-speaking and Detraction.

Now all this proceeds from hence, that they govern themselves by the Spirit of the World; the World allows of Evil-speaking and Detraction, and therefore they practise it openly, though it is as contrary to Religion, as Murder and Injustice.

And thus it will be with all these wicked Tempers, till we practise an universal Self-denial, and labour after a religious Perfection in all our Ways of Life.

We are certainly under Habits of Pride, till we are governed by Humility, and we are not governed by Humility till we deny ourselves, and are afraid of every Appearance of Pride, till we are willing to comply with every Thing and every State, that may preserve and secure our Humility.

No Man is governed by a religious Justice, till he is exact in all Degrees of it, till he denies himself all Approaches towards Injustice, till he fears and abhors every Appearance of Fraud, and Crafty Management.

Now it is this Temper and State of Mind that is the Measure of every Virtue.

A common Liar may hate some Sorts of Lies, an unjust Man may avoid some Sorts of Injustice, so a proud Person may dislike some Instances of Pride, but then he has no more Title to Humility, than an unjust Man has a Title to Integrity, because there are some Sorts of Injustice that he avoids.

So that it is not any single Acts, or any particular Restraints, but it is an uniform State and Temper of the Mind, that stands constantly disposed to every Degree of Humility, and averse from every Degree of Pride, that is to denominate a Person to be truly humble.

To measure any virtuous Temper by any other Standard than this, is not to measure ourselves by Religion. How can anyone be said to be religiously chaste, unless he abhors and avoids all Instances of Lewdness and Impurity? How could he be said to be sincerely pious, unless he was fearful of every Occasion of Sin?

Must it not therefore be the same in Humility and every other Virtue? Can anyone be reckoned truly humble, till he denies himself all Instances of Pride?

Self-denial therefore is so universally necessary, that it is the Foundation of every Virtue; Humility and Charity requiring more Self-contradiction and Self-denial, than the strictest Temperance.

From these Observations we may be able to pass a true Judgment upon ourselves as to our State of Virtue. If we are denying ourselves, we are so far labouring after Virtue ; but if Self-love, if Idleness and Indulgence, be the State of our Lives, we may be sure that we are as distant from true Religion, as the Sot is distant from strict Temperance.

A Life of Idleness, Indulgence, and Self-love, is an entire Resignation of ourselves to every Vice, except such as cannot be committed without Trouble ; and we may assure ourselves, that if we are in this State, we are not only Strangers to Virtue, but ready for every Sin that suits with Ease and Softness.

Persons of this Turn of Mind, lose the very Form of Piety, and find it too great a Contradiction to their Idleness, to comply with the very outward Appearance of Religion. They would be oftener at Church, but it may be, their Seat is crowded, and they can sit with more Ease by their Fire-Side at Home. They would be more exact in kneeling when they are there, if they had always the same Ease in kneeling.

I mention these Particulars, as only small Instances of that general Deadness and Indisposition towards all Parts of Religion, which this Spirit of Idleness and Indulgence creates. For it affects People in the same Manner as to every other part of their Duty, and makes them incapable of attending to it. For a Person that is too idle and self-indulgent to undergo the constant Trouble of public Worship, must be at a great Distance from those Virtues, which are to be acquired by Care and Watchfulness, which are to crucify us to the World, and make us alive unto God.

Ambition and worldly Cares distract the Mind, and fill it with false Concerns, but even these Tempers are in a nearer State to Religion, and less indispose the Soul to it, than Idleness and Indulgence. For Ambition and worldly Cares, though they employ the Mind wrong, yet as they employ it, they preserve some Degree of Activity in it, which by some Means or other may happen to take a right Turn ; but Idleness and Indulgence is the Death and Burial of the Soul.

I have been more particular upon this Temper, because it is so common, and even acknowledged without Shame. People who would not be thought Reprobates, are yet not afraid to let you know that they hardly do anything but eat, and drink, and sleep, and take such Diversions as suit with their Ease ; whereas if such a State of Life be examined by the Rules of Reason and Religion, it will appear as dangerous and frightful, as any other Reprobate State of Sin. For it is a State that nourishes all the Corruption of our Nature, that exposes us to all the Vanity of the World, and resigns us up to all the Power of the Devil.

Did we design to set ourselves in the fairest Posture for the Devil to hit us, we ought to choose that of Idleness and Indulgence.

Watch and pray, saith our Saviour, that ye fall not into Temptation. The Devil's Advice is, be idle and indulge, and then ye will yield to every Temptation. For if Watching and Prayer have any Tendency to prevent our falling into Temptation, it is certain that Idleness and Indulgence must in an equal Degree make us incapable of resisting them.

To return. As certain therefore as our Nature is in a State of Corruption, as certain as this Corruption consists in ill Tempers and Inclinations, so certain is it, that if we would not die in our Sins, we must enter upon such a Course of Life as is a State of Denial not only to this or that, but to all those corrupt Tempers and Inclinations.

For since Man is only a Compound of corrupt and disorderly Tempers, it is as necessary to deny himself, as to resist Evil; and he is indeed only so far virtuous, as he has put off himself, and is guided and governed by another Spirit.

When we speak of Self-denial, we are apt to confine it to Eating and Drinking; but we ought to consider that though a strict Temperance be necessary in these Things, yet these are the easiest and smallest Instances of Self-denial. Pride, Vanity, Self-love, Covetousness, Envy, and other Inclinations of the like Nature, call for a more constant and watchful Self-denial, than the Appetites of Hunger and Thirst.

Till therefore we make our Self-denial as universal as our Corruption, till we deny ourselves all Degrees of Vanity and Folly, as earnestly as we deny ourselves all Degrees of Drunkenness, till we reject all Sorts of Pride and Envy, as we abhor all Kinds of Gluttony, till we are as exact in all Degrees of Humility, as we are exact in all Rules of Temperance, till we watch and deny all irregular Tempers, as we avoid all Sorts of Sensuality, we can no more be said to practise Self-denial, than he can be said to be Just, who only denies himself the Liberty of stealing.

And till we do enter into this Course of universal Self-denial, we shall make no Progress in true Piety, but our Lives will be a ridiculous Mixture of I know not what, sober and covetous, proud and devout, temperate and vain, regular in our Forms of Devotion, and irregular in all our Passions, circum-spect in little Modes of Behaviour, and careless and negligent of Tempers the most essential to Piety.

And thus it will necessarily be with us, till we lay the Axe to the Root of the Tree, till we deny and renounce the whole Corruption of our Nature, and resign ourselves up entirely to the Spirit of God, to think and speak and act by the Wisdom and Purity of Religion.

Let it be supposed that Religion required us to forget a Language that we loved, and had been bred in, and constantly to speak in a Language that was New and Difficult.

Could we possibly forget our former Language that we loved, and was natural to us, any other Way, than by denying ourselves the Liberty of ever speaking it?

Could we forget it by only forbearing to use it on some particular Occasions? Would it not be as necessary to abstain from thinking, reading, and writing in it, as to abstain from using it in Conversation? Could we render our new Language any other Way habitual or natural to us, than by making it the Language of all Seasons?

Now this may teach us the absolute Necessity of an universal Self-denial, for though Religion does not command us to part with an old Language that we love, yet it commands us to part with an old Nature, and to live and act by a new Heart and a new Spirit.

Now can we think to part with an old Nature by fewer Rules of Abstinence, than are necessary to get rid of an old Language? Must we not deny ourselves the Liberty of ever acting according to it? Can we get rid of it by only denying it in particular Instances? Must it not be as necessary to abstain from all its Ways of thinking and wishing, liking and disliking, as to practise any Abstinence at all? For if the whole is to be changed, if a new Heart is to be obtained, we are doing nothing, whilst we only renounce it in part; and can no more be said to live by a new Heart, than they can be said to speak only a new Language, whose general Conversation is in their old natural Tongue.

Indeed a little Attention to the Nature of Man, and the Nature of Christianity, will soon convince us, that Self-denial is the very Substance, the beginning and ending of all our Virtues. For,

First, Christianity, is the Cure of the Corruption of our natural State. Now what is the Corruption of our natural State? Why it consists chiefly in Tempers, and Passions, and Inclinations that fix us to bodily and earthly Enjoyments, as to our proper good.

Now how is it that Christianity cureth this Corruption of our Nature? Why it cureth this Corruption of our Nature,

upon Christian Perfection. 125

by teaching us to live and act by Principles of Reason and Religion.

What are these Principles of Reason and Religion ?

They are such as these :

First, That God is our only Good, that we cannot possibly be happy, but in such Enjoyment of him, as he is pleased to communicate to us.

Secondly, That our Souls, [are immortal Spirits,] that [are here only in a State of Trial and Probation.

Thirdly, That we must all appear before the Judgment-Seat of God, to receive the Sentence of eternal Life, or eternal Death.

These are the chief Principles of Reason and Religion, by which every Christian is to live ; judging and thinking, choosing and avoiding, hoping and fearing, loving and hating according to these Principles, as becomes a Creature, that is sent hither to prepare himself to live with God in everlasting Happiness.

Now who does not see, that this resolves all our Religion into a State of Self-denial, or Contradiction to our natural State ?

For first, what can be a greater Self-denial, or more Contradictory to all our habitual Notions, and natural Sentiments, than to live and govern ourselves, by a Happiness that is to be had in God alone ? A Happiness, which our Senses, our old Guides, neither see, nor feel, nor taste, nor perceive ? A Happiness, which gives us neither Figure nor Dignity, nor Equipage, nor Power, nor Glory amongst one another ?

Look at Man in his natural State, acting by the Judgment of his Senses, following the Motions of his Nature, and you will see him acting, as if the World was full of infinite Sorts of Happiness.

He has not only a thousand imaginary Pleasures, but has found out as many Vexations, all which show, that he thinks Happiness is everywhere to be found, for no one is vexed at any Thing, but where he thinks he is disappointed of some possible Happiness.

The Happiness therefore of Religion, which is an Happiness in God alone, is a great Contradiction to all our natural and habitual Tempers and Opinions, not only as it proposes a Good, which our Senses cannot relish, but as it leads us from all those imaginary Enjoyments, upon which our Senses have fixed our Hearts.

To think of Religion in any other Sense, than as a State of Self-denial, is knowing nothing at all of it. For its whole Nature is to direct us by a Light, and Knowledge, and Wisdom from God, which is all contrary to the Darkness, Ignorance, and Folly of our Natures.

It is therefore altogether impossible for any Man to enter into the Spirit of Religion, but by denying himself, by renouncing all his natural Tempers and Judgments, which have been formed by the blind Motions of Flesh and Blood, and strengthened by the Example and Authority of the World. He cannot walk in the Light of God, but by rejecting the Dreams of his Senses, the Visions of his own Thoughts, and the Darkness of worldly Wisdom.

We may let our Senses tell us, what we are to eat and drink, or when we are to sleep, we may let them teach us, how near we may draw to a Fire, how great a Burden we may carry, or into how deep a Water we may go; in these Things they are our proper Guides.

But if we appeal to them to know the true Good of Man, or the proper Happiness of our rational Nature, if we ask them what Guilt there is in Sin, or what Excellence there is in Piety, if we consult them as our Guides and Instructors in these Matters, we act as absurdly, as if we were to try to hear with our Eyes, or to see with our Ears.

For our Senses are no more fitted to tell us our true Good, as we are Christians and rational Creatures, than our Eyes are fitted to instruct us in Sounds, or our Ears in Sights.

Religion therefore has just so much Power over us, as it has Power over our natural Tempers, and the Judgments of our Senses, so far as it has made us deny ourselves, and reject the Opinions and Judgments of Flesh and Blood, so far has it settled its Power within us.

Hence appears the absolute Necessity of our Saviour's Proposal to Mankind, If any Man will come after me, let him deny himself and follow me.

For it plainly appears from the Nature of the Thing, that no Man can follow Christ, or walk in the Light that he walked, but by denying himself, and walking contrary to the Darkness and Errors of his own Heart and Mind.

All our Ways of thinking and judging of the Nature and Value of Things, are corrupted with the Grossness and Errors of our Senses.

We judge of every Thing in the same Manner, that the Child judges of his Playthings, that is, it is by our Senses alone that we pass the Judgment, though we think that we act with the Reason of Men.

The World is made up of fine Sights, Equipage, Sports, Show and Pageantry, which please and captivate the Minds of Men, because Men have yet the Minds of Children, and are just the same Slaves to their Senses, that Children are.

As Children and Men see the same Colours in Things, so Children and Men feel the same sensible Pleasures, and are affected with external Objects in the same Manner.

But the Misfortune is, that we laugh at the little Pleasures, poor Designs and trifling Satisfactions of Children, whilst at the same time, the Wisdom and Ambition and Greatness of Men is visibly taken up with the same Trifles.

A Coach and Six and an Embroidered Suit shall make a great Statesman as happy, as ever a Go-cart and Feather made a Child.

When a Man thinks how happy he shall be with a great Estate, he has all the same Thoughts come into his Head, that a Child has, when he thinks what he would do with a great Sum of Money; he would buy twenty little Horses, he would have twenty fine Coats, and all fine Sights, and the like.

Now promise but a Man a great Estate, and you will raise all these same Thoughts and Designs in his Mind.

Now whence can all this proceed, but from this, that Men act with the same Vanity of mind, are under the same poor guidance of their Senses, are as ignorant of their true Happiness, as great Strangers to their own Nature, and as far from a true Sense of their relation to God, as when they first set out in Life.

And is not this a plain Argument of the Reasonableness and Necessity of Self-denial? For to indulge ourselves and live according to our natural Tempers and Judgments, is to grow old in the Follies of Childhood. And to deny ourselves, is to save ourselves, as it is denying such Tempers and Judgments as are contrary to our eternal Happiness.

To proceed, let us take another view of the weakness and disorder of our Nature, that we may still see a greater Necessity of not walking according to it.

When we see People drunk or in a violent Passion, we readily own, that they are, so long as that continues, in a State of Delusion, thinking, saying, and doing irregular Things by the mere Force of their Blood and Spirits. In these States we all see and acknowledge the Power of our Bodies over our Reason, and never suppose a Man capable of judging or acting wisely, so long as he is under the violence of Passion or heated with Drink.

Now this is more or less the constant State of all Mankind, who are by bodily Impressions, and the Agitations of the Blood and Spirits, in the same kind of Delusion, as Men that are Drunk or in a Passion, though not always in the same Degree.

A Man that is Drunk has heated his Blood to that Degree, that it sends up Spirits to the Brain in too violent a Motion, and in too great a quantity. This violent Motion of the Spirits, raises so many Ideas in the Brain, and in so Disorderly a Manner, that the Man is every Minute different from himself, as fast as different or new Ideas are raised in his Head by the impetuous Course of the Spirits. This is the disorder of a Man that is Drunk.

Now this is the State of all People more or less, when they appear to one another as Sober.

For first, Drunkenness is a State of disorder and Delusion, because our Heads are then filled with a Crowd of Ideas, which we have little or no power over, and which for that Reason distract our Judgment.

Now this is in a certain Degree the State of all Men, whilst they are in the Body ; the Constitution of our Bodies, and our Commerce with the World is constantly filling our Heads with Ideas, and Thoughts, that we have little or no Power over, but intrude upon our Minds, alter our Opinions, and affect our Judgments in the same Manner, as they disorder the Minds of those who are Drunk.

Let anyone but try to Meditate upon any the most Important Doctrine of Religion, and he will find the Truth of this Observation, he will find a Thousand Ideas crowd in upon him, in spite of all his Care to avoid them, which will hinder his Meditation, and prevent his seeing Things in that Light in which he would see them, if his Mind was empty of other Thoughts.

Now it is the same Cause that hinders him from Thinking so well as he would, that hinders the Drunken man from Thinking at all ; that is, an Involuntary Succession of Ideas.

So that every Man, so long as he is in the Body, is in some Degree weak and disordered in his Judgment, in the same Manner and for the same Causes, as People who are Drunk.

Secondly, Another Circumstance of Drunkenness is this, that Ideas and Thoughts are raised in a disorderly Manner, because the Blood is too much heated.

Now this is another constant Circumstance that attends Men in every State of Life.

For first, it is the same Thing whether our Spirits be heated with Liquor, or anything else, if they are heated, all the same Effects are produced.

This is undeniably true, because we daily see, that Passion will heat and disorder People in the same Manner, as they are, who are inflamed with Liquor.

Therefore our own Thoughts and Imaginations have the same effect upon our Spirits, as Drink ; so that it is the same Thing whether a Man be Drunk with Passion, or any violent Set of Thoughts, or heated with Liquor. There is the same Weakness of Mind, the same disordered Imagination, and the same wrong Apprehension of the Nature of Things.

Now though all People are not at all Times Drunk with Passion, or some Violent Imagination, yet they are always in a Disorder of the same Kind; they have something that affects and hurries their Spirits in the same Manner, that a Man's Spirits are affected in some violent Passion.

And the Reason is, because Men are always in some Passion or other, though not to that Degree as to be visible, and give Offence to other People.

We are always in a State either of Self-love, Vanity, Pride, Hatred, Spite, Envy, Covetousness or Ambition. Some one or other of these Passions is in some Degree affecting our Spirits in the same Manner, that any violent Passion, or heat of Liquor affects our Spirits, differing only in the Degree.

A silent Envy, a secret Vanity, which nobody sees, raises Thoughts in our Heads, and disorders our Judgments in the same Manner, as more violent Passions.

But you may increase the Vanity, and Envy till it ends in Distraction and Madness, as it sometimes happens, but then we may be sure, that it disorders our Understanding in the same Manner, and made us Foolish and Extravagant in some Degree, long before it came to Madness. Whilst therefore we are in the Body, we are constantly in a State of Disorder, like to those who are Drunk or in a violent Passion; we have some Passion or other, either of Self-love, Vanity, Envy or the like, that affects our Spirits, and disorders our Judgment, in the same Manner, though not in the same Degree, as their Spirits are affected, who are in the heat of Drink, or in some violent Passion.

Thirdly, Another Circumstance of Drunkenness is this, that it Forms us to a Taste and Temper peculiar to it, so as to leave a Dulness and Indisposition in the Mind toward any Thing else. An habitual Drunkard has no Pleasure, like that confused Hurry and Heat of Thoughts that arises from inflamed Blood. The repeating of this Pleasure so often has given him a Turn of Mind, that Relishes nothing but what relates to Intemperance.

Now this is the State of all People in some respect or other, there is some way of Life that has got hold of them, and given them a Taste and Relish for it, in the same Manner that Drinking has Formed the Drunkard to a peculiar liking of it. All People are not intemperate, but all are under Habits of Life, that affect the Mind in the same Manner, as Intemperance.

Some People have indulged themselves so long in Dressing, others in Play, others in Sports of the Field, others only in little gossiping Stories, that they are as much Slaves to these Ways of Life, as the intemperate Man is a Slave to Liquor.

Now we readily own that a Man who has enslaved himself to the Pleasures of Drinking and Intemperance, has thereby rendered himself incapable of being a reasonable Judge of other Happiness and Pleasure; but then we do not enough consider, that we are hurt in the same Manner, by any other Way of Life, that has taken hold of us, and given us a Temper and Turn of Mind peculiar to it.

It is to as little Purpose to talk of Religion, or the Happiness of Piety, to a Person who is fond of Dress, or Play, or Sports, as to another who is intemperate; for the Pleasures of these particular Ways of Life make him as deaf to all other Proposals of Happiness, and as incapable of judging of other Happiness and Pleasure, as he who is enslaved to Intemperance.

A Lady abominates a Sot, as a Creature that has only the Shape of a Man; but then she does not consider that drunken as he is, perhaps he can be more content with the Want of Liquor, than she can with the Want of fine Clothes: And if this be her Case, she only differs from him, as one intemperate Man differs from another.

Thus it appears, that whether we consider the Nature, Circumstances, and Effects of Drunkenness, that all Mankind are more or less in the same State of Weakness and Disorder.

I have dwelt the longer upon this Comparison, because it seems so easily to explain the Disorder of our Nature. For as everyone readily sees how the bodily Disorders of Drunkenness, and violent Passion, blind and pervert our Minds, so it seems an easy Step from thence, to imagine how the Body, though in a cooler State, does yet disorder the Mind in the same Manner, though not in the same Degree. It is also easy to conceive, that if violent Passion, or a heated Imagination, confounds our Judgments, and gives us wrong Apprehensions of Things, that therefore all Passions, though more still and secret, must yet influence our Minds, and make us weak and disordered in our Judgments, in the same Manner, though not in the same Degree, as those are, who are in a violent Passion. So that the meanest Capacity may by this apprehend, that so long as we are in the Body, we are in a State of Weakness and Disorder, that is full of such Blindness and Delusion, as attends a State of Drunkenness and Passion.

It is intended by this Account of human Nature, to convince us of the absolute Necessity of renouncing ourselves, of denying all our Tempers and Inclinations, and resigning ourselves wholly to the Light and Wisdom of God. For since by our State of Corruption and Slavery to the Body, we are always under the Power of its blind Motions, since all our Inclinations and Judgments are only the Judgments of heated Blood, drunken Spirits, and disordered Passions, we are under as absolute a Necessity of denying all our natural Tempers and Judgments, as of refraining from Intemperance.

For must a Man who is in a Fit of violent Passion, silence that Passion before he can judge of the ordinary Things of Life? Is it a State of such Blindness as makes him blind in the plainest Matters, and unable to judge rightly even of Things which he is acquainted with? And can we think, that our more still and secret Passions of Self-love, Pride, Vanity, Envy, and the like, make us less blind as to the Things of God, than a heated Passion does as to the Things of this World?

Will an inflamed Passion disorder a Man too much to judge of anything even in his own Business? And will not a Passion of less Violence disorder a Man's Judgment in Things of a spiritual Nature, which he never was rightly acquainted with, which he never saw or understood in the Manner that he ought, and which are all contrary to the Impressions of his Senses?

Everyone sees People in the World whom he takes to be incapable of sober Judgments, and wise Reflections, for this Reason, because he sees that they are full of themselves, blinded with Prejudices, violent in their Passions, wild and extravagant in their Imaginations.

Now as often as we see these People, we should reflect that we see ourselves; for we as certainly see a true Representation of ourselves, when we look at such People, as we see a true Picture of our State, when we see a Man in the Sorrows and Agonies of Death.

You are not dying as this Man is, you are not in his State of Sickness and Extremity; but still his State shows you your own true Picture, it shows you that your Life is in the midst of Death, that you have in you the Seeds of Sickness and Mortality, that you are dying, though not in his Degree, and that you are only at a little uncertain Distance from those, who are lying upon their last Beds.

When therefore you see Men living in the Disorders of their Passions, blinded with Prejudices, swelling in Pride, full of themselves, vain in their Imaginations, and perverse in their Tempers, you must believe, that you see as true a Representation of your own State, as if you saw a Man in his last Sickness.

You, it may be, are not in the Extravagance of his disordered Tempers, you are at some uncertain Distance from his State, but if you fancy that you are not corrupted with Self-love, not weakened by Prejudices, not blinded with Pride, not vain in your Imaginations, not ridiculous in your Tempers, because you are not in such Disorders as you find some People, you think as absurdly, as if you were to imagine yourself to be immortal, because you are not in that Extremity of Death, in which you see some People.

And as the true Way of knowing and being rightly affected with the Weakness and Mortality of our State, is frequently to view the Condition of dying Men, as Pictures of ourselves, so the most likely Means to affect us with a just Sense of the Corruption and Disorder of our Hearts, is to consider the Frailties, Corruptions, and Disorders, of other People, as certain Representations of the Frailty and Corruption of our own State.

When therefore you see the Violence of other Men's Passions, the Irregularity of their Tempers, the Strength of their Prejudices, the Folly of their Inclinations, and the Vanity of their Minds, remember that you see so many plain Reasons for denying yourself, and resisting your own Nature, which has in it the Seeds of all those evil Tempers, which you see in the most irregular People.

From the foregoing Reflections upon human Nature, we may learn thus much, that Abstinence, as to Eating and Drinking, is but a small part of Christian Self-denial.

The Corruption of our Nature has its chief Seat in the Irregularity of our Tempers, the Violence of Passions, the Blindness of our Judgments, and the Vanity of our Minds; it is as dangerous therefore to indulge these Tempers, as to live in Gluttony and Intemperance.

You think it shameful to be an Epicure, you would not be suspected to be fond of Liquor, you think these Tempers would too much spoil all your Pretences to Religion; you are very right in your Judgment, but then proceed a Step farther, and think it as shameful to be fond of Dress, or delighted with yourself, as to be fond of Dainties, and that it is as great a Sin to please any corrupt Temper of your Heart, as to please your Palate; remember that Blood heated with Passion, is like Blood heated with Liquor, and that the Grossness of Gluttony is no greater a Contrariety to Religion, than the Politeness of Pride, and the Vanity of our Minds.

I have been the longer upon this Subject, trying every Way to represent the Weakness and Corruption of our Nature, because so far as we rightly understand it, so far we see into the Reasonableness and Necessity of all religious Duties. If we fancy ourselves to be wise and regular in our Tempers and Judgments, we can see no Reason for denying ourselves; but if we find that our whole Nature is in Disorder, that our Light is Darkness, our Wisdom Foolishness, that our Tempers and Judgments are as gross and blind as our Appetites, that our Senses govern us as they govern Children, that our Ambition and Greatness is taken up with Gewgaws and Trifles, that the State of our Bodies is a State of Error and Delusion, like that of Drunkenness and Passion.

If we see ourselves in this true Light, we shall see the whole Reason of Christian Self-denial, of Meekness, and Poverty of Spirit, of putting off our old Man, of renouncing our whole Selves, that we may see all Things in God; of watching and Prayer, and mortifying all our Inclinations, that our Hearts may be moved by a Motion from God, and our Wills and Inclinations be directed by the Light and Wisdom of Religion.

Religion has little or no hold of us, till we have these right Apprehensions of ourselves; it may serve for a little Decency of outward Behaviour, but it is not the Religion of our Hearts, till we feel the weakness and disorder of our Nature, and embrace Piety and Devotion, as the Means of recovering us to a State of Perfection and Happiness in God.

A Man that thinks himself in Health, cannot lament the Sickness of his State.

If we are pleased with the Pride and Vanity of our Minds, if we live in Pleasure and Self-satisfactions, we shall feel no meaning in our Devotions, when we lament the Misery and Corruption of our Nature. We may have Times and Places to mourn for Sins, but we shall feel no more inward Grief, than hired Mourners do at a Funeral.

So that as the Corruption of our Nature, is the Foundation and Reason of Self-denial, so a right Sense and Feeling of that Corruption, is necessary to make us rightly affected with the Offices and Devotions of Religion.

I shall now show, that the reasonableness and necessity of Self-denial, is also founded upon another fundamental Doctrine of Religion, namely, the Necessity of Divine Grace, which I shall leave to be the Subject of the following Chapter.

Chapter IX.

Of the Necessity of Divine Grace, and the several Duties to which it calleth all Christians.

I COME now to another Article of our Religion, namely, the absolute Necessity of Divine Grace, which is another universal and constant Reason of Self-denial.

The invisible Operation and Assistance of God's Holy Spirit, by which we are disposed towards that which is good, and made able to perform it, is a confessed Doctrine of Christianity.

Our natural Life is preserved by some Union with God, who is the Fountain of Life to all the Creation, to which Union we are altogether Strangers; we find that we are alive, as we find that we think, but how, or by what Influence from God our Life is supported, is a Secret into which we cannot enter. It is the same Thing with Relation to our spiritual Life, or Life of Grace, it arises from some invisible Union with God, or Divine Influence, which in this State of Life we cannot comprehend. Our blessed Saviour saith, *The Wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the Sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of God. This shows us, how ignorant we are of the manner of the Operations of the Holy Spirit; we may feel its Effects, as we may perceive the Effects of the Wind, but are as much Strangers to its manner of coming upon us, as we are Strangers to that exact Point, from whence the Wind begins to blow, and where it will cease.

The Spirit of God is like the Nature of God, too high for our Conceptions, whilst we are in these dark Houses of Clay. But our blessed Saviour has in some Degree helped our Conceptions in this Matter, by the manner of his giving the Holy Spirit to his Disciples. And he breathed on them, and said unto them, receive the Holy Ghost. Now by this Ceremony of breathing, we are taught to conceive of the Communications of the Holy Spirit with some likeness to Breath, or Wind, that its Influences come upon us in some manner most like to a gentle breathing of the Air. Representations of this kind are only made in Compliance with the Weakness of our Apprehensions, which not being able to conceive Things as they are in their own Nature, must be instructed, by comparing them to such Things as our Senses are acquainted with. Thus, the Wisdom and Knowledge that is revealed from God, is compared to Light, not because Light is a true Representation of the Wisdom of God, but because it serves best to represent it to our low Capacities. In like manner, the Influences of the Holy Spirit, are set forth by the Ceremony of breathing upon us, not because Breath, or Air, or Wind, are true Representations of the Gifts of the Spirit, but because they are the properest Representations, that yet fail within our Knowledge.

But that which is most necessary for us to know, and of which we are sufficiently informed in Scripture, is the absolute Necessity of this Divine Assistance.

We are used to consider those only as inspired Persons, who are called by God to some extraordinary Designs, and act by immediate Revelation from him. Now as Inspiration implies an immediate Revelation from God, in this Sense there has been but few inspired Persons; but Inspiration, as it signifies an invisible Operation, or Assistance and Instruction of God's Holy Spirit, is the common Gift and Privilege of all Christians; in this Sense of Inspiration, they are all inspired Persons. Know ye not, saith St. Paul, that your Body is the Temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you. St. John likewise, Hereby know we that he dwelleth in us by the Spirit, which he has given us. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, are the Sons of God. Again, Now if any Man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.* From these and many other Passages of the like Nature, it is undeniably plain, that the Life which we now live, is a Life in and by the Spirit of God, and that they are only Sons of God, who are led by this Spirit. Now this Doctrine plainly proves the Necessity of a constant Self-denial, for it must be necessary, that we deny ourselves all those Tempers and Ways of Life, which may make God withhold his Grace from us; and likewise all those Enjoyments and Indulgences, which may make us less able and less disposed to improve and co-operate with those Degrees of Divine Grace, that are communicated to us.

Our blessed Saviour saith, If any man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.† This teaches us, how we are to invite the good Spirit of God to dwell in us: We are to Prepare ourselves for the Abode of this Divine Guest, by loving Christ and keeping his Commandments. Whence we also learn, that the Spirit of God does not equally Visit all Persons in all ways of Life, but that we must Prepare ourselves for his Presence.

* Rom. viii. 9.

We are also told, that God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. This also explains to us the Method of Divine Grace, that it is bestowed with regard to the State and Temper of Persons ; that there are some Dispositions which separate us from the Spirit of God, and others that procure to us a larger Share of its Gifts and Graces. We are also here Taught to consider Pride, not only as a Sin that has its particular Guilt, but as it has this certain Effect, that it Extinguishes the Divine Light, deprives us of God's Spirit, and leaves us to sink under the Corruption and Weight of our Nature.

We are to consider Humility also, not only as it is a reasonable Duty, and proper to our State, but as it qualifies and prepares us for larger Degrees of Divine Grace, such as may Purify and Perfect our Souls in all Manner of Holiness. All Instances therefore of Pride are to be avoided, all Sorts of Humility to be practised, not only for their own Sakes, but as necessary Preparatives for Divine Grace, that we may be fit Temples for the Holy Ghost to dwell in. Now seeing we are none of Christ's, if the Spirit of Christ be not in us, seeing we are only so far Christians, as we are renewed by the Holy Ghost, nothing can be more necessary to true Piety, than that we Form every Part of our Lives with regard to this Holy Spirit. That we consider all our Tempers, Pleasures, Cares, Designs and Ways of Life, whether they be such, as suit with the Wisdom and Heavenly Guidance of the Holy Spirit. This Doctrine shows us to ourselves in a new Point of View, and may serve to teach us several Truths, which we should otherwise not so readily apprehend.

When we are left to consider our Duty with relation to the express Commandments of God ; there are many ways of Life which we think ourselves at Liberty to follow, because they seem to be no plain Breach of any Commandment. But we are to look to a further Rule, and to consider our Pleasures and Cares, our Designs and Endeavours, not only whether they are contrary to the Letter of the Law, but whether they are according to the Spirit of God, for if they are contrary to the Spirit of God, if they suit not with his secret Inspirations, they are as truly to be avoided as if they were contrary to some express Commandment. For we are assured from Scripture, that they only are the Sons of God, who are led by the Spirit of God, and none can be said to be led by the Spirit of God, but they whose Lives are according to it, whose Actions, Cares and Pleasures, Hopes and Fears are such, as may be said to be guided by the Motions of the Holy Ghost.

We are therefore to consider ourselves as inspired Persons, that have no Knowledge, or Wisdom but what comes from God, and that this Wisdom will no longer dwell with us, than so long as we act and conduct ourselves Conformably to it. So that we must not vainly deceive ourselves in saying, where is the harm of such Indulgences, or such Vanities and idle Amusements, but must consider, whether they are such as are Conformable to a Life that is to be directed by the Holy Ghost, whether they will invite his Assistance, and make him delight to dwell with us. In this Manner must we Examine and Try all our Ways of Life, as well our Cares as our Pleasures, and all our Tempers and Inclinations. For unreasonable Cares, as well as unreasonable Pleasures, are equally contrary to the Wisdom of the Holy Spirit, and equally separate us from him. People often think their Designs and Diversions Innocent because they are not sinful in their Nature, but they should also consider whether they are not vain and foolish, and unsuitable to the State and Condition of a Christian. For a Life of Folly, and Vanity and trifling Designs, is no more living by the Spirit of God, than a Life of gross Sins, is keeping the Commandments. So that the safest Rule to judge of our Actions by, is to consider them with relation to that Spirit, by which we are to be guided. Is this Design, or this Diversion according to the Wisdom of the Spirit of God? Am I in these Things improving the secret Inspiration of the Holy Ghost? Am I here governed by a Wisdom from above? Are these ways such as I can truly say, that I am led into them by the Spirit of God? Do I allow myself in them, because they serve to set forth the Glory of God, and are agreeable to the Condition of a Disciple of Christ? Are they good Proofs that the Spirit of God dwelleth in me, and that by thus Sowing to the Spirit, I shall of the Spirit Reap everlasting Life. This is the Rule of Perfection, by which Christians are to regulate their Thoughts, Words and Actions, for we are called by God to a State of Purity and Holiness, to act by the Motions of his Holy Spirit, and make no other Use of ourselves, or the World we are in, than such as is conformable to that Dignity of Life, and State of Glory to which we are called. The Spirit of our Religion is to be the Spirit of our Lives, the constant Principle of all our Tempers and Inclinations, which is to render us Reasonable, and Wise and Holy in all our Progress through the World.

The Renewal of our Hearts by the Spirit of God consists in new Thoughts and new Desires, in filling our Minds with great and sublime Truths, and in giving us Desires and Inclinations, Hopes and Fears, Cares and Pleasures suitable to them.

This is being born^d of the Spirit. Hence appears a plain Reason of an universal Self-denial, because the Spirit of the World and the Spirit of our corrupt Hearts, is in a State of Contrariety to this Spirit and Wisdom which is from above. So that it is to be the main Business and Labour of our Lives, to contradict those Motions of our Hearts, and those Tempers of the World, which are contrary to this Spirit, which is to be the Principle of our new Life in Christ.

We must therefore deny ourselves all those Ways of Life, all Cares and Enjoyments which too much possess our Minds, and render them insensible of these great Truths. We must Practise all that Self-denial, Temperance, Abstinence, Care and Watchfulness which can anyway fit and prepare our Minds to hear and receive, to comprehend and relish the Instructions and Doctrine which come from the Spirit of God. For all these Truths, every Thing that relates to God and Religion have a different Effect upon us, according to the State or Way of Life that we are in. As Land must be prepared to receive the best Seed, as Rocks can bring forth no Fruit, so unless our Minds are in some proper State and Disposition to Co-operate with the Holy Spirit, and receive his Instructions, his Gifts and Graces will bring forth no Fruit.

'Tis acknowledged by all, that a Life of Intemperance and Debauchery makes us dead and senseless of Religion, and incapable of receiving its Truths: But then it is not enough considered, that the Vanity of the Mind and Understanding busied in Trifles, an impertinent Course of Life, will as certainly produce the same Effect. If our Understanding is full of foolish Imaginations, devoted to Trifles, Religion can gain no Entrance. A Man may be so earnest in picking Straws, as to have no Leisure to think of his Salvation, nor any more Inclination to it, than one that is constantly in Drink. Children^d are incapable of Religion, not because they are intemperate and debauched, but because they have little Minds, that are taken up and employed with little and trifling Entertainments. Now if when we are Men, we have the Minds of Children, and have only changed our Playthings, we shall embrace and practise Religion just to as much Purpose as Children do: For a Mind taken up with Georgaws, and Trifles, and impertinent Satisfactions, is in the same State, whether it be four, or whether it be fifty Years old. If it be made silly with trifling Concerns, and false Satisfactions, it is in a State of as much Disorder, and as contrary to Religion, as a State of Gluttony and Intemperance.

upon Christian Perfection. 139

Thus poor Amusements, vain Arts, useless Sciences, impertinent Learning, false Satisfactions, a wrong Turn of Mind, a State of Idleness, or any the vainest Trifles of Life, may keep Men at as great a Distance from the true Impressions of Religion, and from living by the Spirit of God, as the Ignorance of Childhood, or the Debaucheries of Intemperance.

Titius is temperate and regular, but then he is so great a Mathematician, that he does not know when Sunday comes: He sees People going to Church, as he sees others going to Market, he goes on studying, measuring, and calculating, and may as well be called a Merchant, as a Christian.

All Doctrines of Religion are disagreeable to Philo, he avoids them as he avoids Party; now what's the Reason of it? It is not because he is debauched and intemperate, but he is a Virtuoso devoted to polite Literature, his Soul is extended to all the Curiosities in the World, and thinks all Time to be lost, that is not spent in the Search of Shells, Urns, Inscriptions, and broken Pieces of Pavements. This makes the Truths of Religion, and the Concerns of Eternity, seem small Things in his Eyes, fit only for the Enquiry of narrow, little and unpolite Souls.

Patronus is fond of a Clergyman who understands Music, Painting, Statuary, and Architecture. He is an Enemy to the Dissenters, and loves the Church of England because of the Stateliness and Beauty of its Buildings; he never comes to the Sacrament, but will go forty Miles to see a fine Altar-piece. He goes to Church when there is a new Tune to be heard, but never had any more serious Thoughts about Salvation, than about Flying. If you visit him when he is dying, you will hear his dying Thoughts upon Architecture.

Eusebius would read Prayers twice every Day in his Parish, he would be often with the Poor and Sick, and spend much Time in charitable Visits; he would be wholly taken up in the Cure of Souls, but that he is busy in studying the old Grammarians, and would fain reconcile some Differences amongst them, before he dies.

Lycia has no wicked or irreligious Temper, and she might be pious, but that she is too easy, gay, and cheerful, to admit of Care of any Kind. She can no more repent, than she can be out of Temper, and must be the same sparkling cheerful Creature in the Church, as in the Playhouse. She might be capable of understanding the Misery of human Nature, and the Necessity of the Comforts of Religion, but that she is so happy every time she is dressed.

Matrona is old, and has been this fifty Years, eating and drinking, sleeping and waking, dressing and undressing, paying and receiving Visits. She has no Profaneness, and if she has no Piety, it is owing to this, that she never had a spare half Hour in all her Life to think about it. She envies her Daughters, because they will dress and visit when she is dead.

Publius goes to Church sometimes, and reads the Scripture, but he knows not what he reads or prays, his Head is so full of Politics. He is so angry at Kings and Ministers of State, that he has no Time nor Disposition to call himself to account. He has the History of all Parliaments, Elections, Prosecutions, and Impeachments, and dies with little or no Religion, through a constant Fear of Popery.

Siccus has neither Virtues nor Vices, he has been all his life-long building and pulling down, making Canals and Ditches, raising Walls and Fences. People call him a good Man, because he employs the Poor; Siccus might have been a religious Man, but that he thought building was the chief Happiness of a rational Creature. He is all the Week amongst Dirt and Mortar, and stays at home on Sundays to view his Contrivances. He will die more contentedly, if his Death does not happen whilst some Wall is in building.

Silvius laughs at preaching and praying, not because he has any profane Principles, or any Arguments against Religion, but because he happens to have been used to nothing but Noise, and Hunting, and Sports.

I have mentioned these several Characters, to show us that it is not only Profaneness, Debauchery, and open Vices, that keep Men from the Impressions of true Religion, but that the mere Play-things of Life, impertinent Studies, vain Amusements, false Satisfactions, idle Dispositions, will produce the same Effect. A wrong Turn of Mind, impertinent Cares, a Succession of the poorest Trifles, if they take up our Thoughts, leave no more Room for the Cares and Fears of true Piety, than gross Sensuality.

Our blessed Saviour saith, *Woe unto you Pharisees, for ye love the uppermost Seats in Synagogues, and Greetings in the Markets. The Wisdom of this World would find little to condemn in such a Behaviour as this, but yet we see that the Wisdom of God condemns it with a Woe, teaching us, that every wrong Turn of Mind, every false Satisfaction, puts the Soul in a State that is contrary to Religion, and makes Men unfit to receive its Doctrines. This is the Reason why Religion calls us to a State of Self-denial, Humility, and Mortification, because it is a State that awakens the Soul into right Apprehensions of Things, and qualifies us to see, and hear, and understand the Doctrines of eternal Truth. We must deny ourselves all our Ways of Folly and Vanity, let go every false Satisfaction, that the Soul may be at Liberty with its full Attention, to listen to the Instructions of Religion.

upon Christian Perfection. 141

Would we see anything exactly, we must take our Eyes from everything else, so if we would apprehend truly the Things of Religion, we must take our Minds from all other Objects; we must empty ourselves of all false Satisfactions, or we shall never know the Want, nor feel the Excellency of our true Good.

We see even in worldly Matters, that if we propose anything to a Man when he is in the Pursuit of something else, he hardly hears, or understands us, we must stay for a Season of more Leisure and Indifference, till his Thoughts and Passions are at rest.

Now this holds much stronger in Matters of Religion, its Doctrines are neither heard nor understood, because it always finds us in the Pursuit of something else, it matters not what this something else is, whether it be loving uppermost Seats in the Synagogues, a Fondness for Trifles, a Joy in Luxury and Idleness, or a Labour after Riches; the Mind is equally employed wrong, and so not in a Condition to like, or at Leisure to listen to any other Happiness. If you were to propose the same Truths to a Man in another State, when Weariness or Disappointment has made him give up all Designs, or when Sickness or the Approach of Death shows him that he must act no longer in them, they would have quite another Effect upon him; then the great Things of Religion appear great indeed; he feels their whole Weight, and is amazed that he did not see them always in the same Manner. Now it is the great End and Design of Self-denial, to put a Stop to the Follies of Life, and mortify all our Passions, that our Souls may quietly consider, and fully comprehend the Truths which come from God, that our Hearts being at Liberty from a Crowd of foolish Thoughts, may be ready to obey and co-operate with the Inspirations of that Spirit, which is to lead and quicken us in all Holiness; that Death and Judgment, Heaven and Hell, may make as deep Impressions upon our Minds in the Middle of our Lives, as at our last Hour; that we may be as wise and prudent as sick and dying Men, and live with such Apprehensions as most People die with, that we may see the Vanity of the World, the Misery of Sin, the Greatness of Eternity, and the Want of God, as they see it who stand upon the Brink of another World.

This is the great and happy Work of Self-denial, which is to fill us with a Spirit of Wisdom, to awaken us into a true Knowledge of ourselves, and show us who, and where, and what we are. Till this Self-denial has put a Stop to our Follies, and opened our Eyes, our Life is but a Sleep, a Dream, a mere Succession of Shadows, and we act with as little Reason and Judgment, as a Child that is pleased with blowing about a Feather. We must therefore not only deny our wicked and sinful Inclinations, but also all our Follies, Impertinences, and vain Satisfactions; for as plain and known Sins harden and corrupt, so Impertinences and false Satisfactions delude and blind our Hearts, and render them insensible of our real Misery, or true Happiness.

We are true Members of the Kingdom of God, when the Kingdom of God is within us, when the Spirit of Religion is the Spirit of our Lives, when seated in our Hearts, it diffuses itself into all our Motions, when we are wise by its Wisdom, sober by its Sobriety, and humble by its Humility; when it is the Principle of all our Thoughts and Desires, the Spring of all our Hopes and Fears; when we like and dislike, seek and avoid, mourn and rejoice, as becomes those who are born again of God. Now this is the Work of the Holy Spirit in our Hearts, to give us a new Understanding, a new Judgment, Temper, Taste, and Relish, new Desires, and new Hopes and Fears. So far therefore as we prepare ourselves by Self-denial, for this Change of Heart and Mind, so far we invite the Assistance, and concur with the Inspirations of the Holy Spirit. And so far as we nourish any foolish Passion, indulge any Vanity of Mind, or Corruption of Heart, so far we resist the Graces of God's Holy Spirit, and render ourselves indisposed to relish and improve his secret Inspirations. Christians are therefore to consider themselves, not only as Men, that are to act by a Principle of Reason, but as spiritual Beings, who have a higher Principle of Life within them, and are to live by the Wisdom and Instructions of the Spirit of God.

As reasonable Men would do everything that tended to strengthen and improve their Reason, so wise Christians ought to practise every Way of Life, that can fit them for further Degrees of Grace, that can strengthen and preserve their Union with the Spirit of God. For as a Man without Reason has but the Figure of a Man, so a Christian without the Spirit of God, has but the Form of a Christian. And as the Perfection of a Man consists in the highest Improvement of his Reason, so the Perfection of a Christian consists in his Growth in Grace, in the spiritual Turn and Temper of his Heart and Mind. Here therefore must we fix all our Care and Concern, that we may remove all Hindrances of Divine Grace, and preserve this Kingdom of God within us ; that we may be truly spiritual in all our Ways and Designs, and indulge no Tempers that may lessen our Union with the Spirit of God.

Some Persons will perhaps refrain from Grief, when they find that it hurts their Eyes ; they will avoid Passion and Anger, if it ends in Pains of the Head ; but they would do well to consider that these Tempers are to be abstained from upon much greater Accounts. Passion may disorder our Bodies, waste our Spirits, and leave Pains in our Heads : but it leaves greater Marks of Injury in our better Part, as it throws us into a State of Madness, and banishes the Holy Spirit of Peace and Gentleness, and prepares us for the Suggestions of the Spirit of Darkness. Grief may hurt our Eyes, but it much more hurts our Souls, as it sinks them into a State of Gloom and Darkness, which expels and quenches the Spirit of God ; for Light may as well unite with Darkness, as the Spirit of God dwell with the gloomy Dulness and Horror of stupid Grief. What I have observed of these two Passions, ought to be concluded of every other Passion and Temper ; we are to consider it as it suits with, or resists that new Spirit by whose holy Motions we are to be preserved in a State of Holiness.

Now seeing this Change of our Hearts, and Newness of Spirit is the whole of Religion, we must fear and avoid all Irregularity of Spirit, every unreasonable Temper, because it affects us in the Seat of Life, because it hurts us in our principal Part, and makes us less capable of the Graces, and less obedient to the Motions of God's Holy Spirit. We must labour after a State of Peace, Satisfaction and Thankfulness, free from the Folly of vain Hopes, idle Fears, and false Anxieties, that our Souls may be disposed to feel the Joys, to rejoice in the Comforts, and advance in the Graces of the Holy Ghost.

With what Care and Exactness we are to conduct ourselves, with Regard to the Spirit of God, is fully set forth in the following Words : *Let no corrupt Communication proceed out of your Mouth, but that which is good to the Use of edifying, that it may minister Grace unto the Hearers, and grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby you are sealed unto the Day of Redemption. That we may not here mistake what is meant by corrupt Communication, that we may not fancy it only implies sinful and wicked Discourse, the Apostle adds ; but that which is good to the Use of edifying, that it may minister Grace unto the Hearers. So that it is a Conversation that does not edify and profit the

* Eph. iv. 29.

Hearer, that the Apostle condemns as corrupt, and such as is to be avoided. Let it be observed that the Apostle does not prohibit this kind of Conversation, because it is useless, impertinent, and better to be avoided, but for a Reason of the utmost Consequence, that we may not grieve the Holy Spirit of God. This shows us, that we Christians are to govern ourselves by no less a Rule, than a Conformity to the Spirit of God, that we are not only to deny ourselves vain and foolish Actions, but also idle and unedifying Discourse, and conduct ourselves in all our Behaviour, with such a Spirit of Wisdom and Purity, as may make the Holy Ghost delight to dwell in us. This Rule of Perfection is highly conformable to the Nature of our Religion. For as our Religion consists in a new Heart and new Spirit, it is certain that we are then only arrived to the true State of our Religion, when it governs our Words and Actions, and is the constant Temper of our Minds at all Times, and on all Occasions. A covetous Man is not only covetous when he is in his Counting-Room, he is the same Person, and governed by the same Temper and Way of thinking wherever he is. And the same Thing is equally true of every Way of Life, when it has once entered into our Heart, and become a settled Temper, it is not occasionally exercised in this or that Place, or at set Times, but is always in Being, and constantly disposing us to Thoughts, and Words, and Actions suitable to it.

Some Persons seem to know so little of Religion, that they confine it to Acts of Devotion, and public Occasions of Divine Service, they don't consider that it consists in a new Heart and new Spirit, and that Acts of Devotion, Prayer and Preaching, Watchings, Fastings and Sacraments, are only to fill us with this new Heart and Spirit, and make it the common constant Spirit of our Lives every Day and in every Place.

A Man may be said to have some regard to Religion, who is regular at Places of Divine Worship, but he cannot be reckoned of a religious Spirit, till it is his Spirit in every Place, and on every Occasion, till he lives and breathes by it, and thinks and speaks, and acts according to its Motions.

A Man may frequent Meetings for Mirth, but yet, if when he is out of them, he gives himself unto Peevishness, Chagrin and Dulness, I presume no one will say, that such a Man is of a cheerful Spirit. It is easy to make the Application here, if we are only Attendants at Places of Religion, if when we are out of those Places, we are of another Spirit, I don't say Proud or Covetous, but Vain and Foolish, if our Actions are silly, and our Conversation trifling and impertinent, our Tempers vain and worldly, we are no more of a religious Spirit, than a dull and peevish Man is of a cheerful Spirit, because he is regular at some set Meetings for Mirth.

If a Person of Pride and Vanity in the general Course of his Life, should yet think himself humble, because he had his appointed Times of praying for Humility, we might justly say of him, that he knew nothing of the Nature of that Virtue: In like manner, if one, whose Conversation, whose Discourse and Carriage, and Temper in common Life, are not according to the Spirit of Religion, should yet think himself religious, because he had his appointed Places of Prayer, it might be justly said of him, that he was a Stranger to the Nature of true Religion. For Religion is not ours till we live by it, till it is the Religion of our Thoughts, Words, and Actions, till it goes with us into every Place, sits uppermost on every Occasion, and forms and governs our Hopes and Fears, our Cares and Pleasures. He is the religious Man who watches and guards his Spirit, and endeavours to be always in the Temper of Religion, who worships God in every Place by a Purity of Behaviour, who is as fearful of foolish Thoughts, irregular Tempers, and vain Imaginations, at one Time as at another, who is as Wise and Heavenly at Home, or in the Field, as in the House of God. For when once Religion has got Possession of a Man's Heart, and is become as it ought to be, his ruling Temper, it is as agreeable to such a one in all Places, and at all Times to speak and act according to its Directions, as it is agreeable to the Ambitious Man, to act according to the Motions of Ambition. We must therefore take it for granted, that if we are not Religious in our Conversation and common Temper, we are not Religious in our Hearts, we may have a Formality of Religion at certain Times and Places, but we are not of a religious Spirit.

We see everybody speaking and conversing according to their Spirit and Temper, the Covetous, the Ambitious, the Vain and Self-conceited have each of them their proper Language suitable to their Spirit and Temper, they are the same Persons in all Places, and always talk like themselves. If therefore we could meet with Persons of a truly Religious Spirit and Temper, we should find them like Men of other Tempers, the same Persons in all Places, and always Talking and Acting like themselves. We should find them Living by one Temper, and Conversing with Men with the same Spirit that they converse with God, not one Thing in one Place, and another in another, not formal and grave at a Funeral, and mad and frantic at a Feast, not listening to Wisdom at Church, and delighting in Folly at Home, not angry at one foolish Thing, and as much pleased with another, but steady and uniform in the same wise and religious Temper.

Further, as we are not of a religious Spirit till it is the Spirit of our Life, and orders our Conversation; so it is carefully to be observed, that if our Conversation is Vain and Foolish, it keeps us in a State incapable of Religion, by grieving the Holy Spirit. For as we can do nothing without the Spirit of God, as it is our Breath, our Life, our Light and our Strength, so if we live in such a Way as grieves and removes this Holy Spirit from us, we are as Branches that are broken off from the Tree, and must perish in the Deadness and Corruption of our Nature. Let this therefore teach us to judge Rightly of the Sin and Danger of Vain, Unedifying and Corrupt Communication; it is not the Sin of Idleness or Negligence, it is not the Sin of a Pardonable Infirmary, it is not a little Mistake in spiritual Wisdom, but it is a Sin that stands between us and the Tree of Life, that opposes our whole Happiness, as it grieves and separates the Holy Spirit from us. Let this also teach some People the Reason, why they are so dead and senseless of Religion, and hardly capable of an outward formal Compliance with it; they are not guilty of gross Sins, they have an aversion to Cheating and Falseness, but at the same time have no more feeling or relish of Religion, than mere Reprobates. Now the Reason of it is this, they live in such an Impertinence of Conversation, their own Communication is so constantly upon silly and vain Subjects, and they are so fond of those who have the Talent of conversing in the same Manner, that they render themselves unfit for the Residence of the Holy Spirit. Their whole Life is almost nothing else, but a Course of that Filthiness, foolish Talking and Jesting, which the Apostle forbids. Now this kind of Conversation may grieve the Holy Spirit, for these two Reasons, first, because it proceeds from too disordered a Soul, for the Holy Spirit to delight in; for such as our Conversation is, such is our Heart, for Truth itself has assured us, that Out of the abundance of the Heart the Mouth speaketh. If therefore we are delighted with idle Raillery, foolish Jestings, and ridiculous Stories, we must not think that we are only Foolish, so far as a little talk goes, but we must charge ourselves home, and be assured that it is a foolishness of Heart, a vanity of Soul that we labour under.

Secondly, Another Reason why this Conversation grieves the Holy Spirit, may be this, because it is of so great Consequence, and has so great an Influence in Life. We don't seem enough to apprehend, either how much Good or how much Evil there is in Conversation, and I believe it may be affirmed that the greatest Instructions, and the greatest Corruptions proceed from it. If some People were to give us their true History, they would tell us that they never had any Religion, since they had such Acquaintance, and others have been insensibly led into a sincere Piety, only by conversing with pious People. For Men's common Conversation and ordinary Life teach much more effectually, than anything they say or do at set Times and Occasions.

When a Clergyman Preaches, he is for the most part considered as doing his Duty, as Acting according to his Profession, and doing that which all Clergymen do, whether good or bad. But if he is the same wise and virtuous Man in his Communication, that he is in the Pulpit, if his Speech be seasoned with Salt, that it may minister Grace unto the Hearers, if the common and ordinary Actions of his Life be visibly governed by a Spirit of Piety; Such a one will make Converts to Holiness; he will be heard with Reverence on the Sunday, not so much for the Weight of what he says, as for what he says and does all the Week. And on the contrary, if a Clergyman when he comes out of the Pulpit, is but like other Men, as Irregular in his Tempers, as Trifling in his Conversation, as Eager in Diversions, and as Ridiculous in his Pleasures, as Vain in his Designs, as other People, he will mightily lessen his Power over the Hearts of his Hearers. A Father now and then gives his Son virtuous Advice, and the Son perhaps would be much the better for it, but that he never hears him talking Virtuously, but when he is giving him Advice, this makes him think, that he is then only Acting the Part of a Father, as when he is buying him Clothes, or putting him out to an Employment. Whereas if he saw his Father's ordinary Life and Conversation to be under the Rules of Religion, and his everyday Temper, a Temper of Piety, 'tis very likely, that he would be won into an Imitation of it.

A Mother, orders her Daughter to be taught the Catechism, and desires that she may have Books of Devotion. The Daughter would have imagined that she was to have formed herself by these Books, she would have read them when she was alone, but that she finds her Mother sits up at Night to read Romances, and if she is ill, must be read to Sleep with a Play. She might have had some Notion of religious Modesty and Humility, but that she sees her Mother eager after all Diversions, Impatient till she knows all Intrigues, fond of the Wit and Flattery of Rakes, pleased with the Gentility of Fops, and the Gracefulness of Players.

Now a Daughter educated with a Mother of this Temper and Conversation, is rendered almost incapable of Religion.

This therefore may be one Reason, why a vain unedifying Conversation grieves the Holy Spirit, viz., because it not only proceeds from a Corruption of Heart, a disordered State of the Soul, but because it is so powerful in its Influences, and does so much harm to those whom we converse with. For it is our Communication, our ordinary Temper, and manner of common Life that affects other People, that either hardens them in Sin, or awakens them to a Sense of Piety. Let therefore all Clergymen, and Masters and Mistresses of Families, look carefully to themselves, let them consider, that if their ordinary Life, their Communication be vain, impertinent, and unedifying, that they are not only in a corrupt State of Heart, but are guilty of corrupting and perverting the Hearts of those who belong to them. Let them not think, that they have sufficiently discharged their Duty, by seeing that those who relate to them, have their proper Instructions, for it is next to impossible for such Instructions to have their proper Effect, against the Temper and Example of those we converse with. If a Clergyman Plays, and Drinks and Sports with his Flock in the Week-Days, let him not wonder, if he preaches them asleep on Sundays. If a Father is intemperate, if he Swears, and converses foolishly with his Friends, let him not wonder, that his Children cannot be made virtuous. For there is nothing that teaches to any Purpose, but our ordinary Temper, our common Life and Conversation; and almost all People will be such as those, amongst whom they were born and bred. It is therefore the necessary Duty of all Christians in all States of Life, to look carefully to their ordinary Behaviour, that it be not the Means of poisoning and corrupting the Hearts of those whom they converse with. They must consider, that all the Follies, and Impertinences of their ordinary Life and Conversation, have the Guilt of destroying Souls, and that the Blood of those, whom their Follies have destroyed, will be required at their Hands.

It is sometimes said of a foolish, irregular and vain Person, that he is only his own Enemy; but this is as absurd as to say, that a Person of exemplary and eminent Piety, is only his own Friend; for as his lively Piety will certainly communicate itself to those about him, so the Folly and impertinent Spirit of an irregular Man, will naturally infect those who are obliged to be near him.

A Mistress whose daily Conversation is a daily Proof to her Maids, that she is governed by a Spirit of true Piety in all that she says and does, whose regular Life is a continual visible Labour to work out her Salvation with Fear and Trembling, is a Blessing to all who stand about her; she communicates Happiness even to those who are born of her Servants; they will be educated in Piety, because their Parents learnt what Piety was, in waiting on such a Mistress.

A good-natured, drinking, sleeping, playing, swearing Master, is a Curse to those who attend upon him ; they are led into all Irregularities, by following his Steps, and are sent into the World hardened in Follies, and insensible of Religion, by having lived with such a Master. This therefore ought carefully to be considered by all Christians, as a mighty Encouragement to an exact Strictness and Regularity of Behaviour ; that as a holy Conversation entitles us to a Reward for other People's Virtues, so an evil Communication and the Folly of our Lives, makes us liable to a Punishment for other Men's Sins. For we can neither live well nor ill to ourselves alone, but must of Necessity do either Good or Harm to others, by our Manner of Conversation. This is one great Reason why a vain corrupt Communication does so grieve the Holy Spirit, because it is so infecting an Evil, and does so corrupt the Manners of those whom we converse with. This Doctrine of abstaining from corrupt Communication, that we may not grieve the Spirit of God, teaches us a high Aim and exalted Degree of Perfection, which is peculiar to Christianity. As Christianity lays the Design of uniting us to God, and raising us to a more intimate Participation of the Divine Nature, so we are to make the Spirit of our Religion, and the Greatness of its Designs, the Rule of our Perfection.

We must not only conduct ourselves by Rules of Morality, but pursue such Degrees of Purity, as can only be expressed by an Imitation of God, and aspire after such Wisdom, as is suggested to us, by considering that we are Temples of the Holy Ghost, and must live like Beings consecrated by the Spirit of Wisdom. If we were frequently to consider the Holy Presence of this God within us, and to ask ourselves, Does this Discourse, this Behaviour, become one who is to act according to the Inspirations of the Divine Spirit? we should find, that the very Thought of this Dignity of our State, would determine several Points where no express Law condemns us ; we should find such a contrariety in many of our allowed Ways, to our Christian Greatness, to this Holy Spirit that is given unto us, as would sufficiently check our Behaviour, only by showing us that we acted below ourselves.

It is common in Life to hear a Man say, this does not become a Gentleman, that does not become a Man of Quality : Now I would have us find out something like this in Religion ; for certainly if any State of Life has its Dignity, which can excite Men to a suitable Greatness of Action, surely the State of a Christian, which is a State of such relation to God, which unites us to his Holy Spirit, ought to raise in us a Desire of acting suitably to so exalted a Condition. For who can so justly be afraid of acting below himself, as he who is made one with Christ? Who can so reasonably think that he is never wise, or holy, or pure enough, as he who is to walk with God in the Light of his Holy Spirit, whose Soul and Body is made a sacred Temple for the Divine Presence?

The Heathen Philosophers exhorted Man to reverence his Reason, as a Ray of the Deity; but we can go much higher, we can exhort him to reverence the Deity that dwelleth in him, and to act with such Purity, as becomes Persons who are inspired by the Holy Ghost.

This is the Improvement that we are to make of this Doctrine of Divine Grace; it must make us exact and careful of our Behaviour, that we may walk worthy of that Holy Spirit that dwelleth in us.

Chapter X.

The Necessity of Divine Grace, obligeth all Christians to a constant Purity, and Holiness of Conversation; wherein is shown, the great Danger, and great Impiety, of reading vain and impertinent Books.

I HAVE shown in the foregoing Chapter, that the Necessity of Divine Grace is a mighty Argument for an universal Care and Exactness of Life and Conversation. I come now to speak of one remarkable Branch of it; Let no corrupt Communication proceed out of your Mouth, but that which is good to the Use of edifying, that it may minister Grace to the Hearers, and grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the Day of Redemption. Now if we are to let no corrupt Communication proceed out of our Mouth, that we may not grieve the Holy Spirit, and separate him from us, then it follows, that we are also to deny ourselves the Entertainment of all corrupt, impertinent, and unedifying Books. For if vain and idle Words are not to proceed out of our Mouths, we must be under the same Necessity of not letting them enter into our Hearts.

If we would know what Books are to be avoided, as corrupt and grievous to the Holy Spirit, we must look back to the Rule of our Communication; for as that Communication is there said to be corrupt, that does not edify and minister Grace to the Hearers, so must we look upon all those Books as corrupt, which do not improve and confirm our Hearts in Virtue, or, in the Apostle's Words, such as do not edify and minister Grace to the Readers. Now this Book-entertainment is as certainly forbidden by the Apostle, as Cheating is forbidden by the Eighth Commandment: For if I am not to say foolish and impertinent Things myself, because such a Communication grieves and removes the Holy Spirit of God, I am as certainly forbid the reading the corrupt and impertinent Sayings of other People. The Books which mostly corrupt our Hearts, and fill us with a Spirit of Folly, are such, as almost all the World allow themselves to read, I mean, Books of Wit and Humour, Romances, Plays, and other Productions of the Poets. Thus a grave orthodox old Gentleman, if he hears that his Niece is very good, and delights in Reading, will fill her Closet with Volumes of Plays, and Poems on several Occasions, on purpose to encourage her to spend her Time well. There is not perhaps a more surprising Infatuation in the Conduct of Christians, than with regard to these Books.

A Father would be very much troubled to see his Daughter in Conversation pleased with the lewd Remarks of a Rake; he would be afraid that she had lost the Virtue of her Mind, if she could relish such a Turn of Conversation. Yet this same Father shall help his Daughter to a Volume of Occasional Poems, for her Closet-Entertainment, full of such gross Immodesties, as hardly any Rake would venture to express in any Conversation. It is perhaps a Collection of the Poet's finest, strongest, and most finished Thoughts in Lewdness and Immodesty. Every Wantonness of Imagination, every Transport of Passion, every Extravagance of Thought, which ever seized him in his Life, is there preserved for the Meditation of the Christian Reader; as if Profaneness, Blasphemy, the grossest Descriptions of Lust, and the wildest Sallies of impure Passions, were made good and useful for a Christian, by being put into Rhyme and Measure. And what shows this Infatuation in a yet higher Degree, is this, that it is still a prevailing Opinion in the World, that the reading virtuous Books is a great Means of improving in Virtue; whereas one would suppose, that the Books I have mentioned could only be allowed upon a Belief, that there was neither Good nor Harm to be got by Reading.

But, however, let us remember that though the Way of the World which is thus inconsistent, may allow this polite kind of Entertainment, yet this is no Rule or Security for our Conduct, since we are no more to make the Spirit of the World our Guide, than we are to make the Riches of the World our Happiness. The Doctrines of the Scriptures are the only Rule by which we are now to live, and the Rule by which we shall hereafter be judged. Now if we will allow ourselves in the reading profane, impure, and impertinent Books, which have everything in them that can pervert our Understandings, and corrupt our Hearts, though the Scripture forbids all unedifying Discourse, as a Thing that grieves the Holy Spirit, it must be said, that we act as contrary to Scripture, as if we indulged and pleased ourselves in Malice and Revenge.

