"The singing recommences, and the two baskets are attached to each other by the priest's beads, and carried round the stage, the women following the priest. Here I left the motley group. I assure you, seen by torchlight, it was a most impressive scene. The singing after we left went on at intervals during the night, and in the morning we discovered the priest and sons singing before the stage by the book, and looking very seedy. They had killed a kid during the night, for its head and hind quarters were lying before the stage. The ceremonies last for 24 hours. The priest gets for his work the clothes of the deceased, and a coin worth 10d. After it was over, I was told that a lad had gone up to the priest to ask him to worship me, as it was likely I could raise the dead!"

DEAD (EXAMINATION OF THE). When a dead body is laid in the grave, the Mohammedans believe that an angel gives notice of it to the two examiners, Monker and Nakir, terrific angels of livid and gloomy appearance, whose duty it is to inquire into the life and actions of the deceased. They order the dead person to sit upright, and if he obeys not instantly, they drag him up with an iron hook; and as these examiners are not supposed to be very patient, the Mohammedans have their graves made hollow, that they may be able to sit up without difficulty. The angels rigidly question the dead person respecting his faith; if he answers satisfactorily, they suffer him to be refreshed with the breezes of Paradise; but if not, they beat him on the temples with maces of iron, and pull him about with the iron hook or scythe, until he roars so loud as to be heard by the whole universe, except men and genii. They then thrust him back into the grave, giving him as companions ninety-nine dragons, with seven heads each, who gnaw his carcase until the day of judgment.

Mr. Lane, in his 'Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians,' thus notices this singular article of faith: "It is a part of the Moslems' creed, that the soul remains with the body the first night after the burial, and that two angels are sent by God to visit and examine it, and perhaps torture the body; a Fackéé is consequently hired to sit before the tomb, and perform the office of instructor of the dead; he repeats generally such sentences as follow: 'Answer the angels, God is my Lord in truth;' 'Mohammed is the apostle of God with veracity;' 'El-Islam is my religion;' 'The Koran is my book of direction, and the Moslems are my brothers,' &c. He concludes by saying, 'Sleep, O servant of God, in the protection of God.' A buffalo is sometimes slaughtered, and the flesh given to the poor; this is supposed to expiate some of the minor sins, but not the great sins. At the end of the first night after the burial, the soul is believed to depart either to the place of residence allotted to good souls until the last day, or to the prison appointed for wicked souls."

The Examination of the Dead, which may have been a notion derived from John xx. 12, is not directly mentioned in the Koran, and therefore rejected by those Mohammedans who strictly adhere to the text, but as the doctrine is distinctly alluded to, it is received by the majority of Mussulmans. The idea is probably borrowed from the religion of the ancient Persians, where the examination of the dead is taught, though it is believed to take place at a later period; and the examiners, Mithra and Rashneé-râst, wait until the souls present themselves on the bridge (see AL-SIRAT) that separates earth from heaven.

In the 'Book of Traditions concerning the Actions and Sayings of Mohammed,' Abû-Horeira, a companion of the prophet, reports on the subject of the examination of the dead: "The prophet said, Verily, a dead body sits up in its grave without fear or noise, after which it is asked its religion in the world; it will reply, 'I was in Islâm.'—And what dost thou say concerning Mohammed?" It will say, 'He is the messenger of God, who brought wonders to us from God, and I consider him a teller of truth.'—'And didst thou see God?'—It will say, 'It is not possible for any man to see God.' Then an opening will be made for it towards hell, to see some tearing others to pieces in flames; then it will be told, 'Look towards that from which God hath guarded thee:' after which an opening will be made for it towards Paradise, and it will see its beauties and pleasures, and it will be told, 'This is the place of thy abode, because thou livedst in the truth, and diedst in it, and God will raise thee up in it!' And a bad man will sit in his grave in lamentation and wailing. Then he will be asked, 'What he did?' he will say, 'I know not.'—'But what dost thou say concerning Mohammed?'—He will say, 'I heard something about him.' For him then will be opened a crevice towards Paradise, and he will look at its beauties, and will be told, 'Look at those things which are withheld from thee;' then a hole will be opened for him towards hell, and he will see its wailing and gnashing of teeth, and will be told, 'This is thy abode, because thou livedst in doubt, and will be raised up in doubt, God willing.'" The Egyptians had a similar custom of examining the dead, particularly their kings. It was not, however, believed to be done by angels, but actually done by the living. As soon as a man was dead he was brought to trial. The public accuser was heard; if he proved that the deceased had led a bad life, his memory was condemned, and he was deprived of the honours of sepulture; but if his life had been honourable and useful, he was buried with great solemnity and respect.

DEAD (PRAYERS FOR THE). The practice of praying for the dead, which is maintained by the Church of Rome, meets with no countenance from the Word of God. Neither do the early Fathers of the Christian Church ever hint at the existence of such a custom. Tertullian, who died A. D. 220, is the first who speaks of prayer for the dead, as a custom of the church in his day. "We make anniversary oblations for the dead," he says, "for their birthdays," which was the usual term employed to indicate the days of their death. Both Origen and Cyprian, who also flourished in the third century, affirm that prayers were wont to be offered by the church in behalf of its departed members. Arnobius, in his 'Treatise against the Heathens,' written probably in the beginning of the fourth century, mentions that after the consecration of the elements in the Lord's Supper, Christians prayed for pardon and peace on behalf of the living and the dead. Cyril of Jerusalem, who lived in the same century, records one of these prayers, which was to this effect: "We offer this sacrifice in memory of all those who have fallen asleep before us; first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, that God, by their prayers and intercessions, may receive our supplications; and then we pray for our holy fathers and bishops, and all that have fallen asleep before us, believing that it is a great advantage to their souls to be prayed for whilst the holy and tremendous sacrifice lies upon the altar." It is impossible to trace the practice farther back than the end of the second century. About that time we find that immediately before the communion was celebrated, which was done on every occasion of public worship, a roll or catalogue, usually called the Diptychs, was read, containing the names of all the worthies who had belonged to the church. Then prayers were offered in behalf of the departed, after which the communion was dispensed. If any thing was proved inconsistent with Christian faith or practice, in the character of an individual thus registered and prayed for, his name was forthwith erased.

The first person who publicly protested against the practice of praying for the dead appears to have been Aërius, who denied that such prayers could be of any advantage to those who were the subjects of them. This objection was eagerly combated by Epiphanius, who argued the usefulness of the practice as testifying the faith and hope of the living, inasmuch as it showed their belief that the departed were still in being, and living with the Lord. Thus it was that the erroneous opinion crept into the church, that prayers and oblations ought to be made for the dead, while it was still a question on which Christians differed in opinion, whether the dead received any profit from such prayers. The Romish church perpetuated the practice by stamping it with the official authority of the Council of Trent, which, in its decree respecting the mass, declares it to be a propitiatory sacrifice "properly offered not only for the sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities of living believers, but also for the dead in Christ, who are not yet thoroughly purified." And the third canon of the same council denounces any one who denies this doctrine in reference to the mass as accursed. Accordingly, a solemn office for the dead forms part of the service of that church, and is usually recited once a-month, and in Lent once a-week. On the Festival of All Souls' day extraordinary masses are said for the relief of departed souls. The Romish church appeal, in support of this doctrine, chiefly to a passage in the Second Book of Maccabees, which runs thus, xii. 46, "It is therefore a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from sins." This citation from the Apocrypha is the only express warrant which Romanism can discover for a practice, which, in connection with the doctrine of purgatory, has been a source of ample revenue to the clergy of that system. Other passages from the canonical Scriptures are no doubt pressed into the service, such as 1 Cor. xv. 29; 1 John v. 16; Matth. v. 26; xii. 32. But these portions of the Sacred Writings, when carefully examined, will be found, in no sense, to support the custom of praying for the dead. No explicit instance of the practice is to be found in the Scripture. On the contrary, the doctrine of the Bible evidently is, that at death the doom of every man is irrevocably fixed, either for weal or woe. Thus Rev. xiv. 13, "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from thenceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them." John v. 24, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." 2 Cor. v. 1, "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Phil. i. 21, "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

It is a curious circumstance that, although in the canonical books of the Old Testament not the slightest reference is made to praying for the dead, as having been practised by the ancient Hebrews, the modern Jews observe the custom. Thus, among the Jews in some countries, it is customary, after the coffin has been nailed up, for ten men to walk in solemn procession round it seven times, repeating, at the same time, prayers for the soul of the deceased. Such a ceremony, however, is by no means universal. But it is a prevailing custom, that after the funeral of an Israelite ten Jews, who have passed the age of thirteen, repeat prayers for the dead, morning and evening; and at the close of these prayers, the sons of the deceased, or his nearest male relatives, repeat the KODESH (which see), a prayer which is considered of sufficient efficacy to deliver the deceased from hell.

The Greek church determines nothing dogmatically about the state of the departed, and yet intercessions are made for them that they may have enjoyment in the state into which they have passed, a joyful resurrection, and a final acquittal at the day of judgment, but not a word is uttered about purgatory. In the Russian church, services are performed over the graves in behalf of the departed on the third, ninth, and fortieth days after burial. The dead are also commemorated in the eucharist, but no money is paid for masses as in the Romish church to effect the deliverance of their souls. In the ARMENIAN CHURCH (which see), the doctrine of purgatory is not acknowledged by name, but prayers and masses are said continually for the dead. The daily service is full of such prayers which are frequently repeated, and incense burned over the graves of the deceased, particularly on Saturday evening, which is the special season for remembering the dead in prayers and alms. Mass is said for the souls of the departed on the day of burial, on the seventh, the fifteenth, and the fortieth day, and at the end of the first year after death. Alms are also given by the surviving relatives to the poor in the name of the deceased, under the idea that the merit of these deeds of charity will procure pardon for both the living and the dead.

DEAD (PRAYERS TO THE). See ANCESTOR-WORSHIP. SAINT-WORSHIP.

DEAD (RITES OF THE). Among the ancient Hebrews nearly the same rites were practised in the case of the dead, which are found at this day to prevail in the East. No sooner had the breath departed than the nearest relative hastened to close the eyes of the deceased, and to salute the lifeless body with a parting kiss. The corpse was then washed with water, and if not interred immediately, was laid out in an upper chamber. They then wrapped the body round with many folds of linen, and placed the head in a napkin. Sometimes after washing, the Hebrews proceeded to embalm the body. (See EMBALMING).

The modern Jews, however, have departed widely from the customs of their fathers in their treatment of the dead. On this subject the following account will be found interesting: "Under the conviction that as the soul was about to leave the body, she became more elevated, and experienced a degree of inspiration, the children and relatives of the dying person surrounded his bed, in order to listen to his parting instructions, and to receive his dying blessing. The practice among the modern Jews, is to send a Rabbi with ten men, to receive his confession, his sins being arranged in the order of the alphabet. But the more intelligent act in the same manner as a Christian upon such an occasion. He prays that God would either restore him to health, or take care of his soul, and particularly that the pain of dying may prove the expiation of his guilt. Meanwhile his friends repair to the synagogue, and pray for him under another name, to indicate his repentance and change of conduct.

"But some with devout and solemn attention remain in the chamber to see him depart, and to receive his last embrace, which they denominate 'the soul of the dying.' Similar to the Greeks and the Romans, the nearest relation of the deceased closed his eyes. Then they rent their clothes, or beat their breasts, or tore their hair, or threw dust or ashes upon their heads; but in modern times, they content themselves with rending any small part of their garments. It is related that there was another custom that obtained, even that of throwing out into the street all the water that was found in the house or neighbourhood, that so the information of his death might speedily be conveyed, and the general lamentation commence. It was one of the direful punishments threatened upon King Jehoiakim, that none should mourn or lament over him, saying, 'Ah, my brother, ah, Lord, or ah, his glory, he shall be buried with the burial of an ass.'

"The corpse was then placed upon a cloth on the ground, and the face covered, it being no longer lawful to behold the human countenance. Moved with a superstitious principle, they also bend the thumb into the hand, and bind it with the strings of the Thaled, assigning as a reason that the thumb having the figure of the name of God, the devil dares not approach it. The remainder of the hand remains open to indicate that the deceased has abandoned all the concerns of this world, as children come into the world closehanded, to indicate that God has put all the riches of the earth into their hands. The body was then bathed with water, say some, that it might appear clean before God; but others, with greater rationality, that the ointments and perfumes might more easily enter into the pores, which were opened with warm water.

"It was sometimes also customary to burn wood and sweet spices over the corpse. Of Asa, king of Judah, it is said, 'they laid him on a bed, which was filled with sweet odours, and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art, and they made a very great burning for him.' It is probable that this was originally intended to remove the offensive smell of the dead bodies, but the vanity of particular persons carried this far beyond what was necessary. In the East, where perfumes are plenty, this practice is still continued; but in Italy, the Jews only mingle the water with which they wash the corpse, with dried roses and chamomile.

"When the body is washed it is shrouded, but in many places they only put on a pair of drawers and a white shift. Others say that it was usual to dress the dead in so sumptuous a manner, that the expenses exceeded all due bounds, and that Gamaliel the old corrected this abuse, by enjoining his disciples, without distinction of rank, to cover the dead body with a linen cloth. It was also deemed an act of devotion to bury a person in the clothes he was accustomed to wear. Some add a kind of rocket, over which they place the Kaled, and cover the head with a white cap.

"The body was exposed for some time previous to its interment, and a lighted candle was placed at the head. Some assert that this light was intended to enlighten the soul, and to facilitate her entrance, when she returns to visit the body; but the Jews reject this opinion, and say that this ancient custom was established only to ridicule the sorcerers, who maintained that the lighting of a wax candle near the dead body, was sufficient to occasion violent pain to the separate spirit."

Among the ancient Romans some peculiar customs existed in their treatment of the dead.

When the last breath was about to depart, the nearest relative endeavoured to catch it with his mouth. The ring was then taken from the hand of the lifeless corpse, and the eyes and mouth were closed by the nearest of kin, who called upon the deceased by name, exclaiming vale, farewell. The corpse was then washed and anointed with perfumes and oil by slaves. When the body was thus prepared, a small coin was placed in the mouth to pay Charon for conducting the deceased to Hades. The corpse was now dressed in the best garment usually worn by the deceased when alive; and having been stretched on a couch, was laid at the threshold of the house with the feet towards the door, at the entrance of which hung a branch of cypress, while the couch on which the body was placed was sometimes covered with leaves and flowers. The object of this exposure of the corpse, which was practised also by the ancient Greeks, from whom it had probably been borrowed, was, that the evidence of real death might be complete. In some points the Greeks differed from the Romans in this exposure of the dead. Thus, beside the bed on which the corpse lay, were placed painted earthen vessels, which were buried along with the deceased. A honey-cake was also placed near the body, which is thought to have been intended to soothe Cerberus, the guardian of the infernal regions. At the door of the house was placed a vessel of water that those who entered might purify themselves by sprinkling water on their persons. The relatives surrounded the bed on which the dead lay, uttering loud lamentations, the females rending their garments and tearing their hair. No persons were permitted to be present on these occasions who were under sixty years of age.

Among the Mohammedans considerable importance is attached to the bodies of their dead. As soon as a pious Moslem feels that his end is drawing near, he hastens, as far as strength permits, to perform the ordinary ablutions, that he may die in a state of bodily purification. When going on a protracted journey, it is not unusual for Mohammedans to carry their grave-clothes with them; and cases have been known of persons who, when taken ill in the desert, have made a trench in the loose sand, and laid themselves down to die, after putting on their grave-clothes, leaving only the face uncovered. When a Moslem is at the point of death, one of the family or attendants turns round the body to place the head in the direction of Mecca, and then closes the eyes of the expiring man, on which the male attendants exclaim, "Allah! there is no strength nor power but in God! to God we belong, and to him we must return; God have mercy on him!" The corpse is always buried the same day, or about twelve hours after death: it is carefully washed, wrapped in grave-clothes, and placed in a bier covered over with a shawl, but it is not buried in a coffin.

and that after the soul had performed a certain cycle in the animal kingdom, it would re-enter and re-animate its own original body, if preserved free from corruption and entire, naturally sought to preserve the bodies in an entire state, by embalming them, and by depositing them in well-constructed catacombs, tumuli, and mausoleums. (See EMBALMENT). This desire to preserve the bodies of their dead was not confined to the Egyptians, but extended also to the Hebrews, and has even been found among some heathen nations. Some savages, particularly North American Indians, deck the bodies of the dead in the richest dresses, and paint their faces and bodies with different colours. Nay, they even set apart provisions for them after death, imagining that they are able to eat and drink as during life. An old traveller gives a curious account of the manner in which some of the aboriginal Americans preserved the bodies of their sovereigns. "The Virginians preserve religiously the bodies of their kings and of their chiefs in the following manner. They first cut the skin all down the back, and take it off whole, if possible: they afterwards take the flesh from the bones, without hurting the nerves, to prevent the joints from disuniting: they then dry the bones in the sun, which they afterwards set again in the skin, having first taken care to moisten it with oil or fat, which keeps it from rotting. After the bones are fixed in the skin in their proper places, they fill up the hollows very dexterously with very fine sand, and sew it up in such a manner, that the body appears as entire as if they had not taken the flesh from it. After the corpse has been prepared in this manner, they carry it into a place made for that purpose, and lay it upon a great piece of wood matted over, that is raised a little from the ground, which they cover over with a mat to keep it from the dust. They expose the flesh which they have taken from the body to the sun, by laying it on a hurdle; and when it is thoroughly dried, they put it up into a basket sewed up very close, and set it at the feet of the corpse. They place an idol of Kiwasa in these sepulchres, which they say looks after those bodies."

Among the ancient Mexicans, as soon as an emperor died, guards were set round the body during the first four nights after his death. The attendants then washed the corpse, and a tuft of hair was taken from the head, which was carefully preserved as a relic, that tuft, as they imagined, representing the soul. They put an emerald into the dead emperor's mouth, wrapped him in seventeen mourning mantles very richly wrought, on the outermost one of which was painted an image of the idol which the deceased chiefly worshipped. They then covered his face with a mask, and carried him into the temple of his favourite idol, where, after a few preliminary ceremonies, they burned the body, and afterwards buried the ashes.

The Chinese, among whom ANCESTOR-WORSHIP (which see), extensively prevails, are accustomed, when a relative dies, to enclose the remains in air-tight coffins, and to retain them for seven days in the house, every fourth day being devoted to special rites for the dead. Food is presented before the coffin, the essence of which the dead are supposed to eat, and prayers are offered by Budhist and Tautist priests, for the happiness of their spirits. The Laplanders to this day provide their dead with a flint and everything necessary for lighting them along the dark passage they have to traverse after death. But while the same general idea of pleasing the spirits of the departed may be observed in many of the customs which prevail both in Asiatic and African nations, there are cases, as in South Africa, in which as much horror is felt at touching the dead body even of the nearest relative as would have been felt by an ancient Jew through dread of ceremonial pollution. A curious custom is related by Mr. Moffat in reference to the dying. When they see any indications of approaching dissolution, in fainting fits or convulsive throes, they throw a net over the body, and hold it in a sitting posture with the knees brought in contact with the chin till life is extinct. Sometimes the RAIN-MAKERS (which see), give orders that none of the dead are to be buried, but dragged at a distance from the town to be devoured by the hyenas and jackals.

The present mode of treating the dead among the Chinese is curious, as stated by the Abbe Huc in his recent work, 'The Chinese Empire.' "It is the custom in China to keep the dead a very long time in the house, sometimes even to the anniversary of their decease. In the meanwhile the body is placed in a coffin of extraordinary thickness, and covered with quick-lime, so that it does not occasion any inconvenience in the house. The object of this practice is to do honour to the dead, and give time for preparation for the funeral. His burial is the most important affair, one may say, in the life of a Chinese, the object of his most anxious solicitude. Death is a mere trifle; no one troubles himself much about that, but the quality of the coffin, the ceremonies of the funeral, the choice of a burial-place, and the spot where the grave is to be dug, all that is matter of serious consideration. When the death takes place these cares of course are left as a legacy to his relations. Vanity and ostentation certainly have much to do with these things; every one wishes to perform the ceremony in grand style, so as to create a sensation in the country, and outdo his neighbours. To obtain the funds necessary for such a display some management is often necessary, but people are not alarmed at the most extravagant expenses; they do not shrink from the most enormous sacrifices, they will even sell their property, and occasionally ruin the family outright, rather than not have a fine funeral. Confucius did not enjoin all these foolish excesses, in the fulfilment of an imaginary duty of filial piety, but he did advise people to devote as much as the half of their worldly property to the interment of their parents. The reigning dynasty has endeavoured to check these exorbitant and useless expenses, but the laws made concerning them appear to affect only the Mantchoos; the Chinese continue to follow their ancient customs.

"After the body has been placed in the coffin, the relations and friends assemble at certain appointed hours, to weep together, and express their sorrow. We have often been present at these funeral ceremonies, in which the Chinese display with marvellous facility their really astonishing talents for dissimulation. The men and women assemble in separate apartments, and until the time comes at which it is settled they are to grieve, they smoke, drink tea, gossip, laugh, all with such an air of careless enjoyment that you can hardly persuade yourself that they are really supposed to be a company of mourners. But when the ceremony is about to begin, the nearest relation informs the assembly that the time has come, and they go and place themselves in a circle round the coffin. On this signal the noisy conversation that has been going on suddenly ceases, the lamentations begin, and the faces but now so gay and good-humoured instantly assume the most doleful and lugubrious expression.

"The most pathetic speeches are addressed to the dead; every one speaks his own monologue on the subject, interrupted by groans and sobs, and, what is most extraordinary, inconceivable indeed, by tears,—yes, actually real true tears, and plenty of them.

"One would suppose they were inconsolable in their grief—and yet they are nothing more than skillful actors—and all this sorrow and lamentation is only a display of histrionic talent. At a given signal the whole scene changes abruptly, the tears dry up, the performers do not even stop to finish a sob or a groan, but they take their pipes, and lo, there are again these incomparable Chinese, laughing, gossiping, and drinking tea. Certainly no one could guess that, instead of drinking hot tea, they had but a moment before been shedding hot tears.

"When the time comes for the women to range themselves round the coffin, the dramatic piece is, if possible, played with still greater perfection. The grief has such an appearance of sincerity, the sighs are so agonising, the tears so abundant, the voice so broken by sobs, that actually, in spite of your certainty that the whole affair is a purely fictitious representation, you can hardly help being affected at it." See FUNERAL RITES.

DEAD (SACRIFICES FOR THE). Among the ancient Greeks a sacrifice was offered for the dead on the second day after the funeral, but the principal sacrifice of this kind was offered on the ninth day. But among some modern Pagans the practice prevails of sacrificing for the dead, not irrational animals, but reasonable beings. This practice of sacrificing men to the dead is more common in Ashantee and Dahomey than anywhere else. The victims offered at the death of any member of the royal family, or of any great personage, and which are repeated at stated periods afterwards, are intended to be servants or escorts to such persons in another world. They suppose that their deceased friends have all the bodily wants which they had in this world, and that they are gratified by the same kind of attentions which pleased them while on earth. The only instance of this practice which is to be found, as far as we can ascertain, in professedly Christian communities, occurs among the Armenians, who offer in connection with the dead an animal of one kind or another. The nature and origin of this peculiar ceremony are thus detailed by the American missionaries, Messrs. Smith and Dwight: "The priests, having brought it to the door of the church, and placed salt before the altar, read the Scripture lessons for such occasions, and pray, mentioning the name of the person deceased, and entreating the forgiveness of his sins. Then they give the salt to the animal, and slay it. A portion belongs to the priest; other portions are distributed to the poor; and of the remainder, a feast is made for the friends. None may remain till the morrow. These sacrifices are not regarded as propitiatory, like those of the Jews, (for the Armenians hold that they were abolished by the death of Christ,) but as a meritorious charity to the needy. They have always, at least in modern times, a special reference to the dead, and are generally, though not necessarily, made on the day that a mass is said for the same object. The other most common occasions are the great festivals of the saints, and what are called the Lord's festivals. At Easter especially, one or more is always sacrificed, the whole congregation frequently contributing to the expense, and then dividing the victim or victims among them. But even this is in memory of the dead. Its origin, we are told, on the authority of the Catholicos Isaac the Great, was as follows. When the nation embraced Christianity under the preaching of St. Gregory Loosavorich, the converted pagan priests came to him, and begged that he would provide for them some means of support, as the sacrifices on which they formerly lived were now abolished. He accordingly ordered, that a tenth of the produce of the fields should be theirs, and that the people, instead of their former offerings to idols, should now make sacrifices to God in the name of the dead as a charity to the hungry."

DEAD (WORSHIP OF THE), one of the early forms of idolatry. When men distinguished themselves during their lives by deeds of heroism or of usefulness, not only were they respected while on earth, but their memories were held in honour after their death. To such an extent was this feeling sometimes carried, that great and good men were invested with divine attributes, and came to be worshipped as gods. The Arabian writers, as Dr. Poocke informs us, trace the idolatry of their own nation to this origin. Diodorus Siculus says of the Egyptians, that "besides the celestial gods, they say there are others which are terrestrial, who were begotten by them, and were originally mortal men, but by reason of their wisdom and beneficence have obtained immortality, of whom some have been kings of Egypt." Cicero and Pliny assure us, that deification was the ancient manner of rewarding those who had deserved well of their country and their kind, and Lactantius actually informs us, that Cicero lived to see divine honours paid to his own daughter Tulliola. No wonder that this eminent man declared in the beginning of his Tusculan Questions, "Those who are initiated must know that they worship the souls of men departed from their bodies, and that the Dii Majorum Gentium were such." Maximus Tyrius says the same thing of the Greeks. Herodotus actually charges Hesiod and Homer with having been the first who introduced a Theogony among the Greeks. He tells us plainly that these two early writers invented the genealogy of the gods; "imposed names upon each; assigned them functions and honours, and clothed them in their several forms," whereas "before that time," he adds, "they sacrificed and prayed to the gods in general without attributing either name or surname to any deity, which in those days they had never heard of." And in regard to the Theogony of Egypt, Syncellus reckons seven of the gods, and nine of the demi-gods, who reigned in Egypt, and assigns to every one of them a certain number of years for his reign. The Egyptians, however, were by no means willing to admit their gods to be of human origin. Their laws inflicted death upon any one who should say Serapis had once been a man.

That the deification of eminent men was one of the sources of polytheistic idolatry, is clearly laid down by Bishop Warburton in his 'Divine Legation of Moses.' "Gratitude and admiration," says he, "the warmest and most active affections of our nature, concurred to enlarge the object of religious worship, and to make man regard the inventors of arts and the founders of society as having in them more than a common ray of the divinity. So that godlike benefits bespeaking, as it were, a godlike mind, the deceased parent of a people was easily advanced into the rank of a demon. When the religious bias was in so good a train, natural affection would have its share in promoting this new mode of adoration. Piety to parents would naturally take the lead, as it was supported by gratitude and admiration, the primum mobile of the whole system; and in those early ages the natural father of the tribe often happened to be the political father of the people, and the founder of the state. Fondness for the offspring would next have its turn; and a disconsolate father at the head of a people, would contrive to soothe his grief for the untimely death of a favourite child, and to gratify his pride under the want of succession, by paying divine honours to its memory." The theory thus advanced by Warburton, as to the origin and progress of the worship of the dead, was in substance brought forward at a very remote period by Sanchoniathon, in a fragment quoted by Eusebius. Not only, however, did the souls of the departed come to take their place among the gods, but the principle, once introduced, was carried still further, for in process of time they were exalted to a higher rank in the scale of the celestial deities. As time rolled on, and the true authentic history of the heroes thus honoured began to be lost, it was no difficult matter to persuade the great mass of the people, that he whom they had long worshipped was in reality possessed of divine attributes. Thus it was, that not only in Egypt, but in Greece and Rome, in Persia, in India, and in Scandinavia, much of their idolatry may be traced to the deification of departed heroes, and the worship of the dead.

DEAN (Lat. decanus, the ruler of a body of ten men), an ecclesiastical officer in the Church of England, not known, as is supposed, before the eleventh or twelfth century. The office was given originally to a presbyter, thereby investing him with authority over ten other presbyters, connected with a cathedral or collegiate church. He was, and still is, a dignitary of some importance, receiving the title of Very Reverend, and presiding over the whole CHAPTER (which see), or governing body of the cathedral, which receives the name of dean and chapter. This office ranks next to that of a bishop, and he receives his appointment by letters patent from the crown. His duty, generally speaking, is to superintend the whole establishment of the cathedral church. It has been proposed of late to unite the offices of bishop and dean in some cases at least. This, however, has been keenly resisted by the chief dignitaries, chiefly on the ground that the bishops are already overburdened with many and various duties, which engross all their time, and besides, it is alleged to be absolutely necessary that the cathedral chapter have a head constantly resident. Before the act of 1840 there was no dean either at St. David's or Llandaff. In the former case the precentor, and in the latter the bishop, exercised the functions of dean. Although the dean now receives his appointment direct from the crown, it was not always so; for at the period between the Norman Conquest and the Reformation, the dean was elected by the chapter summoned for that purpose. In some cases also a sub-dean was chosen to act in his absence. By the enactments of late years, the residence of a dean is fixed at eight months, and he is restricted from holding a benefice except in the cathedral city, and not above £500 per annum in value. No person can be appointed dean until he shall have been six years complete in priest's orders, except in case of professorships. By the law of England a dean is a sole corporation, that is, he represents a whole succession, and is capable of taking an estate as dean, and conveying it to his successors.

DEAN AND CHAPTER. See CHAPTER.

DEANS (RURAL), inferior officers in the Church of England, who existed long before the Reformation, acting as itinerant visitors of churches, subject to the authority of the ARCHDEACON (which see). Besides their own parochial labours, they have the inspection of a certain number of parishes, the name being probably derived from the circumstance that ten parishes, and these chiefly rural, were usually assigned to their superintendence. The proper office of a rural dean was the inspection of the lives and manners of the clergy and people within their district, in order to be reported to the bishop. Of late, accordingly, several bishops have been very anxious to revive the office, as affording in their view a better security for the efficiency of the clergy.

DEASUIL (Celt. deas, the south, and suil, a way), a Druidical ceremony which consisted in pacing thrice round an earthen walk, which externally encompassed the temple, and which is still visible at Stonehenge. The route represented the course of the sun, being from the east southward to the west; and a contrary progress was called cartua-suil, probably from the Celtic car, a turn, and tuathal, the left hand, which constituted a most bitter imprecation. This custom as a religious rite is of great antiquity, and most extensive; and it has been supposed to be an imitation of the Jewish ceremony of blessing the altar of burnt-offering, or of the march of the Israelites round the walls of Jericho. The benediction of the Deasuil was long used in Ireland, Wales, and the Scottish Highlands; and even at present it is said not to be entirely extinct. See DRUIDS.

DEATH (THE BROTHERS OF), a name usually given to the religious of the order of St. Paul the hermit of Thebais. They are said to have received this strange designation from the practice which they followed of keeping the figure of a death's head always before them, that they might never lose sight of their latter end. This order was probably suppressed by Pope Urban VIII.

DECANI, or DEANS, an order of men instituted in the French church in the ninth century, to assist the bishops in the inspection of their dioceses. Seven of the most enlightened men in each congregation were appointed under the name of decani to take special charge of the rest. When the bishop arrived in any part of his diocese to hold his spiritual court, which he was bound to do once every year, he commenced with receiving the oath of the Deans, who thereby solemnly promised not to allow themselves to be actuated by any respect of persons, so as to conceal any offence against the Divine Law. 'He then questioned them,' says Neander, "particularly and distinctly in reference to the observance of heathen customs, and whether every father taught his children the creed and the Lord's prayer. He also made enquiry as to the continued practice of those crimes which had been prevalent among the people in former times, and the enormity of which was then altogether disregarded. The appointed punishments, some of which were corporal, were then duly inflicted, and that there might be no difficulty in this administration of punishment, the officers of government were bound, in case of necessity, to assist the bishops with their authority."

The officers appointed in the fourth century to undertake the conduct of funerals (see COPIATÆ), were sometimes called Decani, but for what reason does not appear. In the arrangement of monasteries also, those monks who presided over ten religious were called Decani.

DECANICA, places of custody or restraint connected with ancient Christian churches, in which ecclesiastical delinquents were wont to be shut up. Such places of confinement are expressly referred to in Justinian's Novels.

DECEMVIRI SACRORUM (Lat. the ten men of sacred things), the members of a college of priests appointed among the ancient Romans to take charge of the Sibylline books, and to inspect them when required by the senate. It was about B. C. 365 that the college was appointed to consist of ten priests, one half of the number being chosen from the patricians, and one half from the plebeians. The same number appears to have continued for a long time to form the college, as we find them existing in the time of Cicero. Their office was for life, and it seems to have been their duty to act as priests of Apollo in celebrating his games, and each of them kept a bronze tripod dedicated to that god in his house.

DECATEPHORUS (Gr. decate, the tenth, and phero, to carry), the surname of Apollo at Megara, as being the god to whom the tenth part of the spoils was dedicated.

DECENNALIA (Lat. decem, ten, and annus, a year), festivals which were celebrated by the Roman emperors every tenth year of their reigns. They were first instituted by Augustus Cæsar to impress the people with a high respect and veneration for the imperial authority. On these occasions games were held, sacrifices offered, gifts distributed among the people, and prayers offered in behalf of the emperor and the prosperity of the empire.

DECIMA (Lat. the tenth), a name given among the ancient Romans to LACHESIS (which see), one of the Fates, from the practice of decimation in the Roman army, when for any offence committed by any number, lots were drawn, which out of every tenth man should be put to death. The word is, accordingly, used to denote the fortune or lot of man.

DECIMÆ, the tenth of the spoils taken from the enemy, which both by the Greeks and Romans was dedicated to the gods. The Jews were also wont to devote to the Lord a portion of the booty obtained in war.

DECREE OF COUNCILS. See CANONS ECCLESIASTICAL.

DECRETALS. See BULL, CANONS ECCLESIASTICAL.

DECRETISTS, one of the two parties into which the students of Canon Law in the twelfth century came to be divided in consequence of the general recognition at that period of the supreme authority of the Pope. The origin of the rise of the Legists and Decretists is thus clearly stated by Neander. "The change which had taken place in the supreme government of the church, necessarily brought along with it a change also in many things connected with legislation, in all parts of the church; and hence, the old collections of ecclesiastical laws no longer met the existing wants. Ever since the pseudo-Isidorian decretals began to be received as valid, men would already come to be sensible of this. The collision between the old and the new church legislation would occasion considerable embarrassment. Since the establishment of the validity of those decretals, several new collections of ecclesiastical laws had, it is true, been formed; as, for example, that of Regino, abbot of Prüm, in the tenth, and that of Burkhard, bishop of Worms, and that of Yves, bishop of Chartres, in the eleventh century; but still, these collections did not prove adequate to do away that contrariety. Add to this, that the new papal church system needed some counterpoise against a tendency which threatened to become dangerous to it. In the twelfth century great enthusiasm was excited for the renewed study of the Roman law, by the famous Irnerius (Guarnerius), at the university of Bologna; and this study led to investigations and doctrines which were quite unfavourable to the interests of the papacy. Even Irnerius stood forth as an ally of the imperial power, in the contest with the papacy, and it was, in fact, the famous teachers of law at that university, who were employed by the emperor Frederic the First, to investigate and defend his rights at the diet of Roncala. The more eager, therefore, would be the hierarchical party to oppose that hostile tendency, by setting up another, in defence of their own interests and principles, through the study of ecclesiastical law, from an opposite point of view. Thus it came about that—at the famous seat itself of the study of the Roman law—at Bologna, about the year 1151, a Benedictine, or according to another account, a Camaldulensian monk, Gratian, arranged a new collection of ecclesiastical laws, better suited to the wants of the church, and to the scientific taste of these times. As the title itself indicates, 'Concordia discordantium canonum,' the Harmony of discordant canons, old and new ecclesiastical laws were here brought together, their differences discussed, and their reconciliation attempted,—a method similar to that employed by Peter Lombard in handling the doctrines of faith. This logical arrangement and method of reconciliation supplied a welcome nutriment to the prevailing scientific spirit. From that time the study also of canon law was pursued with great zeal, and the two parties called the Legists and the Decretists arose,—Gratian's collections of laws being denominated simply the 'Decretum Gratiani.' The zeal with which the study of civil and ecclesiastical law was pursued had, however, this injurious effect that the clergy were thereby drawn away from the study of the Bible, and from the higher, directly theological, interest, and their whole life devoted solely to these pursuits."

DECURSIO, a ceremony performed by the Greeks and Romans at the funeral of generals and emperors, in which the soldiers and the whole company present made a solemn procession three times round the funeral pile as soon as it was lighted, in token of respect for the deceased. On this occasion the procession moved to the left to indicate sorrow, motion to the right being the usual expression of joy. Homer alludes to this ceremony, which went by the name of Peridrome among the Greeks.

DEDICATION, the devotion or CONSECRATION (which see) of any person or thing to the Lord, or to sacred purposes. See ANATHEMATA.

DEDICATION (FEAST OF), a Jewish feast instituted by Judas Maccabæus, in remembrance of the cleansing of the second temple and altar, after they had been profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes. It began on the 25th of the month Chisleu, corresponding to our December, and lasted during eight days. The Jews on this occasion illuminated their houses as an expression of their joy and gladness. Hence it was also called the Feast of Lights, and is termed by Josephus phota, lights. As long as the festival lasted, hymns were sung, and sacrifices offered. This festival is minutely described in 1 Mac. iv. 52—59, in these words, "Now, on the five and twentieth day of the ninth month, which is called the month Casleu, in the hundred forty and eighth year, they rose up betimes in the morning, and offered sacrifice, according to the law, upon the new altar of burnt-offerings which they had made. Look at what time, and what day, the heathen had profaned it, even in that was it dedicated with songs, and citherns, and harps, and cymbals. Then all the people fell upon their faces, worshipping and praising the God of heaven, who had given them good success. And so they kept the dedication of the altar eight days, and offered burnt-offerings with gladness, and sacrificed the sacrifice of deliverance and praise. They decked also the forefront of the temple with crowns of gold, and with shields; and the gates and the chambers they renewed, and hanged doors upon them. Thus was there very great gladness among the people, for that the reproach of the heathen was put away. Moreover, Judas and his brethren, with the whole congregation of Israel, ordained that the days of the dedication of the altar should be kept in their season from year to year, by the space of eight days, from the five and twentieth day of the month Casleu, with mirth and gladness." The same feast is generally supposed to be alluded to in John x. 22, "And it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication, and it was winter." The reason why it is celebrated with lighted lamps is curiously explained by the Rabbies. They say that when the sanctuary had been cleansed and dedicated in the time of the Maccabees, and the priests came to light the lamp which was to burn continually before the Lord, there was no more oil found than what would burn for one night, all the rest being polluted; and seven days' purification being necessary, with an additional day to gather olives and express the oil, eight days would be required before they could procure a fresh supply. But they tell us that the Almighty wrought so great a miracle that that small portion of oil burned eight days and nights, till they had time to obtain more. On this legendary story they found the present mode of celebrating the feast, which is essentially a feast of lights. On the first night they light one light in the synagogue; on the second night, two; on the third night, three; adding one every night, until the last, when they light up eight. These lamps ought to be lighted with oil of olive, but when that species of oil cannot be obtained, they use wax. Labour is not required to be suspended during this festival, but besides the lighting of lamps, and some additions being made to the ordinary prayers and lessons of the synagogue, the whole time is spent in mirth and feasting.

DEDICATION OF CHURCHES. It does not appear that, in the earliest ages of Christianity, any special ceremony was observed in consecrating or dedicating churches as buildings set apart for sacred purposes. There may possibly, on such occasions, have been solemn prayer and thanksgiving to God, but no evidence can be found on the subject, in so far as the three first centuries are concerned. In the reign of Constantine the Great, however, when numerous churches were built throughout the whole Roman Empire, it was customary to dedicate them with great solemnity, an appropriate sermon being delivered by one of the large body of bishops who were usually present. Eusebius informs us, that when Constantine built the church of Jerusalem over our Saviour's sepulchre, the dedication was attended by a full synod of all the bishops of the East, some of whom, says the historian, made speeches by way of panegyric upon the emperor and the magnificence of his building; others handled a common place in divinity suited to the occasion; while others discoursed upon the lessons of Scripture that were read, expounding the mystical sense of them. At the close of these numerous addresses, the assembly partook of the Lord's Supper, when prayers were offered for the peace of the world, the prosperity of the church, and a blessing upon the emperor and his children. In the course of the service a special dedication prayer seems to have been offered, a specimen of which is given by Ambrose in these words: "I beseech thee now, O Lord, let thine eye be continually upon this house, upon this altar, which is now dedicated unto thee, upon these spiritual stones, in every one of which a sensible temple is consecrated unto thee: let the prayers of thy servants, which are poured out in this place, be always accepted of thy Divine mercy. Let every sacrifice that is offered in this temple with a pure faith and a pious zeal, be unto thee a sweet-smelling savour of sanctification. And when thou lookest upon that sacrifice of salvation, which taketh away the sins of the world, have respect to these oblations of chastity, and defend them by thy continual help, that they may be sweet and acceptable offerings unto thee, and pleasing unto Christ the Lord: vouchsafe to keep their whole spirit, soul, and body, without blame, unto the day of thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

It was the exclusive province of a bishop in these times to preside in the service of dedication, presbyters being prohibited from the performance of this solemn act. Thus the first council of Bracara, A. D. 563, declares any presbyter to be liable to deprivation who shall consecrate an altar or a church, and refers to former canons as having also forbidden any such act on the part of a presbyter. By the laws of Justinian the building of no church could be commenced before the bishop had first made a solemn prayer, and fixed the sign of the cross in the place where the building was to be erected. The day of dedication of a church was usually kept as one of the anniversary festivals to which the name of ENCENIA (which see) was given, and which are still observed in some parts of England under the name of Vigils or Wakes.

The ceremony to be observed in dedicating a Romish church is laid down with great minuteness in the Romish Pontifical.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH (Lat. Fidei Defensor), a peculiar title which is claimed by the sovereign of England. It was first conferred in 1521 by Pope Leo on King Henry VIII. in approval of his treatise, entitled 'A Vindication of the Seven Sacraments,' written against Martin Luther. "The Pope, to whom it was presented," says Robertson the historian, "with the greatest formality in full consistory, spoke of the treatise in such terms as if it had been dictated by immediate inspiration; and as a testimony of the gratitude of the church for his extraordinary zeal, conferred on him the title of Defender of the Faith, an appellation which Henry soon forfeited in the opinion of those from whom he derived it, and which is still retained by his successors, though the avowed enemies of those opinions, by contending for which he merited that honourable distinction." This production of Henry, which was written in Latin, was dedicated to the Pope, and received by his Holiness with such satisfaction that he granted an indulgence to every person who should peruse the book. The proposal to confer the title of Defender of the Faith upon the royal controversialist did not meet with immediate assent from the consistency, for Roscoe, in his 'Life of Leo X.' lets us a little farther into the secret of the matter. "This proposition," he informs us, "gave rise to more deliberation, and occasioned greater difficulty in the sacred college than perhaps the Pope had foreseen. Several of the cardinals suggested other titles, and it was for a long time debated whether, instead of the appellation of the Defender of the Faith, the sovereigns of England should not in all future times be denominated the Apostolic, the Orthodox, the Faithful, or, the Angelic. The proposition of the Pope, who had been previously informed of the sentiments of Wolsey on this subject, at length, however, prevailed, and a bull was accordingly issued, conferring this title on Henry and his posterity: a title retained by his successors till the present day, notwithstanding their separation from the Roman church; which has given occasion to some orthodox writers to remark, that the kings of this country should either maintain that course of conduct in reward for which the distinction was conferred, or relinquish the title." The title, which Leo had thus conferred upon Henry, was afterwards confirmed by Clement VII.; but when Henry vigorously espoused the cause of the Reformation, and authorized the suppression of religious houses in England, the title of Defender of the Faith was withdrawn by the Pope, and Henry was excommunicated and deposed. The Parliament of England, however, in virtue of its own authority, confirmed the title which Henry had received, and, accordingly, the title Defender of the Faith has been used by Henry's successors on the English throne down to the present time. It is well worth notice, that although Leo X. is generally regarded by historians as originating the title in question, he is far from having any valid claim to such an honour. The fact is, that long before that Pope's pretended gift of the title to Henry VIII., we find Richard II., in all his acts against the Lollards, uniformly taking the title of Defender of the Faith. It appears, therefore, to have been an ancient right of the sovereigns of England, and in further proof of this, Chamberlayne appeals to several charters granted at different periods long anterior to the time of Henry VIII.

DEFENSORS OF THE CHURCH (Lat. Defensores Ecclesie), officers employed in the early ages of Christianity to plead the cause of the church, or any single ecclesiastic who happened to have been injured or oppressed, and had occasion for redress in a civil court; or if remedy was not found there, they were to address the emperors themselves in the name of the church, to procure a particular precept in her favour. It was the business of this important class of public functionaries to see that the rights of the church settled by law were maintained; and if any encroachments were made upon these rights, they were bound to prosecute the aggressors before the magistrates, and, even if necessary, to appeal to the Emperor. From the laws of Justinian it appears that the defensors were appointed to exercise a kind of superintendence over the COPIATÆ (which see). They were likewise expected to make inquiry whether every clerk belonging to the church carefully attended the celebration of morning and evening service in the church, and to inform the bishop of those who neglected their duty in this respect, that they might be subjected to ecclesiastical censures. Authors are by no means agreed whether these officers were clergymen or laymen, but although it is not unlikely that at first they might be taken from the clerical order, it was afterwards found more suitable to have advocates possessed of legal qualifications. This change was made in the case of the African churches, about A. D. 407, by a decree issued by the emperor Honorius. From this time the office was frequently, though by no means universally, intrusted into the hands of laymen. The officers whom the Latins called Defensores, the Greeks called Ecdici or Ecclesiecdici. Justinian decreed that to avoid clandestine marriages, parties of middle rank should be married in presence of the Defensor of the church.

DEFENSORS OF THE POOR (Lat. Defensores Pauperum), officers in the early Christian church whose business it was, if any of the poor, or virgins, or widows belonging to the church were injured or oppressed by the rich, to take steps without delay for maintaining their rights by all legal means. Accordingly, by a decree passed by the fifth council of Carthage, A. D. 401, which is also inserted in the African code, it was enacted, that "forasmuch as the church was incessantly wearied with the complaints and afflictions of the poor, it was unanimously agreed upon by them in council, that the emperors should be petitioned to allow defensors to be chosen for them by the procurement and approbation of the bishops, that they might defend them from the power and tyranny of the rich."

DEGRADATION, a punishment inflicted upon clergymen in the ancient Christian church. It consisted, as its name implies, in removing the offender from a higher to a lower grade of office. The sentence of degradation appears to have been final and irrevocable. Bishops were in this way sometimes transferred from a larger to a smaller or less important charge. Presbyters were often thus degraded to the order of deacons, and deacons to that of subdeacons. This species of punishment was also inflicted upon bishops in Africa, by superseding them in their expected succession to the office of archbishop or metropolitan. In its full meaning, however, the term degradation implied deprivation of orders, and reduction to the state and condition of a layman. Thus, in the third council of Orleans there is a canon which appoints, that if any clergyman was convicted of theft or fraud, because these were capital crimes, he should be degraded from his order, and only allowed lay communion. (See COMMUNION, LAY.) If after the infliction of such a sentence he persisted in exercising clerical functions, he received in addition a formal excommunication, and was denied even the communion of laymen. See CENSURES (ECCLIASTICAL), DEPOSITION.

DEIMA, the personification of fear among the ancient Greeks.

DEISTS, a name given to those who believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, but deny the divine authority and inspiration of the Bible. Such persons are generally strenuous advocates for a natural, as opposed to a revealed religion. They are termed Deists, from the Latin word Deus, God, a belief in God being the chief article of their creed. The word Theists would seem at first sight to bear the same meaning, being derived from the Greek word Theos, God. But the appellations Deists and Theists belong to two essentially different classes of people; the former being used to denote those who believe in God, in a future state of rewards and punishments, and in all those doctrines contained in what is usually called the religion of Nature, but refuse to acknowledge any written revelation of the will of God; the latter being employed to denote those who believe in the existence of God, in opposition to Atheists who deny his existence altogether. Deists, from their unbelief in Divine revelation, sometimes receive the name of Infidels or Unbelievers. The name Deists, as applied in its present signification, is said to have been first assumed about the middle of the sixteenth century, by some persons on the continent, who, while they rejected the Bible as an inspired book, were nevertheless most unwilling to be regarded as atheists. They therefore adopted an appellation, which set forth as their distinguishing character their belief in the existence of a God. Peter Viret, a French reformed divine of the period, is said to have been the first who mentions Deists as a separate class. Lord Herbert of Cherbury, however, was the first English writer who reduced Deism to a system; declaring the sufficiency of reason and natural religion to guide man to a knowledge of the Divine will, and rejecting the Bible as superfluous and unnecessary. His creed may be expressed in five articles, 1. That there is a God; 2. That he ought to be worshipped; 3. That piety and moral virtue are the chief parts of worship; 4. That God will pardon our faults on repentance; and 5. That there is a future state of rewards and punishments.

That there is a close and intimate connection between Deism and Unitarianism in its modern form it is impossible to deny. At numerous points they unite and coalesce into one harmonious system. On this subject Mr. Robert Hall offers some valuable remarks by way of instituting a comparison between the two: "Deism, as distinguished from atheism," he says, "embraces almost every thing which the Unitarians profess to believe. The Deist professes to believe in a future state of rewards and punishments,—the Unitarian does no more. The chief difference is, that the Deist derives his conviction on the subject from the principles of natural religion; the Unitarian from the fact of Christ's resurrection. Both arrive at the same point, though they reach it by different routes. Both maintain the same creed, though on different grounds: so that, allowing the Deist to be fully settled and confirmed in his persuasion of a future world, it is not easy to perceive what advantage the Unitarian possesses over him. If the proofs of a future state, upon Christian principles, be acknowledged more clear and convincing than is attainable merely by the light of nature, yet as the operation of opinion is measured by the strength of the persuasion with which it is embraced, and not by the intrinsic force of evidence, the Deist, who cherishes a firm expectation of a life to come, has the same motives for resisting temptation, and patiently continuing in well doing, as the Unitarian. He has learned the same lesson, though under a different master, and is substantially of the same religion.

"The points in which they coincide are much more numerous, and more important, than those in which they differ. In their ideas of human nature, as being what it always was, in opposition to the doctrine of the fall; in their rejection of the Trinity, and of all supernatural mysteries; in their belief of the intrinsic efficacy of repentance, and the superfluity of an atonement; in their denial of spiritual aids, or internal grace, in their notions of the person of Christ; and finally, in that lofty confidence in the sufficiency of reason as a guide in the affairs of religion, and its authority to reject doctrines on the ground of antecedent improbability;—in all these momentous articles they concur. If the Deist boldly rejects the claims of revelation in toto, the Unitarian, by denying its plenary inspiration, by assuming the fallibility of the apostles, and even of Christ himself, and by resolving its most sublime and mysterious truths into metaphors and allegory, treads close in his steps. It is the same soul which animates the two systems though residing in different bodies; it is the same metal transfused into distinct moulds."

Dr. Samuel Clarke, in his Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion, ranges Deists under four different classes, 1. "Those who would be thought to be Deists because they pretend to believe in the existence of an eternal, infinite, independent, intelligent Being, and to avoid the name of Epicurean Atheists, teach also that this Supreme Being made the world, though at the same time they agree with the Epicureans in this, that they fancy God does not concern himself in the government of the world, nor has any regard to, or care of, what is done therein.

2. "Some others there are that call themselves Deists, because they believe not only the being, but the providence of God; that is, that every natural thing that is done in the world is produced by the power, appointed by the wisdom, and directed by the government of God; though not allowing any difference between moral good and evil, they suppose that God takes no notice of the morally good or evil actions of men; these things depending, as they imagine, merely on the arbitrary constitution of human laws."

The opinions of these two sorts of Deists, Dr. Clarke believes, can terminate consistently in nothing but downright atheism, and their practice and behaviour, he asserts, is exactly agreeable to that of the most openly professed Atheists. They not only oppose the revelation of Christianity, and reject all the moral obligations of natural religion as such; but generally they despise also the wisdom of all human constitutions made for the order and benefit of mankind, and are as much contemners of common decency as they are of religion.

3. "Another sort of Deists there are, who having right apprehensions concerning the natural attributes of God, and his all-governing providence; seem also to have some notion of his moral perfections also: that is, as they believe him to be a being infinitely knowing, powerful and wise; so they believe him to be also in some sense a being of infinite justice, goodness and truth; and that he governs the universe by these perfections, and expects suitable obedience from all his rational creatures. But then, having a prejudice against the notion of the immortality of human souls, they believe that men perish entirely at death, and that one generation shall perpetually succeed another, without any thing remaining of men after their departure out of this life, and without any future restoration or renovation of things. And imagining that justice and goodness in God are not the same as in the ideas we frame of these perfections when we consider them in men, or when we reason about them abstractly in themselves; but that in the Supreme Governor of the world they are something transcendent, and of which we cannot make any true judgment, nor argue with any certainty about them; they fancy, though there does not indeed seem to us to be any equity or proportion in the distribution of rewards and punishments in this present life, yet that we are not sufficient judges concerning the attributes of God, to argue from thence with any assurance for the certainty of a future state. But neither does this opinion stand on any consistent principles. For if justice and goodness be not the same in God, as in our ideas; then we mean nothing, when we say that God is necessarily just and good; and for the same reason it may as well be said, that we know not what we mean, when we affirm that he is an intelligent and wise being; and there will be no foundation at all left, on which we can fix any thing. Thus the moral attributes of God, however they be acknowledged in words, yet in reality they are by these men entirely taken away; and, upon the same grounds, the natural attributes may also be denied. And, so upon the whole, this opinion likewise, if we argue upon it consistently, must finally recur to absolute atheism.

4. "The last sort of Deists are those who, if they did indeed believe what they pretend, have just and right notions of God, and of all the Divine attributes in every respect; who declare they believe that there is one, eternal, infinite, intelligent, all-powerful and wise Being; the creator, preserver, and governor of all things; that this supreme cause is a Being of infinite justice, goodness, and truth, and all other moral as well as natural perfections; that he made the world for the manifestation of his power and wisdom, and to communicate his goodness and happiness to his creatures; that he preserves it by his continual all-wise providence, and governs it according to the eternal rules of infinite justice, equity, goodness, mercy and truth; that all created rational beings, depending continually upon him, are bound to adore, worship and obey him; to praise him for all things they enjoy, and to pray to him for every thing they want; that they are all obliged to promote, in their proportion, and according to the extent of their several powers and abilities, the general good and welfare of those parts of the world wherein they are placed; in like manner as the divine goodness is continually promoting the universal benefit of the whole; that men in particular, are every one obliged to make it their business, by an universal benevolence, to promote the happiness of all others; that in order to this, every man is bound always to behave himself so towards others, as in reason he would desire they should in like circumstances deal with him; that therefore, he is obliged to obey and submit to his superiors in all just and right things, for the preservation of society, and the peace and benefit of the public; to be just and honest, equitable and sincere, in all his dealings with his equals, for the keeping inviolable the everlasting rule of righteousness, and maintaining an universal trust and confidence, friendship and affection amongst men; and, towards his inferiors, to be gentle and kind, easy and affable, charitable and willing to assist as many as stand in need of his help, for the preservation of universal love and benevolence amongst mankind, and in imitation of the goodness of God, who preserves and does good to all creatures, which depend entirely upon him for their very being and all that they enjoy; that, in respect of himself, every man is bound to preserve, as much as in him lies, his own being and the right use of all his faculties, so long as it shall please God, who appointed him his station in this world, to continue him therein; that therefore he is bound to have an exact government of his passions, and carefully to abstain from all debaucheries and abuses of himself, which tend either to the destruction of his own being, or to the disordering his faculties, and disabling him from performing his duty, or hurrying him into the practice of unreasonable and unjust things; lastly, that accordingly as men regard or neglect these obligations, so they are proportionably acceptable or displeasing unto God; who being supreme governor of the world, cannot but testify his favour or displeasure at some time or other; and consequently, since this is not done in the present state, therefore there must be a future state of rewards and punishments in a life to come. But all this, the men we are now speaking of, pretend to believe only so far as it is discoverable by the light of nature alone; without believing any Divine revelation. These, I say, are the only true Deists; and indeed the only persons who ought in reason to be argued with, in order to convince them of the reasonableness, truth, and certainty of the Christian revelation."

Deism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries prevailed to a great extent in England, being openly avowed by several men of note, both in the political and literary world. Gibbon, Hume, Priestley, Bolingbroke, Shaftesbury, and Hobbes, commanded no small share of attention and even respect from their fellow-countrymen, and leading the way in the rejection of revealed religion, they were followed by no inconsiderable number of hasty superficial thinkers, such as are found invariably to follow in the wake of those who are superior to them whether in rank or talent. It was for the express purpose of opposing the English Deists that Robert Boyle founded those celebrated Lectures which bear his name, and which have done so much to uphold the theological reputation of England. For a time indeed the advocates of a Natural, as opposed to a Revealed religion, occupied no mean place in the ranks of British literature, and their writings were read by a large and not uninterested public. The Deists have had their day, and they are now scarcely to be found except among the lowest and least influential classes of the community; and even among these classes Deism has passed by an easy course into infidelity and atheism. Whether in the form of Socialists or Secularists, the Deists of the present day can no longer claim the standing and reputation of their predecessors of the last century. They are at once inferior in intellect, in position, and in influence.

The form which Deism assumed in France during the last century, was not that of Naturalism as in England, but a gross and sensuous Materialism as set forth in the writings of Condillac, Diderot, Helvetius, Voltaire, and those of the so-called Encyclopedists. But while Deists assumed a powerful front both in France and England, they were not long in making their appearance in Germany also. During the second half of the last century the most powerful attacks upon positive Christianity were made by the anonymous author of the Wolfenbittel Fragments, which gave rise to a series of controversies in regard to the position which ought to be assigned to reason in matters of faith. It is somewhat remarkable that even some of the German mystics adopted deistic principles. The mind of the age, influenced as it was by Frederic the Great, King of Prussia, also contributed to the spread of deistical tendencies, especially among the higher classes. The works of Wieland had no small effect in diffusing these mischievous principles. Some attempts were also made to form societies on the basis of Deism, such as the Illuminators founded by Weishaupt in 1777, and the Friends of Enlightenment at Berlin in 1783. Several theological writers, from whom better things might have been expected, contributed to the spread of deistic principles. The most conspicuous of these professed theologians was Bahrdt, who, though he set out apparently on the side of orthodoxy, yet in his writings composed in the latter part of his life, endeavoured to undermine all positive religion.

DELEGATES (COURT OF), a court in England, deriving its name from these delegates being appointed by the royal commission, under the great seal, and issuing out of Chancery, to represent the sovereign, and all appeals in three causes: 1. When a sentence is given in any ecclesiastical cause by the archbishop or his official. 2. When any sentence is given in any ecclesiastical cause, in places exempt. 3. When a sentence is given in the admiralty courts, in suits civil or marine, by the civil law.

DELIA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), Delos having been supposed to be her birth-place. The same name is also applied sometimes to Demeter, Aphrodite, and the Nymphs.

DELIA, ancient Pagan festivals and games celebrated in the island of Delos, in honour of Apollo and Artemis. They were observed every fifth year with games, choruses, and dances, but in process of time they were suspended. The Athenians, however, revived the festival, adding to it horse-races. Besides these greater games, there were also lesser Delia, which were held every year in honour of Delian Apollo, when the Athenians sent to Delos the sacred vessel, which the priest of Apollo adorned with laurel branches. Theseus is said to have been the founder of the lesser Delia, but they are alleged by some authors to have been of much greater antiquity.

DELIUS, a surname of APOLLO (which see) arising from his having been born at Delos, an island in the Ægean sea.

DELIVERERS, a Christian sect mentioned by Augustine as having arisen about A. D. 260, and who derived their name from the doctrine which they maintained that upon Christ's descent into hell, infidels believed, and all were delivered from thence.

DELPHI (ORACLE OF), the most celebrated of all the oracles of Apollo. The ancient name of the place was Pytho, and hence Apollo was sometimes known by the surname of Pythius, and the priestess who pronounced the oracular responses received the name of Pythia or Pythonessa. Delphi being one of the places at which Apollo was particularly worshipped, there was a temple dedicated to him in that town, in the innermost sanctuary of which his statue was placed, while before it stood an altar on which burned a perpetual fire, fed only with fir-wood. The inner roof of the temple was wreathed with laurel garlands, and on the altar, laurel was burnt as incense. Fumes of vapour incessantly ascended from the crevices of a profound cavern within the temple, over which the priestess sat on a three-legged stool known as the tripod. These vapours powerfully affected the brain of the Pythia, and were deemed to be the sure and hallowed media of divine inspiration. Dr. Gillies, the historian of ancient Greece, speaking of the Delphian oracle, which was honoured by the protection and superintendence of the Amphictyonic council, says, "The inhabitants of Delphi, who, if we may use the expression, were the original proprietors of the oracle, always continued to direct the religious ceremonies, and to conduct the important business of prophecy. It was their province alone to determine at what time and on what occasion, the Pythia should mount the sacred tripod, to receive the prophetic steams, by which she communicated with Apollo. When overflowing with the heavenly inspiration, she uttered the confused words, or rather frantic sounds, irregularly suggested by the impulse of the god; the Delphians collected these sounds, reduced them into order, animated them with sense, and adorned them with harmony."

At first oracles were only given forth once every seventh year on the birth-day of Apollo; but as the fame of the Delphian oracle spread throughout Greece, it became necessary to set apart several days every month for the purpose. Those who came to consult the oracle were admitted by lot, unless when the magistrates of Delphi assigned to any one a right of preference. A fee was demanded from those who availed themselves of the oracle. Before the Pythia mounted the tripod, she spent three days in previous preparation, which consisted in fasting and bathing in the Castalian well. She is also said to have burnt laurel leaves and flour of barley upon the altar of the god. The consulters of the oracle, before they could approach the shrine, must previously sacrifice an ox, a sheep, or a goat, in honour of Apollo. Five priests were attached to the temple, all of whom were chosen from families descended from DEUCALION (which see), and held office for life.

The oracles of Greece were usually delivered in hexameter verse, and as the origin of this poetic measure was ascribed to the Delphian Apollo, it was also called the Pythian metre. At the later periods of Grecian history, however, when the oracle ceased to be consulted on great occasions, the oracular answers were given in prose. It is an undoubted fact, that the oracles exercised a highly important influence upon Greece, especially in the earlier periods of its civilization, often guiding public opinion, and urging on the spirit of national enterprise. But above all the other oracles, that of Delphi enjoyed a world-wide renown. Its responses revealed many a tyrant, and foretold his fate. Through its means many an unhappy being was saved from destruction, and many a perplexed mortal guided in the right way. It encouraged useful institutions, and promoted the progress of useful discoveries. Its moral influence was on the side of virtue, and its political influence in favour of the advancement of civil liberty. The time at length came, however, when the fame of the Delphian oracle began to diminish. Protracted struggles between Athens and Sparta for domination in Greece tended more than anything else to diminish the estimation in which the oracle was held. Its prestige was almost entirely gone in the days of Cicero and Plutarch, but it was still occasionally consulted down to the time of the Roman Emperor Julian, and only finally prohibited by Theodosius. See ORACLES.

DELPHINIUS, a surname of Apollo; derived from Delphi, one of the chief seats of his worship.

DELPHINIA, a festival celebrated in various towns of Greece in honour of Apollo, on which occasion a procession of boys and girls took place, each carrying an olive branch bound with white wool. This at least was the customary mode of observance at Athens, but in some other places, as at Ægina, it was celebrated with contests.

DELUGE (TRADITIONS OF THE). It does not lie within the scope of the present work to consider the actual facts connected with the Deluge, as they are detailed in the Scriptures, or to examine the much disputed question, whether the inundation on that occasion was universal or partial in its extent; but we confine ourselves to the exhibition of a few of the most important traditions on the subject which are to be found in almost all the nations of the earth, and which present throughout so remarkable a uniformity of aspect as to afford a striking evidence of the truth of the Mosaic narrative. "These ancient traditions of the human race," says Humboldt, "which we find dispersed over the surface of the globe, like the fragments of a vast shipwreck, present among all nations a resemblance that fills us with astonishment; there are so many languages belonging to branches which appear to have no connection with each other, which all transmit to us the same fact. The substance of the traditions respecting the destroyed races and the renovation of nature is almost everywhere the same, although each nation gives it a local colouring. On the great continents, as on the small islands of the Pacific, it is always on the highest and nearest mountains that the remains of the human race were saved."

Bryant, in his 'System of Ancient Mythology,' followed more recently by Faber, enters into an elaborate and erudite argument to prove, that Noah was worshipped in conjunction with the sun, and the ark in conjunction with the moon, and that these were the principal deities among the ancient heathens. He labours to prove, with an extent of erudition seldom surpassed, that the primitive Egyptian gods were eight in number, that they represented the eight persons saved in the ark, and that almost all the heathen deities had a reference in some way to Noah and the deluge.

Both in the East and West, traditions in reference to the world having been destroyed by a great flood of waters have been found mingled with the beliefs of almost every country. Among the ancient Babylonians, such an event was related as having occurred in the time of Xisuthrus, the tenth of their line of kings, counting from the first created man, just as Noah was the tenth from Adam. The account of Berosus is interesting from its remarkable coincidence in many points with the narrative of the deluge given by Moses. "Warned in a dream by Chronus and Saturn of the approaching calamity, he was commanded to build an immense ship, and embark in it with his wife, his children, and his friends; having first furnished it with provisions, and put into it a number both of birds and four-footed animals. As soon as these preparations were completed, the flood commenced, and the whole world perished beneath its waters. After it began to abate, Xisuthrus sent out some of the birds, which, finding neither food nor resting-place, returned immediately to the ship. In the course of a few days he again let out the birds, but they came back to him, having their feet covered with mud. The third time of his sending them, they returned no more. Concluding from this that the flood was decreasing, and the earth again appearing, he made an aperture in the side of the vessel, and perceived that it was approaching a mountain, on which it soon after rested, when he descended with his family, adored the earth, built an altar, and sacrificed to the gods. Xisuthrus having suddenly disappeared, his family heard a voice in the air which informed them that the country was Armenia, and directed them to return to Babylon."

On the subject of the deluge the Hindu traditions also correspond in a remarkable degree with the principal facts of revelation. The popular view as given in the Puránas, amid all its Oriental luxuriance and exaggeration, approaches at many points to the Mosaic narrative. "The lord of the universe, loving the pious man who thus implored him, and intending to preserve him from the sea of destruction caused by the depravity of the age, thus told him how he was to act. 'In seven days from the present time, O thou tamer of enemies, the three worlds will be plunged in an ocean of death; but, in the midst of the destroying waters, a large vessel, sent by me for thy use, shall stand before thee. Then shalt thou take all medicinal herbs, all the variety of seeds; and, accompanied by seven saints, encircled by pairs of all brute animals, thou shalt enter the spacious ark, and continue in it, secure from the flood, on one immense ocean, without light, except the radiance of thy holy companions. When the ship shall be agitated by an impetuous wind, thou shalt fasten it with a large sea-serpent on my horn; for I will be near thee: drawing the vessel with thee and thy attendants, I will remain on the ocean, O chief of men, until a night of Brahmá shall be completely ended. Thou shalt then know my true greatness, rightly named the supreme godhead. By my favour all thy questions shall be answered, and thy mind abundantly instructed.' Hari, having thus directed the monarch, disappeared; and Satyavrata humbly waited for the time, which the ruler of our senses had appointed. The pious king, having scattered towards the east the pointed blades of the grass darbha, and turning his face towards the north, sat meditating on the feet of the god who had borne the form of a fish. The sea, overwhelming its shores, deluged the whole earth; and it was soon perceived to be augmented by showers from immense clouds. He, still meditating on the command of Bhagavat, saw the vessel advancing, and entered it with the chiefs of Brámanas, having carried into it the medicinal creepers and conformed to the directions of Hari. The saints thus addressed him: 'O king, meditate on Kés'ava; who will surely deliver us from this danger, and grant us prosperity.' The god, being invoked by the monarch, appeared again distinctly on the vast ocean in the form of a fish, blazing like gold, extending a million of leagues, with one stupendous horn: on which the king, as he had been before commanded by Hari, tied the ship with a cable made of a vast serpent, and happy in his preservation, stood praising the destroyer of Madhu. When the monarch had finished his hymn, the primeval male, Bhagavat, who watched for his safety on the great expanse of water, spoke aloud to his own divine essence, pronouncing a sacred Purána, which contained the rules of the Sákhya philosophy: but it was an infinite mystery to be concealed within the breast of Satyavrata; who, sitting in the vessel with the saints, heard the principle of the soul, the Eternal Being, proclaimed by the preserving power. Then Hari, rising together with Brahmá from the destructive deluge which was abated, slew the demon Hayagríva, and recovered the sacred books: Satyavrata, instructed in all divine and human knowledge, was appointed in the present Kalpa, by the favour of Vishnu, the seventh Manu, surnamed Vaivaswata: but the appearance of a horned fish to the religious monarch was Máya or delusion; and he, who shall devoutly hear this important allegorical narrative, will be delivered from the bondage of sin."

Thus plainly in the closing sentence of this extract do the Puránas admit that the description here given of the deluge is an allegory. A different version of the legend is found in the Mahabhárata, which Professor Wilson thinks is more ancient than that of the Pūrānas, but still in their main features there is a close resemblance, so close indeed as to show plainly that both are derived from the same original source. Another version of the same Hindu legend has been recently brought to light by the publication of the Yajur-Veda, to which there is appended the Satapat'ha-Brahmana, containing an account of the deluge much simpler than that which has been already given from the Purānas. We quote from Mr. Charles Hardwick's able work, at present in course of publication, entitled 'Christ and other Masters,' a work which is likely to throw much light on the points of coincidence, as well as of divergence between Christianity and other systems of religion. "One morning the servants of Manu brought him water for ablutions, as the custom is to bring it in our day when men's hands have to be washed. As he proceeded to wash himself he found a fish in the water, which spoke to him, saying, 'Protect me and I will be thy Saviour.' 'From what wilt thou save me?' 'A deluge will ere long destroy all living creatures, but I can save thee from it.' 'What protection, then, dost thou ask of me?' 'So long as we are little,' replied the Fish, 'a great danger threatens us, for one fish will not scruple to devour another. At first, then, thou canst protect me by keeping me in a vase. When I grow bigger, and the vase will no longer hold me, dig a pond, and protect me by keeping me in it; and when I shall have become too large for the pond, then throw me into the sea; for henceforward I shall be strong enough to protect myself against all evils.' The Fish ere long became enormous (Jhasha), for it grew very fast, and one day it said to Manu, 'In such a year will come the deluge; call to mind the counsel I have given thee; build a ship, and when the deluge comes, embark on the vessel thou hast built, and I will preserve thee.' Manu after feeding and watching the Fish, at last threw it into the sea, and in the very year the Fish had indicated, he prepared a ship and had recourse [in spirit] to his benefactor. When the flood came, Manu went on board the ship. The Fish then reappeared and swam up to him, and Manu passed the cable of his vessel round its horn, by means of which he was transferred across yon Northern Mountain. 'I have saved thee, said the Fish, 'now lash thy vessel to a tree, else the water may still carry thee away, though thy vessel be moored upon the mountain. When the water has receded, then also mayest thou disembark.' Manu implicitly obeyed the order, and hence that northern mountain still bears the name of 'Manu's descent.' The deluge swept away all living creatures; Manu alone survived it. His life was then devoted to prayer and fasting in order to obtain posterity. He made the Pāka-sacrifice; he offered to the Waters the clarified butter, cream, whey, and curdled milk. His offerings were continued, and at the end of a year he thereby fashioned for himself a wife: she came dripping out of the butter; it trickled on her footsteps. Mitra and Varun'a approached her and asked 'Who art thou?' She answered, 'The daughter of Manu.' 'Wilt thou be our daughter?' 'No;' the answer was, 'My owner is the author of my being.' Their solicitations were all vain; for she moved directly onward till she came to Manu. On seeing her, he also asked her, 'Who art thou?' And she answered, 'Thine own daughter.' 'How so, beloved, art thou really my daughter?' 'Yes; the offerings thou hast made to the Waters, the clarified butter, the cream, the whey, and the curdled milk have brought me into being. I am the completion of thy vows. Approach me during the sacrifice. If so, thou shalt be rich in posterity and in flocks. The desire which thou art cherishing shall be entirely accomplished.' Thus was Manu wedded to her in the midst of the sacrifice, that is, between the ceremonies that denote the opening and the close of it. With her he lived in prayer and fasting, ever-anxious to obtain posterity: and she became the mother of the present race of men which even now is called the race of Manu. The vows which he had breathed in concert with her were all perfectly accomplished."

Quitting the East, and proceeding to the Western nations, our attention is naturally called to the well-known legend of Deucalion's flood, as found in the writers of ancient Greece. The details are simply these. Deucalion, the hero of the legend, was a king in Phthia, whose wife was Pyrrha. Zeus having resolved, in consequence of the treatment he had received from Lycaon, to destroy the whole race of men from the face of the earth, Deucalion, following the advice of his father Prometheus, built a ship, which he stored with all manner of provisions, and in this vessel, when Zeus sent a flood all over Hellas, Deucalion and Pyrrha were alone saved. Their ship floated on the waters for nine days, at the end of which it rested on a mountain which was generally reputed to have been Mount Parnassus. When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus Phyxius, who, in return for this pious act, sent his messenger Hermes to offer Deucalion whatever he should wish. Thereupon Deucalion implored of the god that mankind should be restored. It has sometimes been said that he and his wife repaired together to the shrine of Themis, and prayed for this boon. At all events their prayer was granted, and they were told to cover their heads, and throw the bones of their mother behind them as they walked from the temple. The rescued pair had some difficulty as to the meaning of the command, but at length coming to the conclusion that the bones of their mother could only mean the stones of the earth, they proceeded to execute the order of the deity by throwing stones behind them, when from those thrown by Deucalion sprung men, and from those thrown by Pyrrha sprung women. Thus was the earth once more peopled.

A curious tradition of the deluge is mentioned by Dr. Richardson, who accompanied Franklin in one of his Arctic Voyages: "The Crees," he says, "spoke of a universal deluge, caused by an attempt of the fish to drown Woesachoolchacht, a kind of demigod, with whom they had quarrelled. Having constructed a raft, he embarked with his family, and all kinds of birds and beasts. After the flood had continued some time, he ordained several waterfowls to dive to the bottom; they were all drowned; but a musk rat having been dispatched on the same errand was more successful, and returned with a mouthful of mud."

In the article ARK-WORSHIP, we have noticed various customs existing in ancient Egypt and other countries, which seem plainly to have originated in traditions of the universal deluge. None of these traditional practices indeed is more remarkable than that of carrying in their religious processions, as in Egypt and elsewhere, the figure of an ark. And it is remarkable that in examining the traditions of different nations, the farther back we go even into the most remote antiquity, the clearer become the traces which present themselves of the great cataclysm. Some writers have even made the Egyptians worship Noah and his three sons, but the recent researches of Wilkinsou, Lepsius, and Burisen have satisfactorily disproved this idea, and pointed out a still deeper source of such deities, as Osiris, Thoth, Isis, and other Egyptian gods, as being embodiments of certain cosmological notions and religious conceptions, having no reference whatever to the deluge. In the literature of China are to be found several notices of this awful catastrophe. In a history of China, said to be written by Confucius, the country is said to be still under the effect of the waters. The opposite sect of the Tauists make mention also of the deluge, as having taken place under Niu-hoa whom they consider as a female. On that occasion they allege, the seasons were changed, day and night were confounded, the world was overwhelmed with a flood, and men were reduced to the state of fishes. The same event is noticed by other Chinese writers.

Mohammed has preserved the traditions of the old Arabians in reference to the deluge, and recorded them in several chapters of the Koran. Several of the African tribes are found also to maintain the memory of a deluge. Both in North and South America traces have been discovered of the same tradition, which are thus sketched by Sharon Turner in 'The Sacred History of the World:': "The ancient inhabitants of Chili, the Araucanians, make the flood a part of their historical remembrances. The Cholulans, who were in the equinoctial regions of New Spain before the Mexicans arrived there, preserved the idea of it in a fantastic form in their hieroglyphical pictures. The Indians of Chiapa, a region in those parts, had a simpler narrative about it. The Mexicans, in their peculiar paintings, which constituted their books and written literature, had an expressive representation of the catastrophe. The nations contiguous to them, or connected with them, had similar records of it, and depict the mountain on which the navigating pair who escaped were saved. It is still more interesting to us to find, that the natives of the province of Mechoacan had their own distinct account of it, which contained the incident of the birds that were let out from the ark, to enable Noah to judge of the habitable condition of the earth. These people had also applied another name to the preserved individual, Tezpi, which implies a different source of information from what they narrated. The belief of a flood has also been found to exist in the province of Guatimala. It was also in Peru and Brazil.

"We learn from Humboldt, to whom we owe so much knowledge of all sorts, of the natives of South America, that the belief prevailed among all the tribes of the Upper Oroonoko, that at the time of what they call 'the Great Waters,' their fathers were forced to have recourse to their boats to escape the general inundation. The Tamanaiks add to their notions of this period, their peculiar ideas of the manner in which the earth was re-peopled. Upon the rocks of Encaramada figures of stars, of the sun, of tigers, and of crocodiles, are traced, which the natives connected with the period of this deluge. Humboldt appropriately remarks, that similar traditions exist among all the nations of the earth, and, like the relics of a vast shipwreck, are highly interesting in the philosophical study of our species.

"Ideas of the same sort existed in the Island of Cuba, and Kotzebue found them among the rude Pagans of Kamschatka, at the extremity of the Asian continent. The Peruvians preserved the memory of a general destruction, as far as their own country was concerned, which their neighbours, the Guancas and others, also entertained. In Brazil, there were also various traditions of the diluvian catastrophe, which, though agreeing in fact, differed in the circumstances attending it. In Terra Firma it was also floating in the popular memory, and equally so among the Iroquois in Canada, and at the mouth of St. Lawrence.

"The Arrawak Indians near the Essequibo and Mazaworry rivers, have preserved still traditions both of the separate creation of the first male and female, and also of the deluge; and describe it as caused by the demoralization of mankind.

"In North America we find in the various Indian tribes of nations, who spread over it, some memorial intimations of this great event. Captain Beechey found that the natives of California had a tradition of the deluge. The Koliougues, on the north-west coast of America, have also peculiar notions upon it. Sir Alexander Mackenzie heard it from the Chippewyams. The idea prevailed, but with fantastic additions, among the Cree Indians. Mr. West heard a similar account from the natives who attended his school on the Red River. In Western or New Caledonia, which was an unexplored country beyond the rocky mountains in these parts, till Mr. Harmon visited them, he found a vague and wild tradition of the same catastrophe, with the singular tradition of a fiery destruction."

Humboldt, when among the Red Indians of the Orinoco, was surprised and delighted at the glowing descriptions of the deluge given by this people in connection with the most absurd legends regarding the origin and distribution of mankind. Ellis, in his 'Polynesian Researches,' takes notice of a similar tradition among the barbarous tribes of the islands in the Pacific.

In short, among nations the most remote from one another in space, and in periods the most remote from one another in time, traditions of the deluge have been discovered, which agree in so many particulars with the simple narrative of the Sacred penman, that it is impossible for a moment to believe that they are anything more than accounts more or less distorted of the same great fact.

DEMETER, one of the principal divinities of ancient Greece, the daughter of Chronus and Rhea. By her brother Zeus, she was the mother of Persephone or Proserpine, who was carried off by Pluto into the infernal regions. Demeter forthwith set out in search of her daughter, and on the tenth day she met with Hecate, who went along with her to Helios, from whom they learned that Pluto had stolen Persephone with the consent of Zeus. Enraged at the tidings she had heard, Demeter refused to return to Olympus, but remained upon earth visiting it with the curse of barrenness. Zeus, unwilling that the human race should perish, sent Iris to prevail upon Demeter to return to the abode of the gods. Iris, however, was unsuccessful in her errand, and though all the gods in a body endeavoured to persuade Demeter to revisit Olympus, she remained inexorable, declaring her determined resolution to remain on earth until she had seen her daughter again. Hermes accordingly was despatched by Zeus to the realms of Pluto, to demand back Persephone, and having obtained her, he carried her to Eleusis, and restored her to the arms of her mother Demeter. Here Persephone was joined by Hecate, who from that time became her constant attendant and companion. Zeus now sent Rhea to prevail upon Demeter to return to Olympus, and allowed Persephone to spend the winter of every year in the shades below, and the rest of the year on earth in the company of her mother. Demeter was now won over, and consented to resume her place in the celestial abodes, but before quitting earth she gave instructions as to her worship and mysteries.

Demeter was the goddess of the earth and of agriculture. She presided also over marriage, and was worshipped especially by women. The myth of Demeter and her daughter seems to have been designed to represent the fertility of the earth as concealed during winter, reviving in spring, and enjoying the light and heat of the sun during a portion of the year. Some have explained the myth by a reference to the mortality of the body, and the immortality of the soul. The worship of Demeter was carried on in Crete, Delos, Argolis, Attica, the western coast of Asia, and in Sicily and Italy. The principal festivals in honour of this goddess were the Thesmophoria and the Eleusinian mysteries. Swine were sacrificed to Demeter, and also bulls, cows, and various species of fruits. Her temples were known by the name of Megara, and were chiefly built in groves near towns.

The Romans, who worshipped Demeter under the name of Ceres, instituted a festival with games in her honour, called Cerealia, which were uniformly conducted by a Greek priestess, who, on receiving office, was invested with the privileges of a Roman citizen. The worship of Ceres held a high place in the estimation of the Romans, and the forfeited property of traitors was given over to her temple, in which were deposited the decrees of the senate, and it was the special business of the ædiles to superintend this sacred place. See CERES.

DEMETRIA, a yearly festival instituted at Athens B. C. 307, in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who, along with his father Antigonus, were consecrated as saviour gods. A procession was held, and sacrifices and games were celebrated, while the name of the festival of the Dionysia was changed into that of Demetria.

DEMIURGE, the world-former of the early Gnostics of the Christian church, a being of a kindred nature with the universe, formed and governed by him, and far inferior to the higher world of emanation, and the Father of it. But at this point arose a difference among the various Gnostic sects. They all admitted the subordination of the Demiurge to the Supreme God, but they did not agree as to the particular mode of the subordination. The varieties of opinion are well detailed by Neander. "Some taking their departure from ideas which had long prevailed among certain Jews of Alexandria (as appears from comparing the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament, and from Philo), supposed that the Supreme God created and governed the world by ministering spirits, by the angels. At the head of these angels stood one, who had the direction and control of all; hence called the officer and governor of the world. This Demiurge they compared with the plastic, animating, mundane spirit of Plato and the Platonicians, which, too, according to the Timæus of Plato, strives to represent the ideas of the Divine Reason, in that which is becoming and temporal. This angel is a representative of the Supreme God on this lower stage of existence. He acts not independently, but merely according to the ideas inspired in him by the Supreme God; just as the plastic, mundane soul of the Platonists creates all things after the pattern of the ideas communicated by the Supreme Reason. But these ideas transcend the powers of his own limited nature; he cannot understand them; he is merely their unconscious organ and hence is unable himself to comprehend the whole scope and meaning of the work which he performs. As an organ under the guidance of a higher inspiration, he reveals what exceeds his own power of conception. And here also they fall in with the current ideas of the Jews, in supposing that the Supreme God had revealed himself to their Fathers through the angels, who served as ministers of his will. From them proceeded the giving of the law by Moses. In the following respect, also, they considered the Demiurge to be a representative of the Supreme God; as the other nations of the earth are portioned out under the guidance of the other angels, so the Jewish people, considered as the peculiar people of God, are committed to the especial care of the Demiurge, as his representative. He revealed also among them, in their religious polity, as in the creation of the world, those higher ideas, which himself could not understand in their true significancy. The Old Testament, like the whole creation, was the veiled symbol of a higher mundane system, the veiled type of Christianity.

"The other party of the Gnostics consisted mainly of such as, before their coming over to Christianity, had not been followers of the Mosaic religion, but had already, at an earlier period, framed to themselves an Oriental Gnosis, opposed as well to Judaism as to all popular religions, like that of which we find the remains in the books of the Sabæans, and of which examples may still be found in the East, among the Persians and the Hindoos. They regarded the Demiurge with his angels, not simply like the former class, as a subordinate, limited being, but as one absolutely hostile to the Supreme God. The Demiurge and his angels are for establishing their independence within their limited sphere. They would tolerate no foreign dominion within their province. Whatever higher existence has descended into their kingdom, they seek to hold imprisoned there, so that it may not ascend again above their narrow precincts. Probably, in this system, the kingdom of the world-forming angels coincided, for the most part, with the kingdom of the deceitful star-spirits, who seek to rob man of his freedom, to beguile him by various arts of deception,—and who exercise a tyrannical sway over the things of this world. The Demiurge is a limited and limiting being; proud, jealous, revengeful; and this his character expresses itself in the Old Testament, which proceeded from him."

The difference which thus existed between the Gnostic systems, in regard to the Demiurge, was one of no small importance. The one class, who held the Demiurge to be the organ and representative of the Supreme God, could see a divine manifestation in nature, and the earth itself pervaded by an influence which would tend to purify and exalt it. But the other class, which believed the Demiurge, or Creator of the world, to be essentially opposed to the Supreme God and his higher system, were naturally led to look upon the world, not with benevolence, but with bitter hatred. The Gnostics of this last class, either encouraged celibacy, or proclaimed open hostility to marriage as an impure and profane connection. Regarding all that was human as necessarily unholy, they denied the humanity of Christ; and all that belonged to Christ's human appearance they represented as not a reality, but a mere vision. The opinions which were held, indeed, by the different classes of Gnostics in regard to the Demiurge, may be regarded as a characteristic mark of distinction between the two great classes.

DEMONS. See ANGELS (EVIL).

DEMON-WORSHIP. In all ages and in all countries there has existed in the popular mind a dread of spiritual beings, and an inclination to some extent to pay them homage. Among the ancient Greeks the Genii of the Romans were called demons, and every individual was supposed to have a good and an evil genius, the one prompting him to the practice of virtue and piety, the other to the practice of vice and wickedness. But it is in less cultivated tribes of men that the necessity of propitiating spirits by offering worship is more especially felt. Thus in Southern Guinea a firm belief is entertained that there are demons or spirits who control the affairs of men, and who are themselves possessed of great diversity of character. Some of them are viewed as good spirits, and their kind offices are eagerly sought. Houses are built for their accommodation, and frequent offerings are made to them of food, drink, clothing, and furniture. Native priests pretend to hold intercourse with them, and to act as channels of communication between mankind and these demons. There are other spirits, however, whose presence is feared, and all kinds of means are employed to expel them from their houses and villages: "On the Gold Coast," Mr. Wilson informs us, "there are stated occasions, when the people turn out en masse (generally at night) with clubs and torches, to drive away the evil spirits from their towns. At a given signal, the whole community start up, commence a most hideous howling, beat about in every nook and corner of their dwellings, then rush into the streets, with their torches and clubs, like so many frantic maniacs, beat the air, and scream at the top of their voices, until some one announces the departure of the spirits through some gate of the town, when they are pursued several miles into the woods, and warned not to come back. After this the people breathe easier, sleep more quietly, have better health, and the town is once more cheered by an abundance of food."

These spirits are also supposed to take up their abodes in certain animals, which on that account are regarded as sacred. Thus monkeys found near a grave-yard are supposed to be animated by the spirits of the dead. On some parts of the Gold Coast the crocodile is sacred; a certain class of snakes on the Slave Coast, and the shark at Bonny, are all regarded as sacred, and are worshipped not on their own account, but because they are regarded as the temples or dwelling-places of spirits. In Western Africa also the practice of offering human sacrifices to appease the anger of evil spirits is common, but nowhere more frequent or on a larger scale than in the kingdoms of Ashantee and Dahomey, and on the Bonny river. A striking illustration of the dread of evil spirits as likely to prove injurious even to the dead, may be seen in the article DEAD (DRIVING AWAY THE DEVIL FROM THE).

Even the ancient Jews are alleged by some to have offered sacrifice to demons of a particular kind, which appeared especially in desert places in the form of goats, which in Scripture are called seirim, a word properly signifying goats. It appears more likely, however, that the Hebrews worshipped the demons adored by the ancient Tsbians, who appeared in the shape of goats. It is a fact well known to all who have carefully studied the mythology of antiquity, that the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and all the nations of the East, who believed in a superintending providence, were of opinion that the government of the world was committed by the heavenly intelligences to an intermediate class of beings called demons, who acted as subordinate ministers to fulfil the designs of the higher powers to whom it properly belonged to govern the universe. The noblest enjoyment which the Oriental mind could conceive to be experienced by the Supreme Being, was a state of entire and undisturbed repose; and accordingly the idea came naturally to arise, that the cares and anxieties of the active management of the universe were devolved upon inferior deputies or ministers, who received the name of demons. Plato arranged these beings into three classes, all of which were possessed of both a body and a soul, the latter being an emanation from the Divine essence, and the former being composed of the particular element in which the particular class of demons had its residence. "Those of the first and highest order," he tells us, "are composed of pure ether; those of the second order consist of grosser air; and demons of the third or lowest rank have vehicles extracted from the element of water. Demons of the first and second order are invisible to mankind. The aquatic demons being invested with vehicles of grosser materials, are sometimes visible, and sometimes invisible. When they do appear, though faintly observable by the human eye, they strike the beholder with terror and astonishment." Demons were supposed to be possessed with similar affections and feelings to those which actuate the human family, and therefore, while they filled the universe, they occupied each his own special locality. Every individual object in the visible creation had thus its presiding genius or demon; and in this way the religion of the heathen in its more primitive form was rather Pantheistic than Polytheistic. Hence Mallet, in his 'Northern Antiquities,' remarks, "Each element was, according to the faith of primeval man, under the guidance of some being peculiar to it. The earth, the water, the fire, the air, the sun, moon, and stars, had each their respective divinity. The trees, forests, rivers, mountains, rocks, winds, thunder, and tempests, had the same; and merited on that score a religious worship, which at first could not be directed to the visible object, but to the intelligence with which it was animated."

Plutarch's doctrine in reference to demons was, that they were half related to the gods and half to men. But he supposed that among these intermediate beings there was a graduated subordination according to the predominance of the divine or the sensuous element. When the latter prevailed the demons were malicious, revengeful, and cruel, requiring in order to conciliate them the offering up in many instances of even human sacrifices. Into this idea Porphyry entered, representing these demons as impure beings related to matter, from which the Platonists derived all evil. Such explanations afforded the Christians a powerful weapon for assailing Paganism.

DEMONTANISTS, those who believe in the reality of demoniacal possession. The question has often been keenly agitated among learned men, whether or not the demoniacs of the New Testament were actually possessed by the Devil, and influenced by him both mentally and corporeally. The neological school of theologians contend that the demoniacs of Scripture were either madmen or persons afflicted with epilepsy or some other cerebral disease; and in support of this opinion they adduce medical cases in which similar symptoms have been exhibited. But the great mass of theological writers entertain very different and much sounder views of the subject, alleging that from the statements of the Evangelical historians, as well as from the whole facts of the cases brought forward, the demoniacs must have been clearly possessed by an evil spirit. The Demonianists, who hold firmly the doctrine of devil-possession, support their opinion by various arguments of a very conclusive character.

1. They refer to the whole sayings and doings of the demoniacs of Scripture, which are plainly inconsistent with the supposition that they were merely labouring under bodily disease. Thus in Mat. viii. 29, "They cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" The evil spirits are said on one occasion to have left the demoniac and passed into a herd of swine. Such a transition cannot possibly be reconciled with any species of insanity, and can only be explained by admitting that the persons were really possessed by devils, which by Divine permission entered into the swine and drove them headlong into the sea.

2. Various cases of demoniacs occur in the New Testament, in which not the slightest symptoms of mental derangement could be discerned. Thus in the dumb demoniac mentioned in Mat. ix. 32, and Luke xi. 14, and in the dumb and blind demoniac referred to in Mat. xii. 22, we have no evidence that the intellect was in the least degree impaired or affected.

3. It is well worthy of being noticed as confirming the reality of the demon-possession, that even in those cases, as in Mat. xvii. 15, where the symptoms might be regarded as allied to those of epilepsy, an express statement is made attributing the morbid influences and effects to the agency of the devil.

4. The art of divination, the exercise of which requires no small ingenuity and skill, and which could only be practised by persons in sound possession of their mental powers, is alleged in Acts xvi. 16, to have been practised by a demoniac damsel at Philippi.

5. Testimony from various quarters can be adduced in proof of the demoniacs of Scripture being actually possessed by the devil. Thus we have the plain statement of the Evangelists in various passages, but more especially in Mat. iv. 24, in which it is expressly declared concerning Jesus, "And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them." We have the testimony of the very enemies of Christ, who would have willingly denied the reality of such possession if they could possibly have done it, but they are compelled, however unwillingly, to admit his power over unclean spirits, Mat. ix. 34, "But the Pharisees said, He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils." And last and greatest of all, we have the testimony of our blessed Lord himself, as in Mark ix. 25, "When Jesus saw that the people came running together, he rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him;" and Luke xi. 19, "And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore shall they be your judges."

6. That demoniacs were not persons labouring under disease, is plain from the circumstance that the sacred writers make an express distinction between demoniacs and diseased persons; and likewise between the casting out of demons and the healing of the sick. Thus Mark i. 32, "And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils." Luke vi. 17, 18, "And he came down with them, and stood in the plain, and the company of his disciples, and a great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jerusalem, and from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon, which came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; and they that were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed;" Luke xiii. 32, "And he said unto them, Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected."

7. An additional argument in favour of the reality of the devil-possession of Scripture, may be drawn from the fact, that wherever circumstances are brought forward in reference to the demoniacs, they are generally such as serve to show that there was something extraordinary and preternatural in their case; for we find them doing homage to Christ and his apostles, and what is peculiarly striking, they all knew him, and united in confessing his divinity. Thus Mark i. 23, 24, "And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God;" Luke iv. 41, "And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, Thou art Christ the Son of God. And he rebuking them, suffered them not to speak: for they knew that he was Christ."

Nor is the opinion of the Demonianists a modern theory, unrecognized by the ancient Christian church. On the contrary, the Fathers of the church are unanimous in maintaining that the persons of whom we have been speaking were really possessed with demons, and the church itself, in accordance with this opinion, instituted a separate order of persons called EXORCISTS (which see), whose office it was to cast out evil spirits.

The doctrine of spiritual influence on the minds of men has been held in all ages and among almost all nations. The gods who watched over the heroes of the Iliad, the demon who assiduously tracked the steps of Socrates, the genii of the Eastern mythology, the fairies and witches of the Northern nations, the dreaded phantoms which are supposed to rule over the Southern hemisphere, proclaim the universal belief in an invisible spiritual agency, exerted for good or for evil, wherever the human race has been found. "At the present day," as Roberts informs us, "The universal opinion in the East is, that devils have the power to enter into and take possession of men, in the same sense as we understand it to have been the case, as described by the sacred writers. I have often seen the poor objects who were believed to be under demoniacal influence, and certainly, in some instances, I found it no easy matter to account for their conduct on natural principles; I have seen them writhe and tear themselves in the most frantic manner; they burst asunder the cords with which they were bound, and fell on the ground as if dead. At one time they are silent, and again most vociferous; they dash with fury among the people, and loudly pronounce their imprecations. But no sooner does the exorcist come forward, than the victim becomes the subject of new emotions; he stares, talks incoherently, sighs and falls on the ground; and in the course of an hour, is as calm as any who are around him. Those men who profess to eject devils are frightful-looking creatures, and are seldom associated with, except in the discharge of their official duties. It is a fact, that they affect to eject the evil spirits by their prince of devils. Females are much more subject to these affections than men; and Friday is the day of all others on which they are most liable to be attacked. I am fully of opinion that nearly all their possessions would be removed by medicine, or by arguments of a more tangible nature. Not long ago a young female was said to be under the influence of an evil spirit, but the father, being an unbeliever, took a large broom and began to beat his daughter in the most unmerciful manner. After some time the spirit cried aloud, 'Do not beat me! do not beat me!' and took its departure. There is a fiend called Poothani, which is said to take great delight in entering little children; but the herb called pa-maruta is then administered with great success."

In Western Africa supposed demoniacal possessions are very common, and the appearances which these cases exhibit, somewhat resemble those described in the Sacred Scriptures. Frantic gestures, convulsions, foaming at the mouth, feats of supernatural strength, furious ravings, lacerations of the body, gnashing of the teeth, and other affections of a similar kind, characterize those who are believed to be under the influence of the Evil One. In some of these cases, Mr. Wilson says, that the symptoms exhibited were, as he discovered, the effects of the exhibition of powerful narcotics, and in others they appeared to him to be plainly the result of an excited state of the nerves. On the Pongo coast there are four or five classes of spirits which, it is believed, may enter into a man, and when any one is supposed to be possessed, he passes through the hands of the priests of these different orders, till some one declares it to be a case with which he is acquainted, and which he can cure. A temporary house is built, dancing commences, various ceremonies are performed, medicines are administered, and after a fortnight spent in this way, night and day, during which the performers are amply supplied with food and rum, the cure is pronounced complete. A house is then built near the residence of the cured demoniac, which is intended to accommodate the ejected devil, who is henceforth to become his tutelary god, to whom he must pay all due respect, and whose commands he must implicitly obey, if he would not incur the penalty of a return of the demoniacal possession.

DENMARK (CHURCH OF). The early history of the Danes, as well as of the other Scandinavian tribes, is involved in mystery and legendary darkness. It is not improbable that Denmark was originally peopled by a colony of Scythians, from the north of the Euxine sea, and who, bearing the name of Cimmerians, gave rise to the appellation Cimbri, which this people bore so long before they assumed the name of Danes. Little is known of this early colony, except that they formed a portion of the barbarians from the North who overran the Roman Empire rather more than a century before the birth of Christ. Their own historical monuments, however, go no farther back than the arrival of Odin, which is usually dated B. C. 70. Saxo Grammaticus, who wrote about the middle of the twelfth century, supposes that the Danish monarchy was founded by a person of the name of Dan, from whom the country was called Denmark; that he lived in the year of the world 2910, and that the country has ever since been governed by his posterity. Sweno, a contemporary of Saxo, who also wrote a history of Denmark, traces the foundation of the monarchy to Skjöld, the son of Odin, thus following the statements of the Icelandic chronicles.

The existence of a powerful sovereign in the north of Europe, called Odin, is not merely borne out by the traditions prevalent throughout the Scandinavian territories, but by the ancient poems and chronicles, as well as by the institutions and customs of these northern nations. From the various records which profess to detail the history of this remarkable personage, we learn that he commanded the Æsir, a people inhabiting the country situated between the Euxine and the Caspian seas. The principal city was named Asgard. Having collected a numerous army, Odin marched towards the north and west of Europe, subduing all the nations through which he passed, and giving them to one or other of his sons for subjects. From these princes various noble families of the North claim their descent. Having distributed the new governments among his sons, he proceeded towards Scandinavia, where Denmark having submitted to his arms, he appointed his son Skjöld king over that country, the first who is alleged to have borne that title.

It is not easy to determine what was the precise nature of the religion anciently professed in the north of Europe. As far as it can be ascertained from Latin and Greek authors who have written on the subject, it consisted of various elementary principles, which are thus sketched by Mallet in his 'Northern Antiquities': "It taught the being of a 'supreme God, master of the universe, to whom all things were submissive and obedient.' Such, according to Tacitus, was the supreme God of the Germans. The ancient Icelandic mythology calls him 'the author of every thing that existeth; the eternal, the ancient, the living and awful Being, the searcher into concealed things, the Being that never changeth. This religion attributed to the Supreme Deity 'an infinite power, a boundless knowledge, an incorruptible justice,' and forbade its followers to represent him under any corporeal form. They were not even to think of confining him within the enclosure of walls, but were taught that it was only within woods and consecrated forests that they could serve him properly. There he seemed to reign in silence, and to make himself felt by the respect which he inspired. It was an injurious extravagance to attribute to this deity a human figure, to erect statues to him, to suppose him of any sex, or to represent him by images. From this supreme God were sprung (as it were emanations of his divinity) an infinite number of subaltern deities and genii, of which every part of the visible world was the seat and temple. These intelligences did not barely reside in each part of nature; they directed its operations, it was the organ or instrument of their love or liberality to mankind. Each element was under the guidance of some being peculiar to it. The earth, the water, the fire, the air, the sun, moon, and stars had each their respective divinity. The trees, forests, rivers, mountains, rocks, winds, thunder and tempests had the same; and merited on that score a religious worship, which, at first, could not be directed to the visible object, but to the intelligence with which it was animated. The motive of this worship was the fear of a deity irritated by the sins of men, but who, at the same time, was merciful, and capable of being appeased by prayer and repentance. They looked up to him as to the active principle, which, by uniting with the earth or passive principle, had produced men, animals, plants, and all visible beings; they even believed that he was the only agent in nature, who preserves the several beings, and disposes of all events. To serve this divinity with sacrifices and prayers, to do no wrong to others, and to be brave and intrepid in themselves, were all the moral consequences they derived from these doctrines. Lastly, the belief of a future state cemented and completed the whole building. Cruel tortures were there reserved for such as despised these three fundamental precepts of morality, and joys without number and without end awaited every religious, just, and valiant man."

This primitive religion of the Northern nations lost much of its original purity, and underwent remarkable changes in the course of the seven or eight centuries which intervened between the time of Odin and the conversion of Denmark to the Christian faith. The most striking alteration which took place during that period was in the number of the gods who were to be worshipped. The Supreme Being, instead of presiding over and regulating universal nature, came to be restricted to one province, and passed among the great mass of the people for the God of War. The Danes seem to have paid the highest honours to Odin. The prose Edda reckons up twelve gods, and as many goddesses, to whom divine honours were due, and who, though they had not a certain power, were nevertheless obliged to obey Odin, the most ancient of the gods, and the great principle of all things. Traces of the worship of these Scandinavian gods are to be found at this day in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. In the middle of a plain, or upon some little hill, are to be seen altars around which the people were wont to assemble for sacrifice. These altars generally consist of three long pieces of rock set upright, which serve for a basis to a great flat stone forming the table of the altar. There is commonly found a large cavity underneath the altar, which might be intended to receive the blood of the victims, and stones for striking fire are almost invariably found scattered around it. At length, as the Scandinavians formed connections with other countries of Europe, temples began to be built, and idols introduced. The particular details of the ancient worship of these northern countries will be found in another article. (See SCANDINAVIANS, RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT.)

The first efforts to Christianize Denmark were made by Anglo-Saxon missionaries in the seventh century. An English presbyter named Willibrord, who in A. D. 696 was consecrated archbishop of the Frisias, passed into Jutland. His mission to that region failed, but he purchased thirty children of the natives, whom he instructed in the knowledge of Christianity, and when he landed on Heligoland, the island dedicated to the old German idol Fosite, he wished to establish his abode there in order to baptize them. But to disturb anything dedicated on the holy island to the Deity was regarded as a heavy offence. When Willibrord, therefore, ventured to baptize the children in the sacred fountain, and his companions slew some of the consecrated animals, the rage of the people was so violently excited, that they made the intruders cast lots which of them should be slain as an offering to the idols. The individual on whom the lot fell was sacrificed accordingly, and the rest of the party were dismissed into the Frankish territory.

It was only, however, in the ninth century, that Christianity can be said to have found a footing in Denmark. The circumstances which in the course of Providence led to this important event, are thus stated by Neander: "In Denmark certain feuds had arisen, touching the right of succession to the crown; and, on this occasion, the interference of Lewis the Pious, Emperor of Germany, was solicited by one of the princes, Harald Krag, who ruled in Jutland. In answer to this application, he sent, in 822, an ambassador to Denmark; and, with the negotiations which ensued, was introduced a proposition for the establishment, or at least to prepare the way for the establishment, of a mission among the Danes. The primate of France, Ebbo, archbishop of Rheims, a man educated at the imperial court, and for a time the emperor's favourite minister, was selected by him for the management of this business. Ebbo, who at the court of his sovereign had often seen ambassadors from the pagan Danes, had for a long time before felt desirous of consecrating himself to the work of converting that people. Practised in the affairs of the world, and ardently devoted to the spread of Christianity, as well as confident of its triumphant progress, he was peculiarly qualified to unite the office of ambassador with that of a teacher among the heathen. Halitgar, bishop of Cambrai, author of the Liber Pœntientialis, was for a while associated with him; and the emperor made him the grant of a place called Welanao or Welna, probably the present Munsterdorf, near Itzehoe, as a secure retreat, as well as a means of support during his labours in the north. He succeeded in gaining over king Harald himself, and those immediately about his person, to Christianity; though political reasons may no doubt have contributed somewhat to this success. In the year 826, the king, with his wife and a numerous train of followers, made a visit to the emperor at Ingelheim, where the rite of baptism was with great solemnity administered to him and to several others. The emperor himself stood godfather to the king, and the empress Judith, godmother to the queen."

When king Harald proposed to return to his country, a monk of great zeal and piety, named Anschar or Ansgar, was selected to accompany him, with the view of endeavouring to convert the Danes from Paganism to Christianity. On reaching the scene of his missionary labours, Anschar commenced his work by purchasing native boys, whom, with others presented to him by the king, he took under his own care to educate and train as teachers for their countrymen. This missionary institution commenced with twelve pupils. The unsettled condition of the country prevented him from doing more. The king had alienated his people from him by embracing Christianity, and forming connections with the Franks, and in A. D. 828 he was driven from the country and compelled to seek refuge in a Frankish feof, which he had received as a present from the emperor. In consequence of the flight of Harald, Anschar was discouraged, and feeling that it was unsafe and inexpedient to continue his labours in Denmark, he availed himself of an invitation to pass over to Sweden, where some seeds of Christianity had already been scattered.

After the departure of Anschar, the Danish mission passed into the hands of a monk called Gislema, who, however, felt himself not a little crippled in his exertions by the determined opposition of Horick, king of Jutland, hitherto a violent enemy to Christianity. Anschar, in the course of a short time, having been compelled to quit his missionary sphere in Sweden, was elevated by the emperor of Germany to the rank of an archbishop, and taking advantage of his improved position, he entered into correspondence with Horick, and so won his confidence, that he was permitted to lay the foundation of a Christian church, and to establish Christian worship wherever he chose, as well as to instruct and baptize all who desired it. Having selected Schleswig a town situated on the borders of the two kingdoms, he planted a church there, which was instrumental in turning many from the worship of idols to the adoption of the Christian faith.

The prospects of the mission in Denmark were in a short time clouded by the death of Horick, who was killed in battle, and the succession of Horick II., who was unfavourable to the Christian cause. The doors of the Christian church at Schleswig were closed, Christian worship was forbidden, and the priest obliged to flee. The check, however, was only temporary. Anschar was invited to send back the priest, the church at Schleswig was re-opened, and what the Pagans would not suffer through fear of enchantment, it was provided with a bell. Liberty was also given to form a second church at Ripen in Jutland. Anschar was unwearied in his efforts to carry forward the good work, and even on his dying bed the salvation of the Danes and Swedes occupied his mind. In a letter written during his last illness, he recommended to the German bishops and to King Lewis to use all their exertions for the continuance of these missions.

Rimbert, the successor of Anschar, strove to follow in his steps. He made several journeys, not without great danger, to Denmark and Sweden. But the circumstances of the times were far from favourable to the progress of Christianity among the Scandinavian tribes, engaged as they were in predatory and piratical incursions into Germany, England, and France. Yet the Danes, by their settlements in England, were brought more nearly within the range of Christian influences. During the first half of the tenth century, a violent persecution of the Christians in Denmark took place under the authority of King Gurm, who had usurped the throne of that country. At length, however, the German emperor, Henry I., in A. D. 934, interposed, and compelled the Danish sovereign not only to sheathe the sword of persecution, but to surrender the province of Schleswig to the German empire. This province afforded for the first time a stable and secure seat for the Christian church. It was now occupied by a colony of Christians, thus affording a convenient point from which Christianity might bear upon Denmark. The archbishop Unni taking advantage of this happy change, again made a missionary tour to the North. The king Gurm was as bitterly opposed as ever to the Christian faith; but it was otherwise with his son Harald, who had been trained up in a knowledge of Christianity by his mother Thyra, a daughter of the first Christian prince Harald. The young prince had not been baptized, but he openly avowed his favour for the Christians, and through the whole period of his reign of fifty years, he encouraged as far as possible the spread of Christianity in his dominions. A war between this prince and the emperor Otho I. terminated in A. D. 972 by a treaty of peace, which tended in no small degree to bring about the first establishment of the Christian church in Denmark. Harald, with his wife Gunild, received baptism in the presence of the emperor, and the latter stood god-father at the baptism of the young Prince Sueno. It was in the reign of Harald that Adaldag, archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen, was enabled to conceive and carry out the plan of consecrating several bishops for Denmark.

A keen contest now ensued between the Pagan and Christian parties among the Danes, the former being aided and abetted by Sueno, the king's son. In A. D. 991, Harald perished in battle, and Sueno, on mounting the throne, banished the Christian priests, and re-established the old religion. It was under this monarch that the Danes conquered England, and on establishing himself in a Christian land, Sueno gave up his opposition to Christianity, and even professed anew to embrace it. His son, Canute the Great, was won over to Christianity by the influence of the Christian Church in England, and on succeeding to the government, he applied himself with great zeal to the work of giving a firm foundation to the Christian church in Denmark. To reclaim the Pagans, who were still very numerous, churches were built and Anglo-Saxon missionaries appointed.

In the eleventh century, the church in Denmark was treated with much favour by Sweyn II. This monarch erected and liberally endowed a number of places of worship, besides founding four new bishoprics, two in Scania, and two in Jutland. But though thus zealous in advancing the spiritual good of his subjects, his own private character was more than questionable. By his licentious conduct he exposed himself to ecclesiastical censures. The following incident, showing the stern authority which the church could exercise even over a royal delinquent, is related by Dr. Dunham, in his 'History of Scandinavia': "Sweyn was a man of strong passions, and of irritable temperament. In a festival which he gave to his chief nobles in the city of Roskild, some of the guests, heated by wine, indulged themselves in imprudent, though perhaps true, remarks on his conduct. The following morning, some officious tale-bearers acquainted him with the circumstance; and in the rage of the moment he ordered them to be put to death, though they were then at mass in the cathedral—that very cathedral which had been the scene of his own father's murder. When, on the day following this tragical event, he proceeded to the church, he was met by the bishop, who, elevating the crosier, commanded him to retire, and not to pollute by his presence the house of God—that house which he had already desecrated by blood. His attendants drew their swords, but he forbade them to exercise any degree of violence towards a man who, in the discharge of his duty, defied even kings. Retiring mournfully to his palace, he assumed the garb of penance, wept and prayed, and lamented his crime during three days. He then presented himself, in the same mean apparel, before the gates of the cathedral. The bishop was in the midst of the service; the Kyrie Eleison had been chaunted, and the Gloria about to commence, when he was informed that the royal penitent was outside the gates. Leaving the altar, he repaired to the spot, raised the suppliant monarch, and greeted him with the kiss of peace. Bringing him into the church, he heard his confession, removed the excommunication, and allowed him to join in the service. Soon afterwards, in the same cathedral, the king made a public confession of his crime, asked pardon alike of God and man, was allowed to resume his royal apparel, and solemnly absolved. But he had yet to make satisfaction to the kindred of the deceased in conformity with the law; and to mitigate the canonical penance, he presented one of his domains to the church. The name of this prelate (no unworthy rival of St. Ambrose) should be embalmed in history. He was an Anglo-Saxon ecclesiastic, William, whom the archbishop of Bremen had nominated to that dignity, and who had previously been the secretary of Canute the Great. During the long period that he had governed the diocese of Roskild, he had won the esteem of all men alike by his talents and his virtues. For the latter he had the reputation of a saint (and he deserved the distinction better than nineteenth of the semi-deities whose names disgrace the calendar), and for the former, that of a wizard. It is no disparagement to the honour of this apostolic churchman, that he had previously been the intimate friend of the monarch; nor any to that of Sweyn, that after this event he honoured this bishop more than he had done before."