You read a Play, I tell you that you read Ribaldry and Profaneness, that you fill your Mind with extravagant Thoughts, lewd Intrigues, vain Fictions, wanton Ideas, and impure Descriptions. If you ask me where is the Sin of this, you may as well ask me where is the Sin of Swearing and Lying: For it is a Sin not only against this or that particular Text, but it is a Sin against the whole Nature and Spirit of our Religion; it is a Contradiction to all Holiness and to all the Methods of arriving at it. For if evil unedifying Communication be forbidden in Scripture, and for this Reason, because it grieves the Spirit of God, then the Entertainment of such Books is certainly forbidden. For certainly the wild Rant, the profane Speeches, filthy Jest, and impure Passions, which there abound, are an evil Communication in the highest Degree, and must therefore highly grieve and separate the Holy Spirit from us. Can therefore any Practice be forbid upon a more dreadful Penalty than this? For without the Spirit of God, we are but Figures of Christians, and must die in our Sins. If therefore we can prove it to be a small Matter to grieve the Spirit of God, then we may allow that it is but a small Offence, to please ourselves in reading those corrupt Books. Our Blessed Saviour saith, Out of the Heart proceed evil Thoughts, and that these are the Things that defile a Man; must it not therefore be a great Defilement to take evil Thoughts into our Hearts? Need we any other Motive than this, to watch and guard the Purity of our Minds? He that, notwithstanding this Doctrine of our Saviour's, dares to set apart Times for the reading the evil and impure Thoughts that are in these Books, does as plainly despise the Doctrine of Christ, as he that murders, despises the Doctrine of the Sixth Commandment.

You will say, perhaps, that you only read these Books now and then, for Amusement, and only to divert your Spirits, and that most of the Time which you devote to Reading, is spent in reading Books that may improve your Piety. If this be your Case, you can say that for yourself which very few can; for the Generality of Readers make other Books their chief and most constant Entertainment. But to speak now to your Excuse, you only read such Books now and then, for your Amusement, and to divert your Spirits; that is, you entertain your Mind with evil Thoughts, you read, relish, and digest, the Lewdness, Profaneness, and Impurity, of these Books, not with a serious Design of making yourself lewd, profane, and impure, but only as it were in jest, and to have a little Pleasure from them. Now this is the plain Meaning of this Excuse, which is as absurd as anything can well be supposed. It is as if a Man, who allows himself now and then to get drunk, and swear, and rant, should say in his Excuse, that he is for the most part very sober, and that when he takes these Liberties, it is not through any Desire or Liking of the Sin of Drunkenness, but only as it were in jest, and through the mere Gaiety of his Spirits. You will ask, perhaps, if the Sin of reading Plays be like the Sin of Drunkenness. I answer, very like it, and perhaps equally grievous to the Spirit of God. For is not evil Thoughts, Vanity of Mind, and Impurity of Heart, the most dreadful State that we can be in? Can you therefore imagine that the feeding and entertaining your Mind with evil Thoughts, and impure Discourses, is a less Sin than drinking too much? What Rule of Reason or Scripture have you to go by in such a Judgment? You may fancy that there is something much more gross and shameful in Drunkenness, than in this Practice; but if you would judge not by Fancy, but by the Light of Religion, you would find, that it is a Drunkenness and Intemperance of the Mind, as gross and shameful, as abominable in the Sight of God, and as contrary to Piety, as that stupid intemperance which consists in drinking too much.

One great Shame of Drunkenness, is this, that it fits us for Ribaldry, and all the Folly of Discourse; that it makes us say silly Things ourselves, and be pleased with the most foolish Rant and extravagant Nonsense of other People. Are not you therefore doing that which is most shameful in Drunkenness? And is it not a Sign of greater Impurity, and greater Want of Piety, for you coolly and soberly to seek and relish such Rant and Folly of Discourse, such profane Jests and Wantonness of Wit, as Men are most pleased with, when Drink has made them half mad. Now the liking of such Discourse as this, makes up great Part of the Guilt of Drunkenness, must it not therefore imply a greater Guilt in you, who like such foolish Discourse when you are sober? Drunken Men like ill Discourse, because Reason and Religion have then no Power over them; if therefore you have as false a Judgment, and relish a Discourse that is equally foolish and mad, must it not be owing to the same Thing, because Reason and Religion have then no Power over you? Drunken Men like any sort of Madness; they are not nice in their Taste; if a Discourse be but wild or lewd, they delight in it, but you like only a Madness that is put into Verse, you only delight in the impure Descriptions and Ravings of Lust, when they are adorned with beautiful Expressions and made Musical to the Ear. So that the Difference betwixt you and a drunken Man does not consist in this, that you have a more religious Taste, or Purity of Mind than he; but in this, that he likes all Sorts of Rant, and Wantonness of Discourse, but you do not like it, unless it be in Rhyme, and divided into Acts and Scenes. He likes a Song because it is a Song, but you do not like it, unless its Impurity and Profaneness be made more Charming by soft and dying Sounds. If therefore a young Lady will go to Bed with her Play, she must not reckon herself better Employed, than her Brother who is at the same time half Mad over his Bottle. For it is impossible to show, that the entertaining ourselves with such evil Thoughts and filthy Communications is a less Sin, than to be Ranting over a Bottle. He that can do this, may also prove, that it is a less Sin to tell a Lie when you are Sober, than when you are Drunk.

Again, you say in your Excuse, that you only read these Books now and then, to divert your Spirits, and that you mostly read good Books. Now this Excuse carries its own Conviction, for it acknowledges all that is necessary to condemn it. For it owns that these Books are Vain and Corrupting, that they are of a contrary Nature to good Books, and naturally produce contrary Effects: And you reckon yourself only secure from being hurt by them, for this Reason, because your Mind is so well Seasoned and Strengthened by the Use of good Books. But pray consider the absurdity of all this. For this is saying, I venture into Temptations, not because I cannot avoid them, or am ignorant that they are Temptations, but because I know myself to be Strong. I read impure Imaginations, filthy Jest, and Profane Harangues, not because they are an harmless, innocent Diversion, but because the Purity and Piety of my Mind is too great to receive the least Injury from them.

Now nothing can be conceived more Absurd and Irreligious than such an Excuse as this. Yet what Christian who reads Plays can possibly make a better. For to say that our Plays are not full of profane Rant, filthy Jest and gross Descriptions of Impurity, is the same Thing as to say that we have no Plays in English.

Further, there is a proper Time for every Thing that is lawful to be done: Now can you tell me when it is proper for a Christian to Meditate upon these Books. Is it to be left to your Temper to entertain yourself as it suits with you, or can your Reason point out the convenient Seasons for it? If you are blindly to follow your Temper, then you are in no better State, than other People who are blindly following other Tempers. If your Reason can appoint any Time for such Entertainment, it must be because there is some Time that is proper for it. Now the different Times or States of our Mind may perhaps be all comprehended under some one of these.

There is a Time when our Hearts are more than ordinarily raised towards God, when we feel the Joys and Comforts of Religion, and enjoy a Peace that passes all Understanding. Now I suppose Reason will not allot this Time for the Diversion of such Books.

There is a Time, when either through the Neglect of Duty, Remorse of Mind, worldly Vexations, bodily Tempers, or the Absence of God's Spirit, that we sink into Dejection and Dulness, grow burdensome to ourselves, and can hardly think of anything with Satisfaction. Now if Reason is to judge, this is of all Times the most improper for such Entertainment. For if there is any Time that is more proper than another to think upon God, it is when we are in Heaviness.

When we are Sick, it is time to apply to the Physician, when we are Weary it is a proper Time to Rest; now there is the same natural Fitness in having recourse to God and Religion, when we are under any dejection of Mind. For it is not more the sole Property of Light to dispel Darkness, than it is the sole Property of Religion to relieve all Uneasiness. Is anyone Afflicted, says the Apostle, let him pray. Now this we are to look upon, not only as wise Advice of something that is very good to be done in Affliction, but as a strict Command, that leaves us no Choice of doing anything in the stead of it.

It is as absolute a Command, as if he said, Hath anyone Sinned, let him Repent. For an Application to God, is as much the one thing to be done in the Hour of Trouble, as Repentance is the one thing to be done in Time of Sin. Our Blessed Saviour saith, Be of good comfort, I have overcome the World. He therefore who in the want of Comfort, seeks for it in anything else, but in the Redemption of Christ, in his Conquest over the World, is no more a true Christian, than he who does not believe in Christ.

You seem to make Times of Dulness, the Occasion of your Reading those Books, by saying that you only read them to divert your Spirits. So that, that which you take to be a Reason for reading them, is a strong Objection against it. For it is never so improper to read those Books, as when you want to have your Spirits raised, or your Mind made easy to itself. For it is the highest Abuse you can put upon yourself, to look for Ease and Quiet in anything, but in right Apprehensions of God's Providence. And it is a Sin against the whole Nature of Religion, not to make it the whole Measure and Reason of all your Peace and Enjoyment in every Occurrence of Life.

If you must amuse yourself with a Volume of Plays, because you are laid up with a Broken leg, or have lost a Friend, you are as far from Wisdom, as a Child who is to be made quiet with a Rattle, and not much more Religious than those, who worship Idols; for to seek to such things for Relief and Refreshment, is like applying to the Devil in Distress. A Man who drinks Drams every time he is dull or uneasy, is a wise, prudent, and sober Man, if compared to the Christian who in Seasons of Dejection, has recourse to wanton Wit and profane Rant to divert his Spirits: He destroys the Religion and Purity of his Mind, much more effectually, than the other destroys the Constitution and Health of his Body.

Some People think that in great Distresses, it is proper to seek Comfort in God and religious Reflections, but that in the little Troubles and Vexations of Life, anything that can divert the Mind from them, is as well. But this is very absurd, for surely if God is our proper and sufficient Comfort in great Distresses, he must also be our best Relief in those that are smaller. Unless it can be said, that the Truths of Religion are able to make us bear Persecution and Martyrdom with content, but not great enough to make us easy in little Trials.

Secondly, To seek for Relief in foolish Diversions, is not only applying to a false Remedy, but is also destroying the chief Power of Religion. For as Religion has no Power over us, but as it is our Happiness, so far as we neglect, or refuse to make Use of its Comforts, so far we lessen and destroy its Power over us. For it cannot otherwise be the ordinary daily Care of our Lives, than by being our ordinary Happiness and Consolation in all the Changes and Chances of Life. A Christian therefore is to make his Christianity his Comfort, not only in Times of great Trial and Sufferings, but in all the lesser Vexations of Life, that by this Means every little Occasion of Grief or Disquiet, may be an Occasion of his being more affected with Religion, and made more sensible of its true Comforts.

Thirdly, Those who are for driving away the ordinary Cares, and little Vexations, of human Life, by Diversions, don't enough consider the Nature of human Life. For the little ordinary Troubles of Life, make up the whole Trouble of Life, and the Reason why so many People are full of Trouble and Uneasiness, is, because they are unable to bear little ordinary Troubles ; and they are unable to bear them, because they don't use the proper Means. For since every Disquiet is at something or other that concerns our State and Condition, there is no Way of relieving us from this Disquiet, but by getting right Notions of our Condition. If Children were capable of knowing themselves, or could be taught the Nature of Things, we should not use such Methods of pleasing them as we do ; but as they cannot think and reflect, we never endeavour to reason them into Content ; but if they have lost one Plaything, we only promise them another. The Application is here very easy : For if Men will make themselves happy, as Children are made happy, not by considering the Nature of Things, but by a Change of Amusements, they must also expect to have the Vexations and Torments of Children, and be, like them, laughing and crying at they know not what, all the Days of their Life. For Children are only easily vexed, because they are easily pleased ; and it is certain, that they who can be pleased with Things without knowing their Worth and Value, must in the same Degree be liable to be displeas'd at Things, without knowing their Weight and Importance. And as this is the true State of Childhood, so whosoever is in this State, whatever his Age may be, his Office or his Dignity in Life, is yet as truly in the State and Folly of Childhood, as he that is but four Years old. Take an Instance or two.

A Child whose Heart is half broken at some Misfortune, may perhaps be made easy with a Picture of a Huntsman and a Pack of Hounds ; but if you would comfort the Father who grieves for his eldest Son, the Hounds must be all alive, they must cry and run, and follow a Hare, and this will make the Father as easy, as the Picture made the Child ; such Happiness will make him bear the Loss of his Son.

A Mother comforts her little Girl with a Pack of Cards that are finely painted : By-and-by she wants to be comforted herself, some great Calamity has happened to her. Now you must not think to comfort her with painted Cards, or building Houses with them, her Grief is too great, and she has been too long a Mother, to be pleased with such Things ; it is only serious Ombre that can dry her Eyes, and remove Sorrow from her Heart.

I might easily multiply Instances of this kind, but these are sufficient to show us, that Persons of Age and Authority often differ only from Children, as one Child may differ from another. This is the true Reason why human Life is so full of Complaint, why it is such a Mixture of ridiculous Pleasures, and vain Disquiets; namely, because we live in an entire Ignorance of the Nature of Things, never considering why we are pleased with this, or displeas'd with that, nor any more appeal to Religion to correct our Judgments, than Children appeal to Reason to form their Tempers. For if we will only play, or lull ourselves into Repose, as Children are rocked to Sleep, it is not to be wonder'd at, if, like them, we cry as soon as we are awake. For every false Relief that is not founded in Reason, is only adding to the Weakness and Disorder of our Nature, and making us more liable to further Vexations. For it is absolutely certain, that a Person who is made easy by vain and false Satisfactions, is in the same Degree capable of being made uneasy by vain and ridiculous Vexations. They therefore who don't think it necessary to apply to Religion in all the common and ordinary Disquiets of Life, mistake the Nature of human Life, not considering that it is our applying false Relief to these, that is the Occasion of all our Troubles, and that we are weak and impatient, fretful and dissatisfied, for no other Reason, but because we never made use of the right Remedy against the ordinary Accidents of Life; for had we but learnt to bear little Troubles and Disappointments upon right Reasons, because we are Christians, and Children of God, we should find but few Troubles that would have any great Trial in them. And the Reason why People seemingly religious, are subject to the same Dulness and Peevishness, to the same Vexations, and Variety of Grievances, that other People are, is this, because they make no more Use of their Religion on these Occasions, than other People: They don't so much as intend to keep themselves easy, thankful, and cheerful, by making Religion the Measure and Standard of all their Thoughts and Judgments, in all the common Chances of Life, any more than those do, who have no Thoughts about Religion. And this is the Reason why you see them as ridiculous in common Life, as vainly pleas'd, and as foolishly vexed, as other People.

For Religion makes no further Difference betwixt People, than so far as it is applied. If one Man is constant at Church, and another is mostly absent, the Difference betwixt them may yet be only the Difference of frequenting and not frequenting the Service of the Church. For a Religion only carried thus far, makes no further Difference betwixt People. You must not therefore expect that they must be different Persons in the ordinary Behaviour of their common Life, for they may, notwithstanding this Difference, be equally vain and unreasonable in their Ways, and equally Slaves to the Folly and Humour of their particular Temper. And all this for this plain Reason, because Religion, like anything else, can have no Effect but where it is applied.

Suppose a Person had lame Feet, and bad Eyes. and that he had an Oil that was an infallible Cure for them both, when applied to both; if you saw him only using it for his Eyes, you would not wonder that it had not cured his Feet; you would know that his anointing his Eyes, could only cure his Eyes, and that there was no Ground to expect, that his Feet should be any better, till he anointed his Feet. And all this for this plain Reason, because Things, however good in themselves, can have no further Effect than as they are applied. Now it is just thus in Religion. If it consists only in Devotions and public Worship, it has made this Alteration in a Man, that it has taught him to attend to Devotion and public Worship; it has operated so far as he has applied it. But why must you wonder that he is not of a wise, virtuous, and religious Temper, in all the Actions of his ordinary Life? Is not this wondering why the Oil has not cured a Man's Feet, when he has never applied it to them, but has only anointed his Eyes?

When the regular Churchman as plainly makes Religion the Measure of his ordinary Life, as he makes it the Rule of his going to Church, when he as directly uses it to this Purpose, as a Man anoints his Eyes, who would be cured by anointing them; then you will see him as different in his ordinary Life from other People, as different in his Pleasures and Grievances, in his Cares and Concerns, as he is different from them in Forms and Regularity of Worship. But till Men do this, till they apply the Principles of Religion to all the Actions of ordinary Life, till they make it the Measure of all their daily Tempers, their Joys and Fears, till they think there is as much Piety in being wise and holy in their common Tempers, as in being devout at Church, as much Sin in being vainly pleased and foolishly vexed, as in neglecting the Divine Service; till they thus directly apply Religion to common Life, as a Man applies a Remedy to the Part that he would have cured, it is no more to be expected, that a Religion of Forms of Worship and Devotion, should make a Man religious in the common Judgments and Actions of his ordinary Life, than it is to be expected that an Oil which is only applied to our Eyes, should cure our Feet. So that it is the Manner of our ordinary Life, which carries on a Course of Fears and Cares, Pleasures and Amusements, Loves and Hatreds, suitable to our Tempers and Condition of Life; it is this Manner of our ordinary Life, which we think is thus left to ourselves, that makes Religion so insignificant in the World; it lies by, like a Remedy that is unapplied, it has no Effect, because it is used only as a formal Thing, that has its Devotions and Duties at set Times and Occasions; whereas it should be used and considered as the Rule and Reason of all our Judgments and Actions, as the Measure of all our Cares and Pleasures, as the Life of our Life, the Spirit of our Spirit, and the very Form and Essence of all our Tempers. It is to be in us, like a new Reason and Judgment of our Minds, that is, to reason and judge of everything that we do, and to preside over, and govern, all the Motions of our Hearts. Is anyone afflicted, saith the Apostle, let him sing Psalms; is anyone afflicted, let him pray. This is Religion in the Apostle's Account; it is not only an Attendance at the public Worship, but it is the ruling Habit of our Minds, something that constantly devotes us wholly to God, that allows of no Mirth in our common Life, but a Mirth proper for the Brethren of Christ, a Mirth that can express itself by a rejoicing in God; that allows of no other Cure for Grief or Vexation, than what is to be had from Recourse to God. And indeed, what can be more senseless and absurd, than to see a Christian ever acting in any other Consideration than as a Christian? He is senseless to a Degree of Madness, when he indulges a Thought, or a Motion of his Heart, when he either takes a Pleasure, or relieves a Grief, where he cannot say, I do this as a Christian, as suitable to that State in which Christianity has placed me.

We reckon a Man sufficiently Mad that fancies himself a King, and governing his Subjects, at the same Time that he is tied to a Bed of Straw. So that Madness consists in mistaking our Condition, in having a Set of Thoughts not suitable to it. Now a Christian repeats every Day, I believe in the Forgiveness of Sin, the Resurrection of the Body, and the Life Everlasting, he thanks God for the Redemption of Jesus Christ, for the Means of Grace, and for the Hope of Glory. Yet at the same Time, in this State of Greatness, he fancies himself in a thousand Wants and Miseries. He cries and labours and toils for a Happiness, that has no Existence but in his own Imagination; he fancies himself a Being, that is to be made happy with Sauces, and Ragouts, with painted Clothes, and shining Diamonds; he seeks the Pleasures of Rakes and Libertines, is grieved and fretted like a Child at the loss of a Feather; and must be diverted as they are, with Shows and Plays, and imaginary Scenes of Rant and Nonsense.

Now is not such a one Mad? Does he not know as little of his State, as the Man in Straw, who fancies himself a King. But for a Christian in Times of Dulness or Vexation, to seek Relief in foolish Amusements, in the loose, wild Discourses of Plays, when he should acquaint himself with God, and be at Peace, is a Degree of Madness that exceeds all others ; it is acting as contrary to the Nature of Things, as if a Man who had lost the Use of his Limbs, should choose to comfort his Lameness with painted Shoes, when he might have the Use of his Feet restored. For the Consolations of Religion relieve Uneasiness and Trouble, as a lame Man is relieved, when his Limbs are restored ; they conquer Grief, not by cheating and deluding the Weakness of our Minds, but as the Resurrection conquers Death, by restoring us to a new and glorious Life. If you need any further Conviction, that Times of Grief and Uneasiness are highly improper for these Diversions, let me desire you to suppose that you knew a Christian, who in his last Hours sent for Buffoons and Jugglers to divert his Mind from the Apprehensions of Death. I daresay you have religious Arguments enough, to prove such a Practice to be stupid and profane in the highest Degree. But perhaps you are not aware, that every Argument against such a Practice as this, concludes as strongly against the same Practice at any other Time of our Life. Try therefore with yourself, if every good Argument against such Folly when we are dying, will not be the same Argument against the same Folly in any other Part of our Life. For every Argument that shows the Impiety and Folly of applying to foolish Diversions, when we are under the Troubles of Death, will show the same Impiety and Folly of applying to such Relief in any Troubles of Life. For to imagine, that we may be ridiculous and vain, and foolish in the Troubles of Life, but serious, holy, and religious in the Troubles of Death, is the same Folly and Absurdity, as to suppose, that we must be devout and penitent on our Death-Beds, but need not be devout and penitent in the other Parts of our Life. For as there is no Religion or Repentance on our Death-Bed, but what ought to be the Religion of our Lives ; so is there no Wisdom, or Seriousness, or Application to God in the Sorrows of Death, but what is equally necessary and proper in all the Sorrows of Life. For we are obliged to live unto God in the same manner that we are to die unto God. For why must I think rightly of Death ? Why must I then apply to God ? Why must I reason and judge rightly at that Time ? Why may I not then divert my Mind with loose and impertinent Entertainments ? Now give but the true Reason of this, and you will give the Reason why I am always to live in the same manner. For as the Reasons of Wisdom and Holiness are not founded in Death, so do they receive no Alteration by the Approach of Death ; there is no Wisdom and Holiness but what is equally necessary, whether I am twenty Years or twenty Days from Death. Death may bring me into a greater Fear of Folly, but it does not bring me into a greater Necessity of avoiding it, than I was in before; because all the Reasons of Piety, Wisdom, and Devotion to God, have been equally Reasons all my Life; for the Holiness and Wisdom of Persons in Health, is as necessary, and as much the Terms of Acceptance with God, as the Holiness and Wisdom of dying Persons. And he who dares to be Foolish and Vain, and seek impertinent Entertainments, because he is Strong and in Health, is governed by the same Spirit, and sins against the same Reasons of Piety, as he who dares to be vain, foolish, and impertinent at the Approach of Death. When therefore you think fit to amuse yourself with foolish Diversions, and drive away, what you may call, dull Hours, with the impertinent and wild Imaginations of Plays, &c., you must remember, that you are under the same Condemnation as they are, who apply to the same Relief to ease them of the Thoughts of Death. For as we always stand in the same Relation to God, as he is as much the true Happiness of living, as of dying Men, so Wisdom and Holiness, and right Dispositions of our Minds, are always Duties of the same Necessity.

If it were ever lawful to forget our Happiness in God, and seek for a ridiculous Happiness in vain and extravagant Diversions, if it were ever proper to live in this Temper, it would be equally proper to die in the same Temper. For we are not upon any new Terms with God at our Death, nor under any other Obligations, but such as are equally necessary to make us live in his Favour.

We often wonder at the Worldly-mindedness, the Hardness, Impenitence and Insensibility of dying Men. But we should do well to remember, that Worldly-mindedness, Folly, Impenitence, Vanity, and Insensibility, are as much to be wondered at in living, healthful Men; and that they are the same odious Sins, and as contrary to all Sense and Reason, and make us as unlike to God, at one Time as at another. Either therefore you must say, that Plays and such like Books are proper Meditations for dying Men, that they keep up a right Turn of Mind, and do not render the Soul unacceptable to God, or else you must own that they are also improper at all other Times. For any Thing that indulges a State of Mind that is not according to the Wisdom and Holiness of Religion, is equally unlawful at all Times. Again, do but consider your own Notions that you have of Plays, and you will find, that if you were consistent with yourself, you would never read them. Not only you, but the Generality of Readers, would think it very improper, and contrary to Piety, to read Plays on the Sunday. Now I would have you ask yourself why it would be so irreligious, to read these Books on the Sunday? Is it because there is such a Contrariety betwixt the Subjects of such Books, and the Design of the Sunday? Is it because they are contrary to such Meditations, as we should make on that Day? Is it because they are vain and loose, and profane, full of impure Thoughts and wanton Descriptions? There can be no possible Reason given, why we may not read these Books on the Sunday, but because they are thus contrary to Piety. Need a Christian therefore have any other Argument to persuade him to refrain from these Books? Is it not a sufficient Proof, that they are never to be read, because they are not to be read when his Mind ought to have a religious Turn? Can these Books be more thoroughly condemned, than by being thought too bad to be opened on the Sunday. Or need we only stay till Monday, to be vain and foolish, to put on a new Temper, and take delight in such Thoughts and Reflections, as we durst not touch the Day before? If therefore we would be consistent with ourselves, we must either prove that Plays and such like Books are proper Meditations for pious Christians, fit for the Piety and Devotion of the Sunday, or else acknowledge that they are equally unfit for their Entertainment at any other Time: For it is manifestly certain, that we are to indulge no Temper of Mind on any Day, that we may not improve and delight in on the Sunday.

For to suppose, that we are to have a new Heart, and mind on the Sunday, different from that Taste and Temper which we may indulge all the Week, is the same Folly as to suppose, that we need only be Christians on the Sunday. The Difference betwixt Sundays and other Days, does not consist in any Difference in the inward State of our Minds, but in the outward Circumstances of the Day, as a general Rest from our lawful Callings, and a public Celebration of Divine Worship. This is the particular Holiness of the Sunday, which requires a particular Rest from Labour, and Attendance at divine Worship, but requires no particular inward Holiness of the Mind, but such as is the necessary Holiness of every Day. So that whatever is contrary to that Holiness, Purity, and Wisdom of Mind, which is to be our Temper on the Sunday, is as much to be abhorred and avoided all the Week as on the Sunday, because though Sunday differs from other Days in outward Marks of Holiness, yet Christians are to be every Day alike as to the inward State and Temper of their Minds.

Therefore, though the Labours of our ordinary Employment and other Actions are to be forborne on the Sunday, and yet are very Lawful on other Days; yet the Case is very different as to these Books, they are unfit to be read at any time, for the same Reason that they are not fit to be read on Sundays. And the Reason is this, because though we may do things on the Week-Days, that we ought not to do on the Sunday, yet we must indulge no Temper, nor support any Turn of Mind, that is contrary to that Purity of Heart and Mind, which we are to aspire after on the Sunday. We may Labour on the Week-Days, because Labour is an external Action, that is not contrary to any Purity or Holiness of Mind, but we must no more be covetous on the Week-Days, than on Sundays, because Covetousness is a Temper of the Mind, a wrong Disposition of the Heart, that is equally contrary to Religion on all Days.

Now reading is not the Labour of our Hands, or our Feet, but is the Entertainment and Exercise of the Heart and Mind; a Delight in either good or bad Books, is as truly a Temper and Disposition of the Heart, as Covetousness and Pride is a Disposition of the Heart. For the same Reason therefore that Pride and Covetousness are constantly to be avoided on every Day of our Lives, because they are wrong Tempers of the Mind, and contrary to essential Holiness: For the same Reason is the Pleasure of Reading ill and corrupt Books, always to be avoided at all times, because it is a Temper and Disposition of our Hearts, that is contrary to that State of Holiness which is essential to Christianity.

If you were to hear a Christian say, that on Sundays he abstained from evil Speaking, and corrupt Communication, but not on the Week-Days, you would think him either very Ignorant of the Nature of Religion, or very Profane. Yet this is as Wise and Religious, as to forbear reading ill Books and wanton Poems only on Sundays, and to take the Liberty of Reading them at other times. For that Vanity of Mind, that Foolishness of Heart, that depraved Taste, which can relish the wild Fictions, the lewd Speeches, the profane Language of mad Heroes, disappointed Lovers, raving in all the furious Expressions of Lust and Passion, and Madness, is as corrupt a Temper, as contrary to Holiness, and as odious on its own Account, as evil Speaking and Malice.

When therefore you see a Person reading a Play, as soon as he comes from the Sunday's Solemnity of public Service, you abhor his Profaneness, but pray be so just to yourself, so consistent with common Sense, as to think everyone liable to the same Accusation, who delights in the same Book on any other Time of the Week; and that the Difference of reading Plays on Week-Days and not on Sundays, is only the Difference of Speaking evil on Week-Days, and not on Sundays.

From these Reflections, I hope, it sufficiently appears, that the reading vain and impertinent Books, is no Matter of Indifference, but that it is justly to be reckoned amongst our greatest Corruptions, that it is as unlawful, as Malice and evil Speaking, and is no more to be allowed in any Part of our Life, than Pride or Covetousness.

Reading, when it is an Exercise of the Mind upon wise and pious Subjects, is, next to Prayer, the best Improvement of our Hearts. It enlightens our Minds, collects our Thoughts, calms and allays our Passions, and begets in us wise and pious Resolutions. It is a Labour that has so many Benefits, that does so much Good to our Minds, that it ought never to be employed amiss: It enters so far into our Souls, that it cannot have a little Effect upon us. We commonly say, that a Man is known by his Companions; but it is certain, that a Man is much more known by the Books that he converses with. These Closet-companions with whom we choose to be alone and in private, are never-failing Proofs of the State and Disposition of our Hearts.

When we are abroad, we must take such as the World gives us, we must be with such People, and hear such Discourse, as the common State of our Life exposes us to. This is what we must bear with, because not altogether to be avoided. And as it is not altogether Matter of Choice, so it is no Proof of what Temper we are of. But if we make our Closet an Entertainment of greater Vanity and Impertinence, than any Conversation we can meet with abroad, if rakish, libertine Writers are welcome to us in secret, if Histories of Scandal and romantic Intrigues are to be with us in our private Retirements, this is a plain Discovery of our Inside, and is a manifest Proof, that we are as vain, and foolish, and vicious, as the Authors that we choose to read. If a wanton Poem pleases you, you may fairly reckon yourself in the same State and Condition with him who made it. In like manner, if Histories of Nonsense and Folly, if Compositions of Intrigue and Scandal suit your Temper, such Books do as truly represent your Nature, as they represent the Nature of their Authors.

Julia has buried her Husband, and married her Daughters, since that she spends her time in reading. She is always reading foolish and unedifying Books: She tells you every time she sees you, that she is almost at the End of the silliest Book, that ever she read in her Life; that the best of it is, it is very long, and serves to dispose of a good deal of her time. She tells you that all Romances are sad Stuff, yet is very impatient till she can get all that she can hear of. Histories of Intrigue and Scandal, are the Books that Julia thinks are always too short. If Julia were to drink Drams in private, and had no Enjoyment of herself without them, she would not tell you this, because she knows it would be plainly telling you that she was a poor disordered Sot. See here therefore the Weakness of Julia; she would not be thought to be a Reprobate, yet she lets you know that she lives upon Folly, and Scandal, and Impertinence, in her Closet, that she cannot be in private without them, that they are the only Support of her dull Hours, and yet she does not perceive, that this is as plainly telling you that she is in a miserable, disordered, reprobate State of Mind.

To return. It is reckoned very dangerous not to guard our Eyes; but it is much more dangerous not to guard our Meditations; because whatever enters that way, enters deeper into our Souls, than anything that only affects our Sight. Reading and Meditation is that to our Souls, which Food and Nourishment is to our Bodies, and becomes a part of us in the same Manner; so that we cannot do ourselves either a little Good, or little Harm, by the Books that we read.

You perhaps think, that it is a dull Task to read only religious and moral Books, but when you have the Spirit of Religion, when you can think of God, as your only Happiness, when you are not afraid of the Joys of Eternity, you will think it a dull Task to read any other Books. Don't fancy therefore that your Heart is right, and that you are well enough affected with Religion, though you had rather read Books upon other Subjects; for it is there that you are to charge your Dulness; Religion has no hold of you, the Things of Eternity are not the Concerns of your Mind, it is dull and tiresome to you to be wise and pious, and that makes it a dull Task to read Books that treat only upon such Subjects. When it is the Care of your Soul to be humble, holy, pious, and heavenly-minded, when you know anything of the Guilt and Misery of Sin, or feel a real Desire of Salvation, you will find religious Books to be the greatest Feast and Joy of your Mind.

If you think it dull and tedious to be in wise, prudent, and sober Company, it is because you are neither wise nor sober yourself: So if it is dull and tiresome to you to be often upon Subjects of Piety and Religion, it is as sure a Proof that you are neither pious nor religious. If therefore you can suppose, that a wise and sober Man may be most delighted with the Noise and Revellings of Drunkenness, then you may suppose, that it is possible for you to be truly religious, and yet be most pleased with the Folly and Impertinence of corrupt and unedifying Books. You perhaps will say, that you have so much spare Time for reading, that you think you need not employ it all in reading good Books. It may be so, you may have also more Time than you need devote to Acts and Offices of Charity; but will you thence conclude, that you may at those Times do Things contrary to Charity, and indulge yourself in Spite and Mischief?

If you have every Day more Time than you can employ in Reading, Meditation, and Prayer; if this Time hangs upon your Hands, and cannot be turned to any Advantage, let me desire you to go to sleep, or pick Straws: For it is much better to do this, than to have recourse to corrupt and impertinent Books. Time lost in Sleep, or picking Straws, is better lost than in such Exercises of the Mind. Consider further, that idle and spare Time, is a dangerous State, and calls for great Care and Watchfulness; to have recourse then to evil and impertinent Books, is like inviting the Devil because you are alone. If you could read ill Books when you were in Haste, or in a Hurry of other Matters, it would do you much less Harm, than to read them, because your Time hangs upon your Hands. So that that Season which you take to be an Excuse for such Reading, is a stronger Argument against it; because evil Thoughts and vain Subjects have twice the Effect, and make double Impressions, when they are admitted at Times of Leisure and Idleness. Consider again, to what a miserable unchristian State you are reduced, when you are forced to have recourse to foolish Books, to get rid of your Time. Your Fortune perhaps has removed you from the Necessity of labouring for your Bread, you have been politely educated in Softness, you have no Trade or Employment to take up your Time, and so are left to be devoured by corrupt Passions and Pleasures. Whilst poor People are at hard Labour, whilst your Servants are drudging in the meanest Offices of Life, you, oppressed with Idleness and Indulgence, are relieving yourself with foolish and impertinent Books, feeding and delighting a disordered Mind with romantic Nonsense, and poetic Follies. If this be the Effect of Riches and Fortune, only to expose People to the Power of disordered Passions, and give them time to corrupt their Hearts with Madness and Folly, well might our Blessed Lord say, Woe unto you that are rich!

When you see a poor Creature drudging in the meanest Offices of Life, and glad of the dirtiest Work to get his Bread, you are apt to look upon him as a miserable Wretch: it raises a Mixture of Pity and Contempt in you, and you hardly know, whether you pity or disregard him most. But remember, that every time you see such a Person, you see a more reasonable Creature than yourself, and one who is much more nobly employed than you are. He is acting conformably to the State of human Life, and bearing a hard Part with Patience; he is doing a Work, which, mean as it is, will be looked upon as done unto the Lord; whilst you, idling in Softness and Pleasures, are unable to bear your Time, unless it be stolen away from you by foolish, corrupt, and unedifying Books.

Fancy that you saw a patient Christian, old, broken, and crooked, with carrying Burdens all his Life; fancy that you saw another Christian lolling in State and Softness, and making every Day a Day of Vanity and Impertinence, of foolish Readings, and vain Imaginations; which of them do you think is most likely to die into the Hands of good Angels, and be carried into Abraham's Bosom?

But after all, what a vain Imagination it is, to think that you have any such thing as spare Time? Is there any Time for which you are not accountable to God? Is there any Time which God has so left to your own Disposal, that you may sacrifice it to the Indulgence of vain Tempers, and the Corruption of your Heart? You can no more show this, than you can show that all your Time is your own. To talk therefore of spare Time, is to talk of something that never did nor ever will belong to any Christian. You may have a spare Time from this or that Labour or Necessity, you may abate, or change any particular Exercise, you may leave off this or that Way, you may take this or that Refreshment, you have all these spare Times from particular Actions, but you have no spare Time that releases you from the Laws of Christianity, or that leaves you at Liberty, not to act by the Principles of Religion and Piety.

You have a spare Time to recreate and refresh yourself, but this Time is to be governed by the same Principles of religious Wisdom, as the Time that is spent in Cares and Labours. For your Recreations and Pleasures are only lawful, so far as they are directed by such Wisdom and Piety, as is to direct your Cares and Labours. If therefore the Providence of God has placed you above the Necessity of labouring for your Livelihood, you must not think that you have so much spare Time to spend, as you please, but that you are as certainly called to some other Labour, as others are called to labour for their Bread. Great part of the World is doomed to Labour and Slavery, they have it not in their Power to choose any other Way of Life, and their Labour is therefore an acceptable Service to God, because it is such as their State requires. Happy you, therefore, if you knew your Happiness, who have it in your Power to be always doing the best Things, who, free from Labour and Hardships, are at Liberty to choose the best Ways of Life, to study all the Arts of Self-improvement, to practise all the Ways of doing Good, and to spend your Time in all the noblest Instances of Piety, Humility, Charity, and Devotion! Bless God therefore, not because you have spare Time, for that you have none, but that you have spare Time to employ in the best Ways that you can find, that whilst others are oppressed with Burdens, and worn out in Slavery, you have Time, and Leisure, and Retirement, to think and meditate upon the greatest and best of things, to enlighten your Mind, to correct the Disorders of your Hearts, to study the Laws of God, to contemplate the Wonders of his Providence, to convince yourself of the Vanity and Folly of the World, and to comfort and delight your Soul with those great and glorious Things, which God has prepared for those that love him. This is the Happiness of being free from Labour, and Want; not to have spare Time to squander away in Vanity and Impertinence, but to have spare Time to spend in the Study of Wisdom, in the Exercise of Devotion, in the Practice of Piety, in all the Ways and Means of doing Good, and exalting our Souls to a State of Christian Perfection.

It is a Doctrine of Scripture, and highly agreeable to Reason, That unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required. Consider therefore, that a Life of Leisure, and Freedom from Want and Hardships, is as much as can well be given you in this World, as it is giving you an Opportunity of living wholly unto God, and making all the Parts of your Life useful to the best Purposes. As sure therefore as it is a State, that has so many Advantages, that furnishes you with so many Means of being eminent in Piety, so sure is it that it is a State from which God expects Fruits that are worthy of it. Had it been your Lot to labour in a Mine, or serve under some cruel Master, you must have served as unto God, and in so doing, you had finished the Work which God had given you. But as you are free from all these States of Life, you must look upon yourself as God's Servant, as called to choose that Way of labouring and spending your Time, which may most promote that which God desires to be most promoted. God has given you Liberty to choose, but it is only that you may have the Blessedness of choosing the best Ways of spending your Time. Though therefore you are at Liberty from servile and mean Labour, yet you are under a Necessity of labouring in all good Works, and making all your Time, and Fortune, and Abilities, serviceable to the best Ends of Life. You have no more Time that is your own, than he has who is to live by constant Labour; the only Difference betwixt you and him, is this, that he is to be diligent in a poor slavish Labour, that oppresses the Body, and dulls and dejects the Mind; but you in a Service that is perfect Freedom, that renders your Body a fit Temple for the Holy Ghost, and fills your Soul with such Light, and Peace, and Joy, as is not to be found in any other Way of Life.

Do you think that a poor Slave would displease God by refusing to act in that painful Drudgery that is fallen to his Share? And do you think that God will not be more displeas'd with you, if you refuse to act your full part in the best of Labours, or neglect that happy joyful Business of doing Good, which your State of Life has call'd you to? Is it expected that poor People should make a right Use of their Condition, and turn all their Labour into a Service unto God? And can you think that you are not oblig'd to make the proper Improvement of your Condition, and turn all your Rest, and Ease, and Freedom from Labour, into a Service unto God? Tell me therefore no more, that you indulge yourself in idle Amusements, in vain, corrupt, and unedifying Books, because you have spare Time; for it is absolutely false to say that you have any such thing; it is also saying, that because God has given you spare Time from servile Labour, that you may choose the best Ways of Life, devote yourself to the most Divine Exercises, and become eminent and exemplary in all the Instances of a holy and heavenly Life; therefore you presume to throw it away in Idleness and Impertinence.

Chapter XI.

A further Consideration of that Purity and Holiness of Conversation, to which the Necessity of Divine Grace calleth all Christians; wherein is shown, that the Entertainment of the Stage, is a corrupt and sinful Entertainment, contrary to the whole Nature of Christian Piety, and constantly to be avoided by all sincere Christians.

I HAVE shown in the foregoing Chapter, that the reading of Plays, or any other Books of that kind, is a dangerous and sinful Entertainment, that corrupts our Hearts, and separates the Holy Spirit from us. You will now perhaps ask me, if it is unlawful for a Christian to go to the Playhouse. I answer, that it is absolutely unlawful. As unlawful, as for a Christian to be a Drunkard or a Glutton, or to Curse and Swear. This I think, after what has been above observed, will be easily proved.

For let us resume the Doctrine of the Apostle, we are absolutely forbid all corrupt Communication, and for this important Reason, because it grieves and separates the Holy Spirit from us. Is it unlawful therefore to have any corrupt Communication of our own? And can we think it lawful to go to Places set apart for that Purpose? To give our Money, and hire Persons to corrupt our Hearts with ill Discourses, and inflame all the disorderly Passions of our Nature? We have the Authority of Scripture to affirm, That evil Communication corrupts good Manners; and that unedifying Discourses grieve the Holy Spirit. Now the third Commandment is not more plain and express against Swearing, than this Doctrine is plain and positive against going to the Playhouse. If you should see a Person, who acknowledges the third Commandment to be a Divine Prohibition against Swearing, yet going to a House, and giving his Money to Persons, who were there met, to Curse and Swear in fine Language, and invent musical Oaths and Imprecations, would you not think him Mad in the highest Degree? Now consider, whether there be a less Degree of Madness in going to the Playhouse. You own, that God has called you to a great Purity of Conversation, that you are forbid all foolish Discourse, and filthy Jestings, as expressly as you are forbid Swearing; that you are to let no corrupt Communication proceed out of your Mouth, but such as is good for the Use of edifying; and yet you go to the House set apart for corrupt Communications, you hire Persons to entertain you with all manner of Ribaldry, Profaneness, Rant, and Impurity of Discourse; who are to present you with vile Thoughts, and lewd Imaginations in fine Language, and to make wicked, vain, and impure Discourse, more lively and effecting, than you could possibly have it in any ill Company. Now, is not this sinning with as high a Hand, and as grossly offending against the plain Doctrines of Scripture, as if you were to give your Money to be entertained with musical Oaths and Curses? You might reasonably think that Woman very ridiculous in her Piety, who durst not Swear herself, but should nevertheless frequent Places to hear Oaths. But you may as justly think her very ridiculous in her Modesty, who, though she dares not to say, or look, or do an immodest Thing herself, shall yet give her Money, to see Women forget the Modesty of their Sex, and talk impudently in a public Playhouse. If the Playhouse were filled with Rakes and ill Women, there would be nothing to be wondered at in such an Assembly ; for such Persons to be delighted with such Entertainments, is as natural, as for any Animal to delight in its proper Element. But for Persons who profess Purity and Holiness, who would not be suspected of Inmodesty or corrupt Communication, for them to come under the Roof of a House devoted to such ill Purposes, and be pleased Spectators of such Actions and Discourses, as are the Pleasure of the most abandoned Persons, for them to give their Money to be thus entertained, is such a Contradiction to all Piety and common Sense, as cannot be sufficiently exposed.

Again, when you see the Players acting with Life and Spirit, Men and Women equally bold in all Instances of Profaneness, Passion, and Inmodesty, I dare say, you never suspect any of them to be Persons of Christian Piety. You can't even in your Imagination join Piety to such Manners, and such a Way of Life. Your Mind will no more allow you to join Piety with the Behaviour of the Stage, than it will allow you to think two and two to be ten. And perhaps you had rather see your Son chained to a Galley, or your Daughter driving Plough, than getting their Bread on the Stage, by administering in so scandalous a Manner to the Vices and corrupt Pleasures of the World. Let this therefore be another Argument to prove the absolute Unlawfulness of going to a Play. For consider with yourself : is the Business of Players so contrary to Piety, so inconsistent with the Spirit and Temper of a true Christian, that it is next to a Contradiction to suppose them united? How then can you take yourself to be Innocent, who delight in their Sins, and hire them to commit them? You may make yourself a Partaker of other Men's Sins, by Negligence, and for want of reprovng them ; but certainly, if you stand by, and assist Men in their evil Actions, if you make their Vices your Pleasure and Entertainment, and pay your Money to be so entertained, you make yourself a Partaker of their Sins in a very high Degree. And consequently it must be as unlawful to go to a Play, as it is unlawful to approve, encourage, assist, and reward a Man for renouncing a Christian Life. Let therefore every Man or Woman who goes to a Play, ask themselves this Question, Whether it suits with their Religion to act the Parts that are there acted? Perhaps they would think this as inconsistent with that Degree of Piety that they profess, as to do the vilest Things. But let them consider, that it must be a wicked and unlawful Pleasure, to delight in any Thing that they dare not do themselves. Let them also consider, that they are really acting those Indecencies and Impieties themselves, which they think is the particular Guilt of the Players. For a Person may very justly be said to do that himself, which he pays for the doing, and which is done for his Pleasure. You must, therefore, if you would be consistent with yourself, as much abhor the Thoughts of being at a Play, as of being a Player yourself, for to think that you must forbear the one and not the other, is as absurd, as to suppose, that you must be temperate yourself, but may assist, encourage, and reward other People for their Intemperance. The Business of a Player, is profane, wicked, lewd, and immodest, to be any way therefore approving, assisting, or encouraging him in such a Way of Life, is as evidently sinful, as it is sinful to assist and encourage a Man in stealing, or any other Wickedness.

To proceed. When I consider Churches, and the Matter of Divine Service, that it consists of holy Readings, Prayers, and Exhortations to Piety, there is Reason to think, that the House of God, is a natural Means of Promoting Piety, and Religion, and rendering Men devout and sensible of their Duty to God. The very Nature of divine Assemblies thus carried on, has this direct Tendency. I ask you whether this is not very plain, that Churches thus employed should have this Effect.

Consider therefore the Playhouse, and the Matter of the Entertainment there, as it consists of Love-intrigues, blasphemous Passions, profane Discourses, lewd Descriptions, *filthy Jest*s, and all the most extravagant Rant of wanton, vile, profligate Persons of both Sexes, heating and inflaming one another with all the Wantonness of Address, the Immodesty of Motion, and Lewdness of Thought, that Wit can invent; consider, I say, whether it be not plain, that a House so employed, is as certainly serving the Cause of Immorality and Vice, as the House of God is serving the Cause of Piety? For what is there in our Church-Service, that shows it to be useful to Piety and Holiness, what is there in divine Worship to correct and amend the Heart, but what is directly contrary to all that is doing in the Playhouse? So that one may with the same Assurance affirm, that the Playhouse, not only when some very profane Play is on the Stage, but in its daily, common Entertainment, is as certainly the House of the Devil, as the Church is the House of God. For though the Devil be not professedly Worshipped by Hymns directed to him, yet most that is there Sung, is to his Service, he is there obeyed and pleased in as certain a Manner, as God is Worshipped and Honoured in the Church.

You must easily see, that this Charge against the Playhouse, is not the Effect of any particular Temper, or Weakness of Mind, that it is not an uncertain Conjecture, or religious Whimsy, but is a Judgment founded as plainly in the Nature and Reason of Things, as when it is affirmed that the House of God, is of Service to Religion. And he who absolutely condemns the Playhouse, as wicked and corrupting, proceeds upon as much Truth and Certainty, as he who absolutely commends the House of God, as Holy, and tending to promote Piety.

When therefore anyone pretends to vindicate the Stage to you, as a proper Entertainment for holy and religious Persons, you ought to reject the Attempt with as much Abhorrence, as if he should offer to show you, that our Church-Service was rightly formed for those Persons to join in, who are devoted to the Devil. For to talk of the Lawfulness and Usefulness of the Stage, is fully as absurd, as contrary to the plain Nature of Things, as to talk of the Unlawfulness and Mischief of the Service of the Church. He therefore who tells you, that you may safely go to the Playhouse, as an innocent, useful Entertainment of your Mind, commits the same Offence, against common Sense, as if he should tell you, that it was dangerous to attend at Divine Service, and that its Prayers and Hymns were great Pollutions of the Mind.

For the Matter and Manner of Stage-entertainments, is as undeniable a Proof, and as obvious to common Sense, that the House belongs to the Devil, and is the Place of his Honour, as the Matter and Manner of Church-Service proves that the Place is appropriated to God.

Observe therefore, that as you do not want the Assistance of anyone, to show you the Usefulness and Advantage of Divine Service, because the thing is plain, and speaks for itself. So neither, on the other hand, need you anyone to show you the Unlawfulness and Mischief of the Stage, because there the thing is equally plain, and speaks for itself. So that you are to consider yourself, as having the same Assurance that the Stage is wicked, and to be abhorred and avoided by all Christians, as you have that the Service of the Church is Holy, and to be sought after by all Lovers of Holiness. Consider therefore, that your Conduct, with relation to the Stage, is not a Matter of Nicety or scrupulous Exactness, but that you are as certain that you do wrong in as notorious a Manner, when you go to the Playhouse, as you are certain that you do right, when you go to Church.

Now it is of mighty Use to conceive things in a right Manner, and to see them as they are in their own Nature. While you consider the Playhouse, as only a Place of Diversion, it may perhaps give no Offence to your Mind: There is nothing shocking in the Thought of it; but if you would lay aside this Name of it for awhile, and consider it in its own Nature, as it really is,

upon Christian Perfection. 175

you would find that you are as much deceived, if you consider the Playhouse, as only a Place of Diversion, as you would be, if you considered the House of God only as a Place of Labour.

When therefore you are tempted to go to a Play, either from your own Inclination, or the Desire of a Friend, fancy that you were asked in plain Terms to go to the Place of the Devil's Abode, where he holds his filthy Court of evil Spirits; that you were asked to join in an Entertainment, where he was at the Head of it, where the whole of it was in order to his Glory, that Men's Hearts and Minds might be separated from God, and plunged into all the Pollutions of Sin and Brutality. Fancy that you were going to a Place that as certainly belongs to the Devil, as the Heathen Temples of old, where Brutes were Worshipped, where wanton Hymns were Sung to Venus, and drunken Songs to the God of Wine. Fancy that you were as certainly going to the Devil's Triumph, as if you were going to those old Sports, where People committed Murder, and offered Christians to be devoured by wild Beasts, for the Diversion of Spectators. Now whilst you consider the Playhouse in this View, I suppose that you can no more go to a Play, than you can expressly renounce your Christianity.

Consider therefore now, that you have not been frightening yourself with groundless Imaginations, but that what you have here fancied of the Playhouse is as strictly true, as if you had been fancying, that when you go to Church, you go into the House of God, where the heavenly Host attend upon his Service, and that when you there read the Scriptures, and Sing holy Hymns, you join with the Choirs above, and do God's Will on Earth as it is done in Heaven. For observe, I pray you, how justly that Opinion of the Playhouse is founded. For, was it a Joy and Delight to the Devil to see Idols worshipped, to see Hymns and Adorations offered up to impure and filthy Deities? Were Places and Festivals appointed for such Ends, justly esteemed Places and Festivals devoted to the Devil? Now give the Reason why all this was justly reckoned a Service to the Devil, and you will give as good a Reason, why the Playhouse is to be esteemed his Temple. For, what though Hymns and Adorations are not offered to impure and filthy Deities, yet if Impurity and Filthiness is there the Entertainment, if immodest Songs, profane Rant, if Lust and Passion entertain the Audience, the Business is the same, and the Assembly does the same Honour to the Devil, though they are not gathered together in the Name of some Heathen God.

For Impurity and Profaneness in the Worshipers of the true

God, is as acceptable a Service to the Devil, as Impurity and Profaneness in any Idolaters, and perhaps a lewd Song in an Assembly of Christians gives him greater Delight, than if it had been sung in a Congregation of Heathens.

If therefore we may justly say, that a House or Festival was the Devil's, because he was delighted with it, because what was there done, was an acceptable Service to him, we may be assured that the Playhouse, is as really the House of the Devil, as any other House ever was. Nay, it is reasonable to think that the Playhouses in this Kingdom, are a greater Pleasure to him than any Temple he ever had in the Heathen World. For as it is a greater Conquest to make the Disciples of Christ delight in Lewdness and Profaneness, than ignorant Heathens, so a House, that in the Midst of Christian Churches, trains up Christians in Lewdness and Profaneness, that makes the Worshippers of Christ flock together in Crowds to rejoice in an Entertainment, that is as contrary to the Spirit of Christ, as Hell is contrary to Heaven, a House so employed, may justly be reckoned a more delightful Habitation of the Devil, than any Temple in the Heathen World. When therefore you go to the Playhouse, you have as much Assurance, that you go to the Devil's peculiar Habitation, that you submit to his Designs, and rejoice in his Diversions (which are his best Devices against Christianity), you have as much Assurance of this, as that they who worshipped filthy Deities, were in reality Worshippers of the Devil.

Again, Consider those old Sports and Diversions, where Christians were sometimes thrown to wild Beasts, consider why such Sports might well be looked upon as the Devil's Triumph. I suppose you are at no stand with yourself, whether you should impute such Entertainments to the Devil. Consider, therefore, why you should not as readily allow the Stage to be his Entertainment.

For were it a Delight to the Devil to see Heathens sporting with the bodily Death of Christians? And must it not be a greater Delight to him to see Christians sporting themselves in the Death of their Souls?

The Heathens could only kill the Body, and separate it from the Soul, but these Christian-Diversions murder the Soul, and separate it from God. I daresay, no Arguments could convince you, that it was lawful to rejoice at those Sports, which were thus defiled with human Blood; but then pray remember, that if the Death of the Soul be as great a Cruelty, as the Death of the Body, if it be as dreadful for a Soul to be separated from God, as to be separated from the Body, you ought to think it as entirely unlawful to enter that House where so many eternal Lives are sacrificed, or ever to partake of those Diversions which separate such Numbers of Souls from God.

Hence it appears, that if instead of considering the Playhouse, as only a Place of Diversion, you will but examine what Materials it is made of, if you will but consider the Nature of the Entertainment, and what is there doing, you will find it as wicked a Place, as sinful a Diversion, and as truly the peculiar Pleasure and Triumph of the Devil, as any wicked Place, or sinful Diversion, in the Heathen World. When therefore you are asked to go to a Play, don't think that you are asked only to go to a Diversion, but be assured that you are asked to yield to the Devil, to go over to his Party, and to make one of his Congregation; that if you do go, you have not only the Guilt of buying so much vain and corrupt Communication, but are also as certainly guilty of going to the Devil's House, and doing him the same Honour, as if you were to partake of some Heathen Festival.

You must consider, that all the Laughter there, is not only vain and foolish, but that it is a Laughter amongst Devils, that you are upon profane Ground, and hearing Music in the very Porch of Hell.

Thus it is in the Reason of the Thing, and if we should now consider the State of our Playhouse as it is in Fact, we should find it answering all these Characters, and producing Effects suitable to its Nature: But I shall forbear this Consideration, it being as unnecessary to tell the Reader that our Playhouse is in Fact the Sink of Corruption and Debauchery, that it is the general Rendezvous of the most profligate Persons of both Sexes, that it corrupts the Air, and turns the adjacent Places into public Nuisances; this is as unnecessary, as to tell him, that the Exchange is a Place of Merchandise.

Now it is to be observed, that this is not the State of the Playhouse, through any accidental Abuse, as any innocent or good Thing may be abused; but that Corruption and Debauchery are the truly natural and genuine Effects of the Stage-Entertainment. Let not therefore anyone say, that he is not answerable for those Vices and Debaucheries, which are occasioned by the Playhouse, for so far as he partakes of the Pleasure of the Stage, and is an Encourager of it, so far he is chargeable with those Disorders which necessarily are occasioned by it. If Evil arises from our doing our Duty, or our Attendance at any good Design, we are not to be frightened at it; but if Evil arises from anything as its natural and genuine Effect, in all such Cases, so far as we contribute to the Cause, so far we make ourselves guilty of the Effects. So that all who any way assist the Play- house, or ever encourage it by their Presence, make themselves chargeable in some Degree, with all the Evils and Vices which follow from it. Since therefore it cannot be doubted by any one, whether the Playhouse be a Nursery of Vice and Debauchery, since the evil Effects it has upon People's Manners, is as visible as the Sun at Noon, one would imagine, that all People of Virtue and Modesty, should not only avoid it, but avoid it with the utmost Abhorrence ; that they should be so far from entering into it, that they should detest the very Sight of it. For what a Contradiction is it to common Sense, to hear a Woman lamenting the miserable Lewdness and Debauchery of the Age, the vicious Taste, and irregular Pleasures of the World, and at the same time dressing herself to meet the lewdest Part of the World, at the Fountain-Head of all Lewdness, and making herself one of that Crowd, where every abandoned Wretch is glad to be present? She may fancy that she hates and abominates their Vices, but she may depend upon it, that till she hates and abominates the Place of vicious Pleasures, till she dare not come near an Entertainment which is the Cause of so great Debauchery, and the Pleasure of the most debauched People, till she is thus disposed, she wants the truest Sign of a real and religious Abhorrence of the Vices of the Age.

For to waive all other Considerations, I would only ask her a Question or two on the single Article of Modesty. What is Modesty? Is it a little mechanical outside Behaviour, that goes no further than a few Forms and Modes at particular Times and Places? Or is it a real Temper, a rational Disposition of the Heart, that is founded in Religion? Now if Modesty is only a mechanical Observance of a little outside Behaviour, then I can easily perceive how a modest Woman may frequent Plays; there is no Inconsistency for such a one to be one Thing in one Place, and another in another Place, to disdain an immodest Conversation, and yet at the same time, relish and delight in immodest and impudent Speeches in a public Playhouse. But if Modesty is a real Temper and Disposition of the Heart, that is founded in the Principles of Religion, then I confess, I cannot comprehend how a Person of such Modesty, should ever come twice into a Playhouse. For it is Reason and Religion that has inspired her with a modest Heart, that makes her careful of her Behaviour, that makes her hate and abhor every Word, or Look, or Hint, in Conversation, that has the Appearance of Lewdness, that makes her shun the Company of such as talk with too much Freedom ; if she is thus modest in common Life, from a Principle of Religion, a Temper of Heart, is it possible for such a one (I don't say to seek) but to bear with the Immodesty and Impudence of the Stage? For must not Immodesty and Impudence, must not loose and wanton Discourse be the same hateful Things, and give the same Offence to a modest Mind, in one Place, as in another? And must not that Place, which is the Seat of Immodesty, where Men and Women are trained up in Lewdness, where almost every Day in the Year, is a Day devoted to the foolish Representations of Rant, Lust, and Passion; must not such a Place, of all others, be the most odious, to a Mind that is truly modest upon Principles of Reason and Religion? One would suppose, that such a Person should as much abominate the Place, as any other filthy Sight, and be as much offended with an Invitation to it, as if she were invited to see an immodest Picture. For the Representations of the Stage, the inflamed Passions of Lovers there described, are as gross an Offence to the Ear, as any Representation that can offend the Eye.

It ought not to be concluded, that because I affirm the Playhouse to be an Entertainment contrary to Modesty, that therefore I accuse all People as void of Modesty, who ever go to it. I might affirm, that Transubstantiation is contrary to all Sense and Reason; but then it would be a wrong Conclusion to say, that I affirmed that all who believe it are void of all Sense and Reason. Now as Prejudices, the Force of Education, the Authority of Numbers, the Way of the World, the Example of great Names, may make People believe, so the same Causes may make People act against all Sense and Reason, and be guilty of Practices which no more suit with the Purity of their Religion, than Transubstantiation agrees with common Sense.

To proceed. I once heard a young Lady thus excusing herself for going to the Playhouse, that she went but seldom, and then in Company of her Mother and her Aunt, that they always knew their Play beforehand, and never went on the Sacrament Week. And what Harm, pray, says she, can there be in this? It breaks in upon no Rules of my Life, I neglect no part of my Duty, I go to Church, and perform the same Devotions at Home, as on other Days. It ought to be observed, that this Excuse can only be allowed where the Diversion itself is innocent; it must therefore be first considered, what the Entertainment is in itself, whether it be suitable to the Spirit and Temper of Religion; for if it is right and proper in itself, it needs no Excuse; but if it be wrong, and dangerous to Religion, we are not to use it cautiously, but to avoid it constantly.

Secondly, It is no Proof of the Innocency of a Thing, that it does not interfere with our Hours of Duty, nor break the Regularity of our Lives, for very wicked Ways of spending Time, may yet be consistent with a regular Distribution of our Hours. She must therefore consider, not only whether such a Diversion hinders the Regularity of her Life, or breaks in upon her Devotions, public or private, but whether it hinders or any way affects that Spirit and Temper, which all her Devotions aspire after. Is it conformable to that Heavenly Affection, that Love of God, that Purity of Heart, that Wisdom of Mind, that Perfection of Holiness, that Contempt of the World, that Watchfulness and Self-denial, that Humility and Fear of Sin? Is it conformable to these Graces, which are to be the daily Subject of all her Prayers? This is the only way for her to know the Innocency of going to a Play. If what she there hears and sees, has no Contrariety to any Graces or Virtues which she prays for, if all that there passes be fit for the Purity and Piety of one who is led by the Spirit of Christ, and is working out her Salvation with Fear and Trembling, if the Stage be an Entertainment, that may be thought according to the Will of God, then she disposes of an Hour very innocently, though her Mother or her Aunt were not with her. But if the contrary to all this be true, if most of what she there hears and sees, be as contrary to the Piety and Purity of Christianity, as Feasting is contrary to Fasting; if the House which she supports by her Money, and encourages by her Presence, be a notorious Means of Corruption, visibly carrying on the Cause of Vice and Debauchery, she must not then think herself excused for being with her Mother.

Thirdly, The same Person would perhaps think it strange to hear one of her virtuous Acquaintance, giving the like excuse for going now and then to a Masquerade.

Now this Diversion is new in our Country, and therefore People judge of it in the manner that they should, because they are not blinded by Use and Custom; but let anyone give but the true Reasons why a Person of Virtue and Piety should not give into such Entertainments, and the same Reasons will show, that a Person of strict Piety, should keep at as great a Distance from the Playhouse. For the Entertainment of the Stage is as directly opposite to the Purity of Religion, and is as much the natural Means of Corruption, and serves all bad Ends in as high a Manner as Masquerades, they only differ, as bad Things of the same kind may differ from one another. So that if the evil Use, the ill Consequences of Masquerades, be a sufficient Reason to deter People of Piety, from partaking of them, the same evil Use and ill Consequences of the Stage, ought to keep all People of Virtue from it. If People will consult their Temper only, they may take the Entertainment of one, and condemn the other, as following the same Guide, they may abhor Intemperance, and indulge Malice, but if they will consult Religion, and make that the Ground of their Opinions, they would find as strong Reasons for a constant Abhorrence of the Stage, as of Masquerades.

Further, she that is for going only to the Playhouse now and then, with this Care and Discretion, does not seem to have enough considered the Matter, or to act by Reason, for if the Stage be an innocent and proper Entertainment, if in its own Nature it be as harmless and useful, as walking, riding, taking the Air, or conversing with virtuous People, if this be the Nature of it, then there is no need of this Care and Abstinence, a virtuous Lady need not excuse herself, that she goes but very seldom. But if it be the very Reverse of all this, if it be that Fountain of Corruption and Debauchery, which has been observed, then to go to it at any Time admits of no excuse, but is as absurd, as contrary to Reason and Religion, as to do any other ill Thing with the same Care and Discretion. If you should hear a Person excusing her Use of Paint in this manner, that truly she painted but very seldom, that she always said her Prayers first, that she never used it on Sundays, or the Week before the Communion, would you not pity such a Mixture of Religion and Weakness? Would you not desire her to use her Reason, and either allow painting to be an innocent Ornament, suitable to the Sobriety and Humility of a Christian, or else to think it as unlawful at one time as at another? Would you not think it strange that she should condemn painting as odious and sinful, and yet think, that the Regularity of her Life, the Exactness of her Devotions, and her Observance of Religion, might make it lawful for her to paint now and then? I don't doubt, but you plainly see the Weakness and Folly of such a Pretence for painting under such Rules at certain Times. And if you would but as impartially consider your Pretences for going sometimes to the Playhouse, you would certainly find them equally Weak and Unreasonable. For Painting may with more Reason be reckoned an innocent Ornament, than the Playhouse an innocent Diversion; and it supposes a greater Vanity of Mind, a more perverted Judgment, and a deeper Corruption of Heart, to seek the Diversion of the Stage, than to take the Pleasure of a borrowed Colour.

I know you are offended at this Comparison, because you judge by your Temper and Prejudices, and don't consider the Things, as they are in themselves, by the pure Light of Reason and Religion. Painting has not been the Way of your Family, it is supposed to be the Practice but of very few, and those who use it, endeavour to conceal it, this makes you readily condemn it;

On the contrary, your Mother and your Aunt carry you to a Play, you see virtuous People there, and the same Persons that fill our Churches, so that your Temper is as much engaged to think it lawful to go sometimes to a Play, as it is engaged to think the Use of Paint odious and sinful. Lay aside therefore these Prejudices for a while, fancy that you had been trained up in some Corner of the World, in the Principles of Christianity, and had never heard either of the Playhouse or Painting. Imagine now that you were to examine the Lawfulness of them by the Doctrines of Scripture. You would first desire to be told the Nature of these Things, and what they meant. They would tell you that painting was the borrowing of Colours from Art, to make the Face look more beautiful. Now though you found no express Text of Scripture against painting, you would find, that it was expressly against Tempers required in Scripture; you would therefore condemn it, as proceeding from a Vanity of Mind, a Fondness of Beauty; you would see that the Harm of painting consisted in this, that it proceeded from a Temper of Mind, contrary to the Sobriety and Humility of a Christian, which indeed is harm enough, because this Humility and Sobriety of Mind is as essential to Religion, as Charity and Devotion. So that in judging according to Scripture, you would hold it as unreasonable to paint sometimes, as to be sometimes malicious, indevout, proud, or false.

You are now to consider the Stage, you are to keep close to Scripture, and fancy that you yet know nothing of Plays. You ask therefore first what the Stage or Playhouse is. You are told that it is a Place where all Sorts of People meet to be entertained with Discourses, Actions, and Representations, which are recommended to the Heart, by beautiful Scenes, the Splendour of Lights, and the Harmony of Music. You are told, that these Discourses are the Inventions of Men of Wit and Imagination, which describe imaginary Intrigues and Scenes of Love, and introduce Men and Women discoursing, raving, and acting in all the wild, indecent Transports of Lust and Passion. You are told that the Diversion partly consists of lewd and Profane Songs, sung to fine Music, and partly of extravagant Dialogues between immodest Persons, talking in a Style of Love and Madness, that is nowhere else to be found, and entertaining the Christian Audience, with all the Violence of Passion, Corruption of Heart, Wantonness of Mind, Immodesty of Thought, and profane Jests, that the Wit of the Poet is able to invent. You are told, that the Players, Men and Women, are trained up to act and represent all the Descriptions of Lust and Passion in the liveliest Manner, to add a Lewdness of Action to lewd Speeches ; that they get their Livelihood, by Cursing, Swearing, and Ranting, for three Hours together to an Assembly of Christians.

Now though you find no particular Text of Scripture condemning the Stage, or Tragedy, or Comedy, in express Words, yet, what is much more, you find that such Entertainments are a gross Contradiction to the whole Nature of Religion. They are not contrary to this or that particular Temper, but are contrary to that whole Turn of Heart and Mind which Religion requires. Painting is contrary to Humility, and therefore is always to be avoided as sinful. But the Entertainment of the Stage, as it consists of blasphemous Expressions, wicked Speeches, Swearing, Cursing, and Profaning the Name of God, as it abounds with impious Rant, filthy Jests, distracted Passions, gross Descriptions of Lust, and wanton Songs, is a contradiction to every Doctrine that our Saviour and his Apostles have taught us. So that to abhor Painting at all Times, because it supposes a Vanity of Mind, and is contrary to Humility, and yet think there is a lawful Time to go to the Playhouse, is as contrary to common Sense, as if a Man should hold that it was lawful sometimes to offend against all the Doctrines of Religion, and yet always unlawful to offend against any one Doctrine of Religion.

If therefore you were to come (as I supposed) from some Corner of the World, where you had been used to live and judge by the Rules of Religion, and upon your arrival here, had been told what Painting, and the Stage was ; as you would not expect to see Persons of religious Humility carrying their Daughters to Paint-shops, or inviting their pious Friends to go along with them, so much less would you expect to hear, that devout, pious and modest Women carried their Daughters, and invited their virtuous Friends to meet them at the Play. Least of all could you imagine, that there were any People too pious and devout to indulge the Vanity of Painting, and yet not devout or pious enough to abhor the Immodesty, Profaneness, Ribaldry, Immorality, and Blasphemy of the Stage.

To proceed. A *polite Writer of a late Paper thought he had sufficiently ridiculed a certain Lady's Pretension to Piety, when speaking of her Closet, he says :

*Together lie her Prayer-book and Paint,
At once t' improve the Sinner and the Saint.*

Now whence comes it that this Writer judges so rightly, and speaks the Truth so plainly in the Matter of Painting? Whence comes it that the generality of his Readers, think his Observation just, and join with him in it? It is because Painting is not yet an acknowledged Practice, but is for the most Part reckoned a shameful Instance of Vanity. Now as we are not prejudiced in Favour of this Practice, and have no Excuses to make for our own Share in it, so we judge of it impartially, and immediately perceive its Contrariety to a religious Temper and State of Mind. This Writer saw this in so strong a Light, that he does not scruple to suppose, that Paint is as natural and proper a Means to improve the Sinner, as the Prayer-book is to improve the Saint.

I should therefore hope, that it need not be imputed to any Sourness of Temper, religious Weakness or Dulness of Spirits, if a Clergyman should imagine, that the Profaneness, Debauchery, Lewdness, and Blasphemy of the Stage, is as natural a Means to improve the Sinner, as a Bottle of Paint; or if he should venture to show, that the Church and the Playhouse are as ridiculous a Contradiction, and do no more suit with the same Person, than the Prayer-book and Paint.

Again, Suppose you were told that the holy Angels delight in the Repentance and Devotion of Christians, that they attend at God's Altar, and rejoice in the Prayers and Praises, which are there offered unto God; I imagine you could easily believe it, you could think it very agreeable to the Nature of such good Beings, to see fallen Spirits returning unto God. Suppose you were told also, that these same heavenly Beings delighted to be with Men in their Drunkenness, Revellings, and Debaucheries, and were as much pleased with their Vices and Corruptions, as with their Devotions, you would know, that both these Accounts could not possibly be true; you could no more doubt in your Mind, whether good Angels that delight in the Conversion and Devotion of Christians, do also delight in their Vices and Follies, than you can doubt, whether the same Person can be alive and dead at the same time. You would be sure, that in Proportion as they delighted in the Piety and Holiness of Men, they must necessarily in the same Degree abhor and dislike their Vices and Corruptions. So that, supposing the Matter of our Church-Service, the Excellency of its Devotions, its heavenly Petitions, its lofty Hymns, its solemn Praises of the most High God, be such a glorious Service as invites and procures the Attendance of that blessed Choir, if this be true, I suppose you are as certain as you can be of the plainest Truth, that the Filthiness, the Rant, Ribaldry, Profaneness, and Impiety of the Stage, must be the Hatred and Aversion of those good Spirits. You are sure, that it is as impossible for them to behold the Stage with Pleasure, as to look upon the Holy Altar with Abhorrence.

Consider a while on this Matter, and think how it can be lawful for you to go to a Place, where if a good Angel was to look with Pleasure, it would cease to be good? For as that which makes Angels good, is the same right Temper which makes you good, so the same Tempers which would render Angels evil, must also render you evil. You may perhaps tell me, that you are not an Angel. I grant it, neither are you Jesus Christ, neither are you God, yet you are called to be Holy as Jesus Christ was Holy, and to be Perfect as your Father which is in Heaven is Perfect. Though you are not an Angel, yet it is Part of your glorious Hope, that you shall be as the Angels of God, so that as you are capable of their Happiness, you must think yourself obliged to be as like them in your Temper, as the Infirmary of your present State will permit. If Angels are to rejoice in singing the Praises of God, though their Joy may exceed yours, yet you are as much obliged to your Degree of Joy in this Duty, as they are. Angels by the Light and Strength of their Nature, may abhor all manner of Sin with stronger Aversion, a higher Degree of Abhorrence, yet you are as much obliged to abhor all manner of Sin, as they are. So that it is no more lawful for you to delight in impure, profane Diversions, which good Angels abhor, than it is lawful for you to hate those Praises and Adorations which are their Delight.

You are to consider also, that these contradictory Tempers are no more possible in the same Men, than in the same Angels; 'tis no more possible for your Heart truly to delight in the Service of the Church, to be in earnest in all its Devotions, and at the same time delight in the Entertainment of the Stage, than it is possible for an Angel to delight in them both.

You may fancy that you relish these Entertainments, and at the same time relish and delight in the Service of God, and are very hearty in your Devotions; you may fancy this, as cruel Men may fancy themselves to be merciful, the covetous and proud may fancy themselves to be humble and heavenly-minded; but then take Notice, that it is all but mere Fancy: For it is as impossible to be really devout with your Reason and Understanding, and at the same time delight in the Entertainment of the Stage, as 'tis impossible to be really charitable, and delighting in Malice at the same time. There is indeed a Falseness in our Hearts, a Mechanism in our Constitution, which will deceive those, who do not constantly suspect themselves. There are Forms of Devotion, little Rules of Religion, which are fixed in us by Education, which we can no more part with, than we can part with any other Customs, which we have long used. Now this makes many People think themselves mighty pious, because they find it is not in their Nature to forbear or neglect such and such Forms of Piety; they fancy that Religion must have its Seat in their Heart, because their Heart is so unalterable in certain Rules of Religion. Thus a Person who is exact in his Times of Prayer, will perhaps think himself much injured, if you were to tell him that it is his want of Piety, that makes him relish the Diversion of the Stage: His Heart immediately justifies him against such an Accusation, and tells him how constant he is in his Devotions; whereas it is very possible, that he may have but little more Piety, than what consists in some Rules and Forms, and that his Constancy to such Rules, may be owing to the same Cause, which makes others constantly sleepy at such an Hour, that is, the mere Mechanism of his Constitution, and the Force of Custom. This is the State of Numbers of People, otherwise it would not be so common, to see the same People constant and unalterable in some Rules of Religion, and as constant and unalterable in Pride, Passion, and Vanity.

Again, there are many other Instances of a false Piety: Some People feel themselves capable of religious Fervours, they have their Passions frequently affected with religious Subjects, who from thence imagine, that their Hearts are in a true State of Religion. But such a Conclusion is very deceitful. For the mere Mechanism and natural Temper of our Bodies, and our present Condition, may be the chief Foundation of all this. Thus a Lady may find herself, as she thinks, warm in her Devotions, and praise God at Church with a Sense of Joy; she thinks she is very good because she finds herself thus affected and pleased with the Service of the Church; whereas it may be, the very Reason why she is more than ordinarily devout, and thinks it a Pleasure to praise God, is, because she is going to a Ball, or a Play, as soon as Divine Service is over. This agreeable Expectation has so put her Spirits in Order, that she can be very thankful to God all the time she is at Church.

Another has been pleased with the Compliments paid to her Person, she finds herself very finely dressed, she is full of Joy under such Thoughts, and so can easily break out into Fervours of Devotion, and rejoice in God at a Time, when she can rejoice in anything. These frequent Starts of Devotion, make her think herself to be far advanced in Piety, and she does not perceive that the Height of her Devotion, is owing to the Height of her Vanity. Let her but be less pleased with herself, let her be unregarded, undressed, without such pleasing Reflections, and she will find herself sunk into a strange Dulness towards Devotion.

The same Temper is very frequent in common Life; you meet a Person who is very fond of you, full of Affection, and pleased with everything you say or do ; you must not imagine that he has more Friendship for you, than when he saw you last, and hardly took any Notice of you : The Matter is only this, the Man is in a State of Joy at something or other, he is pleased with himself, and so is easily pleased with you, stay but till this flow of Spirits is gone off, and he will show you no more Affection, than he used to do. This is the Religion of Numbers of People ; they are devout by Fits and Starts, in the same Manner as they are pleased by Fits and Starts, and their Devotion at those very Times is no more a Sign of true Piety, than the Civility and Compliments of a Person overjoyed, are Signs of true Friendship. But still these little Flashes of Devotion make People think themselves in a State of Religion.

Take another instance of a false Piety of another kind : Junius has been orthodox in his Faith, a Lover of Churchmen, a Hater of Heretics, these several Years ; he is the first who is sorry for a dangerous Book that is come out, he is amazed what People would be at by such Writings, but thanks God there is Learning enough in the World to confute them. He reads all the Confutations of Atheists, Deists, and Heretics, there is only one sort of Books, for which Junius has no Taste, and that is, Books of Devotion. He freely owns that they are not for his Taste, he does not understand their Flights.

If another Person were to say so much, it would be imputed to his want of Piety : but because Junius is known to be an Enemy to Irreligion, because he is constantly at Church, you suppose him to be a pious Man, though he thus confesses that he wants the Spirit of Piety. It is in the same Manner that Junius deceives himself, his Heart permits him to neglect Books of Devotion, because his Heart is constantly showing him his Zeal for Religion, and Honour for the Church ; this makes him no more suspect himself to want any Degrees of Piety, than he suspects himself to be a Favourer of Heresy. If he never thinks any ill of himself, if he never suspects any Falseness in his own Heart, if he is prejudiced in favour of all his own Ways, it is because he is prejudiced in favour of all orthodox Men. Junius reads much Controversy, yet he does not take it ill, that you pretend to inform him in Matters of Controversy ; on the contrary, he never reads Books of Devotion, yet is angry if you pretend to correct him in Matters of that kind. You may suppose him mistaken in something that he is always studying, and he will be thankful to you for setting him right ; but if you suppose him mistaken in Things that he never applies himself to, if you suppose that any Body knows what Humility, Heavenly-mindedness, Devotion, Self-denial, Mortification, Repentance, Charity, or the Love of God is, better than he, you provoke his Temper, and he won't suffer himself to be informed by you. Great Numbers of People are like Junius in this Respect, they think they are very religious by listening to Instruction upon certain Points, by reading certain Books, and being ready to receive further Light, who yet can't bear to be instructed in Matters where they are most likely to be deceived, and where the Deceit is of the utmost Danger. They will be thankful for your telling them the particular Times in which the Gospels were written, for explaining the Word Euroclydon, or Anathema Maranatha, they will be glad of such useful Instruction, but if you touch upon such Subjects as really concern them in a high Degree, such as try the State and Way of their Lives, these religious People, who are so fond of religious Truths, cannot bear to be thus instructed.

What is the Reason that when we consult Lawyers, it is not to hear Harangues upon the Law, or its several Courts; it is not to hear the Variety of Cases that concern other People, but it is to be instructed and assisted in our own Case? Why do we thank them for dealing impartially with us, for searching and examining into the true State of our Case, and informing us of every Thing that concerns us? What is the Reason that we apply to Physicians, not to hear the Rise and Progress of Physic, or the History of Disputes amongst them, not to hear of other People's Distempers, but to tell them our own particular State, and learn the Cure of our own Distempers? Why do we thank them for being nicely exact in searching us out, for examining into every Part of our Lives, our Ways of eating, drinking, and sleeping, and not suffering us to deceive ourselves with wrong Opinions and Practices? What is the Reason why we act thus consistently, and in the same Manner, in both these Instances? Now the only Reason is this, because in both these Instances we are really in earnest. When you are in earnest in your Religion, you will act as consistently and in the same Manner there. When you desire solid Piety, as you desire sound Health, your chief Concern will be about your own Disorders; you will thank Divines and Casuists for making you their chief Care, you will be glad to have them examine and search into your Ways of Life, to be rightly informed of the Follies, Vanities, and Dangers, of your State. You will be glad to read those Books, and consult those Casuists, which are most exact and faithful in discovering your Faults, who question and examine all your Ways, who discover to you your secret Corruptions, and unsuspected Follies, and who are best able to give you the surest Rules of arriving at Christian Perfection; when you are in earnest in your Religion, you will as certainly act in this Manner, as you act in the same Manner with the Lawyer or Physician. Take this also for an undeniable Truth, that till you do act in this Manner, you are not in earnest in your Religion. This therefore is a good Rule to examine yourself by. Do you find that you act in Religion as you do in other Cases, where you are in earnest? Are you as suspicious of yourself, as fearful of Mistake, as watchful of Danger, as glad of Assistance, as desirous of Success, as in other Matters where your Life or Fortune are at stake, or where your Heart is engaged? Never imagine that your Religion is founded in a true Fear of God, and a hearty Desire of Salvation, till you find yourself acting as you do in other Matters, where your Fears are great, and your Desires hearty. If you had rather read Books that entertain the Mind, than correct the Heart, if you had rather hear a Casulist examine other People's Lives, than your's, if you had rather hear him talk of the Excellency and Wisdom of Religion, than be exact in trying the Excellency and Wisdom of your way of Life, you must take it for granted, that you are not in earnest in the Reformation of your Life, and that there are some Tempers in you more strong and powerful, that more rule and govern you, than the Fear of God, and a Desire of Salvation. To return now to my Subject.

I had observed that People who are religious upon a true Principle, who are devout with their Reason and Understanding, cannot possibly either relish or allow the Entertainment of the Stage. I observed that these contradictory Tempers, a Delight in the Offices and Divine Services of the Church, and a Delight in the Entertainments of the Stage, are no more possible to be in the same good Men, than in the same good Angels. This made it necessary for me to step a little aside from my Subject, to consider some false Appearances of Religion, which are chiefly founded in natural Temper, Custom, Education, and the Way of the World; which yet so far deceive People, as to make them fancy themselves in a good State of Religion, while they live and act by another Spirit and Temper.

Now I readily own, a Man may come up to these Appearances of Religion, he may carry on a Course of such Piety as this, and yet relish the Diversion of the Stage. It is no Contradiction for a Man to like to say his Prayers, to be often delighted with the Service of the Church, to hear Sermons, to read Divinity, to detest Heretics, and yet find a constant Pleasure in the vain Entertainments of the Stage. The World abounds with Instances of People who swear, drink, and debauch, with all these Appearances of Religion. Now as we are sure that where we see these Vices, those Persons have only an Appearance of Religion, which is founded in something else than a true Fear of God; so wherever we see sober and regular People, Lovers of the Church, and Friends to Religion, taking the Pleasure of the Stage, we may be as sure that their Religion is defective, and founded in something that is weak, and false, and blind, that permits them to act so inconsistently. For the reasoning is full as strong in one Case as in the other. Now although I would not have People to be solely guided by what they feel, or think they feel, in their own Minds, yet this we may depend upon, as certain in our Tempers, that we never love or affect anything truly, but we hate and avoid all that is contrary to it in an equal Degree. So that we may be assured, that all that Love, or Zeal, or Affection, that we pretend for anything, is but mere Pretence, and a blind Motion, unless it appears by a zealous, lively Abhorrence of everything that is contrary to it. Upon this Ground I again affirm, that it is impossible for truly religious People to bear the Entertainments of the Stage. For consider only the Matter in this short View. A truly religious Person is to love and fear, and adore God, with all his Heart, and with all his Soul, and with all his Strength; now I ask you, who is it that has this true Love of God? Is it he that delights in Profaneness at all Times? Or is it he that can bear with Profaneness sometimes? Or is it he that abhors and avoids it at all Times and in all Places? Which of these three hath a Right to be esteemed a true Lover of God? Now he that goes to a Play at any time, though he may say that he does not delight in Profaneness, yet he must own, that he can sometimes, and in some Places, bear with Profaneness. For Profaneness of some kind or other, is in most of our Plays, almost as common, as the Name of God in Scripture. But I will suppose it were only now and then, and that no Profaneness either of Thought or Expression happened above twice or thrice in an Entertainment, yet this is Profaneness, and he that can bear with so much, that can seek the Entertainment as a Pleasure, must acknowledge, that though he does not delight in Profaneness as such, yet he can bear with Profaneness for the Sake of other Delight. Now ask yourself, has not he a truer Love of God, whose Piety will not suffer him to bear with Profaneness at any Time, or in any Place, or for any Pleasure? Am I not therefore supported by plain Reason and common Sense, when I affirm, that it is for want of true Piety, that any People are able to bear the Entertainment of the Stage?

You see also that no higher Degree of Piety, is required to fill one with a constant Abhorrence of the Stage, than such a

upon Christian Perfection. 191

Piety, as implies an Abhorrence of Profaneness at all Times, and in all Places.

When you are thus pious, when you thus love God, you will have a Piety, a Love of God that will not suffer you to be at an Entertainment that has any Mixture of Profaneness. Now as there must be this manifest Defect in true Piety, before you can bear with the Profaneness of the Stage; so if you consider every other Part of the Character of a truly religious Man, you will find, that there must be the same Defect run through the whole of it, before he can be fit for such Diversion.

You tell me that you love the Church, and rejoice at the Returns of Divine Service, though you now and then go to a Play. Now consider what it is which these Words mean, If you love and delight in the Service of the Church, then you love to be in a State of Devotion, you love to draw near to God, you love to be made sensible of the Misery, Guilt, and Weight of Sin, you love to abhor and deplore your Iniquities, and to lament the Misery and Vanity of human Life; you love to hear the Instructions of Divine Wisdom, to raise your Soul unto God, and sing his Praises; you love to be on your Knees praying against all the Vanities and Follies of Life, and for all the Gifts and Graces of God's Holy Spirit.

Now all this is implied in the true Love of Church-Service; for unless you love it for what it is, and because you feel its Excellency, your Love is only a blind, mechanical Motion; but if you love it in Truth and Reality, if you are thus affected with it, because all its Parts so highly suit the Condition of human Nature, whilst you are thus disposed, you can no more relish the wicked Spirit and foolish Temper of Stage Entertainments, than sincere, dying Penitents can delight in the Guilt of their Sins.

Never imagine therefore, that you are sincerely affected with the Confessions of the Church, or that you are truly glad for the Return of those Hours, which humble you in the Sight of God, never imagine that you truly feel the Misery and Weight of Sin, or sincerely lament the Corruption of your Nature, whilst you dare go to the Fountain-head of Corruption, the Place where Sin reigns and exercises its highest Power.

Never imagine that you have the Spirit of Devotion, that your Heart is renewed with the Holy Ghost, that it truly rejoices in the Means of Grace, and the Hope of Glory; never imagine that it is your Joy and Delight to worship God in the Beauty of Holiness, to send up your Soul to him in Prayers and Praises, so long as the Way of the Stage, its impious Nonsense, vile Jests, profane Passions, and lewd Speeches, are not your utter Abhor-rence. For it is not more absurd to believe, that a corrupt Tree may bring forth good Fruit, than to believe, that a pious Mind, truly devoted to God, should taste and relish the Entertainment of the Stage. For the Taste and Relish of the Mind, is a more certain Sign of the State and Nature of the Mind, than the Quality of Fruit is a Sign of the State and Nature of Trees.

Had the impure Spirits which asked our Blessed Saviour, to suffer them to enter into the Herd of Swine, said at the same time, that it was their only Delight and Joy to dwell in the Light and Splendour of God, no one could have believed them, any more than he could believe Light and Darkness to be the same Thing.

When you have the Spirit of Christ, when you are devoted to God, when Purity, Holiness, and Perfection is your real Care, when you desire to live in the Light of God's Holy Spirit, to act by his Motions, to rise from Grace to Grace, till you are finished in Glory, it will be as impossible for you, whilst you continue so disposed, either to seek or bear the Entertainment of the Stage, as it is impossible for pure and holy Spirits to ask to enter into a Herd of Swine. If you want the Delight of so corrupt an Entertainment, so contrary to the Spirit and Purity of Religion, you ought no more to believe yourself, when you pretend to true Piety and Devotion, than you ought to have believed those impure Spirits, if they had pretended to have been Angels of Light. For this is absolutely certain, and what you ought carefully to consider, that nothing ever gives us any Pleasure, but what is suitable to the State and Temper of Mind that we are then in. So that if the Corruption, the Immorality, the profane Spirit and wanton Temper of the Stage-Entertainment can give you any Pleasure, you are as sure that there is something like all these Vices in your Heart, as you can be of anything that relates to a human Mind.

Lastly, Ask yourself, when you think that you have a true Love for Divine Service, whether he is not a truer Lover of it, whose Soul is so fashioned to it, so deeply affected with it, that he can delight in nothing that is contrary to it; who can bear with no Entertainment that is made up of Speeches, Passions, Harangues, and Songs so opposite to the Wisdom, the Discourses, Instructions, and Hymns, of Divine Service. This I believe, you cannot deny, and if this cannot be denied, then it must be owned as a certain Truth, that he who can bear with the Stage-Entertainment, has this further Defect, that he wants the true Love of Divine Service.

Again, it is Part of a truly religious Man, to love the Scriptures, and delight in reading them; you say this is your Temper,

upon Christian Perfection. 193

though you go to Plays. I answer, that it is for want of a true Love and Delight in the Scriptures, that you are able to relish Plays. You may perhaps so love the Scriptures, that you may think it your Duty to read them; and desire to understand them. But when you once so love the Scriptures, as to love to be like them, to desire that the Spirit and Temper of Scripture, may be the one Spirit and Temper of your Life: When, for Instance, you love this Doctrine, strive to enter in at the strait Gate. If thy right Eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee. When you are of the same Mind with this Scripture, *be sober, be vigilant, because your Adversary the Devil, as a roaring Lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour.

When you are intent upon this Truth, for we must all appear before the Judgment-Seat of Christ, that everyone may receive the things done in his Body.† When this Text has taken Possession of your Heart, Seeing then that all these things must be dissolved, what Manner of Persons ought ye to be in all holy Conversation and Godliness?‡

When you resign up your whole Soul to this Exhortation, Take my Yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in Heart.§ When your Heart can truly bear you witness to this Doctrine, that you put on the whole Armour of Christ, that you may be able to stand, that you live by Faith and not by Sight, pressing after the Prize of your high Calling. When you thus love and delight in the Scriptures, when you thus enter into its Spirit and Temper, when its Purity is your Purity, its Fears, and Hopes, and Joys are your Fears, and Hopes, and Joys, you will find yourself one of those, who constantly and at all Times abominate the Folly, Impertinence and Profaneness of the Stage.

Let me desire you, when you are dressed for a Play, to read over our Saviour's Divine Sermon on the Mount before you go; try whether your Soul is full of the Spirit that is there taught, examine whether you then feel in your Heart such a Love of the Scripture, as to love those Conditions of Blessedness that are there described, Blessed are the Poor in Spirit, blessed are they that Mourn, blessed are they that Hunger and Thirst after Righteousness. Do you find yourself in these heights of Holiness? Is your Soul reformed, purified and exalted according to these Doctrines? Or can you imagine, that you are conforming yourself to those Doctrines, that you depart from none of them, when you are preparing yourself for a Pleasure, which is the proper Pleasure of the most corrupt and debauched Minds? Blessed are the pure in Heart, for they shall see God. Can you think that you are rightly affected with this Doctrine, that you are labouring after this Purity, that you are preparing to see God, when you are going to an Entertainment, to which they ought only to go, who have no Thoughts of seeing God, nor any Desires after that Purity which prepares us for it?

Lastly, Another Virtue essential to Christian Holiness is Chastity, our Blessed Saviour has given us the Measure of this Virtue in these Words: But I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a Woman to lust after her, hath committed Adultery with her already in his Heart. We are sure therefore that this Virtue is not preserved, unless we keep ourselves clear from all immodest Thoughts and impure Imaginations; we are sure also that the Guilt of these, is like the Guilt of Adultery. This is the Doctrine of Christ. Look now into the Playhouse, and think whether any Thing can be imagined more contrary to this Doctrine?

For, not to consider the monstrous Lewdness and Immodesty of the Stage, take it in its best State, when some admired Tragedy is upon it. Are the extravagant Passions of distracted Lovers, the impure Ravings of inflamed Heroes, the tender Complaints, the Joys and Torments of Love, and gross Descriptions of Lust; are the indecent Actions, the amorous Transports, the wanton Address of the Actors, which make so great a Part of the most sober and modest Tragedies, are these Things an Entertainment consistent with this Christian Doctrine? You may as well imagine, that Murder and Rapine are consistent with Charity and Meekness. I hope it will not now be said, that I have spent too much Time upon a Subject, that seems not necessary in a Treatise upon Christian Perfection. For though these Things are generally looked upon as little because they are called Pleasures and Diversions, yet they may as justly be called Vices and Debaucheries; they affect Religion, as Lies and Falsehood affect it, in the very Heart and Essence, and render People as incapable of true Piety, as any of the grossest Indulgences of Sensuality and Intemperance. And perhaps it may be true, that more People are kept Strangers to the true Spirit of Religion, by what are called Pleasures, Diversions, and Amusements, than by confessed Vices, or the Cares and Business of Life. I have now only one Thing to beg of the Reader, that he would not think it a sufficient Answer to all this, to say in general, that it is a Doctrine too strict and rigid, but that he would consider every Argument as it is in itself, not whether it be strict and rigid, but whether it be false Reasoning, or more strict and rigid than the Doctrine of Scripture: If it prescribes a Purity and Holiness which is not according to the Spirit and Temper of the Scriptures, let it be rejected, not as too strict and rigid, but as a Species of false Worship, as vain and ridiculous as Idolatry: But if what is here asserted, be highly conformable to the most plain Doctrines of Scripture, the saying that it is too strict and rigid, is of no more Weight against it, than if it were said, that it was too true. It is not my Intention to trouble the World with any particular Notions of my own; or to impose any unnecessary Rules, or fancied Degrees of Perfection upon any People. But in declaring against the Stage, as I have done, I have no more followed any particular Spirit or private Temper, or any more exceeded the plain Doctrine of Scripture, than if I had declared against Drunkenness and Debauchery. Let a Man but be so much a Christian, as not to think it too high a Degree of Perfection, or too strict and rigid to be in earnest in these two Petitions, Lead us not into Temptation, but deliver us from Evil; and he has Christianity enough to persuade him, that it is neither too high a Perfection, nor too strict and rigid, constantly to declare against, and always to avoid the Entertainment of the Stage.

Chapter XII.

Christians are called to a constant State of Prayer and Devotion.

IT is one principal Article of our Religion, to believe, that our Blessed Saviour is now at the Right Hand of God, there making perpetual Intercession for us, till the Redemption of Mankind is finished. Prayer therefore is undoubtedly a proper Means of drawing near to God, a necessary Method of restoring Sinners to his Favour, since he who has conquered Sin and Death, who is constituted Lord of all, is yet, as the great Advocate for Sinners, obliged to make perpetual Intercession for them.

Whenever, therefore, we are in the Spirit of Prayer, when our Hearts are lifted up to God, breathing out Holy Petitions to the Throne of Grace, we have this Encouragement to be constant and fervent in it, that we are then joining with an Intercession at the Right Hand of God, and doing that for ourselves on Earth, which our Blessed Saviour is perpetually doing for us in Heaven. This Reason of Prayer is perhaps not much considered, yet it certainly contains a most powerful Motive to it. For who, that considers his Redemption, as now carrying on by an Intercession in Heaven, can think himself so agreeable to God, so like his Saviour, as when the Constancy of his own Prayers bears some Resemblance to that never-ceasing Intercession which is made above? This shows us also, that we are most of all to desire those Prayers, which are offered up at the Altar, where the Body and Blood of Christ are joined with them. For as our Prayers are only acceptable to God through the Merits of Jesus Christ, so we may be sure, that we are praying to God in the most prevailing Way, when we thus pray in the Name of Christ, and plead his Merits in the highest Manner that we can.

Devotion may be considered, either as an Exercise of public or private Prayers at set Times and Occasions, or as a Temper of the Mind, a State and Disposition of the Heart, which is rightly affected with such Exercises. Now external Acts of Devotion, are like other external Actions, very liable to Falseness, and are only so far good and valuable, as they proceed from a right Disposition of Heart and Mind. Zealous Professions of Friendship are but the more abominable Hypocrisy, for being often repeated, unless there be an equal Zeal in the Heart; so solemn Prayers, rapturous Devotions, are but repeated Hypocrisies, unless the Heart and Mind be conformable to them. Since therefore it is the Heart only, that is devout, since the Regularity and Fervency of the Heart, is the Regularity and Fervency of Devotion; I shall consider Devotion chiefly in this Respect, as it is a State and Temper of the Heart. For it is in this Sense only, that Christians are called to a constant State of Devotion, they are not to be always on their Knees in Acts of Prayer, but they are to be always in the State and Temper of Devotion.

Friendship does not require us to be always waiting upon our Friends in external Services, these Offices have their Times and Seasons of Intermission, it is only the Service of the Heart, the Friendship of the Mind, that is never to intermit; it is not to begin and end, as external Services do, but is to persevere in a Constancy like the Motion of our Heart, or the Beating of our Pulse. It is just so in Devotion, Prayers have their Hours, their Beginning and Ending, but that turn of Mind, that Disposition of the Heart towards God, which is the Life and Spirit of Prayer, is to be as constant and lasting as our own Life and Spirit.

The repeating of a Creed at certain Times, is an Act of Faith, but that Faith which overcometh the World, stays neither for Times nor Seasons, but is a living Principle of the Soul, that is always believing, trusting, and depending upon God. In the same manner, verbal Prayers are Acts of Devotion, but that Prayer which saveth, which openeth the Gates of Heaven, stops not at Forms and Manuals of Devotion, but is a Language of the Soul, a Judgment of the Heart, which worships, adores, and delights in God, at all Times and Seasons.

upon Christian Perfection. 197

The Necessity and Reason of Prayer, is like all other Duties of Piety, founded in the Nature of God, and the Nature of Man. It is founded in the Nature of God, as he is the sole Fountain and Cause of all Happiness; it is founded in the Nature of Man, as he is weak and helpless, and full of Wants. So that Prayer is an earnest Application or Ascent of the Heart to God, as to the sole Cause of all Happiness. He therefore that most truly feels the Misery, Corruption, and Weakness of his own Nature, who is most fully convinced that a Relief from all these Disorders, and a true Happiness, is to be found in God alone, he who is most fully convinced of these two Truths, is most fully possessed of the Spirit of Prayer. There is but one Way therefore to arrive at a true State of Devotion, and that is, to get right Notions of ourselves, and of the Divine Nature, that having a full View of the Relation we bear to God, our Souls may as constantly aspire to him, as they as constantly aspire after Happiness. This also shows us the absolute Necessity of all those forementioned Doctrines of Humility, Self-denial, and Renunciation of the World. For if Devotion is founded in a Sense of the Poverty, Misery, and Weakness of our Nature, then nothing can more effectually destroy the Spirit of Devotion, than Pride, Vanity, and Indulgence, of any kind. These Things stop the Breath of Prayer, and as necessarily extinguish the Flame of Devotion, as Water extinguishes common Fire.

If Prayer is also founded in right Notions of God, in believing him to be the sole Fountain and Cause of all our Happiness, then everything that takes this Truth out of our Minds, that makes us less sensible of it, makes us so far less capable of Devotion; so that worldly Cares, vain Pleasures, false Satisfactions, are all to be renounced, that we may be able to pray. For the Spirit of Prayer has no further hold of us, than so far as we see our Wants, Imperfections, and Weakness, and likewise the infinite Fulness and All-sufficiency of God; when we thoroughly feel these two great Truths, then are we in the true Spirit of Prayer. Would you therefore be in the State and Temper of Devotion, you must practise all those Ways of Life, that may humble you in your own Sight; you must forbear all those Indulgences and Vanities which blind your Heart, and give you false Notions of yourself; you must seek that Way of Life, accustom yourself to such Practices as may best convince you of the Vanity of the World, and the Littleness of everything but God. This is the only Foundation of Prayer. When you don't enough see either your own Littleness, or the Greatness of God, when you either seek for Pleasure in yourself, or think that it is anywhere to be found, except in God, you put yourself out of a State of Devotion. For you can desire nothing, but what you think you want, and you can desire it only in such a degree, as you feel the Want of it. It is certain therefore, that whatever lessens or abates the Feeling of your own Wants, whatever takes you from looking to God, as the only possible Relief of them, so far lessens and abates the Spirit and Fervour of your Devotion.

We sometimes exhort People to Fervour in Devotion, but this can only mean as to the outward Acts of it; for to exhort People to be Fervent in Devotion, as that implies a Temper of the Heart, is to as little Purpose, as to exhort People to be Merry, or to be Sorry. For these Tempers always follow the Judgments and Opinions of our Minds, when we perceive Things to be, as we like them, then we are Merry; when we find Things in a contrary State, then we are Sorry. It comes to pass after the same manner in Devotion, bid a Man be fervent in Devotion, tell him it is an excellent Temper, he knows no more how to go about it, than how to be merry, because he is bid to be so. Stay till old Age, till Sickness, Misfortunes, or the Approach of Death, has convinced him that he has nothing good in himself, that there is nothing valuable in the World, that all that is good, or great, or glorious is in God alone, and then he will find himself as disposed to Devotion, and zealous Desires after God, as the Man is disposed to Cheerfulness, who sees Things in that State in which he would have them to be. So that the one and only way to be devout, is to see and feel our own Weakness, the Vanity of the World, and the Greatness of God, as dying Men see and feel them. It is as impossible to be devout without seeing Things in this View, as it is impossible to be cheerful without perceiving something in our Condition, that is according to our Mind. Hence therefore we may learn to admire the Wisdom and Divinity of the Christian Religion, which calls all its Members to Humility, Self-denial, and a Renunciation of worldly Tempers, as a necessary Foundation of Piety and Devotion. It was in these Practices that our Saviour first instituted his Religion; it was on these Conditions that the Apostles embraced it, and taught it to others; it was in these Doctrines that the primitive Christians became such worthy Followers of our Saviour and his Apostles. These Doctrines are still in the Gospel, and till they are to be found in our Lives, we shall never find ourselves in a State of Devotion. For I must again repeat, what my Reader cannot too much reflect upon; that since Devotion is an earnest Application of the Soul to God, as the only Cause and Fountain of Happiness, that it is impossible for the Soul to have this Desire, without having such Reasons to produce and support it, as are necessary to produce and support other Tempers of the Mind.

Now it is impossible for a Man to grieve when he finds his Condition answering his Desires ; or to be overjoyed when he finds his State to be full of Misery, yet this is as possible, as consistent with our Nature, as for a Man to aspire after, and delight in God as his only Happiness, whilst he is delighting in himself and the Vanity of the World. So that to pretend to Devotion without great Humility, and an entire Renunciation of all worldly Tempers, is to pretend to Impossibilities ; it is as if a Man should pretend to be cheerful, whilst he is in Vexation and Impatience ; he must first bring himself to a State of Satisfaction and Contentment, and then Cheerfulness will flow from it ; so he that would be devout, must first be humble, have a full View of his own Miseries and Wants, and the Vanity of the World, and then his Soul will be full of Desires after God. A proud, or vain, or worldly-minded Man, may use a Manual of Prayers, but he cannot be devout, because Devotion is the Application of an humble Heart to God, as its only Happiness.

Hence we may also perceive, why People of Learning and great Application to Books, who seem to have retired from the Corruptions of the World, to spend their time in their Studies, are yet often not Devout. The Reason is, because Devotion is founded in great Humility, and a full Sense of the Vanity and Littleness of every Thing but God. Whereas it is often the same Vanity that wears out some Scholars in their Studies, that wears out other People at Court, in the Camp, or at Sea. They do not want to be Merchants, or Colonels, or Secretaries of State, but they want to be Critics, Grammarians, and Historians. They, it may be, disregard Riches and Equipage, despise the Sports and Diversions of the present Age, avoid the Folly of Conversation, but then it is to contemplate the Riches and Equipage, the Sports and Diversions of the ancient Romans.

The Vanity of some Ladies and Gentlemen would be touched, if you should tell them, that they did not understand Dress : Some great Scholars would be more dejected, if you should suppose them Ignorant of a Fold in the Roman Garments.

The Bulk of Mankind are so dull and tasteless, so illiterate, as to set their Hearts upon current Coin, large Fields, and Flocks and Herds of Cattle. Great Learning has raised some Men above this grossness of Taste, their Hearts only beat at the Sight of a Medal and ancient Coins, they are only afraid of dying before they have outdone the World, in their Collections of Shells, Skins, Stones, Animals, Flies, and Insects.

You would not expect that a Merchant should be devout because he traded in all Parts of Europe, or that a Lady should be pious, because she understands all Sorts of fine Work and Embroidery. Now if you were to look into the Business of many profound Scholars, if you were to consider the Nature of such Learning as makes the greatest Figure in the World, you will find no more Tendency in it to Piety and Devotion, than there is in Merchandise or Embroidery.

When Men retire into their Studies to change their Nature, to correct and reform their Passions, to find out the Folly, the Falseness, the Corruption and Weakness of their Hearts, to penetrate into the Vanity and Emptiness of all worldly Attainments, when they read and meditate to fill their Souls with religious Wisdom and heavenly Affections, and to raise their Hearts unto God, when this is Learning (and what else deserves the Name), then Learning will lead Men unto God, learned Men will be very Devout, and great Scholars will be great Saints.

Hence we also learn, why so many People seemingly Religious, are yet Strangers to the Spirit of Devotion. Crito buys Manuals of Devotion, he finds nothing in them but what is according to the Doctrines of Religion, yet he is not able to keep pace with them, he feels nothing of what he reads, and throws them by, as something that does not suit his Taste: He does not consider that the fault is in himself, and that these very same Books will suit him when he is dying. He does not consider, that whilst he is so well pleased with himself, so fond of the World, so delighted with a Variety of Schemes that he has on foot, it is as impossible for him to be Devout, as for a Stone to hang by itself in the Air, or a Building to stand without anything to stand upon. If Crito was to begin his Devotion to God, with Humility, Self-denial, and a Renunciation of all worldly Tempers, he would show that he used common Sense in his Religion, that he was as wise as that Builder, who begins his House by laying a Foundation. But to think of adding Devotion to a Life that does not naturally lead to it, that is not so ordered, as to be so many Steps towards it, is as absurd, as if a Man should think of getting to the End of his Journey, without going through any of the Way that leads to it. For as it is a Temper of the Mind, it must arise from the State of our Mind, and must have its proper Causes to produce it, as all other Tempers have.

Suppose you were to call a Man from some joyful Feast, from the Pleasures of Songs, Music, and Dancing, and tell him to go into the next Room to grieve for half an Hour, and then return to his Mirth; suppose you were to tell him that he must mourn that half Hour from the Bottom of his Heart, that it was a very excellent Thing, and highly becoming a rational Creature. It is possible he might obey you so far, as to go into the Room appointed for Mourning, he may be able to sit still, look grave, sigh and hang down his Head, and stay out his half Hour, but you are sure that he cannot really grieve, and for this Reason, because he is in a State of festival Joy, and is returning to his Feast. Now this is the State of Crito, and great Numbers of Christians, they are always at a Feast; their Life is nothing else but a Succession of such Pleasures, Satisfactions, and Amusements, as affect and hurry their Minds, like the festival Joys of Drinking, Music, and Dancing. So that when they go to Devotion, they are just as capable of it, as a Man that is rejoicing at a Feast, is capable of mourning at the same time. Let not the Reader imagine, that this is the Case only of such great People, as live in such a constant Scene of Pleasure, as their Fortunes can procure, for it is a Case that equally concerns almost all States of Life. For as a Man rejoicing at an ordinary Feast, is as indisposed for Grief, as one that is merry at a more splendid Entertainment; so that Course of Pleasures and worldly Delights, which falls in with lower States of Life, may render such People as Incapable of Devotion, as they are, who have other Entertainments provided for them. Now no one wonders that he cannot put on Grief, when he is rejoicing at a Feast of any kind, because he knows there is sufficient Reason for it, because his Mind is then otherwise engaged. But if Crito would but deal thus faithfully with himself, he would as readily own, that he cannot relish Strains of Devotion, that his Heart does not enter into them, for this Reason, because it is otherwise engaged. For People certainly relish everything that suits with the State of Life that they live, and can have no Taste or Relish, but such as arises from the Way and Manner of Life that they are in. Whoever therefore finds himself unable to relish Strains of Devotion, dull and unaffected with them, may take it for certain, that it is owing to the Way and State of Life that he is in: He may also be further assured, that his Life is wanting in the Virtues of Humility, Self-denial, and a Renunciation of worldly Goods, since these Virtues as naturally prepare and dispose the Soul to aspire to God, as a Sense of Sickness disposes People to wish for Health.

Let us now put these Things together; it is certain, that Devotion, as a Temper of the Mind, must have something to produce it, as all other Tempers have, that it cannot be taken up at Times and Occasions, but must arise from the State of the Soul, as all other Tempers and Desires do. It is also equally certain, that Humility, Self-denial, and a Renunciation of the World, are the only Foundation of Devotion, that it can only proceed from these, as from its proper Causes. Here therefore we must fix our Rule to take the just Measure of ourselves. We must not consider how many Books of Devotion we have, how often we go to Church, or how often we have felt a Warmth and Fervour in our Prayers, these are uncertain Signs; but we must look to the Foundation, and assure ourselves, that our Devotion neither is, nor can be, greater than our Humility, Self-denial, and Renunciation of the World. For as it must proceed only from these Causes, so it can rise no higher than they carry it, and must be in the same State of Strength or Weakness that they are. If our Humility is false, our Self-denial hypocritical and trifling, and our worldly Tempers not half mortified, our Devotion will be just in the same State of Falseness, Hypocrisy, and Imperfection. The Care therefore of our Devotion, seems wholly to consist in the Care of these Duties; so far as we proceed in them, so far we advance in Devotion. We must alter our Lives, in order to alter our Hearts, for it is impossible to live one way, and pray another.

This may teach us to account for the several false Kinds of Devotion which appear in the World, they cannot be otherwise than they are, because they have no Bottom to support them. Devotion is like Friendship, you hear of it everywhere, but find it nowhere; in like manner, Devotion is everywhere to be seen in Modes of Worship, in Forms of Speech, in outward Adorations, but is in reality scarcely to be found. Hence also it is, that you see as much difference in the Devotion, as in the Faces of Christians, for wanting its true Foundation, being like an affected Friendship, it has as many Shapes, as there are Tempers of Men. Many people are thus far sincere in their Devotions, that they would be glad to pray Devoutly, they strive to be Fervent, but never attain to it, because they never took the only possible Way. They never thought of altering their Lives, or of living different from the rest of the World, but hope to be Devout, merely by reading over Books of Devotion. Which is as odd a Fancy, as if a Man should expect to be Happy, by reading Discourses upon Happiness. When these People dare take Christianity as it is offered to them in the Gospel, when they deny themselves, and renounce the World, as our Saviour exhorted his Followers, they will then have begun Devotion.

Trebonius, asks how often he shall pray: He thinks the nicety of the Question shows the Piety and Exactness of his Heart; but Trebonius is deceived, for the Question proves that he is a stranger to Devotion. Trebonius has a Friend, he is constantly Visiting him, he is never well out of his Company; if he is absent Letters are sent at all Opportunities. Now what is the Reason that he never asks how often he shall Visit, how often he shall delight in, how often he shall write to his Friend? It is because his Friend has his Heart, and his Heart is his faithful and sufficient Instructor. When Trebonius has given his Heart to God, when he takes God to be as great a Good, as substantial a Happiness, as his Friend, he will have done asking how often he shall pray.

Julius goes to Prayers, he confesses himself to be a miserable Sinner, he accuses himself to God with all the Aggravations that can be, as having no health in him, yet Julius cannot bear to be informed of any Imperfection, or suspected to be wanting in any Degree of Virtue. Now can there be a stronger Proof, that Julius is wanting in the Sincerity of his Devotions? Is not this a plain Sign, that his Confessions to God are only Words of Course, an humble Civility of Speech to his Maker, in which his Heart has no Share?

If a Man were to confess that his Eyes were bad, his Hands weak, his Feet feeble, and his Body helpless, he would not be angry with those who supposed he was not in perfect Strength, or that he might stand in need of some Assistance. Yet Julius confesses himself to be in great Weakness, Corruption, Disorder, and Infirmity, and yet is angry at anyone, that does but suppose him defective in any Virtue. Is it not the same thing as if he had said, You must not imagine that I am in earnest in my Devotions?

It would be endless to produce Instances of false Devotion; I shall therefore proceed no further in it, but rather endeavour to explain and illustrate that which is true. Devotion, we see, is an earnest Application of the Soul to God as its only Happiness. This is Devotion considered as a State and Temper of the Mind. All those Texts of Scripture which call us to God, as our true and only Good, which exhort us to a Fulness of Faith, of Hope, of Joy, and Trust in God, are to be considered as so many Exhortations to Devotion. Because Devotion is only another Name for the Exercise of all these Virtues. That Soul is devoted to God, which constantly rises and tends towards God in Habits of Love, Desire, Faith, Hope, Joy, and Trust. The End and Design of Religion, as it proposes to raise Man to a Life of Glory with Christ at the Right Hand of God, carries a stronger Reason for Devotion, than any particular Exhortation to Prayer. Beloved, saith St. John, It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. St. Paul also saith, As we have borne *the Image of the Earthly, we shall also bear the Image of the Heavenly.

Now these and such like Texts seem to me to carry the most powerful Motives, to awaken the Soul into a State of Devotion. For as the Apostle saith, He that hath this Hope, purifieth himself, even as he is Pure. So he that hath this Hope of being taken into so glorious an Enjoyment of the Divine Nature, must find his Heart raised and enlivened in thinking upon God. For these Truths cannot be believed without putting the Soul into a State of Prayer, Adoration, and Joy in God. The seeing thus far into Heaven, is seeing so many Motives to Praise and Thanksgiving.

It was this View of future Glory that made the Apostle break out in this Strain of Thanksgiving, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath begotten us to a lively Hope by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the Dead, to an Inheritance undefiled and that fadeth not away.† And would we Praise and Adore God with such Thanksgiving, as filled the Heart of this Apostle, we must raise it from a Contemplation of the same Truth; that incorruptible Inheritance that is prepared for us.

Again, the same Apostle saith to the Philippians, Our Conversation is in Heaven, and as the Reason and Motive to this heavenly Conversation, he addeth, Whence we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall change our vile Body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious Body.‡ So that the most powerful motive to Heavenly-mindedness, the plainest Reason for our Conversation in Heaven, is our Expectation of Christ's glorious Appearance, when he shall come to put an End to the Miseries of this Life, and clothe us with Robes of Immortality. These Truths much more effectually raise the Heart to God, than any particular Precepts to Prayer, they do not so much exhort, as carry the Soul to Devotion: He that feels these Truths, feels himself Devout, they leave a Light upon the Soul, which will kindle into holy Flames of Love and Delight in God.

The way therefore to live in true Devotion, is to live in the Contemplation of these Truths; we must daily consider the End and Hope of our Calling, that our Minds may be formed and raised to such Tempers and Desires as are suitable to it, that all little Anxieties, worldly Passions, and vain Desires may be swallowed up in one great Desire of future Glory. When the Heart is in this State, then it is in a State of Devotion, tending to God in such a Manner as justly suits the Nature of our

* 1 Cor. xv.

‡ Phil. iii. 20.

Religion. For whither should our Hearts tend, but where our Treasure is? This Devotion to God, is signified in Scripture, by living by Faith and not by Sight, when the invisible Things of the other Life, are the Reason, the Motive, and the Measure of all our Desires and Tempers. When Christians are thus settled in right Judgments of Things, and tending towards God in such Motions and Desires as are suitable to them, then are they devout Worshipers of God everywhere; this makes the common Actions of their Life, Acts of Religion, and turns every Place into a Chapel. And it is to this State of Devotion, that we are all called, not only by particular Precepts, but by the whole Nature and Tenor of our Religion.

Now as all States and Tempers of the Mind must be supported by Actions and Exercises suitable to them, so Devotion, which is an earnest Application of the Soul to God, as its only Happiness, must be supported and kept alive, by Actions and Exercises suitable to it, that is, by Hours and Forms of Prayer both public and private. The Devotion of the Heart disposes us to observe set Times of Prayer, and on the other Hand, set Times of Prayer as naturally increase and enliven the Devotion of the Heart. It is thus in all other Cases: Habits of the Mind dispose us to Actions suitable to them, and these Actions likewise strengthen and improve the Habits, from whence they proceeded.

It is the habitual Taste for Music, that carries People to Concerts, and again it is Concerts that increases the habitual Love of Music. So it is the right Disposition of the Heart towards God, that leads People to outward Acts of Prayer, and on the other Side, it is outward Acts of Prayer, that preserve and strengthen the right Disposition of the Heart towards God. As therefore we are to judge of the Significancy of our Prayers, by looking to the State and Temper of our Heart; so are we also to judge of the State of our Heart, by looking to the Frequency, Constancy, and Importunity of our Prayers. For as we are sure that our Prayers are insignificant, unless they proceed from a right Heart, so unless our Prayers be frequent, constant, and full of Importunity, we may be equally sure that our Heart is not right towards God.

Our Blessed Saviour has indeed condemned one sort of long Prayer. *But when ye pray, use not vain Repetitions as the Heathens do; for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking. Now it is not Length or a Continuance of Prayer that is here forbid, but vain Repetitions, when instead of praying, the same Words are only often repeated. Secondly, the Heathens are not here condemned for being importunate and persevering in their Prayer; but for a wrong Judgment, a false Devotion, in that they thought they were heard, because they spoke much, that is, often repeated the same Words. So that all that Christians are here forbid, is only this, they are not to think that the Efficacy of Prayer consists in vain and long Repetitions, but are to apply to God upon a better Principle, a more enlightened Devotion. Now though this is plainly all that is here condemned, yet some People imagine that a Continuance and Importunity of Prayer is here reprov'd, and thence conclude that Shortness is a necessary Qualification of Prayer.

But how willing must such People be to be deceived, before they can Reason in this manner. For the Words have plainly no Relation to Length or Shortness of Prayer, they no more condemn the one than the other, but speak altogether to another Matter. They only condemn an Opinion of Heathens, which supposed, that the Excellency and Power of Prayer consisted in a Multitude of Repetitions. Now to think, that a short Prayer is better, because it is short, is the same Error as to hold with the Heathens, that a Prayer is more powerful, the longer the same Words are repeated. It is the same Mistake in the Nature of Devotion.

But supposing the Meaning of these Words were something obscure (which it is not) yet surely it is plain enough, that our Saviour has expressly taught and recommended a Continuance and Importunity in Prayer. And how perversely do they read the Gospel, who can find his Authority against such kind of Devotion! For can he who was so often retiring to Deserts, to Mountains, to Solitary Places to pray, who spent whole Nights in Prayer, can he be supposed to have left a Reproof upon such as should follow his Example? But besides the Authority of his great Example, his Doctrine is on no Point more plain and certain, than where he teaches Frequency, Continuance, and Importunity in Prayer. He spake a Parable unto them, to this End, that Men ought always to pray, and not to faint. Saying, there was in a City a Judge which feared not God, nor regarded Man. And there was a Widow in that City, and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of my Adversary. And he would not for awhile: But afterwards he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard Man, yet because this Widow troubleth me, I will avenge her. And shall not God avenge his own Elect, which cry Day and Night unto him? The Apostle tells us, that this Parable was to teach Men to pray always, and not to faint, and it is plain to anyone that reads it, that it has no other intent, but to recommend Continuance and Importunity, as the most prevailing Qualifications of Prayer. The Widow is relieved, not because she asked Relief, but because she continued asking it, and God is said to avenge his Elect, not because they cry to him now and then, but because they cry Day and Night. Our Blessed Saviour teacheth the same Doctrine in another Parable, of a Person going to his Friend to borrow three Loaves of him at Midnight, where it thus concludes, I say unto you, though he would not rise and give him, because he is his Friend, yet because of his Importunity, he will rise and give him as many as he needeth. Here again the sole Scope of this Passage is to show, the great Power and Efficacy of Continuance and Importunity in Prayer.

Consider further in what manner Prayer is mentioned in Scripture. St. Paul does not command us to pray, but to pray without ceasing.* The same Doctrine is thus taught in another Place, continue in Prayer.† And again, Praying always with all Prayer and Supplication in the Spirit.‡ It is said of Anna, That she served God in Fasting and Prayer Night and Day. Now who can imagine that Shortness is any Excellency of Prayer?

Clito says, he desires no more Time for rising, dressing, and saying his Prayers, than a Quarter of an Hour. He tells this to his Friends, not to show his want of Religion, but that he may be thought to understand Devotion. You tell him that our Saviour's Parables teach Continuance and Importunity in Prayer, that the Apostles exhort to pray without ceasing, to pray always, and that devout Persons are recorded in Scripture, as praying Night and Day. Still Clito is for short Prayers. He at last finds a Text of Scripture, and appeals to the Example of the Angels, they only said, Glory be to God on High, and on Earth Peace, Goodwill towards Men. Clito takes this to be an Argument for short Prayer, because the Angels had done so soon. But Clito must be told, that this is no Prayer. It is only a joyful Proclamation to Men. And surely the manner of Angels speaking to Men, can be no Rule or Measure of the Devotion of Men speaking to God. The Angels had no more to tell the World, than this Message of Joy, but does it therefore follow, that Sinners are to be as short in their Addresses to God? The Scripture tells us sometimes of Voices from Heaven, but it would be strange, to make Things that were then spoken, the Measure of our Prayers when we call upon God. If Clito must have an Example from Heaven, he might have found one much more proper than this, where it is said, That they rest not Day and

* 1 Thess. v. 17.

‡ Ephes. vi. 18.

*Night, saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which was and is, and is to come.

Our Blessed Saviour saith, But thou, when thou prayest enter into thy Closet, and when thou hast shut thy Door, pray unto thy Father, &c.† Now here is indeed no mention of the Time that Prayer is to be continued, but yet this Preparation for Prayer, of entering into our Closet, and shutting the Door, seems to teach us that it is a Work of some Time, that we are not hastily to open our Door, but to allow ourselves time to continue and be importunate in our Prayers.

How long and how often all People ought to pray, is not to be stated by any one particular Measure. But this we may take as a general Rule, that relates to all Particulars, that every Christian is to pray so often and so long, as to show a Perseverance and Importunity in Prayer, as to show that he prays without ceasing, that he prays always, and that he cries to God Night and Day, for these are essential Qualifications of Prayer, and expressly required in Scripture. One would think it impossible for People to be sparing in their Devotions, who have read our Saviour's Parables, which teach us that the Blessings of Heaven, the Gifts and Graces of God's Holy Spirit are given to such as are importunate in their Prayers. I shall now only add a Word or two in Favour of frequent and continued Prayers.

First, Frequent and continued Prayers, are a likely Means to beget in us the Spirit of Prayer. A Man who is often in his Closet, on his Knees to God, though he may for some Time perform but a Lip-labour, will, if he perseveres, find the very Labour of his Lips altering the Temper of his Heart, and that he has learned to pray, by praying often.

This we find to be true in all Parts of Life, that we catch a Spirit and Temper from such Conversation and Ways of Life as we allow ourselves in. Use is called a second Nature, and Experience teaches us, that whatever we accustom ourselves to, it will by Degrees transform our Spirit and Temper into a Likeness to it.

Credula was for some Time a tender Mother, friendly and charitable to her Neighbours, and full of Good-will towards all People; she is now spiteful, malicious, envious, and delights in nothing but Scandal. How came Credula thus changed? Why she has been for several years spending her Time in visiting, she entered into Scandal and evil Speaking at first merely for the Sake of Talk, she has gone on talking, till she has talked her very Heart and Spirit into a Taste for nothing else; at first she only detracted from her Neighbours and Friends, because she was visiting, but now she visits for the Sake of Detraction. Credula is hardened and cruel in evil Speaking, for the same Reason, that Butchers are inhuman and cruel, because she has been so long used to murder the Reputation of her Neighbours. She has killed all her own Family over and over, and if she seeks new Acquaintance, it is to get fresh Matter for Scandal; now all this change in Credula, is purely owing to her indulging a talkative Temper.

* Rev. iv. 8.

† Math. vi. 6.

Now everything that we use ourselves to, enters into our Nature in this Manner, and becomes a part of us before we are aware. It is common to observe, that some People tell a Story so long, till they have forgotten that they invented it. This is not as is supposed, through a bad Memory, but because the things which we make constant and familiar, will by Degrees steal the Approbation of the Heart. If therefore we would but be often on our Knees, putting up our Prayers to God, though for a while it was only Form and outward Compliance, yet our Hearts would by Degrees learn the Language of our Mouths. The Subject of our Prayers would become the Subject of our Hearts, we should pray ourselves into Devotion, and it would become a part of us, in the same manner that all other ways enter into our Nature. Our Reason and Judgment would at last consent to our lips, and by saying the same things often, we should come to believe and feel them in a proper Manner. For it is a very reasonable Thing, to Judge of the Effects of good Customs, by what we see to be Effects of bad ones. They therefore who are hasty in their Devotions, and think a little will do, are Strangers both to the Nature of Devotion and the Nature of Man; they do not know that they are to learn to pray, and that Prayer is to be learnt, as they learn all other things, by Frequency, Constancy, and Perseverance.

Secondly, There is another great Advantage in frequent and continued Prayers.

The Cares and Pleasures of Life, the Levity, Vanity, and Dulness of our Minds, make us all more or less unfit for our Devotions. We enter into our Closets thus unprepared for Prayer; now if our Petitions are very short, we shall end our Prayers before our Devotion is begun, before we have time to collect our Minds, or turn our Hearts to the Business we are upon.

Now continuance in Prayer, is as great relief against these Indispositions, not only as it gives the Heart leisure to fall from worldly Cares and Concerns, but as it Exercises the Mind upon such Subjects, as are likely to abate its Vanity and Distraction, and raise it into a State of Seriousness and Attention. It is the Case of all People, to find themselves Inconstant in their Prayers, joining heartily with some Petitions, and wandering away from others; it is therefore but common Prudence to continue our Prayers, that our Minds which will wander from some Parts, may have others to join in. If we were Masters of our Attention, and could be as Fervent as we pleased, then indeed fewer Words might serve for our Devotion, but since our Minds are weak, inconstant, and ungovernable, we must endeavour to catch and win them to Devotion, by such Means as are suited to such a State of Weakness, Dulness, and Inconstancy. He that goes to his Closet in a hurry, only to repeat a short Form of Words, may pray all his Life without any Devotion, and perhaps he had been a devout Man long ago, if it had ever entered into his Head, that Meditation and Continuance in Prayer are necessary to excite Devotion. If a Man were to make it a Law, to himself, to Meditate a while before he began his Prayers, if he were to force his Mind to think, what Prayer is, what he prays for, and to whom he prays; if he should again make it a Rule to stop in some Part of his Prayers, to ask his Heart, whether it really prays, or to let his Soul rise up in silence unto God; prayers thus performed, thus assisted by Meditation and Continuance, would in all likelihood soon render the Mind truly Devout. It is not intended by this, to impose any particular Method upon all People; it is only to show us, that there are certain Means of assisting our Devotion, some Rules, though little in themselves, yet of great use to render our Minds Attentive and Fervent in our applications to God. It is the Business therefore of every sincere Christian, to be as wise as he can in these Arts and Methods of Self-government. As we ourselves know most of the Falseness of our own Hearts, of the Temper of our Minds, and the Occasion of our Defects, so if we would but be so wise, as to think the Amendment of our Hearts, the best and greatest Work, that we can do, every one's Reason would help him to such useful Rules, as had a peculiar fitness to his own State. Self-reflection is the shortest and most certain Way of becoming truly Wise, and truly Pious.

There are two Seasons of our Hearts, which if we would but reflect upon, we might get much Knowledge of ourselves, and learn how to assist our Devotion. I mean the time when we are most affected with our Devotions, and the time when we are most indisposed to pray. Both these Seasons equally serve to instruct us in the Knowledge of ourselves, and how to govern the Motions of our Hearts.

Reflect with yourself, how it was with you, what Circumstances

you were in, what had happened to you, what you had been doing, what Thoughts you had in your Head at such a Time, when you found yourself so affected with your Devotions. Now if you find out what State you were then in, when you were disposed to pray so Fervently, then you have found out a certain Way of raising your Devotion at another time. For do but put yourself in the same State, recall the same Thoughts, and do as you had then been doing, and you will find the same Causes will again produce the same Effects, and you will be again in the same Temper of Devotion. If you were then to put down in Writing, some short Remembrances of the chief Things, that ever raised your Heart to Fervency of Prayer, so that you might have Recourse to a full View of them, as often as your Mind wanted such Assistance, you would soon find a Benefit, that would well Reward your Labour. On the contrary, whenever you have found yourself very much Indisposed for Prayer, reflect with yourself, what State you were then in, what had happened unto you, what Thoughts you had in your Head, what Passions were then awakened, what you had been doing, or were intending to do; for when you have found out the State that you were then in, you have found out the real Hindrances of your Devotion, and are made certain what things you are to avoid, in order to keep yourself in a Temper of Devotion.

If you were here again to make short remembrances in Writing, of the chief Things which at such times rendered you indisposed for Prayer, and oblige yourself frequently to read them and reflect upon them, you would by this Means, set a Mark upon everything that did you any Hurt, and have a constant, faithful Information of what Ways of Life, you are most to avoid. If in Examining your State, you should find that sometimes impertinent Visits, foolish Conversation, or a Day idly Spent in civil Compliances with the Humours and Pleasures of other People, has rendered your Mind dull and indisposed, and less affected with Devotion, than at other times, then you will have found, that impertinent Visits, and Ceremonious Compliances in spending our time, are not little, indifferent Things, but are to be numbered amongst those Things which have a great effect upon our Minds, and such as are to be daily watched and guarded against, by all those who are so wise as to desire, to be daily alive unto God in the Spirit and Temper of Devotion.

I pass now to another Observation upon the Benefit of frequent Prayers.

Thirdly, Frequent and continued Prayer is the best Remedy against the Power of Sin. I do not mean as it procures the Divine Grace and Assistance, but as it naturally Convinces, Instructs, and Fortifies the Mind against all Sin. For every endeavour to pray, is an endeavour to feel the Truth of our Prayers, to convince our Minds of the Reasonableness and Fitness of those Things, that are the Subject of our Prayers, so that he who prays most, is one that most labours to convince his Heart and Mind of the Guilt, Deformity, and Misery of Sin. Prayer therefore considered merely as an Exercise of the Heart upon such Subjects, is the most certain way to destroy the Power of Sin; because so far as we pray, so far we renew our Convictions, enlighten our Minds and fortify our Hearts by fresh Resolutions. We are therefore to consider the Necessity and Benefit of Prayer, not only as it is that which God hears, but also as it is that, which by its natural Tendency alters and corrects our Opinions and Judgments, and forms our Hearts to such Ways of Thinking, as are suitable to the Matter of our Prayers.

Now this is an unanswerable Argument for frequency and continuance in Prayer, since if Prayer at all convinces the Mind, frequency and continuance in Prayer, must be the most certain way to establish the Mind in a steady well-grounded State of Conviction. They therefore who are for short Prayers, because they suppose, that God does not need much entreaty, ought also to show, that the Heart of Man does not need Assistance of much Prayer, that it is so regular and uniform in its Tendency to God, so full of right Judgments and good Motions, as not to need that Strength and Light, and Help, which arises from much praying. For unless this be the State of our Hearts, we shall want much Prayer to move and awake ourselves, though but little was necessary to excite the Goodness of God. If therefore Men would consider Prayer, not only as it is an Invocation of God, but also as it is an Exercise of holy Thoughts, as it is an endeavour to feel and be affected with the great Truths of Religion, they would soon see, that though God is so good, as not to need much calling upon, yet that Man is so weak as to need much Assistance, and to be under a constant Necessity of that Help, and Light, and Improvement which arises from praying much.