From this time till his death Sweyn continued an obedient son of the Roman Catholic church. He spent large sums in supporting missions in Sweden, Norway, and the isles. In his reign the Pagans of Bernholm were converted to Christianity, destroying with contempt the idol Frigga, which they had so long been accustomed to worship. Towards the end of the eleventh century, the church in Denmark received considerable increase of power through the favour of Canute IV. surnamed the saint. He emptied ecclesiastics from all dependence on the secular authority; he raised bishops to a level with dukes and princes; he brought the clergy into his council, and endeavoured to give them a voice in the assembly of the states. A line of proceeding so unpopular with all parties, except churchmen themselves, could not fail to be followed with unhappy consequences. The people rose in revolt, and Canute fell a victim to the indignation of the mob. The unfortunate king was succeeded by his brother, Eric III., surnamed the Good, one of the best princes that ever occupied the Danish throne. To check the extravagant power of the archbishop of Bremen, whose jurisdiction extended over the whole North, this wary prince prevailed upon the Pope to erect an additional archbishopric at Lund. He made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and visited Rome in person, that he might secure the favour and support of the Pontiff. He made large donations to the church in his own dominions, and gave a settlement to the Cistercian order among his people, besides founding at Lucca a cloister for the accommodation of Danish palmers. In short, such was his devotion to the interests of mother church, that he is styled a saint by more than one writer of his times.

Denmark was now to a great extent a professedly Christian country, but the population on the coasts were much molested by the incursions of Pagan pirates. At length Valdemar I., surnamed the Great, resolved to destroy the strongholds of these lawless rovers, to cut their gods in pieces, and convert them to Christianity. With these intentions he led an armament against the isle of Rugen, which was inhabited by a race of fierce and cruel idolaters. The account of the expedition is interesting, as given by Dunham: "To their gigantic idol, Svantovit, they offered human sacrifices, and believed a Christian to be the most acceptable of all. The high-priest had unbounded power over them. He was the interpreter of the idol's will; he was the great augur; he prophesied; nobody but him could approach the deity. The treasures laid at the idol's feet from most parts of the Slavonic world were immense. Then there was a fine white horse, which the high-priest only could approach; and in it the spirit of the deity often resided. The animal was believed to undertake immense journeys every night, while sleep oppressed mortals. Three hundred chosen warriors formed a guard of honour to the idol; they too brought all which they took in war to the sanctuary. There was a prestige connected with the temple; it was regarded as the palladium not of the island merely, but of Slavonic freedom; and all approach to it was carefully guarded. Valdemar was not dismayed. He pushed with vigour the siege of Arcona; and was about to carry it by assault, when his two military churchmen, Absalom, bishop of Roskild, and Eskil, archbishop of Lund, advised him to spare the idolaters upon the following conditions: that they would deliver him their idol with all the treasure; that they would release, without ransom, all their Christian slaves; that all would embrace, and with constancy, the gospel of Christ; that the lands now belonging to their priests should be transferred to the support of Christian churches; that, whenever required, they would serve in the armies of the king; and that they would pay him an annual tribute. Hostages being given for the performance of these stipulations, the invaders entered the temple, and proceeded to destroy Svantovit, under the eyes of a multitude of Pagans, who expected every moment to see a dreadful miracle. The idol was so large, that they could not at once hurl it to the ground, lest it should fall on some one, and the Pagans be enabled to boast of its having revenged itself. They broke it in pieces; and the wood was cut up into logs for the fires of the camp. Great was the amazement of the spectators to witness this tameness on the part of so potent a god; and they could only account for it by inferring that Christ was still more powerful. The temple was next burnt; and so were three others, all with idols. The numerous garrisons of the island were made to capitulate; the victors returned to Denmark in triumph; and missionaries were sent to instruct the inhabitants in the doctrines and duties of Christianity. At the instance of Bishop Absalom, the island was annexed to the diocese of Roskild. This was a glorious and it was an enduring conquest; a fierce people were converted into harmonised subjects, and piracy lost its great support."

But while Valdemar was thus zealous in attacking the idolaters on the coast of the Baltic, he yielded so much to the influence of the clergy of his own kingdom, that he was persuaded to collect the tithes even by the sword. The impost was unpopular, more especially among the Scanians, who were also unfriendly to bishops, and still more to clerical celibacy. Neither mild nor severe measures were effectual in inducing them to pay the obnoxious tax, and at length Valdemar, dreading greater evils, suspended the collection until the people should be more accessible to reason. In the thirteenth century, so unbounded had the power of the Danish clergy become, that Christopher I., in consequence of a supposed encroachment on the privileges of the church, was excommunicated, and his kingdom put under an interdict. This bold step roused the resentment of the king and his nobles, and in revenge a royal decree was issued revoking the concessions of privileges, immunities, and even domains made by his ancestors to the cathedral of Lund. A contest thus commenced between the king and the church, which must have led to the most disastrous results to the kingdom at large, had it not been abruptly terminated by the sudden death of the monarch; but the interdict continued for a number of years, until, by a general council held at Lyons A. D. 1274, it was removed, and the following year, the king, Eric VII. was reconciled to the church, though even after that time he frequently seized the church tithes, and applied to his own use the produce arising from the monastic domains. Nor was his son and successor, Eric VIII., less involved in quarrels with the church. Again was the kingdom placed under interdict on account of indignities offered to the archbishop of Lund; the king was condemned by the Pope and a commission of cardinals to pay a large fine, and in default of payment, not only was the kingdom to remain under interdict, but the royal offender was to be excommunicated along with his brother Christopher, who had been the main instrument in arresting the archbishop. Matters, however, were compromised, the fine was reduced to a comparatively small sum, and the quarrel came to an end. From this time onward till the Reformation in the sixteenth century, the church continued to maintain its authority and power unresisted by the people and unopposed by the state.

From the contiguity of Denmark to the Protestant states of Germany the new opinions found their way into that country almost immediately after their promulgation by Luther. Christian, the heir of the thrones of Denmark and Norway, so far favoured the Protestant cause, that he sent for missionaries to preach it openly; but in a short time he withdrew his countenance from the movement, and even disavowed what he had previously sanctioned. Frederic I., the then reigning sovereign, not only tolerated the new doctrines, but secretly encouraged their diffusion. At the diet of Odensay in 1527, he went much farther, and exhorted the bishops to enforce, in their respective dioceses, the preaching of the pure word of God, divested of the corruptions which had been associated with it. The leaning to the Lutheran doctrines, which the king evidently showed, had its effect notwithstanding the opposition of the bishops. The assembled states decreed that there should be perfect liberty of conscience; that priests, monks, and nuns might lawfully marry; that the pallium should no longer be solicited from the Pope; that bishops should be elected by the chapters, and confirmed by the crown without Papal bulls. These were decided steps towards the introduction of the reformed principles into Denmark. The improvement went forward. Many of the religious establishments were forsaken by their inmates, and their revenues were seized by the crown, some of the domains being given up to the secular nobles. No bishop was now elected without the recommendation of the crown. Lutheran missionaries began everywhere to make their appearance, exciting a great sensation among the people by their zeal and the novelty of their manner. In the cities where intelligence more abounded, the new doctrines rapidly spread, and even in the rural districts not a few were found holding keenly Protestant views. The ancient church at this time received a blow from which it could not afterwards recover. The Romish clergy had now lost their hold of the people, and their system was plainly destined to fall. One of the last acts of Frederic I., who had been mainly instrumental in bringing about this important change, was to receive the Confession of Augsburg, which he imposed on his Protestant subjects, leaving those who still adhered to Romanism to follow their own conscientious convictions.

An interregnum followed the death of Frederic, and, taking advantage of the unsettled state of the country, the Romish clergy made great efforts to recover the privileges which they had lost during the late reign. Nor were they altogether unsuccessful. At a meeting of the states-general, held in A. D. 1533, a decree was passed that bishops alone should have the power of conferring holy orders; that the tithes should be duly paid, and whoever should not pay should have no protection from the civil power; that bequests to the church might be lawfully made and peacefully enjoyed; that the church should be supported in her actual rights and possessions. These concessions, however, were all of them withdrawn by Christian III. on his accession to the throne. His first step was to exclude the bishops from the senate, and to interdict them from all authority in temporal concerns. Having accomplished this object, he called a private meeting of his senators, at which a resolution was passed, to confiscate the revenues of the bishops for the use of the state, to destroy their jurisdiction in the church, as well as in the state, and not to restore them it even a general council should decree their restoration, unless the king, the senate, and the states of the realm should revoke the present resolution. It was also agreed to adhere in future to the Protestant religion, and to defend and advance its interests. An act, embodying these resolutions, was signed by each member, who promised to keep them secret. Having thus secured the support of his senators, Christian proceeded to take some bold steps for the accomplishment of his design. All the bishops of the kingdom were seized and put in close custody. To justify this extraordinary step in the eyes of the nation and of Europe, Christian assembled the states at Copenhagen, when, after a violent denunciation of the Romish clergy by the king, their domination was formally declared at an end, and the Roman Catholic worship abolished. The church revenues were adjudged to state purposes, to the support of the Protestant ministers, to the maintenance of the poor, to the foundation of hospitals, and to the sustentation of the university and the schools.

Thus was the Protestant Church established in Denmark on the firm and solid footing on which it has rested down to the present day. It was not, however, till the reign of Christian V. that the constitution of the Danish Lutheran Church was fully settled, when, in 1683, the code of Danish laws, civil and ecclesiastical, which are still in force, was drawn up, confirmed, and sanctioned by the king. In this code, the religion of the Danish dominions is restricted to the faith of the Lutheran Church. The Danish ritual was first prepared, sanctioned, and published in 1685, and a Latin translation of it was published in 1706.

In Denmark, as well as in Sweden and Norway, no person is permitted to fill any office, civil or military, unless he belongs to the Lutheran church. Hence the great importance attached in these, and indeed in all Lutheran countries, to the rite of confirmation by the bishop or dean. "It is not only considered," says Mr. Samuel Laing, "as a religious, but also as a civil act, and one of the greatest importance to the individual in every station, from the highest to the lowest. It is the proof of having attained majority in years, and competency for offices, duties, and legal acts. The certificate of confirmation is required in all engagements, as regularly as a certificate of character from the last employer." The manner in which an individual is trained before the administration of this important ceremony is thus detailed by the same shrewd and intelligent writer: "There is a long previous educational preparation, often of six or even twelve months, in which each individual is instructed by the parish minister. He is answerable, and his professional character is at stake, that each individual whom he presents for examination to the bishop or dean can read, understands the Scriptures, the catechism, the prayer-book, according to the means and opportunities of the parents to give, and the capacity of the young person to receive, education. The examination by the bishop, or dean, is strict; and to be turned back from ignorance would be a serious loss of character, affecting the material interests both of the clergyman who had brought forward the young person unprepared, and of the parents of the young person, whose state of minority is prolonged, and who, unless he is confirmed, can find no employer. In those purely Lutheran countries there is very little dissent from the established Church, in consequence, perhaps, of the educational preparation given to each individual for this rite, and of the importance attached to it; and the few dissenters, Mennonites or Herrenhutlers, or Moravians, live together, in general, in distinct colonies, or towns, and are not scattered through the population. The individual not passing through the education preparatory to confirmation would stand alone in his neighbourhood, without employment or countenance from any other body of his own persuasion. One evil attends this strict examination preparatory to receiving confirmation. It unquestionably promotes, or rather enforces indirectly, the education of the youth by the interests of the parents, the youth himself, and the minister, and by the immediate advantage it presents of enabling the young person to enter into his future trade or profession as a man who has attained majority; but it is too liable to be considered as taking a final degree in religion and religious knowledge. Taking a degree in medical, legal, or theological science is very often the ultimate effort of the students, that at which they stand still all their lives. This is observable in the state of religion, in Lutheran countries. The mind may be saturated too early with the knowledge required for attaining a certain end, and the end being attained, the knowledge is thrown aside, or perhaps only remembered and referred to with disgust."

Confirmation in the case of the young, and confession in all cases, must in the Church of Denmark precede admission to the Lord's Supper, and the latter ordinance must have been received by both parties before marriage. In dispensing baptism, exorcism is practised, and the trine aspersion with the sign of the cross on the head and breast, accompanied with the imposition of hands. Lay baptism, even though performed by females, is in some cases considered as valid. Five sponsors or witnesses, of both sexes, are usually present at the administration of baptism, but they bear no responsibility in regard to the child during the life of the parents. The Lord's Supper is celebrated in towns weekly, but in rural parishes monthly, or even more rarely. On these occasions wafers are used instead of bread, one of them being put into the mouth of each communicant by the officiating clergyman. In placing the wafer in the mouth, the minister says, Hoc est verum Jesu corpus, This is the true body of Jesus; and in giving the cup, he adds, Hic est verus Jesu sanguis, This is the true blood of Jesus. Sometimes the organ plays during the whole administration of the ordinance. Lighted wax candles are usually, in Denmark at least, though not in Sweden, nor in many of the Lutheran churches of Germany, placed upon the altar during the dispensation of the eucharist. Even in administering the ordinance to the sick, one or two lighted candles are enjoined by the ritual to be used. In receiving the sacrament the communicants kneel, the males on the right side of the altar, and the females on the left. In this point also the Lutheran church of Denmark differs from the Lutheran church in Germany, where in general the communicants do not kneel, but approach the altar singly, and after receiving the bread and wine retire. In the Danish church the minister neither kneels during any part of the service, nor does he partake of the elements himself, but is required by the ritual to communicate outside the altar rails, as the congregation do, using the ministry of another.

The three great festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, are celebrated each of them for two successive days, three services being prescribed for each day, and the communion being appointed to be observed on the first morning of each festival, at the first of the three services. Lent is the only fast observed in this church. Various other festivals are celebrated in the course of the year, besides the three already mentioned.

The funeral ceremony in Denmark is simple, but exceedingly impressive, consisting merely in the repetition by the clergyman of these three sentences in Danish, "From the earth thou didst spring;" "To the earth thou shalt return;" "From the earth thou shalt rise again;" and at the repetition of each of these sentences, the minister throws a quantity of earth on the body when it is let down into the grave. Occasionally a funeral oration is delivered.

In Denmark, as indeed in all the Scandinavian countries, there is a peculiarity in reference to marriage, which recalls the Oriental customs—that the parties before being united by the marriage tie, have generally for some time been betrothed to each other. No small importance is attached to the latter ceremony, as we learn from the description of Mr. Laing in his 'Denmark and the Duchies:' "The betrothal is a solemn act much more imposing and binding than our simple engagement to marry. The betrothal is regularly a ceremonial in which rings are exchanged, and mutual acceptance before witnesses of the family friends of both parties, takes place, although the actual marriage is postponed for one, and even for several years. I have heard of parties having been betrothed above twenty years before they could afford to marry. In real life, there is both evil and good in this custom. Boys and girls engage themselves, exchange rings and love tokens, and conceive themselves bound together for life before they know their own minds, or circumstances, and, at a maturer age, inclination, as well as prudence, may forbid the banns. But they are betrothed; and although it may have been privately, and clandestinely, the betrothal is, in their own minds, as sacred as marriage. The betrothal is in Denmark, from the custom of the country, a kind of public solemn act, has a kind of sanctity attached to it, more than the simple private engagement, understanding, or promise, between the parties. People may be engaged to be betrothed, although the betrothal itself is only an engagement to be married. It always precedes the marriage by a few weeks, or months, even where there is no reason to delay the ceremony, and the betrothed lady has her status in society, different from that of the bride whose marriage day is fixed, or from that of the woman already married, but it is conventionally acknowledged. Parties may and do recede from it by mutual agreement, from prudential or other causes, without the censure, and éclat, of a dissolution of a marriage. They renounce their mutual obligations, return their rings, and quietly cease those exclusive attentions which showed they were betrothed. It is to the effect of betrothal, that the actual dissolution of the marriage tie is so much less frequent than we might expect from the facility with which, in most Lutheran countries, a divorce may be obtained. Incompatibility of temper, confirmed disease, insanity, conviction of crime, extravagance, habits of drunkenness, of gaming, of neglect, and even a mutual agreement to be divorced persevered in after an interval of two years from the formal notice by the parties to the Consistory of the district, are grounds upon which divorce will be pronounced in the ecclesiastical court of the district, and the parties released altogether from the marriage tie, and set free to marry again. The opportunity, which the betrothal affords, of parties knowing each other, and of getting rid of each other before marriage, if any such causes as would have led to dissolution of the marriage are discovered in either party, render divorces more rare, and the great facility of divorce less noxious in society than we might suppose."

The oldest churches in Denmark are built in the form of a cross. In some of the churches crucifixes are placed upon the altar, and paintings may be seen upon the walls, but not painted glass. The ceilings or roofs are occasionally ornamented with gilded stars, and the ceiling of the chancel with representations of the sun and moon. The attendance on Divine worship is by no means so general among the Danes as among the Norwegians. The service is usually commenced, as well as closed, by a short prayer offered up by the catechist, standing on the steps leading up to the chancel with his face towards the congregation. A great part of the service consists of praise or rather chanting, for the passages selected from the Prayer-Book to be sung are not in metre but in prose. Though the churches are almost all of them provided with excellent organs, the people join in praise with scarcely a single exception. That the congregation may be fully aware what passages are to be sung, they are marked on boards which are hung up in different parts of the church. The collect and the epistle are read at the altar, or chanted at the pleasure of the officiating minister, and while so engaged he wears a surplice above his gown, and before commencing to read, he puts on, in the presence of the congregation, a humerale, that is, a cloak of crimson velvet hanging down before and behind, rounded at the bottom, and shorter than the surplice, edged all round with gold lace, with a large cross, also of gold lace, on the back. In the pulpit a black gown of a peculiar make is worn with a ruff round the neck and without a band. Before commencing the sermon an extempore prayer is offered. During almost the whole service the people sit, being only required by the rubric to stand when the Epistle and Gospel are read, and when the blessing, which is always AARON'S BLESSING (which see), is pronounced. While the sermon is being delivered, it is customary to carry the collecting boxes round the congregation that they may have an opportunity of contributing for the poor. This practice is enjoined by the ritual.

The government of the Church of Denmark is episcopal, there being in the whole country, including Iceland and its dependencies, nine bishops and one superintendent-general, who are all appointed by the king. The metropolitan is the bishop of Zealand, who resides in Copenhagen. By him all the other bishops are consecrated, while he himself is consecrated by the bishop of Fyhn, as the bishop whose residence is nearest to Copenhagen. The metropolitan anoints the king on his accession to the throne. He wears the insignia of the highest order of knighthood, and is consulted in all matters ecclesiastical. The clergy are to some extent civil as well as ecclesiastical officers, being employed by the government in collecting certain taxes within their respective parishes. Their salaries are very limited, and even the bishops and dignitaries of the church are far from being overpaid. Only one-third of the tithes has since the Reformation been appropriated to ecclesiastical purposes, the other two-thirds having become the property of the king and the nobles. The church patronage is mostly in the hands of the sovereign, who nominates the bishops, and while the feudal proprietors have the privilege of nominating three candidates for church livings on their own estates, it belongs to the king to choose one of the three who receives the appointment. No minister can be ordained until he has reached the age of 'twenty-five, though he is permitted to preach as soon as he has passed the regular theological examination, and may wear a peculiar short gown, but cannot appear in full canonical dress until he has been ordained. The bishops are bound to send an annual report to the king of the state of the churches and schools of their dioceses, and the condition of affairs spiritual and ecclesiastical among the people. The Synod of Zealand meets twice a year; but the other diocesan synods meet only once, namely, during the eight days which follow St. John the Baptist's day. On these occasions the bishop and chief civil functionary of the district preside, and the ecclesiastical affairs of the diocese are carefully considered, and any new royal rescripts which may have been issued are read.

In the Danish German provinces the church government approaches more to that of the German Lutherans. They have no bishops, but one superintendent-general, who alone has the right to ordain, and twenty-one provosts.

DEODAND (Lat. Deo, to God, dandus, to be given), a thing given or forfeited to God in consequence of its having caused the death of a human being. Thus, if a man, when driving a cart, accidentally falls, and one of the cart-wheels crushes him to death, the cart becomes a deodand, or given to God, that is, it becomes the property of the sovereign to be distributed to the poor by the royal almoner, by way of expiation or atonement for the death which it has caused. The origin of this custom is probably to be found in Exod. xxi. 28, "If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox shall be surely stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit."

DEPOSITION, a term used in Presbyterian churches to indicate the sentence of a church court, whereby a minister is denuded of the office of the holy ministry, and solemnly prohibited from exercising any of its functions. The act of deposing is always preceded by prayer. The church of the deposed minister is declared vacant from the day and date of the sentence of deposition, and the usual steps upon occasion of a vacancy are taken. In the Church of Scotland the sentence of deposition cannot be pronounced by a presbytery in absence of the minister to be deposed, unless by authority of the General Assembly. A minister deposed for immorality cannot be restored to his former charge under any circumstances whatsoever, without the special authority of the General Assembly appointing it.

DENOMINATIONS (THE THREE), an appellation given to an association of Dissenting ministers in and about London, belonging to the Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Baptist denominations, and bearing the formal title of 'The General Body of Protestant Dissenting ministers of London and Westminster.' The Three Denominations sprung from the original Nonconformists to the prelatical government of the Church of England, as established by Queen Elizabeth and the Stuart dynasty. It was in their behalf that the Toleration Act was originally passed, and the association thus formed among the principal bodies of English Dissenters in and near London, enjoys the privilege, along with the Established clergy of London and the two Universities, of approaching the sovereign on the throne. The ministers of the several dissenting denominations in London addressed the throne in the reign of William and Mary as separate bodies. We learn from Dr. Calamy, that in 1702 "they made an address to her Majesty (Queen Anne), in a large body made up of the three denominations of Presbyterians, Independents, and Antipædobaptists; and this being the first time of their joining together in an address at court, it was much taken notice of, and several were surprised and commended their prudence." From the passing of the Toleration Act in 1688, the Presbyterians and Independents had been gradually approaching nearer to each other, laying aside somewhat of their natural prejudices, and from their common hostility to Prelacy, becoming every day more prepared to coalesce. In 1691, accordingly, these two denominations of Dissenters agreed to merge their mutual differences, and "to reduce," as they themselves expressed it, "all distinguishing names to that of United Brethren." This union led to the drawing up of a declaration of faith in the same year, entitled "Heads of Agreement assented to by the United Ministers in and about London, formerly called Presbyterians and Congregational." When this document was printed, it had been subscribed by above eighty ministers. Similar associations were formed in all parts of the country, and throughout both denominations the union was very generally recognized. Two years thereafter a theological controversy having arisen on the subject of the mode and terms of justification, in consequence of the republication of the Works of Dr. Tobias Crisp (see CRISPITES), the United Ministers of London published a tract entitled, 'The Agreement in Doctrine among the Dissenting Ministers in London, subscribed Dec. 16, 1692.' The propositions contained in this tract were arranged under nine distinct heads, directed chiefly against the Arminian, Antinomian, Socinian, and Popish errors. Similar declarations were given forth by the United Ministers in the course of the Antinomian controversy, which raged in England between 1691 and 1699. And Dr. Calamy informs us, in his 'Brief but true Account of the Protestant Dissenters in England,' published in 1717, that "they generally agree in the doctrinal articles of the Church of England, which they subscribe, the Confession of Faith, and Larger and Smaller Catechisms compiled by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and the judgment of the British Divines at the Synod of Dort, about the Quinquarticular controversy." The united body termed "The Three Denominations," was organized in 1727, and so harmonious was the association, that for some time they were able to join together in acts of Christian worship. At length, Socinianism having been embraced and openly taught by some of the Presbyterian and of the General Baptist ministers, it was found necessary to limit the proceedings of the united body to general points, connected with the political rights and privileges of Dissenters. The Unitarian ministers, however, have seceded from the general body of the Three Denominations, so that their proceedings are now conducted with greater harmony of deliberation and unity of purpose. See DEPUTIES (DISSENTING).

DEPRIVATION, a term used in England to denote an ecclesiastical censure, whereby a minister for some competent reason is deprived of his living. The sentence of deprivation, according to the canons of the Church of England, must be pronounced by the bishop only, with the assistance of his chancellor and dean, and some of the prebendaries, if the court be kept near the cathedral church, or of the archdeacon if he may be had conveniently, and two other at least grave ministers and preachers to be called by the bishop when the court is kept in other places.

DEPUTATI. See CEROFERARI.

DEPUTIES (DISSENTING), a committee of gentlemen chosen annually by the congregations belonging to the Three DENOMINATIONS (which see) of London and its vicinity, for the purpose of watching over and defending the rights and privileges of Protestant Dissenters in England. A few years after the union of the three bodies had been effected in 1727, the system of deputies was adopted. Each congregation belonging to the Three Denominations of Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, in and within twelve miles of London, appoints two deputies annually to represent them at the General Committee. The election has taken place regularly since 1737, and the Committee thus formed watch over any bills which may be introduced into Parliament affecting the interests of Dissenters, as well as the cause of religious liberty generally.

DERCETO. See ATERGATIS, DAGON.

DERRHIATIS, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), derived from Derrhion, a town on the road from Sparta to Arcadia.

DERVISHES, Mohammedan monks who belong to the Schiite or Persian sect of Moslems, and who lay claim to special revelations from heaven, and to immediate supernatural intercourse with the Deity. The name is said to be derived from the Persian word der, "the threshold of the house," and metaphorically "humility." In Persia they obtained also the name of Sofis from Sof, which signifies a coarse woollen dress worn by devotees. The orders of these Dervishes are numerous. D'Olsson enumerates no fewer than thirty-two, while Von Hamme estimates them at thirty-six. It is remarkable what a powerful influence they exercise upon the social condition of the whole Turkish empire. They are said to have existed in Persia long before the promulgation of Islamism, and indeed their system of doctrine may be traced back to the remotest periods in the history of all the regions of Central Asia. Mohammed, endeavouring to accommodate his system of religious belief to the peculiarities of the Oriental character, rendered Islamism so sensual and materialistic in its representations of God, that it suited the Pantheistic Sofis or Dervishes, who believed every man to be an incarnation of Deity. This class of religious fanatics soon came to combine with their belief of the Koran much of the contemplative mysticism of the Hindu Fakirs. Some of them, as for example, the Nachshbendies, without quitting the world for a monastic seclusion, bind themselves to the strict observance of certain forms of devotion. Other orders of Dervishes are still more rigid. Most of them impose a noviciate, the length of which is made to correspond with the progress which the candidate has already made. He is taught to repeat the list of the Divine attributes, seven of them only being communicated at a time. He is bound to tell all his dreams to his superior, who pretends thereby to be able to discover the advancement which the candidate is making in Divine knowledge. Some of the orders approach nearer to, and others are farther removed from, the doctrines of the Koran. Twelve of the orders are alleged by Von Hammer to have existed before the foundation of the Ottoman Empire, while the rest were formed between the fourteenth and eighteenth centuries. In Persia, however, the Dervishes have always been most flourishing, and they have even ranked among their number some of the most celebrated Persian poets. Such was the popularity indeed of the Dervishes at one time in Persia, that one of them actually reached the throne, and founded the dynasty of the Sophis. In Turkey again, when the Janissaries were first organised in 1328, the Sultan prevailed upon a noted Dervish, named Bactasch, and the founder of the BACTASCHITES (which see), to bless them formally in order to inspire them with religious zeal. This the Dervish did by holding the sleeve of his robe over the head of each of the officers. In commemoration of this ceremony, the Janissaries ever after wore a piece of cloth hanging down from behind the turban.

The Dervisher make no open opposition to the Koran, but they pretend to be delivered by special Divine inspiration from the necessity of submitting to any law human or divine. This doctrine they never openly avow even to candidates seeking admission into their society. They craftily teach the initiated that the Koran contains only an allegory of precepts and maxims purely political; and that as soon as habits of mental devotion have been acquired, the worship of God becomes a purely spiritual act, which entirely supersedes all outward forms and ceremonies, and all human interpretation of the written word. In this way outward authority and law are made to yield to inward impulses. They insist also upon implicit submission to the sheikh of their order. "Whatever you do, whatever you think, let your sheikh be ever present to your mind," is the mental ejaculation of every Dervish.

This class of superstitious devotees has succeeded in acquiring a strong hold over the minds and hearts of the lower class of Moslems. This influence they strive by all means to maintain and increase. They persuade the people that the descent of the Dervishes is to be traced to Ali, and even to Abubekr, the first of the four immediate successors of Mohammed. They profess to work miracles, and have recourse to all kinds of juggleries and impositions, with the view of exalting themselves in popular estimation. Though some of them are far from being correct in their moral conduct, yet the ignorant and superstitious among the people actually believe that the souls of these pretended saints are already purified and united with God, and therefore are in no way contaminated by the deeds of the body. The Sultans and Ulemas have more than once had occasion to dread the dangerous power of the Dervishes over the common people, which has actually led on some occasions to open rebellion against the rulers of the country. The Ulemas, who belong to the Sonnié sect of the Mohammedans, have always been at enmity with the Dervishes, and striving in every way to lessen their power, but hitherto with little success. One order, the Bactaschites, was aroused to fury in consequence of the destruction of the Janissaries by order of Sultan Mahmoud, and were the chief instruments in raising revolts in various quarters; but the Sultan, with the advice of the Grand Mufti and chief Ulemas, had the three chiefs of the order publicly executed, banishing most of its members.

Most of the orders of Dervishes have convents. Only one order, that of the Bactaschites, can properly be called mendicant; many of these profess to live on alms alone, after the example of their founder. They are not very importunate beggars, rarely addressing private individuals, but for the most part they are found in crowded streets, crying, "Relief for the love of God." Others of this order become hermits, and profess to support themselves by manual labour. Though Dervishes are quite at liberty to quit their order and return to the world, should they feel so disposed, very few cases of the kind have been ever known to occur. They generally live and die in connection with the order they have joined. "Were the Dervishes of Turkey," says Dr. Taylor, "to lay aside their distinctive dress, they would still be recognized by their modest gait and submissive countenance." Wherever a Dervish appears he is warmly welcomed. Many wealthy persons keep a Dervish in their house, like the confessor in rich Roman Catholic families; believing that his presence will bring down upon them the blessing of heaven. The Dervish is consulted on all occasions as one believed to be possessed of supernatural wisdom.

The mode in which the Dervishes in Turkey conduct religious services will be best described by quoting the statement of an eye-witness of one of their festivals: "The ceremony commenced by a procession, consisting of the Sheikh, Imáms, Dervishes, and people, along the street, many of them carrying long poles, having several lamps attached at the upper end, or else wooden lanterns. After they had entered the mosque, the Dervishes, about fifteen in number, sat down cross-legged on matting, in an elliptic circle, and the people stood or sat closely round them. At one end of the mosque were the Sheikh, Imám, and moon-'shids (or singers of poetry), and near the circle sat a player on a kind of small flute.

"The service commenced by the recital of a prayer called 'El-Fa'thhah,' in a slow, solemn chant, in which the whole assembly joined. After a few minutes' silence the Dervishes began their special exercises, termed the Ziker, by chanting, in a slow measure and very low tone, the words, 'La' ila'ha, il'la-llah' (there is no deity but God), bowing the head and body twice in each repetition of the words; after continuing this for about a quarter of an hour, they repeated the same words to the same air for about an equal space of time, but in a quicker measure and with corresponding quickened motions; during this the moon-'shids and Imám sometimes sung to a variation of the same air portions of an ode in praise generally of the Prophet;—the effect of the soft melody of this ode, contrasted with the hoarser voices of the Dervishes, was at times pleasing.

"The Dervishes then repeated the same words to a different air, beginning, as before, in a slow whisper, raised gradually to louder tones, with very rapid motions of the head and body. They next rose on their feet in a circle, repeating the same words in very hoarse tones, laying the emphasis chiefly upon the word 'La' and the first syllable of 'Allah,' which were uttered with great vehemence; each turned his head alternately to the right and to the left, bending also the body at the repetition of these syllables. The rapidity of their motions and ejaculations was gradually increased until they became apparently frantic with excitement, several of them jumping and throwing about their bodies in all directions; others, overcome with their intense exertions, were panting and gasping for breath, uttering the most unearthly and horrible sounds, and sinking down from exhaustion, bathed in perspiration. The quickness of their motions and vehemence of their ejaculations seemed to be regulated in some measure by the chant of the moon-'shids and Imám, who lowered their voices when the Dervishes began to appear exhausted, and urged them on again by raising their notes after they were somewhat rested.

"During these performances, one of the spectators who had joined the circle became highly excited, throwing about his arms and body, looking very wildly upwards, and ejaculating the words, 'Al'lah! Al'lah! la' la' la' lah!' with extreme vehemence. In a short time his voice became extinct, his strength exhausted, and he sank down on the floor violently convulsed and foaming at the mouth; it was a fit of epilepsy, and he was considered by the assembly to be possessed, or melboo's, like the demoniacs mentioned in the New Testament. Such occurrences are very frequent during these services.

"When these performances had lasted about two hours, they were completely suspended for some time, the actors taking coffee, and smoking; and the suddenness with which they subsided from the highest pitch of excitement into their ordinary dignified gravity of manner was very remarkable. After a short rest they resumed the Zikr, and continued the same frantic performances till day-break. They are enabled by habit to persevere in these exercises a surprising length of time without intermission. We were kept sitting up nearly all night, for it was impossible to sleep in the hearing of their wild groanings and howlings."

There is an extraordinary order of Dervishes called MEVLEVI (which see), or dancing Dervishes, whose religious ceremonies are of a truly singular kind, consisting of a series of rotatory motions, which are said to symbolize the eternal existence of the Divine Being. The members of this order belong chiefly to the higher class of Turks. Another class of Dervishes, called Rufahies, practise ceremonies of the most surprising kind, in the course of which they lick red-hot swords, cut and wound themselves with knives, and lacerate their bodies until they sink exhausted. There is a degraded class of Dervishes, called Kalenders, or wandering Dervishes, who are recognized only by the lowest ranks of society, and disowned by the members of the regular confraternities.

DESIGNATOR, the master of ceremonies at funerals among the ancient Romans, who regulated the order of procession, and made all proper arrangements. He was considered as the minister of the goddess Libitina, who presided over funerals.

DESK, the name usually given to the pulpit in which morning and evening prayers are read in the Church of England. Formerly this part of the service was performed in the upper part of the choir or chancel near the altar, and it does not appear to have been till the reign of James I. that the convocation ordered a desk to be provided in every church, in which the minister might read the service.

DESPERATI (Lat. desperate men), a name given to the early Christians by their enemies, as a term of reproach. This name they rejected as a calumny, throwing it back upon their enemies, who more justly deserved it. Lactantius says, "Those who set a value upon their faith, and will not deny their God, they first torment, and butcher them with all their might, and then call them desperadoes, because they will not spare their own bodies; as if any thing could be more desperate than to torture and tear in pieces those whom you cannot but know to be innocent."

DESPENA, a surname of Aphrodite, Demeter, and Persephone.

DESTINIES (THE THREE), female divinities among the ancient Scandinavians, bearing the names respectively of Urd, the Past, Verdandi, the Present, and Skuld, the Future. They are represented as three virgins, who are continually drawing from a spring precious water, with which they water the Ash-Tree, so celebrated in Northern Mythology under the name of YGGDRASIL (which see). This water preserves the beauty of the ash-tree's foliage, and after having refreshed its leaves falls back again to the earth, where it forms the dew of which the bees make their honey. These three virgins always remain under the ash; and it is they who dispense the days and ages of men. Every man has a destiny appropriated to himself, who determines the duration and events of his life. In the prose Edda the Destinies are termed Norns.

DESTRUCTIONISTS. See ANNIHILATIONISTS.

DEUCALION, a son of Prometheus and Clymene. He was king in Phthia, and in his days a flood is said to have happened, which destroyed the whole human race except himself and his wife Pyrrha. Ovid gives a detailed account of this universal deluge, alleging it to have been a manifestation of the wrath of Jupiter on account of the wickedness of man. Deucalion and his wife, embarking in a small vessel, were saved, and when the flood abated, they landed on Mount Parnassus, and in obedience to the orders of the oracle of Themis they threw stones behind their backs; those which were thrown by Deucalion being changed into men, and those which were thrown by Pyrrha becoming women. In this way the earth is said to have been once more peopled. See DELUGE (TRADITIONS OF THE).

DEUTEREUOS, one of the assistants to the PATRIARCH (which see) of the Greek church.

DEUTERO-CANONICAL (Gr. deuteros, second, and canonicos, canonical), an epithet applied to certain books of Sacred Scripture, which were added to the canon after the rest, either because they were not written till after the compilation of the canon, or because of some doubt whether they were canonical or not. The deutero-canonical books in the modern canon are, the book of Esther, either the whole, or at least the seven last chapters; the epistle to the Hebrews; that of James, and that of Jude; the second epistle of Peter; the second and third epistles of John, and the Book of Revelation. The deutero-canonical parts of books are, the Hymn of the Three Children; the prayer of Azariah; the his-stories of Susannah, of Bel and the Dragon; the last chapter of Mark; the narrative of the bloody sweat; the appearance of the angel in Luke xxii., and the history of the adulterous woman in John viii. See BIBLE.

DEUTEROPOTMI, a name given by the Athenians to such as had been thought dead, but recovered after the funeral rites. These persons were not allowed to enter the temple of the Eumenides, or any sacred place, until they had been emblematically born again.

DEUTEROSIS. See MISHNA.

DE'VAS, the generic name for gods among the Hindus. Throughout the Vaidic period they were mere shapeless and colourless abstractions. Human properties, it is true, were frequently ascribed to them; it was believed that even gods are ultimately mortal, and can only purchase an exemption from the common lot by drinking of the potent amrita, the draught of immortality, that is, the soma or milky juice of the moon-plant, the asclepias acida of botanists. But in the later period, when Brahmanism had been introduced, the Dévas became more completely humanised, assumed a definite shape in the imagination of the worshipper, and exhibited all the ordinary signs of individuality. But while they were acknowledged and worshipped as gods, the Dévas are regarded, in the ancient Hindu sacred books, as inferior to the One Great Spirit, who is the primal source of being, and of whom the Dévas worshipped by the undiscerning multitude are no more than scintillations of his majesty; they emanate from him who, when the worlds were brought into existence, had proceeded to create the "guardians of the worlds." Accordingly, in the Isa-Upanishad, a kind of pendant to the second Véda, it is said, "This primal mover the Dévas even cannot overtake." But Dévas are worshipped, though inferior to Brahm, the Supreme Being, in order, as a Hindu writer alleges, that men's minds may be composed and conducted by degrees to the essential Unity. The Mūrti, or one person, is distributed in three Dévas, or, in other words, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. The Dévas have their dwelling place in Meru, the local heaven of the Hindus. They are of different degrees of rank, some of them being superior, and others inferior. The Vedas themselves distinguish between the great gods and the less, between the young gods and the old. Devas or Dewas are also the deities of the Budhists, whether denoting the divine persons on the earth, or in the celestial regions above. There are numberless dwellings of the Dewas in the lókas or spheres above the earth. The following account of the Budhist Dewas is given by Mr. Hardy in his 'Manual of Budhism:': "The déwas of Budhism do not inhabit the déwa-lókas exclusively, as in the world of men there are also déwas of trees, rocks, and the elements. They resemble the saints of the Romanists, or the kindred *dii mi-nor*es of a more ancient faith, as they are beings who were once men but are now reaping the reward of their prowess or virtue. They reside in a place of happiness; but do not possess the higher attributes of divinity. They receive birth by the apparitional form, are subject to various passions, and in size are more than colossal. Their number must be incalculable by the numeration of mortals; as many myriads of myriads are represented as being present when Gótama delivered the discourse called Maha Samaya, in the hall of Kútágára, near his native city of Kapilawastu. When the acquisition of merit in previous births has been small, the déwas become subject to fear as they approach the period in which they are to pass into some other mode of existence. Thus Sekra himself, the ruler of Tawutisá, previous to the occasion upon which he heard the sacred bana from the lips of Gótama (by which he received merit, and thereby a prolongation of the period of his reign), became greatly sorrowful when he reflected that he was about to leave the pleasures he had so long enjoyed. But the déwas who possess a greater share of merit are free from fear, as they know that when they are re-born it will be in some superior state of existence.

"The functions of the déwas are of varied character, and in some instances inconsistent with the powers attributed to 'the three gems.' They endeavour to prevent the acquirement of merit by those who they fear will supplant them in the possession of the various pleasures and dignities they respectively enjoy. They take cognizance of the actions of men, as we learn from the legend of the guardian deities. They sympathize with those who act aright, as in the case of the nobleman Wisákha; and punish those by whom they themselves are injured, or those who insult and persecute the faithful." See DEWA-LOKAS.

DEVATAS, gods worshipped by ordinary Hindus, such as Rama, Krishna, Shiva, Kali, and others.

DEVERRA, one of the three female divinities whose interposition was believed by the ancient Romans to defend the mother, at the birth of a child, from Sylvanus, the goddess of forests and fields, who was thought on such occasions to be ever meditating injury. The ceremonies observed in honour of Deverra were curious. The night after a child was born, three men walked round the house; the first struck the threshold with an axe, the second gave it a blow with a pestle, and the third swept it with a broom. The other two goddesses concerned in protecting women against Sylvanus were Pilumnus and Intercidona.

DEVIL. See ANGELS (EVIL).

DEVIL-WORSHIP. In addition to what has been already said on this species of idolatry under article DEMON-WORSHIP, it may be remarked, that the ancient Hebrews are distinctly charged with this sin in Deut. xxxii. 17, "They sacrificed unto devils, not to God." In later times they spoke of all false gods as devils, in consequence of the hatred which they bore to all kinds of idolatry, and we find them calling the chief deity of the Phœnicians BEELZEBUB (which see), the Prince of Devils. ●

Among the aboriginal races of Hindustan, remnants of which are still to be found in what are called the Hill-Tribes inhabiting the forests and mountain-fastnesses, Devil-Worship has always been widely prevalent. The evil spirits among these people are propitiated by means of bloody sacrifices and frantic dances. In Ceylon this kind of worship is mixed up with Buddhism. It is a curious fact, and shows how wide-spread this kind of superstition has once been, that it is found to characterize the SHAMANISM (which see) which prevails among the Ugrian races of Siberia, and the Hill-Tribes on the south-western frontier of China, the chief objects of Shamanite worship being demons, which are supposed to be cruel, revengeful, and capricious, and are worshipped by bloody sacrifices and wild dances. The officiating magician or priest excites himself to frenzy, and then pretends, or supposes himself, to be possessed by the demon to which worship is being offered; and after the rites are concluded, he communicates to those who consult him the information he has received. The demonolatri practised in India, by the more primitive Dravidian tribes, is not only similar to this but the same. Nothing strikes the Christian mind more deeply in surveying the superstitions of India than the worship so generally, and on the coast of Malabar, universally paid by all the lower castes of Hindus, to evil spirits. The following affecting description of the state of matters in this respect in Southern India is from the pen of an intelligent gentleman long resident in that quarter: "In the district of Canara, on the coast of Malabar, these evil spirits are worshipped by all classes of Hindoos except the Brahmins. Some of the Soodras make offerings also to the temples of the Hindoo gods, but their worship is chiefly directed to the evil spirits, those called Suktis, which are to be found in every village, nay, almost in every field. To the caste of slaves, which, in the estimation of their countrymen, is the lowest and most degraded of all castes, is attributed the power of causing an evil spirit to enter into a man, or, as it is expressed in the language of the country, to 'let loose an evil spirit' upon him. On the occurrence of any misfortune, they frequently attribute it to this, and suppose that it has been at the instigation of some enemy that the evil spirit has visited them, to preserve their houses and persons from which, charms are in general use. Petitions are frequently lodged before the magistrates, soliciting them to issue orders for the withdrawing of these evil spirits, and to punish the persons charged with having instigated and procured their visitation. The ordinary method used to remove the active cause of their calamities, is to employ an exorcist, who also generally belongs to the slave caste. The exorcist having come to the house from which he is employed to expel the evil spirit, accompanied by musicians beating tom-toms, or native drums, commences his operations with groans, sighs, and mutterings, followed by low moanings. He gradually raises his voice, and utters with rapidity, and in a peculiar unearthly tone of voice, certain charms, trembling violently all the while, and moving his body backwards and forwards. The drum-beaters act in harmony with the motions of the exorcist, beating more loudly and rapidly as his excitement increases. In consequence of the supposed power of sorcery in the slaves, they frequently inspire the superior castes with terror; and it is a singular retribution, that these degraded beings thus enthrall, by the terrors of superstition, those who hold their persons in bondage. A case of great atrocity occurred a few years ago in the district of Malabar, in which some Nairs, who are the landowners and gentry of that country, conspired and murdered a number of slaves, whom they suspected of sorcery. After much laborious investigation, the crime was brought home to them, and they were tried and convicted.

"The evil spirits are worshipped under the form of, and the idols represent, sometimes the simple figure of a man or woman clothed in coloured garments; at others, under the horrible looking form of a man, from whose mouth issue two large tusks, whose head is covered with snakes instead of hair, and who holds a sword in his hand; at others, under the form of a hog or a bullock, or a man with a bullock's head.

"Such are the demons to whom, in that unhappy country, is given the worship and honour due to the Eternal. The district of Malabar was ceded to the British government by Tippoo Sultan in 1792. Since then many years have passed, and no attempt has yet been made to dispel the moral darkness in which it is involved. A generation of men born since that time, under a Christian government and dominion, have already advanced far on the road to eternity, and yet no voice is to be heard proclaiming to them the glad tidings of great joy, and calling them to repentance. In every place the cry of 'Rama, Rama!' 'Nairain, Nairain!' is openly and loudly repeated; but no where is to be heard the glorious name of JESUS, the only name given unto men whereby we must be saved.

"The offerings made by the people to the evil spirits, consist of boiled rice, plantains and cocoa nuts. The management of the devil temples is generally vested in the head of the principal Soodra family in the village. The jewels of the idol are kept in his possession, and he arranges and directs the performance of the feasts, which are held on stated occasions. The temple is considered village property; each family claims an interest in it, and five or six of the chief families have a hereditary right in superintending its concerns.

"On the feast days cocoa-nuts, betel-nut, and flowers taken from before the idol, and which are therefore considered to be consecrated, are presented by the officiating priest to the heads of those families in succession, according to their rank, and on these occasions their family pride is exhibited in a remarkable manner, by the frequent disputes that occur regarding their rank. Actions of damage are often filed in the courts of law on account of alleged injuries on this head. There is a hereditary office of priest attached to these temples, the holder of which is supposed to be possessed by the evil spirit on the day of the feast. On these occasions he holds in his hand a drawn sword, which he waves about in all directions; his hair is long and loose; he becomes convulsed, trembles and shakes, and jumps about, and at times is held by the bystanders by a rope like an infuriated wild beast.

"The temples generally consist of an inclosed room in which the idol is placed, surrounded on three sides by verandahs, the walls of which are made of planks of wood, with open spaces between the planks; the whole is covered with a thatched or tiled pent-roof, and sometimes surrounded by an outer wall inclosing a piece of ground round the temple. Attached to some of the larger temples is a painted wooden figure of the demon, riding on a horse, or on a royal tiger, mounted on a platform cart with wheels, which is drawn a short distance by the villagers on the principal feast days. These are honoured as the chiefs of evil spirits, and are represented with a higher royal tiara on their head, and a sword in their hand.

"Around the temples there are generally some old spreading banian trees, which, to the natural eye, gives a pleasing and picturesque appearance to the spot, but, in beholding them a contemplative Christian mind is pained by the reflection, that their appearance, which denotes their antiquity, declares, at the same time, the length of time Jehovah has been dishonoured, and the firm hold idolatry has over those who practise it there. The evil spirits are frequently worshipped on the top of hills and in dense groves, the trees in which are so high and so closely planted together as to cause a darkness and deep gloom, which creates in the beholder a feeling of awe. There are in the district of Canara altogether four thousand and forty-one temples dedicated to evil spirits, and three thousand six hundred and eighty-two other places of Hindoo worship."

The YEZIDI (which see), a people which are found in the countries lying between Persia and the north of Syria, as well as throughout various parts of Syria, have been accused by some writers of adoring the devil. This, however, is denied by others; but one thing is certain, that they cannot bear to speak of Satan, nor even to hear his name mentioned.

DEVOTED THINGS. See ANATHEMATA, CORBAN.

DEVOUT, a name given by the Jews to PROSELYTES (which see) of the Gate. Under this designation they are mentioned in Acts x. 2 and xvii. 14.

DEWALAS, the name given to temples in Ceylon in which the Brahmanical deities are worshipped. The officiating priests in the Dewalas are called Kapuvvas, who wear no particular costume, and are permitted to marry. They use the Sanskrit language in their service, though they themselves do not understand the meaning of the words, but repeat them from memory. Entrance to the Dewalas is forbidden to Europeans. Mr. Hardy says, "that in the sanctum are the armlets or foot-rings of Pattiné, or the weapons of the other deities, with a painted screen before them; but there are no images, or none that are permanently placed; in some of the ceremonies temporary images are made of rice, or of some other material equally perishable."

DEWA-LOKAS, the six celestial worlds which the Budhists believe to be situated between the earth and the Brahma-Lokas. In these worlds, where there are numberless mansions inhabited by the DEVAS (which see), perfect happiness is enjoyed. The Hindu Paránas teach that there are seven Lokas or spheres above the earth.

DEWI, the female of a Budhist DEVA (which see).

DHARMA, virtue in the ancient Vedanta system of the Sanskrit philosophy. The Purva Mimansa, or first division of the Vedanta, is strong in praise of dharma.

DHARMMA, the teachings of Gotama Budha, or the system of truth among the Budhists. It is one of the three gems or great treasures which they prize above all other objects. Mr. Spence Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism,' thus describes the Dharmma, "The different portions of the Dharmma, when collected together, were divided into two principal classes, called Suttáni and Abhidhammáni. These two classes are again divided into three collections, called respectively in Singhalese:—1. Winaya, or discipline. 2. Súra, or discourses. 3. Abhidharmma, or pre-eminent truths. The three collections are called in Pali, Pitakattayan, from pitakan, a chest or basket, and táyo, three; or in Singhalese, Tunpitaka. A Glossary and a Commentary on the whole of the Pitakas were written by Budhagósha, about the year A. D. 420. They are called in Pali Atthakathá, or in Singhalese, Atuwáwa. The Rev. D. J. Gogerly has in his possession a copy of the whole of the sacred text, 'and the principal of the ancient comments, which, however, form but a small portion of the comments that may exist.' As this gentleman resided in 1835, and some subsequent years, at Dondra, near which place the most learned of the priests in the maritime provinces in Ceylon are found, he had admirable facilities for securing a correct copy of the Pitakas. Mr. Turnour states that the Pali version of the three Pitakas consists of about 4,500 leaves, which would constitute seven or eight volumes of the ordinary size, though the various sections are bound up in different forms for the convenience of reference." The Dharmma is literally worshipped, and the books are usually kept wrapped up with the utmost care in cloth. Whenever the Budhists speak of these sacred books, they add an epithet of honour. Sometimes they are placed upon a kind of rude altar by the road-side, that those who pass by may put money upon it in order to obtain merit. The Dharmma is considered as perfect, having nothing superfluous and nothing wanting. See BANA.

DHYANA, a state of abstract meditation inculcated upon Budhist ascetics, and which they believe leads to the entire destruction of all cleaving to existence.

DIABATHERIA, a sacrifice which the kings of Sparta offered to Zeus and Athena, when they had led their army beyond the frontiers of Lacedæmon. If the victims were unfavourable, they disbanded the army and returned home.

DIACÆNISMUS (Gr. Dia, through, and Kainos, new), a name formerly given by the Greek church to the week after Easter, as being the Renovation or first week of the festival of our Saviour's resurrection or restoration to life. On the fifth day of that week, the patriarch of Constantinople, along with the bishops and principal clergy, were wont to repair to the palace, where the Emperor received them seated on his throne. The Patriarch commenced the ceremony of the day by perfuming the Emperor with incense, then blessed him, and saluted him with a kiss on the mouth. The bishops and other ecclesiastics then kissed the Emperor's hand and cheek. This ceremony has long since been discontinued.

DIACONATE (Gr. Diaconos, a deacon), the office or order of a DEACON (which see).

DIACONI (Gr. ministers), the teachers or priests among the CATHARISTS (which see) of the twelfth century. All of them were held in great veneration.

DIACONI REGIONARII (Lat. district deacons). The cardinals, who now compose the ecclesiastical synod at Rome, were originally nothing more than deacons to whom the care of distributing alms to the poor of the several districts of Rome was intrusted. Hence the name of Diaconi Regionarii, which was afterwards exchanged for that of CARDINALS (which see).

DIACONICON, the sanctuary or BEMA (which see), of Christian churches in early times.

DIACONICUM MAGNUM. See CEIMELIAR-CHIUM.

DIACONICUM MINUS, the inner vestry of early Christian churches, to which the deacons brought the vestments and utensils belonging to the altar, out of the Diaconicum Magnum, to be ready for Divine service. Here the priests put on their robes in which they used to officiate, and to this apartment they returned when the public service was ended, that they might engage in private devotion. The charge of this place was committed to the deacons. It received also the name of SCEUOPHYLACIUM.

DIACONISSÆ. See DEACONESSES.

DIACONOFTSCHINS, a sect of RASKOLNIKS (which see), or Dissenters from the Russo-Greek Church. They derived their name from the diaconos or deacon Alexander their founder. He belonged to the church at Veska, but separated from it in 1706, in consequence of a dispute which had arisen relative to some ecclesiastical ceremonies.

DIADEM. See CROWN.

DIAH, the law of retaliation among the Mohamedans. When a murder has been committed, the nearest relative of the murdered person may claim the price of blood from the murderer—an evident imitation of the law of Moses. The words of the Koran on the subject of Diah are these: "Retaliation is commanded you in cases of murder, a freeman for a freeman, a slave for a slave, and a woman for a woman. But he who shall pardon a murderer shall obtain mercy from God; and when a man shall have pardoned a murderer, he shall no longer have it in his power to exact retaliation from him."

DIAMASTIGOSIS (Gr. dia, through, and mastix, a scourge), a solemnity anciently observed at Sparta during the festival held in honour of Artemis Orthia. On this occasion Spartan youths were scourged at the altar of the goddess, until the blood gushed from the wounds made by the scourge and covered the altar. Pausanias explains the origin of this custom to have been that Artemis demanded human sacrifices in expiation of the pollution which her altar had sustained by the shedding of blood in her temple, and that Lycurgus afterwards substituted the diamastigosis for human sacrifices, with the additional design of training the Spartan youth to the habit of patiently enduring pain and suffering. It was accordingly regarded as a highly honourable death to fall under the lash at the festival of Artemis.

DIANA, an ancient Italian goddess, identical with the ARTEMIS (which see) of the Greeks, and regarded as representing the moon. She was the daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and the sister of Apollo. Her birth-place was the island of Delos in the Ægean sea; hence she received the name of Delia. She was called Diana on earth, Luna in heaven, and Hecate in the infernal regions. Hesiod, however, describes these as three distinct goddesses. The Roman goddess Diana seems to have been first worshipped on the Aventine hill, in the time of Servius Tullius, and as she was the guardian of slaves, the day on which the temple was dedicated was held as a festival by slaves of both sexes, and was usually termed the day of the slaves. Diana seems to have been worshipped at Rome chiefly by the lower class of the community, who were wont to assemble every year on the Aventine, and offer sacrifices in her honour. According to Varro, she was originally a Sabine goddess. The goddess bearing the name of Diana, who was worshipped at Ephesus, differed from the goddess who was worshipped at Rome, and corresponded rather to the Cybele than to the Artemis of the Greeks. She is generally represented with a great number of breasts, thus evidently symbolizing the principle of fertility, the fruitful mother of all things. The Ephesian temple of Diana was one of the wonders of the world, but its great glory was the image which fell down from Jupiter, as we find noticed in Acts xix. 35. This image, which is supposed to have been a black conical stone, probably of meteoric origin, was worshipped by the inhabitants of Ephesus. The following description will give some idea of the magnificent Ephesian temple.

"The temple of Diana at Ephesus was, as has been already remarked, considered one of the seven wonders of the world. This magnificent edifice, of which accounts have been handed down to us in the writings of Pliny and Vitruvius, occupied 220 years in building. It was erected on the site of that which had been destroyed by Eratosthenes on the day of Alexander's birth, and surpassed its predecessor in splendour; the cost of the work was defrayed by the contributions of all the Asiatic states, and so immense was the quantity of stone used in the building, that the quarries of the country are said to have been nearly exhausted by it. It was of the Ionic order, and surrounded by a double range of columns sixty feet high, thirty-six of which were adorned with sculpture, by Scopas, one of the most eminent artists of antiquity. The architect of the first temple was Ctesiphon; of the second, Denocrates or Cheremocrates. Twenty-seven kings contributed sculptured pillars to this magnificent edifice, and the altar was one of the master-pieces of Praxiteles. The length of this temple was 425 feet, and its breadth 220 feet; so that there are many cathedrals in England superior in dimensions to this famous building. Till the time of Tiberius it had enjoyed the privilege of an asylum, which had gradually increased till it took in the greater part of the city, but that prince finding the privilege abused rescinded it, and declared that even the altar should not serve as a sanctuary to criminals.

"The priests of the Ephesian Diana were held in great esteem, but their condition was far from enviable, for they were not only mutilated in honour of their goddess, (another proof identifying the Artemis of Ephesus with Cybele,) but they were restricted to a severe diet and prohibited from entering any private house; they were called Estiatores, and must have been a wealthy body, for they sent a statue of gold to Artemidorus, who pleaded their cause at Rome, and rescued their property out of the hands of the farmers of the public revenues, who had seized upon them. Once in the year was there a public festival held in honour of the goddess in the city of Ephesus, and to this festival all the Ionians who could do so, made a point of repairing with their wives and children, bringing with them not only costly offerings to Diana, but also rich presents for the Estiatores." In Acts xix. 24, silver shrines for Diana are spoken of. These are said by Chrysostom to have been small boxes or chests wrought into the form of models of the temple, with an image of the goddess within. This explanation is shown to be correct by the representations on the Ephesian coins.

DIAPSALMA, a mode of singing adopted occasionally in the Christian churches in early times. The priests according to this practice led the psalmody, and the people sung responses.

DIASIA, a festival in honour of Zeus, surnamed Meilichius, celebrated at Athens outside the city. It was observed by all classes, the wealthy sacrificing animals, while the poor offered such gifts as their means allowed. This festival, which was observed with feasting and rejoicings, was held in the latter half of the month Anthesterion.

DIATAXEIS (Gr. ordinances), the word used by the author of the APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS (which see), to denote the forms and orders of worship in the early Christian church.

DICAIOPHYLAX (Gr. *dicaio*s, just, and phylax, a keeper), an officer in the Greek church who takes care of the church's title and her charters.

DICE (Gr. justice), a goddess among the ancient Greeks, the daughter of Zeus and Themis. She was regarded as one of the HORÆ (which see); and Hesiod represented her as approaching the throne of Zeus with tears and lamentations whenever a judge was guilty of injustice.

DICTÆUS, a surname of Zeus, derived from Mount Dicte in Crete, where he had a temple.

DICTATES OF HILDEBRAND. See ROME (CHURCH OF).

DICTYNNA (Gr. dictyon, a net), a surname of Artemis, as being the goddess of hunting.

DICTYNNIA, a festival celebrated in honour of Artemis at Cydonia in Crete. Little is known concerning it, except that it was accompanied with sacrifices.

DIDYMÆUS, a surname of Apollo, from the double light which he imparted to mankind; the one directly and immediately from himself, considered as the sun, the other by reflection, as the moon.

DIESPITER. See JUPITER.

DIFFAREATIO (Lat. dis, asunder, and far, wheat), a religious ceremony among the ancient Romans, by which alone a marriage could be dissolved which had been contracted by CONFAREATIO (which see), the most solemn marriage ceremony in the earlier periods of the Roman history. See DIVORCE.

DIGAMY (Gr. dis, twice, and gameo, to marry) The point was much disputed in the ancient Christian church, whether second marriages were lawful or otherwise, particularly in consequence of the strong opinions held by the Novatians and Montanists, who denounced such marriages as unlawful. This opinion was also maintained by several councils.

The laity were afterwards permitted to contract second marriages, while the prohibition still rested upon the clergy. The introduction of the law of celibacy, however, rendered this restriction, in so far as the clergy were concerned, altogether useless.

DIGGERS, a term of reproach applied to the WALDENSES (which see) because in consequence of the severe persecution to which they were exposed, they were under the necessity of digging for themselves caverns in which they might safely worship God.

DIGNITARY, a term used in England to denote one who holds cathedral or other preferment to which jurisdiction is annexed.

DII (Lat. gods). See MYTHOLOGY.

DIPOLEIA, a festival of great antiquity, celebrated annually in honour of Zeus on the Acropolis of Athens. An ox was sacrificed on this occasion, but in a peculiar manner. Barley mixed with wheat was laid upon the altar of Zeus, and the ox which was destined to be sacrificed was allowed to eat a portion of it; but while the animal was thus engaged, one of the priests, who received the title of Bouphonos, or ox-murderer, seized an axe, killed the ox, and ran away. The other priests, pretending to be ignorant who had committed the fatal act, summoned the axe with which the deed had been done, and declared it guilty of murder. This strange ceremony is said to have arisen from an ox having on one occasion devoured the cakes offered at the celebration of the DIONYSIA (which see), thus carrying us back for the origin of the Diipoleia to a time when the fruits of the ground were offered instead of animal sacrifices. Porphyry informs us, that three Athenian families claimed the privilege of taking a part in this ancient festival, one by leading the ox to the altar, a second by knocking it down, and a third by killing it, all of which functions were reckoned peculiarly honourable.

DIMESSES, an order of nuns, consisting of young maids and widows, founded in the state of Venice in the sixteenth century. The originator of this order was Dejanata Valmarana, the wife of a civilian of Verona; and the rules for their direction were laid down in 1584 by Anthony Pagani, a Franciscan. Three years' probation was required before entrance could be obtained into the order. The habit which the nuns wore was either of black or brown woollen, as they chose.

DIMINUTOS, a name used to denote those persons whose confessions before the Inquisition were defective and imperfect. There are three kinds of Diminutos, who as such were condemned to die. (1.) Those who having accused themselves after being imprisoned, or at least before sentence of condemnation had passed upon them, had consequently sufficient time to examine themselves and make a complete declaration. (2.) Those who did not confess till after sentence of condemnation had passed upon them. These were put to the torture in order thereby to force them to complete their confessions, and thereby save their lives. This second kind of diminutos were allowed time to answer what was required of them till the Friday immediately preceding the Auto da Fe. (3.) Those who did not make a confession until they were given up to the confessors. These were never afterwards put to the torture, and could only be delivered from death by naming all their accomplices without a single exception. See INQUISITION.

DIMISSORY LETTERS, also called CANONICAL LETTERS (which see). In the Church of England Dimissory Letters are those which are given by a bishop to a candidate for holy orders, having a title in his diocese, directed to some other bishop, and authorizing the bearer to be ordained by him. When a person produces letters of ordination conferred by any other than his own diocesan, he must at the same time produce the letters dimissory given by his own bishop.

DIMOERITES. See APOLLINARIANS.

DIN (Arab. practice), the second of the two parts into which Islamism or the Mohammedan system is divided, faith and practice. The din or practice consists of, 1. Prayers and purifications. 2. Alms. 3. Fasting; and 4. The Pilgrimage to Mecca.

DINA CHARİYAWA, a manual of Daily Observances to be attended to by the Buddhist priests in Ceylon. Mr. Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism,' gives a translation of this production, and to give the reader an idea of its contents, we extract a passage containing the principal duties incumbent upon the priest: "He who, with a firm faith, believes in the religion of truth, rising before day-light, shall clean his teeth, and shall then sweep all the places that are proper to be swept, such as the court-yard, the platform near the bô-tree, and the approaches to the wihâra; after which he shall fetch the water that is required for drinking, filter it, and place it ready for use. When this is done he shall retire to a solitary place, and for the space of three hours (there are sixty hours in one day) meditate on the obligations, considering whether he has kept them or not. The bell will then ring, and he must reflect that greater than the gift of 100 elephants, 100 horses, and 100 chariots, is the reward of him who takes one step towards the place where worship is offered. Thus reflecting he shall approach the dâgoba (a conical erection under which some relic is placed) or the bô-tree, and perform that which is appointed; he shall offer flowers, just as if Budha were present in person, if flowers can be procured; meditate on the nine virtues of Budha, with a fixed and determined mind; and having worshipped, seek absolution for his negligences and faults, just as if the sacred things (before which he worships) had life. Having risen from this act of reverence, he shall proceed to the other places where worship is offered, and spreading the cloth or skin that he is accustomed to place under him, he shall again worship (with his forehead to the ground, and touching the ground with his knees and toes). The next act that he is required to perform is to look at his lita, or calendar, in order that he may learn the awach'háwa (the length of the shadow, by which according to rules regularly laid down, varying with the time of the year, the hour of the day may be known), the age of the moon, and the years that have elapsed since the death of Budha; and then meditate on the advantages to be derived from the keeping of the obligations, carrying the alms-bowl, and putting on the yellow robe. It will now be time for him to take the alms-bowl, and when going his round, he is to bear in mind the four karmasthánas, not to go too near, nor to keep at too great a distance from, his upádyá or preceptor; at a convenient distance from the village, having swept a small place clean, he is properly to adjust his robe. If going with his upádyá or preceptor, he is to give the bowl into his hands, and accompany him to the village, carefully avoiding the sight of women, men, elephants, horses, chariots or soldiers. According to the rules contained in the Sékhiyá, he is to proceed along the road; and after the alms have been received he is to retire from the village in the manner previously declared. Taking the bowl and outer robe of his superior, he shall then proceed to the wihára. If there be a place appointed for the robe, he shall put it there after folding it; then place a seat, wash his feet, enquire if he is thirsty, place before him the tooth-cleaner, and bring the alms-bowl, or if this be refused, a small portion of rice. The stanzas must be repeated that are appointed to be said before eating, after eating, and when the things are received that may be used as sick diet; and the food is to be eaten in the manner laid down in the Sékhiyá. Then taking the bowl of his superior he shall wash it, put it in the sunshine to dry, and deposit it afterwards in its proper place. This being done he is to wash his own face, and putting on his robe, he is first to worship his superior, and then Budha. The next act is to go again to some solitary place, and there repeat the appointed stanzas, considering whether he has omitted the practice of any obligation, or in any way acted contrary to them, after which he must exercise maitri-bháwaná, or the meditation of kindness and affection. About an hour afterwards, when his weariness is gone, he is to read one of the sacred books, or write out a portion of one; and if he has anything to ask from his preceptor, or to tell him, this is the time at which it should be done. In some convenient place the bañá is to be read; and when this is concluded, if there be time before the setting of the sun, he is again to sweep the court-yard, &c. as before."

DIOCESE (Gr. dióikesis, administration), the district of country over which, according to ecclesiastical arrangement, the jurisdiction of a bishop extends. The division of a country into dioceses probably commenced in the time of Constantine, when the church first became connected with the state. The term is used in Lutheran churches to denote all the parishes, usually from twenty to thirty, that are under the inspection of one superintendent. In Russia, the dioceses are called EPARCHIES (which see), and are thirty-six in number. In England and Wales there are twenty-eight dioceses or bishoprics, namely, Canterbury, York, London, Durham, Winchester, Bangor, Bath and Wells, Carlisle, Chester, Clüchester, Ely, Exeter, Gloucester and Bristol, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, Llandaff, Manchester, Norwich, Oxford, Peterborough, Ripon, Rochester, Salisbury, St. Asaph, St. David's, Worcester, Sodor and Man. It is the duty of the BISHOP (which see) to exercise a careful oversight of all the members of his diocese, both clerical and lay, in regard to spiritual and ecclesiastical matters. In matters of discipline an appeal is open from the clergy to the bishop of the diocese.

The average population in March 1851, when the last census was taken of each diocese in England and Wales, was 645,383. This appears to be a higher average than is to be found in any other country of Europe. From a Report of a recent Commission in France, on the subject of Episcopal Sees, we learn the following facts as to the average population of each diocese in various Roman Catholic and other countries in Europe. France reckons a bishop or archbishop for about 400,000 souls of Roman Catholic population. Bavaria has eight dioceses for 3,000,000 souls, or in other words, the average amount of a single diocese is 375,000. Austria has seventy-eight bishops or archbishops for 28,000,000 souls, that is, one diocese for 358,000. Ireland has twenty-nine dioceses for 6,500,000 Roman Catholics, which makes about 224,000 in each diocese. Spain has fifty-nine dioceses for 12,000,000 souls, that is, a diocese for 203,000 souls. The dioceses in Spain have recently undergone a slight reduction to fifty-six. Portugal has twenty-two episcopal or metropolitan dioceses for 2,500,000 souls, that is, a diocese for 113,000 souls. The two Sicilies have eighty dioceses for 8,500,000 souls, or one diocese for 106,000 souls. Sweden, with about 3,000,000 souls, has thirteen dioceses. Greece, with a population of less than 1,000,000, has twenty-four Episcopal dioceses. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America has about 1,800 clergy, and thirty-two Episcopal dioceses.

DIOCESAN, a word frequently used to denote a bishop in relation to his diocese.

DIOCESAN CHURCH, a term anciently used for a parish church. Thus the council of Tarraco decreed that bishops must visit their dioceses once a year, and see that no diocesan church was out of repair.

DIOCESAN EPISCOPACY. See EPISCOPACY.

DIOCESAN SYNODS, ecclesiastical conventions which the patriarchs of the ancient Christian church had the privilege of summoning whenever occasion required. These synods consisted of the metropolitans and all the provincial bishops.

DIOCLEIA, a festival celebrated at Megara in ancient Greece, in honour of Diocles, an Athenian, who, when banished from his native city, fled to Megara, and there having formed an attachment to youth, fell in battle while protecting his favourite with his shield. The Megarians, in admiration of this hero, instituted the diocleia, at which the young men engaged in gymnastic and other exercises.

DIOMEDES, the name of one of the inferior deities of the ancient Greeks. It is not improbable that he may have been a Pelasgian deity who came afterwards to be confounded with Diomedes, who next to Achilles was the most distinguished of the heroes of Greece.

DIONÆA, a surname of APHRODITE (which see).

DIONYSIA, festivals celebrated in ancient times in different parts of Greece, in honour of DIONYSUS (which see). They were known under a variety of different names, but were uniformly marked by one feature, that of enthusiastic merriment and joviality, such as were likely to characterize festivals sacred to the god of wine. The Attic festivals of Dionysus were four in number; the rural Dionysia, the Lenæa, the Anthesteria, and the city Dionysia. On all these occasions processions took place, in which both men and women joined, bearing the thyrsus in their hands, and singing dithyrambic odes and hymns in honour of the god. The phallus, the symbol of fertility, was also carried in these processions, and this was followed by men disguised as women. In some places it was counted as a dishonour done to the god to appear at the Dionysia without being intoxicated. The Greeks both in Asia and in Europe observed these festivals, but in Bœotia with more unrestrained joviality than anywhere else. In very early times, however, human sacrifices were offered on these occasions. When introduced among the Romans, the Dionysia received the name of BACCHANALIA (which see).

DIONYSUS, the god of wine among the ancient Greeks, worshipped also among the Romans under the name of BACCHUS (which see). He is usually described as the son of Zeus and Semele, but a tradition is given by Diodorus, that he was a son of Ammon and Amaltheia. Great difference of opinion exists as to the birthplace of the god, which is generally said to be Thebes, while others allege it to have been India, Libya, and other places. Traditions are so various as to the parentage, birthplace, and other circumstances connected with this god, that Cicero distinguishes five Dionysi, and Diodorus Siculus speaks of three.

The education of Dionysus is said to have been intrusted by Zeus to the nymphs of Mount Nisa in Thrace, and when he had reached the age of manhood, he travelled throughout many countries of the earth displaying his divine power, after which he led his mother Semele out of Hades, and ascended with her to Olympus. As the cultivation of the vine came to be more extensively cultivated in Greece, the worship of Dionysus was more widely diffused. This god was the mythical representative of some power of nature, which leads man away from his natural mode of living. He was considered as revealing future events, and was even said to be as intimately connected with the oracle at Delphi as Apollo himself. He had oracles of his own in different parts, particularly in Thrace and in Phocis. In the former province his worship was first accompanied with Bacchanalian orgies. In the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to him, but this barbarous custom was afterwards discontinued, and animals were sacrificed in place of men. The ram was the animal which was most frequently offered to Dionysus. The plants sacred to this god were the vine, the ivy, the laurel, and the asphodel, while among living creatures the magpie and the panther illustrated his divinity.

DIOSCURI, the name given to Castor and Pollux, sons of Zeus and Leda, who were ranked among the deities of ancient Greece. Homer, in the Odyssey, makes them sons of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedæmon, and hence they are often called Tyndaridæ. Each of the brothers was famed for his skill in a particular accomplishment, Castor in managing horses, and Pollux in boxing. Various fabulous stories are related concerning these famed brothers. Thus they are said to have received divine honours from the Athenians, in consequence of the valour which they displayed in an expedition undertaken against Athens, in order to rescue their sister Helen who had been carried off from Sparta. They are also alleged to have had a part in the Argonautic expedition, and to have distinguished themselves in a battle with the sons of Aphareus. Zeus, in token of his approbation, gave the brothers a place among the stars, under the name of Gemini, the Twins. Müller considers the worship of the Dioscuri to have had its origin in some ancient Peloponnesian gods, who were in course of time confounded with the human Tyndaridæ, who had performed such exploits as to raise them to divine honours. Their worship spread from Peloponnesus, where it seems to have commenced, over Greece, Sicily, and Italy. They were considered as exercising a watchful care over all travellers, but more especially travellers by sea. Statues of the Dioscuri were placed at the end of the race-course at Sparta. The worship of Castor and Pollux was early introduced among the Romans, and a temple in their honour stood in the Forum at Rome. Two other temples dedicated to the Castores were afterwards built in the city, one in the Circus Maximus, and the other in the Circus Flaminius. From that time the Castores were regarded as the patrons of the Roman equites, who held a grand procession in their honour every year.

DIOSCURIA, festivals celebrated annually in ancient Greece in honour of the DIOSCURI (which see). Different ceremonies were observed on these occasions in different places. At Sparta sacrifices and rejoicings took place. The festival at Athens was called ANACEA (which see). Throughout many parts of Greece the worship of the Dioscuri prevailed, and their festivals were held.

DIPAVALI, a Hindu festival in honour of VISHNU (which see), the second person of the Hindu Triad or Trimurti. It was instituted in memory of an exploit which the god performed in the form of KRISHNA (which see). A certain Ratjasja had taken captive sixteen thousand virgins, but Krishna slew him, and set the maidens at liberty. Hence originated the Dipavali, when the Hindu holds a festival during the day, and the houses are illuminated at night. The children also go up and down the streets with lighted candles.

DIPPERS. See DUNKERS.

DIPTYCHS, two writing tablets among the ancient Greeks which could be folded together. This name was also given to the registers kept in the early Christian churches, in which were recorded the names of those who offered and presented themselves for baptism. They had several sorts of diptychs, some for the dead, and some for the living. It was usual in the ancient church, before making oblation for the dead, that the deacon read aloud the names of those eminent bishops, or saints, or martyrs, who were particularly to be mentioned in this part of the service. The diptychs seem to have been read before the consecration prayer, immediately after the kiss of peace. Cardinal Bona mentions three sorts of diptychs, which are thus described by Bingham: "One, wherein the names of bishops only were written, and more particularly such bishops as had been governors of that particular church: a second, wherein the names of the living were written, who were eminent and conspicuous either for any office and dignity, or some benefaction and good work, whereby they had deserved well of the church; in this rank were the patriarchs and bishops of great sees, and the bishop and clergy of that particular church; together with the emperors and magistrates, and others most conspicuous among the people: the third was, the book containing the names of such as were deceased in catholic communion." The diptychs were read from the AMBO (which see), or reading-desk. To erase any person's name from these ecclesiastical registers, was to declare them anathematized, and cast out of the communion of the church. When any one who had been excommunicated was restored, his name was inserted anew in the diptychs. When this was done, the penitent was absolved, and he was once more admitted to the communion and fellowship of the faithful. See CENSURES (ECCLIASTICAL).

DIRÆ. See EUMENIDES.

DIRECTORY, regulations for the performance of public worship, drawn up by the Assembly of Di-vines at Westminster in 1644. It was by express order from both Houses of Parliament that the Directory was composed, and with a view to supply the place of the Liturgy or Book of Common Prayer which had been abolished. Dr. Hetherington, in his 'History of the Westminster Assembly,' gives the following brief account of the proceedings of the Assembly on the subject of the Directory: "On the 21st of May 1644, Mr. Rutherford moved for the speeding of the directory for public worship, to which no attention had hitherto been paid. In consequence of this motion, Mr. Palmer, chairman of the committee appointed for that purpose, gave in a report on the 24th, which brought the subject fairly before the Assembly. Some little difference of opinion arose, whether any other person, except the minister, might read the Scriptures in the time of public worship, which terminated in the occasional permission of probationers. But when the subject of the dispensation of the Lord's Supper came under discussion, it gave rise to a sharp and protracted debate, chiefly between the Independents and the Scottish Commissioners. The Independents opposed the arrangement of the communicants, as seated at the communion table, it being the custom among them for the people to remain in their pews; while the Scottish members urgently defended the proposed method of seating themselves at the same table. Another disputed point was, with regard to the power of the minister to exclude ignorant or scandalous persons from communion. The debates on these points occupied the Assembly from the 10th of June to the 10th of July. The directory for the sacrament of baptism was also the subject of considerable debate, continued from the 11th of July to the 8th of August. The directory for the sanctification of the Sabbath was readily received; and a committee was appointed to prepare a preface for the completed directory for public worship. This committee consisted of Messrs. Goodwin, Nye, Bridge, Burgess, Reynolds, Vines, Marshall, and Dr. Temple, together with the Scottish ministers. The appointment of so many of the Independents was for the purpose of avoiding any renewal of the protracted contentions in which they had so long held the Assembly, as we learn from Baillie. This part of the Assembly's labours received the ratification of Parliament on the 22d of November 1644; with the exception of the directions for marriage and burial, which were finished on the 27th of the same month, and soon afterwards the whole received the full ratification of Parliament."

Among other directions in reference to the mode of conducting public worship, the use of the Lord's Prayer is enjoined as the most perfect model of devotion. Private or lay persons are forbidden to dispense the ordinance of baptism, and injunctions are given to baptize publicly in face of the congregation. Anything in the shape of a burial service for the dead is forbidden. In the observance of the Lord's Supper, the communion table is ordered to be so placed that the communicants may sit about it. The use of the Directory having been enforced by an ordinance of the Parliament, which was repeated on 3d August 1645, King Charles II., in opposition to this injunction, issued a proclamation at Oxford on the 13th November of the same year, restoring the use of the Book of Common Prayer, which had been discontinued. The Directory was adopted by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and published under their sanction.

DIS, a name given to PLUTO (which see), and, therefore, sometimes applied to the infernal regions over which that god reigned.

DISCALCEATI (Lat. barefooted), a brotherhood of monks in Spain, connected with the Franciscan order. They received the privileges of a separate association in A. D. 1532, by authority of Clement VII. They differed from others by adhering more strictly to the rules of St. Francis. They receive the name of Recollets in France, and Reformati in Italy.

DISCIPLE (Lat. discipulus, a scholar), the follower of any leader of a sect, or head of a school of religion or philosophy.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, a Christian denomination in the United States of America, which, though known by a variety of names, such as "Baptists," "Reformed Baptists," "Reformers," or "Campbellites," have themselves chosen the unsectarian appellation which heads the present article. The originator of the sect, as has already been noticed in the article BAPTISTS (AMERICAN), was Mr. Thomas Campbell, who was long a minister of the Secession branch of the Presbyterian Church of the North of Ireland, and who, having emigrated to America, settled in Washington county, Pennsylvania. Being soon after joined by his son Alexander, who had studied under Greville Ewing in Glasgow, they began to entertain and promulgate the idea, that a public effort should be made to restore the original unity of the church of Christ. With this view they urged it as a grand fundamental point, in order to Christian unity, that all human creeds, confessions of faith, and formularies of doctrine and church government, should be laid aside, and the Bible alone should be taken as the authorized bond of union and the infallible rule of faith and practice. A considerable number of individuals responded to this appeal, and a congregation was immediately organized upon Brush Run in Washington county, on the 7th of September 1810, where a place of worship was erected, and over this congregation Thomas Campbell and his son Alexander presided as joint pastors. Each applicant for admission to this body of Christians was required to give satisfactory evidence that he fully understood the relation he assumed, and the true scriptural ground of salvation. Accordingly, he was requested to give an answer to the question, "What is the meritorious cause of the sinner's acceptance with God?" and upon expressing an entire reliance upon the merits of Christ alone for justification, and evincing a conduct becoming the Christian profession, he was received into the fellowship of the church.

This infant community enjoyed for a time the utmost harmony and peace. Most of the members being poor, they were unable to finish the interior of the church which they had built for the worship of God, and they were accordingly accustomed to assemble in the unfinished building without fire even in the depth of winter. They were also in the habit of visiting often at each other's houses, and spending whole nights in social prayer; searching the Scriptures, asking and answering questions, and singing hymns. The sunshine of peace which rested upon this small body of Christian disciples was ere long destined to be overclouded. A controversy arose on the much-disputed point of infant baptism, which distracted the minds both of pastors and people. The question was agitated with much keenness by parties on both sides, and at length, on the 12th June 1812, Thomas Campbell, his son Alexander, and the whole family, along with several members of the church, were immersed in the waters of adult baptism on a simple profession of their faith. This event, of course, affected, in no small degree, the church which had been formed. Those who adhered to the doctrines of the Pædobaptists left the community, while those who remained were, in consequence of the change in their views, brought into immediate connection with the Baptists. Accordingly, in the fall of 1813, they were received into the Redstone Baptist Association, stipulating, however, expressly in writing, that "no terms of union or communion other than the Holy Scriptures should be required."

The views which Alexander Campbell urged upon the Baptist churches, with which he and his father had now become connected, excited no small stir in that body, some entering readily into the new opinions, while others as firmly and resolutely opposed them. At length the church of Brush Run and its pastors came to be looked upon with jealousy and distrust by the other churches of the Redstone Association, and it became necessary, after a considerable time spent in the most unpleasant contentions, that about thirty of the members of Brush Run, including Alexander Campbell, should leave the church. This small body, accordingly, emigrated to Wellsburg, Virginia, where they were constituted as a new church, and admitted into the Mahoning Association of Ohio. Here they found a much more ready adoption of their sentiments, and so rapidly did they succeed in promulgating their peculiar opinions, that in 1828 the Mahoning Association rejected all human formularies of religion, and relinquished all claim to jurisdiction over the churches, resolving itself into a simple annual meeting for the purpose of receiving reports of the progress of the churches, and for worship and mutual co-operation in the spread of the gospel. The bold step thus taken by so large a number of churches, embracing a considerable portion of the Western Reserve, excited the utmost alarm throughout the Baptist churches generally. The adjoining churches connected with the Beaver Association proceeded without delay to denounce as heretical, and to exclude from their communion, all who had adopted the views of the Disciples, as the followers of Campbell were termed. The schism thus commenced extended to Kentucky, to Eastern Virginia, and, in short, to all the Baptist churches and associations into which the new views had been introduced.

The Disciples, finding themselves thus cut off from communion with the Baptist churches, formed themselves everywhere into distinct churches on Congregationalist or Independent principles, co-operating together, as Thomas Campbell himself expressed it, for "the restoration of pure primitive apostolic Christianity in letter and spirit; in principle and practice." No sooner had the separation of the Disciples from the Baptist body been effected than their number rapidly increased. They were joined by many Baptists who had been led to embrace their principles. The prejudices which had been formerly entertained against them gradually disappeared, and the most friendly feelings arose between the Disciples and the Baptists. The very points, indeed, for which the Disciples contended, the rejection of creeds and baptism for the remission of sins, have been adopted by some of the most able ministers of the Baptist body. Many have come over to them from almost all the leading denominations in the States, and what is more pleasing, they have been successful in gaining numerous converts from the ranks of indifference and infidelity. The principles of the Disciples have found their way into England and Wales, by the diffusion of the writings of Mr. Campbell and his fellow-labourers, and the census of 1851 contains a return of three congregations or churches calling themselves by the name of Disciples of Christ. In the United States they are most numerous in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Virginia. There are a few churches holding the principles of the Disciples in the British Provinces of North America.

The doctrines of this large and rapidly extending body of American Christians will be best stated in the language of Mr. Campbell himself as communicated to the 'Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge': "They regard all the sects and parties of the Christian world as having, in greater or less degrees, departed from the simplicity of faith and manners of the first Christians, and as forming what the apostle Paul calls 'the apostacy.' This defection they attribute to the great varieties of speculation and metaphysical dogmatism of the countless creeds, formularies, liturgies, and books of discipline adopted and inculcated as bonds of union and platforms of communion in all the parties which have sprung from the Lutheran reformation. The effects of these synodical covenants, conventional articles of belief, and rules of ecclesiastical polity, has been the introduction of a new nomenclature, a human vocabulary or religious words, phrases and technicalities, which has displaced the style of the living oracles, and affixed to the sacred diction ideas wholly unknown to the apostles of Christ.

"To remedy and obviate these aberrations, they propose to ascertain from the holy Scriptures, according to the commonly-received and well-established rules of interpretation, the ideas attached to the leading terms and sentences found in the holy Scriptures, and then to use the words of the Holy Spirit in the apostolic acceptance of them.

"By thus expressing the ideas communicated by the Holy Spirit in the terms and phrases learned from the apostles, and by avoiding the artificial and technical language of scholastic theology, they propose to restore a pure speech to the household of faith; and by accustoming the family of God to use the language and dialect of the heavenly Father, they expect to promote the sanctification of one another through the truth, and to terminate those discords and debates which have always originated from the words which man's wisdom teaches, and from a reverential regard and esteem for the style of the great masters of polemic divinity; believing that speaking the same things in the same style, is the only certain way to thinking the same things.

"They make a very marked difference between faith and opinion; between the testimony of God and the reasonings of men; the words of the Spirit and human inferences. Faith in the testimony of God and obedience to the commandments of Jesus are their bond of union; and not an agreement in any abstract views or opinions upon what is written or spoken by divine authority. Hence all the speculations, questions, debates of words, and abstract reasonings found in human creeds, have no place in their religious fellowship. Regarding Calvinism and Arminianism, Trinitarianism and Unitarianism, and all the opposing theories of religious sectaries, as extremes begotten by each other, they cautiously avoid them, as equi-distant from the simplicity and practical tendency of the promises and precepts, of the doctrine and facts, of the exhortations and precedents of the Christian institution.

"They look for unity of spirit and the bonds of peace in the practical acknowledgment of one faith, one Lord, one immersion, one hope, one body, one Spirit, one God and Father of all; not in unity of opinions, nor in unity of forms, ceremonies, or modes of worship.

"The holy Scriptures of both Testaments they regard as containing revelations from God, and as all necessary to make the man of God perfect, and accomplished for every good word and work; the New Testament, or the living oracles of Jesus Christ, they understand as containing the Christian religion ; the testimonies of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, they view as illustrating and proving the great proposition on which our religion rests, viz. that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the only-begotten and well-beloved Son of God, and the only Saviour of the world; the Acts of the Apostles, as a divinely authorized narrative of the beginning and progress of the reign or kingdom of Jesus Christ, recording the full development of the gospel by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven, and the procedure of the apostles in setting up the church of Christ on earth ; the Epistles as carrying out and applying the doctrine of the apostles to the practice of individuals and congregations, and as developing the tendencies of the gospel in the behaviour of its professors ; and all as forming a complete standard of Christian faith and morals, adapted to the interval between the ascension of Christ and his return with the kingdom which he has received from God ; the Apocalypse, or Revelation of Jesus Christ to John in Patmos, as a figurative and prospective view of all the fortunes of Christianity, from its date to the return of the Saviour.

"Every one who sincerely believes the testimony which God gave of Jesus of Nazareth, saying, 'This is my Son, the beloved, in whom I delight,' or, in other words, believes what the evangelists and apostles have testified concerning him, from his conception to his coronation in heaven as Lord of all, and who is willing to obey him in everything, they regard as a proper subject of immersion, and no one else. They consider immersion into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, after a public, sincere, and intelligent confession of the faith in Jesus, as necessary to admission to the privileges of the kingdom of the Messiah, and as a solemn pledge on the part of heaven, of the actual remission of all past sins and of adoption into the family of God.

"The Holy Spirit is promised only to those who believe and obey the Saviour. No one is taught to expect the reception of that heavenly Monitor and Comforter as a resident in his heart till he obeys the gospel.

"Thus while they proclaim faith and repentance, or faith and a change of heart, as preparatory to immersion, remission, and the Holy Spirit, they say to all penitents, or all those who believe and repent of their sins, as Peter said to the first audience addressed after the Holy Spirit was bestowed after the glorification of Jesus, 'Be immersed every one of you, in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.' They teach sinners that God commands all men everywhere to reform or to turn to God, that the Holy Spirit strives with them so to do by the apostles and prophets, that God beseeches them to be reconciled through Jesus Christ, and that it is the duty of all men to believe the gospel and to turn to God.

"The immersed believers are congregated into societies according to their propinquity to each other, and taught to meet every first day of the week in honour and commemoration of the resurrection of Jesus, and to break the loaf which commemorates the death of the Son of God, to read and hear the living oracles, to teach and admonish one another, to unite in all prayer and praise, to contribute to the necessities of saints, and to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord.

"Every congregation chooses its own overseers and deacons, who preside over and administer the affairs of the congregations ; and every church, either from itself or in co-operation with others, sends out, as opportunity offers, one or more evangelists, or proclaimers of the word, to preach the word and to immerse those who believe, to gather congregations, and to extend the knowledge of salvation where it is necessary, as far as their means extend. But every church regards these evangelists as its servants, and therefore they have no control over any congregation, each congregation being subject to its own choice of presidents or elders whom they have appointed. Perseverance in all the work of faith, labour of love, and patience of hope, is inculcated by all the disciples as essential to admission into the heavenly kingdom.

"Such are the prominent outlines of the faith and practices of those who wish to be known as the Disciples of Christ : but no society among them would agree to make the preceding items either a confession of faith or a standard of practice ; but, for the information of those who wish an acquaintance with them, are willing to give at any time a reason for their faith, hope, and practice."

It is somewhat remarkable that in this statement of doctrine and discipline, drawn up by one of the originators of the sect of Disciples of Christ, one of their leading doctrines, that of baptismal regeneration, is scarcely made to occupy its due prominence. The Rev. R. Richardson of Virginia, however, himself a minister in connection with the body, is more explicit on the subject : "It was the unity of the church which first struck the attention : the subsequent submission to immersion is only one example, among others, of that progression which consistency with their own principles required. Thus, it was not until about ten years after this, that the definite object of immersion was fully understood, when it was recognised as the remitting ordinance of the gospel, or the appointed means through which the penitent sinner obtained an assurance of that pardon, or remission of sins, procured for him by the sufferings and death of Christ. Nor was it until a still later period, that this doctrine was practically applied, in calling upon believing penitents to be baptized for the purpose specified. This view of baptism gave great importance to the institution, and has become one of the prominent features of this reformation." Dr. Schaaf also in his 'America ; Social, Political, and Religious,' when speaking of this sect, says of them, that "they identify baptism, that is immersion, with regeneration." Dr. Baird, who seems to entertain strong prejudices against this sect, says, that "Evangelical Christians in America, Baptists, as well as Pædobaptists, have many fears about Mr. Campbell and his followers." But the Disciples are gathering strength every day, and becoming a numerous and energetic body.

DISCIPLINANTS. See FLAGELLANTS.

DISCIPLINE (ECCLESIASTICAL), the exercise of a judicial power which is claimed by the Christian church over her own members, in virtue of which she inflicts censures of various kinds and degrees on those of them who have transgressed the laws of Christ. For the nature of these censures, and the principles on which they rest, see CENSURES (ECCLESIASTICAL). The right of the church to exercise discipline, or to exclude any from her communion, was keenly controverted by Erastus and his followers, on the ground that it belongs to the civil magistrate alone to punish the guilty. Such a view was in complete consistency with the principles of Erastus, who confounded the provinces of the church and the state with each other. The two, however, are essentially distinct and separate. The chief points of difference are thus briefly noticed by Dr. James Buchanan: "They differ in their origin—the civil governor holding primarily of God, as the universal sovereign; the church holding of Christ as mediator; and this difference is of some importance, notwithstanding the great truth which is clearly affirmed in Scripture, viz., that both are now placed under Christ, who is not only 'the Head of the church,' but 'Head over all things to the church.' They differ in their extent; civil government being an ordinance of God in all nations, the church being limited to those countries where the gospel is preached. They differ in respect to some of their ends; certain secular purposes being served by the state, which are not directly contemplated by the church as a spiritual body, however much she may be fitted to aid in their attainment; and certain spiritual purposes, again, being served by the church, which the state, considered as such, cannot effect. They differ in respect to some of the means by which these ends are to be promoted; the civil magistrate having the power of the sword, which is withheld from the church, and the prerogative of making war on just and needful occasions, which is not competent to a spiritual kingdom; while the church again has warrant to use the sword of ecclesiastical discipline with which the magistrate may not interfere. They differ in respect to their officers, the civil magistrate having no power, as such, to preach or to administer the sacraments of religion; and the officers of the church, as such, having no power to exercise any function of the magistracy; so that, even were there a nation in which every subject of the state was also a member of the church, that nation would still be governed by two distinct sets of office-bearers, the one belonging to the church, the other to the commonwealth."

It is impossible to peruse the New Testament even in the most cursory manner, without being convinced that the primitive church asserted for itself the right of exercising discipline over its members. The case of the incestuous man is a case completely in point. This man had been guilty of a flagrant violation of the Divine law, and had brought serious discredit upon the Christian profession. Paul therefore enjoins the church of Corinth to which this person had belonged, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." The discipline to be exercised upon a heretic the apostle lays down in Titus iii. 10, "A man that is an heretick, after the first and second admonition reject;" and in regard to an immoral person he says, in 2 Thes. iii. 6, "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us." Some of the seven churches of Asia Minor are reproved for their neglect of the exercise of discipline in various cases, and for in this way permitting unworthy persons to remain within the Christian church.

The discipline of the Christian church is in its nature strictly spiritual and moral, not civil. It is a gross perversion of its design, therefore, to connect it with civil pains, confiscation of goods, imprisonment, bodily torture, banishment or death. Neither is it consistent with the true character of the church of Christ, to deliver up an excommunicated person, as the Church of Rome does, to the secular arm, to endure civil penalties, or even death. The church has received power, not for destruction, but for edification, and all her censures, therefore, ought to have as their ultimate design the reformation and restoration of the offenders.

The theory of ecclesiastical discipline in the Church of England is to be found in the canons adopted by convocation in 1603, which having been authorized by the King's Commission, are held to be binding on the clergy; but not having been confirmed by Parliament, they are not binding on the laity except where they are explanatory of the ancient canon law. The principles on which discipline ought to proceed according to the constitution and canons of the church are thus laid down by Mr. Conder in his 'View of All Religions:' "According to the theory of the church, every parish is committed to the government of the minister, with the assistance of the churchwardens, (generally two,) who are chosen annually, in Easter week, from the body of the parishioners, and who are the guardians of public morals and ecclesiastical discipline within their precincts. These lay officers of the church are bound by their oath to return the names of all loose and scandalous livers into the ecclesiastical court of the diocese, at least once a-year; and they may present at any other time for gross crimes. And if the churchwardens neglect their duty, and no voluntary promoter appears, the 113th canon then empowers the minister to take the business of prosecuting offenders into his own hands. If the party accused be convicted of the crime upon the testimony of at least two witnesses, before the judge of the ecclesiastical court, he may be excommunicated, and not admitted to the sacrament or any communion in divine offices, and be condemned in the costs of the suit. There is also what is termed the Greater Excommunication, whereby the offender is cut off from all commerce with Christians, even in temporal affairs. This must be pronounced by the bishop; and if the excommunicated person persist, for forty days, in contumacious disobedience, he may be committed to prison by virtue of the writ de excommunicato capiendo, to lie there till he shall have made satisfaction to the church. But, if the judge of any spiritual court excommunicate a man for a cause of which he has not the legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the king." Such is the mode of discipline which is sanctioned by the canon law of the Church of England, but the exercise of discipline in that church has almost fallen into desuetude.

In the Church of Scotland, and other Presbyterian churches, the exercise of discipline devolves in the first instance upon the kirk-sessions, which consist of the minister and elders of each congregation. From the kirk-session an appeal lies to the presbytery of the bounds, which consists of all the ministers within a certain district, along with one ruling elder chosen from each parish. From the judgment and authority of the presbytery, there lies an appeal to the provincial synod, which usually meets twice in the year, and comprises all the presbyteries within a certain large district of country. Last of all, the judgment of the synod may be appealed from to the highest ecclesiastical court, the General Assembly, which is composed of a certain number of ministers and ruling elders delegated from each presbytery, along with, in the case of the Established Church of Scotland, commissioners from the royal burghs. In questions purely religious, and not affecting temporalities, no appeal is admissible from the decisions of this court. But the ecclesiastical courts of Scotland have no such temporal authority over persons and property as belongs to the ecclesiastical courts of England; having no power either to fine or to imprison the offender, but simply enforcing their decisions by religious considerations and motives.

The Reformed churches on the Continent have great variety in their modes of discipline, and in many instances the civil magistrate arrogates to himself the functions which ought to belong to the office-bearers of the church. Thus in the Protestant church of Prussia, though the consistories exercise nominally ecclesiastical power, yet their proceedings are not a little controlled by government. In Russia, also, all is still more manifestly under the management of the sovereign. The Holy Legislative Synod is dependent entirely for the choice of its members on the will of the Czar. It is presided over by a layman, who is considered as sitting on the part of the crown, and has a negative on all its resolutions till they are laid before the emperor; and the members of the synod, in the words of their oath, acknowledge the emperor as "the supreme judge of this spiritual college."

In the Society of FRIENDS (which see), commonly called Quakers, a peculiar arrangement is made for the exercise of discipline. Monthly meetings are held, composed of several congregations situated within a convenient distance from each other. Each monthly meeting is required to appoint certain persons under the name of overseers, whose business it is to take care that the rules of discipline be put in practice, and when any case of complaint or disorderly conduct comes to their knowledge, they are bound to see that private admonition agreeably to the gospel rule, Mat. xviii. 15—17, be given before the case is reported to the monthly meeting. The quarterly meeting, which is composed of several monthly meetings, inquires into the conduct of the members connected with each, and the mode in which discipline has been exercised. The accounts thus received are digested into one, which is presented to the yearly meeting. In the case of any member who feels himself aggrieved, an appeal lies from the monthly to the quarterly, and finally to the yearly meeting, where the case takes end. There is a peculiarity, however, in the exercise of discipline among the Friends, which it may be well to notice. They believe that women may be rightly called to the work of the ministry, and that to them also belongs a share in the support of Christian discipline; and that where their own sex is concerned, its exercise devolves on them with peculiar propriety. Accordingly they have monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings of their own sex, held at the same time with those of the men; but separately, and without the power of making rules.

Among the United Brethren or Moravians, the mode of discipline followed is what is termed among them congregation-discipline, which is thus described in one of their authoritative documents: "Agreeably to the direction of our Saviour, Matt. xviii. 15—17, the congregation-discipline has various degrees, and consists in admonitions, warnings, and reproofs given to those who transgress; first, by his fellow-brother; next, by one of the elders of the congregation; and, lastly, by the committee of overseers; in exclusion from the holy communion, and, according to the nature of the case, also from other private meetings of the congregation: and this continues until genuine repentance and a real conversion become evident in the person falling under discipline; when he is either re-admitted to the holy communion, or reconciled to the congregation, after a deprecatory letter has been read, expressing the offender's sorrow for his transgression, and asking forgiveness. In case of great and public offence given, such persons are also absolved with laying on of hands in the presence of the congregation. It is, however, to be observed, that no privation of temporal honour, dignity, or substance is connected with this church or congregation-discipline; neither can this ever be the case, as it never interferes with any merely civil regulations, which fall under the cognizance of the laws of the land."

The Congregational or Independent churches maintain that the right of exercising discipline is vested in the church or body of Christians, who alone have the power of determining who shall be admitted into communion, and also of excluding from fellowship those who may prove themselves unworthy members of the church.

DISCIPLINE (FIRST BOOK OF), an important document drawn up by the Scottish Reformers in 1560, containing a plan of order, government, and discipline of the Church of Scotland. The commission appointed to prepare this volume consisted of John Knox, along with Messrs. Winram, Spotswood, Row, and Douglas. When completed, it was cordially approved of by the General Assembly, but when submitted to the privy council, it was so warmly opposed that it never received a formal ratification. Notwithstanding this, however, the church looked upon it as a standard book for the regulation of her practice and the guidance of her decisions. And besides, it is worthy of being noted, that though the First Book of Discipline was not ratified by the privy council as a body, it was subscribed by the greater number of the nobility and barons who were members of the council.

As this valuable document contains the fundamental principles on which the Scottish reformers sought to establish the Church of Scotland, we give an abstract of these principles drawn from Dr. Hetherington's History of that Church: "The ordinary and permanent office-bearers of the church were of four kinds: the minister or pastor, to whom the preaching of the gospel and administration of the sacraments belonged, the doctor or teacher, whose province it was to interpret Scripture and confute errors, including those who taught theology in schools and universities; the ruling elder, who assisted the minister in exercising ecclesiastical discipline and government; and the deacon, who had the special charge of the revenues of the church and the poor. To these permanent office-bearers there were added two others of a temporary character. In the arrangement entered into previous to the first General Assembly, there were only twelve reformed ministers to preach the gospel throughout the whole kingdom; and to accomplish the utmost possible amount of duty by so small a number, seven were placed in the chief towns, and large country districts were assigned to each of the remaining five. These five were called superintendents; and their duty was to travel from place to place throughout their districts, for the purpose of preaching, planting churches, and inspecting the conduct of the country ministers where there were any, and of another temporary class of men termed exhorters and readers. The latter class consisted of the most pious persons that could be found, who, having received a common education, were able to read to their more ignorant neighbours, though not qualified for the ministry. When the readers were found to have discharged their duty well, and to have increased in their own knowledge, they were encouraged to add a few plain exhortations to the reading of the Scriptures; and then they were termed exhorters. If they still continued to improve, they might finally be admitted to the ministry. To search out, employ, and watch over the conduct of such men, giving them instruction from time to time, was the chief duty of the superintendent, from which, indeed, he derived his name, so naturally expressive of his duty,—a duty the very nature of which shows it to have been temporary, and intended to expire whenever the necessities which called it into being should have been removed by a sufficiency of qualified ministers.

"No person was allowed to preach, or to administer the sacraments, till he was regularly called to this employment. 'Ordinary vocation [calling] consisteth in election, examination, and admission.' 'It appertaineth to the people, and to every several congregation, to elect their minister.' 'For altogether this is to be avoided, that any man be violently intruded or thrust in upon any congregation; but this liberty, with all care, must be reserved to every several church, to have their votes and suffrages in election of their ministers.' The examination was appointed to take place 'in open assembly, and before the congregation,' to satisfy the church as to his soundness in the faith, his 'gifts, utterance, and knowledge,' his willingness to undertake the charge, the purity of his motives, and his resolution to discharge the duties of the office with diligence and fidelity. Admission then took place by the person being solemnly set apart by prayer, at first without imposition of hands, which, however, was afterwards appointed to be done. Superintendents were admitted in the same way as other ministers, were tried by the same church courts, liable to the same censures, and might be deposed for the same crimes.

"The affairs of each congregation were managed by the minister, elders, and deacons, who constituted the kirk-session, which met regularly once a-week, and oftener if business required. There was also a meeting, called the weekly exercise, or prophesying, held in every considerable town, consisting of the ministers, exhorters, and educated men in the vicinity, for expounding the Scriptures. This was afterwards converted into the presbytery, or classical assembly. The superintendent met with the ministers and delegated elders of his district twice a-year, in the provincial synod, which took cognizance of ecclesiastical affairs within its bounds. And the General Assembly, which was composed of ministers and elders commissioned from the different parts of the kingdom, met twice, sometimes thrice, in a year, and attended to the interests of the National Church.

"Public worship was attended to in such a manner as to show the estimation in which it was held by our reformers. On Sabbath days the people assembled twice for public worship; and, the better to instruct the ignorant, catechising was substituted for preaching in the afternoon. In towns a sermon was regularly preached on one day of the week besides the Sabbath; and on almost every day the people had an opportunity of hearing public prayers and the reading of the Scriptures. Baptism was never dispensed unless it was accompanied with preaching or catechising. The Lord's Supper was administered four times a-year in towns; the sign of the cross in baptizing, and kneeling at the Lord's table, were forbidden; and anniversary holidays were wholly abolished.

"Education was very justly regarded as of the utmost importance, and deserving every possible encouragement. It was stated as imperatively necessary, that there should be a school in every parish, for the instruction of youth in the principles of religion, grammar, and the Latin tongue; and it was farther proposed, that a college should be erected in every 'notable town,' in which logic and rhetoric should be taught, along with the learned languages. It was even suggested that parents should not be permitted to neglect the education of their children; but that the nobility and gentry should be obliged to do so at their own expense; and that a fund should be provided for the education of the children of the poor, who discovered talents and aptitude for learning."

From the view thus given of the First Book of Discipline, it is plain that the constitution of the Reformed Church of Scotland was purely Presbyterian, and framed, as they believed, on the model of the primitive churches exhibited in the New Testament.

DISCIPLINE (SECOND BOOK OF), a system of ecclesiastical government drawn up by a committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and sanctioned by the Assembly in 1578. In the preparation of this work, Andrew Melville took a leading part. It was never ratified by Parliament, but it has continued down to the present day to be regarded as the authorized standard of the Church of Scotland, in so far as government and discipline are concerned. The following summary of its leading propositions is given by Dr. Hetherington: "It begins by stating the essential line of distinction between civil and ecclesiastical power. This it does by declaring, that Jesus Christ has appointed a government in his Church, distinct from civil government, which is to be exercised by such office-bearers as He has authorized, and not by civil magistrates, or under their direction. Civil authority has for its direct and proper object the promoting of external peace and quietness among the subjects; ecclesiastical authority, the direction of men in matters of religion, and which pertain to conscience. The former enforces obedience by external means, the latter by spiritual means; yet, 'as they be both of God, and tend to one end, if they be rightly used, to wit, to advance the glory of God, and to have good and godly subjects,' they ought to co-operate within their respective spheres, and fortify each other. 'As ministers are subject to the judgment and punishment of the magistrate in external matters, if they offend, so ought the magistrates to submit themselves to the discipline of the Church, if they transgress in matters of conscience and religion.' The government of the Church consists in three things,—doctrine, discipline, and distribution. Corresponding to this division, there are three kinds of church officers,—ministers, who are preachers as well as rulers; elders, who are merely rulers; and deacons, who act as distributors of alms and managers of the funds of the church. The name bishop is of the same meaning as that of pastor or minister: it is not expressive of superiority or lordship; and the Scriptures do not allow of a pastor of pastors, or a pastor of many flocks. There should be elders, who do not labour in word and doctrine. The eldership is a spiritual function, as is the ministry. He ought to assist the pastor in examining those who come to the Lord's table, and in visiting the sick; but their principal office is to hold assemblies with the pastors and doctors, who are also of their number, for establishing good order and execution of discipline. The office-bearers of the Church are to be admitted by election and ordination. None are to be intruded into any ecclesiastical office 'contrary to the will of the congregation to which they are appointed.' Ecclesiastical assemblies are either particular (consisting of the office-bearers of one congregation or of a number of neighbouring congregations), provincial, national or ecumenical, and general. The Presbytery, or eldership as it is called, has the inspection of a number of adjoining congregations in every thing relating to religion and manners, and has the power of ordaining, suspending, and deposing ministers, and of exercising discipline within its bounds. The provincial Synod possesses the power of all the Presbyteries within a province. The General Assembly is composed of commissioners, ministers, and elders, from the whole churches in the realm, and takes cognizance of every thing connected with the welfare of the National Church. Appeals for redress of grievances may be taken from every subordinate court to its next superior one, till they reach the General Assembly, whose decision in all matters ecclesiastical is final. All the ecclesiastical assemblies have lawful power to convene for transacting business, and to appoint the times and places of their meeting. The patrimony of the Church includes whatever has been appropriated to her use, whether by donations from individuals, or by law and custom. To take any part of this by unlawful means, and apply it to the particular and profane use of individuals, is simony. It belongs to the deacons to receive the ecclesiastical goods, and to distribute them according to the appointment of Presbyteries. The purposes to which they are to be applied are the four following: the support of ministers; the support of elders where that is necessary, and of a national system of education; the maintenance of the poor and of hospitals; and the reparation of places of worship, and other extraordinary charges of the Church or commonwealth. Among the remaining abuses which ought to be removed, the following are particularly specified: the titles of abbots, and others connected with monastic institutions, with the places which they held, as churchmen, in the legislative and judicial courts; the usurped superiority of bishops, and their acting in parliament and council in the name of the Church, without her commission; the exercise of criminal jurisdiction and the pastoral office by the same individuals; the mixed jurisdiction of commissaries; the holding of pluralities; and patronages and presentations to benefices, whether by the prince or any inferior person, which lead to intrusion, and are incompatible with 'lawful election and the assent of the people over whom the person is placed, as the practice of the apostolical and primitive Kirk, and good order, crave.'"

The Second Book of Discipline has ever occupied a high place in the estimation of all Scottish Presbyterians; and "the principal secessions," as Dr. M'Crie well remarks, "which have been made from the National Church in this part of the kingdom, have been stated, not in the way of dissent from its constitution as in England, but in opposition to departures, real or alleged, from its original and genuine principles." See SCOTLAND (CHURCH OF).

DISPENSATIONS, special modes of providential dealing with individuals or communities; thus we speak of the Adamic Dispensation, the Abrahamic Dispensation, the Jewish Dispensation, and so forth.—The term is also used in an ecclesiastical as well as a theological sense. Thus, in the Church of Rome, a dispensation means a permission from the Pope to do what may have been prohibited. Thus before any one in communion with that church can contract a marriage within the forbidden degrees, he must have previously received a dispensation from the Pope.—In the Church of England the word dispensation denotes a power vested in the archbishops, of dispensing, on certain emergencies, with some minor regulations of the church, more particularly in her character as an establishment.

DISPUTATIONS, a name sometimes given to the sermons preached in the ancient Christian church, from the controversial character which they often of necessity assumed.

DISSENTERS, those denominations and sects which have separated from, and refuse to have fellowship with, the established church of a country. As distinguished from SECEDERS (which see), the word Dissenters is now generally employed to denote those who have left communion with an established church from their conscientious disapproval of all connection between the church and the state. See VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY.

DISSENTERS (ENGLISH), a term usually applied to the Three DENOMINATIONS (which see), the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists. The original Nonconformists were the great bulk of them of Presbyterian principles, and the Westminster Assembly was composed chiefly of Presbyterian divines, not more than ten or twelve of them being of the Independent denomination, and the great anxiety of that Assembly evidently was to establish Presbyterian uniformity throughout both England and Scotland. It was only, indeed, through the determined resistance of the small body of Independents that this object was defeated. During the reign of Elizabeth most of the Puritans had objected to separation from the Church of England, on the ground of doctrine, though they sought a reformation of her discipline and worship, the greater number of them being Presbyterians. But there were among the Puritans some Independents and some Baptists, whose objections were of a more serious character, disapproving as they did of all national churches. The statute of 1593, commanding the attendance of every person above sixteen at some church, bore hardly against the Independents. Many of them were imprisoned, and not a few were compelled to seek refuge in a foreign land. Brown, the originator of the sect of the BROWNISTS (which see), found a home, along with a number of his followers, in Holland. Towards the Puritans, Queen Elizabeth exercised the utmost severity during the whole of her reign, and numerous churches of exiled Dissenters sprung up at Leyden, Middleburgh, Rotterdam, and other Dutch towns, not only separated from the Church of England, but animated with a bitter hostility to the principle of established churches. This, indeed, came to be a settled doctrine of the body of English Independents. The keen discussion which took place at this time gave origin to Richard Hooker's 'Ecclesiastical Polity,' one of the ablest pieces of controversial theology which England has ever produced. The first four books appeared in 1594, and the fifth in 1597. "They have in them," said Pope Clement VIII., on hearing only a small part of them translated into Latin, "such seeds of eternity, that if the rest be like this they shall remain till the last fire shall consume all learning."