It is perhaps for this Reason, that God promises to give to those who are importunate and ask without ceasing, to encourage us to practise that Exercise, which is the most natural Cure of the Disorders of our Souls. If God does not give to us at our first asking, if he only give to those who are importunate, it is not because our Prayers make any Change in God, but because our Importunity has made a change in ourselves, it has altered our Hearts, and rendered us proper Objects of God's Gifts and Graces. When therefore we would know how much we ought to pray, we must consider how much our Hearts want to be altered, and remember that the great Work of Prayer, is to work upon ourselves; it is not to move and affect God, but it is to move and affect our own Hearts and fill them with such Tempers as God delights to reward.

Prayer is never so good a Preservation against Sin, it never so corrects and amends the Heart, as when we extend it to all the Particulars of our State, enumerating all our Wants, Infirmities, and Disorders, not because God needs to be informed of them, but because by this Means we inform ourselves, and make our Hearts in the best Manner acquainted with our true Condition. When our Prayers are thus particular, descending to all the Circumstances of our condition, they become by this Means a faithful Glass to us, and so often as we pray, so often we see ourselves in a true Light.

This is the most likely Means to raise in us proper Affections, to make us feel the Force and Truth of such Things, as are the Subject of our Devotions. Don't be content therefore with confessing yourself to be a Sinner, or with praying against Sin in general, for this will but little affect your Mind, it will only show you to yourself in such a State as all Mankind are in; but if you find yourself out, if you confess and lay open the Guilt of your own particular Sins, if you pray constantly against such particular Sins, as you find yourself most subject to, the frequent Sight of your own Sins, and your constant deploring of their Guilt, will give your Prayers Entrance into your Heart, and put you upon Measures how to amend your Life.

If you confess yourself only to be a Sinner, you only confess yourself to be a Man, but when you describe and confess your own particular Guilt, then you find Cause for your own particular Sorrow, then you give your Prayers all the Power they can have, to affect and wound your Hearts. In like manner, when you pray for God's Grace, don't be satisfied with a general Petition, but make your Prayers suitable to your Defects; and continue to ask for such Gifts and Graces of the Holy Spirit, as you find yourself most Defective in, for this will not only give Life to your Petitions, and make your Heart go along with them, but will also be the surest Means to fit and prepare you for such Graces, as you pray for.

Lastly, This Particularity in our Prayers, is the greatest Trial of the Truth of our Hearts.

A Man perhaps thinks he prays for Humility, because he has the Word, Humility, in his Prayers. But if he were to branch out Humility into all its particular Parts, he would perhaps find himself not disposed to pray for them. If he were to represent to himself the several Particulars, which make a Man poor in Spirit, he would find his Heart not desirous of them. So that the only way to know the Truth of our Hearts, and whether we really pray for any Virtue, is to have all its Parts in our Prayers, and make our Petitions ask for it in all its Instances. If the proud Man were to pray daily, and frequently for Humility in all its Kinds, and to beg of God to remove him from all Occasions of such Pride, as is common to his particular State, and to disappoint him in all his Attempts, that were contrary to Humility, he would find, that such Prayers, would either conquer his Pride, or his Pride would put an End to his Prayers. For it would be impossible to live long in any Instances of Pride, if his daily and frequent Prayers, were Petitions against those particular Instances. Now everyone may make his private Devotions thus useful to him, if he has but Piety enough to intend it. For everyone may know his own State if he will; we indeed commonly say, that People are blind to themselves, and know the least of their true State. We pass this Judgment upon People, because we see them pretending to so many Virtues, which do not belong to them, and declaiming against Vices, to which they are the most subject. Therefore we say, that Men don't know themselves, but this is false Reasoning.

We see People often pretending to be Rich, now this is not, because they don't know their State, but because they would not have you to know it, and they presume it possible to impose upon you. Now the Case is just the same in all other Pretences. The false, the proud, the worldly Man that pretends to Fidelity, Humility, and Heavenly Affection, knows that he is neither Faithful, nor Humble, nor Heavenly-minded; he no more thinks he has these Virtues, than a Man thinks he has a great Estate, when he endeavours to be thought rich; he knows that he only affects the Reputation of these Virtues, and is only blind in this, that he imagines he imposes upon you, and passes for the Man he is not.

Every Man therefore has Knowledge enough of himself, to know how to make his Prayers particularly fitted to the Corruption and Disorders of his Heart, and when he is so desirous of Salvation, as to enter into such a Method of Prayer, he will find, that he has taken the best Means, to make his Prayers effectual Remedies against all his Sins. Let me now only add this one Word more, that he who has learned to pray, has learned the greatest Secret of a holy and happy Life. Which way soever else we let loose our Hearts, they will return unto us again empty and weary. Time will convince the vainest and blindest Minds, that Happiness is no more to be found in the Things of this World, than it is to be dug out of the Earth. But when the Motions of our Hearts, are Motions of Piety, tending to God in constant Acts of Devotion, Love and Desire, then have we found Rest unto our Souls, then is it, that we have conquered the Misery of our Nature, and neither Love nor Desire in vain ; then is it, that we have found out a Good suited to our Natures, that is equal to all our Wants, that is, a constant Source of Comfort and Refreshment, that will fill us with Peace and joyful Expectations here, and eternal Happiness hereafter. For he that lives in the Spirit and Temper of Devotion, whose Heart is always full of God, lives at the Top of human Happiness, and is the furthest removed from all the Vanities and Vexations, which disturb and weary the Minds of Men, who are devoted to the World.

Chapter XIII.

All Christians are required to imitate the Life and Example of Jesus Christ.

OUR Religion teaches us, that as we have borne the Image of the Earthly, so we shall bear the Image of the Heavenly, that after our Death we shall rise to a State of Life and Happiness, like to that Life and Happiness, which our Blessed Saviour enjoys at the Right Hand of God. Since therefore it is the great End of our Religion to make us Fellow-Heirs with Christ, and Partakers of the same Happiness, it is not to be wondered at, that our Religion should require us to be like Christ in this Life, to imitate his Example, that we may enter into that State of Happiness, which he enjoys in the Kingdom of Heaven.

For how can we think that we are going to the Blessed Jesus, that we are to be hereafter as he is, unless we conform to his Spirit in this Life, and make it our great Endeavour to be what he was, when he was here. Let it therefore here be observed, that the Nature of our Religion teaches us this Duty in a more convincing Manner, than any particular Precepts concerning it. For the most ordinary Understanding must feel the Force and Reasonableness of this Argument. You are born to depart out of this World, to ascend to that State of Bliss,* to live in such  is not till the morning in morning*

Enjoyment of God to all Eternity, as our Blessed Saviour now enjoys, you are therefore to live in the Spirit and Temper that he lived, and make yourselves first like him here, that you may be like him hereafter. So that we need not look for particular Texts of Scripture, which command us to imitate the Life of Christ, because we are taught this Duty by a Stronger and more convincing Authority; because as the End and Design of our Religion, is to make us one with Christ hereafter, Partakers of the same State of Life, so it plainly calls us to be one with him here, and to be Partakers of that same Spirit and Temper in which he lived on Earth. When it is said that we are to imitate the Life of Christ, it is not meant that we are called to the same manner of Life, or the same sort of Actions, for this cannot be, but it is certain that we are called to the same Spirit and Temper, which was the Spirit and Temper of our Blessed Saviour's Life and Actions. We are to be like him in Heart and Mind, to act by the same Rule, to look towards the same End, and to govern our Lives by the same Spirit. This is an Imitation of Jesus Christ, which is as necessary to Salvation, as it is necessary to believe in his Name. This is the sole End of all the Counsels, Commands and Doctrines of Christ, to make us like himself, to fill us with his Spirit and Temper, and make us live according to the Rule and Manner of his Life. As no Doctrines are true, but such as are according to the Doctrines of Christ, so it is equally certain, that no Life is regular or Christian, but such as is according to the Pattern and Example of the Life of Christ. For he lived as infallibly as he taught, and it is as irregular, to vary from his Example, as it is false, to dissent from his Doctrines. To live as he lived, is as certainly the one sole Way of living as we ought, as to believe as he taught, is the one sole Way of believing as we ought. I am, saith the Blessed Jesus, The Way, the Truth, and the Life, no Man cometh unto the Father but by me. Christians often hear these Words, and perhaps think that they have enough fulfilled them by believing in Jesus Christ. But they should consider, that when Jesus Christ saith he is the Way, his meaning is, that his way of Life is to be the way, in which all Christians are to live, and that it is by living after the manner of his Life, that any Man cometh unto the Father. So that the Doctrine of this Passage is this, that however we may call ourselves Christians, or Disciples of Christ, yet we cannot come unto God the Father, but by entering into that way of Life, which was the way of our Saviour's Life. And we must remember, that there is no other way besides this, nothing can possibly bring us to God, but that way of Life, which first makes us one with Christ, and teacheth us to walk as he walked. For we may as well expect to go to a Heaven where Christ is not, as to go to that where he is, without the Spirit and Temper which carried him thither. If Christians would but suffer themselves to reflect upon this Duty, their own Minds would soon convince them of the Reasonableness and Necessity of it. For who can find the least Shadow of a Reason, why he should not imitate the Life of Christ, or why Christians should think of any other Rule of Life? It would be as easy to show that Christ acted amiss, as that we need not act after his Example. And to think that these are Degrees of Holiness, which though very good in themselves, are yet not necessary for us to aspire after, is the same Absurdity as to think, that it was not necessary for our Saviour to have been so perfect himself as he was. For, give but the Reason why such Degrees of Holiness and Purity became our Saviour, and you will give as good a Reason for us to aspire after them. For as the Blessed Jesus took not on him the Nature of Angels, but the Nature of Man, as he was in all Points made like unto us, Sin only excepted, so we are sure, that there was no Spirit or Temper that was Excellent in him, that recommended him to God, but would be also Excellent in us, and recommend us to God, if we could arrive at it.

If it should be said, that Jesus was the Saviour of the World, that he was born to redeem Mankind, was the Son of God, and therefore in a Condition so different from ours, that his Life can be no Rule of our Life. To this it may be answered, That these Differences don't make the Life of Christ to be less the Rule and Model of all Christians. For, as I observed before, it is the Spirit and Temper of Christ, that all Christians are to imitate, and not his particular Actions, they are to do their proper Work in that Spirit and Temper, in which Christ did the Work on which he was sent. So that although Christians are not Redeemers of the World as he was, though they have not his extraordinary Powers, nor that great Work to finish which he had, yet they have their Work to do in the manner that he did his; they have their Part to act, which though it be a different Part, must not be performed with a different Spirit, but with such Obedience to God, such Regard to his Glory, for such Ends of Salvation, for such Good of others, and with all such Holy Dispositions, as our Blessed Saviour manifested in every Part of his Life. A Servant of the lowest Order is in a very different State from his Master, yet we may very justly exhort such a one, to follow the Example of a pious and charitable Master, not because he can perform the same Instances of Piety and Charity, but because he may show the same Spirit of Piety and Charity in the Actions, which are proper to his State. This may show us, that the different State of our Lord and Master leaves him still the exact Rule and Pattern of his lowest Servants, who though they cannot come up to the Greatness of his Actions, may yet act according to that Spirit from whence they proceeded; and then are they true Followers of Christ, when they are following his Spirit and Temper, acting according to his Ends and Designs, and doing that in their several States, which Christ did in his.

The Blessed Jesus came into the World to save the World; now we must enter into this same Design, and Make Salvation the greatest Business of our Lives; though we cannot, like him, contribute towards it, yet we must contribute all that we can, and make the Salvation of ourselves and others, the one only great Care of our Lives.

The poor Widow's Mites were but a small Matter in themselves, yet as they were the utmost she could do, our Blessed Saviour set them above the larger Contributions of the Rich. This may encourage People in every State of Life to be contented with their Capacity of doing good, provided that they do but act up to it. Let no one think that he is too low, too mean and private to follow his Lord and Master in the Salvation of Souls, let him but add his Mite, and if it be all that he hath, he shall be thought to have done much, and be reckoned amongst those who have best performed their Master's Will. It is not meant by this, that all People are to be Preachers and Teachers of Religion, no more than all are to be Apostles, or all Prophets, or all Workers of Miracles. Christians are like Members of one and the same Body, they are as different from one another as Hands and Eyes, and have as different Offices to perform, yet may their different Parts serve and promote the same common End. As the Eye cannot say to the Hand, I have no need of thee, nor again the Head to the Feet, I have no need of you,* so neither can the learned Teacher say he hath no need of the private unlearned Person. For the Work of Salvation is carried on by all Hands, as well by him that is taught, as by him that teacheth. For an unlearned Person by being desirous of Instruction, and careful to comply with it, may by these very Dispositions promote Salvation in as true a Degree, as he who is able and willing to instruct. This teachable Disposition may more effectually draw others to a like Temper of Mind, than another Man's Ability and Care of teaching. And perhaps in many Instances, the Success of the Teacher is more owing to the Manners and Example of some Person that is taught, than to the Power and

* 1 Cor. xii. 21.

Strength of the Teacher. Therefore though, as the Apostle saith, all have not the Gifts of Healing, though all do not speak with Tongues, yet all have some Part that they may act in the Salvation of Mankind, and may follow their Lord and Master in the great Work, for which he came down from Heaven. We must not therefore think, that it is only the Business of Clergymen to carry on the Work of Salvation, but must remember, that we are engaged in the same Business, though not in the same Manner. Had the poor Widow thought herself excused from taking Care of the Treasury, had she thought that it belonged only to the Rich to contribute to it, we find that she had been mistaken, and had lost that great Commendation which our Saviour bestowed upon her. Now it may be that some Widows may be so very poor, as not to have so much as a Mite to give to the Treasury, who must therefore content themselves with the Charity of their Hearts; but this can never happen in the Business of Salvation, here no one can be so poor, so destitute, so mean and private, as not to have a Mite to contribute towards it. For no Circumstances of Life can hinder us from being Examples of Piety and Goodness, and making our Lives a Lesson of Instruction to all who are about us. And he that lives an exemplary Life, though his State be ever so poor and mean, is largely contributing to the Salvation of others, and proving himself the best Follower of his Lord and Master.

This therefore is the first great Instance in which we are to follow the Example and Spirit of our Blessed Saviour. He came to save the World, to raise Mankind to a Happiness in Heaven, we must therefore all consider ourselves as called to carry on this great Work, to concur with our Saviour in this glorious Design. For how can we think ourselves to be his Followers, if we do not follow him in that for which alone he came into the World? How can we be like the Saviour of the World, unless the Salvation of the World be our chief and constant Care? We cannot save the World as he saved it, but yet we can contribute our Mite towards it. *How knowest thou, O Wife, saith the Apostle, whether thou shalt save thy Husband? Or how knowest thou, O Man, whether thou shalt save thy Wife? This shows very plainly, that all Persons may have a great Share in the Salvation of those who are near them, and that they are to consider themselves as expressly called to this great Work. For the Apostle uses it as the same Argument both to Husband and Wife, which supposes that it is a Business, in which one is as much concerned as the other. The Woman we know is not allowed to speak in the Church, yet is she here instructed with some share in the Salvation of the World, she is called to this great Work, and supposed equally capable of saving the Husband, as the Husband of saving the Wife. Now what is here said of Husband and Wife, we must extend to every State and Relation of this Life; Brothers and Sisters, Relations, Friends, and Neighbours must all consider themselves as called to the Edification and Salvation of one another. How knowest thou, O Sister, whether thou shalt save thy Brother? How knowest thou, O Man, whether thou shalt save thy Neighbour, is a Way of thinking that ought never to be out of our Minds. For this would make Brothers and Sisters bear with one another, if they considered that they are to do that for one another, which Christ has done for all the World. This Reflection would turn our Anger towards bad Relations into Care and Tenderness for their Souls, we should not be glad to get away from them, but give them more of our Company, and be more exact in our Behaviour towards them, always supposing it possible, that our good Conversation may some time or other affect them, and that God may make use of us as a Means of their Salvation.

Eutropius is very good and pious himself, but then his Fault is, that he seeks only the Conversation of pious and good People; he is careful and exact in his Behaviour towards his virtuous Friends and Acquaintance, always studying to oblige them, and never thinking he has done enough for them; but gets away from, and avoids those that are of another Temper. Now Eutropius should recollect, that this is acting like a Physician who would take care of the Healthy, and disregard those who are Sick. He should remember, that his irreligious Friends and Relations are the very Persons who are fallen to his Care, to be edified by him, and that he is as directly called to take care of their Salvation, as the Husband to take care of the unbelieving Wife. Eutropius therefore, if he would imitate his Lord and Master, must apply to the lost Sheep of the House of Israel, and endeavour by all the innocent Arts of pleasing and conversing with his Friends, to gain them to Repentance. We must not excuse ourselves from this Care, by saying that our Relations are obstinate, hardened, and careless of all our Behaviour towards them, but must support ourselves with the Apostle's Argument, how knowest thou, O Man, whether it will be always so, or whether thou mayest not at last save thy Relation?

The Apostle saith, *Destroy not him with thy Meat for whom Christ died. We may therefore justly reason thus with ourselves, that as it lies much in our Power to hinder the Salvation, so it must be in our Power in an equal Degree to edify and promote the Salvation of those whom Jesus Christ died to save. Destroy not therefore by thy Negligence, by thy Impatience, by thy Want of Care, that Relation for whom Christ died, nor think that thou hast done enough to save those who relate to thee, till there is no more that thou canst do for them. This is the State in which all Christians are to consider themselves, as appointed by God in their several Stations to carry on that great Work, for which Christ came into the World. Clergymen are not the only Men who have a Cure of Souls, but every Christian has some People about him, whose Salvation he is obliged to be careful of, with whom he is to live in all Godliness and Purity, that they may have the Benefit of his Example and Assistance in their Duty to God. So that all Christians, though ever so low and mean, and private, must consider themselves as hired by Christ to work in his Vineyard; for as no Circumstances of Life can hinder us from saving ourselves, so neither can they hinder us from promoting the Salvation of others. Now though we have according to our different Stations different Parts to act, yet if we are careful of that Part which is fallen to our Share, we may make ourselves equally Objects of God's Favours.

Thou, it may be, art not a Prophet, God has not honoured thee with this Post in his Service, yet needest thou not fall short of this Happiness; for our Saviour hath said, That he that receiveth a Prophet in the Name of a Prophet, shall receive a Prophet's Reward. Now this shows us that though all Men have not the same Part to act in the common Salvation, yet that none will be losers by that State they are in, if they be but true to the particular Duties of it. If they do all the Good they can in their particular State, they will be looked upon with such Acceptance as the poor Widow who gave all that she had. Hence we may learn the Greatness of their Folly, who neglecting the exact Performance of such Duties as fall within their Power, are pleasing themselves with the great Things they would do, were they but in another State.

Clemens, has his Head full of imaginary Piety. He is often proposing to himself what he would do if he had a great Estate; he would outdo all charitable Men who are gone before him: He would retire from the World, he would have no Equipage, he would allow himself only Necessaries, that Widows and Orphans, the Sick and Distressed, might find Relief out of his Estate. He tells you that all other Ways of Spending an Estate is Folly and Madness.

Now Clemens has at present a moderate Estate which he spends upon himself in the same Vanities and Indulgences, as other People do : He might live upon one Third of his Fortune, and make the rest the Support of the Poor, but he does nothing of all this that is in his Power, but pleases himself with what he would do, if his Power were greater. Come to thy Senses, Clemens, do not talk what thou wouldst do, if thou wast an Angel, but consider what thou canst do as thou art a Man. Make the best Use of thy present State, do now as thou thinkest thou wouldst do with a great Estate, be sparing, deny thyself, abstain from all Vanities, that the Poor may be better maintained, and then thou art as Charitable as thou canst be in any Estate. Remember the poor Widow's Mite.

Fervidus, is a regular Man, and exact in the Duties of Religion, but then the Greatness of his Zeal to be doing Things that he cannot, makes him overlook those little Ways of doing Good, which are every Day in his Power. Fervidus is only sorry that he is not in Holy Orders, and that his Life is not spent in a Business the most desirable of all Things in the World. He is often thinking what Reformation he would make in the World, if he were a Priest or Bishop ; he would have devoted himself wholly to God and Religion, and have had no other Care, but how to save Souls. But do not believe yourself, Fervidus, for if you desired in earnest to be a Clergyman, that you might devote yourself entirely to the Salvation of others, why then are you not doing all that you can in the State that you are now in ? Would you take extraordinary Care of a Parish or a Diocese, why then are you not as extraordinary in the Care of your Family ? If you think the Care of other Peoples' Salvation, to be the happiest Business in the World, why do you neglect the Care of those who are fallen into your Hands ? Why do you show no Concern for the Souls of your Servants ? If they do their Business for which you hired them, you never trouble your Head about their Christianity. Nay, Fervidus, you are so far from labouring to make those who are about you truly Devout and Holy, that you almost put it out of their Power to be so. You hire a Coachman to carry you to Church, and to sit in the Street with your Horses, whilst you are attending upon Divine Service. You never ask him how he supplies the loss of Divine Service, or what means he takes to preserve himself in a State of Piety. You imagine that if you were a Clergyman, you would be ready to lay down your Life for your Flock, yet you cannot lay aside a little State to promote the Salvation of your Servants. It is not desired of you, Fervidus, to die a Martyr for your Brethren ; you are only required to go to Church on Foot, to spare some State and Attendance, to bear sometimes with a little Rain and Dirt, rather than keep those Souls which are as dear to God and Christ as your's is, from their full Share in the common Worship of Christians. Do but deny yourself such small matters as these, let us but see that you can take the least Trouble, to make all your Servants and Dependants true Servants of God, and then you shall be allowed to imagine, what Good you would have done, had you been devoted to the Altar.

Eugenia is a good young Woman, full of pious Dispositions; she is intending, if ever she has a Family, to be the best Mistress of it that ever was, her House shall be a School of Religion, and her Children and Servants shall be brought up in the strictest Practice of Piety; she will spend her time, and live in a very different Manner from the rest of the World. It may be so, Eugenia, the Piety of your Mind makes me think that you intend all this with Sincerity. But you are not yet at the Head of a Family, and perhaps never may be. But, Eugenia, you have now one Maid, and you do not know what Religion she is of; she dresses you for the Church, you ask her for what you want, and then leave her to have as little Christianity as she pleases. You turn her away, you hire another, she comes, and goes no more instructed or edified in Religion by living with you, than if she had lived with any Body else. And all this comes to pass, because your Mind is taken up with greater Things, and you reserve yourself to make a whole Family Religious, if ever you come to be Head of it. You need not stay, Eugenia, to be so extraordinary a Person; the Opportunity is now in your Hands, you may now spend your time, and live in as different a Manner from the rest of the World, as ever you can in any other State. Your Maid is your Family at present, she is under your Care, be now that religious Governess that you intend to be; teach her the Catechism, hear her read, exhort her to pray, take her with you to Church, persuade her to love the Divine Service, as you love it, edify her with your Conversation, fill her with your own Notions of Piety, and spare no Pains to make her as Holy and Devout as yourself. When you do thus much Good in your present State, then are you that extraordinary Person that you intend to be, and till you thus live up to your present State, there is but little Hopes that the altering of your State, will alter your Way of Life.

I might easily produce more Instances of this Kind, where People are vainly pleasing themselves with an imaginary Perfection to be arrived at some time or other, when they are in different Circumstances, and neglecting that real Good which is proper to their State, and always in their Power. But these are, I hope, sufficient to show my Reader how to examine his own Life, and find out himself, if I have not done it for him.

There is no Falseness of our Hearts, that leads us into greater Errors, than imagining that we shall some time or other be better than we are, or need be now ; for Perfection has no Dependence upon external Circumstances, it wants no Times or Opportunities, but it is then in its highest State, when we are making the best Use of that Condition in which we are placed. The poor Widow did not stay till she was rich, before she contributed to the Treasury, she readily brought her Mite, and, little as it was, it got her the Reward and Commendation of great Charity. We must therefore all of us imitate the Wisdom of the poor Widow, and exercise every Virtue in the same Manner, that she exercised her Charity. We must stay for no Time or Opportunities, wait for no Change of Life, or fancied Abilities, but remember that every time is a time for Piety and Perfection. Everything but Piety has its Hindrances, but Piety, the more it is hindered, the higher it is raised. Let us therefore not vainly say, that if we had lived in our Saviour's Days, we would have followed him, or that if we could work Miracles, we would devote ourselves to his Glory. For to follow Christ as far as we can in our present State, and to do all that we are able for his Glory, is as acceptable to him, as if we were working Miracles in his Name.

The Greatness that we are to aim at, is not the Greatness of our Saviour's particular Actions, but it is the Greatness of his Spirit and Temper, that we are to act by in all Parts of our Life. Now every State of Life, whether public or private, whether bond or free, whether high or low, is capable of being conducted and governed by the same Spirit and Temper, and consequently every State of Life may carry us to the same Degree of Likeness to Christ. So that though we can in no respect come up to the Actions, yet we must in every respect act by the Spirit and Temper of Christ. Learn of me, saith our Blessed Lord, for I am meek and lowly in Heart. He doth not say, be ye in the State and Condition that I am in, for that were impossible, yet though ever so different in State and Condition, he calls upon us to be like him in Meekness and Lowliness of Heart and Spirit, and makes it necessary for us to go through our particular State with that Spirit and Temper, which was the Spirit and Temper of his whole Life. So far therefore as we can learn the Heart and Spirit of our Saviour, so far as we can discover the Wisdom, Purity, and Heavenliness of his Designs, so far we have learned of what Spirit and Temper we ought to be of, and must no more think ourselves at liberty to act by any other Spirit, than we are at liberty to chose another Saviour. In all our Actions and Ways of Life we must appeal to this Rule, we must reckon ourselves no further living like Christians, than as we live like Christ, and be assured, that so far as we depart from the Spirit of Christ, so far we depart from that State to which he has called us. For the Blessed Jesus has called us to live as he did, to walk in the same Spirit, that he walked, that we may be in the same Happiness, with him when this Life is at an end. And indeed, who can think that anything but the same Life, can lead to the same State?

When our Blessed Saviour was upon the Cross, he thus prayed for his Enemies, *Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Now all Christians readily acknowledge that this Temper of Christ, is to be the exact Rule of our Temper on the like Occasion, that we are not to fall short of it, but must be perfectly like Christ in this Charity towards our Murderers. But then perhaps they do not enough consider, that for the very same Reason, every other Temper of Christ, is as much the exact Rule of all Christians, as his Temper towards his Murderers. For are we to be thus disposed towards our Persecutors and Murderers, because Christ was so disposed towards his? And is it not as good an Argument that we are to be so, and so disposed towards the World and all worldly Enjoyments, because Christ was so disposed towards them? He was as right in one case as the other, and no more erred in his Temper towards worldly Things, than in his Temper towards his Enemies. Should we not fail to be good Christians, if we fell short of that forgiving Spirit, which the Blessed Jesus showed upon the Cross? And shall we not equally fail to be good Christians, if we fall short of that humble and meek Spirit which he showed in all his Life? Can any one tell why the Temper of Christ towards his Enemies, should be more the exact Measure of our Temper, than any other Spirit that he showed upon any other Occasion? Think, Reader, if thou canst find a Reason, why thou mayest not as well forgive thy Enemies less than Christ forgave his, as to love the World more than he loved it? If thou canst tell why it is not as dangerous to be wanting in the Humility, Meekness, and other Tempers of Christ, as to be wanting in his Charity, towards his Enemies. We must therefore either own, that we may be good Christians, without the forgiving Spirit, which Christ then exercised, or we must own that we are not good Christians, whenever we depart from the Spirit of Christ in any other Instances. For the Spirit of Christ consisted as much in Meekness, Humility, Devotion, and Renunciation of the World, as in the forgiving his Enemies: They therefore who are contrary to Christ in any of these Tempers, are no more like to Christ, than they who are contrary to him in this forgiving Spirit. If you were to see a Christian dying without this Temper towards those that destroyed him, you would be frightened at it; you would think that Man in a dreadful State, that died without that Temper in which Christ died. But then, remember, that he judges as rightly, who thinks it equally dreadful to live in any other Spirit, that is not the Spirit of Christ. If thou art not living in that Meekness and Lowliness of Heart, in that Disregard of the World, that Love of God, that Self-denial and Devotion in which our Saviour lived, thou art as unlike to him, as he that dies without that Temper, in which he died.

* Luke xxiii. 34.

The short of the Matter is this, the Spirit and Temper of Christ, is the strict Measure of the Spirit and Temper of all Christians. It is not in this or that particular Temper of Christ, that we are to follow his Example, but we are to aspire after his whole Spirit, to be in all things as he was, and think it as dangerous to depart from his Spirit and Temper in one Instance, as in another. For besides that there is the same Authority in all that our Saviour did, which obliges us to conform to his whole Example: Can any one tell us why we should have more value for this World, than our Saviour had? What is there in our State and Circumstances, that can make it proper for us to have more affection for the Things of this Life, than our Saviour had? Is the World any more our Happiness than it was his Happiness? Are Riches, and Honours, and Pleasures, any more our proper Good, than they were his? Are we any more born for this Life, than our Saviour was? Are we in less danger of being Corrupted by its Enjoyments, than he was? Are we more at leisure to take up our rest, and spend our time in worldly Satisfaction than he was? Have we a work upon our Hands that we can more easily finish, than he could finish his? That requires of us less Mortification and Self-denial, less Devotion and Watching, than our Saviour's required of him? Now as nothing of this can be said, so nothing can be said in our Excuse, if we follow not our Saviour's Temper in this Respect. As this World is as little our Happiness, and more our Danger, than it was his, as we have a Work to finish that requires all our Strength, that is as contrary to the World, as our Saviour's was, it is plain, there was no Reason or Necessity of his Disregard of the World, but what is the same Reason and Necessity for us to disregard it in the same Manner.

Again, take another Instance of our Blessed Saviour's Spirit,

*I came down from Heaven, saith he, not to do my own Will, but the Will of him that sent me.

And again, My Meat and Drink is to do the Will of him that sent me. Now can any Christian show, why he may think otherwise of himself, than our Saviour here thought? Or that he need be less devoted to the Glory of God than he was? What is there in our Nature and Condition to make any Difference of this Kind? Do we not stand in the same Relation to God that our Saviour did? Have we not the same Nature that he had? Are we too great to be made Happy in the same Way that he was? Or can anything else be the Happiness of our Nature, but that which was the Happiness of his? Was he a sufferer, a loser, did he leave the true Happiness of human Life, by devoting himself to the Will of God? Or can this be our Case, though it was not his? Can we be losers, by looking to God alone, and devoting ourselves to his Glory? Was it not the Greatness and Happiness of our Saviour that he lived to God alone? And is there any other Happiness or Greatness for us, but by making that the End and Aim of our Life, which he made the End and Aim of his Life? For we may as well seek out for another God, as for another Happiness, or another Way to it, than that in which Christ is gone before us. He did not mistake the Nature of Man, or the Nature of the World, he did not overlook any real Felicity, or pass by any solid Good, he only made the best Use of human Life, and made it the Cause of all the Happiness and Glory that can arise from it. To find a Reason therefore, why we should live otherwise than he lived, why we should less seek the Glory of God than he sought it, is to find a Reason why we should less promote our own Greatness and Glory. For our State and Condition in this Life lays us under all the Obligations, that our Saviour was under to live as he did, his Life is as much our right Way, as it was his, and his Spirit and Temper is as necessary for our Condition, as it was for his. For this World and all the Things of the World signify as little to us, as they did to him; we are no more in our true State, till we are got out of this World, than he was; and we have no other way to arrive at true Felicity and Greatness, but by so devoting ourselves to God, as our Blessed Saviour did. We must therefore make it the great Business and Aim of our Lives, to be like Christ, and this not in a loose or general Way, but with great Nicety and Exactness, always looking to his Spirit, to his Ends and Designs, to his Tempers, to his Ways and Conversation in the World, as the exact Model and Rule of our Life.

* John vi. 38.

Again, Learn of me, saith our Blessed Saviour, for I am Meek and Lowly of Heart, Now this Passage is to be considered, not as a Piece of good Advice, that would be of use to us, but as a positive Command requiring a necessary Duty. And if we are commanded to learn of Christ Meekness and Lowliness, then we are commanded in the same positive Manner, to learn his Meekness and Lowliness. For if we might take up with a Meekness and Lowliness of Heart, that was not his, then it would not be necessary to learn them of him. Since therefore we are commanded to learn them of him, it is plain, that it is his Meekness and Lowliness that we are commanded to learn; that is, we are to be Meek and Lowly, not in any loose or general Sense of the Words, not according to the Opinions and Practices of Men, but in such Truth and Reality as Christ was Meek and Lowly.

It ought also to be observed, that there must be something very Extraordinary in these Dispositions of the Heart, from the manner in which we are taught them. It is only in this Place, that our Saviour says expressly, Learn of me; and when he says, Learn of me, he does not say, for I am just and equitable, or kind or holy, but I am meek and lowly of Heart; as if he would teach us, that these are the Tempers which most of all distinguish his Spirit, and which he most of all requires his Followers to learn of him. For consider, does Christ when he describes himself, choose to do it by these Tempers? When he calls upon us to learn of him, does he only mention these Tempers? And is not this a sufficient Proof that these are Tempers, which the Followers of Christ, are most of all obliged to learn, and that we are then most unlike to Christ, when we are wanting in them? Now as our great Lord and Master has made these Characters, the distinguishing Characters of his Spirit, it is plain, that they are to be the distinguishing Characters of our Spirit, for we are only so far his, as we are like him. Consider also, was he more lowly than he need have been? Did he practise any Degrees of Humility that were unnecessary? This can no more be said, than he can be charged with Folly. But can there be any Instances of Lowliness which became him, that are not necessary for us? Does our State and Condition excuse us from any kind of Humility, that were necessary for him? Are we higher in our Nature, more raised in our Condition, or more in Favour of God than he was? Are there Dignities, Honours, and Ornaments of Life which we may delight in, though he might not? We must own these Absurdities, or else acknowledge, that we are to breathe the same lowly Spirit, act with the same Meekness, and practise the same humble Behaviour that he did. So that the Matter comes plainly to this Conclusion, either that Christ was more humble and lowly than his Nature and Condition required, or we are under the same Necessity of as great Humility, till we can prove that we are in a higher state than he was.

Now as it is plainly the Meekness and Lowliness of Christ, that we are to Practise, why should we think, that we have attained unto it, unless we show forth these Tempers in such Instances, as our Saviour showed them? For, can we suppose, that we are Meek and Lowly as he was, if we live in such Ways of Life, and seek after such Enjoyments as his Meekness and Lowliness would not allow him to follow? Did he mistake the proper Instances of Lowliness? If not, it must be our great Mistake not to follow his Steps. Did his Lowliness of Heart make him disregard the Distinction of this Life, avoid the Honours, Pleasures, and Vanities of Greatness? And can we think that we are living by the same lowly Spirit, whilst we are seeking after all the Dignities and Ornaments both of our Persons and Conditions? What may we not think, if we can think after this Manner? For let us speak home to this Point, either our Saviour was wise, judicious, and governed by a Divine Spirit in these Tempers, or he was not; to say that he was not, is horrid Blasphemy, and to say that he was, is saying, that we are neither wise, nor judicious, nor governed by a Divine Spirit, unless we show the same Tempers. Perhaps you will say, that though you are to be lowly in Heart like Christ, yet you need not disregard the Ornaments, Dignities, and Honours of Life, and that you can be as truly meek and lowly in the Figure and Show of Life, as in any other State.

Answer me, therefore, this one Question. Was our Saviour's Lowliness, which showed itself in an utter disregard of all Pomp and Figure of Life, a false Lowliness that mistook its proper Objects, and showed itself in Things not necessary? Did he abstain from Dignities and Splendour, and deny himself Enjoyments which he might with the same Lowliness of Heart have taken Pleasure in? Answer but this Question plainly, and then you will plainly determine this Point; if you justify our Saviour, as being truly and wisely Humble, you condemn yourself, if you think of any other Humility, than such as he practised. Consider further, that if you were to hear a Person reasoning after this Manner in any other Instance, if he should pretend to be of an inward Temper contrary to the outward Course of his Life, you would think him very absurd. If a Man that lived in an outward Course of Duels and Quarrels, should say, that in his Heart he forgave all Injuries, allowed of no Resentments. If another whose common Life was full of Bitterness, and Wrath, and Evil-Speaking, should pretend that in his Heart he loved his Neighbour as himself, we should reckon them amongst those that were more than a little touched in their Heads. Now to pretend to any Temper contrary to our outward Actions, is the same Absurdity in one Case as in another. And for a Man to say, that he is lowly in Heart, whilst he is seeking the Ornaments, Dignities, and Show of Life, is the same Absurdity, as for a Man to say, that he is of a meek and forgiving Spirit, whilst he is seeking and revenging Quarrels. For to disregard and avoid the Pomp and Figure, and vain Ornaments of worldly Greatness, is as essential to Lowliness of Mind, as the avoiding of Duels and Quarrels is essential to Meekness and Charity. As therefore there is but one way of being charitable as our Saviour was, and that by such outward Actions towards our Enemies as he showed, so is there but one way of being lowly in Heart as he was, and that by living in such a Disregard of all vain and worldly Distinctions, as he lived. Let us not therefore deceive ourselves; let us not fancy that we are truly Humble, though living in all the Pride and Splendour of Life; let us not imagine that we have any Power to render ourselves Humble and Lowly any other way, than by an humble and lowly Course of Life. Christ is our Pattern and Example, he was content to be one Person, he did not pretend to Impossibilities, to reconcile the Pride of Life with the Lowliness of Religion, but renounced the one, that he might be a true Example of the other. He had a Power of working Miracles, but to reconcile an humble and lowly Heart with the vain Ornaments of our Persons, the Dignities of State and Equipage, was a Miracle he did not pretend to. It is only for us great Masters in the science of Virtue, to have this mighty Power; we can be humble, it seems, at less Expense than our Saviour was, without supporting ourselves in it by a way of Life suitable to it. We can have Lowliness in our Hearts, with Paint and Patches upon our Faces, we can deck and adorn our Persons in the Spirit of Humility, make all the Show that we can in the Pride and Figure of the World, with Christian Lowliness in some little Corner of our Hearts.

But suppose now that all this was possible, and that we could preserve an humble and lowly Temper in a way of Life contrary to it. Is it any advantage to a Man to be one Thing in his Heart, and another Thing in his Way of Life? Is it any excuse, to say that a Man is kind and tender in his Heart, though his Life hath a Course of contrary Actions? Is it not a greater Reproach to him, that he lives a churlish Life with Tenderness in his Heart? Is he not that Servant that shall be beaten with many stripes for sinning against his Heart and Conscience? Now it is the same Thing in the Case before us. Are you humble and lowly in your Heart, is it not therefore a greater Sin in you, not to practise Humility and Lowliness in your Life? If you live contrary to Conscience, are you not in a State of greater Guilt? Are not lowly Actions, an humble Course of Life, as much the proper Exercise of Humility, as a charitable Life and Actions, is the proper Exercise of Charity?

If therefore a Man may be excused for not living a charitable Life, because of a supposed Charity in his Heart, then may you think it excusable to forbear a Lowliness of Life and Actions, because of a pretended Humility in your Mind. Consider further, is any Thing so agreeable to a proud Person, as to shine and make a Figure in the Pride of Life? Is such a Person content with being high in Heart and Mind? Is he not uneasy till he can add a way of Life suitable to it? Till his Person, his State, and Figure in Life appear in a Degree of Pride suitable to the Pride of his Heart? Nay, can any Thing be a greater Pain to a proud Man, than to be forced to live in an humble lowly State of Life? Now if this be true of Pride, must not the contrary be as true of Humility? Must not Humility in an equal Degree dispose us to ways that are contrary to the Pride of Life, and suitable and proper to Humility? Must it not be the same Absurdity, to suppose a Man content with Humility of Heart, without adding a Life suitable to it, as to suppose a Man content with a secret Pride of his Heart, without seeking such a State of Life as is according to it? Nay, is it not the same Absurdity, to suppose an humble Man seeking all the State of a Life of Pride, as to suppose a proud Man desiring only Meanness and Obscurity, and unable to relish any Appearance of Pride? These Absurdities are equally manifest and plain in one Case as in the other. So that what way soever we examine this Matter, it appears, that a Humility of Mind, that is not a Humility of Person, of Life and Action, is but a mere Pretence, and as contrary to common Sense, as it is contrary to the Doctrine and Example of our Saviour.

I shall now leave this Subject to the Reader's own Meditation, with this one further Observation.

We see the Height of our calling, that we are called to follow the Example of our Lord and Master, and to go through this World with his Spirit and Temper. Now nothing is so likely a Means to fill us with his Spirit and Temper, as to be frequent in reading the Gospels, which contain the History of his Life and Conversation in the World. We are apt to think, that we have sufficiently read a Book, when we have so read it, as to know what it contains, this reading may be sufficient as to many Books, but as to the Gospels, we are not to think that we have ever read them enough, because we have often read and heard what they contain. But we must read them, as we do our Prayers, not to know what they contain, but to fill our Hearts with the Spirit of them. There is as much Difference betwixt reading, and reading, as there is betwixt praying, and praying. And as no one prays well, but he who is daily and constant in Prayer, so no one can read the Scriptures to sufficient Advantage, but he who is daily and constant in the reading of them. By thus conversing with our Blessed Lord, looking into his Actions and manner of Life, hearing his Divine Sayings, his Heavenly Instructions, his Accounts of the Terrors of the Damned, his Descriptions of the Glory of the Righteous, we should find our Hearts formed and disposed to Hunger and Thirst after Righteousness. Happy they, who saw the Son of God upon Earth converting Sinners, and calling fallen Spirits to return to God! And next happy are we, who have his Discourses, Doctrines, Actions, and Miracles which then converted Jews and Heathens into Saints and Martyrs, still preserved to fill us with the same Heavenly Light, and lead us to the same State of Glory.

Chapter XIV.

An Exhortation to Christian Perfection.

WHOEVER hath read the foregoing Chapters with Attention, is, I hope, sufficiently instructed in the Knowledge of Christian Perfection. He hath seen that it requireth us to devote ourselves wholly unto God, to make the Ends and Designs of Religion, the Ends and Designs of all our Actions. That it calleth us to be born again of God, to live by the Light of his Holy Spirit, to renounce the World and all worldly Tempers, to practise a constant, universal Self-denial, to make daily War with the Corruption and Disorder of our Nature, to prepare ourselves for Divine Grace by a Purity and Holiness of Conversation, to avoid all Pleasures and Cares which grieve the Holy Spirit, and separate him from us, to live in a daily constant State of Prayer and Devotion, and as the Crown of all to imitate the Life and Spirit of the Holy Jesus.

It now only remains, that I exhort the Reader to labour after this Christian Perfection. Were I to exhort anyone to the Study of Poetry or Eloquence, to labour to be Rich and Great, or to spend his Time in Mathematics or other Learning, I could only produce such Reasons as are fit to delude the Vanity of Men, who are ready to be taken with any Appearance of Excellence. For if the same Person were to ask me, what it signifies to be a Poet or Eloquent, what Advantage it would be to him, to be a great Mathematician, or a great Statesman, I must be forced to answer, that these Things would signify just as much to him, as they now signify to those Poets, Orators, Mathematicians, and Statesmen, whose Bodies have been a long while lost amongst common Dust. For if a Man will but be so thoughtful and inquisitive, as to put the Question to every human Enjoyment, and ask what real Good it would bring along with it, he would soon find, that every Success amongst the Things of this Life, leaves us just in the same State of Want and Emptiness in which it found us. If a Man asks why he should labour to be the first Mathematician, Orator, or Statesman, the Answer is easily given, because of the Fame and Honour of such a Distinction, but if he were to ask again, why he should thirst after Fame and Honour, or what Good they would do him, he must stay long enough for an Answer. For when we are at the Top of all human Attainments, we are still at the Bottom of all human Misery, and have made no further Advancement towards true Happiness, than those, whom we see in the Want of all these Excellences. Whether a Man die before he has written Poems, compiled Histories, or raised an Estate, signifies no more than whether he died an hundred, or a thousand Years ago.

On the contrary, when anyone is exhorted to labour after Christian Perfection, if he then asks what Good it will do him, the Answer is ready, that it would do him a Good, which Eternity alone can measure, that it will deliver him from a State of Vanity and Misery, that it will raise him from the poor Enjoyments of an animal Life, that it will give him a glorious Body, carry him in spite of Death and the Grave to live with God, be Glorious among Angels and Heavenly Beings, and be full of an infinite Happiness to all Eternity. If therefore we could but make Men so reasonable, as to make the shortest Inquiry into the Nature of Things, we should have no Occasion to exhort them to strive after Christian Perfection. Two Questions, we see, put an End to all the vain Projects and Designs of human Life, they are all so empty and useless to our Happiness, that they cannot stand the Trial of a second Question. And on the other Hand, 'tis but asking whether Christian Perfection tends, to make us have no other Care. One single Thought upon the eternal Happiness that it leads to, is sufficient to make all People Saints.

This shows us how inexcusable all Christians are, who are devoted to the Things of this Life, it is not because they want fine Parts, or are unable to make deep Reflections, but it is because they reject the first Principles of common Sense, they won't so much as ask what those Things are, which they are labouring after. Did they but use thus much Reason, we need not desire them to be wiser, in order to seek only eternal Happiness. As a Shadow at the first Trial of the Hand, appears to have no Substance, so all Human Enjoyments sink away into nothing at the first Approach of a serious Thought. We must not therefore complain of the Weakness and Ignorance of our Nature, or the deceitful Appearances of worldly Enjoyments, because the lowest Degree of Reason, if listened to, is sufficient to discover the Cheat. If you will, you may blindly do what the rest of the World are doing, you may follow the Cry, and run yourself out of Breath, for you know not what. But if you will but show so much Sense, as to ask why you should take such a Chase, you will need no deeper a Reflection than this, to make you leave the Broad-way, and let the Wise and Learned, the Rich and Great be mad by themselves. Thus much common Sense will turn your Eyes towards God, will separate you from all the Appearances of worldly Felicity, and fill you with one only Ambition after eternal Happiness.

When Pyrrhus King of Epirus, told Cineas what great Conquests he intended to make, and how many Nations he would subdue, Cineas asked him what he would do, when all this was done? He answered, we will then live at Ease and enjoy ourselves and our Friends. Cineas replied to this Purpose, Why then, Sir, do we not now live at Ease and enjoy ourselves? If Ease and Quiet, be the utmost of our Views and Designs why do we run away from it at present? What Occasion for all these Battles and Expeditions all over the World?

The Moral of this Story is very extensive, and carries a Lesson of Instruction to much the greatest part of the Christian World.

When a Christian is eager after the Distinctions of this Life, proposing some mighty Heights to which he will raise himself, either in Riches, Learning, or Power, if one was to ask him what he will do when he has obtained them, I suppose his Answer would be, that he would then retire, and devote himself to Holiness and Piety. May we not here justly say with Cineas, if Piety and Holiness is the chief End of Man, if these are your last Proposals, the upshot of all your Labours, why do you not enter upon Happiness at present? Why all this wandering out of your Way? Why must you go so far about? For to devote yourself to the World, though it is your last Proposal to retire from it to Holiness and Piety, is like Pyrrhus's seeking of Battles, when he proposed to live in Ease and Pleasure with his Friends. I believe there are very few Christians, who have it not in their Heads at least, to be some Time or other Holy and Virtuous, and readily own, that he is the happy Man that dies truly Humble, Holy, and Heavenly-minded. Now this Opinion which all People are possessed of, makes the Projects and Designs of Life, more Mad and Frantic than the Battles of Pyrrhus. For one may not only say to such People, why do you neglect the present Happiness of these Virtues, but one must further add, why are you engaged in ways of Life, that are quite contrary to them? You want to be Rich and Great, is it that Riches and Greatness may make you more Meek and Humble, and Heavenly-minded? Do you aspire after the distinctions of Honour, that you may more truly feel the Misery and Meanness of your Nature, and be made more lowly in your own Eyes? Do you plunge yourself into worldly Cares, let your Passions fix upon Variety of Objects, that you may love God with all your Heart, and raise your Affections to Things above? You acknowledge Humility to be essential to Salvation, yet make it the chief Care of your Life to run away from it, to raise yourself in the Show and Figure of the World? Is not this fighting of Pyrrhus's Battles? Nay, is it not a much more egregious Folly? For your own, that you cannot be saved without true Humility, a real Lowliness of Temper, and yet are doing all that you can to keep it out of your Heart. What is there in the Conduct of the maddest Hero, that can equal this Folly?

Suppose, that strict Sobriety was the sole End of Man, the necessary Condition of Happiness, what would you think of those People, who knowing and believing this to be true, should yet spend their Time in getting Quantities of all Sorts of the strongest Liquors? What would you think if you saw them constantly enlarging their Cellars, filling every Room with Drams, and contending who should have the largest Quantities of the strongest Liquors? Now this is the Folly and Madness of the Lives of Christians, they are as Wise and Reasonable, as they are who are always providing strong Liquors in order to be strictly Sober. For all the Enjoyments of human Life, which Christians so aspire after, whether of Riches, Greatness, Honours, and Pleasures, are as much the Dangers and Temptations of a Christian, as strong and pleasant Liquors, are the Dangers and Temptations of a Man that is to drink only Water. Now if you were to ask such a Man, why he is continually increasing his Stock of Liquors, when he is to abstain from them all, and only to drink Water, he can give you as good a Reason, as those Christians, who spare no Pains to acquire Riches, Greatness, and Pleasures, at the same time that their Salvation depends upon their Renouncing them all, upon their Heavenly-mindedness, great Humility, and constant Self-denial.

But it may be, you are not devoted to these Things, you have a greater Soul, than to be taken with Riches, Equipage, or the Pageantry of State. You are deeply Engaged in Learning and Sciences.

You are, it may be, squaring the Circle, or settling the Distances of the Stars, or busy in the Study of exotic Plants.

You, it may be, are comparing the ancient Languages, have made deep Discoveries in the Change of Letters, and perhaps know how to write an Inscription in as obscure Characters, as if you had lived above two Thousand Years ago. Or, perhaps, you are meditating upon the Heathen Theology, collecting the History of their Gods and Godesses; or you are scanning some ancient Greek or Roman Poet, and making an exact Collection of their scattered Remains, Scraps of Sentences, and broken Words.

You are not exposing your Life in the Field like a mad Alexander or Cæsar, but you are again and again fighting over all their Battles in your Study, you are collecting the Names of their Generals, the Number of their Troops, the Manner of their Arms, and can give the World a more exact Account of the Times, Places, and Circumstances of their Battles than has yet been seen.

You will perhaps ask whether this be not a very commendable Inquiry? An excellent Use of our Time and Parts? Whether People may not be very reasonably Exhorted to these Kind of Studies? It may be answered, that all Inquiries (however Learned they are reckoned) which do not improve the Mind in some useful Knowledge, that do not make us Wise in religious Wisdom, are to be reckoned amongst our greatest Vanities and Follies. All Speculations that will not stand this Trial, are to be looked upon as the Wanderings and Impertinences of a disordered Understanding.

It is strange Want of Thought to imagine, that an Inquiry is ever the better, because it is taken up in Greek and Latin. Why is it not as Wise and Reasonable for a Scholar to dwell in the Kitchen and converse with Cooks, as to go into his Study, to meditate upon the Roman Art of Cookery, and learn their Variety of Sauces.

A grave Doctor in Divinity would perhaps think his time very ill Employed, that he was acting below his Character, if he were to be an Amanuensis to some modern Poet. Why then does he think it suitable with the Weight of his Calling, to have been a Drudge to some ancient Poet, counting his Syllables for several Years, only to help the World to read, what some irreligious, wanton, or Epicurean Poet has written.

It is certainly a much more reasonable Employment to be making Clothes, than to spend one's Time in reading or writing Volumes upon the Grecian or Roman Garments.

If you can show me a Learning that makes Man truly sensible of his Duty, that fills the Mind with true Light, that reforms the Heart, that disposes it right towards God, that makes us more reasonable in all our Actions, that inspires us with Fortitude, Humility, Devotion, and Contempt of the World, that gives us right Notions of the Greatness of Religion, the Sanctity of Morality, the Littleness of every Thing but God, the Vanity of our Passions, and the Misery and Corruption of our Nature, I will own myself an Advocate for such Learning. But to think that time is well employed, because it is spent in such Speculations as the Vulgar cannot reach, or because they are fetched from Antiquity, or found in Greek or Latin, is a Folly that may be called as great as any in human Life.

They who think that these Inquiries are consistent with a Heart entirely devoted to God, have not enough considered human Nature; they would do well to consult our Saviour's Rebuke of Martha. She did not seem to have wandered far from her proper Business, she was not busy in the History of Housewifery, or inquiring into the Original of the Distaff, she was only taken up with her present Affairs, and cumbered about much serving, but our Blessed Saviour said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many Things. But one thing is needful.

Now if Scholars and Divines can show, that they only apply to such Studies as are serviceable to the one thing needful, if they are busy in a Philosophy and Learning that has a necessary Connection with the Devotion of the Heart to God, such Learning becomes the Followers of Christ. But if they trifle in Greek and Latin, and only assist other People to follow them in the same Impertinence, such Learning may be reckoned amongst the Corruptions of the Age. For all the Arguments against Pride, Covetousness, and Vanity, are as good Arguments against such Learning, it being the same Irreligion to be devoted to any false Learning, as to be devoted to any other false Good.

A Satisfaction in any vain Ornaments of the Body, whether of Clothes or Paint, is no greater a Mistake, than a Satisfaction in the vain Accomplishments of the Mind.

A Man that is eager and laborious in the Search and Study of that which does him no good, is the same poor, little Soul, as the Miser, that is happy in his Bags, that are laid by in Dust. A ridiculous Application of our Money, Time, and Understanding, is the same Fault, whether it be found amongst the Finery of Fops, the Hoards of Misers, or the Trinkets of Virtuosos. It is the same false Turn of Mind, the same Mistake of the Use of Things, the same Ignorance of the State of Man, and the same Offence against Religion.

When we see a Man brooding over Bags of Wealth, and labouring to die Rich, we do not only accuse him of a poor Littleness of Mind, but we charge him with great Guilt, we do not allow such a one to be in a State of Religion. Let us therefore suppose that this covetous Man was on a sudden changed into another Temper, that he was grown Polite and Curious, that he was fond and eager after the most useless Things, if they were but ancient or scarce; let us suppose that he is now as greedy of original Paintings, as he was before of Money, that he will give more for a Dog's-Head, or a Snuff of a Candle by a good Hand, than ever he gave in Charity all his Life, is he a wiser Man, or a better Christian than he was before? Has he more overcome the World, or is he more devoted to God, than when his Soul was locked up with his Money? Alas! his Heart is in the same false Satisfaction, he is in the same State of Ignorance, is as far from the true Good, as much separated from Good, as he whose Soul is cleaving to the Dust; he lives in the same Vanity, and must die in the Misery, as he that lives and dies in Foppery or Covetousness.

Here therefore I place my first Argument for Christian Perfection, I exhort thee to labour after it, because there is no choice of anything else for thee to labour after, there is nothing else that the Reason of Man can exhort thee to. The whole World has nothing to offer thee in its stead, choose what other way thou wilt, thou hast chosen nothing but Vanity and Misery; for all the different Ways of the World, are only different Ways of deluding thyself, this only excels that, as one Vanity can excel another. If thou wilt make thyself more Happy than those who pursue their own Destruction, if thou wilt show thyself wiser than Fops, more reasonable than sordid Misers, thou must pursue that Happiness, and study that Wisdom which leads to God, for every other Pursuit, every other Way of Life, however polite or plausible in the Opinions of the World, has a Folly and Stupidity in it, that is equal to the Folly and Stupidity of Fops and Misers.

For a while shut thine Eyes, and think of the silliest Creature in human Life, imagine to thyself something, that thou thinkest the most poor, and vain in the Way of the World. Now thou art thyself that poor and vain Creature, unless thou art devoted to God, and labouring after Christian Perfection: Unless this be thy Difference from the World, thou canst not think of any Creature more silly than thyself. For it is not any Post, or Condition, or Figure in Life, that makes one Man wiser or better than another, if thou art a proud Scholar, a worldly Priest, an inde-vout Philosopher, a crafty Politician, an ambitious Statesman, thy Imagination cannot invent a Way of Life, that has more of Vanity or Folly than thine own.

Every one has Wisdom enough to see, what Variety of Fools and Madmen there are in the World.

Now perhaps we cannot do better, than to find out the true Reason of the Folly and Madness of any Sort of Life. Ask thyself therefore wherein consists the Folly of any Sort of Life, which is most condemned in thy Judgment.

Is a drunken Fox-hunter leading a foolish Life? wherein consists the Folly of it? Is it because he is not getting Money upon the Exchange? Or because he is not wrangling at the Bar? Or not waiting at Court? No, the Folly of it consists in this, that he is not living like a reasonable Christian, that he is not acting like a Being that is born again of God, that has a Salvation to work out with fear and trembling, that he is throwing away his Time amongst Dogs, and Noise, and Intemperance, which he should devote to Watching and Prayer, and the Improvement of his Soul in all holy Tempers. Now if this is the Folly (as it most certainly is) of an intemperate Fox-hunter, it shows us an equal Folly in every other Way of Life, where the same great Ends of Living are neglected. Though we are shining at the Bar, making a Figure at Court, great at the Exchange, or famous in the Schools of Philosophy, we are yet the same despicable Creatures, as the intemperate Fox-hunter, if these States of Life keep us as far from the improvements of Holiness, and heavenly Affections. There is nothing greater in any Way of Life than Fox-hunting, it is all the same Folly, unless Religion be the Beginning and Ending, the Rule and Measure of it all. For it is as noble a Wisdom, and shows as great a Soul, to die less Holy and Heavenly for the sake of Hunting and Noise, as for the sake of anything that the World can give us.

If we will judge and condemn things, by our Tempers and Fancies, we may think some Ways of Life mighty wise, and others mighty foolish, we may think it Glorious to be pursuing Methods of Fame and Wealth, and foolish to be killing Foxes, but if we will let Reason and Religion show us the Folly and Wisdom of Things, we shall easily see, that all Ways of Life are equally Little and Foolish, but those that perfect and exalt our Souls in Holiness.

No one therefore can complain of Want of Understanding in the Conduct of his Life, for a small Share of Sense is sufficient to condemn some Degrees of Vanity, which we see in the World ; everyone is able and ready to do it. And if we are but able to condemn the vainest Sort of Life upon true Reasons, the same Reasons will serve to show, that all Sorts of Life are equally vain, but the one Life of Religion. Thou hast therefore, as I observed before, no choice of anything to labour after instead of Christian Perfection : If thou canst be content to be the poorest, vainest, miserablest Thing upon Earth, thou mayst neglect Christian Perfection. But if thou seest anything in human Life that thou abhorrest and despisest, if there be any Person that lives so, as thou shouldst fear to live, thou must turn thy Heart to God, thou must labour after Christian Perfection, for there is nothing in Nature but this, that can set thee above the vainest, poorest, and most miserable of human Creatures. Thou art everything that thou canst abhor and despise, everything that thou canst fear, thou art full of every Folly that thy Mind can imagine, unless thou art all devoted to God.

Secondly, Another Argument for Christian Perfection shall be taken from the necessity of it.

I have all along shown, that Christian Perfection consists in the right Performance of our necessary Duties, that it implies such holy Tempers, as constitute that common Piety, which is necessary to Salvation, and consequently it is such a Piety as is equally necessary to be attained by all People. But besides this, we are to consider, that God only knows what Abatements of Holiness he will accept ; and therefore we can have no Security of our Salvation, but by doing our utmost to deserve it.

There are different Degrees of Holiness, which it may please God to Reward, but we cannot State these different Degrees ourselves ; but must all labour to be as eminent as we can, and then our different Improvements must be left to God. We have nothing to trust to, but the Sincerity of our Endeavours, and our Endeavours may well be thought to want Sincerity, unless they are Endeavours after the utmost Perfection. As soon as we stop at any Degrees of Goodness, we put an End to our Goodness, which is only valuable by having all the Degrees, that we can add to it. Our highest Improvement, is a State of great Imperfection, but will be accepted by God, because it is our highest Improvement. But any other State of Life, where we are not doing all that we can, to purify and perfect our Souls, is a State that can give us no Comfort or Satisfaction, because so far as we are wanting in any Ways of Piety that are in our Power, so far as we are defective in any holy Tempers, of which we are capable, so far we make our very Salvation uncertain. For no one can have any Assurance that he pleases God, or puts himself within the Terms of Christian Salvation, but he who serves God with his whole Heart, and with the utmost of his Strength. For though the Christian Religion be a Covenant of Mercy, for the Pardon and Salvation of frail and imperfect Creatures, yet we cannot say that we are within the Conditions of that Mercy, till we do all that we can in our frail and imperfect State. So that though we are not called to such a Perfection, as implies a sinless State, though our Imperfections will not prevent the Divine Mercy, yet it cannot be proved, that God has any Terms of Favour for those, who do not labour to be as Perfect as they can be.

upon Christian Perfection. 241

Different Attainments in Piety will carry different Persons to Heaven, yet none of us can have any Satisfaction, that we are going thither, but by arriving at all that Change of Nature, which is in our Power. It is as necessary therefore to labour after Perfection, as to labour after our Salvation, because we can have no Satisfaction that a failure in one, will not deprive us of the other. When therefore you are exhorted to Christian Perfection, you must remember, that you are only exhorted to secure your Salvation, you must remember also, that you have no other Rule to judge of your Perfection, but by the Sincerity and Fulness of your Endeavours to arrive at it.

We may judge of the Measure and Extent of Christian Holiness, from the one Instance of Charity. This Virtue is thus described, Charity seeketh not her own, beareth all Things, believeth all Things, hopeth all Things, endureth all Things. Now this Charity though it be in Perfection, is yet by the Apostle made so absolutely Necessary to Salvation, that a failure in it, is not to be supplied by any other, the most shining Virtues. Though I have all faith, so that I could remove Mountains, though I bestow all my Goods to feed the Poor, though I give my Body to be burned, and have not Charity, it profiteth me nothing. The Apostle expressly teaches us, that this Perfection in Christian Charity, is so necessary to Salvation, that even Martyrdom itself is not sufficient to Atone for the want of it. Need we now any other Argument to convince us, that to labour after our Perfection, is only to labour after our Salvation? For what is here said of Charity, must in all Reason be understood of every other Virtue, it must be practised in the same Fulness and Sincerity of Heart as this Charity. It may also justly be affirmed, that this Charity is so holy a Temper, and requires so many other Virtues as the Foundation of it, that it can only be exercised by a Heart, that is far advanced in Holiness, that is entirely devoted to God. Our whole Nature must be changed, we must have put off the old Man, we must be born again of God, we must have overcome the World, we must live by Faith, be full of the Spirit of Christ, in order to Exercise this Charity.

When therefore you would know, whether it be necessary to labour after Christian Perfection, and live wholly unto God, read over St. Paul's Description of Charity: If you can think of any Negligence of Life, any Defects of Humility, any Abatements of Devotion, any Fondness of the World, any Desires of Riches and Greatness, that is consistent with the Tempers there described, then you may be content with them; but if these Tempers of an exalted Charity cannot subsist, but in a Soul that is devoted to God, and resigned to the World, that is humble and mortified, that is full of the Spirit of Christ, and the Cares of Eternity, then you have a plain Reason of the Necessity of Labouring after all the Perfection, that you are capable of; for the Apostle expressly saith, that without these Tempers, the very Tongues of Angels, are but as sounding Brass or a tinkling Cymbal. ✓ Do not therefore imagine, that it only belongs to People of a particular Piety and Turn of Mind, to labour after their Perfection, and that you may go to Heaven with much less Care; there is only one strait Gate and one narrow Way that leadeth unto Life, and there is no Admission, but for those who strive to enter into it. If you are not striving, you neglect the express condition which our Lord requires, and it is flat Nonsense to think that you strive, if you do not use all your Strength. The Apostle represents a Christian's striving for eternal Life in this Manner, Know ye not that they which run in a Race, run all, but one receiveth the Prize? So run that ye may obtain. So that, according to the Apostle, he only is in the Road to Salvation, who is so contending for it, as he that is running in a Race. Further, you can have no Satisfaction that you are sincere in any one Virtue, unless you are endeavouring to be Perfect in all the Instances of it. If you allow yourself in any Defects of Charity, you have no Reason to think yourself sincere in any Acts of Charity. If you indulge yourself in any Instances of Pride, you render all your Acts of Humility justly suspected, because there can be no true Reason for Charity, but what is as good a Reason for all Instances of Charity; nor any religious Motive for Humility, but what is as strong a Motive for all Degrees of Humility. So that he who allows himself in any known Defects of Charity, Humility, or any other Virtue, cannot be supposed to practise any Instances of that Virtue upon true Reasons of Religion. For if it was a right Fear of God, a true Desire of being like Christ, a hearty Love of my Fellow-Creatures that made me give Alms, the same Dispositions would make me love and forgive all my Enemies, and deny myself all kinds of Revenge, and Spite, and Evil-speaking.

So that if I allow myself in known Instances of Uncharitableness, I have as much Reason to suppose myself void of true Charity, as if I allowed myself in a Refusal of such Alms as I am able to give. Because every Instance of Uncharitableness, is the same Sin against all the Reasons of Charity, as the allowed Refusal of Alms. For the Refusal of Alms is only a great Sin, because it shows that we have not a right Fear of God, that we have not a hearty Desire of being like Christ, that we want a true Love of our Fellow Creature. Now as every allowed Instance of Uncharitableness shows a Want of all these Tempers, so it shows, that every such Instance is the same Sin, and sets us as far from God, as the Refusal of Alms.