The death of Elizabeth and the accession of James I. to the throne of England, naturally revived the hopes of the Puritan Dissenters. The king had been educated in Presbyterian principles, and had openly avowed a warm attachment to what he termed "the purest kirk in the world;" but no sooner did he plant his foot on English ground, than he straightway abjured his former views, and became a warm advocate for Episcopacy, alleging that "where there was no bishop, there would shortly be no king." The Dissenters, however, had become too powerful a party to be treated with contempt, or even neglect. James, therefore, to conciliate them if possible, summoned a conference at Hampton Court between four of their principal leaders and a select number of bishops and divines of the Established Church, himself being president. The debate, which was earnest on both sides, occupied three days, and the result was, that a few unimportant alterations were made in the English Liturgy, which were published by the king's authority, and universally adopted, though they were never ratified by parliament. One great and, indeed, inestimable benefit which occurred from the Hampton Court conference, was the suggestion which the king carried out to procure a new and revised translation of the Bible. This delicate task was most satisfactorily accomplished by the preparation and publication of the admirable authorized version of the Holy Scriptures.

Under James I. the Puritan Dissenters were still treated with great severity, and many of them fled to Holland, whence considerable numbers emigrated to America in 1620. Another party followed in 1629, and a third in 1636, and when prevented from transporting themselves to New England, many of them removed with their families to the Netherlands. In 1637, the laws of uniformity were enforced against Dissenters; but, in 1640, the parliament checked these severities. It has been often brought forward as a charge against the English Dissenters that they were zealous and active in their opposition to Charles I., but it is a well-known fact that the execution of the monarch was the deed of a faction, and condemned by the Puritans generally, as an act of criminal severity. "But whatever blame," says Mr. Robert Hall, "they may be supposed to have incurred on account of their conduct to Charles, the merit of restoring monarchy in his son was all their own. The entire force of the empire was in their hands; Monk himself of their party; the parliament, the army, all puritans; yet were they disinterested enough to call the heir to the throne, and yield the reins into his hands, with no other stipulation than that of liberty of conscience, which he violated with a baseness and ingratitude peculiar to his character. All the return he made them for the recovery of his power, consisted in depriving two thousand of their ministers, and involving the whole body in a persecution, by which not less than ten thousand are supposed to have perished in imprisonment and want. But their patriotism was not to be shaken by these injuries. When, towards the latter end of Charles the Second's reign, the character of his successor inspired a dread of the establishment of popery, to avert that evil they cheerfully acquiesced in an exclusion from all places of emolument and trust; an extraordinary instance of magnanimity. When James the Second began to display arbitrary views, dissenters were among the first to take the alarm, regarding with jealousy even an indulgence when it flowed from a dispensing power. The zeal with which they co-operated in bringing about the revolution, the ardour with which they have always espoused its principles, are too well known to need any proof, and can only be rendered more striking by a contrast with the conduct of the high church party. The latter maintained, in its utmost extent, the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance; were incessantly engaged in intrigues to overturn the revolution; and affirmed the doctrine of divine right to be an ancient and indisputable tenet of the English Church. Whoever wishes to ascertain the existence of those arts, by which they embroiled the reign of King William, may see them displayed at large in Burnet's 'History of his own Times.'

"The attachment of dissenters to the house of Hanover was signalized in a manner too remarkable to be soon forgotten. In the rebellions of fifteen and forty-five, they ventured on a breach of the law, by raising and officering regiments out of their own body; for which the parliament were reduced to the awkward expedient of passing an act of indemnity. This short sketch of their political conduct, as it is sufficient to establish their loyalty beyond suspicion, so may it well augment our surprise at the extreme obloquy and reproach with which they are treated. Mr. Hume, a competent judge, if ever there was one, of political principles, and who was far from being partial to dissenters, candidly confesses that to them we are indebted for the preservation of liberty."

In 1688 the Toleration Act was passed, placing the assemblies of Dissenters under the protection of the state, but by the provisions of this very act all Dissenting ministers were required to qualify for the exercise of their ministerial functions, by subscribing the thirty-nine Articles, with certain exceptions. This continued to be the state of the law till 1779, when, by an act passed in that year, any Dissenting minister, who had scruples in declaring and subscribing his assent to any of the articles, was allowed to make and subscribe instead thereof the declaration of Protestant belief, and was thereby entitled to similar exemptions. A subsequent statute renders qualifying for the exercise of ministerial functions unnecessary except in obedience to a legal requisition.

In the aggregate, according to the last census in 1851, the Protestant Dissenting churches of England are reported as providing accommodation for 4,657,422 persons, or for 26 per cent. of the population, and 45.6 per cent. of the aggregate provision of the country. This statement includes the Wesleyan Methodists, many of whom object to be called Dissenters.

DISSENTERS (SCOTTISH). For a very long period, in the ecclesiastical history of Scotland, dissent was utterly unknown. From 1560, when the Reformed Church of Scotland was founded, onward to the commencement of the eighteenth century, not only did the Established Church possess an undivided hold of the affections of the people, but the principle of an establishment seems never to have been doubted. The old Dissenters, it is true, or Reformed Presbyterians, who had been all along opposed to the Revolution settlement of Church and State in 1688, and who are the remains of the COVENANTERS (which see), are of longer standing than any other denomination of separatists from the National Church. They are strenuous advocates, however, for the obligation of the National Covenant, and of the Solemn League and Covenant, both of which, as well as the Westminster Confession of Faith, which they acknowledge as the confession of their own faith, maintain, in the most decided terms, the principle of a national ecclesiastical establishment. The question, however, of the lawfulness of a National Church was first formally started by Mr. John Glas of Tealing, about 1728. Though minister of a parish, he began to promulgate views inconsistent with the acknowledged standards of the church. In the course of his examination before the Synod of Angus and Mearns, to which he belonged, the question was put to him, "Is it your opinion that there is no warrant for a National Church under the New Testament?" to which he replied, "It is my opinion, for I can see no churches instituted by Christ in the New Testament, besides the universal, but congregational churches: neither do I see that a nation can be a church unless it could be made a congregation, as was the nation of Israel." A long controversy ensued which for some time agitated both the Church and the country. Mr. Glas was at length deposed, but he still continued the exercise of his ministry, and his followers, under the name of GLASITES (which see), formed congregations, or rather churches, on independent principles throughout various towns and parishes of Scotland. The next secession from the Church of Scotland was that which originated in the resistance and protest of four ministers against the decision of the General Assembly in 1732, and who, being joined by others, formed themselves into the ASSOCIATE PRESBYTERY (which see). The ground of their secession was the arbitrary enforcement, by the majority of the General Assembly, of the law of patronage, and the settlement of ministers contrary to the wishes of the Christian people. The four brethren, when cut off from the communion of the Established Church, read at the bar, and laid upon the table of the Assembly, a solemn protest, which they concluded in these words, "And we hereby appeal unto the first free faithful and reforming General Assembly of the Church of Scotland." It was plain, therefore, that the brethren in no sense dissented from the constitution and standards of the church, as Mr. Glas had done, but simply seceded or separated themselves from it, as they hoped only for a time, looking forward to the possibility of the period arriving when they and all who adhered to them would be able conscientiously to rejoin the communion of the church from which they had been reluctantly severed. The Secession, which thus arose, rapidly increased in numbers, but in 1747 the body became separated into two distinct Christian communities, the one being the ASSOCIATE BURGHER SYNOD (which see), and the other the ASSOCIATE ANTI-BURGHER SYNOD (which see). The rupture which thus took place in the Secession Church at so early a period of its history, arose simply from a difference of opinion as to the lawfulness of taking the Burgess oath then exacted in several of the royal burghs of Scotland. For seventy-three years this division was maintained, both parties in their separate capacity extending and multiplying throughout the whole country, and at length the Burgess oath having been abolished, and the original ground of quarrel being thus removed, the two synods, in 1820, were reunited under the name of the United Associate Synod of the Secession Church.

From an early period of their history, so early indeed as 1743, the Seceders had evidently to some extent begun to entertain doubts as to the extent of power alleged by the Westminster Confession to belong to the civil magistrate in matters of religion. In an official document issued by the Associate Presbytery in that year, they distinctly declare that "the public good of outward and common order in all reasonable society to the glory of God is the great and only end which those invested with magistracy can propose in a sole respect to that office." And, further, they go on to say, that, "as in prosecuting this end civilly, according to their office, it is only over men's good and evil work that they can have any inspection, so it is only over those which they must needs take cognizance of, for the said public good; while at the same time their doing so must be in such a manner, and proceed so far altogether as is requisite for that end, without assuming any lordship immediately over men's consciences, or making any encroachment upon the special privileges or business of the church." These words, though capable of being interpreted so as to involve no dissent from the principle of an established church, admit undoubtedly of being understood in a sense opposed to that principle. And, accordingly, we learn from Dr. M'Kerrow, in his 'History of the Secession Church,' that when any of their preachers or ministers, or elders, entertained doubts upon the subject, they were uniformly told that they were to understand the two doubtful paragraphs of the Confession of Faith on the power of the civil magistrate, in matters of religion, only in such a sense as corresponded with the explanation given in the Presbytery's answers to Mr. Nairn.

It was not, however, until the year 1796 that the point which converted secession into dissent was brought publicly before the courts of the Secession Church. Two young candidates for the ministry, one of whom was the afterwards celebrated Dr. Thomas M'Crie, declared their doubts concerning the doctrine taught in the Confession of Faith regarding the power of the magistrate in matters of religion, and requested that the moderator of the Associate Antiburgher Presbytery of Edinburgh, in proposing the questions of the formula to them previous to their ordination, should be allowed to intimate that they were not to be understood as giving their sentiments on that point. In these circumstances the Presbytery felt themselves in a position in which it was impossible for them to take any further steps towards the ordination of the two young men without the express sanction of the Supreme Court. The matter was accordingly carried up by reference to the Synod, and a declaratory act was prepared by a committee which, after being read and amended, was unanimously adopted. The views of the body were fully brought out in this document, which ran as follows: "The synod finding that they cannot at present enter on a particular consideration of the overture, respecting the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion,—but convinced of the urgent necessity of doing something in the meantime to obviate the scruples which young men at license, preachers and elders at ordination, private persons at their accession and baptism of their children, have offered to the courts about the doctrine or manner of expression, used on that subject, in the Confession of Faith, chap. xxiii., sect. 3d, and chap. xx., sect. 4th.

"Declare, That as the Confession of Faith was at first received by the Church of Scotland with some exception, as to the power of the civil magistrate relative to spiritual matters, so the synod, for the satisfaction of all who desire to know their mind on this subject, extend that exception to every thing in the Confession which, taken by itself, seems to allow the punishment of good and peaceable subjects on account of their religious opinions and observances: That they approve of no other means of bringing men into the church, or retaining them in it, than such as are spiritual, and were used by the apostles and other ministers of the word in the first ages of the Christian church, persuasion not force, the power of the gospel not the sword of the civil magistrate, agreeably to that most certain and important doctrine laid down in the Confession itself, chap. xx., sect. 2d. 'God alone is the Lord of the conscience, and has left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men, which are in any thing contrary to his word, or beside it, in matters of faith or worship; so that to believe such doctrines, or obey such commands out of conscience, is to betray true liberty of conscience and reason also.

"Nor do the synod mean the smallest reflection on the venerable compilers of the Confession, whose degrees of light on these matters, and peculiar circumstances, seem to have led them to use some expressions that have been understood by many, and may be construed as investing civil rulers with a lordship over the consciences of men, and inconsistent with the spirituality, freedom, and independence of the kingdom of Christ. And the synod hereby renew their adherence to the doctrine on this point, in the Declaration and Defence of the Associate Presbytery's principles concerning the present civil government."

The Antiburgher Synod accordingly, after this important preamble, and inserting the passages which we have already quoted from the Associate Presbytery's answer to Mr. Nairn, enacted that in the second question of the formula, after the words, "as the said Confession was received and approved by an Act of Assembly, 1647, session 23," there shall be added, "and according to the declaration of the General Associate Synod, 1796." This declaratory Act satisfied the scruples of the two young men, who thereupon submitted to ordination. But in the course of a few years the views of Dr. M'Crie on the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion underwent a change. This change he formally announced in a sermon which he preached at the opening of the General Associate Synod in 1800; and the adherence of the synod to the sentiments expressed in the above act, led to his renunciation of all connection with the body. In their new Testimony which they issued in 1804, the connexion between Church and State was plainly and explicitly condemned. Thus from the original position of Seceders the General Associate (Antiburgher) Synod passed into the position of Dissenters. The Associate (Burgher) Synod were called to enter into a discussion on the same controverted point, which was followed as in the other case by a breach in the Synod, some of the members forming themselves into a separate society. The discussion which arose is usually known by the name of the FORMULA CONTROVERSY in Scotland. In the course of the discussions, which were keen and protracted, a proposal was made that the article as to the magistrate's power in the concerns of religion should be made a matter of forbearance. The Synod, however, refused to agree to this proposal, and they prefixed to the Formula a declaration explanatory of the sense in which preachers and ministers were understood to give their assent to the doctrine of the Confession of Faith on this point. The declaration, which was usually called the preamble, in so far as it bore upon this point, ran in these words: "That whereas some parts of the standard-books of this synod have been interpreted as favouring compulsory measures in religion, the synod hereby declare, that they do not require an approbation of any such principle from any candidate for licence or ordination."

By the expression which occurs in the preamble, "compulsory measures in religion," the Associate Synod obviously meant nothing more than a declaration against all persecution for conscience' sake. Though no opinion was given by the Synod on the subject of the magistrate's power in religious matters, the simple occurrence of an expression which had a remote reference to the subject, gave rise to a bitter controversy both in sessions and congregations. The press also teemed with pamphlets on the subject. The Synod was accused of abandoning the avowed principles of the Secession. To repel this accusation, a synodical address was printed and circulated declaring their adherence to the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland. Notwithstanding this avowal, they continued to be misunderstood and misrepresented, and therefore, they found it necessary at their meeting in September 1800, to insert in their minutes a statement explanatory of their views with regard to the power of the civil magistrate. The statement was to this effect, "That it is the duty of the Christian magistrate to be a praise to them that do well, and a terror to evil-doers, such as contemptuous profaners of the holy name and Sabbath of the Lord, and perjured persons, as disturbers of the peace and good order of society." The general language adopted in this statement, as well as in all that the Associate Synod had given forth on the vexed point of the magistrate's power, renders it impossible to regard them as having set forth an explicit avowal of what have since been called voluntary principles, such as emanated from the other branch of the Secession Church.

When the two Synods, the Burgher and Anti-burgher, coalesced into one in 1820, the second article of the Basis of Union ran in these words: "We retain the Westminster Confession of Faith, with the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, as the confession of our faith, expressive of the sense in which we understand the Holy Scriptures,—it being always understood, however, that we do not approve or require an approbation of any thing in those books, or in any other, which teaches, or may be thought to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles of religion." In a note appended to this article, the United Secession Church refers for an explanation of its views to the statement made by the Associate Presbytery on the subject in 1743, and which we have already quoted. Soon after a new Testimony was issued, which was drawn up with great ability, but the question of the magistrate's power in matters of religion was not attempted to be dogmatically settled. It still remains a matter of forbearance, and while a number both of the ministers and people maintain with the utmost tenacity the principle of voluntary churches, such a principle has never been converted into a term of communion or fellowship with the body.

The subject of civil establishments of religion, which had agitated both the Burgher and Anti-burgher sections of the Secession Church while in their separate capacity, was far from being settled and set at rest by their union. No sooner had the United Secession Church been formed, than a controversy on this very subject arose, and was carried on with a bitterness and acrimony of spirit, which was creditable neither to the one party in the dispute, nor to the other. The Voluntary Controversy, as it was called, raged for several years with the most unbridled fury on both sides, and numbers both of the ministers and members of the United Secession Church now assumed towards the Established Church of Scotland the attitude of firm and uncompromising dissent.

The new position which the great mass of the Seceders now occupied in relation to the National Church, tended to attract the favourable attention and regard of another body, which had been also an offshoot from the Established Church of the land, though at a much later period than that at which the elder branch of the Secession had occurred. The Relief Body, to which we now refer, was founded by the Rev. Thomas Gillespie, minister of Carnock, who was deposed in 1752, for refusing to take part in the settlement of a minister at Inverkeithing, in the face of the remonstrances of the Christian people. "He had joined the church," says Dr. Struthers, "testifying against the power of the civil magistrate in religious matters, as laid down in the Confession of Faith. His obedience to church courts he considered 'as limited by the word of God and his own conscience.' He considered patronage as 'antichristian,'—'all persecution as sinful,' and 'the kingdom of Christ as totally distinct from the kingdoms of this world.' Nay, the party in the church with whom he acted, went even so far as to consider 'a civil Establishment, and the annexing to it of civil emoluments, a mere State arrangement, no way essentially connected with a gospel church, and that to inflict ecclesiastical censures upon ministers who would not carry out a mere State arrangement, was stamping with the image of Christ what should bear the image and superscription of Cæsar.'" The next who left the Church of Scotland on the same grounds with Mr. Gillespie, was the Rev. Thomas Boston, son of the distinguished author of the 'Fourfold State,' and the congregation which he formed at Jedburgh was founded on the principles of the Presbyterian Dissenters in England. He declared his dissent from the National Church, on the footing of her departure from the ancient policy and discipline, with respect to planting vacant parishes with gospel ministers.

Soon after, another congregation having been formed on the same principles at Colinsburgh in Fife, in consequence of a forced settlement in the parish of Kilconquhar, a Presbytery was formed, called the Presbytery of Relief, evidently from the idea that the formation of this body afforded a relief to oppressed consciences, who were groaning under the yoke of patronage, and the tyrannical conduct of the courts of the Establishment. The principles of the Relief body, on the power of the civil magistrate, are thus laid down by Mr. Hutchison, one of their ministers: "Every civil magistrate ought to have a power of judging, in matters of religion, for himself, for this belongs to him as a man and a Christian, and therefore he ought not to be deprived of it by becoming a magistrate. But as, by becoming the supreme magistrate, he does not lose the unalienable right of judging for himself in religious matters: so, by being raised to supremacy in the state, he acquires no right over his subjects, to prescribe to them in matters of religion, or to interfere with the sacred rights of Christians, to regulate their faith, conscience, and religious worship, according to the information and conviction of truth and duty, which they have received from the word of God. In these things the conscience is sacred to God, the alone Lord of the conscience: and Christians, in these matters, are accountable only to Christ, as their Master and Lord, and must stand or fall by his judgment. As the civil magistrate is a member of the church, he is not a ruler, but a subject of Christ's kingdom; and, if he is a good man, he will account this a higher honour and privilege, than to be the head of the civil state. As he is a member of the church, he is upon the same footing with other Christians. The meanest subject of Christ's kingdom has as good a right to all the privileges of it, as the greatest prince on earth; for here is no respect of persons, and no man is known after the flesh." A few years after another Relief minister still more explicitly speaks of the alliance between Church and State: "The church is catholic, composed of all the faithful in Christ Jesus scattered abroad over the face of the earth; of the redeemed out of every kindred, tribe, and nation; of all who in every place call on the name of the Lord Jesus out of a pure heart, and love him in sincerity and truth. These, and these only, are the children of the kingdom, and are all brethren, however they may be distinguished from one another by birth, language, complexion, education, station, local situation, or other accidental circumstances. This is the church of Christ; and its catholic nature shows at first view that it cannot be thrown into any national or provincial mould. Yet in nations where the Christian religion has been generally professed, princes and states have thought proper to interpose their authority, by attempting to give it a civil establishment, which it is not capable of receiving. For what in effect have these boasted guardians of religion, and affectionate nurses of the church, established, or can they establish, that is, enforce by their authority? Not the original plan of that grace which hath appeared unto men bringing salvation; that must stand on the basis of divine institution, and its own intrinsic excellence; and it is calculated to be the religion of every man for himself voluntarily chosen and voluntarily professed, on which its whole value and efficacy depend; not to be the religion of civil communities, as such, and enforced by their authority, for they are not capable of it. But on examination it will be found that the civil powers (while they pretended to establish Christianity) have only established peculiar forms of profession, and particular sects of professing Christians, giving them an outward sanction, and granting them certain exclusive civil privileges, and when thus embodied nick-naming them the church. The church by law established! What a pompous title! What a glorious privilege! How secure are they who are within her consecrated pale! High is their dignity. They are the best citizens, and the only Christians! Worthy therefore of the civil patronage they receive. Their creed, their ritual, their understandings, their wills, their consciences, are all stamped with the great seal of civil authority! They have surely reason to rejoice that they are authorized to be Christians, and that they have received a patent which warrants them to worship their Maker! Oh the blasphemy! Oh the daring impiety!"

Throughout the whole of her history as a distinct religious denomination, the Relief Church holding the principles of Free Communion, admitted to the Lord's Supper members of the Established as well as Secession churches. Still, however, she maintained her character as essentially a Dissenting body. And as soon as the Voluntary controversy arose, and many in the Secession Church took so determined a stand against all state churches, the Relief Church began to fraternise with her more cordially than she had ever done before. "Similar in their origin," says Dr. Andrew Thomson, "and not unlike in their history, beholding the Established Church from the same standing point, it was not to be wondered at, that when the Voluntary controversy arose, the two bodies should be found thinking alike on this question, and launching their mutual protestations both against the corruptions of the Established Church and against the system from which those corruptions rose." Both denominations now began to think of union. Overtures upon the subject were laid upon the tables of both Synods, friendly deputations passed from the one Synod to the other, and committees of both Synods held meetings to consider the proposed union. At length, on the 13th of May 1847, the two churches became one under the designation of the United Presbyterian Church; which is neither avowedly in its standards, nor by any public act, a Voluntary church, though many both of its ministers and people are opposed to an alliance between the church and the state.

The Free Church of Scotland, the latest and largest of those religious bodies which have left the National Establishment, have never thus far in their history taken the position of Dissenters. On the contrary, they disown all hostility to Established Churches as such, and freely admit the authority of the civil magistrate, circa sacra, about sacred things, though not in sacris, in sacred things.

Among the Scottish Dissenters we must necessarily class all Congregationalists and Baptists, who disapprove of national churches, and Episcopalians, Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics, who disapprove of the church order and government of the Church of Scotland, though they may hold in all its strictness the principle of a civil establishment of religion. The Scottish Dissenters, strictly so called, including only those who object to state churches in general, or to the constitution and government of the Church of Scotland in particular, are calculated, according to the last census in 1851, to possess in round numbers 1,300 places of worship.

DISSIDENTERS (VOLUNTARY). See VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY.

DISSIDENTS, the official name given to the anti-Romanists of Poland. From the period of the first introduction of the principles of the Reformation into that country, the Dissidents, as they were called, were subjected to much injustice and oppression on the part of the dominant church as well as of the government. In the course of the eighteenth century a favourable re-action commenced. The Empress Catherine of Russia declared for the Polish Dissidents, and was joined by Frederic the Second of Prussia. These two monarchs supported the claims of the Dissidents with such determination and even violence, that many, who were disposed to agree with them on religious grounds, felt their national pride deeply wounded. The influence of Russia led these Dissidents to form two confederations for the recovery of their rights, one at Thorn in Polish Prussia, and another at Sutzk in Lithuania. These two confederations, composed of Protestants, including Lutherans, Calvinists, Greeks, and Armenians, supported also by the Greek bishop of Mohiloff, reckoned only five hundred and seventy-three members. Many of the Protestants loudly disapproved of these violent measures, and many bitterly regretted that they had allowed themselves to become the tools of foreign influence. But it was too late to retrace their steps, and great numbers, under the pressure of external force, joined the confederations. At length, in 1767, the Dissidents of Poland were re-admitted to equal rights with the Roman Catholics, after a long negotiation, in which not only the Russian ambassador and the Prussian minister, but also those of England, Denmark, and Sweden took a part. The condition of the Dissidents in Poland from 1733, when August

III. was elected king, till 1764, when Catherine of Russia interfered in their favour, was melancholy in the extreme, as is evident from the memorial which they presented to King Stanislaus Poniatowski, and to the diet of 1766, in which they state a few of their grievances in these terms: "Our churches have been partly taken from us, under various pretences, and are partly falling into ruins, as their reparation is prohibited, and a permission for doing it cannot be obtained without much difficulty and cost. Our youths are obliged to grow up in ignorance, and without the knowledge of God, as schools are forbidden to us in many places. Many difficulties are frequently opposed to the vocation of ministers to our churches; and their visits to the sick and dying are exposed to much danger. We must dearly pay for permission to perform the rites of baptism, marriage, and burial, because the price for it is arbitrarily fixed by those who give this permission. The burying of our dead even at night is exposed to great danger; and we are obliged, in order to baptize children, to carry them out of the country. The jus patronatus in our estates is disputed to us; and our churches are subject to the visitation of Roman Catholic bishops; our church discipline, maintained according to the ancient order is subject to great impediments. In many towns, people belonging to our confession are compelled to follow Roman Catholic processions. The ecclesiastical laws, or jura canonica, are imposed upon us. Not only are children proceeding from mixed marriages obliged to be educated in the Roman Catholic religion, but children of a Protestant widow who marries a Roman Catholic are obliged to follow the religion of their stepfather. We are called heretics, although the laws of the country accord to us the name of Dissidents. Our oppression becomes the more grievous, as we have no patron either in the senate, or at the diets, the tribunals, or any jurisdiction whatever. Even at the elections we dare not appear without exposing ourselves to an evident danger; and for some time we have been cruelly used, in opposition to the ancient laws of the country."

The Polish Dissidents have often been reproached for having recourse to foreign influence and intervention to recover their rights, but who could blame them for hailing a friendly hand stretched out from any quarter, to obtain deliverance from wrongs which were almost past human endurance? In the last struggle for their country in 1794, the Polish Protestants signalized themselves by their valour and heroism. The most recent account of the state of the Dissidents or Protestants of Poland, is given by the late Count Krasinski, in his 'Sketch of the Religious History of the Slavonic Nations:'. "With regard to the present condition of Protestantism in Poland," says he, "it is by no means such as the friends of the Reformation would desire. Szafarik, in his Slavonic ethnography, computes the number of Protestant Poles in round numbers at four hundred and forty-two thousand, the great majority of whom are in Prussia proper and Silesia. There is a considerable number of Protestants in Poland, but they are German settlers, of whom many, however, have become Polanized, and are Poles by language and feeling. According to the statistical account published in 1845, there were in the kingdom of Poland, i. e., that part of the Polish territory which was annexed to Russia by the treaty of Vienna, in a population of four millions eight hundred and fifty-seven thousand two hundred and fifty; two hundred and fifty-two thousand and nine Lutherans, three thousand seven hundred and ninety reformed, and five hundred and forty-six Moravians. I have no statistical data regarding the Protestant population in other Polish provinces under the Russian dominion. I can therefore only say, from personal knowledge, that about twenty years ago there were between twenty and thirty churches of the Genevese Confession. Their congregations, consisting principally of the gentry, are far from being numerous, with the exception of two, whose congregations, composed of peasantry, amount to about three or four thousand souls.

"The Protestant clergy of the Genevese Confession in Lithuania derive their support from estates, as well as from other kinds of property, belonging to their churches, and with which they have been endowed by their founders. The advantages of a permanent endowment over the voluntary principle has been strikingly illustrated by the Protestant churches and schools in Poland, because, whilst almost all those which were supported by the last-named means fell to the ground as soon as their patrons or congregations, by whom they had been supported, became unfaithful to their religion, were dispersed or impoverished by persecution, or other causes, all those churches and schools which had the advantage of a permanent endowment withstood almost every kind of adversity, and greatly contributed to maintain in their faith the Protestant inhabitants of the place where they were situated. In speaking of this subject, I cannot refrain from observing, with no little gratification to my national feelings, that, notwithstanding the immense influence which the Jesuits exercised over my country, it never was able to obliterate the sense of justice and legality from the national mind so much as to obtain a confiscation of the property belonging to the Protestant churches and schools, though these fathers have given abundant proofs that there would be no lack of intention on their part to do so if they could.

"In Prussian Poland there were, according to the census of 1845, in the provinces of western Prussia, or ancient Polish Prussia, in a population of one million nineteen thousand one hundred and five, five hundred and two thousand one hundred and forty-eight Protestants; and in that of Posen, in a population of one million three hundred and sixty-four thousand three hundred and ninety-nine, there were four hundred and sixteen thousand six hundred and forty-eight Protestants. Amongst these Protestants there are Poles, but unfortunately their number, instead of increasing, daily decreases, owing to the efforts of the government to Germanize, by all means, its Slavonic subjects. The worship in almost all the Protestant churches is in German; and the service in Polish, instead of being encouraged, is discouraged. The continual efforts of the Prussian government to Germanize the Slavonic population of its Polish province, gave to Romanism in that province the great advantage of being considered, and not without justice, the bulwark of the Polish nationality, and inflicted a great injury upon Protestantism. The bulk of the population call Protestantism the German religion, and consider the Church of Rome as the national one. Owing to this cause, many patriots who would have been otherwise much more inclined to Protestantism than to the Church of Rome, have rallied under the banner of the latter, as the only means of preserving their nationality from the encroachment of Germanism. It is on this account that the German press accuses the Poles of Posen of being bigoted Romanists, and under the dominion of the priesthood. This I may emphatically deny. The Polish League, or the National Association of Prussian Poland, which had been formed in 1848 for the preservation of its nationality by legal and constitutional means, but particularly by the promotion of education, the national language and literature, and which comprehended almost every respectable Pole of that province, had for its honorary president the Archbishop of Posen, whilst the chairman of its directing committee was a Protestant nobleman, Count Gustavus Potworowski."

The name of Dissidents is also sometimes applied to the new religious denomination which has recently been formed in France by the secession of several pastors and congregations from the Reformed churches at the new Assembly, which met on the 11th September 1848. Long and serious discussions took place in that assembly regarding the Confessions of Faith. The members were divided on points of doctrine, but the majority agreed to waive these points, and to draw up an address expressing their common belief. Some of the members protested against this decision and withdrew. They have since formed with the Independent congregations then existing a new religious body under the name of the Union of the Evangelical Churches of France. The first meeting of their synod was held on the 20th of August 1849, and drew up a profession of faith and an ecclesiastical constitution for the flocks which it represented. DIVI (Lat. gods). See MYTHOLOGY.

DIVI, the demons of the ancient Persians. They believed them to be male and female, the former called Neri and the latter Peri. They supposed that before the creation of man the world was governed for seven thousand years by the male Divi, and then for two thousand years more by the female Divi. But both of these classes of beings having fallen into sin, God set over them Eblis, who was formed out of the element of fire, and who having come from heaven to earth, made war upon the rebellious Divi and overcame them, taking possession of this lower world, which had before this been inhabited by demons. Eblis was elated with pride, and God, being provoked to anger at his presumption, resolved to humble him. With this view he created man, and commanded Eblis and the rest of the angels to worship him. But Eblis having refused to humble himself, was deprived of his sovereignty over this world, and subjected to the curse of God.

DIVINATION, the art of foretelling future events from certain previously understood signs. The first and fundamental conception which seems to have given rise to the art appears to have been the supposition that there were some persons who enjoyed the peculiar privilege of learning the secrets of the future by immediate personal intercourse with the Divine Being. That there were individuals, in very early times, who made pretensions to such intercourse is highly probable. Nay, there is a Rabbinical tradition that as the tempter promised to Eve as an inducement to partake of the forbidden fruit, "Behold ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," divination was one branch of the knowledge which had been forbidden to man, but which he obtained by the fall. The Rabbis further allege in the Talmud, that although Adam made no use of the art of divination, it was extensively used by Cain and his wicked descendants.

The Jews were not absolutely prohibited from inquiring into the future. On the contrary, they were expressly provided with prophets or seers, who revealed by Divine inspiration what was yet to come. They had also the privilege of the Urim and Thummim, sacred oracles, on consulting which they might learn events which were as yet hidden in the womb of futurity. From all other modes, however, of prying into the secrets of the future, the Jews were forbidden under the heavy penalty of death by stoning. And yet notwithstanding the Divine prohibition, many different kinds of divination are mentioned in Scripture as having been in use among the ancient Jews. And in Deut. xviii. 10, 11, we find this command given by God: "There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer."

Among the heathen nations of antiquity direct communications were believed to be made in special cases, particularly to seers and prophets. APOLLO was considered as generally the source from which supernatural knowledge of this kind was derived. Hence of all the ancient oracles, that of Apollo at Delphi was the most celebrated. The art of divination is said by Herodotus to have been derived from Egypt; at least the Egyptians were the first who introduced the sacred festivals, processions, and supplications, and by them the Greeks were instructed in these things. At length there arose in Greece a separate class of individuals who possessed the character of seers or manteis, who, under the influence of the gods, made known the future. These prophets enjoyed the protection, and even the sanction, of the government of Athens, and in the case of the SYBILLÆ (which see), who were also possessed of predictive power, the sacred books were intrusted by the government to special officers appointed for the purpose. But besides the male and female diviners of a higher grade, there were others who held an inferior position, and carrying on their operations chiefly among the lower classes, employed themselves in telling fortunes, and other humble modes of soothsaying. This last description of diviners, however, belongs to a later period in the history of Greece.

One prevalent species of divination practised both in Greece and Rome, was that which was followed by augurs and aruspices, and which drew its signs from the flight of a bird, the cackling of a hen, or the entrails of a slain animal. "If a thundergust arose," says Mr. Gross, in his ingenious work on 'Heathen Religion,' "the augur took notice whether it came from the right or the left hand, according to the four templa or quarters into which the heavens were divided for the use of this art; whether the number of strokes were even or odd, etc. So important was this species of augury deemed to be, that only the master of the augurial college could take it. When beasts, either wild or tame, constituted the subject of augury, it was of importance to observe whether they appeared in a strange place, crossed the road, or ran to the right or to the left side of their line of progression. The omens taken from the flight or the notes of birds, decided nothing unless they were confirmed by a repetition of the token. Besides, the sneezing or stumbling of a person; the hearing of mysterious voices or seeing or apparitions by him; the falling of salt upon the table or the spilling of wine upon one's clothes, etc., were serious subjects for augurial prognostication, even among a people whose senators clothed in their robes of state, and sitting in silent majesty in the forum, the ancient Gauls took to be gods! Domestic fowls were especially kept for the benefit of this important profession, and the manner in which they took or refused their food, determined the prosperous or adverse character of the omen, and might hasten or suspend the downfall of an empire."

It was the duty of the aruspices, who were also diviners, to draw their omens from the appearance of the sacrificial victims, both before and after they were cut in pieces; the aspect of the smoke and flame of the fire over which they were consumed, as well as the taste, smell, colour, and quantity of the flour, frankincense, wine, and water used in the sacrifices. Birds, more especially among the Romans, were of use in divination. Some furnished omens from their chattering, such as crows and owls; others from the direction of their flight, as eagles, vultures, and hawks. A bird appearing on the right was a favourable, but one appearing on the left, an unfavourable sign, the observer being always supposed to have his face turned towards the north.

The phenomena of the heavens were also carefully watched among the ancient heathens as fertile sources of divination. No more unlucky event of this kind could happen than a storm of thunder and lightning, an eclipse of the sun or moon, an earthquake, a fall of a meteoric stone, or any unusual aspect of the sky. Remarkable incidents occurring in the ordinary intercourse of life were regarded as ominous, and the most common kind of divination was that which was derived from the interpretation of dreams. The introduction of Christianity tended gradually to bring all such superstitious practices into complete discredit. From that time they came to be regarded as sinful, ministering to the idle curiosity of the ignorant, and trenching impiously upon the province of Him who alone knows the secrets of futurity. It is an undoubted fact, however, that among the early Christians themselves there were not a few who still retained some remnants of the old superstitions in their hearts. Unwilling to abandon altogether their former practices, they endeavoured to give them a Christian direction. "Whenever," says Dr. Jamieson, "they felt anxious to know what course to pursue in particular circumstances,—whether the result of any undertaking was to be prosperous or the reverse, or to learn the character and conduct of those who were about to be placed over them, they resorted to this method of settling all doubts, and obtaining omens by which they might be guided in their proceedings. Homer and Virgil, indeed, were discarded for the Psalms of David, and the preliminary rites observed were more accordant than before with the usages of a Christian profession; but excepting these, there was little difference between the heathen and such Christians as practised this kind of divination, either in the manner or the views with which these auguries were consulted. There were two ways of taking them; one was, when the person who was anxious to have some intimation in his favour, prepared himself by a previous course of prayer, and fasting—longer or shorter according to his distress of mind, or the importance of the occasion; and then he set himself to open the Psalms—to which, to make assurance doubly sure, they sometimes added the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul—the first passage, in any of which, that caught his attention, was received as the solemn answer of heaven. The other, and simpler method was, for the inquirer to repair, on a set day to the church, and by the first words of the Psalm which was singing at the moment of his entrance, to decide what he was to do, or what was to befall him. It is impossible to determine at what precise period this superstition was introduced into the Christian Church; but it appears to have been a common practice in the days of Augustine; and, indeed, that celebrated man himself seems to have been at one time a firm believer in its efficacy,—for when walking in his garden, in the utmost agony of mind, produced by remorse for his sinful and profligate conduct, and impelled by a voice which seemed once and again to say to him, 'Take the book and read'—he took up a copy of the Scriptures that was lying on the table before him, and, having resolved to rest his case on the first sentence that struck his eye, he found that well-known passage, which being brought home to him by demonstration of the Spirit and with power, afterwards led to his remarkable conversion. At a subsequent period, when he had acquired more just and scriptural views, he publicly declared his disapproval of this use of Scripture. But even the great influence and authority of Augustine was not sufficient to put a stop to a practice, to which the growing ignorance and superstition of the times made the minds of men extremely prone; and though it may appear to us a mode of determining dark and difficult matters, equally absurd and impious, it continued to be followed by all classes of society, from the third to the fourteenth century, as a tried and certain plan of ascertaining the will of Providence."

In the early ages of the Christian Church strenuous efforts were made to restrain the practice of the art of divination. The council of Eliberis made the renunciation of the art a condition of baptism in the case of a professed augur, and should he resume the practice of it after baptism, he was to be forthwith excommunicated. The Apostolical Constitutions lay down the same rule, and various councils are equally severe. By the council of Ancyra it was decreed that those that follow after such diviners, or harbour them in their houses, were to be excluded from communion, and do five years' penance. By a law of Constantius inserted in the Theodosian code, diviners, and those that consult them, were condemned to death, as being guilty of a capital crime and offence against religion. This severe law was passed in consequence of the encouragement which Constantine had given to the heathen in his reign, by permitting them to consult their augurs, provided they did so in public, and refrained from putting questions concerning the state of the commonwealth, or the life of the prince. Thus was divination brought into comparative disuse, being punished with excommunication by the church, and death by the state.

The practice of divination has been adopted in almost all ages and nations. Thus the Scandinavian tribes had diviners, both male and female, whom they held in the highest honour and respect. Some of them, as Mallet informs us, were said to have familiar spirits who never left them, and whom they consulted under the form of little idols; others dragged the ghosts of the departed from their tombs, and forced the dead to tell them what would happen. In this way the skalds or bards of the Northern nations often pretended by their songs to extract secrets from the dead. The letters or Runic characters, which were at that time used only by the few who were able to read and write, were supposed by the ignorant to have in them certain mysterious and magical properties. "Impostors," says Mallet, "easily persuaded a credulous people that these letters, disposed and combined after a certain manner, were able to work wonders, and, in particular, to presage future events. There were letters, or Runes, to procure victory—to preserve from poison—to relieve women in labour—to cure bodily diseases—to dispel evil thoughts from the mind—to dissipate melancholy—and to soften the severity of a cruel mistress. They employed pretty nearly the same characters for all these different purposes, but they varied the order and combination of the letters; they wrote them either from right to left, or from top to bottom, or in form of a circle, or contrary to the course of the sun. In this principally consisted that puerile and ridiculous art, as little understood, probably, by those who professed it, as it was distrusted by those who had recourse to it."

In Teutonic heathenism, as it once existed in Britain, no slight importance was attached to divination. Deliberations on matters of consequence were decided by lot, which was done by cutting a branch of a fruit-tree in pieces, marking them, and scattering them on a white vest. The priest, if it were a public council, or the father, if it were a private one, prayed, looked towards the heavens, and drawing each thrice, interpreted according to its inscription; and if it were adverse, the matter was deferred. According to Tacitus the same mode of divination was practised among the ancient Germans, and after minutely describing it, he adverts to a strange custom which prevailed among them of receiving intimation of future events from horses. "For this purpose," he says, "a number of milk-white steeds, unprofaned by mortal labour, is constantly maintained at public expense, and placed to pasture in the religious groves. When occasion requires, they are harnessed to a sacred chariot, and the priest, accompanied by the king, or chief of the State, attends to watch the motions and the neighing of the horses. No other mode of augury is received with such implicit faith by the people, the nobility, and the priesthood. The horses, upon these solemn occasions, are supposed to be the organs of the gods, and the priests their favourite interpreters." Among the Persians omens of this description were also highly esteemed. To the neighing of his horse Darius owed his elevation to the Persian throne. Herodotus mentions another mode of divination resorted to by the ancient Scythians. They were wont to take large bundles of willow twigs, and having united them together, they arranged them one by one on the ground, each bundle at a distance from the rest. Having done this, they pretended to foretell the future, during which they took up the bundles separately and tied them again together.

But passing from ancient to modern nations, we may remark, that in all countries which are not largely pervaded by Christian influence, divination is practised very extensively. In Mohammedan countries, this is found to be particularly the case. The Egyptians firmly believe in charms, magic, and astrology; amulets are manufactured and sold, and various arts are employed by professional diviners, who are generally schoolmasters and dervishes, to play upon the credulity of the ignorant and superstitious. To preserve themselves, their cattle, and other property from enchantment, the great mass of the people are in the habit of using charms, composed of passages of the Koran, with the names of God, or of favourite saints inscribed upon them, along with mystical diagrams and combinations of numbers. Over the shops of tradesmen may sometimes be observed papers with the name of God, or Mohammed, or an extract from the Koran written upon them; and inscriptions of a similar kind are often carved over the doors of private houses. It is also a custom to hang an aloe plant over the door of a house to secure a long duration to the house, or a long life to its inmates: "The Moslems," we are told, "when in doubt respecting any action, have recourse to various superstitious devices to determine whether or not they shall do it. Sometimes they apply for an answer to a magic table, divided into an hundred squares, in each of which an Arabic letter is written: after repeating such passages of the Koran as, 'With Him are the keys of the secret things,' he places the finger upon one of the letters, without looking at the table, and then writes it down, and repeats the same with every fifth letter, until he comes again to the first he wrote; all these letters compose the answer. The table has been so constructed, as to give four negative answers for one affirmative, on the belief that men much more frequently wish to do what is wrong than right."

The Mohammedans in the East attach no small importance to lucky or unlucky days. They regard Sunday as unfortunate, because the Prophet died on a Sunday night, and Tuesday also, because several martyrs died on that day, but Friday being the Moslem Sabbath, they look upon as peculiarly lucky. Fortune-tellers, astrologers, magicians, and diviners, abound among them, and are sure to be consulted in difficult circumstances of any kind. In Oriental countries, a superstitious dread prevails of what is called the Evil-eye, or a glance from some imaginary evil spirit, or some human being gifted with the power of exercising a secret injurious influence upon any one. From this source are believed to arise many accidents, diseases, and calamities of every description. From the recent Journal of a Deputation to the East, we learn some interesting facts as to the practices resorted to for the purpose of obviating the misfortunes supposed to be connected with the Evil-eye: "A great many charms are employed to avert the dangerous influences of the Evil-eye, which are especially dreaded by mothers for their children. This is the reason of so many of the children of the higher classes being seen with besmeared faces and dirty clothes, when taken out for exercise in public. Whenever a person expresses strong admiration of a child, or indeed of any other object, he is dreaded as being envious and ill-intentioned, and he is reproved by the parents or owners, and requested to say, 'O God, favour him:' by his ready compliance with this, he removes all fear of evil consequences. It is customary, therefore, when expressing approbation of any person or object, to accompany such remarks with various pious exclamations, the one most generally used being, 'Mashallah,' or 'God's will.' Many other fanciful charms and superstitious practices are resorted to for the same purpose. They sometimes cut off a piece of the skirt of the clothes of the child imagined to have been looked upon with envy, burn it with salt, coriander-seed, or alum, and sprinkle the child with the ashes, besides fumigating it with the smoke. Burning alum upon live coals until it has ceased to bubble, is a very favourite custom. Great use is also made of a mixture of storax, frankincense, wormwood, coriander-seed, fennel-seed, and salt dyed of different colours, called 'blessed storax,' or Mey'ah. The ingredients are carried about the streets, and mixed when purchased, the vendor chanting all the time a long spell; the following specimen of which is extracted from Mr. Lane's work:—"In the name of God!" and 'by God!' 'There is no conqueror that conquereth God! his unity is an illustrious attribute.' After some words on the proportions of the ingredients, he adds, 'I charm thee from the eye of a girl, sharper than a spike; and from the eye of a woman, sharper than a pruning-knife; and from the eye of a boy, more painful than a whip; and from the eye of a man, sharper than a chopping knife,' and so on. 'Then,' continues Mr. Lane, 'he relates how Solomon deprived the Evil-eye of its influence, and afterwards enumerates every article of property that the house is likely to contain, and that the person who purchases his wonderful mixture may be conjectured to possess; all of which he charms against the influence of the eye. The Mey'ah, a handful of which may be purchased for a little more than a farthing, is treasured up by the purchaser during the ensuing year; and whenever it is feared that a child or other person is affected by the Evil-eye, a little of it is thrown upon some burning coals in a chafing-dish, and the smoke which results is generally made to ascend upon the supposed sufferer.' The Mey'ah is sold only during the first ten days of the month Mohharrah, or first month of the year."

Among the modern Jews, in many parts of the world, the art of divination may be considered as so intimately mixed up with their whole system of belief and practice, as to be with great difficulty separated from it. The CABBALA (which see), indeed is nothing more than an intricate system of superstition. Giving way to an unlicensed range of fancy, and exercising an unbounded fertility of invention, the Cabbalists have devised thirty-two ways, and fifty gates, which lead men to the knowledge of all that is secret and mysterious either in nature or in religion. The phrases, the words, the letters, and even the very accents of the Hebrew Scriptures are converted into instruments as it were of divination. But independently altogether of the Cabbalistic art, the modern Jews are to a lamentable extent addicted to the grossest superstition. Some of them are in the habit of wearing a charm about them, composed of a few Cabbalistic words, written on a small piece of parchment by some of their Rabbis. Others carry about in their pockets a small piece of their passover cake to avert misfortune. Many Jews put great faith in dreams, and believe that the mode of fulfilment depends on the interpretation given by the person to whom they tell their dreams, and hence they are particularly careful only to reveal them to those whom they consider their friends.

The religion of modern heathendom very much consists of the observance of superstitious rites, and the priests are simply a species of diviners. Thus in Western Africa, the Fetishmen, who are accounted the ministers of religion, chiefly carry on their sacred rites by means of charms and amulets, or grisgris, or greegrees, as they are termed in the common parlance of the country. "There are several classes of fetiches," says Mr. Wilson, "for each of which there is a separate name. One of these classes embraces such as are worn about the person, and are intended to shield the wearer from witchcraft and all the ordinary ills of human life. They are expected to bring him good luck, inspire him with courage and wisdom. Another class are such as are kept in their dwellings, having a particular place assigned them, and correspond in the offices they perform to the penates of the old Romans. They have also national fetiches to protect their towns from fire, pestilence, and from surprise by enemies. They have others to procure rain, to make fruitful seasons, and to cause abundance of game in their woods, and fish in their waters. Some of these are suspended along the highways, a larger number are kept under rude shanties at the entrance of their villages; but the most important and sacred are kept in a house in the centre of the village, where the Bodeh or high priest lives and takes care of them. Most of these, and especially those at the entrances of their villages, are of the most uncouth forms—representing the heads of animals or human beings, and almost always with a formidable pair of horns. Large earthen pots filled with bees are frequently found among these fetiches—the bees being regarded somewhat as a city guard." In Southern Africa also, a great part of their religious ceremonies are invented and regulated by sorcerers or diviners, who are held in the utmost veneration. Thus Mr. Moffat remarks: "One will try to coax the sickness out of a chieftain by setting him astride an ox, with its feet and legs tied; and then smothering the animal by holding its nose in a large bowl of water. A feast follows, and the ox is devoured, sickness and all. A sorcerer will pretend he cannot find out the guilty person, or where the malady of another lies, till he has got him to kill an ox, on which he manœuvres, by cutting out certain parts. Another doctor will require a goat, which he kills over the sick person, allowing the blood to run down the body; another will require the fat of the kidney of a fresh slaughtered goat, saying, that any old fat will not do; and thus he comes in for his chop. These slaughterings are prescribed according to the wealth of the individual, so that a stout ox might be a cure for a slight cold in a chieftain, while a kid would be a remedy for a fever among the poor, among whom there was no chance of obtaining any thing greater."

Of all the heathen nations of modern times, none are more superstitious than the Hindus. The Brahmans are avowedly sorcerers and diviners, the grand charm which they use being what is called the numtra, a mystic verse or incantation, the repetition of which is supposed to effect wonders. This verse occupies a very prominent place in the Hindu religion. It can only be used by the Brahmans and higher castes, being positively forbidden to be even uttered by the lower castes. All things are subject to the numtra, and even the gods are unable to resist its influence. It is the very essence of the Vedas, and the united power of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. "By its magic power," as has been said, "it confers all sanctity; pardons all sin; secures all good temporal and spiritual, and procures everlasting blessedness in the world to come. It possesses the wonderful charm of interchanging good for evil, truth for falsehood, light for darkness, and of confirming such perversions by the most holy sanctions. There is nothing so difficult, so silly, or so absurd, that it may not be achieved by this extraordinary numtra."

It were easy, in short, to illustrate the subject of divination by adverting to the manners and customs of almost every nation on the face of the earth, but enough has been said to show that the practice of this superstitious art forms a conspicuous feature of every false religion, originating in the natural desire inherent in the mind of man to pry into the secrets of futurity, and to push his inquiries beyond the legitimate boundaries which the Almighty hath assigned.

DIVINERS, those who practise the art of DIVINATION (which see).

DIVORCE, the dissolution of the marriage bond. The law of Moses on the subject of divorce is found in Deut. xxiv. 1—5, which was interpreted by many of the Jews, particularly of the school of Hillel, as authorising a man to put away his wife for the most trifling reason. There can be no doubt, that because of the hardness of their hearts, and to prevent still greater evils, God was pleased for a time to extend the law of divorce beyond the narrow limits within which it is restricted by our Lord. Such a temporary arrangement was eagerly laid hold of by the Jewish teachers, and perverted as an encouragement of the most lax views as to the obligation of the marriage vow. They inculcated the doctrine, that on whatever grounds a man might think fit to part with his wife, he was quite warranted in doing so, if only he strictly adhered to the various legal forms by which the divorce was effected. If a written instrument had been procured from the proper quarter, and was signed and attested by the competent authorities, the divorce was regarded by the Scribes as perfectly valid, in the eye both of God and man. This cause of the divorce was with them of little consequence, provided the regular formalities attendant on the act of separation were scrupulously observed. Our Lord, however, brings back the law of marriage to an accordance with the original design of this benevolent and gracious institution, and he absolutely prohibits divorce, except on the ground of unfaithfulness to the marriage vow. In such a case the marriage oath is broken, and our Lord declares that a divorce or a legal disruption of the union in these circumstances, is in complete harmony with the Word and the Law of God. On this subject we find Jesus expressing himself at considerable length in Mat. xix. 3—9, "The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female; and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh. Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery."

Among the modern Jews a man is at liberty to divorce his wife at any time, for any cause, or for no substantial cause at all, except that such is his wish. No doubt various processes are required by the synagogue to be gone through, so that a considerable delay necessarily takes place, and thus an opportunity is afforded of carefully considering the proposed step before it is finally taken. A regular bill of divorce must be drawn out by one of their notaries, with the concurrence of three Rabbis, on ruled vellum, and containing neither more nor fewer than twelve lines. In this document the husband declares, "I put thee away, dismiss, and divorce thee; so that from this time thou art in thine own power, and art at thine own disposal, and may be married to any other man whom thou pleasest: and let no man hinder thee in my name, from this day forward and for ever; and lo! thou art free to any man. Let this be to thee from me a bill of divorce, an instrument of dismissal, and a letter of separation according to the law of Moses and Israel." Ten witnesses are present when this document is read and signed by the parties; and before appending their subscription, a Rabbi inquires of the husband whether he is acting willingly, and of his own free unconstrained choice. If the husband's answer is satisfactory, and the deed is executed in the presence of the witnesses, the man is then directed by the Rabbi to deliver the document to the woman, and on dropping it into her hand he makes a declaration to this effect: "Behold this is thy bill of divorce, and thou art herewith divorced from me, and art free to any other man." The Rabbi then warns the woman that she is not allowed to marry again within ninety days. After the divorce has thus been formally executed, the parties are forbidden to be married to each other again, or even to meet together unless in the presence of witnesses. If the woman has been divorced for adultery, she is prohibited from marrying her paramour. With these exceptions the parties are free to marry whomsoever they please.

In Mohammedan countries divorce is permitted without any cause whatever. The husband may simply say, "Thou art divorced," and straightway the wife is under the necessity of leaving his house, and surrendering all the privileges of a married person. This he may do twice and receive her back again, but if he sends her away a third time he is not allowed to take her back unless she has been married to another man, and has been compelled to leave him.

Marriage being accounted among the Roman Catholics a sacrament, the indissolubility of the marriage tie is a recognized principle in the law of Romish countries. And until very recently the whole genius of British law seemed to presume that the marriage tie cannot be broken. No doubt a separation from bed and board could be obtained in a court of law, in which case the wife was entitled to a suitable maintenance out of her husband's effects, but the marriage of either party was prohibited, and the rights of the husband over his wife's property were left untouched. Divorce, however, in the full meaning of the word, a vinculo matrimonii, or from the marriage tie, has been hitherto in England effected in rare cases, and with the utmost difficulty, requiring for the purpose a private Act of Parliament, which could only be obtained at a very great expense. Such a state of matters has been productive of much vice and suffering throughout all ranks, but more especially the middling and poorer classes of society. Of late years, accordingly, the subject has been frequently brought under the consideration of the legislature. Various attempts have been made to procure an amendment of the law of divorce in England, but without effect. A new Act, however, has length been passed, which came into operation on the first day of the present year (1858), and which it is to be hoped may be useful. This Act of Parliament abolishes the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in the matter of divorce, and establishes a separate court for divorce and matrimonial causes. The court consists of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, the senior Puisne Judge for the time being in each of the three last-mentioned Courts, and the Judge of the new Court of Probate. The latter is to be called the Judge Ordinary of the Court, and will be empowered to dispose alone of all matrimonial causes, except petitions for a divorce, or for annulling a marriage, applications for a new trial of any questions of fact heard before a jury, bills of exceptions, special verdicts, or special cases. The court will sit in London or Middlesex unless her Majesty should appoint another place. The conduct of matrimonial causes is thrown open to every branch of the legal profession. Divorce from bed and board is abolished, but instead of it the court may decree a judicial separation, which will have the same force and consequences. The business of the new Court will therefore consist in granting divorces, in decreeing judicial separation, in protecting the wife's property when deserted by her husband, and in entertaining all suits in reference to marriage, except those with regard to the granting of marriage licences. Any husband may present a petition to the court praying for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. But the wife who seeks a divorce must allege, and be prepared to prove one or more of these five acts on his part: "1. That he has been guilty of incestuous adultery; that is, of adultery committed by him with a woman with whom, if his wife were dead, he could not lawfully contract marriage, by reason of her being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity. 2. That he has committed bigamy with adultery; i. e. that he has not merely contracted, but consummated a bigamous marriage. 3. That he has committed rape, sodomy, or bestiality. 4. That he has committed adultery, coupled with such cruelty as, without adultery, would, under the old law, have entitled her to a divorce à mensâ et thoro (equivalent to what will in future be termed judicial separation); or, 5. That he has committed adultery, coupled with desertion, without reasonable cause, for two years or upwards." Along with the charges an affidavit must be lodged stating that there is no collusion or connivance between the deponent and the other party to the marriage. The same course of proof will be admitted as has hitherto been usual in Ecclesiastical Courts. There is an appeal allowed from the sentence of the court to the House of Lords. If the decree of divorce be fully passed, both parties have liberty to enter into marriage, and even the guilty party is allowed to marry his or her paramour. On the question of remarriage in such cases, a large party of the clergy of the Established Church have conscientious scruples, and, accordingly, the Act declares that they cannot be compelled to solemnize such marriages, but they are bound to allow the use of their churches or chapels to any other minister of the Church who may consent to officiate on such occasions. In the case of judicial separation, a petition may be entertained, and a decree passed by an ordinary judge of assize, whose judgment, however, may be appealed against to the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The grounds on which such a sentence may be procured are three: 1. Adultery. 2. Cruelty. 3. Desertion continued for two years or upwards without reasonable excuse. This last is a new and additional cause of separation admitted by the New Act. The law in regard to Alimony and the Custody of Children remains as before.

The changes which are thus effected by the bill, whose provisions we have slightly sketched, will place the law of divorce on a much more satisfactory footing than it has ever occupied in this country.

DOCETÆ (Gr. dokein, to appear or seem), a heretical Christian sect which arose towards the close of the second century, denying the humanity of Christ, and representing all that referred to his human appearance as a mere vision. Julius Cassian, a disciple of Valentinus and Tatian, is said to have been the founder of this heretical sect, which formed one of the branches of the GNOSTICS (which see). The peculiar character of mind which led to the rejection of the human nature of Christ as a delusive phantom, is thus ably sketched by Neander: "Docetism may be the result of very different tendencies of mind—a tendency to supranaturalism, or a tendency to rationalism. There might be united with it, an interest at bottom to give all possible prominence to this supernatural and real element in Christ's appearance. Docetism, at this point, supposed a real, though not sensible Christ; and a real impartation of Christ to humanity. Christ gave himself, according to this view, to humanity, as a source of divine life. He presented himself sensibly to the eyes of men, not in his true, divine nature, but only so as to be perceived by them, yet without coming himself into any contact with matter, in an unreal veil of sense. His appearance was something truly objective; but the sensible form in which this was apparent to men was merely subjective. This was the only possible way in which men, under the dominion of sense, could come into any contact with a nature so divine. A mode of apprehension turned exclusively in the direction of supranaturalism, might lead in this case to a total denial of the reality of the natural element in Christ. But under this form of Docetism might be lurking, also, a tendency which would have resulted in an entire evaporation of Christianity, in turning the life of Christ into a mere symbol of a spiritual communication from God, in substituting the idea of God's redeeming power in place of the historical Redeemer; in a word, there might eventually spring out of a tendency of this sort, an opposition to historical Christianity."

The Docetæ believed only in a glorified Christ, and refused to admit him in the form of a servant. Under a most erroneous impression that they were honouring the Redeemer, they were in reality robbing him of that which constituted one of the most interesting features of his Mediatorial character, that he was Emmanuel, God incarnate, that wearing the nature of men he might suffer and die in their room. "How is it," said Tertullian, addressing the Docetæ, "that you make the half of Christ a lie? He was all truth." And what, we might still further ask, what would have availed the true divinity of Christ unless it had been combined with a true humanity? It was this blessed union which rendered him a true Christ, both glorifying the Father, and saving his own believing people. Similar sentiments to those held by the Docetæ in the second, were afterwards taught by Priscillian and his followers in the beginning of the fifth century.

DOCTORS (JEWISH), a class of superior teachers who were accounted the preservers of tradition. This was in accordance with a belief which prevailed among the Jews, that the law delivered on Mount Sinai was of a twofold nature, the one conveyed by writing, and the other by tradition from one generation to another. The succession of Fathers, by whom the latter class of laws was transmitted to posterity, received the name of doctors or teachers. They were also called Mishnaics, because the Mishna was said to be composed by them. Esdras is usually placed by Jewish Rabbis at the head of the doctors, and so highly have they been wont to extol this man, that the Koran charges them with making him a son of God. Esdras is said to have received the traditions from Baruch in Babylon. Besides many other important works which he is alleged to have executed, the Jews attribute to him the appointment of a great council composed of one hundred and twenty men, who assisted him in restoring the Sacred Writings to their ancient purity and simplicity.

The immediate successor of Esdras, in the line of doctors, according to Jewish historians, was Simeon the Just, who is regarded as the last of the great synagogue, who survived all the rest, and received from them the whole system of the traditions. The doctors or Tanaites are held by the Jews in as great veneration as if the honour of their church and nation depended upon these preservers of their traditions. They were assisted, it is alleged, by the BATH-KOL (which see); they had the privilege of conversing with angels, the power of restraining sorcerers and of commanding devils. Each doctor was permitted to add his own comments to the traditions which had been handed down to him from Ezra and the men of the great synagogue. Thus the traditions went on increasing from one generation to another. At length, in the middle of the second century after the coming of Christ, when Antoninus Pius was Emperor of Rome, it was thought necessary for their better preservation, to collect together the cumbrous mass of traditions, and commit them carefully to writing. This difficult task was undertaken by the Rabbi Judah, the son of Simeon, who, from his reputed sanctity, was called Hakbadosh, the Holy. This learned and industrious Jew, devoting himself to his arduous work, compiled the Mishna, or Collection of Traditions, in six books, each consisting of several tracts, which altogether amount to sixty-three. The work, when completed, was received by the Jews with great veneration, and has ever since been held in high regard. They believe that the contents of the Mishna were dictated by God to Moses on Mount Sinai along with the written law, and that both consequently are possessed of the same authority. The first idea of such an undertaking as the Mishna is said by some to have originated with Rabbi AKIBA (which see), but tradition attributes both the plan and its accomplishment to Judah, who is often called, for distinction's sake, the Rabbi. The later Rabbins have exhausted their ingenuity in making commentaries upon, and additions to, this work. The whole collection of these commentaries is named Gemara or completeness, which, along with the Mishna, forms the Talmuds. Of these the Jerusalem Talmud is the prior in date, having been compiled towards the end of the third century in Palestine; while the Babylonian Talmud, compiled in the schools of Babylon and Persia, takes its date from A. D. 500. So highly do the Jews prize their traditions, that there is among them a familiar Rabbinical adage, "Holy Scripture may be compared to fresh water, but the Mishna is wine, and the Gemara refined wine;" or, in another form, "The law is the salt, the Mishna the pepper, and the Talmud the precious spices." He who sins against Moses, they say, may be forgiven, but he who contradicts the doctors deserves death.

After the publication of the Talmud, arose another class of doctors which lessened its authority by their doubts and conjectures. These were termed Sabureans or Doubters, because they disputed the statements of the Talmud, and called in question the opinions of the ancient doctors. The popularity of the Talmud rendered this sect peculiarly odious to the Jews, many of whom have refused to recognise them as belonging to the list of doctors, lest they should reflect disgrace upon that honourable fraternity. The Saburean sect was founded by Rabbi Josi, but met with so much discouragement that it became extinct about seventy-four years after its establishment.

The fall of the Sabureans was followed by the rise of another class of Jewish doctors, called Geonim or Excellentes, because of their extensive learning and their remarkable virtue. These men were esteemed interpreters of the law; they were consulted upon all important or difficult matters, and their decisions were received with the utmost confidence and respect. This sect originated with Chanan Meischka, in the beginning of the sixth century, and continued to maintain considerable credit with the Jews till the commencement of the eleventh century, when it came to an end in the person of Rabbi Hai Bar Rab Scherira. About that time the academies of Babylon, which had long been presided over by the Excellentes, were destroyed, and the remains of the devoted nation were driven into Spain and France, where they formed new establishments, and exchanged the title of doctors for that of RABBANIM (which see), among whom are found the celebrated names of Aben Ezra and Maimonides. Another class of Jewish doctors distinguished themselves as grammarians, and published a well-known work of traditions called the Masorah, which has undoubtedly rendered great service to the cause of Hebrew literature in the preservation and critical knowledge of the Old Testament, by its vowels, accents, and notes. By the laborious industry of these men, each verse, word, and even letter of the Hebrew Scriptures has been carefully numbered, while, with marvellous but unprofitable ingenuity, they have deduced the most strange and absurd meanings from the insertion of a larger or smaller letter in the text, or the intervention of a greater or less space between the chapters. Some authors maintain that Esdras was the father of this order of doctors, and they tell us that he was under the necessity, at the return from the Babylonian captivity, of inventing the vowel points to prevent the study of the sacred language from being neglected amid the national calamities, imagining that by this invention, correct copies of the Scriptures would be provided, which could admit of no variation. Others, however, are of opinion, and with greater probability, that the Masoretic doctors were coeval with the authors of the Talmud, and Capellus still more definitely fixes the date at the end of the fifth century, while many writers trace the origin of the Masorah to a period so late as the beginning of the eleventh century, when a very keen dispute took place in the academies of Babylon about many words of the law. The precise date of this contention between the children of Asher and the children of Naphtali was A. D. 1039, and so violent did both parties become, that Ezechias, the Prince of the Captivity, was slain, and the academies laid in ruins. The birth-place of the Masorah is generally believed to have been the academy of Tiberias, which was held in such respect that its approval of the points led to their ready reception by all the synagogues of the West.

The last order of Jewish doctors to which it is necessary to advert, are those which bore the name of Cabbalists, because they taught the science of the CABBALA (which see), a species of Oriental mysticism, by which, as we have seen, all kinds of strange fancies, and even magical powers, were deduced from the words, letters, and accents of the Hebrew Scriptures. There were five different departments included in the Cabbalistic science, to the study of which the doctors of this order were accustomed to devote themselves. Those who cultivated the natural Cabbala, endeavoured to discover the nature and qualities of external objects, which lay hid, as they believed, in the Hebrew words and letters. Those, again, who studied the connecting Cabbala, sought in the same fertile field to find the harmonies and connecting links of universal nature. The students of the contemplative Cabbala, however, took a wider and a loftier range, holding it to be their duty to abstract themselves from all sensible objects, and to elevate their bodily powers by holding converse with angels, contemplating God and the divine splendours, and thus rendering themselves partakers of the Divine nature, acquiring the power of working miracles, or of receiving Divine illumination. Those who applied their minds to the astrological Cabbala, investigated the influences of the stars, and particularly of the moon, as being the storehouse of the other planets, and the inquiries of these celestial doctors were not a little quickened by the idea that when every man is born, God sends him a guardian from that constellation under which his nativity took place; and, therefore, if parents wish to make their children prosperous and happy, they ought to pacify and caress the angel of the planet. There have been Jewish doctors, in fine, whose special studies have been directed to the magical Cabbala, from which they are led to attach a miraculous virtue to numbers, pretending by these to cure diseases and to ward off misfortunes, while, by the arrangement of words in a certain order, they profess to produce remarkable effects, more especially if these words express the name of God, his perfections or emanations.

The duties of the Jewish doctors have always been to instruct the people both in the written law of Moses, and in the oral law or tradition. They decide what is clean, and what unclean, what meats are lawful to be eaten, and what are prohibited. The extent of their influence is thus noticed by Mr. Lewis, in his 'Hebrew Antiquities:' "The power of the doctors is great among the Jews, and they omit nothing that may draw the veneration of the people. They represent themselves as men inspired by God, or like the angels of the ministry. One of their maxims is, that if a child by the law is bound to fear and honour his father, he is yet more obliged to respect his masters: a child that sees his father and master overloaded with a burden, or groaning in bondage, ought to unload his master, and redeem him from slavery before his father. The doctors often equal their power to that of God himself; for they tell their disciples, that he who contradicts and fights against his master's opinion, in some measure opposes and fights against the Deity; and that he who murmurs against a doctor, murmurs against God; that he who traduces his master's reputation, is the cause of God's withdrawal from Israel. Scholars are not allowed to salute their master as other men, but they must bend their knee before him. It is a crime to pray to God, either by his side, or behind his back. It is an enormous sin for a scholar to set up a school near to that of his master's; and he that spits in his face, deserves to be punished with death. The doctors taught in a sitting posture, but it is not easy to guess what was the posture of the scholars. There is a tradition, that from the time of Moses to that of Gamaliel they stood; and that after this doctor's death, they were permitted to sit, by reason of a sickness which then reigned, and that it was at that time that the glory of the law decayed, because this posture was less respectful. Many doctors have believed, that Jacob had this custom in his view, when he foretold, that the lawgiver should not depart from Judah's feet until Shiloh come; and that he would thereby show, that some disciples should always learn the law at their master's feet."

DOCTORS (CHRISTIAN). In the enumeration which the apostle Paul gives in Eph. iv. 11, of the office-bearers of the primitive Christian church, he expressly mentions doctors or teachers, along with pastors, and in 1 Cor. xii. 28, he speaks of them separately, "first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers." Although in the first-cited passage doctors are combined with pastors so closely, that by some they have been considered as one class of office-bearers, it is probable, on a careful comparison of both passages, that a distinct and separate class is pointed out. In accordance with this view, we find in the form of church government drawn up by the Westminster Assembly, a chapter headed, "The Teacher or Doctor," and commencing with these words, "The Scripture doth hold out the name and title of teacher as well as of the pastor." The concluding passage shows what the Assembly considered to be the special duty of the doctor as distinct from the pastor. "A teacher or doctor," they say, "is of most excellent use in schools and universities, as of old in the schools of the prophets, and at Jerusalem, where Gamaliel and others taught as doctors." The duties of the doctors in the early Christian church seem to have been chiefly to instruct the young in the elements of Christian truth, to prepare candidates for baptism, and to give further instruction to those who, though baptized, were still deficient in their religious knowledge. Accordingly schools were attached to certain churches in early times, in which doctors or teachers exercised their gifts. Thus Origen taught for a time in the school of Alexandria. No such office-bearer exists now in the Christian church, unless professors of theology may be considered as holding a position analogous to that of doctor in the primitive church.

In the course of the sittings of the Westminster Assembly, the question was discussed at considerable length, whether the pastoral office was identical with that of doctor or teacher. The Independents maintained that in every congregation there ought to be two such office-bearers distinct and separate from one another. Accordingly, in Congregationalist churches there exists a doctor or teacher, subordinate to the pastor, but forming a connecting link between the pastor and the people. The Independents, however, forming a small minority in the Assembly, their opinions were overruled, and the views which are found embodied in the Form of Church Government were adopted by the Assembly, namely, that he who excels in the exposition of Scripture may be termed a doctor, and that such a person may be of great use in universities.

DOCTOR AUDIENTIUM (Lat. teacher of the hearers), the Christian instructor of the AUDIENTES (which see), or lowest order of catechumens in the early Christian church. The name therefore was equivalent to CATECHISTS (which see).

DOCTRINE, the principles of a religious system as contradistinguished from its practical precepts.

DOCTRINE (SECRET). See ARGANI DISCIPLINA.

DODONÆUS, a surname of JUPITER (which see), derived from his temple at Dodona, a city of Epirus, where he had a temple dedicated to his worship. One of the earliest of the ancient oracles seems to have existed there, of which Herodotus gives two different accounts. One account, he tells us, he had received from an Egyptian source. It was to the following effect. The Phœnicians had carried away two priestesses from that place, one of whom they sold into Libya, the other into Greece, and each of these had erected the first oracle in those nations, the one of Jupiter Ammon, the other of Jupiter Dodonæus. The other account of the origin of the oracle at Dodona, Herodotus had received from the priestesses of that oracle. The story ran as follows: Two black pigeons taking their flight from Thebes in Egypt, one of them came to Libya, where she ordered an oracle to be erected to Jupiter Ammon, the other came to Dodona, where she sat upon an oak, and thence gave orders that an oracle should be erected in that place to Jupiter Dodonæus. Servius attempts to reconcile these two accounts with one another, by alleging that the same Greek word peleia, signifies both a prophetess or priestess, and a pigeon. The priests, who delivered the oracles at Dodona, were called SELLI (which see), and are mentioned by Homer as having submitted to great austerities, such as sleeping on the bare ground. In later ages the oracles were pronounced by three old women. Near the temple of Dodona was a sacred grove, which was said to be inhabited by nymphs and satyrs.

DODONIDES, a name given to the seven daughters of Atlas, who delivered the oracles in the temple at Dodona, before the Selli were appointed to discharge that office.

DOG-WORSHIP. Among the ancient Hebrews the dog was accounted an unclean animal, and looked upon with the utmost contempt. But among some ancient nations this sagacious and useful animal appears to have been an object of worship. Thus in 2 Kings xvii. 31, an idol of the Avites is mentioned under the name of Nibhaz, which the Hebrew commentators interpret as a barker, and they assert that this idol was made in the form of a dog. Traces of the ancient worship of an idol of the same kind have been discovered in Syria, even in modern times. The ancient Egyptian deity ANUBIS (which see), was represented by a figure with a dog's head, and his worship was so celebrated that a city was built in Egypt, which was named after him, Cynopolis, or the City of the Dog. Sir Gardner Wilkinson, in his 'Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians,' says, "The Egyptians had several breeds of dogs, some solely used for the chase, others admitted into the parlour, or selected as the companions of their walks; and some, as at the present day, selected for their peculiar ugliness. All were looked upon with veneration, and the death of a dog was not only lamented as a misfortune, but was mourned by every member of the house in which it occurred." The dog was probably held in all the greater veneration in Egypt as being the emblem of Sirius, or the dog-star, which, as soon as it has ascended above the horizon, proclaims the approaching flood of the Nile.

Among the Hyperborean tribes, with whom the dog is reckoned a very valuable animal, it occupies a conspicuous place in their traditions, being considered, as for instance among the Esquimaux, according to the accounts given by Franklin and Parry, and other Arctic navigators, as the father of the human family. The Chippewyan Indians had a tradition that they were sprung from a dog; and hence they neither ate the flesh of that animal themselves, nor could they look with any other feeling than horror upon those nations who fed upon it. In all these cases probably the dog is the symbol of the sun. A strange notion prevails among the Greenlanders, that an eclipse is caused by the sun being pursued by his brother the moon. Accordingly, when this phenomenon takes place, the women take the dogs by the ears, believing that as these animals existed before man was created, they must have a more certain presentiment of the future than he has, and therefore, if they do not cry when their ears are pulled, it is an infallible sign that the world is about to be destroyed.

The inhabitants of Japan have a superstitious regard for dogs. Thus we learn from Picart, in his 'Religious Ceremonies of all Nations:' "The Emperor who sat on the throne when Kaempfer resided in Japan, was so extravagantly 'fond of them,' that there has been a greater number of them in that kingdom ever since his reign, if we may depend on the veracity of this traveller, than in any other nation in the whole world. Every street is obliged to maintain a fixed and determinate number of them. They are quartered upon the inhabitants, and, in case of sickness, they are obliged to nurse and attend them. When they die, they are obliged to inter them in a decent manner, in the mountains and hills peculiarly appropriated for the interment of the people. It is looked upon as a capital crime not only to kill them, but barely to insult and treat them ill; and no one but the legal proprietor is allowed so much as to correct any of them. All this reverence and respect is owing to a celestial constellation, which the Japanese call the Dog, under the influence whereof the aforesaid Emperor of Japan was born."

An old traveller gives an account of a peculiar custom which existed among the ancient Guebres or Fire-Worshippers of Persia, and which shows that they held dogs in high religious estimation: "Before they expose a dead corpse to the birds of prey, they lay him decently on the ground, whilst some particular friend of his beats the hoof all round about the neighbouring villages, in hopes to meet with a dog; and as soon as he is so fortunate, he endeavours to allure and bribe him with some crusts of bread, . . . and to bring him as near to the corpse as possibly he can. The nearer the dog approaches it, the nearer they imagine, the soul of the deceased must be to the mansions of eternal bliss. If he jumps upon him, and seizes the bit of bread, which for that purpose is put into his mouth, it is an incontestable mark, or presage of his future felicity: but if the dog, on the other hand, cannot be tempted to approach it, but keeps at a distance, . . . it is a melancholy, unpropitious sign, and they almost despair of his happy state. When the dog has performed his part of the ceremony, two Daroos . . . stand in a devout posture, with their hands joined close together, at about one hundred feet distance from the bier whereon the corpse is laid, and repeat, with an audible voice, a form of prayer of half an hour long . . . but with such hurry and precipitation, that they scarce give themselves sufficient time to breathe."

DOGMA, the doctrine of a particular party or sect in religion.

DOKANA, an ancient emblematic representation of the Dioscuri at Sparta, consisting of two upright beams, with others placed transversely. Dokana is said by some writers to have been the name of the graves of the DIOSCURI (which see).

DOMIDUCA, a surname of Juno among the ancient Romans, and DOMIDUCUS, a surname of Jupiter, both these deities being so called from Lat. domus, a house, and duco, to lead, because they were believed to conduct the bride to the house of the bridegroom on the occasion of a marriage.

DOMINICA GAUDII (Lat., the Lord's day of joy), a name given by some of the ancient Christian writers to Easter Sunday. In token of joy, the Roman Emperors were accustomed to grant a release to prisoners on that day, with the exception of those who had committed great crimes.

DOMINICA IN ALBIS (Lat., the Lord's day in white garments), a name given by the Roman Catholic Church to the first Sunday after Easter. Some Latin ritualists term it Dominica post albas, the Lord's day after the white garments, because on this day those who had been baptized on Easter day laid aside the white robe or CHRISOME (which see), in which they had been baptized, carefully depositing it in the church, that it might be produced as an evidence against them, if they should afterwards throw discredit upon the faith which they had professed in baptism.

DOMINICAL LETTER. The following account of the Sunday letter, as it is sometimes called, is given by Dr. Hook, in his 'Church Dictionary:' "In the calendar the first seven letters of the alphabet are applied to the days of the week, the letter A being always given to the 1st of January, whatsoever that day may be, and the others in succession to the following days. If the year consisted of 364 days, making an exact number of weeks, it is evident that no change would ever take place in these letters; thus supposing the 1st of January in any given year to be Sunday, all the Sundays would be represented by A not only in that year, but in all succeeding. There being however 365 days in the year, the first letter is again repeated on the 31st of December, and, consequently, the Sunday letter for the following year will be G. This retrocession of the letters will, from the same cause, continue every year, so as to make F the dominical letter of the third, &c. If every year were common, the process would continue regularly, and a cycle of seven years would suffice to restore the same letters to the same days as before. But the intercalation of a day, every bissextile or fourth year, has occasioned a variation in this respect. The bissextile year, containing 366, instead of 365 days, will throw the dominical letter of the following year back two letters, so that if the dominical letter at the beginning of the year be C, the dominical letter of the next year will be, not B, but A. This alteration is not effected by dropping a letter altogether, but by changing the dominical letter at the end of February, where the intercalation of a day takes place. In consequence of this change every fourth year, twenty-eight years must elapse, before a complete revolution can take place in the dominical letter, and it is on this circumstance that the period of the solar cycle is founded."

DOMINICALE, a word which occurs in the canons of the council of Auxerre in France A. D. 590, which decree that no woman should receive the eucharist in her bare hand, but should wear a dominicale when she communicates. Considerable doubt exists among ecclesiastical writers as to the precise meaning of this word. Most authors interpret it to mean a linen cloth, which was to be worn upon the hand by women when partaking of the sacramental elements. Baluze, however, says, that it signifies only the women's veil, which they were obliged to wear upon their heads, by ancient canons, conformable to the rule of the apostle.

DOMINIC (St.), the founder of the Romish order of DOMINICANS (which see). He was born in A. D. 1170, in Calarugna, a village in the diocese of Osma in Castile. Endowed with the ardent temperament which characterizes the Spanish nation, he early displayed a violent hostility to all heretics, and a readiness, if he had it in his power, to persecute and oppress them. He was educated at the university of Palenza in his native country, and while prosecuting his studies, a famine having broken out, he generously sold his books and his furniture that he might relieve the distresses of the poor, and in this way he led many by his example to deeds of charity and kindness. Naturally of an austere and self-denying disposition, he became a favourite with Didacus, bishop of Osma, who was a man of a kindred spirit, and, therefore, gladly received him into the number of his clergy. No sooner was Dominic invested with the sacred office, than burning with zeal for the destruction of heretics, he proceeded to the south of France with the view of attacking the ALBIGENSES (which see). His superior Didacus had gone from place to place, travelling on foot in voluntary poverty, preaching to, and disputing with, the heretics. Full of the expectation of converting the heretical sects, he resolved to suspend his labours in France for a time, and set out for Rome to ask assistance in his arduous undertaking from the Pope; but before doing so he gave the conduct of the spiritual work to Dominic. While on his journey to Italy, Didacus died, leaving the fulfilment of his plan to his zealous friend, who had succeeded to his duties among the Albigenses. The demise of the bishop, however, led to a complete alteration in the whole character of the movement, which was now directed, not to the conversion but the extirpation of the heretics. "When armed troops," says Neander, "were called in to follow up the work of preaching and disputing, and, in the year 1209, the horrible crusade against the Albigenses was commenced, Dominick still went on with his labours, and the cruelties resorted to for the extirpation of heresy were approved and promoted by him,—a bad precedent, foretoking already the history of an order which in after times was to exercise such cruel despotism under the name of charity. He found a few still remaining here like-minded with himself, who joined with him in forming a society consecrated to the defence of the church. Several pious men in Toulouse entered heart and hand into his scheme, and placed their property in his hands, to purchase books for the society, and provide them with what they needed.—Fulco himself, the bishop of Toulouse, favoured the undertaking, and, in the year 1215, went in company with Dominick to Rome, for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of Pope Innocent the Third, to a spiritual society devoted to the office of preaching. True, the canon enacted this very year by the Lateran council, forbidding the institution of any new order of monks, stood in the way of a compliance with this demand; but, at the same council, it had also been expressed as an urgent need of the church, that the bishops should procure able men to assist them in the office of preaching, and in their pastoral labours. Now, the supply of this want—a want so sensibly felt on account of the great number of ignorant and worldly-minded clergymen—was the very purpose and aim of the scheme submitted by Dominick to the Pope. Innocent, therefore, accepted the proposition, making only one condition, that Dominick should attach himself to some one of the orders of monks already existing. Dominick selected the so-called rule of Augustin, with a few modifications aiming at greater strictness. The order was to accept of no property that needed to be managed, but only the incomes from the same; lest it might be diverted by the cares of secular business from its spiritual vocation. Pope Honorius the Third confirmed the establishment of the order in 1216; and it was styled, in accordance with the object to which it was especially consecrated, Ordo predicatorum, the Order of preachers. In the first chapter of its articles, it was settled that it should hold neither property in funds nor income. It is evident from many examples, that great efforts were made to enlarge and extend the society by energetic preachers amongst its earliest members. Many young men at the universities and in other cities were carried away by the fervent appeals of the preaching friars, and finally devoted themselves to this foundation."

Dominic continued to prosecute his work, as the superior of the order which he had formed, with great zeal and efficiency until his death in A. D. 1221. This Romish saint has acquired no small renown from having been the inventor, or at least the first inquisitor-general, of the Holy Inquisition. He is said also to have performed many miracles, as well as to have sanctioned many cruel tortures inflicted upon heretics, and thus he has acquired a conspicuous place in the Romish calendar.

DOMINICANS, a celebrated order of mendicant monks, which was instituted in the thirteenth century. Its founder was ST. DOMINIC (see preceding article), who established the first monastery of the order at Toulouse. The monks connected with it were put under the rule of St. Augustine. By means of the papal sanction obtained from Honorius III., in 1216, it was raised to a separate order under the name of Fratres Prædicatores, preaching brothers. At length, in the first general-chapter held at Bologna in A. D. 1220, the Dominicans, though they resisted the decree at first, were compelled to submit to the maxim of evangelical poverty. To this order specially belongs the Rosary, which seems to have been adopted by them so early as A. D. 1270, under the technical name of Paternoster. The Dominicans were the first standing inquisitors at the time of the exterminating crusade waged against the Albigenses. It was the council of Toulouse which, in A. D. 1229, achieved the organization of the tribunal of the Holy Inquisition, St. Dominic being appointed the first Inquisitor-General, and from that time he and his order began the cruel work of bitter persecution in the countries tainted with heresy; and to save the church from the odious charge of blood-shedding, the secular princes were called in to serve the office of executioner.

From the thirteenth century onward to the period of the Reformation, the Dominicans, and their rivals the Franciscans, held the chief power and influence both in church and state. They occupied the highest offices, both ecclesiastical and civil; they taught with almost absolute authority both in churches and schools, and maintained the supreme majesty of the Roman pontiffs against kings, bishops, and heretics, with remarkable zeal and success. To distinguish them from the Franciscans, who were called Minor Friars, the Dominicans occasionally received the name of Major Friars. In France the latter order were often styled Jacobins or Jacobites, while in England the name of Black Friars was given them from the colour of their dress; and the part of London where they first had their residence is still styled Blackfriars. In Edinburgh, also, there is a locality which bears the same name, there having been at one time on that spot a monastery of Dominicans. The Roman pontiffs soon discovered that the two powerful orders which had thus arisen might easily be rendered of eminent service to the cause of the church. They were invested, accordingly, with special privileges above all the other orders of monks, permitted to preach publicly everywhere without license from the bishops, to act as confessors whenever required, and to grant absolutions, and even indulgences. The peculiar favour thus shown to the two rival mendicant orders excited the jealousy and bitter hatred of the bishops and priests. Commotions arose, and violent contentions broke out in every country of Europe, and even in the city of Rome itself. One of the most noted of these disputes was that which was carried on for thirty years between the Dominican monks and the university of Paris. The monks claimed the privilege of having two theological chairs in the university. The claim was denied, one of the chairs was taken from them, and a decree passed by the university that no order of monks should be entitled to have two theological chairs. The Dominicans were firm in asserting their claim to a second chair, and the university, with the view of putting an end to the controversy, deprived the monks of all connection with them. This strong step, however, instead of terminating the dispute, only rendered matters worse. The Dominicans appealed to Rome, and the Pope, Alexander IV., decided so completely in their favour, that after a bold and fruitless struggle, carried on by the university for several years, they were compelled to concede all that the Mendicant orders wished. Hence arose the hostility which the university of Paris has ever since maintained to the Dominicans.

In the course of this memorable contest between the Sorbonne and the Mendicants, many writings appeared on both sides, but the ablest production to which the controversy gave rise, was a treatise entitled 'The Perils of the Latter Times,' the author of which was William of St. Amour, a doctor of the Sorbonne. The appearance of this work, written by a man of remarkable genius and argumentation, produced a great sensation, and so enraged were the Dominicans against both the book and its author, that through their influence with the see of Rome, Alexander IV., in A. D. 1256, ordered the book to be publicly burned, and the author to be banished from France. The mandate of the Pope was obeyed, but under his successor, Clement IV., William of St. Amour returned to Paris, wrote a larger work in the same strain as the former, and at last died amid the esteem and regret of his cotemporaries.

The two rival orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans, not contented with embroiling all Europe in discord and angry strife, began, soon after the decease of their respective founders, to contend with each other for precedence. Attempts were frequently made to put an end to these unseemly disputes, but all such attempts were utterly fruitless, and they continued for many a long year to hurl at each other the most bitter invectives and recriminations. But notwithstanding this keen rivalry between the two great orders of Mendicants, the Dominicans gradually rose to great power and influence, both through their connection with the Inquisition and the high position which they occupied as confessors at the courts of all the kings and princes of Europe. Elated with the extraordinary power which they had thus acquired, the Dominican monks carried their pride and insolence so far that they alienated many of the most intelligent and honest from the church, and by their violent measures drove them to join the ranks of the open opponents of the Roman pontiffs. This tragedy at Berne (see CONCEPTION, IMMACULATE) did much to weaken their influence, but the deadliest blow which they unwittingly aimed at the authority of the Church of Rome, was the independent step which they took of prompting Leo X. to issue a public condemnation of Luther. Thus were the Dominican friars unconsciously the instruments of bringing about the Reformation in the sixteenth century.

One of the most prominent points in the controversy which so long raged between the Dominicans and Franciscans was the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. For centuries the dispute was conducted with the utmost bitterness on both sides. Thomas Aquinas (see THOMISTS) argued against the Immaculate Conception and the festival which had been recently instituted in honour of it with the most consummate ability, so that the Dominicans, whose champion he was, were apparently about to drive their enemies from the field, when Duns Scotus (see SCOTISTS), taking up the Franciscan view of the doctrine, entered the arena of debate in favour of the original sinlessness of Mary. The Dominicans and Franciscans have continued down to the present day to arrange themselves on different sides of this vexed question, and although the present Pope, Pius IX., has pronounced the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin to be henceforth an article of faith in the Romish church, there are not wanting members of the Dominican fraternity who are unwilling to admit, though they may not openly oppose, a doctrine which their order has long declared to be contrary both to the Scriptures and the opinions of the majority of the Fathers.

Thomas Aquinas has always been a favourite author with the Dominicans, and their partiality for the writings of this celebrated mediæval philosopher led to a sharp controversy with the Jesuits in the sixteenth century. Molina, a Spanish monk of the Society of Jesus, published a book in 1588 on the union of grace and free-will. The Dominicans were deeply offended at the doctrines of that book, more especially as being in declared opposition to the teachings of Aquinas. All Spain was in commotion, and the Jesuits were charged with reviving the errors of PELAGIUS (which see). Anxious to suppress the rising controversy, the Pope, Clement VIII., enjoined silence upon both parties, and undertook himself to decide the controverted points. The pontiff adopted this plan in the hope that time would subdue the animosities of both parties. But finding that no such effect was produced by delay, he was at length prevailed upon to call an assembly at Rome to discuss the disputed subjects. "Thus, in the beginning of the year 1598," to quote the language of Mosheim, "commenced those celebrated consultations on the contests between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, which, from the principal topic of controversy, were called Congregations on the Aids, that is, of Grace. The president of them was Lewis Madrucci, a cardinal of the Romish court and bishop of Trent, with whom there were ten assessors or judges—namely, three bishops and seven theologians of different fraternities. These occupied the remainder of this century in hearing the arguments of the parties. The Dominicans most strenuously defended the opinions of their Thomas as being the only true opinions. The Jesuits, although they refused to adopt the sentiments of Molina as their own, yet felt that the reputation and the honour of their order required that Molina should be pronounced free from any gross error, and untainted with Pelagianism." (See MOLINIST CONTROVERSY.) The contest which had thus continued for some time between the Dominicans and the Jesuits respecting the nature of Divine grace and its necessity to salvation, was under the careful consideration, for several years, of certain select divines, to whose examination it had been committed by Clement VIII. At length the committee of theologians gave their verdict in favour of the opinions of the Dominicans, and against those of Molina and the Jesuits. Accordingly, in A. D. 1601, the Pope was about to declare against the Jesuits, but learning that their cause was in imminent danger, they exerted all their influence with Clement to prevent him from adopting a step so likely to prove injurious to their order. Clement yielded to their earnest entreaties, and resolved to hear both parties anew. The trial continued for three years, the Pope acting as presiding judge, with fifteen cardinals, nine theologians, and five bishops as assessors. This court held seventy-eight sessions or congregations, as they are styled by the Roman Catholic church, at which both parties pleaded in favour of their respective opinions, but before Clement could come to a decision, he was cut off by death on the 4th March 1605. In September following, Paul V., who succeeded to the papal chair, ordered the judges to resume their examination of the disputed theological points. After several months' discussion, in which the committee were divided in opinion, the matter terminated in no formal conclusion being come to, but both parties being permitted to retain their own sentiments. It would appear that after this unsatisfactory termination of the controversy, the Dominicans gradually modified their opinions so as to avoid further collision with the Jesuits. Accordingly, we learn from the 'Provincial Letters of Pascal,' that the two parties were brought to something like an agreement in words, if not in opinions. "The Society," says Pascal, "is content with having prevailed on them so far as to admit the name of sufficient grace, though they understand it in another sense; by which manœuvre they gain this advantage, that they will make their opinion appear untenable, as soon as they judge it proper to do so. And this will be no difficult matter; for, let it be once granted that all men have the sufficient grace, nothing can be more natural than to conclude, that the efficacious grace is not necessary to action—the sufficiency of the general grace precluding the necessity of all others. By saying sufficient we express all that is necessary for action; and it will serve little purpose for the Dominicans to exclaim that they attach another sense to the expression; the people, accustomed to the common acceptation of that term, would not even listen to their explanation. Thus the Society gains a sufficient advantage from the expression which has been adopted by the Dominicans, without pressing them any further; and were you but acquainted with what passed under Popes Clement VIII. and Paul V., and knew how the Society was thwarted by the Dominicans in the establishment of the sufficient grace, you would not be surprised to find that it avoids embroiling itself in quarrels with them, and allows them to hold their own opinion, provided that of the Society is left untouched; and more especially, when the Dominicans countenance its doctrine, by agreeing to employ, on all public occasions, the term sufficient grace."

Though peace might seem to be restored to the Romish church by the compromise which the Dominicans had effected with the Jesuits on the subject of sufficient grace, the cessation of hostilities was only temporary. Throughout the whole of the last century, and down to the present day, the Dominicans have been incessantly at variance with the Jesuits on the one hand, and the Franciscans on the other, exhibiting the most violent intestine discord in a church which boasts of its unity and peace.

DOMINICUM, or DOMUS DEI, a name given by the Latins in ancient times to a church, as being the Lord's house, or a place set apart for the worship of God. The word Dominicum signifies three things in ancient writers: 1. The Lord's day. 2. The Lord's supper. 3. The Lord's house.

DOMUS BASILICÆ, a name applied anciently to the houses of the clergy adjoining the church.

DOMUS COLUMBÆ (Lat. house of the dove), a name once used by Tertullian for a church.

DOMUS SYNAXEOS (Lat. house of assembly), a name which sometimes occurs in the rescripts of ancient heathen emperors to denote Christian churches.

DONARIA. See ANATHEMATA.

DONATISTS, a Christian sect which arose in the North African Church in the early part of the fourth century, deriving its name from Donatus, a bishop of Casa Nigra in Numidia. It was the first important schism which divided the Christian church, and for a long period, extending indeed over nearly three centuries, it caused the fiercest contentions and disasters. The circumstances which gave rise to this unhappy schism were shortly these: Cæcilian, a deacon of the church at Carthage, was elected, on the death of Mensurius, to the bishopric of that see in A. D. 311. The validity of this appointment was disputed by Donatus on several grounds, but particularly, 1. Because the election had been irregular. 2. The ordination had been invalid, having been performed by a Traditor, that is, one who had obeyed the edicts of Diocletian by delivering up the sacred vessels, and even the Holy Scriptures; and 3. Because Cæcilian had shown the most unbecoming hostility to the Christians who had suffered in the late persecution. These charges were too serious to be passed over in silence, and accordingly, they were submitted to the judgment of seventy Numidian bishops, who were so fully satisfied of the truth of the allegations made by Donatus, that they refused to recognize the appointment of Cæcilian, and elected Majorinus to the bishopric of Carthage. The matter was brought before the Emperor, and the two rival prelates set out for Rome, each accompanied by ten ecclesiastics favourable to his claim. A convention was summoned on the occasion, consisting of three Gallic and fifteen Italian bishops, who decided in favour of Cæcilian and against Majorinus. The defeated party appealed to Constantine, who agreed to summon another and a larger convention, which was held at Arles in A. D. 314, when the decision of the former assembly was confirmed. Again an appeal was made to the judgment of the Emperor in person, but the decision of Constantine, who heard the delegates of the two parties at Milan in A. D. 316, was also in favour of Cæcilian. From this time the party of Majorinus was treated with the utmost severity; they were deprived of their churches, and laws were passed by the state expressly directed against them. But as usually happens, persecution only increased their number and influence, and although Majorinus himself died in A. D. 315, the party still continued to maintain its ground, being headed by Donatus, a man of eloquence, firmness, and energy, whom his followers regarded with such veneration that they gave him the title of the Great.

The Donatists were now called to encounter the hostility both of the dominant church and of the state. Constantine, however, had learned from his own experience the disastrous consequences of persecution, and therefore, in a rescript addressed to the Vicar Verinus in North Africa, he granted to the Donatists full liberty to act according to their own convictions, declaring that this was a matter which belonged to the judgment of God. And in this tolerant spirit did Constantine continue to act during the rest of his life. It would have been well if his successors had been animated by the same prudent and conciliatory dispositions. But when, on the death of Constantine, North Africa fell into the hands of Constans, matters assumed a very different aspect. At first he tried to bribe the Donatist churches to join themselves to the dominant church. At the same time he issued an edict calling upon them to return back to the unity of the church. These measures were only precursors to more forcible means of accomplishing his wishes. The Donatists were driven from their churches, and dispersed by armed soldiers when peaceably engaged in the worship of God. This led to scenes of violence and bloodshed, which only excited public sympathy all the more in their favour.

In A. D. 347, a still more violent persecution broke out against the Donatists. It was preceded by an attempt, as before, to bribe, by means of presents, several communities belonging to the sect to pass over to the dominant church. The object of these presents was clearly seen by Donatus, who, in reply to the flattering advances of the imperial officer, uttered the indignant remark, "What has the emperor to do with the church?" The Voluntary principle, as it has since been called, so evidently embodied in this remark, had begun to prevail extensively among the Donatists. Their preachers openly in their sermons attributed the corruption of the Church to its connection with the State. The fact that they held such opinions rendered them all the more odious to the civil authorities, so that under several succeeding emperors the sect was treated with the utmost harshness and cruelty.

The deplorable effects of the long-continued Donatist schism on the prosperity and progress of the North-African church, combined with the notion which many held even at that early date, that there was no salvation out of the Catholic church, roused several bishops to put forth all their efforts to heal the unhappy division. One of the most zealous in this work was Augustin, a presbyter, and subsequently a bishop of Hipporegius in Numidia. This distinguished polemic sought, but without effect, to bring about a private discussion between the two parties. At last at a general African council held at Carthage A. D. 403, an invitation was resolved to be given to the Donatist bishops to make arrangements for a public discussion with their opponents on the disputed points. The invitation, however, was declined, and a convention of the clergy of the Catholic church, summoned in the following year, actually discussed the question, whether it was not their duty to request the Emperor to pass new penal laws against the Donatists, whereby many might be compelled to return back to the Catholic church. This proposal, breathing, as it did, an intolerant and persecuting spirit, was resisted by Augustin and some of the younger bishops, who succeeded in modifying, and to some extent restraining, the intemperate zeal of the council. The government were not disposed to relax, but on the contrary, they increased their former severity.

Augustin and the North-African bishops generally, were urgent with the Donatists to agree to a religious conference, in the hope that they might convince them by argument that they had departed from the true faith. It was vain. The Donatists were unwilling to engage in so useless an experiment. An order, however, was obtained from the Emperor Honorius, that a conference should be held between the two parties at Carthage A. D. 411. The meeting was numerously attended, there being present no fewer than 286 bishops of the Catholic, and 279 of the Donatist party. Flavius Marcellinus, as imperial commissioner, presided on the occasion. The proceedings were far from being so quiet and orderly as befitted a religious assembly. In obedience to the imperial letters missive, Marcellinus demanded that each of the two contending parties should choose seven deputies to advocate their peculiar views. This arrangement was for a time resisted by the Donatists, but at length they were compelled to yield. The ablest speaker on the Catholic side was Augustin, while that on the other was Petilianus. Before commencing the debate, Marcellinus requested the deputies on both sides to be seated, as he himself was, but the Donatists declined, chiefly because the Divine Law forbade them in Ps. xxvi. 4, to sit down with such adversaries. The imperial commissioner, on hearing this, declared that respect for the character of the bishops prevented him from remaining seated, if they chose to stand, and accordingly he ordered his chair to be removed.

The points in dispute were simply two in number, the one of a mere temporary interest, and referring only to a matter of fact, namely, whether Felix of Aptunga and Cæcilian were TRADITORS (which see); the other an important question of doctrine, whether the church, by having in its communion unworthy members, thereby forfeited its title to be considered the genuine Christian Catholic church. The source of the error into which both parties had fallen in reference to the point, What constitutes the essence of the Catholic church? is to be found in confounding the invisible and the visible church with each other. "Proceeding on this fundamental error," says Neander, "the Catholic fathers maintained that, separate from the communion of the one visible Catholic church, derived, through the succession of the bishops, from the apostles, there is no way of participating in the influences of the Holy Spirit and of obtaining salvation; and hence it could not seem otherwise than a matter of the highest importance to those of them who were actuated by a pure zeal of Christian charity, to bring the Donatists to acknowledge this universal visible church, although they were not separated from them by any difference of creed. On the other hand, the Donatists, owing to this same confusion of notions, held that every church which tolerated unworthy members in its bosom was itself polluted by the communion with them; it thus ceased to deserve the predicates of purity and holiness, and consequently ceased to be a true Christian church, since such a church could not subsist without these predicates."

The Donatists maintained that it was the duty of the church to thrust out all unworthy members from her communion, supporting their opinion by the charge given by the apostle Paul to the church at Corinth, in the case of the incestuous man, as well as to various other passages in the New Testament. Augustin, on the other hand, while he admitted that church discipline ought to be maintained with the greatest strictness, nevertheless contended that such a complete separation as the Donatists required between the righteous and the wicked in the existing state of the church was impracticable; appealing, in support of his view, to those parables of our Lord which speak of the separation between the good and bad as reserved for the final judgment. To this the Donatists replied, that these passages either referred to the mixing together of the good and bad in the world, and not in the church; or that they referred to the mixing up of secret sinners with the saints. Thus a difference of opinion arose as to the meaning of the term "world" in the parables in question, such as those of the tares and the wheat, and the net containing both good and bad fishes. One party pointed to the explanation of our Lord himself, "The field is the world," understanding the term "world" in its literal sense as opposed to the church; while the other party regarded the "world," in the parables referred to, as used instead of the church. But still the question arises, What notion of the church is meant? On the proper answer to this question, Neander offers some very judicious observations: "That portion of the visible church," he says, "which belongs at the same time to the invisible, could only form an antithesis to that portion which the New Testament calls, in a peculiar sense, the world. But of the external, visible church, in so far as it is not one with the invisible, it may with propriety be said, that it belongs to the world in the sense of the Bible. Precisely because the Donatist bishop Emeritus failed to mark this distinction of ideas, he uttered—as Augustin expressed it—that petulant exclamation. He then proceeded directly to quote those passages from John, where the world expresses that which is opposed to the kingdom of God; and demanded, whether that could be said of the church?—for example, the world knows not God, therefore the church knows not God. But of one portion of the visible church all this may with propriety be said; and the Donatist himself could have no hesitation in applying all this to the secret unworthy members who yet belonged to the visible church. Pity that he had not made himself distinctly conscious of this! Augustin answered, that the holy scriptures used the term 'world,' sometimes in a good, and sometimes in a bad sense. In the former, for example, when it is said, the world believes in Christ, is redeemed by him; but he ought to have considered, that the invisible church receives its members out of the world; that they, who once belonged to the world, in that biblical sense, do, by becoming incorporated, by faith and participation in the redemption, into the invisible church, cease belonging to it any longer. Augustin says, one need only distinguish the different senses of the term 'world,' and one would no longer find any contradiction here in the scriptures. But he would have advanced farther, and been still more free from prejudice, in his interpretation of the Bible, if he had duly distinguished the different significations of the word 'church.' He says: 'Behold the world in the bad sense, all who cleave to earthly things among all the nations:—behold, on the other hand, the world in the good sense, all who believe and have hope of eternal life among all nations.' But are not the last mentioned precisely the members of the genuine church of Christ, of the invisible church among all the nations where the gospel has found its way,—among all the different earthly forms of appearance of the visible church?"

At the conference between the Donatists and their opponents, the important question came up in the course of the discussion, Whether it was lawful to employ force in matters of religion? The Donatist party argued with the utmost strenuousness against intolerance and persecution of every kind as being unscriptural, and opposed to the whole genius of the Christian system. Augustin, on the other hand, as the champion of the Catholic church, found himself under the necessity of attempting to prove that it was right and proper to compel men to enter into communion with the outward visible church, out of whose pale no man can be saved. On the great principle of toleration, therefore, the two parties were diametrically opposed to each other, and while the Donatists vindicated religious freedom, Augustin laid down a theory which, although he never dreamt probably of the extent to which it would be carried, led afterwards to a system of spiritual despotism, the most intolerant and enslaving ever devised by man.

After a keen and animated controversy of three days, conducted on both sides with no small ability and argumentative power, the conference came to an end, and the imperial commissioner, as was anticipated, gave his decision against the Donatists. A hot persecution ensued at the instance of the emperor and the government. The Donatist clergy were banished from their country, and the laity mulcted in heavy fines. Scattered and oppressed, the party continued to maintain their views, and even down to the sixth century, they still survived as a distinct sect or denomination of the Christian church, but it is nowhere mentioned after the days of Gregory the Great, although Witsius, in his 'History of the Donatists,' conjectures that the conquests of the Saracens in Africa, in the seventh century, put an end to the Donatist sect. See CIRCUMCELLIONS.

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, a forged document which appeared near the close of the eighth century, purporting to be a formal donation from the Roman emperor Constantine the Great, in A. D. 324, of the city of Rome and all Italy, to Sylvester, then bishop of Rome. This remarkable document contains the following passage: "We give as a free gift to the Holy Pontiff the city of Rome, and all the western cities of Italy, as well as the western cities of the other countries. To make room for him we abdicate our sovereignty over all these provinces; and we withdraw from Rome, transferring the seat of our empire to Byzantium, since it is not just that a terrestrial emperor should retain any power where God has placed the head of religion." The first mention of this donation occurs in an epistle which Pope Adrian I. addressed to the Emperor Charlemagne. "According to the legend," says Gibbon in his 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' "the first of the Christian emperors was healed of the leprosy, and purified in the waters of baptism, by St. Sylvester, the Roman bishop; and never was physician more gloriously recompensed. His royal proselyte withdrew from his seat and patrimony of St. Peter; declared his resolution of founding a new capital in the east; and resigned to the popes the free and perpetual sovereignty of Rome, Italy, and the provinces of the West. This fiction was productive of the most beneficial effects. The Greek princes were convicted of the guilt of usurpation; and the revolt of Pope Gregory was the claim of his lawful inheritance. The popes were delivered from their debt of gratitude: and the nominal gifts of the Carolingians were no more than the just and irrevocable restitution of a scanty portion of the ecclesiastical state. The sovereignty of Rome no longer depended on the choice of a fickle people; and the successors of St. Peter and Constantine were invested with the purple and prerogatives of the Cæsars. So deep was the ignorance and credulity of the times, that this most absurd of fables was received with equal reverence, in Greece and in France, and is still enrolled among the decrees of the canon law. The emperors and the Romans were incapable of discerning a forgery that subverted their rights and freedom; and the only opposition proceeded from a Sabine monastery, which, in the beginning of the twelfth century, disputed the truth and validity of the donation of Constantine. In the revival of letters and liberty this fictitious deed was transpierced by the pen of Laurentius Valla, an eloquent critic and a Roman patriot. His contemporaries of the fifteenth century were astonished at his sacrilegious boldness; yet such is the silent and irresistible progress of reason, that before the end of the next age, the fable was rejected by the contempt of historians; though, by the same fortune which has attended the decretals and the Sibylline oracles, the edifice has subsisted after the foundations have been undermined."

Of this pretended donation of Constantine, there are four texts in Greek, and only one in Latin, which is found in the Pseudo-Isidorian Collection. Otho III. acknowledges candidly, A. D. 999, that Constantine never made any such grant. The document is now universally given up as spurious, though the donation is defended by Baronius, and several writers among the Jesuits. Yet this forged document was the first step from which the papacy endeavoured to raise itself above the state.

DONATIVE, a term used to express the fact, that a church or chapel, in connection with the Church of England, is given and fully possessed by the single donation of the patron in writing without presentation, institution, or induction. This is said to have been anciently the only way of conferring ecclesiastical benefices in England, the method of institution by the bishop not having been established before the time of Thomas à Becket in the reign of Henry II. Others again allege, that institution by bishops has existed even from the first introduction of Christianity into England.

DOORKEEPERS. See OSTIARII.

DORMITIO DEIPARÆ (Lat. the sleeping of the Mother of God), the name given by the Greek church to the festival of the ASSUMPTION (which see) of the Virgin Mary.

DORMITORY, the sleeping apartment of a monastery.

DORON (Gr. a gift), a name sometimes given to baptism in the early Christian church, because it is the gift of Christ. We call it the gift, says Gregory Nazianzen, because it is given to those who offer nothing for it. The eucharist also, both before and after consecration, was sometimes called by the name of gifts or mystical gifts.

DORRELLITES, a class of religionists who were followers of one Dorrell, a person who appeared in the end of the last century at Leyden, in Massachusetts, North America, pretending to be a prophet sent to supersede the Christian dispensation, and to introduce a new one, of which he claimed to be the head. His opinions were of the most peculiar and extravagant description. According to his own statement they were as follows: "Jesus Christ, as to substance, is a Spirit, and is God. He took a body, died, and never rose from the dead. None of the human race will ever rise from their graves. The resurrection spoken of in Scripture is only one from sin to spiritual life, which consists in perfect obedience to God. Written revelation is a type of the substance of the true revelation which God makes to those whom he raises from spiritual death. The substance is God revealed in the soul. Those who have it are perfect, are incapable of sinning, and have nothing to do with the Bible. Neither prayer nor any other worship is necessary. There is no law but that of nature. There is no future judgment. God has no fore-thought, no knowledge of what passes in the dark world, which is hell, nor any knowledge of what has taken place, or will take place in this world."

DORT (SYNOD OF). See ARMINIANS.

DOSITHEANS, a heretical sect of the first century, which derived its name from Dositheus, a Samaritan, who pretended to be the Messiah foretold by the prophets. According to Origen he was a rigorous observer of the law of Moses; and, in particular, he allowed no one to move from the spot where the Sabbath overtook him. According to Epiphanius, he was an apostate Jew, whose ambition being disappointed, he retired among the Samaritans, lived in a cave, and fasted so rigorously as to occasion his death. It is said that though at first he gave himself out as being the Messiah, he afterwards retracted in the presence of his pupil Simon Magus. The followers of Dositheus maintained that he was raised from the dead, and that if he did not appear visibly to the multitude, it was because he was to remain concealed during some years in a cave. In the seventh century, Eulogius, bishop of Alexandria, wrote against the Dositheans, and besides his pretended Messiahship, he attributed to Dositheus various errors, all of them resembling the Sadducean or Samaritan opinions, and alleges, also, that he corrupted the Samaritan copy of the Pentateuch.

DOUAY BIBLE, a Roman Catholic version of the Old Testament translated from the Vulgate into English at Douay, whence it derives its name. It appeared originally in two vols. 4to, the first of which was published in 1609, and the second in 1610. The translators were William, afterwards Cardinal Allen, Gregory Martin, and Richard Bristow. This translation, with the Rhemish version of the New Testament, forms the only English Bible used by the Romanists of Great Britain and Ireland.

DOVE-WORSHIP. The dove is reckoned by Moses among the clean birds, and from sacred as well as other writers, we learn that this bird was held in high estimation among the Eastern nations. The dove was worshipped by the Assyrians and Samaritans, as Lucian informs us when he says, "Of birds the dove appears to them the most sacred, and they think it unlawful even to touch it." Some writers suppose that this bird was worshipped by the Assyrians in honour of Semiramis, while others allege it to have been an emblem of the air. Doves have been uniformly celebrated for their conjugal fidelity. Accordingly, among the Egyptians, a black pigeon was the symbol of a widow who declined to marry a second time. In Sacred Scripture, the dove is often an emblem of purity and innocence. It was appointed as an offering under the Old Testament, Lev. xii. 6, 8, and also recognized as such in various passages of the New Testament, particularly in the case of those who were unable to be at the charge of more expensive victims. At one period the dove seems to have been a symbol of kings, for Lightfoot, quoting from some Jewish writers, tells us that when Solomon sat on his throne, there was appended to it a sceptre, on whose top was a dove and a golden crown in the mouth of the dove. In the account given in the New Testament of the baptism of our blessed Lord, we find the Holy Spirit descending upon him from heaven in the form of a dove. From that time, therefore, this bird was frequently used to represent the Holy Spirit, more especially as brooding upon the face of the waters in the act of creation. Hence, in the Jewish Commentaries, the creative energy of the Spirit is familiarly represented under the figure of a dove hatching its eggs. Thus the Semitic nations generally came to entertain a high veneration for the dove, and all the more that, besides being connected with the creation, the same bird occupies a prominent place in the narrative of the Deluge.

In various towns of Syria, the dove was formerly worshipped as a divinity, and, therefore, prohibited from being eaten, and consecrated dove-cots were used in which these birds were carefully reared. Venus was worshipped as the principal deity of the ancient Arabians, under the name of ALLAT (which see), whose sacred day was Friday, and even yet a golden dove is seen at Mecca, in the Ka'aba, and such is the veneration for doves, that they are allowed to nestle in the city of Mecca wherever they choose, without the slightest chance of molestation. Burnes, the traveller, tells us that at Bokhara the inhabitants have such a respect for pigeons, that if any one should be found killing one of these sacred birds, he would be instantly mounted upon a camel and paraded through the streets with a dead pigeon hung round his neck.

The dove may be considered in its symbolic character as twofold, having a relation either to the creation or to the deluge. In the first aspect we find several instances of its occurrence as a symbol among the nations of antiquity. Thus the Syrian Venus sprung from an egg, which having fallen from heaven into the Euphrates, was rolled upon the bank by fishes, and hatched by doves. The Aphrodite of the Greeks, or Venus of the Romans, who was strictly a personification of the generative powers of nature, and the mother of all living beings, reckoned the dove among the creatures specially consecrated to her.

In the Mosaic account of the deluge, the dove was despatched by Noah from the ark to ascertain whether the waters were abated. Twice she returned, not having found a spot of dry ground on which to rest her foot, but on going forth the third time she returned no more. Hence the dove is often used emblematically in relation to the deluge. "The dove is diluvian," says Rougemont, in his 'Le Peuple Primitif,' "when she feeds Semiramis exposed upon the shore, or Jupiter, who is the god of the times posterior to the flood; when she is represented at Hierapolis upon the head of Deucalion or Semiramis; when the Argonauts let her loose from their ship at the moment when they cross the Symplégades. At Eryx, in that ancient town of Sicily whose medals have a dove on the obverse, the doves, which throughout the rest of the year fluttered in great numbers around the temple of Venus, disappeared on the very day on which they advanced in procession towards the sea, as if to accompany the goddess, who was thought to have set out for Libya; returning to the temple on the ninth day with great rejoicings."

The Jewish writers say that the dove was worshipped on Mount Gerizzim by the Cuthites, whom Shalmaneser had carried thither from the Euphrates, and it is highly probable that the Babylonians, as well as the Assyrians, also worshipped this bird. The dove was anciently held in great estimation as a prophetic bird, especially by mariners. It was a dove which, setting out from Thebes, founded the oracle of Dodona, on the spot where Deucalion settled after the flood.

Several heathen nations of modern times are accustomed to venerate the dove. Schoolcraft informs us, that the Red Indians of North America recognize in this bird the symbol of the earth, and address it as a mother. The Dacotas also, he says, venerate the dove, as well as the wolf and the bear. According to a legend of the New Zealanders, it was a dove which raised the earth to the surface of the sea, and that dove, which they believe to be animated by the spirit of the god Mawi, they suppose to appear at distant intervals, and if heard to coo during the night, it is regarded as the sure sign of an approaching storm. The celebrated voyager, Captain Cook, mentions a singular tradition as prevailing in the South Sea Islands. Tahiti, they say, was at a very remote period covered with certain trees, which were destroyed by some catastrophe, but a number of doves carrying off the seeds conveyed them to the moon. These seeds have been brought back from that planet, and have given origin to the numerous luxuriant groves and forests which adorn these islands of the South. The Mandans of North America also venerate the dove, on the idea that it came to the Red Indians on the retirement of the waters of the deluge, carrying in its beak a branch of willow. Accordingly, when the willow is in flower, they observe a yearly festival called the retreat of the waters, evidently in commemoration of the deluge.

But while we thus dwell upon the dove as an emblem among heathen nations, we must not omit its use in the early Christian church as representing the Holy Ghost. It was considered, for instance, that at an election to any sacred office, if a dove lighted upon the head of any one of the candidates, he was thereby marked out from the others by a Divine omen in his favour. He was therefore chosen in preference to all the rest, as having been pointed out by the Spirit himself for the office. Eusebius says, that an incident of this kind led to the election of a bishop of Rome, though he was a stranger. At first no one thought of choosing him, but when a dove was observed by the people to settle on his head, they took it for an emblem of the Holy Spirit, and with one voice they cried out, that he was worthy, which was the usual way of signifying their consent. In the same way was decided the election of Severus, bishop of Ravenna, and that of Euortius, bishop of Orleans. At a later period, when images and pictures began to be allowed in Christian churches, the Holy Ghost was sometimes represented by a silver dove hovering over the altar. This was found also not unfrequently in the baptisteries, as a memorial of the dove lighting upon Jesus at his baptism. Accordingly, when the custom became more common of having golden or silver doves suspended over the altar, the place where they hung received the name of peristerion, from peristera, the Greek word for a dove.

DOUBLE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST. See PROCESSION (DOUBLE) OF THE HOLY GHOST.

DOWRY, a marriage portion. The custom in Britain and other European countries differs widely in this matter from the invariable practice of the East. With us the father usually gives a dowry to his daughter on her marriage, which becomes the property of her husband. But in Eastern countries, the bridegroom from the earliest times has always bestowed the dowry or marriage portion, which has been uniformly understood to belong to the wife, and to remain hers after her husband's death. In the Old Testament, we find reference to a gift, as well as a dowry, and by the word "gift" in such cases, is probably meant a present made at the time of the betrothing, as a pledge of plighted faith. Of this nature were probably the jewels of silver and gold which Abraham's servant brought to Rebekah, Gen. xxiv. 53, "And the servant brought forth jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah: he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things." The principle on which a dowry is given among Orientals is clearly laid down in the following passage from the Pictorial Bible: "Among all savage and barbarous people—and therefore in the early history of every nation which afterwards became civilized—the father of a girl, in relinquishing her to a husband, conceives he has a right to receive a compensation for losing the benefit of her services, as well as for the trouble and expense of bringing up and providing for her wants. The principle is still the same, whether, as among the Bedouins, the sum exacted be called the 'price' of the woman, or is merely described as a 'gift' or 'present' to the father. The antiquity of this usage will appear from various passages in the book of Genesis; although the only instance in which a provision for the female is overlooked, is that of Jacob's engagement with Laban. The classical scholar is aware of numerous allusions to this custom. In one passage of the Iliad an accomplished lady is valued at four oxen; in another place, Agamemnon is made to say, that he would give one of his daughters to Achilles without exacting the least present in return. Homer never mentions anything as given to the bride, but always the presents which the bridegroom makes to the lady's father. It is also related by Pausanias, that when Danaus found himself unable to get his daughters married he caused it to be made known that he would not demand any presents from those who would espouse them. It may suffice to state generally, that, under sundry modifications, the principle of paying the father for his daughter is distinctly recognised throughout Asia, even where the father actually receives nothing. We shall confine our instances to the Bedouins. Usages differ considerably in this and other points among the Arabian tribes; and travellers have too hastily concluded that the customs of one tribe represented those of the entire nation. The principle of payment is, indeed, known to all the tribes, but its operation varies very considerably. Among some very important tribes it is considered disgraceful for the father to demand the daughter's 'price,' (halk el bint), nor is it thought creditable to receive even voluntary presents; among other tribes, the price is received by the parent, but is made over to the daughter, constituting her dowry. Among other tribes, however, the price is rigidly exacted. The price is generally paid in cattle, and is sometimes so considerable as to render it an advantageous circumstance when there are many daughters in a family. Five or six camels are a very ordinary payment for a person in tolerable circumstances, and if the man can afford it, and the bride is much admired or well connected, fifty sheep and a mare or foal are added."

The marriage dowry of a Hebrew bride was at one time fixed at a certain price, but afterwards it varied according to circumstances. The average amount in the time of Moses was thirty shekels, and the highest fifty. The wife who was freely given up by her father, without receiving any pecuniary compensation, was all the more highly esteemed on that account. Sometimes, as in the case of Michal the daughter of Saul, a wife is given by her father as a reward of bravery, and sometimes, though rarely, the bride, instead of being purchased by the bridegroom, received a dowry from the father. Similar customs are found at this day in Eastern countries. Mr. Buckingham mentions that in Arabia young women of the higher classes are given in marriage for certain sums of money, varying from 500 to 1,000 piastres, though among the lower orders the dowry descends as low as 100 or even 50 piastres. In all Mohammedan countries the giving of a dowry by the bridegroom is indispensable.

The custom of the bridegroom paying a dowry for his wife prevails in many other nations besides the Oriental. Thus Mr. Wilson, in describing the customs of the nations of the Grain Coast in Western Africa, says: "The wife is always purchased; and as this is done, in the great majority of cases, when she is but a child, her wishes, as a matter of course, are never consulted in this most important affair of her whole life. The first overture must be made to the mother. Her consent is to be won by small presents, such as beads, plates, dried fish, or a few leaves of tobacco. When this is accomplished the way is prepared for opening negotiations with the father and his family, who are the real owners of the child. The main question to be settled, and indeed the only one about which there is much negotiation, is whether the applicant is able to pay the dowry, and will be likely to do so without giving much trouble. The character of the man, his position in society, his family connections, or circumstances in life, are seldom taken into the account. The price of a wife is usually three cows, a goat or a sheep, and a few articles of crockery-ware or brass rods, the whole of which would scarcely exceed twenty dollars. The goat and the smaller articles go to the mother's family, and the cows belong to the family of the father, which pass out of their hands without much delay in payment for a wife for some other member of the family. Bullocks may be seen passing from village to village, almost every day, in fulfilment of these matrimonial arrangements. It is a very inconvenient medium of exchange, but the only one they have, and habit of long standing has reconciled them to it. If a man pays down the whole dowry at the time, he may take the child home at once, and place her under the care of his head wife or some favourite sister. If he is not able to do this, she remains with her own mother until the payment is completed, which may not be until she has attained to womanhood. In cases, however, where the negotiation has been completed, the husband-expectant places a string of beads on the neck of the child as evidence of her betrothment."

A curious custom is mentioned by Herodotus as having existed among the ancient Babylonians by which dowries were obtained for those females who more particularly needed them. Once a-year, he informs us, all the young marriageable women were collected together in a certain spot, where they were surrounded by the bachelors of all classes who chose to be present. The whole of the females were then put up to auction and sold to the highest bidder, the auctioneer commencing the sale with the handsomest and most agreeable of the party. For these, of course, the wealthiest bachelors offered high prices, and thus a considerable sum of money was collected. When the beautiful women were sold off, the money which had been obtained was divided among those of the young women who were not possessed of great personal attractions, the plainest and least beautiful obtaining the largest dowry. Thus all the young women were sure of meeting with a partner, if not for their beauty, at least for their wealth.

With the modern Jews the dowry was a matter of regular contract, by which the husband granted her a sum of money which the law fixed at sixty crowns, but which could not be demanded until his death, when the wife had it in her power to claim it from her husband's estate. The rich and poor gave the same sum, and the contract was delivered to the bride upon the day of marriage. The following copy of a dowry contract is found in the Babylonian Talmud: "Upon the sixth day of the week, in the fourth of the month Sivan, in the year five thousand two hundred and fifty-four of the creation of the world, according to the computation which we use here at Massilia, a city situated near the sea-shore; the bridegroom Rabbi Moses, the son of Rabbi Jehuda, said unto the bride-wife Clarona, the daughter of Rabbi Moses, a citizen of Lisbon, be unto me a wife, according to the law of Moses, and of Israel; and I, according to the word of God, will worship, honour, maintain, and govern thee, according to the manner of the husbands among the Jews, which do honour, worship, maintain, and govern their wives faithfully. I also do bestow upon thee the dowry of thy virginity, two hundred deniers of silver, which belong unto thee by law; and moreover thy food, thy apparel, and sufficient necessaries, as likewise the knowledge of thee, according to the custom of all the earth. Thus Clarona the virgin rested and became a wife to Rabbi Moses, the son of Jehuda, the bridegroom."

DOXOLOGY (Gr. doxa, glory, and logos, a discourse), an ascription of glory to God. The ancient liturgies of the Greek church append to the Lord's Prayer a doxology which has been ascribed to Basil and Chrysostom, and which runs in these words, obviously designed to recognize the Trinity, "Thine is the kingdom, power, and glory, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, both now and for ever, world without end." The doctrine revealed in this doxology, none but the faithful were permitted to know. The doxology appended to the Lord's Prayer in Matth. vi. 13, is couched in these words, "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen." This passage, beautiful and appropriate as it is in the close of the prayer, was unknown to Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, and Cyril of Jerusalem. But it was extant as early as the middle of the fourth century. Neither this doxology, nor that in the Greek liturgies, is supposed by ecclesiastical writers generally to belong to the text.

In the ancient Christian church, two doxologies or brief hymns of praise were much in use. These were called the greater and the lesser doxology. The former was more generally known by the name of the ANGELICAL HYMN (which see). The latter consisted simply of these words, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," and was one of the most common and ancient hymns used in Divine service. It is repeated at the end of every Psalm in the service of the Church of England, but in a more expanded form, having these words added to it, "as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." The most ancient form of the lesser doxology, as used both in the Greek and Latin churches, has no such clause appended to it. The fourth council of Toledo, A. D. 633, reads it thus, "Glory and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen." It occurs in the same form in the Mosarabic liturgy, which was used in Spain not long after. The Greek church read it in the same way, only omitting the word "honour," which seems to have been peculiar to the Spanish church. Athanasius repeats it thus, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen." Strabo says, that the Greeks omitted the words "as it was in the beginning," which were supposed by some to have been added by the council of Nice, A. D. 325, in order to oppose the Arian tenet, which asserted that the Son was not in the beginning, and that there was a time when the Son was not.

After the rise of the Arian heresy in the fourth century, a considerable difference of opinion began to manifest itself as to the precise words in which this ancient doxology should be expressed. Before that time the words had varied considerably, some saying, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost;" others, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Ghost," and others still, "Glory be to the Father, in" or "by the Son, and by the Holy Ghost." No sooner, however, had Arius broached his peculiar opinions on the subject of the Trinity, than all his followers refused to employ the lesser doxology in any other form than the third of those just noticed; thereby intending to indicate their belief, that the Son and the Holy Ghost were inferior to the Father, and different in nature from him. The use of this doxology, therefore, with the peculiar phraseology "in" or "by the Son and by the Holy Ghost," became a distinctive mark by which the Arians were known from the orthodox. The lesser doxology appears to have been used in the ancient church at the close of every solemn office. The Western church repeated it at the end of every Psalm, and the Eastern church at the end of the last Psalm. Many of their prayers were also concluded with it, particularly the consecration prayer at the eucharist. The sermons in the ancient church always closed with a doxology to the Holy Trinity. The Greek church uses the doxology several times in the course of the marriage ceremony.

DRABICIANS, the followers of Nicholas Drabik, or Drabicius, a pretended prophet who appeared in Hungary about A. D. 1630. He had been born and educated in Moravia, but in consequence of the severe edicts issued against the Protestants in that country, he had been compelled, in 1629, to seek an asylum in Hungary. In 1638 he began to assume the functions of a prophet, declaring that he had been favoured with a vision from heaven announcing that great armies would come from the north and east, which should overthrow the house of Austria. He was ordered to commit to writing the revelation he had received, and to preface it like the ancient prophets, with the statement, "The word of the Lord came unto me." He belonged to the Moravian brethren, and had with difficulty supported himself by dealing in a small way in woollen wares. Entirely destitute of learning, and knowing no other than the Bohemian language, he imagined himself enlightened by the Spirit of God to pierce into the secrets of futurity. Under this delusion he wrote a book entitled, 'Light out of Darkness,' in the course of which he spoke with the utmost severity of the Austrian government, calling the two Ferdinands and Leopold covenant-breakers; the house of Austria, the house of Ahab, a cruel perjured house, which ought to be rooted out. To the Roman Catholics he predicted a speedy and utter desolation

This work, which, though rudely written, excited no slight sensation on its publication, was translated out of Bohemian into Latin, by an ardent follower of Drabik, named John Amos Comenius, and was printed at Amsterdam in 1665. The appearance of a book containing such violent and unscrupulous attacks upon the house of Austria, exposed the author to the hostility of the government. He was forthwith arrested and conveyed in a cart to be tried before the court at Presburg. The trial took place on the 4th of July 1671. Being eighty-four years of age, he was very infirm, but with a bold and undaunted spirit he appeared before his judges, taking his seat near Count Rottel, who understood Bohemian. In a short time he was compelled to sit on the ground. On being interrogated by the archbishop, whether he were the false prophet, he replied, that such an epithet could not be properly applied to him. He admitted having written the obnoxious book entitled, 'Light out of Darkness;' and when the archbishop put the question by whose orders and for what purpose he had written the book, he answered, without the slightest hesitation, "At the command of the Holy Spirit." "You lie," said the archbishop, "the book is from the devil." "In this you lie," said old Drabik, with the utmost firmness, utterly regardless of the consequences. The examiners then asked him what his belief was, when he repeated the whole Athanasian Creed, asking the bishop at the close, "And what do you believe?" The prelate replied, "I believe all that and a great deal more, which is also necessary." "You do not believe any such thing," said Drabik, "you believe in your cows, and horses, and your estates."

In a few days the old man was led forth to execution. His right hand was first cut off; then he was beheaded. The tongue was torn out, and nailed to a post, some say while he was yet alive; and his writings burned in the market-place along with his body.

The Jesuits boast that they succeeded in converting Drabik before his death, but the real state of the case is given in a recently published 'History of the Protestant Church in Hungary:'. "After many attempts had been made in vain to shake the old man's faith, at length the Jesuit Peter Kubey or Kubmey succeeded in gaining his confidence so far, that in a moment of weakness he yielded, and on the 4th of July did actually join the Popish Church. What prevailed with him seems to have been the promise of liberty; he should be set completely at liberty, said the Jesuit pater, and should have a conveyance to take him back to his native land to die there in peace. So soon as he discovered that he had been deceived, the vile deed that he had committed stood in all its horror before him, he was deeply ashamed of his cowardice, and exclaimed, that he would die in the faith in which he had lived, and which he had only for a few moments forsaken." The death of their founder put an end to the hopes of his followers, who seem never to have been able to establish themselves as a separate sect.

DRACONARII, soldiers who were wont to accompany the Pope in his public functions.

DRACONTIA, dragon-temples which were found in Asia Minor, Epirus, North-Africa, Gaul, and Britain. They were formed of immense stones, set upright in rows. They had probably a reference to the deluge, and destructive agents under the form of monster serpents. Hence we find a myth prevailing in many countries of the dragon of the deluge attacking the ark, and in Asia a dragon attacking the moon has by many tribes been regarded as the cause of an eclipse.

DRAGON-WORSHIP. The word translated dragon in the Sacred Scriptures is Tham, or as it more frequently occurs in the plural, Thanim, or Thanin. It is differently rendered by different writers, sometimes crocodiles, at other times whales, and frequently serpents of a large species. The crocodile was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians, which Diodorus Siculus accounts for by remarking, that for fear of this creature their enemies durst not cross the Nile to attack them. At Tachompo in particular, the crocodiles, called in the Coptic language champsæ, were served with religious zeal and solemn rites. In some parts of Egypt their flesh was used as an article of food, but in others it was detested as the emblem of Typhon the deity of evil. According to Plutarch, both the crocodile and the hippopotamus are symbols of the wicked and mischievous god. One genealogy traces the descent of Typhon to Tartarus and Terra; decorates the upper part of his person with a hundred heads like those of a serpent or dragon; and furnishes him with a mouth and eyes, from which dart flames of devouring fire. Having stated that the lurid god was the most eminent of those giants that presumed to wage war against heaven, Tooke thus proceeds: "Typhœus, or Typhon, the son of Juno, had no father. So vast was his magnitude, that he touched the east with one hand and the west with the other, and the heavens with the crown of his head. A hundred dragons' heads grew from his shoulders; his body was covered with feathers, scales, rugged hair, and adders; from the ends of his fingers snakes issued, and his two feet had the shape and fold of a serpent's body; his eyes sparkled with fire, and his mouth belched out flames. He was at last overcome, and thrown down—from heaven; and lest he should rise again, the whole island of Sicily was laid upon him."

From the notion which prevailed in some parts of Egypt, that the crocodile represented TYPHON (which see), its destruction was regarded as a sacred duty. In the Egyptian mythology, this creature was sacred to the god Savak. Ælian informs us, that in places where crocodiles were worshipped, their numbers increased to such an extent that it was not safe for any one to wash his feet or draw water at the river; and no one could walk near the edge of the stream either in the vicinity of Ombos, Coptos, or Arsinoë, without extreme caution. From the great veneration in which the crocodile was held at Arsinoë, it was formerly called Crocodilopolis. Strabo says, that one which was regarded as peculiarly sacred was kept at that town, in a lake set apart for the purpose, and so tame was the creature, that it allowed itself to be touched by the priests. It was fed with bread, meat, and wine, which were brought by strangers who came to see it.

Sir John Gardner Wilkinson states that, among the Egyptians, "The crocodile was supposed by some to be an emblem of the sun; and Clemens tells as the sun was sometimes placed in a boat, at others on a crocodile. On the subject of the crocodile M. Pauw makes a very judicious remark, 'that on his examining the topography of Egypt, he observed Coptos, Arsinoë, and Crocodilopolis (Athribis), the towns most remarkable for the adoration of crocodiles, to be all situated on canals at some distance from the Nile. Thus by the least negligence in allowing the ditches to be filled up, those animals, from being incapable of going far on dry land, could never have arrived at the very places where they were considered as the symbols of pure water. For, as we learn from Ælian, and more particularly from a passage in Eusebius, the crocodile signified water fit for drinking and irrigating the lands. As long as their worship was in vogue, the government felt assured that the superstitious would not neglect to repair the canals with the greatest exactness.' Thus was their object gained by this religious artifice. Herodotus speaks of a method of catching the crocodile with a hook to which a piece of pork was attached as a bait; but I ought not to omit another mode practised at the present day. They fasten a dog upon a log of wood, to the middle of which is tied a rope of sufficient length, protected by iron wire, or other substance, to prevent its being bitten through; and having put this into the stream, or on a sand-bank at the edge of the water, they lie concealed near the spot, and await the arrival of the crocodile. As soon as it has swallowed the dog, they pull the rope, which brings the stick across the animal's throat. It endeavours to plunge into deep water, but is soon fatigued by its exertions, and is drawn ashore; when, receiving several blows on the head with long poles and hatchets, it is easily killed. It is now seldom eaten, the flesh being bad; but its hide is used, especially by the Ethiopians, for shields and other purposes: the glands are taken from beneath the arm or fore leg, for the musk they contain; and some parts are occasionally dried and used as philters. In former times it seems rather to have been eaten as a mark of hatred to the Evil Being, of whom it was the emblem, than as an article of food."

In the New Testament, Satan is termed, Rev. xii. 9, the dragon, and in the Old Testament it is the symbol of a king, that is an enemy. Among some ancient nations the dragon was an emblem of industry. Thus the Athenians represented Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, as always attended by a dragon. A painted or sculptured dragon was often placed at the gates of their temples, and of those places where they were wont to receive the answers of their gods. These monstrous creatures occupy a conspicuous place in the fabulous legends of China and Japan. They speak of a dragon which resides at the bottom of the sea. The Japanese tell us of a dragon which had its abode in a certain lake, and destroyed a monstrous serpent that frightened the inhabitants of the country. A temple was erected in honour of this animal, which had been so great a benefactor of the people. The Chinese and Japanese, and even the Mohammedans in Arabia and Persia, frequently paint in front of their houses, and over their doors, dragons' heads, with wide open mouths, large teeth and fiery eyes, to prevent the peace of their families from being disturbed by the envious, or those who wish to do them harm.

In the cosmogony of various heathen nations, a monstrous dragon plays an active part, descending from heaven with its immense form, its eyes flashing lightning, and its wings flapping with the noise of thunder. This mighty creature touches the ocean, and straightway the earth rises from beneath its waters, and takes its place as a solid mass, distinct from the fluid heap. It is thus that various tribes of North American Indians account for the origin of the world. The Chinese and the Kalmuck Tartars allege that the thunder arises from a dragon which flies in the air. Comets have been called dragons, and the representation of a dragon has formed the ensign of many nations. Harold, the last of the Anglo-Saxon monarchs, fell fighting between dragon standards; and the Norman sovereigns used a standard of this kind down to the reign of Henry VIII.

If the dragon be understood to be a snake, even in that sense we can speak of Dragon-Worship. An animal of this kind is well known to be venerated in Cutch, in Hindostan, and in the eastern provinces of Persia. In Western Africa both crocodiles and snakes are held in veneration, the crocodile being accounted sacred on the Gold Coast, and a certain kind of snake on the Slave Coast. See SERPENT-WORSHIP.

DRAWERS (LINEN), a part of the official dress of the Jewish high-priest, as described in Exod. xxviii. and Lev. viii. They were bound about the loins with strings, and reached down to the knees. See HIGH-PRIEST.

DREAMS (DIVINATION BY). See DIVINATION, ONEIROMANCY.

DRINK-OFFERINGS, an appointed part of the ancient ritual law of the Hebrews. These offerings always consisted of wine, and were never performed alone, but always accompanied other sacrifices. Burnt-offerings and peace-offerings had meat-offerings and drink-offerings combined with them. See offerings, however, had no such accompaniment. In every sacrifice in which a bullock was slain, the quantity of the drink-offering was half a hin of wine; for a ram, the third part of a hin; for a lamb or kid, the fourth part of a hin. The wine was not mingled, nor any of it thrown into the fire as the meat-offering was, but it was poured out like the blood of the sacrifice, at the bottom of the altar. See OFFERINGS, SACRIFICES.

DROPS (FESTIVAL OF THE), a festival observed by the Copts, or original inhabitants of Egypt, on the 12th day of June yearly, because on that day the drops of dew fall which are believed to lead to the rise of the Nile. These drops the natives believe to be the mercies and blessings sent from heaven. As soon as this dew is fallen, the water begins to be corrupt, and assumes a greenish colour, which increases more and more till the river appears as a lake covered all over with moss. This colour is to be seen not only in its great channel, but also in all the ponds and branches that come from it; only the cisterns keep the water pure. Some years this green colour continues about twenty days, and sometimes more, but never above forty. At this time the Egyptians suffer much, because the water is corrupt, tasteless, and unwholesome, and good water is very rare. As soon as the green colour is gone, the river Nile becomes red and very muddy. The Copts were wont to call the drops of dew the benediction of heaven, and believed that the Almighty sent down Michael the archangel to infuse these sacred drops into the Nile, that it might begin to rise, and at length irrigate and fertilize their country.

Sir John Gardner Wilkinson tells us that "the deity, or presiding genius of the river, was propitiated by the ancient Egyptians by suitable oblations, both during the inundation, and about the period when it was expected; and Seneca tells us that on a particular fete, the priests threw presents and offerings of gold into the river near Philæ, at a place called the veins of the Nile, when they first perceived the rise of the inundation. Indeed we may reasonably suppose that the grand and wonderful spectacle of the inundation excited in them feelings of the deepest awe for the Divine power to which they were indebted for so great a blessing."

One of the principal festivals of the Egyptians in ancient times, according to Heliodorus, was the NILOA (which see), or invocation of the blessings of the inundation, offered to the tutelary deity of the Nile. Vansleb says, that on the first night of the drops, "a cadi (judge) and the oldest person of the town repair to church, carrying with them a small line with eight knots in it at the distance of an inch from one another. At the end of this line is fastened a leaden plummet, which is let down the mouth of the well in the presence of a vast concourse of people, till it touch the surface of the water, after which they lock up the well, and put their signet upon it, remaining in the church till next morning, in order to discover how high the water has risen in the course of the night. As soon as it is daybreak they take off the seal, open the well, and discover by the number of knots which are wet how many fathoms the Nile would rise that year above sixteen, reckoning a fathom for every knot." The same traveller adds, "The Mohammedans, though professed enemies of the Copts, observe upon the same occasion several customs at this day which bear a near affinity with those of the Copts at the time when their priests measured the Nile. This ceremony is never performed but at vespers, that is to say, at three o'clock in the afternoon. Such as undertake this office must be cadi or judges, which, amongst the Mohammedans, is an ecclesiastical function. Before they enter upon it they must be purified, and must have finished their evening prayers or vespers, which bear some relation to the mass amongst the Copts."

The practice is still observed annually in Egypt, of holding a festival on the opening of the Kalidgi, or cutting down the embankment of the canal at Cairo, in order to admit the waters of the Nile when they have reached a certain height, which is ascertained by an instrument adapted for the purpose, called a Nilometer, or measurer of the Nile. This is placed between Gizeh and Cairo, on the point of an island in the middle of the river, and consists of a round tower with an apartment having a cistern in the middle of it, which is lined with marble. The bottom of the cistern reaches to the bottom of the river, and there is a large opening by which the water of the Nile is admitted into the cistern. The rise of the water is indicated by an octagonal column of blue and white marble, on which are marked twenty cubits of twenty-two inches each. The two lowermost of these have no subdivisions; but each of the rest is divided into twenty-four parts called digits; and the whole height of the pillar is thirty-six feet eight inches. When the river has attained its proper height, all the canals are opened, and the whole country is laid under water. The utmost importance is attached by the inhabitants to the rise of the Nile, Egypt being wholly dependent for its fertility upon that noble river, and accordingly, when the medium height has been reached, and the canals are thrown open, sounds of festive rejoicing are heard on all sides, intermingled with music, songs, and cries of "Allah illah Allah." A general festival is held at this time, during which the people indulge in all kinds of amusement and hilarity. Joy is pictured on every countenance, and happiness reigns in every house. Each man congratulates his neighbour that the river-god is pouring forth productiveness and plenty over the land.

DROTTEs, the priests of Teutonic heathenism in ancient Germany and Britain. It has been supposed that they had some analogy with the Celtic Druids, though Cæsar declares that no such persons were found among the Germans. Bishop Percy says, that although the Teutonic nations had priests, they more no more resemblance to the Druids than the pontiffs of the Greeks and Romans, or of any other Pagan people. It is related that in a celebrated temple of Odin, there were twelve superior Drottes, who presided over all ecclesiastical affairs, and governed the other priests; and one was called the chief priest of Northumberland. Their office was confined to certain families, and was hereditary in its transmission; but they appear to have been far inferior both in wealth and power to the Druids. They enjoyed peculiar privileges in virtue of their sacred calling; being exempted from war, prohibited from appearing in arms, and even from mounting a horse. The Teutonic Pagans had also an order of priestesses who served in the temples of their female deities; and Friga, their chief goddess, was attended by kings' daughters, and ladies of the highest rank of nobility. Some of these consecrated females were consulted as infallible oracles, and held in the greatest veneration, as if in fact they had themselves been divinities.

DRUIDS, the priests of the most ancient religion of Great Britain. Druidism is generally supposed to have been one of the primitive forms of religion, the people among whom it prevailed, the Gauls, Britons, and other Celtic nations, being descended from Gomer, the son of Japhet, and grandson of Noah. So completely perverted did the true religion become, as it passed by tradition throughout a long course of ages, that when we are first made acquainted with the religion of the Druids, it is presented to us as an absurd and cruel superstition. The original seat of the system appears to have been Britain, for when Julius Cæsar invaded this country, B. C. 56, we find him stating that "such of the Gauls as were desirous of being thoroughly instructed in the principles of their religion, usually took a journey into Britain for that purpose."

The priests of the Pagan religion to which Cæsar refers, received collectively the name of Druids, an appellation to which numerous derivations have been assigned. Some have deduced it from the Teutonic Druthiwo, a servant of Truth, others from the Welsh Dar-Gwydd, a superior priest, while a still more numerous class of writers trace it to the Greek word drus, an oak, that tree occupying a conspicuous place in their religious ceremonies. The Druidical priests appear to have exercised great influence both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs. Thus Cæsar informs us, that two classes of men were held in the highest veneration; Druids and nobles. "No sacred rite," says Diodorus Siculus, "was ever performed without a Druid; by them, as being the favourites of the gods, and depositories of their counsels, the people offered all their sacrifices, thanksgivings, and prayers, and were perfectly submissive and obedient to their commands. Nay, so great was the veneration in which they were held, that when two hostile armies, inflamed with warlike rage, with swords drawn and spears extended, were on the point of engaging in battle, at their intervention they sheathed their swords and became calm and peaceful." In these early times the privileges and immunities of this sacred class were many and valuable. Their persons were sacred and inviolable; they were exempted from all taxes, and they were free from liability to serve in war. The estimation in which both the men and their privileges were held, tended greatly to increase their numbers. Nobles, and even princes, eagerly sought admission into the priestly order, and the more numerous the Druids were, the people superstitiously imagined the country would be the more prosperous and wealthy.

The whole Druidical priesthood was divided into different ranks, which were distinguished from one another by their peculiar dress, and over the entire society were placed the ARCH-DRUIDS (which see), of whom there were two in Britain, the one residing in the isle of Anglesea, and the other in the isle of Man. The office of the priesthood was hereditary, passing from father to son, but the Arch-Druids were elected from the most eminent of the priestly order by a plurality of votes. Such was the anxiety to obtain this exalted and influential dignity, and so keen was the contention among rival candidates, that, as Cæsar informs us, the election of an Arch-Druid sometimes occasioned a civil war.

A considerable difference of opinion exists among antiquaries as to the precise number of orders into which Druids were divided. The most usual division is into Bards, Eubages, Vates, and Druids properly so called. The Bards were the progenitors of the heroic, historical and genealogical poets of Gaul, Germany, and Britain. The Triades, which were generally regarded as genuine remains of the Druidical ages, declare the duties of the Bards to be, "to reform morals and customs, to secure peace, and to celebrate the praises of a'l that is good and excellent." Their office was in no sense ecclesiastical, their simple vocation being to sing to the lyre or harp, the actions of illustrious men, and there is no evidence that they ever introduced into their poems the slightest allusion to religious subjects. Yet such was the influence which the Muses exercised over the people of that barbarous age, that the power which they wielded over the public mind can scarcely be exaggerated. The second order of the ministers of religion, who are termed the Eubages, are frequently confounded by antiquarian writers with the Vates, but it is more probable that they were the men of science such as then existed, little better than jugglers and sorcerers, who drew after them crowds of wondering, awe-struck followers, by their superior knowledge of the powers of nature. The Vates were regarded by the Celtic nations as sacred persons, and were generally called Faids or prophets. There is no doubt but this class is rightly reckoned an order of priests, since they were employed in offering sacrifices, as well as in composing hymns in honour of the gods, which they sang at the sacred solemnities to the music of their harps. In the Vates was com bined the threefold character of musician, poet, and prophet, and they sang their poetical vaticinations to a superstitious people, who believed them to be divinely inspired.

The Druids, however, were strictly and properly the ministers of religion who professed to instruct the people in divine things, and presided in the sacred ceremonies which belonged to their peculiar faith. With their sacred were also combined important secular duties, for while they educated the young in religious truth, they interpreted the laws, and officiated as judges both in civil and in criminal matters. Their mode of living is thus described by Dr. Henry: "Many of the Druids seem to have lived a kind of collegiate or monastic life, united together in fraternities, as Marcellinus expresses it. The service of each temple required a considerable number of them, and all these lived together near the temple where they served. The Arch-druid of Britain is thought to have had his ordinary residence in the isle of Anglesey, where he lived in great splendour and magnificence for those times, surrounded by a great number of the most eminent persons of his order. In this isle, it is pretended, the vestiges of the Arch-druid's palaces, and of the houses of the other Druids, who attended him, are still visible. But not a few of the Druids led a more secular and public way of life, in the courts of princes and families of great men, to perform the duties of their function. For no sacred rite or act of religion could be performed without a Druid, either in temples or in private houses. Nor does it seem improbable, that some of these ancient priests retired from the world, and from the societies of their brethren, and lived as hermits, in order to acquire a greater reputation of sanctity. In the most unfrequented places of some of the Western Islands of Scotland, there are still remaining the foundations of small circular houses, capable of containing only one person, which are called by the people of the country Druids' houses. None of these ways of life seem to be very suitable to a married state, and it is therefore probable that the far greater part of the Druids lived in celibacy, and were waited upon by a set of female devotees." The females here referred to formed another order of priesthood called DRUIDESSES (which see).

There is no doubt that the ancient British Druids received ample support from the people among whom they laboured. In many cases they possessed lands in the neighbourhood of their temples, and the offerings which the worshippers presented to the gods fell to the share of the priests. Besides the emoluments which may have accrued to them from the discharge of their manifold duties, both sacred and secular, certain annual dues were exacted from every family by the priests of that temple within whose district the family dwelt. To refuse payment of these dues was to incur excommunication. A tradition exists, which is mentioned by several writers, that the Druidical priesthood were accustomed to adopt a most effectual mode of securing payment of their yearly dues. Every family was bound, under pain of the highest ecclesiastical censures, to extinguish every fire in their dwelling on the evening of the last day of October, the day of the annual payment; and on the following day, being the first of November, they were obliged to attend at the temple and receive from the altar a portion of the sacred fire wherewith to rekindle the fires of their houses. By this ingenious contrivance every family was under the necessity of making payment of their dues, otherwise they were deprived of the use of fire at the approach of winter, when it was most needed. Nor were neighbouring families allowed to lend their friendly interposition on such occasions, if they would not themselves incur the awful sentence of excommunication, which shut them out not only from the privileges of the church, but from the society of their fellows, and from all the benefits of law and justice.

The Druidical priests could only attain the highest dignity of their office by passing through six different gradations, each of them distinguished by a peculiar costume. The first or plainest dress was entirely destitute of ornament, and could only be known from that of the laity by its shape, colour, and cassock-girdle. The second rank of priests wore a sash passing from the right shoulder across the body to the lower edge of the garment. The third and fourth ranks, which seem scarcely to have been distinguishable from each other, wore a kind of broad scarf reaching round the neck, and hanging loose down the front without a girdle, and crossed with horizontal stripes. The fifth rank wore a large sash suspended over the right shoulder across the body, the back and front being joined together. The highest rank or Arch-Druids were completely covered with a long mantle and flowing robes, while they wore on their heads an oaken crown, and carried a sceptre in their hands. All the six orders, when engaged in religious ceremonies, were dressed in white, and wore an oaken wreath. The younger Druids had no beards, and were decorated with collars, bracelets, and armlets of brass; while the older men among them had a venerable appearance, having long beards, their necks decorated with gold chains, and round their neck a garment encased with gold.

The doctrines of the Druids were of a twofold character, secret and public. The secret or esoteric doctrines were reserved exclusively for the initiated, who were bound by a solemn oath to keep them concealed from all men, and had themselves been taught a knowledge of them in caves of the earth and the recesses of forests. The exoteric or public doctrines were freely expounded to the people generally. The following interesting and accurate sketch of the Druidical Theology is given by Mr. Thomson, in his 'Illustrations of British History': "It has been supposed that the principal secret of Druidism was the great doctrine of one God, the Creator and Governor of the universe, which was in reality retained by them long after the commencement of their idolatries: and is also one of those tenets which the Brahmans of India—who are often assimilated to the British Druids—vow to keep sacred. Cæsar states only, that the Druids taught many things concerning the power and prerogatives of the immortal gods; but it has also been believed that they recounted to their disciples a great part of the Mosaical history of the creation of the world, the formation and fall of man, the revolt and expulsion of the angels, the deluge, and the final destruction of the universe by fire. Their principal public doctrine appears to have been the immortality of the soul, which was taught to the common people to excite that bravery and contempt of death evinced by all the ancient nations; and the Triad containing it bids them remember 'To act bravely in war; that souls are immortal; and there is another life after death.' But even this divine principle is frequently viewed only as a system of transmigration; though it has also been asserted, that such a change with the Druids related solely to other human bodies of the same sex, whence the arms, &c. which were valued in life were also deposited in the tomb. It has likewise been imagined, that their doctrine of immortality was represented under the metaphor of the soul passing into another body, only as being more easily comprehended; and that the Druids themselves held the belief of a distinct future state, in a kind of Elysian fields, called F'ath-Innis, or the island of the brave and virtuous, to which the soul immediately ascended; and in a place of darkness, named Ifurin, or the isle of the cold land, infested with hurtful animals, where serpents hissed and stung, lions roared, and wolves devoured. The Druids and their followers, also, both in Gaul and Britain, exemplified their assurance of a future existence, by going fearlessly to battle to encourage the armies; leaving the settlement of their accounts until they met in another world; casting letters on the funeral piles of their friends to be read in the next life; burying the accounts of the departed, and lending money to be repaid there; and by voluntarily embracing death at the immolation of some esteemed person, to enjoy their society in an eternal state. The writings of the bards contain their dark and uncertain notions of moral virtue, and the retributions of a future existence. Man is placed, according to their doctrine, in the circle of courses, good and evil being set before him for his selection; and upon his making choice of the former, death transmits him from the earth into the circle of felicity. If, however, he become vicious, death returns him into the circle of courses, wherein he is made to do penance in the body of an animal, and then permitted to reassume his human form. The length and repetition of this probation, is determined by the vice or virtue of the individual; but after a certain number of transmigrations, his offences were supposed to be expiated, his passions subdued, and his spirit dismissed to the circle of felicity. Such is a summary of the complex Theological Triades; and only one more of the Druidical doctrines deserves to be mentioned, which has been preserved in its original form by Diogenes Laertius: it simply commands, 'To worship the gods; to do no evil; and to exercise fortitude.' The principles of this theological system having increased these hymns to about 20,000 verses, their study frequently occupied twenty years; and they were preserved only in the memories of the Druids and their disciples, since it was held unlawful to commit them to writing. When they were taught to the nation, they were delivered from little eminences, of which many are yet remaining, though their signification was never given, excepting with the greatest reserve; but the Druidical students were instructed in the most private manner, in caverns or recesses of thick forests, that their lessons might not be overheard. Even after the establishment of Christianity, something of this plan of instruction was still followed; since a collection of its doctrines was formed in the Druid measure, adapted for Bardic recitation, and entitled the Triades of Paul.

"The purer parts of the Druidical theology are considerably more ancient than the introduction of those numerous false deities with which it was corrupted in its late ages; since some of its professors interdicted the worship of idols, or any other form intended to represent the Godhead. These were probably the followers of the first Druids, and those who fixed upon the Sun, as the great reviver of Nature, and the chief emblem of Him who is the life of all things. The later Druids were probably those who united the most conspicuous parts of an animal in an image, to express the several perfections of the Deity, since it was contrary to the principles of the Celtic religion to represent Gods in the human form. Such were probably the effigies alluded to by Gildas, when he notices 'the monstrous idols of our country, almost surpassing in number the very devilish devices of Egypt, of the which we behold as yet some, both within and without the walls of their forsaken temples, now mouldering away, with deformed portraitures, and terrible countenances, after the accustomed manner.' It has been argued that idolatry was not introduced in Britain until after the invasion of the Romans; but subsequent to that event, the British deities were principally the same as those of Rome and Greece, adored under Celtic names. The Supreme Being was worshipped under the form of an oak, and called Hæsus, or Mighty. In their representation of this Divinity, the Druids, with the consent of the whole order and neighbourhood, fixed upon the most beautiful tree they could discover, and having cut off its side branches, they joined two of them to the highest part of the trunk, so that they extended like the arms of a man. Near this transverse piece was inscribed the word Thau, for the name of God; whilst upon the right arm was written Hæsus on the left Belenus, and, on the centre of the trunk, Tharanis. Towards the decline of Druidism; however, when a belief in the unity of God was lost in Polytheism, Hæsus is sometimes said to have been identified with Mars, who presided over wars and armies, though it is also believed that he was adored under another name, in the form of a naked sword. To him were presented all the spoils of battle; and if, says Cæsar, 'they prove victorious, they offer up all the cattle taken, and set apart the rest of the plunder in a place appointed for that purpose: and it is common in many provinces to see these monuments of offerings piled up in consecrated places. Nay, it rarely happens that any one shows so great a disregard of religion, as either to conceal the plunder, or pillage the public oblations; and the severest punishments are inflicted upon such offenders.' The divine attribute of universal paternity, furnished another Druidical Deity, adored under the name of Teutates, composed of the British words Deu-Tatt, or God the Father. He was at length transformed into the Sovereign of the infernal world, and considered as Dis, or Pluto, with the Greeks and Romans; though some suppose him to have been adored as Mercury. Nor did the Britons omit to worship the heavenly bodies, since they had many temples erected to the Sun, which was known under the names of Bel, Belinus, Belatucardus, Apollo, Gran-nius, &c., expressive of its properties. The adorations paid to the Moon appear to have been equally great; and the temples dedicated to it were generally near and similar to the former. With these principal splendours of the skies, the Britons also worshipped the Thunder, under the name of Taranis, but a great number of the Gods of Great Britain were deifications of men, who had been victorious princes, wise legislators, or inventors of useful arts. They were, in general, the very same as those adored by the Greeks and Romans, and it is even probable that they were of greater antiquity in Gaul and Britain; since they were Celtes by birth, princes of Celtic tribes, and were originally known by names significant in the Celtic language. Added to which, the Greeks and Romans discovered a great propensity to adopt the deities of other nations, whilst the more barbarous people were tenacious of the faith and customs of their ancestors. One of the greatest of these demi-gods was Saturn, the first of the Titan race, whose name signifies Martial, or Warlike. The original name of Jupiter is Jow, a Celtic word, meaning Young, because he was the youngest son of Saturn, whom he dethroned; whilst his elder brothers, Neptune and Pluto, acted only as subordinate princes in his empire. The Romans afterwards extended his name by the addition of Pater, Father. Mercury was adored in Britain under the form of a cube, and Cæsar calls him 'the chief deity with the Gauls, of whom they have many images, accounting him the inventor of all arts, their guide and conductor in their journeys, and the patron of merchandise and gain' He was the favourite son of Jupiter by Maia, and received from his father the government of the West of Europe, where he procured his Celtic name, composed of the words Merc, merchandise, and Wr, a man. There were also many other imaginary deities, anciently adored in Britain, and also female divinities; these were Andraste, supposed to have been Venus or Diana; Minerva, Ceres, Porserpine, &c. It has also been believed, that the British worshipped the serpent and the bull; and that there was scarcely a river, lake, mountain, or wood, which was not supposed to have some genii residing within it, in honour of whom treasures were presented, and gold, food, and garments, cast into the waters."

The places of worship among the Druids of ancient Britain were dense groves of oak, which were found in great numbers throughout different parts of the country. A Druidical temple consisted of a spacious circular area in the midst of one of these shady thickets, which, though surrounded with oak-trees, was open at the top. Within the area stood a single and sometimes a double line of large stones erected perpendicularly, and occasionally crossed by a line of horizontal stones forming a circle above; there were also several erections of rude stones, supposed to have been dedicated to particular deities. The Druidical altar, which was also contained within the enclosure, was sometimes made of turf or a large flat rock, for receiving an extensive burnt-offering, and sometimes only a pile of stones raised in the centre of the area.

Much obscurity hangs over the rites and ceremonies of the Druidical worship. One of their favourite sacred customs was, what is called the DEASUIL (which see), which was probably connected with the worship of the Sun. On this peculiar ceremony, Dr. Lindsay Alexander remarks in his small treatise on Iona, "There is reason to believe that they attached much importance to the ceremony of going thrice round their sacred circle from east to west, following the course of the Sun, by which it is supposed that they intended to express their entire conformity to the will and order of the Supreme Being, and their desire that all might go well with them according to that order." The same intelligent writer remarks, as an instance of the tenacity with which ancient religious rites are kept up among a people, "that even to the present day certain movements are considered of good omen only when they follow the course of the sun; and that in some of the remote parts of the country, the practice is still retained of seeking good fortune by going thrice round some supposed sacred object from east to west." Another rite punctually observed was the cutting of the MISLETOE which was solemnly performed on the 10th of March, or the commencement of the year. The sixth day of the moon, and the new and full changes of the same planet, were also considered by the Druids as sacred seasons. There were two festivals celebrated with sacred fires, namely, on the first or May and the first of November. (See FIRE-WORSHIP).

The religious assemblies of the Druids were attended by both men and women, and so rigidly was silence enforced during sacred service, that those who were found talking were thrice admonished, then exposed by a small piece being cut from their robes, and ultimately proceeded against with the utmost severity. Cæsar tells us, that to be prohibited from coming to the public sacrifices was the greatest punishment known to the Gauls. Animals were offered to the gods, and especially white bulls. There is no doubt, however, that the Druids were also addicted to the cruel and barbarous practice of offering human sacrifices. "Sometimes," says Mr. Thomson, "these victims were destroyed by arrows, and crucified in the sacred groves; and at others they were despatched in a more extensive way of slaughter, by an immense statue of straw, or twisted osiers, which was filled entirely with wood, cattle, and human beings, which were indiscriminately consumed in one entire burnt-offering. The victims are said to have been brought into the temples naked, and stained with the juice of herbs; and such sacrifices were even publicly established, though on extraordinary occasions they were sometimes anticipated for the purpose of divination. 'They take a man,' says Diodorus Siculus, 'who is to be sacrificed, and kill him with one stroke of a sword above the diaphragm; and by observing the posture in which he falls, his different convulsions, and the direction in which the blood flows from his body, they form their predictions, according to certain rules which have been left them by their ancestors.' The fragments of the sacrifice, or feast, as some have supposed it, were consumed by the last fire upon the altar; which was then consecrated anew by strewing it with oak leaves. It is only candid to state, however, that these human sacrifices have not only been denied, but it has been supposed that they were seldom even of the animal kind, and then only of the more hurtful, such as the boar. The Gaelic language is said to contain no traces of such ceremonies; and the word expressive of sacrifice actually means 'the offering of the Cake.'"

If the charge made against the Druids of sacrificing human victims be in reality well-founded, they were not alone in the practice of such superstitious barbarities, it being established beyond all doubt that the Egyptians, Carthaginians, and Phœnicians, were guilty of the same crime. So closely indeed does the Druidical approach to the Phœnician worship, that some writers have alleged them to be actually identical. The points of resemblance, however, are too remote to entitle us to draw such a conclusion.

For ages Druidism reigned with unquestioned supremacy both in Britain and Gaul. The Roman invasion, however, of the former country gave the first blow to the system, Augustus Cæsar having issued a warning to the Roman citizens against the practice of any of its rites. Tiberius banished such ceremonies from Rome and the adjoining provinces while Claudius destroyed the Druids in Gaul. A persecution about the same time arose against them in Britain, compelling numbers to seek refuge in the isle of Anglesey. Suetonius Paulinus, governor of Britain under Nero, cut down the sacred groves of the Druids, destroyed their temples, overthrew their altars, and burned many of the priests. Successive seasons of persecution rapidly diminished the votaries of the Druidical superstition. But traces of the system seem to have remained in Britain until A. D. 177, when king Lucius embraced Christianity. Even for a century after that period, the worship of the Druids was still practised in the island of Mona. Gradually, however, this idolatrous system disappeared as Christianity made its way throughout all parts of the country, and before the zealous exertions of Columba and the CULDEES (which see), the barbarous rites and superstitions of the Druids passed utterly and for ever away.

DRUIDESSES, priestesses of the ancient Pagan Britons. The name was usually applied to the wives of the Druids, some of whom devoted themselves almost exclusively to religious duties. "The most sacred and important rank, however," to use the language of Mr. Richard Thomson, whose antiquarian knowledge was of the most extensive and accurate kind, "was composed of such as were vowed to perpetual virginity, and resided together in sequestered sisterhoods. About A. D. 45, these vestals were nine in number, their dwelling being an island inhabited by the Corisoptii, situated in the British Sea, on the coast of the Osismii; which place is now supposed to be the Isle de Sein, about four leagues from Finisterre on the coast of Bretagne, since it was anciently named Sena, and its inhabitants Sehanes or Sena, venerable women. Their principal characteristic was divination, but they also professed the working of miracles, prophecy, curing the most inveterate diseases, raising of storms, and converting themselves into all kinds of animals; though they disclosed none of their predictions but to mariners, and such as visited their island purposely to consult their oracle. They had white hair, and like the Druids, their habit on certain public occasions was a white tunic and linen cloak with clasps, a broad girdle of brass-work, their feet uncovered, and a magic staff in their hands. When Suetonius Paulinus in A. D. 61, invaded the Isle of Anglesey, which was then the residence of the Arch-Druid, his army was struck with consternation at finding a considerable number of these Druidesses, in funeral habits with disordered hair, carrying torches, and running up and down the ranks of the British army, imprecating the wrath of heaven upon the invaders of their country. Their sacrificial duties towards captives, however, were still more ferocious; since they first rushed upon them with drawn swords, and having cut them down, dragged them to a capacious labrum, or cistern, on which stood the officiating Druidess, who plunged a long knife into each of the victims. The bodies were then opened and examined by her assistants, who, from the appearance of the entrails, pronounced their divinations, which were immediately communicated to the army or the council. Every year it was their custom to unroof their temple, and, by their united labours, to recover it again before sun-set; during which ceremony, if any one lost or dropped her burthen, she was torn to pieces by the rest, and her limbs carried round the sacred place in Bacchanalian procession."

DRUM (SACRED), an instrument of magical incantation formerly in use among the native Laplanders. It was made of the body or trunk of a pine or hollow birch-tree, which could be found only in particular spots, and every part of which, both trunk and branches, had the remarkable peculiarity of being inflected naturally from the right to the left. The drum was constructed of one entire piece of wood, hollowed out in the middle. The upper part, which was flat, was covered with skin, and the lower part, which was convex, was so constructed, that, after they made two long openings in it, the solid wood between served as a handle. The rims which kept the skin tight in a kind of circular form, were not absolutely round, but rather oval. Upon this skin thus stretched on the head of the drum, the Laplanders painted various figures in red, which seemed to be of a somewhat hieroglyphical character. These drums were not all made of the same pattern. In order to render them complete and adapted for magical purposes, there was appended to them a large copper ring, to which they fastened several others of a smaller size. These rings, also, varied in construction, sometimes consisting of a very thick plate of copper, with a square hole in the middle, and with small brass chains, which hung down instead of rings, and met together in a circle; at other times consisting of a brass ring, with a small round plate of brass suspended to it by several small chains. The hammer with which the drum was beaten was made from the horn of a rein-deer.

The sacred drum was held in extraordinary veneration by the Laplanders in former times, though such an instrument is no longer in use. By it they discovered secrets, cured diseases, and performed many wonderful deeds. Its efficacy was with them certain and undoubted. It was not, however, by the noise of the drum when beaten, but by the motion which was thereby caused in the rings, and the peculiar positions which, in consequence of the vibration, the rings assumed, that they professed to interpret the secrets of futurity. So great was the importance which they attached to the drum, that no family accounted its household equipment complete without this necessary article of furniture, and if at any time the family changed their residence, the drum was the last thing removed from the premises, and was only conveyed to its new quarters after the whole family had quitted the house. Nor was any one allowed to lay his hands upon the sacred instrument but the master of the house himself, and in carrying it away to his new abode, he must needs select the most private and unfrequented roads, for the Laplanders believed that if any female, whether married or unmarried, should happen within three days to pass along the same road, she would either die upon the spot, or some fatal disaster would befall her, unless it were averted by the gift, on her part, of a brass ring presented in the most solemn manner, for the service of the sacred drum.

In his magical consultations with the drum, the Laplander and all who joined him assumed a kneeling posture, which they regarded as only decent and becoming in the presence of the sacred utensil. The ordinary mode in which they used this venerated article is thus described by Picart, in his 'Religious Ceremonies of all Nations:' "In order to know, for instance, the transactions of any foreign country, one of the operators beats the drum, in the following manner: 'He first lays a large quantity of brass rings linked together, with several small brass chains, upon that particular place where the sun is delineated. Then he beats the drum, in such a manner with his horn hammer, or stick, that the rings are put in motion. During this action, he sings very distinctly a song, which in the language of Lapland is called Jonke, and all the natives that are present, both men and women, add their respective songs, which are distinguished by the name of Deuvra. The words which they utter are so distinct, that they nominate the very place of which they want some secret intelligence. After he has beat the drum for some considerable time, he raises it to his head, and then drops instantly down upon the ground, like one fallen fast asleep, or into a trance. His senses are all lost, his pulse ceases to beat, and he is, in short, a dead man to all outward appearance; from whence it has been thought that the soul of the magician actually abandons his body for a time, and, through the assistance of some invisible spirits, is conveyed to those very countries, of which they want such intelligence as before-mentioned. Whilst the officiating Laplander is in this situation, this state of insensibility, he is notwithstanding, we are told, in such extremity of pain, that the sweat runs down his face and all over his body. Meanwhile the whole assembly continue singing, till he returns from his reverie to his perfect senses. For should they cease, or endeavour to awake him by the least touch imaginable, the magician, as we are further told, would inevitably die. And, in all probability, that is the reason, why they take a more than ordinary care at such a time, to prevent flies, or insects of any other kind, from settling near him. When he is perfectly awake, and come to himself, he gives a full account of the information he has received, and answers all the interrogatories of the whole assembly.' The duration of this ecstatic slumber is very uncertain; but it never lasts, at the most, as we are informed, above four and twenty hours: the conjuror, however, should he recover his senses sooner or later, always produces some token of the thing or country inquired after, as an undeniable testimony of his supernatural abilities."

One of the most frequent occasions on which the drum was consulted was to ascertain the nature and seat of a disease, and how the gods might be most readily induced to effect its removal. If the rings turned from the left to the right when the drum was beaten, the omen was regarded as favourable, being in accordance with the sun's course in the heavens; but if, on the contrary, the motion of the rings was from right to left, the omen was looked upon as unfavourable, and portending calamities or misfortunes of one kind or another. Even on the most ordinary occasions, the Laplander was wont to consult the drum, were it only to ascertain whether the day was to be lucky or unlucky, whether the chase was to be successful or otherwise, or whether the journey on which he was about to start was to be prosperous or disastrous. The superstitious practices which we have thus sketched are no longer to be found in Lapland, having disappeared before the light of Christianity and advancing civilization. See LAPLANDERS (RELIGION OF).

DRUZES, a heretical Mohammedan sect which arose about the beginning of the eleventh century, in the mountains of Syria. They are chiefly found in the districts of Lebanon, north of the METAWILAH (which see), and south of the MARONITES (which see), with whom, however, to a certain extent, they have become commingled. Dr. Wilson alleges that they are also to be found in considerable numbers in Wádi-et-Teim, in Jebel-Haurán, and in the neighbourhood of Damascus. As a sect they are descended from the CARMATHIANS (which see), and their origin is to be traced to the propagation of the extravagant doctrines of the fanatical Caliph El-Hakim of the Fatimite race. This tyrannical ruler was alarmed by an insurrection of the orthodox Mussulmans of Egypt, headed by an obscure water-carrier of Cairo, who pretended to be sprung from the Ommiade family. After a long and severe contest, the impostor was conquered, and was made prisoner. The caliph devised a new and singular mode of putting him to death; he ordered him to be bound hand and foot to a camel, and led through the streets of Cairo, while an ape, trained for the purpose, beat his head with a stone until life was extinct. From this time El-Hakim became a bitter persecutor of the orthodox Mohammedans, and a vigorous opponent of the caliphs of Bagdad. He was assisted by two Persian disciples equally zealous with himself, Hamzah and Ed-Derazi, from the latter of whom comes the name Deruz, their proper Arabic appellation, whence the term Druzes is said to have been derived. For a long time considerable obscurity hung over the tenets of this singular sect, but of late years tolerably correct information has been obtained from several authors, who have made careful investigations into this somewhat mysterious subject. De Sacy, in his 'Exposé de la Religion des Druzes,' gives the following summary of this singular sect: "To acknowledge only one God, without seeking to penetrate the nature of his being and of his attributes; to confess that he can neither be comprehended by the senses, nor defined by words; to believe that the Divinity has shown itself to men at different epochs, under a human form, without participating in any of the weaknesses and imperfections of humanity; that it has shown itself at last, at the commencement of the fifth age of the Hejira, under the figure of Hakim Biamr-Allah; that that was the last of his manifestations, after which there is none other to be expected; that Hakim disappeared in the year 411 of the Hejira, to try the faith of his servants, to give room for the apostacy of hypocrites, and of those who had only embraced the true religion from the hope of worldly rewards; that in a short time he would appear again, full of glory and of majesty, to triumph over all his enemies, to extend his empire over all the earth, and to make his faithful worshippers happy for ever; to believe that Universal Intelligence is the first of God's creatures, the only direct production of his omnipotence; that it has appeared upon the earth at the epoch of each of the manifestations of the Divinity, and has finally appeared since the time of Hakim under the figure of Hamza, son of Ahmed; that it is by his ministry that all the other creatures have been produced; that Hamza only possesses the knowledge of all truth, that he is the prime minister of the true religion, and that he communicates, directly or indirectly, with the other ministers and with the faithful, but in different proportions, the knowledge and the grace which he receives directly from the Divinity, and of which he is the sole channel; that he only has immediate access to God, and acts as a mediator to the other worshippers of the Supreme Being; acknowledging that Hamza is he to whom Hakim will confide his sword, to make his religion triumph, to conquer all his rivals, and to distribute rewards and punishments according to the merits of each one; to know the other ministers of religion, and the rank which belongs to each of them; to give to each the obedience and the submission which is their due; to confess that every soul has been created by the Universal Intelligence; that the number of men is always the same, and that souls pass successively into different bodies; that they are raised by their attachment to truth to a superior degree of excellence, or are degraded by neglecting or giving up religious meditation; to practise the seven commandments which the religion of Hamza imposes upon its followers, and which principally exacts from them the observance of truth, charity towards their brethren, the renunciation of their former religion, the most entire resignation and submission to the will of God; to confess that all preceding religions have only been types more or less perfect of true religion, that all their ceremonial observances are only allegories, and that the manifestation of true religion requires the abrogation of every other creed. Such is the abridgment of the religious system taught in the books of the Druzes, of which Hamza is the author, and whose followers are called Unitarians."

Mohammed ben Ishmael Ed-Derazin was an ardent apostle of the fanatic Hakim, who, in addition to his other absurdities, had actually claimed to be regarded as a divinity. This impious pretension was supported by Ed-Derazin, who asserted that Hakim was an incarnation of the invisible Imam. Hamza was the most active missionary of the new creed; he declared that Mohammed knew nothing but the literal interpretation of what was revealed, while El Hakim was acquainted with the allegorical sense, which was perfect and true wisdom. The principal points in which the Druzes differ from the other Mohammedan sects, are the authority they attribute to El Hakim, and their reverence for a charter of faith which he is said to have bequeathed to his followers. This charter was found suspended in one of the mosques after the death of El Hakim, and it is held in greater veneration among the Druzes than the Koran. It is a curious fact, that though this singular people profess to be Mohammedans, and to believe in the Koran, so far are they from reverencing Mohammed as a prophet, that they never pronounce his name without cursing his memory. "We are those," say they, "who have been put in possession of the faith, after the religion of Mohammed, the son of Abdallah: may the malediction of the Lord be upon him." They are partial to the name of Unitarians, asserting that they alone rightly understand the doctrine of the Divine Unity. In regard to El Hakim, whom they chiefly venerate, they expect his return in a short time, if it so pleases him, and that he will reign with his followers upon the earth through ages of ages, when those who now refuse to own him shall be subjected to his sway, cast into chains, compelled to pay an annual tribute, and forced to wear distinctive marks upon their dress. By the zeal of Hamza, the new doctrines were rapidly spread in Egypt, Palestine, and along the coast of Syria, but in consequence of the persecution raised against them by the orthodox Mohammedans, the Druzes took refuge in the mountains of Lebanon, where on the range of the Anti-Libanus there are found, by the most recent accounts, fully 200,000 of them.

The religion of the Druzes, as far as it has yet been discovered, is a system of Deism mingled with occasional traces of Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. They practise neither circumcision, prayer, nor fasting; they drink wine, eat swine's flesh, and marry within the prohibited degrees. They wear a white turban as an emblem of purity.

All the ceremonies of their religion are studiously enveloped in mystery; their mosques are isolated, built usually on the tops of hills, and none but the initiated are allowed to be present at their worship. In their sanctuaries the veiled figure of a calf is religiously kept, which they regard as the symbol of the invisible Imám; this is rarely uncovered, and never but to those who have obtained the higher degrees in the faith. The initiated are bound to maintain the most inviolable secrecy in reference to religious matters, more especially as to their master El Hakim. The strict rule which they have laid down on this point is, that "whosoever shall betray the least of those secrets shall be slain without mercy in the public assembly of the Druzes as an apostate."

The ecclesiastical arrangements of the Druzes are briefly described by Niebuhr in his 'Travels in Arabia,' &c. "The Druzes," he says, "are divided into Akals, that is to say, Ecclesiastics; and Djahels or Seculars. The Ecclesiastics are dependent upon three Akals, who are Sheiks among them; of whom one dwells in the district Arkub, the second in the district Tschuf el Heite, and the third in the district Hasbeia. The Akals are distinguished from the Seculars by their white dress. They have generally good houses on the hills; and, judging by those few which I saw on the road from Saide to Damascus, it seems to me that they have not chosen the worst situations. On Thursday evening, which among the Orientals is called the night of Friday, they assemble in the house of one or other of their fraternity, to perform their worship and pray for the whole nation: the wives of Ecclesiastics may be present, but they do not admit Seculars, not even a Sheik or an Emir. They despise all employments of honour in the world—but perhaps in this they make a virtue of necessity—for, on the return of Hakim, they hope to be kings, viziers, and pachas. They do not marry the daughters of Seculars; and they even carry their aversion to the property of the great so far, as not to eat with the Sheiks and Emirs of their own nation. Akals eat only with Akals; and with the peasants and other poor people, who they are certain earn their bread by labour." Burekhardt also throws further light upon the subject in his 'Travels in Syria.' "It seems to be a maxim with them," he tells us, "to adopt the religious practices of the country in which they reside, and to profess the creed of the strongest; hence, they all profess Islamism in Syria; and even those who have been baptized, on account of their alliance with the Shehab family, still practise the exterior forms of the Mohammedan faith. There is no truth in the assertion that the Druzes go one day to the mosque, and the next to the church; they all profess Islamism: and whenever they mix with Mohammedans, they perform the rites prescribed by their religion. In private, however, they break the fast of Ramadan, curse Mohammed, indulge in wine, and eat food forbidden by the Kcran

They bear an inveterate hatred to all religions except their own, but more particularly to that of the Franks, chiefly in consequence of a tradition current among them, that the Europeans will one day overthrow their commonwealth."

Dr. Wilson, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' gives the substance of a catechism used among the Druzes in the education of the young, and the doctrines which it contains are in complete conformity with the views which we have given of their system of religion—a system which simply substitutes El Hakim for Mohammed, and a vague unsatisfactory Deism for all that the Koran contains of Christianity.

Before closing this article, we may notice a peculiarity of dress among the female Druzes, mentioned by various travellers in Palestine. Messrs. Bonar and M'Cheyne thus describe it: "In the streets of Beyrout, it is common to meet Druse women wearing the tantour or 'horn' of silver, with the white veil thrown over it. It is far from being a graceful ornament, and is adopted only by the women of Lebanon. It is likely that this fashion was borrowed originally from the language of Scripture, and not that any such fashion existed long ago, to which Scripture refers. Probably the truth in regard to this custom, is the same as in regard to several practices in use among the Abyssinians; they have grafted customs on a literal application of Scripture expressions. Such passages as 'I have defiled my horn in the dust,' may have suggested this singular head-dress to the people of Lebanon. The horn to which the words of Scripture refer, was simply, as among the Greeks, the horn of animals, that being their principal weapon of defence, and therefore the natural symbol of power."

DRYADS (Gr. drus, an oak), inferior female divinities among the ancient Greeks and Romans, who presided over trees.

DRYOPS, a king of the Dryopes, who were named from him. After his death he was worshipped by the Asinæans in Messenia, as an ancestral hero, and as a son of Apollo. A festival was observed in honour of this deity every second year.

DUALISM, that system of doctrine which maintains that there are two essential, self-subsisting, independent principles, a good and an evil principle. Evil is thus put beyond the Divine control, having an independent existence out of God. This was one of the fundamental principles of the Gnostic heresies. They were essentially dualistic. They endeavoured to explain the present state of things in a moral point of view, by alleging it to be the product of two opposite principles, the result of the commixture of two hostile kingdoms. This peculiar notion characterized the Syrian as distinguished from the Alexandrian Gnosis, and was evidently borrowed from the Parsic or ancient Persian system of Zoroaster, which maintained Ahriman and his kingdom to be equally original and self-subsisting with Ormuzd and his kingdom. (See ABESTA.) This theory, as was manifested in the Manichean sect, assumed the existence of an active, turbulent kingdom of darkness, which was constantly making inroads on the kingdom of light, and thus mixing the light with the darkness, or the evil with the good. This system of Dualism was found also among the Platonists in the hyle or substance of the corporeal world as opposed to the mundane soul animating the universe. "The most essential difference," says Neander, "between the Gnostic systems, and the one which is best suited also to be made the basis of their distribution, is that which arises from their different degrees of divergence, in respect to what constitutes the peculiarity of the Gnostic view of the universe, from the purely Christian view. It is the Dualistic element carried out;—by virtue of which those oppositions,—which Christianity exhibits as conflicting with the original unity in creation, as having first originated in the fall of the creature, and only to be removed by the redemption,—these oppositions are considered as original, grounded in the very principles of existence;—hence, also, as being of such a kind that they could not be overcome by the redemption itself;—the oppositions between a temporal, earthly, and a higher, invisible order of things; between the natural, the purely human, and the divine. This opposition, so apprehended, must be extended moreover to the relation of Christianity to the creation, to nature, and history. Where this opposition generally was seized in its most sharp and decided form, nothing less could be supposed than an absolute opposition also between Christianity and the creation—between nature and history. Christianity must make its appearance as an altogether sudden thing, as a fragment disconnected from everything else, as something coming in wholly without expectation. According to this view, no gradual development of the Theocracy, as an organically connected whole, could be admitted. The connection, also, must be broken between Christianity and Judaism. And all this becomes concentrated in the form of relation in which the Demiurge was conceived to stand to the Supreme, perfect God, and the world of Eons. Everything depends, then, on the circumstance, whether an absolute opposition was made to exist here, or room was still left for some sort of mediation. It is manifest, how deeply this difference must affect everything that pertains to the province of morals and religion."

Dualism lay at the foundation of the system of the BASILIDIANS (which see), which ascribed the mixture of the Divine element with matter to an encroachment of the kingdom of darkness on the kingdom of light. But not only did Dualism prevail in various Gnostic systems, it also occupies a prominent place in the principal Oriental systems of religion. Thus both Budha and Brahm are represented as under the necessity of passing out of themselves into manifestation. Thus springs into existence the world of phenomena or appearances, the Maia or illusion. In man the spirit or soul returns back through various stages into the pure being of the Spirit, the Nirvana of the Budhists, or absorption into Brahm the eternal spirit, the supreme felicity of the Brahmanists. The Manichean dualism was an evident combination of the Zoroastrian and the Budhist systems.

DUCHOBORTZI (Slav. Duch, a spirit, and bor-etz, a wrestler), or combatants in spirit, a sect of dissenters from the Russian (Greek) church. The origin of this sect has never been fully ascertained. They themselves allege, when interrogated on the subject, that the first persons who held their principles were the three Hebrew youths mentioned in Dan. iii., who were cast by Nebuchadnezzar into a burning fiery furnace, because they refused to worship the idolatrous image which the king set up. No records exist as to the history of the Duchobortzi; none, at least, have been made public. The late Count Krasinski, whose knowledge of the religions of the Slavonic nations was very extensive and minute, was of opinion that they are a continuation of the sect of the PATARENES (which see), who maintained exactly the same doctrine about the fall of the soul before the creation of the world as the Duchobortzi hold, and who were very numerous in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries in Servia, Bosnia, and Dalmatia, but of whom no mention is made since the latter part of the fifteenth century. Whether this conjecture be well founded or not, the Duchobortzi were only discovered towards the middle of the last century in different parts of Russia. The attention of the government was particularly attracted towards them by the conscientious refusal of the members of the sect to serve in the army. This resolution, firmly adhered to, drew down upon them the persecution of the civil authorities during the reigns both of Catharine and Paul. Complete toleration, however, was afforded them on the succession of Alexander I. to the throne of the Czars, and they were freely permitted to form settlements in the south of Russia on the right bank of the Molochna, where Dr. Henderson found them in 1822 occupying eight villages, besides an island called the Isle of Wolves.

The most distinct account of the faith of the Duchobortzi is contained in a memorial which, in the time of their persecution under Catharine, they presented to Kochowski, governor of Ekaterinoslav. It runs thus: "God is only one, but he is one in the Trinity. This holy Trinity is an inscrutable Being. The Father is the Light, the Son is the Life, the Holy Ghost is the Peace. In man the Father is manifested as the memory, the Son as the reason, the Holy Ghost as the will. The human soul is the image of God; but this image in us is nothing else than the memory, the reason, and the will. The soul had existed before the creation of the visible world. The soul fell before the creation of the world, together with many spirits, who then fell in the spiritual world, in the world above; therefore, the fall of Adam and Eve, which is described in the Scripture, must not be taken in its usual sense; but this part of the Scripture is an image, wherein is represented, firstly, the fall of the human soul from a state of exalted purity in the spiritual world, and before it came into the world; secondly, the fall which was repeated by Adam, in the beginning of the days of this world, and which is adapted to our understanding; thirdly, the fall which, since Adam, is spiritually and carnally repeated by all of us men, and which will be repeated till the destruction of the world. Originally the fall of the soul was brought about by its contemplating itself, and beginning to love only itself, so that it turned away from the contemplation and love of God; and by a voluntary pride. When the soul was, for its punishment, enclosed in the prison of the body, it fell for the second time in the person of Adam, through the guilt of the seductive serpent; that is to say, through the evil corrupted will of the flesh. At present, the fall of all of us is caused by the seduction of the same serpent, which has entered into us through Adam, through the use of the forbidden fruit, i. e. through the pride and vain-gloriousness of the spirit, and the lasciviousness of the flesh. The consequence of the first fall of the soul in the world above was the loss of the divine image, and its imprisonment in the matter. The memory of man was weakened, and he forgot what he had formerly been. His reason became darkened, and his will corrupted. It was thus that Adam appeared in this world with a faint recollection of the former higher world, without a clear reason and just will. His sin, which lay in his fall repeated on the earth, does not, however, descend to his posterity; but every one sins, and is saved for himself. Although it is not the fall of Adam, but the wilfulness of each individual, which is the root of the sin, no man is, however, exempt from fall and sin, because every one who comes into this world had already formerly fallen, and brings with him the inclination to a new fall. After the fall of the soul in the world above, God created for it this world, and precipitated it, according to his justice, from the world of spiritual purity into this world, as into a prison, for the punishment of sin; and now our spirit, imprisoned in this world, is sinking and burying itself in this cauldron of elements which ferment in it. On the other side, the soul is let down into the present life as into a place of purification, in order that, being clothed with flesh, and following its own reason and will, it should be grounded either in good or evil, and thus either obtain the forgiveness of its former guilt, or become subject to everlasting punishment. When the flesh is formed for us in this world, our spirit flows down upon it from above, and man is called into existence. Our flesh is the storehouse into which our soul is received, and in which it loses the recollection and the feeling of what we had once been before our incarnation: it is the thin water of the elements in the boiling cauldron of this world,—in this world of the Lord, in which our souls must be refined into a pure eternal spirit, which is better than the former one; it is the cherub with the fiery sword, who bars to us the way to the tree of life, to God, to the absorption in his Godhead; and here is fulfilled on man that divine destination, 'And now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever.'

"As God foresaw from all eternity the fall of the soul in the flesh, and knew that man could not by his own strength rise from this fall, the Eternal Love decided to descend on the earth, to become man, and to satisfy by its sufferings the eternal justice.

"Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and God himself. It must be, however, observed, that when He is considered in the Old Testament, He is nothing else than the Heavenly Wisdom of God, the All-preserver, which in the beginning was clothed in the nature of the world, and afterwards in the letters and writings of the revealed Word. Christ is the Word of God, which speaks to us in the book of nature and in the Scriptures; the power which, through the sun, miraculously shines upon the creation and in living creatures,—which moves every thing, animates every thing, and is every where, in number, weight, and measure. He is the power of God which, in our ancestors, as well as now in ourselves, acted and acts in different manners. When He is, however, considered in the New Testament, He is nothing else than the Incarnate Spirit of the highest wisdom, knowledge of God, and truth,—the Spirit of love, the Spirit coming from above, incarnate, inexpressible, holiest joy, the Spirit of comfort, of peace in fulness, of every pulsation of the heart, the Spirit of chastity, sobriety, moderation.

"Christ was also man, because he was, like ourselves, born in the flesh. But he also descends into every one of us, through the annunciation of Gabriel, and is spiritually received, as in Mary; He is born in the spirit of every believer; He goes into the desert,—namely, into the flesh of the same,—is tempted by the devil in every man, through the cares of life, lasciviousness, and worldly honours. When He waxes strong in us, He speaks words of instruction; He is persecuted, and suffers death on the cross; is laid into the grave of the flesh; He rises in the light of glory, in the soul of those who suffer affliction to the tenth hour; He lives in them forty days, influences all love in their hearts, and leads them accordingly towards heaven, and brings them upon the altar of glory, as a holy, true, and lovely sacrifice."

The Duchobortzi acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, but, like the Swedenborgians, they maintain that even the plainest historical statements of the Bible have a mysterious, allegorical meaning, which it is the exclusive privilege of their sect fully to understand.

The whole of religion they place in mystic exercises to the exclusion of all external rites and ceremonies "On our urging upon them," says Dr. Henderson, "the importance of being well supplied with the Scriptures, they told us we were much mistaken if we imagined they had not the Bible among them—they had it in their hearts; the light thus imparted was sufficient, and they needed nothing more. Every thing with them is spiritual. They speak indeed of Christ, and his death; but they explain both his person and sufferings mystically, and build entirely upon a different foundation than the atonement. They make no distinction of days and meats; and marriage, so far from being a sacrament with them, as in the Greek church, is scarcely viewed as a civil rite."

Preferring the inward to the outward light, this sect have always been ready to embrace any opinions which a zealous and enthusiastic mind might suggest to them. At one time they were called by the government Ikonobortsi, because they rejected the use of pictures in their worship. But they assume to themselves the name of Christians, and all other people they denominate men of the world. They never enter the national churches, or bow before the pictures in the time of prayer; they neither cross themselves, nor observe the appointed fasts; they neither observe the ordinance of baptism, nor that of the Lord's Supper. They have no stated place for worship, nor do they observe any particular day as more sacred than another. Their meetings are often held in the open air, in two circles, the one of men, and the other of women. Dr. Pinkerton, whose long residence in Russia renders his testimony peculiarly valuable, gives the following interesting account of their meetings: "Each of them is at liberty to hold a meeting in his own house, and to invite such of his brethren as are near him to attend. In such meetings, they always sup together; and should the brother in whose house the meeting is held not be able to provide food sufficient to entertain his guests, in that case they either send themselves, beforehand, provisions for this purpose, or bring them along with them.

"Being assembled, they salute one another; the men salute the men, and the females the females, by taking each other by the right hand, and thrice bowing and kissing one another; at the same time every one pronounces a short prayer. These three bows and three embraces, they perform in the name of the three-one God, to the purifying of the flesh, and to the rooting out of pride. They take each other by the hand as a mark of their union in love, in calling, in knowledge of judgment, and of the unseen God, who is within them.

"In the course of the meeting, they pray one after another, sing psalms, and explain the word of God; but as the greater part of them are unable to read, most of this is performed in their assemblies extemporaneously. They have no appointed priests, but confess Jesus Christ alone to be the only just holy, pure, undefiled priest, separated from sinners, and exalted above the heavens; he also is their only Teacher. In their assemblies they instruct each other from the Scriptures; every one speaks according to the grace given him, to the admonishing and comforting of his brethren. Even women are not excluded from this privilege; for they say, Have not women enlightened understandings as well as men? They pray standing or sitting, just as it happens. At the end of the meeting they again embrace each other thrice, as at the beginning, and then separate."

The readiness with which the Duchobortzi embrace any novel opinions was remarkably exemplified about the beginning of the present century. An individual named Kapustin, a discharged non-commissioned officer of the guards, joined the sect at their settlement on the banks of the Molochna. By his talents, eloquence, and insinuating manners, this man obtained such an influence over the minds of these sectarians, that they regarded him as a prophet, and blindly submitted to all his dictates. He led them to believe in the doctrine of transmigration of souls, and other strange Oriental notions, such as that "the soul of every believer was an emanation of the God-head, the Word made flesh, and would remain upon earth, but change its body, as long as the created world was to exist; that God has manifested himself as Christ in the body of Jesus, who was the wisest and most perfect of men that ever lived; and that, therefore, the soul of Jesus was the most perfect and purest of all souls; that since the time when God manifested himself in Jesus, He always remains with mankind, living and manifesting himself in every believer; but the individual soul of Jesus, according to what he declared himself, saying,—'I shall remain with you to the end of the days,'—continues to dwell in this world, changing its body from generation to generation, but retaining, by a particular dispensation of God, the memory of its former existence; therefore every man in whom the soul of Jesus is dwelling knows it. During the first ages of Christianity this fact was universally acknowledged, and the new Jesus was known to all. He governed the church, and decided all the controversies about religion. He was called the pope; but false popes soon usurped the throne of Jesus, who has retained only a small number of faithful followers and true believers, according to what he has predicted himself, that many are called, but few are chosen. These true believers are the Duchobortzi; Jesus is constantly amongst them, and the soul animates one of them. Thus Sylvan Kolesnikof (a leader of their sect), whom many of your old people have known, was a real Jesus; but now I am he, as true as heaven is over my head, and the earth under my feet,—I am the true Jesus Christ, your Lord. Therefore fall down upon your knees and worship me!" Such was the credulity with which these simple enthusiasts listened to the teaching of Kapustin, that in obedience to his command, they forthwith fell down at his feet and worshipped him.

Kapustin thus claimed to be recognized as the head of the sect, at least that portion of it which was settled in Taurida. Having confirmed his authority, he established a perfect community of goods amongst his followers, and for a time, by the introduction of manufactures, and the diligent cultivation of the soil, the colony was remarkably flourishing. In 1814, Kapustin was imprisoned on the charge of making proselytes from the national church, but in a short time he was liberated on bail. He established a council of thirty persons for the government of the body, twelve of whom received the name of apostles. On the death of Kapustin, the council elected his son as his successor, a youth of only fifteen years of age, and withal weak-minded, and incapable of ruling. The result of this arrangement was, that the government of the community rested with the council, who formed amongst themselves a secret tribunal, which in some way or other dispatched all who were either guilty, or supposed to have been guilty of resisting their authority. In this way about four hundred individuals unaccountably disappeared. The government were informed of it, and an inquiry was commenced in 1834, which was concluded in 1839. A great number of dead bodies were found, some of which were mutilated, whilst the appearance of others but too plainly indicated that they had been buried alive. In consequence of the horrid disclosures which took place at this time, a proclamation was issued by the emperor Nicholas in 1841, ordering that all the Duchobortzi belonging to the colony on the right bank of the Molochna, should be sent into the Trans-Caucasian provinces, and there divided into separate settlements, and placed under a strict surveillance. In consequence of this order, nearly 2,500 individuals were transported to the Trans-Caucasian provinces, while the remainder of the sect conformed, outwardly at least, to the established church of Russia.

DUNKERS, a sect of German Baptists, or Brethren as they prefer to be called, who emigrated from Germany to the United States of North America between the years 1718 and 1730. Their first appearance in America was in 1719, when about twenty families landed in Philadelphia, but as they scattered over a wide range of country, they were unable to meet together for public worship, and would have fallen into a state of indifference as to religious matters, had not some of the more zealous of them formed a church at Germantown, Pennsylvania, in 1723, under the ministry of Peter Becker. This church grew rapidly in numbers, and in a short time others were formed on the same principles. Hitherto they had been First Day German Baptists, that is, they held the first day of the week to be the Christian Sabbath. The sect had sprung out of the Pietistic controversy, which arose in the Protestant churches of Germany and Holland in the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries. In 1708, the society afterwards called Dunkers was first formed in Germany. Driven by persecution from their country, some took refuge in Holland, and others in the duchy of Cleves, while the mother church removed to Friesland, and thence to America.

Soon after the sect of the Dunkers had established themselves in the United States, a church connected with the body was formed at Mill Creek, in Lancaster county. To this community belonged Conrad Beissel, a native of Germany, who, on studying the subject of the Sabbath, came to the conclusion that the seventh day, not the first, ought to be observed as sacred to the Lord. In 1725 he published a tract in support of his opinions, which excited no small sensation among the brethren of the Mill Creek church. Beissel thereupon quitted the settlement, and retired to a solitary place in the same county, and being joined by a number of the brethren who had embraced his opinions on the Sabbath, a community was formed, which adopted the seventh day or Jewish Sabbath as the day set apart for religious exercises. Hence the sect is often termed the German Seventh Day Baptists.

In 1733 a kind of monastic society was established by Beissel and his followers, who formed a small colony in a sequestered district called Ephrata. The members of this singular body adopted the dress of White Friars, consisting of a long white robe reaching down to the heels, with a sash or girdle round the waist, and a capuche or cowl hanging down over the neck. All who entered the cloister received monastic names, though no monastic vows were taken, neither were they under a superior, all the brethren and sisters being on a perfect equality. On joining the society no one was required to surrender his property, but the property which belonged to the society by donation, or by the labour of the single brethren and sisters, was common stock. The religious principles of this body are thus stated by Dr. Fahnstock of Bordentown, New Jersey.

"1. They receive the Bible as the only rule of faith, covenant, and code of laws for church government. They do not admit the least license with the letter and spirit of the Scriptures, and especially the New Testament—do not allow one jot or tittle to be added or rejected in the administration of the ordinances, but practise them precisely as they are instituted and set forth by Jesus Christ in his word.

"2. They believe in the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the trinity of the Godhead; having unfurled this distinctive banner on the first page of a hymn book which they had printed for the Society as early as 1739, viz.: 'There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one.'

"3. They believe that salvation is of grace, and not of works; and they rely solely on the merits and atonement of Christ. They believe, also, that atonement is sufficient for every creature—that Christ died for all who will call upon his name, and offer fruits meet for repentance; and that all who come unto Christ are drawn of the Father.

"4. They contend for the observance of the original Sabbath, believing that it requires an authority equal to the Great Institutor to change any of his decrees. They maintain that, as he blessed and sanctified that day for ever, which has never been abrogated in his word, nor any Scripture to be found to warrant that construction, it is still as binding as it was when it was reiterated amid the thunders of Mount Sinai. To alter so positive and hallowed a commandment of the Almighty, they consider would require an explicit edict from the Great Jehovah. It was not foretold by any of the prophets, that with the new dispensation there would be any change in the sabbath, or any of the commandments. Christ, who declared himself the Lord of the Sabbath, observed the seventh day, and made it the day of his especial ministrations; nor did he authorize any change. The Apostles have not assumed to do away the original sabbath, or give any command to substitute the first for the seventh day. The circumstance of the disciples meeting together to break bread on the first day, which is sometimes used as a pretext for observing that day, is simply what the seventh day people do at this day. The sacrament was not administered by Christ nor by the Apostles on the sabbath, but on the first day, counting as the people of Ephrata still do, the evening and the morning to make the day.

"5. They hold to the apostolic baptism—believers' baptism—and administer trine immersion, with the laying on of hands and prayer, while the recipient yet remains kneeling in the water.

"6. They celebrate the Lord's Supper at night, in imitation of our Saviour;—washing at the same time each other's feet, agreeably to his command and example, as is expressly stated in the 13th chapter of the Evangelist John, 14th and 15th verses. This is attended to on the evening after the close of the sabbath—the sabbath terminating at sunset of the seventh day; thus making the supper an imitation of that instituted by Christ, and resembling also the meeting of the Apostles on the first day to break bread, which has produced much confusion in some minds in regard to the proper day to be observed."

The Dunkers hold that celibacy is not binding on any member of their community, but that it is to be commended as a virtue, and as peculiarly conducive to a holy life. They do not approve of a salaried ministry, as they are of opinion that the gospel having been sent without money and without price, every one who is called to preach the word should do it purely from love to the cause. But although these are their avowed opinions as to the support of the ministry, they are liberal in their presents, both of money and goods, to those who are over them in the Lord. Their public worship is conducted in this manner. They commence with a hymn; then follows prayer, the congregation kneeling; after a second hymn the minister requests one of the brethren to read a chapter from any part of the Old or New Testament; the minister now expounds the chapter which has been read, and he is followed by the exhorters who enforce the practical lessons contained in it; any of the brethren or single sisters may then deliver their sentiments on the points which have come under notice; after which the service is closed with prayer, singing, and the reading of a psalm instead of the benediction.

The followers of Beissel, like the good man himself, have been much misrepresented. They studied the strictest simplicity and economy in all their arrangements, and they lived together in social community, in the utmost harmony and love. Governor Penn was in the habit of visiting Ephrata, and such was the high respect in which he held the society, that he kindly offered them a grant of five thousand acres of land, which he pressed upon their acceptance as a Seventh Day Baptist manor. The gift, however, was politely declined on the ground that large possessions might interfere with the harmony of the society, and besides, they felt that it was unbecoming strangers and pilgrims to be absorbed in the gains of this world and the accumulation of property.

Beissel, the founder of the Seventh Day Baptists, at least in America, died in 1768, and was succeeded by Peter Miller, under whom, though undoubtedly he was a man of energy and perseverance, the society began to decline. The sect still exists, though in small and scattered fragments, which are chiefly found throughout Pennsylvania. They acknowledge the Holy Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice. They keep the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, alleging that the Sabbath instituted in paradise has never been abolished, either by God himself, or by Him who declares himself the Lord of the Sabbath. They administer baptism by trine immersion. When the person is kneeling in the water, he is plunged three times forward under water, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The ordinance is accompanied with the laying on of hands and with prayer, while the person is yet in the water. None but adults are baptized, though children of believing parents are received into the church by the laying on of hands and prayer, for a blessing upon them after the example of Christ, Matth. x. 16. They practise the washing of feet before the Lord's Supper, which they celebrate in the evening, as being the time at which it was observed by our blessed Lord. Open communion is the rule of the church, no person being refused admission to the Lord's Supper who expresses a desire to partake of it; and this practice they support by appealing to the Apostle Paul, who throws the responsibility on the individual partaker, when he says, 1 Cor. xi. 28, "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." In every thing this sect endeavour to approach as nearly as possible to a literal observance of the ordinances of Christ, precisely in accordance with the time, manner, and circumstantial details of their original institution.

DURGA, one of the principal forms in which the consort of Shiva, the destroying power of the Hindus, has been manifested. This goddess is believed to be possessed of tremendous power, having been endowed with the distinctive attributes of all the gods. She is usually represented with ten arms, each of them supplied with a warlike weapon, and thus equipped, she stands forth as the champion and defender of her fellow immortals. It was by an act of prowess, the conquest of a giant who had dispossessed the gods of their dominion, that she obtained the name of Durga. The details of this mighty feat are thus described by Dr. Duff in his 'India and India Missions': "In remote ages, a giant named Durgá, having performed religious austerities of transcendent merit, in honour of Brahma, obtained his blessing, and became a great oppressor. He conquered the three worlds; dethroned all the gods, except the sacred Triad; banished them from their respective heavens to live in forests; and compelled them at his nod to come and bow down and worship before him, and celebrate his praise. He abolished all religious ceremonies. The Brahmins, through fear of him, forsook the reading of the Vedas. The rivers changed their courses. Fire lost its energy. The terrified stars retired from his sight. He assumed the forms of the clouds, and gave rain whenever he pleased; the earth, through fear, gave an abundant increase; and the trees yielded flowers and fruits out of season. The gods at length applied to Shiva. One said, he has dethroned me; another, he has taken my kingdom;—and thus all the gods related their misfortunes. Shiva, pitying their case, desired his wife, Parvati, to go and destroy the giant. She willingly accepted the commission. Durga prepared to meet her with an army of thirty thousand giants, who were such monsters in size, that they covered the surface of the earth,—ten millions of swift-footed horses,—a hundred millions of chariots,—a hundred and twenty thousand millions of elephants,—and soldiers beyond the power of arithmetic to number. Parvati, having assumed a thousand arms, sat down upon a mountain, coolly awaiting the approach of her formidable foes. The troops of the giant poured their arrows at her, thick as the drops of rain in a storm; they even tore up the trees and the mountains, and hurled them at the goddess:—she turned them all away; and caused millions of strange beings to issue from her body, which devoured all her enemies except their great leader. He then hurled a flaming dart at the goddess; she easily turned it aside. He discharged another; this she resisted by a hundred arrows. He levelled at her a club and pike; these, too, she repelled. He broke off the peak of a mountain and threw it at her; she cut it into seven pieces by her spear. He now assumed the shape of an elephant, as large as a mountain, and approached the goddess; but she tied his legs, and with her nails, which were like scimitars, tore him to pieces. He then arose in the form of a buffalo, and with his horns cast stones and mountains at the goddess—tearing up the trees with the breath of his nostrils; she pierced him with a trident, when he reeled to and fro. Renouncing the form of a buffalo, he reassumed his original body as a giant, with a thousand arms, and weapons in each; she seized him by his thousand arms and carried him into the air, from whence she threw him down with a dreadful force. Perceiving, however, that this had no effect, she pierced him in the breast with an arrow; when the blood issued in streams from his mouth, and he expired. The gods, filled with joy, immediately reascended their thrones, and were reinstated in their former splendour. The Brahmans recommenced the study of the Vedas. Sacrifices were again regularly performed. Everything resumed its pristine state. The heavens rang with the praises of Parvati. And the gods, in return for so signal a deliverance, immortalized the victory by transferring to the heroine the name of Durga.”

This goddess is extensively and most enthusiastically worshipped throughout Eastern India. The wealthy natives have images of Durga in their houses made of gold, silver, brass, copper, crystal, stone, or mixed metal, which are daily worshipped. Her ten-armed image is approached with the most profound veneration. On either side are usually placed images of her two sons, which are worshipped along with her;—Ganesa, the god of wisdom, represented with the head of an elephant; and Kartikeya, the god of war, riding on a peacock. Around the image of Durga are usually represented a multitude of demi-goddesses, the companions of Durga in her wars. This female divinity is regarded as the patroness of thieves and robbers, who held her in great veneration. Hence she is sedulously worshipped by the Dakoits, or bandits of Bengal, who were accustomed, before setting out on their marauding excursions, to propitiate Durga by the promise of a portion of their spoil. One of the most celebrated of the annual festivals of Bengal is held in honour of this goddess. See next article.

DURGA PUJAH, a festival celebrated yearly in September among the natives of Eastern India, in honour of the goddess DURGA (see preceding article). It extends altogether over fifteen days, twelve of them being spent in preparation for the last three great days of worship. In the view of this festival multitudes of images are made of a composition of hay, wood, clay, or other light and cheap materials. They may be made of any size, from a few inches to ten, twelve, or even twenty feet in height, but most commonly they are of the size of the human stature. These images are either made by the worshippers themselves, or purchased from professional image-makers. As the great days of the festival approach, all secular business is suspended both in town and country, by land and by water. At length the sacred festival commences. The first part of the ceremony consists in consecrating the images, which is done by one or more Brahmans, whose services are much in demand on this important occasion. Having provided himself with the leaves of a sacred tree, and other necessary articles for the service, he approaches the image of the goddess, and with the two forefingers of his right hand, he touches the breast, the two cheeks, the eyes, and the forehead of the image, at each successive touch giving audible utterance to the prayer, “Let the spirit of Durga descend and take possession of this image.” He then performs various ceremonies, and repeats the muntras or mystical verses, at the repetition of which, as is firmly and universally believed, the goddess comes down from heaven to take bodily possession of the image. Immediately after the consecration of the images, the worship commences, and is continued with numberless rites throughout the day. In the evening, about eight o'clock, the principal pujah or worship is renewed with redoubled ardour. This, however, will be best described in the graphic language of Dr. Duff. “He (the devotee) enters the hall; he approaches the image; and prostrates himself before it. After the usual ablutions, and other preparatory rites, he next twists himself into a variety of grotesque postures; sometimes sitting on the floor, sometimes standing; sometimes looking in one direction and sometimes in another. Then follows the ordinary routine of observances;—sprinklings of the idol with holy water; rinsings of its mouth; washings of its feet; wipings of it with a dry cloth; throwings of flowers and green leaves over it; adornings of it with gaudy ornaments; exhalings of perfume; alternate tinklings and plasterings of the sacred bell with the ashes of sandal wood; mutterings of invocation for temporal blessings; and a winding up of the whole with the lowliest act of prostration, in which the worshipper stretches himself at full length, disposing his body in such a manner as at once to touch the ground with the eight principal parts of his body, viz.—the feet, the thighs, the hands, the breast, the mouth, the nose, the eyes, and the forehead.

"After numbers have thus performed their worship, there succeeds a round of carousals and festivity. The spectators are entertained with fruits and sweetmeats. Guests of distinction have atar, or the essence of roses, and rich conserves, abundantly administered. Musicians, with various hand and wind instruments, are introduced into the hall. Numbers of abandoned females, gaily attired, and glittering with jewels, are hired for the occasion to exhibit their wanton dances, and rehearse their indecent songs in praise of the idol, amid the plaudits of surrounding worshippers.

"Another essential part of the worship consists in the presentation of different kinds of offerings to the idol. These offerings, after being presented with due form and ceremony, are eventually distributed among the attendant priests. No share of them is expected to be returned to the worshipper; so that, on his part, it is a real sacrifice. Whatever articles are once offered, become consecrated; and are supposed to have some new and valuable qualities thereby imparted to them. Hence the more ignorant natives often come craving for a small portion of the sacred food, to be carried home to cure diseases."

The sums expended on the celebration of the Durga Pujah festival are enormous, and almost incredible. At the lowest and most moderate estimate, as Dr. Duff informs us, it has been calculated that half a million, at least, is spent every year on this object in Calcutta alone. This festival is also remarkable for the number of bloody sacrifices which are presented to it. Hundreds of families in Calcutta offer scores of such sacrifices, many of them hundreds, and some of them even thousands. The scene which ensues on these occasions is thus described by Dr. Duff: "After the worship, and the offerings and the dancings in honour of the goddess have been concluded, the votaries proceed after midnight to the presentation of animals in sacrifice. It is in the central roofless court or area of the house that the process of slaughter is usually carried on. There a strong upright post is fastened in the ground, excavated at the top somewhat like a double pronged fork. In this excavation the neck of the victim is inserted, and made fast by a transverse pin above. Close at hand stands the hired executioner, usually a blacksmith, with his broad heavy axe. And woe be to him if he fail in severing the head at one stroke! Such failure would betide ruin and disgrace to himself, and entail the most frightful disaster on his employer and family.

"Each animal is duly consecrated by the officiating Brahman, who marks its horns and forehead with red lead,—sprinkles it, for the sake of purifying with Ganges water,—adorns its neck with a necklace of leaves, and its brow with a garland of flowers,—and reads various incantations in its ears, adding, 'O Durga, I sacrifice this animal to thee, that I may dwell in thy heaven for so many years.' With similar ceremonies, each sacrificial victim, whether goat, sheep, or buffalo, is dedicated and slain amid the din and hubbub of human voices. The heads and part of the blood are then carried in succession to the hall within, and ranged before the image,—each head being there surmounted with a lighted lamp. Over them the officiating Brahman repeats certain prayers,—utters appropriate incantations,—and formally presents them as an acceptable feast to the goddess. Other meat-offerings and drink-offerings are also presented with a repetition of the proper formulas. And last of all, on a small square altar made of clean dry sand, burnt-offerings of flowers, or grass, or leaves, or rice, or clarified butter, are deposited—with prayers, that all remaining sins may be destroyed by the sacrificial fire. This naturally leads us to answer a question that is often asked, namely, What becomes of the flesh meat of so many animals? Part of it is offered on the altar as a burnt-sacrifice. But the larger part of it always, and not unfrequently the whole, is devoured as food. The Brahmans, of course, have their choice; and the remainder is distributed in large quantities among the inferior castes. As it has been consecrated by being offered to the goddess, it is lawful for all who choose to partake of it."

The same round of worship, and ceremonies, and sacrifices is continued for two days and two nights more. On the morning of the fourth day, the grand ceremony is performed of unconsecrating the images. This is accomplished by the officiating Brahman, who dismisses the goddess from her earthly habitation by means of various rites, and sprinklings, and incantations, at the end of which he pronounces a farewell address to Durga, when all present unite in bidding her a sorrowful adieu, some being affected even to tears. The images, no longer the abode of the goddess, are now carried forth in solemn procession to the banks of the Ganges, where, after various rites and ceremonies, the image-carriers suddenly make an assault upon their images, violently break them in pieces, casting the broken fragments into the depths of the rolling river. Thus terminates one of the most popular festivals of the superstitious Hindus.

DUSCHARA, an inferior divinity of the ancient Arabians.

DUST (CASTING). In ancient times the Jews were accustomed in time of mourning to cast dust upon their heads, and one of the most expressive modes which existed among them, of indicating extreme affliction, was sitting or lying in the dust. In Sacred Scripture there are two remarkable instances of casting dust. The first is, that of Shimei, who, when David fled before his rebellious son, showed his hatred of, and contempt for, him, by throwing stones and casting dust at him. Thus we read in 2 Sam. xvi. 13, "And as David and his men went by the way, Shimei went along on the hill's side over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him, and cast dust." Another instance of the same kind occurs in the case of the Apostle Paul. The Jews, we are told, seized him in the temple, and had nearly put him to death, and they cried out, Acts xxii. 23, "and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air." This behaviour of the Jews was in complete accordance with a custom which prevails in almost every part of Asia of throwing dust upon a criminal, signifying that he deserves to lose his life, and to be cast into the grave.

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, or, as it is termed in a wider and more general sense, the "Netherlands Reformed Church." The first introduction of Christianity into the Low Countries dates no further back than the seventh century, when a presbyter named Willibrord, an Englishman by birth, commenced a mission with the sanction of the Pope in the Frankish districts of Friesland. This earliest missionary among the Frisians was accompanied by twelve companions, and others joined them soon after. Among these may be mentioned, Lambert or Landebert, who was born of noble parents at Maestricht, and afterwards became bishop of that town, and who is said to have done much for the spread of Christianity in these quarters in connection with Willibrord, and to have suffered martyrdom in 708 or 709. Another individual to whose labours the Netherlands owe much in the infancy of their Christian history, was the holy Romuld, who was either a Scotchman, or, as is more probable, an Anglo-Saxon. Animated by ardent missionary zeal he settled in Lower Germany, took a share in the labours of Willibrord, and was consecrated a bishop, but without a fixed see. Romuld is regarded as the founder of the church of Mechlin and its patron saint. To give a firm foundation to the Christian church which had now been commenced in the Low Countries, a bishopric was established in the ancient city of Wilten, now called Utrecht, to which Willibrord was ordained at Rome. The fame of Willibrord's success in these regions was soon spread abroad, and a warm interest excited. Among others Bishop Wulfram of Sens resolved to visit this promising scene of missionary labour. He set out accordingly, accompanied by numerous followers, for Friesland, where he baptized many of the people. The Frisians were not subject to the Franks, but under an independent monarch. King Radbod professed himself to receive baptism at the hands of Wulfram, but before the rite was administered, he put the question to the bishop, whether, when he himself entered heaven, he should find his predecessors there, those who were kings before him. The ecclesiastic replied, that those who had died without baptism must have perished; when the monarch instantly exclaimed, "What could I do with some few poor people in heaven? I shall abide by the religion of my fathers." The efforts of Willibrord with the Frankish king proved equally vain.

Radbod, however, who had thrown every obstacle in the way of the conversion of his people to the Christian faith, died in 719, and the Frisians became more and more independent of the Franks. One of the warmest supporters of Willibrord in his missionary work was a man of rank and a Christian, Wursing, whose surname was Ado. This zealous friend of the good cause was so persecuted by Radbod and his ministers, that he was compelled to flee with his family into the neighbouring territory of the Franks. After the death of Radbod, Charles Martell, the mayor of the palace, presented Wursing with a fief on the borders of Friesland, and sent him back to his native province that he might have an opportunity of advancing the Christian cause among his people. He settled in the neighbourhood of Utrecht, and laboured with the utmost zeal and activity in the work of his heavenly Master. Willibrord continued to carry on his work as bishop of the new church for forty years, and died in 739 at the age of eighty.

The Frisians, after the death of Radbod, had embraced Christianity in considerable numbers, and the impulse which the cause then received was not a little aided by the efficient assistance which Willibrord obtained from the devoted Boniface, afterwards the apostle of the Germans; and so anxious was the aged bishop to secure a continuance of the services of this laborious missionary, that he proposed to name him as his successor. The proposal, however, was declined, and Boniface, urged forward by a strong feeling of duty, transferred his labours to the Germans, among whom he was eminently successful. But throughout the whole course of his earnest self-denying exertions for the conversion of the heathen Germans, Boniface seems never to have wholly lost sight of the people among whom he had first laboured as a missionary, and accordingly, when he had so far accomplished his work that he had established a Christian church in Germany, and rendered it independent of his personal support, he resolved, though now advanced in life, to return to the mission in Friesland. His wishes in this respect, however, were for a time in danger of being frustrated by the opposition of Hildegard, the newly appointed bishop of Cologne, who urged certain obsolete pretensions by which he sought to render the diocese of Utrecht dependent on his authority. These objections were easily answered, Utrecht having been constituted originally by Pope Sergius as a metropolitan see, holding directly from the Pope, and established for the conversion of the heathen. The controversy on this point being speedily settled, Boniface set out for Friesland, with the expectation of ending his days among the Frisians, and with this view he carried his shroud along with him. His anticipations were soon destined to be realized. But the remainder of the history of Boniface we give in the language of Neander: "With a little company of followers, some priests and some monks, and others servants, he proceeded along the banks of the Rhine, and landed on the shore of the Zuydersee, being joined in Friesland, by his scholar, Bishop Eoban. They traversed the district; and in many cases, found a favourable reception, baptizing thousands of converts, and building new churches. Boniface sent many of those whom he had instructed and baptized back to their homes, with the injunction, that they should meet him again on a certain day, to receive confirmation. In the meantime he pitched his tents, and encamped with his companions on the banks of the river Burda, not far from Dockingen. It was on the fifth of June, in the year 755, that he expected the return of his spiritual children. Early in the morning he heard the distant sound of the approaching multitudes. Full of joy, he hastened to the door of his tent. But he soon found he was grievously deceived. The clang of weapons indicated that the crowd was rushing on with a far other than friendly disposition. Many of the heathens, in fact, enraged at the success of Boniface in turning their countrymen from the worship of idols, conspired to consecrate this day, on which so many were to be received into the bosom of the Christian church, as a day of vengeance to their gods. The lay attendants on Boniface wished to defend him with their weapons; but he forbade them. Bearing relics in his hand, he quietly awaited what might happen. In this attitude he exhorted his companions not to fear those who could hurt the body only, and were unable to harm the soul, but rather to think upon the unerring promises of their Lord, and to trust in him who would soon enrich their souls with the reward of eternal glory. Thus he died a martyr's death in the seventy-fifth year of his age; and with him fell many of his followers, among whom was Bishop Eoban."

The death of Boniface at such a time was a heavy blow to the missionary cause in the Low Countries, but he left behind him a number of zealous men who had imbibed somewhat of his earnest spirit. Conspicuous among these was the Abbot Gregory, on whom the entire management of the mission now devolved. A seminary was established for the education of youth, and a missionary school, from which missionaries were afterwards sent to all parts of the country. Gregory was abundant in labours, and through his instrumentality Christianity was widely diffused throughout the Netherlands. He lived till he was more than seventy years of age, and laboured as a faithful teacher to the end. He died in A. D. 781, and was succeeded by Aldrich, who was consecrated bishop in Cologne. This new superintendent of the mission in Friesland received much valuable assistance in his work from Liudger, a pious pupil of the Abbot Gregory, and who had also been taught in the school of the great Alcuin at York. For seven years did Liudger labour as a presbyter, more particularly for the conversion of the heathen Frisians. His missionary work, however, was suddenly interrupted by the rise of the Saxon leader Wittekind against the Frankish government. The Saxon was successful in his enterprise, and heathenism once more got a footing in the country. The Christian churches were now reduced to ashes, and idol-temples rose upon their ruins. The prospects of the mission being thus unexpectedly blighted, Liudger set out for Rome, and took up his residence in the abbey of Monte Cassino. In two years and a-half he returned to Friesland, and found matters entirely changed. Peace was restored, and the Saxon Wittekind had submitted to baptism. Liudger now renewed his labours with the express sanction of the Emperor Charles, who assigned him a sphere of missionary work around Gröningen and Norden. This young man continued for many years to instruct the Frisians in the knowledge of Christian truth, and with such success that many publicly renounced heathenism and embraced Christianity.

Another active and efficient labourer in the conversion of the inhabitants of the Low Countries was Willebad, a native of Northumberland, the sphere of whose missionary work was the district of Dockum, where Boniface had shed his blood as a martyr. There his labours were attended with much success, but when he entered the district of Gröningen, where idolatry still prevailed, the people were so excited by his discourses, that they proposed to put him to death. It was suggested, however, by the more moderate among them, that they should first consult the gods respecting him by casting lots. This was done, and the decision being in his favour, the life of the missionary was spared. Willebad next proceeded to the province of Drenthe, where his discourses were listened to with attention and respect, but some of his followers, in their zeal against idolatry, began to destroy the temples of the idols—an act which so enraged the heathen that they attacked the missionaries, and even Willebad himself, who would have been killed by a blow aimed at him by a sword, had he not been providentially protected by the leathern thong of a relic-bag which hung round his neck. The heathen were struck with the incident, and regarded Willebad as under the protection of some superior power. Soon after he was appointed by the Emperor Charles to preside over the newly formed diocese of Bremen. He exercised the episcopal office for only two years, when he was cut off by a violent fever with which he was suddenly seized in the course of one of his visitations of his diocese. He died on the eighth of November A. D. 789.

Christianity had now obtained a footing in the Netherlands, and the church had assumed a standing as an organized body in the country, under the authority and obedient to the behests of the Pope of Rome; and although Charlemagne, in the extensive possessions which he won by conquest, asserted firmly the supreme authority of civil government in religious matters, yet in the Low Countries, the clergy, in process of time, became a powerful and independent body. During the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, the whole of Belgium and Batavia was divided into several small dominions, some of them called dukedoms and others countships, owning subjection, part of them to the German empire, and part to the Frankish kings. Utrecht was still a bishopric, but the ecclesiastic who held the office exercised civil authority not only in the city, which was the seat of his spiritual office, but also in Overijssel and Gröningen. Towards the end of the fourteenth century, the whole of what afterwards became the seventeen provinces of the Netherlands, passed into the hands of the house of Burgundy; and under the government of the dukes of that house these provinces rose into high commercial importance among the states of Europe. Charles the Bold, the last of the dukes of Burgundy, in his anxiety to enlarge his dominions, rashly attempted the conquest of Switzerland, but was defeated and killed in battle, and as he died without leaving male issue, Louis XI. of France took possession of Burgundy in 1477. The duke's eldest daughter, Maria, married Maximilian, son of the Emperor Frederick III., who thereby acquired the sovereignty of the Netherlands; and thus the grandson of Maria, who was afterwards Charles V., emperor of Germany, became sovereign of the Low Countries, and of the kingdom of Spain, from the moment of his birth.

It was during the reign of Charles V. that the religious Reformation which had commenced in Germany was introduced into the Netherlands, and secured for itself multitudes of adherents, especially in the large trading cities. These provinces were at this period both wealthy and prosperous, and Charles, afraid of diminishing the ample revenues which flowed from thence into the imperial treasury, was unwilling to resort to severe measures with a view to check the progress of the new opinions. Towards the close of his life he formed the resolution, that as soon as he should conclude his wars in Germany, he would take decisive steps to compel his subjects in the Netherlands to submit to the Romish faith, and with that view he had determined to introduce the Inquisition. Tidings of the royal designs had no sooner reached the country than commerce was suspended, money disappeared, and no taxes could be collected. This put a stop to the compulsory and persecuting designs of Charles, and although severity was practised to some extent before his abdication, it was only under the reign of Philip, his son and successor, that those violent and oppressive measures were devised and carried into execution by the Duke of Alva, which so exasperated the people of the Low Countries, that they threw off the Spanish yoke and asserted their ancient liberties and laws. These they defended with such energy and perseverance that they gave employment to the arms of Spain for half a century, and at length compelled their former masters to treat with them on the footing of a free and independent state. And no sooner was peace and security restored to these long-distracted provinces, than the kingdom which was formed by the United Provinces, "rose," to use the language of Principal Robertson, "to be one of the most respectable as well as enterprising powers of Europe."