To forbear from Spite and Evil-speaking, is a proper Instance of Christian Charity, but yet it is such a Charity as will not profit those, who are not charitable in Alms, because by refusing Alms, they sin against as many Reasons of Charity, as he that lives in Spite and Evil-speaking. And on the other Hand, he that allows himself in Spite and Evil-speaking, sins against all the same Reasons of Charity, as he that lives in the Refusal of Alms. This is a Doctrine that cannot be too much reflected upon by all those who would practise a Piety, that is pleasing to God.

Too many Christians look at some Instances of Virtue which they practise, as a sufficient Atonement for their known Defects in some other Parts of the same Virtue. Not considering, that this is as absurd, as to think to make some apparent Acts of Justice, compound for other allowed Instances of Fraud.

A Lady is perhaps satisfied with her Humility, because she can look at some apparent Instances of it ; she sometimes visits Hospitals and Alms-houses, and is very familiar and condescending to the Poor : Now these are very good Things, but then it may be, that these very Things are looked upon as sufficient Proofs of Humility ; she Patches and Paints, and delights in all the Show and Ornaments of personal Pride, and is very easy with herself, because she visits the Hospitals. Now she should consider, that she places her Humility in that which is but a Part, and also the smallest and most deceitful Part of it. For the hardest, the greatest, and most essential Part of Humility, is to have low Opinions of ourselves, to love our own Meanness, and to renounce all such Things, as gratify the Pride and Vanity of our Nature. Humility also is much better discovered by our Behaviour towards our Equals and Superiors, than towards those who are so much below us. It does no hurt to a proud Heart, to stoop to some low Offices to the meanest People. Nay, there is something in it that may gratify Pride, for perhaps our own Greatness is never seen to more Advantage, than when we stoop to those who are so far below us. The lower the People are to whom we stoop, the better they show the Height of our own State. So that there is nothing difficult in these Condescensions, they are no Contradictions to Pride.

The truest Trial of Humility, is our Behaviour towards our Equals, and those that are our Superiors or Inferiors but in a small Degree. It is no Sign of Humility, for a private Gentleman to pay a profound Reverence, and show great Submission to a King, nor is it any sign of Humility for the same Person to condescend to great Familiarity with a poor Almsman. For he may act upon the same Principle in both Cases.

It does not hurt him to show great Submission to a King, because he has no Thoughts of being equal to a King, and for the same Reason it does not hurt him to condescend to poor People, because he never imagines, that they will think themselves equal to him. So that it is the great Inequality of Condition, that makes it as easy for People to condescend to those who are a great Way below them, as to be submissive, and yielding to those who are vastly above them.

From this it appears, that our most splendid Acts of Virtue, which we think to be sufficient to atone for our other known Defects, may themselves be so Vain and Defective as to have no worth in them. This also shows us the absolute Necessity of labouring after all Instances of Perfection in every Virtue, because if we pick and choose what Parts of any Virtue we will perform, we sin against all the same Reasons, as if we neglected all Parts of it. If we choose to give instead of forgiving, we choose something else instead of Charity.

Thirdly, Another Motive to induce you to aspire after Christian Perfection, may be taken from the double Advantage of it in this Life, and that which is to come.

The Apostle thus exhorts the Corinthians, wherefore my beloved Brethren, be ye *steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the Work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know, that our Labour will not be in vain in the Lord. This is an Exhortation founded upon solid Reason; for what can be so Wise and Reasonable, as to be always abounding in that Work, which will never be in vain? Whilst we are pleased with ourselves, or pleased with the World, we are pleased with Vanity, and our most prosperous Labours of this Kind are, as the Preacher saith, but Vanity of Vanities, all is Vanity. But whilst we are labouring after Christian Perfection, we are labouring for Eternity, and building to ourselves higher Stations in the Joys of Heaven. As one Star differeth from another Star in Glory, so also is the Resurrection of the Dead: We shall surely rise to different Degrees of Glory, of Joy and Happiness in God, according to our different Advancements in Purity, Holiness, and good Works.

No Degrees of Mortification and Self-denial, no private Prayers, no secret Mournings, no Instances of Charity, no Labours of Love will ever be forgotten, but all treasured up to our everlasting Comfort and Refreshment. For though the Rewards of the other Life, are free Gifts of God, yet since he has assured us, that every Man shall be rewarded according to his Works, it is certain that our Rewards will be as different as our Works have been.

Now stand still here a while, and ask yourself, whether you really believe this to be true, that the more Perfect we make ourselves here, the more Happy we shall be hereafter. If you do not believe this to be strictly true, you know nothing of God or Religion. And if you do believe it to be true, is it possible to be awake, and not aspiring after Christian Perfection? What can you think of, what can the World show you, that can make you any amends for the Loss of any Degree of Virtue? Can any way of Life make it reasonable for you to die less perfect, than you might have done?

If you would now devote yourself to Perfection, perhaps you must part with some Friends, you must displease some Relations, you must lay aside some Designs, you must refrain from some Pleasures, you must alter your Life, nay, perhaps you must do more than this, you must expose yourself to the Hatred of your Friends, to the Jest and Ridicule of Wits, and to the Scorn and Derision of worldly Men; but had you not better do and suffer all this, than to die less perfect, less prepared for Mansions of eternal Glory? But, indeed, the suffering all this, is suffering nothing. For why should it signify anything to you, what Fools and Madmen think of you? And surely it can be no Wrong or rash Judgment, to think those both Fools and Mad, who condemn what God approves, and like that which God condemns. But if you think this too much to be done, to obtain Eternal Glory, think, on the other hand, what can be gained instead of it.

Fancy yourself living in all the Ease and Pleasure that the World can give you, esteemed by your Friends, undisturbed by your Enemies, and gratifying all your natural Tempers. If you could stand still in such a State, you may say, that you had got something; but alas! every Day that is added to such a Life, is the same thing as a Day taken from it, and shows you that so much Happiness is gone from you; for be as Happy as you will, you must see it all sinking away from you, you must feel yourself decline, you must see that your Time shortens apace, you must hear of sudden Deaths, you must fear Sickness, you must both dread and desire old Age, you must fall into the Hands of Death, you must either die in the painful, bitter Sorrows of a deep Repentance, or in sad, gloomy Despair, wishing for Mountains to fall upon you, and Seas to cover you. And is this a Happiness to be chosen? Is this all that you can gain, by neglecting God, by following your own Desires, and not labouring after Christian Perfection? Is it worth your while to separate yourself from God, to lose your Share in the Realms of Light, to be thus Happy, or I may better say, to be thus Miserable even in this Life? You may be so blind and foolish as not to think of these Things, but it is impossible to think of them, without labouring after Christian Perfection. It may be, you are too young, too happy, or too busy to be affected with these Reflections, but let me tell you, that all will be over before you are aware, your Day will be spent, and leave you to such a Night, as that which surprised the foolish Virgins. And at Midnight there was a great Cry made, behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.*

The last Hour will soon be with you, when you will have nothing to look for, but your Reward in another Life, when you will stand with nothing but Eternity before you, and must begin to be something, that will be your State for ever. I can no more reach Heaven with my Hands, than I can describe the Sentiments, that you will then have, you will then feel Motions of Heart that you never felt before, all your Thoughts and Reflections will pierce your Soul in a Manner, that you never before experienced, and you will feel the Immortality of your Nature, by the Depth and piercing Vigour of your Thoughts. You will then know what it is to die, you will then know, that you never knew it before, that you never thought worthily of it, but that dying Thoughts are as new and amazing, as that State which follows them.

Let me therefore exhort you, to come prepared to this Time of Trial, to look out for Comfort, whilst the Day is before you, to treasure up such a Fund of good and pious Works, as may make you able to bear that State, which cannot be borne without them. Could I any way make you apprehend, how dying Men feel the Want of a pious Life, how they lament Time lost, Health and Strength squandered away in Folly, how they look at Eternity, and what they think of the Rewards of another Life, you would soon find yourself one of those, who desire to live in the highest State of Piety and Perfection, that by this Means you may grow old in Peace, and die in full Hopes of eternal Glory.

Consider again, that besides the Rewards of the other Life, the labouring after Christian Perfection, or devoting yourself wholly to God, has a great Reward even in this Life, as it makes Religion doubly pleasant to you. Whilst you are divided betwixt God and the World, you have neither the Pleasures of Religion, nor the Pleasures of the World, but are always in the Uneasiness of a divided State of Heart. You have only so much Religion as serves to disquiet you, to check your Enjoyments, to show you a Hand-writing upon the Wall, to interrupt your Pleasures, to reproach you with your Follies, and to appear as a Death's-head at all your Feasts, but not Religion enough, to give you a Taste and Feeling of its proper Pleasures and Satisfaction. You dare not wholly neglect Religion, but then you take no more than is just sufficient to keep you from being a Terror to yourself, and you are as loth to be very good, as you are fearful to be very bad. So that you are just as Happy, as the Slave that dares not run away from his Master, and yet always serves him against his Will. So that instead of having a Religion that is your Comfort in all Troubles, your Religion is itself a Trouble, under which you want to be Comforted; and those Days and Times hang heaviest upon your Hands, which leave you only to the Offices and Duties of Religion. Sunday would be very dull and tiresome, but that it is but one Day in seven, and is made a Day of dressing and visiting, as well as of Divine Service: You don't care to keep away from the Public Worship, but are always glad when it is over. This is the State of a Half-piety; thus they live who add Religion to a worldly Life; all their Religion is mere Yoke and Burden, and is only made tolerable by having but little of their Time.

Urbanus, goes to Church, but he hardly knows whether he goes out of a Sense of Duty, or to meet his Friends. He wonders at those People who are Profane, and what Pleasure they can find in Irreligion; but then he is in as great wonder at those who would make every Day, a Day of Divine Worship, he feels no more of the Pleasures of Piety, than of the Pleasures of Profaneness. As Religion has everything from him, but his Heart, so he has everything from Religion, but its Comforts. Urbanus likes Religion, because it seems an easy Way of pleasing God, a decent thing, that takes up but little of our Time, and is a proper Mixture in Life. But if he were reduced to take Comfort in it, he would be as much at a loss, as those who have lived without God in the World. When Urbanus thinks of Joy, and Pleasure, and Happiness, he does not think at all of Religion. He has gone through a hundred Misfortunes, fallen into a Variety of Hardships, but never thought of making Religion his Comfort in any of them, he makes himself Quiet and Happy in another Manner. He is content with his Christianity, not because he is pious, but because he is not profane. He continues in the same Course of Religion, not because of any real Good he ever found in it, but because it does him no hurt.

To such poor Purposes as these do Numbers of People profess Christianity. Let me therefore exhort you *o a solid Piety, to devote yourself wholly unto God, that entering deep into Religion, you may enter deep into its Comforts, that serving God with all your Heart, you may have the Peace and Pleasure of a Heart that is at Unity with itself. When your Conscience once bears you witness, that you are steadfast, immovable, and always abounding in the Work of the Lord, you will find that your Reward is already begun, and that you could not be less Devout, less Holy, less Charitable, or less Humble, without lessening the most substantial Pleasure, that ever you felt in your Life. So that to be content with any lower Attainments in Piety, is to rob ourselves of a present Happiness, which nothing else can give us.

You would perhaps devote yourself to Perfection, but for this or that little Difficulty, that lies in your Way, you are not in so convenient a State for the full Practice of Piety as you could wish. But consider, that this is Nonsense, because Perfection consists in conquering Difficulties. You could not be Perfect, as the present State of Trial requires, had you not those Difficulties and Inconveniences to struggle with. These things therefore which you would have removed, are laid in your Way, that you may make them so many Steps to Perfection and Glory.

As you could not Exercise your Charity, unless you met with Objects, so neither could you show, that you had overcome the World, unless you had many worldly Engagements to overcome. If all your Friends and Acquaintance, were Devout, Humble, Heavenly-minded, and wholly intent upon the one End of Life, it would be less Perfection in you to be like them. But if you are Humble amongst those that delight in Pride, Heavenly- minded, amongst the Worldly, Sober amongst the Intemperate, Devout amongst the Irreligious, and labouring after Perfection amongst those, that despise and ridicule your Labours, then are you truly devoted unto God. Consider therefore, that you can have no Difficulty, but such as the World lays in your Way, and that Perfection is never to be had, but by parting with the World. It consists in nothing else. To stay therefore to be Perfect, till it suits with your Condition in the World, is like staying to be Charitable, till there were no Objects of Charity. It is as if a man should intend to be Courageous some time or other, when there is nothing left to try his Courage.

Again, You perhaps turn your Eyes upon the World, you see all Orders of People full of other Cares and Pleasures, you see the Generality of Clergy and Laity, Learned and Unlearned, your Friends and Acquaintance mostly living according to the Spirit that reigneth in the World, you are perhaps content with such a Piety, as you think contents great Scholars, and famous Men, and it may be, you cannot think that God will reject such Numbers of Christians. Now all this is amusing yourself with Nothing, it is only losing yourself in vain Imaginations, it is making that a Rule, which is no Rule, and cheating yourself into a false Satisfaction. As you are not censoriously to damn other People, so neither are you to think your own Salvation secure, because you are like the generality of the World.

The foolish Virgins that had provided no Oil for their Lamps, and so were shut out of the Marriage-Feast, were only thus far foolish, that they trusted to the Assistance of those that were Wise. But you are more foolish than they, for you trust to be saved by the Folly of others, you imagine yourself safe in the Negligence, Vanity, and Irregularity of the World. You take confidence in the broad Way, because it is broad, you are content with yourself, because you seem to be along with the many, though God himself has told you, that narrow is the Way, that leadeth unto Life, and few there be that find it.

Lastly, one Word more and I have done, think with yourself, what a Happiness it is, that you have it in your Power to secure a Share in the Glories of Heaven, and make yourself one of those blessed Beings that are to live with God for ever. Reflect upon the Glories of bright Angels, that shine about the Throne of Heaven, think upon that Fulness of Joy, which is the State of Christ at the Right Hand of God, and remember, that it is this same State of Glory and Joy that lies open for you. You are less, it may be, in worldly Distinctions than many others, but as to your Relation to God, you have no Superior upon Earth. Let your Condition be what it will, let your Life be ever so mean, you may make the End of it, the Beginning of eternal Glory. Be often therefore in these Reflections, that they may fill you with a wise Ambition of all that Glory, which God in Christ hath called you to. For it is impossible to understand and feel anything of this, without feeling your Heart affected with strong Desires after it. The Hopes and Expectations of so much Greatness and Glory, must needs awake you into earnest Desires and Longings after it. There are many Things in human Life, which it would be in vain for you to aspire after, but the Happiness of the next, which is the Sum of all Happiness, is secure and safe to you against all Accidents. Here no Chances or Misfortunes can prevent your Success, neither the Treachery of Friends, nor the Malice of Enemies can disappoint you, it is only your own false Heart that can Rob you of this Happiness. Be but your own true Friend, and then you have nothing to fear from your Enemies. Do you but sincerely labour in the Lord, and then neither Height nor Depth, neither Life nor Death, neither Men nor Devils, can make your Labour in vain.

A SERIOUS CALL

TO A

Devout and Holy Life.

THE SERIOUS CALL to a Devout and Holy Life, is WILLIAM LAW'S fifth work in the order of publication, printed in the year 1729, when he was about forty-three years of age. It was written by him during the early portion of his ten years' residence with the Gibbon family at Putney, with whom he resided in the capacity of Spiritual Director, and by whom, as most readers know, he was greatly esteemed.

The 'Serious Call' is the most widely and generally known of all WILLIAM LAW'S works; and is undoubtedly his masterpiece: if not, as some think in a certain sense, his masterpiece. It has passed through some hundreds of editions by various Publishers, from the year of its publication to the present time; and has, more than any other religious work, attracted—as it will ever continue to do—the notice and admiration, and its precepts the emulation, of successive generations of the wisest and best among men. Of such, various authoritative opinions have been quoted, in acknowledgment and support of the great excellence of this work: which excellence, the most ordinary reader may at once by its perusal, discern for himself.

It is supposed that the Character of 'Paternus' described in this work, was that of WILLIAM LAW'S father; and that 'Eusebia' represented his widowed-mother; but this is mere conjecture: both portraits, as that of 'Ouranius'—which is likewise supposed to be William Law himself—being, more probably, ideals of his own. These and other 'Characters,' are cleverly and humorously described—in particular that of 'Mundanus,' who 'has made a great figure in business,' which he has carried to its greatest improvement and perfection. 'The only one thing which has not fallen under his improvement nor received any benefit from his judicious mind, is his devotion.

iv Prefatory Advertisement.

' This is just in the same poor state it was when he was only six years of age, and the old man prays now in that little form of words which his mother used to hear him repeat night and morning. This Mundanus, who hardly ever saw the poorest utensil, or ever took the meanest trifle into his hand, without considering how it might be made or used to better advantage, has gone all his life long praying in the same manner as when he was a child without ever considering how much better or oftener he might pray. . . . If Mundanus sees a book of devotion he passes it by as he does a spelling-book, because he remembers that he learned to pray so many years ago under his mother when he learned to spell. . . . '

It will probably not escape the attention of the thoughtful reader that in Chapter XX., upon 'Intercessory Prayer,' WILLIAM LAW sets our duty towards our Neighbour—particularly towards such of whose reputation and manner of life we do not quite approve—in a new, and deeply instructive light—in a most impressive and logical passage, which it is remarkable should have been omitted from DR. WHYTE'S recently published Selections from Law's works.

In it WILLIAM LAW reminds us that when is 'let loose any ill-natured passion, either of hatred, or contempt, towards—as you suppose—an ill man, consider what you would think of another, who was doing the same towards a good man, and be assured that you are committing the same sin. You will perhaps say—How is it possible to love a good and a bad man, in the same degree? Just as it is possible to be as just and faithful to a good man as to an evil man. Now are you in any difficulty about performing justice and faithfulness to a bad man? Are you in any doubts whether you need be so just and faithful to him, as you need be to a good man? Now why is it that you are in no doubt about it? It is because you know that justice and faithfulness are founded upon reasons that never vary or change, that have no dependence upon the merits of men, but are founded in the Nature of Things, in the Laws of God, and therefore are to be observed with an equal exactness towards good and bad men. Now do but think thus justly of Charity, or love to your Neighbour, that it is founded upon reasons, that vary not, that have no dependence upon the merits of men, and then you will find it as possible to perform the same exact charity, as the same exact justice, to all men, whether good or bad.'

Chapter I.

Concerning the Nature and Extent of Christian Devotion.

DEVOTION is neither private nor public Prayer, but Prayers whether private or public, are particular parts or instances of Devotion. Devotion signifies a life given, or devoted to God.

He therefore is the devout man, who lives no longer to his own will, or the way and spirit of the world, but to the sole will of God, who considers God in everything, who serves God in everything, who makes all the parts of his common life, parts of piety, by doing everything in the name of God, and under such rules as are conformable to his Glory.

We readily acknowledge, that God alone is to be the rule and measure of our Prayers; that in them we are to look wholly unto him, and act wholly for him; that we are only to pray in such a manner, for such things, and such ends, as are suitable to his Glory.

Now let anyone but find out the reason, why he is to be thus strictly pious in his prayers, and he will find the same as strong a reason, to be as strictly pious in all the other parts of his life. For there is not the least shadow of a reason, why we should make God the rule and measure of our prayers; why we should then look wholly unto him, and pray according to his will; but what equally proves it necessary for us to look wholly unto God, and make him the rule and measure of all the other actions of our life. For any ways of life, any employment of our talents, whether of our parts, our time, or money, that is not strictly according to the will of God, that is not for such ends as are suitable to his glory, are as great absurdities and failings, as prayers that are not according to the will of God. For there is no other reason, why our prayers should be according to the will of God, why they should have nothing in them, but what is wise, and holy, and heavenly, there is no other reason for this, but that our lives may be of the same nature, full of the same wisdom, holiness, and heavenly tempers, that we may live unto God in the same spirit that we pray unto him. Were it not our strict duty to live by reason, to devote all the actions of our lives to God, were it not absolutely necessary to walk before him in wisdom and holiness and all heavenly conversation, doing everything in his name, and for his glory, there would be no excellency or wisdom in the most heavenly prayers. Nay, such prayers would be absurdities, they would be like Prayers for wings, when it was no part of our duty to fly.

As sure, therefore, as there is any wisdom in praying for the spirit of God, so sure is it, that we are to make that Spirit the rule of all our actions; as sure as it is our duty to look wholly unto God in our Prayers, so sure is it, that it is our duty to live wholly unto God in our lives. But we can no more be said to live unto God, unless we live unto him in all the ordinary actions of our life, unless he be the rule and measure of all our ways, than we can be said to pray unto God, unless our Prayers look wholly unto him. So that unreasonable and absurd ways of life, whether in labour or diversion, whether they consume our time, or our money, are alike unreasonable and absurd Prayers, and are as truly an offence unto God.

'Tis for want of knowing, or at least considering this, that we see such a mixture of Ridicule in the lives of many People. You see them strict as to some times and places of Devotion, but when the service of the Church is over, they are but like those who seldom or never come there. In their way of life, their manner of spending their time and money, in their cares and fears, in their pleasures and indulgences, in their labour and diversions, they are like the rest of the world. This makes the loose part of the world generally make a jest of those who are devout, because they see their Devotion goes no further than their Prayers, and that when they are over, they live no more unto God, till the time of Prayer returns again; but live by the same humour and fancy, and in as full an enjoyment of all the follies of life as other People. This is the reason why they are the jest and scorn of careless and worldly People; not because they are really devoted to God, but because they appear to have no other Devotion, but that of occasional Prayers.

Julius is very fearful of missing Prayers; all the Parish supposes Julius to be sick, if he is not at Church. But if you were to ask him why he spends the rest of his time by humour and chance? why he is a companion of the silliest People in their most silly pleasures? why he is ready for every impertinent entertainment and diversion? If you were to ask him why there is no amusement too trifling to please him? why he is busy at all balls and assemblies? why he gives himself up to an idle gossiping conversation? why he lives in foolish friendships and fondness for particular persons, that neither want nor deserve any particular kindness? why he allows himself in foolish hatreds and resentments against particular persons, without considering that he is to love everybody as himself? If you ask him why he never puts his conversation, his time, and fortune, under the rules of Religion, Julius has no more to say for himself, than the most disorderly Person. For the whole tenor of Scripture lies as directly against such a life, as against debauchery and intemperance: He that lives in such a course of idleness and folly, lives no more according to the Religion of Jesus Christ, than he that lives in gluttony and intemperance.

If a man were to tell Julius that there was no occasion for so much constancy at Prayers, and that he might, without any harm to himself, neglect the service of the Church, as the generality of People do, Julius would think such a one to be no Christian, and that he ought to avoid his company. But if a person only tells him, that he may live as the generality of the world does, that he may enjoy himself as others do, that he may spend his time and money as People of fashion do, that he may conform to the follies and frailties of the generality, and gratify his tempers and passions as most People do, Julius never suspects that man to want a Christian spirit, or that he is doing the devil's work.

And if Julius were to read all the New Testament from the beginning to the end, he would find his course of life condemned in every page of it.

And indeed there cannot anything be imagined more absurd in itself, than wise and sublime, and heavenly Prayers, added to a life of vanity and folly, where neither labour nor diversions, neither time nor money, are under the direction of the wisdom and heavenly tempers of our Prayers. If we were to see a man pretending to act wholly with regard to God in everything that he did, that would neither spend time or money, or take any labour or diversion, but so far as he could act according to strict principles of reason and piety, and yet at the same time neglect all Prayer, whether public or private, should we not be amazed at such a man, and wonder how he could have so much folly along with so much religion?

Yet this is as reasonable, as for any person to pretend to strictness in Devotion, to be careful of observing times and places of Prayer, and yet letting the rest of his life, his time, and labour, his talents and money, be disposed of without any regard to strict rules of Piety and Devotion. For it is as great an absurdity to suppose holy Prayers, and divine Petitions without an holiness of life suitable to them, as to suppose an holy and divine life without Prayers.

Let anyone therefore think, how easily he could confute a man that pretended to great strictness of Life without Prayer, and the same Arguments will as plainly confute another, that pretends to strictness of Prayer, without carrying the same strictness into every other part of life. For to be weak and foolish in spending our time and fortune, is no greater a mistake, than to be weak and foolish in relation to our Prayers. And to allow ourselves in any ways of life that neither are, nor can be offered to God, is the same irreligion, as to neglect our Prayers, or use them in such a manner, as makes them an offering unworthy of God.

The short of the matter is this, either Reason and Religion prescribe rules and ends to all the ordinary actions of our life, or they do not : If they do, then it is as necessary to govern all our actions by those rules, as it is necessary to worship God. For if Religion teaches us anything concerning eating and drinking, or spending our time and money ; if it teaches us how we are to use and contemn the world ; if it tells us what tempers we are to have in common life, how we are to be disposed towards all people, how we are to behave towards the sick, the poor, the old and destitute ; if it tells us whom we are to treat with a particular love, whom we are to regard with a particular esteem ; if it tells us how we are to treat our enemies, and how we are to mortify and deny ourselves, he must be very weak, that can think these parts of Religion are not to be observed with as much exactness, as any doctrines that relate to Prayers.

It is very observable, that there is not one command in all the Gospel for Public Worship ; and perhaps it is a duty that is least insisted upon in Scripture of any other. The frequent attendance at it is never so much as mentioned in all the New Testament. Whereas that Religion or Devotion which is to govern the ordinary actions of our life, is to be found in almost every verse of Scripture. Our blessed Saviour and his Apostles are wholly taken up in Doctrines that relate to common life. They call us to renounce the world, and differ in every temper and way of life, from the spirit and way of the world : to renounce all its goods, to fear none of its evils, to reject its joys, and have no value for its happiness : to be as new born babes, that are born into a new state of things; to live as Pilgrims in spiritual watching, in holy fear, and heavenly aspiring after another life: to take up our daily cross, to deny ourselves, to profess the blessedness of mourning, to seek the blessedness of poverty of spirit: to forsake the pride and vanity of Riches, to take no thought for the morrow, to live in the profoundest State of Humility, to rejoice in worldly sufferings: to reject the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life; to bear injuries, to forgive and bless our enemies, and to love mankind as God loveth them: to give up our whole hearts and affections to God, and strive to enter through the strait gate into a life of eternal Glory.

This is the common Devotion which our Blessed Saviour taught, in order to make it the common life of all Christians. Is it not therefore exceeding strange, that People should place so much piety in the attendance upon public worship, concerning which there is not one precept of our Lord's to be found, and yet neglect these common duties of our ordinary life, which are commanded in every Page of the Gospel? I call these duties the devotion of our common life, because if they are to be practised, they must be made parts of our common life, they can have no place anywhere else.

If contempt of the world and heavenly affection, is a necessary temper of Christians, it is necessary that this temper appear in the whole course of their lives, in their manner of using the world, because it can have no place anywhere else.

If self-denial be a condition of salvation, all that would be saved, must make it a part of their ordinary life. If humility be a Christian duty, then the common life of a Christian, is to be a constant course of humility in all its kinds. If poverty of spirit be necessary, it must be the spirit and temper of every day of our lives. If we are to relieve the naked, the sick, and the prisoner, it must be the common charity of our lives, as far as we can render ourselves able to perform it. If we are to love our enemies, we must make our common life a visible exercise and demonstration of that love. If content and thankfulness, if the patient bearing of evil be duties to God, they are the Duties of every Day, and in every circumstance of our life. If we are to be wise and holy as the new-born sons of God, we can no otherwise be so, but by renouncing everything that is foolish and vain in every part of our common life. If we are to be in Christ new creatures, we must show that we are so, by having new ways of living in the world. If we are to follow Christ, it must be in our common way of spending every day.

Thus it is in all the virtues and holy tempers of Christianity, they are not ours unless they be the virtues and tempers of our ordinary life. So that Christianity is so far from leaving us to live in the common ways of life, conforming to the folly of customs, and gratifying the passions and tempers which the spirit of the world delights in, it is so far from indulging us in any of these things, that all its virtues which it makes necessary to salvation, are only so many ways of living above, and contrary to the world in all the common actions of our life. If our common life is not a common course of humility, self-denial, renunciation of the world, poverty of spirit, and heavenly affection, we do not live the lives of Christians.

But yet though it is thus plain, that this, and this alone is Christianity, an uniform open and visible practice of all these virtues, yet it is as plain, that there is little or nothing of this to be found, even amongst the better sort of People. You see them often at Church, and pleased with fine preachers, but look into their lives, and you see them just the same sort of People as others are, that make no pretences to devotion. The difference that you find betwixt them, is only the difference of their natural tempers. They have the same taste of the world, the same worldly cares, and fears, and joys; they have the same turn of mind, equally vain in their desires. You see the same fondness for state and equipage, the same pride and vanity of dress, the same self-love and indulgence, the same foolish friendships, and groundless hatreds, the same levity of mind, and trifling spirit, the same fondness for diversions, the same idle dispositions, and vain ways of spending their time in visiting and conversation, as the rest of the world, that make no pretences to devotion.

I do not mean this comparison betwixt People seemingly good, and professed rakes, but betwixt People of sober lives. Let us take an instance in two modest Women: let it be supposed, that one of them is careful of times of Devotion, and observes them through a sense of duty, and that the other has no hearty concern about it, but is at Church seldom or often, just as it happens. Now it is a very easy thing to see this difference betwixt these persons. But when you have seen this, can you find any further difference betwixt them? Can you find that their common life is of a different kind? Are not the tempers, and customs, and manners of the one, of the same kind as of the other? Do they live as if they belonged to different worlds, had different views in their heads, and different rules and measures of all their actions? Have they not the same goods and evils, are they not pleased and displeased in the same manner, and for the same things? Do they not live in the same course of life? Does one seem to be of this world, looking at the things that are temporal, and the other to be of another world, looking wholly at the things that are eternal? Does the one live in pleasure, delighting herself in show or dress, and the other live in self-denial and mortification, renouncing everything that looks like vanity, either of person, dress, or carriage? Does the one follow public diversions, and trifle away her time in idle visits, and corrupt conversation, and does the other study all the arts of improving her time, living in Prayer and Watching, and such good works, as may make all her time turn to her advantage, and be placed to her account at the last day? Is the one careless of expense, and glad to be able to adorn herself with every costly ornament of dress, and does the other consider her fortune as a talent given her by God, which is to be improved religiously, and no more to be spent in vain and needless ornaments, than it is to be buried in the earth?

Where must you look, to find one Person of Religion differing in this manner, from another that has none? And yet if they do not differ in these things which are here related, can it with any sense be said, the one is a good Christian, and the other not?

Take another instance amongst the men. Leo has a great deal of good nature, has kept what they call good company, hates everything that is false and base, is very generous and brave to his friends, but has concerned himself so little with Religion, that he hardly knows the difference betwixt a Jew and a Christian.

Eusebius on the other hand, has had early impressions of Religion, and buys books of Devotion. He can talk of all the feasts and fasts of the Church, and knows the names of most men that have been eminent for piety. You never hear him swear, or make a loose jest, and when he talks of Religion, he talks of it, as of a matter of the last concern.

Here you see, that one person has Religion enough, according to the way of the world, to be reckoned a pious Christian, and the other is so far from all appearance of Religion, that he may fairly be reckoned a Heathen; and yet if you look into their common life, if you examine their chief and ruling tempers in the greatest articles of life, or the greatest doctrines of Christianity, you will find the least difference imaginable.

Consider them with regard to the use of the world, because that is what everybody can see.

Now to have right notions and tempers with relation to this world, is as essential to religion, as to have right notions of God. And it is as possible for a man to worship a Crocodile, and yet be a pious man, as to have his affections set upon this world, and yet be a good Christian.

But now if you consider Leo and Eusebius in this respect, you will find them exactly alike, seeking, using, and enjoying all that can be got in this world in the same manner, and for the same ends. You will find that riches, prosperity, pleasures, indulgences, state, equipage, and honour, are just as much the happiness of Eusebius as they are of Leo. And yet if Christianity has not changed a man's mind and temper with relation to these things, what can we say that it has done for him?

For if the doctrines of Christianity were practised, they would make a man as different from other people as to all worldly tempers, sensual pleasures, and the pride of life, as a wise man is different from a natural; it would be as easy a thing to know a Christian by his outward course of life, as it is now difficult to find anybody that lives it. For it is notorious, that Christians are now not only like other men in their frailties and infirmities, this might be in some degree excusable, but the complaint is, they are like Heathens in all the main and chief articles of their lives. They enjoy the world, and live every day in the same tempers, and the same designs, and the same indulgences, as they do who know not God, nor of any happiness in another life. Everybody who is capable of any reflection, must have observed, that this is generally the state even of devout people, whether men or women. You may see them different from other people, so far as to times and places of prayer, but generally like the rest of the world in all the other parts of their lives. That is, adding Christian Devotion to a Heathen life: I have the authority of our Blessed Saviour for his remark, where he says, 'Take no thought, saying what shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed? for after all these things do the Gentiles seek.' But if to be thus affected even with the necessary things of this life, shows that we are not yet of a Christian Spirit, but are like the Heathens, surely to enjoy the vanity and folly of the world as they did, to be like them in the main chief tempers of our lives, in self-love and indulgence, in sensual pleasures and diversions, in the vanity of dress, the love of show and greatness, or any other gaudy distinctions of fortune, is a much greater sign of a heathen temper. And consequently, they who add Devotion to such a life, must be said to pray as Christians, but live as heathens.

Chapter II.

An inquiry into the Reason, why the generality of Christians fall so far short of the Holiness and Devotion of Christianity.

IT may now be reasonably inquired, how it comes to pass, that the lives even of the better sort of people, are thus strangely contrary to the principles of Christianity?

But before I give a direct answer to this, I desire it may also be inquired, how it comes to pass that swearing is so common a vice amongst Christians? It is indeed not yet so common amongst women, as it is amongst men. But amongst men this sin is so common, that perhaps there are more than two in three that are guilty of it through the whole course of their lives, swearing more or less, just as it happens, some constantly, others only now and then as it were by chance. Now, I ask how comes it, that two in three of the men are guilty of so gross and profane a sin as this is? There is neither ignorance, nor human infirmity to plead for it: It is against an express commandment, and the most plain Doctrine of our blessed Saviour.

Do but now find the reason why the generality of men live in this notorious vice, and then you will have found the reason why the generality even of the better sort of people, live so contrary to Christianity.

Now the reason of common swearing is this, it is because men have not so much as the intention to please God in all their actions. For let a man but have so much piety as to intend to please God in all the actions of his life, as the happiest and best thing in the world, and then he will never swear more. It will be as impossible for him to swear, whilst he feels this intention within himself, as it is impossible for a man who intends to please his Prince, to go up and abuse him to his face.

It seems but a small and necessary part of piety to have such a sincere intention as this; and that he has no reason to look upon himself as a Disciple of Christ, who is not thus far advanced in piety. And yet it is purely for want of this degree of piety, that you see such a mixture of sin and folly in the lives even of the better sort of People. It is for want of this intention, that you see men who profess religion, yet live in swearing and sensuality; that you see Clergymen given to pride and covetousness, and worldly enjoyments. It is for want of this intention, that you see women who profess Devotion, yet living in all the folly and vanity of dress, wasting their time in idleness and pleasures, and in all such instances of state and equipage as their estates will reach. For let but a woman feel her heart full of this intention, and she will find it as impossible to patch or paint, as to curse or swear; she will no more desire to shine at Balls and Assemblies, or make a figure amongst those who are most finely dressed, than she will desire to dance upon a Rope to please Spectators: She will know, that the one is as far from the wisdom and excellency of the Christian Spirit, as the other.

It was this general intention, that made the primitive Christians such eminent instances of piety, that made the goodly fellowship of the saints, and all the glorious army of martyrs and confessors. And if you will here stop, and ask yourself, why you are not as pious as the primitive Christians were, your own heart will tell you, that it is neither through ignorance, nor inability, but purely because you never thoroughly intended it. You observe the same Sunday-worship that they did; and you are strict in it, because it is your full intention to be so. And when you as fully intend to be like them in their ordinary common life, when you intend to please God in all your actions, you will find it as possible, as to be strictly exact in the service of the Church. And when you have this intention to please God in all your actions, as the happiest and best thing in the world, you will find in you as great an aversion to everything that is vain and impertinent in common life, whether of business or pleasure, as you now have to anything that is profane. You will be as fearful of living in any foolish way, either of spending your time, or your fortune, as you are now fearful of neglecting the public Worship.

Now, who that wants this general sincere intention, can be reckoned a Christian? And yet if it was amongst Christians, it would change the whole face of the world; true piety, and exemplary holiness, would be as common and visible, as buying and selling, or any trade in life.

Let a Clergyman but be thus pious, and he will converse as if he had been brought up by an Apostle; he will no more think and talk of noble preferment, than of noble eating, or a glorious chariot. He will no more complain of the frowns of the world, or a small cure, or the want of a patron, than he will complain of the want of a laced coat, or a running horse. Let him but intend to please God, in all his actions, as the happiest and best thing in the world, and then he will know, that there is nothing noble in a Clergyman, but a burning zeal for the salvation of souls; nor anything poor in his profession, but idleness and a worldly Spirit.

Again, let a Tradesman but have this intention, and it will make him a saint in his shop; his every-day business will be a course of wise and reasonable actions, made holy to God, by being done in obedience to his will and pleasure. He will buy and sell, and labour and travel, because by so doing he can do some good to himself and others. But then, as nothing can please God but what is wise, and reasonable, and holy, so he will neither buy nor sell, nor labour in any other manner, nor to any other end, but such as may be shown to be wise, and reasonable, and holy. He will therefore consider, not what arts, or methods, or application will soonest make him richer and greater than his brethren, or remove him from a shop to a life of state and pleasure; but he will consider what arts, what methods, what application can make worldly business most acceptable to God, and make a life of trade a life of holiness, devotion, and piety. This will be the temper and spirit of every tradesman; he cannot stop short of these degrees of piety, whenever it is his intention to please God in all his actions, as the best and happiest thing in the world.

And on the other hand, whoever is not of this spirit and temper in his trade and profession, and does not carry it on only so far as is best subservient to a wise, and holy, and heavenly life; it is certain that he has not this intention; and yet without it, who can be shown to be a follower of Jesus Christ?

Again, let the Gentleman of birth and fortune but have this intention, and you will see how it will carry him from every appearance of evil, to every instance of piety and goodness. He cannot live by chance, or as humour and fancy carry him, because he knows that nothing can please God but a wise and regular course of life. He cannot live in idleness and indulgence, in sports and gaming, in pleasures and intemperance, in vain expenses and high living, because these things cannot be turned into means of piety and holiness, or made so many parts of a wise and religious life.

As he thus removes from all appearance of evil, so he hastens and aspires after every instance of goodness. He does not ask what is allowable and pardonable, but what is commendable and praiseworthy. He does not ask, whether God will forgive the folly of our lives, the madness of our pleasures, the vanity of our expenses, the richness of our equipage, and the careless consumption of our time; but he asks, whether God is pleased with these things, or whether these are the appointed ways of gaining his favour? He does not inquire, whether it be pardonable to hoard up money, to adorn ourselves with diamonds, and gild our chariots, whilst the widow and the orphan, the sick and the prisoner, want to be relieved; but he asks, whether God has required these things at our hands, whether we shall be called to account at the last day for the neglect of them; because it is not his intent to live in such ways as, for aught we know, God may perhaps pardon; but to be diligent in such ways, as we know, that God will infallibly reward.

He will not therefore look at the lives of Christians, to learn how he ought to spend his estate, but he will look into the Scriptures, and make every doctrine, parable, precept, or instruction, that relates to rich men, a law to himself in the use of his estate.

He will have nothing to do with costly apparel, because the rich man in the Gospel was 'clothed with purple and fine linen.' He denies himself the pleasures and indulgences which his estate could procure, because our blessed Saviour saith, 'Woe unto you 'that are rich, for ye have received your consolation.' He will have but one rule for charity, and that will be, to spend all that he can that way, because the judge of quick and dead hath said, that all that is so given, is given to him.

He will have no hospitable table for the rich and wealthy to come and feast with him, in good eating and drinking; because our blessed Lord saith, 'When thou makest a dinner, call not 'thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy 'rich neighbours, lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense 'be made thee. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, 'the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed. 'For they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recom- 'pensed at the resurrection of the just.*'

He will waste no money in gilded roofs, or costly furniture: He will not be carried from pleasure to pleasure, in expensive state and equipage, because an inspired Apostle hath said, that 'all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the 'eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the 'world.'

Let not anyone look upon this as an imaginary description of charity, that looks fine in the notion, but cannot be put in practice. For it is so far from being an imaginary impracticable form of life, that it has been practised by great numbers of Christians in former ages, who were glad to turn their whole estates into a constant course of charity. And it is so far from being impossible now, that if we can find any Christians, that

* Luke xiv. 12-14.

sincerely intend to please God in all their actions, as the best and happiest thing in the world, whether they be young or old, single or married, men or women, if they have but this intention, it will be impossible for them to do otherwise. This one principle will infallibly carry them to the height of charity, and they will find themselves unable to stop short of it.

For how is it possible for a man that intends to please God in the use of his money, and intends it because he judges it to be his greatest happiness, how is it possible for such a one, in such a state of mind, to bury his money in needless, impertinent finery, in covering himself or his horses with gold, whilst there are any works of piety and charity to be done with it, or any ways of spending it well?

This is as strictly impossible, as for a man who intends to please God in his words, to go into company on purpose to swear and lie. For as all waste and unreasonable expense is done designedly, and with deliberation, so no one can be guilty of it, whose constant intention is to please God in the use of his money.

I have chosen to explain this matter, by appealing to this intention, because it makes the case so plain, and because everyone who has a mind, may see it in the clearest light, and feel it in the strongest manner, only by looking into his own Heart. For it is as easy for every person to know, whether he intends to please God in all his actions; as for any servant to know, whether this be his intention towards his master. Everyone also can as easily tell how he lays out his money, and whether he considers how to please God in it, as he can tell where his estate is, and whether it be in money or land. So that there is no plea left for ignorance or frailty, as to this matter, everybody is in the light, and everybody has power. And no one can fail, but he who is not so much a Christian, as to intend to please God in the use of his estate.

You see two persons, one is regular in public and private Prayer, the other is not. Now the reason of this difference is not this, that one has strength and power to observe Prayer, and the other has not; but the reason is this, that one intends to please God in the duties of Devotion, and the other has no intention about it. Now the case is the same, in the right or wrong use of our time and money. You see one person throwing away his time in sleep and idleness, in visiting and diversions, and his money in the most vain and unreasonable expenses. You see another careful of every day, dividing his hours by rules of Reason and Religion, and spending all his money in works of charity; now the difference is not owing to this, that one has strength and power to do thus, and the other has not ; but it is owing to this, that one intends to please God in the right use of all his time, and all his money, and the other has no intention about it.

Here therefore let us judge ourselves sincerely, let us not vainly content ourselves with the common disorders of our lives, the vanity of our expenses, the folly of our diversions, the pride of our habits, the idleness of our lives, and the wasting of our time, fancying that these are such imperfections as we fall into through the unavoidable weakness and frailty of our natures ; but let us be assured, that these disorders of our common life are owing to this, that we have not so much Christianity, as to intend to please God in all the actions of our life, as the best and happiest thing in the world. So that we must not look upon ourselves in a state of common and pardonable imperfection, but in such a state, as wants the first and most fundamental principle of Christianity, viz., an intention to please God in all our actions.

And if anyone were to ask himself, how it comes to pass, that there are any degrees of sobriety which he neglects, any practices of humility which he wants, any method of charity which he does not follow, any rules of redeeming time which he does not observe, his own heart will tell him, that it is because he never intended to be so exact in those duties. For whenever we fully intend it, it is as possible to conform to all this regularity of life, as it is possible for a man to observe times of Prayer.

So that the fault does not lie here, that we desire to be good and perfect, but through the weakness of our nature fall short of it ; but it is, because we have not piety enough to intend to be as good as we can, or to please God in all the actions of our life. This we see is plainly the case of him who spends his time in sports, when he should be at Church ; it is not his want of power, but his want of intention, or desire to be there.

And the case is plainly the same in every other folly of human life. She that spends her time and money in the unreasonable ways and fashions of the world, does not do so, because she wants power to be wise and religious in the management of her time and money, but because she has no intention or desire of being so. When she feels this intention, she will find it as possible to act up to it, as to be strictly sober and chaste, because it is her care and desire to be so.

This doctrine does not suppose, that we have no need of divine grace, or that it is in our own power to make ourselves perfect. It only supposes, that through the want of a sincere intention of pleasing God in all our actions, we fall into such irregularities of life, as by the ordinary means of grace, we should have power to avoid.

And that we have not that perfection, which our present state of grace makes us capable of, because we do not so much as intend to have it.

It only teaches us, that the reason why you see no real mortification, or self-denial, no eminent charity, no profound humility, no heavenly affection, no true contempt of the world, no Christian meekness, no sincere zeal, no eminent piety in the common lives of Christians, is this, because they do not so much as intend to be exact and exemplary in these virtues.

Chapter III.

Of the great danger and folly, of not intending to be as eminent and exemplary as we can, in the practice of all Christian virtues.

ALTHOUGH the goodness of God, and his rich mercies in Christ Jesus, are a sufficient assurance to us, that he will be merciful to our unavoidable weaknesses and infirmities, that is, to such failings as are the effects of ignorance or surprise; yet we have no reason to expect the same mercy towards those sins which we have lived in, through a want of intention to avoid them.

For instance, the case of a common swearer, who dies in that guilt, seems to have no title to the divine mercy, for this reason, because he can no more plead any weakness, or infirmity in his excuse, than the man that hid his talent in the earth, could plead his want of strength to keep it out of the earth.

But now, if this be right reasoning in the case of a common swearer, that his sin is not to be reckoned a pardonable frailty, because he has no weakness to plead in its excuse, why then do we not carry this way of reasoning to its true extent? Why do not we as much condemn every other error of life, that has no more weakness to plead in its excuse than common swearing?

For if this be so bad a thing, because it might be avoided, if we did but sincerely intend it, must not then all other erroneous ways of life be very guilty, if we live in them, not through weakness and inability, but because we never sincerely intended to avoid them?

For instance, you perhaps have made no progress in the most important Christian virtues, you have scarce gone half way in humility and charity; now if your failure in these duties is purely owing to your want of intention of performing them in any true degree, have you not then as little to plead for yourself, and are you not as much without all excuse, as the common swearer?

Why, therefore, do you not press these things home upon your conscience? Why do you not think it as dangerous for you to live in such defects, as are in your power to amend, as it is dangerous for a common swearer to live in the breach of that duty, which it is in his power to observe? Is not negligence, and a want of a sincere intention, as blamable in one case, as in another?

You, it may be, are as far from Christian Perfection, as the common swearer is from keeping the third Commandment; are you not therefore as much condemned by the doctrines of the Gospel, as the swearer is by the third Commandment?

You perhaps will say, that all People fall short of the Perfection of the Gospel, and therefore you are content with your failings. But this is saying nothing to the purpose. For the question is not whether Gospel Perfection can be fully attained, but whether you come as near it, as a sincere intention, and careful intelligence can carry you. Whether you are not in a much lower state than you might be, if you sincerely intended, and carefully laboured to advance yourself in all Christian virtues.

If you are as forward in the Christian Life, as your best endeavours can make you, then you may justly hope, that your imperfections will not be laid to your charge; but if your defects in piety, humility, and charity, are owing to your negligence, and want of sincere intention, to be as eminent as you can in these virtues, then you leave yourself as much without excuse, as he that lives in the sin of swearing, through the want of a sincere intention to depart from it.

The salvation of our souls is set forth in Scripture as a thing of difficulty, that requires all our diligence, that is to be worked out with fear and trembling.

We are told, that 'strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto Life, and few there be that find it. That many are called, but few are chosen.' And that many will miss of their salvation, who seem to have taken some pains to obtain it: As in these words, 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many I say unto you will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.'

Here our blessed Lord commands us to strive to enter in, because many will fail, who only seek to enter. By which we are plainly taught, that Religion is a state of labour and striving, and that many will fail of their salvation; not because they took no pains or care about it, but because they did not take pains and care enough; they only sought, but did not strive to enter in.

Every Christian therefore, should as well examine his life by these Doctrines, as by the Commandments. For these Doctrines are as plain marks of our condition, as the Commandments are plain marks of our duty.

For if salvation is only given to those who strive for it, then it is as reasonable for me to consider, whether my course of life be a course of striving to obtain it, as to consider whether I am keeping any of the Commandments.

If my Religion is only a formal compliance with those modes of worship, that are in fashion where I live; if it costs me no pains or trouble; if it lays me under no rules and restraints; if I have no careful thoughts and sober reflections about it, is it not great weakness to think that I am striving to enter in at the strait gate?

If I am seeking everything that can delight my senses, and regale my appetites; spending my time and fortune in pleasures, in diversions, and worldly enjoyments, a stranger to watchings, fastings, prayers, and mortifications, how can it be said that I am working out my salvation with fear and trembling?

If there is nothing in my life and conversation, that shows me to be different from Jews and Heathens; if I use the world, and worldly enjoyments, as the generality of people now do, and in all ages have done, why should I think that I am amongst those few, who are walking in the narrow way to heaven?

And yet if the way is narrow, if none can walk in it but those that strive, is it not as necessary for me to consider, whether the way I am in be narrow enough, or the labour I take be a sufficient striving, as to consider whether I sufficiently observe the second or third Commandment.

The sum of this matter is this: From the above-mentioned, and many other passages of Scripture, it seems plain, that our salvation depends upon the sincerity and perfection of our endeavours to obtain it.

Weak and imperfect men shall, notwithstanding their frailties and defects, be received, as having pleased God, if they have done their utmost to please him.

The rewards of charity, piety, and humility, will be given to those, whose lives have been a careful labour to exercise these virtues in as high a degree as they could.

We cannot offer to God the service of Angels; we cannot obey him as man in a state of perfection could; but fallen men can do their best, and this is the perfection that is required of us; it is only the perfection of our best endeavours, a careful labour to be as perfect as we can.

But if we stop short of this, for aught we know, we stop short of the mercy of God, and leave ourselves nothing to plead from the terms of the Gospel. For God has there made no promises of mercy to the slothful and negligent. His mercy is only offered to our frail and imperfect, but best endeavours to practise all manner of righteousness.

As the law to angels is angelical righteousness, as the law to perfect beings is strict perfection, so the law to our imperfect nature is, the best obedience that our frail nature is able to perform.

The measure of our love to God, seems in justice to be the measure of our love of every virtue. We are to love and practise it 'with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our mind, and 'with all our strength.' And when we cease to live with this regard to virtue, we live below our nature, and instead of being able to plead our infirmities, we stand chargeable with negligence.

It is for this reason that we are exhorted, to work out our salvation with fear and trembling; because unless our heart and passions are eagerly bent upon the work of our salvation; unless holy fears animate our endeavours, and keep our consciences strict and tender about every part of our duty, constantly examining how we live, and how fit we are to die, we shall in all probability fall into a state of negligence, and sit down in such a course of life, as will never carry us to the rewards of heaven.

And he that considers, that a just God can only make such allowances as are suitable to his justice, that our works are all to be examined by fire, will find, that fear and trembling are proper tempers for those, that are drawing near so great a trial.

And indeed there is no probability, that anyone should do all the duty that is expected from him, or make that progress in piety, which the holiness and justice of God requires of him, but he that is constantly afraid of falling short of it.

Now this is not intended, to possess people's minds with a scrupulous anxiety, and discontent in the service of God, but to fill them with a just fear of living in sloth and idleness, and in the neglect of such virtues, as they will want at the day of Judgment.

It is to excite them to an earnest examination of their lives, to such zeal, and care, and concern after Christian perfection, as they use in any matter that has gained their heart and affections.

It is only desiring them to be so apprehensive of their state, so humble in the opinion of themselves, so earnest after higher degrees of piety, and so fearful of falling short of happiness, as the great apostle St. Paul was, when he thus wrote to the Philippians.

‘Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect;—but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.’ And then he adds, ‘Let us therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded.’

But now, if the Apostle thought it necessary for those, who were in his state of perfection, to be thus minded, that is, thus labouring, pressing and aspiring after some degrees of holiness, to which they were not then arrived, surely it is much more necessary for us, who are born in the dregs of time, and labouring under great imperfections, to be thus minded, that is, thus earnest and striving after such degrees of a holy and divine life, as we have not yet attained.

The best way for anyone to know, how much he ought to aspire after holiness, is to consider, not how much will make his present life easy, but to ask himself, how much he thinks will make him easy, at the hour of death.

Now any man that dares be so serious, as to put this question to himself, will be forced to answer, that at death, everyone will wish that he had been as perfect as human nature can be.

Is not this therefore sufficient, to put us not only upon wishing, but labouring after all that perfection, which we shall then lament the want of? Is it not excessive folly, to be content with such a course of piety, as we already know cannot content us, at a time when we shall so want it, as to have nothing else to comfort us? How can we carry a severer condemnation against ourselves, than to believe, that at the hour of death, we shall want the virtues of the Saints, and wish that we had been amongst the first servants of God, and yet take no methods of arriving at their height of piety, whilst we are alive?

Though this is an absurdity that we can easily pass over at present, whilst the health of our bodies, the passions of our minds, the noise, and hurry, and pleasures, and business of the world, lead us on with eyes that see not, and ears that hear not, yet at death, it will set itself before us in a dreadful magnitude, it will haunt us like a dismal Ghost, and our conscience will never let us take our eyes from it.

We see in worldly matters, what a torment self-condemnation is, and how hardly a man is able to forgive himself, when he has brought himself into any calamity, or disgrace, purely by his own folly. The affliction is made doubly tormenting, because he is forced to charge it all upon himself, as his own act and deed, against the nature and reason of things, and contrary to the advice of all his friends.

Now by this we may in some degree guess, how terrible the pain of that self-condemnation will be, when a man shall find himself in the miseries of death, under the severity of a self-condemning conscience, charging all his distress upon his own folly, and madness, against the sense and reason of his own mind, against all the doctrines and precepts of religion, and contrary to all the instructions, calls, and warnings, both of God, and man.

Penitens was a busy, notable tradesman, and very prosperous in his dealings, but died in the thirty-fifth year of his age.

A little before his death, when the doctors had given him over, some of his neighbours came one evening to see him, at which time, he spake thus to them.

I see, says he, my friends, the tender concern you have for me, by the grief that appears in your countenances, and I know the thoughts that you now have about me. You think how melancholy a case it is, to see so young a man, and in such flourishing business, delivered up to death. And perhaps, had I visited any of you in my condition, I should have had the same thoughts of you.

But now, my friends, my thoughts are no more like your thoughts, than my condition is like yours.

It is no trouble to me now to think, that I am to die young, or before I have raised an estate.

These things are now sunk into such mere nothings, that I have no name little enough to call them by. For if in a few days, or hours, I am to leave this carcass to be buried in the earth, and to find myself either for ever happy in the favour of God, or eternally separated from all light and peace, can any words sufficiently express the littleness of everything else?

Is there any dream like the dream of life, which amuses us with the neglect and disregard of these things? Is there any folly like the folly of our manly state, which is too wise and busy, to be at leisure for these reflections?

When we consider death as a misery, we only think of it as a miserable separation from the enjoyments of this life. We seldom mourn over an old man that dies rich, but we lament the young, that are taken away in the progress of their fortune. You yourselves look upon me with pity, not that I am going unprepared to meet the Judge of quick and dead, but that I am to leave a prosperous trade in the flower of my life.

This is the wisdom of our manly thoughts. And yet what folly of the silliest children is so great as this?

For what is there miserable, or dreadful in death, but the consequences of it? When a man is dead, what does anything signify to him, but the state he is then in?

Our poor friend Lepidus died, you know, as he was dressing himself for a feast; do you think it is now part of his trouble, that he did not live till that entertainment was over? Feast, and business, and pleasures, and enjoyments, seem great things to us, whilst we think of nothing else, but as soon as we add death to them, they all sink into an equal littleness; and the soul that is separated from the body, no more laments the loss of business, than the losing of a feast.

If I am now going into the joys of God, could there be any reason to grieve, that this happened to me before I was forty years of age? Could it be a sad thing to go to heaven, before I had made a few more bargains, or stood a little longer behind a counter?

And if I am to go amongst lost spirits, could there be any reason to be content, that this did not happen to me till I was old, and full of riches?

If good Angels were ready to receive my soul, could it be any grief to me, that I was dying upon a poor bed in a garret?

And if God has delivered me up to evil spirits, to be dragged by them to places of torments, could it be any comfort to me, that they found me upon a bed of state?

When you are as near death as I am, you will know, that all the different states of life, whether of youth or age, riches or poverty, greatness or meanness, signify no more to you, than whether you die in a poor, or stately apartment.

The greatness of those things which follow death, makes all that goes before it sink into nothing.

Now that judgment is the next thing that I look for, and everlasting happiness, or misery is come so near me, all the enjoyments and prosperities of life seem as vain and insignificant, and to have no more to do with my happiness, than the clothes that I wore before I could speak.

But, my friends, how am I surprised, that I have not always had these thoughts? for what is there in the terrors of death, in the vanities of life, or the necessities of piety, but what I might have as easily and fully seen in any part of my life?

What a strange thing is it, that a little health, or the poor business of a shop, should keep us so senseless of these great things, that are coming so fast upon us!

Just as you came into my chamber, I was thinking with myself, what numbers of souls there are now in the world, in my condition at this very time, surprised with a summons to the other world; some taken from their shops and farms, others from their sports and pleasures, these at suits of Law, those at Gaming-tables, some on the road, others at their own fire-sides, and all seized at an hour when they thought nothing of it; frightened at the approach of death, confounded at the vanity of all their labours, designs, and projects, astonished at the folly of their past lives, and not knowing which way to turn their thoughts, to find any comfort. Their consciences flying in their faces, bringing all their sins to their remembrance, tormenting them with deepest convictions of their own folly, presenting them with the sight of the angry Judge, the worm that never dies, the fire that is never quenched, the gates of hell, the powers of darkness, and the bitter pains of eternal death.

O my friends! bless God that you are not of this number, that you have time and strength to employ yourselves in such works of piety, as may bring you peace at the last.

And take this along with you, that there is nothing but a life of great piety, or a death of great stupidity, that can keep off these Apprehensions.

Had I now a thousand worlds, I would give them all for one year more, that I might present unto God, one year of such devotion and good works, as I never before so much as intended.

You perhaps, when you consider that I have lived free from scandal and debauchery, and in the communion of the Church, wonder to see me so full of remorse and self-condemnation at the approach of death.

But, alas! what a poor thing is it, to have lived only free from murder, theft, and adultery, which is all that I can say of myself.

You know indeed, that I have never been reckoned a sot, but you are at the same time witnesses, and have been frequent companions of my intemperance, sensuality, and great indulgence. And if I am now going to a Judgment, where nothing will be rewarded but good works, I may well be concerned, that though I am no sot, yet I have no Christian sobriety to plead for me.

It is true, I have lived in the communion of the Church, and generally frequented its worship and service on Sundays, when I were neither too idle, or not otherwise disposed of by my business and pleasures. But then, my conformity to the public worship, has been rather a thing of course, than any real intention of doing that, which the service of the Church supposes; had it not been so, I had been oftener at Church, more devout when there, and more fearful of ever neglecting it.

But the thing that now surprises me above all wonders, is this, that I never had so much as a general intention of living up to the piety of the Gospel. This never so much as entered into my head, or my heart. I never once in my life considered, whether I were living as the laws of Religion direct, or whether my way of life was such, as would procure me the mercy of God at this hour.

And can it be thought, that I have kept the Gospel terms of salvation, without ever so much as intending in any serious and deliberate manner, either to know them, or keep them? Can it be thought, that I have pleased God with such a life as he requires, though I have lived without ever considering, what he requires, or how much I have performed? How easy a thing would salvation be, if it could fall into my careless hands, who have never had so much serious thought about it, as about any one common bargain that I have made?

In the business of life I have used prudence and reflection. I have done everything by rules and methods. I have been glad to converse with men of experience and judgment, to find out the reasons why some fail, and others succeed in any business. I have taken no step in trade but with great care and caution, considering every advantage, or danger that attended it. I have always had my eye upon the main end of business, and have studied all the ways and means of being a gainer by all that I undertook.

But what is the reason that I have brought none of these tempers to Religion? What is the reason that I, who have so often talked of the necessity of rules and methods, and diligence in worldly business, have all this while never once thought of any rules, or methods, or managements, to carry me on in a life of Piety?

Do you think anything can astonish, and confound a dying man like this? What pain do you think a man must feel, when his conscience lays all this folly to his charge, when it shall show him how regular, exact, and wise he has been in small matters, which are passed away like a dream, and how stupid and senseless he has lived, without any reflection, without any rules, in things of such eternal moment, as no heart can sufficiently conceive them?

Had I only my frailties and imperfections to lament, at this time, I should lie here humbly trusting in the mercies of God. But, alas! how can I call a general disregard, and a thorough neglect of all religious improvement, a frailty or imperfection; when it was as much in my power to have been exact, and careful, and diligent in a course of piety, as in the business of my trade.

I could have called in as many helps, have practised as many rules, and been taught as many certain methods of holy living, as of thriving in my shop, had I but so intended and desired it.

Oh my friends! a careless life, unconcerned and unattentive to the duties of Religion, is so without all excuse, so unworthy of the mercy of God, such a shame to the sense and reason of our minds, that I can hardly conceive a greater punishment, than for a man to be thrown into the state that I am in, to reflect upon it.

Penitens was here going on, but had his mouth stopped by a convulsion, which never suffered him to speak any more. He lay convulsed about twelve hours, and then gave up the ghost.

Now if every reader, would imagine this Penitens to have been some particular acquaintance or relation of his, and fancy that he saw and heard all that is here described, that he stood by his bedside when his poor friend lay in such distress and agony, lamenting the folly of his past life, it would, in all probability, teach him such wisdom as never entered into his heart before. If to this, he should consider how often he himself might have been surprised in the same state of negligence, and made an example to the rest of the world, this double reflection, both upon the distress of his friend, and the goodness of that God, who had preserved him from it, would in all likelihood soften his heart into holy tempers, and make him turn the remainder of his life into a regular course of piety.

This therefore being so useful a meditation, I shall here leave the reader, as I hope, seriously engaged in it.

Chapter IV.

We can please God in no state, or employment of life, but by intending and devoting it all to his honour and glory.

HAVING in the first Chapter stated the general nature of Devotion, and shown, that it implies not any form of Prayer, but a certain form of life, that is offered to God not at any particular times, or places, but everywhere and in everything, I shall now descend to some particulars, and show how we are to devote our labour and employment, our time and fortunes unto God.

As a good Christian should consider every place as holy, because God is there, so he should look upon every part of his life as a matter of holiness, because it is to be offered unto God.

The profession of a Clergyman, is a holy profession, because it is a ministration in holy things, an attendance at the Altar. But worldly business is to be made holy unto the Lord, by being done as a service to him, and in conformity to his divine will.

For as all men, and all things in the World, as truly belong unto God, as any places, things, or persons that are devoted to divine service, so all things are to be used, and all persons are to act in their several states and employments for the Glory of God.

Men of worldly business therefore, must not look upon themselves as at liberty to live to themselves, to sacrifice to their own humours and tempers, because their employment is of a worldly nature. But they must consider, that as the world and all worldly professions, as truly belong to God, as persons and things that are devoted to the Altar, so it is as much the duty of men in worldly business to live wholly unto God, as it is the duty of those, who are devoted to divine service.

As the whole world is God's, so the whole world is to act for God. As all men have the same relation to God, as all men have all their powers and faculties from God, so all men are obliged to act for God, with all their powers and faculties.

As all things are God's, so all things are to be used and regarded as the things of God. For men to abuse things on earth, and live to themselves, is the same rebellion against God, as for Angels to abuse things in Heaven; because God is just the same Lord of all on earth, as he is the Lord of all in Heaven.

Things may, and must differ in their use, but yet they are all to be used according to the will of God.

Men may, and must differ in their employments, but yet they must all act for the same ends, as dutiful servants of God, in the right and pious performance of their several callings.

Clergymen must live wholly unto God in one particular way, that is, in the exercise of Holy offices, in the ministration of Prayers and Sacraments, and a zealous distribution of spiritual goods.

But men of other employments, are in their particular ways as much obliged to act as the servants of God, and live wholly unto him in their several callings.

This is the only difference between Clergymen, and People of other callings.

When it can be shown, that men might be vain, covetous, sensual, worldly minded, or proud in the exercise of their worldly business, then it will be allowable for Clergymen to indulge the same tempers in their sacred profession. For though these tempers are most odious and most criminal in Clergymen, who besides their baptismal vow, have a second time devoted themselves to God, to be his servants, not in the common offices of human life, but in the spiritual service of the most holy, sacred things, and who are therefore to keep themselves as separate and different from the common life of other men, as a Church or an Altar is to be kept separate from houses, and tables of common use; yet as all Christians are by their baptism devoted to God, and made professors of holiness, so are they all in their several callings to live as holy and heavenly persons; doing everything in their common life only in such a manner, as it may be received by God, as a service done to him. For things spiritual and temporal, sacred and common, must, like men and angels, like heaven and earth, all conspire in the Glory of God.

As there is but one God and Father of us all, whose Glory gives light and life to everything that lives; whose presence fills all places, whose power supports all beings, whose providence ruleth all Events; so everything that lives, whether in heaven or earth, whether they be thrones or principalities, men or angels, they must all with one spirit, live wholly to the praise and glory of this one God and Father of them all. Angels as angels, in their heavenly ministrations, but men as men, women as women, bishops as bishops, priests as priests, and deacons as deacons; some with things spiritual, and some with things temporal, offering to God the daily sacrifice of a reasonable life, wise actions, purity of heart, and heavenly affections.

This is the common business of all persons in this world. It is not left to any women in the world to trifle away their time in the follies and impertinences of a fashionable life, nor to any men to resign themselves up to worldly cares and concerns: it is not left to the rich, to gratify their passions in the indulgences and pride of life, nor to the poor, to vex and torment their hearts with the poverty of their state; but men and women, rich and poor, must, with bishops and priests, walk before God in the same wise and holy spirit, in the same denial of all vain tempers, and in the same discipline and care of souls; not only because they have all the same rational nature, and are servants of the same God, but because they all want the same holiness, to make them fit for the same happiness, to which they are all called. It is therefore absolutely necessary for all Christians, whether men or women, to consider themselves, as persons that are devoted to holiness; and so order their common ways of life, by such rules of reason and piety, as may turn it into continual service unto almighty God.

Now to make our labour, or employment an acceptable service unto God, we must carry it on with the same spirit and temper, that is required in giving of alms, or any work of piety.* For, if 'whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must do all 'to the glory of God'; if 'we are to use this world as if we used 'it not'; if we are to 'present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, 'acceptable to God';† if 'we are to live by faith, and not by 'sight,' and to 'have our conversation in heaven'; then it is necessary, that the common way of our life in every state, be made to glorify God by such tempers, as make our prayers and adorations acceptable to him. For if we are worldly, or earthly-minded in our employments, if they are carried on with vain desires, and covetous tempers, only to satisfy ourselves, we can no more be said to live to the glory of God, than gluttons and drunkards can be said, to eat and drink to the glory of God.

As the glory of God is one and the same thing, so whatever we do suitably to it, must be done with one and the same spirit. That same state and temper of mind, which makes our alms and devotions acceptable, must also make our labour, or employment, a proper offering unto God. If a man labours to be rich, and pursues his business, that he may raise himself to a state of figure and glory in the world, he is no longer serving God in his employment; he is acting under other masters, and has no more title to a reward from God, than he that gives alms, that he may be seen, or prays, that he may be heard of men. For vain and earthly desires are no more allowable in our employments, than in our alms and devotions. For these tempers of worldly pride, and vain glory, are not only evil, when they mix with our good works, but they have the same evil nature, and make us odious to God, when they enter into the common business of our employment. If it were allowable, to indulge covetous or vain passions in our worldly employments, it would then be allowable to be vain-glorious in our devotions. But as our alms and devotions are not an acceptable service, but when they proceed from a heart truly devoted to God, so our common employment cannot be reckoned a service to him, but when it is performed with the same temper and piety of heart.

Most of the employments of life are in their own nature lawful; and all those that are so, may be made a substantial part of our duty to God, if we engage in them only so far, and for such ends, as are suitable to beings that are to live above the world, all the time that they live in the world. This is the only measure of our application to any worldly business, let it be what it will, where it will, it must have no more of our hands, our hearts, or our time, than is consistent with an hearty, daily, careful preparation of ourselves for another life. For as all Christians, as such, have renounced this world, to prepare themselves by daily devotion, and universal holiness, for an eternal state of quite another nature, they must look upon worldly employments, as upon worldly wants, and bodily infirmities; things not to be desired, but only to be endured and suffered, till death and the resurrection has carried us to an eternal state of real happiness.

* 1 Cor. x. 31.

† Rom. xii. 1.

Now he that does not look at the things of this life in this degree of littleness, cannot be said, either to feel or believe the greatest truths of Christianity. For if he thinks anything great or important in human business, can he be said, to feel or believe those Scriptures which represent this life, and the greatest things of life, as bubbles, vapours, dreams, and shadows?

If he thinks figure and show, and worldly glory, to be any proper happiness of a Christian, how can he be said to feel or believe this doctrine, 'Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil for the Son of Man's sake'? For surely, if there was any real happiness in figure and show, and worldly glory; if these things deserved our thoughts and care, it could not be matter of the highest joy, when we are torn from them by persecutions and sufferings? If, therefore, a man will so live, as to show, that he feels and believes the most fundamental doctrines of Christianity, he must live above the world; this is the temper that must enable him to do the business of life, and yet live wholly unto God, and to go through some worldly employment with a heavenly mind. And it is as necessary, that people live in their employments with this temper, as it is necessary, that their employment itself be lawful.

The husbandman that tilleth the ground, is employed in an honest business, that is necessary in life, and very capable of being made an acceptable service unto God. But if he labours and toils, not to serve any reasonable ends of life, but in order to have his plough made of silver, and to have his horses harnessed in gold, the honesty of his employment is lost as to him, and his labour becomes his folly.

A tradesman may justly think, that it is agreeable to the will of God, for him to sell such things as are innocent and useful in life, such as help both himself, and others, to a reasonable support, and enable them to assist those that want to be assisted. But if instead of this, he trades only with regard to himself, without any other rule than that of his own temper, if it be his chief end in it to grow rich, that he may live in figure and indulgence, and be able to retire from business to idleness and luxury, his trade, as to him, loses all its innocency, and is so far from being an acceptable service to God, that it is only a more plausible course of covetousness, self-love, and ambition. For such a one turns the necessities of employment into pride and covetousness, just as the sot and epicure turn the necessities of eating and drinking, into gluttony and drunkenness. Now he that is up early and late, that sweats and labours for these ends, that he may be sometime or other rich, and live in pleasure and indulgence, lives no more to the glory of God, than he that plays and games for the same ends. For though there is a great difference between trading and gaming, yet most of that difference is lost, when men once trade with the same desires and tempers, and for the same ends, that others game. Charity and fine dressing, are things very different; but if men give alms, for the same reasons that others dress fine, only to be seen and admired, charity is then but like the vanity of fine clothes. In like manner, if the same motives make some people painful and industrious in their trades, which make others constant at gaming, such pain are but like the pains of gaming.

Calidus has traded above thirty years in the greatest city of the kingdom; he has been so many years constantly increasing his trade, and his fortune. Every hour of the day is with him an hour of business; and though he eats and drinks very heartily, yet every meal seems to be in a hurry, and he would say grace if he had time. Calidus ends every day at the tavern, but has not leisure to be there till near nine o'clock. He is always forced to drink a good hearty glass, to drive thoughts of business out of his head, and make his spirits drowsy enough for sleep. He does business all the time that he is rising, and has settled several matters, before he can get to his counting-room. His prayers are a short ejaculation or two, which he never misses in stormy, tempestuous weather, because he has always something or other at Sea. Calidus will tell you with great pleasure, that he has been in this hurry for so many years, and that it must have killed him long ago, but that it has been a rule with him, to get out of the town every Saturday, and make the Sunday a day of quiet, and good refreshment in the country.

He is now so rich, that he would leave off his business, and amuse his old age with building, and furnishing a fine house in the country, but that he is afraid he should grow melancholy, if he were to quit his business. He will tell you with great gravity, that it is a dangerous thing for a man that has been used to get money, ever to leave it off. If thoughts of Religion happen at any time to steal into his head, Calidus contents himself with thinking, that he never was a friend to heretics and infidels, that he has always been civil to the Minister of his parish, and very often given something to the charity schools.

Now this way of life is at such a distance from all the doctrines and discipline of Christianity, that no one can live in it through ignorance or frailty. Calidus can no more imagine that 'he is 'born again of the spirit';* that he is 'in Christ a new 'creature';† that he lives 'here as a stranger and pilgrim, 'setting his affections upon things above, and laying up treasures in heaven.'‡ He can no more imagine this, than he can think that he has been all his life an Apostle, working Miracles, and preaching the Gospel.

It must also be owned, that the generality of trading people, especially in great towns, are too much like Calidus. You see them all the week buried in business, unable to think of anything else; and then spending the Sunday in idleness and refreshment, in wandering into the country, in such visits and jovial meetings, as make it often the worst day of the week.

Now they do not live thus, because they cannot support themselves with less care and application to business; but they live thus because they want to grow rich in their trades, and to maintain their families in some such figure and degree of finery, as a reasonable Christian life has no occasion for. Take away but this temper, and then people of all trades, will find themselves at leisure to live every day like Christians, to be careful of every duty of the Gospel, to live in a visible course of Religion, and be every day strict observers both of private and public Prayer.

Now the only way to do this, is for people to consider their trade as something, that they are obliged to devote to the glory of God, something that they are to do only in such a manner, as that they may make it a duty to him. Nothing can be right in business, that is not under these rules.—The Apostle commands servants, 'to be obedient to their masters, in singleness of heart, 'as unto Christ. Not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but as 'the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart. 'With good will doing service as unto the Lord, and not to 'men.'§

† 2 Cor. v. 17.

‡ Col. iii. 1.

§ Eph. vi. 5; Col. iii. 22, 23.

This passage sufficiently shows, that all Christians are to live wholly unto God in every state and condition, doing the work of their common calling, in such a manner, and for such ends, as to make it a part of their devotion or service to God. For certainly if poor slaves are not to comply with their business as men-pleasers, if they are to look wholly unto God in all their actions, and serve in singleness of heart, as unto the Lord, surely men of other employments and conditions, must be as much obliged to go through their business with the same singleness of heart; not as pleasing the vanity of their own minds, not as gratifying their own selfish, worldly passions, but as the servants of God in all that they have to do. For surely no one will say, that a slave is to devote his state of life unto God, and make the will of God, the sole rule and end of his service, but that a tradesman need not act with the same spirit of devotion in his business. For this is as absurd, as to make it necessary for one man to be more just, or faithful than another.

It is therefore absolutely certain, that no Christian is to enter any further into business, nor for any other ends, than such as he can in singleness of heart offer unto God, as a reasonable service. For the Son of God has redeemed us for this only end, that we should, by a life of reason and piety, live to the glory of God; this is the only rule and measure, for every order and state of life. Without this rule, the most lawful employment becomes a sinful state of life.

Take away this from the life of a Clergyman, and his holy profession serves only to expose him to a greater damnation. Take away this from tradesmen, and shops are but so many houses of greediness and filthy lucre. Take away this from gentlemen, and the course of their life becomes a course of sensuality, pride, and wantonness. Take away this rule from our tables, and all falls into gluttony and drunkenness. Take away this measure from our dress and habits, and all is turned into such paint, and glitter, and ridiculous ornaments, as are a real shame to the wearer. Take away this from the use of our fortunes, and you will find people sparing in nothing but charity. Take away this from our diversions, and you will find no sports too silly, nor any entertainments too vain and corrupt to be the pleasure of Christians.

If therefore we desire to live unto God, it is necessary to bring our whole life under this law, to make his glory the sole rule and measure of our acting in every employment of life. For there is no other true devotion, but this of living devoted to God in the common business of our lives.

So that men must not content themselves with the lawfulness of their employments, but must consider whether they use them, as they are to use everything, as strangers and pilgrims, that are baptized into the resurrection of Jesus Christ, that are to follow him in a wise and heavenly course of life, in the mortification of all worldly desires, and in purifying and preparing their souls for the blessed enjoyment of God.*

For to be vain, or proud, or covetous, or ambitious in the common course of our business, is as contrary to these holy tempers of Christianity, as cheating and dishonesty.

If a glutton were to say in excuse of his gluttony, that he only eats such things as it is lawful to eat, he would make as good an excuse for himself, as the greedy, covetous, ambitious tradesman, that should say, he only deals in lawful business. For as a Christian is not only required to be honest, but to be of a Christian spirit, and make his life an exercise of humility, repentance, and heavenly affection, so all tempers that are contrary to these are as contrary to Christianity, as cheating is contrary to honesty.

So that the matter plainly comes to this, all irregular tempers in trade and business, are but like irregular tempers in eating and drinking.

Proud views, and vain desires, in our worldly employments, are as truly vices and corruptions, as hypocrisy in prayer, or vanity in alms. And there can be no reason given, why vanity in our alms, should make us odious to God, but what will prove any other kind of pride to be equally odious. He that labours and toils in a calling, that he may make a figure in the world, and draw the eyes of People upon the splendour of his condition, is as far from the pious humility of a Christian, as he that gives alms that he may be seen of men. For the reason, why pride and vanity in our prayers and alms, renders them an unacceptable service to God, is not because there is anything particular in prayers and alms, that cannot allow of pride, but because pride is in no respect, nor in anything, made for man; it destroys the piety of our prayers and alms, because it destroys the piety of everything that it touches, and renders every action that it governs, incapable of being offered unto God.

So that if we could so divide ourselves, as to be humble in some respects, and proud in others, such humility would be of no service to us, because God requires us as truly to be humble in all our actions and designs, as to be true and honest in all our actions and designs.

And as a man is not honest and true, because he is so to a great many People, or upon several occasions, but because truth and honesty is the measure of all his dealings with everybody ; so the case is the same in humility, or any other temper, it must be the general ruling habit of our minds, and extend itself to all our actions and designs, before it can be imputed to us.

* Col. iii. 1; 1 Pet. i. 15, 16; Eph. v. 26, 27.

We indeed sometimes talk, as if a man might be humble in some things, and proud in others ; humble in his dress, but proud of his learning ; humble in his person, but proud in his views and designs. But though this may pass in common discourse, where few things are said according to strict truth, it cannot be allowed, when we examine into the nature of our actions.

It is very possible for a man that lives by cheating, to be very punctual in paying for what he buys ; but then everyone is assured, that he does not do so out of any principle of true honesty.

In like manner, it is very possible for a man, that is proud of his estate, ambitious in his views, or vain of his learning, to disregard his dress, and person, in such a manner as a truly humble man would do ; but to suppose that he does so out of a true principle of religious humility, is full as absurd, as to suppose that a cheat pays for what he buys, out of a principle of religious honesty.

As therefore all kinds of dishonesty destroy our pretences to an honest principle of mind, so all kinds of pride destroy our pretences to an humble spirit.

No one wonders that those prayers, and alms, which proceed from pride and ostentation, are odious to God ; but yet it is as easy to show, that pride is as pardonable there as anywhere else.

If we could suppose, that God rejects pride in our prayers and alms, but bears with pride in our dress, our persons, or estates, it would be the same thing as to suppose, that God condemns falsehood in some actions, but allows it in others. For pride in one thing, differs from pride in another thing, as the robbing of one man differs from the robbing of another.

Again, if pride and ostentation is so odious, that it destroys the merit and worth of the most reasonable actions, surely it must be equally odious in those actions, which are only founded in the weakness and infirmity of our nature. As thus, alms are commanded by God, as excellent in themselves, as true instances of a divine temper, but clothes are only allowed to cover our shame ; surely therefore it must at least be as odious a degree of pride, to be vain in our clothes, as to be vain in our alms.

Again, we are commanded to pray without ceasing, as a means of rendering our souls more exalted and divine, but we are forbidden to lay up treasures upon earth ; and can we think that it is not as bad, to be vain of those treasures, which we are for- bidden to lay up, as to be vain of those prayers, which we are commanded to make.

Women are required to have their heads covered, and to adorn themselves with shamefacedness ;* if therefore they are vain in those things, which are expressly forbidden, if they patch and paint that part, which can only be adorned by shamefacedness, surely they have as much to repent of for such a pride, as they have, whose pride is the motive to their prayers and charity. This must be granted, unless we will say, that it is more pardonable to glory in our shame, than to glory in our virtue.

All these instances are only to show us the great necessity of such a regular and uniform piety, as extends itself to all the actions of our common life.

That we must eat and drink, and dress and discourse, according to the sobriety of the Christian spirit, engage in no employments but such as we can truly devote unto God, nor pursue them any further, than so far as conduces to the reasonable ends of a holy devout life.

That we must be honest, not only on particular occasions, and in such instances, as are applauded in the world, easy to be performed, and free from danger, or loss, but from such a living principle of justice, as makes us love truth and integrity in all its instances, follow it through all dangers, and against all opposition ; as knowing that the more we pay for any truth, the better is our bargain, and that then our integrity becomes a Pearl, when we have parted with all to keep it.

That we must be humble, not only in such instances as are expected in the world, or suitable to our tempers, or confined to particular occasions, but in such an humility of spirit, as renders us meek and lowly in the whole course of our lives, as shows itself in our dress, our person, our conversation, our enjoyment of the world, the tranquillity of our minds, patience under injuries, submission to superiors, and condescensions to those that are below us, and in all the outward actions of our lives.

That we must devote, not only times and places to prayer, but be everywhere in the spirit of devotion, with hearts always set towards heaven, looking up to God in all our actions, and doing everything as his servants, living in the world as in a holy temple of God, and always worshipping him, though not with our lips, yet with the thankfulness of our hearts, the holiness of our actions, and the pious and charitable use of all his gifts. That we must not only send up petitions and thoughts, now and then to heaven, but must go through all our worldly business with an heavenly spirit, as members of Christ's mystical body, that with new hearts, and new minds, are to turn an earthly life, into a preparation for a life of greatness and glory in the kingdom of heaven.

Now the only way to arrive at this piety of spirit, is to bring all your actions to the same rule as your devotions and alms. You very well know what it is, that makes the piety of your alms or devotions ; now the same rules, the same regard to God, must render everything else that you do, a fit and acceptable service unto God.

Enough, I hope, has been said, to show you the necessity of thus introducing Religion into all the actions of your common life, and of living and acting with the same regard to God, in all that you do, as in your prayers and alms.

Eating is one of the lowest actions of our lives, it is common to us with mere animals, yet we see that the piety of all ages of the world, has turned this ordinary action of an animal life, into a piety to God, by making every meal to begin and end with devotion.

We see yet some remains of this custom in most Christian families ; some such little formality, as shows you, that people used to call upon God at the beginning and end of their meals. But, indeed, it is now generally so performed, as to look more like a mockery upon devotion, than any solemn application of the mind unto God. In one house you may perhaps see the head of the family just pulling off his hat ; in another half getting up from his seat ; another shall, it may be, proceed so far, as to make as if he had said something ; but, however, these little attempts are the remains of some devotion that was formerly used at such times, and are proofs that religion has formerly belonged to this part of common life.

But to such a pass are we now come, that though the custom is yet preserved, yet we can hardly bear with him, that seems to perform it with any degree of seriousness, and look upon it as a sign of a fanatical temper, if a man has not done it as soon as he begins.

I would not be thought to plead for the necessity of long prayers at these times ; but thus much I think may be said, that if prayer is proper at these times, we ought to oblige ourselves to use such a form of words, as should show, that we solemnly appeal to God for such graces and blessings, as are then proper to the occasion. Otherwise the mock ceremony, instead of blessing our victuals, does but accustom us to trifle with devotion, and give us a habit of being unaffected with our prayers.

If every head of a family was, at the return of every meal, to oblige himself to make a solemn adoration of God, in such a decent manner, as becomes a devout mind, it would be very likely to teach him, that swearing, sensuality, gluttony, and loose discourse, were very improper at those meals, which were to begin and end with devotion.

And in these days of general corruption, this part of devotion is fallen into a mock ceremony, it must be imputed to this cause, that sensuality and intemperance have got too great a power over us, to suffer us to add any devotion to our meals. But thus much must be said, that when we are as pious as Jews and Heathens of all ages have been, we shall think it proper to pray at the beginning and end of our meals.

I have appealed to this pious custom of all ages of the world, as a proof of the reasonableness of the doctrine of this and the foregoing chapters ; that is, as a proof that religion is to be the rule and measure of all the actions of ordinary life. For surely, if we are not to eat, but under such rules of devotion, it must plainly appear, that whatever else we do, must in its proper way, be done with the same regard to the glory of God, and agreeably to the principles of a devout and pious mind.

Chapter V.

Persons that are free from the necessity of labour and employments, are to consider themselves as devoted to God in a higher degree.

GREAT part of the world are free from the necessities of labour and employments, and have their time and fortunes in their own disposal.

But as no one is to live in his employment according to his own humour, or for such ends as please his own fancy, but is to do all his business in such a manner, as to make it a service unto God ; so those who have no particular employment, are so far from being left at greater liberty to live to themselves, to pursue their own humours, and spend their time and fortunes as they please, that they are under greater obligations of living wholly unto God in all their actions.

The freedom of their state, lays them under a greater necessity of always choosing, and doing the best things.

They are those, of whom much will be required, because much is given unto them.

A slave can only live unto God in one particular way, that is, by religious patience and submission in his state of slavery.

But all ways of holy living, all instances, and all kinds of virtue, lie open to those, who are masters of themselves, their time and their fortune.

It is as much the duty therefore, of such persons, to make a wise use of their liberty, to devote themselves to all kinds of virtue, to aspire after everything that is holy and pious, to endeavour to be eminent in all good works, and to please God in the highest and most perfect manner; it is as much their duty to be thus wise in the conduct of themselves, and thus extensive in their endeavours after holiness, as it is the duty of a slave to be resigned unto God in his state of slavery.

You are no labourer, or tradesman, you are neither merchant, nor soldier; consider yourself therefore, as placed in a state, in some degree like that of good angels, who are sent into the world as ministering spirits, for the general good of mankind, to assist, protect, and minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation.

For the more you are free from the common necessities of men, the more you are to imitate the higher perfections of angels.

Had you, Serena, been obliged by the necessities of life, to wash clothes for your maintenance, or to wait upon some mistress, that demanded all your labour, it would then be your duty to serve and glorify God, by such humility, obedience, and faithfulness, as might adorn that state of life.

It would then be recommended to your care, to improve that one talent to its greatest height. That when the time came, that mankind were to be rewarded for their labours by the great Judge of quick and dead, you might be received with a 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of the Lord.*'

But as God has given you five talents, as he has placed you above the necessities of life, as he has left you in the hands of yourself, in the happy liberty of choosing the most exalted ways of virtue; as he has enriched you with many gifts of fortune, and left you nothing to do, but to make the best use of variety of blessings, to make the most of a short life, to study your own perfection, the honour of God, and the good of your neighbour; so it is now your duty to imitate the greatest servants of God, to inquire how the most eminent saints have lived, to study all the arts and methods of perfection, and to set no bounds to your love and gratitude to the bountiful author of so many blessings.

It is now your duty to turn your five talents, into five more, and to consider how your time, and leisure, and health, and fortune, may be made so many happy means of purifying your own soul, improving your fellow-creatures in the ways of virtue, and of carrying you at last to the greatest heights of eternal glory.

As you have no mistress to serve, so let your own soul be the object of your daily care and attendance. Be sorry for its impurities, its spots and imperfections, and study all the holy arts of restoring it to its natural and primitive purity.

Delight in its service, and beg of God to adorn it with every grace and perfection.

Nourish it with good works, give it peace in solitude, get it strength in prayer, make it wise with reading, enlighten it by meditation, make it tender with love, sweeten it with humility, humble it with penance, enliven it with Psalms and Hymns, and comfort it with frequent reflections upon future glory. Keep it in the presence of God, and teach it to imitate those guardian angels, which though they attend on human affairs, and the lowest of mankind, yet 'always behold the face of our Father 'which is in heaven.'*

This, Serena, is your profession. For as sure as God is one God, so sure it is, that he has but one command to all mankind, whether they be bond or free, rich or poor; and that is, to act up to the excellency of that nature which he has given them, to live by reason, to walk in the light of religion, to use everything as wisdom directs, to glorify God in all his gifts, and dedicate every condition of life to his service.

This is the one common command of God to all mankind. If you have an employment, you are to be thus reasonable, and pious, and holy, in the exercise of it; if you have time and a fortune in your own power, you are obliged to be thus reasonable, and holy, and pious, in the use of all your time, and all your fortune.

The right religious use of everything and every talent, is the indispensable duty of every being, that is capable of knowing right and wrong.

For the reason why we are to do anything as unto God, and with regard to our duty, and relation to him, is the same reason why we are to do everything as unto God, and with regard to our duty, and relation to him.

That which is a reason for our being wise and holy, in the discharge of all our business, is the same reason for our being wise and holy in the use of all our money.

As we have always the same natures, and are everywhere the servants of the same God, as every place is equally full of his presence, and everything is equally his gift, so we must always act according to the reason of our nature ; we must do everything as the servants of God ; we must live in every place, as in his presence ; we must use everything, as that ought to be used which belongs to God.

Either this piety and wisdom, and devotion is to go through every way of life, and to extend to the use of everything, or it is to go through no part of life.

If we might forget ourselves, or forget God, if we might disregard our reason, and live by humour and fancy, in anything, or at any time, or in any place, it would be as lawful to do the same in everything, at every time, and every place.

If therefore some People fancy, that they must be grave and solemn at Church, but may be silly and frantic at home ; that they must live by some rule on the Sunday, but may spend other days by chance ; that they must have some times of Prayer, but may waste the rest of their time as they please ; that they must give some money in charity, but may squander away the rest as they have a mind ; such People have not enough considered the nature of Religion, or the true reasons of Piety. For he that upon principles of Reason can tell, why it is good to be wise and heavenly-minded at Church, can tell that it is always desirable to have the same tempers in all other places. He that truly knows why he should spend any time well, knows, that it is never allowable to throw any time away. He that rightly understands the reasonableness, and excellency of Charity, will know, that it can never be excusable to waste any of our money in pride and folly, or in any needless expenses.

For every argument that shows the wisdom and excellency of Charity, proves the wisdom of spending all our fortune well. Every argument that proves the wisdom and reasonableness of having times of Prayer, shows the wisdom and reasonableness of losing none of our time.

If anyone could show, that we need not always act as in the divine presence, that we need not consider and use everything, as the gift of God, that we need not always live by reason, and make Religion the rule of all our actions, the same arguments would show, that we need never act as in the presence of God, nor make Religion and reason the measure of any of our actions. If therefore we are to live unto God at any time, or in any place, we are to live unto him at all times, and in all places. If we are to use anything as the gift of God, we are to use everything as his gift. If we are to do anything by strict rules of reason and piety, we are to do everything in the same manner. Because reason, and wisdom, and piety, are as much the best things at all times, and in all places, as they are the best things, at any time, or in any place.

If it is our glory and happiness to have a rational nature, that is endowed with wisdom and reason, that is capable of imitating the Divine nature, then it must be our glory and happiness, to improve our reason and wisdom, to act up to the excellency of our rational nature, and to imitate God in all our actions, to the utmost of our power. They therefore who confine Religion to times and places, and some little rules of retirement, who think that it is being too strict and rigid to introduce religion into common life, and make it give laws to all their actions and ways of living, they who think thus, not only mistake, but they mistake the whole nature of Religion. For surely they mistake the whole nature of Religion, who can think any part of their life is made more easy, for being free from it. They may well be said to mistake the whole nature of wisdom, who do not think it desirable, to be always wise. He has not learnt the nature of piety, who thinks it too much to be pious in all his actions. He does not sufficiently understand what reason is, who does not earnestly desire to live in everything according to it.

If we had a Religion that consisted in absurd superstitions, that had no regard to the perfection of our nature, People might well be glad to have some part of their life excused from it. But as the Religion of the Gospel is only the refinement, and exaltation of our best faculties, as it only requires a life of the highest Reason, as it only requires us to use this world, as in reason it ought to be used, to live in such tempers as are the glory of intelligent beings, to walk in such wisdom as exalts our nature, and to practise such piety, as will raise us to God; who can think it grievous, to live always in the spirit of such a Religion, to have every part of his life full of it, but he that would think it much more grievous, to be as the Angels of God in heaven?

Further, as God is one and the same being, always acting like himself, and suitably to his own nature, so it is the duty of every being that he has created, to live according to the nature that he has given it, and always to act like itself.

It is therefore an immutable law of God, that all rational beings should act reasonably in all their actions; not at this time, or in that place, or upon this occasion, or in the use of some particular thing, but at all times, in all places, at all occasions, and in the use of all things. This is a law, that is as unchangeable as God, and can no more cease to be, than God can cease to be a God of wisdom and order.

When therefore any being that is endued with reason, does an unreasonable thing at any time, or in any place, or in the use of anything, it sins against the great law of its nature, abuses itself, and sins against God, the author of that nature.

They therefore who plead for indulgences and vanities, for any foolish fashions, customs, and humours of the world, for the misuse of our time, or money, plead for a rebellion against our nature, for a rebellion against God, who has given us reason for no other end, than to make it the rule and measure of all our ways of life.

When therefore you are guilty of any folly, or extravagance, or indulge any vain temper, do not consider it as a small matter, because it may seem so, if compared to some other sins; but consider it, as it is acting contrary to your nature, and then you will see that there is nothing small, that is unreasonable. Because all unreasonable ways are contrary to the nature of all rational beings, whether men, or Angels. Neither of which can be any longer agreeable to God, than so far as they act according to the reason and excellence of their nature.

The infirmities of human life make such food and raiment necessary for us, as Angels do not want; but then it is no more allowable for us to turn these necessities into follies, and indulge ourselves in the luxury of food, or the vanities of dress, than it is allowable for Angels to act below the dignity of their proper state. For a reasonable life, and a wise use of our proper condition, is as much the duty of all men, as it is the duty of all Angels and intelligent beings. These are not speculative flights, or imaginary notions, but are plain and undeniable laws, that are founded in the nature of rational beings, who as such are obliged to live by reason, and glorify God by a continual right use of their several talents and faculties. So that though men are not Angels, yet they may know for what ends, and by what rules, men are to live and act, by considering the state and perfection of Angels. Our blessed Saviour has plainly turned our thoughts this way, by making this petition a constant part of all our Prayers. 'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.' A plain proof, that the obedience of men, is to imitate the obedience of Angels, and that rational beings on earth, are to live unto God, as rational beings in Heaven live unto him.

When therefore you would represent to your mind, how Christians ought to live unto God, and in what degrees of wisdom and holiness, they ought to use the things of this life, you must not look at the world, but you must look up to God, and the society of Angels, and think what wisdom and holiness is fit to prepare you for such a state of glory. You must look to all the highest precepts of the Gospel, you must examine yourself by the spirit of Christ, you must think how the wisest men in the world have lived, you must think how departed souls would live, if they were again to act the short part of human life; you must think what degrees of wisdom, and holiness, you will wish for, when you are leaving the World.

Now all this is not over-straining the matter, or proposing to ourselves, any needless perfection. It is but barely complying with the Apostle's advice, where he says, 'Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.*' For no one can come near the doctrine of this passage, but he that proposes to himself to do everything in this life as the servant of God, to live by reason, in everything that he does, and to make the wisdom and holiness of the Gospel, the rule and measure of his desiring, and using, every gift of God.

Chapter VI.

Containing the great obligations, and the advantages of making a wise and religious use of our estates and fortunes.

AS the holiness of Christianity consecrates all states and employments of life unto God, as it requires us to aspire after an universal obedience, doing and using everything as the servants of God, so are we more especially obliged to observe this religious exactness, in the use of our estates and fortunes.

The reason of this would appear very plain, if we were only to consider, that our estates are as much the gift of God, as our eyes, or our hands, and are no more to be buried, or thrown away at pleasure, than we are to put out our eyes, or throw away our limbs, as we please.

But besides this consideration, there are several other great and important reasons, why we should be religiously exact in the use of our estates.

First, Because the manner of using our money, or spending our estate, enters so far into the business of every day, and makes so great a part of our common life, that our common life must be much of the same nature, as our common way of spending our estate. If reason and religion govern us in this, then reason and religion hath got great hold of us ; but if humour, pride, and fancy, are the measures of our spending our estate, then humour, pride, and fancy, will have the direction of the greatest part of our life.

Secondly, Another great reason for devoting all our estate to right uses, is this, because it is capable of being used to the most excellent purposes, and is so great a means of doing good. If we waste it, we do not waste a trifle, that signifies little, but we waste that which might be made as eyes to the blind, as a husband to the widow, as a father to the orphan : We waste that, which not only enables us to minister worldly comforts to those that are in distress, but that which might purchase for ourselves everlasting treasures in heaven. So that if we part with our money in foolish ways, we part with a great power of comforting our fellow-creatures, and of making ourselves for ever blessed.

If there be nothing so glorious as doing good, if there is nothing that makes us so like to God, then nothing can be so glorious in the use of our money, as to use it all in works of love and goodness, making ourselves friends, and fathers, and benefactors, to all our fellow-creatures, imitating the divine love, and turning all our power into acts of generosity, care, and kindness, to such as are in need of it.

If a man had eyes, and hands, and feet, that he could give to those that wanted them ; if he should either lock them up in a chest, or please himself with some needless, or ridiculous use of them, instead of giving them to his brethren that were blind and lame, should we not justly reckon him an inhuman wretch ? If he should rather choose to amuse himself with furnishing his house with those things, than to entitle himself to an eternal reward, by giving them to those that wanted eyes and hands, might we not justly reckon him mad ?

Now money has very much the nature of eyes and feet ; if we either lock it up in chests, or waste it in needless and ridiculous expenses upon ourselves, whilst the poor and the distressed want it for their necessary uses ; if we consume it in the ridiculous ornaments of apparel, whilst others are starving in nakedness, we are not far from the cruelty of him, that chooses rather to adorn his house with the hands and eyes, than to give them to those that want them. If we choose to indulge ourselves in such expensive enjoyments, as have no real use in them, such as satisfy no real want, rather than to entitle ourselves to an eternal reward, by disposing of our money well, we are guilty of his madness, that rather chooses to lock up eyes and hands, than to make himself for ever blessed, by giving them to those that want them.

For after we have satisfied our own sober and reasonable wants, all the rest of our money is but like spare eyes, or hands; it is something that we cannot keep to ourselves, without being foolish in the use of it, something that can only be used well, by giving it to those that want it.

Thirdly, If we waste our money, we are not only guilty of wasting a talent which God has given us, we are not only guilty of making that useless, which is so powerful a means of doing good, but we do ourselves this further harm, that we turn this useful talent into a powerful means of corrupting ourselves; because so far as it is spent wrong, so far it is spent in the support of some wrong temper, in gratifying some vain and unreasonable desires, in conforming to those fashions, and pride of the world, which, as Christians and reasonable men, we are obliged to renounce.

As wit and fine parts cannot be trifled away, and only lost, but will expose those that have them into greater follies, if they are not strictly devoted to piety: so money, if it is not used strictly according to reason and religion, cannot only be trifled away, but it will betray people into greater follies, and make them live a more silly and extravagant life, than they could have done without it. If, therefore, you do not spend your money in doing good to others, you must spend it to the hurt of yourself. You will act like a man, that should refuse to give that as a cordial to a sick friend, though he could not drink it himself without inflaming his blood. For this is the case of superfluous money; if you give it to those that want it, it is a cordial; if you spend it upon yourself in something that you do not want, it only inflames and disorders your mind, and makes you worse than you would be without it.

Consider again the fore-mentioned comparison; if the man that would not make a right use of spare eyes and hands, should, by continually trying to use them himself, spoil his own eyes and hands, we might justly accuse him of still greater madness.

Now this is truly the case of riches spent upon ourselves in vain and needless expenses; in trying to use them where they have no real use, nor we any real want, we only use them to our great hurt, in creating unreasonable desires, in nourishing ill tempers, in indulging our passions, and supporting a worldly, vain turn of mind. For high eating and drinking, fine clothes, and fine houses, state, and equipage, gay pleasures, and diversions, do all of them naturally hurt, and disorder our hearts; they are the food and nourishment of all the folly and weakness of our nature, and are certain means to make us vain and worldly in our tempers. They are all of them the support of something, that ought not to be supported; they are contrary to that sobriety and piety of heart, which relishes divine things; they are like so many weights upon our minds, that make us less able, and less inclined to raise up our thoughts and affections to the things that are above.

So that money thus spent, is not merely wasted, or lost, but it is spent to bad purposes, and miserable effects, to the corruption and disorder of our hearts, and to the making us less able to live up to the sublime doctrines of the Gospel. It is but like keeping money from the poor, to buy poison for ourselves.

For so much as is spent in the vanity of dress, may be reckoned so much laid out to fix vanity in our minds. So much as is laid out for idleness and indulgence, may be reckoned so much given to render our hearts dull and sensual. So much as is spent in state and equipage, may be reckoned so much spent to dazzle your own eyes, and render you the idol of your own imagination. And so in everything, when you go from reasonable wants, you only support some unreasonable temper, some turn of mind, which every good Christian is called upon to renounce.

So that on all accounts, whether we consider our fortune as a talent, and trust from God, or the great good that it enables us to do, or the great harm that it does to ourselves, if idly spent; on all these great accounts it appears, that it is absolutely necessary, to make reason and religion the strict rule of using all our fortune.

Every exhortation in Scripture to be wise and reasonable, satisfying only such wants as God would have satisfied; every exhortation to be spiritual and heavenly, pressing after a glorious change of our nature; every exhortation to love our neighbour as ourselves, to love all mankind as God has loved them, is a command to be strictly religious in the use of our money. For none of these tempers can be complied with, unless we be wise and reasonable, spiritual and heavenly, exercising a brotherly love, a godlike charity in the use of all our fortune. These tempers, and this use of our worldly goods, is so much the doctrine of all the New Testament, that you cannot read a chapter, without being taught something of it. I shall only produce one remarkable passage of Scripture, which is sufficient to justify all that I have said concerning this religious use of all our fortune.

‘When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. And before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.— Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels; for I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.’

I have quoted this passage at length, because if one looks at the way of the world, one would hardly think, that Christians had ever read this part of Scripture. For what is there in the lives of Christians, that looks as if their salvation depended upon these good works? And yet the necessity of them is here asserted in the highest manner, and pressed upon us by a lively description of the glory and terrors of the day of Judgment.

Some people, even of those who may be reckoned virtuous Christians, look upon this text only as a general recommendation of occasional works of charity; whereas it shows the necessity not only of occasional charities now and then, but the necessity of such an entire charitable life, as is a continual exercise of all such works of charity as we are able to perform.

You own, that you have no title to salvation, if you have neglected these good works; because such persons as have neglected them, are, at the last day, to be placed on the left hand, and banished with a Depart, ye cursed. There is, therefore, no salvation but in the performance of these good Works. Who is it, therefore, that may be said to have performed these good Works? Is it he that has sometime assisted a prisoner, or relieved the poor or sick? This would be as absurd, as to say, that he had performed the duties of devotion, who had sometime said his prayers. Is it, therefore, he that has several times done these works of charity? This can no more be said, than he can be said to be the truly just man, who had done acts of justice several times. What is the rule therefore, or measure of performing these good works? How shall a man trust that he performs them as he ought?

Now the rule is very plain and easy, and such as is common to every other virtue, or good temper, as well as to charity.—Who is the humble, or meek, or devout, or just, or faithful man? Is it he that has several times done acts of humility, meekness, devotion, justice, or fidelity? No. But it is he that lives in the habitual exercise of these virtues. In like manner, he only can be said to have performed these works of charity, who lives in the habitual exercise of them to the utmost of his power. He only has performed the duty of divine love, who loves God with all his heart, and with all his mind, and with all his strength. And he only has performed the duty of these good works, who has done them with all his heart, and with all his mind, and with all his strength. For there is no other measure of our doing good, than our power of doing it.

The Apostle St. Peter puts this question to our blessed Saviour; 'Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him, till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, until seven times; but until seventy times seven.*' Not as if after this number of offences, a man might then cease to forgive; but the expression of seventy times seven, is to show us, that we are not to bind our forgiveness by any number of offences, but are to continue forgiving the most repeated offences against us. Thus our Saviour saith in another place, if he trespass 'against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.†' If, therefore, a man ceases to forgive his brother, because he has forgiven him often already; if he excuses himself from forgiving this man, because he has forgiven several others; such a one breaks this law of Christ, concerning the forgiving one's brother.

Now the rule of forgiving, is also the rule of giving; you are not to give, or do good to seven, but to seventy times seven. You are not to cease from giving, because you have given often to the same person, or to other persons; but must look upon yourself as much obliged to continue relieving those that continue in want, as you were obliged to relieve them once or twice. Had it not been in your power, you had been excused from relieving any person once; but if it is in your power to relieve people often, it is as much your duty to do it often, as it is the duty of others to do it but seldom because they are but seldom able. He that is not ready to forgive every brother, as often as he wants to be forgiven, does not forgive like a disciple of Christ. And he that is not ready to give to every brother, that wants to have something given him, does not give like a disciple of Christ. For it is as necessary to give to seventy times seven, to live in the continual exercise of all good works to the utmost of our power, as it is necessary to forgive until seventy times seven, and live in the habitual exercise of this forgiving temper, towards all that want it.

* Matt. xviii. 22.

And the reason of all this is very plain, because there is the same goodness, the same excellency, and the same necessity of being thus charitable at one time, as at another. It is as much the best use of our money, to be always doing good with it, as it is the best use of it at any particular time; so that that which is a reason for a charitable action, is as good a reason for a charitable life. That which is a reason for forgiving one offence, is the same reason for forgiving all offences. For such charity has nothing to recommend it to-day, but what will be the same recommendation of it to-morrow; and you cannot neglect it at one time, without being guilty of the same sin, as if you neglected it at another time.

As sure, therefore, as these works of charity are necessary to salvation, so sure is it, that we are to do them to the utmost of our power; not to-day, or to-morrow, but through the whole course of our life. If therefore it be our duty at any time to deny ourselves any needless expenses, to be moderate and frugal, that we may have to give to those that want, it is as much our duty to do so at all times, that we may be further able to do more good: For if it is at any time a sin to prefer needless vain expense, to works of charity, it is so at all times: because charity as much excels all needless and vain expenses at one time, as at another. So that if it is ever necessary to our salvation, to take care of these works of charity, and to see that we make ourselves in some degree capable of doing them, it is as necessary to our salvation, to take care to make ourselves as capable as we can be, of performing them in all the parts of our life.

Either therefore you must so far renounce your Christianity, as to say, that you need never perform any of these good works; or you must own, that you are to perform them all your life in as high a degree as you are able. There is no middle way to be taken, any more than there is a middle way betwixt pride and humility, or temperance and intemperance. If you do not strive to fulfil all charitable works, if you neglect any of them that are in your power, and deny assistance to those that want what you can give, let it be when it will, or where it will, you number yourself amongst those that want Christian charity.

Because it is as much your duty to do good with all that you have, and to live in the continual exercise of good works, as it is your duty to be temperate in all that you eat and drink.

Hence also appears the necessity of renouncing all those foolish and unreasonable expenses, which the pride and folly of mankind have made so common and fashionable in the world. For if it is necessary to do good works, as far as you are able, it must be as necessary to renounce those needless ways of spending money, which render you unable to do works of charity.

You must therefore no more conform to these ways of the world, than you must conform to the vices of the world; you must no more spend with those that idly waste their money as their own humour leads them, than you must drink with the drunken, or indulge yourself with the epicure; because a course of such expenses is no more consistent with a life of charity, than excess in drinking is consistent with a life of sobriety. When therefore any one tells you of the lawfulness of expensive apparel, or the innocency of pleasing yourself with costly satisfactions, only imagine that the same person was to tell you, that you need not do works of charity; that Christ does not require you to do good unto your poor brethren, as unto him; and then you will see the wickedness of such advice: For to tell you, that you may live in such expenses, as make it impossible for you to live in the exercise of good works, is the same thing as telling you, that you need not have any care about such good works themselves.

Chapter VII.

How the imprudent use of an estate corrupts all the tempers of the mind, and fills the heart with poor and ridiculous passions, through the whole course of life; represented in the character of Flavia.

IT has already been observed, that a prudent and religious care is to be used, in the manner of spending our money or estate, because the manner of spending our estates makes so great a part of our common life, and is so much the business of every day, that according as we are wise, or imprudent, in this respect, the whole course of our lives, will be rendered either very wise, or very full of folly.

Persons that are well affected to Religion, that receive instructions of piety with pleasure and satisfaction, often wonder how it comes to pass, that they make no greater progress in that Religion which they so much admire.

Now the reason of it is this ; it is because Religion lives only in their head, but something else has possession of their hearts ; and therefore they continue from year to year mere admirers, and praisers of piety, without ever coming up to the reality and perfection of its precepts.

If it be asked, why Religion does not get possession of their hearts, the reason is this. It is not because they live in gross sins, or debaucheries, for their regard to religion preserves them from such disorders.

But it is because their hearts are constantly employed, perverted, and kept in a wrong state, by the indiscreet use of such things as are lawful to be used.

The use and enjoyment of their estates is lawful, and therefore it never comes into their heads, to imagine any great danger from that quarter. They never reflect, that there is a vain, and imprudent use of their estates, which, though it does not destroy like gross sins, yet so disorders the heart, and supports it in such sensuality and dulness, such pride and vanity, as makes it incapable of receiving the life and spirit of piety.

For our souls may receive an infinite hurt, and be rendered incapable of all virtues, merely by the use of innocent and lawful things.

What is more innocent than rest and retirement ? And yet what more dangerous, than sloth and idleness ? What is more lawful than eating and drinking ? And yet what more destructive of all virtue, what more fruitful of all vice, than sensuality and indulgence ?

How lawful and praiseworthy is the care of a family ? And yet how certainly are many people rendered incapable of all virtue, by a worldly and solicitous temper ?

Now it is for want of religious exactness in the use of these innocent and lawful things, that Religion cannot get possession of our hearts. And it is in the right and prudent management of ourselves, as to these things, that all the arts of holy living chiefly consist.

Gross sins are plainly seen, and easily avoided by persons that profess Religion. But the indiscreet and dangerous use of innocent and lawful things, as it does not shock and offend our consciences, so it is difficult to make people at all sensible of the danger of it.

A Gentleman that expends all his estate in sports, and a woman that lays out all her fortune upon herself, can hardly be persuaded that the spirit of Religion cannot subsist in such a way of life.

These persons, as has been observed, may live free from debaucheries, they may be friends of Religion, so far as to praise and speak well of it, and admire it in their imaginations; but it cannot govern their hearts, and be the spirit of their actions, till they change their way of life, and let Religion give laws to the use and spending of their estates.

For a woman that loves dress, that thinks no expense too great to bestow upon the adorning of her person, cannot stop there. For that temper draws a thousand other follies along with it, and will render the whole course of her life, her business, her conversation, her hopes, her fears, her taste, her pleasures, and diversions, all suitable to it.

Flavia and Miranda are two maiden sisters, that have each of them two hundred pounds a year. They buried their parents, twenty years ago, and have since that time spent their estate as they pleased.

Flavia has been the wonder of all her friends, for her excellent management, in making so surprising a figure in so moderate a fortune. Several ladies that have twice her fortune, are not able to be always so genteel, and so constant at all places of pleasure and expense. She has everything that is in the fashion, and is in every place where there is any diversion. Flavia is very orthodox, she talks warmly against heretics and schismatics, is generally at Church, and often at the sacrament. She once commended a sermon that was against the pride and vanity of dress, and thought it was very just against Lucinda, whom she takes to be a great deal finer than she need to be. If anyone asks Flavia to do something in charity, if she likes the person who makes the proposal, or happens to be in a right temper, she will toss him half-a-crown or a crown, and tell him, if he knew what a long Milliner's bill she had just received, he would think it a great deal for her to give. A quarter of a year after this, she hears a sermon upon the necessity of charity; she thinks the man preaches well, that it is a very proper subject, that people want much to be put in mind of it; but she applies nothing to herself, because she remembers that she gave a crown some time ago, when she could so ill spare it.

As for poor people themselves, she will admit of no complaints from them; she is very positive they are all cheats and liars; and will say anything to get relief, and therefore it must be a sin to encourage them in their evil ways.

You would think Flavia had the tenderest conscience in the world ; if you were to see, how scrupulous and apprehensive she is of the guilt and danger of giving amiss.

She buys all books of wit and humour, and has made an expensive collection of all our English Poets. For she says, one cannot have a true taste of any of them, without being very conversant with them all. She will sometimes read a book of Piety, if it is a short one, if it is much commended for style and language, and she can tell where to borrow it.

Flavia is very idle, and yet very fond of fine work ; this makes her often sit working in bed until noon, and be told many a long story before she is up ; so that I need not tell you, that her morning devotions are not always rightly performed.

Flavia would be a miracle of Piety, if she were but half so careful of her soul, as she is of her body. The rising of a pimple in her face, the sting of a gnat, will make her keep her room two or three days, and she thinks they are very rash people that do not take care of things in time. This makes her so over-careful of her health, that she never thinks she is well enough ; and so over-indulgent, that she never can be really well. So that it costs her a great deal in sleeping-draughts and waking-draughts, in spirits for the head, in drops for the nerves, in cordials for the stomach, and in saffron for her tea.

If you visit Flavia on the Sunday, you will always meet good company, you will know what is doing in the world, you will hear the last lampoon, be told who wrote it, and who is meant by every name that is in it. You will hear what plays were acted that week, which is the finest song in the opera, who was intolerable at the last assembly, and what games are most in fashion. Flavia thinks they are Atheists that play at cards on the Sunday, but she will tell you the nicety of all the games, what cards she held, how she played them, and the history of all that happened at play, as soon as she comes from Church. If you would know who is rude and ill-natured, who is vain and foppish, who lives too high, and who is in debt : If you would know what is the quarrel at a certain house, or who and who are in love : If you would know how late Belinda comes home at night, what clothes she has bought, how she loves compliments, and what a long story she told at such a place : If you would know how cross Lucius is to his wife, what ill-natured things he says to her, when nobody hears him ; if you would know how they hate one another in their hearts, though they appear so kind in public ; you must visit Flavia on the Sunday. But still she has so great a regard for the holiness of the Sunday, that she has turned a poor old widow out of her house, as a profane wretch, for having been found once mending her clothes on the Sunday night.

Thus lives Flavia; and if she lives ten years longer, she will have spent about fifteen hundred and sixty Sundays after this manner. She will have worn about two hundred different suits of clothes. Out of this thirty years of her life, fifteen of them will have been disposed of in bed; and of the remaining fifteen, about fourteen of them will have been consumed in eating, drinking, dressing, visiting, conversation, reading and hearing Plays and Romances, at Operas, Assemblies, Balls and Diversions. For you may reckon all the time that she is up, thus spent, except about an hour and half, that is disposed of at Church, most Sundays in the year. With great management, and under mighty rules of economy, she will have spent sixty hundred pounds upon herself, bating only some shillings, crowns, or half-crowns, that have gone from her in accidental charities.

I shall not take upon me to say, that it is impossible for Flavia to be saved; but thus much must be said, that she has no grounds from Scripture to think she is in the way of salvation. For her whole life is in direct opposition to all those tempers and practices, which the Gospel has made necessary to salvation.

If you were to hear her say, that she had lived all her life like Anna the Prophetess, who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers, night and day, you would look upon her as very extravagant; and yet this would be no greater an extravagance, than for her to say, that she has been striving to enter in at the strait gate, or making any one doctrine of the Gospel, a rule of her life.

She may as well say, that she lived with our Saviour when he was upon earth, as that she has lived in imitation of him, or made it any part of her care to live in such tempers, as he required of all those that would be his disciples. She may as truly say, that she has every day washed the saints' feet, as that she has lived in Christian humility and poverty of spirit; and as reasonably think, that she has taught a Charity-school, as that she has lived in works of charity. She has as much reason to think, that she has been a sentinel in an army, as that she has lived in watching, and self-denial. And it may as fairly be said, that she lived by the labour of her hands, as that she had given all diligence to make her calling and election sure.

And here it is to be well observed, that the poor, vain turn of mind, the irreligion, the folly and vanity of this whole life of Flavia, is all owing to the manner of using her estate. It is this that has formed her spirit, that has given life to every idle temper, that has supported every trifling passion, and kept her from all thoughts of a prudent, useful, and devout life.

When her parents died, she had no thought about her two hundred pounds a year, but that she had so much money to do what she would with, to spend upon herself, and purchase the pleasures and gratifications of all her passions.

And it is this setting out, this false judgment and indiscreet use of her fortune, that has filled her whole life with the same indiscretion, and kept her from thinking of what is right, and wise, and pious in everything else.

If you have seen her delighted in plays and romances, in scandal and backbiting, easily flattered, and soon affronted: if you have seen her devoted to pleasures and diversions, a slave to every passion in its turn, nice in everything that concerned her body or dress, careless of everything that might benefit her soul, always wanting some new entertainment, and ready for every happy invention, in show or dress, it was because she had purchased all these tempers with the yearly revenue of her fortune.

She might have been humble, serious, devout, a lover of good books, an admirer of prayer and retirement, careful of her time, diligent in good works, full of charity and the love of God, but that the imprudent use of her estate forced all the contrary tempers upon her.

And it was no wonder, that she should turn her time, her mind, her health, her strength, to the same uses that she turned her fortune. It is owing to her being wrong in so great an article of life, that you can see nothing wise, or reasonable, or pious in any other part of it.

Now though the irregular trifling spirit of this character belongs, I hope, but to few people, yet many may here learn some instruction from it, and perhaps see something of their own spirit in it.

For as Flavia seems to be undone by the unreasonable use of her fortune, so the lowness of most people's virtue, the imperfections of their piety, and the disorders of their passions, is generally owing to their imprudent use and enjoyment of lawful and innocent things.

More people are kept from a true sense and taste of Religion, by a regular kind of sensuality and indulgence, than by gross drunkenness. More men live regardless of the great duties of piety, through too great a concern for worldly goods, than through direct injustice.

This man would perhaps be devout, if he were not so great a Virtuoso. Another is deaf to all the motives to piety, by indulging an idle, slothful temper.

Could you cure This man of his great curiosity and inquisitive temper, or That of his false satisfaction and thirst after learning, you need do no more to make them both become men of great piety.

If this woman would make fewer visits, or That not be always talking, they would neither of them find it half so hard to be affected with Religion.

For all these things are only little, when they are compared to great sins; and though they are little in that respect, yet they are great, as they are impediments and hindrances of a pious spirit.

For as consideration is the only eye of the soul, as the truths of Religion can be seen by nothing else, so whatever raises a levity of mind, a trifling spirit, renders the soul incapable of seeing, apprehending, and relishing the doctrines of piety.

Would we therefore make a real progress in Religion, we must not only abhor gross and notorious sins, but we must regulate the innocent and lawful parts of our behaviour, and put the most common and allowed actions of life, under the rules of discretion and piety.

Chapter VIII.

How the wise and pious use of an Estate, naturally carrieth us to great perfection in all the virtues of the Christian Life; represented in the character of Miranda.

ANY one pious regularity of any one part of our life, is of great advantage, not only on its own account, but as it uses us to live by rule, and think of the government of ourselves.

A man of business, that has brought one part of his affairs under certain rules, is in a fair way to take the same care of the rest.

So he that has brought any one part of his life under the rules of religion, may thence be taught to extend the same order and regularity into other parts of his life.

If anyone is so wise as to think his time too precious to be disposed of by chance, and left to be devoured by anything that happens in his way: If he lays himself under a necessity of observing how every day goes through his hands, and obliges himself to a certain order of time in his business, his retirements, and devotions, it is hardly to be imagined, how soon such a conduct would reform, improve, and perfect the whole course of his life.

He that once thus knows the value, and reaps the advantage of a well-ordered time, will not long be a stranger to the value of anything else that is of any real concern to him.

A rule that relates even to the smallest part of our life, is of great benefit to us, merely as it is a rule.

For as the Proverb saith, He that has begun well, has half done: So he that has begun to live by rule, has gone a great way towards the perfection of his life.

By rule, must here be constantly understood, a religious rule, observed upon a principle of duty to God.

For if a man should oblige himself to be moderate in his meals, only in regard to his stomach; or abstain from drinking, only to avoid the headache; or be moderate in his sleep, through fear of a lethargy, he might be exact in these rules, without being at all the better man for them.

But when he is moderate and regular in any of these things, out of a sense of Christian sobriety and self-denial, that he may offer unto God a more reasonable and holy life, then it is, that the smallest rule of this kind, is naturally the beginning of great piety.

For the smallest rule in these matters is of great benefit, as it teaches us some part of the government of ourselves, as it keeps up a tenderness of mind, as it presents God often to our thoughts, and brings a sense of religion into the ordinary actions of our common life.

If a man, whenever he was in company, where anyone swore, talked lewdly, or spoke evil of his neighbour, should make it a rule to himself, either gently to reprove him, or if that was not proper, then to leave the company as decently as he could; he would find, that this little rule, like a little leaven hid in a great quantity of meal, would spread and extend itself through the whole form of his life.

If another should oblige himself to abstain on the Lord's Day from many innocent and lawful things, as travelling, visiting, common conversation, and discoursing upon worldly matters, as trade, news, and the like; if he should devote the day, besides the public worship, to greater retirement, reading, devotion, instruction, and works of Charity: Though it may seem but a small thing, or a needless nicety, to require a man to abstain from such things as may be done without sin, yet whoever would try the benefit of so little a rule, would perhaps thereby find such a change made in his spirit, and such a taste of piety raised in his mind, as he was an entire stranger to before.

It would be easy to show, in many other instances, how little and small matters are the first steps, and natural beginnings of great perfection.

But the two things which of all others, most want to be under a strict rule, and which are the greatest blessings both to ourselves and others, when they are rightly used, are our time, and our money. These talents are continual means and opportunities of doing good.

He that is piously strict, and exact in the wise management of either of these, cannot be long ignorant of the right use of the other. And he that is happy in the religious care and disposal of them both, has already ascended several steps upon the ladder of Christian perfection.

Miranda (the Sister of Flavia) is a sober, reasonable Christian; as soon as she was mistress of her time and fortune, it was her first thought, how she might best fulfil everything that God required of her in the use of them, and how she might make the best and happiest use of this short life. She depends upon the truth of what our blessed Lord hath said, that there is but one thing needful, and therefore makes her whole life but one continual labour after it. She has but one reason for doing, or not doing, for liking, or not liking anything, and that is, the will of God. She is not so weak as to pretend to add, what is called the fine lady, to the true Christian; Miranda thinks too well, to be taken with the sound of such silly words; she has renounced the world to follow Christ in the exercise of humility charity, devotion, abstinence, and heavenly affections; and that is Miranda's fine breeding.

Whilst she was under her mother, she was forced to be genteel, to live in ceremony, to sit up late at nights, to be in the folly of every fashion, and always visiting on Sundays; to go patched, and loaded with a burden of finery, to the holy Sacrament; to be in every polite conversation; to hear profaneness at the playhouse, and wanton songs and love intrigues at the opera; to dance at public places, that fops and rakes might admire the fineness of her shape, and the beauty of her motions. The remembrance of this way of life, makes her exceeding careful to atone for it, by a contrary behaviour.

Miranda does not divide her duty between God, her neighbour, and herself; but she considers all as due to God, and so does everything in his name, and for his sake. This makes her consider her fortune, as the gift of God, that is to be used as everything is, that belongs to God, for the wise and reasonable ends of a Christian and holy life. Her fortune therefore is divided betwixt herself, and several other poor People, and she has only her part of relief from it. She thinks it the same folly to indulge herself in needless, vain expenses, as to give to other People to spend in the same way. Therefore she will not give a poor man money to go see a Puppet-show, neither will she allow herself any to spend in the same manner; thinking it very proper to be as wise herself, as she expects poor men should be. For is it a folly and a crime in a poor man, says Miranda, to waste what is given him in foolish trifles, whilst he wants meat, drink, and clothes? And is it less folly, or a less crime in me, to spend that money in silly diversions, which might be so much better spent in imitation of the divine goodness, in works of kindness and charity towards my fellow-creatures, and Fellow-Christians? If a poor man's own necessities are a reason why he should not waste any of his money idly, surely the necessities of the poor, the excellency of Charity, which is received as done to Christ himself, is a much greater reason why no one should ever waste any of his money. For if he does so, he does not only do like the poor man, only waste that which he wants himself, but he wastes that which is wanted for the most noble use, and which Christ himself is ready to receive at his hands. And if we are angry at a poor man, and look upon him as a wretch, when he throws away that which should buy his own bread; how must we appear in the sight of God, if we make a wanton idle use of that, which should buy bread and clothes for the hungry and naked brethren, who are as near and dear to God as we are, and fellow-heirs of the same state of future Glory? This is the spirit of Miranda, and thus she uses the gifts of God; she is only one of a certain number of poor People, that are relieved out of her fortune, and she only differs from them in the blessedness of giving.

Excepting her victuals, she never spent ten pounds a year upon herself. If you were to see her, you would wonder what poor body it was, that was so surprisingly neat and clean. She has but one rule that she observes in her dress, to be always clean, and in the cheapest things. Everything about her resembles the purity of her soul, and she is always clean without, because she is always pure within.

Every morning sees her early at her Prayers, she rejoices in the beginning of every day, because it begins all her pious rules of holy living, and brings the fresh pleasure of repeating them. She seems to be as a guardian Angel to those that dwell about her, with her watchings and prayers blessing the place where she dwells, and making intercession with God for those that are asleep.

Her devotions have had some intervals, and God has heard several of her private Prayers, before the light is suffered to enter into her sister's room. Miranda does not know what it is to have a dull half-day; the return of her hours of Prayer, and her religious exercises, come too often to let any considerable part of time lie heavy upon her hands.

When you see her at work, you see the same wisdom that governs all her other actions, she is either doing something that is necessary for herself, or necessary for others, who want to be assisted. There is scarcely a poor family in the neighbourhood, but wears something or other that has had the labour of her hands. Her wise and pious mind neither wants the amusement, nor can bear with the folly of idle and impertinent work. She can admit of no such folly as this in the day, because she is to answer for all her actions at night. When there is no wisdom to be observed in the employment of her hands, when there is no useful or charitable work to be done, Miranda will work no more. At her table she lives strictly by this rule of holy Scripture, 'Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.' This makes her begin and end every meal, as she begins and ends every day, with acts of devotion: She eats and drinks only for the sake of living, and with so regular an abstinence, that every meal is an exercise of self-denial, and she humbles her body every time that she is forced to feed it. If Miranda were to run a race for her life, she would submit to a diet that was proper for it. But as the race which is set before her, is a race of holiness, purity, and heavenly affection, which she is to finish in a corrupt, disordered body of earthly passions, so her everyday diet has only this one end, to make her body fitter for this spiritual race. She does not weigh her meat in a pair of scales, but she weighs it in a much better balance; so much as gives a proper strength to her body, and renders it able and willing to obey the soul, to join in Psalms and Prayers, and lift up eyes and hands towards Heaven with greater readiness, so much is Miranda's meal. So that Miranda will never have her eyes swell with fatness, or pant under a heavy load of flesh, until she has changed her religion.

The holy Scriptures, especially of the New Testament, are her daily study; these she reads with a watchful attention, constantly casting an eye upon herself, and trying herself, by every doctrine that is there. When she has the New Testament in her hand, she supposes herself at the feet of our Saviour and his Apostles, and makes everything that she learns of them, so many laws of her life. She receives their sacred words with as much attention, and reverence, as if she saw their persons, and knew that they were just come from Heaven, on purpose to teach her the way that leads to it.

She thinks, that the trying of herself every day by the doctrines of Scripture, is the only possible way to be ready for her trial at the last day. She is sometimes afraid that she lays out too much money in books, because she cannot forbear buying all practical books of any note; especially such as enter into the heart of religion, and describe the inward holiness of the Christian life. But of all human writings, the lives of pious persons, and eminent saints, are her greatest delight. In these she searches as for hidden treasure, hoping to find some secret of holy living, some uncommon degree of piety, which she may make her own. By this means Miranda has her head and her heart, so stored with all the principles of wisdom and holiness, she is so full of the one main business of life, that she finds it difficult to converse upon any other subject; and if you are in her company, when she thinks it proper to talk, you must be made wiser and better, whether you will or no.

To relate her charity, would be to relate the history of every day for twenty years; for so long has all her fortune been spent that way. She has set up nearly twenty poor tradesmen that had failed in their business, and saved as many from failing. She has educated several poor children, that were picked up in the streets, and put them in a way of an honest employment. As soon as any labourer is confined at home with sickness, she sends him, till he recovers, twice the value of his wages, that he may have one part to give to his family, as usual, and the other to provide things convenient for his sickness.

If a family seems too large to be supported by the labour of those that can work in it, she pays their rent, and gives them something yearly towards their clothing. By this means, there are many poor families that live in a comfortable manner, and are from year to year blessing her in their prayers.

If there is any poor man or woman, that is more than ordinarily wicked and reprobate, Miranda has her eye upon them, she watches their time of need and adversity; and if she can discover that they are in any great straits, or affliction, she gives them speedy relief. She has this care for this sort of people, because she once saved a very profligate person from being carried to prison, who immediately became a true penitent.

There is nothing in the character of Miranda more to be admired, than this temper. For this tenderness of affection towards the most abandoned sinners, is the highest instance of a divine and God-like soul.

Miranda once passed by a house, where the man and his wife were cursing and swearing at one another, in a most dreadful manner, and three children crying about them; this sight so much affected her compassionate mind, that she went the next day, and bought the three children, that they might not be ruined by living with such wicked parents; they now live with Miranda, are blessed with her care and prayers, and all the good works which she can do for them. They hear her talk, they see her live, they join with her in Psalms and Prayers. The eldest of them has already converted his parents from their wicked life, and shows a turn of mind so remarkably pious, that Miranda intends him for holy orders; that being thus saved himself, he may be zealous in the salvation of souls, and do to other miserable objects, as she has done to him.

Miranda is a constant relief to poor people in their misfortunes and accidents; there are sometimes little misfortunes that happen to them, which of themselves they could never be able to overcome. The death of a cow, or a horse, or some little robbery, would keep them in distress all their lives. She does not suffer them to grieve under such accidents as these. She immediately gives them the full value of their loss, and makes use of it as a means of raising their minds towards God.

She has a great tenderness for old people that are grown past their labour. The parish allowance to such people is very seldom a comfortable maintenance. For this reason they are the constant objects of her care; she adds so much to their allowance, as somewhat exceeds the wages they got when they were young. This she does to comfort the infirmities of their age, that being free from trouble and distress, they may serve God in peace, and tranquillity of mind. She has generally a large number of this kind, who by her charities and exhortations to holiness, spend their last days in great piety and devotion.

Miranda never wants compassion, even to common beggars; especially towards those that are old or sick, or full of sores, that want eyes or limbs. She hears their complaints with tenderness, gives them some proof of her kindness, and never rejects them with hard, or reproachful language, for fear of adding affliction to her fellow-creatures.

If a poor old traveller tells her, that he has neither strength, nor food, nor money left, she never bids him go to the place from whence he came, or tells him, that she cannot relieve him, because he may be a cheat, or she does not know him; but she relieves him for that reason, because he is a stranger, and unknown to her. For it is the most noble part of charity, to be kind and tender to those whom we never saw before, and perhaps never may see again in this life. I was a stranger, and ye took me in, saith our blessed Saviour; but who can perform this duty, that will not relieve persons that are unknown to him?