Long before the Lutheran Reformation in Germany, there had for several centuries existed in the Netherlands a spirit of religious inquiry, and calm but firm resistance to the domination of the Romish church. Through the greater part of the middle ages we can trace a succession of free spiritual associations, which were often oppressed and persecuted by the hierarchy, but which steadily aimed at the cultivation and diffusion of a pure practical Christianity. As early as the eleventh century, there arose in the Netherlands the female societies of the BEGUINES (which see). About the thirteenth they were joined by the male communities of the Beghards, whose oldest establishment, so far as is known, was founded A. D. 1220 at Louvain; and then about the commencement of the following century, and at first around Antwerp, appeared the fellowships of the Lollards. All of them rapidly spread and became very numerous. None of these fellowships was more effective in awakening a Reformation spirit than the establishments and schools of the Brethren of the Common Lot in Holland and Germany. The warm piety of Gerhard Groot, Florentius Radewins, and Thomas à Kempis, founded the institutions which sent forth the most influential precursors of the Reformation, men who, not only like Erasmus exercised a powerful influence over the higher classes of society, but also laboured among the common people, and laid the foundations of ecclesiastical reform in the very heart and centre of the general community. Thus the Reformation in Holland, independently altogether of the Lutheran movement in Germany, had a firm and solid basis of its own. From time to time, for centuries before, men had been springing up, who, like John of Goch, John Wessel, and Cornelius Grapheus, were propagating widely throughout the Netherlands the principles of a pure gospel. The invention of printing at this transition period was of singular benefit in promoting the progress of the new opinions. Printing offices were set up, and the press was actively worked in various parts of Holland as well as in Germany. Copies of the Sacred Scriptures, of works on theology, and school-books were issued in great numbers. Schools and academies were established for the education of the young. A new impulse was communicated from Italy in favour of classical, and particularly of Grecian literature. Men illustrious throughout Europe for their talents and learning, such as Dringenberg, Agricola, and more especially Erasmus, besides giving origin to a new, liberal, and truly classic system of instruction, spread extensively a spirit of inquiry among the higher and more intelligent members of society. The door was thus opened wide for the ready access into Holland of reformed opinions. Nevertheless, that country was on the whole faithfully devoted to the Romish church and its head, and in the last ten years of the fifteenth century, and the commencement of the sixteenth, the Dutch were kept in submission by the zeal of their political governors. No doubt, like all the branches of the Teutonic race, they resisted, and not without success, the introduction of the Inquisition, though they allowed the preaching of indulgences. As soon, however, as Luther commenced his attacks upon that abuse, his papers and works, which had been condemned so early as the 19th Nov. 1519 by the divines of Louvain, were eagerly read in the Netherlands. Shortly afterward the diet at Worms was held, and there Charles V. passed a severe penal law against all who adhered to the doctrines of Luther, and at the same time and place he issued an edict against heresy in the Netherlands. Under his government it has been calculated that, on a moderate reckoning, 50,000 men suffered violent death in various forms on account of their faith. Yet the number of the Reformed continually increased; and when at last seven of these provinces revolted and became an independent state, they adopted the Protestant religion. In Holland, no doubt, the extravagant opinions of the Anabaptists found a large body of supporters, and the cause of the Reformation sustained, in consequence, no small injury. But amid these outbursts of ill-regulated zeal, there existed a calm but firm determination to uphold the truth of God.

Although the Netherlands early embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, it was for a long time doubtful whether those who left the church of Rome would join the party of the Lutheran or that of the Swiss Reformers, for both had numerous and zealous supporters. But at length the preference was publicly given to the Swiss. The Belgic Confession, or thirty-seven articles, as it was called, was composed in the Walloon language in 1563, by Guido de Bres, a French teacher at Valenciennes, a place which at that time belonged to the Netherlands. This Confession was approved by the synod at Antwerp in 1566, and two years later by another synod, and from that time it has continued down to this day to be the standard confession of the Reformed Dutch Church. It agrees in most points with the confession adopted by the FRENCH REFORMED CHURCH (which see), and differs from the Augsburg Confession in several respects, but especially in the doctrine of the eucharist. From this period the Belgians publicly called themselves by the name of Reformed instead of Lutherans. So long, however, as they were under the dominion of the Spaniards, they avoided using the term Reformed, taking the name of Associates of the Augsburg Confession, because of the hatred which the Spaniards bore to the Reformed, and the decided preference which they showed for the Lutherans. About the same time also the Belgians adopted the Heidelberg Catechism, which was prepared by order of Frederick III., Elector Palatine, who had removed from their offices the Lutheran clergy, and filled their places with Calvinistic teachers.

In assuming the name of the Dutch Reformed Church, the Belgian Protestants evidently declared that, on the great points in which the Reformed differed from the Lutherans, they coincided in opinion with the former. The most prominent points of distinction between these two classes of Protestants are thus briefly described by Mosheim: "I. The doctrine of the Holy Supper, in which the Lutherans say that the body and blood of Christ are truly, though in an inexplicable manner, presented to both the pious and the ungodly; while the Reformed suppose that the human nature of Christ is present only by the symbols of it. Yet they do not all explain their doctrine in the same manner. II. The doctrine of the eternal decrees of God in regard to the salvation of men, the ground of which the Lutherans suppose to be, the faith or unbelief of men in Christ foreseen by God from eternity; but the Reformed suppose it to be the free and sovereign good pleasure of God. III. Certain rites and institutions, which the Reformed think have a tendency to superstition, but which the Lutherans think are partly tolerable and partly useful to Christians. Such are images in churches, sacred garments for the clergy, the private confession of sins, the use of small circular pieces of bread [wafers] such as were anciently distributed in the Holy Supper, the formula of exorcism as it is called in the sacrament of baptism, and some others. These the Reformed would have to be abrogated, because they think religious worship should be restored to its primitive simplicity, and the additions made to it be wholly struck off." On all these points the Reformed at length adopted the opinions of the great Swiss or rather French Reformer CALVIN (which see), although it is an undoubted fact that the Reformed doctrine was first established in Holland by disciples of Zuinglius, and it was not till after a long struggle that the views of Calvin in some degree superseded those of Zuinglius. The church government still remains Zuinglian, not Calvinistic. The formularies are still the old Zuinglian documents, as well as the Liturgical offices used in the dispensation of the sacraments, ordinations, &c. Hence Dermont, a Dutch ecclesiastical historian, contends that the Netherlands church is fundamentally Zuinglian, with an infusion of Calvinism. It is Zuinglian, at least as regards church government and the doctrine of the sacraments. Hence the leaven of Erastianism, not only now, but always characterizing the Netherlands church.

But while the Church of the Netherlands had thus chosen and publicly avowed its creed, the precise form of its ecclesiastical government still remained to be settled. Accordingly, a national synod was held at Dort in 1578, which laid down the basis of the church government in these words, "To establish good and legitimate order in the church, it is resolved that four sorts of ecclesiastical councils shall be instituted: (1) The consistory in each congregation: (2) The classis: (3) The provincial synod: (4) The general or national synod. In these assemblies only ecclesiastical affairs shall be transacted. As regards matters that are partly ecclesiastical and partly political, these shall be settled by consultation between the civil and the ecclesiastical authorities."

Thus early in the history of the Dutch Reformed Church was the Presbyterian form of church government plainly and distinctly established, the four gradations of which were the consistory or kirk-session, the classis or presbytery, the provincial, and the general or national synods. The first arrangement was, that general synods should meet every three years, and the first met at Emden in Hanover, where, though held beyond the confines of the Provinces for safety's sake, the Netherlands church was originally constituted. A second was held at Middleburg in 1581. The next took place at the Hague in 1586, the interval from some cause or other being longer than three years. Thirty years elapsed before a national synod again assembled, being the famous synod of Dort in 1618, after which no national synod was held for nearly two hundred years. Only a few years had passed away after the Reformed Church had been thoroughly organized, when internal controversies on the most important and vital points of theological doctrine agitated the minds of both ministers and people for many years. The church itself had publicly embraced the Calvinistic system, but ARMINIUS (which see), a respected minister, and afterwards professor of theology, inculcated both from the pulpit and the academic chair, opinions completely subversive of the doctrines maintained in the recognised standards of the church. A sect thus arose within the church (see ARMINIANS), avowing a heresy of the most dangerous kind. Gomarus headed the Calvinistic party. Thus commenced a theological controversy, which was conducted on both sides with the utmost bitterness. At length a national synod was summoned, which met at Dort in 1618, attended by deputies from all the Reformed churches in Europe, and after protracted sittings, extending from November till April of the following year, the doctrines of Arminius were formally condemned, and a series of canons or decrees framed in opposition to them, which to this day form a part of the symbols or standards of the Dutch Reformed church. The Arminian or Remonstrant communion, which is now reduced to a very small body, has, since the synod of Dort, formed a separate ecclesiastical denomination.

The seventeenth century was marked by an almost incessant succession of theological disputes in the Dutch churches. Even after the Arminian controversy had been settled by the synod of Dort, several provinces of Holland, more especially Friesland, Zealand, Utrecht, Groningen, and Guelderland, refused to acknowledge the decrees of that synod. For a number of years they continued their resistance, and it was not till 1651, that they were prevailed upon to give in their adhesion to the canons of the national council. But though the protracted Arminian controversy at length came to an end, Holland continued during nearly the whole century to be the scene of fierce religious contention and strife. Points of doctrine and of discipline were eagerly discussed by divines of the most opposite opinions. Questions of casuistry of the most subtle kind gave rise to angry disputation. But the topic which more than any other ranged learned divines in the most violent hostility to one another was that which referred to the power of the magistrate in matters of religion. On this subject numerous pamphlets and treatises appeared, some arguing in favour of the magistrate's power in sacris, in sacred things, and others contending that he had no power unless circa sacra, about sacred things. But amid the various disputes which at this period agitated the churches of Holland, there arose two powerful parties, the Cocceians and the Voetians, so named from their respective leaders, who were divided partly on theological and partly on philosophical grounds. The Aristotelian system of philosophy had for many centuries held undisputed sway over the minds of thinking men in Europe. In the university, in the school, in the closet of the student, the Stagyrite reigned supreme. It was a bold step therefore in Des Cartes to set forth a system of philosophy which in many points ran counter to the views of Aristotle. No sooner, accordingly, was the Cartesian philosophy promulgated, than the learned were divided in opinion as to its truth. Voet raised the standard in Holland against the new philosopher, as teaching not merely error in science, but heresy in religion. In 1639, this philosophico-religious warfare began. The most eminent Dutch theologians entered the field, some in favour of Aristotle, and others of Des Cartes. The controversy waxed fiercer every day, and the classes or presbyteries of the Dutch Reformed Church found it necessary at length to interfere, and to forbid the clergy from carrying matters of philosophy to the pulpit. The States of Holland also in 1656 publicly prohibited the writings of Des Cartes from being expounded to the young, or the Scriptures from being explained according to the dictates of philosophy. These strong measures, however, adopted on the part both of the church and the state, did not prevent the works of Des Cartes from being extensively studied, and their merits or demerits from being widely and keenly canvassed. And the controversy was not a little complicated by the strange and heterogeneous combinations of the errors of Cocceius with those of Des Cartes, it having happened by a curious coincidence, that those who adopted the theology of Cocceius, adopted also the philosophy of Des Cartes. Hence, though not in the remotest degree connected with each other, they came to be confounded in the minds of many. (See COCCESIANS.)

But while it is difficult to see how the Cartesian system of philosophy could have led to the errors of Cocceius, other controversies which arose at this period in Holland had their origin evidently in the new speculative opinions. Among these may be mentioned the dispute commenced by Roël in 1689, in regard to the title, "Son of God," applied to Christ in the New Testament, which that divine alleged to refer only to his human nature, and to the supernatural conception, and to have no bearing upon his divinity. Vitranga, and many of the Dutch divines, opposed this view of the subject with great ability, and in 1691 the states of Friesland enjoined Roël not to teach or preach his peculiar sentiments, and at the same time also enjoined his opponents to keep silence on the contested points. This order issuing from the civil authorities was strictly obeyed, in so far as the province of Friesland was concerned. But in the other Dutch provinces the government not having interfered, the ecclesiastical synods passed decrees condemning the obnoxious opinions, and ordering that candidates for the ministry should be required to renounce them before receiving license.

To the Cartesian system also may be traced the erroneous opinions of Balthazar Becker, a minister at Amsterdam, who, arguing from the principles laid down by Des Cartes, that the essence of spirit consists in thinking, and as there is no connection between thought and extension, mind cannot act upon body unless united with it, maintained that those passages of Scripture which speak of an influence as exerted by good or evil spirits upon man, must be understood figuratively, or in an allegorical sense. The views of Becker were given to the public in a work bearing the name of 'The World Bewitched,' which gave rise to much discussion. Becker was deposed and silenced by the synods of Edam and Alkmaar in 1692, but such was the personal estimation in which he was held, that the senate of Amsterdam continued his salary till his death in 1718.

Not to speak of the deep interest which the Dutch Protestants took during the seventeenth century in the theological controversies which were carried on among their neighbours of the French Reformed Church, those for example raised by the AMYRALD-

ISTS (which see), and PAIONIANS (which see), or of the anxiety with which they watched the controversies which were agitating the English Church, and which, by causing the Brownists to emigrate, gave rise to the Independents in Holland; not to speak, we say, of these religious disputes imported from other countries, the Dutch Reformed Church itself, during that eventful period, suffered long and deeply from the most violent internal dissensions. Sects sprung up entertaining the wildest and most extravagant opinions, such as the Collegiants, the Bourignonists, the Verschorists, the Hattemites, and others. But amid all the commotions which prevailed in the Protestant church in Holland, and the numerous controversies which arose among its people, Christianity owes that church a deep debt of gratitude for its vigorous defence of the gospel against vital errors, and also for affording a refuge to the persecuted Puritans, when driven for conscience' sake from their native shores. Nor ought we to forget that the French or Walloon branch of the Netherlands Reformed Church exercised very great influence in settling the doctrine of the church. The English and Scotch churches in Holland also were of no small importance in the same light, and the remaining congregations of both are still influential and very interesting.

During the eighteenth century, Holland maintained a high place among the nations of Europe by the rapid progress of her manufactures, and the flourishing extent of her commerce. But in the midst of all this material prosperity, the country was visited in the providence of God with one severe calamity after another. The effect of these trials upon the minds of the Dutch Protestants was the reverse of what might have been expected. The zeal for the truth which had marked their history now palpably declined. The war which preceded the peace of 1784 had proved deeply disastrous to the country, and the restoration of security from outward assaults was followed immediately by internal divisions. Holland lost the high place it had once held among the nations, and after experiencing a continued succession of disgraces and disasters for nearly thirty years longer, this interesting country was blotted out from the map of Europe, and made a dependent province as it were of the French Empire. During the twelve years of French ascendancy, the Presbyterian system of church government in Holland fell into total disorder, and a most melancholy decline of vital religion took place. The three universities, Leyden, Groningen, and Utrecht, became hotbeds of Liberalism and Neology. Still there was a Dort orthodox party, who firmly maintained the truth amid all opposition. The low state of vital religion throughout the Dutch churches in the end of the last century, is thus briefly sketched by Dr. Wynperse, at that time an eminent professor at Leyden: "The diligent and daily use of God's word, both in the family and the closet, so much in esteem among the Protestants immediately after the Reformation, is exceedingly rare. A torrent of new writings, less adapted to convey instruction than to afford amusement, to gratify an idle curiosity, and to encourage a frivolous waste of precious time, has banished the Bible.—Children, after a short and defective education, and such as they are apt to despise, are allowed to make a public profession of the religion to which they have been accustomed, by joining in the holy communion: but this is done in so slight and superficial a manner, that the least banter in a libertine company is sufficient to unhinge every good principle, and efface every good impression.—Such professors, as also people of rank, though in other matters ingenious and learned, continue in the same old track, attend the church, and adhere to the doctrines which are taught there: but as they never examine the foundation of their faith, they remain unsettled, and fall before the assaults of infidelity.—When the principles of the English deists (for the most part shrewd philosophers, but whose style of writing was dry and unpopular,) made less progress on the continent, a number of libertine Frenchmen attacked the Holy Scriptures and the doctrines of Christianity, not by solid argument and sound reason, but by giving way to a sportful fancy; by artful insinuations, witty allusions, ludicrous representations, banter, and ridicule; and this mode of attack made a great impression, especially on such as had received a more polished education. Their profane scoffs and ill-applied wit, infused into the unguarded the poison of scepticism, to extract which a deeper investigation was necessary than that to which they were either able or willing to submit."

It is refreshing, however, to note, that amid the deplorable decay of godliness which thus extensively prevailed, the Dutch Reformed Church was not unmindful of the great work which was assigned her. In 1803, 1804, and 1805, we find her engaged in preparing a collection of Evangelical Songs to be used along with their metrical version of the Psalms in public worship. This treasury of sacred melody, when completed, was approved by all the Synods, as being agreeable to "the received doctrine contained according to the Word of God in the Heidelberg Catechism, Confession of Faith, and canons of the National Synod held at Dordrecht in the years 1618 and 1619." This collection of sacred hymns has been loudly complained of as containing erroneous sentiments, but nevertheless continues to be used in the public services of the Reformed churches in Holland.

Previous to 1795, the Reformed church was the predominant church in the Netherlands, but in that year the church was separated from the State, and ever since, all religious opinions are tolerated and enjoy the same protection. Salaries are now paid from the public treasury to ministers of different churches, and even to the Jewish Rabbis. But still the Reformed church, being the church to which the King and

Royal family belong, though it can scarcely be said to have special privileges different from other denominations, enjoys at all events a double share of pecuniary support from the State treasury. In 1816, when the House of Orange recovered the sovereignty, the Presbyterian form of government, which had become completely disarranged, was remodelled by a synod which met at the Hague under the sanction of William I. The four graduated ecclesiastical courts—consistories, classes, provincial synods, and general synods—were restored. The classes were permitted to meet only once a-year, and their business was limited to the management of their ministers' widows' fund, the election of deputies to attend the provincial synods, and the nomination of a small committee called moderators, in whom are vested all the functions of the ancient classes. The provincial and general synods were permitted to meet at regular intervals, and, accordingly, since 1816, there has been a meeting of the general synod at the Hague regularly every year. Its meetings are usually continued for fourteen days, and all the affairs of the entire Dutch Reformed church, all that concerns its worship, government, and discipline is under the regulation of this supreme ecclesiastical court, and in it alone is vested the power of deposing ministers or excommunicating members. "There is a regular establishment at the Hague," as we learn from Dr. Steven, "solely for the general direction of the affairs of the Reformed Church, at the head of which is the minister of state. This ecclesiastical minister has under him a secretary and adviser,—besides five commissioners, two adjunct clerks, and an agent for the church. This establishment, though standing in immediate connection with all the church courts, possesses no legislative power and government, and takes no management of church matters, without consulting those ecclesiastical judicatories, to whose department such affairs belong."

The manner in which Divine service is conducted in the Dutch Reformed church on ordinary Sabbaths, and on sacramental occasions, is thus described in a valuable tract, published some years ago by Dr. Steven, on the Dutch Ecclesiastical Establishment, and inserted as an appendix to his 'History of the Scottish Church at Rotterdam.' "In Holland, clergymen are familiarly, but as a term of respect, called Dominies. Few of the clergy preach from memory. They generally read their discourses; and sometimes, though rarely, their prayers. They are held in the greatest respect by the Dutch. In general they are certainly exemplary, and zealous in the discharge of their sacred functions. And, like the people at large, are distinguished for loyalty and strong attachment to their Fatherland. Accompanied by an elder, they regularly make a professional visit to their members, from house to house, twice a-year, immediately before the season of communion. They are also particularly careful whom they admit to the Lord's Table. Young people attend them, for years together for catechetical instruction. As auxiliaries, independent of the ministers, there are also subordinate licensed male and female teachers of religion, who keep private preparatory classes, and receive a small gratuity from their pupils.

"In all the Reformed churches in the Netherlands, the sacrament of the Supper is administered once a quarter; though formerly, as in some districts still, six times a-year. The celebration of that ordinance is announced a fortnight beforehand; and in the course of the week immediately preceding the Sabbath on which it is celebrated, there is a preparation service, towards the conclusion of which, all the intending communicants stand up and answer in the affirmative, in presence of the congregation, a few questions put from the pulpit, comprehending a declaration, That they believe, with all their heart, the doctrine which they have confessed; that they resolve, through Divine grace, to adhere to that doctrine, and to lead a Christian life; and that they will submit to the superintendence and the discipline of the church. All candidates for membership in the New Reformed Communion, receive a regular course of religious instruction from the ministers or the catechists of that church, in Christian doctrine and morality, according to the Confession of Faith and to the Heidelberg Catechism; and also in the knowledge of Bible history, and the origin and progress of the Reformation in the Christian church. Upon these subjects they are examined, an elder being present; and when found qualified, they are solemnly and publicly admitted or confirmed; making in a standing posture in church, satisfactory replies to the queries above enumerated. Within the pale of the Reformed church, very few adults are to be found who had not been duly enrolled as members ere they attained the age of twenty. Before the celebration of the Lord's Supper, a meeting of the Consistory of each church is always held, in direct reference to the moral and religious character of the communicants. Members of other Protestant congregations in the Netherlands are admissible to communion with the Reformed Church, provided that their moral character is unobjectionable. The practice is unknown in Holland, which is universal among Scottish Presbyterians, of distributing tokens.

"When the Apostolical benediction, after the ordinary service in the morning of the sacramental Sabbath, is pronounced, the officiating minister directs the attention of the members to the prescribed and printed Form for the Communion Service. That Form commences with a plain statement of the nature and design of the Lord's Supper, and of the character of those who ought to abstain from it, and of those who worthily partake it. Then follows an appropriate prayer, with the Lord's Prayer and the Apostle's Creed. A psalm or hymn is next sung, and the minister takes then, if not before, his station at the Communion Table, which is placed in the middle, or most convenient and conspicuous part of the church. At his invitation the members promptly and decently approach the Lord's Table, and sit down promiscuously without distinction of age or rank, the king being seated, perhaps, next to the poorest of his subjects. The generally prevailing practice, of the men communicating first, and then the women separately, is not enjoined by law, but established by custom.

"After a few prefatory sentences, left to his own discretion, the minister distributes, in the words of institution, the bread and wine to those who are nearest to him. He then pauses, and sitting down, partakes of the same himself; and while the sacred symbols are being handed from one member to another along the table, a solemn and impressive silence prevails in the assembly. When all at the table have communicated, the minister stands up again, and addresses to them words of comfort and exhortation; after which, they return to their pews. A small portion of Scripture, such as the 53d chapter of Isaiah, or a similarly appropriate passage, is then read by the clerk or precentor, or a few verses of a psalm or hymn are sung. This process is repeated till all intending communicants have so received the Holy Supper. The same clergyman, who has delivered the sacramental discourse, or what in Scotland is called the action sermon, conducts the whole of the sacred service; and in large communities, he is sometimes called to address thirty tables consecutively. His address, of necessity, is very short. Reverting again to the form for the communion service, the minister next reads the invitation to thanksgiving and praise, and offers up the concluding prayer with the Lord's Prayer. Finally, a psalm or hymn is sung, and the benediction is pronounced. In the afternoon or evening of the same Lord's day there is a thanksgiving service. The frequency of the celebration of this holy ordinance, we reckon to be productive of the happiest effects upon the Dutch community. The preparatory and thanksgiving services are neither injudiciously numerous, nor unnecessarily prolonged.

"As it is impossible, especially in large towns, that every member of a family can attend on the same day, the sacrament is dispensed in one or more of the churches on the succeeding Sabbath, to give to all an opportunity of communicating.

"The officiating elders and deacons are, like the minister, distinguished by a band. The precentor or reader is also dressed precisely as a clergyman." It may be mentioned that the Dutch clergy, till within a few years back, wore a court-looking dress and a cocked hat. This practice has been discontinued. Formerly also, in the pulpit, instead of a gown, they used a long mantel, consisting of black cloth only six inches broad, edged with silk, with a hook to the collar of the coat. Now, however, they wear a gown of ample dimensions.

The changes introduced by William I. into the government of the church, though designed to main tain order and due subordination to the civil authority, have never been regarded throughout the church with entire satisfaction. The decisions of the higher administrations of the church, particularly in cases of discipline, have often given rise to murmuring among those who were concerned for the purity of the church, and the constant observation of the head of the state, although he asserted no right of positive interference, was by many regarded as inconsistent with religious liberty. The result was, that in 1834 a secession took place from the national church of a number of ministers and congregations, who formed themselves into a separate religious body. No sooner had they taken this important step than they were subjected to severe hardships and privations, both in their property and in their persons. Heavy fines were imposed upon them, various restrictions were put upon their meetings, and they were even subjected to a vexatious and harassing system of military oppression. In vindication of these harsh measures, which in some cases the Seceders may have brought upon themselves by their indiscretion, it was argued that the constitution of 1813, when Holland regained her independence, while it afforded full toleration and protection to the sects then known, made no provision for the toleration of any new sects that might arise; and in the penal code had been embodied a clause forbidding more than nineteen persons to assemble unless authorized to do so by the state.

The grounds on which the secession of 1834 took place are to be found, to some extent at least, in the modifications which were introduced in 1816 into the ecclesiastical constitution and government of the Reformed church. In the Old Republic of the Seven United Provinces, the church was as Erastian as it well could be, the ultimate appeal being in all cases to the civil authorities. During the French regime, when the church was disestablished, the stipends withdrawn, and the whole was in utter confusion, the church was left to herself, and her assemblies were freely chosen, and debated and acted freely. The consistory consisted of the minister or ministers of the congregation, with the elders, and in most cases the deacons. The classis consisted of all the ministers and several of the elders within the bounds. The provincial synod consisted of deputies from each classis, and the general synod of deputies from each provincial synod. Such was the constitution of the church courts between 1795 and 1816, but in the latter year a considerable change took place under the sanction of the king. The consistory underwent no alteration, but in the classis was established a commission or classical direction, which managed most of the business of the classis, and in the selection of those who were to be members of the classical direction, as it came to be called, the king obtained an influential voice. The provincial synod or direction was still more thoroughly under the control of the sovereign, the members being chosen by him out of a list prepared by the inferior courts. The general synod was appointed to consist of nineteen members commissioned by the provincial synods. In A. D. 1852, a new fundamental law of the church was adopted by the synod, and accepted by the king. It is a great improvement on that which preceded it. The powers of the classis are much extended, while those of the select commission are abridged. The elections to church offices and to membership of courts are allowed to be made without state interference. The general synod consists now of 34 clerical members chosen by provincial synods, and an equal number of secundli to take the places of those who may be prevented from attending. In addition to the 34 now mentioned, one clerical member is present to represent the Walloon synod, one to represent the presbytery of Limburg, and one to represent the churches in the colonies. Three elders are chosen by the Dutch synods, and one by the Walloon synod. There are also present a secretary, a quæstor-general, and three professors, one from each university, who have a right to sit and deliberate, but not to vote. The synod meets annually at the Hague.

The preponderance of crown influence in the deliberations and decisions of the church courts, according to the fundamental law of the church passed in 1816, gave rise to a spirit of discontent and dissatisfaction, which was every year evidently on the increase. This, however, was not the only, nor perhaps even the chief, cause of the alienation from the National church of many of its members. From the period of the French Revolution, there had been gradually imported into Holland much of the infidelity of France, and the false theology of Germany. These and other influences led, in process of time, to the diffusion, among both the pastors and people of the Dutch church, of a spirit of indifference, and even of unbelief, which saddened the hearts of the godly in the land. And in addition to the departure from soundness of doctrine and decay of vital godliness which rapidly spread throughout the church, the National synod of 1816 had modified the form of subscription to the articles of the synod of Dort thus, "that we truly receive and heartily believe the doctrine which, in accordance with God's Holy Word, is contained in the recognized formularies of unity of the Netherlands Reformed Church." This modification was considered by many as calculated to throw open the door to those who, entertaining Arminian, Arian, or Socinian principles, could not conscientiously declare that they believed the articles of the synod of Dort to be agreeable to Scripture. A change so important was not accomplished without considerable resistance. Many were the attempts made through the press to expose the equivocation supposed to be involved in the new form of subscription, but the most successful in awakening a deep interest on the subject, was a small pamphlet published in April 1827, under the title of 'An Address to my Reformed Fellow-Believers.' The re-suit of the wide circulation of this 'Address' was, that the spirit of murmuring and discontent, which had for several years been gaining ground in the church, came at length to a height, and the secession of 1834 drew off from her communion a large body of the people, who, in the face of all opposition, still maintain those principles, which rendered their continuance in the church difficult, if not impossible.

The twenty-four years which have elapsed since the Secession took place, has by no means improved the state of the Dutch church in so far as purity of doctrine is concerned. The pernicious effects, on the contrary, of the modification of the form of subscription which was introduced in 1816, are every day more and more apparent. Within the pale of the church has arisen a class of ministers known by the name of the Groningen school, who openly teach Arianism or semi-Arianism from the pulpit, and from the professor's chair, alleging that Christ is not the everlasting Son of the Father, born of God, and therefore very God, as all Scripture teaches, but merely the most exalted of the creatures of God, trained in heaven to wisdom and holiness, that coming as a man into the world, he might reveal God in manhood for the purpose of bringing man back to the image of God. They deny also the personality and Godhead of the Holy Spirit, and believe him to be simply an attribute of God, a manifestation of the Divine power and wisdom. Their views of the inspiration of the Scriptures are equally unsound, for they declare that the Bible is not the Word of God, but that the Word of God is in the Bible; in other words, that some portions of the Bible are inspired, but others not.

Besides the Groningen school, the Dutch Reformed Church has another form of heresy taught in one of its universities, which is rapidly undermining the principles of the students of theology. We refer to the theological views inculcated at Leyden by Professor Scholten, which differ in several particulars from the errors just noticed. This learned divine teaches from the chair that a difference ought to be maintained between the Scriptures and the Word of God. What Jesus teaches he regards as alone infallible, but that the writings of the Evangelists and Apostles stand on a different footing from the discourses of Christ, and are not to be regarded as a standard for the belief of the church. The Professor alleges also that the promise of the Holy Spirit given to the Apostles belonged not to them alone, but to the church also in all ages, that they might more and more seek and find all the truth, the testimony of the Spirit within a man being nothing else but the man's cordial reception of the truth. This teacher of theology denies original sin, declares that there is no direct prophecy of the Messiah in the Old Testament, and asserts that the Son before his coming into the world was not a person, but merely the world-thought of God, and the Holy Spirit nothing else but the almighty power of God. Finally, the Professor believes and teaches that there will be a final restoration of all things, and that the whole human race will ultimately be saved. Such are the heretical sentiments openly set forth in Leyden, as we learn from a treatise just published by D. Molenaar, an excellent Dutch Reformed minister at the Hague; and thus both at Leyden and Groningen are the minds of the Dutch students of theology poisoned by the most erroneous and unscriptural teaching. Utrecht is the only one of the three theological schools of Holland which is to any extent free from fatal heresy.

The present state of the Dutch Reformed Church is far from affording a favourable prospect for the future, but there is one redeeming feature of the case, that amid all the heresies which are springing up throughout the church, its standards are still preserved in their original purity and Scriptural orthodoxy, and amid the severe shock which it sustained by the secession, it is calculated that while the Seceders amount to somewhere about 40,000, there are 1,700,000 persons who still adhere to the Reformed Church, and the pastors number 1,637, not including 25 ministers and 8 emeriti pastors of the Walloon Synod, which is also represented in the General Synod of the Dutch church. In the classes of the Dutch church are also included 4 ministers of the Scotch church, 1 English Presbyterian, and several German Protestants. There are 92 licentiates or candidates for the ministry.

Pope Pius IX. issued a bull on 4th March 1853, dividing Holland into regular dioceses, over which Romish bishops in ordinary were appointed. This movement on the part of the Roman Catholic church excited no small sensation among the Dutch Protestants. The government, however, refused to sanction any such arrangement, unless on certain conditions involving a modification of the oath taken by Romish bishops at their consecration, a demand that every bishop should obtain a royal license before exercising his office, and should take an oath of allegiance to the government. The bishops also were not allowed to reside in the places from which they derived their titles, but in such places as the king should appoint, and accordingly, he has located them in North Brabant and Limbourg, which are chiefly Roman Catholic districts.

From the Dutch Reformed Church there is a vigorous offshoot at the Cape of Good Hope, where, as the colony formerly belonged to Holland, the population largely consists of Dutch emigrants and their descendants. The church is supported by the government of the colony. Each congregation has its consistory, which meets as often as occasion requires, and the classes or presbyteries, five in number, meet once a-year, while the synod meets every five years. There are twenty-one students connected with this branch of the Dutch Reformed Church, who are attending the universities in Holland, chiefly Utrecht, in preparation for the office of the ministry.

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA, the oldest Presbyterian denomination in the United States. It is a branch of the national church of Holland, and dates as far back as 1614, when a colony of Dutch emigrants began to settle on the banks of the Hudson, and laid the foundation of New Amsterdam, which was afterwards called New York, and became the commercial metropolis of the New World. The Dutch West India Company were the first who carried the ministers of the gospel from Holland to North America, and as the members of that Company chiefly belonged to Amsterdam, the ministers of that city were naturally applied to for aid in selecting suitable and efficient pastors for the rising colony. Thus it happened that the Dutch Reformed Church in America formed for more than a century only a branch of the mother church in Europe, and was under the immediate jurisdiction of the classis in Amsterdam, which to this day has the charge of the churches in the Dutch colonies. But this dependence, at first natural and beneficial, came to be attended with much inconvenience on account of the intervening distance. At length, after a good deal of violent controversy between the old Dutch and the young Dutch parties, which led even to a formal though but temporary schism, the church assumed an independent organization, with the consent of the classis of Amsterdam and the synod of North Holland, in 1771, chiefly in consequence of the prudent and conciliatory intervention of the venerable Dr. Livingston. (See CONFERENTIE PARTY.)

From this period nearly all communication with the parent church in Holland ceased, and even the Dutch language rapidly passed away from the pulpit and the school. Many of the Dutch settlers resisted for a time the introduction of the English language into the regular services of the church, but those born in the colony having no such partiality for the language of the fathers, preferred to worship in the prevailing language of their adopted country. And no sooner was the church placed on an independent footing than it increased quickly in numbers and in influence. At the commencement of the war of the revolution, there were about eighty churches in the state of New York, which were divided into three classes or presbyteries; and in New Jersey there were forty churches, which were divided into two classes. The particular synod, as it was called, was a delegated body, which met once a-year, and which consisted of two pastors and two elders from each classis. A general synod was held for the first time in 1792. It consisted at first of all the ministers of the church, with an elder from each congregation, and it met every third year. Some years afterwards, when the number of churches was greatly multiplied, the general synod was made a delegated body, each classis nominating three pastors and three elders as their representatives. It was arranged that this general synod should meet annually. The Dutch Reformed church is confined to the States of New York and New Jersey, and the city of Philadelphia. Its congregations are prosperous and wealthy, especially the collegiate churches in the city of New York. This denomination has also at Brunswick, New Jersey, a theological seminary and also a college, called Rutgers's college, which, though the number of their students is small, are among the best endowed literary institutions in the country. In the absence of an original field of home missionary labour, we are informed by Dr. Schaff, that this church has lately made an effort to enlarge its territory and influence by establishing congregations out of foreign German, and German Reformed material, and published a new German hymn-book.

In doctrine this denomination holds to the same standards as the parent church in Holland, but being now completely separated from that church, they have happily escaped the influx of Neologian sentiments which have so extensively corrupted the Reformed church of Holland, more particularly the universities of Groningen and Leyden, to the almost complete setting aside of the articles of the synod of Dort. The Heidelberg Catechism, which is one of the symbolical books of the church, is now practically very little used. This church has a liturgy containing prayers suited to persons in different circumstances, public and private; but the only part which is enjoined to be read is the Form of Baptism, in order to preserve the uniformity of vows; together with the short prayer before the vows taken by the parents; and also the Formula of the Holy Communion of the Lord's Supper. These the minister reads while all the members carefully and devoutly follow him, with the form open before them. This is all the use that is made in public of the Liturgy.

In its form of government this church is strictly Presbyterian, and in almost all respects in conformity with the ecclesiastical arrangements of Presbyterian churches on both sides of the Atlantic. The only difference respects the eldership, which in other churches is an office conferred for life; but in the Dutch Reformed church in America the elders are chosen to serve for two years in succession, and after remaining out of office one year, they are again eligible should the congregation see fit to re-elect them.

The mode of conducting Divine service is thus described by Dr. Brownlee: "With us, the ancient and time-honoured custom and mode is this: the minister and people, who are members, upon entering the church, bow down, and in secret worship the King of Zion. In the morning, the pastor begins the solemnity of the day by reading the ten commandments: and in the other services of the day, by reading a chapter of the Holy Scriptures. The assembly then sing; then there is the solemn benediction; then a brief address, called the exordium remotum, containing an outline of the subject to be discussed; then prayer; then singing; then the sermon; then a prayer; then a collection of alms for the poor; then singing, and the benediction.

"Our psalmody is that which has been carefully prepared by a committee of our General Synod. It consists of the psalms of Watts, greatly improved and enlarged, and two books of hymns. It is a rule of our church that each pastor shall lecture on a section of our Heidelberg Catechism, in the afternoon of the Sabbath, so as to go through the whole in a definite time. These lectures exhibit an entire system of pure and holy doctrine to the people, in a regular course. And to this admirable system do we humbly and prayerfully ascribe the uniformity and strictness of adherence to pure doctrine in our churches. The design is to secure doctrinal preaching, and that of the entire system, to our people, in a regular course, from year to year." Since 1764, the worship has ceased to be conducted in the Dutch language. The body is of limited extent, numbering in 1853 only 324 churches.

DUUMVIRI, the name of various magistrates and functionaries, in ancient times, at Rome. Thus those officers, to whom was committed the original charge of the Sibylline books, were called Duumviri Sacrorum. Officers bearing the name of Duumviri were also appointed for the purpose of building or dedicating a temple.

DUZAKH, a place often referred to in the ancient Persian religion, where Ahriman, and the Devs, and the souls of the wicked are thoroughly cleansed and purified by fire. It somewhat resembles the purgatory of the Romish church. The Persians, however, had a purgatory without a hell, being of opinion that there was no eternal punishment, but that men would be purified, and then restored to the Divine favour.

DWARFS, diminutive creatures, which, according to the ancient Scandinavian mythology, were bred in the body of the giant Ymir, and were at first only maggots, but by the will of the gods they at last assumed the form and understanding of man. They always dwell in rocks and caverns.

DWIJA (twice born), an appellation given to a Hindu Brahman, after his investiture with the sacred cord. See CORD (INVESTITURE WITH THE).

DYOTHELITES, a name given to those orthodox Christians, in the seventh century, who held that there were two wills in Christ, a Divine and a human, in opposition to the MONOTHELITES (which see), who contended that the human will was so absorbed in the Divine, that Christ could only be said to have one will. The sixth general council called by the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus in A. D. 680, asserted unanimously the doctrine of two wills in Christ, and two kinds of voluntary acts. This council, therefore, was strictly Dyothelite, and, accordingly, declared the Monothelites to be heretics. This was the third Constantinopolitan council, and from the vaulted chamber in which it held its meetings, was called the Trullian council. By means of this council the doctrine of two wills and two modes of operation in Christ obtained a victory throughout the Eastern church. It was now made part of a new Confession; "Two wills and two natural modes of operation united with each other, without opposition, and without confusion or change, so that no antagonism can be found to exist between them, but a constant subjection of the human will to the Divine;" this was the foundation of the creed. An anathema was also pronounced by the council upon the champions of Monothelitism, upon the patriarchs of Constantinople, and upon the pontiff Honorius. But in A. D. 711, an emperor mounted the throne of the Greek empire who was a zealous champion of the Monothelite party. Under his presidency a council was held at Constantinople, which overthrew the decisions of the sixth general council, and proposed a new symbol of faith in favour of the Monothelite doctrine. The reign of this emperor, however, lasted only two years, and his successor, Anastasius II., by whom he was dethroned, asserted Dyothelite doctrine to be that which he alone could favour, and the Monothelites, fleeing from the country, took refuge among the mountains of Lebanon, where they came to be known under the name of MARONITES (which see).

DZOHARA, the name given by the ancient Arabians to the planet Venus, whom they worshipped.

EAGLE-WORSHIP. The eagle has always been regarded as the king of birds. It was the bird of Jove among the ancient Greeks and Romans; and the appearance of an eagle clapping her wings and sporting in the air was esteemed a lucky omen.

Thus Priam, when he had formed the design of going forth to redeem Hector, begs of Jupiter to assure him of his protection by the flight of an eagle. Xenophon, and other ancient historians, inform us, that the golden eagle with extended wings was the ensign of the Persian monarchs long before it was adopted by the Romans; and it is very probable that the Persians borrowed the symbol from the ancient Assyrians. In the representations of the Roman Jupiter, the eagle is usually pictured at his feet, but in a statue of Zeus at Olympia, presented by the Metapontines as a votive offering to the god, he is represented with the face averted towards the east, with an eagle perched upon one hand, and a thunder-bolt grasped in the other, while a garland of flowers decorated his brow. Not only, however, was the eagle looked upon as an emblem in connection with the heathen gods of antiquity, but there is reason to believe that it was ranked among the birds that were accounted sacred among the Egyptians. Diodorus Siculus and Strabo tell us, that the people of Thebes in Egypt worshipped the eagle, looking upon it as a royal bird worthy of divine honours. The Roman eagle, also borne as their military standard, was sometimes actually worshipped.

In the cosmogony of various nations, we find the eagle occupying a conspicuous place, the Holy Spirit brooding upon the surface of the waters being often symbolized by an eagle or other large bird hovering over chaos. Among the Aztecs the eagle was the emblem of their supreme divinity, and with the eagle as their standard, they marched to battle under the protection and in the name of God. In the monuments of ancient Mexico, is seen a figure of an eagle holding in its talons a serpent whose head it is tearing off. To the north of Mexico the Indians of California hold this bird in great veneration, because, according to one of their legends, which may possibly have an allusion to the deluge, a man who had fallen into a well was rescued by an eagle.

Among several nations, the eagle is an attribute of the Supreme God or King of the universe. Thus, as we have already seen, among the Greeks and Romans it was consecrated to Jupiter; among the Sabines, to Sangus or Sancus, who is, they tell us, the heaven; among the Cymri, to Hu; among the Scandinavians, to Odin, who bears, among other surnames, that of eagle-headed; to the supreme god of the ancient Arabs of Yemen, who is called Nasr, the eagle; to that of the Assyrians, called Nisroch, who is represented at Khorsabad, according to Layard, by a man with an eagle's head. In the Zendavesta of the ancient Persians, the eagle is the guardian of the two gates of the world. In India, Vishnu is sometimes represented under the form of an eagle, with a thunderbolt in its claws, but Garouda, as Vishnu is called under this form, has only the body of a bird, his head being that of a man. The Scandinavians represented organic existence by the ash-tree, Yggdrasil, at the top of which is seen Odin, under the form of an eagle, while the serpent Nidhög gnaws the root of the ash-tree. The squirrel Ratolsk runs up and down the ash-tree, seeking to cause strife between the bird of heaven and Nidhög, the huge mundane snake. In Phœnicia, the mythic and paradisaical island of Tyre was alleged to be guarded by an eagle, which must be killed before man could gain access to the happy land. In a legendary epic of the Finns, the Supreme God is said to come under the form of an eagle in aid of the god of agriculture, Wäinämöinen, and to set fire to the forests which covered the soil. Thus almost everywhere is the eagle found to be the symbol of God, the Supreme God, the sovereign God who formed and fashioned the world over which he reigns. It was also a bird of good omen both among the Greeks and Romans, and it is still looked upon as a suitable ornament to the sceptre of kings, and the proud standard of warlike nations.

EARTH. See CREATION.

EAST (WORSHIPPING TOWARDS THE). This custom is of very remote antiquity, having probably been derived from the habit prevailing among those who worshipped the sun, of turning towards the east where he is seen to rise. Vitruvius, the Roman writer on architecture, lays it down as a fixed principle, that a temple should be so built that those who sacrifice at the altar may in doing so have their faces turned towards the east. The altar itself also, he affirms, ought to be situated in that direction. Augustine traces the practice of turning towards the east, which early appeared in the Christian church, to the custom observed by the heathens. The ancient Jews, on the contrary, turned towards the west, that they might not appear to imitate the idolatrous heathen. From the period of the second century, it was customary both in the Eastern and Western church to pray facing towards the east. The altars of the Christian churches were situated in the same way, and the dead were buried so that the eye might be turned in the same direction. In the baptismal ceremony it was customary first to turn towards the west as the region of darkness, where the prince of darkness might be supposed to dwell, and to renounce with great solemnity the devil and his works, and then to turn about to the east and enter into covenant with Christ. "The eye of the Christian," it has been said, "turned with peculiar interest to the east, whence the day-spring from on high had visited him. There the morning-star of his hope fixed his admiring gaze. Thence arose the Sun of Righteousness, with all his heavenly influences. Thither in prayer his soul turned with kindling emotions to the altar of his God. And even in his grave, thither still he directed his slumbering eye, in quiet expectation of awaking to behold in the same direction the second appearing of his Lord, when he shall come in the clouds of heaven to gather his saints." This practice is carefully observed in the Roman Catholic church, although it has not met with uniform approbation from the Roman Pontiffs, for Pope Leo I. pronounced it to be a superstitious custom which ought not to be tolerated. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions gives directions for building churches towards the east, but the practice has been departed from in multitudes of instances in every age of the church. Bingham, in his Christian Antiquities, gives a very full account of the reasons which have been assigned for the introduction and continued observance of the custom of worshipping towards the east. "Some say, the east was the symbol of Christ, who was called the Orient, and Light, and Sun of righteousness, in Scripture: and therefore, since they must worship toward some quarter of the world, they chose that which led them to Christ by symbolical representation. As Tertullian tells us in one place, that in fact they worshipped toward the east, which made the heathen suspect that they worshipped the rising sun; so in another place he says, The east was the figure of Christ, and therefore both their churches and their prayers were directed that way. Clemens Alexandrinus says, They worshipped toward the east, because the east is the image of our spiritual nativity, and from thence the light first arises and shines out of darkness, and the day of true knowledge, after the manner of the sun, arises upon those who lie buried in ignorance. And St. Austin, When we stand at our prayers, we turn to the east, whence the heavens, or the light of heaven arises: not as if God was only there, and had forsaken all other parts of the world, but to put ourselves in mind of turning to a more excellent nature, that is, to the Lord. This reason exactly falls in with that which is given for turning to the east, when they covenanted with Christ in the solemnities of baptism.

"Another reason given for it by some, is, that the east was the place of paradise, our ancient habitation and country, which we lost in the first Adam by the fall, and whither we hope to be restored again, as to our native abode and rest, in the Second Adam, Christ our Saviour. This reason is given by Gregory Nyssen and St. Basil, and by the author of the Constitutions, and the author of the Questions and Answers to Antiochus among the works of Athanasius, together with Chrysostom, (as he is cited by Cotelerius and Gregentius,) and many others. Now, this is the very reason assigned by St. Cyril for turning to the east, when they covenanted with Christ, and celebrated the mysteries of baptism. So that hitherto we find a clear relation of these ceremonies one to the other, and a perfect agreement between them.

"Another reason assigned for this custom, was, that the east was the most honourable part of the creation, as being the seat of light and brightness. The author of the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox gives this reason for it: We set apart, says he, the most honourable things to the honour of God: and the east, in the opinion of men, is the most honourable part of the creation: we therefore in time of prayer turn our faces to the east; as we sign those in the name of Christ, that need consignation, with the right hand, because it is deemed more honourable than the left, though it differ only in position, not in nature. And Lactantius, without taking any particular notice of this custom, makes this general observation, That the east was more peculiarly ascribed to God, because he was the fountain of light, and illuminator of all things, and because he makes us rise to eternal life. But the west was ascribed to that wicked and depraved spirit the devil, because he hides the light, and induces darkness always upon men, and makes them fall and perish in their sins. Now, this is a reason that equally holds for turning to the east in baptism, as well as their daily devotion.

"There is one reason more assigned for it, which is, that Christ made his appearance on earth in the East, and there ascended into heaven, and there will appear again at the last day. This is one of the three answers, which the author of the Questions to Antiochus, under the name of Athanasius, orders to be given to this question: If a Christian ask the question, he is to be told, They looked toward paradise, beseeching God to restore them to their ancient country and region, from whence they were expelled. If a heathen put the question, the answer should be, Because God is the true Light, for which reason, when they looked upon the created light, they did not worship it, but the Creator of it. If the question was proposed by a Jew, he should be told, They did it because the Holy Ghost had said by David, 'We will worship toward the place where thy feet stood, O Lord,' Psal. cxxxii. 7, meaning the place where Christ was born, and lived, and was crucified, and rose again, and ascended into heaven. Which seems also to be intimated by St. Hilary on those words of the 67th Psalm, according to the translation of the Septuagint, 'Sing unto God, who ascended above the heaven of heavens' in the east. The honour of God, says he, who ascended above the heaven of heavens in the east, is now reasonably required: and for that reason toward the east, because he, according to the prophet, is the East or Morning from on high; that he, returning to the place whence he descended, might be known to be the Orient Light, who shall hereafter be the Author of men's rising to the same ascent of a celestial habitation."

EASTER, a festival observed in the Christian church from early times in memory of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. It corresponds to the PASSOVER (which see) of the Jews, which is called only once by the name of Easter in our authorized version, namely in Acts xii. 4, "And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered him to four quarternions of soldiers to keep him; intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people." The term Easter is said by the Venerable Bede to have been first used when Christianity was introduced among the Saxons in Britain, and this old historian traces it to Eostre, a Saxon goddess, whose festival was celebrated annually at the season in which Easter is now held; and when the worship of the heathen deity was abolished, the name was still retained in connection with the Christian festival to which it gave place. According to other writers, however, it is derived from a Saxon word signifying rising, and thus Easter-day is the day of the rising or resurrection of Christ.

The precise time at which this festival ought to be celebrated was the subject of a keen and protracted controversy, which commenced at an early period in the history of the Christian church, arising out of the twofold elements of which that church was composed—Jewish and Gentile converts. The former class of Christians brought over with them to their new profession strong prepossessions in favour of the whole Jewish ceremonial law, including of course all the Jewish festivals; while the latter class of Christians, encumbered by no such prejudices, cordially assented from the first to Christianity, apart altogether from the ceremonies and the festivals of Judaism. The marked difference which thus existed among the Christian churches, according as they were composed of members drawn from Judaism or from heathenism, was in no respect more manifest than in their views as to the time when the festival of Easter was to be held. The churches of Asia Minor, or Proconsular Asia and its neighbourhood, kept their Easter on the same day on which the Jews observed their passover, that is, upon the fourteenth day of the first month—which always began with the appearance of the moon—mostly corresponding to our March. Hence those who followed the Jewish chronology in this matter were Quarto-decimans, because they kept Easter on the fourteenth day after the appearance of the moon. At the close of the second century a controversy arose between Victor, bishop of Rome, and Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, concerning the proper time for celebrating the Easter festival, or rather for terminating the ante-paschal fast. The whole of Christendom at that time, with the exception of the churches of Asia Minor, continued the fast onwards to the Sabbath after the Jewish passover, which they kept as the festival, so as to make the weekly and yearly commemorations of the resurrection to coincide. Victor was anxious to persuade the Asiatic Quarto-decimans to conform in this matter to the general practice, but Polycrates, who was primate of the Quartodeciman churches, defended their peculiar custom on the ground that they had received it from the apostles John and Philip, Polycarp of Smyrna, Melito of Sardis, and others; and that they felt it to be their duty to hand down to others the custom which they had themselves received. But from the letter of Polycrates, which has been preserved by Eusebius, it would appear that the churches of Asia Minor, in adhering to their time of keeping Easter, went on the supposition that the fourteenth day of the month Nisan ought to be regarded as the day of our Lord's passion. In this view of the matter, it must often have happened, that the memorial of Christ's passion would fall to be celebrated on another day of the week than Friday, and the memorial of Christ's resurrection on another day than Sabbath. When, however, in the course of the second century annual festivals came to be introduced also in the Western churches, they held it necessary that a Friday should always be consecrated to the memory of Christ's passion, and a Sabbath to the memory of Christ's resurrection.

The bishop of Rome, unconvinced by the letter of Polycrates, published sentence of excommunication against the churches of Asia Minor for refusing to conform to the general practice, but this anathema of Victor was met by a decided spirit of opposition. Irenæus, in the name of the churches at Lyons and Vienna, addressed a letter of strong remonstrance and sharp reproof to the Roman bishop, which had the effect of putting an end to the controversy in the meantime. The Quarto-decimans of the proconsulate of Asia came to an end about A. D. 276, and up to that date the Antiochian provinces kept their Easter feast in conformity with the Catholic custom. The council of Arles, in A. D. 314, decreed that the paschal feast should be celebrated on the same day throughout the world; but the Asiatic practice still continued to be maintained by various churches, particularly in Syria. The emperor Constantine the Great, as he is usually called, endeavoured to bring about uniformity in the church as to the time of keeping Easter. He first tried to accomplish this object by the negotiations of Hosius, bishop of Cordova. In this, however, he was unsuccessful, and, therefore, he summoned the general council of Nice, in A. D. 325, partly for this object. The point was discussed in the council, and it was resolved that the old Jewish custom should be abandoned, and that the remembrance of Christ's passion should be celebrated always on Friday, and the remembrance of his resurrection on Sabbath. Notwithstanding this decree, a number of churches, as well as individuals, still adhered to the ancient usage, and being in consequence excluded from the church, they took the position of a separate sect under the name of Quarto-decimans, because they insisted on celebrating Easter on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan. They accused the Nicene council of being guided in their decision by the will of the emperor, and although exposed to much persecution, they tenaciously maintained the ancient usage.

The council of Nice had given a decision that Easter should be held by all the Christian churches on one and the same day, but they had failed to lay down any rule for securing uniformity in the reckoning of time, and thus to a great extent the purpose of the council was defeated. The Eastern churches found little difficulty in coming to an agreement as to the time, astronomical and mathematical knowledge being much diffused among the churches of Alexandria, by which the most accurate calculations were instituted, and the result made known throughout the whole of the East. The bishop of Alexandria, indeed, made known every year, at the feast of Epiphany, throughout his whole diocese, the day on which the next Easter festival would fall. But as the Roman church was not so exact, differences arose in the time of keeping Easter between the Eastern and Western churches, amounting sometimes to a week, and occasionally even to a month, until at length, particularly by the exertions of Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot, in the sixth century, the Alexandrian mode of reckoning was introduced also into the Roman church.

In the end of the sixth century, a controversy broke out in Britain concerning the time of keeping Easter, which lasted for two hundred years, the opposing parties being the old Christians of Britain and Ireland, and the new Christians who were converted by Augustin and the other emissaries of the Romish church. The difference consisted in two particulars: (1.) While the Romanists, according to the rule of Dionysius Exiguus, fixed the time of Easter by the nineteen years' cycle of the moon, and the twenty-eight years' cycle of the sun, the British and Irish Christians adhered to the old cycle of eighty-four years. (2.) While the Romanists observed the beginning of the festival from the 15th day of the first vernal moon to the 21st inclusive, the British and the Irish Christians observed it from the 14th to the 20th. After a long protracted controversy on the subject, the old mode of reckoning by eighty-four years was abandoned, and both the Britons and the Irish consented to adopt the Roman mode of computation which had been originally proposed by the Alexandrian church.

The festival of Easter was uniformly preceded, even from early times, by a season of fasting, which lasted for forty hours, corresponding to the time during which our Saviour lay in the grave. At first the fast was strictly voluntary in its character, but at length it became a prescribed and necessary duty, not only for penitents and catechumens, but for all believers, to observe this fast for their own spiritual improvement. In the fifth and sixth centuries, the fast was extended to thirty-six days. The four additional days which complete the season of Lent, were added either in the sixth century by Gregory the Great, or in the eighth century by Gregory II. This fast began with Ash Wednesday, and ended with the Saturday before Easter, which was observed with great solemnity, and was denominated the Great Sabbath. The whole week before Easter beginning with Palm Sunday, was kept as holy time, but the fifth, sixth, and seventh were regarded as peculiarly sacred above the other days of this week. The week was called the Great Week and Passion Week. The fifth day was Maunday Thursday, the sixth, Good Friday, and the seventh was the Great Sabbath, which was observed as a day of rigorous fasting. Religious worship was celebrated by night, and protracted until cock-crowing, the time when our Lord is supposed to have risen from the grave. No sooner did the moment arrive than suddenly the joyful acclamation burst forth amid the stillness of the midnight vigils, "The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen indeed!"

The ceremonies of the Easter festival are observed in the Romish church with great strictness. As conducted at Rome, the Pope takes part in them. Early in the morning the officiating cardinal performs in the sacristy the ceremony of blessing the fire and five grains of incense. Thrice he censures, and thrice he sprinkles with holy water both the fire and the incense. The fire is kindled, according to the rubric of the missal, by sparks struck from a stone in remembrance of Christ as the great corner stone. After this ceremony, which takes place in the Sistine chapel, they proceed to the Pauline chapel, where they find a rod with three wax candles on the top of it, with which they return to the Sistine. The rest of the ceremony we shall leave an intelligent eye-witness to describe: "On approaching the railing which divides the chapel, the cardinal deacon who carries the rod, bends it down, and an assistant lights one of the three candles, by means of a taper kindled at the new sacred fire; all kneel, a sub-deacon exclaims, 'Lumen Christi,' 'the light of Christ,' all rise, and the choir sing, 'Deo Gratias,' 'Thanks be to God.' When they enter the inclosure of the chapel, the second candle is lighted with the same ceremonies, and the third in like manner on arriving at the Pope's throne. All the lights on the altar and in the chapel are previously extinguished, that at the proper time they may be rekindled with the new fire. They now chant the hymn, 'Now let the angelic host of heaven rejoice.' The hymn is long, and towards the middle of it, a pause is made, when the officiating deacon takes five grains of incense, and fixes them, in the form of a cross, into a very large ornamental wax candle. The chanting proceeds, and soon the same deacon lights this candle at one of the three candles mentioned above. This is the ceremony—the following is the explanation of it. 'The grains are of incense, which is the proper odour of the altar and of the sacrifice, and signify the perfumes wherewith was embalmed the sacred body of Jesus, of which this wax candle is a symbol. This wax light, after having, when extinguished, represented the death of Jesus Christ, when kindled, represents his resurrection; or, after having represented, in a mystic sense, before being lighted, the pillar of cloud, when lighted, represents the pillar of fire, which guides the catechumens in their passage through the Red sea of baptism, to the land of promise, that is, the state of grace.

"After this are read twelve long passages from the Scriptures, during which, the various lights on the altar and in the chapel are lighted from the three first mentioned, and the purple, or mourning, with which the altar and papal throne were covered, is removed, and the servants of the cardinals enter, take off their purple and put on their scarlet robes, all in token that the mourning of their church is at an end, and its rejoicing for the resurrection of our Saviour about to begin.

"The Pope is sometimes present at the preliminary ceremonies, but if not, he now comes in and takes his place on his throne, to be present at the celebration of mass. During the mass, the Pope censes the altar once, and is himself censed thrice. At the conclusion of the hymn 'Gloria in excelsis Deo,'—'Glory be to God on high,' the veil which covered the altar-piece is drawn aside, and the picture, which is a representation of the resurrection in tapestry, is displayed to view in honour of that event, the trumpeters of the papal cavalry blow their trumpets, the guns of St. Angelo are fired, and all the church bells in Rome are set a ringing.

"An ecclesiastic, kneeling before the Pope's throne, says with a loud voice in Latin:—

"Holy father, I announce to you a great joy, which is hallelujah, and the service is concluded by the chanting of vespers."

Easter is accounted by the Greek church as the most solemn festival in all the year. Mr. Neale, in his 'History of the Holy Eastern Church,' gives the following description of the midnight scene at Easter eve as witnessed at Athens: "There was not a light—not a sound; each individual of that immense multitude, filling even all the adjoining streets, remained still and motionless, so that even the most distant might catch the murmuring voices of the priests who were reciting the service within the church; troops lined the streets to see that perfect quiet was maintained, but assuredly it was a needless precaution, for there was not one present who did not seem to share in a general feeling of gloom and depression, as though a heavy cloud were hanging over all things; and so complete was the realization of all that these ceremonies are intended to convey, that I am certain the power of death, so awfully manifest in these last tedious hours, was present with each one of them. As midnight approached, the archbishop with his priests, accompanied by the king and queen, left the church, and stationed themselves on the platform which was raised considerably from the ground, so that they were distinctly seen by the people. Every one now remained in breathless expectation, holding their unlighted tapers in readiness when the glad moment should arrive, while the priests still continued murmuring their melancholy chant in a low half whisper. Suddenly a single report of a cannon announced that twelve o'clock had struck, and that Easter-day had begun; then the old archbishop, elevating the cross, exclaimed in a loud exulting tone, 'Christos anesti!' 'Christ is risen!' and instantly every single individual of all that host took up the cry, and the vast multitude broke through and dispelled for ever the intense and mournful silence which they had maintained so long, with one spontaneous shout of indescribable joy and triumph, 'Christ is risen!' 'Christ is risen!' At the same moment the oppressive darkness was succeeded by a blaze of light from thousands of tapers, which, communicating one from another, seemed to send streams of fire in all directions, rendering the minutest objects distinctly visible, and casting the most vivid glow on the expressive faces, full of exultation, of the rejoicing crowd; bands of music struck up their gayest strains; the roll of the drums through the town, and further on the pealing of the cannon, announced far and near these 'glad tidings of great joy;' while from hill and plain, from the sea-shore and the far olive-grove, rocket after rocket ascending to the clear sky, answered back with mute eloquence that Christ is risen indeed, and told of other tongues that were repeating those words, and other hearts that leaped for joy; everywhere men clasped each other's hands, and congratulated one another, and embraced with countenances beaming with delight, as though to each one separately some wonderful happiness had been proclaimed; and all the while, rising above the mingling of many sounds, each one of which was a sound of gladness, the aged priests were distinctly heard chanting forth a glorious old hymn of victory, in tones so loud and clear, that they seemed to have regained their youth and strength to tell the world how 'Christ hath risen from the dead, having trampled down death by death, and having bestowed on them that are in the tombs eternal life.' It is impossible to give any adequate idea of the effect of this scene. The sudden change from silent sorrow and darkness to an almost delirious joy, and a startling blaze of light spreading its unwonted brilliance through the night, was really like magic." These Easter ceremonies are not confined to midnight; on the following day the people congratulate one another with the words, "Jesus Christ is risen from the dead," to which the reply is given, "The Lord is risen indeed," and festivities and rejoicings of different kinds take place.

The Moravians have a peculiar mode of celebrating this sacred festival. On Easter Sunday a liturgy is read specially suited to the occasion, and the names of all their members who died in the course of the preceding year are called over. Every morning also in Easter week they meet at seven o'clock to read the harmonies of the Gospel on the crucifixion, and other kindred topics.

The Easter festival has from early times been held in high honour in the Christian church. Gregory Nazianzen calls it the Queen of Festivals, and declares it to excel all the others, as far as the sun excels the rest of the heavenly bodies. Some ancient writers term Easter Sunday Dominica (sc. dies) Gaudii, the Lord's day of joy, and in token of gladness, the Christian Emperors of Rome were accustomed to release prisoners on that day, with the exception of those who had committed great crimes. Private persons also frequently gave expression to their joyful feelings at this festive season by manumitting their slaves. But the festival was not limited to Easter Sunday alone; Christians were wont to keep the whole week as part of the festival; holding religious assemblies every day for prayer, preaching, and partaking of the Lord's Supper. Nay, the ancient Christian Pasch included the week before Easter Sunday, as well as the week following it, the one being called the Pasch of the cross, and the other the Pasch of the resurrection. The author of the Apostolic Constitutions requires servants to rest from their work during the whole week. Christians also signalized the season by special liberality to the poor. Baptisms were usually celebrated at the time of Easter, as well as at the other annual festivals. Easter Eve was celebrated in the ancient Christian church with solemn watchings, and the carrying of lighted torches both in the churches and in private houses, by which they meant to represent the ushering in of the light of the Sun of Righteousness. The Sunday after Easter also, which was the conclusion of the Paschal feast, was usually observed with great solemnity. For on this day the neophytes or newly baptized were wont to lay aside their white garments, and to commit them to the repository of the church. Hence it was usually known by the name of the Dominica (sc. dies) in Albis (sc. vestibus), the Lord's day in white garments. The Greek writers give it the name of the New Lord's day, under which name it is mentioned in a decree of the council of Trullo thus: "From the day of the Lord's resurrection to the New Lord's Day, men shall attend at church to singing, reading the Scriptures, and participating of the holy mysteries."

The law which regulates Easter in Great Britain, declares that whenever the full moon on or next after March 21st falls on a Sunday, that Sunday is not Easter Sunday, but the next; it also prescribes rules for determining Easter. Thus, there is a fixed rule which prevails throughout the Roman, English, and Scottish Episcopal churches, and from which the remaining Protestant churches who are in the habit of observing Easter vary but little. Presbyterian and Congregationalist churches reject the festival of Easter altogether, as being an institution of merely human appointment.

EASTERN CHURCH. This name is usually given to one great division of Christendom, in contradistinction from the Western or Latin Church. The term Eastern Church includes various communions, in particular the Orthodox Greek church, as it is termed, the Russian-Greek church, the Monophysite churches, which are subdivided into the Jacobite church, the Coptic church, the Abyssinian church, the Nestorian church, the Christians of St. Thomas, and the Armenian church. Besides these, the term Eastern church is sometimes considered as embracing also those of the Greek and other Oriental Christians who acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope of Rome, and are in communion with the Latin church, thus being properly Papal Eastern churches. These last include the Maronite church, the Eastern Latin church, the Greek Catholic or Melchite church, the Armenian Catholic church, the Syrian Catholic church, the Chaldean Catholic church, and the Coptic Catholic church.

From very early times there was a marked distinction between the Eastern and the Western church, which manifested itself on various points both of doctrine and worship. The first great dispute which arose between them, commenced towards the end of the second century, in regard to the precise time at which EASTER (which see) should be observed. In this controversy the Eastern church, or that of Asia Minor, seems to have been regulated by a regard to the Jewish chronology, while the Western church, or that of Rome, was under no such influence. The point, however, which in this case formed the subject of contention, had reference to a festival of mere human institution. Another source of difference arose out of a spirit of jealousy between the bishop of Rome and the bishop of Constantinople. In the second general council, the latter dignitary was permitted to sit next to the occupant of the See of Rome, and by the council of Chalcedon, the two rival bishops were declared to be of equal rank. This decision, however, did not succeed in crushing the ambitious spirit of either party. On the contrary, a spirit of mutual antipathy reigned between the two competing bishops, which broke forth on every fitting occasion. In the sixth century, as we learn from Mosheim, "The bishop of Constantinople not only claimed an unrivalled sovereignty over the Eastern churches, but also maintained that his church was in point of dignity no way inferior to that of Rome." At length in A. D. 588, the bishop of Constantinople assumed to himself the lordly title of oecumenical or universal bishop; whereupon Gregory the Great, who at that time occupied the See of Rome, indignant at the presumption of his rival, declared that whoever should take upon himself the title of Universal Bishop, was entitled to be considered as the Antichrist of Scripture. And yet only two years after the death of Gregory, his successor Boniface III. sought, and obtained the title of Universal Bishop in A. D. 606 from the Greek Emperor Phocas.

The use of images in Christian churches formed another topic of keen contention between the Eastern and Western churches, the former being iconoclastic in their views, that is, opposed to image-worship, while the latter were as keen in defending it. The contention which began in the eighth century continued to rage for years with ever-increasing fury, and the distinction between the two churches now became settled and confirmed. The last occasion on which they met in united session was at the second council of Nice in A. D. 787, called by the empress Irene in favour of image-worship. From that time the bitterest mutual hostility existed be tween the Eastern and the Western churches, and although a fruitless attempt was made in the thirteenth century to promote the re-union of the two churches, and the council of Florence in 1442 endeavoured to heal the breach, they continue divided down to the present day.

The churches of the East and the West are at variance on various points, the most important of which may be briefly noticed. The first great point of distinction refers to the constitution of the Person of the Holy Ghost, in regard to which the Eastern Church adheres literally to the Scriptural expression, John xv. 26, "Which proceedeth from the Father;" while the Western or Latin church follows the addition made in the Nicene Creed, filioque, "and from the Son." On this point the Protestant churches agree with the latter view. Another ground of difference between the two churches is the authority of the later General Councils. In reference to the authority of the first seven General Councils they are both agreed, but the eighth, which is that of Constantinople held in A. D. 869, is the last council of the East that is recognized by the Western or Roman Church. This, however, and the subsequent Western Councils are rejected by the Greek Church. The two churches are divided also on the subject of the sacraments, at least nominally. Both hold that there are seven sacraments, but the Greek church hold a distinction between their four sacraments and the three lesser mysteries. The Eastern churches reject purgatory, though the Greeks pray for the dead. By the Eastern church both elements in the eucharist are administered, but by the Western or Roman church the cup is withheld from the laity. In the eucharist also the Greeks use leavened bread formed into a loaf. The Latins eat unleavened bread in the form of a wafer. The time of keeping Easter is still a cause of dispute between the two churches, the Eastern church always observing it on the day on which the Jews kept the passover, while the Western churches celebrate it on the eve of the anniversary of the resurrection. The subject of image-worship is still a subject of contention between the two churches. The Greek church allows only the use of paintings in churches, while the Roman church does not forbid statues. A difference also exists between the Eastern and the Western churches in the mode of writing the sign of the cross. In the former they move the hand from the right shoulder to the left while repeating the words, "And of the Holy Ghost;" in the latter, the hand is moved from the breast to the left shoulder, and then to the right. In the Western church celibacy is enjoined upon all persons in holy orders, but in the Eastern church the higher clergy are alone prohibited from entering into the married state. The reading of the Scriptures by the laity is permitted by the Eastern, but discountenanced by the Western church. The supremacy and infallibility of the Pope of Rome are firmly maintained by the Western, but wholly disclaimed by the Eastern church. In addition to these differences in doctrine and practice between the churches of the East and of the West, it may be mentioned that the Greeks regard the Septuagint as the authentic version of the Old Testament, and reverence it as highly as the Latin church does the Vulgate, while they receive as canonical all the apocryphal books comprised in the Greek canon. They also attach a high authority to the eighty-five Apostolical Constitutions. The Greeks commence their ecclesiastical year on the 1st of September, and they differ from the Western church in their sacred chronology, reckoning 5,500 years from the creation to the birth of Christ.

But while we thus rapidly sketch the points of distinction between the Eastern and the Western churches, we may also notice that there are several doctrines and practices in which they agree with one another, but differ from Protestant churches. The most prominent of these are the invocation and adoration of saints, the worship of the Virgin Mary the homage paid to relics, the sacrifice of the mass, prayers for the dead, absolution and indulgences.

EBIONITES, a name applied to those who, in the early ages of Christianity, while they professed the religion of Christ, agreed in observing also the Mosaic law. These Judaizing Christians are first mentioned under the name of Ebionites by Irenæus, but considerable doubt rests upon the origin of the appellation. Tertullian, whose opinion has been adopted by Epiphanius and many other writers, traces it to a person of the name of Ebion, who has been regarded as the founder of the sect. Neander thinks it very improbable that a party embracing so many different shades of opinion had its origin from any single individual, and the more especially as no well authenticated tradition exists respecting the founder of a sect called Ebion. "The more accurately informed authorities," says the historian, "such as Irenæus and Origen, nowhere mention such a person; and all that we find anywhere said respecting the pretended Ebion, is of that vague and indefinite character which sounds suspicious. Origen was the first to give the correct derivation of this name, from the Hebrew word denoting poor. These Jewish Christians, then, were called the poor; but the question now arises, in what sense was this appellation originally applied to them? And with this is connected another,—by whom first was this appellation given them? Upon the resolution of these questions it must depend, whether the appellation is to be understood as a term of reproach or of praise. Now it appears evident, from an explanation which Epiphanius cites from the mouths of the very people in question, that, in his time, the Ebionites regarded it as an epithet which they had bestowed on themselves. But although the Ebionites did actually appropriate and sanction the name, it might nevertheless be true and wholly consistent with this fact, that the epithet was originally bestowed on them by their adversaries:

while they might afterwards apply it to themselves, either in the same or a different sense; since what was considered by their opponents a term of reproach, might be regarded, from their own point of view, as an honourable title.

“Origen, who, as we have said, first presented the correct explanation of the word, applies the designation, ‘poor,’ to the meagre religious system, the poverty of faith that characterized this party. In this sense, the term may have been applied to them by pagan Christians; but it cannot be supposed that pagan Christians would have chosen a Hebrew word to express this character. It is far more natural to suppose that the inventors of this name were Jews; and at the particular position of these Jews, it might be used and understood to denote a poor, meagre way of thinking, especially if this notion be defined according to the acute and ingenious suggestion of a distinguished modern inquirer in this department of learning; namely, that in the mouth of those Jews who were expecting a Messiah in visible glory, it would designate such as could believe in a poor, abject, crucified Messiah, like Jesus. Yet even this explanation, taken by itself, seems not the most simple and natural; and, indeed, the author of it himself joins it with the other, about to be mentioned. What objection is there to understand this word in the literal and obvious sense, as a designation of the poorer class among the people of the nation? We know, in fact, what reproach was cast upon the Christian faith by the hierarchical party among the Jews, because none but those belonging to the ignorant and poorer class of the people would openly profess it, (John vii. 49;) and the like objection was made to Christianity by the pagans. Thus it may be explained, how the Christians among the Jews came to be designated as the poor; and this name, which was employed by them to designate the Christians generally, would afterwards naturally be employed by the pagan Christians, without any knowledge of the meaning of the name, to designate that portion of believers who were distinguished from the rest by their observance of their Mosaic law. When we observe that the same thing happened in the case of another name which was originally a common appellation for all Christians among the Jews, the name ‘Nazarenes,’ it may serve to confirm the above supposition.”

The Ebionite doctrine, it may be remarked generally, was simply the engrafting of the Jewish upon the Christian system. We find the Judaizing party beginning to develop itself in the days of the apostles, when some persons, who evidently maintained the perpetual obligation of the law of Moses, wished to compel Paul to yield to their views in circumcising Titus, a Gentile convert. The apostle successfully resisted their pretensions, but shortly after individuals belonging to the same party followed him to Antioch, where they stirred up a controversy that threatened to produce a schism in the church. An appeal was made to the apostles and elders in council assembled in Jerusalem, who decided in favour of the Gentiles. Notwithstanding the apostolic decree which was then issued, the Judaizers gradually increased in numbers, and at length formed a powerful party in the church, so as to disturb the peace, and even to endanger the safety of the apostle of the Gentiles. Such were the Ebionites of the first century, who, indignant at the unflinching support which Paul gave to the claims of the Gentiles, attempted to weaken the force of his advocacy by representing his abandonment of Judaism as originating in unworthy motives. It was in the second century, however, that this Judaizing party received the name of Ebionites. Their principles were now more fully developed and carried out to their legitimate conclusions. They looked upon Christianity solely from a Jewish point of view. Jesus they regarded as simply a man remarkable for his piety, and chosen on that account to be the Messiah, but altogether ignorant of any special Divine call to such an office until it was revealed to him by the reappearance of the prophet Elijah, and thereupon he received power from on high to exercise his Messiahship, and to attest his authority by the performance of miraculous deeds. It was at his baptism, they alleged, by Jehn the Baptist, who, in this case represented Elijah, that Jesus was first made aware of the high office with which he was invested. To support their views, the Ebionites set forth a revision of the Gospel history, under the name of the Gospel of the Hebrews, fragments of which have been preserved by Epiphanius and Justin. In this work they represented the baptism of Christ as simply the outward visible descent of the Holy Spirit, to impart to Jesus the consciousness of his Divine call to the Messiahship, and to make known the fact to John. That the event might be painted in the most impressive aspect, accordingly, light was represented as shining round about the place, and fire bursting forth from the Jordan. Irenæus says, that they revered Jerusalem as if it were the house of God. They lived in constant expectation of the second coming of Christ, believing that he would return to Jerusalem and re-establish the Theocracy there.

Origen speaks of two classes of Ebionites, those who denied the miraculous conception of our Lord, and those who admitted it, the former party believing that the operation of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus commenced at his baptism; the latter party believing that it commenced at his conception in the womb of the Virgin Mary. The CLEMENTINES (which see), an apocryphal production of the second century, contains the same Judaizing views which were professed by the Ebionites. Jerome describes a sect of the same kind as having been seen by him at Berœa in Syria, near the close of the fourth century, passing, however, not under the name of Ebionites, but under that of NAZARENES (which see).

EBLIS, the name by which the Mohammedans describe the Devil (see ANGELS, EVIL).

EBRBUHARITES, an order of monks among the Mohammedans, who derived their name from their founder, Ebrbuhar, the scholar of Nacshbendi, who came from Persia to Europe in the fourteenth century, to propagate their faith. The sect professed to surrender all care about worldly concerns, and to give themselves wholly up to the contemplation of eternal objects. They were wont to tell foolish stories of their founder, such as that he was nourished with barley bread, oil of olives, honey and grapes, yet that he took food only three times a-year. The Ebrbuharites fasted on Mondays and Thursdays, but notwithstanding their profession of superior sanctity, they were esteemed heretics by the Mohammedans generally, because they refused to go on pilgrimage to Mecca, alleging that the journey was unnecessary, as they were permitted in secret vision, while sitting in their cells, to behold the holy city.

ECALESIA, a festival held by the ancient Romans in honour of Jupiter.

ECATESIA, a festival celebrated among the ancient Greeks in honour of Hecate.

ECCLESIA. See CHURCH.

ECCLESIA APOSTOLICA (Lat. the Apostolic church), a name applied by Irenæus, in the second century, to the Church of Rome, the great capital of the world. The name probably originated from the universally diffused belief that both Paul and Peter had taught in the Roman church, and honoured it by their martyrdom. To this church, from its position in the metropolis of the Roman Empire, the greater portion of the Western churches could appeal as to their common mother. Thus it came gradually to assume an authority over the other churches, which, combining with other circumstances, led at length to the primacy of the Roman bishop. See POPE.

ECCLESIA MATRIX (Lat. the Mother church), a term applied in ancient times to the cathedral church, to which all the clergy of a city or diocese belonged.

ECCLESIE CAUSIDICI (Lat. church-lawyers), the name applied in ancient times to ecclesiastical CHANCELLORS (which see).

ECCLESIASTERION, a term sometimes used in early times to denote the church-building as distinguished from the ecclesia, or members of the Christian church.

ECCLESIASTICS, a term applied to Christians by Eusebius, Origen, Epiphanius, and Cyril of Jerusalem, who sought thus to distinguish them from Jews, Gentiles, and heretics. The name, however, was even in the most remote antiquity used more frequently to denote the clergy as distinguished from the laity or ordinary members of the churches. In the middle ages it was customary to give the name of ecclesiastics to the subordinate officers of the church.

ECCLESIASTICAL CENSURES. See CENSURES (ECCLESIASTICAL).

ECCLESIECDICI (Gr. church lawyers), the CHANCELLORS (which see) of bishops.

ECDICES, officers who, as lateral judges, attend a Greek patriarch in the exercise of his official functions.

ECHETLÆUS, (Gr. echelle, a ploughshare), a hero whom the Athenians were commanded by the oracle to worship, because he had mysteriously appeared during the battle of Marathon, and slain many of the barbarians with his plough; yet after the battle, when sought for, he could nowhere be found.

ECLECTIC PHILOSOPHY. See ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL.

ECLIPSE. This striking natural phenomenon has in all ages given rise, among those who are unacquainted with its true nature and cause, to feelings of anxiety, and even awe. There appears to be a conflict between the sun and the moon, and the world on which we live and move seems to be threatened with immediate and final destruction. The consequence has been, that, in almost all heathen nations, an eclipse has been viewed with the utmost anxiety and alarm. Livy tells us that among the ancient Romans, when an eclipse of the moon occurred, the people rent the air with shouts mingled with the beating of iron pots and vessels. The Egyptians struck their musical instruments with unusual force, imagining thereby to frighten away Typhon, the genius of evil, who, they thought, was engaged in mortal conflict with the sun. The same practice is said to be followed in several parts of Western and Central Africa under the impression that the sun is dragging the moon across the heavens, and that the world is approaching its end. Among the Peruvians, it was firmly believed that the world would be destroyed by the fall of one of the heavenly bodies, and that the moon, if totally eclipsed, would perish and fall from the sky to the earth. Accordingly, they set their dogs a-howling under an impression that these animals were the special favourites of the moon. Among several tribes of the South American Indians, there is an impression that when the moon is eclipsed, she is in the agonies of death, and, therefore, they utter loud cries and lamentations, and the women, drowned in tears, run to hide each a burning brand in the earth from the fear that should the moon die every fire will expire also, except what is hidden from view. Some of the tribes scourge the young people during the eclipse, as if by their follies they had brought about this calamity. Many nations have, like the Egyptians, believed that the phenomenon was caused by a malevolent being who was wishing to swallow up the moon. According to the Scandinavian Edda there are two wolves; the one called Sköll, pursues the sun, and shall one day overtake and devour her—the other called Hati, runs before her, and as eagerly pursues the moon, which will on the last day be caught by him. Among the Creek Indians of Alabama, it is a large dog which is threatening to devour the sun. Some of the South American Indians shoot arrows in the air during an eclipse, with the view of killing the dogs or boars which they suppose are gnawing at the moon, and causing it to bleed. In China and the Philippine islands, it is a dragon which they believe causes an eclipse, whether of the sun or moon. The Hindus ascribe it to a demon called Rahores. Both the Chinese and Hindus, when an eclipse occurs, raise loud cries, and beat on all manner of musical instruments as long as the frightful phenomenon lasts.

ECRAR (Arab. confession of sins). The duty of confession of sins is reckoned by Mohammedans to be the fifth capital and fundamental article of the Christian religion. It is the doctrine of the Koran that God will pardon those who confess their sins.

ECSTATICI, a kind of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who were wont to fall into a trance, in which they continued a considerable time deprived of all sense and motion, and on their recovery they gave marvellous accounts of what they had seen and heard. In Roman Catholic countries, also, in modern times, stories have frequently been told of individuals who have been in a state of ecstasis or trance, in the course of which they saw and conversed with the Virgin Mary and other saints.

ECTHESIS (Gr. exposition), a formulary drawn up A. D. 639, by order of the Greek emperor Heraclius, with the view of accomplishing the re-union of the MONOPHYSITES (which see) with the dominant church. The document was prepared after consultation on the subject with the patriarch Sergius of Constantinople, and was so artfully composed, that, while it professed to be an exposition of faith, it concealed the difference which existed between the Eutychians and the orthodox in regard to their views of the constitution of the Person of Christ. The heresy of Eutychius had been condemned by the council of Chalcedon, and the Emperor hoped, by issuing the Ecthesis, to induce the bishops to submit to the decrees of the council. Heraclius seems to have had no wish to make this formulary universal in the church, but simply to introduce it into those provinces where the Monophysite party chiefly prevailed, and where he hoped it might lead to their union with the Catholic church. It was remarkably successful among the Monophysites in Egypt and the surrounding provinces, thousands of whom joined the dominant church. The patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch embraced the Monothelite doctrine which was taught in the Ecthesis. Others, however, opposed both the doctrine and the document. The controversy, instead of being assuaged by the conciliatory formula, became more violent than ever. Paul of Constantinople warmly espoused the Monothelite doctrine, and favoured the Ecthesis, while many of the Eastern and the whole of the Western bishops were violently opposed to the opinions of Paul, and actually made an application to the Pope to excommunicate him along with all who held Monothelite opinions. The Catholic doctrine, which was Dyothelite, was strongly maintained by a monk named Maximus, who conducted a public discussion on the controverted point, and with such success, that Pyrrhus, his opponent in the debate, declared himself a convert to the Dyothelite views, and in company with Maximus set out for Rome, where he publicly abjured the Monothelite heresy, joined the Roman church, and was appointed patriarch of Constantinople. On leaving Rome after this public display, Pyrrhus proceeded to Ravenna, and there so lennly withdrew his recent recantation, and placed himself at the head of the Monothelite party in that city. On hearing intelligence of the strange conduct of Pyrrhus, Pope Theodore was almost frantic with indignation. He immediately convened an assembly of the clergy, excommunicated Pyrrhus with the most fearful anathemas, and calling for the consecrated wine of the sacrament, mingled a portion of it with the ink, and with the mixture signed the sentence of excommunication, which was to consign the treacherous apostate to the regions of despair.

Meanwhile, to appease the wrath of the Pope, and conciliate if possible the Western bishops, the patriarch Paul caused the Ecthesis to be removed from the gates of the church of Constantinople, and another document, called the Type or formulary, to be substituted in its place, the object of the Type being to forbid, under severe penalties, all disputes whatever, on the subject of the will or wills of Christ, and the mode of its or their operation. Before the suppression of the Ecthesis, however, had become known at Rome, the Pope, by the advice of the African bishops, had excommunicated Paul with great solemnity, and declared him divested of all ecclesiastical power and dignity. This rash act, on the part of the Pope, was wholly disregarded by the emperor and the great mass of the Eastern clergy, while the patriarch himself was so enraged that he imprisoned the apocrisarii, or Pope's ambassadors, who brought him the sentence, and even whipped some of their retinue. On the death of Pope Theodore, A. D. 649, his successor Martin, as soon as he ascended the papal chair, summoned a council at Rome, and condemned not only the Monothelite doctrine, and "the impious Ecthesis," as he termed it, but also "the most wicked Type lately published against the Catholic church, by the most serene Emperor Constantine, at the instigation of Paul, the pretended bishop of Constantinople." The insult conveyed in this decree was instantly resented by the emperor. The Pope was taken prisoner, and conveyed to Naxos, a small island in the Grecian Archipelago; thence he was carried to the imperial court, and after a mock form of trial, accompanied with cruel insult and abuse, he was stripped of his sacerdotal garments, condemned, degraded, and sent into exile, on the inhospitable shores of the Taurica Chersonesus, where he died A. D. 656. See EUTYCHIANS, MONOTHELITES.

ECTYPOMATA (Gr. effigies or figures), gifts of a peculiar kind, which began to be made to churches probably about the middle of the fifth century. They are first mentioned by Theodoret, who tells us that when any one obtained the benefit of a signal cure from God in any member of his body, such as his eyes, hands, or feet, he then brought his ectypoma, the image or figure of the part cured, in silver or gold, to be hung up in the church to God, as a memorial of his favour. Such a practice prevailed among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and also among the Egyptians. To this custom there is an evident allusion in 1 Sam. vi. 4, where we find the Philistines sending their golden emerods and mice, figures of the objects by which they had suffered, as an offering to the God of Israel. In Roman Catholic countries, figures of parts of the body healed are often seen suspended upon the walls of the churches. See ANATHEMATA.

EDDA, a celebrated production of northern antiquity, to which we are principally indebted for our knowledge of the Scandinavian mythology. The learned have been much divided in opinion as to the original derivation of the term Edda, but the most probable explanation of the word is that which is given by Olafsen, who derives it from the obsolete verb æda, to teach. There are two works which are known by the name of Edda, the one in verse, the other in prose. The Poetic or Elder Edda, as it is often called, consists of thirty-nine poems, which were collected by Sæmund Sigfusson, surnamed the Learned, towards the latter end of the eleventh or beginning of the twelfth century. The oldest and the most interesting of the whole of this collection of poems is the Völuspá, or Song of the Prophetess, which is supposed to have been publicly recited at the religious festival of the summer solstice. It contains the whole system of Scandinavian mythology. The only one of these poems which is of a practical character, is the Hávamál, the discourse of the sublime, which contains a tolerably complete code of morality.

The Prosaic or Younger Edda is generally ascribed to Snorri Sturlason, who was born of a distinguished Icelandic family in A. D. 1178, and was killed A. D. 1241. This production, which in its present form dates from the thirteenth century, forms, irrespective of the Prologue and Epilogue, which were probably written by Snorri himself, a complete synopsis of Scandinavian mythology derived principally from the Poetical Edda. Dr. Henderson, in the Appendix to his 'Iceland,' gives the following sketch of the different parts of the Prose Edda: "The prosaic Edda is a collection of various treatises, which are designed to elucidate the mythology of the ancient Scandinavians, and render more intelligible to younger poets the number of obscure and difficult passages in the works of their predecessors, and more especially in the odes of the Edda we have just described. It begins with a most absurd and ridiculous preface, which has evidently been prefixed to the work by some transcriber, tracing the connection of the northern nations with those of antiquity, and carrying back their genealogical relations to the original families enumerated in the book of Genesis. Then follow what are called the Dæmisögur, or 'Dialogues,' explanatory of the origin of the gods, the creation of the world, the principal events which are to fill up the period of the duration of the world, the final conflagration, the destruction of the gods, &c. The second division of the work comprehends the Kenningar, or 'Instructions;' a digest of poetical phraseology, founded on, and illustrated by, quotations from the principal Skalds. We here find not fewer than one hundred and thirty-seven synonyms of Odin; twenty-four of a bear; sixty-four of fire; sixty-five of gold, &c. The third treatise is called Skálda, or 'The Poetics;' and consists of a dissertation on the Icelandic alphabet, and a number of rules respecting the use of rhetorical and poetical figures. To this is appended Snorri's Háttalykil, or 'The Key of Versification;' giving a view of the structure and measure of the different sorts of verse in use among the northern poets."

It seems quite plain that the Edda, instead of being the production of any single individual, is the result of the separate labours of different individuals at different periods of time. The persons most probably concerned in reducing the Edda to its present form were Sæmund Sigfusson, Snorri Sturlason, and Olaf Thordarsen, the nephew of Snorri. The Edda of Sæmund was first sent from Iceland by the learned Bishop Svenson, about the middle of the seventeenth century. It is beautifully written on parchment, and is still preserved in the Royal Library of Copenhagen. There exists also a number of paper codices containing various readings, many of which greatly elucidate the original text. Of Snorri's Edda, there exist two principal codices written on parchment viz., the Wormian MS. in the University Library of Copenhagen, and the Upsala MS. preserved in the Library of that University, besides a number of manuscripts on paper to be met with in different libraries on the Continent. There is a copy of the Upsala Codex preserved among the Marshall MSS. in Oxford. The first edition of the Edda was published by Resenius, along with a Latin and Danish version, at Copenhagen in 1665, but it contains only the part composed by Snorri, with the addition of the Völuspá and Hávamál. The latest and most correct edition is that which was published by the learned Professor Rask in 1818. See SCANDINAVIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

EDHEMI, a monastic order among the Moham-medans. It was founded by Ibrahim ebn-Edhem, who died at Damascus A. D. 777. His disciples say that he was a slave, an Abyssinian by birth, that he always desired to please God, regularly read the Koran in the mosques, prayed day and night with his face to the ground, and often repeated these words, "O Lord, thou hast given me so much wisdom as that I clearly know I am under thy direction, and therefore scorning all power and dominion, I resign myself to the speculation of philosophy and a holy life." Edhem established a strictly ascetic order, who gave themselves much to prayer and fasting; their food being of barley bread, and their clothing of a thick coarse cloth, with a woollen cap upon their heads, surrounded by a turban, and a white linen cloth striped with red, round their necks. They professed to discourse with Enoch in the wilderness.

EDOMITES (RELIGION OF THE). Little is known concerning the religion of this ancient people. Though in the first stage of their history they appear, from the message which Moses sent them, Num. xx. 14—17, to have been worshippers of the true God, they lapsed in course of time into gross idolatry. On this account a perpetual enmity existed between them and the Israelites. That they were idolaters is plain from Josephus, who mentions one of their idols named Koze, which they worshipped before Hyrcanus compelled them to conform to the rites and observances of the Jewish law. In consequence of their submission to circumcision, Josephus thinks that they became proselytes of the gate, or wholly Jews. Yet when Herod was raised to the throne of Judea, Antigonus upbraided him with being an Idumean or a half-Jew, whereas the kingdom ought to have been given to one of the royal family according to ancient custom. Josephus always speaks of Herod the Great as an Edomite, though he admits Herod's father, Antipater, to have been of the same people with the Jews. In the first century after Christ, the name of Idumean was lost and quite disused.

EDRIS (Arab. the student), one of the appellations of the prophet Enoch among the Mohammedans. He was the third of the prophets, and the greatest, according to the Arabians, that flourished in the antediluvian world. They represent him as having been commissioned to preach to the Cainites, but they rejected his doctrine, and in consequence he waged war upon them, and made them servants and slaves of the true believers. He is also said to have ordered the faithful to treat all future infidels in a similar manner, being thus the originator of religious wars, and the first who inculcated the duty of persecuting infidels. To Edris is attributed the invention of the pen, the needle, the sciences of astronomy and arithmetic, and the arts of magic and divination. He is alleged to have written thirty treatises, of which, however, only one has escaped the ravages of time, and is called by his name, being styled the Book of Enoch, an apocryphal work, which is held in great estimation by the Orientals.

EDULICA, or EDUSA, a goddess among the ancient Romans, who was believed to watch over children and to bless their food.

EED-EL-KORBAN (Pers., festival of the sacrifice), a festival celebrated among the Persian Mohammedans, in honour of the patriarch Abraham. The day before the feast about four hundred camels are collected from the neighbouring country, and the first that rises after resting is chosen as the victim, shot and speared. This feast is distinct from the Behul Bairam, which is also kept in memory of Abraham. See ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE (FEAST OF).

EFFRONTES (Lat. ex, from, frons, the forehead), a heretical sect which arose in Transylvania in the sixteenth century. They derived their name from a strange custom which they are said to have had, of shaving their foreheads till they bled, and then anointing them with oil. This was their mode of baptism and initiation into the sect. They denied the existence of the Holy Ghost, believing the expression to denote nothing more than the operation of God upon the mind.

EGBO YOUNG, an idol worshipped by the natives of Old Calabar in Western Africa. It is a human skull stuck upon the top of a stick with a few feathers tied to it. One of these idols is found in almost every house where the inmates still adhere to their former idolatry. Mr. Waddell, a missionary in that district, gives the following account of an Egbo procession and dance. "Ere long two Egbo runners, in their usual harlequin costume, entered the town to clear the streets. The bells at their waists gave notice of their approach, and their long whips made common folk keep at a distance. They cleared only the middle of the street—the main street is wide—while the sides were thronged with unmolested spectators. Another person, also curiously dressed and painted, but of a different character, advanced with slow and solemn pace into the area before the palaver-house, holding a long staff, and with bowed head, and muttering to himself, marched pensively round and round unobservant of all about him, like some hermit from the wilds in a fit of abstraction. Soon two others, enveloped in gay cloths and crowned with flowers, appeared, and paraded the town as proud as peacocks. These characters served to entertain the crowd, and keep alive expectation of what more novel and imposing was coming. They were greeted with shouts by the populace.

"At length the procession came into view, the king at its head in robes of office, and carrying the mace or grand baton, silvered all over and ornamented with ribbons. These things make a show, and, when the heads of a country can get up shows, the lower members are expected to be in ecstasies. Wiser men, in wiser countries, can get up shows for public admiration; and this here was something like a Lord Mayor's show in little. The procession arranged before the palaver-house. In the midst of the space stood an immense flag-staff recently erected, a single mangrove tree not less than seventy to eighty feet high; and fast to that above hung a magnificent British ensign of yellow and red. There was not wind enough to spread it, and it hung in vast folds on the ground many fathoms down. I should like to have seen it flying in the wind from such a mast-head.

"The king made proclamation, which at short intervals was responded to by the deep tones of the Egbo drum. This done, six men dressed in the highest style of Egbo fashion, began to dance before the king—and such a dance! hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys, and reels were nothing. They ran and leaped, pranced and capered up and down, round and round, now fast, now slow, stopping suddenly to bow and scrape, then flinging away in surpassing style. It was inimitable. I wish the advocates and practitioners of that ball-room exercise had witnessed it. It would put them out of countenance. That done, the procession advanced towards the palaver-house, and enclosed the entrance to it in a small circle. Young Eyo came to me where I stood, and smiling, said, 'This be very fine.' 'Well tell me what Egbo be?' 'When you buy Egbo you saby,' was his reply. 'I buy Egbo!' 'Yes,' he responded, 'you be Calabar gentleman now. Next year I think my father make you buy Egbo.' 'Well, suppose I buy it, tell me what good it will do me?' 'O, plenty good,' he answered; 'any thing you like to do, you can do it.' 'But I do not want to be able to do every thing I like; lest by and by I might do something bad. I want to do only what God likes.' He ejaculated, 'Oh!' significantly, and perhaps would have expressed his ideas of my objections more fully, had not his name been called by his father, and repeated by a number of other voices, and answered by himself with an alacrity that soon carried him through the crowd to his father's side. Soon after the sound of Egbo was heard inside the palaver-house, when all the privileged instantly rushed in, and I returned to my domicile.

"The noises were continued all Saturday evening; and as Sabbath was grandbrass Egbo day, when neither man, woman, nor child, with the exception of a few great gentlemen, is allowed to walk about, the usual religious services could not be held. The town was perfectly still, but soon after the darkening, the horrid bawling and drumming was resumed, and continued all night, to be relieved in the morning only by numerous volleys of musketry. The crying is performed by a band of women, who follow it professionally, accompanied usually by many others, who chime in from time to time as feeling or fashion dictates. They vary their cries, and some ingenuity is required in devising the different systems of cries. But no taste or music is discoverable in them, no pathos is expressed; they do not approach within any calculable distance of a tuneful dirge, or sad and wild koinah, the old Irish funeral cry which in my boyhood I so often heard."

EGG (MUNDANE). In the cosmogonies of many heathen nations, both of ancient and of modern times, the egg occupies a very prominent place, as representing the world in its transition from its primitive chaotic state to its fully organized and orderly condition. In the Rig-Véda of ancient Hinduism, the Supreme Spirit is represented as producing an egg, and from the egg is evolved a world. At a later period Brahma is set forth as depositing in the primordial waters an egg shining like gold. In ancient Egypt we find CNEPH (which see), the Creator or Demiurgus, producing an egg, the symbol of the world. In the Sandwich Islands, an eagle is represented as depositing an egg in the primordial waters; and among the Finns it is an aquatic bird. In the old Celtic legends, the mundane egg was produced by a serpent, which had no sooner brought it forth than it hastened to devour it. The ancient Lacedæmonians spoke of Jupiter as having visited Leda in the disguise of a swan, in consequence of which she produced two eggs, from the one of which issued Helena, and from the other the twin Dioscuri. Elis also had its two heroes sprung from a silver egg, called the Molionides, Molione their mother being the goddess of labour. A legend of the Peruvians speaks of a virgin seduced by a god, and giving birth to two eggs, the one containing Apo-catéquil, the prince of evil, an idol reverently worshipped in the country; the other containing Piguérao-catéquil, who raised up his mother from the dead. The one being in this case represented evil, and the other good; the one death, and the other life. The Tonquinese have a legend, as we learn from Marini, that the princess Au-leo produced a hundred eggs, from which came forth as many male children. To prevent quarrels among this numerous progeny, the father and mother agreed to separate, and to retire each with the half of their offspring, the one to the sea-coast, and the other to the mountains. According to Father Martini, the Chinese acknowledge the creation of a first man, whom they call Ponceu. This man derived his being from an egg, the shell of which was snatched up to heaven, the white expanded through the air, and the yolk remained upon the earth.

But while the mundane egg represents the world in its first creation, it is often found also as emblematic of its renovation, after having been purified by fire. Herodotus relates, accordingly, that the Phoenix buried the body of its father in a mass of myrrh of the form of an egg. The modern Jews in several places make use of eggs in funeral feasts, probably in token of the resurrection. In Russia also the eggs used at the Paschal season are understood to have the same emblematic signification.

The following system of Japanese cosmogony, which includes the mundane egg, is given by Klaproth, as contained in an imperfect volume of Chinese and Japanese chronology, printed in Japan, in Chinese characters, without date, but which for more than a hundred years past has been in the Royal Library of Paris: "At first the heaven and the earth were not separated, the perfect principle and the imperfect principle were not disjoined; chaos, under the form of an egg, contained the breath [of life], self-produced, including the germs of all things. Then what was pure and perfect ascended upwards, and formed the heavens (or sky), while what was dense and impure coagulated, was precipitated and produced the earth. The pure and excellent principles formed whatever was light, whilst whatever was dense and impure descended by its own gravity; consequently the sky was formed prior to the earth. After their completion, a divine being (Kami) was born in the midst of them. Hence, it has been said, that at the reduction of chaos, an island of soft earth emerged, as a fish swims upon the water. At this period a thing resembling a shoot of the plant [assi Eryanthus Japonicus] was produced between the heavens and the earth. This shoot was metamorphosed and became the god [first of the seven superior gods] who bears the honorific title of Kami toko kontsi-no mikoto, that is to say, the venerable one who constantly supports the empire."

There is a pagoda at Miaco in Japan, consecrated to a hieroglyphic bull, on a large square altar, and composed of solid gold. His neck is adorned with a very costly collar, but what particularly attracts attention is an egg, which he pushes with his horns, while he seizes it between his fore-feet. This bull is placed on the summit of a rock, and the egg floats in water, which is enclosed within a hollow space. The egg represents the chaos. The whole world, say the Japanese, was enclosed at the time of chaos within this egg, which swam upon the surface of the waters. The bull observing this egg, broke the shell of it by goring it with his horns, and so created the world, and by his breath formed the human species. Among the ancient Persians, AHRIMAN (which see), the evil principle, created twenty-four genii, which he enclosed in an egg, while Ormuzd, the good principle, created the same number of genii, which he also enclosed in an egg. By the breaking of these eggs, the Persians accounted for the mixture of good and evil in the present state of things. Thus in some systems of cosmogony the egg is used as an emblem of the world emerging from the chaotic mass, and in others it denotes chaos itself. The Phœnicians are said indeed to have worshipped an egg.

EGOTHEISTS. See MYSTICS, PANTHEISTS.

EGYPTIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT). It is surprising how early Egypt, which was the cradle of the arts and sciences, must have fallen into the grossest idolatry. Nay, mythologists are generally agreed that this was the first country in which originated the worship of false gods. By what gradual steps the Egyptians came to adore the creature in preference to the Creator it is difficult to trace. At a very remote period, they seem to have used hiero-glyphical signs and emblems to denote abstract conceptions and the attributes of the Deity; and, as is believed by Le Pluche and other writers, these figurative representations were afterwards made instruments of superstition and idolatry. Thus they looked upon the sun as an emblem of the Almighty, as being the grandest object in creation, and therefore best fitted to denote the Creator; and besides, they employed the figure of a circle at once as an image of the sun and an emblem of eternity; at length calling both the sun and its symbol, the Eternal, and directing their devotions through these outward visible emblems, in process of time they lost sight of the great and glorious Being who is alone entitled to the homage and adoration of the whole intellectual creation. Religion, instead of being a series of all-important abstract principles addressed to the mind and the heart of man, passed into the attractive form, attractive at least to the outward eye, of a series of pictorial representations, which were only revealed to the initiated in their true nature and signification. Thus, according to the secret teaching of the Egyptian priesthood, Osiris is the Supreme Being, the God of gods; but being possessed of a variety of attributes, each of which is Divine, these are individually represented under different names, and by different emblems, as themselves gods. Thus Osiris, as evolving the material universe, is Ammon or Jupiter-Ammon, and aptly symbolized by the sun, who evolves by his light and heat the flowers and fruits of the earth. Osiris, as wisdom, exercising the perfection of his creative energy, and realizing in outward creation the inward ideas of the Divine mind, is another deity called Ptha. As goodness, and the beneficent author of all good, life, and happiness, Osiris is still another deity, though bearing the same name of Osiris. On the Supreme Being of the Egyptian mythology, Sir John G. Wilkinson observes: "Osiris, in his mysterious character, was the greatest of the Egyptian deities; but little is known of those undivulged secrets, which the ancients took so much care in concealing; so cautious indeed were the initiated, that they made a scruple even of mentioning his name. His principal office, as an Egyptian deity, was to judge the dead, and rule over that kingdom where the souls of good men were admitted to eternal felicity. Seated on his throne, accompanied by Isis and Nephtys, with the four genii of Amenti, who stand on a lotus growing from the waters, in the centre of the divine abode, he receives the account of the actions of the deceased recorded by Thoth. Horus, his son, introduces the deceased into his presence, bringing with him the tablet of Thoth, after his actions have been weighed by Anubis and Horus; (though Anubis had the office and title of director of the weights, Horus frequently assisted him in this duty;) in the balance are placed, on one side the feather or the figure of Truth or Justice, on the other a vase, supposed to contain, or represent, the just actions of the deceased the deficiency or the approximation of which is noted down by Thoth. A cynocephalus, the emblem of the ibis-headed god, sits on the upper part of the balance; and Cerberus, the guardian of the palace of Osiris, is present; sometimes also Harpocrates, the symbol of silence, is seated on a couch of Osiris, before the god of letters. Some of the figures of the dead are represented wearing round their necks the same emblem, a vase, which appears in the scale, after they have passed their ordeal, and are deemed worthy of admittance into the presence of Osiris. This vase will therefore signify judged or justified, and the person wearing it has perhaps been mistaken for a judge."

Osiris and Isis were the two principal deities or deified personifications among the ancient Egyptians. Osiris symbolized the sun and the Nile, the latter being as essential to the fertilizing of Egypt as the sun is to the fertilizing of the earth. Isis represented the moon and Egypt. Both are considered as denoting the solar year. Osiris was worshipped under the form of an ox called Apis, and Isis under the form of a cow. In speaking of the origin of Egyptian idolatry, Diodorus Siculus says, "Contemplating the arch of heaven raised above their heads, and admiring the marvellous order which reigned in the universe, they regarded the sun and moon as eternal gods, and worshipped them with a particular worship." The whole mythological system of this ancient people has been considered by those who have most carefully investigated it as an astro-theology, using animals as symbols of the heavenly bodies, and if this view be correct, it affords a not altogether unsatisfactory explanation of the origin of animal worship. If the signs of the zodiac and the constellations were worshipped, so also were the animals which represented them. The vulgar adored the symbol, while they were totally ignorant of that which it symbolized.

A most ingenious view of the intricate mythology of Egypt, in so far as it bears on their cosmogony, is thus given by Mr. Gross in his 'Heathen Religion': "According to Proclus, the Egyptians postulated three orders or emanations of gods: a fact which the beginning of the present century still attested in the extant zodiacs in the small town of Tentyra on the Nile. Directing our vision towards the upper part of the cupola, in which this ancient specimen of the astronomical theology of the Egyptians is perpetuated, we discover quite at the top the twelve great or calendarian gods, symbolized in the twelve signs of the zodiac. Each of these twelve gods has his three satellites called Decani, and also known as the demons or ethereal gods of Hermes, the personification of the soul or intelligent principle of the universe. Each of the Decani, likewise, has two adjuncts, and thus divinity is divided and subdivided until the circumference of the pneumatological zodiac, comprising three hundred and sixty degrees, extends in twelve homo-centric pyramids to the centre of the earth. Every one of these zodiacal pyramids has its presiding demon, just as the twelve great mundane gods are governed by the supreme divinity, recognized as Ammon or Kneph. These deities regulate the seasons and the cycles of time of our planetary system; and hence the ancient division of annual time into hebdomads, or weeks of seven days, and years of twelve months. We here perceive a vast, theocosmic system, whose apex terminates in unity, and which proclaims the interesting and important truth, that all the gods are essentially but one god, as all the suns and planets are but one world.

"The entire heaven, or the world considered as supernal, is marked out into numerous compartments and distributed among the celestial rulers, while the uppermost regions, extending downwards from the pyramidal zenith of the universe to the moon, appertain pre-eminently to the gods, according to their several ranks and orders. The first and highest among them are the twelve supercelestial gods, with their subordinate demons. After these follow the intercosmic gods, of whom each also presides over a number of demons, to whom he imparts his power, and who rejoice to bear his name. Within the ample limits of these demons, gravitates the centre of all things. The demons, receiving their power and influence from the gods, whose subalterns they are, produce the plants and animals, infusing into them their own energies, thus replenishing the world, and uniting into one stupendous whole the four spheres of the universe: the supercelestial, the celestial, and the super and sublunar spheres.

"There are six orders of demons. The first is sui generis, and has a truly divine nature. These highest demons link the souls to the bodies: the effluxes of the Father, to the gods. The second order, still remarkable for high intellectual attributes, has the supervision of the souls as they enter or leave the bodies: they make creation manifest. The third imparts to the divine souls who enter into bodies for the benefit of common souls, the second degree of creative power, while it sheds upon them the higher influences. The fourth bestows upon the individualized natures, or distinct forms of being, the active powers, or principles of synthetic or concrete existence; as life, order, ideas, and the means of perfectibility which are at the disposal of the gods. The fifth order of demons, possessing bodily similitude—hold together, sustain, and preserve all the elements of the terrestrial body, after the sample of the eternal body: the ideal body and type and source of all bodies. As to the demons of the sixth and last order, they are charged with the care of matter, and it is their business to superintend the powers which descend from the heavenly hylé into the terrestrial hylé, and to preserve the outlines—of the ideas in matter.

"As the upper celestial sphere has its subdivisions of beings, so has the lower; and according to a fixed law of pneumatology, the inferior beings always act in subserviency to the superior. The sphere of the moon, the air, the fire, and the water, etc., are all filled with demons, who are of an elastic, ethereal nature, and who officiate as intermediate agents between the gods and mankind. They preside over the elements and organic life. Upon them depend the growth, the inflorescence, the virtue, and the perfection of plants; and hence all plants which bloom in any given month or under a particular zodiacal sign, are decidedly influenced by the god to whom such sign or month is sacred! Behold the origin of sacred plants."

In no part of the world has ANIMAL-WORSHIP (which see) been carried to such an extent as in ancient Egypt. Every small town or district had its sacred animal, and a temple consecrated to its worship, with a whole retinue of priests or priestesses to conduct the service. At Thebes, the sun-city of Ammon, the ram was worshipped; at Mendes, the goat; at Cynopolis, the dog; at Lycopolis, the wolf; at Bubastis, the cat; and at Tachompso, the crocodile. A few of the sacred animals were worshipped with far more reverence than all the others. This was more especially the case with the three sacred bulls, Mnevis, Onuphis, and Apis. Herodotus gives animal-worship a colouring, which could only apply to it as practised by the more intelligent and thoughtful of the Egyptian people. "In the presence of these animals," says he, "the inhabitants of the cities perform their vows. They address themselves as supplicants to the divinity who is supposed to be represented by the animal in whose presence they are." The great mass of the community were not likely to entertain any other idea than that the animals themselves were divinities, and, therefore, to be worshipped as such. These sacred animals, accordingly, were feasted in the most sumptuous manner, had gorgeous couches prepared for them, and when they happened to die, their votaries went into mourning, buried them with great pomp, and erected magnificent tombs over their place of interment. So far did the Egyptians carry this species of idolatry, that, as Pomponius Mela informs us, they worshipped the images of many beasts, as well as the beasts themselves. And Strabo says, that the Egyptians had no images of men in their temples, but only of beasts. It is quite possible that the extraordinary veneration in which they held certain animals may have been connected with their belief in transmigration. Herodotus says, "The ancient Egyptians believed that when the body is dissolved, the soul enters into some other animal which is born at the same time, and that after going the round of all the animals that inhabit the land, the waters, and the air, it again enters the body of a man which is then born. This circuit, they say, is performed by the soul in three thousand years." While the Egyptians believed in the continued existence of the soul after death, they considered it of the utmost importance that the body should be carefully preserved.

Hence the practice of embalming the bodies of the dead, and the attention bestowed upon the preparation of mummies.

Among the offerings presented to the Egyptian deities, libations and incense held the first place, accompanied with fruit, flowers, and other productions of the soil; but animals of different kinds, particularly oxen and birds of various descriptions, were also set before them. Herodotus gives an account of a sacrifice to Isis, the greatest of the Egyptian goddesses. "After the previous ceremony of prayers," says he, "they sacrifice an ox: they then strip off the skin, and take out the intestines, leaving the fat and the paunch; they afterwards cut off the legs, the shoulders, the neck, and the extremities of the loin; the rest of the body is stuffed with fine bread, honey, raisins, figs, frankincense, myrrh, and various aromatics; after this process they burn it, pouring on the flame a large quantity of oil: while the victim is burning, the spectators flagellate themselves, having fasted before the ceremony; the whole is completed by their feasting on the residue of the sacrifice." The same author tells us that in Egypt it was accounted a capital offence to sacrifice a beast that had not been stamped with the seal of the superintending priest, and thus legally attested as being fit for sacrifice.

The priesthood, including both the chief priests or pontiffs, and the minor priests, held the first rank in Egypt next to the king. They were divided into different colleges according to the deity in whose service they were employed. And besides the priests there were also priestesses of the gods, or of the kings and queens, each of whom bore a title indicating her peculiar office. Herodotus asserts that women were not eligible to the priesthood, but the historian probably refers to the office of pontiff or the higher sacerdotal orders, as in another place he himself speaks of women devoted to the service of Ammon. The office of the priesthood usually descended from father to son, and all who held the office enjoyed important privileges, which extended also to the whole family. They were exempt from public taxes, and were provided for from the public stores. When Pharaoh, by the advice of Joseph, bought up all the land of the Egyptians, the land of the priests was excepted, nor was the tax of the fifth part of the produce entailed upon it as on that of the other part of the people. We learn from Diodorus Siculus, that the land was divided into three portions, one of which belonged to the king, a second to the priests, and a third to the soldiers.

The priesthood in Egypt was of various orders. The chief or high priest occupied the most honourable station. He superintended the immolating of the victims, the processions of the sacred boats or arks, the presentation of the offerings at the altar or at funerals, and the anointing of the king. On these occasions he was covered with a sort of mantle made of an entire leopard skin. "Various in signia," says Sir John G. Wilkinson, "were worn by them, according to their rank or the ceremony in which they were engaged; and necklaces, bracelets, garlands, and other ornaments were put on during the religious ceremonies in the temples. Their dresses were made of linen, which, as Plutarch observes, is perfectly consistent with the customs of men anxious to rid themselves of all natural impurities; for certainly, he adds, it would be absurd for those who take so much pains to remove hair and all other superfluities from the body, to wear clothes made of the wool or hair of animals. Their prejudice, however, against woollen garments was confined to the under robes, it being lawful for them to put on a woollen upper garment for the purpose of a cloak; and cotton dresses were sometimes worn by the priests, to whom, if we may believe Pliny, they were particularly agreeable. But no one was allowed to be buried in a woollen robe, from its engendering worms, which would injure the body; nor could any priest enter a temple without previously taking off this part of his dress. Their sandals were made of the papyrus and palm leaves, and the simplicity of their habits extended even to the bed on which they slept. It was sometimes a simple skin extended upon the bare ground; sometimes it consisted of a sort of wicker work made of palm branches, on which they spread a mat or skin; and their head, says Porphyry, was supported by a half cylinder of wood, in lieu of a pillow."

Of the ordinary priests, those who served the great gods were looked upon as of higher rank than those who belonged to the minor deities. In many provinces and towns, those who were connected with particular temples were in greater repute than others. Thus the priests of Ammon held the first rank at Thebes, those of Pthah at Memphis, those of Re at Heliopolis. The dresses of the priests were similar to those of the nobility, and consisted of an under garment like an apron, and a loose upper robe with full sleeves, secured by a girdle round the loins, or of the apron and a shirt with short tight sleeves, over which was thrown a loose robe, leaving the right arm exposed. Sometimes when engaged in sacred duty the priest threw aside the upper garment, and wore only an ample robe bound round the waist, which descended over the apron to his ankles; and on some occasions he was dressed in a long full garment, reaching from below the arms to the feet, and supported over the neck with straps.

Distinct from the priesthood the ancient Egyptians had also a class of prophets or sacred scribes. Accordingly, the sixth line of the Rosetta stone thus enumerates the members of the Egyptian hierarchy: "The chief priests and prophets, and those who have access to the shrines to clothe the gods, and the wing-bearers, and the sacred scribes, and all the other sacred persons." The wing-bearers appear to have been a higher order of the sacred scribes; for Diodorus Siculus expressly mentions the wearing of wings on the head as a peculiarity of the sacred scribes, while Clemens Alexandrinus uses the expression, "having wings upon the head" as synonymous with the expression, "sacred scribe." This order was particularly skilled in divination, and we find Moses making a distinction between the prophets and the diviners in Deut. xiii. 3, "Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul." The costume of the sacred scribe consisted of a large apron, either tied in front, or wound round the lower part of the body; and the loose upper robe, with full sleeves, which in all cases was of the finest linen; he is also described as occasionally wearing feathers on his head.

The whole order of the priesthood was treated in Egypt with the utmost respect, and they were thus enabled to exercise great influence over the people. The chief cause of the ascendancy which they possessed is to be attributed to the mysteries of their religion, which were carefully concealed from the great mass of the community, and revealed only to the favoured few. These mysteries of the Egyptians, like the Eleusinian mysteries among the Greeks, consisted of two degrees, usually termed the greater and the less. The privilege of initiation into the greater mysteries was reserved for the priesthood alone, and, accordingly, even the heir apparent to the throne was not instructed in these mysteries until he came into full possession of the kingdom, when, in virtue of his kingly office, he became a member of the priesthood, and the head of the religion of the country.

The fundamental principle which lay at the foundation of the ancient religion of Egypt, in its esoteric or hidden form, was the existence of one Supreme Being, the Self-Existent, Independent God. So vast and varied was the Egyptian Pantheon, that this great truth was completely concealed from public view. The first and highest manifestation of the Supreme God is in Cneph, the Creator, and the next Pthah, the organizer of the world; the one deity giving birth to matter, and the other shaping it into form. Osiris presents himself as the sun, the active principle in nature; Isis as the moon, the passive, dark, material principle. From the union of these two, the whole creation assumes fertility and life. Besides these great beings who give rise only to good, there is a dark principle of chaos, called Buto or Athyra, who gives birth to Typhon, the great originator and representative of evil, who, marrying Nephtys or perfection, originates that mixture of good and evil which both the physical and moral aspect of the world presents.

But besides the metaphysical view of the ancient Egyptian religion, it has also been considered by many writers, as conveying to the initiated a splendid chart of astronomical and chronological science;

while all the while to the uninstructed vulgar it was a system of the grossest and most debasing idolatry. The most ancient popular rites of the Egyptians were, according to Creuzer, of the nature of orgies, and the fundamental character of their religion was Bacchanalian. Sensual songs were sung accompanied with noisy instruments. The people bowed down with reverence before the very beasts of the field, and worshipped the creature, to the exclusion of "the Creator, who is God over all, blessed for evermore."

EICETÆ, an order of Syrian monks in the ninth century, who held dancing to be an essential part of Divine worship, and, accordingly, in their sacred assemblies they danced and sung praises to God. This practice they defended, by appealing to the example of Miriam, the sister of Moses, who led the dance of the Israelites after the passage over the Red sea; and also to the example of David, who danced before the ark. Though these Eicetæ met with few imitators, John Damascenus thought it necessary to expose their error.

EIKTHYRNIR, a stag in the ancient Scandinavian mythology, which stands over Valhalla, the final abode of the righteous, and feeds upon the leaves of the famous tree, called Lærath, and while he is feeding, so many drops fall from his antlers down into Hvergelmir, that they furnish sufficient water for the rivers that, issuing thence, flow through the celestial abodes.

EILEITHYIA, the goddess of birth among the ancient Greeks, who assisted women in labour, either hastening or protracting it at her pleasure. At an earlier period there were two goddesses bearing this name, the one favourable, the other unfavourable, both of them daughters of Hera, the goddess of marriage. The worship of Eileithyia was first practised among the Dorians in Crete, from whence it passed into Attica, where she was worshipped by the Athenians. In many different parts of Greece there were temples built in honour of this goddess.

EIRENE, the goddess of peace, worshipped by the ancient Greeks and Romans. At Athens altars were erected, where sacrifices were offered to propitiate her favour. There was also a splendid temple built to her at Rome by the Emperor Vespasian, under her Latin name Pax.

EISITERIA, sacrifices which the senate at Athens were accustomed to offer to Zeus and Athena before they commenced the public deliberations of each session. Libations were offered, and a festival was held on the occasion.

ELAPHEBOLIA, an ancient Grecian festival, celebrated in honour of ARTEMIS (which see) at Hyampolis in Phocis. It was instituted in commemoration of a victory gained over the Thessalians. The name of the festival is probably derived from a peculiar kind of cake, made in the form of a stag (Gr. elaphos), which was offered to the goddess on the occasion. This sacred festival was celebrated not only in Phocis, but in other parts of Greece.

ELATIO, the name given among the ancient Romans to the ceremony of carrying out the dead body on the day of burial, with the feet towards the gate, to intimate that the deceased was taking his final departure from his former home. The ancient Greeks also adopted the same custom.

ELCESAITES, a Christian sect which appeared in the second century. It derived its name from Elcesai or Elxai, a Jew by whom it was founded. Epiphanius, who gives an account of this sect, expresses his doubts whether it ought to be ranked among Christian or Jewish sects. The Elcesaites rejected both the eating of flesh and the offering of animals, explaining the entire sacrificial worship as not a part of Judaism, but a corruption of it. They held in great veneration an apocryphal book called 'Steps of Jacob,' in which the patriarch is introduced discoursing against the sacrificial and temple worship. They reckoned the renunciation of all worldly goods as an essential part of religious perfection. The members of this sect were willing to take the name of Ebionites, as the poor in spirit, glorying in the name as inherited by them from the first founders of the church at Jerusalem, who renounced all temporal possessions, and enjoyed an unconditional community of goods. This sect were decidedly opposed to the feeling which was arising at that early period in favour of celibacy; and in opposition to such a notion, they expressed their partiality for early marriages, which, according to the custom of the Jews, they urged upon all their followers.

ELDERS (JEWISH). The Hebrew word in the Old Testament, which is translated elders, literally signifies seniors, or persons advanced in life; and such alone were selected to occupy stations of dignity and authority. Hence elder became an established title of office. Even while the Israelites were in Egypt, they seem to have had elders. Hence the command of God to Moses, Exod. iii. 16, "Go, and gather the elders of Israel together, and say unto them, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, appeared unto me, saying, I have surely visited you, and seen that which is done to you in Egypt." During the journeyings of the Israelites in the wilderness, the elders of Israel are frequently referred to. The Jews gave this title of elder to most of their officers, civil as well as ecclesiastical, long before synagogues were established. From the time of Moses they had elders over the nation, as well as over every city and smaller community. In the wilderness Moses established a council of seventy to assist him in governing the people. These were appointed from the urgent necessity of the case, and accordingly, their office appears to have been only temporary, and not to have survived the days of Moses. Indeed, after that time, no mention is made of it by any one of the Old Testament historians, prophets, and poets. Elders do not occur until the introduction of the synagogue worship, when they are found as rulers of the synagogue.

On some occasions there was only one elder, when we find the expression, "the ruler of the synagogue." But most frequently there was more than one elder, as in Acts xiii. 15. And Jewish writers affirm that three was the proper number. In certain matters of judgment three appear to have been necessary. These sat in judgment on matters of discipline and worship, but they did so also on a variety of offences, both civil and criminal. They judged in pecuniary matters, in matters of theft, of losses, of restitution, of the admission of proselytes, and of the laying on of hands.

Great variety of opinion has existed among the learned on various points in reference to these elders of the synagogue, but all writers of weight, whether Jewish or Christian, unite in maintaining that there was in every synagogue such a bench of elders who conducted its discipline and managed its affairs. Vitringa, who has written a very elaborate work on the ancient synagogue, alleges that the greater number of the Jewish elders did not usually preach, but simply acted as rulers in ecclesiastical matters. When the congregation were met, the elders occupied a semicircular bench, in the middle of which sat the chief ruler, and his colleagues on each side of him.

ELDERS (CHRISTIAN), office-bearers in the Christian church frequently mentioned in the New Testament. The name of elders or seniors is probably given in this case, because of the knowledge, gifts, and experience which they ought to have. The elders mentioned in the New Testament were of different kinds, preaching elders or ministers, who labour in word and doctrine, teaching elders or DOCTORS (which see), and ruling or governing elders. The term "elders," however, is usually limited in Presbyterian churches, at least in ordinary parlance, to the last-mentioned class, those whose sole office it is to rule or govern in the church, individuals being chosen from the ordinary membership of the church expressly to join with the pastor in the exercise of government or rule in the congregation. Such lay elders, as they are often termed, are denied by Episcopalians to be of Divine institution, while the Congregationalists maintain that the Scriptures make mention of no other office-bearers in the Christian church besides pastors and deacons.

Presbyterians maintain that the office of ruling elder is not a human, but a Divine institution, and in proof of this assertion, they are wont to refer to various passages in the Word of God. The first which may be mentioned is Rom. xii. 6, 7, 8, "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness." In this passage it is argued the office of ruling is plainly distinguished from those of teaching, exhorting, and giving, or, in other words, from the peculiar work of the pastor, the doctor, and the deacon. A second passage, which is generally adduced in support of the Presbyterian opinion is, 1 Cor. xii. 28, "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." Here the apostle enumerates office-bearers both of an extraordinary and ordinary description. Among the latter occur what are called governments or governors, the abstract being used for the concrete. These governors are mentioned as a distinct class from apostles, prophets, and teachers, as well as from helps or helpers. Being governors they cannot be deacons, who, even by the admission of Congregationalists, have no rule over the church. There is then, Presbyterians allege, no other class of office-bearers to whom the name governors in this passage can be applied except to the ruling elders whose special duty is government or rule over the congregation. The only other passage which is commonly quoted in proof of the Divine authority of the office of ruling elders is 1 Tim. v. 17, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine." Various explanations have been given of this much-disputed passage. To quote from Dr. Dick, "Some say that the elders who rule well are diocesan bishops, and that those who labour in word and doctrine are preaching presbyters; but besides that, contrary to their own system, they thus assign greater honour to presbyters than to bishops, there were no such bishops in the apostolic church; and this hypothesis must be abandoned. Others tell us that the former are ordinary bishops and presbyters, and the latter evangelists; as if it had been the business of bishops and presbyters in the primitive church to rule, and of evangelists to preach, without having any concern in the government of the church. Again, it has been supposed that the rulers here mentioned are deacons; and the labourers in word and doctrine, the ministers of the word; but deacons have nothing to do with the government of the church. Some have fancied two kinds of elders, of whom some preached the word, and administered the sacraments; while others were employed in reading the Scriptures to the people, and performing other inferior offices." But the Presbyterian argument founded on this passage, as briefly but effectively stated by Dr. Dick, is, "There are elders, who, although they rule well, are not worthy of double honour, unless they labour in word and doctrine. But there are elders who are counted worthy of double honour, because they rule well, although they do not labour in the word and doctrine. Therefore, there are elders who are not teaching or preaching elders, that is, they are ruling elders only. The premises are clearly laid down in the passage, and the conclusion is therefore legitimate."

It is a fundamental principle of Episcopacy, as distinguished from Presbytery, that bishops are of a different order from presbyters or elders, while Presbyterians allege that they are of the same order, and on the same level as to rank or authority. This question, however, has been discussed under the article BISHOP, and will again fall to be noticed under EPISCOPACY. Meanwhile we limit our remarks in the present article to the ruling elder in the Presbyterian churches. Not only do these churches appeal to Scripture as sanctioning such an office in the church of God, but they are in the habit of adducing quotations both from the early and later Fathers, as a subsidiary argument in its favour. Clemens Romanus, who lived towards the close of the first century, addresses the Corinthian Christians thus, "It is a shame, my beloved, yea, a very great shame to hear, that the most firm and ancient church of the Corinthians should be led by one or two persons to rise up against their elders." Ignatius, who lived at the close of the first and the beginning of the second century, speaks often in his epistles, of elders as office-bearers in the church. Thus he says to the Ephesians, "I exhort you, that you study to do all things in a divine concord: your bishop presiding in the place of God, your elders in the place of the council of the apostles, and your deacons, most dear to me, being entrusted with the ministry of Jesus Christ." And again, to the Magnesians, "Do nothing without your bishop and elders." This Father calls the presbyters or elders of each church which he addresses, the sanhedrim or council of God. Hippolytus, also, often in his writings speaks of these elders as existing and exercising authority in his day. Thus, in his tract against the heresy of Noetus, he tells us, that "the elders cited Noetus to appear, and examined him in the presence of the church;" and again, "the elders summoned him a second time, condemned him, and cast him out of the church." Origen too, who flourished little more than two hundred years after Christ, says, "There are some rulers appointed, whose duty it is to inquire concerning the manners and conversation of those who are admitted, that they may debar from the congregation such as commit filthiness." This passage is believed by Presbyterians clearly to prove, that in the days of Origen the government and discipline were not conducted as Congregationalists would have it, by the entire body of communicants, but by a bench of separate rulers or governors. The description also which the Fathers give of the manner in which the bishop or pastor and his elders were seated during divine service, throws considerable light on this subject. Several of the early Fathers tell us, that when the church was assembled for public worship, the bishop or pastor was commonly seated on the middle of a raised bench or semi-circular seat at one end of the church; that his elders were seated on each side of him, on the same seat, or on seats immediately adjoining, and commonly a little lower; and that the deacons commonly stood in front of this bench. The whole of this arrangement was evidently drawn from that of the Jewish synagogue. It is remarkable that the Syrian Christians in Malabar, whom Dr. Claudius Buchanan visited, and whom he considers as having settled in the East within the first three centuries after Christ, had three ruling elders belonging to the church.

It has been often asserted by Episcopalians and Congregationalists, that lay-elders were unknown to the church before the days of Calvin in the sixteenth century, when that eminent reformer introduced Presbyterian order into the church of Geneva. But the most satisfactory evidence exists that the office of elder, as distinguished from that of pastor, was recognized among the Waldenses, a Christian sect which traces its origin almost to apostolic times. In the Confession of Faith of this very ancient body of Christians, it is explicitly declared, that "it is necessary for the church to have pastors to preach God's word, to administer the sacraments, and to watch over the sheep of Jesus Christ, and also elders and deacons, according to the rules of good and holy church discipline and the practice of the primitive church." The Bohemian Brethren also, who drew up a 'Plan of Government and Discipline' in 1616, mention elders as acknowledged office-bearers in their church, and at the close of the document they say, that "this is the ecclesiastical order which they and their forefathers had had established among them for two hundred years." The description which this church gives of the office of elders plainly identifies it with the same office which still exists in all Presbyterian churches. "Elders (Presbyteri, seu Censores morum) are honest, grave, pious men, chosen out of the whole congregation, that they may act as guardians of all the rest. To them authority is given (either alone or in connection with the pastor) to admonish and rebuke those who transgress the prescribed rules, also to reconcile those who are at variance, and to restore to order whatever irregularity they may have noticed. Likewise in secular matters, relating to domestic concerns, the younger men and youths are in the habit of asking their counsel, and of being faithfully advised by them. From the example and practice of the ancient church, we believe that this ought always to be done; see Exodus xviii. 21.—Deut. i. 13.—1 Cor. vi. 2, 4, 5.—1 Tim. v. 17." Comenius the historian says, in speaking of elders in the Bohemian church, "They are styled judges of the congregation, or censors of the people, and also ruling elders." It seems plain, therefore, that long before the period of the Reformation, office-bearers bearing the name, and discharging the duties of elders, were known in several sections of the Christian church. And nowhere more strongly than in the writings of the Reformers themselves do we find testimony borne to the apostolical warrant of the office of the eldership, and its actual existence in the early ages of the ancient church.

The great body of the Protestant churches, indeed, when they had separated from the Church of Rome, and proceeded to set up distinct organizations of their own, were almost unanimous in adopting and maintaining the office of ruling elder. At this day all the Protestant churches on the continent of Europe, both Lutheran and Calvinistic, agree with the Presbyterian churches, both in Britain and America, in this particular point of ecclesiastical government and administration, their consistories being universally composed of both ministers and laymen.

The office of the eldership is regarded by Presbyterians as not only useful, but absolutely essential, to the due discharge of discipline and rule in the Church of God. According to the canons by which the Church of England is regulated, the exercise of discipline rests with the minister, assisted by the churchwardens, although there is confessedly no warrant in Scripture for the existence of the latter class of officers. But instead of intrusting the responsibility, as such an arrangement virtually does, to the pastor alone, Presbyterians allege that there is no example in Scripture of a church being intrusted to the government of a single individual. Such a thing was unknown in the Jewish synagogue. It was unknown in the apostolic age. In all the primitive churches we find a plurality of elders, and while some were employed in preaching and exhorting, others were wholly restricted to the duty of ruling in the church.

The Congregationalists, however, while they admit that it is neither in accordance with Scripture nor reason that the pastor should stand alone in the inspection and government of the church, maintain that it is competent for the whole body of the church members to aid him in this important and arduous work. In reply to this, Presbyterians are wont to argue that the great majority of members of the church are altogether unqualified for rendering the aid contemplated, and even though qualified, could scarcely be expected regularly to give their services in this difficult and often delicate work. Accordingly, in Congregationalist churches it is not unusual for the pastors to have a committee of the most pious, intelligent, and prudent of the church-members, who consider each case of discipline in private, and prepare it for decision in the public assembly of the church; thus virtually admitting the necessity of a body of ruling elders.

Another class of objections to the office of ruling elders, as it exists in Presbyterian churches, is thus noticed by Dr. Miller of America: "There are some, however, who acknowledge that there ought to be, and must be, in every church, in order to the efficient maintenance of discipline, a plurality of elders. They confess that such a body or bench of elders was found in the Jewish synagogue; that a similar eldership existed in the primitive church; and that the scriptural government of a Christian congregation cannot be conducted to advantage without it.

But they contend that these presbyters or elders ought all to be of the teaching class; that there is no ground for the distinction between teaching and ruling elders; that every church ought to be furnished with three or more ministers, all equally authorized to preach, to administer the sacraments, and to bear rule. It requires little discernment to see that this plan is wholly impracticable; and that if attempted to be carried into execution, the effect must be, either to destroy the church, or to degrade, and ultimately to prostrate the ministry. It is with no small difficulty that most churches are enabled to procure and support one qualified and acceptable minister. Very few would be able to afford a suitable support to two; and none but those of extraordinary wealth could think seriously of undertaking to sustain three or more. If, therefore, the principle of a plurality of teaching elders in each church were deemed indispensable, and if a regular and adequate training for the sacred office were also, as now, insisted on; and if it were, at the same time, considered as necessary that every minister should receive a competent pecuniary support, the consequence, as is perfectly manifest, would be, that nineteen out of twenty of our churches would be utterly unable to maintain the requisite organization, and must of course become extinct. Nay, the regular establishment of gospel ordinances, in pastoral churches, would be physically possible only in a very few great cities or wealthy neighbourhoods." The allusion in this passage is evidently to the Sandemanians, and a few other sects, whose churches have a plurality of teaching elders, who, instead of giving themselves wholly to the work of the ministry, devote their chief time and attention to secular pursuits.

It is important to bear in mind that, although for the purpose of preserving the distinction between teaching and ruling elders, the term lay-elders is often used, the office of the eldership is, nevertheless, essentially spiritual. It is spiritual in its warrant, in its nature, and in its design. Hence the objection is altogether fallacious, which Dr. Davidson brings forward against the office of the eldership, in so far as it is argued from 1 Tim. v. 17, and other passages in the writings of the apostles, that it "implies that a distinction between the laity and clergy was made in the apostolic period." No such inference is legitimately deducible from the office, as it exists in Presbyterian churches, which Dr. Davidson well knows is strictly and exclusively spiritual. In reality it implies nothing more than that in apostolic times the ordinary unofficial membership of the church was distinguished from the spiritual office-bearers. The whole arguments, indeed, of this writer, who is well known to have abandoned Presbyterianism for Independency, are strangely irrelevant. He reasons, for example, thus, on 1 Tim. v. 17, which is decidedly the strongest passage in the New Testament in favour of the ruling elder: "Elder is the appropriate appellation of bishop in other places of the New Testament. It is, therefore, agreeable to usage to understand it of bishops alone in the present text." Unfortunately for this argument, it so happens that all bishops were elders, the word "elders" being the more comprehensive term, but it was not true that all elders were bishops, as it is admitted even by Dr. Davidson himself, that "some elders ruled while others preached." Another argument founded on the same passage of Scripture is thus expressed, "Stated and ordinary bishops are elsewhere said to rule." This is admitted on all hands, but in no respect does it affect the question whether there are not other office-bearers whose sole function it is to rule. Again, reasoning on the same passage, Dr. Davidson says, "Double honour, of which the elders who rule well are counted worthy, must mean double maintenance, as the succeeding context shows. But in no passage of Scripture do we find the least intimation or command towards contributing to the temporal support of an order of men who do not teach or preach in public. Such contributions are due to pastors and bishops—to speaking, not to silent elders." To which Dr. King well replies, "This is saying and unsaying to perfection. Of the elders for whom double honour or pay is claimed, Dr. Davidson admits that 'some ruled, while others preached;' and yet he declares now that double honour was demanded for speaking elders only. We have Dr. Davidson's admission, that some elders had not aptitude for teaching, and were wise enough not to attempt things too high for them. Were these elders, if they ruled faithfully, to be denied compensation? No, says Paul, as Dr. Davidson understands him, let those elders ruling well be amply recompensed." The fact is, that making the simple admission, that "some elders ruled, while others preached," Dr. Davidson concedes the whole point in dispute. Dr. Wardlaw, who reasons much more effectively than the author we have now referred to, endeavours to evade the force of the passage in Timothy, by alleging that the word "especially" is not meant to imply that two different classes of office-bearers were in the view of the apostle, but simply that there were some who were more laborious in word and doctrine than others, all, however, being of the same class—ruling elders. "On no other principle," says Dr. Wardlaw, "can that adverb 'especially' have its legitimate signification—the signification which the idiomatic use of it in the original language has fixed as its appropriate import, except on the principle that 'the elders who rule well,' in the beginning of the verse, are the same order of office-bearers of which those in the end of it, 'who labour in word and doctrine,' are a still more select description, adding to, the distinguishing excellence of the former, a farther distinguishing excellence of their own—those elders, namely, who to eminence in ruling joined laboriousness in teaching." It is interesting to observe, how completely Dr. Wardlaw, in his anxiety to avoid the inference being drawn from the verse, that it gives countenance to the notion of two distinct classes of office-bearers in the Christian church, preaching elders and ruling elders, has nevertheless, by the admission that while all are ruling elders, there is "a still more select description, who labour in word and doctrine," actually interpreted the passage precisely as the staunchest Presbyterian could have wished. All the eldership rule, but some are worthy of double honour, inasmuch as they add to the exercise of rule or government in the church, an excellence superadded to their ruling power, that, namely, of labouring in word and doctrine. Or to express the same idea somewhat more briefly; all elders rule, but some preach as well as rule, and therefore deserve double honour.

The chief duty of the office of the eldership is to rule, to exercise government and discipline in the church of God. See DISCIPLINE (ECCLESIASTICAL.) The elder, however, is not a civil but an ecclesiastical ruler, having no other than moral power, which he exercises only under the authority of Christ. This is the only claim which is put forth by the ruling elder of the Presbyterian church. The duties of this officer are of a twofold character, those which regard the personal qualifications which he is bound to cultivate, and those which concern the official duties which he is bound to discharge. His qualifications are clearly laid down in the Sacred Writings. Thus, Tit. i. 5—9, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee: if any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly. For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre; but a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers." On this plain and explicit statement it is unnecessary to enlarge. As selected to rule in the church of God, it becomes him to be an example to the brethren, "in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." His official duties are of a strictly spiritual character. It is his duty to assist the pastor in the inspection, guidance, and government of the special congregation to which they belong. In particular, an elder ought to strive in every way to promote the edification of all classes of the people, by aiding in the religious catechising of the young, aiding the pastor in preparing candidates for admission to the Lord's table, visiting as far as possible from house to house among the members of the congregation, warning the careless, instructing the ignorant, encouraging the timid, endeavouring to solve the doubts of the perplexed, to comfort the sick and the bereaved, and to strengthen and build up the believer in the faith and hope of the gospel. One very important class of official duties of the elders refers to the exercise of discipline and government, in which duties they are conjoined with the pastor in a recognized court of Presbyterian churches called the kirk-session, or as on the Continent, the consistory. The number of elders in any congregation is entirely regulated by the extent and other circumstances of the congregation; two elders at least being necessary to form along with the minister a quorum of the kirk-session. From the First Book of Discipline, it appears, that in Scotland at one period there was a change in the eldership every year. But the Second Book of Discipline declares, that "eldaris anis lawfully callit to the office, and having gifts of God, meit to exercise the same, may not leave it again." In the Acts of Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, an elder is required to have attained the age of twenty-one, to be a communicant, an inhabitant of the parish, residing therein at least six weeks annually, or an heritor in the parish, liable to pay stipend and other parochial burdens, or the apparent heir of an heritor of that description in the parish. By the act 1722, "the General Assembly appoints the judicatories of this church to take good heed that none be admitted to, or continued in, the office of an elder, but such as are tender and circumspect in their walk, and punctual in their attending upon ordinances, and strict in their observation of the Lord's day, and in regularly keeping up the worship of God in their families." This Act of Assembly has been repeatedly renewed and pressed upon presbyteries, but has been too often practically disregarded.

The duties of the elder in the Presbyterian church are by no means limited to the single congregation of which he has been appointed one of the rulers. It is his duty, as often as the laws and constitution of the church require, to take his seat in the higher judicatories, and there to take his share in the deliberations and decisions of the court, striving in all things to act for the glory of God, and the best interests of Christ's church and people. Every Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly of Presbyterian churches, is composed of both ministers and elders. Each congregation is represented by one ruling elder, in all meetings of the presbytery and synod. The General Assembly consists of ministers and elders representing the different presbyteries of the church, in such proportions as the church appoints. In these several judicatories the ruling elder is in all respects on an equal footing with the pastor.

Some difference of opinion has existed among Presbyterians as to the parties in whom the right of electing elders ought to be vested. In the infancy of the Reformed church in Scotland, the mode of electing elders was by no means uniform. In some churches the existing session nominated a certain number of eligible persons, out of whom the church members made their choice. In other churches the choice was made without the previous nomination of the session, by the communicants at large. In some churches the session appointed electors; and in others they acted as electors themselves. According to the laws of the Established Church of Scotland, new elders are chosen by the voice of the kirk-session. The mode of election is thus stated in Hill's Institutes: "After their election has been agreed upon, their names are read from the pulpit in a paper called an edict, appointing a day, at the distance of not less than ten days, for their ordination. If no member of the congregation offer any objection upon that day, or if the session find the objections that are offered frivolous, or unsupported by evidence, the minister proceeds, in the face of the congregation, to ordain the new elders." In the other Presbyterian churches in Scotland, England, and Ireland, the election of elders is vested in the whole communicants. In the Reformed Dutch Church in the United States, the elders and deacons remain only two years in office, and at the end of that time they retire, and others are chosen in their places. But such individuals as have once held the office are still considered as having a claim upon it, and hence the following article appears in the Constitution of that Church: "When matters of peculiar importance occur, particularly in calling a minister, building of churches, or whatever relates immediately to the peace and welfare of the whole congregation, it is usual (and it is strongly recommended upon such occasions, always) for the consistory to call together all those who have ever served as elders or deacons, that by their advice and counsel they may assist the members of the consistory. These when assembled constitute what is called the 'Great Consistory.' From the object or design of their assembling, the respective powers of each are easily ascertained. Those who are out of office, have only an advisory or counselling voice; and, as they are not actual members of the board or corporation, cannot have a decisive vote. After obtaining their advice, it rests with the members of the consistory to follow the counsel given them or not as they shall judge proper."

In almost all the Protestant churches on the Continent of Europe, both Lutheran and Reformed, the civil government either directly or indirectly exercises an influence in the election of elders. The consequence is, that the number of ruling elders in their church judicatories is frequently restricted, and the State, as in the Dutch Reformed Church, has a representative at every meeting of Synod to watch over their deliberations. The elders are chosen from the male communicants in all Protestant churches, with the exception of the Moravians and the Society of Friends, whose system of church order admits of female elders. The usual mode of ordination in the case of elders and deacons is simply by prayer, though no satisfactory reason can be given why they should not, like pastors, be ordained by the imposition of hands as well as prayer.

ELEATICS, a sect of ancient Greek philosophers, who derived their name from Elea in Magna Græcia, where Xenophanes, the founder of the school, first taught its peculiar doctrines, somewhere about the middle of the sixth century before Christ. The three principal representatives of the Eleatic sect were Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Zeno; and the result of their researches was the development of a system of absolute Pantheism. The infinite all-producing One of Pythagoras, became in the philosophy of the school of Elea the one sole Being, eternal, infinite, immutable. Xenophanes, the originator of the sect, believed in the existence of finite beings, who were simply modifications of the one infinite Being, but his disciple and successor Parmenides denied the reality even of these modifications, and taught that nothing existed but pure and absolute unity. Zeno, adopting this Pantheistic doctrine of Parmenides, attempted to defend it against all objections by showing that ideas derived from the general idea of the finite are contradictory, and that we are shut up therefore to the belief of one, sole infinite Being, who contains all within himself, or rather is all that exists. This was a decided step in the progress of error beyond the school of Pythagoras, which preceded the Eleatic school. The infinite Being had been believed to be a producer of all things by emanation from himself, but the existence of these emanations was now alleged to be impossible and contradictory. The world was demonstrated to be as complete an illusion as the Maya of the Hindus. The argument of Zeno against the existence of a multitude of things may be stated thus. There is but one being existing who is necessarily indivisible and infinite. To suppose that The One is divisible, is to suppose it finite. If divisible, it must be infinitely divisible. But suppose two things to exist, then there must necessarily be an interval between those two, something separating and limiting them. What is that something? It is some other thing. But then if not the same thing, it also must be separated and limited; and so on ad infinitum. Thus only One thing can exist as the substratum for all manifold appearances. By such a train of reasoning did this Pantheistic school reduce the whole universe to an unmeaning shadow, the One infinite Being alone possessing real existence. See PANTHEISTS.

ELENCHUS, an ancient Roman deity, who is supposed to have presided over liberty and truth. He is mentioned in Menander's Comedies.

ELEOS, the god of pity and compassion among the ancient Greeks. There was an altar reared to his worship in the market-place of Athens. Pausanias says, that the Athenians alone of all the Greeks worshipped this deity ELEPHANT-WORSHIP. This animal, remarkable for its sagacity and bodily strength, has for ages been held in high veneration in various Oriental nations. Among the Hindus, Ganesa, the son of Shiva and Parvati, is represented with the head of an elephant to indicate his wisdom, and indeed this animal is usually regarded by that people as the symbol of Divine wisdom. In some of the ancient ruins of temples in India is seen the figure of a lion throwing down an elephant, denoting, as Rougemont explains it in his 'Le Peuple Primitif,' God in his just wrath destroying the wise laws which are the foundation of the world, and by his power consuming the earth. In the Hindu cosmography, upon a serpent rests a tortoise which in turn carries four or eight elephants, on whose back the universe is supported. This myth is supposed to signify that the world is founded upon the Eternal symbolized by the serpent, that all its laws are characterized by divine harmony, represented by the tortoise, and that it is maintained in all its parts by the intelligence of an all-powerful being, indicated by the elephants. In another Brahmanical myth the elephant seems to have a different symbolical meaning. From the sacred mountain of Meru a celestial river is said to descend, which, after having flowed around the city of Brahma, discharges its waters into a lake called Mansarovara. Four rivers issue from it by four rocks, pierced with an opening resembling the mouth of an animal. The four animals thus represented are the cow or the earth, from which the Gauges flows; the elephant, another Hindu symbol of the earth, which vomits forth the Hoangho; the horse or the water, which is the source of the Oxus; and, finally, the tiger, the emblem of evil, whence the Yenisei flows towards its frozen deserts. This Brahmanic myth of Meru forms a part of the Buddhist legends which have become the religion of a great part of the Chinese.

Not only, however, does the elephant occupy a conspicuous place in Oriental legends; the living animal is held in great veneration in some parts of the East, particularly in the kingdom of Siam, where the white elephant is reckoned an indispensable part of the regalia of sovereignty. The lower orders perform the shiko, or obeisance of submission to the white elephant. The establishment of this venerated animal, as we learn from Mr. Crawford, is very large; he has his Wun or minister; his Wun-dauk or deputy to that office; his Sarégyi or secretary, with a considerable endowment of land for his maintenance. Formerly one of the finest districts of the kingdom was the estate of the white elephant. Mr. Crawford, who was ambassador from Britain to the court of Siam, makes the following remarks on the white elephants: "The rareness of the white elephant is, no doubt, the origin of the consideration in which it is held. The countries in which it is found, and in which, indeed, the elephant in general exists in greatest perfection, and is most regarded, are those in which the worship of Buddha and the doctrine of the metempsychosis prevail. It was natural, therefore, to imagine that the body of so rare an object as the white elephant must be the temporary habitation of the soul of some mighty personage in its progress to perfection. This is the current belief, and accordingly every white elephant has the rank and title of a king, with an appropriate name expressing this dignity—such as the ‘pure king,’ the ‘wonderful king,’ and so forth. One of the Jesuits, writing upon this subject, informs us with some naïveté, that his majesty of Siam does not ride the white elephant, because he, the white elephant, is as great a king as himself! Each of those which we saw had a separate stable, and no less than ten keepers to wait upon it. The tusks of the males, for there were some of both sexes, were ornamented with gold rings. On the head they had all a gold chain net, and on the back a small embroidered velvet cushion.”

When Sir John Bowring visited the court of Siam in 1855, he was presented with a lock of the sacred hair of the white elephant. The Siamese indeed regard all animals of a white colour as invested with peculiar sanctity. If a Talapoin or a Bonze meets a white cock, he salutes him—an honour which he will not pay to a prince. The white monkey also is held in special reverence, though yielding precedence to the elephant. “The monkey is a man,” say the Siamese, “not very handsome to be sure, but not less a brother.” Extravagant honours are paid to the white elephant. He is supposed to be the incarnation of some future Budha. He takes rank immediately after princes of the blood, and a tuft of his hair was one of the choicest presents lately made by the King of Siam to her majesty Queen Victoria.

ELEUSINA, a surname of DEMETER (which see), and also of PERSEPHONE (which see), derived from Eleusis in Attica, where these divinities were chiefly worshipped, and where one of the greatest festivals of ancient Greece was celebrated. See next article.

ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES, one of the most celebrated festivals observed by the ancient Greeks. The name was derived from Eleusis, a town of Attica, where the mysteries were first introduced in honour of Demeter, and her daughter Persephone. Considerable difference of opinion exists among the learned as to the origin of these noted mysteries, but it is generally believed that they were instituted by Erechthonius, and remodelled by Eumolpus, the king of Thrace, about fourteen centuries before the birth of Christ. They were divided into the greater and the lesser mysteries; the former were observed, some authors say, annually, others every five years in autumn, and the latter in early spring, the interval between the two being at least six months. Both the autumnal and vernal mysteries appear to have had a reference to the various processes of agriculture as practised at these two different seasons of the year. The greater mysteries were dedicated to Demeter, and the lesser to Perse- phone; in both of them Dionysus also occupied a conspicuous place, but especially in the lesser. And it is plain that an affinity was recognized as existing between these three divinities among the Romans at least, for they had a temple in common at Rome near the circus maximus. The lesser mysteries were celebrated at Agræ in Attica, a place on the Ilissus. In preparation for the festival a season of fasting was observed, and it was closed by a series of purifications in the Ilissus, which were superintended by a priest called Hydranos, assisted by a torch-bearer or Daduchus. As an essential part of the festival, it was customary to sacrifice a sow, or a bull, or both, and after the performance of the lustral ceremonies in the river, a candidate for initiation into the mysteries was required to place his feet upon the skins of the victims which had been sacrificed, and in this position an oath was administered to him by the Mystagogue, binding him to preserve inviolable secrecy on all subjects connected with the mysteries. The novice then pronounced the sacred formula, which De Sacy thinks was the watchword of the mystæ or initiated. It was couched in these terms, “I have drunk the kukëon; I have taken the goblet from the shrine, and according to custom put it into the flask, and thence back again into the shrine.” During all these solemnities the candidates for initiation were not allowed to enter the temple of Demeter, but remained in the vestibule. Some time elapsed before they could be admitted to the greater mysteries, when instead of Mystæ they were called Epoptæ and Ephyri. There appear to have been five degrees of rank among the initiated, of which the two first were limited to purifications; the third to the preparatory ceremonies; the fourth admitted into the lesser mysteries, and conferred the title of Mystæ; and the fifth gave admission to the greater mysteries, and conferred the title of Epoptæ.

The ancients held all mysteries, but especially the Eleusinian, in the highest estimation. Isocrates speaks of Demeter as having introduced the mysteries, “which,” says he, “fill the souls of those who participate in them with the sweetest hopes, both as to this and the future world.” Hence it was a common proverbial saying, that in the mysteries no one is sad. Different opinions have been entertained as to the time which was allowed to pass before those initiated in the lesser mysteries could be admitted into the greater. Plutarch says it was a year, and Scaliger alleges five years. The greater mysteries of Eleusis commenced on the fifteenth day of the Greek month Bœdromion. They were celebrated both at Athens and Eleusis, and lasted during nine days. The ceremonies of each of these days are thus described by Mr. Gross: “On the first day of the festival, the initiates of the lesser mysteries assembled and took the necessary measures for their admission into the greater: it was the day of preparation. The second day borrowed its name from the hortatory phrase Alade Mystai—to the sea, ye initiated; for on this day the initiated or Mystai marched in procession to the Saronic gulf, or at least to one of its inlets. On account of its saline properties, sea-water was deemed among the ancients to be especially efficacious in the cure of physical maladies, and the washing and bathing in it from religious motives was therefore typical of moral purity. The third day was fast-day, and it was spent in a total abstinence from all sensual enjoyments. It was observed in commemoration of the sorrow of the goddess Ceres, on account of the abduction of her daughter, fondly denominated Korē, the maiden, but commonly known as Proserpine, by the enamoured and inexorable Pluto. As an offering was made to Ceres and Proserpine during the festival, the presumption is that the fourth day of the celebration was dedicated to this solemnity. The fifth day was called the Lampadōn Hemera, the day of torches; thus distinguished because on it the initiated went two and two in procession, each bearing a torch in his hand, into the temple of Ceres at Eleusis, the Daduch, with a torch the size of which corresponded to his superior dignity, leading the way. The torches were passed from hand to hand, and the smoke and flames which issued from them were considered to possess a purifying virtue. Their introduction into the mysteries is ascribed by mythology to the circumstance that Ceres, while perambulating the whole earth in search of her lost child, illumined her wearisome path with torchlight. Iacchus, the son and ward of Ceres, and one of the surnames of Bacchus, gave appellative distinction to the sixth and most solemn day of the festival. On this emphatically jubilant day, young Iacchus, thus named from iachein—the same as clamare in Latin, in allusion to the shouts which the votaries of Bacchus raised at the festival of their god, being crowned with a myrtle-wreath, was carried from the Ceramicus, a public walk at Athens, to Eleusis. The initiated, likewise crowned with myrtle and displaying the usual Bacchus symbols—the thyrsus, ivy leaves, etc., followed the youthful deity in solemn procession. The frequent exclamations of Iacchus, or rather Iacchos, and the chanting of pæans, still farther distinguished this procession from that of the torches, at once so stately and so taciturn. Iacchus had a temple at Athens, which bore his name, and was called Iaccheion; he was worshipped as the mediator between Ceres and her votaries, and hence his frequent invocation by the initiated on this occasion. On the seventh day the initiated returned to Athens by the sacred road, a distance of ten miles, stopping at various places rendered sacred by tradition, or significant from their connection with religion; as, at the site where the first fig-tree grew, and hence called the holy fig-tree; at the bridge which spanned the river Cephissus, etc. At the latter place they were met by many of the people of the neighbourhood, when both parties indulged towards each other in good-humoured jests and railleries, and this mutual jocosity and alternate play of wit was denominated Gephourismos—the teasing at the bridge.

"The eighth day bore the appellation of Epidauria, which appears to have been sacred to Æsculapius, the god of medicine and the symbol of the mature autumnal harvest, and to have borrowed its name from Epidaurus, a town in the north of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, chiefly dedicated to the hygienic god, who had a famous temple there. If mythic record can be relied upon, it once happened on this day that Æsculapius came too late to the festival, and had therefore to be initiated by a posteal or after-consecration. From this precedent, so encouraging to the dilatory, all late comers were permitted to enjoy the same unenviable privilege. In his Eleusinian connections with Ceres, Æsculapius is the same as Erisichthon: a fact which sufficiently accounts for his presence at the solemnities of the goddess.

"Plēmochoē was the term which distinguished the ninth and last day of the Eleusinian solemnities. It owed its distinctive appellation to a tureen or flat-bottomed earthen vessel; for on this day two vessels answering to this description were filled with wine, when the contents of the one was poured out towards the rising, and that of the other towards the setting sun. While the libation was offered, the initiated—as it appears from Proclus on Plato—looked alternately towards heaven and earth, as if they were there recognizing and adoring the father and mother of all things, pronouncing as they did so, the words Uie Tolmie."

The most impressive ceremony of the whole festival season was the Epopteia, which was said to have taken place at midnight of the sixth day of the festival. It was performed in the vestibule of the temple of Demeter, all the uninitiated being commanded to withdraw. The initiated commenced by again taking the oath which they had already taken in the lesser mysteries, and repeating the sacred formula, after which they clothed themselves in a new dress, over which they threw a fawn skin. Thus equipped, they were saluted with the words, "May you be happy," "May the good demon attend you." At this point in the ceremony, the assembly was suddenly enveloped in darkness, lightning flashed, thunder rolled, and unearthly noises resounded through the apartment, while monstrous forms appeared on all sides, filling the mystæ with horror and consternation. This scene of darkness and confusion has been supposed to symbolize the chaotic state of primitive matter before the work of creation introduced order and beauty into this lower world.

The scene now suddenly changed, and the Mystæ, led by the Hierophant or Mystagogus, were admitted into the inner temple or sanctuary of Demeter, which was most brilliantly lighted up for the occasion, and where stood the statue of the goddess splendidly adorned. Here the initiated was dazzled with the brightness of the light which shone every where around him, and his ears were saluted with the sweetest and most harmonious sounds; a myrtle crown was placed upon his head, and under the magical influence of what was termed a state of Autopsia, he beheld the fairest and most enchanting scenes, while a thrill of indescribable enjoyment passed through his soul—the foretaste of future and eternal bliss. In the midst of this delirious ecstasy, the initiated was startled by a voice exclaiming Conx Ompan, cabalistic and unintelligible words, which brought the imposing ceremony to a close.

Besides vocal and instrumental music, the greater Eleusinian mysteries were also celebrated with public shows and games, which lasted for several days, but the most noted of these spectacles was the Taurilia or bull-fights, with which the whole festival terminated. In no way could the Athenians more significantly express their obligations to the goddess who taught them the art of agriculture, than by sacrificing to her bulls, and making libations of the blood of these animals, which were so eminently useful to every tiller of the ground.

From the date of their initiation the mystæ were under the strongest vows of secrecy, and the garment they had worn upon the occasion of their first admission to the mysteries was not to be laid aside as long as its fragments would hang together, and the shreds of it were to be dedicated at some shrine as a memorial of their due performance of the mysteries of Demeter or Ceres. The privilege of initiation was eagerly coveted, as ensuring greater happiness on earth, and a higher place among the blessed in a future life. So great was the respect, indeed, in which the mysteries were held, that it was considered no small cause of reproach against Socrates, that he had neglected endeavouring to obtain his initiation.

The Eleusinian mysteries retained such a firm hold of the minds of the Greeks, that they survived all the changes which befell their country, and continued till the reign of the elder Theodosius. De Sacy thinks that Egypt was the cradle of these secret rites, and that they were intended to symbolize the principal operations of nature. Thirlwall, however, in his 'History of Greece,' represents them as "the remains of a worship which preceded the rise of the Hellenic mythology and its attendant rites, grounded on a view of nature less fanciful, more earnest, and better fitted to awaken both philosophical thought and religious feeling." What secrets were revealed to the initiated in the greater mysteries, it is impossible to do more than conjecture. But it is more likely that they were of a moral than a physical character, and, indeed, the ancients generally seemed to entertain the idea, that the main secret communicated was the assurance of a future state of happiness beyond death and the grave.

ELEUTHEREUS (Gr. eleutheros, free), a surname of Diomysus or Bacchus, and also of Zeus or Jupiter. It corresponds to the Latin name Liber.

ELEUTHERIA, an ancient Grecian festival instituted after the battle of Plataæ, in honour of Zeus Eleutheros or the Deliverer. It was celebrated annually, when delegates assembled at Plataæ from all parts of Greece, to offer sacrifices in grateful remembrance of the deliverance of their country from the power of barbarians. Every fifth year games were celebrated, and the successful competitors were crowned with chaplets. Plutarch gives a minute account of the annual festival of Eleutheria, which existed even in his time. On the sixteenth day of the month Maimacterion, the solemnity commenced with a procession which marched at early dawn through the town, preceded by a trumpeter, who blew the signal for battle, and followed by waggons loaded with branches of myrtle and chaplets of flowers. After these came a black bull and a number of youths carrying libations for the dead. In the rear of the whole procession walked the archon or chief magistrate of Plataæ, dressed in a purple robe, with a sword in his hand, and bearing an urn, which was kept specially for the occasion. When the procession reached the spot where lay buried the brave Greeks who had fallen at the battle of Plataæ, the archon first washed and anointed the tombstones of the dead, after which he sacrificed the black bull, offered up prayers to Zeus Eleuthereus and Hermes Chthonius, and invited the buried warriors to partake of a feast which had been prepared for them.

ELEUTHERIA, an ancient festival celebrated at Samos in honour of EROS (which see).

ELEVATION OF THE HOST. See HOST.

ELIJAH, or ELIJAH. The Mohammedan writers allege that this illustrious Hebrew prophet is the destined precursor of the Messiah, and will announce the second advent of Jesus to judge both the quick and the dead. The modern Jews have the same belief in regard to Elijah, and, accordingly, in the concluding service for the Sabbath, one of their prayer-books has a poem commencing with the following passage: "O may Elijah, the prophet, come to us speedily, with Messiah, the son of David. He was the man who was zealous for the name of God; to whom tidings of peace were delivered by the hand of Jekuthiel; he was the man who drew near, and made expiation for the children of Israel. He was the man whose eyes saw twelve generations; who was known and called an hairy man, girt with a girdle of leather about his loins; Elijah the prophet." He is believed also to be frequently employed in missions of peace and happiness to men. Hence the same poem, from which we have just quoted, says, "Happy is he who hath seen him in dreams; happy is he who saluted him with peace, and to whom he returned the salutation of peace." Elijah is supposed by the Jews to be present on every occasion on which the rite of CIRCUMCISION (which see) is performed. Mr. Allen, in his 'Modern Judaism,' thus states the belief of the Jews on this point "The Jews suppose that the prophet Elijah enters the room with the infant, and sits in the vacant chair, or in the vacant seat of the double chair, to observe whether the covenant of circumcision be duly administered. Hence this other seat is called the seat of Elias. They say that on a certain occasion, when circumcision was interdicted to the Israelites, Elijah was so grieved in his mind, that he determined to end his life in a cave:—that when God asked him, What dost thou here, Elijah? He answered, I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts, for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, meaning the covenant of circumcision:—upon which they add, God immediately promised the prophet, that he should always, in future, be present at that ceremony, that the children of Israel might never more forsake this covenant, but thenceforth might duly and rightly administer it. When they prepare the seat for Elijah, they are required to say with a loud voice, and in express words, This is the seat of the prophet Elijah. Unless this be expressly declared, they say, he comes not to the circumcision, as not having been invited:—and this loudness of voice they believe to be necessary on account of his dullness of hearing, which is the consequence of his extreme old age. That he may wait with patience to the end of the circumcision, his chair is not removed from its place for three days." Abarbanel, the Jewish writer, alleges that Elijah was translated, both body and soul, into heaven, that he might be ready to return to earth frequently on messages of kindness, and that he ascended in a fiery chariot that his moisture might be dried up, and his body thus rendered light and swift to pass readily and rapidly to all parts of the earth. The Greek church observes a festival in commemoration of the prophet Elias on the 20th July. The Mingrelians sacrifice goats in honour of this prophet, whose favour they invoke in order to obtain a plentiful harvest.

ELICIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, under which Numa erected an altar to him on the Aventine hill, and was also said to have instituted secret rites to be observed in his honour. This name is supposed to be derived from Lat. elicio, to entice or invite, because the ancient Romans were accustomed on particular occasions to invite Jupiter Elicius to send down lightning from heaven. Some modern writers have even deduced from this the conclusion that the Romans were acquainted with the art of conducting lightning, which has been found so useful in modern times.

ELION (Heb. the Most High), a name given to God by Melchizedek, Gen. xiv. 18, 19, 20, showing that at that period the knowledge of the true God, though it had been lost throughout a great part of the then known world, still lingered here and there. Though the religion of the Phœnicians had become a nature-religion, or deification of nature, we learn from a fragment of Sanchoniathon preserved by Eusebius, that Elion was the name of one of their principal divinities, and, in describing one of their systems of cosmogony, he represents it as teaching that Elion produced by his wife Berouth, the heaven and the earth—a legend which approaches very near to the Scriptural statement, that "God created (Heb bara) the heaven and the earth."

ELIONIA. See EILETHYIA.

ELIVAGAR, celebrated rivers which occupy a conspicuous place in the cosmogony of the ancient Scandinavians. They are thus noticed in the Prose Edda: "Tell me," said Gangler, "what was the state of things ere the races mingled, and nations came into being."

"When the rivers that are called Elivagar had flowed far from their sources," replied Har, "the venom which they rolled along hardened, as does dross that runs from a furnace, and became ice. When the rivers flowed no longer, and the ice stood still, the vapour arising from the venom gathered over it, and froze to rime, and in this manner were formed, in Ginnungagap, many layers of congealed vapour, piled one over the other."

"That part of Ginnungagap," added Jafnhar, "that lies towards the north was thus filled with heavy masses of gelid vapour and ice, whilst everywhere within were whirlwinds and fleeting mists. But the southern part of Ginnungagap was lighted by the sparks and flakes that flew into it from Muspellheim."

"Thus," continued Thridi, "whilst freezing cold and gathering gloom proceeded from Nifheim, that part of Ginnungagap looking towards Muspellheim was filled with glowing radiancy, the intervening space remaining calm and light as wind-still air. And when the heated blast met the gelid vapour it melted it into drops, and, by the might of him who sent the heat, these drops quickened into life, and took a human semblance. The being thus formed was named Ymir, but the Frost-giants eall him Orgelmir. From him descend the race of the Frost-giants (Hrimthursar), as it is said in the Völuspá, 'From Vidolf come all witches; from Vilmeith all wizards; from Svarthöfði all poison-seethers; and all giants from Ymir.' And the giant Vathrúdnir, when Gangrad asked, 'Whence came Orgelmir the first of the sons of giants;' answered, 'The Elivagar cast out drops of venom that quickened into a giant. From him spring all our race, and hence are we so strong and mighty'" This symbolical representation may perhaps be designed to indicate that heat is the active, and cold the passive principle of generation.

ELLERIANs, a sect mentioned only by the Abbé Gregoire. in his 'Histoire des Sectes Religieuses,' and represented by him as deriving its name from one Eller of Ronsdorff, its founder. This person, who died in 1750, asserted that God dwelt in him, and had commissioned him to form a new church. Hence he was called the father of Sion, and his wife the mother. He is charged with being ambitious and luxurious.

ELLOTIA, an ancient Grecian festival. It was celebrated at Corinth in honour of Athena. A festival bearing the same name was celebrated at Crete.

ELOHIM, one of the Hebrew names applied frequently in Scripture to GOD (which see). This is a very remarkable word, occurring most frequently in the plural, and yet usually connected with a singular verb. An argument has been often drawn from this peculiarity, in favour of a plurality of persons in the Godhead, but many theologians object to the use of such an argument, on the ground that a similar Hebrew idiom is met with in various passages of Scripture, for example, Exod. xxi. 4; Is. xix. 4; Mal. i. 6; Ps. lviii. 11, where it is used in respect to words denoting rank, authority, eminence, and majesty. In such cases the plural is supposed to be employed to give intensity and force to the word. The term Elohim sometimes denotes angels, as in Ps. viii. 5, and at other times it signifies magistrates or persons in authority, as in Exod. xxi. 6, where, in our version, it is rendered "judges." This name of God differs essentially from the incommunicable name JEHOVAH (which see), the latter implying self-existence, and denoting God therefore in his essential being, while the former seems to mean God as the All-powerful Being, and used therefore in such acts of the Divinity—for example, the act of creation—as imply the exercise of power. The author of the article "God" in Dr. Kitto's Bible Cyclopaedia, takes a different view of the matter, and alleges the word Elohim to be the abstract word for God considered apart from his attributes, being a general term like our word Deity. This explanation of the word, however, seems to be scarcely borne out by a reference to the passages of Scripture in which it occurs. See JEHOVAH.

ELUL, the twelfth month of the Jewish civil year, and the sixth month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year. It corresponds with parts of our August and September. During this month various festivals occur, for instance, the New Moon, on the first; the festival of the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah on the seventh; and the festival of xylophoria or wood-offering on the twenty-first. There were two fasts, also, in the course of Elul; thus, on the seventeenth a fast was kept because of the death of the spies, who brought up the evil report concerning the Promised Land; and on the twenty-second, a fast in memory of the punishment of the wicked, unbelieving Israelites. The twentieth was the last day of the month on which the Jews reckoned up the beasts that had been born, the tithes of which belonged to God. The beasts were counted on this day, because the first day of the month Tisri was a festival, and therefore, a flock could not be tithed on that day.

ELVES, spirits of various kinds, in the mythology of the ancient Scandinavians, to whom they ascribed in general the same nature and properties as the Greeks did to their demons. They were divided into two classes, the celestial or white elves, and the terrestrial or black elves. The former were believed to be of a friendly disposition towards men, the latter the reverse. The prose Edda alleges the white elves to be whiter than the sun, the black to be darker than pitch. Mr. Keightley, in his 'Fairy Mythology,' thus describes the elves: "The Alfar still live in the memory and traditions of the peasantry of Scandinavia. They also, to a certain extent, retain their distinction into white and black. The former, or the good elves, dwell in the air, dance on the grass, or sit in the leaves of trees; the latter, or evil elves, are regarded as an underground people, who frequently inflict sickness or injury on mankind; for which there is a particular kind of doctors, called Kloka, to be met in all parts of the country.

"The Elves are believed to have their kings, to celebrate their weddings and banquets, just the same as the dwellers above ground. There is an interesting intermediate class of them in popular tradition, called the Hill-people (Högfolk), who are believed to dwell in caves and small hills: when they show themselves they have a handsome human form. The common people seem to connect with them a deep feeling of melancholy, as if bewailing a half-quenched hope of redemption.

"There are only a few old persons who now can tell any thing more about them than of the sweet singing that may occasionally on summer nights be heard out of their hills, when one stands still and listens, or, as it is expressed in the ballads, lays his ear to the Elve-hill (lägger sitt öra till Elfvehögg): but no one must be so cruel as, by the slightest word, to destroy their hopes of salvation, for then the sprightly music will be turned into weeping and lamentation.

"The Norwegians called the Elves, Huldrafolk, and their music, Huldraslaat: it is in the minor key, and of a dull and mournful sound. The mountaineers sometimes play it, and pretend they have learned it by listening to the underground people among the hills and rocks. There is also a tune called the Elf-king's tune, which several of the good fiddlers know right well, but never venture to play; for as soon as it begins, both old and young, and even inanimate objects, are impelled to dance, and the player cannot stop unless he can play the air backwards, or that some one comes behind him and cuts the strings of his fiddle.

"The little underground elves, who are believed to dwell under the houses of mankind, are described as sportive and mischievous, and as imitating all the actions of men. They are said to love cleanliness about the house and place, and to reward such servants as are neat and cleanly.

"The Elves are extremely fond of dancing in the meadows, where they form those circles of a livelier green which from them are called Elfdans (Elfdance): when the country people see in the morning stripes along the dewy grass in the woods and meadows, they say the Elves have been dancing there. If any one should at midnight get within their circle, they become visible to him, and they may then illude him. It is not every one that can see the Elves; and one person may see them dancing, while another perceives nothing. Sunday children, as they are called, i. e., those born on Sunday, are remarkable for possessing this property of seeing Elves and similar beings. The Elves, however, have the power to bestow this gift on whomsoever they please. They also used to speak of Elf-books, which they gave to those whom they loved, and which enabled them to foretell future events.

"The Elves often sit on little stones that are of a circular form, and are called Elf-mills (Elf-quarnor); the sound of their voice is said to be sweet and soft, like the air.

"The Danish peasantry give the following account of their Ellefolk or Elve-people:

"The Elle-people live in the Elle-moors. The appearance of the man is that of an old man, with a low-crowned hat on his head: the Elle-woman is young, and of a fair and attractive countenance, but behind she is hollow like a dough-trough. Young men should be especially on their guard against her, for it is very difficult to resist her; and she has, moreover, a stringed instrument, which, when she plays on it, quite ravishes their hearts. The man may be often seen near the Elle-moors, bathing himself in the sunbeams; but if any one comes too near him, he opens his mouth wide and breathes upon them, and his breath produces sickness and pestilence. But the women are most frequently to be seen by moonshine; then they dance their rounds in the high grass so lightly and so gracefully, that they seldom meet a denial when they offer their hand to a rash young man. It is also necessary to watch cattle, that they may not graze in any place where the Elle-people have been; for if any animal come to a place where the Elle-people have spit, or done what is worse, it is attacked by some grievous disease, which can only be cured by giving it to eat a handfull of St. John's wort, which had been pulled at twelve o'clock on St. John's night. It might also happen that they might sustain some injury by mixing with the Elle-people's cattle, which are very large, and of a blue colour, and which may sometimes be seen in the fields licking up the dew on which they live. But the farmer has an easy remedy against this evil; for he has only to go to the Elle-hill when he is turning out his cattle, and to say, 'Thou little Troid! may I graze my cows on thy hüll?' And if he is not prohibited, he may set his mind at rest."

ELYSIUM, the future abode of the blessed, according to the mythology of the ancient poets of Greece and Rome. Homer has only once used the term Elysium. In the fourth book of the Odyssey, Menelaus is told by Proteus that he was not destined to finish his days at Argos, for the gods should send him to Elysium, at the extremity of the earth, where the yellow-haired Rhadamanthus exercised supreme authority, and the inhabitants were gifted with immortal felicity. "No snows," says the poet, "are there, no driving showers, and no stormy winter but soft gales perpetually blowing from the ocean, cool and purify the air, and refresh the land." Homer speaks of the happiness of Elysium only briefly and feebly, but he expatiates at length upon the torments which await the wicked in Tartarus. It is to Virgil that we are indebted for a fuller description of the Elysian fields. He paints in the most glowing colours the gorgeous scenery of that land of beauty and of bliss. All that is fitted to please the imagination, to regale the senses, or to gratify the desires of the most voluptuous and sensual is concentrated there. Unlike the heaven of the Christian, it has no delights save those to which men are wont to be attached on earth, no employments save those in which the worldly habitually engage. Shadowy horses, chariots and arms are provided for the warriors who have fallen in defence of their country. Wrestling, music, dancing, feasting, revelry, make up the chief pleasures of the inhabitants of these celestial regions of the poets of antiquity. But what is the precise locality of Elysium? "The ancients," says Mr. Gross: "The ancients were far from being unanimous as to the precise locality of the Elysian fields. Some taught that they were to be sought near the African coast, in the Atlantic ocean, among a cluster of islands which they designated as the Fortunate; others placed them in the island of Lence, in the Euxine sea; and Virgil, as a good Roman, hesitated not to point out Italy as the fittest country that could overlie so felicitous a spot. The poet Lucian assigned to them a situation near the moon, but Plutarch, more orthodox as well as true to prescription, was content to find his paradise in the centre of the earth. In one thing, however, all agreed, that it was a most enchanting region, with bowers for ever green, delightful meadows, and pleasant streams; with a balmy air, a serene sky, and a salubrious climate; with birds continually warbling in the groves, and a heaven illustrated by a more glorious sun and brighter stars than the similar orbs which illumine the path of mortals."

Virgil has mingled with his details of Elysian enjoyment, doctrines which were partly derived from the schools of Pythagoras and Plato. The shades are unearthly forms with earthly organs and appetites, displaying the same character, and under the influence of the same affections, which had governed them on earth. Though admitted to the joys of Elysium, it is only for a time. When a thousand years have passed away, the inhabitants of these delightful regions, Virgil informs us, will be conducted to the stream of Lethe, and having drank of the oblivious river, they shall return to earth to commence a long series of successive transmigrations through various forms of corporeal being. Such is the Elysium of the ancient heathen, as described by the great Roman poet, and so completely does that master of language and of imagery exhaust the subject, that it is unnecessary to occupy further space by noticing the Elysium of Pindar, of Claudian, or of Catullus. Bochart and others are of opinion that the fable of Elysium is of Phœnician extraction.

EMANATIONS (DOCTRINE OF). This principle, which is found in several both of the Oriental and Occidental systems of philosophy, implies that all things, instead of being created by the power of God, are an emanation from, or a development of, the Divine essence. The whole universe in this view exists originally in God, and emanates from God. There is one infinite eternal substance from which flows that collective whole of phenomena called the universe. In the various systems of Hindu philosophy, creation is accounted for by a series of successive emanations from the Divine substance or essence, and as soon as this gradual process of creation is completed, there commences an analogous system of destructive evolutions, by means of which the process of emanation is reversed, and the whole universe is once more absorbed into the Divine substance. Then begins anew the divine sleep of Brahm, or the total inaction of creative power. Thus Hinduism is decidedly Pantheistic in its character, viewing, as it does, all finite beings as simply forms, modifications, or emanations of the One Infinite Substance. In the Vedanta school, however, of Hindu philosophy, Pantheism is carried to its utmost extent, matter being no longer an emanation from, or a modification of, the Divine essence, but a mere illusion, its existence being lost in that of the One Infinite Being, of whom alone existence can be predicated. The Vedantist, then, is in reality a pure idealist, as well as a spiritual Pantheist.

The Egyptian philosophy, or rather the Egyptian theology, viewed philosophically, appears to have comprised a system of emanations, not only in so far as the external universe is concerned, but even the celestial hierarchy, which consisted of gods innumerable, all deriving their origin by way of emanation from the one invisible source of light and life. All the primitive divine powers are represented by a double emanation, Osiris and Isis, the one active, the other passive. After these come other subordinate emanations corresponding to the great phenomena of nature. Pythagoras, and most other Greek philosophers, believed human souls to be emanations of the ether to which they returned at death. The founder of the Eleatic school, Xenophanes, held that all finite beings were emanations from the Infinite Being. But the doctrine of emanations never formed a very conspicuous feature of Greek philosophy. It only presented itself in all its strength and fulness as a fundamental principle of that combination of Oriental, Greek, and Jewish doctrines which gave rise to the Gnosticism of the second and third centuries after the Christian era. In all the Gnostic systems, the Infinite Being is something invisible, sunk in the abyss or dark night, equivalent to the Brahm of Hindu mythology. The emanations which compose the superior world are the ÆONS (which see), the manifestations of the Divine attributes, and which, along with the Infinite Being himself, constitute the Pleroma, the plenitude of intelligences. This inferior world is the last link in the chain of emanations. The Demiurgus is the last emanation of the Pleroma, and the first power of the inferior world, thus forming the connecting link between the two worlds.

The Gnostic sects derived many of their doctrines, and among others that of emanations, from the school of the Neo-Platonists. But the grand error into which these heretics in religion fell was that of subordinating their faith to their philosophy. In the writings of the Pseudo-Dionysius may be seen the extent to which the philosophical doctrine of emanations was carried in the Eastern or Greek church. In proof of this remark, we quote from 'Vaughan's Hours with the Mystics,' the following abstract of the views of Dionysius on this subject: "All things have emanated from God, and the end of all is return to God. Such return—deification, he calls it—is the consummation of the creature, that God may finally be all in all. A process of evolution, a centrifugal movement in the Divine Nature, is substituted in reality for creation. The antithesis of this is the centripetal process, or movement of involution, which draws all existence towards the point of the Divine centre. The degree of real existence possessed by any being is the amount of God in that being—for God is the existence in all things. Yet He himself cannot be said to exist, for he is above existence. The more or less of God which the various creatures possess is determined by the proximity of their order to the centre.

"The chain of being in the upper and invisible world, through which the Divine Power diffuses itself in successive gradations, he calls the Celestial Hierarchy. The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy is a corresponding series in the visible world. The orders of Angelic natures and of priestly functionaries correspond to each other. The highest rank of the former receive illumination immediately from God. The lowest of the heavenly imparts divine light to the highest of the earthly hierarchy. Each order strives perpetually to approximate to that immediately above itself, from which it receives the transmitted influence; so that all, as Dante describes it, draw and are drawn, and tend in common towards the centre—God."

But at no time has the doctrine of emanations been held in greater vigour than in modern times among the Sufis or Mystics of Persia. Every man is with them an emanation from God, a particle of the Divine essence. Deity is manifested in humanity, the Infinite in the Finite. This tenet pervades the whole writings of the Sufis, both in prose and verse. Hence they look upon every human being as representing the Deity. Some of them inculcate the importance of endeavouring, by abstracting the soul from worldly objects, and absorbing it in Divine contemplation, to aim at re-uniting ourselves to the Divine essence, from which we have sprung.

EMBALMING, a process which has been followed from very early times for the preservation of dead bodies from passing into corruption. It is frequently referred to in Sacred Scripture. Thus in Gen. i. 2, 3, it is stated, "And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel. And forty days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed: and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days." The custom of embalming seems to have prevailed in Egypt from a very remote period, as is plain from the practice which Herodotus notes, of cutting the bodies with an Ethiopian stone. Some mummies also bear the date of the oldest kings. The office of embalming, which was handed down from father to son, belonged to a regularly organized class of men in Egypt, of whom, according to Diodorus Siculus, the Taricheutæ were the most distinguished. In the time of Joseph, the duty was committed to physicians, and Sir J. G. Wilkinson thinks that the whole order were physicians. The process seems to have consisted in filling the dead bodies with spices. It is thus briefly described by Diodorus: "They prepare the body first with cedar oil, and various other substances, more than thirty (or according to another reading, forty) days; then after they have added myrrh and cinnamon, and other drugs, which have not only the power of preserving the body for a long time, but of imparting to it a pleasant odour, they commit it to the relatives of the deceased." The practice of embalming was not limited to the Egyptians, but appears to have been adopted by the Jews, Persians, Arabs, and Ethiopians. In the New Testament we find Nicodemus bringing spices to embalm the body of our Lord. Thus John xix. 39, 40, "And there came also Nicodemus, which at the first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight. Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury." As practised in Egypt, the work of embalming was discharged by different professional officers, each of whom had his particular department assigned to him in the process. One began by pointing out the precise manner in which the incision was to be made in the left flank, while another acted as officiating operator, and having inflicted the incision on the dead body, instantly fled from the spot as if he had committed a crime. Now commenced the process of embalming, strictly so called, which was performed by the hereditary caste to which we have already referred. The parts of the body most liable to pass into corruption were first removed, the rest was washed with palm-wine, and the inside was filled with myrrh, cinnamon, and other sorts of spices. The body was then put into salt of nitre for about forty days, at the end of which it was swathed in fine linen bandages, glued together with a species of gum. The whole was now covered with the richest perfume. The process being thus completed, the body was delivered to the relations entire in all the features, and even the very hair of the eyelids preserved. It has been uniformly alleged that in embalming among the Egyptians, the bowels or viscera were removed, but this, though commonly, seems not to have been universally a part of the process, as Mr. Pettigrew mentions in his account of a mummy which he lately unrolled, that he had in some instances found the viscera embalmed, and placed among the bandages, and he adds, "they were within the body in the greater number of mummies I have unrolled, and always in four portions." That disembowelling, however, was often adopted, is plain from the circumstance that both Herodotus and Diodorus expressly mention it, and Porphyry records a prayer, which he alleges was uttered by the embalmers in the name of the deceased, entreating the gods to receive the soul into the region of the good, and casting into the river Nile the organs which he supposes may have offended the gods, and injured the soul by eating and drinking improperly, plainly referring to the stomach and other viscera.

EMBER DAYS, a name given to certain fast-days observed in the Church of Rome, and some other churches, that is, the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent; after Whitsunday; after the 14th of September; and after the 13th of December, the Sundays following these days being the stated times of ordination in the church. According to some writers, ember comes from the Greek word hemera, a day; according to others, from the ancient custom of eating nothing on these days till night, and then only a cake, baked under the embers, called ember-bread. The appointment of these days of fasting is probably not to be dated earlier than the fourth century, as stated times for ordination do not appear to have been fixed before that time. Pope Leo, who wrote about A. D. 450, asserts that the Ember-days are derived from apostolical tradition, an idea which cannot be sustained, as no author previous to Leo makes mention of any such fasts. They are usually called in old writers jejunia quatuor temporum, the fasts of the four seasons, the months on which they occur, March, June, September, and December, being the beginning of the four several seasons of the year, and in the first notice of them which is found in the writings of Leo, they are not referred to as fasts, with a view to the ordination of the clergy, but simply as fasts in connection with the different seasons of the year. For several centuries, indeed, no fixed times were settled for ordination, but persons were ordained to all offices in the church as occasion required, without any regard to time. When Leo spoke of the fasts of the four seasons, therefore, he could have no reference to ordinations, there being at the time when he wrote only one season, December, on which ordinations took place in the Church of Rome. This continued to be the practice till the time of Simplicius, who in A. D. 467 added February to December, as another time for ordination. Gregory VII. is supposed to have been the first who connected the fasts of the four seasons, which had long existed in the church, with ordinations. Since that time these fasts have been observed with this view alone, and the original design of their appointment has been completely lost sight of. For a long period these fasts were observed by different churches, with considerable variety, but they were at last settled, as they are now observed, by the council of Placentia, A. D. 1095. In the Rubric of the Church of England, her members are invited to solemn prayer and fasting on the Ember Days, to implore the Divine assistance and blessing in the choice and commission of ministers of the gospel.

EMBER WEEKS, those weeks in which the Ember Days (see previous article) occur.

EMBLA, the first created woman in the ancient Scandinavian cosmogony. The account of the creation of the first human pair is thus related in the Prose Edda: "One day as the sons of Bør were walking along the sea-beach, they found two stems of wood, out of which they shaped a man and a woman. Odin infused into them life and spirit; Vili endowed them with reason and the power of motion; Ve gave them speech and features, hearing and vision. The man they called Askur, and the woman, Embla. From these two descend the whole human race, whose assigned dwelling was within Midgard." The name Askur means the ash, and Embla the alder, in allusion to their dendronic origin, and their allotted habitation Midgard, or the middle sphere, denotes obviously the habitable globe.

EMBOLUS, the side aisles of the early Christian churches, from which the nave was entered by doors on the north and south. See CHURCHES.

EMERSONIANS. See INTUITIONISTS.

EMIR, the descendants of Mohammed, or rather of his sister Fatima. They are usually termed Sons of the Prophet, and are looked upon with great veneration by all Mohammedans. They wear a green turban as a badge of distinction, and no one is allowed to beat them, or to do them any injury, under pain of losing his hand. The chief Emir has guards and officers under him, and has the power of life and death over the whole body which he rules. There is an officer of some distinction amongst the Emirs, called the Alemdar, whose office it is to carry the green standard of Mohammed before the Sultan on public occasions.

The word Emir itself signifies commander, chief, or prince. It was assumed as a title by the Caliphs, who reigned in the East after the death of Mohammed. Abubekr, the immediate successor of the prophet, was both Emir-al-mominin, prince of the true believers, and also Imam-al-moslimin, head of the faithful, thus uniting in himself the authority of a monarch and of a pontiff. Several sovereigns of different races, who reigned under the authority of the Caliphs, were at first called Emir, a title which in process of time was changed into that of Sultan, while Emir came to be applied, as it still is, exclusively to those who are of the race of Mohammed.

EMMANUEL. See IMMANUEL.

EMPANDA, an ancient Roman goddess, called also PANDANA, from Lat. pando, to open, who had a temple in Rome, which was always open, and the worshippers were supplied with food from the funds of the temple.

EMPYREAN (Gr. en, in, and pur, fire), a name sometimes given to heaven, the more peculiar residence of Deity, from the burning splendour with which it is supposed to be invested.

ENCÆNIA, anniversary festivals anciently observed in commemoration of the dedication of Christian churches. Sozomen mentions a festival of this kind which was wont to be held in memory of the dedication of the church which Constantine built in Jerusalem in honour of our Saviour. On that occasion, he tells us, Divine service was performed for eight successive days. From that time, Encænia continued to be kept very generally throughout different parts of Christendom. According to Bede, the first Saxon bishops in England were ordered by Gregory the Great to allow the people liberty on their annual feasts of the dedication of their churches, to build for themselves booths round about the church, and there feast and entertain themselves with eating and drinking, instead of their ancient sacrifices while they were heathens. Remains of these ancient festivals are still preserved in England in the church wakes or vigils, which are still kept up in different parts of the country. The name Encænia is also given to ceremonies observed at regular intervals, as at Oxford and Cambridge, in honour of benefactors and founders. See DEDICATION OF CHURCHES.

ENCELADUS, one of the giants in ancient Greek and Roman mythology, who made war upon the gods. He is represented as having been the son of Tartarus and Ge, and was killed, according to Virgil, by Jupiter, and buried under Mount Ætna.

ENCHANTMENTS, a word frequently used in the Old Testament, but in different significations. When Moses cast his rod on the ground before Pharaoh, and it became a serpent, we find that "the magicians did so also with their enchantments." The word here translated "enchantments," properly means "burnings." A prohibition against enchantments is found in Lev. xix. 26, "Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood: neither shall ye use enchantment, nor observe times." The word in this passage is in Hebrew menachesh, the precise meaning of which it is difficult to ascertain. Some suppose it to denote those who draw omens from the examination of the entrails of victims, while others regard it as signifying diviners in general. Those who follow the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, regard the word as referring to augury from the flight, feeding, chirping, and other actions of birds. But the root of the word menachesh seems more properly to denote a serpent, so that it points rather to divination by serpents, the asp of the ancient Egyptians being considered sacred throughout the whole country, and worshipped, according to Plutarch, "on account of a certain resemblance between it and the operations of the Divine power." The Psylli, or modern serpent-charmers of Egypt, are still looked upon with wonder. Minutoli, in his Travels, says, "The people consider them as holy. At certain festivals, for example, on the day before the departure of the great caravan to the Holy Kaaba, they go forth in procession with live snakes around their necks and arms, having their faces in contortions like an insane person, until foam falls from the mouth. They sometimes also tear the serpents with their teeth. When they are in this condition, the people press around them, especially the women, in order, if it is possible, to touch their foaming mouths with their hands." Maimonides regards the word menachesh as denoting the art of the ancient heathen Aruspices, that of drawing omens from incidental events, such as the chattering of crows, the unexpected appearance of a hare in passing along a road, and such things. Others again consider it as pointing to divination by lots. But amid so great diversity of opinion, it is difficult to decide what is the precise meaning of the word.

ENCRATITES (Gr. engkratitai, abstinent), a heretical Christian sect which arose in the second century. It owed its origin to Tatian of Assyria, who, while residing at Rome as a rhetorician, was converted to Christianity by the instrumentality of Justin Martyr. Having imbibed the philosophical doctrines of the school of Plato, he commenced his deviation from orthodox doctrine by engrafting upon the Christian system the Platonic doctrine concerning matter, and from this he passed to the belief that the human soul, like every thing connected with matter, is by its own nature mortal, and that the image of God in which man was originally created, and by virtue of which he became immortal, was a principle of divine life exalted above the nature of this soul which had been derived from matter. Having lost this living principle by sin, man became wholly subject to matter and to mortality. Irenæus says, that Tatian taught a doctrine of ÆONS (which see) similar to that of the Valentiniens. Clement of Alexandria classes him with the anti-Jewish Gnostics. His practical doctrines are thus rapidly sketched by Neander; "Tatian was aware that the system of Christian morals must be derived from the contemplation of the life of Christ, and take its laws from thence. Assuming this, he wrote a work in which he endeavoured to show how true perfection might be attained by the imitation of Christ. He failed only in one respect; that he did not seize the life of Christ in its completeness, and in its relation to his mission as the Redeemer of mankind, and the author of the new creation of divine life, which was designed to embrace and pervade all human relations only in the further course of its development from him. Paying no regard to this, he held the life of celibacy and the renunciation of all worldly possessions, after the pattern of Christ, to be the distinctive mark of Christian perfection. But to such as appealed to the life of Christ considered in this light, Clement of Alexandria replied, 'The specific nature of Christ's being, as distinguished from all other men, left no room for the marriage relation. That necessity of something to complete the human nature, which is grounded in the mutual relation of the sexes, found no place in him. The only analogon to the marriage state was, in his case, the relation he bears to the church, which is bound to him as his bride. Nothing could issue from him, as the Son of God, but a spiritual posterity.' The strong bias of Tatian in this particular direction led him to understand the Apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. vii. 5, as teaching that marriage and unchastity were one and the same thing—both equally the service of Satan. It may be too, that besides the canonical gospels, he made use of apocryphal histories, in which the image of Christ had already become modified under the influence of theosophical-ascetic habits of contemplation. As the tendency to a theosophical asceticism of this kind, which sprung up in the East, had now become widely spread, it can be no wonder that there were different kinds of these abstinentes, who had no special connection with Tatian, and who belonged in part to the Jewish and partly to the anti-Jewish party."

In following out his ascetic views, Tatian taught that it was necessary to abstain from wine and animal food, and that water ought to be used instead of wine in the Lord's Supper. Hence they were sometimes called Hydroparastatae or water-drinkers, and Apotactatae or renouncers. The name Encratites was often used as a general term, and applied to all sects practising austerity, so that it was not always limited to the followers of Tatian, who sometimes received the name of Tatianists. The Manicheans, in the fourth century, assumed to themselves the name of Encratites, from their abstaining from and condemning marriage, a doctrine which had been previously taught by the followers of Tatian, who would admit no married person into their society, whether male or female.

ENDOVELLICUS, a Pagan divinity anciently worshipped in Spain. Gruter gives twelve or thirteen inscriptions found in Spain at a place called Villavitirosa, all of them referring to this deity. Nothing is known as to the nature of this god.

ENERGICI, one of the numerous sects which arose in the sixteenth century, deriving their name from the peculiar views which they held on the subject of the Lord's Supper, alleging that the consecrated bread was neither the real body of Christ, nor a symbol of it, but simply his energy and virtue.

ENERGUMENS, a name given in the early Christian church to demoniacs, or those who were believed to be possessed of the devil. Various regulations were laid down by the church in regard to them. They were treated as a distinct class, bearing some relation both to the catechumens and the faithful, but differing from both in this, that they were committed to the special care of EXORCISTS (which see), while they were permitted to take part in some of the religious exercises of the church. If catechumens, while under probationary instruction, became demoniacs, they were in no case allowed to be baptized until they were thoroughly healed, unless they were labouring under seemingly fatal sickness. Believers who became demoniacs in the worst stages of their disease, like the weeping penitents, were not permitted to enter the church, but were retained under close inspection in the outer porch. When partially recovered they joined along with the AUDIEN- TES (which see) in public worship, but could not partake of the sacrament until they were completely restored, except in the immediate prospect of death. In general the energumens were subject to the same rules as the penitents, and Bingham thinks that they ought to be ranked among the catechumens, being treated in the same manner as they were. Prayers were offered up for them in the public assemblies of the church, and in the Apostolical Constitutions certain forms of prayer are mentioned as suitable for such persons. At other times the exorcists were obliged to pray over them, to keep them employed in some harmless exercise, such as sweeping the church, and to take care that they were regularly supplied with food while they resided in the church, which was their usual place of abode. See DEMONIANISTS.

ENGASTRIMYTHI (Gr. en, in, gaster, belly, and muo, to mutter), a name given to the priestesses of Apollo, from a species of ventriloquism which they practised, speaking from within, while not the slightest motion of the lips could be observed. The voice was supposed to proceed from a spirit within the body of the PYTHIA (which see).

ENGLIL, a word which very often occurs in the Koran, and which denotes the Gospel or the New Testament, as distinguished from the Taourat, the Law or the Old Testament. The Mohammedan doctors generally do not understand by Engil, in the Koran, the Gospel such as Christians have in their hands, and which the Mohammedans look upon as corrupted; but an imaginary gospel, which they say was sent from heaven by God to Jesus Christ, and of which nothing remains but what is cited from it in the Koran. A curious fancy has been entertained by some Mohammedan writers that the Gospel which begins with Bismilab, that is, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, is not the Gospel which God sent to Jesus Christ; and which they say begins with Bismillah, that is, in the name of God, clement and merciful. The latter Gospel, which they allege is the only true one, contains precious instructions; whereas the former Gospel, or that which Christians now possess, contains only a history of the life of Christ, written by four of his disciples.

ENGLAND (CHURCH OF). The ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH (which see), as has already been mentioned, yielded implicit submission to the see of Rome, and persecuted the ancient BRITISH CHURCH (which see), for resolutely maintaining its complete independence of the Pope. The invasion of England by William of Normandy in A. D. 1066, was not likely to make any material change in the relations of the English church to Rome, as the Norman monks themselves had been accustomed, in their own country, to own the supreme authority and infallibility of the Roman bishop. No sooner, however, did William seat himself on the English throne than he commenced a contest with the papacy which lasted till the Reformation. At the instigation of the Roman pontiff, the English bishops were deprived of their sees, and their places were occupied with successors imported from Normandy. Having filled their dioceses with bishops of his own nomination, William took upon himself the authority which the Pope had hitherto claimed,—that of nominating directly to all vacant ecclesiastical offices,—required all the priests to swear obedience to him, and demanded that all the decrees of synods should be countersigned by himself. This was a bold attitude for the Conqueror to assume when the chair of St. Peter was occupied by the haughty and unbending Hildebrand. But the Pope felt that while all the other monarchs in Europe bowed before him, William must not be rashly interfered with, and although he made several attempts indirectly to assert his pontifical authority over the English clergy, every effort of the kind was instantly repelled. William forbade the clergy to recognize the Pope, or to publish a single bull which issued from Rome without the royal approbation. He was resolved that the church, instead of ruling, should serve the king. All church-lands, therefore, he made liable to military services, which the Anglo-Saxon priests had been exempted from; and in many cases he seized upon the sacred vessels and treasures of the monasteries.

The reign of a line of Norman monarchs led of course to a complete change in the customs of the country. The French language came extensively into use, and the manners of the people rapidly assumed a Continental aspect. In no department, however, was the change more obviously apparent than in the ecclesiastical architecture of England. Stone structures were everywhere seen rising instead of the simple wooden churches of the Anglo-Saxons; and both the workmen and stone employed to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral A. D. 1187 were brought from Normandy. But the outward improvements which William the Norman introduced, were of little importance compared with the spirit of independence which was infused into the English clergy through his influence. Nor was William Rufus any more submissive than his father to the Roman pontiff. Taking advantage of the great Papal schism which took place during his reign, he refused to fill up ecclesiastical benefices as they became vacant, making use of the revenues for his own purposes. The archbishopric of Canterbury itself was thus left unfilled up for several years. At length the monarch changing his mind, appointed to the see of Canterbury A. D. 1093, Anselm, a firm supporter of the Papal see. The nomination of this remarkable man led once more to the entire subjugation of the English church to the will and authority of the Pope. Immediately on his arrival in England, Anselm took firm ground, resolved to maintain the rights of the church against what he considered the unwarranted encroachments of the sovereign. He commenced with an open avowal of the supreme authority of the then reigning Pope, Urban II., at the same time demanding the immediate restitution of the ecclesiastical revenues which William II. had seized. Henry I., who succeeded to the throne, yielded so far to the requirements of the new primate of Canterbury, but on one point the monarch was inexorable—the right of investiture. An appeal was made to Rome, and the Pope decided in favour of Anselm, to the no small umbrage of the disappointed monarch. A reconciliation, however, took place, through the interposition of Adela, the sister of Henry; when the right of investiture—giving the pastoral staff and ring—was yielded to the church, and that of homage retained for the temporal lord. Anselm had now obtained his utmost desires, in so far as the subjection of the English church to Rome was concerned, and he proceeded accordingly to destroy every remnant of independence for which the clergy had been indebted to the two Williams. With this view he forbade all ecclesiastics to take the feudal oath, and ordered them forthwith to put away their wives. The consequence of all this was, that in the close of the eleventh century, the clergy of England were in high favour at the court of Rome, and the Pope, to show his favour to Henry, submitted to him the choice of a bishop of St. David's, and at his request nominated to the see one of the queen's chaplains.

Amidst the confusion and disorder which King Stephen caused by his attempts to reduce the power of the barons, the see of Rome took advantage of the divided state of the country to seize upon several privileges, especially the power of deciding on ecclesiastical causes. Nor were the clergy without their own ambitious contentings at this time, for at the commencement of the reign of Henry II. a number of the more wealthy and powerful among the clergy sought to withdraw their benefices from Episcopal jurisdiction. But one dignitary of the church, Thomas à Becket, surpassed all his brethren in arrogance and ambition. In his own person he combined the two characters of an ecclesiastic and a politician, of a priest and a soldier, chancellor of England and archbishop of Canterbury. His story is soon told. We give it in the words of D'Aubigné. "The judges having represented to Henry that during the first eight years of his reign a hundred murders had been committed by ecclesiastics, the king in 1164 summoned a council at Clarendon, in which certain regulations or constitutions were drawn up, with the object of preventing the encroachments of the hierarchy. Becket at first refused to sign them, but at length consented, and then withdrew into solitary retirement to mourn over his fault. Pope Alexander III. released him from his oath; and then began a fierce and long struggle between the king and the primate. Four knights of the court, catching up a hasty expression of their master's, barbarously murdered the archbishop at the foot of the altar in his own cathedral church (A. D. 1170). The people looked upon Becket as a saint: immense crowds came to pray at his tomb, at which many miracles were worked. 'Even from his grave,' said Becket's partisans, 'he renders his testimony in behalf of the papacy.'

"Henry now passed from one extreme to the other. He entered Canterbury barefooted, and prostrated himself before the martyr's tomb: the bishops, priests, and monks, to the number of eighty, passed before him, each bearing a scourge, and struck three or five blows according to their rank on the naked shoulders of the king. In former ages, so the priestly fable ran, Saint Peter had scourged an archbishop of Canterbury: now Rome in sober reality scourges the back of royalty, and nothing can henceforward check her victorious career. A Plantagenet surrendered England to the Pope, and the Pope gave him authority to subdue Ireland."

England was now to a large extent under the authority of Rome, and the reign of King John completed the domination. Innocent III. having illegally nominated an archbishop of Canterbury, John was unwilling to acknowledge the prelate, whereupon the Pope laid the kingdom under an interdict; and such effect did this bold act of the Roman pontiff produce upon the mind of the monarch, that he laid his crown at the feet of the Pope's legate, declared that he surrendered his kingdom to the papal see, and made oath to him as to his lord paramount. These concessions to the Pope, and the great importance which, during the minority of Henry III., attached to the Pope's legate, gave to the court of Rome no small influence in England. The submission, however, of the sovereign to the domination of Rome, was by no means universally participated in by the people, an association having been formed including some of the nobility, to oppose and expel the foreign priests whom the Pope had instituted to the best English benefices. But this popular movement was unavailing, for while Cardinal Otho was legate at Henry's court, three hundred additional Italian monks received benefices in England between A. D. 1236 and A. D. 1240. In process of time the papal power and influence in England gathered strength, but suddenly it received a violent check by the appearance of Wickliffe, the morning star of the Reformation. This excellent and intrepid man, in the face of the most bitter persecution, set himself to expose the papal tyranny. His followers, who were called Lollards, increased so much in numbers, that they amounted to nearly one-half of the population of England. By Henry IV. they were treated with great severity, but the death of their most virulent enemy, Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1413, deprived the penal statutes of their violence, and left the Lollards for a time unmolested. It is true that the following year witnessed the execution of Lord Cobham, who openly avowed the opinions of these early reformers, but it is well known that his death rested as much on political as on religious grounds.

In the course of the fifteenth century the influence of the papacy in England underwent a gradual diminution. This is apparent from unsuccessful attempts which on two different occasions were made to raise supplies from the clergy. Thus Nicholas V. sent to King Henry VI. a blessed and perfumed rose, accompanied with a request that the ecclesiastics should be called upon to pay a large sum into the pontifical treasury, but while the gift was accepted, the demand was firmly refused. Again, in A. D. 1463, when Pius II. undertook a crusade against the infidels, he endeavoured to raise the necessary funds by taxing the clergy of Europe in a tenth of their revenues, but the result, in so far as England was concerned, miserably disappointed the expectations of the Pope.

Reformed principles had been slowly and insensibly making way among the English people from the days of Wickliffe, and independently altogether of those, and they were not a few who had embraced these principles from conviction, there were multitudes who were dissatisfied with the rapacity, ignorance, and religious indifference of the clergy. But what more, perhaps, than anything else, roused the indignation of the people against the ecclesiastics, was the claim which they boldly maintained, to be exempt from civil judgment for crime. This claim was so far modified by Henry VI., under whom a statute was enacted, that the privilege should be pleaded not at the outset, so as to prevent arrestment on a criminal charge, but at the arraignment after conviction. The change thus introduced only rendered the claim the more obnoxious, and the difficulty of asserting it on the part of the clergy all the greater. Under Henry VII. it was provided, that a clergyman convicted of felony should be burned in the hand; and, in 1513, a law was passed which both alarmed and enraged the ecclesiastics, benefit of clergy being taken from robbers and murderers, though an exemption was still made for priests, deacons, and subdeacons. The enactment of this law was resisted by the bishops, but without effect, the king expressing his determination to keep the power of the church within due bounds. Yet the reign of Henry VII. and the earlier part of the reign of Henry VIII was a period during which submission to the pontifical authority was as firm and apparently as deeply-rooted as in any country of Europe. The latter sovereign in particular entertained a profound reverence for mother church and her earthly head, while he had a warm regard for monastic learning. But the same principles and events which led to the Reformation in Germany were at work in England. The revival of learning and the teaching of the Greek and Latin classics had introduced a more elevated style of education among the higher and even the middle classes of society. The invention of the art of printing led to the wide diffusion of the best writings of the ancients. But the circumstance which more than any other prepared the way for the Reformation among the more intelligent classes of the population, was the translation of the Bible by Wickliffe into the English language. A lapse of several centuries had intervened since the production of the last Anglo-Saxon version of the Scriptures, and the appearance, therefore, in A. D. 1380, of a version of the Bible in the ordinary English of the time, was hailed as an event of the greatest interest and importance. This translation was completed before the invention of printing, and for a time manuscript copies of it were so rare that, in A. D. 1429, one of Wickliffe's Testaments could not be procured under £40 of our present money. Yet so violent was the opposition of both the clergy and the laity to the appearance of the Sacred Scriptures in the vernacular language, that in A. D. 1390, a bill was actually introduced into the House of Lords for the suppression of Wickliffe's Bible, and the measure was rejected only through the influence of the Duke of Lancaster. In A. D. 1408, in a convocation at Oxford, this version of the Scriptures was openly condemned, and an order issued that no translation of the Bible should be made in future. All attempts, however, to check the circulation of God's word among the people of England were ineffectual. It was rapidly and extensively diffused, and in consequence the community of England was prepared to hail the Reformation, which by God's providence was about to be introduced. One of the warmest supporters of reformed principles was Anne of Bohemia, the youthful spouse of Richard II. Having imbibed in the land of Huss the principles of a pure Bible Christianity, she brought with her to the shores of Britain a determined attachment to the Word of God, and a holy delight in those who adhered to the truth as it is in Jesus. Aided and encouraged, accordingly, by the Queen-mother, Joan, she threw the shield of her powerful protection over Wickliffe and the Lollards. The advantage of such patronage was soon felt. The truth made silent and rapid progress among all classes of the people; the hand of the persecutor was stayed; and the influence of Anne's high example, in studying the Word of God with a prayerful desire to learn the truth, speedily diffused itself far and wide to the no small annoyance and chagrin of the ghostly emissaries of Rome. This pious queen had never formally separated herself from the Romish Church. But though remaining nominally within its pale, she made no secret of her renunciation of all that was superstitious and erroneous in its tenets. Hers was the religion of the Bible, and hence, though outwardly a Papist, she was in reality and at heart a warm adherent of the doctrines of Wickliffe. While that reformer lived, indeed, he was indebted for protection from the violence of his enemies to the exertions in his behalf of Anne and her mother-in-law, assisted by John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who has been sometimes styled "the political father of the Lollards." Anne survived Wickliffe several years; and although, in the inscrutable providence of God, she was cut off at the early age of twenty-seven, she had done much during the twelve years of her married life to promote the cause of truth and righteousness. Richard was prevented from persecuting the Lollards as long as she lived, and even after her death, though he unhappily yielded so far to the influence of the clergy as to persecute in various forms, not a single Lollard was put to death during his reign.

Henry VIII., during the first nineteen years of his reign, was one of the most faithful and devoted sons of the Romish church; and so bigoted an adherent of the Papacy was this wicked monarch, that while Reformation principles were held by many of his subjects, there seemed to be not the remotest probability that they would ever be embraced by the sovereign. But unexpectedly a series of events occurred, which separated England at once and for ever from the domination of the Papal power. The circumstances were briefly these. The licentious monarch who at that time occupied the throne of England, attracted by the charms of Anne Boleyn, was anxious to obtain her as his wife. Being already married to Catharine of Arragon, it was impossible that his wishes could be gratified without a divorce from his present queen. To effect this, accordingly, he demanded the sanction of the Pope, which, however, in the face of repeated and urgent entreaties, was sternly refused. Finding that his Holiness was inexorable, the haughty monarch, rather than be disappointed of his object, threw off the yoke of Rome, claiming for himself within his own dominions that ecclesiastical supremacy which had been up to that period the admitted prerogative of the Pope. Thus, by the instrumentality of the evil passions of a wicked prince, did the Almighty Disposer of events rescue England from the supremacy of the Papal power—thus affording a striking illustration of the important Bible truth, that Jehovah "maketh the wrath of man," or even human wickedness of any kind, "to praise him, and the remainder of that wrath," or wickedness, "he doth restrain." As might have been expected, Popish writers have attempted to disparage the English Reformation as having had its origin in so unworthy a source. The occasion of an action, however, does not necessarily stamp its real character. The evil passions of men led to the crucifixion of our blessed Redeemer, and were thus the unintentional occasion of the most glorious event of which our world has ever been the theatre—the redemption of the human family. On the same principle, Henry, though bent only on evil, was unintentionally made the instrument of carrying out that blessed Reformation from Popery which is the glory of England. Before that period multitudes had renounced the errors and idolatry of Romanism, but it was then that the nation in its national capacity was dissevered from and rendered wholly independent of the Romish See.

Meanwhile attempts had been made to limit the power of the clergy, and the bishops especially had been censured in the House of Commons. An act was also passed to limit the clerical fees on probates of wills, which had been increased by Wolsey, and heavily complained of. In A. D. 1531, the clergy were likewise adjudged to have incurred forfeitures and imprisonment for having admitted that Wolsey possessed papal and legative jurisdiction; and they only procured the king's mercy by submitting to a fine of £100,000. A petition presented to Henry by the convocation on this occasion, addressed him as "Protector and Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England," qualifying it by the additional clause, "so far as is permitted by the law of Christ." Another step towards the diminution of clerical power and influence was the taking away of the ANNATES (which see), or first-fruits of benefices, which had been a continual source of discord between the Pope and the countries which owned his supreme authority. In A. D. 1534, an act was passed forbidding appeals to Rome from ecclesiastical courts, and protecting the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn from being annulled by the Pope. The last act, probably, of Papal supremacy in England under Henry VIII., was in the course of the same year, when the usual bulls were granted for establishing Cranmer as archbishop of Canterbury; for in the next session, a statute passed that bishops elected by their chapters on a Royal recommendation should be consecrated, and archbishops receive the pall without soliciting for the Pope's interference in any way. All dispensations and licenses hitherto granted by the Pope were transferred to the archbishop of Canterbury. The king was formally acknowledged to be the Supreme Head of the English Church, as had been two years before admitted by the convocation. The headship of the sovereign was not, however, universally held, and three priors, Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, were condemned and executed in 1534 for denying it, the crime being regarded as high treason.

The next great step in the English Reformation was the dissolution of the religious houses, amounting in number to 645, while their possessions were valued at one-fifth of the kingdom. Being exempt from episcopal visitation, they had gradually become perverted, and at different periods previous to that at which we have arrived, several monasteries had been suppressed by bulls obtained from the Pope, and their funds had been devoted to endowing colleges, first at Ipswich and Oxford, then at Cambridge and Eton. But now that Clement had issued his decree from the Vatican that Henry must abandon Anne and receive back Catharine, the enraged monarch resolved to make an end of the whole monasteries of the kingdom. Commissioners were immediately despatched to visit and examine all the religious foundations. An act was passed in A. D. 1536 giving to the crown all the smaller monasteries, amounting to 276, and in July 1539 the suppression was completed by the famous act which confirmed the seizure and surrender of abbots, when there fell to the crown a clear yearly revenue of £161,607. Besides taking possession of all the monasteries and their revenues, Henry seized the rich shrine of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, and his name as a saint was ordered to be erased from the calendar. A few of the abbots were pensioned for life. Some of the wealth thus obtained by the Crown was bestowed on the universities in the institution of colleges and professorships; and six new bishoprics were created. The abbots of Colchester, Reading, and Gloucester, having resisted to the last the forcible seizure of their houses, were executed for treason.

Amid these acts of violence, Henry seems to have had little or no desire to promote the cause of the Reformation in England, for at the very time that he was dealing thus with the Romanists, the laws against heretics were rigorously enforced, and several Protestants burned at the stake. In A. D. 1535, it is true, he wrote to Germany wishing to have a conference with the Reformed divines, particularly Melanethon and Bucer, but the reply which he received was, that "whilst he burned reformed preachers, he could not be treated as a friend to reformation." And even after he had suppressed the monasteries, and set up the English Bible in churches, Henry was still so much a Romanist at heart, that in A. D. 1539, at the instigation of Bishop Gardiner, one of the most bigoted Papists that ever wore the Episcopal mitre, he procured the enactment of the "Bloody Statute," as it has been called, which condemned to death all who supported the marriage of priests, and the giving of the cup to the laity, and all who opposed transubstantiation, auricular confession, vows of chastity, and private masses. Under this statute many suffered, both Romanists and Protestants.

That Henry, even to the end of his days, was a devoted son of the Romish church, is plain from the fact, that one of the latest actions of his life was the founding of a convent, and by will he bequeathed large sums to be spent in saying masses for the repose of his soul. Though Henry is often credited with being the author of the English Reformation, that great event had a deeper and a holier source than the actions of a profligate libertine. It was obviously, and throughout, the work of God. For a long course of years the reformed doctrines had been diffusing themselves widely among all classes of the community. The works of the reformed divines were eagerly read. English books were printed in the German or Flemish provinces, and no sooner were they imported into England, than they were received and read with such avidity, that in A. D. 1533 an act was passed, prohibiting the purchase of foreign books. The production, however, which met with the most eager acceptance, was the English Testament by William Tyndale, published at Antwerp in A. D. 1526. Several copies of this book were publicly burned at St. Paul's Cross, and the bishop of London bought up the remainder of the edition and committed the whole to the flames. With the supply of funds which the zeal of the bishop thus afforded to him, Tyndale published a new and improved edition, which was also transmitted to England where it made many converts to the principles of the Reformation. The translator was burned as heretic in A. D. 1536, but he had lived long enough to advance mightily the good work of God in England. The whole Bible in the English language, translated by Miles Coverdale, appeared in A. D. 1535, dedicated to the king, being the first edition of the Scriptures published by royal authority. Henry had before this time professed to favour the reformed party, and from hostility to Rome, rather than love to the Bible, he had ordered a copy of the Scriptures in Latin and English to be provided for every parish church in the realm, and chained to a pillar, or a desk in the choir, that any man might have access to it, and read it. Another injunction to the same effect appeared in A. D. 1538, along with a royal permission to read the Scriptures. Mr. Richard Thomson, in his Illustrations of British History, gives a rapid sketch of the various steps taken with the approbation of Henry to disperse the Bible throughout England. "An impression," he tells us, "of 1,500 copies was printed by Richard Grafton, of which every curate was directed to have one, and every abbey six. A proclamation, issued in May 1540, ordered this under a penalty of forty shillings a-month; and the price of the Bibles was fixed at ten shillings unbound, or twelve shillings well bound and clasped. When Bonnar was made bishop of London in this year, he set up six Bibles in certain convenient places in his cathedral, with an admonition to the readers, fastened on the pillars to which the books were chained. This admonition directed, that whosoever came to read, should prepare himself to be edified and made better, joining his readiness to the king's injunctions; that he should bring with him discretion, honest intent, charity, reverence, and quiet behaviour; that there should no such number meet together as to make a multitude; that no exposition be made thereupon but what is declared in the book itself; and, that it be not read with noise in time of divine service, nor any contention or disputation used at it.

"The most famous translation of this period, however, was that promoted by Archbishop Cranmer in 1534, after the Papal power was abolished in England, and the king's supremacy settled by Act of Parliament. It appeared in April 1539, being printed by Grafton and Whitechurch, and called 'the Great Bible;' but during the whole reign of Henry VIII. the friends of the Reformation were actively engaged in improving and introducing English versions of the Scriptures, which were eagerly received by the people, though they had many difficulties to encounter from the inveterate prejudices of a strong Romish party, and the inconstancy of an absolute sovereign. The holy books were generally received with joy throughout the realm; some aged persons even learned to read purposely to study it; and two apprentices, who had procured a copy, hid it under the straw of their bed, from fear of their master, who was a rigid Papist. The possession of the Scriptures, however, was by no means secure; since the king declared, in his proclamation, that his allowing them in English was not his duty, but his goodness and liberality to the people, of which he exhorted them to make no ill use. The Popish clergy, also, knowing that the reformed faith would be most effectually promoted by this privilege, did all in their power to discredit the translations. Bishop Tunstall affirmed, in a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, that there were 2,000 errors in Tindall's version; and Gardiner made a list of about 100 words in Coverdale's, which he thought unfit to be translated. These, in case of an authorized version, of which the clergy reluctantly admitted the expediency, he advised should still be left in Latin. The curates, also, were very cold in promulgating the Scriptures, and read the king's ordinances in such a manner, that few persons knew what they uttered. They also read the Bible carelessly to their parishioners, and bade them 'do as they did in times past, and live as their fathers, the old fashion being the best.' In a little tract, entitled 'The Supplication of the poor Commons,' complaint was made to the king, that after his order for placing Bibles in churches, many 'would pluck it either into the quire, or else into some pew where poor men durst not presume to come: yea, there was no small number of churches that had no Bible at all.' At length, in the parliament which met by prorogation January 22, 1542, the popish party was most prevailing, and passed 'an act for the advancement of true religion,' &c., which mentioned the people having abused the liberty of reading the Scriptures, and then condemned Tindall's translation as crafty, false, and untrue; and ordered the copies of it to be suppressed. The other versions not being by him, were allowed to be used, so that all annotations were defaced under penalty of forty shillings. The reading of the Bible was also restricted to persons appointed, or those accustomed to teach; and to noblemen, gentlemen, and merchants, being householders. But no women, except noblewomen and gentlewomen, who might read to themselves alone, and not to others,—nor artificers, prentices, journeymen, servingmen of the degrees of yeomen and under, husbandmen and labourers, might read the English Scriptures privately or openly, under penalty of a month's imprisonment. It is said, that the repeated complaints of the ill use which the people made of the Scriptures, in disputing and quarrelling about what they read, induced Henry to suppress all editions but that permitted by parliament, which, in fact, could not be ascertained."

Henry VIII., at his death in A. D. 1547, was succeeded by Edward VI., during whose brief reign every encouragement was given to the diffusion of the English Bible; and the bishops were ordered in their synods and visitations to examine the clergy as to their knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. Though the reign of this pious and youthful monarch extended to no more than seven and a-half years, such was the activity manifested in the circulation of God's Word in the vernacular language, that there were published in this brief space of time no fewer than eleven printed editions of the English Bible, and six of the New Testament. Various improvements were also introduced in the mode of conducting Divine service. The Epistle and Gospel of the mass were appointed to be read in English; and it was enjoined that on every Sunday and holiday, a chapter of the New Testament in English should be read at matins, and a chapter of the Old Testament at vespers. This order was exchanged in A. D. 1549 for the reading of two lessons from the Old and New Testament respectively immediately after the Psalms at morning and evening prayer.

The Reformation was carried forward with the most encouraging alacrity under Edward VI. All images were ordered to be removed from the churches; prayers were appointed to be no longer offered for the dead; auricular confession and transubstantiation were declared to be unscriptural; and the clergy were permitted to marry. These important changes in the public creed and practice of the nation received the cordial assent of both clergy and people; and the refractory prelates, Gardiner and Bonnar, were committed to the Tower. It was thought necessary that steps should be taken to prepare a series of articles of belief which might form the creed of the now Reformed Church of England. Accordingly, in A. D. 1549, the king was empowered to name a committee of sixteen bishops and clergymen, and sixteen laymen, for this important object; and in A. D. 1552, a series of articles, amounting in number to forty-two, were drawn up in a convocation held at London, and published by authority. These articles, upon which the Thirty-Nine articles now in use are founded, are said to have been chiefly drawn up by Cranmer and Ridley; but in all probability they were the production of a much larger number of bishops and divines, by whom they were carefully examined and matured. (See ARTICLES, THIRTY-NINE.)

In no country in Europe did the great Reformation of the sixteenth century work its way with more steadiness and caution than in England. Both in doctrines and ceremonies the English church underwent a slow but efficient improvement by the removal of those corruptions which had gradually defiled and almost completely defaced the pure and holy institution of the Christian church. At the instigation of Cranmer a committee of the convocation had prepared two works, which were published by authority for the guidance of the devout of the people. The first of these books, which was entitled 'The Godly and Pious Institution of a Christian Man,' was published in A. D. 1537; and the second, which was called 'A Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man,' was simply an improved edition of the former, published in 1540 and 1543. These works contained a few of the more important religious forms, such as the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, and the Ten Commandments. In consequence of a petition from the convocation, Henry VIII. appointed a committee of the higher clergy to reform the rituals and offices of the church, and the proceedings of this committee having been carefully considered by the convocation, led to the introduction of various improvements. The prayers for processions and litanies were translated into English, and brought into public use. A short time before Henry's death, the King's Primer was published, containing the prayers from the former books, the hymns called Venite, and Te Deum, along with several collects, all in English.

In the reign of Edward VI. the Liturgy was ordered to be performed in English. This was a most important alteration, as hitherto the whole ritual having been compiled at Rome, where the Latin tongue was spoken, consisted of a collection of prayers in the Latin language, with which the English people generally were entirely unacquainted. A great change was at this time introduced into the mode of administering the communion. Since the council of Constance, in A. D. 1414, it had been the invariable practice of the Romish church to deny the cup to the laity. In A. D. 1547, however, the English convocation first, and afterwards the parliament, decreed, that all persons should receive the sacrament in both kinds. This change led to the appointment of a committee of the clergy to prepare a uniform order for the communion, according to the rules of Scripture and the use of the primitive church. The same committee was charged in the following year to compose a new Liturgy, which was prepared in a few months, including the new communion office. The clergy, to whom this important task was intrusted, were men of note, both for character and learning, who were afterwards raised to distinction in the church, and the Liturgy thus formed was ratified by the king and parliament. It is generally known by the name of 'The First Book of Edward VI.'