Miranda considers, that Lazarus was a common beggar, that he was the care of Angels, and carried into Abraham's bosom.

She considers, that our blessed Saviour and his Apostles, were kind to beggars; that they spoke comfortably to them, healed their diseases, and restored eyes and limbs to the lame and blind. That Peter said to the beggar that wanted an alms from him, 'Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee; in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk.' Miranda, therefore, never treats beggars with disregard and aversion, but she imitates the kindness of our Saviour and his Apostles towards them; and though she cannot, like them, work miracles for their relief, yet she relieves them with that power that she hath; and may say with the Apostle, 'Such as I have give I thee, in the name of Jesus Christ.'

It may be, says Miranda, that I may often give to those that do not deserve it, or that will make an ill use of my alms. But what then? Is not this the very method of divine goodness? Does not God make his sun to rise on the evil, and on the good? Is not this the very goodness that is recommended to us in Scripture, that by imitating of it, we may be children of our Father which is in Heaven, who sendeth rain on the just, and on the unjust? And shall I with-hold a little money, or food, from my fellow-creature, for fear he should not be good enough to receive it of me? Do I beg of God to deal with me, not according to my merit, but according to his own great goodness; and shall I be so absurd, as to with-hold my charity from a poor brother, because he may perhaps not deserve it? Shall I use a measure towards him, which I pray God never to use towards me?

Besides, where has the Scripture made merit the rule or measure of charity? On the contrary, the Scripture saith, 'If thy enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink.'

Now this plainly teaches us, that the merit of persons is to be no rule of our charity, but that we are to do acts of kindness to those that least of all deserve it. For if I am to love and do good to my worst enemies; if I am to be charitable to them, notwithstanding all their spite and malice, surely merit is no measure of charity. If I am not to with-hold my charity from such bad people, and who are at the same time my enemies, surely I am not to deny alms to poor beggars, whom I neither know to be bad people, nor any way my enemies.

You will perhaps say, that by this means I encourage people to be beggars. But the same thoughtless objection may be made against all kinds of charities, for they may encourage people to depend upon them. The same may be said against forgiving our enemies, for it may encourage people to do us hurt. The same may be said even against the goodness of God, that by pouring his blessings on the evil and on the good, on the just and on the unjust, evil and unjust men are encouraged in their wicked ways. The same may be said against clothing the naked, or giving medicines to the sick, for that may encourage people to neglect themselves, and be careless of their health. But when the love of God dwelleth in you, when it has enlarged your heart, and filled you with bowels of mercy and compassion, you will make no more such objections as these.

When you are at any time turning away the poor, the old, the sick and helpless traveller, the lame, or the blind, ask yourself this question, Do I sincerely wish these poor creatures may be as happy as Lazarus, that was carried by Angels into Abraham's bosom? Do I sincerely desire that God would make them fellow-heirs with me in eternal Glory? Now if you search into your soul, you will find that there are none of these motions there, that you are wishing nothing of this. For it is impossible for anyone heartily to wish a poor creature so great a happiness, and yet not have a heart to give him a small alms. For this reason, says Miranda, as far as I can, I give to all, because I pray to God to forgive all; and I cannot refuse an alms to those whom I pray God to bless, whom I wish to be partakers of eternal glory, but am glad to show some degree of love to such, as, I hope, will be the objects of the infinite Love of God. And if, as our Saviour has assured us, it be more blessed to give than to receive, we ought to look upon those that ask our alms, as so many friends and benefactors, that come to do us a greater good than they can receive, that come to exalt our virtue, to be witnesses of our charity, to be monuments of our love, to be our advocates with God, to be to us in Christ's stead, to appear for us at the day of judgment, and to help us to a blessedness greater than our alms can bestow on them.

This is the spirit, and this is the life of the devout Miranda; and if she lives ten years longer, she will have spent fifty hundred pounds in charity, for that which she allows herself, may fairly be reckoned amongst her alms.

When she dies, she must shine amongst Apostles, and Saints, and Martyrs; she must stand amongst the first servants of God, and be glorious amongst those that have fought the good fight, and finished their course with joy.

Chapter IX.

Containing some reflections upon the life of Miranda, and showing how it may, and ought to be imitated by all her sex.

NOW this life of Miranda, which I heartily recommend to the imitation of her sex, however contrary it may seem to the way and fashion of the world, is yet suitable to the true spirit, and founded upon the plainest doctrines of Christianity.

To live as she does, is as truly suitable to the Gospel of Christ, as to be baptized, or receive the Sacrament.

Her spirit is that which animated the Saints of former ages ; and it is because they lived as she does, that we now celebrate their memories, and praise God for their examples.

There is nothing that is whimsical, trifling, or unreasonable in her character ; but everything there described, is a right and proper instance of a solid and real piety.

It is as easy to show, that it is whimsical to go to church, or to say one's prayers, as that it is whimsical to observe any of these rules of life. For all Miranda's rules of living unto God, of spending her time and fortune, of eating, working, dressing, and conversing, are as substantial parts of a reasonable and holy life, as devotion and prayer.

For there is nothing to be said for the wisdom of sobriety, the wisdom of devotion, the wisdom of charity, or the wisdom of humility, but what is as good an argument for the wise and reasonable use of apparel.

Neither can anything be said against the folly of luxury, the folly of sensuality, the folly of extravagance, the folly of prodigality, the folly of ambition, of idleness, or indulgence, but what must be said against the folly of dress. For religion is as deeply concerned in the one as in the other.

If you may be vain in one thing, you may be vain in everything ; for one kind of vanity only differs from another, as one kind of intemperance differs from another.

If you spend your fortune in the needless vain finery of dress, you cannot condemn prodigality, or extravagance, or luxury, without condemning yourself.

If you fancy that it is your only folly, and that therefore there can be no great matter in it ; you are like those that think they are only guilty of the folly of covetousness, or the folly of ambition. Now though some people may live so plausible a life, as to appear chargeable with no other fault, than that of covetousness or ambition; yet the case is not as it appears, for covetousness, or ambition, cannot subsist in a heart, in other respects rightly devoted to God.

In like manner, though some people may spend most that they have in needless expensive ornaments of dress, and yet seem to be in every other respect truly pious, yet it is certainly false; for it is as impossible for a mind that is in a true state of religion, to be vain in the use of clothes, as to be vain in the use of alms or devotions. Now to convince you of this from your own reflections, let us suppose that some eminent saint, as for instance, that the holy Virgin Mary was sent into the world, to be again in a state of trial for a few years, and that you were going to her, to be edified by her great piety. Would you expect to find her dressed out, and adorned in fine and expensive clothes? No. You would know in your own mind, that it was as impossible, as to find her learning to dance. Do but add saint, or holy, to any person, either man, or woman, and your own mind tells you immediately, that such a character cannot admit of the vanity of fine apparel. A saint genteely dressed, is as great nonsense, as an Apostle in an embroidered suit; everyone's own natural sense convinces him, of the inconsistency of these things.

Now what is the reason, that when you think of a saint, or eminent servant of God, you cannot admit of the vanity of apparel? Is it not because it is inconsistent with such a right state of heart, such true and exalted piety? And is not this therefore, a demonstration, that where such vanity is admitted, there a right state of heart, true and exalted piety, must needs be wanted? For as certainly as the holy Virgin Mary could not indulge herself, or conform to the vanity of the world in dress and figure; so certain is it, that none can indulge themselves in this vanity, but those who want her piety of heart; and consequently it must be owned, that all needless and expensive finery of dress, is the effect of a disordered heart, that is not governed by the true spirit of religion.

Covetousness is not a crime, because there is any harm in gold or silver, but because it supposes a foolish and unreasonable state of mind, that is fallen from its true good, and sunk into such a poor and wretched satisfaction.

In like manner, the expensive finery of dress is not a crime, because there is anything good or evil in clothes, but because the expensive ornaments of clothing, shows a foolish and unreasonable state of heart, that is fallen from right notions of human nature, that abuses the end of clothing, and turns the necessities of life, into so many instances of pride and folly.

All the world agree in condemning remarkable fops. Now what is the reason of it? Is it because there is anything sinful in their particular dress, or affected manners? No: but it is because all people know, that it shows the state of a man's mind, and that it is impossible for so ridiculous an outside, to have anything wise, or reasonable, or good within. And indeed, to suppose a fop of great piety, is as much nonsense, as to suppose a coward of great courage. So that all the world agree in owning, that the use and manner of clothes, is a mark of the state of a man's mind, and consequently, that it is a thing highly essential to religion. But then it should be well considered, that as it is not only the sot that is guilty of intemperance, but everyone that transgresses the right and religious measures of eating and drinking; so it should be considered, that it is not only the fop that is guilty of the vanity and abuse of dress, but everyone that departs from the reasonable and religious ends of clothing.

As therefore every argument against sottishness, is as good an argument against all kinds of intemperance; so every argument against the vanity of fops, is as good an argument against all vanity and abuse of dress. For they are all of the same kind, and only differ, as one degree of intemperance may differ from another. She that only paints a little, may as justly accuse another, because she paints a great deal; as she that uses but a common finery of dress, accuse another that is excessive in her finery.

For as in the matter of temperance, there is no rule, but the sobriety, that is according to the doctrines and spirit of our religion; so in the matter of apparel, there is no rule to be observed, but such a right use of clothes, as is strictly according to the doctrines and spirit of our religion. To pretend to make the way of the world our measure in these things, is as weak and absurd, as to make the way of the world the measure of our sobriety, abstinence, or humility. It is a pretence that is exceedingly absurd in the mouths of Christians, who are to be so far from conforming to the fashions of this life, that to have overcome the world, is made an essential mark of Christianity.

This therefore is the way that you are to judge of the crime of vain apparel: You are to consider it as an offence against the proper use of clothes, as covetousness is an offence against the proper use of money; you are to consider it as an indulgence of proud and unreasonable tempers, as an offence against the humility and sobriety of the Christian spirit ; you are to consider it as an offence against all those doctrines, that require you to do all to the glory of God, that require you to make a right use of your talents ; you are to consider it as an offence against all those texts of Scripture, that command you to love your neighbour as yourself, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, and do all works of charity that you are able ; so that you must not deceive yourself with saying, Where can be the harm of clothes ? for the covetous man might as well say, Where can be the harm of gold or silver ? but you must consider, that it is a great deal of harm to want that wise, and reasonable, and humble state of heart, which is according to the spirit of religion, and which no one can have in the manner that he ought to have it, who indulges himself either in the vanity of dress, or the desire of riches.

There is therefore nothing right in the use of clothes, or in the use of anything else in the world, but the plainness and simplicity of the Gospel. Every other use of things (however polite and fashionable in the world) distracts and disorders the heart, and is inconsistent with that inward state of piety, that purity of heart, that wisdom of mind, and regularity of affection, which Christianity requireth.

If you would be a good Christian, there is but one way, you must live wholly unto God ; and if you would live wholly unto God, you must live according to the wisdom that comes from God ; you must act according to right judgments of the nature and value of things ; you must live in the exercise of holy and heavenly affections, and use all the gifts of God to his praise and glory.

Some persons perhaps, who admire the purity and perfection of this life of Miranda, may say, How can it be proposed as a common example ? How can we who are married, or we who are under the direction of our parents, imitate such a life ?

It is answered, Just as you may imitate the life of our blessed Saviour and his apostles. The circumstances of our Saviour's life, and the state and condition of his apostles, were more different from yours, than that of Miranda's is ; and yet their life, the purity and perfection of their behaviour, is the common example that is proposed to all Christians.

It is their spirit therefore, their piety, their love of God, that you are to imitate, and not the particular form of their life.

Act under God as they did, direct your common actions to that end which they did, glorify your proper state with such love of God, such charity to your neighbour, such humility and self-denial, as they did ; and then, though you are only teaching your own children, and St. Paul is converting whole nations, yet you are following his steps, and acting after his example.

Do not think therefore, that you cannot, or need not be like Miranda, because you are not in her state of life; for as the same spirit and temper would have made Miranda a saint, though she had been forced to labour for a maintenance, so if you will but aspire after her spirit and temper, every form and condition of life, will furnish you with sufficient means of employing it.

Miranda is what she is, because she does everything in the name, and with regard to her duty to God; and when you do the same, you will be exactly like her, though you are never so different from her in the outward state of your life.

You are married, you say, therefore you have not your time and fortune in your power as she has.

It is very true; and therefore you cannot spend so much time, nor so much money, in the manner that she does.

But now Miranda's perfection does not consist in this, that she spends so much time, or so much money in such a manner, but that she is careful to make the best use of all that time, and all that fortune, which God has put into her hands. Do you therefore make the best use of all that time and money which is in your disposal, and then you are like Miranda.

If she has two hundred pounds a year, and you have only two mites, have you not the more reason to be exceeding exact in the wisest use of them? If she has a great deal of time, and you have but a little, ought you not to be the more watchful and circumspect, lest that little should be lost?

You say, if you were to imitate the cleanly plainness and cheapness of her dress, you should offend your husbands.

First, Be very sure, that this is true, before you make it an excuse.

Secondly, If your husbands do really require you to patch your faces, to expose your breasts naked, and to be fine and expensive in all your apparel, then take these two resolutions:

First, To forbear from all this, as soon as your husbands will permit you.

Secondly, To use your utmost endeavours, to recommend yourselves to their affections by such solid virtues, as may correct the vanity of their minds, and teach them to love you for such qualities, as will make you amiable in the sight of God and his holy angels.

As to this doctrine concerning the plainness and modesty of dress, it may perhaps be thought by some, to be sufficiently confuted by asking, whether all persons are to be clothed in the same manner?

These questions are generally put by those, who had rather perplex the plainest truths, than be obliged to follow them.

Let it be supposed, that I had recommended an universal plainness of diet. Is it not a thing sufficiently reasonable to be universally recommended? But would it thence follow, that the nobleman and the labourer were to live upon the same food?

Suppose I had pressed an universal temperance, does not religion enough justify such a doctrine? But would it therefore follow, that all people were to drink the same liquors, and in the same quantity?

In like manner, though plainness and sobriety of dress is recommended to all, yet it does by no means follow, that all are to be clothed in the same manner.

Now what is the particular rule with regard to temperance? How shall particular persons that use different liquors, and in different quantities, preserve their temperance?

Is not this the rule? Are they not to guard against indulgence, to make their use of liquors a matter of conscience, and allow of no refreshments, but such as are consistent with the strictest rules of Christian sobriety?

Now transfer this rule to the matter of apparel, and all questions about it are answered.

Let everyone but guard against the vanity of dress, let them but make their use of clothes a matter of conscience, let them but desire to make the best use of their money, and then everyone has a rule, that is sufficient to direct them in every state of life. This rule will no more let the great be vain in their dress, than intemperate in their liquors; and yet will leave it as lawful to have some difference in their apparel, as to have some difference in their drink.

But now will you say, that you may use the finest, richest wines, when, and as you please; that you may be as expensive in them as you have a mind, because different liquors are allowed? If not, how can it be said, that you may use clothes as you please, and wear the richest things you can get, because the bare difference of clothes is lawful?

For as the lawfulness of different liquors, leaves no room, nor any excuse for the smallest degrees of intemperance in drinking, so the lawfulness of different apparel, leaves no room, nor any excuse for the smallest degrees of vanity in dress.

To ask what is vanity in dress, is no more a puzzling question, than to ask what is intemperance in drinking. And though Religion does not here state the particular measure for all individuals, yet it gives such general rules, as are a sufficient direction in every state of life.

He that lets Religion teach him, that the end of drinking is only so far to refresh our spirits, as to keep us in good health, and make soul and body fitter for all the offices of a holy and pious life, and that he is to desire to glorify God by a right use of this liberty, will always know what intemperance is, in his particular state.

So he that lets Religion teach him, that the end of clothing is only to hide our shame and nakedness, and to secure our bodies from the injuries of weather, and that he is to desire to glorify God by a sober and wise use of this necessity, will always know what vanity of dress is, in his particular state.

And he that thinks it a needless nicety, to talk of the religious use of apparel, has as much reason to think it a needless nicety, to talk of the religious use of liquors. For luxury and indulgence in dress, is as great an abuse, as luxury and indulgence in eating and drinking. And there is no avoiding either of them, but by making religion the strict measure of our allowance in both cases. And there is nothing in Religion to excite a man to this pious exactness in one case, but what is as good a motive to the same exactness in the other.

Further, as all things that are lawful, are not therefore expedient, so there are some things lawful in the use of liquors, and apparel, which by abstaining from them for pious ends, may be made means of great perfection.

Thus, for instance, if a man should deny himself such use of liquors as is lawful; if he should refrain from such expense in his drink as might be allowed without sin; if he should do this, not only for the sake of a more pious self-denial, but that he might be able to relieve and refresh the helpless, poor, and sick: if another should abstain from the use of that which is lawful in dress, if he should be more frugal and mean in his habit, than the necessities of religion absolutely require; if he should do this not only as a means of a better humility, but that he may be more able to clothe other People; these Persons might be said to do that, which was highly suitable to the true spirit, though not absolutely required by the letter of the law of Christ.

For if those who give a cup of cold water to a disciple of Christ, shall not lose their reward, how dear must they be to Christ, who often give themselves water, that they may be able to give wine to the sick and languishing members of Christ's body!

But to return. All that has been here said to married women, may serve for the same instruction to such as are still under the direction of their Parents.

Now though the obedience which is due to parents, does not oblige them to carry their virtues no higher than their parents require them; yet their obedience requires them to submit to their direction in all things, not contrary to the laws of God.

If, therefore, your parents require you to live more in the fashion and conversation of the world, or to be more expensive in your dress and person, or to dispose of your time otherwise, than suits with your desires after greater perfection, you must submit, and bear it as your cross, till you are at liberty to follow the higher counsels of Christ, and have it in your power to choose the best ways, of raising your virtue to its greatest height.

Now although, whilst you are in this state, you may be obliged to forego some means of improving your virtue, yet there are some others to be found in it, that are not to be had in a life of more liberty.

For if in this state, where obedience is so great a virtue, you comply in all things lawful, out of a pious, tender sense of duty, then those things which you thus perform, are instead of being hindrances of your virtue, turned into means of improving it.

What you lose by being restrained from such things, as you would choose to observe, you gain by that excellent virtue of obedience, in humbly complying against your temper.

Now what is here granted, is only in things lawful; and therefore the diversion of our English stage is here excepted; being elsewhere proved, as I think, to be absolutely unlawful.

Thus much to show, how persons under the direction of others, may imitate the wise and pious life of Miranda.

But as for those who are altogether in their own hands, if the liberty of their state makes them covet the best gifts, if it carries them to choose the most excellent ways, if they having all in their own power, should turn the whole form of their life into a regular exercise of the highest virtues, happy are they who have so learned Christ.

All persons cannot receive this saying. They that are able to receive it, let them receive it, and bless that Spirit of God, which has put such good motions into their hearts.

God may be served, and glorified in every state of life. But as there are some states of life more desirable than others, that more purify our natures, that more improve our virtues, and dedicate us unto God in a higher manner, so those who are at liberty to choose for themselves, seem to be called by God to be more eminently devoted to his service.

Ever since the beginning of Christianity, there hath been two orders, or ranks of People amongst good Christians.

The one that feared and served God in the common offices and business of a secular worldly life.

The other renouncing the common business and common enjoyments of life, as riches, marriage, honours, and pleasures, devoted themselves to voluntary poverty, virginity, devotion, and retirement, that by this means they might live wholly unto God, in the daily exercise of a divine and heavenly life.

This testimony I have from the famous ecclesiastical historian Eusebius, who lived at the time of the first general council, when the faith of our Nicene Creed was established, when the Church was in its greatest glory and purity, when its Bishops were so many holy fathers, and eminent saints.

'Therefore,' saith he, 'there hath been instituted in the Church of Christ, two ways, or manners of living. The one raised above the ordinary state of nature, and common ways of living, rejects wedlock, possessions, and worldly goods, and being wholly separate and removed from the ordinary conversation of common life, is appropriated and devoted solely to the worship and service of God, through an exceeding degree of heavenly love.

'They who are of this order of people, seem dead to the life of this world, and having their bodies only upon earth, are in their minds, and contemplations, dwelling in heaven. From whence, like so many heavenly inhabitants, they look down upon human life, making intercessions and oblations to Almighty God, for the whole race of mankind. And this not with the blood of beasts, or the fat, or smoke, and burning of bodies, but with the highest exercises of true piety, with cleansed and purified hearts, and with an whole form of life strictly devoted to virtue. These are their sacrifices, which they continually offering unto God, implore his mercy and favour for themselves and their fellow-creatures.

'Christianity receives this as the perfect manner of life.

'The other is of a lower form, and suiting itself more to the condition of human nature, admits of chaste wedlock, the care of children and family, of trade and business, and goes through all the employments of life under a sense of piety, and fear of God.

'Now they who have chosen this manner of life, have their set times for retirement and spiritual exercises, and particular days are set apart, for their hearing and learning the word of God. And this order of people are considered, as in the second state of piety.*

Thus this learned historian.

If therefore persons, of either sex, moved with the life of Miranda, and desirous of perfection, should unite themselves into little societies, professing voluntary poverty, virginity, retirement and devotion, living upon bare necessaries, that some might be relieved by their charities, and all be blessed with their prayers, and benefited by their example: Or if for want of this, they should practise the same manner of life, in as high a degree as they could by themselves; such persons would be so far from being chargeable with any superstition, or blind devotion, that they might be justly said to restore that piety, which was the boast and glory of the Church, when its greatest saints were alive.

Now as this learned historian observes, that it was an exceeding great degree of heavenly love, that carried these persons, so much above the common ways of life, to such an eminent state of holiness; so it is not to be wondered at, that the Religion of Jesus Christ, should fill the hearts of many Christians with this high degree of love.

For a Religion that opens such a scene of Glory, that discovers things so infinitely above all the world, that so triumphs over death, that assures us of such mansions of bliss, where we shall so soon be as the Angels of God in Heaven; what wonder is it, if such a Religion, such truths and expectations, should in some holy souls, destroy all earthly desires, and make the ardent love of heavenly things, be the one continual passion of their hearts?

If the Religion of Christians is founded upon the infinite humiliation, the cruel mockings and scourgings, the prodigious sufferings, the poor, persecuted life, and painful death of a crucified Son of God; what wonder is it, if many humble adorers of this profound mystery, many affectionate lovers of a crucified Lord, should renounce their share of worldly pleasures, and give themselves up to a continual course of mortification and self-denial, that thus suffering with Christ here, they may reign with him hereafter?

If Truth itself hath assured us, that there is but one thing needful, what wonder is it, that there should be some amongst Christians so full of faith, as to believe this in the highest sense of the words, and to desire such a separation from the world, that their care and attention to the one thing needful may not be interrupted?

If our blessed Lord hath said, 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: And come and follow me.' What wonder is it, that there should be amongst Christians some such zealous followers of Christ, so intent upon heavenly treasure, so desirous of perfection, that they should renounce the enjoyment of their estates, choose a voluntary poverty, and relieve all the poor that they are able?

If the chosen vessel, St. Paul, hath said, 'He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may

'please the Lord : And that there is this difference also between 'a wife and a virgin ; the unmarried woman careth for the 'things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and 'Spirit :' What wonder is it, if the purity and perfection of the virgin state, hath been the praise and glory of the Church in its first and purest ages ? That there hath always been some so desirous of pleasing God, so zealous after every degree of purity and perfection, so glad of every means of improving their virtue, that they have renounced the comforts and enjoyments of wedlock, to trim their lamps, to purify their souls, and wait upon God in a state of perpetual virginity ?

And if in these our days, we want examples of these several degrees of perfection, if neither Clergy, nor laity, are enough of this spirit ; if we are so far departed from it, that a man seems, like St. Paul at Athens, a setter forth of strange doctrines, when he recommends self-denial, renunciation of the world, regular devotion, retirement, virginity, and voluntary poverty, it is because we are fallen into an age, where the love not only of many, but of most, is waxed cold.

I have made this little appeal to Antiquity, and quoted these few passages of Scripture, to support some uncommon practices in the life of Miranda ; and to show that her highest rules of holy living, her devotion, self-denial, renunciation of the world, her charity, virginity, and voluntary poverty, are founded in the sublimest counsels of Christ and his Apostles, suitable to the high expectations of another life, proper instances of a heavenly love, and all followed by the greatest saints of the best and purest ages of the Church.

'He that hath ears to ear, let him hear.'

Chapter X.

Showing how all orders and ranks of men and women of all ages, are obliged to devote themselves unto God.

I HAVE in the foregoing Chapters, gone through the several great instances of Christian devotion, and shown that all the parts of our common life, our employments, our talents, and gifts of fortune, are all to be made holy and acceptable unto God, by a wise and religious use of everything, and by directing our actions and designs to such ends, as are suitable to the honour and glory of God.

a Devout and Holy Life. 81

I shall now show, that this regularity of devotion, this holiness of common life, this religious use of everything we have, is a devotion that is the duty of all orders of Christian people.

Fulvius has had a learned education, and taken his degrees in the University, he came from thence, that he might be free from any rules of life. He takes no employment upon him, nor enters into any business, because he thinks that every employment or business, calls people to the careful performance and just discharge of its several duties. When he is grave, he will tell you that he did not enter into holy orders, because he looks upon it to be a state that requires great holiness of life, and that it does not suit his temper to be so good. He will tell you, that he never intends to marry, because he cannot oblige himself to that regularity of life, and good behaviour, which he takes to be the duty of those who are at the head of a family. He refused to be Godfather to his nephew, because he will have no trust of any kind to answer for.

Fulvius thinks that he is conscientious in this conduct, and is therefore content with the most idle, impertinent, and careless life.

He has no Religion, no Devotion, no pretences to Piety. He lives by no rules, and thinks all is very well, because he is neither a priest, nor a father, nor a guardian, nor has any employment or family to look after.

But Fulvius, you are a rational creature, and as such, are as much obliged to live according to reason and order, as a priest is obliged to attend at the altar, or a guardian to be faithful to his trust; if you live contrary to reason, you do not commit a small crime; you do not break a small trust; but you break the law of your nature, you rebel against God who gave you that nature, and put yourself amongst those, whom the God of reason and order will punish as apostates and deserters.

Though you have no employment, yet as you are baptized into the profession of Christ's religion, you are as much obliged to live according to the holiness of the Christian spirit, and perform all the promises made at your baptism, as any man is obliged to be honest and faithful in his calling. If you abuse this great calling, you are not false in a small matter, but you abuse the precious blood of Christ; you crucify the Son of God afresh; you neglect the highest instances of divine goodness; you disgrace the church of God; you blemish the body of Christ; you abuse the means of Grace, and the promises of Glory; and it will be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

It is therefore great folly, for anyone to think himself at liberty to live as he pleases, because he is not in such a state of life as some others are : For if there is anything dreadful in the abuse of any trust ; if there is anything to be feared for the neglect of any calling ; there is nothing more to be feared than the wrong use of our reason, nor anything more to be dreaded, than the neglect of our Christian calling ; which is not to serve the little uses of a short life, but to redeem souls unto God, to fill Heaven with saints, and finish a kingdom of eternal Glory unto God.

No man therefore, must think himself excused from the exactness of piety and morality, because he has chosen to be idle and independent in the world ; for the necessities of a reasonable and holy life, are not founded in the several conditions and employments of this life, but in the immutable nature of God, and the nature of Man. A man is not to be reasonable and holy, because he is a priest, or a father of a family ; but he is to be a pious priest, and a good father, because piety and goodness are the laws of human nature. Could any man please God, without living according to reason and order, there would be nothing displeasing to God in an idle priest, or a reprobate father. He therefore, that abuses his reason, is like him who abuses the priesthood ; and he who neglects the holiness of the Christian life, is as the man that disregards the most important trust.

If a man were to choose to put out his eyes, rather than enjoy the light, and see the works of God, if he should voluntarily kill himself, by refusing to eat and drink, everyone would own, that such a one was a rebel against God, who justly deserved his highest indignation. You would not say, that this was only sinful in a priest, or a master of a family, but in every man as such.

Now wherein does the sinfulness of this behaviour consist ? Does it not consist in this, that he abuses his nature, and refuses to act that part for which God had created him ? But if this be true, then all persons who abuse their reason, that act a different part from that for which God created them, are like this man, rebels against God, and on the same account subject to his wrath.

Let us suppose that this man, instead of putting out his eyes, had only employed them in looking at ridiculous things, or shut them up in sleep ; that instead of starving himself to death, by not eating at all, he should turn every meal into a feast, and eat and drink like an Epicure ; could he be said to have lived more to the glory of God ? could he any more be said to act the part for which God had created him, than if he had put out his eyes, and starved himself to death ?

Now do but suppose a man acting unreasonably ; do but suppose him extinguishing his reason, instead of putting out his eyes, and living in a course of folly and impertinence, instead of starving himself to death ; and then you have found as great a rebel against God.

For he who puts out his eyes, or murders himself, has only this guilt, that he abuses the powers that God has given him ; that he refuses to act that part for which he was created, and puts himself into a state that is contrary to the divine will. And surely this is the guilt of everyone who lives an unreasonable, unholy, and foolish life.

As therefore, no particular state, or private life, is an excuse for the abuse of our bodies, or self-murder, so no particular state, or private life, is an excuse for the abuse of our reason, or the neglect of the holiness of the Christian religion. For surely it is as much the will of God that we should make the best use of our rational faculties, that we should conform to the purity and holiness of Christianity, as it is the will of God, that we should use our eyes, and eat and drink for the preservation of our lives.

Till therefore, a man can show, that he sincerely endeavours to live according to the will of God, to be that which God requires him to be ; until he can show, that he is striving to live according to the holiness of the Christian religion ; whosoever he be, or wheresoever he be, he has all that to answer for, that they have, who refuse to live, who abuse the greatest trusts, and neglect the highest calling in the world.

Everybody acknowledges, that all orders of men are to be equally and exactly honest and faithful ; there is no exception to be made in these duties, for any private or particular state of life. Now if we would but attend to the reason and nature of things ; if we would but consider the nature of God, and the nature of man, we should find the same necessity for every other right use of our reason, for every grace, or religious temper of the Christian life : We should find it as absurd to suppose, that one man must be exact in piety, and another need not, as to suppose that one man must be exact in honesty, but another need not. For Christian humility, sobriety, devotion, and piety, are as great and necessary parts of a reasonable life, as justice and honesty.

And on the other hand, pride, sensuality, and covetousness, are as great disorders of the soul, are as high an abuse of our reason, and as contrary to God, as cheating and dishonesty.

Theft and dishonesty seem indeed, to vulgar eyes, to be greater sins, because they are so hurtful to civil society, and are so severely punished by human laws.

But if we consider mankind in a higher view, as God's order or society of rational beings, that are to glorify him by the right use of their reason, and by acting conformably to the order of their nature, we shall find, that every temper that is equally contrary to reason and order, that opposes God's ends and designs, and disorders the beauty and glory of the rational world, is equally sinful in man, and equally odious to God. This would show us, that the sin of sensuality is like the sin of dishonesty, and renders us as great objects of the divine displeasure.

Again, if we consider mankind in a further view, as a redeemed order of fallen spirits, that are baptized into a fellowship with the Son of God ; to be temples of the Holy Ghost ; to live according to his holy inspirations ; to offer to God the reasonable sacrifice of an humble, pious, and thankful life ; to purify themselves from the disorders of their fall ; to make a right use of the means of grace, in order to be sons of eternal glory : If we look at mankind in this true light, then we shall find, that all tempers that are contrary to this holy society, that are abuses of this infinite mercy ; all actions that make us unlike to Christ, that disgrace his body, that abuse the means of grace, and oppose our hopes of glory, have everything in them, that can make us for ever odious unto God. So that though pride and sensuality, and other vices of the like kind, do not hurt civil society, as cheating and dishonesty do ; yet they hurt that society, and oppose those ends, which are greater and more glorious in the eyes of God, than all the societies that relate to this world.

Nothing therefore can be more false, than to imagine, that because we are private persons, that have taken upon us no charge or employment of life, that therefore we may live more at large, indulge our appetites, and be less careful of the duties of piety and holiness ; for it is as good an excuse for cheating and dishonesty. Because he that abuses his reason, that indulges himself in lust and sensuality, and neglects to act the wise and reasonable part of a true Christian, has everything in his life to render him hateful to God, that is to be found in cheating and dishonesty.

If therefore, you rather choose to be an idle Epicure, than to be unfaithful ; if you rather choose to live in lust and sensuality, than to injure your neighbour in his goods, you have made no better a provision for the favour of God, than he that rather chooses to rob a house, than to rob a church.

For the abusing of our own nature, is as great a disobedience against God, as the injuring our neighbour ; and he that wants piety towards God, has done as much to damn himself, as he that wants honesty towards men. Every argument therefore, that proves it necessary for all men, in all stations of life, to be truly honest, proves it equally necessary for all men, in all stations of life, to be truly holy and pious, and do all things in such a manner, as is suitable to the glory of God.

Again, another argument to prove, that all orders of men are obliged to be thus holy and devout in the common course of their lives, in the use of everything that they enjoy, may be taken from our obligation to prayer.

It is granted, that prayer is a duty that belongs to all states and conditions of men; now if we inquire into the reason of this, why no state of life is to be excused from prayer, we shall find it as good a reason, why every state of life is to be made a state of piety and holiness in all its parts.

For the reason why we are to pray unto God, and praise him with Hymns, and Psalms of Thanksgiving, is this, because we are to live wholly unto God, and glorify him all possible ways. It is not because the praises of words, or forms of thanksgiving, are more particularly parts of piety, or more the worship of God than other things; but it is, because they are possible ways of expressing our dependence, our obedience and devotion to God. Now if this be the reason of verbal praises and thanksgivings to God, because we are to live unto God all possible ways, then it plainly follows, that we are equally obliged to worship, and glorify God in all other actions, that can be turned into acts of piety and obedience to him. And as actions are of much more significancy than words, it must be a much more acceptable worship of God, to glorify him in all the actions of our common life, than with any little form of words at any particular times.

Thus, If God is to be worshipped with forms of thanksgivings, he that makes it a rule, to be content and thankful in every part and accident of his life, because it comes from God, praises God in a much higher manner, than he that has some set time for singing of Psalms. He that dares not say an ill-natured word, or do an unreasonable thing, because he considers God as everywhere present, performs a better devotion, than he that dares not miss the church. To live in the world as a stranger and a pilgrim, using all its enjoyments as if we used them not, making all our actions so many steps towards a better life, is offering a better sacrifice to God, than any forms of holy and heavenly prayers.

To be humble in all our actions, to avoid every appearance of pride and vanity, to be meek and lowly in our words, actions, dress, behaviour, and designs, in imitation of our blessed Saviour, is worshipping God in a higher manner, than they who have only times to fall low on their knees in devotions. He that contents himself with necessaries, that he may give the remainder to those that want it; that dares not to spend any money foolishly, because he considers it as a talent from God, which must be used according to his will, praises God with something that is more glorious than songs of praise.

He that has appointed times for the use of wise and pious prayers, performs a proper instance of devotion; but he that allows himself no times, nor any places, nor any actions, but such as are strictly conformable to wisdom and holiness, worships the divine nature with the most true and substantial devotion. For who does not know, that it is better to be pure and holy, than to talk about purity and holiness? Nay, who does not know, that a man is to be reckoned no further pure, or holy, or just, than as he is pure, and holy, and just in the common course of his life? But if this be plain, then it is also plain, that it is better to be holy, than to have holy prayers.

Prayers therefore are so far from being a sufficient devotion, that they are the smallest parts of it. We are to praise God with words and prayers, because it is a possible way of glorifying God, who has given us such faculties, as may be so used. But then as words are but small things in themselves, as times of prayer are but little, if compared with the rest of our lives; so that devotion which consists in times and forms of prayer, is but a very small thing, if compared to that devotion which is to appear in every other part and circumstance of our lives.

Again; as it is an easy thing to worship God with forms of words, and to observe times of offering them unto him, so it is the smallest kind of piety.

And, on the other hand, as it is more difficult to worship God with our substance, to honour him with the right use of our time, to offer to him the continual sacrifice of self-denial and mortification; as it requires more piety to eat and drink only for such ends as may glorify God, to undertake no labour, nor allow of any diversion, but where we can act in the name of God; as it is most difficult to sacrifice all our corrupt tempers, correct all our passions, and make piety to God the rule and measure of all the actions of our common life: so the devotion of this kind is a much more acceptable service unto God, than those words of devotion which we offer to him either in the Church, or in our closet.

Every sober reader will easily perceive, that I do not intend to lessen the true and great value of Prayers, either public or private; but only to show him, that they are certainly but a very slender part of devotion, when compared to a devout life.

To see this in a yet clearer light, let us suppose a person to have appointed times for praising God with Psalms and Hymns, and to be strict in the observation of them; let it be supposed also, that in his common life he is restless and uneasy, full of murmurings and complaints at everything, never pleased but by chance, as his temper happens to carry him, but murmuring and repining at the very seasons, and having something to dislike in everything that happens to him. Now can you conceive anything more absurd and unreasonable, than such a character as this? Is such a one to be reckoned thankful to God, because he has forms of praise which he offers to him? Nay, is it not certain, that such forms of praise must be so far from being an acceptable devotion to God, that they must be abhorred as an abomination? Now the absurdity which you see in this instance, is the same in any other part of our life; if our common life hath any contrariety to our prayers, it is the same abomination, as songs of thanksgiving in the mouths of murmurers.

Bended knees, whilst you are clothed with pride; heavenly petitions, whilst you are hoarding up treasures upon earth; holy devotions, whilst you live in the follies of the world; prayers of meekness and charity, whilst your heart is the seat of spite and resentment; hours of prayer, whilst you give up days and years to idle diversions, impertinent visits, and foolish pleasures; are as absurd, unacceptable service to God, as forms of thanksgiving from a person that lives in repinings and discontent.

So that unless the common course of our lives, be according to the common spirit of our prayers, our prayers are so far from being a real or sufficient degree of devotion, that they become an empty lip-labour, or, what is worse, a notorious hypocrisy.

Seeing therefore we are to make the spirit and temper of our prayers, the common spirit and temper of our lives, this may serve to convince us, that all orders of people are to labour and aspire after the same utmost perfection of the Christian life. For as all Christians are to use the same holy and heavenly devotions, as they are all with the same earnestness to pray for the Spirit of God; so is it a sufficient proof, that all orders of people are, to the utmost of their power, to make their life agreeable to that one spirit, for which they are all to pray.

As certain, therefore, as the same holiness of prayers requires the same holiness of life, so certain is it, that all Christians are called to the same holiness of life.

A soldier, or a tradesman, is not called to minister at the altar, or preach the Gospel; but every soldier or tradesman is as much obliged to be devout, humble, holy, and heavenly-minded in all the parts of his common life, as a clergyman is obliged to be zealous, faithful, and laborious in all parts of his profession.

And all this for this one plain reason, because all people are to pray for the same holiness, wisdom, and divine tempers, and to make themselves as fit as they can for the same heaven.

All men therefore, as men, have one and the same important business, to act up to the excellency of their rational nature, and to make reason and order the law of all their designs and actions. All Christians, as Christians, have one and the same calling, to live according to the excellency of the Christian spirit, and to make the sublime precepts of the Gospel, the rule and measure of all their tempers in common life. The one thing needful to one, is the one thing needful to all.

The merchant is no longer to hoard up treasures upon earth: the soldier is no longer to fight for glory; the great scholar is no longer to pride himself in the depths of science; but they must all with one spirit 'count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus.'

The fine lady must teach her eyes to weep, and be clothed with humility. The polite gentleman must exchange the gay thoughts of wit and fancy, for a 'broken and a contrite heart.' The man of quality must so far renounce the dignity of his birth, as to think himself miserable till he is born again. Servants must consider their service as done unto God. Masters must consider their servants as their brethren in Christ, that are to be treated as their fellow members of the mystical body of Christ.

Young Ladies must either devote themselves to piety, prayer, self-denial, and all good works, in a virgin-state of life; or else marry to be holy, sober, and prudent in the care of a family, bringing up their children in piety, humility, and devotion, and abounding in all other good works, to the utmost of their state and capacity. They have no choice of anything else, but must devote themselves to God in one of these states. They may choose a married, or a single life; but it is not left to their choice, whether they will make either state, a state of holiness, humility, devotion, and all other duties of the Christian life. It is no more left in their power, because they have fortunes, or are born of rich parents, to divide themselves betwixt God and the world, or take such pleasures as their fortune will afford them, than it is allowable for them to be sometimes chaste and modest, and sometimes not.

They are not to consider, how much religion may secure them a fair character, or how they may add devotion to an impertinent, vain, and giddy life; but must look into the spirit and temper of their prayers, into the nature and end of Christianity, and then they will find, that whether married or unmarried, they have but one business upon their hands, to be wise, and pious, and holy, not in little modes and forms of worship, but in the whole turn of their minds, in the whole form of all their behaviour, and in the daily course of their common life.

Young Gentlemen must consider, what our blessed Saviour said to the young Gentleman in the Gospel; he bid 'him sell all 'that he had and give to the poor.' Now though this text should not oblige all people to sell all; yet it certainly obliges all kinds of people to employ all their estates, in such wise and reasonable and charitable ways, as may sufficiently show, that all that they have is devoted to God, and that no part of it is kept from the poor, to be spent in needless, vain, and foolish expenses.

If, therefore, young Gentlemen propose to themselves a life of pleasure and indulgence, if they spend their estates in high living, in luxury and intemperance, in state and equipage, in pleasures and diversions, in sports and gaming, and such like wanton gratifications of their foolish passions, they have as much reason to look upon themselves to be Angels, as to be disciples of Christ.

Let them be assured, that it is the one only business of a Christian Gentleman, to distinguish himself by good works, to be eminent in the most sublime virtues of the Gospel, to bear with the ignorance and weakness of the vulgar, to be a friend and patron to all that dwell about him, to live in the utmost heights of wisdom and holiness, and show through the whole course of his life a true religious greatness of mind. They must aspire after such a gentility, as they might have learnt from seeing the blessed Jesus, and show no other spirit of a gentleman, but such as they might have got by living with the holy Apostles. They must learn to love God with all their heart, with all their soul, and with all their strength, and their neighbour as themselves; and then they have all the greatness and distinction that they can have here, and are fit for an eternal happiness in heaven hereafter.

Thus in all orders and conditions, either of men or women, this is the one common holiness, which is to be the common life of all Christians.

The Merchant is not to leave devotion to the Clergyman, nor the Clergyman to leave humility to the labourer; women of fortune are not to leave it to the poor of their sex, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, to adorn themselves in modest apparel, shamefacedness, and sobriety; nor poor women leave it to the rich to attend at the worship and service of God. Great men must be eminent for true poverty of spirit, and people of a low and afflicted state must greatly rejoice in God.

The man of strength and power is to forgive and pray for his enemies, and the innocent sufferer who is chained in prison, must, with Paul and Silas, at midnight sing praises to God. For God is to be glorified, holiness is to be practised, and the spirit of Religion is to be the common spirit of every Christian, in every state and condition of life.

For the Son of God did not come from above, to add an external form of worship to the several ways of life that are in the world ; and so to leave people to live as they did before, in such tempers and enjoyments as the fashion and spirit of the world approves. But as he came down from heaven, altogether divine and heavenly in his own nature, so it was to call mankind to a divine and heavenly life ; to the highest change of their whole nature and temper ; to be born again of the Holy Spirit ; to walk in the wisdom and light and love of God ; and be like him to the utmost of their power ; to renounce all the most plausible ways of the world, whether of greatness, business, or pleasure ; to a mortification of all their most agreeable passions ; and to live in such wisdom, and purity, and holiness, as might fit them to be glorious in the enjoyment of God to all eternity.

Whatever therefore is foolish, ridiculous, vain, or earthly, or sensual in the life of a Christian, is something that ought not to be there ; it is a spot and a defilement that must be washed away with tears of repentance. But if anything of this kind runs through the course of our whole life, if we allow ourselves in things that are either vain, foolish, or sensual, we renounce our profession.

For as sure as Jesus Christ was wisdom and holiness, as sure as he came to make us like himself, and to be baptized into his spirit, so sure it is, that none can be said to keep to their Christian profession, but they who to the utmost of their power, live a wise and holy and heavenly life. This and this alone is Christianity, an universal holiness in every part of life, a heavenly wisdom in all our actions, not conforming to the spirit and temper of the world, but turning all worldly enjoyments into means of piety and devotion to God.

But now, if this devout state of heart, if these habits of inward holiness be true Religion, then true Religion is equally the duty and happiness of all orders of men ; for there is nothing to recommend it to one, that is not the same recommendation of it to all states of people.

If it be the happiness and glory of a Bishop to live in this devout spirit, full of these holy tempers, doing everything as unto God, it is as much the glory and happiness of all men and women, whether young or old, to live in the same spirit. And whoever can find any reasons, why an ancient Bishop should be intent upon divine things, turning all his life into the highest exercises of piety, wisdom, and devotion, will find them so many reasons, why he should to the utmost of his power, do the same himself.

If you say that a Bishop must be an eminent example of Christian holiness, because of his high and sacred calling, you say right. But if you say, that it is more to his advantage to be exemplary, than it is yours, you greatly mistake. For there is nothing to make the highest degrees of holiness desirable to a Bishop, but what makes them equally desirable to every young person of every family.

For an exalted piety, high devotion, and the religious use of everything, is as much the glory and happiness of one state of life, as it is of another.

Do but fancy in your mind, what a spirit of piety you would have in the best Bishop in the world, how you would have him love God, how you would have him imitate the life of our Saviour and his Apostles, how you would have him live above the world, shining in all the instances of a heavenly life, and then you have found out that spirit, which you ought to make the spirit of your own life.

I desire every reader to dwell a while upon this reflection, and perhaps he will find more conviction from it, than he imagines. Everyone can tell how good and pious he would have some people to be; everyone knows, how wise and reasonable a thing it is in a Bishop, to be entirely above the world, and be an eminent example of Christian perfection: As soon as you think of a wise and ancient Bishop, you fancy some exalted degree of piety, a living example of all those holy tempers, which you find described in the Gospel.

Now if you ask yourself, what is the happiest thing for a young Clergyman to do? You must be forced to answer, that nothing can be so happy and glorious for him, as to be like that excellent holy Bishop.

If you go on and ask, what is the happiest thing, for any young Gentleman or his sisters to do? The answer must be the same; that nothing can be so happy or glorious for them, as to live in such habits of piety, in such exercises of a Divine life, as this good old Bishop does. For everything that is great and glorious in Religion, is as much the true glory of every man or woman, as it is the glory of any Bishop. If high degrees of Divine love, if fervent charity, if spotless purity, if heavenly affection, if constant mortification, if frequent devotion be the best and happiest way of life for any Christian; it is so for every Christian.

Consider again; if you were to see a Bishop in the whole course of his life, living below his character, conforming to all the foolish tempers of the world, and governed by the same cares and fears which govern vain and worldly men, what would you think of him. Would you think that he was only guilty of a small mistake? No. You would condemn him, as erring in that which is not only the most, but the only important matter that relates to him. Stay a while in this consideration, till your mind is fully convinced, how miserable a mistake it is in a Bishop, to live a careless worldly life.

Whilst you are thinking in this manner, turn your thoughts towards some of your acquaintance, your brother, or sister, or any young person. Now if you see the common course of their lives to be not according to the doctrines of the Gospel, if you see that their way of life, cannot be said to be a sincere endeavour to enter in at the strait gate, you see something that you are to condemn, in the same degree, and for the same reasons. They do not commit a small mistake, but are wrong in that which is their all, and mistake their true happiness, as much as that Bishop does, who neglects the high duties of his calling. Apply this reasoning to yourself; if you find yourself living an idle, indulgent, vain life, choosing rather to gratify your passions, than to live up to the doctrines of Christianity, and practise the plain precepts of our blessed Lord, you have all that blindness and unreasonableness to charge upon yourself, that you can charge upon any irregular Bishop.

For all the virtues of the Christian life, its perfect purity, its heavenly tempers, are as much the sole rule of your life, as the sole rule of the life of a Bishop. If you neglect these holy tempers, if you do not eagerly aspire after them, if you do not show yourself a visible example of them, you are as much fallen from your true happiness, you are as great an enemy to yourself, and have made as bad a choice, as that Bishop, that chooses rather to enrich his family, than to be like an Apostle. For there is no reason, why you should not think the highest holiness, the most heavenly tempers, to be the duty and happiness of a Bishop; but what is as good a reason, why you should think the same tempers, to be the duty and happiness of all Christians. And as the wisest Bishop in the world, is he, who lives in the greatest heights of holiness, who is most exemplary in all the exercises of a Divine life, so the wisest youth, the wisest woman, whether married, or unmarried, is she, that lives in the highest degrees of Christian holiness, and all the exercises of a Divine and heavenly life.

Chapter XI.

Showing how great devotion, fills our lives with the greatest peace and happiness that can be enjoyed in this world.

SOME people will perhaps object, that all these rules of holy living unto God in all that we do, are too great a restraint upon human life; that it will be made too anxious a state, by thus introducing a regard to God in all our actions. And that by depriving ourselves of so many seemingly innocent pleasures, we shall render our lives dull, uneasy, and melancholy. To which it may be answered :

First, That these rules are prescribed for, and will certainly procure a quite contrary end. That instead of making our lives dull and melancholy, they will render them full of content and strong satisfactions. That by these rules, we only change the childish satisfactions of our vain and sickly passions, for the solid enjoyments, and real happiness of a sound mind.

Secondly, That as there is no foundation for comfort in the enjoyments of this life, but in the assurance that a wise and good God governeth the world, so the more we find out God in everything, the more we apply to him in every place, the more we look up to him in all our actions, the more we conform to his will, the more we act according to his wisdom, and imitate his goodness, by so much the more do we enjoy God, partake of the divine nature, and heighten and increase all that is happy and comfortable in human life.

Thirdly, He that is endeavouring to subdue, and root out of his mind all those passions of pride, envy, and ambition, which religion opposes, is doing more to make himself happy, even in this life, than he that is contriving means to indulge them.

For these passions are the causes of all the disquiets and vexations of human life: they are the dropsies and fevers of our minds, vexing them with false appetites, and restless cravings after such things as we do not want, and spoiling our taste for those things which are our proper good.

Do but imagine that you somewhere or other saw a man, that proposed reason as the rule of all his actions, that had no desires but after such things as nature wants, and religion approves, that was as pure from all the motions of pride, envy, and covetousness, as from thoughts of murder; that in this freedom from worldly passions, he had a soul full of Divine love, wishing and praying that all men may have what they want of worldly things, and be partakers of eternal glory in the life to come.

Do but fancy a man living in this manner, and your own conscience will immediately tell you, that he is the happiest man in the world, and that it is not in the power of the richest fancy, to invent any higher happiness in the present state of life.

And on the other hand, if you suppose him to be in any degree less perfect; if you suppose him but subject to one foolish fondness, or vain passion, your own conscience will again tell you, that he so far lessens his own happiness, and robs himself of the true enjoyment of his other virtues. So true is it, that the more we live by the rules of religion, the more peaceful and happy do we render our lives.

Again, as it thus appears, that real happiness is only to be had from the greatest degrees of piety, the greatest denials of our passions, and the strictest rules of religion, so the same truth will appear from a consideration of human misery. If we look into the world, and view the disquiets and troubles of human life, we shall find that they are all owing to our violent and irreligious passions.

Now all trouble and uneasiness is founded in the want of something or other; would we therefore know the true cause of our troubles and disquiets, we must find out the cause of our wants; because that which creates, and increaseth our wants, does in the same degree create, and increase our trouble and disquiets.

God Almighty has sent us into the world with very few wants; meat, and drink, and clothing, are the only things necessary in life; and as these are only our present needs, so the present world is well furnished to supply these needs.

If a man had half the world in his power, he can make no more of it than this; as he wants it only to support an animal life, so is it unable to do anything else for him, or to afford him any other happiness.

This is the state of man, born with few wants, and into a large world, very capable of supplying them. So that one would reasonably suppose, that men should pass their lives in content and thankfulness to God, at least, that they should be free from violent disquiets and vexations, as being placed in a world, that has more than enough to relieve all their wants.

a Devout and Holy Life. 95

But if to all this we add, that this short life, thus furnished with all that we want in it, is only a short passage to eternal glory, where we shall be clothed with the brightness of angels, and enter into the joys of God, we might still more reasonably expect, that human life should be a state of peace, and joy, and delight in God. Thus it would certainly be, if reason had its full power over us.

But, alas! though God, and Nature, and Reason, make human life thus free from wants, and so full of happiness, yet our passions, in rebellion against God, against nature and reason, create a new world of evils, and fill human life with imaginary wants, and vain disquiets.

The man of pride has a thousand wants, which only his own pride has created; and these render him as full of trouble, as if God had created him with a thousand appetites, without creating anything that was proper to satisfy them. Envy and Ambition have also their endless wants, which disquiet the souls of men, and by their contradictory motions, render them as foolishly miserable, as those that want to fly and creep at the same time.

Let but any complaining, disquieted man, tell you the ground of his uneasiness, and you will plainly see, that he is the author of his own torment; that he is vexing himself at some imaginary evil, which will cease to torment him, as soon as he is content to be that which God, and nature, and reason, require him to be.

If you should see a man passing his days in disquiet, because he could not walk upon the water, or catch birds as they fly by him, you would readily confess, that such a one might thank himself for such uneasiness. But now if you look into all the most tormenting disquiets of life, you will find them all thus absurd; where people are only tormented by their own folly, and vexing themselves at such things, as no more concern them, nor are any more their proper good, than walking upon the water, or catching birds.

What can you conceive more silly and extravagant, than to suppose a man racking his brains, and studying night and day how to fly? wandering from his own house and home, wearying himself with climbing upon every ascent, cringing and courting everybody he meets, to lift him from the ground, bruising himself with continual falls, and at last breaking his neck? And all this, from an imagination, that it would be glorious to have the eyes of people gazing up at him, and mighty happy to eat, and drink, and sleep, at the top of the highest trees in the kingdom. Would you not readily own, that such a one was only disquieted by his own folly?

If you ask, what it signifies to suppose such silly creatures as these, as are nowhere to be found in human life ?

It may be answered, that wherever you see an ambitious man, there you see this vain and senseless flyer.

Again, if you should see a man that had a large pond of water, yet living in continual thirst, not suffering himself to drink half a draught, for fear of lessening his pond ; if you should see him wasting his time and strength, in fetching more water to his pond, always thirsty, yet always carrying a bucket of water in his hand, watching early and late to catch the drops of rain, gaping after every cloud, and running greedily into every mire and mud, in hopes of water, and always studying how to make every ditch empty itself into his pond. If you should see him grow grey and old in these anxious labours, and at last end a careful, thirsty life, by falling into his own pond, would you not say, that such a one was not only the author of all his own disquiets, but was foolish enough to be reckoned amongst idiots and madmen ? But yet foolish and absurd as this character is, it does not represent half the follies, and absurd disquiets of the covetous man.

I could now easily proceed, to show the same effects of all our other passions, and make it plainly appear, that all our miseries, vexations, and complaints, are entirely of our own making, and that in the same absurd manner, as in these instances of the covetous and ambitious man. Look where you will, you will see all worldly vexations, but like the vexation of him, who was always in mire and mud in search of water to drink, when he had more at home, than was sufficient for an hundred horses.

Celia is always telling you, how provoked she is, what intolerable shocking things happen to her, what monstrous usage she suffers, and what vexations she meets with everywhere. She tells you that her patience is quite worn out, and there is no bearing the behaviour of people. Every assembly that she is at, sends her home provoked ; something or other has been said, or done, that no reasonable, well-bred person ought to bear. Poor people who want her charity, are sent away with hasty answers, not because she has not a heart to part with any money, but because she is too full of some trouble of her own, to attend to the complaints of others. Celia has no business upon her hands, but to receive the income of a plentiful fortune ; but yet by the doleful turn of her mind, you would be apt to think, that she had neither food nor lodging. If you see her look more pale than ordinary, if her lips tremble when she speaks to you, it is because she is just come from a visit, where Lupus took no notice at all of her, but talked all the time to Lucinda, who has not half her fortune. When cross accidents have so disordered her spirits, that she is forced to send for the Doctor, to make her able to eat ; she tells him, in great anger at Providence, that she never was well since she was born, and that she envies every beggar that she sees in health.

This is the disquiet life of Calia, who has nothing to torment her but her own spirit.

If you could inspire her with Christian humility, you need do no more to make her as happy, as any person in the world. This virtue would make her thankful to God, for half so much health as she has had, and help her to enjoy more for the time to come. This virtue would keep off tremblings of the spirits, and loss of appetite, and her blood would need nothing else to sweeten it.

I have just touched upon these absurd characters, for no other end, but to convince you in the plainest manner, that the strictest rules of religion, are so far from rendering a life dull, anxious, and uncomfortable, (as is above objected) that, on the contrary, all the miseries, vexations, and complaints that are in the world, are all owing to the want of religion ; being directly caused by those absurd passions, which religion teaches us to deny.

For all the wants which disturb human life, which make us uneasy to ourselves, quarrelsome with others, and unthankful to God ; which weary us in vain labours and foolish anxieties ; which carry us from project to project, from place to place, in a poor pursuit of we know not what, are the wants which neither God, nor nature, nor reason, hath subjected us to, but are solely infused into us by pride, envy, ambition, and covetousness.

So far therefore, as you reduce your desires to such things as nature and reason require ; so far as you regulate all the motions of your heart by the strict rules of religion, so far you remove yourself from that infinity of wants and vexations, which torment every heart that is left to itself.

Most people indeed confess, that religion preserves us from a great many evils, and helps us in many respects to a more happy enjoyment of ourselves ; but then they imagine, that this is only true of such a moderate share of religion, as only gently restrains us from the excesses of our passions. They suppose, that the strict rules and restraints of an exalted piety, are such contradictions to our nature, as must needs make our lives dull and uncomfortable.

Although the weakness of this objection, sufficiently appears from what hath been already said, yet I shall add one more word to it.

This objection supposes, that religion moderately practised, adds much to the happiness of life; but that such heights of piety as the perfection of religion requireth, have a contrary effect.

It supposes therefore, that it is happy to be kept from the excesses of envy, but unhappy to be kept from other degrees of envy. That it is happy to be delivered from a boundless ambition, but unhappy to be without a more moderate ambition. It supposes also, that the happiness of life consists in a mixture of virtue and vice, a mixture of ambition and humility, charity and envy, heavenly affection and covetousness. All which is as absurd, as to suppose that it is happy to be free from excessive pains, but unhappy to be without more moderate pains; or that the happiness of health consisted, in being partly sick, and partly well.

For if humility be the peace and rest of the soul, then no one has so much happiness from humility, as he who is the most humble. If excessive envy is a torment of the soul, he most perfectly delivers himself from torment, who most perfectly extinguishes every spark of envy. If there is any peace and joy, in doing any action according to the will of God, he who brings the most of his actions to this rule, does most of all increase the peace and joy of his life.

And thus it is in every virtue; if you act up to every degree of it, the more happiness you have from it. And so of every vice; if you only abate its excesses, you do but little for yourself; but if you reject it in all degrees, then you feel the true ease and joy of a reformed mind.

As for example: If religion only restrains the excesses of revenge, but lets the spirit still live within you, in lesser instances, your religion may have made your life a little more outwardly decent, but not made you at all happier, or easier in yourself. But if you have once sacrificed all thoughts of revenge, in obedience to God, and are resolved to return good for evil at all times, that you may render yourself more like to God, and fitter for his mercy in the kingdom of love and glory; this is a height of virtue, that will make you feel its happiness.

Secondly, As to those satisfactions and enjoyments, which an exalted piety requireth us to deny ourselves, this deprives us of no real comfort of life.

For, 1st, Piety requires us to renounce no ways of life, where we can act reasonably, and offer what we do to the glory of God. All ways of life, all satisfactions and enjoyments, that are within these bounds, are no way denied us by the strictest rules of piety. Whatever you can do, or enjoy, as in the presence of God, as his servant, as his rational creature, that has received reason and knowledge from him ; all that you can perform conformably to a rational nature, and the will of God, all this is allowed by the laws of piety. And will you think that your life will be uncomfortable, unless you may displease God, be a fool, and mad, and act contrary to that reason and wisdom which he has implanted in you ?

And as for those satisfactions, which we dare not offer to a holy God, which are only invented by the folly and corruption of the world, which inflame our passions, and sink our souls into grossness and sensuality, and render us incapable of the divine favour, either here or hereafter ; surely it can be no uncomfortable state of life, to be rescued by religion from such self-murder, and to be rendered capable of eternal happiness.

Let us suppose a person, destitute of that knowledge which we have from our senses, placed somewhere alone by himself, in the midst of a variety of things which he did not know how to use ; that he has by him bread, wine, water, golden dust, iron, chains, gravel, garments, fire, &c. Let it be supposed, that he has no knowledge of the right use of these things, nor any direction from his senses how to quench his thirst, or satisfy his hunger, or make any use of the things about him. Let it be supposed, that in his drought he puts golden dust into his eyes ; when his eyes smart, he puts wine into his ears ; that in his hunger, he puts gravel in his mouth ; that in pain, he loads himself with the iron chains ; that feeling cold, he puts his feet in the water ; that being frightened at the fire, he runs away from it ; that being weary, he makes a seat of his bread. Let it be supposed, that through his ignorance of the right use of the things that are about him, he will vainly torment himself whilst he lives ; and at last die, blinded with dust, choked with gravel, and loaded with irons. Let it be supposed, that some good Being came to him, and showed him the nature and use of all the things that were about him, and gave him such strict rules of using them, as would certainly, if observed, make him the happier for all that he had, and deliver him from the pains of hunger, and thirst, and cold.

Now could you with any reason affirm, that those strict rules of using those things that were about him, had rendered that poor man's life dull and uncomfortable ?

Now this is in some measure, a representation of the strict rules of religion ; they only relieve our ignorance, save us from tormenting ourselves, and teach us to use everything about us to our proper advantage.

Man is placed in a world full of variety of things ; his ignorance makes him use many of them as absurdly, as the man who puts dust in his eyes to relieve his thirst, or put on chains to remove pain.

Religion therefore here comes into his relief, and gives him strict rules of using everything that is about him ; that by so using them suitably to his own nature, and the nature of the things, he may have always the pleasure of receiving a right benefit from them. It shows him what is strictly right in meat, and drink, and clothes ; and that he has nothing else to expect from the things of this world, but to satisfy such wants of his own ; and then to extend his assistance to all his brethren, that as far as he is able, he may help all his fellow-creatures, to the same benefit from the world that he hath.

It tells him, that this world is incapable of giving him any other happiness, and that all endeavours to be happy in heaps of money, or acres of land, in fine clothes, rich beds, stately equipage, and show and splendour, are only vain endeavours, ignorant attempts after impossibilities ; these things being no more able to give the least degree of happiness, than dust in the eyes can cure thirst, or gravel in the mouth satisfy hunger ; but like dust and gravel misapplied, will only serve to render him more unhappy by such an ignorant misuse of them.

It tells him, that although this world can do no more for him, than satisfy these wants of the body, yet that there is a much greater good prepared for man, than eating, drinking, and dressing ; that it is yet invisible to his eyes, being too glorious for the apprehension of flesh and blood ; but reserved for him to enter upon, as soon as this short life is over ; where, in a new body, formed to an angelic likeness, he shall dwell in the light and glory of God to all eternity.

It tells him, that this state of glory will be given to all those, who make a right use of the things of this present world ; who do not blind themselves with golden dust, or eat gravel, or groan under loads of iron of their own putting on ; but use bread, water, wine, and garments, for such ends as are according to nature and reason ; and who with faith and thankfulness, worship the kind giver of all that they enjoy here, and hope for here-after.

Now can anyone say, that the strictest rules of such a religion as this, debar us of any of the comforts of life ? Might it not as justly be said of those rules, which only hindered a man from choking himself with gravel ? For the strictness of these rules, only consists in the exactness of their rectitude.

Who would complain of the severe strictness of a law, that without any exception forbade the putting of dust into our eyes ? Who could think it too rigid, that there were no abate-

ments? Now this is the strictness of religion, it requires nothing of us strictly, or without abatements, but where every degree of the thing is wrong, where every indulgence does us some hurt.

If religion forbids all instances of revenge without any exception, it is because all revenge is of the nature of poison; and though we do not take so much as to put an end to life, yet if we take any at all, it corrupts the whole mass of blood, and makes it difficult to be restored to our former health.

If religion commands an universal charity, to love our neighbour as ourselves, to forgive and pray for all our enemies without any reserve; it is because all degrees of love are degrees of happiness, that strengthen and support the divine life of the soul and are as necessary to its health and happiness, as proper food is necessary to the health and happiness of the body.

If religion has laws against laying up treasures upon earth, and commands us to be content with food and raiment; it is because every other use of the world, is abusing it to our own vexation, and turning all its conveniences into snares and traps to destroy us. It is because this plainness and simplicity of life, secures us from the cares and pains of restless pride and envy, and makes it easier to keep that straight road, that will carry us to eternal life.

If religion saith, 'Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor,' it is because there is no other natural or reasonable use of our riches, no other way of making ourselves happier for them; it is because it is as strictly right to give others that which we do not want ourselves, as it is right to use so much as our own wants require. For if a man has more food than his own nature requires, how base and unreasonable is it, to invent foolish ways of wasting it, and make sport for his own full belly, rather than let his fellow-creatures have the same comfort from food, which he hath had? It is so far therefore from being a hard law of religion, to make this use of our riches, that a reasonable man would rejoice in that religion, which teaches him to be happier in that which he gives away, than in that which he keeps for himself; which teaches him to make spare food and raiment be greater blessings to him, than that which feeds and clothes his own body.