The new Liturgy was afterwards revised by Cranmer, aided by two eminent reformers, Martin Bucer and Peter Martyr; and the alterations then made, chiefly consisted in the addition of the sentences, exhortation, confession, and absolution, with which the morning and evening services commence. Various ceremonies contained in the former book were omitted in this; for example, the use of oil in baptism; the anointing of the sick; prayers for souls departed; the order for mixing water with the wine; and several others. The habits of the clergy also prescribed by the former book were ordered to be disused, and the practice of kneeling at the sacrament was explained so as to prevent it from being confounded with the idolatrous worship of the wafer. This improved Liturgy, which was again ratified by parliament, frequently receives the name of 'The Second Book of Edward VI.'

The premature death of Edward, and the succession of Mary, went far to undo all that had been already done in the work of Reformation. One of the first acts of the new queen, on her accession to the throne in A. D. 1553, was to repeal the acts of her predecessor ratifying the Liturgy, as being inconsistent with the Romish ritual, which she was resolved to restore. The work of persecution now commenced, and many of the chief supporters of reformed principles were compelled to seek an asylum on a foreign shore. At Geneva they published in A. D. 1557 an English New Testament, the first in which the verses were distinguished by numbers.

The unhappy reign of the bloody Mary, as she is often termed, was soon at an end, and Elizabeth, who succeeded her, was as keen a Protestant as Mary had been a bigoted Papist. As soon as she ascended the throne, a new act was passed establishing the queen's supremacy, and repealing all the laws which had been passed in the reign of Mary for the restoration of popery. The English service was again brought into use. A commission of learned divines, among whom was Matthew Parker, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, was appointed to make another revision of King Edward's Liturgies, and to frame from them a Prayer-Book for the use of the Church of England. After considerable deliberation, the Second Book of King Edward was adopted by the commission, and ratified by parliament, with the addition of certain lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, a few changes in the form of the Litany, and the addition of two sentences in delivering the sacrament to communicants. One of the alterations in the Litany consisted in the omission of the words "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities," which formed a part of the last deprecation in both the First and Second Books of King Edward. To the first petition for the queen were added the words, "Strengthen in the true worshipping of thee in righteousness and holiness of life." The two sentences, which were inserted at the delivery of the sacrament, consisted of these words taken from King Edward's First Book, but omitted in the Second, "the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee," and "the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ which was shed for thee, preserve thy body and soul to everlasting life." Some alterations were made also in regard to the chancel and proper place for reading divine service. The habits mentioned in the First Book, but ordered to be disused in the Second, were restored. Two prayers for the queen and clergy were added to the end of the Litany, and a note, which had been inserted at the end of the communion service explanatory of the sense in which Christ was present in the sacrament, was omitted, that, in consequence of the difference of opinion which existed, the point might be left quite undetermined. The English Liturgy thus completed, was published at first in Latin only, and in A. D. 1571, an English version appeared under the auspices of convocation, and with some slight alterations. The new ritual was protected by the "Act of Uniformity of Common Prayer and Service in the Church," when a number of the clergy, including fourteen bishops, refused to conform. This Liturgy, however, was established for forty-four years, when various objections were offered to it by the Puritans.

During the reign of Elizabeth, the English Bible was very extensively circulated among all classes of the people. The Geneva Bible, which was dedicated to the queen, appeared soon after her accession, and no fewer than thirty editions of it were printed in England within sixty years—a fact which strikingly evinces the thirst for the Word of God which at this time prevailed among the English people. The most celebrated version of the Bible, however, which Elizabeth's reign produced, was that which is commonly known by the name of 'The Bishop's Bible,' having been prepared under the superintendence of Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury. It is said to have been undertaken by command of the queen herself, and the most careful arrangements were made that the work might be as complete as possible. The Scriptures were divided into about fifteen parts, which were distributed among eight of the English bishops, with a select number of learned laymen. To give unity to the design, the whole translation was executed under the direction and revision of the Archbishop himself, to whose laborious care and skill the work owes much of the celebrity which it obtained.

With the Reformation in England revived the practice of preaching discourses to the people expository of the Bible. This ancient custom, which had almost fallen into disuse, began now to be adopted by the most eminent prelates of the English church. In the reign of Edward VI. there was only a quarterly sermon, which Elizabeth in A. D. 1559 ordered to be exchanged for a regular monthly discourse, while James I. in 1603 commanded the clergy to deliver a sermon or homily every Sunday. Multitudes of the clergy, however, were quite incompetent to discharge this part of their duty, and to such an extent did this deficiency prevail in the close of Elizabeth's reign, that no fewer than 8,000 parishes were occupied by ministers who were unfit to compose pulpit discourses. To remedy this defect, two books of homilies, or short sermons, were prepared and issued, with the injunction that one of the sermons should be read every Sunday and holiday, when no sermon was preached. The first volume was published in A. D. 1547, and consists of brief discourses, beautifully blending the doctrinal and the practical, which are supposed to have been written by Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. The second volume, which did not appear till A. D. 1563, is wholly attributed to Bishop Jewel.

Edward VI., in his diary, laments that the prejudices of some of the bishops prevented him from carrying out to the utmost of his wishes a reform in the outward ceremonies of the church. The Protestants of England were by no means satisfied with the limited extent to which Luther went in the improvement of the ritual, and although they were scarcely prepared to go so far as Calvin, they were still earnestly desirous that some of the more obnoxious rites and practices which Luther tolerated, should be removed from the reformed Church of England. This was particularly the case with priestly vestments, tapers, the Latin missal, images, crucifixes, and the elevation of the host. It is far from being improbable, that had the valuable life of Edward VI. been protracted a few years longer, the Church of England would have approached nearer than it does to the theory of Calvin in its forms, doctrine, and discipline. The limited extent to which the reform of its ritual proceeded, compared with the ritual of many of the Protestant churches on the Continent, gave rise to the dissenters called Puritans, and to that separation from the church of a large body of conscientious Protestants, which has continued down to the present day.

Though Queen Elizabeth outwardly favoured the cause of the Reformation, and even persecuted in some cases the adherents of Popery, she was personally inclined to some of the tenets of the Roman Church, and some of the gorgeous ceremonies of its ritual. She is said to have used prayers to the Virgin, and to have retained for a long time in her own private chapel the crucifix, and lighted tapers, even when these were ordered to be removed from all other churches throughout the kingdom. And it is worthy of remark, that during her whole reign, the act which had been passed by Mary against the marriages of the clergy continued unrepealed, and it was not until A. D. 1603, under James I., that the repeal of this statute took place, thus enabling ecclesiastics to marry without license, or any restriction whatever. But notwithstanding Elizabeth's secret attachment to some parts of the Romish ritual, she had given sufficient encouragement to the reformed cause to incur the wrath of the Pope, and in A. D. 1569 she was visited with a sentence of excommunication, followed up by a bull deposing her from her throne, absolving her subjects from their allegiance, and threatening them with a curse if they ventured to obey her. This assault on the part of Rome severed the last link which bound the queen to the Papacy.

Elizabeth now found herself engaged in a twofold contest, with the Romanists on the one hand, and the Puritans on the other. She declared her determination to uphold the reformed Church of England, of which she was by law the supreme earthly head. Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles was made imperative. Both the Papists and the Puritans, who had outwardly conformed to the church during the twelve first years of Elizabeth's reign, now abandoned their parish churches, and formally separated from the establishment. Meanwhile, both in the Church and the Parliament, there was a party of tolerable strength and influence who sought to remove the grounds of dissent, by proposing extensive alterations in the rites and ceremonies of the church; but the queen was inexorable, and by acts of cruelty and intolerance disgraceful to her character and reign, she strove to silence the scruples and suppress the objections of a large and respectable body of her subjects. Nor was Elizabeth less lenient towards her former friends the Romanists. Against them, as well as against the Puritans, she put forth the strong arm of violence, persecuting them in many different ways. The universities were shut against them, and all means of educating their priests in England were taken out of their hands. In consequence of these harsh, intolerant measures, the first Popish college was established at Douay in A. D. 1568, which was ten years after removed to Rheims. Another college was also founded at Rome by Gregory XIII., for the education and training of English priests. Several passed from these foreign seminaries to propagate the Romish faith in England, but it was declared treason to harbour them. One act was passed after another, bearing with the utmost cruelty upon the adherents of the Romish church, and they were even prohibited from proceeding on any pretence whatever to the distance of five miles from their ordinary residence, on pain of forfeiting their goods, and the profits of their lands for life.

The accession of James I. to the throne of England, on the death of Elizabeth, seemed to hold out prospects more favourable to the Puritans, though not to the Papists. Having been reared in connection with the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, it was surely to be expected that his sympathies would be with the Puritans rather than the Prelatists; but no sooner did he find himself securely seated on the English throne, than he straightway declared himself favourable to an Episcopal church, asserting his conviction, that "where there was no bishop, there would shortly be no king." But, notwithstanding this rapid abandonment of his former sentiments, the new monarch yielded so far to a petition presented by the Dissenters in A. D. 1603, that he reformed some of the abuses of which they complained, ordered a revisal and improvement of the Liturgy, and procured an admirable translation of the Scriptures into the English tongue, which continues to hold its place as the only authorized version of the Bible down to the present day. The alterations made in the English Liturgy at the Hampton Court Conference, which was called by James, were few and unimportant, consisting chiefly of the addition of a petition in the Litany, and a Collect in the Morning and Evening Prayer, on behalf of the Royal Family, with the Forms of Thanksgivings on several occasions. These changes were published by the king's authority, and universally adopted, though they were never ratified by Parliament. No particular alterations were made in the English Liturgy, either during the reign of Charles I., or during the Commonwealth, but on the restoration of Charles II., the Presbyterian clergy were urgent with the king to call a conference on the subject. This was accordingly done, but to no effect, except that some alterations were proposed by the Episcopal divines, which were soon after reconsidered and agreed to by the whole clergy in convocation. The principal of these were the adoption of more appropriate lessons for certain days; the separation of occasional prayers from the Litany; alterations in the Collects, the Epistles and Gospels, which were now taken from the new version of the Scriptures; and additions of the Offices for Adult Baptism, the Sea, the King's Martyrdom, and the Restoration. Several other trifling changes were made, and the Preface was composed by Dr. Sanderson, bishop of Lincoln. The Common Prayer Book, in its revised form, was subscribed by the whole clergy in convocation on the 20th of December 1661, and in March following it was formally ratified by the English Parliament. The only addition which has subsequently been made to the Book of Common Prayer, is the Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving used on the anniversary of the Sovereign's accession to the Throne. The office now in use is that which was prepared on the accession of Queen Anne in 1702, and which was partly new, and partly composed of that prepared for James II.

In the reign of James I. both the Puritans and the Roman Catholics were treated with great severity, many of the former being compelled to leave the country for Holland, whence considerable numbers of them afterwards emigrated to America. Under this monarch the doctrines afterwards taught by Arminius in Holland began to be embraced and promulgated by a considerable number of the Episcopalian clergy in England. Thus not only was the English church assailed by Puritans and Romanists from without, but she contained within her own pale two parties differing widely from one another in their doctrinal sentiments, the one party holding Arminian, and the other Calvinistic principles. These internal dissensions were carried on with great acrimony, and the debated points were at length publicly discussed in two conferences of the clergy held in A. D. 1625. Charles I. was keenly opposed to the Puritans both within and without the church, and the high-handed policy of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, led to the laws of uniformity being enforced against the Dissenters. This prelate was with good reason suspected of intending to introduce the Romish religion again into England. Both the people and the parliament were soon aroused to a sense of the danger to which the country was exposed from an arbitrary monarch and a semi-popish primate. Steps were taken in A. D. 1640 to check the innovations of Laud, and the severities by which they were supported. The right of the bishops to sit in parliament now began to be openly discussed, and numerous petitions were laid on the table of the House of Commons, praying for the abolition of the Episcopal form of church government.

The Puritan party had now obtained an ascendancy in the country, and the Commons, yielding to the popular wishes, passed an act declaring that no bishop should have a vote in parliament, judicial power in the star-chamber, or bear any authority whatever in temporal matters. Under the same influence a bill was brought into parliament for abolishing the practice of making the sign of the cross in baptism, of wearing the surplice in divine service, and bowing at the name of Jesus. The rails about the communion tables were ordered to be removed, and the parliamentary soldiers, in their zeal against Episcopacy, committed the most outrageous acts of spoliation upon the churches and cathedrals, breaking the organs, defiling the fonts, tearing in pieces the Bibles and Prayer-Books. A bold attempt was now made to establish Presbytery on the ruins of Episcopacy. In the Westminster Assembly which met in A. D. 1643, the Presbyterians formed a decided majority, but the bold stand which a small but able and learned knot of Independents made, prevented any effective steps being taken to convert the English church from an Episcopalian into a Presbyterian body.

The ecclesiastical establishment of England sunk every day during the Commonwealth in public estimation. In A. D. 1644, Christmas day was ordered to be observed as a fast instead of a festival. The Liturgy was forbidden to be used in public; and the parish-churches were occupied chiefly by Presbyterians or Independents. To such an extent were matters carried by Cromwell, that he issued a proclamation prohibiting any minister of the Church of England from preaching, administering the sacraments, or teaching schools, on pain of imprisonment or exile. The Liturgy was still read only in a few private families, and the established clergy were now almost wholly silenced, the religious world of England being divided between Independency and Presbytery.

The restoration of Charles II., however, brought back matters to their former state. The Liturgy was restored in A. D. 1660, and in a short time the Act of Uniformity passed, by which all who refused to observe the rites and subscribe to the doctrines of the Church of England were excluded from its communion, and if ecclesiastics, they were deprived of their offices. This act came into operation on the 24th August 1662, when about 2,000 conscientious ministers were thrust from their benefices, being unable to conform. The death of Charles II. and the succession of James II. excited at first some hopes of an improvement in the position of the Non-conformists, as the crafty prince commenced his reign by a declaration, allowing liberty of conscience to all his subjects, suspending and dispensing with the penal laws and tests, and even with the oaths of supremacy and allegiance. This apparent liberality to the Dissenters was coupled with the most discouraging treatment of the Church of England, an ecclesiastical commission having been issued by which seven persons were invested with a full and unlimited power over the whole establishment. Beneath all these movements of the king lay a secret design of restoring Popery to the place which it had formerly held in England as the established religion of the country. This fondly cherished purpose, instead of being accomplished, led to that strong revulsion of feeling which accomplished the revolution of 1688, and finally established the Protestant Reformed Church of England. The reign of William III. who, after the expulsion of James, was placed upon the throne, was decidedly favourable to the Dissenters, the Toleration Act having been passed, which delivered the Protestant Non-conformists of all kinds, except Socinians, from the penal effects of the Act of Uniformity. The abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland, however, and the restoration of Presbytery as the established religion of that country, excited some fear, groundless as it proved, in the minds of many of the English clergy, lest William might interfere with their church. The only remarkable feature, however, in this period of the history of the Church of England, was the dispute which arose within the church in 1689 between the Non-Jurors and Jurors, or High Churchmen, and Low Churchmen. The Non-Juring partly refused to acknowledge the title of William III. to the crown of Great Britain, under the belief that James II., though excluded, was still their rightful sovereign. They maintained the doctrine of passive obedience, or that it is not lawful for the people, in any circumstances, to resist the sovereign. They held that the hereditary succession to the throne is of divine right, and cannot be altered; that the church is subject only to God; that the bishops deposed by William III. continued bishops, notwithstanding this deposition, during the whole of their natural lives, those who were substituted in their places being usurpers, rebels in the state, and schismatics in the church, as were all who held communion with them; and that this schism would fall upon the heads of those who did not repent and return to the church.

The eighteenth century opened with bitter contentions between the High and the Low Church parties, not on points of theological doctrine, but on points of political and party strife. Both religion and learning were then at a low ebb in the Church of England, and yet to this dark period is due the formation of two religious societies, which have been instruments of incalculable good from that day down to the present. We refer to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, which was instituted in 1698, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign parts, which received a royal charter in 1704. A few years after, the BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY (which see) arose, which is chiefly remarkable as having led to the final dissolution of convocation in 1717, in so far as the dispatch of public business is concerned. Both houses meet, it is true, regularly at the commencement of each session of parliament, but though the members may deliberate and discuss, they have no power to decide a single point. (See CONVOCATION.) Of late various attempts have been made by a party in the Church of England to procure a revival of convocation, but hitherto without effect. It assembles by royal writ, but the royal license is withheld, and, therefore, it is destitute of the powers of a provincial synod.

At first the suppression of convocation was felt by many of the English clergy to be a great hardship, but it appears, by withdrawing them from the harassing anxieties of public affairs, to have led them to devote their time and attention more exclusively to their strictly professional studies and pursuits. There was in consequence a decided improvement at this period in the character of English theological literature. It assumed a more vigorous, massy aspect than it had done for a long time previous. The piety of the Church of England also received no slight impulse from the labours of John and Charles Wesley, Whitfield, and their followers. (See ME-THODISTS.) These earnest men, with apostolic zeal, travelled from place to place, throughout the length and breadth of England, preaching the truth as it is in Jesus. Admiring crowds waited on their ministry, while many of the parish churches were literally deserted. The consequence was, that a spirit of bitter persecution against the Methodists arose among not a few of the English clergy. This active hostility, however, was to a great extent limited to the subordinate orders of the clergy, while the bishops acted with greater caution and reserve. Whitfield having adopted Calvinistic opinions, and the Wesleys being partial to Arminian tenets, the Methodists split into two parties, which have formed separate communions ever since under the respective names of Wesleyan Methodists and Calvinistic Methodists. Though the Church of England had been strongly Arminian since the Restoration of the Second Charles, they persecuted the Wesleys and their followers with the bitterest rancour and animosity.

During the latter half of the eighteenth century the Church of England made little progress in sound theological learning, or in earnest efforts for the propagation of the truth. A spirit of coldness and indifference to vital religion prevailed extensively among the clergy, and still more so among the laity. A large association was formed at this time, called, from their place of meeting, the Feathers Tavern Clergy, which petitioned the Legislature for the removal of the damnatory clauses from the Athanasian Creed, and the repeal of the Act of Elizabeth, which required subscription of the Thirty-Nine Articles from every ordained minister of the church. These lax views, though entertained by a large body of the clergy, and adopted by a few members of the Commons House of Parliament, led to no such changes as they desired. A keen war of pamphlets ensued on the subject of subscription to the Articles, but the Feathers Tavern Association was so overborne by the force of public opinion that it soon ceased to exist, and down to the present day the subscription ex animo of the Thirty-Nine Articles is imperatively demanded, by the laws of the church, from every candidate for holy orders. Towards the end of the last century and the first half of the present, the Church of England has been evidently growing in vitality and vigour. Evangelical truth is more generally taught in her pulpits, and though since 1833 the ANGLICAN CATHOLICS (which see), have been growing in numbers and influence, never probably at any time since the Reformation has the church had a firmer hold on the affections of the English people. The numerous efficient institutions which have been formed within her pale for the diffusion of the Gospel, strikingly manifest the living power which animates her as a great section of the Church of Christ. Dissent is strong at present in England, but the Church of England has an immeasurably stronger influence over the public mind than all the forms of dissent combined together.

can possibly boast. Since the present century began the greatest activity has been, from time to time, manifested on the part of the church in overtaking, as far as possible, the spiritual destitution which prevails chiefly in London and other large towns. In this important work no fewer than between two and three thousand additional churches have been built. The funds for these numerous erections have been supplied partly by private benefactions, and partly by parliamentary grants.

The Church of England though united in adherence to one common creed, as contained in the Thirty-Nine Articles, is nevertheless divided into three different parties, commonly known by the appellations of the High Church, the Low Church, and the Broad Church. The High Church party have always entertained strong views of the authority of the church, the apostolical dignity of the clergy, and the efficacy of the sacraments. On these points their opinions resemble those of the Tractarian or Anglo-Catholic party, with whom accordingly they have become almost completely identified. The Low Church again, or the Evangelical party, have no such Romanizing tendencies, but avow the pure Scriptural doctrines of the best writers among the Reformers. They have no sympathy with the views of the Anglo-Catholics, and though in some instances they can scarcely be said to be thoroughly Calvinistic in their doctrinal sentiments, they are far from entertaining the low Arminian views which are but too prevalent among the High Churchmen. On the contrary, they profess to hold the doctrine of justification by free grace, through faith alone. The Broad Church party is of comparatively recent date, having been originated by Dr. Arnold of Rugby. It occupies a middle place between the High Church and the Low Church parties, and is founded on the principle that every doctrine must be subjected to the investigation of human reason. It may be considered, therefore, as rationalist in its views, though by no means running into the extreme sentiments promulgated by the Rationalists of Germany. Some of the party, it is true, are alleged to have imbibed views approaching to Socinianism, but they are unwilling to acknowledge themselves chargeable with so serious a departure from sound doctrine.

The doctrines of the Church of England are embodied in her Articles and Liturgy; her mode of worship is prescribed in her Book of Common Prayer; and her discipline is regulated by the Canons of A. D. 1603. There are three Courts of discipline in England, that of the Bishop, that of the Archbishop, and highest of all, that of the Sovereign, which is termed the Privy Council, and which hears and finally decides all appeals from inferior ecclesiastical courts.

There are three orders of clergy in the Church of England, BISHOPS, PRIESTS, and DEACONS (which see), and besides these there are several dignities, including Archbishops, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, and Rural Deans. All these orders and dignities have certain territorial jurisdictions assigned to them. The population of the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1851, the year when the last census was taken, was 12,785,048; and that of York 5,285,687. At the same period the number of rural deaneries was 463, and the number of archdeaconries was 71. England is divided into two archbishoprics or provinces, Canterbury and York, the former including twenty-one bishoprics or dioceses, and the latter seven. The average population in March 1851 of each diocese of England and Wales was 645,383, which is a higher average than is to be found in any other country of Europe. The benefices in England and Wales are 11,728. The clergy amount in number to about 18,000. All the archbishops, bishops, and deans, and a considerable number of the clergy, are appointed by the crown. Of the 11,728 benefices, 1,144 are in the gift of the crown; 1,853 in that of the bishops; 938 in that of cathedral chapters and other dignitaries; 770 in that of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the colleges of Eton, Winchester, &c.; 931 in that of the ministers of mother-churches; and the residue, amounting to 6,092, in that of private persons. By the last census there were 14,077 existing churches, chapels, and other buildings belonging to the church. There are three kinds of incumbents in the English church; rectors, vicars, and perpetual curates. Rectors receive all the tithes of the parish; vicars and perpetual curates are the delegates of the tithe impropriators, and receive a portion only of the tithes. These appointments are for life. The ordinary curates are appointed by the incumbent whom they assist.

The income of the Church of England is derived from the following sources; lands, tithes, church-rates, pew-rents, Easter offerings, and surplice fees, that is, fees for burials, baptisms, &c. To increase the stipends of incumbents of the smaller livings, the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty annually receive the sum of £14,000, the produce of First-Fruits and Tenth (see ANNATES), and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners apply to the same object a portion of the surplus proceeds of episcopal and capitular estates. The whole revenues of the church are supposed to amount to not less than £5,000,000 a-year, distributed in the most unequal manner among the various orders of clergy, so that while the dignitaries have enormous incomes, the hard-working curates receive often a mere paltry pittance seldom exceeding £80 a-year.

ENIPEUS, a river-god worshipped anciently in Thessaly, and another river-god of the same name was worshipped in Elis.

ENOCH. See EDRIS.

ENOLMI, a name sometimes given to the priestess of Apollo at Delphi, because she sat on the tripod called Olmos.

ENTHRONISTIC LETTERS, letters anciently addressed by Christian bishops immediately after their instalment to foreign bishops, announcing their promotion to the episcopal office, and giving an account of their faith and orthodoxy, that they might receive in return letters of peace and Christian communion. If any newly ordained bishop failed to send these communications, the omission was regarded as tantamount to a refusal to hold communion with the rest of the Christian world.

ENTHRONIZATION, the form or ceremony of conducting a newly ordained and consecrated BISHOP (which see), to his chair or throne in his cathedral. This practice is of very ancient standing, and was usually performed by the other bishops present, and on placing him in his episcopal chair, they all saluted him with a holy kiss. A portion of Scripture was then read, after which the new bishop delivered a discourse, which, from the occasion on which it was spoken, received the name of the Enthronistic Sermon.

ENTHUSIASM, that state of mind in a religious person in which the imagination is unduly heated, and the passions outrun the understanding. In minds which have been but imperfectly cultivated, some degree of enthusiasm perhaps generally accompanies religious impressions at their commencement. "It is not uncommon, however," as Mr. Robert Hall judiciously remarks, "to find those who, at the commencement of their religious course, have betrayed symptoms of enthusiasm, become in the issue the most amiable characters. With the increase of knowledge, the intemperate ardour of their zeal has subsided into a steady faith and fervent charity, so as to exemplify the promise of scripture, that the 'path of the just' shall be 'as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' As the energy of the religious principle is exerted in overcoming the world; so that variety of action and enlarged experience which the business of life supplies, serves to correct its excesses and restrain its aberrations.

"There are some who, proscribing the exercise of the affections entirely in religion, would reduce Christianity to a mere rule of life; but as such persons betray an extreme ignorance of human nature, as well as of the Scriptures, I shall content myself with remarking, that the apostles, had they lived in the days of these men, would have been as little exempt from their ridicule as any other itinerants. If the supreme love of God, a solicitude to advance his honour, ardent desires after happiness, together with a comparative deadness to the present state, be enthusiasm, it is that enthusiasm which animated the Saviour, and breathes throughout the Scriptures."

ENTHUSIASTICS, a name given by the ancient Greeks to the VATES (which see), who pretended to utter prophecies by the perpetual influence of an indwelling demon.

ENTHUSIASTS, a name given to the sect of the EUCHITES (which see), because they pretended to be inspired, and to hold converse with the Holy Spirit.

ENYALIUS, a surname frequently applied in Homer's Iliad to ARES (which see), the god of war and the Spartan youths are said to have sacrificed young dogs to Ares under this name. At a later period Enyalios was regarded as a separate god of war, the son of Ares and Enyo. The epithet Enyalios was sometimes applied also to DIONYSUS (which see.)

ENYO, the goddess of war among the ancient Greeks, who accompanied Ares or Mars when he went forth to battle. A statue of this goddess accordingly stood in the temple of Ares at Athens. Among the Romans the goddess of war was called BELLONA (which see).

EONLIANS, the followers of Eon d'Etoile, a wealthy nobleman of Bretagne in the twelfth century. Being a person of a highly excitable temperament, and an ill-regulated imagination, he happened one day, on hearing the common formula used among the Romanists for exorcising evil spirits, "Per Eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos," that is, "By Him who will come to judge the quick and the dead," to conceive the idea, that, from the similarity of the word Eum to his own name Eon, he must be the person who is to come to judge the quick and the dead. Being of a pleasing address, and generally attractive manners, this extravagant enthusiast drew great crowds of people after him. He travelled through the country, causing so much excitement among the people, that he was arrested by the authorities, and committed to prison, where he died. Even after the death of their leader, his followers continued to hold him in great reverence, and persisted in declaring that he would come again, as he had said, to summon the world to general judgment. A number of the most obstinate of his adherents were burned at the stake. So great importance was attached to the reveries of this fanatic, that he was formally condemned at the council of Rheims, A. D. 1148, at which Pope Eugene III. presided.

EONS. See ÆONS.

EOQUINIANS, a sect which arose in the sixteenth century, deriving their name from their leader, Eoquinus, who taught that Christ did not die for the wicked in any sense whatever, but only for the faithful. They seem to have held the Calvinistic doctrine of a particular atonement.

EOS, the Greek name for the goddess AUROKA (which see).

EOSTRE, an ancient Saxon goddess, who was worshipped in the spring about the time of the Jewish passover. She is generally supposed to have been identical with ASTARTE (which see). From the name of this goddess, Eostre, it has been supposed by various writers that the Christian festival, held in many churches in honour of the resurrection of Christ, has received the name of Easter.

EPACT, a number which indicates, in general chronology and in the tables for calculating Easter, the excess of the solar above the lunar year. The solar year consists in round numbers of 365 days, and the lunar year of 354 days, so that there is an excess of 11 days in the solar above the lunar year. This excess is called the Epact.

EPACTÆUS, a surname of Poseidon, and also of APOLLO (which see).

EPAINE, a surname of PERSEPHONE (which see).

EPAPHUS, the name given by the Greeks to the Egyptian divinity APIS (which see).

EPARCH, an archbishop in the modern GREEK CHURCH (which see).

EPARCHY, a term corresponding in the RUSSO-GREEK CHURCH (which see), to the word diocese among us. The number of eparchies in Russia is discretionary, and entirely at the will of the sovereign. They are superintended by metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops. The eparchies are generally named after the place where the prelate resides, and not after the province. Catharine II., by an ukase of the 24th February 1764, divided all the eparchies, as well as the monasteries and nunneries, into three classes. In the two first she placed archbishops and archimandrites over the monasteries and nunneries, and in the third class bishops and hegumeni. At present the whole of Russia is divided into thirty-six eparchies, which in extent are nearly the same with the civil divisions into provinces and governments.

EPEFANOFTSCHINS, a sect of dissenters from the Russian Greek church. It takes its name from a monk, who, in 1724, by forged letters and recommendations, got himself ordained bishop, and was in consequence arrested by government, and put in prison, where he died. Some persons hold him to have been a legal bishop, and, looking upon him as a martyr, make frequent visits to his tomb at Kief. The Epefanofschins are not numerous, and though they have some peculiarities, they are nearly the same with the Old Ceremonialists or STAROBRADTZI (which see).

EPHOD, a portion of the dress of the high-priest of the Hebrews. It was a vest which was fastened on the shoulders, and of very rich and splendid construction. The ephod is thus described by Moses, Exod. xxviii. 6—12, "And they shall make the ephod of gold, of blue, and of purple, of scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work. It shall have the two shoulder-pieces thereof joined at the two edges thereof; and so it shall be joined together. And the curious girdle of the ephod, which is upon it, shall be of the same, according to the work thereof; even of gold, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. And thou shalt take two onyx stones, and grave on them the names of the children of Israel: six of their names on one stone, and the other six names of the rest on the other stone, ac-ording to their birth. With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the names of the children of Israel: thou shalt make them to be set in ouches of gold. And thou shalt put the two stones upon the shoulders of the ephod for stones of memorial unto the children of Israel: and Aaron shall bear their names before the Lord upon his two shoulders for a memorial." In this passage, it may be observed, that the materials of the ephod are described rather than the form, which, indeed, it is difficult precisely to ascertain. Commentators have generally agreed in considering it as approaching to the form of a short double apron, having the two parts connected by two wide straps united on the shoulders. The point of union seems to have been under the two onyx stones, where they rested on the shoulders. Josephus calls the ephod a short coat with sleeves, a description of it which is given by no other writer. Jerome speaks of it as resembling the Roman cloak called caracalla, but without the hood. Calmet describes it as a sort of sash. Bähr attaches chief importance to the shoulder-pieces, which he thinks were intended to denote dignity, authority, and command. To each of the shoulder-straps was affixed a precious stone, on which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. The two main pieces of the ephod hung down, the one in front, and the other behind, Josephus says to the extent of a cubit, which would bring their lower extremity nearly to the loins. It is not improbable, however, that the hinder portion reached almost to the feet. Two distinct bands issuing from the sides of either the anterior or posterior portion of the ephod formed, what is termed in Scripture, "the curious girdle of the ephod," which passed round the body just under the arms, so as to bind it closely round the region of the heart. From Professor Bush we learn, that Gassetius, one of the ablest of the Hebrew lexicographers, is disposed to give to the whole ephod the form of a belt or girdle fitting close to the body.

As to the materials of which the ephod was made, it appears to have been a kind of brocade formed of fine linen, and gold thread interwoven, and adorned with scarlet, purple, and blue. Maimonides professes to give a minute account of the mode of its construction. He says that the workmen took one thread of pure gold, and joining it with six threads of blue, twisted the whole into one. He did the same with one thread of gold and six of purple, and with one of gold and six of scarlet, and with one of gold and six of fine linen. Thus in twenty-eight threads there were four of them of gold. This description is probably incorrect, as so small a quantity of gold could scarcely convey to the ephod the brilliant appearance which it is said to have possessed, and which has led it to be spoken of in Rev. i. 13, as "a golden girdle."

Though the ephod formed properly a part of the dress exclusively worn by the Hebrew high-priest, a plainer vestment of the same kind came to be worn also by the ordinary priests. Samuel, who was only a Levite, seems to have worn an ephod, and David, who was not even a Levite, had a garment of this kind when he danced before the ark. We learn from 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, that on one occasion Saul consulted the Lord by Urim, and therefore must have used the ephod of the high-priest; and on another occasion, 1 Sam. xxx. 7, David is said to have done the same. These latter instances, however, of Saul and David, are explained by some writers as simply implying not that they themselves used the ephod, but employed the priests to use it.

On the two precious stones of the ephod were engraven, as has been already mentioned, the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, six on the one shoulder, and six on the other. The Rabbins say, that the letters on these two inscriptions were so equally divided, that Joseph's name was written "Jehoseph," in order to make just twenty-five letters in each stone. See HIGH-PRIEST.

EPHOD (ROBE OF THE), a mantle of sky-blue wool, which was worn by the Jewish high-priest over the inner tunic or shirt. It was worn immediately under the ephod, and hence its name. To this part of the high-priest's garments there is an evident allusion in Rev. i. 13, where our blessed Lord is said to have been "clothed with a garment down to the feet." The robe of the ephod is thus described by Professor Bush: "It was a long linen gown of sky blue colour, reaching to the middle of the leg. It was all of one piece, and so formed as to be put on, not like other garments which are open in front, but like a surplice, over the head, having a hole at the top for the head to pass through, which was strongly hemmed round with a binding or welt to prevent it from rending, and with openings or arm-holes in the sides in place of sleeves. Round its lower border were tassels made of blue, purple, and scarlet, in the form of pomegranates, interspersed with small gold bells, in order to make a noise when the high priest went into or came out from the holy place. We are not informed of the exact number of the pomegranates and bells. The Rabbinical writers are mostly unanimous in saying, there were seventy-two in all, which is doubtless as probable as any other conjecture on the subject. It will be observed, that while the body of the robe was entirely of blue, this ornamental appendage in the skirts was richly dyed of variegated hues, and must have rendered the whole a vestment of exquisite beauty." The Hebrew name of this robe is mêil, which is translated by the Septuagint, "an undergarment reaching down to the feet."

EPHODION. See VIATICUM.

EPHOROI (Gr. inspectors), a name which some of the ancient Christian writers gave to bishops.

EPHPHATA (Gr. be opened), a ceremony practised in the ancient Christian church in the case of catechumens. It consisted in touching their ears, and saying to them, Ephphata, Be opened, denoting the opening of the understanding to receive the instructions of faith. St. Ambrose derives this custom from our Saviour's example, when he uttered Ephphata, as he cured the deaf and the blind. Few writers make any reference to this practice, which seems not to have been followed very extensively in the church. See CATECHUMENS.

EPICLESEIS. See COLLECT.

EPICUREANS, a sect of ancient Greek philosophers, the disciples and adherents of Epicurus, who flourished in the fourth century before Christ. Having studied the systems of Plato and Democritus, he showed a decided preference for the latter; but without keeping strictly to the opinions of any other school, he formed a school of his own. The fundamental principle of the Epicurean philosophy is, that happiness or complete enjoyment is the chief good of man, towards which his efforts ought to be mainly directed. The gratification of one's own desire of happiness is, therefore, according to this selfish system of philosophy, the grand end of all human action. There is here no abstract goodness, righteousness, or truth, no motive which has its central point anywhere else than in the individual man.

The system of Epicurus was essentially materialistic in its character, strictly following up the atomic hypothesis of Democritus. It viewed man as connected with the external world by a series of emanations issuing from outward objects, and combining with the human organization. The sensations or impressions to which the outward world thus gives rise in the Epicurean philosophy, are combined in man with a power of generalizing these sensations, and thus forming abstract notions, which, as anticipations or presumptions, form the foundation of all reasoning.

Epicurus thus reached two principles, one originating from without, and the other from within the human being, and the result of these two principles is the reason of man. The great employment of reason is, to secure pleasure and avoid pain, and thus to attain happiness. Pleasure and happiness then are identical.

But besides the metaphysical and moral opinions of Epicurus, he taught also a peculiar system of cosmology. He believed with Democritus that indivisible, eternal, and indestructible atoms are the principles of all things; but he somewhat improved upon the system of his master as to the motion of these atoms. Democritus taught that the atoms moved in a straight line in the infinite void. This hypothesis did not appear to Epicurus sufficient to explain the mechanical structure of the universe, and therefore, he endowed them with a second motion, in an oblique line, by which, being borne along in different directions, he imagined they might give rise to the various phenomena of the universe. In his view, not only was the production of material objects thus accounted for, but also that of the soul of man, which he regarded as composed of matter more refined and ethereal in its nature than the body, but equally subject with it to mortality. A system of philosophy so completely material in its character amounted to Atheism, or the denial of a creating and superintending God. The whole movements of the universe, both in its origin and continued action, were the movements of an automaton or self-acting machine. Not that Epicurus denied the existence of the gods, but adhering still to his materialistic views, he invested these celestial beings with material bodies like those of men, but more perfect and ethereal in their nature; and these gods, clothed in human bodies, were represented as wrapped up in their own unchanging felicity, and utterly indifferent to the affairs of sublunary mortals. Thus did the Atheism of Epicurus deny both creating power and providential government.

EPIDAURIA. See ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES.

EPIDOTES, a god worshipped at Lacedemon. It was also a surname of Zeus and some other gods.

EPIGONATON, a portion of the sacerdotal habit, used in both the Greek and Roman churches, consisting of an appendage somewhat resembling a small maniple, worn on the right side hanging from the girdle. It has been supposed to refer to the towel or napkin with which our blessed Lord girded himself when he washed the disciples' feet. Others regard it as an allusion to the words, "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty." This piece of dress, which has generally a cross upon it, is used in the Romish church, only by the Pope. In the Greek church it is worn by all bishops, and consists of a square of brocade, velvet or some stiff material, a foot in dimension, with a cross wrought upon it, and tassels hanging from the three lower corners. This article of dress forms no part of the sacerdotal vestments worn in the English church.

EPILENÆA, sacred games celebrated among the ancient Greeks in the time of vintage, before the press for squeezing the grapes was invented. They contended with one another in treading the grapes, who should soonest press out the must; and in the meantime they sung the praises of Dionysus, begging that the must might be sweet and good.

EPIMANICIA, the maniples or hand-pieces of the priests of the Greek church. They are provided with epimanicia for both arms, whereas the MANIPLE (which see) of the Romish priesthood is worn on the left hand alone. The patriarch wears both the epimanicia at one time. They are supposed to represent the bonds of our Lord Jesus Christ.

EPIMEDES, one of the CURETES (which see).

EPINICION, a triumphal hymn used in the communion service of the ancient Christian church. It consisted of the words, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts." It has sometimes been confounded with the CHERUBICAL HYMN (which see).

EPIPHANY, a Christian festival instituted in honour of the manifestation of Christ as the Messiah, or his consecration to the office of Messiah at his baptism by John, and the beginning of his public ministry. It is mentioned by Chrysostom as an ancient principal feast of the church in Eastern Asia, and in another passage the same writer calls it the first among the principal feasts, and the only one which had reference to the appearance of Christ among men. From the Eastern, this festival spread to the Western church, and accordingly, we find Ammianus Marcellinus relating, that in A. D. 360 the Emperor Julian, residing at Vienna in the month of January, celebrated the feast of Epiphany in the Christian church. The Donatists, who had separated from the dominant church at a time when no such festival was known in the West, refused to adopt it, as being in their view an innovation coming from the Eastern church. Clement of Alexandria says, that the Gnostic sect of the Basilidians kept Epiphany in his time at Alexandria. Neander thinks that this festival in all probability originated with Jewish Christian churches in Palestine or Syria. At an early period the festival of Epiphany was adopted as a special season for administering baptism, in addition to the seasons of Easter and Whitsuntide. Gregory Nazianzen appears to have been acquainted with the custom of baptizing on Epiphany. It was also observed in the churches of Jerusalem and Africa.

When the Christmas festival was introduced from the Western into the Eastern churches, many churches in the East, such as the churches of Jerusalem and of Alexandria, instead of keeping two separate festivals, preferred combining the two into one. A separation of the two festivals, however, in the Alexandrian church took place in the fifth century. The union of Christmas with Epiphany was attempted to be defended by a reference to Luke iii. 23, from which passage, it was inferred, that the baptism of Christ took place on the very day of his nativity. In many of the Greek churches the festival of Christmas received the name of Epiphany or Theophany. In course of time the Epiphany came to denote the day on which the wise men came from the East to worship the infant Jesus, that being the day on which Christ was first specially manifested as a light to lighten the Gentiles. In Germany this feast is called the day of the holy three kings. Some have alleged that it was also observed in commemoration of the first miracle wrought by our Saviour in Cana of Galilee, and that other miracle by which he fed five thousand men with five loaves and two small fishes. It was called often in ancient times, as it is still called in the Greek church, the feast of Lights, as having its origin from the baptism of Christ, "the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Chrysostom says, that in this solemnity, in memory of our Saviour's baptism, by which he sanctified the nature of water, they were accustomed to carry home water at midnight from the church, and lay it up, where it would remain as fresh and uncorrupt, for one, two, or three years, as if it were immediately drawn out of any fountain. By the laws of Justinian both Christmas and Epiphany were ordered to be held with great veneration, the courts of law and the theatres being shut on these days. Epiphany was the time at which notice was appointed to be given when Easter, Lent, and all the moveable solemnities were to be kept during the ensuing year.

Epiphany or Twelfth Day is observed with peculiar solemnity in the Greek church. On that day the ceremony takes place which is termed the Greater Benediction of the Waters. Dr. King, in his 'Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia,' gives the following description of the manner in which this rite is celebrated in St. Petersburg: "On the river, upon the ice, a kind of wooden church is raised, painted and richly gilt, and hung round with pictures, especially of St. John Baptist; this is called the Jordan, a name used to signify the baptistery or font. The Jordan is surrounded by a temporary hedge of the boughs of fir-trees; and in the middle of it a hole is cut through the ice into the water; a platform of boards, covered with red cloth, is laid down for the procession to pass upon, also guarded with a fence of fir-boughs. After the liturgy is finished in the chapel of the imperial palace, the clerks, the deacons, the priests, the archimandrites, and the bishops, vested in their richest robes, and carrying in their hands lighted tapers, the censer, the Gospel, and the sacred pictures and banners, proceed from the chapel to the Jordan, singing the hymns appointed for the office; followed by the emperor and the whole court. All the troops of the city are drawn up round the place, the standards of the regiments are also planted upon it, and all the artillery. The artillery and soldiers fire as soon as the service is finished, and then are sprinkled with the sanctified water. The water is held in such estimation by the common people, that they look on it as a preservative from, as well as cure of, not only spiritual but natural infirmities. The aged, the sick, and especially children, are brought in numbers to receive the benefit of these waters, by drinking them, or by aspersion or immersion. Vast quantities are carried home by them in bottles to be kept in their houses for the use of their families during the ensuing year. It is considered as having great efficacy to drive away evil spirits; therefore, they have a singular custom in the evening, when this service is performed in the church, of marking a cross upon their window-shutters and doors, in order to hinder those spirits, when chased from the water, as they are believed to be by the consecration, from entering into their houses."

The Mingrelians observe the practice of blessing the waters on Epiphany, but in a manner somewhat different from that which has just been described. Picart describes it thus: "A priest preceded by a trumpet, accompanied by a standard-bearer, the officer who carries the oil, and a calabash or bowl, in which there are five wax-tapers, made in the form of a cross, and another attendant, who carries the sacred fire and the frankincense, repairs to the river which is nearest to him, and reads, upon the bank-side, some prayers adapted to the solemn occasion; after that, he thurifies or incenses the waters, pours oil into them, and then lights the wax-tapers in the calabash or bowl, which he sets afloat upon the surface. In the next place, he puts a cross and his holy-water stick into the river, and besprinkles the assistants, who wash themselves in the consecrated waters, and carry away with them a greater or less quantity of it, in proportion to their zeal and ardency for devotion."

The Copts also have their Epiphany, on which the following rites are practised as described by an old writer: "As soon as the midnight office was over, which was read at the conservatory of water, wherein they were to plunge, the patriarch withdrew to the vestry, from whence he returned in a short time, dressed in all his pontifical vestments, attended by a priest and a deacon with his cope on. The former officiated in his alb, and the latter bore a steel cross. As soon as they were got to the conservatory, the patriarch began his benediction of the water, by reading several lessons, some in the Coptic language, and others in the Arabic, out of the Old and New Testament. Afterwards he thurified the water, and stirred it several times crosswise with his pastoral-staff. The priests who were present repeated the same ceremony after him. During this benediction there was a large iron sconce with three branches, about six feet high, and in each of them a wax-candle burning. After the benediction was over, the congregation were allowed to plunge themselves, or were plunged into the conservatory: and as the three who could get there first had the happiness of being plunged by the patriarch himself, it is easy to imagine what hurry and confusion this imaginary act of devotion must create, where there was no regard had to common decency or modest behaviour. After the men were all plunged in this holy water, they withdrew into the choir, and the women moved afterwards with the same irregularity, to bear a part in this immodest, religious ordinance, which may justly be compared to the lewd and dissolute festivals of the Pagans." The Armenians also observe the ceremony of blessing the waters on Epiphany, but in a somewhat different manner: "In the first place, a large bason of water is placed at the door of the sanctuary, all the clergy march in procession out of the vestry, and ascending the steps of the sanctuary, continue their procession round the bason. The celebrant, who has said mass just before, reads several prayers over the water in the bason, dips his cross into it, and afterwards makes the sign of the cross in the water with it, and at last pours some chrism into it. After that the faithful wash themselves in it, and carry some of the water home with them, where they make the same use of it as the Latins do of their holy water."

A peculiar custom has been long observed by the monarchs of Spain on the festival of Epiphany, that of offering three chalices or communion-cups, one containing a piece of gold, another a portion of incense, and the third a portion of myrrh. For a long period, also, the kings of England offered gold, frankincense and myrrh. In this custom there is evidently an allusion to the Eastern magi presenting to the young child Jesus offerings of gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

EPIPHANIANS, a branch of the CARPOCRATIANS (which see).

EPISCOPIA, a name sometimes given in the ancient Christian church to the wife of a bishop. The word is used in this sense in the second council of Tours, where it is said, that if a bishop hath not a wife, there shall no train of women follow him.

EPISCOPÆ, a name given to the DEACONESSES (which see) of the ancient Christian church.

EPISCOPACY, that form of church government which recognises a distinction of ranks among the ministers of religion, having as its fundamental article that a bishop is superior to a presbyter. The Presbyterians, on the other hand, assert a complete parity, in respect of office and authority, of those who preach and administer the sacraments, whatever difference there may be among them in age, talents, and learning. A full view of the arguments on both sides has been given under the article BISHOP.

EPISCOPALIANS, a name given to those who hold that peculiar form of church government which is called EPISCOPACY. (See preceding article.) The Church of Rome is Episcopalian in its constitution, and acknowledges the Pope as Universal Bishop, to whom all the various orders of clergy, cardinals, primates, and patriarchs, archbishops and bishops are subordinate. In the class of Episcopalian churches, also, must be ranked the Greek church, which, besides the Patriarch of Constantinople, who is Ecumenical or Universal Bishop, has other subordinate patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, along with various orders of inferior clergy. The Russian church, which is an independent branch of the Greek church, maintains a strictly episcopalian form of government under the Holy Legislative Synod, the superior clergy consisting of metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops. The Armenian church is similar in government to the Greek church, their Catholicos being equivalent in rank and authority to the Greek patriarch. All the ancient Eastern churches, including the Copts, Abyssinians, and others, are Episcopalian. The government of several of the Lutheran churches appears to be a mixture of Episcopacy, Presbyterianism, and Independency, but especially of the two former. This is the case with the German Lutheran church. The churches of Sweden and Denmark, however, are wholly Episcopalian. The Reformed churches, both those which are Zuinglian and those which are Calvinian, are not Episcopalian, but Presbyterian in their form of government. The church of the United Brethren or Moravians is also Episcopalian, though they allow their bishops no pre-eminent authority.

The Church of England is strictly Episcopalian in its ecclesiastical constitution, and differs both from the Lutheran and Reformed churches, with which it holds no ecclesiastical communion. Professing to derive its episcopal succession from the Church of Rome, it recognises the validity of Romish orders, while Presbyterian ordination is rejected as null and void. Before the Act of Uniformity was passed in 1662, the orders of Presbyterian churches were admitted by the Church of England, and it was not until the time of Laud that the slightest doubt came to be entertained as to their validity. In the reign of Elizabeth, the ministers of foreign churches, even although ordained in the Presbyterian form, were by express enactment declared to be admissible to English benefices, simply on obtaining the license of the bishop. Accordingly, many presbyterially ordained ministers were found occupying pastoral charges within the pale of the Episcopalian church. The question, however, of the validity of the ordination of Presbyterian ministers was brought under public discussion in England in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Episcopacy had been thrust upon the Scottish people by James I. after his succession to the English throne, and that the new bishops might be consecrated with due Episcopalian form, three of them were despatched to London for ordination, though they had previously been regularly ordained Presbyterian ministers. Andrews, Bishop of Ely, raised the difficulty, whether these three Scottish ministers ought not to be ordained priests before being consecrated as bishops. In reply to this difficulty, Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, maintained that Presbyterian orders were quite valid, otherwise there would be no lawful ministry throughout the foreign Reformed churches. This last opinion prevailed, and the proposal to re-ordain the bishops-elect from Scotland fell to the ground. The Act of Uniformity produced a complete change in the practice of the church in this matter, no minister, not episcopally ordained, being allowed to enter the pulpits of the English clergy. Accordingly, when Charles II. re-established Episcopacy in Scotland, Leighton, Sharp, and others, who had only received Presbyterian ordination, were ordained priests before being consecrated to the Episcopate. In 1689, Episcopacy was abolished in the Church of Scotland, and "all superiority of any office of the church in this kingdom above Presbyters." From that day, down to the present, while Episcopacy has been the established form of religion in England, that of Scotland has been Presbyterian.

EPISCOPAL (PROTESTANT) CHURCH OF AMERICA. This large and respectable body of Christians had its origin in the scattered congregations which sprung up in North America in the beginning of the seventeenth century, composed chiefly of English emigrants, who had been reared in the doctrine, worship, and discipline of the Church of England. From 1607 to the close of the American Revolution in 1783, all the Episcopal clergy in all the English colonies were under the supervision of the Bishop of London. The consequence was, that for more than one hundred and seventy years, the Protestant Episcopal Church of America enjoyed no proper episcopal supervision, there being no bishop in the country invested with the power of conferring holy orders or admitting to the communion by confirmation. Such a state of things was far from favourable to the progress of the church in America. Attempts were made at various periods to remedy the evil. In the reign of Charles I. a project was devised of sending a bishop to New England, but it was not carried into effect. After the restoration of Charles II. a similar proposal was made by Lord Clarendon, and a patent was actually made out for the consecration of a bishop of Virginia, but this plan also was defeated. The subject was again and again mooted, but to no practical purpose. The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, which was chartered in 1701, took up the matter, but the death of Queen Anne prevented them from accomplishing their purpose. Some of the dignitaries of the Church of England felt a deep interest in the Transatlantic branch of their church, and in 1715, Archbishop Tenison bequeathed £1,000, for the support of bishops in America. At length steps were taken in Scotland among the non-juring bishops for carrying out the long-desired project. Two bishops consecrated for the American church, the Rev. Robert Welton and the Rev. John Talbot, sailed across the Atlantic in 1723. But the British government would neither allow colonial bishops to be ordained in England, nor would they permit bishops to officiate in the colonies who had been ordained elsewhere. Mr. Welton, accordingly, had scarcely set foot on the shores of America when he received orders immediately to return to England, and the other bishop, Mr. Talbot, having died soon after his arrival, this scheme also failed.

The subject of the appointment of bishops for the American church was once more taken up in England, and the Bishop of London resolved to consecrate the Rev. Mr. Colebatch, his suffragan, to officiate in the colonies, but the new bishop was prohibited by government from leaving the kingdom. Still the Society for Propagating the Gospel earnestly pressed the matter, and their efforts were seconded by nearly the whole Episcopal branch at the time; but all was to no purpose, the Dissenters, both in England and the colonies, giving the most strenuous opposition to the consecration of bishops for the American church. And it was not until the Americans had asserted their political independence of Britain, that they were able to obtain bishops for themselves. In 1783 they despatched the Rev. Samuel Seabury for England to receive episcopal consecration, but unfortunately insuperable obstacles presented themselves. It was found that the bishops could not consecrate a bishop for an independent country without a special act of parliament authorizing them to do so, which permission parliament would not grant. Dr. Seabury, therefore, after spending ten months in London, with no prospect of obtaining the fulfilment of his wishes, repaired to Scotland, where, without hesitation, the non-juring bishops of that country consecrated him to the Episcopal office as Bishop of Connecticut. This act of the Scottish Episcopalians was immediately followed by a change in the views of the English government, and no difficulty was now experienced in obtaining full permission for the English bishops to consecrate other bishops for the American Episcopal Church. An act of parliament was passed in 1787 empowering the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London to consecrate three bishops for the dioceses of Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia.

The Protestant Episcopal church is the oldest Protestant church in the United States. The first congregation of the body was formed at Jamestown in Virginia, in 1607, and enjoyed under the English government all the privileges of an established church. The number of congregations gradually increased, not only in the new colony of Virginia, but in the colony of Maryland, and also in New York, since 1693. But till the American Revolution, its clergymen could only be ordained in England, and were mostly chosen, as well as partially supported, by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Since the Revolution this church has made steady, but by no means rapid progress. Its present position is thus sketched by Dr. Schaff: "It does not properly correspond so well as the Puritan and Presbyterian churches to republican institutions; and on account of the English sympathies, which a large number of its clergy cherished for very obvious reasons, during the Revolutionary war, it incurred suspicion of a want of patriotism, and was, therefore, for a long time unpopular. Yet, it has in its favour staunch old English traditions, an important theological and practical religious literature, and a name of renown even in the history of America—for Washington, for instance, and most of the great statesmen of Virginia, belonged to it—and by its compact, imposing, and personally responsible form of government, and its liturgical worship, without any special missionary efforts, it has a strong attraction for the higher classes and the polite, yet would-be religious world. It may be called, in a certain sense, the aristocratic and fashionable church of the United States, which, however, involves at the same time a serious defect, since in the church of Christ all distinctions of society ought to disappear in the feeling of common guilt and common salvation, and before the awful realities of the eternal world. From its clergy

The President chooses most of the chaplains for the army and navy. In the country, in the lower orders of society, and in the west, it has very feeble hold; but in the great cities of the east it is wealthy and strong. In New York, for example, it possesses, not by any means the most intelligence and piety—in these it must yield to the Presbyterian—but the greatest outward splendour, the most imposing and costly churches, and the fattest livings. With a mass of high-flying men of the world, who attend its worship merely for fashion's sake, and perhaps also for the music, but never think of such a thing as thorough conversion, it numbers among its members many truly pious persons, whose religious life is more evenly and harmoniously formed, than that of most Puritans. The large accession which the Episcopal Church continually receives from other denominations, is, by no means, to be referred entirely to outward considerations, but, in many cases, to deeper inward grounds. Many laymen, and even Puritanically or Methodistically educated clergymen, pass over to it, because they see in it the true mean between the extremes of Puritanism and Romanism, and because they think, that it alone equally meets both the evangelical Protestant and the Catholic interests. Yet many such Episcopal clergymen, who have come from other Protestant denominations, have been driven by the same desire for a fixed objective ecclesiasticism and a liturgical altar-service, beyond this via media into the Roman camp."

In the American Episcopal Church, as well as in the English Church, there have always been two parties; the High Church party, which takes its stand on the episcopal constitution and the theory of apostolic succession, and, more than all, on the Book of Common Prayer; and the Low Church party, which takes its stand with equal right on the Thirty-Nine Articles, being Calvinistic in the doctrine of election, and Zuinglian in the doctrine of the sacraments. There is also, as in England, a considerable and daily increasing party, corresponding to the Broad Church school, of which Dr. Arnold was the founder. The ANGLO-CATHOLICS (which see), also, are rapidly making way in America. We learn from Dr. Schaff, that "almost half the Episcopal ministers there are more or less Puseyistic, and several among them, including Bishop Ives of North Carolina, have passed over to the Romish church; while most content themselves with the idea of an Anglo-Catholicism, in hope of a future, closer union with the Eastern churches, and the Roman bishop as patriarch of the West."

In several points the American Episcopal Church differs from the mother-church in England. Her liturgy omits the Athanasian Creed, the prayers for the Royal family, the services which relate to the death of Charles I., to the restitution of the Stuarts in 1660, and to the Gunpowder plot under James I. But besides these comparatively trifling peculiarities, the American church, from its position as being situated in a republican country, is free from the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown, which is an essential feature of the English church; and accordingly, all the passages in the Thirty-Nine Articles, the Liturgy, and the Canons which bear upon the headship of the Sovereign, have been either struck out or modified. The Protestant Episcopal Church in America enjoys full freedom of action, and has the privilege of self-government. It has also full lay representation. The organization of the church is thus described by Dr. Schaff: "It is divided into dioceses according to the political divisions of the country, the names of the dioceses corresponding to the number and names of the States; while the Roman Catholics name their sees after the larger cities. Only the great State of New York has two dioceses—an eastern and a western. At the head of each diocese stands a bishop, who is usually at the same time rector of one of the more important congregations, and is in part supported by it, or draws his salary from the interest of a special fund, or, if there is no such fund, or if it is not sufficient, from the annual collections made by his Presbyters. Every spring he assembles all the Presbyters of his district, with as many lay delegates as there are parishes, in a diocesan convention. He, as president, opens the convention with a charge, consisting of a statistical report of his official labours during the past year, with appropriate exhortations, and sometimes theological expositions. Here all the affairs of the diocese are attended to. To this body belongs also the power of electing the bishop of the diocese, of choosing a standing committee as his council, and of presenting him for trial. Every three years the General Convention, as it is called, assembles in one of the larger cities of the Union, for the most part in New York and Philadelphia alternately. Agreeably to the arrangement of the old English convocations and of the British Parliament and the American Congress, this convention consists of two houses, an upper, or the house of Bishops (now numbering thirty-one or two), which sits with closed doors, and is presided over by the oldest or senior bishop—for there are no archbishops as in England—and a lower, or the house of clerical and lay deputies, which is composed of an equal number of Presbyters and lay delegates from all the dioceses, none being allowed to send more than four of each order, and which holds its deliberations in open church. This triennial General Convention is the supreme judicatory of the Episcopal Church in all matters of doctrine, worship and discipline. The concurrence of both houses is necessary to the enactment of a law. The vote is counted by dioceses. The house of Bishops has a veto upon the acts of the lower house. This power may prevent many useful reforms but also many useless changes or dangerous innovations, especially in an age and country, which has a morbid passion for law-making."

There were thirty-five bishops in the United States in 1854, belonging to the Protestant Episcopal church. The salaries of the clergy are regulated by an agreement between them and their people. The number of clergy amount to 1,700, the churches to 1,500, the communicants to 105,000, and the adherents to 1,000,000. Of all the Protestant denominations in the United States, this has perhaps the fairest prospects of success. There is at present a movement on foot, in which, however, the bishops do not sympathize, for rendering this church increasingly efficient and popular. What is to be the result of the movement, time alone can determine, but with the self-accommodating power which it possesses, and the advantage of lay representation, this church may yet be honoured to do much towards advancing the cause of Christianity in America.

EPISCOPATE, the office of a BISHOP (which see).

EPISCOPI EPISCOPORUM (Lat. bishops of bishops), a name sometimes applied to bishops in the ancient Christian church, because, as Epiphanius says, they make bishops by ordination.

EPISCOPI SENATUS (Lat. bishops of the senate), a name given in the Canon Law to the CHAPTER OF A CATHEDRAL (which see).

EPISCOPISSÆ, a name sometimes given to the DEACONESSES (which see) of the ancient Christian church.

EPISCOPUS JUDÆORUM (Lat. bishop of the Jews). The Jews in England under the first Norman kings, had over them an officer under this name, licensed by the crown, who judged and ruled them according to their own law.

EPISCOPUS ŒCUMENICUS, universal bishop, a title which the Greek bishops of the larger sees and chief cities of the East were sometimes arrogant enough to assume. When this title was adopted by John the Faster, patriarch of Constantinople, in a council held in A. D. 588, Gregory the Great opposed his pretensions with the utmost vehemence, and in order to establish more firmly his own authority as bishop of Rome, and, therefore, sitting in the chair of Peter, he invented the fiction of the power of the keys as committed to the successor of St. Peter, rather than to the body of the bishops, which had been the recognized opinion up to that time. In one of his letters, he says, "I am bold to say that whoever adopts or affects the title of UNIVERSAL BISHOP has the pride and character of antichrist, and is in some manner his forerunner in this haughty quality of elevating himself above the rest of his order. And indeed both the one and the other seem to split upon the same rock; for as pride makes antichrist, strains his pretensions up to Godhead, so whoever is ambitious to be called the only or universal prelate, arrogates to himself a distinguished superiority, and rises as it were upon the ruins of the rest." Only two years after the death of Gregory, who penned these words, Pope Boniface

III. sought for and obtained the title of UNIVERSAL BISHOP from the Greek Emperor, and the date of this event A. D. 606 is generally considered by Protestant writers as the date of the full revelation of ANTICHRIST.

EPISCOPUS REGIONARIUS, a bishop in former times, whose labours were confined to no particular place, but who wandered about from one district to another.

EPISOZOMENE, a name given by the Cappadocian Christians to ASCENSION-DAY (which see), probably because on that day our salvation was perfected.

EPISTEMONARCH (Gr. epistemai to know, and archo to rule), an officer in the Greek church, whose office it is to watch over the doctrines of the church, and to examine all matters relating to faith.

EPISTLE, the first lesson in the Communion Service of the Church of England, deriving its name from the circumstance that it is generally taken from the Apostolic Epistles; though sometimes it is taken from the Acts, and occasionally from the writings of the Old Testament Prophets. The Epistles occur not only in the Liturgy in its present form, but also in both the First and Second Books of King Edward VI. Dr. Hook thinks that they are as old as the time of Augustine in the sixth century. Bishop Stillingfleet says, that for four hundred years till the time of Pope Celestine, the Romish church had neither psalms nor lessons from the Old Testament read before the Communion, but only Epistle and Gospel. In other churches, they had lessons out of the Old Testament as well as the New.

EPISTLER, an ecclesiastical officer mentioned in the Canons of the Church of England, and in the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, whose duty it was to read the Epistle in collegiate churches. He was appointed to be dressed in a cope. The office is now obsolete, but it is mentioned in the original constitution of Norwich cathedral, founded by charter of King Edward VI.

EPISTLES. This term is usually applied specially to those letters contained in the New Testament, which were addressed by the apostles on various occasions to different Christian churches. They amount in number to twenty-one, and are divided into two classes, the Pauline Epistles, or those which were penned by the Apostle Paul, and the CATHOLIC EPISTLES (which see), or those which were addressed not to particular individuals or churches, but to Christians generally. Fourteen of these Apostolic Letters were written by the great apostle of the Gentiles. They are arranged in the New Testament not chronologically, or in the order of time, but according to the rank or importance of the societies or persons to whom they were addressed. The present arrangement is that which was followed in the time of Eusebius, who flourished in the beginning of the fourth century, and also probably of Irenæus, who lived in the second century. The Catholic Epistles are seven in number, and contain the letters of the Apostles James, Peter, John, and Jude.

The Apostolic Epistles afford abundant confirmation of the truth and authority of Christianity. They strikingly establish the most important facts mentioned in the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles. The chief particulars of our Lord's life and death are referred to in such a way as to show that the writers were familiarly acquainted with them, as having themselves been eye-witnesses of the same; nor do they rest their claim to be believed on the mere ordinary footing of human testimony, but they appeal to the possession of miraculous gifts with which as apostles they were endowed, and which fully established their divine mission. The Epistles are in fact inspired commentaries on the doctrines of the Gospel, giving a fuller, more systematic, and clearer display of evangelical truth than is to be found in any other portion of the Sacred Volume. See BIBLE

EPISTOLÆ CANONICÆ. See CANONICAL LETTERS.

EPISTOLÆ COMMENDATORIÆ. See COMMENDATORY LETTERS.

EPISTOLÆ DIMISSORIÆ. See DIMISSORY LETTERS.

EPISTOLÆ SYNODICÆ, a name sometimes given to ENTHRONISTIC LETTERS (which see), but more generally used to indicate the circular letters by which a primate summoned a synod of the ancient Christian church.

EPIHALAMIUM (Gr. epi, upon, and thalamos, a marriage), a marriage song. It was customary among the Jews in ancient times to sing a song accompanied by musical instruments, in praise of the bridegroom and bride. See MARRIAGE.

EPITRACHELION (Gr. epi, over, and trachelion, a neck-piece), a vestment of the Greek ecclesiastics, which, instead of being put round the neck like a scarf, is joined at the centre, and has an orifice left at its upper end that it may be passed over the head. It is usually of rich brocade, and ornamented with gold and costly gems.

EPOCH. See ÆRA.

EPONA, the Divine protectress of horses among the ancient Greeks. Images of her, whether in painting or sculpture, were frequently found in stables.

EPONAMON, a name given by the natives of Chili in South America to the Devil, as being strong and powerful. See DEVIL-WORSHIP.

EPOPSIUS, a surname of ZEUS, APOLLO, and POSEIDON (which see).

EPOPTÆ. See ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES.

EPULONES, a special order of priests among the ancient Romans. They were originally three in number, and were first appointed B. C. 198 to preside at the EPULUM JOVIS (which see), and the festivals held in honour of the other gods. Their number was afterwards increased to seven, and Julius Cæsar added three more; but in a short time the number was again reduced to seven. The epulones formed a college or religious corporation recognized by the state. "They had their name," says Kennet in his Roman Antiquities, "from a custom which obtained among the Romans in time of public danger, of making a sumptuous feast in their temples, to which they did as it were invite the deities themselves; for their statues were brought on rich beds with their pulvinaria or pillows, and placed at the most honourable part of the table as the principal guests. These regalia they called epulæ or lectisternia; the care of which belonged to the epulones."

EPULUM JOVIS (Lat. the feast of Jupiter), one of the festivals of the ancient Romans held in honour of the father of the gods. At these heathen feasts, in commemoration of their deities, splendid couches were prepared, on which were laid images of the gods, and rich entertainments set before them. On these occasions the Epulones presided. See preceding article.

EQUIRIA (Lat. equus, a horse), two festivals, celebrated the one in February, and the other in March, by the ancient Romans, in honour of Mars, the god of war. Horse races were the principal amusement on these occasions, and hence the name.

ERA. See ÆRA.

ERASTIANS, those who adhere to the opinions first publicly avowed by Thomas Erastus, a doctor of medicine at Heidelberg in Germany, in the sixteenth century. A public dispute took place in A. D. 1568, on certain theses concerning the necessity of church government, and the power of presbyteries to excommunicate unworthy persons. The debate was conducted on the one side by Mr. George Withers, who had left England in consequence of the controversy concerning church ceremonies; and on the other side by Erastus, who, although at an earlier period he had held the opinion that excommunication is warranted by the Word of God, now came forward openly to defend the doctrine that the church has no power to exercise discipline of any kind, but is entirely subordinate to the authority of the civil magistrate. Erastus, however, did not proceed so far, in his published writings, as to deny wholly, and in all cases, the right of the church to excommunicate, but, on the contrary, he admitted that profane, scandalous persons ought to be suspended from the sacrament, and if they still persisted in their offences, they ought to be excommunicated. He enumerates, in his writings, seven different classes of persons, who ought not to be regarded as members of the visible church, and if found in it ought to be cast out. The classes to which he refers are these, "1. Idolaters. 2. Apostates. 3. Such as do not understand the true doctrine; that is, ignorant persons. 4. Such as do not approve and embrace the true doctrine; that is, heretics and sectaries. 5. Such as desire to receive the sacrament otherwise than in the right manner, and according to Christ's institution. 6. Such as defend or justify their wickedness. 7. Such as do not confess and acknowledge their sins, and profess sorrow and repentance for them, and a hatred or detestation of them."

Others, however, went far beyond Erastus in their views on this subject, confounding completely the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, denying the synodical power of censures, holding that both the power of making laws, and the corrective power of censuring transgressors, belong exclusively to the civil magistrate. No such sentiments had ever been broached by the divines of the Reformation, not even by Zuinglius himself, and although most of them had passed away from this earthly scene before the theory of Erastus had been set forth in all its grossness, yet Beza, in advanced years, entered the field against Erastus with a vigour almost equal to that of his early years.

From Germany the Erastian controversy was transferred to England, and the important topics connected with it occupied a prominent place in the debates of the Assembly of divines held at Westminster in A. D. 1643. The chief defenders of Erastianism in the Assembly, were Selden, Whitelocke, Lightfoot, and Coleman; and the principal ground on which they rested their defence, was an alleged analogy between the Mosaic and the Christian dispensations. "They held," says Dr. Hetherington, in his 'History of the Westminster Assembly,' "that the Christian system ought to resemble, or rather to be identical with, the system of the Mosaic dispensation; and they attempted to prove, that there were not two distinct and co-ordinate courts, one civil and the other ecclesiastical, among the Hebrews, but that there was a mixed jurisdiction, of which the king was the supreme and ultimate head and ruler, and that, consequently, the civil courts determined all matters, both civil and ecclesiastical, and inflicted all punishments, both such as affected person and property, and such as affected a man's religious privileges, properly termed church censures. From this they concluded, that the civil magistrate, in countries avowedly Christian, ought to possess an equal, or identical authority, and ought consequently to be the supreme and ultimate judge in all matters, both civil and ecclesiastical, inflicting or removing the penalties of church censure equally with those affecting person and property. The arguments on which they most relied were drawn from rabbinical lore, rather than from the Bible itself, although they were very willing to obtain the appearance of its support, by ingenious versions, or perversions of peculiar passages of Scripture." The argument of Coleman, in a sermon which he preached before the House of Commons on the 30th of July 1645, was thus plausibly stated, "A Christian magistrate, as a Christian magistrate, is a governor in the church. All magistrates, it is true, are not Christians; but that is their fault: all should be; and when they are, they are to manage their office under and for Christ. Christ hath placed governments in his church. Of other governments besides magistracy I find no institution; of them I do. I find all government given to Christ, and to Christ as Mediator; and Christ, as head of these, given to the church. To rob the kingdom of Christ of the magistrate and his governing power, I cannot excuse, no, not from a kind of sacrilege, if the magistrate be His."

The Erastian principles put forth by Coleman were ably refuted by Mr. George Gillespie, in a short pamphlet appended to a sermon which he preached in August of the same year before the House of Lords. To this Coleman replied, but Gillespie, in a short rejoinder, exposed his opponent in a most masterly way. Various pamphlets were published on the disputed points in the year 1646; but towards the close of the year appeared Gillespie's powerful treatise, entitled 'Aaron's Rod Blossoming; or the Divine Ordinance of Church Government Vindicated,' which was published almost simultaneously with a very learned and elaborate work by Samuel Rutherford, another Scotch divine, under the title, 'The Divine Right of Church Government and Excommunication.' These works against the Erastians, along with another from the pen of the famous Apollonius of Middleburg, established on a firm and irrefragable basis the grand truth, so clearly and explicitly laid down in the Westminster Confession, that "Christ hath appointed a government in the church, in the hands of church officers, distinct from the civil government."

The Erastian theory, when followed out to its legitimate issue, makes the church dependent for its authority upon the will of the magistrate. Both, however, are Divine institutions, but though sprung from the same source, the appointment of God, they have a separate existence, an independent will, and a co-ordinate authority. They have, it is true some ends in common, and they have also some common means for the accomplishment of these ends. But there are various essential points of difference between the church and the civil government, which render the attempts of the Erastians to confound the two, alike contrary to reason and Scripture. They differ in their origin, civil government having been appointed by God as the governor of the universe, and the church having been appointed by Christ in his capacity of Mediator. They differ in their extent, civil government being an ordinance extending to all nations, and the church embracing those only who have been brought within range of the Gospel. They differ in regard to some of the purposes which they serve, civil government being fitted to attain various secular ends, which the church, from its strictly spiritual character, could never accomplish; and the church, on the other hand, being adapted to the fulfilment of several spiritual purposes, which the civil government, from its strictly secular character could never reach. They differ in the weapons which they respectively wield, the civil government having the power of the sword, from which the church is excluded, while the church has the power of ecclesiastical discipline from which civil government is excluded. They differ finally in their officers, the civil government having no authority to preach or administer the sacraments, while the church has no authority to intrude into the office of the magistrate.

It is important to observe, that the church and the civil government not only differ in various points from one another, but each is in its own proper sphere independent of the other. They have each of them a distinct and independent jurisdiction, so that neither does the state derive its authority from the church, as the Romanist alleges, nor does the church derive its authority from the state, as the Erastian alleges. Both these opinions are equally wide of the truth.

But the question naturally arises, Can these two societies thus distinct from, and independent of, each other, form an alliance so as to act in harmony for the national good? To many it appears impossible that such an alliance can be effected without either the one party or the other suffering an abridgment of its independence; and, accordingly, those who entertain conscientiously this opinion consider such an alliance as inexpedient and unlawful. To many others, again, it appears quite possible that the church may form an alliance with the state, which will, nevertheless, leave entire the just prerogatives of each, and at the same time promote the common ends of both. Hence the VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY (which see).

ERATO, one of the MUSES (which see), and also one of the NEREIDS (which see).

ERDAVIRAPH, an eminent impostor who arose in Persia in the third century, and was considered as the true and real restorer of the doctrines of the Magi. Being ambitious to support the character which he bore of a man of God, he pretended to be cast into a profound sleep, during which he assured his admirers that his soul was released from her earthly tabernacle, in order to take her flight to heaven. His soul was seven entire days in her passage to realms of light and bliss; during which time his body was constantly attended by six Magi, and the king in person, all of them jointly praying and fasting till his return.

EREBUS, a son of Chaos, and father of Æther and Hemera, by his sister Night. The term, which signifies darkness, is also used to signify the dark and gloomy space through which, according to the ancient heathens, souls pass on their way to HADES (which see).

ERECTHEUS, a king of Athens, in whose honour after his death a temple was erected to his worship on the Acropolis, which was known by the name of the Erechtheum, in which were statues of Poseidon and Hephæstus. Erectheus is said to have introduced into Athens the worship of Athena, and to have instituted the festival of the Panatheæna. He was the first who drove a chariot with four horses, and, accordingly, he received a place among the constellations under the name of Auriga or the charioteer.

EREMITES. See ANCHORETS.

ERGANA, or ERGATIS (Gr. ergon, a work), a surname of Athena, as having taught mankind all kinds of arts.

ERIDANUS, a river-god among the ancient Greeks, the son of Oceanus and Tethys. The first who mentions him is Hesiod, but Herodotus regards this divinity as a mere poetical invention.

ERINNES, a surname of Hermes.

ERINNYES. See EUMENIDES.

ERIS (Gr. contention), the goddess of discord among the ancient Greeks. It was she who threw the apple of discord among the gods. She was said to be the sister of Ares and the daughter of Nyx.

ERMENSUL, a god, supposed to have been identical with Mars, which was worshipped by the ancient Saxons in Westphalia. This idol was destroyed by Charlemagne in A. D. 799, and its temple converted into a Christian church.

EROS, the god of love among the ancient Greeks, corresponding to the Roman god Amor. Hesiod is the first who mentions him in connection with the creation of the world, Eros being the connecting power of love which introduced harmony among the conflicting elements of chaos. Some of the older Greek poets describe him as the first of the gods who sprang from the mundane egg. There is another Eros, however, who is spoken of by the later poets as a son of Aphrodite, a youth of handsome figure and lovely countenance, who rules both gods and men. He is often represented as a winged youth, blindfolded, carrying a bow and quiver full of arrows, which he discharges at the hearts of mortals. He was chiefly worshipped at Thespiæ in Bœotia, where a rude stone was his symbol, and a festival was observed regularly in honour of this god. See next article.

EROTIA, a festival celebrated every five years at Thespiæ in Bœotia, in honour of Eros, the god of love. Little is known regarding this festival, except that it was conducted with music and wrestling.

ERYCINA, a surname of Aphrodite, who was so named from Mount Eryx in Sicily, where a temple was erected in her honour. About the beginning of the second Punic war, her worship was introduced at Rome under the name of Venus Erycina, and a temple built for her worship.

ESCHRAKITES (Arab. enlightened), a Mohammedan sect, who, like the Platonists of old, give themselves to contemplation. They meditate chiefly upon God, and differ from other Mohammedans in believing a Trinity of Persons in the Godhead. This they explain by three folds in a handkerchief. They nave no great respect for the Koran, which, except in so far as it proves their own doctrines, they consider as abrogated. Being convinced that the supreme happiness of man consists in the contemplation of the Divine majesty, the gross notions of Mohammed concerning the pleasures of paradise they look upon as mere idle fancies, and hold them in contempt. This is one of the most respectable and most highly esteemed of all the Mohammedan sects, and their doctrines, as well as whole department, approach most nearly to those of Christians.

ESSENES, one of the three ancient sects of the Jews. There has been considerable diversity of opinion as to their origin. Their name is supposed by some to be derived from a Syriac word asa, to heal, and in confirmation of this derivation, it may be remarked, that they are often called Therapeutes or healers. Some suppose them to have originated in the time of the Maccabees, about B. C. 150, and they have even been considered as identified with the ASSIDEANS (which see), while others trace them back to the Rechabites. The Essenes were divided into two classes:—the Practical Essenes, who lived in society, and were not opposed to the married life;—and the Contemplative Essenes, who lived chiefly in retirement, and devoted themselves to meditation.

On the sect of the Essenes generally Dr. Welsh remarks: "The servile hypocrisy of the Pharisees and the cold reasonings of the Sadducees being equally distasteful to them, they had recourse to a mystic devotion and an ascetic life. They fixed their residence in the desolate tracts on the western shores of the Dead Sea, where they were joined from time to time by men of views similar to their own. Though receiving the Old Testament Scriptures as of Divine authority—like most mystics, they were ready to set aside alike the authority of written revelation and the dictates of reason, upon the suggestions of their own imagination. They were chiefly devoted to the pastoral and agricultural life, and to some of the simpler mechanical arts, the proceeds of their industry being conveyed occasionally to cities, in several of which they had communities established. Medicine occupied a considerable portion of their attention, which seems to have been connected with inquiries into the hidden powers of nature. In regard to their moral and religious views, our information is not wholly to be depended on, as Josephus and Philo seem both to have been animated with the wish of impressing their Greek and Roman readers with an idea of romantic or philosophic purity. There seems no reason to doubt, however, that they led harmless lives, supporting themselves by manual labour, showing great kindness to the members of their community, and seeking in their religious exercises to realize something more than a compliance with outward forms. The mixture of freedom from regard to ceremonies, and a servile attachment to them, which has always distinguished mystics, and which proceeds from their making their own fancy their guide, is to be observed among the Essenes. Sacrifices were offered—but not in the Jewish temple; oaths were prohibited—except that by which they were, after a noviciate of three years, bound to their order; the Sabbath rest was observed with a scrupulosity that cannot be recorded; and they not only avoided all intercourse with the heathen, but even with other Jews, and with the inferior classes of their own sect. Their numbers were comparatively small. The peaceful tenor of their lives seems to have preserved them, amidst the storms that shook Judea, in the respect of all parties. They exerted, however, little influence upon the general character."

It is a somewhat remarkable circumstance, that while our blessed Lord during his public ministry openly censured the other Jewish sects, he never even once mentions the sect of the Essenes, nor does their name occur throughout the whole of the New Testament. This is generally accounted for by the supposition that from their preference of a retired and secluded mode of life, they never probably came in contact with our Lord and his apostles as the Pharisees and Sadducees did. Though not directly mentioned, however, they are supposed to be alluded to by Christ under the term eunuchs in Mat. xix. 12. The apostle Paul also, in his Epistle to the Colossians, seems to refer to them. Thus Col. ii. 18, 23, "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind. Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh."

The Essenes believed in the immortality of the soul, the existence of angels, and a future state of rewards and punishments, but they seem scarcely to have believed in the resurrection of the body. All that is known either of the opinions or practices of the sect is derived from the writings of Josephus, Philo, and Pliny. The two first-mentioned authors being themselves Jews, give a somewhat highly coloured description of the Essenes. Josephus gives us a detailed view of their mode of life. "They are the strictest people towards God of all men living: they make a conscience of not speaking one word of common business before the sun rises; but they have certain traditional forms of prayer for that occasion, imploring particularly from God, that the sun might shine upon them. After this act of devotion they are all dismissed to their several tasks and employments; and when they have studied and wrought hard till eleven at noon, they meet again with linen clothes thrown over them, and so wash themselves all over with cold water. Upon this purification they retire to their cells, where no mortal of any other profession is allowed so much as to breathe upon them; from thence they enter into the refectory, or dining-room, which they account little less holy than the temple itself. When they have staid there awhile without a word speaking, the baker brings up every man his loaf, and the cook every man his plate or mess of soup of the same sort, and sets it before him. The priest then blesses the meat, and not a creature dares so much as touch it till the grace be over: and so after dinner another grace again; for they never fail to give God thanks both before and after meat, as the author of the blessing. This duty being over they quit their habits, as in some measure sacred, and so to their ordinary work till evening. They go next to supper, as before, where they sit together, guests and all, if they have any, at the same table. There is no manner of noise or disorder in those houses: they speak by turns; and this way of gravity and silence gives strangers a great veneration for them. This is the effect of a constant course of sobriety, in their moderation of eating and drinking only to suffice nature.

"In the administration of justice they are the most regular and exact people alive; they determine nothing but what is carried by a hundred voices at least; and when the judgment is once past, there is no recalling it. Next to the supreme authority of God himself they reckon that of their legislators, making it death to speak ill of them, or to blaspheme them. They ascribe great honour to their elders, and to the majority of the people, and think it very reasonable to obey the one and hearken to the other. When there are ten together in council, no particular person is to speak, if the other nine be against it. They make it a matter of immorality to spit toward the middle of the company, or upon the right hand. They are the strictest observers of the Sabbath of all sorts of Jews; for they do not only make ready the Sabbath-day's meal the night before, to avoid kindling a fire upon that day; but they dare not so much as remove a pot or a dish from one place to another."

Simple, plain, and unostentatious, both in their dress and manners, they are represented as having wandered about from place to place without any fixed residence, carrying nothing with them except arms for their protection. They held a kind of community of goods, so that what one wanted another was bound to supply. A candidate for admission into the society was kept on trial for an entire year, and when his probation was finished, he was received into the body, being presented with a pick-axe, a girdle, and a white garment. But even then he was not permitted to eat at the common table till he had given evidence by a probation of one year longer, that he was a fit person to associate with the community. Before being fully united to the Essene society, Josephus says, that "he is first to bind himself by solemn execrations and professions to love and worship God, to do justice towards men, to wrong no creature willingly, no, nor to do it, though commanded; to declare himself an enemy to all wicked men, to join with all the lovers of right and equity, to keep faith with all men, but with princes especially, as they are of God's appointment, and his ministers. He is likewise to declare, that if ever he comes to be advanced above his companions, he will never abuse that power to the injury of his subjects, nor distinguish himself from his inferiors by any ornament of dress or apparel; but that he will love and embrace the truth, and bring false speakers to justice. He binds himself likewise to keep his hands clear from theft and fraudulent dealing, and his soul as untainted with the desire of unjust gain; that he will not conceal from his fellow professors any of the mysteries of his religion, nor communicate any of them to the profane, though it should be to save his life. And then for the matter of his doctrine, that he shall deliver nothing but what he hath received; that he will endeavour to preserve the doctrine itself that he professes, the books that are written of it, and the names of those from whom he had it. These protestations are made use of as a test for new comers, and as a security to keep them fast to their duty."

This sect arose in the country lying on the west side of the Dead Sea, and thence they spread over other parts of Palestine. Josephus says, there were many of them dwelling in every town, and he mentions four different orders of them, all of which, however, are resolvable into the two classes already mentioned, Practical and Contemplative Essenes; some characterized by the one feature, and others by the other, while not a few might prefer to adopt a combination of both. It was a curious peculiarity of the sect, that they sent gifts to the temple at Jerusalem, while they themselves declined to attend. Neander thus most judiciously accounts for this practice. "If we may trust the words of Josephus, they did indeed send gifts to the temple, and thus expressed their reverence for the original establishment; discharging in this manner the common duty of all Jews, as it was their principle to fulfil every obligation that bound them; yet they did not visit the temple themselves, perhaps because they looked upon it as polluted by the vicious customs of the Jews. They thought that the holy rites could be performed in a worthier and more acceptable manner within the precincts of their own thoroughly pure and holy community. In like manner, also, they performed their sacrificial offerings, for the presentation of which, within the pale of their own society, they believed themselves best prepared by their ascetic instructions. The authority of Moses standing so high with them, there is not the least reason for supposing they would wholly set aside the sacrificial worship appointed by him, unless it were true, perhaps, that they looked upon the original Mosaic religion as having been corrupted by later additions, and among these additions reckoned also the sacrificial worship, as we find inserted in the Clementines; which, however, so far as it regards the Essenes at least, admits not the shadow of a proof. Now it is singular, it must be admitted, how, as Jews, they could entertain the opinion, that they might be allowed to offer sacrifices away from Jerusalem. But caprice in the treatment of whatever belongs to the positive in religion, forms, indeed, one of the characteristic marks of such mystic sects. And it might well accord with the spirit of such a sect, that in proportion as they looked upon the sacrificial worship, instituted by Moses, as a holy service, they should be so much the less disposed to take any part in its celebration, amidst all the wickedness in the desecrated temple at Jerusalem; and should maintain that only among the really sanctified, the members of their own sect, was the truly spiritual temple, where sacrifices could be offered with the proper consecration."

ESTABLISHED CHURCHES, those churches which are explicitly recognized and supported by the state. The question has been often agitated, particularly in Britain, within the present century, whether civil establishments of religion are lawful, and even supposing them to be lawful, whether they are expedient. This formed with the Puritans, at least with a large party of them, a fundamental ground of opposition to the Church of England, and from the rise of the Brownists, or first Independents, may be dated the commencement of the VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY (which see), as it is called, which has at different periods been agitated with more or less keenness, both in England and Scotland, down to the present day.

The argument in favour of established churches may be thus stated: It is admitted on all hands, that, in his natural relations, as opposed to his civil and political relations, man is imperatively bound to promote the interests of true religion. As an individual, or even as a brother, a parent, a friend or a neighbour, he is responsible for the faithful discharge of this paramount duty. But when we trace the man into his civil or conventional relations as a citizen, a subject, or a magistrate, he is alleged to be altogether free from this responsibility, of advancing the interests of truth. This is, in plain language, to assert, that, in all his natural relations, a man is bound to be a Christian, and to act like a Christian; but, in his strictly civil duties, he not only may, but must, be an unbeliever, and act, in so far as he does act, in the capacity of a citizen, a subject, or a magistrate, as a decided unbeliever. It is undoubtedly true, that at the original formation of the social compact—a phrase which we may be permitted to use without being supposed to found civil government upon the social compact—every individual has, no doubt, surrendered a portion of his natural liberty in exchange for what he considers an equivalent, if not a greater good. But it cannot be admitted, that, for the attainment of social privileges, however great, any individual either did or could part with one of these fundamental obligations which lay upon him as a creature of God. He was originally and necessarily bound, by the primary laws of his being, to promote the diffusion of divine truth to the utmost extent of his ability. This is not denied, so long as we speak of man in his natural relations, but the point at which this responsibility stops is affirmed by the opponents of civil establishments, to be that at which, to man's natural were superadded civil relations. Now, though in all his former situations the obligation in question is admitted, the circumstances of man in society are viewed, and in many respects we are far from denying it, as essentially different. The laws by which society is regulated are strictly conventional, and in the very terms of its formation are included the exchange of individual for social privileges. No man, however, can barter a moral obligation for any consideration whatever. The existence of the obligation is admitted to extend over all the circumstances in which man is placed up to that point where the social compact is formed; and, therefore, upon the opponents of Ecclesiastical Establishments lies the burden of proving, that the circumstances of man in civil society are such as to preclude the existence or operation of this fundamental obligation. It seems impossible to conceive of any possible, much less of any actually existing circumstances, in which man could be free from such an obligation, so long as the relation exists between the Creator and the creature. For the enjoyment of the invaluable privileges connected with a state of society, man, no doubt, readily parts with not a few of his individual and natural rights. His moral obligations, however, must necessarily remain entire; and it is in the nature of things absolutely impossible, that, by any mere conventional arrangements, he can be denuded of these without violence being done to the primary laws of his existence upon earth.

But it may perhaps be said, that, in entering into society, all his original obligations are maintained in full operation, only, there is a general understanding, that, to the civil relations on which he has now entered, the obligations in question do not extend. Instead, however, of this allegation having been ever admitted to any extent, there never has existed, as Bishop Warburton has well remarked, a nation upon the face of the earth, where a civil establishment of religion has not occupied a prominent place among her political institutions. The United States of America form, no doubt, an exception to this remark; but as the plan is still in process of experiment, it can scarcely, we should think, be adduced as weakening, even in the slightest degree, the force of the argument drawn from all past history and experience. If the voluntary principle had been necessarily involved in the original structure and arrangements of civil society, it would surely have assumed a conspicuous place in the common or the statute-law of some, at least, of the ancient or modern nations. Far from this being the case, however, religion has, without a single exception, uniformly received the sanction and authority of the State; and it is not till very lately, that the propriety of such an arrangement has been at all disputed; and, therefore, we are authorized in inferring, that the alleged inconsistency of the obligation to promote the interests of truth, with the existence of civil society, has never been admitted, in the past history of the world, up to a very recent period. And the statement itself is by no means axiomatic. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that, at the original formation of the social compact, it had been demanded of any individuals, whether subjects or rulers, to suspend the exercise of the obligation which lies upon them to maintain and extend the interests of truth, would not this have been an obvious infringement on the liberty of conscience? They are imperatively bound to promote religion, whatever may be the civil advantages derived from their ceasing to do so; and "whether they ought to obey God rather than man, judge ye."

It is alleged, however, that the variety of opinions which exist among the members of a civil community in reference to the subject of religion, precludes the possibility of any individual, in a purely civil capacity, promoting its diffusion, unless by a direct encroachment on the liberties of others. Were truth at all dependent upon the erring judgments of men, this objection would have possessed no little force. But the fact is, the very admission of the moral obligation, even though limited to strictly natural relations, involves an admission, that religion is an actual reality, not a matter of mere opinion. An objection precisely similar, is often urged by superficial infidels against the very truth of Christianity itself. The opinions of men differ widely, say they, as to what religious truth consists in; and are we not authorized in thinking, that let a man's opinions be what they may, if he is only sincere and consistent in maintaining them, he will find acceptance in the sight of God? Now, our reply both to the infidel and to the opponent of Church Establishments, would be precisely the same. Men may differ in sentiment, and it may often be difficult to discover truth from error; but truth nevertheless does actually exist, and if any man fails to find it, the responsibility lies upon his own head. Now, in reference to a civil community, the obligation to receive and to propagate the truth lies upon each, and consequently, upon all its members. The voluntary churchman admits the obligation upon each individual, but denies it in reference to the whole mass in a social state, as infringing upon the right of individual opinion. This right, however, it is impossible to concede, so long as we are speaking of moral obligation. Every man is bound to accept for himself, and use all possible means of diffusing throughout the community the truth, and the truth only: and it is no reason, surely, which could stand the test of a judgment-day, that we had failed to discharge either of these duties, because men differed in opinion as to the nature of truth. The law of God is not dependent for the maintenance of its obligations and authority on the fitful fancies of degenerate man.

The conclusion, then, of this part of the argument is, that upon all the members of a social community, both separately and conjointly, lies the obligation of maintaining an open profession of the true religion, whatever varieties of sentiment may exist among them. It is no objection, be it observed, to this conclusion, that where men differ widely in opinion, it cannot be carried into practical operation. We are not speaking of what is, but of what ought to be; and if, from any cause whatever, men have put themselves in such circumstances that they cannot possibly fulfil the commands of God, these commands are by no means, on that account, relaxed, but, on the contrary, still maintain their authority unaltered and unalterable. If the duty be impracticable, the responsibility lies upon those who have rendered it so. Hence we would argue, that if either at the original formation, or in the progress of society, any nation has either denied or failed to fulfil the duty of advancing the interests of religion as a community, they are chargeable in all its extent with national infidelity.

The principle of an Ecclesiastical Establishment is founded, it is affirmed, on those moral obligations from which no possible circumstances can free us, and which form the very foundation of our moral constitution. It may wear the aspect of an infringement upon the rights of those who deny the truth of that system of religion which is established; but it would not only appear, but actually be a serious dereliction of duty on the part of the whole community, were the national profession neglected. The matter then resolves itself into a question of inconvenience to some, as Paley has termed it, on the one hand, and a question of duty imperative upon all, on the other; and which of the terms of the alternative ought to be adopted, cannot possibly admit of a doubt.

Passing, however, to the argument drawn from Scripture, we remark, that in the course of the patriarchal dispensation the principles of an ecclesiastical establishment were obviously acknowledged and acted on. From the peculiar circumstances of the age, as well perhaps as from the want of union among the scattered pastoral tribes, the paternal and the magistratical authority appear to have been uniformly combined in the same individual; and with these was also combined, as is well known, the sacerdotal office. So that by one and the same person were executed the functions of a father, a king and a priest; and that too, be it observed, not in consequence of any express appointment of God, as in the case of the Mosaic ritual, but arising, as far at least as can be discovered, from the peculiar state of society at the time. The history of Abraham might be adduced in illustration of these remarks. The civil were only beginning as it were to emerge from the natural relations of man; and yet no such incongruity seems to have existed as to have led to the inconvenience and injustice and oppression which are alleged necessarily to arise from the union of these two separate elements. It must not be alleged that we are pleading for a combination of the paternal with the magistral functions; they are essentially distinct from each other. But the existence of the principle of a national religion, at the period to which we now refer, is in our view peculiarly interesting, as being a remarkable era in the history of man when the social compact was in the course of being formed, and the laws of a civil polity were as yet scarcely distinct from the original law of nature.

In passing from the Patriarchal to the Jewish dispensation, an objection is raised by the opponents of Establishments to the validity of any appeal to that quarter. The circumstances and whole genius of the Jewish, are alleged to have differed so widely from those of the Christian economy, as entirely to preclude any legitimate deductions being drawn, even analogically, from the one to the other. Now, it is no more than justice to admit that the Jewish system was in many respects peculiar, and, indeed, altogether singular in its nature, and on those peculiarities we do not feel ourselves authorized to found any general conclusions whatever. But we are far from consenting on that account to keep out of view the Mosaic economy, as bearing strictly and immediately on the point before us. It was a system, we readily allow, containing many peculiarities which were only intended to serve a special and temporary purpose, but neither of the Jewish, nor of any dispensation, whether appointed or sanctioned of God, can it be affirmed that it embraces no general fundamental principles which are independent of all mere circumstantial details. It detracts not in the slightest degree from the argument for establishments drawn from the Jewish system, that in itself that system was typical, and connected with a pure theocracy. In so far as it was so, no general reasoning can be founded upon it; but the opponents of Established churches forget, that whether viewed as a civil polity, or as an ecclesiastical community, or as both simultaneously, there lie at the very basis of its structure as a society, principles which are equally applicable in every age and in every country. These are, of course, the fundamental principles of moral obligation which belong to man both in his individual and social capacity. And does not the very fact that the Jewish government existed under the form of a theocracy, render it the more certain that it would be based on the eternal and immutable principles of rectitude and truth? In these circumstances, no valid objections can be raised, on the ground of its being a theocracy, to an argument founded on these principles, as exhibited in the government of the Jews. And with equal truth may it be asserted that the typical nature of the Mosaic dispensation is far from precluding any appeal to it on general principles, inasmuch as types, whether referring to persons or things, involve in their very meaning and design many moral and spiritual principles which are more clearly unfolded in the antitype. Whatever is matter of moral obligation, is, in its nature and design, under whatever form it may be represented to us, matter of universal interest and universal application. It is not to be imagined, surely, for a moment, that a principle thus clearly developed both in the patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations, would be unknown in the Christian.

The importance of the principle of Establishments, and the foundation on which it rests, render it very improbable, a priori, that the New Testament would contain the slightest hints of its abrogation; and the result of a candid examination of the whole Christian dispensation is quite in accordance with what might have been anticipated. Some passages have no doubt been adduced which at first sight may seem opposed to all interposition of the civil power in behalf of the church; these however are brought forward in an isolated form, detached entirely from the context with which they are connected, and by which their meaning is necessarily modified. It is by the neglect of this simple and obvious rule of Scripture interpretation that heresies of every kind in theology are propped up by separate sentences from the Sacred Writings, which, if read along with the preceding or succeeding context, would be found to bear no such meaning as that which is attached to them. Independently altogether of the principle we are now considering being founded on moral obligation, the evident sanction which it is admitted to have received from God under the ancient economy, called for an explicit declaration that such was the Divine will ere its abolition could have been accomplished.

It has been alleged, however, in opposition to the argument for establishments drawn from Scripture, that the New Testament is silent on the subject, at least in so far as a direct precept is concerned. Now we must decidedly demur to the principle on which this objection is founded—that nothing is obligatory on us save what is expressly commanded in Scripture. Innumerable general principles pervade the sacred volume, the application of which, in particular instances, is left to the exercise of a sound discretion and an enlightened judgment. The principle in question is one of this nature. It is capable of application under a great variety of modifications, each one of which would require to have been specified in any law which had been laid down in Scripture. This, however, was quite unnecessary in the peculiar circumstances of the case. The principle itself had its origin in the moral constitution of man; and while examples of its practical operation were exhibited in the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations, we cannot allow that any distinct precept was to be expected in the New Testament church. The Gospel economy was strictly universal in its design, and no law is recorded which was liable to be modified in the mode of its application by peculiar, perhaps local circumstances. But though no precept was recorded expressly on the subject, might not an exemplification of it have been given in the early Christian church such as had been already given in the Jewish church? To this we can only reply, that to have done so would have been to have changed the whole course of ordinary events at the time, or in other words, would have amounted to a miracle, and we know that the usual mode of acting on the part of Deity has been to allow the responsibilities of man to influence his conduct with as little miraculous interposition as possible. It is not ours to dictate to the All-wise at what time a miracle might be expected. We must judge of what God ought to have done by what he actually does. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

One grand objection which is urged against the principle of Establishments is its alleged inconsistency with the whole spirit and genius of Christianity. It is surely a priori very improbable that what is capable of being demonstrated to be a fundamental law of moral obligation, and what has been expressly sanctioned by Divine authority from the fall of man down to the advent of Christ, should be after all opposed to the principles of the Christian scheme. This is of itself, we affirm, a presumptive argument so strong as to put us on our guard against any attempts which may be made to thrust forward isolated passages. There is no doctrine, however absurd and heretical, which has not found support in this mode of interpretation. The utmost caution however is necessary, the text adduced must be studied in connexion with its context, the scope and design of the writer or speaker must be carefully kept in view, and no clause must be regarded as a general statement, the meaning of which is obviously modified by particular circumstances, whether of time or place, at or in which it was written. In opposition, however, to these plain and acknowledged rules of Scripture interpretation, the adversaries of church Establishments are in the constant habit of referring us to the well-known declaration of our Lord, "My kingdom is not of this world." The reply of Dr. Inglis is so excellent that we make no apology for quoting it.

"In the court of Pilate, the Roman governor of Judea, Jesus was accused of having forbidden his countrymen to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself was Christ a king. Pilate in consequence asked him, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?' And Jesus answered in the affirmative, but added, My kingdom is not of this world.' Who does not perceive that the single object of this declaration was to disavow all pretension to such temporal authority as could absolve the Jews either from their obligation of paying tribute to Cæsar, or from their allegiance in any respect to him as their earthly sovereign? The religion of Christ, so far from absolving subjects from their allegiance to the potentates of this world, was to lay them under a new obligation to such allegiance, as they desired to maintain a good conscience towards Christ himself as their spiritual king. It was therefore impossible that the charge brought against him should not be repelled in the way which we have seen; nor can it be regarded as reasonable, in the circumstances of the case, to attach any other meaning to his words than what has been already stated as applicable to the charge in question."

And taking the statement in its absolute sense, who that is at all acquainted with Christian truth, doubts it for a moment? The church of Christ is a body separate and distinct from the world, having independent laws and office-bearers of its own. No man save an Erastian would so confound the Church with the State as to allege that the magistrate had any, even the slightest authority in regulating the internal affairs of the church. These must be left entirely to her own office-bearers, under the guidance of the Great Head. Though we thus deny the power of the civil ruler, in sacris, we nevertheless concede to him a most interesting and extensive sphere of exertion when we assert his right to govern and legislate in regard to the church, or in other words, circa sacra. This is his legitimate province in faithfully discharging the duties of which, he will most effectually fulfil the great end of his office as an "ordinance of God;" and in the neglect of which, he is deeply culpable, inasmuch as independently altogether of his moral obligation he is failing to employ one of the most effectual means of becoming a "minister of good" to the people over whom he rules. The punishment of the criminal is not more necessary than the prevention of crime, which can only be successfully accomplished by the infusion of Christian principle into the minds of the people by a rightly constituted Ecclesiastical Establishment. In the performance of this part of the magistrate's official duty, as in every other, there is no doubt included the idea of compulsion, which results from the nature of civil government in all cases. And here it may be of importance to attend to the real nature of this compulsion. It is not ecclesiastical, it is strictly civil; it is not an interference with any arrangements in the church, it is an interference with the people concerning the church; it is not resorted to with the view of coercing the consciences of any individuals of whatever opinions, to the exclusion of any others, it is a compulsion used towards every individual indiscriminately for the benefit of the whole community.

It is scarcely necessary to advert to the objection which is sometimes urged by the adversaries of Church Establishments, that it is altogether ultra vires on the part of the magistrate to decide in matters of religion, and the very existence of an establishment supposes his having done so. Whatever may be the opinions of men, truth nevertheless exists, and it has moreover been revealed, and therefore every man is responsible for the reception that he gives it. If the magistrate supports the true religion, he supports those opinions which both he and his subjects were bound to maintain; but if he supports error, the responsibility lies either with himself or with those who have led to the establishment of a system which is unscriptural. Be it observed, however, that the criminality does not primarily attach to the establishment, but to the adoption of error; and though his belief in the first instance of heretical doctrines has undoubtedly led to the heinous crime of establishing a false religion, it is not the principle of establishments which has led to the sin, but the adoption of false views, either by the ruler personally, or by the people by whose influence and advice he has been guided. But is not, it has been said, the possibility of erring in this point a clear proof that such a duty was not designed to belong to him? No; otherwise what would become of all the other duties which, as a civil ruler, he is bound to discharge? He is equally liable to err in all civil duties as in this, and yet who would argue that from that very circumstance it was never designed by the Almighty that he should discharge them? Has man, by rendering himself incapable of obeying the Divine commandments, brought about the abrogation of the moral law? Surely not, and yet to this conclusion we must come, if we admit the principle on which the objection proceeds.

There is no objection which is more frequently urged against the establishment of any particular system of religion, and none which has apparently a stronger effect upon the minds of multitudes, than the alleged injustice of such a principle. Looking at the matter abstractly, we do not conceive that there is, at all events, any intentional partiality or injustice in a government so acting. They do not establish a system as professed by one part of the community, to the avowed exclusion of a system professed by another part of the same community. The question is viewed as a great national benefit which will redound to all from this particular act of legislation; and could it be shown, that there is any one class of the community who, instead of deriving the slightest advantage from this proposed act, are subjected thereby to unmingled hardship and oppression, their complaint would deserve to be listened to with respect, and every endeavour made to remedy this defect. But is there a single enlightened Dissenter in this or any other country, who can make such an allegation in regard to an Established Church? Are there no advantages which accrue from it to every individual in the country? Waving altogether the religious view of the question, is the protection of property, and the increased security of personal safety, by the diffusion of right moral principle, no advantage? Is the prevention of crime in general, and the consequent diminution of expenditure for the erection and repair of jails and penitentiaries, and houses of correction, no advantage? Is the diffusion of industry and frugality, and kindness of heart, no advantage? Is an elevated standard of physical comfort and happiness among the peasantry of the land, no advantage?

The civil benefits arising from Ecclesiastical Establishments are thus forcibly and perspicuously described by Dr. Inglis. "Now, we have already seen, that an Established Church is of high importance for an adequate support of these ministrations, by which the cause of godliness or true religion is most effectually maintained; and how, then, shall we question their utility for promoting the interests of civil society? Has religion no tendency to make us good and useful members of society? Its salutary influence in this department will scarcely be denied; it is so obvious, as of itself to account abundantly for civil governments having, from the beginning, interposed in behalf of religion. Religious principle is at once the cheapest and the most effectual instrument that can be employed for accomplishing the ends and purposes of government. It goes far to restrain men from the commission of those crimes for which the magistrate must otherwise visit the defaulter with punishment. By its influence in reforming the corrupt heart, 'out of which are the issues of life,' this purpose is more effectually served than it can ever be by human laws. The laws of men take cognizance only of the outward conduct, and only of those parts of the conduct in respect of which crime may be ascertained by evidence. But religion, by its dominion over the heart, strikes at the root of the evil; and by means of the controlling power of conscience, prevents the commission of many crimes, to which no human laws could ever reach. Besides, punishment is almost the only sanction by which human laws are enforced; but, when religion would deter us from what is criminal, and engage us to what is praiseworthy, in our capacity as members of society, it does not resort to threatening alone, it holds out to us a great reward; it imparts to us a promise both of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

"It is impossible that enlightened governments can be insensible of the aid which, in these views, they derive from Ecclesiastical Establishments, so far as such establishments tend to promote true religion. But an Established Church goes farther; it tends to consecrate the state itself and the rulers of the state. When men in authority are united to those over whom they rule by a profession of the same faith, and by the same exercises of religious worship, it has a tendency to unite their hearts in one bond of mutual confidence and mutual love. Even the most exalted of those who are invested with authority learn to regard the meanest of their subjects as their brethren in Christ and their equals in the sight of God; and to the great body of the people over whom they rule, the most satisfying pledge is appended for their ruling in the fear of the Lord."

But while the advocates of Established churches follow such a line of argument as we have now sketched, those who are opposed to all civil establishments of religion adopt an entirely different train of reasoning. In so far as the argument from natural religion is concerned, its force is freely admitted, in so far as the obligation of the magistrate to promote religion in a country is concerned; but they contend that this obligation is strictly personal, and in no respect connected with his official character. The argument drawn from the patriarchs sustaining civil as well as religious offices, appears to them utterly inconclusive, since, even though admitted, it fails to prove that religion was incorporated with the civil government. The case of the Jews is also completely inapplicable in their view, the political constitution of that people being not an alliance of religion with the state, but a theocracy, which, from its very nature, implies far more than the friends of establishments contend for, even a complete amalgamation and identification of religion with the state. The Jewish polity was not a friendly union of religion with the state, it was essentially a religio-political system. The head of the Jewish state was the head of the Jewish church, even Jehovah, the God of Israel. To argue, therefore, from such a peculiar system, which besides was typical in its nature, in favour of religious establishments under the Christian system, would necessarily lead to conclusions from which Zuinglius would have revolted, and even Erastus himself would have shrunk. The Church of Christ, argue the opponents of Established churches, is, in its very nature, spiritual, and ought not, yea, in fact, cannot be incorporated with the state, without sustaining material injury. Such a union must necessarily be exposed to two serious dangers, either from the prevalence of the Popish principle on the one hand, or the Erastian principle on the other. In the one case the state is overborne by the church, and in the other case the church is overborne by the state. In vain do the friends of Establishments allege, that there is a medium course which may possibly be adopted, in which the independence of both the church and the state may be fully preserved. The instant reply of the objector is, that such a middle course, if it really exists, has never yet been practically followed. All history attests that established churches have either been popish, and the civil government have groaned under the intolerable burden of priestly tyranny, or they have been Erastian, and the church has been overpowered by civil despotism, or she has revolted and thrown off the yoke. To be at all effective, spiritual government must be independent, and in its own sphere civil government must be independent also. But in an established church the line of demarcation between the civil and the spiritual is often so narrow and almost impalpable, that the danger at every moment of a collision between the two is imminent in the extreme. And the obvious misfortune of such an alliance is, that if a collision does take place, both parties assert with equal justice their right to adjudicate as to the extent of their respective jurisdictions, and whether as well as how far their independence has been trespassed upon. In such circumstances no third party can interfere, and an adjustment is impossible. Nothing remains but that the alliance be severed, an alliance, surely, which it were better had never been formed.

But the opponents of established churches feel that their cause rests not upon theoretical argument alone, but upon practical experience. They point back to the earliest and purest ages of Christianity, when the church was not only unsupported, but actually opposed by the state. If for three centuries the church was a stranger to temporal authority, and yet maintained her ground in the face of oppression, and prolonged persecution on the part of the civil government; if, in such circumstances, she struck her roots deep in the earth, shot upward a goodly tree, flourished and spread her branches far and wide, have we not in this a powerful argument, that the church needs not, and can safely dispense with, the countenance of the civil powers? She has in herself a Divine energy and power which bears her onward in her course, independently altogether of the favour and support of the state.

That the most signal benefits accrue to a country from the existence of an established church, is admitted by the opponents of civil establishments of religion; but they argue that equal, if not greater, benefits would arise from the same church in a disestablished condition. The church may be a blessing in spite of her alliance with the state, but may it not be questioned whether she would not be a greater blessing were she unfettered by any such alliance? The church operates exclusively upon the consciences of men, and what additional strength can her appeals receive from the sanctions of mere human authority? None whatever, nay, the very fact that she is backed by the state is apt to convey an impression that she believes the Divine authority with which she is armed, to be weak and insufficient of itself. And in the present divided condition of the religious world, what inconveniences must arise from the state giving exclusive countenance to one section only of the Christian church! What jealousies, heartburnings, and contentions arise in consequence!

But, finally, the enemies of establishments go a step farther, and deny the right of the magistrate to establish any particular form of religion, and thus to burden the consciences of all his subjects with the support of that form to which many of them may be conscientiously opposed. This, even with the best intentions on his part, is at all events doing evil that good may come. It is making use of his position as a magistrate to oppress the consciences of good men simply to maintain a church which he conscientiously approves, and which many of his subjects just as conscientiously disapprove.

Such are the principal arguments for and against Religious Establishments.

ESTHER (FAST OF), a Jewish fast kept on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, in memory of Esther fasting three days and nights before presenting herself to supplicate the king in behalf of the Jews, who had been marked out for destruction by Haman. When the thirteenth day of Adar happens on the Jewish Sabbath, this fast is kept on the Thursday before; as the day after being the Feast of Purim, and the day before being Friday, they could not finish the Fast, on account of the Sabbath beginning before dark, and their being obliged to fast till night.

ETERNAL, an essential attribute of the Divine Being. None but God is strictly and properly eternal or everlasting. The immortality of other beings is entirely derivative, and subsists by Him who only, in respect of his essence, "hath immortality." See God.

ETERNALES, a Christian sect which arose, as is supposed, about A. D. 260, deriving their name from their belief in the eternity of the world. They maintained that this world, even after the resurrection of the dead, will continue in its present state without any change.

ETERNITY, deified by the ancients, and represented as a goddess on various medals. In a medal of Titus she is represented as a woman holding in her hands the sun and moon. A circle or ring was an emblem of eternity among the Egyptians, Persians, and Hindus. Sometimes the phoenix, from the fabulous power which it was supposed to possess, of rising from its ashes and thus becoming immortal, was also used to indicate eternal duration. The Slavonians and the Arabians denoted eternity by a white colour, and in the Revelation of St. John, Jesus Christ, the Ancient of Days, appears, i. 14, with white hair, symbolical of his eternal existence.