If religion requires us sometimes to fast, and deny our natural appetites, it is to lessen that struggle and war that is in our nature, it is to render our bodies fitter instruments of purity, and more obedient to the good motions of divine grace; it is to dry up the springs of our passions that war against the soul, to cool the flame of our blood, and render the mind more capable of divine meditations. So that although these abstinences give some pain to the body, yet they so lessen the power of bodily appetites and passions, and so increase our taste of spiritual joys, that even these severities of religion, when practised with discretion, add much to the comfortable enjoyment of our lives.

If religion calleth us to a life of watching and prayer, it is because we live amongst a crowd of enemies, and are always in need of the assistance of God. If we are to confess and bewail our sins, it is because such confessions relieve the mind, and restore it to ease; as burdens and weights taken off the shoulders, relieve the body, and make it easier to itself. If we are to be frequent and fervent in holy petitions, it is to keep us steady in the sight of our true good, and that we may never want the happiness of a lively faith, a joyful hope, and well grounded trust in God. If we are to pray often, it is that we may be often happy in such secret joys as only prayer can give; in such communications of the divine presence, as will fill our minds with all the happiness, that beings not in heaven are capable of.

Was there anything in the world more worth our care, was there any exercise of the mind, or any conversation with men, that turned more to our advantage than this intercourse with God, we should not be called to such a continuance in prayer. But if a man considers what it is that he leaves when he retires to devotion, he will find it no small happiness, to be so often relieved from doing nothing, or nothing to the purpose; from dull idleness, unprofitable labour, or vain conversation. If he considers, that all that is in the world, and all that is doing in it, is only for the body, and bodily enjoyments, he will have reason to rejoice at those hours of prayer, which carry him to higher consolations, which raise him above these poor concerns, which open to his mind a scene of greater things, and accustom his soul to the hope and expectation of them.

If religion commands us to live wholly unto God, and to do all to his glory, it is because every other way, is living wholly against ourselves, and will end in our own shame and confusion of face.

As everything is dark, that God does not enlighten; as everything is senseless, that has not its share of knowledge from him; as nothing lives, but by partaking of life from him; as nothing exists, but because he commands it to be; so there is no glory, or greatness, but what is the glory or greatness of God.

We indeed may talk of human glory, as we may talk of human life, or human knowledge; but as we are sure that human life implies nothing of our own, but a dependent living in God, or enjoying so much life in God; so human glory, whenever we find it, must be only so much glory as we enjoy in the glory of God.

This is the state of all creatures, whether men, or angels; as they make not themselves, so they enjoy nothing from themselves; if they are great, it must be only as great receivers of the gifts of God; their power can only be so much of the divine power acting in them; their wisdom can be only so much of the divine Wisdom shining within them; and their light and glory, only so much of the light and glory of God shining upon them.

As they are not men or Angels, because they had a mind to be so themselves, but because the will of God formed them to be what they are; so they cannot enjoy this or that happiness of men or angels, because they have a mind to it, but because it is the will of God, that such things be the happiness of men, and such things the happiness of angels. But now if God be thus all in all; if his will is thus the measure of all things, and all natures; if nothing can be done, but by his power; if nothing can be seen but by a light from him; if we have nothing to fear, but from his justice; if we have nothing to hope for, but from his goodness; if this is the nature of man, thus helpless in himself; if this is the state of all creatures, as well those in heaven, as those on earth; if they are nothing, can do nothing, can suffer no pain, nor feel any happiness, but so far, and in such degrees, as the power of God does all this; if this be the state of things, then how can we have the least glimpse of joy or comfort, how can we have any peaceful enjoyment of ourselves, but by living wholly unto that God, using and doing everything conformably to his will? A life thus devoted unto God, looking wholly unto him in all our actions, and doing all things suitably to his glory, is so far from being dull, and uncomfortable, that it creates new comforts in everything that we do.

On the contrary, would you see how happy they are who live according to their own wills, who cannot submit to the dull and melancholy business of a life devoted unto God; look at the man in the parable, to whom his Lord had given one talent.

He could not bear the thoughts of using his talent, according to the will of him from whom he had it, and therefore he chose to make himself happier in a way of his own. 'Lord,' says he, 'I knew thee, that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hadst not sown, and gathering where thou hadst not strawed. And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent, in the earth. Lo there thou hast that is thine.'

His Lord having convicted him out of his own mouth, despatches him with this sentence, 'Cast the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'*

* Matt. xxv. 24.

Here you see how happy this man made himself, by not acting wholly according to his Lord's will. It was, according to his own account, a happiness of murmuring and discontent; I knew thee, says he, that thou wast an hard man: It was an happiness of fears and apprehensions; I was, says he, afraid: It was an happiness of vain labours and fruitless travails: I went, says he, and hid thy talent: and after having been a while the sport of foolish passions, tormenting fears, and fruitless labours, he is rewarded with darkness, eternal weeping, and gnashing of teeth.

Now this is the happiness of all those, who look upon a strict and exalted piety, that is, a right use of their talent, to be a dull and melancholy state of life.

They may live awhile free from the restraints and directions of Religion, but instead thereof, they must be under the absurd government of their passions: They must, like the man in the parable, live in murmurings, and discontents, in fears, and apprehensions. They may avoid the labour of doing good, of spending their time devoutly, of laying up treasures in heaven, of clothing the naked, of visiting the sick; but then they must, like this man, have labours, and pains in vain, that tend to no use or advantage, that do no good either to themselves, or others; they must travel, and labour, and work, and dig, to hide their talent in the earth. They must like him, at their Lord's coming, be convicted out of their own mouths, be accused by their own hearts, and have everything that they have said and thought of Religion, be made to show the justice of their condemnation to eternal darkness, weeping, and gnashing of teeth.

This is the purchase that they make, who avoid the strictness and perfection of Religion, in order to live happily.

On the other hand, would you see a short description of the happiness of a life rightly employed, wholly devoted to God, you must look at the man in the parable, to whom his Lord had given five talents. 'Lord,' says he, 'thou deliveredst unto me five talents; behold I have gained besides them five talents more. His Lord said unto him, well done thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

Here you see a life that is wholly intent upon the improvement of the talents, that is devoted wholly unto God, is a state of happiness, prosperous labours, and glorious success. Here are not, as in the former case, any uneasy passions, murmurings, vain fears, and fruitless labours. The man is not toiling, and digging in the earth for no end nor advantage; but his pious labours prosper in his hands, his happiness increases upon him; the blessing of five becomes the blessing of ten talents ; and he is received with a 'well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

Now as the case of these men in the parable, left nothing else to their choice, but either to be happy in using their gifts to the glory of the Lord, or miserable by using them according to their own humours and fancies ; so the state of Christianity leaves us no other choice.

All that we have, all that we are, all that we enjoy, are only so many talents from God : if we use them to the ends of a pious and holy life, our five talents will become ten, and our labours will carry us into the joy of our Lord ; but if we abuse them to the gratification of our own passions, sacrificing the gifts of God to our own pride and vanity, we shall live here in vain labours and foolish anxieties, shunning Religion as a melancholy thing, accusing our Lord as a hard master, and then fall into everlasting misery.

We may for a while amuse ourselves with names, and sounds, and shadows of happiness ; we may talk of this or that greatness and dignity ; but if we desire real happiness, we have no other possible way to it, but by improving our talents, by so holily and piously using the powers and faculties of men in this present state, that we may be happy and glorious in the powers and faculties of angels in the world to come.

How ignorant therefore are they, of the nature of Religion, of the nature of man, and the nature of God, who think a life of strict piety and devotion to God, to be a dull uncomfortable state ; when it is so plain and certain, that there is neither comfort or joy to be found in anything else ?

Chapter XII.

The happiness of a life wholly devoted unto God, further proved, from the vanity, the sensuality, and the ridiculous, poor enjoyments, which they are forced to take up with, who live according to their own humours. This represented in various characters.

WE may still see more of the happiness of a life devoted unto God, by considering the poor contrivances for happiness, and the contemptible ways of life, which they are thrown into, who are not under the directions of a strict piety, but seeking after happiness by other methods.

If one looks at their lives, who live by no rule but their own humours and fancies; if one sees but what it is, which they call joy, and greatness, and happiness; if one sees how they rejoice, and repent, change and fly from one delusion to another; one shall find great reason to rejoice, that God hath appointed a strait and narrow way, that leadeth unto life, and that we are not left to the folly of our own minds, or forced to take up with such shadows of joys and happiness, as the weakness and folly of the world has invented. I say invented, because those things which make up the joy and happiness of the world are mere inventions, which have no foundation in nature and reason, are no way the proper good or happiness of man, no way perfect either in his body, or his mind, or carry him to his true end.

As for instance, when a man proposes to be happy in ways of ambition, by raising himself to some imaginary heights above other people; this is truly an invention of happiness, which has no foundation in nature, but is as mere a cheat, of our own making, as if a man should intend to make himself happy by climbing up a ladder.

If a woman seeks for happiness from fine colours or spots upon her face, from jewels and rich clothes, this is as merely an invention of happiness, as contrary to nature and reason, as if she should propose to make herself happy, by painting a post, and putting the same finery upon it. It is in this respect that I call these joys and happiness of the world, mere inventions of happiness, because neither God, nor nature, nor reason, hath appointed them as such; but whatever appears joyful, or great, or happy in them, is entirely created or invented by the blindness and vanity of our own minds.

And it is on these inventions of happiness, that I desire you to cast your eye, that you may thence learn, how great a good Religion is, which delivers you from such a multitude of follies, and vain pursuits, as are the torment and vexation of minds, that wander from their true happiness in God.

Look at Flatus, and learn how miserable they are, who are left to the folly of their own passions.

Flatus is rich and in health, yet always uneasy, and always searching after happiness. Every time you visit him, you find some new project in his head, he is eager upon it as something that is more worth his while, and will do more for him than anything that is already past. Every new thing so seizes him, that if you were to take him from it, he would think himself quite undone. His sanguine temper, and strong passions, promise him so much happiness in everything, that he is always cheated, and is satisfied with nothing.

At his first setting out in life, fine clothes were his delight, his inquiry was only after the best Tailors and Peruke-makers, and he had no thoughts of excelling in anything but dress. He spared no expense, but carried every nicety to its greatest height. But this happiness not answering his expectations, he left off his Brocades, put on a plain coat, railed at fops and beaux, and gave himself up to gaming with great eagerness.

This new pleasure satisfied him for some time, he envied no other way of life. But being by the fate of play drawn into a duel, where he narrowly escaped his death, he left off the dice, and sought for happiness no longer amongst the gamesters.

The next thing that seized his wandering imagination, was the diversions of the town: and for more than a twelvemonth, you heard him talk of nothing but Ladies, Drawing-rooms, Birth-nights, Plays, Balls, and Assemblies. But growing sick of these, he had recourse to hard drinking. Here he had many a merry night, and met with stronger joys than any he had felt before. Here he had thoughts of setting up his staff, and looking out no further; but unluckily falling into a fever, he grew angry at all strong liquors, and took his leave of the happiness of being drunk.

The next attempt after happiness carried him into the field, for two or three years, nothing was so happy as hunting; he entered upon it with all his soul, and leaped more hedges and ditches than had ever been known in so short a time. You never saw him but in a green coat; he was the envy of all that blow the horn, and always spoke to his dogs in great propriety of language. If you met him at home on a bad day, you would hear him blow his horn, and be entertained with the surprising accidents of the last noble chase. No sooner had Flatus outdone all the world in the breed and education of his dogs, built new kennels, new stables, and bought a new hunting-seat, but he immediately got sight of another happiness, hated the senseless noise and hurry of hunting, gave away his dogs, and was for some time after deep in the pleasures of building.

Now he invents new kinds of dove-cotes, and has such contrivances in his barns and stables, as were never seen before: He wonders at the dulness of the old builders, is wholly bent upon the improvement of Architecture, and will hardly hang a door in the ordinary way. He tells his friends, that he never was so delighted in anything in his life; that he has more happiness amongst his brick and mortar, than ever he had at court; and that he is contriving how to have some little matter to do that way as long as he lives.

The next year he leaves his house unfinished, complains to everybody of Masons and Carpenters, and devotes himself wholly to the happiness of riding about. After this, you can never see him but on horseback, and so highly delighted with this new way of life, that he would tell you, give him but his horse and a clean country to ride in, and you might take all the rest to yourself. A variety of new saddles and bridles, and a great change of horses, added much to the pleasure of this new way of life. But, however, having after some time tired both himself and his horses, the happiest thing he could think of next, was to go abroad and visit foreign Countries; and there indeed happiness exceeded his imagination, and he was only uneasy that he had begun so fine a life no sooner. The next month he returned home, unable to bear any longer the impertinence of foreigners.

After this he was a great student for one whole year; he was up early and late at his Italian grammar, that he might have the happiness of understanding the opera, whenever he should hear one, and not be like those unreasonable people, that are pleased with they know not what.

Flatus is very ill-natured, or otherwise, just as his affairs happen to be when you visit him; if you find him when some project is almost worn out, you will find a peevish ill-bred man; but if you had seen him just as he entered upon his riding regimen, or begun to excel in sounding of the horn, you had been saluted with great civility.

a Devout and Holy Life. 109

Flatus is now at a full stand, and is doing what he never did in his life before, he is reasoning and reflecting with himself. He loses several days, in considering which of his cast-off ways of life he should try again.

But here a new project comes in to his relief. He is now living upon herbs, and running about the country, to get himself into as good wind as any running-footman in the kingdom.

I have been thus circumstantial, in so many foolish particulars of this kind of life, because I hope, that every particular folly that you here see, will naturally turn itself into an argument, for the wisdom and happiness of a religious life.

If I could lay before you a particular account of all the circumstances of terror and distress, that daily attend a life at sea, the more particular I was in the account, the more I should make you feel and rejoice in the happiness of living upon the land.

In like manner, the more I enumerate the follies, anxieties, delusions, and restless desires which go through every part of a life devoted to human passions, and worldly enjoyments, the more you must be affected with that peace, and rest, and solid content, which religion gives to the souls of men.

If you but just cast your eye upon a madman, or a fool, it perhaps signifies little or nothing to you; but if you were to attend them for some days, and observe the lamentable madness and stupidity of all their actions, this would be an affecting sight, and would make you often bless yourself for the enjoyment of your reason and senses.

Just so, if you are only told in the gross, of the folly and madness of a life devoted to the world, it makes little or no impression upon you; but if you are shown how such people live every day; if you see the continual folly and madness of all their particular actions and designs, this would be an affecting sight, and make you bless God, for having given you a greater happiness to aspire after.

So that characters of this kind, the more folly and ridicule they have in them, provided that they be but natural, are most useful to correct our minds; and therefore are nowhere more proper than in books of devotion, and practical piety. And as in several cases, we best learn the nature of things, by looking at that which is contrary to them; so perhaps we best apprehend the excellency of wisdom, by contemplating the wild extravagances of folly.

I shall therefore continue this method a little further, and endeavour to recommend the happiness of piety to you; by showing you in some other instances, how miserably and poorly they live, who live without it.

But you will perhaps say, that the ridiculous, restless life of Flatus, is not the common state of those who resign themselves up to live by their own humours, and neglect the strict rules of religion; and that therefore it is not so great an argument of the happiness of a religious life, as I would make it.

I answer, that I am afraid it is one of the most general characters in life; and that few people can read it, without seeing something in it that belongs to themselves. For where shall we find that wise and happy man, who has not been eagerly pursuing different appearances of happiness, sometimes thinking it was here, and sometimes there?

And if people were to divide their lives into particular stages, and ask themselves what they were pursuing, or what it was which they had chiefly in view, when they were twenty years old, what at twenty-five, what at thirty, what at forty, what at fifty, and so on, till they were brought to their last bed; numbers of people would find, that they had liked, and disliked, and pursued as many different appearances of happiness, as are to be seen in the life of Flatus.

And thus it must necessarily be, more or less, with all those who propose any other happiness, than that which arises from a strict and regular piety.

But Secondly, let it be granted, that the generality of people are not of such restless, fickle tempers as Flatus; the difference then is only this, Flatus is continually changing and trying something new, but others are content with some one state; they do not leave gaming, and then fall to hunting. But they have so much steadiness in their tempers, that some seek after no other happiness, but that of heaping up riches; others grow old in the sports of the field; others are content to drink themselves to death, without the least inquiry after any other happiness.

Now is there anything more happy, or reasonable, in such a life as this, than in the life of Flatus? Is it not as great and desirable, as wise and happy, to be constantly changing from one thing to another, as to be nothing else but a gatherer of money, a hunter, a gamester, or a drunkard, all your life?

Shall religion be looked upon as a burden, as a dull and melancholy state, for calling men from such happiness as this, to live according to the laws of God, to labour after the perfection of their nature, and prepare themselves for an endless state of joy and glory in the presence of God?

But turn your eyes now another way, and let the trifling joys, the gewgaw-happiness of Feliciania, teach you how wise they are, what delusion they escape, whose hearts and hopes are fixed upon an happiness in God.

a Devout and Holy Life. III

If you were to live with Feliciana but one half year, you would see all the happiness that she is to have as long as she lives. She has no more to come, but the poor repetition of that which could never have pleased once, but through a littleness of mind, and want of thought.

She is to be again dressed fine, and keep her visiting day. She is again to change the colour of her clothes, again to have a new head, and again put patches on her face. She is again to see who acts best at the playhouse, and who sings finest at the opera. She is again to make ten visits in a day, and be ten times in a day trying to talk artfully, easily, and politely about nothing.

She is to be again delighted with some new fashion; and again angry at the change of some old one. She is to be again at cards, and gaming at midnight, and again in bed at noon. She is to be again pleased with hypocritical compliments, and again disturbed at imaginary affronts. She is to be again pleased with her good luck at gaming, and again tormented with the loss of her money. She is again to prepare herself for a birth-night; and again see the town full of good company. She is again to hear the cabals and intrigues of the town; again to have secret intelligence of private amours, and early notice of marriages, quarrels, and partings.

If you see her come out of her chariot more briskly than usual, converse with more spirit, and seem fuller of joy than she was last week, it is because there is some surprising new dress, or new diversion just come to town.

These are all the substantial and regular parts of Feliciana's happiness; and she never knew a pleasant day in her life, but it was owing to some one, or more, of these things.

It is for this happiness, that she has always been deaf to the reasonings of religion, that her heart has been too gay and cheerful to consider what is right or wrong in regard to eternity; or to listen to the sound of such dull words, as wisdom, piety, and devotion.

It is for fear of losing some of this happiness, that she dares not meditate on the immortality of her soul, consider her relation to God, or turn her thoughts towards those joys, which make Saints and Angels infinitely happy in the presence and glory of God.

But now let it be here observed, that as poor a round of happiness as this appears, yet most women, that avoid the restraints of religion for a gay life, must be content with very small parts of it. As they have not Feliciana's fortune and figure in the world, so they must give away the comforts of a pious life, for a very small part of her happiness.

And if you look into the world, and observe the lives of those women, whom no arguments can persuade to live wholly unto God, in a wise and pious employment of themselves, you will find most of them to be such, as lose all the comforts of religion, without gaining the tenth part of Feliciana's happiness. They are such as spend their time and fortunes, only in mimicking the pleasures of richer people; and rather look and long after, than enjoy those delusions, which are only to be purchased by considerable fortunes.

But if a woman of high birth, and great fortune, having read the Gospel, should rather wish to be an under servant in some pious family, where wisdom, piety, and great devotion, directed all the actions of every day; if she should rather wish this than to live at the top of Feliciana's happiness; I should think her neither mad, nor melancholy; but that she judged as rightly of the spirit of the Gospel, as if she had rather wished to be poor Lazarus at the gate, than to be the rich man 'clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day.'

But to proceed: Would you know what an happiness it is, to be governed by the wisdom of religion, and to be devoted to the joys and hopes of a pious life, look at the poor condition of Succus, whose greatest happiness, is a good night's rest in bed, and a good meal when he is up. When he talks of happiness, it is always in such expressions, as show you, that he has only his bed and his dinner in his thoughts.

This regard to his meals and repose, makes Succus order all the rest of his time with relation to them. He will undertake no business that may hurry his spirits, or break in upon his hours of eating and rest. If he reads, it shall only be for half an hour, because that is sufficient to amuse the spirits; and he will read something that may make him laugh, as rendering the body fitter for its food and rest. Or if he has at any time a mind to indulge a grave thought, he always has recourse to a useful treatise upon the ancient cookery. Succus is an enemy to all party-matters, having made it an observation, that there is as good eating amongst the Whigs, as the Tories.

He talks coolly and moderately upon all subjects, and is as fearful of falling into a passion, as of catching cold; being very positive, that they are both equally injurious to the stomach. If ever you see him more hot than ordinary, it is upon some provoking occasion, when the dispute about cookery runs very high, or in the defence of some beloved dish, which has often made him happy. But he has been so long upon these subjects, is so well acquainted with all that can be said on both sides, and has so often answered all objections, that he generally decides the matter with great gravity.

Succus is very loyal, and as soon as ever he likes any wine, he drinks the king's health with all his heart. Nothing could put rebellious thoughts into his head, unless he should live to see a Proclamation against eating of Pheasants' eggs.

All the hours that are not devoted either to repose, or nourishment, are looked upon by Succus as waste or spare time. For this reason he lodges near a coffee-house and a tavern, that when he rises in the morning, he may be near the news, and when he parts at night, he may not have far to bed. In the morning you always see him in the same place in the coffee-room, and if he seems more attentively engaged than ordinary, it is because some criminal is broke out of Newgate, or some Lady was robbed last night, but they cannot tell where. When he has learnt all that he can, he goes home to settle the matter with the Barber's boy, that comes to shave him.

The next waste-time that lays upon his hands, is from dinner to supper. And if melancholy thoughts ever come into his head, it is at this time, when he is often left to himself for an hour or more, and that after the greatest pleasure he knows is just over. He is afraid to sleep, because he has heard, it is not healthful at that time, so that he is forced to refuse so welcome a guest.

But here he is soon relieved, by a settled method of playing at cards, till it is time to think of some little nice matter for supper.

After this, Succus takes his glass, talks of the excellency of the English constitution, and praises that Minister the most, who keeps the best table.

On a Sunday night you may sometimes hear him condemning the iniquity of the town-rakes; and the bitterest thing that he says against them, is this, that he verily believes, some of them are so abandoned, as not to have a regular meal, or a sound night's sleep in a week.

At eleven, Succus bids all good night, and parts in great friendship. He is presently in bed, and sleeps till it is time to go to the coffee-house next morning.

If you were to live with Succus for a twelvemonth, this is all that you would see in his life, except a few curses and oaths that he uses as occasion offers.

And now I cannot help making this Reflection :

That as I believe the most likely means in the world, to inspire a person with true piety, was to have seen the example of some eminent professor of Religion; so the next thing that is likely to fill one with the same zeal, is to see the folly, the baseness, and poor satisfactions of a life destitute of Religion. As the one excites us to love and admire the wisdom and greatness of Religion, so the other may make us fearful of living without it.

For who can help blessing God for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory, when he sees what variety of folly they sink into, who live without it? Who would not heartily engage in all the labours and exercises of a pious life, be 'steadfast, immovable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord,' when he sees, what dull sensuality, what poor views, what gross enjoyments they are left to, who seek for happiness in other ways.

So that whether we consider the greatness of Religion, or the littleness of all other things, and the meanness of all other enjoyments, there is nothing to be found in the whole nature of things, for a thoughtful mind to rest upon, but a happiness in the hopes of Religion.

Consider now with yourself, how unreasonably it is pretended, that a life of strict piety must be a dull and anxious state? For can it with any reason be said, that the duties and restraints of Religion must render our lives heavy and melancholy, when they only deprive us of such happiness, as has been here laid before you?

Must it be tedious and tiresome, to live in the continual exercise of charity, devotion, and temperance, to act wisely and virtuously, to do good to the utmost of your power, to imitate the divine perfections, and prepare yourself for the enjoyment of God? Must it be dull and tiresome, to be delivered from blindness and vanity, from false hopes, and vain fears, to improve in holiness, to feel the comforts of conscience in all your actions, to know that God is your friend, that all must work for your good, that neither life nor death, neither men nor devils can do you any harm; but that all your sufferings and doings, that are offered unto God, all your watchings and prayers, and labours of love and charity, all your improvements, are in a short time to be rewarded with everlasting glory in the presence of God; must such a state as this be dull and tiresome, for want of such happiness, as Flatus, or Feliciana enjoys?

Now if this cannot be said, then there is no happiness or pleasure lost, by being strictly pious, nor has the devout man anything to envy in any other state of life. For all the art and contrivance in the world, without Religion, cannot make more of human life, or carry its happiness to any greater height, than Flatus and Feliciana have done.

The finest wit, the greatest genius upon earth, if not governed by Religion, must be as foolish, and low and vain in his methods of happiness, as the poor Succus.

a Devout and Holy Life. 115

If you were to see a man duly endeavouring all his life to satisfy his thirst, by holding up one and the same empty cup to his mouth, you would certainly despise his ignorance.

But if you should see others of brighter parts, and finer understandings, ridiculing the dull satisfaction of one cup, and thinking to satisfy their own thirst, by a variety of gilt and golden empty cups; would you think that these were ever the wiser, or happier, or better employed, for their finer parts?

Now this is all the difference that you can see in the happiness of this life.

The dull and heavy soul, may be content with one empty appearance of happiness, and be continually trying to hold one and the same empty cup to his mouth all his life. But then let the wit, the great scholar, the fine genius, the great statesman, the polite gentleman, lay all their heads together, and they can only show you, more, and various empty appearances of happiness; give them all the world into their hands, let them cut and carve as they please, they can only make a greater variety of empty cups.

So that if you do not think it hard to be deprived of the pleasures of gluttony for the sake of Religion, you have no reason to think it hard to be restrained from any other worldly pleasure. For search as deep, and look as far as you will, there is nothing here to be found, that is nobler, or greater, than high eating and drinking, unless you look for it in the wisdom and laws of Religion.

And if all that is in the world, are only so many empty cups, what does it signify, which you take, or how many you take, or how many you have?

If you would but use yourself to such meditations as these, to reflect upon the vanity of all orders of life without piety, to consider how all the ways of the world, are only so many different ways of error, blindness, and mistake; you would soon find your heart made wiser and better by it. These meditations would awaken your soul into a zealous desire of that solid happiness, which is only to be found in recourse to God.

Examples of great piety are not now common in the world, it may not be your happiness to live within sight of any, or to have your virtue inflamed by their light and fervour. But the misery and folly of worldly men, is what meets your eyes in every place, and you need not look far to see, how poorly, how vainly men dream away their lives, for want of religious wisdom.

This is the reason, that I have laid before you so many characters of the vanity of a worldly life, to teach you to make a benefit of the corruption of the age, and that you may be made wise, though not by the sight of what piety is, yet by seeing what misery and folly reigns, where piety is not.

If you would turn your mind to such reflections as these, your own observation would carry this instruction much further, and all your conversation and acquaintance with the world, would be a daily conviction to you of the necessity of seeking some greater happiness, than all the poor enjoyments of this world can give.

To meditate upon the perfection of the divine attributes, to contemplate the glories of Heaven, to consider the joys of Saints and Angels, living for ever in the brightness and glory of the divine presence; these are the meditations of souls advanced in piety, and not so suited to every capacity.

But to see and consider the emptiness and error of all worldly happiness; to see the grossness of sensuality, the poorness of pride, the stupidity of covetousness, the vanity of dress, the delusion of honour, the blindness of our passions, the uncertainty of our lives, and the shortness of all worldly projects; these are meditations that are suited to all capacities, fitted to strike all minds; they require no depth of thought, or sublime speculation, but are forced upon us by all our senses, and taught us by almost everything that we see and hear.

This is that 'wisdom that crieth, and putteth forth her voice'* in the streets, that standeth at all our doors, that appealeth to all our senses, teaching us in everything, and everywhere, by all that we see, and all that we hear, by births and burials, by sickness and health, by life and death, by pains and poverty, by misery and vanity, and by all the changes and chances of life, that there is nothing else for man to look after, no other end in nature for him to drive at, but a happiness which is only to be found in the hopes and expectations of Religion.

* Prov. viii. 1.

Chapter XIII.

That not only a life of vanity, or sensuality, but even the most regular kind of life, that is not governed by great devotion, sufficiently shows its miseries, its wants, and emptiness to the eyes of all the world. This represented in various characters.

IT is a very remarkable saying of our Lord and Saviour to his disciples, in these words : ' Blessed are your eyes, for ' they see, and your ears, for they hear.' They teach us two things: First, That the dulness and heaviness of men's minds, with regard to spiritual matters, is so great, that it may justly be compared to the want of eyes and ears.

Secondly, that God has so filled every thing, and every place, with motives and arguments for a godly life, that they who are but so blessed, so happy as to use their eyes and their ears, must needs be affected with them.

Now though this was in a more especial manner, the case of those whose senses were witnesses of the life and miracles and doctrines of our blessed Lord, yet it is as truly the case of all Christians at this time. For the reasons of Religion, the calls to piety, are so written and engraved upon everything, and present themselves so strongly, and so constantly to all our senses in everything that we meet, that they can only be disregarded by eyes that see not, and ears that hear not.

What greater motive to a religious life, than the vanity, the poorness of all worldly enjoyments? And yet who can help seeing and feeling this every day of his life?

What greater call to look towards God, than the pains, the sickness, the crosses, and vexations of this life; and yet whose eyes and ears are not daily witnesses of them?

What miracles could more strongly appeal to our senses, or what message from heaven speak louder to us, than the daily dying and departure of our fellow-creatures?

So that the one thing needful, or the great end of life, is not left to be discovered by fine reasoning and deep reflections; but is pressed upon us in the plainest manner, by the experience of all our senses, by everything that we meet with in life.

Let us but intend to see and hear, and then the whole world becomes a book of wisdom and instruction to us all ; all that is regular in the order of nature, all that is accidental in the course of things, all the mistakes and disappointments that happen to ourselves, all the miseries and errors that we see in other people ; become so many plain lessons of advice to us ; teaching us with as much assurance as an Angel from Heaven, that we can no ways raise ourselves to any true happiness, but by turning all our thoughts, our wishes, and endeavours, after the happiness of another life.

It is this right use of the world, that I would lead you into, by directing you to turn your eyes upon every shape of human folly, that you may thence draw fresh arguments and motives, of living to the best and greatest purposes of your creation.

And if you would but carry this intention about you, of profiting by the follies of the world, and of learning the greatness of Religion, from the littleness and vanity of every other way of life ; if, I say, you would but carry this intention in your mind, you would find, every day, every place, and every person, a fresh proof of their wisdom, who choose to live wholly unto God. You would then often return home, the wiser, the better, and the more strengthened in Religion, by everything that has fallen in your way.

Octavius is a learned, ingenious man, well versed in most parts of literature, and no stranger to any kingdom in Europe. The other day, being just recovered from a lingering fever, he took upon him to talk thus to his friends.

My glass, says he, is almost run out ; and your eyes see how many marks of age and death I bear about me : But I plainly feel myself sinking away faster than any standers-by imagine. I fully believe, that one year more will conclude my reckoning.

The attention of his friends was much raised by such a declaration, expecting to hear something truly excellent from so learned a man, who had but a year longer to live. When Octavius proceeded in this manner : For these reasons, says he, my friends, I have left off all taverns, the wine of those places is not good enough for me in this decay of nature. I must now be nice in what I drink ; I cannot pretend to do, as I have done ; and therefore am resolved to furnish my own cellar with a little of the very best, though it costs me ever so much.

I must also tell you, my friends, that age forces a man to be wise in many other respects, and makes us change many of our opinions and practices.

You know how much I have liked a large acquaintance ; I now condemn it as an error. Three or four cheerful, diverting companions, is all that I now desire ; because I find, that in my present infirmities, if I am left alone, or to grave company, I am not so easy to myself.

A few days after Octavius had made this declaration to his friends, he relapsed into his former illness, was committed to a nurse, who closed his eyes, before his fresh parcel of wine came in.

Young Eugenius, who was present at this discourse, went home a new man, with full resolutions of devoting himself wholly unto God.

I never, says Eugenius, was so deeply affected with the wisdom and importance of religion, as when I saw how poorly and meanly the learned Octavius was to leave the world, through the want of it.

How often had I envied his great learning, his skill in languages, his knowledge of antiquity, his address, and fine manner of expressing himself upon all subjects ! But when I saw how poorly it all ended, what was to be the last year of such a life, and how foolishly the master of all these accomplishments was then forced to talk, for want of being acquainted with the joys and expectations of piety, I was thoroughly convinced, that there was nothing to be envied or desired, but a life of true piety ; nor anything so poor and comfortless, as a death without it.

Now as the young Eugenius was thus edified and instructed in the present case ; so if you are so happy as to have anything of his thoughtful temper, you will meet with variety of instruction of this kind ; you will find that arguments for the wisdom and happiness of a strict piety, offer themselves in all places, and appeal to all your senses in the plainest manner.

You will find, that all the world preaches to an attentive mind ; and that if you have but ears to hear, almost everything you meet, teaches you some lesson of wisdom.

But now, if to these admonitions and instructions, which we receive from our senses, from an experience of the state of human life ; if to these we add the lights of religion, those great truths which the Son of God has taught us ; it will be then as much past all doubt, that there is but one happiness for man, as that there is but one God.

For since religion teaches us, that our souls are immortal, that piety and devotion will carry them to an eternal enjoyment of God ; and that carnal worldly tempers will sink them into an everlasting misery with damned spirits ; what gross nonsense and stupidity is it, to give the name of joy or happiness to anything but that, which carries us to this joy and happiness in God ?

Were all to die with our bodies, there might be some pretence for those different sorts of happiness, that are now so much talked of; but since our all begins at the death of our bodies; since all men are to be immortal, either in misery or happiness, in a world entirely different from this; since they are all hastening hence at all uncertainties, as fast as death can cut them down; some in sickness, some in health, some sleeping, some waking, some at midnight, others at cock-crowing, and all at hours that they know not of; is it not certain, that no man can exceed another in joy and happiness, but so far as he exceeds him in those virtues, which fit him for a happy death?

Cognatus is a sober, regular Clergyman, of good repute in the world, and well esteemed in his parish. All his parishioners say he is an honest man, and very notable at making a bargain. The farmers listen to him with great attention, when he talks of the properest time of selling corn.

He has been for twenty years a diligent observer of markets, and has raised a considerable fortune by good management.

Cognatus is very orthodox, and full of esteem of our English Liturgy; and if he has not prayers on Wednesdays and Fridays, it is because his Predecessor had not used the parish to any such custom.

As he cannot serve both his livings himself, he makes it matter of conscience to keep a sober curate upon one of them, whom he hires to take care of all the souls in the parish, at as cheap a rate as a sober man can be procured.

Cognatus has been very prosperous all his time; but still he has had the uneasiness and vexations that they have, who are deep in worldly business. Taxes, losses, crosses, bad mortgages, bad tenants, and the hardness of the times, are frequent subjects of his conversation; and a good or bad season has a great effect upon his spirits.

Cognatus has no other end in growing rich, but that he may leave a considerable fortune to a Niece, whom he has politely educated in expensive finery, by what he has saved out of the tithes of two livings.

The neighbours look upon Cognatus as an happy clergyman, because they see him (as they call it) in good circumstances; and some of them intend to dedicate their own sons to the Church, because they see how well it has succeeded with Cognatus, whose father was but an ordinary man.

But now if Cognatus, when he first entered into holy orders, had perceived how absurd a thing it is to grow rich by the Gospel; if he had proposed to himself the example of some primitive father; if he had had the piety of the great St. Austin in his eye, who durst not enrich any of his relations out of the revenue of the Church, if, instead of twenty years' care to lay up treasures upon earth, he had distributed the income of every year, in the most Christian acts of charity and compassion.

If instead of tempting his Niece to be proud, and providing her with such ornaments, as the Apostle forbids, he had clothed, comforted, and assisted numbers of widows, orphans, and distressed, who were all to appear for him at the last day.

If instead of the cares and anxieties of bad bonds, troublesome mortgages, and ill bargains, he had had the constant comfort of knowing, that his treasure was securely laid up, where neither moth corrupteth, nor thieves break through and steal: Could it with any reason be said, that he had mistaken the spirit and dignity of his order, or lessened any of that happiness, which is to be found in his sacred employments?

If instead of rejoicing at the happiness of a second living, he had thought it as unbecoming the office of a clergyman, to traffic for gain in holy things, as to open a shop.

If he had thought it better to recommend some honest labour to his Niece, than to support her in idleness by the labours of a curate; better that she should want fine clothes and a rich husband, than that cures of souls should be farmed about, and brother clergymen not suffered to live by those altars at which they serve. If this had been the spirit of Cognatus, could it with any reason be said, that these rules of religion, this strictness of piety, had robbed Cognatus of any real happiness? Could it be said, that a life thus governed by the spirit of the Gospel, must be dull and melancholy, if compared to that of raising a fortune for a Niece?

Now as this cannot be said in the present case, so in every other kind of life, if you enter into the particulars of it, you will find, that however easy and prosperous it may seem, yet you cannot add piety to any part of it, without adding so much of a better joy and happiness to it.

Look now at that condition of life, which draws the envy of all eyes.

Negotius is a temperate honest man. He served his time under a master of great trade, but has, by his own management, made it a more considerable business than ever it was before. For thirty years last past, he has wrote fifty or sixty letters in a week, and is busy in corresponding with all parts of Europe. The general good of trade seems to Negotius to be the general good of life; whomsoever he admires, whatever he commends or condemns, either in Church or State, is admired, commended, or condemned, with some regard to trade.

As money is continually pouring in upon him, so he often lets it go in various kinds of expense and generosity, and sometimes in ways of charity.

Negotius is always ready to join in any public contribution : If a purse is making at any place where he happens to be, whether it be to buy a plate for a horse-race, or to redeem a prisoner out of gaol, you are always sure of having something from him.

He has given a fine ring of bells to a Church in the country ; and there is much expectation, that he will some time or other make a more beautiful front to the market-house, than has yet been seen in any place. For it is the generous spirit of Negotius, to do nothing in a mean way.

If you ask what it is, that has secured Negotius from all scandalous vices, it is the same thing that has kept him from all strictness of devotion, it is his great business. He has always had too many important things in his head, his thoughts have been too much employed, to suffer him to fall either into any courses of rakery, or to feel the necessity of an inward, solid piety.

For this reason he hears of the pleasures of debauchery, and the pleasures of piety, with the same indifferency ; and has no more desire of living in the one, than in the other, because neither of them consist with that turn of mind, and multiplicity of business, which are his happiness.

If Negotius was asked, What is it which he drives at in life ? he would be as much at a loss for an answer, as if he was asked, what any other person is thinking of. For though he always seems to himself to know what he is doing, and has many things in his head, which are the motives of his actions ; yet he cannot tell you of any one general end of life, that he has chosen with deliberation, as being truly worthy of all his labour and pains.

He has several confused notions in his head, which have been a long time there ; such as these, viz., That it is something great to have more business than other people, to have more dealings upon his hands than an hundred of the same profession ; to grow continually richer and richer, and to raise an immense fortune before he dies. The thing that seems to give Negotius the greatest life and spirit, and to be most in his thoughts, is an expectation that he has, that he shall die richer than any of his business ever did.

The generality of people, when they think of happiness, think upon Negotius, in whose life every instance of happiness is supposed to meet ; sober, prudent, rich, prosperous, generous, and charitable.

Let us now, therefore, look at this condition in another, but truer light.

Let it be supposed, that this same Negotius was a painful, laborious man, every day deep in variety of affairs ; that he neither drank, nor debauched ; but was sober and regular in his business. Let it be supposed, that he grew old in this course of trading ; and that the end and design of all this labour, and care, and application to business, was only this, that he might die possessed of more than an hundred thousand pair of boots and spurs, and as many great coats.

Let it be supposed, that the sober part of the world say of him when he is dead, that he was a great and happy man, a thorough master of business, and had acquired a hundred thousand pair of boots and spurs when he died.

Now if this was really the case, I believe it would be readily granted, that a life of such business was as poor and ridiculous, as any that be invented. But it would puzzle anyone to show, that a man that has spent all his time and thoughts in business and hurry that he might die, as it is said, worth an hundred thousand pounds, is any whit wiser than he, who has taken the same pains, to have as many pair of boots and spurs when he leaves the world.

For if the temper and state of our souls be our whole state ; if the only end of life be to die as free from sin, and as exalted in virtue as we can ; if naked as we came, so naked are we to return, and to stand a trial before Christ, and his holy angels, for everlasting happiness or misery ; what can it possibly signify what a man had, or had not, in this world ? What can it signify what you call those things which a man has left behind him ; whether you call them his or anyone's else ; whether you call them trees, or fields, or birds and feathers ; whether you call them an hundred thousand pounds, or an hundred thousand pair of boots and spurs ? I say, call them ; for the things signify no more to him than the names.

Now it is easy to see the folly of a life thus spent, to furnish a man with such a number of boots and spurs. But yet there needs no better faculty of seeing, no finer understanding, to see the folly of a life spent, in making a man a possessor of ten towns before he dies.

For if when he has got all his towns, or all his boots, his soul is to go to its own place amongst separate spirits, and his body be laid by in a coffin, till the last trumpet calls him to judgment ; where the inquiry will be, how humbly, how devoutly, how purely, how meekly, how piously, how charitably, how heavenly, we have spoken, thought, and acted, whilst we were in the body ; how can we say, that he who has worn out his life in raising an hundred thousand pounds, has acted wiser for himself, than he who has had the same care, to procure an hundred thousand of anything else ?

But further: Let it now be supposed, that Negotius, when he first entered into business, happening to read the Gospel with attention, and eyes open, found that he had a much greater business upon his hands, than that to which he had served an apprenticeship; that there were things which belong to man, of much more importance than all that our eyes can see; so glorious, as to deserve all our thoughts; so dangerous, as to need all our care; and so certain, as never to deceive the faithful labourer.

Let it be supposed, that from reading this book, he had discovered that his soul was more to him than his body; that it was better to grow in the virtues of the soul, than to have a large body, or a full purse; that it was better to be fit for heaven, than to have variety of fine houses upon the earth; that it was better to secure an everlasting happiness, than to have plenty of things which he cannot keep; better to live in habits of humility, piety, devotion, charity, and self-denial, than to die unprepared for judgment; better to be most like our Saviour, or some eminent saint, than to excel all the tradesmen in the world, in business and bulk of fortune.

Let it be supposed, that Negotius believing these things to be true, entirely devoted himself to God at his first setting out in the world, resolving to pursue his business no further than was consistent with great devotion, humility, and self-denial; and for no other ends, but to provide himself with a sober subsistence, and to do all the good that he could, to the souls and bodies of his fellow-creatures.

Let it therefore be supposed, that instead of the continual hurry of business, he was frequent in his retirements, and a strict observer of all the hours of prayer; that instead of restless desires after more riches, his soul had been full of the love of God and heavenly affection, constantly watching against worldly tempers, and always aspiring after divine grace; that instead of worldly cares and contrivances, he was busy in fortifying his soul against all approaches of sin; that instead of costly show, and expensive generosity of a splendid life, he loved and exercised all instances of humility and lowliness; that instead of great treats and full tables, his house only furnished a sober refreshment to those that wanted it.

Let it be supposed that his contentment kept him free from all kinds of envy. That his piety made him thankful to God in all crosses and disappointments. That his charity kept him from being rich, by a continual distribution to all objects of compassion.

Now had this been the Christian spirit of Negotius, can anyone say, that he had lost the true joy and happiness of life, by thus conforming to the spirit, and living up to the hopes of the Gospel?

Can it be said, that a life made exemplary by such virtues as these, which keep heaven always in our sight, which both delight and exalt the soul here, and prepare it for the presence of God hereafter, must be poor and dull, if compared to that of heaping up riches, which can neither stay with us, nor we with them?

It would be endless to multiply examples of this kind, to show you how little is lost, and how much is gained, by introducing a strict and exact piety into every condition of human life.

I shall now therefore leave it to your own meditation, to carry this way of thinking further, hoping that you are enough directed by what is here said, to convince yourself, that a true and exalted piety is so far from rendering any life dull and tiresome, that it is the only joy and happiness of every condition in the world.

Imagine to yourself some person in a consumption, or any other lingering distemper, that was incurable.

If you were to see such a man wholly intent upon doing everything in the spirit of Religion, making the wisest use of all his time, fortune, and abilities. If he was for carrying every duty of piety to its greatest height, and striving to have all the advantage that could be had from the remainder of his life. If he avoided all business, but such as was necessary; if he was averse to all the follies and vanities of the world, had no taste for finery, and show, but sought for all his comfort in the hopes and expectations of Religion; you would certainly commend his prudence, you would say that he had taken the right method to make himself as joyful and happy, as anyone can be in state of such infirmity.

On the other hand, if you should see the same person, with trembling hands, short breath, thin jaws, and hollow eyes, wholly intent upon business and bargains, as long as he could speak. If you should see him pleased with fine clothes, when he could scarce stand to be dressed, and laying out his money in horses and dogs, rather than purchase the prayers of the poor for his soul, which was so soon to be separated from his body, you would certainly condemn him, as a weak silly man.

Now as it is easy to see the reasonableness, the wisdom and happiness of a religious spirit in a consumptive man, so if you pursue the same way of thinking, you will as easily perceive the same wisdom and happiness of a pious temper, in every other state of life.

For how soon will every man that is in health, be in the state of him that is in a consumption? How soon will he want all the same comforts and satisfactions of Religion, which every dying man wants?

And if it be wise and happy to live piously, because we have not above a year to live, is it not being more wise, and making ourselves more happy, because we may have more years to come! If one year of piety before we die, is so desirable, is not more years of piety much more desirable?

If a man had five fixed years to live, he could not possibly think at all, without intending to make the best use of them all. When he saw his stay so short in this world, he must needs think that this was not a world for him; and when he saw how near he was to another world, that was eternal, he must surely think it very necessary, to be very diligent in preparing himself for it.

Now as reasonable as piety appears in such a circumstance of life, it is yet more reasonable in every circumstance of life, to every thinking man.

For who but a madman, can reckon that he has five years certain to come?

And if it be reasonable and necessary to deny our worldly tempers, and live wholly unto God, because we are certain that we are to die at the end of five years; surely it must be much more reasonable and necessary, for us to live in the same spirit, because we have no certainly, that we shall live five weeks.

Again, if we were to add twenty years to the five, which is in all probability more than will be added to the lives of many people, who are at man's estate; what a poor thing is this! how small a difference is there between five, and twenty-five years?

It is said, that a day is with God as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; because in regard to his eternity, this difference is as nothing.

Now as we are all created to be eternal, to live in an endless succession of ages upon ages, where thousands and millions of thousands of years, will have no proportion to our everlasting life in God; so with regard to this eternal state, which is our real state, twenty-five years is as poor a pittance, as twenty-five days.

Now we can never make any true judgment of time as it relates to us, without considering the true state of our duration. If we are temporary beings, then a little time, may justly be called a great deal in relation to us, but if we are eternal beings, then the difference of a few years is as nothing.

If we were to suppose three different sorts of rational beings, all of different, but fixed duration, one sort that lived certainly only a month, the other a year, and the third an hundred years.

Now if these beings were to meet together, and talk about time, they must talk in a very different language; half an hour to those that were to live but a month, must be a very different thing, to what it is to those, who are to live an hundred years.

As therefore time is thus different a thing, with regard to the state of those who enjoy it, so if we would know what time is with regard to ourselves, we must consider our state.

Now since our eternal state, is as certainly ours, as our present state; since we are as certainly to live for ever, as we now live at all; it is plain, that we cannot judge of the value of any particular time, as to us, but by comparing it to that eternal duration, for which we are created.

If you would know, what five years signify to a being that was to live an hundred, you must compare five to an hundred, and see what proportion it bears to it, and then you will judge right.

So if you would know, what twenty years signify to a son of Adam, you must compare it, not to a million of ages, but to an eternal duration, to which no number of millions bears any proportion; and then you will judge right, by finding it nothing.

Consider therefore this: how would you condemn the folly of a man, that should lose his share of future glory, for the sake of being rich, or great, or praised, or delighted in any enjoyment, only one poor day before he was to die!

But if the time will come, when a number of years will seem less to everyone, than a day does now; what a condemnation must it then be, if eternal happiness should appear to be lost, for something less than the enjoyment of a day!

Why does a day seem a trifle to us now? It is because we have years to set against it. It is the duration of years, that makes it appear as nothing.

What a trifle therefore must the years of a man's age appear, when they are forced to be set against eternity, when there shall be nothing but eternity to compare them with!

Now this will be the case of every man, as soon as he is out of the body, he will be forced to forget the distinctions of days and years, and to measure time, not by the course of the Sun, but by setting it against eternity.

As the fixed stars, by reason of our being placed at such distance from them, appear but so many points; so when we, placed in eternity, shall look back upon all time, it will all appear but as a moment.

Then, a luxury, an indulgence, a prosperity, a greatness of fifty years, will seem to everyone that looks back upon it, as the same poor short enjoyment, as if he had been snatched away in his first sin.

These few reflections upon time, are only to show how poorly they think, how miserably they judge, who are less careful of an eternal state, because they may be at some years' distance from it, than they would be, if they knew they were within a few weeks of it.

Chapter XIV.

Concerning that part of Devotion which relates to times and hours of Prayer. Of daily early prayer in the morning. How we are to improve our forms of Prayer, and how to increase the spirit of devotion.

HAVING in the foregoing Chapter, shown the necessity of a devout spirit, or habit of mind in every part of our common life, in the discharge of all our business, in the use of all the gifts of God : I come now to consider that part of devotion, which relates to times and hours of prayer.

I take it for granted, that every Christian, that is in health, is up early in the morning ; for it is much more reasonable to suppose a person up early, because he is a Christian, than because he is a labourer, or a tradesman, or a servant, or has business that wants him.

We naturally conceive some abhorrence of a man that is in bed, when he should be at his labour, or in his shop. We cannot tell how to think anything good of him, who is such a slave to drowsiness, as to neglect his business for it.

Let this therefore teach us to conceive, how odious we must appear in the sight of heaven, if we are in bed, shut up in sleep and darkness, when we should be praising God ; and are such slaves to drowsiness, as to neglect our devotions for it.

For if he is to be blamed as a slothful drone, that rather chooses the lazy indulgence of sleep, than to perform his proper share of worldly business ; how much more is he to be reproached, that had rather lie folded up in a bed, than be raising up his heart to God in acts of praise and adoration ?

Prayer is the nearest approach to God, and the highest enjoyment of him, that we are capable of in this life.

It is the noblest exercise of the soul, the most exalted use of our best faculties, and the highest imitation of the blessed inhabitants of heaven.

When our hearts are full of God, sending up holy desires to the throne of grace, we are then in our highest state, we are upon the utmost heights of human greatness ; we are not before kings and princes, but in the presence and audience of the Lord of all the world, and can be no higher, till death is swallowed up in glory.

On the other hand, sleep is the poorest, dullest refreshment of the body, that is so far from being intended as an enjoyment, that we are forced to receive it either in a state of insensibility, or in the folly of dreams.

Sleep is such a dull, stupid state of existence, that even amongst mere animals, we despise those most, which are most drowsy.

He therefore that chooses, to enlarge the slothful indulgence of sleep, rather than be early at his devotions to God, chooses the dullest refreshment of the body, before the highest, noblest employment of the soul ; he chooses that state, which is a reproach to mere animals, rather than that exercise, which is the glory of Angels.

You will perhaps say, though you rise late, yet you are always careful of your devotions when you are up.

It may be so. But what then ? Is it well done of you to rise late, because you pray when you are up ? Is it pardonable to waste great part of the day in bed, because some time after you say your prayers ?

It is as much your duty to rise to pray, as to pray when you are risen. And if you are late at your prayers, you offer to God the prayers of an idle, slothful worshipper, that rises to prayers, as idle servants rise to their labour.

Further, if you fancy that you are careful of your devotions, when you are up, though it be your custom to rise late, you deceive yourself ; for you cannot perform your devotions as you ought. For he that cannot deny himself this drowsy indulgence, but must pass away good part of the morning in it, is no more prepared for prayer when he is up, than he is prepared for fasting, abstinence, or any other self-denial. He may indeed more easily read over a form of prayer, than he can perform these duties ; but he is no more disposed to enter into the true spirit of prayer, than he is disposed to fasting. For sleep thus indulged, gives a softness and idleness to all our tempers, and makes us unable to relish anything, but what suits with an idle state of mind, and gratifies our natural tempers, as sleep does. So that a person that is a slave to this idleness, is in the same temper when he is up ; and though he is not asleep, yet he is under the effects of it ; and everything that is idle, indulgent, or sensual, pleases him for the same reason that sleep pleases him ; and on the other hand, everything that requires care, or trouble, or self-denial, is hateful to him, for the same reason that he hates to rise. He that places any happiness in this morning indulgence, would be glad to have all the day made happy in the same manner ; though not with sleep, yet with such enjoyments, as gratify and indulge the body in the same manner as sleep does ; or at least, with such as come as near to it as they can. The remembrance of a warm bed is in his mind all the day, and he is glad when he is not one of those, that sit starving in a Church.

Now you do not imagine, that such a one can truly mortify that body which he thus indulges ; yet you might as well think this, as that he can truly perform his devotions ; or live in such a drowsy state of indulgence, and yet relish the joys of a spiritual life.

For surely, no one will pretend to say, that he knows and feels the true happiness of prayer, who does not think it worth his while to be early at it.

It is not possible in nature, for an Epicure to be truly devout ; he must renounce this habit of sensuality, before he can relish the happiness of devotion.

Now he that turns sleep into an idle indulgence, does as much to corrupt and disorder his soul, to make it a slave to bodily appetites, and keep it incapable of all devout and heavenly tempers, as he that turns the necessities of eating, into a course of indulgence.

A person that eats and drinks too much, does not feel such effects from it, as those do, who live in notorious instances of gluttony and intemperance ; but yet his course of indulgence, though it be not scandalous in the eyes of the world, nor such as torments his own conscience, is a great and constant hindrance to his improvement in virtue ; it gives him 'eyes that see not,' and 'ears that hear not' ; it creates a sensuality in the soul, increases the power of bodily passions, and makes him incapable of entering into the true spirit of Religion.

Now this is the case of those who waste their time in sleep ; it does not disorder their lives, or wound their consciences, as notorious acts of intemperance do ; but like any other more moderate course of indulgence, it silently, and by smaller degrees, wears away the spirit of religion, and sinks the soul into a state of dulness and sensuality.

If you consider devotion only as a time of so much prayer, you may perhaps perform it, though you live in this daily indulgence : But if you consider it as a state of the heart, as a lively fervour of the soul, that is deeply affected with a sense of its own misery and infirmities, and desiring the spirit of God more than all things in the world, you will find that the spirit of indulgence, and the spirit of prayer, cannot subsist together. Mortification, of all kinds, is the very life and soul of piety ; but he that has not so small a degree of it, as to be able to be early at his prayers, can have no reason to think that he has taken up his cross, and is following Christ.

What conquest has he got over himself? What right hand has he cut off? What trials is he prepared for? What sacrifice is he ready to offer unto God ; who cannot be so cruel to himself, as to rise to prayer at such time, as the drudging part of the world are content to rise to their labour.

Some people will not scruple to tell you, that they indulge themselves in sleep, because they have nothing to do ; and that if they had either business, or pleasure to rise to, they would not lose so much of their time in sleep. But such people must be told, that they mistake the matter ; that they have a great deal of business to do ; they have a hardened heart to change ; they have the whole spirit of Religion to get. For surely, he that thinks devotion to be of less moment, than business or pleasure ; or that he has nothing to do, because nothing but his prayers want him, may be justly said to have the whole spirit of Religion to seek.

You must not therefore consider, how small a crime it is to rise late, but you must consider how great a misery it is, to want the spirit of Religion, to have a heart not rightly affected with prayer ; and to live in such softness and idleness, as makes you incapable of the most fundamental duties, of a truly Christian and spiritual life.

This is the right way of judging, of the crime of wasting great part of your time in bed.

You must not consider the thing barely in itself, but what it proceeds from ; what virtues it shows to be wanting ; what vices it naturally strengthens. For every habit of this kind, discovers the state of the soul, and plainly shows the whole turn of your mind.

If our blessed Lord used to pray early before day ; if he spent whole nights in prayer ; if the devout Anna was day and night in the temple ; if St. Paul and Silas at midnight sang praises unto God ; if the primitive Christians, for several hundred years, besides their hours of prayer in the day-time, met publicly in the Churches at midnight, to join in Psalms and Prayers, is it not certain that these practices showed the state of their heart? Are they not so many plain proofs of the whole turn of their minds?

And if you live in a contrary state, wasting great part of every day in sleep, thinking any time soon enough to be at your prayers; is it not equally certain, that this practice as much shows the state of your heart, and the whole turn of your mind?

So that if this indulgence is your way of life, you have as much reason to believe yourself destitute of the true spirit of devotion, as you have, to believe the Apostles and Saints of the Primitive Church were truly devout. For as their way of life was a demonstration of their devotion, so a contrary way of life, is as strong a proof of a want of devotion.

When you read the Scriptures, you see a Religion that is all life, and spirit, and joy in God; that supposes our souls risen from earthly desires, and bodily indulgences, to prepare for another body, another world, and other enjoyments. You see Christians represented as temples of the Holy Ghost, as children of the day, as candidates for an eternal crown, as watchful virgins, that have their lamps always burning, in expectation of the bridegroom. But can he be thought to have this joy in God, this care of eternity, this watchful spirit, who has not zeal enough to rise to his prayers?

When you look into the writings and lives of the first Christians, you see the same spirit that you see in the Scriptures. All is reality, life and action. Watching and prayers, self-denial and mortification, was the common business of their lives.

From that time to this, there has been no person like them, eminent for piety, who has not, like them, been eminent for self-denial and mortification. This is the only royal way that leads to a kingdom.

But how far are you from this way of life, or rather how contrary to it, if instead of imitating their austerity and mortification, you cannot so much as renounce so poor an indulgence, as to be able to rise to your prayers? If self-denials and bodily sufferings, if watchings and fastings, will be marks of glory at the day of Judgment, where must we hide our heads, that have slumbered away our time in sloth and softness?

You perhaps may find some pretences, to excuse yourselves from that severity of fasting and self-denial, which the first Christians practised. You fancy that human nature is grown weaker, and that the difference of Climates, may make it not possible for you to observe their methods of self-denial and austerity, in these colder countries.

But all this is but pretence; for the change is not in the outward state of things, but in the inward state of our minds. When there is the same spirit in us, that there was in the Apostles and primitive Christians, when we feel the weight of Religion, as they did, when we have their faith and hope, we shall take up our cross, and deny ourselves, and live in such methods of mortification as they did.

Had St. Paul lived in a cold country, had he had a constitution made weak with a sickly stomach, and often infirmities, he would have done as he advised Timothy, he would have mixed a little wine with his water.

But still he would have lived in a state of self-denial and mortification. He would have given this same account of himself: 'I therefore so run, not as uncertainly, so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: But I keep under my body, and bring it unto subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.'

After all, let it now be supposed, that you imagine there is no necessity for you to be so sober and vigilant, so fearful of yourself, so watchful over your passions, so apprehensive of danger, so careful of your salvation, as the Apostles were. Let it be supposed, that you imagine that you want less self-denial and mortification, to subdue your bodies, and purify your souls, than they wanted; that you need not have your loins girt, and your lamps burning as they had, will you therefore live in a quite contrary state? Will you make your life as constant a course of softness and indulgence, as theirs was of strictness and self-denial.

If therefore, you should think that you have time sufficient, both for prayer and other duties, though you rise late; yet let me persuade you to rise early, as an instance of self-denial. It is so small a one, that if you cannot comply with it, you have no reason to think yourself capable of any other.

If I were to desire you, not to study the gratifications of your palate, in the niceties of meats and drinks, I would not insist much upon the crime of wasting your money in such a way, though it be a great one; but I would desire you to renounce such a way of life, because it supports you in such a state of sensuality and indulgence, as renders you incapable of relishing the most essential doctrines of Religion.

For the same reason, I do not insist much on the crime of wasting so much of your time in sleep, though it be a great one, but I desire you to renounce this indulgence, because it gives a softness and idleness to your soul; and is so contrary to that lively, zealous, watchful, self-denying spirit, which was not only the spirit of Christ and his Apostles, the spirit of all the saints and martyrs which have ever been amongst men, but must be the spirit of all those, who would not sink in the common corruption of the world.

Here therefore, we must fix our charge against this practice ; we must blame it, not as having this or that particular evil, but as a general habit, that extends itself through our whole spirit, and supports a state of mind that is wholly wrong.

It is contrary to piety ; not as accidental slips and mistakes in life are contrary to it, but in such a manner, as an ill habit of body is contrary to health.

On the other hand, if you were to rise early every morning, as an instance of self-denial, as a method of renouncing indulgence, as a means of redeeming your time, and fitting your spirit for prayer, you would find mighty advantages from it. This method, though it seems such a small circumstance of life, would in all probability be a means of great piety. It would keep it constantly in your head, that softness and idleness were to be avoided, that self-denial was a part of Christianity. It would teach you to exercise power over yourself, and make you able by degrees to renounce other pleasures and tempers that war against the soul.

This one rule would teach you to think of others ; it would dispose your mind to exactness, and be very likely to bring the remaining part of the day, under rules of prudence and devotion.

But above all, one certain benefit from this method you will be sure of having, it will best fit and prepare you for the reception of the Holy Spirit. When you thus begin the day in the spirit of religion, renouncing sleep, because you are to renounce softness, and redeem your time ; this disposition, as it puts your heart into a good state, so it will procure the assistance of the Holy Spirit ; what is so planted and watered, will certainly have an increase from God. You will then speak from your heart, your soul will be awake, your prayers will refresh you like meat and drink, you will feel what you say, and begin to know what saints and holy men have meant, by fervours of devotion.

He that is thus prepared for prayer, who rises with these dispositions, is in a very different state from him, who has no rules of this kind ; who rises by chance, as he happens to be weary of his bed, or is able to sleep no longer. If such a one prays only with his mouth ; if his heart feels nothing of that which he says ; if his prayers are only things of course ; if they are a lifeless form of words, which he only repeats because they are soon said, there is nothing to be wondered at in all this ; for such dispositions are the natural effects of such a state of life.

Hoping therefore, that you are now enough convinced of the necessity of rising early to your prayers, I shall proceed to lay before you a method of daily prayer.

I do not take upon me to prescribe to you the use of any particular forms of prayer, but only to show you the necessity of praying at such times, and in such a manner.

You will here find some helps, how to furnish yourself with such forms of prayer, as shall be useful to you. And if you are such a proficient in the spirit of devotion, that your heart is always ready to pray in its own language, in this case I press no necessity of borrowed forms.

For though I think a form of prayer very necessary and expedient for public worship, yet if anyone can find a better way of raising his heart unto God in private, than by prepared forms of prayer, I have nothing to object against it; my design being only to assist and direct such as stand in need of assistance.

Thus much, I believe, is certain, that the generality of Christians ought to use forms of prayer, at all the regular times of prayer. It seems right for everyone to begin with a form of prayer; and if in the midst of his devotions, he finds his heart ready to break forth into new and higher strains of devotion, he should leave his form for a while, and follow those fervours of his heart, till it again wants the assistance of his usual petitions.

This seems to be the true liberty of private devotion; it should be under the direction of some form; but not so tied down to it, but that it may be free to take such new expressions, as its present fervours happen to furnish it with; which sometimes are more affecting, and carry the soul more powerfully to God, than any expressions that were ever used before.

All people that have ever made any reflections upon what passes in their own hearts, must know that they are mighty changeable in regard to devotion. Sometimes our hearts are so awakened, have such strong apprehensions of the divine Presence, are so full of deep compunction for our sins, that we cannot confess them in any language, but that of tears.

Sometimes the light of God's countenance shines so bright upon us, we see so far into the invisible world, we are so affected with the wonders of the love and goodness of God, that our hearts worship and adore in a language higher than that of words, and we feel transports of devotion, which only can be felt.

On the other hand, sometimes we are so sunk into our bodies, so dull and unaffected with that which concerns our souls, that our hearts are as much too low for our prayers; we cannot keep pace with our forms of confession, or feel half of that in our hearts which we have in our mouths; we thank and praise God with forms of words, but our hearts have little or no share in them.

It is therefore highly necessary, to provide against this inconstancy of our hearts, by having at hand such forms of prayer, as may best suit us when our hearts are in their best state, and also be most likely to raise and stir them up, when they are sunk into dulness. For as words have a power of affecting our hearts on all occasions, as the same thing differently expressed has different effects upon our minds; so it is reasonable, that we should make this advantage of language, and provide ourselves with such forms of expressions, as are most likely to move and enliven our souls, and fill them with sentiments suitable to them.

The first thing that you are to do, when you are upon your knees, is to shut your eyes, and with a short silence let your soul place itself in the presence of God; that is, you are to use this, or some other better method, to separate yourself from all common thoughts, and make your heart as sensible as you can of the divine presence.

Now if this recollection of spirit is necessary, as who can say it is not? then how poorly must they perform their devotions, who are always in a hurry; who begin them in haste, and hardly allow themselves time to repeat their very form, with any gravity or attention? Theirs is properly saying prayers, instead of praying.

To proceed; if you were to use yourself (as far as you can) to pray always in the same place; if you were to reserve that place for devotion, and not allow yourself to do anything common in it; if you were never to be there yourself, but in times of devotion; if any little room, (or if that cannot be) if any particular part of a room was thus used, this kind of consecration of it, as a place holy unto God, would have an effect upon your mind, and dispose you to such tempers, as would very much assist your devotion. For by having a place thus sacred in your room, it would in some measure resemble a chapel or house of God. This would dispose you to be always in the spirit of religion, when you were there; and fill you with wise and holy thoughts, when you were by yourself. Your own apartment would raise in your mind, such sentiments as you have, when you stand near an altar; and you would be afraid of thinking or doing anything that was foolish near that place, which is the place of prayer, and holy intercourse with God.

When you begin your petitions, use such various expressions of the attributes of God, as may make you most sensible of the greatness and power of the divine Nature.