ETERNITY OF THE WORLD. It was a doctrine taught by Aristotle, and some of the other philosophers of ancient Greece, that the world, or at least the matter of which it is composed, existed from all eternity. Even those of them who admitted the existence of a Supreme Being, believed in matter as co-existent with him, and viewed the Divinity not as the Creator, but as simply the arranger of atoms which had a previous existence. It was regarded as an axiom, indeed, by many of the Greek sects, that nothing springs from nothing, and hence they considered it as indispensable to the act of creating power that there should be a previously existing matter. Matter and soul, however, were not only reckoned uncreated, but indestructible; their existence was imagined to be eternal in every sense of the word, without end as well as without beginning. Modern infidelity, represented by Mirabaud and Hume, has attempted to build an argument in favour of Atheism, or the non-existence of a Supreme Being, on the eternity not of the matter or substance or the world, but of the world in its existing arrangements. "For aught we can know à priori," says Hume, "matter may contain the source or spring of order originally within itself, as well as mind does; and there is no more difficulty in conceiving that the several elements from an internal unknown cause may fall into the most exquisite arrangement, than to conceive that their ideas in the great universal mind, from a like internal unknown cause, fall into that arrangement. The equal possibility of both these suppositions is allowed." To this atheistical argument thus put in a plausible form, Dr. Chalmers makes the following satisfactory reply in his 'Natural Theology': "In the material economy we have the vestiges before our eyes of its having had an origin, or in other words of its being a consequent—and we have furthermore the experience that in every instance which comes under full observation of a similar consequent, that is of a consequent which involved as the mundane order of things does so amply, the adaptation of parts to an end, the antecedent was a purposing mind which desired the end, and devised the means for its accomplishment. We might not have been called upon to make even a single ascent in the path of causation, had the world stood forth to view in the character or aspect of immutability. But instead of this, both history and observation tell of a definite commencement to the present order—or, in other words, they oblige us to regard this order as the posterior term of a sequence; and we, in reasoning on the prior term, just follow the lights of experience when we move upward from the world to an intelligent mind that ordained it. It is this which carries us backward one step from the world to God—and the reason why we do not continue the retrogression beyond God is, that we have not met with an indication of his having had a commencement. In the one case there is a beginning of the present material system forced upon our convictions; and we proceed on the solid ground of experience, when we infer that it began in the devisings of an antecedent mind. In the other case, the case of the antecedent mind, there is no such beginning forced upon our convictions; and none therefore that we are called upon to account for. It is our part, as far as in us lies, to explain an ascertained difficulty; but not surely to explain an imagined one. We must have some reason for believing in the existence of a difficulty ere we are called upon to solve it. We have ample reason for regarding this world as a posterior term, and seeking after its antecedent. But we have no such reason for treating this antecedent as a posterior term, and seeking for its prior term in a higher antecedent. The one we see to be a changeable and a recent world. The other for aught we know may be an unchangeable and everlasting God. So that when the question is put—Why may not the material economy fall into order of itself, as well as the mental which we affirm to have caused it?—our reply is, that so far from this mental economy falling into order of itself, we have yet to learn that it ever had to fall into order at all. The one order, the material, we know, not to have been from everlasting. The other, the mental, which by all experience and analogy must have preceded the material, bears no symptom which we can discover, of its ever having required any remoter economy to call it into being."

The doctrine of an infinite series has been long since exploded, and notwithstanding the numerous and persevering assaults with which men have attempted to throw discredit upon the great act of creation, it is now all but universally admitted that no better explanation of the subject can be given than that which is contained in the opening sentence of the Bible, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

ETHNOPHRONES (Gr. ethnos, a nation, and phroneo, to think), a name sometimes applied to those heretics of the seventh century who sought to conjoin Pagan customs and ceremonies with Christianity.

ETU, an object of worship in the South Sea Islands, consisting of some bird, or fish, or reptile, in which the natives believed that a spirit resided. This form of idolatry, which prevailed particularly in the Samoa islands, is thus described by Mr. Williams in his 'Missionary Researches': "It was by no means uncommon to see an intelligent chief muttering some prayer to a fly, an ant, or a lizard, which happened to alight or crawl in his presence. On one occasion a vessel from New South Wales touched at the Samoas, the captain of which had on board a cockatoo that talked. A chief was invited to the ship, and shortly after he entered the cabin, the captain began a colloquy with the bird. At this he was struck with amazement, trembled exceedingly, and immediately sprang upon deck, leaped into the sea, and called aloud to the people to follow him, affirming the captain had his devoto on board, which he had both seen and heard. Every native at once dashed into the sea, and swam on shore with haste and consternation; and it was with much difficulty that they could be induced to revisit the ship, as they believed that the bird was the captain's etu, and that the spirit of the devil was in it. While walking, on one occasion, across a small uninhabited island, in the vicinity of Tongatabu, I happened to tread upon a nest of sea-snakes. At first I was startled at the circumstance, but being assured that they were perfectly harmless, I desired a native to kill the largest of them as a specimen. We then sailed to another island, where a number of heathen fishermen were preparing their nets. Taking my seat upon a stone under a tou tree, I desired my people to bring the reptile, and dry it on the rocks; but as soon as the fishermen saw it, they raised a most terrific yell, and, seizing their clubs, rushed upon the Christian natives, shouting, 'You have killed our god, you have killed our god!' I stepped in between them, and with some difficulty stayed their violence, on the condition that the reptile should be immediately carried back to the boat. This incident shows, not only that they worship these things, but that they regard them with the most superstitious veneration."

EUCADIREs, priests of the ancient Carthaginian deities called ABADIREs (which see).

EUCCHARIST. See LORD'S SUPPER.

EUCCHARISTIA, the Great Thanksgiving which formed a part of the service of the Eucharist in the ancient Christian church. It included a grateful acknowledgment of all the Divine mercies, whether in creation, providence, or redemption. An instance of it is given in the Apostolic Constitutions, and Justin Martyr says, that as soon as the common prayers were ended, and they had saluted one another with a kiss, bread, and wine, and water were brought to the president, who, receiving them, gave glory to the Father of all things by the Son and Holy Spirit, and made a long thanksgiving for the blessings which he vouchsafed to bestow upon them. And when he had ended the prayers and thanksgiving, all the people that were present answered with acclamation, Amen. As an example of the Eucharistia, we may quote the Thanksgiving contained in St. James's Liturgy which was used in the church of Jerusalem. It runs thus, "It is very meet and right, becoming us and our duty, that we should praise thee, and celebrate thee with hymns, and give thanks unto thee, the Maker of all creatures, visible and invisible, the Treasure of all good, the Fountain of life and immortality, the God and Lord of all things, whom the heavens and the heavens of heavens praise, and all the host of them; the sun, and moon, and the whole company of stars; the earth and sea, and all that are in them; the celestial congregation of Jerusalem; the church of the first-born, who are written in heaven; the spirits of just men and prophets, the souls of martyrs and apostles; angels and archangels, thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, the tremendous hosts and cherubims with many eyes, and seraphims with six wings, with two whereof they cover their faces, and with two their feet, and with two they fly, crying out incessantly one to another, and singing with loud voices the triumphal song of the magnificence of thy glory, 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Hosanna in the highest. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest.'" Such was the mode in which the consecration of the sacrament was introduced, and, accordingly, from this important part, the whole service received the name of Eucharist or Thanksgiving.

EUCCHARISTIC, belonging to the act of thanksgiving, or to the Eucharist or LORD'S SUPPER (which see).

EUCHELAION (Gr. euche, prayer, and elaion, oil), the oil of prayer, one of the sacraments of the GREEK CHURCH (which see), and in some degree, though not altogether, corresponding to the extreme unction of the Church of Rome. This sacrament is dispensed in cases of sickness, but not necessarily in anticipation of death. The Greeks look upon it as an anointing for recovery, not for dissolution, and appeal in support of the custom to James v. 14, 15, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." In accordance with this apostolic injunction, the Greek church dispenses the sacrament, anointing the sick with oil, and accompanying the ceremony with earnest prayer for their recovery and the forgiveness of their sins. In the Longer Orthodox Catechism of the Russian church, it is defined as "a mystery in which while the body is anointed, God's grace is invoked on the sick, to heal him of spiritual and bodily infirmities." According to the ritual seven priests are required for the Euchelaion, though in many cases three are deemed sufficient, but not fewer than three, as the Apostle James speaks of "elders," in the plural number. The service is very long, each of the seven priests reading in turn a prokeimenon, or short anthem, an Epistle, Psalm, Gospel, and finally a prayer, during which each priest takes one of seven twigs, with cotton bound round the end of it, and with this rod, which has been dipped in oil, he makes the sign of the cross on various parts of the sick man's body. After the anointing, prayer is again offered, and in the course of it the Gospel is held over the sick man's head.

EUCHELOGION (Gr. euche, prayer, and logos, a discourse), a liturgical book of the Greek church, containing, besides religious offices, everything relating to religious ceremonies. An attempt was made in the time of Pope Urban VIII. to procure the consent of some of the most eminent divines of the Greek church to such a modification of the Euchelogion, as would bring it into conformity with the offices and ritual of the Romish church, but the attempt was successfully resisted.

EUCHITES (Gr. euche, prayer), a Christian sect which had its origin among the monks of Syria, in the fourth century. In the course of their history, which was somewhat prolonged, they received a variety of names, generally derived from the leading men of the sect. Thus they were at different times called Lampetians, Adelphians, Eustathians, Marcianists, Choreutes, and Enthusiasts. They were denominated Euchites, from the importance which they attached to prayer, as, in their view, supplying the place of all other modes of devotion and means of grace. In all probability the sect originated in a few monks giving themselves wholly to inward contemplation and communion with the Holy Spirit in prayer. Imagining that they had thereby obtained the victory over outward sense, and had reached a species of ascetic perfection, they gave up all ordinary employments, and professed to spend their whole time in inward prayer and contemplation. They held that every man brings with him into the world an evil principle, with which he is called incessantly to struggle throughout life, and which he can only overcome by inward prayer. Having obtained this deliverance, there is no farther need of fasting or self-mortification. The man who has received Divine illumination may henceforth dispense with all human instructors and guides. Accordingly, though the Euchites still retained outward connection with the church, by the observance of the Lord's Supper, they judged it unnecessary to join in outward prayer or singing, and sought after supernatural revelation by means of dreams. They believed that baptism cleanses us from past sin, but gives no power to withstand sin in future. They boasted that they had become partakers of the Divine nature. Epiphanius says, that to such an extravagant height of self-glorification did they reach, that if angel, patriarch, prophet, or even Christ himself were named to such an one, he would instantly reply in each case "That am I myself." They denied the reality of our Lord's miracles, alleging them to be simply symbolical of important truths. In regard to the doctrine of the Trinity, they taught that "the three hypostases of the Triad are nothing but different forms of revelation of the one Divine Essence—the Trinity resolves again into Unity." They believed fire to be the creative principle of the universe.

Another sect arose in the eleventh century in the Greek church who were also called Euchites or Enthusiasts, and who held opinions and indulged in practices almost identical with those of the Euchites of the fourth century. This sect appeared also in Mesopotamia and in the character of monks, like the older sect. Their doctrines are thus sketched by Neander: "Agreeing with the doctrine of Zoroaster, they believed in one perfect original being, from whom they derived two sons, the good and the evil principle. Their doctrine touching the relation of these two principles to each other, seems to have constituted according as it inclined one way or the other either to an absolute or to a relative Dualism, a main difference, and indeed the ground of two several parties, in this sect. And to this same distinction it may be remarked is to be referred also the main difference between the Bogomiles and the Catharians, and among the Catharians themselves of after times.

They differed, that is, either as they supposed that the evil principle was a spirit originally evil, or a spirit originally good, but who by virtue of his free-will had apostatized from God, though he would finally be recovered again to goodness. According to the doctrine of this latter class, the spirit, clothed at the beginning with the supreme power, the elder of the two sons of the Supreme God, revolted against the Father, and produced the visible world with the intention of founding in it an independent kingdom. The younger spirit, Christ, remained loyal to God, and took the other's place. Christ will destroy the kingdom of the evil one, and prosecute his redeeming work until the general restitution. If we might credit the report of Michael Psellus, one party of the Euchites made the evil spirit himself an object of worship; but this is altogether unlikely. The character of such a party we might safely presume would be thoroughly immoral as the natural result of their principle; and it would be exclusively to this party we should have to refer what Michael Psellus relates concerning the immoral excesses, nightly committed after the extinguishing of the lights, in the secret assemblies of these sects. But as the same stories are to be met with in every age, concerning the secret meetings of sects stigmatized as heretical, they must ever be considered as extremely liable to suspicion. It is possible, that the Euchites, by their knowledge of some of the hidden powers of nature, particularly of magnetism, may have been able to produce effects which excited the wonder of beholders. The sect seems to have had a regular constitution; their presiding officers were called apostles. Even at this early period, the sect was threatened with a persecution from Constantinople, and an imperial commissioner was appointed and despatched to carry it into effect."

From the Euchites seems to have originated the sect of the BOGOMILES (which see), who made their appearance in the twelfth century. Schlegel mentions a sect of Pagan Euchites who acknowledged a plurality of gods, though they worshipped but one, whom they called the Almighty. These were more ancient than the Christian Euchites, built houses for worship similar to the Christian churches, and assembled morning and evening with torches, and employed their time in praising God. Hence they were called EUPHEMITES (which see).

EUCHOMENOI (Gr. praying people), a name sometimes given to those of the CATECHUMENS (which see), who remained to receive the minister's prayers and benedictions. These were also called Genuflectentes or kneelers.

EUCLEIA, a goddess worshipped at Athens, and whose temple was built from the spoils taken at the battle of Marathon. Eucleia was also used at Athens as a surname of Artemis. The Bœotians and Locrians worshipped Eucleia, persons of both sexes being accustomed before their marriage to offer sacrifices to this goddess.

EUCTAIA. See OFFERINGS.

EUDISTS, a congregation of missionary priests which arose in France in the seventeenth century, deriving their name from Eudes their founder. The first establishment of the order was formed in 1643, at Caen in Normandy, which was speedily followed by others of the same description. These societies gradually increasing in number, were united into one congregation, which was put under the charge of Eudes. It was essentially a missionary fraternity, designed to labour among the people in the principal towns of the kingdom. The Eudists made no vows, and wore no peculiar habit, but dressed like other priests. They were under the patronage of Jesus and Mary, and were placed under a superior, who derived his powers from the bishop of the diocese in which they laboured.

EUDOXIANS, a name given to the ARIANS (which see), after the death of Arius. The appellation was derived from their leader, Eudoxius, who opposed the orthodox views as to the proper divinity of Christ, with such ability and zeal, that he was appointed Bishop of Germanicia, on the Euphrates, whence he was transferred to the episcopal see of Antioch, A. D. 356, and at length, having joined the ANOMŒANS (which see), he was raised by the Emperor Constantius, A. D. 360, to the dignity of Patriarch of Constantinople. As head of the Arian party, he signalled himself by his powerful support of their views, first in the council of Antioch, then in the Arian councils of Sardica, Sirmium, and Seleucia. Such was his influence at court that he bound the Emperor Valens by an oath to support the cause of Arianism.

EUEMERION, a Pagan deity regarded as presiding over good fortune, and as being the author of happiness. He is mentioned by Pausanias as having been worshipped by the Sicyonians. He is supposed to have been identical with TELESPHORUS a medical divinity.

EUKTEROI OIKOI (Gr. oratories or houses of prayer), a name sometimes applied to ancient Christian churches.

EULOGIA (Gr. blessing or praise), one of the appellations given in the ancient Christian church to the LORD'S SUPPER (which see). From the fifth century this became the name of the consecrated bread, which was set apart for the poor, and for the ministers of the church, who sent such eulogia to one another in token of friendship.

EULOGIUM, the consecrated bread of the Greek church. See ANTIDORON.

EUMENIDES, the furies of Pagan antiquity, goddesses who avenged crime, and heaped their maledictions upon the criminal. They are also called Erinyes and Furice or Diræ. They were supposed to inhabit EREBUS (which see), which they only left when summoned to earth by the crimes of men which called for punishment. Inexorable to the prayers or the tears of the sufferers, they inflicted with stern justice the chastisement due to crimes. The existence of the furies was more ancient than that of the gods of Olympus, of whom, accordingly, they were wholly independent. By the poets of ancient Greece they are described as beings of terrific aspect, their bodies black, their eyes blood-red, and numberless serpents twined around their heads. The Eumenides, according to later writers, were three in number, and bore the names of Tisiphone, Alecto, and Megæra. They were worshipped at Athens, and a festival was celebrated in their honour called EUMENIDEIA (which see). Black sheep were offered in sacrifice to them, and libations of a peculiar drink composed of honey mixed with water. They were worshipped also at Megalopolis under the name of MANIÆ (which see). They were called Eumenides, favourable or propitiations, from an idea that their true names were an unlucky omen.

EUMENIDEIA, a festival celebrated in honour of the EUMENIDES (which see) at Athens and in other parts of ancient Greece. It was kept once every year with sacrifices and libations of honey and water, the worshippers engaged in the festival being decked with flowers. Freemen of good character were alone allowed to take part in the solemnities.

EUMOLPIDÆ, Athenian priests of the goddess Demeter or Ceres, particularly in her worship at the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see). They were said to be descended from Eumolpus, who reorganized, if he did not originally institute, these mysteries; and the high-priest who principally conducted them uniformly belonged to the family of the Eumolpidæ. The whole of this class of priests were expected to supplicate the gods in behalf of the state, and if they failed to discharge this important part of their duties they were punished. They were expected also to take strict cognizance of every case in which sacred things were violated, and their judicial functions were regulated, not by any written law, but simply by tradition. Sometimes, besides punishing the offender in aggravated cases with banishment, the Eumolpidæ added to their sentence, but only when required by the people, a clause containing a formal and solemn curse.

EUNOMIANS, a modification of the Anomœan sect of Semi-Arians in the fourth century. Their founder, Eunomius, was the most celebrated disciple of Ætius, from whom the *ÆTIAN*S (which see) derive their name; but he was both more subtle in reasoning, and more fierce and uncompromising than his master. Having embraced the Anomœan form of the Arian heresy, he contended with the utmost bitterness against the other forms which it assumed, and particularly against the Acacianism of Eudoxius of Antioch. So far, indeed, did the Eunomians carry the violence of their opposition to the other sections of the Arian party, that they even re-baptized their Christian converts as if they had been heathens; and that too not only when the converts were brought from the orthodox party, but also from the Eusebians, and other portions of the Arian party. Eunomius, as an Anomœan, not only denied the equality between the Father and the Son, but also the similarity. In the earlier part of his history he was a deacon at Antioch, and chiefly, through the influence of Eudoxius in A. D. 360, he was appointed to the bishopric of Cyzicus; but having boldly avowed his opinions, he was deposed in the course of a few months from his office, and to add to his disgrace, the inhabitants of Cyzicus banished him from the town. His whole life was one perpetual series of sentences of exile, for wherever he went his imprudent and unaccommodating temper brought down upon him the vengeance both of the government and of the people. After his death, at an advanced age, A. D. 394, his works were ordered by imperial edicts to be destroyed.

Besides that portion of the Eunomian system, which declared the nature of the Son to be altogether different from, and unlike to, that of the Father, there was also contained in it a distinct heresy in reference to the nature of the Holy Spirit, who is affirmed by this theory to be the first among the created natures, formed according to the command of the Father by the agency of the Son. This view, of course, amounted to a denial of the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, and while it admitted the power of the Spirit to sanctify and enlighten, it proclaimed that power to be neither inherent nor divine. The attack thus made upon the essential divinity of the Third as well as the Second Person of the Trinity, led to the extension of the Homoousion, or identity of substance to the doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit, as well as to that concerning the Son. To meet this peculiar heresy which had arisen, a modification was introduced into the Nicene creed, through the second general council at Constantinople. The terms in which the Holy Spirit was described by the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed ran in these words: "The Spirit proceeding from the Father; the governing, quickening Spirit, who is to be worshipped and honoured at the same time with the Father and the Son."

Eunomius was not contented with a mere abstract denial of the divinity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; but, in accordance with these views, he abandoned the ancient custom of the trine immersion in baptism, and also the practice of baptizing in the name of the Trinity, and adopted an entirely new form, that of baptizing only into the death of Christ. Epiphanius tells us, that the Anomœans, whose sentiments Eunomius defended, adopted still another form, baptizing in the name of the uncreated God, and the name of the created God, and the name of the sanctifying Spirit, created by the created Son. Gregory Nyssen says, that from the writings of Eunomius, it appears that the doctrine which he taught on this subject was, that baptism ought to be administered in the name of the Creator and Maker, and not Father only, but God of the Only-begotten. Eunomius, indeed, seems to have been the first of all the Arians who gave a practical bearing to his opinions by changing the form of baptism. Accordingly, both the first general council of Constantinople, and the council of Trullo, ordered the Eunomians on their return to the orthodox faith to be re-baptized, while converts from all the other forms of Arianism were appointed to be received by imposition of hands, without a new baptism. See ANOMŒANS, ÆTIANS, ACACIANS, ARIANS.

EUPHEMITES (Gr. eu, well, and phemi, to speak), one of the appellations given to the EUCHITES (which see) of the fourth century, from hymns addressed to the Supreme God, the Almighty, whom alone they worshipped. Neander supposes this sect to have arisen from that spiritualized, refined polytheism which was connected with the recognition of one absolute essence. Mosheim regards the Euphemites rather as a Pagan than a Christian sect.

EUPHROSYNE, one of the ancient Pagan GRACES (which see)

EUROPA, a daughter of Agenor, who was believed by the ancient Greeks to have been carried off from Phœnicia to Crete by Zeus, who had metamorphosed himself into a bull, in order to accomplish his purpose. From this fabulous person Europe is supposed to have received its name.

EUROPA, a surname of DEMETER (which see).

EURYNOME, a daughter of Oceanus, who was said by the Pagans in ancient times, to have once held rule in Olympus over the Titans, but that having been vanquished by Chronos, she was cast down into Tartarus. Homer, also, represents Eurynome and Thetis as having received Hephestus when he was banished from Olympus by Hera.

EURYNOME, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), under which sacrifices were offered to her once every year at Phigalea in Arcadia. She was represented as half woman, half fish.

EURYNOMUS, a demon among the ancient Greeks, who was reported, by a tradition at Delphi, to have devoured human carcasses, leaving nothing but the bones.

EURYSTERNOS (Gr. broad-chested), a surname of Gæ (which see).

EUSEBIANS, a class of Semi-Arians, who derived their name from two bishops of the name of Eusebius, the one of Cæsarea, who is the celebrated church historian, the other of Nicomedia, and afterwards of Constantinople, who was intimate with Constantine the Great. The latter prelate made use of his influence with the emperor to persuade him to persecute the orthodox party. Under the forms of ecclesiastical law, accusations were formally preferred against the orthodox prelates of the principal sees, and the result was, that all the most powerful churches of Eastern Christendom were brought under the influence of the Arians. Eustathius of Cæsarea was both deposed and banished on charges of heresy and immorality, while Marcellus of Ancyra was deposed, anathematized, and banished on the alleged ground of his leaning to the errors of Sabellius. But the most rancorous enmity of the heretics was directed against Athanasius, the distinguished Patriarch of Alexandria. Charges were produced against him before councils successively held at Cæsarea and Tyre, the Meletians being the accusers, and the Eusebians the judges. The stratagem was but too successful. Athanasius was deposed from the see of Alexandria, and with the sanction of Constantine banished into Gaul.

The death of Constantine, and the division of the Empire among his three sons, changed the whole state of matters in so far as Athanasius was concerned. A large party, headed by the Bishop of Rome, who had already obtained great influence in the West, espoused the cause of the exiled prelate, and the Eusebians found it necessary to take determined steps with the view of confirming the sentence of deposition against the patriarch of Alexandria, and at the same time of drawing up a confession of faith, to allay, if possible, the suspicions which were extensively entertained in the Western churches, of their orthodoxy. A council, accordingly, was summoned at Antioch A. D. 341, which is well known as the Council of the Dedication, at which between ninety and one hundred bishops were present, all of them Arians or Arianizers. In a council composed of such materials, it was no difficult matter to obtain a complete ratification of the sentence pronounced by the synods of Cæsarea and Tyre in condemnation of Athanasius.

"But a less easy task," says Dr. Newman, in his work entitled, 'The Arians of the Fourth Century,' "remained behind; viz. the conciliation of the Western Church, by an exposition of the articles of their faith. Four, or even five creeds, more or less resembling the orthodox in language, were successively adopted, with a view of convincing the Latins of their freedom from doctrinal error. The first was that ascribed to the martyr Lucian, though doubts are entertained concerning its genuineness. It is in itself almost unexceptionable; and, had there been no controversies on the subjects contained in it, would have been a satisfactory evidence of the orthodoxy of its promulgators. The Son is therein styled the exact image of the substance, will, power, and glory of the Father; and the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity are said to be three in substance, one in will. An evasive condemnation was added of the Arian tenets; sufficient, as it might seem, to delude the Latins, who were unskilled in the subtleties of the question. For example, it was denied that our Lord was born 'in time;' but in the heretical school, time was supposed to commence with the creation of the world; and that He was 'in the number of the creatures,' it being their doctrine, that He was the sole immediate work of God, and, as such, altogether distinct from what is commonly called the creation, of which indeed He was, even according to them, the author. Next, for some or other reason, two new creeds were proposed, and partially adopted by the Council; the same in character of doctrine, but shorter. These three were all circulated, and more or less received in the neighbouring churches; but, on consideration, none of them seemed adequate to the object in view, that of recommending their authors to the distant churches of the West. Accordingly, a fourth formulary was drawn up after a few months' delay by Mark, bishop of Arethusa, and others, who were deputed to present it to Constans; and this proving unsatisfactory, a fifth confession was composed with considerable care and ability; but it too failed to quiet the suspicions of the Latins."

From the number of creeds thus produced, the Eusebians were only proclaiming to the world the uncertain and unsatisfactory nature of their opinions. The Western churches countenanced by Constans, and his brother the Emperor of the East, summoned a general council at Sardica A. D. 347. Upwards of 380 bishops attended, of whom 76 were Arian. At the very opening of the council, the Arian party objected to Athanasius being allowed a seat while under deposition. Their objection was overruled, on the ground that a later council held at Rome had fully acquitted and restored him. The Arians, however, retired in a body from the council, and holding a separate meeting at Philippopolis, excommunicated the leaders of the orthodox party, issued a sixth confession of faith, and confirmed the proceedings of the council of Antioch against Athanasius and the other exiles. The council of Sardica, on the contrary, unmoved by the retreat of the Arians, proceeded to condemn some of their leaders, reviewed the acts of the investigations at Tyre and the Maræotis, which the Eusebians had sent to Rome in their defence, and confirmed the decree of the council of Rome in favour of Athanasius. A separation now took place between the Eastern and Western churches, the Semi-Arians now came forward, who had hitherto been concealed among the Eusebians, and took a prominent part in the controversy. On the assassination of the emperor Constans A. D. 350, the Eusebians won over to their party Constantius, who had succeeded to the whole empire, while they opposed and triumphed over the Semi-Arian creed. The stratagem by which they succeeded in blinding the Emperor was, that of affecting on principle to limit confessions of faith to Scripture terms. The author of this artifice was Acacius of Cæsarea, who gave rise to the ACACIANS (which see), in which the Eusebians were from this time absorbed.

EUSTATHIANS, a party which arose in the church at Antioch in the fourth century, in consequence of Eustathius, the bishop of that city, having been deposed A. D. 327 by the Anti-Nicene party, while a majority of the community remained faithfully attached to him. They refused to acknowledge as their bishops the Arians who were thrust upon them, and formed a separate church party under the name of Eustathians, holding peaceful meetings among themselves for Divine worship. This continued as long as Arius held the see of Antioch, and even when Meletius was appointed, who after a time avowed his belief in the Nicene creed, still the Eustathians refused to acknowledge either the Meletians or their bishop, as not pure enough in their opinion from the Arian heresy. Various attempts were made to heal these divisions in the church at Antioch, but in vain. In A. D. 362, Lucifer consecrated a new bishop named Paulinus, but the Eustathians alone received him. Meletius returned to Antioch, and thus there were two bishops of Antioch. Athanasius regarded Paulinus as the most orthodox, and, therefore, he and the greater part of the west took the side of the Eustathians. The eastern bishops were on the side of Meletius, who, however, suddenly died. This event did not, as might have been expected, put a stop to the unseemly contentions. The Meletians in their turn now refused to acknowledge Paulinus, and elected Flavianus as successor to Meletius. Paulinus died A. D. 389, but before his death he had consecrated Evagrius as his successor. Soon after Evagrius also died, but the disunion still continued. At length, through the prudent and conciliatory management of Chrysostom, the two parties were reconciled to each other. Flavianus was acknowledged by the foreign bishops, as bishop of Antioch. Yet there remained a small body of Eustathians who did not unite with the general church till Flavianus was succeeded by other bishops.

EUSTRATES, one of a class of martyrs to whom a festival is dedicated in the Greek church on the 13th December.

EUTERPE, one of the MUSES (which see), of the ancient Pagan mythology.

EUTRESITES, a surname of APOLLO (which see), derived from a place called Eutresis, where he had an oracle. It was situated between Platææ and Thespia.

EUTUCHITES (Gr. eu, well, and tuche, fortune), a heretical sect mentioned by Theodoret, as belonging to the third century. They held that our souls were placed in our bodies only to honour the angels who created them; that we ought to be afflicted at nothing, to be equally pleased with vice and virtue, for to be otherwise would be to dishonour the angels who created our souls. They maintained also that Christ was not the son of the Great God, but of an unknown God.

EUTYCHIANS. See MONOPHYSITES.

EVANEMUS (Gr. eu, well, and anemos, wind), a surname of Zeus, as granting favourable winds. Under this name he was worshipped at Sparta.

EVANGEL (Gr. euangelion, good tidings), a name often applied to the Gospel of Christ. Hence what is in accordance with the Gospel is called Evangelical.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, an association of Christians of all denominations, formed with the design of realizing and giving visible expression to the unity of the church of God throughout the whole world. The Alliance was established in 1846, and the first meeting of the Conference; with a view to its formation, was held in London in August of that year, when leading members of all the orthodox denominations of Britain were present, along with professors of theology, ministers, and elders, from all the departments of France, from the cantons of Switzerland, from the kingdoms, principalities, and universities of Germany, from Holland, from Asia Minor, from Hindustan, and from every section of the United States of America. This was probably the nearest approach to an Ecumenical Council that has been held since the days of the apostles.

The doctrinal basis on which the Evangelical Alliance rests, is as follows:—

“That the parties composing the Alliance shall be such persons only as hold and maintain what are usually understood to be evangelical views in regard to the matters of doctrine under-stated, viz. :—

“1. The Divine inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.

“2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

“3. The Unity of the Godhead, and the Trinity of persons therein.

“4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall.

“5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for sinners of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.

“6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.

“7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.

“8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal punishment of the wicked.

“9. The Divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the obligation and the perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

“It is, however, distinctly declared—First, That this brief summary is not to be regarded, in any formal or ecclesiastical sense, as a creed or confession, nor the adoption of it as involving an assumption of the right authoritatively to define the limits of Christian brotherhood, but simply as an indication of the class of persons whom it is desirable to embrace within the Alliance: Second, That the selection of certain tenets, with the omission of others, is not to be held as implying that the former constitute the whole body of important truth, or that the latter are unimportant.

“That in the prosecution of the present attempt, it is distinctly declared, that no compromise of the views of any member, or sanction of those of others, on the points wherein they differ, is either required or expected; but that all are held as free as before to maintain and advocate their religious convictions with due forbearance and brotherly love.

“That it is not contemplated that this Alliance should assume or aim at the character of a new ecclesiastical organization, claiming and exercising the functions of a Christian Church. Its simple and comprehensive object, it is strongly felt, may be successfully promoted without interfering with, or disturbing the order of, any branch of the Christian Church to which its members may respectively belong.

“That while the formation of this Alliance is regarded as an important step towards the increase of Christian union, it is acknowledged as a duty incumbent on all its members carefully to abstain from pronouncing any uncharitable judgment upon those who do not feel themselves in a condition to give it their sanction.

“That the members of this Alliance earnestly and affectionately recommend to each other in their own conduct, and particularly in their own use of the press, carefully to abstain from and put away all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, with all malice; and in all things in which they may yet differ from each other, to be kind, tender-hearted, forbearing one another in love forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them; in everything seeking to be followers of God, as dear children, and to walk in love, as Christ also has loved them.”

The objects which the Alliance ought to prosecute were thus stated:

“I. That, inasmuch as this proposal for union originated, in a great degree, in the sense very generally entertained among Christians, of their grievous practical neglect of our Lord's ‘new commandment’ to his disciples, to ‘love one another’—in which offence the members of the Alliance desire, with godly sorrow, to acknowledge their full participation—it ought to form one chief object of the Alliance to deepen in the minds of its own members, and through their influence, to extend among the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ generally, that conviction of sin and shortcoming in this respect, which the blessed Spirit of God seems to be awakening throughout his Church; in order that, humbling themselves more and more before the Lord, they may be stirred up to make full confession of their guilt at all suitable times, and to implore, through the merits and intercession of their merciful Head and Saviour, forgiveness of their past offences, and divine grace to lead them to the better cultivation of that brotherly affection which is enjoined upon all who, loving the Lord Jesus Christ, are bound also to love one another for the truth's sake which dwelleth in them.

“II. That the great object of the Evangelical Alliance be, to aid in manifesting, as far as practicable, the unity which exists amongst the true disciples of Christ; to promote their union by fraternal and devotional intercourse; to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions; to impress upon Christians a deeper sense of the great duty of obeying our Lord's command, to 'love one another;' and to seek the full accomplishment of his prayer, 'That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.'

"III. That in furtherance of this object, the Alliance shall receive such information respecting the progress of vital religion in all parts of the world as Christian brethren may be disposed to communicate; and that a correspondence be opened and maintained with Christian brethren in different parts of the world, especially with those who may be engaged, amidst peculiar difficulties and opposition, in the cause of the Gospel, in order to afford them all suitable encouragement and sympathy, and to diffuse an interest in their welfare.

"IV. That, in subserviency to the same great object, the Alliance will endeavour to exert a beneficial influence on the advancement of Evangelical Protestantism, and on the counteraction of Infidelity, of Romanism, and of such other forms of superstition, error, and profaneness, as are most prominently opposed to it, especially the desecration of the Lord's-day; it being understood that the different branches of the Alliance be left to adopt such methods of prosecuting these great ends as may to them appear most in accordance with their respective circumstances; all at the same time pursuing them in the spirit of tender compassion and love.

"In promoting these, and similar objects, the Alliance contemplates chiefly the stimulating of Christians to such efforts as the exigences of the case may demand, by publishing its views in regard to them, rather than accomplishing these views by any general organization of its own."

Branches of the Alliance have since 1846 been formed in almost every part of Christendom, and the result has been, that a spirit of greater harmony and social brotherhood has been thereby infused into the different sections of the Christian body, who, while still retaining their denominational peculiarities, and their separate spheres of action, feel that they are knit together in the unity of the faith, and in the indissoluble bond of Christian peace and love.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, a denomination of Christians in the United States of America, which arose about the year 1800, in one of the middle free States. It was founded as a separate sect by Jacob Albrecht, a Lutheran layman of Pennsylvania, from whom they were at first called the Albrecht Brethren. Having been brought under serious impressions, this worthy man conceived it to be his duty to go forth preaching the gospel, more especially to the Germans throughout the United States, among whom at that time true evangelical Christianity was at a very low ebb. At length, having gathered around him a number of converts, he formed a Christian society, under the name of the Evangelical Association. In 1803 they assumed a regular organization, electing Jacob Albrecht as their presiding elder, and ordaining him by the laying on of the hands of the other preachers. For a time, this zealous body, composed exclusively of Germans, and conducting their worship exclusively in the German language, were exposed to great opposition, and they were even called to endure much persecution. Yet they continued to spread more and more, sending out hundreds of preachers to labour among the German population of the United States and the Canadas, and they have been very successful in their missions among the German emigrants in the Western States, and in several of the principal seaports. For many years the services of this body were conducted wholly in German, but for some years past they have directed their attention more to English preaching, and in several of their circuits their religious exercises are almost exclusively conducted in that language.

The church government of this body of Christians is Episcopal. The bishops are elected every four years by the General Conference, to which they are responsible for the faithful discharge of their duties. They are bound to travel in turn through the whole connection, to superintend the temporal and spiritual affairs of the church, and to preside in the Annual and General Conferences. Next to the bishops, there are presiding elders, whose duty it is, each of them, to travel over the whole bounds of his district, to hold stated quarterly meetings, preside at local and quarterly conferences, and to superintend all the churches within his allotted sphere. Preachers are appointed in the different circuits and stations, who, besides attending to the duty of preaching, are bound to attend to the formation of classes, to direct and superintend the elections of leaders and exhorters, and finally, to receive, put back on trial, and expel members. The Evangelical Association have a Quarterly, an Annual, and a General Conference, the last of which meets every four years for the arrangement of the affairs of the whole body. Quarterly Conferences are held in each of the circuits, and consist of all the class-leaders, exhorters, travelling and local preachers of the district. The members of the Annual Conferences, which meet in every Conference district, are all the travelling preachers, and such as have formerly travelled, and who are fully ordained ministers. To form the General Conference, delegates are elected from every Annual Conference every fourth year, one for every four members of their own body. There is besides another Annual Conference appointed for the local preachers on every circuit, chiefly for investigating the character and conduct of the preachers. The whole society is divided into conference districts, which are subdivided into smaller districts, and these into circuits and the circuits into classes.

The doctrines of the Evangelical Association, as stated by themselves, are in accordance with the creeds and confessions of other evangelical churches, with one solitary exception,—that they deny the imputation of Adam's first sin to his natural posterity. The only other peculiarity of the sect which may be noticed, is that they consider war as in all cases inconsistent with the gospel and spirit of Christ.

This denomination in 1843 had 15,000 communicants, but since that time it has made extensive progress both in the States and Canada.

EVANGELICAL UNION, a Christian denomination which originated in Scotland in 1840. It took its rise from the peculiar theological views which, about that time, began to be entertained and promulgated by Mr. James Morison, son of the Rev. Robert Morison, minister of the United Secession church in Bathgate. Hence the name of Morisonians, by which this body is commonly known, although they themselves prefer the title which we have prefixed to this article. Mr. James Morison was educated for the ministry in connection with that denomination to which his father belonged, and after having passed through the ordinary course of study, both literary and theological, he was licensed to preach the gospel. His father was a man of fervent piety and exemplary diligence as a minister, and the youthful licentiate reared under such favourable auspices, besides being possessed naturally of an ardent, energetic temperament, and having towards the close of his studies, had his serious impressions deepened by a serious illness, entered upon the work of preaching the gospel with an ardent desire to win souls to Christ. The first sphere of his labours as a probationer was in the north of Scotland, particularly Ross-shire, where, by the Divine blessing, he was made instrumental in bringing about a revival of religion. Crowds flocked to hear him wherever he preached, and not a few professed to have received saving impressions from listening to his discourses.

On returning to the south, Mr. Morison continued to take a lively interest in the progress of that good work which was still going forward among his former hearers, and besides corresponding with many of them, he published a tract for their benefit, entitled, 'The Question, What must I do to be Saved? answered by Philanthropos.' This small pamphlet contained the germs of that peculiar theological system which led to the formation of the Evangelical Union. It was extensively circulated throughout the whole country, and excited great sensation, more especially in the denomination of Christians with which its author was connected. In the midst of the ferment caused by this publication, Mr. Morison was invited to become the pastor of a Secession congregation at Kilmarnock; but on presenting himself before the presbytery of the bounds for ordination, two of the brethren, who had read the obnoxious tract, hesitated about proceeding to set him apart for the work of the ministry; but at length he succeeded in removing their scruples, by declaring his readiness to withdraw the tract from circulation.

Having now obtained the responsible position of an ordained minister of a congregation, Mr. Morison conceived it to be his duty to adopt the same style and mode of preaching to his own flock which had been already attended with such marked success in other congregations. He accordingly proclaimed what he considered the grand gospel message, that Christ died for all men without exception, and that, therefore, it was the duty, as well as the privilege of every human being, to apply this truth to his own individual case, and without hesitation to believe and take comfort from the conviction that Christ died for him. For any man to do otherwise, to refuse to exercise this assurance of his own personal interest in Christ, he taught was sin, inasmuch as it was a manifest denial of the design of Christ's death as an universal atonement. That such views were taught by Mr. Morison could not be concealed, nor was he ashamed of them. He proclaimed them publicly from the pulpit, and from house to house. The novelty of the doctrine, and its obvious inconsistency with the Westminster Confession, speedily attracted the notice of the neighbouring ministers, and in a short time Mr. Morison was summoned to appear before the Kilmarnock presbytery accused of teaching false and unscriptural doctrine. The charges were arranged under various heads.—1. That he inculcated the doctrine that the object of saving faith to any man was, that Christ made atonement for the sins of that person, inasmuch as he made atonement for the sins of the whole world, and that saving faith consisted in seeing this statement to be true. To this specific charge Mr. Morison replied that the object of saving faith is the gospel, and that the gospel is simply this, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures," which, of course, implies that Christ died for all men, since all men are commanded to believe; that faith cannot be exercised without consciousness of its exercise, and, therefore, saving faith must always be accompanied with a consciousness that the man is believing the truth as it is in Jesus. 2. That he taught man's ability of himself to believe. To this Mr. Morison replied, that man has power to believe, God having given him the requisite ability; were it otherwise man would not be responsible for his belief. 3. That he declared that no man ought to be called upon to pray for strength to enable him to believe. The reply of Mr. Morison to this charge was, that prayer was undoubtedly a duty incumbent upon every man, but it was a prior duty to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and prayer, which did not spring from faith, could not be acceptable to God. 4. That he taught repentance in Scripture to be only a change of mind, and not a godly sorrow for sin. To this Mr. Morison made answer, that the Greek word used in the New Testament was metanoia, and meant simply change of mind, while he readily admitted that such a change was uniformly followed by godly sorrow for sin. 5. That he declared justification not to be pardon, but that it is implied in pardon. To this Mr. Morison answered, that justification cannot be considered as identical with pardon, seeing a man can be justified only once, but he may be often pardoned. 6. That he believed election to come in the order of nature after the purpose of atonement. The reply of Mr. Morison to this charge was, that while he maintained election to be eternal, personal and unconditional, since the statement of Scripture is, that the elect are chosen in Christ, the purpose of election cannot possibly precede, but must follow after the purpose of atonement. 7. That his publications contained many unwarranted statements in regard to the atonement. These statements Mr. Morison explained or defended. 8. That he taught that men could not merit eternal death on account of Adam's first sin. To this Mr. Morison replied, that he held all men to be guilty of Adam's first sin, but that no man would suffer eternal death merely in consequence of that sin.

The result of this trial for heresy was, that in March 1841 Mr. Morison was suspended from the office of the holy ministry. Against this sentence he protested, and appealed to the next meeting of the United Secession synod, which took place in the following June. The case occupied the synod for eleven successive sittings, at the close of which it was decided that the sentence of suspension passed by the presbytery of Kilmarnock be confirmed. Against this decision Mr. Morison protested in these terms: "Seeing the supreme court has given sentence against me, even to my suspension from the ministry, on most inadequate grounds, I protest against the decision, and I shall hold myself at liberty to maintain and preach the same doctrines as if no such decision had been come to." Mr. Robert Morison of Bathgate, the father of the young minister who was thus suspended, was next charged with heresy, chiefly on the subject of the atonement of Christ, which he maintained secured the salvation of no man, but provided salvation for all, and that salvation was secured to individual believers by the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, which were ordained in the order of nature subsequent to the purpose of atonement. The charge was fully proved, and Mr. Morison was cast out of the Secession body in 1842. On precisely similar grounds, the Rev. A. C. Rutherford of Falkirk, and Rev. John Guthrie of Kendal were cast out in 1843. Suspensions now began to be entertained that the Morisonian heresy, as it was called, was taught by Dr. John Brown from the professorial chair. This eminent divine, accordingly, was sisted at the bar of the Secession synod, accused of heresy, but, after a careful and minute inquiry, the charges were wholly disproved, and the worthy Professor was triumphantly acquitted. Thereupon Dr. Marshall of Kirkintilloch, one of the two brethren who had taken upon themselves the responsibility of libelling Dr. Brown, withdrew from the Secession body.

The four suspended ministers continued to exercise their ministry, notwithstanding the sentence of the synod, the majority of the members of their congregations still adhering to them; and besides teaching their peculiar tenets from the pulpit, they availed themselves of the press to circulate their opinions far and wide throughout the whole country. The new views, accordingly, found numerous supporters in most of the large towns, and many of the rural districts of Scotland. It was now thought proper that the congregations which adhered to the suspended ministers should be united in Christian fellowship, and in pursuance of this object, meetings were held in Glasgow on the 16th, 17th, and 18th May 1843, at which the EVANGELICAL UNION was formed "for the purpose," as they themselves expressed it in their published statement of principles, "of countenancing, counselling, and otherwise aiding one another; and also for the purpose of training up spiritual and devoted young men to carry on and to carry forward the work and pleasure of the Lord."

At the time when the Union was established, the opinions of the brethren as to various important theological points had undergone considerable modification. When first separated from the United Secession church, their views of election and predestination were decidedly Calvinistic, but they had now assumed an Arminian character. Their characteristic peculiarities had been the universal extent of the atonement, and the ability of men to believe the gospel. To these, however, they now added the universality of the grace of God as extended to all men, and not to believers alone, and also the capability of man to resist that grace. They no longer believed in absolute unconditional election, but in conditional election, arising out of the Divine foreknowledge of the future faith of those who were elected. These tenets added to those of their former creed, showed that the new sect avowed opinions which bore partly a Pelagian and partly an Arminian character.

The Morisonian doctrines, as they were called, arose first within the United Secession Church, but they were not long limited to that body; several ministers of the Scottish Congregationalist or Independent communion began openly to promulgate the same tenets both from the pulpit and the press. The students also, of the Theological Academy in Glasgow were suspected of having secretly imbibed the new views. Considerable uneasiness was excited in consequence, lest what was considered a fatal heresy should diffuse itself throughout the Independent body. Steps were accordingly taken to test the students with the design of discovering how far the obnoxious opinions prevailed among them. Dr. Wardlaw, under whose charge they had long been placed, was appointed to draw up three questions, which were presented to each student, and written answers were required

These testing questions were as follows: "1. Are your sentiments on the subject of Divine influence the same now as they were when you were examined by the committee and admitted into this institution? 2. Do you hold, or do you not, the necessity of a special influence of the Holy Spirit, in order to the regeneration of the sinner, or his conversion to God, distinct from the influence of the Word or of providential circumstances, but accompanying these means, and rendering them efficacious? 3. Are your sentiments settled on the subject of the preceding query, or are you in a state of indecision, and desirous of time for farther consideration and inquiry?" The answers produced from ten out of twenty regular students were deemed unsatisfactory by the Academy committee, and nine of them still adhering to the opinions given forth in their printed answers, were expelled from the Academy on the 1st May 1844. In the following year, five churches in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, and four in the north of Scotland, were thrown off from the Congregationalist body, and co-operated with the brethren of the Evangelical Union. A minister belonging to the Free Church also, the Rev. William Scott of Free St. Mark's, Glasgow, having been led to embrace the Morisonian views, was cut off from that body by the General Assembly in 1845.

Thus the Evangelical Union came to be composed of a number of ministers, who, while they held substantially the same theological views, were disagreed on the subject of church government, some of them being Presbyterians, and others Congregationalists. And yet the Congregationalist principle is admitted by the whole body, inasmuch as they deny the right of Presbyteries, Synods, or Assemblies to exercise control over individual churches. But though the fundamental principle of presbyterianism is thus abandoned, even by those churches of the Union which formerly held it, still the Congregationalist churches of the body transact all their affairs in meetings of the whole church members, while the Presbyterian churches intrust the management of their affairs to a body of elders chosen from among the communicants. The Union exercises no authority over the internal government of the different churches, which are placed on a strictly independent footing, there being no external body which interferes in the slightest degree with their internal arrangements. The Annual Conference meets in the beginning of October, but its object is simply consultation for the general good of the whole Union and the advancement of the common cause, attending to the interests of the Theological Academy, and to the Home and Foreign Missions in connection with the body, but no attempt is ever made to intermeddle with the internal concerns of individual congregations. According to the census reports of 1851, the ministers of the Union are returned as twenty-eight; but it ought to be borne in mind, that several churches and ministers co-operate with the body, profess its principles, and contribute to its funds, though they have not formally joined the Union. It is probable, therefore, that the ministers of the body actually amount to upwards of forty, and the denomination is decidedly on the increase. Nor is the body limited to Scotland; its principles have also been carried across the Tweed, and are now making rapid progress, particularly in the north of England. By means of a publishing establishment which was commenced by private individuals in Glasgow in 1846, both a weekly newspaper, called the Christian News, and a Monthly Magazine, called the Day-Star, are regularly issued, along with various tracts and treatises, all of them designed to circulate widely throughout both ends of the island, as well as in Ireland, and even in foreign countries.

EVANGELICAL COUNSELS, the three vows of a monk in the Romish church, namely, voluntary poverty, perpetual chastity, and entire obedience or complete submission to an ecclesiastical superior.

EVANGELIST (Gr. eu, well, and angelos, a messenger), literally, one who brings good tidings, a word used in the New Testament to denote an office-bearer in the early Christian church, who seemed to rank next to the apostles, and whose duty it was to preach the gospel not in any stated district, but at large. It implied, therefore, an itinerant preacher, or missionary, who wandered about from place to place preaching and founding churches. It may have been in this sense that Paul calls upon Timothy to "do the work of an evangelist." The word, however, is now usually limited in its application to the four inspired persons, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, who wrote the history of the life of our blessed Lord. In later ages of the church, the term Evangelist was applied to the officer who read or chanted the gospel during divine service, and in the Greek church the name EVANGELISTA (which see) is still applied to the deacon who reads the Gospels. In Eusebius we find an important passage respecting the office of Evangelist. "They extended the preaching of the gospel, and sprad the seed of the kingdom of heaven far and wide. The greater number of disciples at that time, whose souls were inflamed through the Divine word with a zealous love of wisdom, in the first place fulfilled the commandment of the Saviour, (see Matth. xix. 21.) and distributed their goods among the poor. Then they travelled into distant parts, and discharged the office of Evangelists among those who had not yet heard anything of the word of faith. They were busily employed in preaching Christ, and distributing the books of the holy Gospels. When they had laid the foundation of faith in unenlightened places, they appointed others as pastors, to whom they intrusted the care of the new plantation; but they themselves went forward to other countries and people, being led by the grace and co-operation of God. The Holy Ghost wrought many miracles by their hands, by means of which they succeeded in bringing over large multitudes, at the first hearing, to the worship of the universal Creator." Philip, who had first been a deacon at Jerusalem, was afterwards an evangelist, preaching the gospel wherever occasion offered. Such officers must have been peculiarly useful in the infancy of the Christian church, and from Scripture we learn that they were endowed with special spiritual gifts to qualify them for their work.

EVANGELISTA, the name given in the Greek church to the deacon who reads the Gospels in the course of Divine service. Before he begins to read he turns to the priest and craves his blessing.

EVANGELISTARIUM, an appendix to the EVANGELIUM (which see) of the Greek church, containing thirty-five canons or rules for finding the Gospels for each Sunday in the year, and also for calculating the time of Easter.

EVANGELISTS. In the last census, that of 1851, four congregations returned themselves as worshipping in England under this name, probably to avoid being identified with anything which bore the aspect of sectarianism.

EVANGELIUM, a book used in the services of the Greek church, which contains the Gospels divided into sections, arranged as lessons for each day and festival. Sometimes these lessons are taken from one evangelist, and sometimes from another. But with the exception of the solemn festivals, which require a particular gospel, the lessons on ordinary Sabbaths go on continuously throughout the four Evangelists, so that the Sundays are often called by the name of the particular Evangelist which they may be in the course of reading. Thus they speak of the first Sunday or the second Sunday of St. Matthew, and so on.

EVE, the first created woman, and the mother of all living. The word Eve in the Hebrew language signifies Life. The Jewish Rabbis say that Eve was not the first wife of Adam, but LILITH (which see), who contended with him for superiority, and finding that he demanded from her obedience and submission, she pronounced the name JEHOVAH, and instantly flew away through the air. Angels were despatched to bring back the fugitive, but she refused to return, whereupon Eve was created to be a helpmeet for Adam. The Mohammedan doctors allege, that Eve was produced from Adam's side, after the expulsion of Satan from Paradise, for refusing to do homage to the first man, and therefore, the woman being unacquainted with the appearance of her adversary, he secretly returned to Eden, and assisted by the serpent and the peacock, persuaded her to eat the forbidden fruit. When our first parents were banished from Paradise, which the Moslems suppose to have been placed in the seventh or lowest heaven, Adam fell in the island of Ceylon, near the mountain which still retains his name, but Eve on the coast of the Red Sea, not far from Mecca. During two hundred years they lived separate from each other, bewailing their forlorn condition, and bitterly repenting of their sin. At length, God took pity upon them and despatched Gabriel to bring them together again, near Mount Arafat in Arabia. The Budhists having lost all faith in a Creator, reject the idea of the creation of the first man and woman. The ancient Scandinavians give the first woman the name of EMBLA (which see). The Hindus, according to one view, allege that Brahma, the god of creation, had converted himself into two persons, the first man or the Manu Swayambhwa, and the first woman or Satarupa, which denotes the great universal mother, the one parent of a hundred forms.

EVENING SERVICE. In the primitive Christian church the evening service was conducted on the same plan as the ANTELUKAN SERVICE (which see), with such variations in the psalmody and prayers as were suited to the time and circumstances. The morning service commenced with the sixty-third Psalm, whereas the evening service commenced with the hundred and forty-first Psalm, which the author of the Apostolic Constitutions accordingly calls the Evening Psalm; and Chrysostom alleges, that the reason of its adoption, as the initial part of the service, was as a sort of salutary medicine to cleanse us from sin; that whatever defilement we may have contracted throughout the whole day, either abroad, in the market, or at home, or in whatsoever place, when the evening comes we might put it all off by this spiritual song, which is a medicine to purge away all such corruption. After this psalm, followed the same prayers which were used in the morning service, at the close of which the evening bidding prayer was used, which ran in these words, "Let us pray to the Lord for his mercies and compassions; and entreat him to send us the angel of peace, and all good things convenient for us, and that he would grant us to make a Christian end. Let us pray that this evening and night may pass in peace and without sin, and all the time of our life unblameable and without rebuke. Let us commend ourselves and one another to the living God through his Christ." Then was offered up the evening thanksgiving in these words: "O God, who art without beginning and without end, the Maker and Governor of all things through Christ, the God and Father of him before all things, the Lord of the Spirit, and King of all things, both intellectual and sensible; that hast made the day for works of light, and the night to give rest to our weakness: for the day is thine, and the night is thine; thou hast prepared the light and the sun: do thou now, most kind and gracious Lord, receive this our evening thanksgiving. Thou that hast led us through the length of the day, and brought us to the beginning of the night, keep and preserve us by thy Christ; grant that we may pass this evening in peace, and this night without sin, and vouchsafe to bring us to eternal life through thy Christ; by whom be glory, honour, and adoration unto thee in the Holy Spirit, world without end. Amen." This thanksgiving being ended, the deacon called upon the people to bow down and receive the benediction, when the following prayer was offered : "O God of our fathers, and Lord of mercy, that hast created man by thy wisdom a rational being, and of all thy creatures upon earth dearest unto thee, that hast given him dominion over the earth, and hast made us by thy pleasure to be kings and priests, the one to secure our lives, and the other to preserve thy lawful worship : be pleased now, O Lord Almighty, to bow down and show the light of thy countenance upon thy people, who bow the neck of their heart before thee ; and bless them by Christ, by whom thou hast enlightened us with the light of knowledge, and revealed thyself unto us : with whom is due unto thee and the Holy Ghost the Comforter, all worthy adoration from every rational and holy nature, world without end. Amen." At the close of this prayer the deacon dismissed the people with the usual form, as in the morning service, "Depart in peace."

In addition to this regular form of the Evening Service, an evening hymn is mentioned by several ancient authors, which was used at the setting up of lights. "It seemed good," says St. Basil, "to our forefathers, not to receive the gift of the evening light altogether with silence, but to give thanks immediately upon its appearance." A hymn of this kind occurs in the Alexandrian Manuscript of the Septuagint, which runs as follows : "O Jesus Christ, thou joyful light of the sacred glory of the immortal, heavenly, holy, blessed Father ! we now, being come to the setting of the sun, and seeing the evening light, do laud and praise the Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit of God (or the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that is God). Thou art worthy to have hymns at all times sung unto thee with holy voices, O Son of God that givest life. Therefore the world glorifies thee." The arrangements for evening service seem to have varied considerably in different churches, but in all of them a considerable number of psalms and hymns were mingled with the prayers.

EVENS. See VIGIL.

EVITERNUS, a deity worshipped by the ancient Romans, according to Pliny.

EVOCATIO, a religious ceremony observed by the ancient Romans when besieging a town, in which they solemnly called upon the deities of the place to forsake it, and come over to their assistance. Without this ceremony they imagined that the place could not be taken, or that it would be sacrilege to take the gods prisoners. They generally attempted to bribe the deities by promising them temples and festivals. If the place was taken, they concluded that the gods had listened to their prayers, and had deserted it.

EXALTATION OF THE CROSS, a festival observed by both the Greek and Roman churches on the 14th of September. It was instituted by the Greek Emperor Heraclius A. D. 631, after having conquered the Persians, and recovered from them the supposed real cross which Cosroes their king had carried off fourteen years before. The festival was established by Pope Honorius, and was introduced into the West in the seventh century ; for the Roman Pontiffs were then under the dominion of the Greek Emperors, and were beginning gradually to withdraw themselves from their jurisdiction. The Greek church calls this festival Stavrophaneia, manifestation of the cross, which, as well as the name given to it by the Romish church, Exaltation of the Cross, is derived from the circumstance that the supposed true cross, when brought back by Heraclius from Persia, was exalted or set up in the great church of Constantinople, in order to show it to the people. The Greeks prepare themselves by a fourteen days' fast for this festival, and during the whole of that time discourses are delivered to the people on the subject of our Saviour's sufferings and death. The fast, however, is observed only by the monks, but on the day of the festival the people are obliged to kiss the cross fasting. The Copts observe this festival by the benediction of a particular cross, which is afterwards thrown into the Nile, in order to make the waters of the river, as they say, retire within its banks, which almost always happens on the 24th of September, or at least from that day the waters begin to decline. In this, as well as some of the other great festivals, the Armenians offer lambs in sacrifices to God. The victims are slain by the priests at the doors of their churches. Each householder usually provides a lamb for sacrifice if his circumstances are such as to admit of it, and when the animal is slain, he dips his finger in the blood, and makes the sign of the cross with it on the door of his house. The priest claims half of the slain victim, and the other half is roasted and eaten by the family.

EXARCH, an officebearer in the Greek church, next to the patriarch, and to whom the charge of the patriarchal monasteries is committed. It is his special duty to visit these monasteries, to hear the complaints of inferiors against their superiors, to impose penance, and punish those monks who neglect their duty. When a superior of a patriarchal monastery dies, the Exarch sends the individual elected by the monks to receive the imposition of hands from the patriarch. The Exarch is also bound to take an exact account of all the monasteries which are dependent on the patriarch, of their revenues, sacred vessels, and ornaments.

When Constantine the Great established Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire, he endeavoured to conform the ecclesiastical arrangements to the civil administration of the commonwealth. With this view he created Exarchs, corresponding to the civil officers of that name, and presiding each over several provinces. The Exarchs, however, of the fourth century are in no respect similar to the Exarchs of the modern Greek church.

EXCELLENTS. See GAONS.

EXCEPTORS. See NOTARY.

EXCISION (Lat. cutting off), an ecclesiastical sentence among the Jews, whereby a person was separated or cut off from his people. The Jews enumerate thirty-six crimes to which this punishment is due. The excision might be partial, in which case the person on whom it fell was cut off from the liberty of free intercourse with every person out of his own family, for the space of thirty days, though he was still allowed to enter the synagogue, provided he did not approach nearer to any person than four cubits. This was the lesser excommunication of the Jews. The excision might also be complete, excluding him from all the privileges of the synagogue, and cutting him off as a heathen man from the worshipping assemblies of his people. This was called the greater excommunication. The Rabbis reckon three kinds of excision: one by an untimely death, which destroys only the body; another by the utter destruction of the soul; and a third by the destruction of both soul and body.

EXCOMMUNICATION. See ANATHEMA, CENSURES (ECCLIASTICAL).

EXECRATION. See ANATHEMA.

EXEDRA, a name sometimes given by St. Augustine to the AMBO (which see). It is often used in ancient writers as synonymous with the APSIS (which see).

EXEDRÆ, the outer buildings of ancient Christian churches, including all the appendages belonging to the churches, such as courts, side-buildings, and wings, along with all those separate buildings pertaining to the main edifice, which were situated in the enclosures of the churchyard. In the open space stood the demoniacs and the weeping penitents, neither of whom were permitted to enter within the walls of the church. But the most important of all the Exedræ was the BAPTISTERY (which see). See CHURCHES.

EXEMPTION, a privilege granted by the Pope to the Romish clergy, and sometimes to the laity, whereby he exempts or frees them from the jurisdiction of their respective ordinaries.

EXITERIA, sacrifices offered by generals among the ancient Greeks before setting out on warlike expeditions. The chief use of these sacrifices was to ascertain whether the enterprise was to be successful or disastrous.

EXOCATACELI, a name given to several important officers in the ancient church of Constantinople, who were of great authority, and in public assemblies took precedence of the bishops. Originally they were of the order of priests, but afterwards were only deacons. Critics differ much as to the origin of the name. The most probable opinion is that of Du Cange, who derives it from the circumstance, that those who were high in office were seated, in public assemblies, in high and more honourable seats, erected on either side of the patriarchal throne. The college of the Exocataceli corresponded to the college of cardinals at Rome.

EXOCIONITES, a name applied to the ARIANS (which see) of the fourth century, who, when expelled from Constantinople by Theodosius the Great, retired to a place outside the city. The name frequently occurs in the Chronicle of Alexandria. Justinian made over to the orthodox all the churches of the heretics, except that of the Exocionites.

EXOMOLOGESIS (Gr. confession), a word which frequently occurs in the Christian fathers, and which is alleged by Romish writers to mean private or auricular confession made to a priest. Protestant writers, however, understand it to mean the whole exercise of public penance, of which public confession formed an important part. The latter view is that which is given by Tertullian. "The exomologesis," says he, "is the discipline of a man's prostrating and humbling himself, enjoining him a conversation that moves God to mercy and compassion. It obliges a man to change his habit and his diet, to lie in sack-cloth and ashes, to defile his body by a neglect of dress and ornament, to afflict his soul with sorrow, and to change his former sinful conversation by a quite contrary practice; to use meat and drink, not to please his appetite, but only for preservation of life; to quicken his prayers and devotions by frequent fastings; to groan and weep, and cry unto the Lord God both day and night; to prostrate himself before the presbyters of the church, to kneel before the friends of God, and beg of all the brethren that they would become intercessors for his pardon: all this the exomologesis requires to recommend a true repentance." See CONFESSION (AURICULAR).

EXORCISM, a ceremony used from ancient times for dispossessing evil spirits, and still employed for this purpose, both in the Romish and Greek churches. In the early days of Christianity, when many of the converts had come over from heathenism, the practice was adopted in baptism, of calling upon the candidate for this sacred ordinance previously to make an open renunciation of all fellowship with the kingdom of darkness, of which he had before been a subject. Giving his hand to the bishop, he solemnly declared that he renounced the devil and all his pomps, referring to the public shows of the heathens. And not only did he renounce the devil, but his angels also, an expression which Neander conjectures to have been based on the notion, that the heathen gods were evil spirits who had seduced mankind. This pledge was regarded as the Christian's military oath or sacrament. "But this form of renunciation," continues Neander, "which we meet with in the second century, should be distinguished from the exorcism, which could not have sprung so early out of the prevailing mode of thinking in Christian antiquity. It is true, the idea of a deliverance from the dominion of the evil spirit in a moral and spiritual respect, of a separation from the kingdom of evil, and of a communication by the new birth of a divine life, which should be victorious over the principle of evil, is to be reckoned among the number of original and essential Christian ideas ; but the whole act of baptism was to be in truth precisely a representation of this idea ; there was no need, therefore, that any separate act should still be added to denote or to effectuate that which the whole act of baptism was intended to denote, and to the believer truly and effectually to represent. The case was different with the form of renunciation. This, like the confession of faith, had reference to what the candidate was bound, on his part, to do, in order to enjoy the benefit of baptism. As in Christianity faith and life are closely conjoined, so the renunciation accompanied the confession. Hence we find in the second century no trace as yet of any such form of exorcism against the evil spirit. But the tendency to confound the inward with the outward, the inclination to the magical, the fondness for pomp and display, caused that those forms of exorcism which had been employed in the case of the energumens or demoniacally possessed, should be introduced in the baptism of all heathens. Perhaps the fact also had some connection with this change, that exorcism, which in earlier times was a free charisma, had become generally transformed into a lifeless mechanical act, attached to a distinct office in the church. In the apostolic constitutions, we find neither the one nor the other. The first unequivocal trace of exorcism in baptism is found in the acts of the council of eighty-five or eighty-seven bishops, which convened at Carthage in the year 256."

Cyril of Jerusalem is the first writer who gives an account of the form of exorcism. The principal ceremonies connected with it were those detailed by Coleman, in his 'Christian Antiquities' :—

"1. Preliminary fasting, prayers, and genuflections. These, however, may be regarded as general preliminaries to baptism.

"2. Imposition of hands upon the head of the candidate, who stood with his head bowed down in a submissive posture.

"3. Putting off the shoes and clothing, with the exception of an under garment.

"4. Facing the candidate to the west, which was the symbol of darkness, as the east was of light.

"In the Eastern church he was required to thrust out his hand towards the west, as if in the act of pushing away an object in that direction. This was a token of his abhorrence of Satan and his works, and his determination to resist and repel them.

"5. A renunciation of Satan and his works ; thus — 'I renounce Satan and his works, and his pomps, and his services, and all things that are his.' This or a similar form was thrice repeated.

"6. The exorcist then breathed upon the candidate either once or three times, and adjured the unclean spirit in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to come out of him.

"This form of adjuration seems not to have been in use until the fourth century ; and these several formalities were apparently introduced gradually and at different times."

The Jews made great pretensions to the power of exorcism, and Josephus relates several wonderful cures of demoniacs effected by this means. Our Saviour gave his disciples power over unclean spirits. Paul, as we learn from Acts xix. 12—16, possessed the power of expelling evil spirits. Among the early Christians the power of casting out devils in the name of Jesus was not confined to the clergy, but as Origen informs us, was common to all Christians. During the first three centuries, however, exorcism was exclusively practised by bishops and presbyters, and it was not until the end of the third century that its duties came to be discharged by a separate class of Christian office-bearers. That exorcism formed no part of the baptismal ceremony in the second century is plain from Justin Martyr, in his 'Second Apology,' and Tertullian, in his 'De Corona Militis,' having described the ceremonies of baptism, in their times, and yet making no mention of exorcism.

The practice of exorcism forms an important part of the ceremonies of the Church of Rome, the ritual of exorcisms extending over no fewer than thirty pages of the Rituale Romanum. Minute directions are given for distinguishing demoniacal possession from lunacy. "The marks of those possessed by demons," we are informed, "are, that they speak unknown tongues with much copiousness of speech, or that they understand them when spoken ; that they disclose things distant and secret ; that they show a strength or prematurity beyond their years ; and when many of these signs concur, the indications are the greater." When the exorcist is convinced from these symptoms that the individual before him is really possessed with a devil, he is directed by the ritual to put a crucifix into the hand of the possessed, or at least within his view. If any relics of saints are within reach, they ought to be reverently applied to his breast or head. If the possessed be very loquacious, the exorcist must order him to be silent, and to reply only to the questions proposed in reference to the number and name of the spirits that beset him, the time they entered, the cause, and other similar questions. Should the demoniac allege himself to be the soul of any saint, or dead person or good angel, the exorcist is strictly charged to put no faith in any such statements. The ceremony of exorcism is performed at the lower end of the church towards the door. The exorcist having first made the sign of the cross upon the possessed person, causes him to kneel, and sprinkles him with holy water. The litanies, psalms, and prayers are then read, after which the exorcist asks the evil spirit his name, and adjures him not to afflict the person any more ; then laying his hand upon the demoniac's head he repeats one of the forms of exorcism, such as the following, which he must pronounce in a tone of command and authority, in strong faith, and humility, and fervour, "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ; tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of the faith, thou foe of mankind, who hast brought death into the world; who hast deprived men of life, and hast rebelled against justice; thou seducer of mankind, thou root of all evil, thou source of avarice, discord, and envy."

Should the unclean spirit refuse to yield to this form of exorcism, a more pungent one must be employed, and if still inexorable, a longer and more emphatic adjuration must be used. "Let him also observe," says the Ritual, "at what words the demons most tremble, and let him repeat these most frequently; and when he comes to the commination, let him return to it again and again, always increasing the punishment; and if he see that he prevails, let him persevere in it throughout two, three, four hours, and more as he is able until he has attained the victory." Houses and other places supposed to be haunted by unclean spirits are also exorcised by the Romish church, and the ceremony is much the same as for a person possessed. The frequent repetition of the Pater Noster, Ave Maria, and Creed, are enjoined as of great efficacy, and should other means fail, the Athanasian Creed is strongly recommended.

The occasions are very numerous in which the Romish church has recourse to exorcism. Besides forming an essential part of the ceremony of baptism, it is also resorted to in laying the foundation stone of a church, salt and water being solemnly exorcised. The form of exorcising the salt, as it is found in the Roman Pontifical, is as follows: "I exorcise thee, thou creature of salt, by the living + God, by the true + God, by the holy + God; by the God who ordered thee to be cast into water by Elijah the prophet, that the unwholesomeness of the water might be healed: that thou be made exorcised salt, for the salvation of those that believe; and that thou be to all that use thee, health of soul and body; and that from the place where thou shalt be sprinkled, every spectre, and malice or subtlety of the devil's illusions, and every unclean spirit, flee away and depart, adjured by Him, who is to come to judge the quick and the dead, and the world by fire. R. Amen." The form also for exorcising the water runs thus: "I exorcise thee, thou creature of water, in the name of God the Fa + ther Almighty, and in the name of Jesus Christ his + Son our Lord, and in the might of the Holy + Spirit, that thou be conjured water, for putting to flight all the power of the enemy: and that thou avail to root out and banish the enemy himself, with his apostate angels, through the might of the same our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall come to judge the quick and the dead, and the world by fire. R. Amen." The holy water to be sprinkled on the inside of the church is exorcised in different words from that which is sprinkled outside, and besides, it is mingled not only with salt, but with ashes and wine, so as to render it still more holy than the other. In making the oil of the sick, also, which is only done on Maundy Thursday, an exorcism is muttered in a low tone, and in the same way there is a form of exorcism for making the holy CHRISM (which see).

The modern Jews have a prayer which they use habitually from early childhood, and which they say exorcises or drives away evil spirits from them during the night; but even although this prayer may have been offered, evil spirits will rest upon their hands and faces if they remain in bed beyond a certain time in the morning. The Rabbins teach, that if a man rises early, says his prayers three times, and performs his appointed rites and ceremonies, he has no cause to dread evil spirits, for although they may hover round him they cannot touch him. It is necessary, however, that as soon as he gets out of bed, and is partly dressed, he should hasten to wash himself in order to drive away evil spirits, and that no time may be lost, the pious are exhorted to have a vessel of water close by their bed-side, that on awaking they may have it in their power without delay to wash their hands. Women are obliged to observe the same order of washing, that is, to pour water three times over their hands.

In the administration of the ordinance of baptism, the Greek church offer four prayers of exorcism, during the last of which the priest blows on the infant's mouth, forehead, and breast, and commands the evil spirit to depart, while the sponsor is directed to confirm his renunciation of the devil by blowing and spitting upon him. The exorcism of the Coptic church is accompanied by the sign of the cross made thirty-seven times. The mode in which the Greeks exorcise demoniacs is thus related by an old writer: "The patient was chained down to a post; after which, several priests, dressed in their sacerdotal vestments, read to him, for six hours together, a considerable part or portion of the four Gospels. And as in one particular place of St. Matthew it is said, in express terms, 'that this kind of devil goeth not out, but by prayer and fasting,' the exorcists took particular care to fast about twenty-four hours before. The next day they observed the same penance, and continued to read as before. It was three days at least before these lessons were over. In the meantime the demoniac cursed his Maker, and raved against all mankind, swearing, hallooing and hooting, and making a thousand ridiculous grimaces. All his contortions, however, were no impediments to the priests in the prosecution of their reading; nor did they condescend so far as to make the least reply to the impious blasphemies of Satan. It is observable, that the priests read alternately, without intermission, and that with such care and circumspection, that before one had well finished the other was ready to begin. After they had done reading the four Gospels, another priest, remarkable for his sanctity of manners, was made choice of for an assistant. His province was to read to the demoniac the exorcisms of St. Basil. Though this lecture, it seems, put the devil into the utmost confusion, yet it did not prevent him from retorting in the most opprobrious language imaginable: the priest, however, so severely rebuked him, and in such a peremptory manner enjoined him to come out, that he was forced to comply. At his departure he showed his resentment to the utmost of his power, tormented the miserable wretch as much as possibly he could, and left him motionless, and like a dead corpse, upon the ground."

EXORCISTS, a class of office-bearers which arose in the Christian church towards the end of the third century, and whose office it was to expel devils. No distinct order of this kind appears to have existed in the early ages of Christianity, but during the first three centuries the duties which afterwards devolved upon expellers of demons, were discharged by the bishops and presbyters, while in a certain sense, by prayer, and by resisting the devil, every one might be his own exorcist. "Nothing is more certain," says Bingham, "than that in the apostolic age, and that next following, the power of exorcising or casting out devils was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, not confined to the clergy, much less to any single order among them, but given to other Christians also, as many other extraordinary gifts then were." Exorcists were charged with the more special care of the ENERGUMENS (which see), or persons possessed with an evil spirit. It was their duty to pray over these persons, and to use all proper means for their recovery. Accordingly, the fourth council of Carthage describes the appointment and office of the exorcists in these words, "When an exorcist is ordained, he shall receive at the hands of the bishop a book, wherein the forms of exorcising are written, the bishop saying, Receive thou these and commit them to memory, and have thou power to lay hands on the Energumens, whether they be baptized or only catechumens." It was not, however, until the fourth century, that exorcists came to exercise their office in connection with Christian baptism, not as being absolutely necessary, nor as being enjoined in the Scriptures, but simply as being highly beneficial, inasmuch as without it children born of Christian parents would not be free from the influence of evil spirits. From this time the exorcists not only officiated in connection with the Energumens or demoniacs, but also with the catechumens as candidates for baptism.

The office of exorcist is still maintained both in the Church of Rome and in the Greek Church, and express provision is made in the Roman Pontifical for the ordination of such an office-bearer, whenever it is thought expedient that he should be chosen and consecrated. The exorcist elect kneeling before the bishop, with candles in his hands, is thus addressed: "About to be ordained, most dear son, to the office of an exorcist, you ought to know what you undertake. It is your part to cast out demons, and to teach the prayer, that he who communicates not gives place to the devil; and it is your part in your ministry to pour out the water, (holy.) Receive therefore, the power of laying hands on the possessed, that by the imposition of your hands, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, and the words of exorcism, unclean spirits may be driven from the bodies possessed by them. Study, therefore, that as you expel demons from the bodies of others, you may cast out uncleanness and wickedness from your own body, lest you fall under the power of those spirits that you put to flight from others. Learn from your office to restrain your own faults, lest through your evil manners the enemy prevail, and avenge himself. Then, truly you will rule over other demons, when you have first overcome their complicate wickedness in yourself; which may the Lord grant you to do, through his Holy Spirit." The Book of Exorcisms is then put into his hands, or instead of it a copy of the Missal or Pontifical, the bishop saying, "Receive and take charge, and take power of laying hands upon the possessed, or the baptized, or catechumens."

The power of exorcising evil spirits is recognized in the canons of the Church of England. Thus in canon 72, it is declared, "No minister shall, without the license of the bishop of the diocese, under his hand and seal, attempt upon any pretence whatsoever, either of possession or obsession, by fasting and prayer, to cast out any devil or devils, under pain of the imputation of imposture or cozenage, and deposition from the ministry." In the Form of Baptism also, as contained in the Liturgy of Edward VI., it was thus ordered: "Then let the priest, looking upon the children, say,—I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from these infants, whom our Lord Jesus Christ hath vouchsafed to call to his holy baptism, to be made members of his body and of his holy congregation; therefore, thou cursed spirit, remember thy sentence, remember thy judgment, remember the day to be at hand, wherein thou shalt burn in fire everlasting, prepared for thee and thy angels; and presume not hereafter to exercise any tyranny towards these infants, whom Christ hath bought with his precious blood; and by this his holy baptism called to be of his flock." No mention is made of exorcism in the Book of Common Prayer presently in use in the Church of England, and the practice is unknown among the greater number of Protestant churches. In the Lutheran churches, some of them at least, the form of exorcism in baptism is still preserved. It is also maintained in the church of Denmark, but was abolished in the church of Sweden in 1809. In the Helvetic Reformed churches, exorcism has never been practised. See DEMONIANISTS.

EXOTERIC AND ESOTERIC, words which literally denote External and Internal, and are often applied to the twofold doctrine of many ancient philosophers, the one intended for the public, and the other for their own private and initiated followers.

The first who adopted this double mode of teaching were the Egyptians, from whom it seems to have passed to the Persians, the Greeks, the Druids, and others. From the schools of Greek philosophy, the practice was introduced among the early Christians, and hence in all probability originated the ARCANI DISCIPLINA (which see), or secret doctrine, which was reserved only for those who had obtained full admission into the Christian church by baptism.

EXOTHOUENOI, the first of the four classes into which Bingham divides the CATECHUMENS (which see) of the early Christian church. This class was instructed privately outside the church, and prevented from entering into the church until they were more fully enlightened in a knowledge of the truth.

EXPECTATION WEEK, a name given to the interval between Ascension Day and Whit-Sunday, because during that period the Apostles waited in expectation of the fulfilment of the promise in reference to the coming of the Comforter.

EXPECTATIVES, a term introduced under the pontificate of John XXII. in the fourteenth century, when the French pontiffs residing at Avignon, assumed to themselves the power of conferring all sacred offices, whether high or low, according to their own pleasure, by which means they raised immense sums of money, calling forth the bitterest complaints from all the nations of Europe. In the fifteenth century, in the council of Constance, at its session on the 25th of March 1436, the expectatives were abolished.

EXPULSION. See CENSURES (ECCLESIASTICAL).

EXSUFFLATION, a part of the ceremony of baptism in the ancient Christian church, in which the candidate for baptism stood with his hands stretched out towards the west, and struck them together; then he proceeded thrice to exsufflate or spit in defiance of Satan. This was the peculiar mode in which the catechumens were wont to express their abhorrence of their great adversary as if he were present. See BAPTISM.

EXTISPICES (Lat. exta, entrails, and specio, to look), a name sometimes given to the ancient ARUSPICES (which see), because it was their duty carefully to examine the entrails of the victims which were sacrificed, in order to gather from them lucky or unlucky omens. The Scandinavians were accustomed to sacrifice human victims, for no other purpose than to ascertain what was to happen by the inspection of their entrails, by the effusion of their blood, and by the greater or less celerity with which they sunk to the bottom of the water.

EXTRAVAGANTS, a collection of Jewish traditions made by Rabbi Chua, and published immediately after the appearance of the Mishna, in the end of the second century. The name of Extravagants was also given to a collection of Decretals or letters of the Popes (see CANONS, ECCLESIASTICAL) made by Pope John XXII. The last Collection was brought down to the year 1483, and was called the Common Extravagants.

EXTREME UNCTION. See UNCTION (EXTREME).

EXUCONTIANS (Gr. ex oukonton, from non-existences), a name given to the class of Arians called ÆTIANS (which see) because they affirmed that the Son of God might, indeed, be called God, and the Word of God, but only in a sense consistent with his having been brought forth from non-existence, that is, that he was one of those things which once had no existence, and, of course, that he was properly a creature, and was once a non-entity. See ARIANS, SEMI-ARIANS.

EZAN, a hymn used in Mohammedan countries by the Muezzin or public crier, who chants it from the minarets of the mosques in a loud, deep-toned voice, summoning the people to their devotions. The proclamation is in these words: "God is great," four times repeated; "I bear witness that there is no God but God," twice repeated; "I bear witness that Mohammed is the prophet of God," twice repeated; "Come to the temple of salvation," twice repeated; "God is great, God is most great; there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet." The same proclamation is made at the five canonical hours, but at morning prayer the Muezzin must add, repeating it twice, "Prayer is better than sleep!" The tone in which the hymn is chanted by the Muezzin has a very solemnizing effect in general upon all within reach of the sound.

EZRA, an ancient Jewish reformer whose memory has always been held in the highest reverence by the Jews, who have generally believed him to have been the principal author of the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures, and that he gathered together, corrected, and arranged the Sacred Books. Having received a commission from the king of Persia, he sought to reform the Jewish church after the model of the law of Moses. The chief points to which he directed his attention were the restoration of such a strict observance of the Mosaic law as had prevailed before the Captivity, and to collect and publish a correct edition of the Holy Scriptures. "To accomplish these designs, he had," say the Jews, "the assistance of a certain assembly of doctors, who met at that time to regulate the affairs of church and state. There is nothing more famous in the books of the Rabbins than this assembly, which they call, by way of excellency, the great synagogue, to distinguish it from all others. This they tell us was a convention consisting of one hundred and twenty men, who lived all at the same time under the presidency of Ezra, and among these they name Daniel, and his three friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, as the first of them, and Simon the Just, as the last; though from the last mention we have of Daniel in the Holy Scriptures, to the time of Simon the Just, there had passed no less than two hundred and fifty years. But the truth of the matter seems to have been this; these hundred and twenty men, it may be supposed, were such principal elders as lived in a continued succession from the first return of the Jews, after the Babylonish captivity, to the death of Simon the Just; and in their several times employed themselves in restoring the usage of the Levitical rites; and in collecting the Books of the Holy Scriptures; which excellent purposes were finished in the time of Simon the Just. And Ezra, no doubt, had the assistance of such among them as lived in his time; but the whole conduct of the work, and the glory of accomplishing it, is ascribed by the Jews to Ezra, under whose administration it was done. Upon this account, they look upon him as another Moses: for the law, they say, was given by Moses, but it was revived and re-established by Ezra, after it had been almost extinguished in the Babylonish Captivity. Him, therefore, they call the Second Founder of the law; and it is commonly believed among them, that he was Malachi the prophet; that he was called Ezra as his proper name, and Malachi (which signifies an angel, or messenger) from his office, because he was despatched by God to restore again the Jewish religion, and to settle it upon the foundation of the law and the prophets, as it stood before the Captivity. This person was of so great esteem and veneration among the Jews, that it is a common saying among their writers, that if the law had not been given by Moses, Ezra was worthy by whom it should have been declared."

To prepare his edition of the Scriptures, Ezra procured as many copies as he could find, and carefully studying and comparing them, he corrected the various mistakes which had crept into them through the ignorance or negligence of transcribers, and sought out the true reading of doubtful passages, making the text as accurate as possible. He then arranged the different books in the order which they now occupy in the Sacred Canon, which is generally called the Canon of Ezra, although it is not improbable that some of the Books were inserted after his death. Thus Malachi is believed to have lived after the time of Ezra, and in the Book of Nehemiah mention is made of Jaddua the high-priest, and Darius Codomannus, king of Persia, who lived at least a hundred years after the period at which Ezra wrote; it is very probable also, that the two Books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, as well as Malachi, were afterwards added in the time of Simon the Just; and that it was not till then that the Jewish canon of the Scriptures was fully completed. Ezra wrote his edition of the Scriptures in the Chaldee character, which was in common use among the Jews after the Babylonish Captivity. Some have even asserted that to this eminent doctor of the law the Jews were indebted for the Hebrew vowel points by which the pronunciation, and in many cases the meaning, of Hebrew words were fixed; but the more general opinion is, that the invention of the vowel points is to be traced to a much later period. FAITH (ARTICLES OF). See CREED.

FAITH (CONTROVERSIES ON). Faith or belief is a fundamental principle of the human mind. We are so formed, as in the first instance to believe, and it is not until an after period that we begin to doubt. The groundwork of this tendency to believe is laid in the very structure of the mind itself. The principle of faith, however, viewed as a purely intellectual act, is utterly inoperative upon the character, but viewed as a moral act, or having a reference to moral truth, it is followed by specific moral results, which, however, can only be obtained by a distinct recognition of the truth believed as holding some relation to our condition, either immediate or prospective. Hence it is that a man might put firm and implicit credence in a multitude of abstract truths, while his character would be utterly unaffected by them. There are many, for example, who believe in the existence of God, and yet by keeping out of view his nature and attributes, the principles or rather affections of their moral constitution are quite unmoved. They neither exercise hope nor fear, sorrow nor joy, love nor hatred, in reference to that

Being whose existence they nevertheless believe as an abstract intellectual truth. God is not in all their thoughts. They may be said to be in a state of complete indifference or neutrality in so far as that truth is concerned. The moral result upon their character and deportment is to them the same as if there had been no God at all. They hope, they fear, they love, they hate, influenced by innumerable motives of the most diversified kinds, but not one of them involving the slightest reference to that Being who ruleth over all.

Thus we are led to an essential characteristic of faith in its moral operation—the truths believed must be such that they shall bear upon the moral emotions or affections of our nature. Without this, constituted as we are, it is impossible that we can ever act as moral agents. No object of faith, therefore, can be admitted as at all effective in purifying the heart or in rectifying the conduct, which is not fitted to awaken our moral emotions and feelings. And we must inevitably arrive at the same result in our analysis of faith, should we view it as significant of trust in, or confidence upon, the object believed. For, it is obvious that no confidence could be placed by us in any being whose existence we did not know, or whose claims upon our confidence we had not previously ascertained. And besides, as confidence implies a feeling of security, no such principle could be called into operation so long as the Being in whom we are called to trust is viewed by us with feelings of suspicion or alarm. If our position in reference to Him, in short, is not such as to call forth love as well as confidence, we can never be expected to exercise faith.

Had man not been a fallen, a guilty creature in the sight of God, we could have conceived of him as exercising, under the influence of reason, a simple child-like confidence in the presence of his Maker. This, however, is far from being the actual condition of man, he not only is, but, as is evident from the manners and customs of unenlightened nations, feels that he is a sinner, and instead, therefore, of relying upon God, or exercising a sincere desire to know and to do His will, every impression of the Divine Being which he derives even from the deductions of reason is necessarily fitted to awaken anxiety and alarm. Adam hid himself from the presence of his Maker, under a feeling of terror, as well as of shame; and every descendant of Adam, who has been unacquainted with the glad tidings of salvation through the blood of Christ, has uniformly betrayed feelings towards God, far different from child-like reliance. To guilty man, the Deity wears no other aspect than that of an angry Judge, so long as the glad tidings of a gospel salvation are unknown; and should a feeling of false and delusive confidence arise in hearts unaffected with a sense of unworthiness and guilt, such faith, if faith it can be called, instead of leading to good results either here or hereafter, will only be visited with such consequences as those which the Gentiles experienced who were given up to believe a lie. The description of the faith of the Gentiles was regarded by the apostle Paul as sufficient to show that they were condemned in the sight of God, and that a law which was followed by no better results was utterly incapable of justifying the sinner. Hence the necessity of the propitiatory sacrifice of the Lord Jesus. The object which has been gained by the death of Christ is clearly revealed to us in the sacred writings. "He died for our offences, and rose again for our justification." "His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." "God hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ." From these and many other passages, the conclusion plainly is, that Christ's death was directly efficacious in the salvation of man, not by imparting efficacy to any indirect instrumentality whatever, but by procuring of itself the free justification of all the elect of God. It may be urged, however, against this view of the subject, that we are doing away with the instrumentality of faith altogether. By no means. We admit that we are justified by faith, but we are far from admitting that in any sense we can be said to be justified because of faith. The work of Christ, not the working of our faith, is the ordinance of God appointed for our justification. The fundamental and solely efficacious, and therefore solely meritorious cause, is the mediation of Christ; and the principle of faith, whether viewed simply, or as an active principle, neither has nor can have any efficacy, either self-derived or imparted, to accomplish our justification.

It is of the greatest importance that we clearly understand the precise place which faith occupies in justification. The Arminian assigns to it a meritorious value in itself, as an abstract principle irrespective altogether of its object. This, however, is impossible, faith without regard to its object being productive of neither good nor evil. The object of justifying faith is Jesus Christ, and redemption through his blood. Thus, in reply to the earnest inquiry of the jailer of Philippi, "What must I do to be saved?" the reply of the apostle was, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Faith in this case is the belief of testimony; not however the testimony of a frail, fallible man, but of the infallible, faithful Jehovah. But this is far from exhausting the Scriptural meaning of faith, it implies reliance, dependence, implicit trust upon Jesus Christ alone for salvation. The faith of the gospel then is not a cold heartless assent to a statement, however important that statement may be, but a cordial, unhesitating, and withal exclusive reliance on a personal Saviour. On the subject of faith the Westminster Confession is clear and explicit: "By this faith a Christian believeth to be true whatsoever is revealed in the Word, for the authority of God himself speaking therein; and acteth differently upon that which each particular passage containeth; yielding obedience to the commands, trembling at the threatenings, and embracing the promises of God for this life and that which is to come." There is no vital doctrine of the gospel, perhaps, which has given rise to more varied and bitter controversies than the doctrine of justifying faith.

In regard to the nature of faith we may notice, that the Romish church alleges that it consists in an assent to the truth of the Scriptures in general. This separates the principle of faith from Him who is set forth in Scripture as the special object of it, and reduces it to a vague assent to the truth of the Bible, which can exert no possible influence over the mind or heart of a man. But when faith has respect to a specific object, Christ Jesus the Lord; when it gives credence not only to the existence of that object, and its bearings upon our individual case, but yields a personal trust and dependence upon Christ as our Redeemer and Lord, the affections cannot fail to be drawn out towards Him who loved us, and gave Himself for us. The heart is then touched, and the life influenced by what Christ hath done, and besides, our love is attracted towards a loving Saviour. Thus we are constrained by the mercies of God, and by the love of Christ, to yield our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service.

Vague and indefinite views, however, as to the nature of saving faith have not been confined to the Romanists; they have prevailed even among some Protestant sects. The Bereans and Sandemanians considered it to be a mere intellectual act, a belief of abstract truth; and the same opinions were set forth by Mr. Thomas Erskine in his 'Essay on Faith,' published in 1822. That faith, as a fundamental principle of the human mind, is in itself a purely intellectual act, is readily admitted. But it is far otherwise with saving faith, which implies, in addition to the intellectual act, an object of a strictly moral kind, towards which the faith is directed. The Christian believes, but it is a belief in Jesus Christ. To speak of faith as nothing more than an intellectual perception of the truth, is to lose sight of Christ, the object of faith, who alone gives to faith a justifying or saving power. To speak of faith irrespectively of Christ, is to reduce it not only to an act of pure intellect, but to an utterly inoperative, inefficacious, and even irreligious principle, having no connection whatever with the truths of the Bible.

Another point of controversy connected with the nature of faith is that which was involved in the heresy of the ROWITES:—Whether assurance is of the essence of faith. To decide this point satisfactorily, it is necessary to ascertain previously what is meant by assurance. The word has a twofold meaning, and denotes either a full persuasion of the truth of the Divine testimony concerning Christ, or an explicit assurance of our own personal salvation. In the former sense it is undoubtedly an essential element of saving faith, but not in the latter. "A sinner cannot say in the first instance," as Dr. Dick well remarks, "Christ is mine in possession; because this becomes true only when he has believed, and cannot belong to the nature of faith, as it is a consequence of it. If the words mean only, that Christ is his in the offer of the Gospel, or is offered to him in particular, we allow it, but have a right to complain, that a fact about which there is no dispute, should be expressed in terms which are apt to suggest a quite different sense. The sinner cannot say till he have believed, that Christ died for him, unless he died for all men without exception; but, consistently with the doctrine of particular redemption, no man can be assured that he was one of the objects of the sacrifice of the cross, unless he have first obtained an interest in it by faith. Neither can every sinner say, in the first moment of faith, that he shall certainly have eternal salvation. He desires salvation no doubt, and his faith implies an expectation of it; but how many believers have been harassed with doubts at first, and during the whole course of their lives, and have rarely been able to use the language of confidence! This the advocates of this definition are compelled to admit; and it is curious to observe how, in attempting to reconcile it with their system, they shift and shuffle, and almost retract, and involve themselves in perplexity and contradiction, as those must do who are labouring to prove that, although it is a fact that many believers are not assured of their salvation, yet assurance is of the essence of faith. It is manifest that, if assurance is of the essence of faith, it can never be separated from it.—The exercise of faith is regulated by the word of God, and its object is there defined. But it is nowhere revealed in the Scripture, that Christ died for any particular person, and that his sins are forgiven. How, then, can an assurance of these things belong to the nature of faith? How can it be our duty to believe what is not in the testimony? It is an objection against this definition, that it makes faith consist rather in the belief of something regarding ourselves, than in the belief of the testimony of God; in the belief of the goodness of our state, rather than of the all-sufficiency and willingness of Christ. It may be farther objected, that it confounds the inferences from faith with faith itself; nothing being plainer than that these propositions, 'Christ died for me,' 'my sins are forgiven,' are conclusions to which the mind comes, from the previous belief of the doctrines and promises of the Gospel. Farther, it is chargeable with this error, that it defines faith in its highest and most perfect state, and excludes the lower degrees of it, and thus lays a stumbling-block before thousands of the people of God, who, not finding in themselves this assurance, are distressed with the melancholy thought that they are unbelievers."

In complete accordance with this clear statement on the subject of assurance, the Westminster Confession declares that this infallible assurance doth not so belong to the essence of faith "but that a true believer may wait long and conflict with many difficulties before he be a partaker of it." Such an assurance of a personal interest in Christ is so necessary to the peace and comfort of the believer, that he ought not to rest until he has attained a reasonable and well-grounded persuasion of it, but that persuasion cannot be obtained from an examination of the statements of the Bible, but from an examination of the state of the soul. "It is founded," says the Westminster Confession, "upon the Divine truth of the promises of salvation, the inward evidence of those graces into which these promises are made, the testimony of the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God; which Spirit is the earnest of our inheritance whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption." This assurance having respect to our own personal condition, has been often termed the assurance of sense, and is carefully to be distinguished from that assurance which has respect to the truth of the Divine testimony, and is therefore properly styled the assurance of faith.

Intimately connected with the questions which have been raised as to the nature of faith, is the kindred question—Whether or not man has an inherent capacity of believing unto the saving of the soul. The Pelagians in former days, who denied, and the Morisonians (see EVANGELICAL UNION) of our own day, who admit original sin, both agree in maintaining that man has in himself a power to believe. It is plainly impossible, however, consistently to hold the original and total depravity of man, and yet to maintain that he can of himself exercise saving faith. This all-important principle, indeed, is assumed in Scripture to be so completely opposed to the natural powers of the human mind, that the Spirit is said to work in the soul the work of faith with power. Faith belongs not to the natural, but to the renewed man. Were it nothing more than a bare assent to certain abstract truths, it would be otherwise, but since it involves a cordial embracing of the truth as it is in Jesus, and an implicit, exclusive dependence upon Christ for salvation, we are compelled to acknowledge the truth of our Lord's explicit statement on the subject; John vi. 44, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day."

The grand controversy, however, on the subject of faith, respects the precise place which it holds in the justification of the sinner. This was the chief theological point on which the controversy turned between the Reformers and the Romanists in the sixteenth century. Luther declared the Scriptural doctrine on the subject of the connection between faith and the sinner's acceptance before God to be, that we are justified by faith alone. This he declared to be the article of a standing or a falling church. The Romanists, on the other hand, taught, to use the words of the Council of Trent, that "If any man shall say that the ungodly man is justified by faith only, so as to understand that nothing else is required that may co-operate to obtain the grace of justification, and that it is in no wise necessary for him to be prepared and disposed by the motion of his own will,—let him be accursed." And again, "If any one shall say that justifying faith is nothing else than confidence in the Divine mercy, pardoning sins for Christ's sake, or that it is that confidence alone by which we are justified,—let him be accursed." Still further, "Whosoever shall affirm that the entire punishment is always remitted by God together with the fault, and therefore, that penitents need no other satisfaction than faith, whereby they apprehend Christ who has made satisfaction for them, let him be accursed." Such statements as these, which occur in the acknowledged standards of the Romish church, are plainly opposed to the statements of the Word of God. The apostle Paul teaches us that "by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast." The same apostle tells us, that "we are justified by faith without the works of the law." Faith, however, is not the ground, but the means of justification. We are justified by means of faith, we are not justified because of faith. The sole ground of a sinner's justification is the righteousness of Christ imputed to him; and the manner in which a sinner becomes a partaker of that righteousness, is solely by a believing reception of it. That such is the doctrine of the Bible may be proved by such passages as these; Rom. iii. 20—22, "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference." Gal. ii. 16, "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." Gal. iii. 11, "But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith." Rom. iii. 24, "Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."

Another view of faith, in connection with justification, is that which is held by the Arminians, that faith is the ground of our acceptance, being substituted instead of that perfect obedience which formed the original ground of justification. In this view of the matter, God is considered as departing from that perfect obedience which he originally required from

man. But such a supposition cannot for a moment be sustained. The law of God never can possibly demand less than it has always done, a perfect, uniform, universal obedience. Faith never can form our justifying righteousness, for it is itself a work, and in the apostolic view of justification, all works are excluded without a single exception, and we are justified by faith, not as constituting our righteousness, but as receiving the righteousness of Christ.

It is interesting to observe how well adapted faith is to promote the great design of God in our justification. On this subject, Dr. Dick makes the following judicious remarks: "Between grace and works there is an irreconcilable opposition, and the admission of the one involves the exclusion of the other. If we are justified by works, we are not justified freely; and the honour of grace, which gives without money and without price, is impaired. This would have been the effect if any act of ours had been made the condition of our justification, if we had been pardoned on account of our repentance and reformation, and restored to the favour of God on account of our love to him and sincere obedience to his law. But by the appointment of faith, the glory of grace is fully displayed. It cannot be supposed, that a poor man has any merit in taking the alms which are presented to him without his solicitation. It is not his acceptance which gives him a right to enjoy them, but the offer made by his charitable neighbour. It cannot be supposed, that there is any merit in consenting that Christ should perform for us what we could not perform for ourselves; any merit in relying on his obedience and sufferings, and acknowledging that there is nothing in ourselves which could recommend us to God. This consent to the suretyship of Christ, this dependence on his righteousness, is the essence of justifying faith. The wisdom of God is manifest in this constitution, which takes away from man every ground of boasting, abases his pride, and leads him to give all the praise to the true Author of salvation. Having saved us by his own arm, he makes it bare, if I may speak so. stretches it out openly, to make all men see that by it alone the mighty work was achieved. To the sinner nothing is left but to receive, with profound humility and gratitude, the precious gift which God most freely bestows. There is an express acknowledgment in the exercise of faith, that there is no goodness in himself for which God should be favourable to him; and he says, 'Surely in the Lord have I righteousness and strength.'"

And besides, the faith which thus glorifies God in the sinner's justification is itself a Divine gift, wrought in the soul by the Holy Spirit. Lest, therefore, we should boast of this important grace, we are taught, that it comes not from ourselves, but from God. Salvation is of faith, that it might be, or rather might clearly appear to be, of grace; that all the glory might be ascribed to God alone, and sinful man might be seen to be simply the recipient of a justification wholly gratuitous.

FAITH (RULE OF). In all matters of religious controversy, nothing can be more important than to ascertain what is the common standard to which the contending parties may lawfully appeal with the view of settling the truth. On this point Romanists and Protestants are completely at variance. The Protestants confidently assert that the Bible, and the Bible alone, is to every Christian the rule of faith, being the only revelation of God to the world, and containing in itself all that is necessary to salvation. And in vindication of this opinion, they are wont to quote such passages as these;—2 Tim. iii. 15—17, "And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Ps. xix. 7, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple." Rom. xv. 4, "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope." Jam. i. 21, "Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls."

The Romanists, on the other hand, assert that Scripture is not the only rule of faith, but that tradition must be placed on the same footing, and received with equal reverence as the Bible; the unwritten and the written Word being in their view of equal authority. The creed of Pope Pius IV. divides tradition into two kinds,—apostolical, which refers to doctrine; and ecclesiastical, which refers to ceremonies instituted by the church. Some Roman Catholic writers speak of three kinds of tradition,—divine, apostolical, and ecclesiastical. Divine tradition they regard as that which was delivered by Christ himself; apostolical, as that which the apostles received by inspiration; and ecclesiastical, as that which has been taught by the church. Besides adding tradition to Scripture, the Romish church adds to both the decrees of the church, and declares such decrees to be infallible.

The question in dispute between Romanism and Protestantism as to the rule of faith, is not whether the Word of God is the rule, that being admitted on both sides, but what is to be regarded as the Word of God. Protestants believe that the Bible which is admitted to be the Divine Word, is the only certain, because the only inspired record of what Christ and his apostles taught, and therefore the only rule of faith. But Romanists allege that it is capable of proof, that many things were unwritten, as well as many things written, which Christ and the apostles taught. Thus in regard to our blessed Lord, it is declared, John xx. 30, "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book." And in reference to apostolic teaching Paul exhorts the Thessalonian Christians, "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle." In reply to this argument, it is readily conceded, that both Christ and his apostles taught many things orally, but the point in dispute is, as to the sufficiency of what was written. On this subject, John plainly states that while Jesus did many other signs than those which were written in his gospel, "These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name." It is undoubtedly true, that if Christ and his apostles were alive, we would listen with equal reverence to their words whether given orally or in writing. But the Church of Rome cannot prove that her traditions were really delivered by Christ and his apostles, and, therefore, it is impossible to admit them to be possessed of equal authority with the written Word, which is capable of being shown by the most undoubted proofs to be the product of inspiration. The Bible alone contains what Christ and his apostles can be satisfactorily proved to have taught.

The objections to tradition as along with the Bible the rule of faith, are thus summarily stated by Dr. Blakeney:

"1. Tradition, according to the Romish scheme, was first oral, though afterwards committed to writing in the works of the Fathers. The early Christians wrote but little, on account of the persecution to which they were exposed. And what is found in the writings of the Fathers of the second and third centuries, has little reference to doctrines disputed between Protestants and Roman Catholics. Tradition, therefore, for hundreds of years, was committed to mere report; and this it is which Rome receives with equal reverence as the written Word. So uncertain is report, that it has become even a proverb, 'that a story never loses in its carriage;' or, in other words, that it seldom retains its original character without addition. We have a remarkable instance in the Bible, in which report or tradition circulated a falsehood,—'Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?' (John xxi. 22, 23.) Surely we cannot build our faith on such an insecure foundation as this!

"2. The Fathers whose writings, and the Councils whose decrees, are supposed to contain such an important universal tradition, far from giving a unanimous consent to Romish doctrine, scarcely consent in any doctrine. They have decidedly contradicted each other, and even themselves. The Fathers of the second century held the personal reign of Christ; those of the fourth century, condemned that doctrine as heresy. The Fathers, on several points, are opposed to Romanism. They condemn the use and worship of images, at least the early Fathers. They deny the canonicity of the Apocrypha. They advocate the reading and free use of Scripture. From their writings, we learn that the cup was given to the laity, that private masses are unlawful, and even Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome, (if he can be called a Father,) denounced the assumption of universal Bishop as antichristian. Where, then, is the universal tradition and unanimous consent of Fathers to Papal doctrine?

"3. Observe the difficulties connected with the Romish rule; it is not accessible to all. No Roman Catholic has the rule of his faith, who has not all the numerous and ponderous volumes written by the Fathers, and all the acts of councils. The careful reading of the Fathers occupied, it is said, Archbishop Usher twenty years! No Roman Catholic has examined his rule of faith, who has not waded through Patristic theology. In order to make any use of his rule, he must be acquainted with dead languages, and possess a considerable sum of money to purchase a library of ancient books.

"4. Tradition is condemned by Christ,—'But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition? Thus have ye made the commandments of God of none effect by your tradition.' 'But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men,' (Matth. xv. 3, 6, 9.) The Jews had added certain traditions to the written law; but that addition is censured by the Son of God."

Some Romish divines regard tradition as inferior, and others as superior, to the written word. Neither of these opinions is in accordance with the express decision of the council of Trent, which only makes tradition equal to Scripture. Before the sitting of the Tridentine council in 1545, the authority of tradition was a matter of mere opinion, but since that time its equal authority with Scripture has become an article of faith in the Church of Rome.

FAITHFUL, a name often used to designate true believers, in the early Christian church.

FAKIRS, monks in India. They subject themselves to the most severe austerities and mortifications. Some of them vow to preserve a standing posture during their whole lives, supported only by a stick or rope under their armpits. Some mangle their bodies with scourges or knives. Others wander about in companies, telling fortunes, and in many different ways deceiving the people. The word Fakir is derived from an Arabic term signifying "poor people," and belongs rather to those monks in India who profess Mohammedanism, than to those who profess Hinduism. These devotees are restricted to a life of poverty, and they go about asking alms in the name of God. They allege that their mode of life is sanctioned by the saying of Mohammed,—“Poverty is my glory.” This class of monks appeared from the time that the faith of the Koran was corrupted by the new doctrines introduced after the conquest of Persia. They received also the name of DERVISHES (which see), and in Persia that of SUFIS (which see).

FAKONE, a district of country in Japan, in which there is situated a lake, at the bottom of which the Japanese believe is found a purgatory for children. On the shore of this lake, as an old traveller tells us, are built five small wooden chapels, and in each sits a priest, beating a gong, and howling a nimanda. “All the Japanese foot-travellers of our retinue,” says Kämpfer, “threw them some kasses into the chapel, and in return received each a paper, which they carried, bareheaded, with great respect, to the shore, in order to throw it into the lake, having first tied a stone to it, that it might be sure to go to the bottom; which they believe is the purgatory for children who die before seven years of age. They are told so by their priests, who, for their comfort, assure them that as soon as the water washes off the names and characters of the gods and saints, written upon the papers above mentioned, the children at the bottom feel great relief, if they do not obtain a full and effectual redemption.”—Fukone is also the name of a temple in Japan, famous for its sacred relics. It contains the sabres of the heroic CAMIS (which see), still stained with the blood of those whom they had slain in battle; the vestments which were said to have been worn by an angel, and which supplied the place of wings; and the comb of Joritomo, who was the first secular emperor of the Japanese.

FALD STOOL, a small desk sometimes used in the Church of England, at which the Litany is enjoined to be said or sung. In those churches which have a fald stool, it is generally placed in the middle of the choir, sometimes near the steps of the altar.

FALDISTORIUM, a portable seat or chair in the Pope's chapel at Rome.

FALL OF MAN, the melancholy event which is recorded in Gen. iii., whereby man, through the seductions of the tempter, lost that perfect righteousness which he possessed at his creation, and became at once guilty, polluted, and miserable, exposed to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell for ever. The narrative of the fall as given by Moses is plain, simple, and touching. Various theologians, however, particularly in Germany, have denied the literal sense altogether, and viewed the whole history of the event as detailed by Moses in no other light than as a myth or fable, intended to teach us some important lessons, such as the danger of giving full rein to our appetites, and the necessity of subjecting them to the control of reason; the intimate connection between the introduction of vice into society, and the false refinements which knowledge and civilization bring along with them; or the improper use which too many make of knowledge, rendering it an instrument of evil rather than of good. But on carefully perusing the narrative which Moses gives of the fall, we find it so interwoven with the whole Mosaic history, that it is impossible to regard the one portion as a myth, without attaching the same character to the whole. No attempt has ever been made to deny the literal truth of the Pentateuch generally, and, therefore, we are compelled to regard the fall of our first parents as a narrative of real events. And, besides, the whole of Scripture is evidently founded on the fall, as not an allegory, but a real event, which is both referred to, and reasoned upon, on this supposition. If, therefore, the whole of Scripture be not one vast allegory, we must admit the reality of the fall. Both our Lord and his apostles evidently refer to it as an actual event. Even the infidel Bolinbroke saw clearly the impossibility of treating the fall as a parable. “It cannot,” he says, “be admitted by Christians; for if it was, what would become of that famous text, Gen. iii. 15, ‘the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent,’ on which the doctrine of our redemption is founded?”

Traditions of the fall, approaching more or less to the Mosaic account, are to be found among all the heathen nations both of ancient and of modern times. The Greeks of antiquity had a fable of the garden of the Hesperides, which contained a tree on which hung golden apples, the possession of which conveyed immortality. The tree was guarded by a serpent, who had the power of speech. A very frequent mode of solving the problem as to the introduction of evil into the world, has been, especially among Oriental nations, by the doctrine of fallen spirits, who either sinned spontaneously, or were tempted into rebellion by others. As examples of this mode of accounting for the fall, we may mention Loki among the Scandinavians; Ahriman among the Persians; Typho among the Egyptians. “Almost all the nations of Asia,” as Von Bohlen, the German rationalist, confesses, “assume the serpent to be a wicked being, which has brought evil into the world.” The Hindu serpent is the type and emblem of the evil principle in nature; and as such we see it wrestling with the goddess Parvati, or trampled upon by the victorious Krishna. The fall of man is thus described in one of the old traditional legends of the Hindus, quoted by Mr. Hardwick, in his ‘Christ and other Masters.’ “The Hindus appear to have identified the first man (Manu Swáyambhuva) with Brahmá himself, of whom, as of the primary cause, he was the brightest emanation while Satarúpá, the wife and counterpart of Manu, was similarly converted into the bride of the creative principle itself. Brahmá, in other words, was ‘confounded with the male half of his individuality,’ so that the narratives which in sacred history relate to Adam and Eve, were not unfrequently transferred to Brahmá and to his female counterpart,—Satarúpá, or, according to a different form, Saraswatí. Brahmá thus humanized is said to have become the subject of temptation. To try him, Siva, who is, in the present story, identified with the Supreme Being, drops from heaven a blossom of the sacred vat'a, or Indian fig,—a tree which has been always venerated by the natives on account of its gigantic size and grateful shadow, and invested alike by Bráhman and by Buddhist with mysterious significations, as 'the tree of knowledge or intelligence' (bódhidruma). Captivated by the beauty of this blossom, the first man (Brahmá) is determined to possess it. He imagines that it will entitle him to occupy the place of the Immortal and hold converse with the Infinite: and on gathering up the blossom, he at once becomes intoxicated by this fancy, and believes himself immortal and divine. But ere the flush of exultation has subsided, God Himself appears to him in terrible majesty, and the astonished culprit, stricken by the curse of heaven, is banished far from Brahmápatana and consigned to an abyss of misery and degradation. From this, however, adds the story, an escape is rendered possible on the expiration of some weary term of suffering and of penance. And the parallelism which it presents to sacred history is well-nigh completed when the legend tells us further that woman, his own wife, whose being was derived from his, had instigated the ambitious hopes which led to their expulsion, and entailed so many ills on their posterity." Among the ancient Germans, Fafnir the serpent, which they believed to guard the treasure of Eden, is called the serpent of the lime-tree, because it was under that tree that Siegfried caught and slew it. By a thousand different legends, in short, and mythical representations, we see the memory preserved among all nations of that great transgression, which brought death into the world and all our woe.

FALLEN ANGELS. See ANGELS (EVIL).

FAME (Lat. Fama), a deity worshipped by the ancient Greeks and Romans. This goddess is mentioned by Hesiod, and was worshipped by the Athenians. Virgil represents her as the last of the gigantic Titans, and as reaching from earth to heaven; a winged monster with a piercing eye, and a million mouths, in every mouth a tongue. Ovid describes her palace as situated on a lofty tower, midway between earth and heaven.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, officers of the Holy Tribunal of the INQUISITION (which see), whose office it is to aid and assist in apprehending all such persons as are impeached, and carrying them to prison. These familiars are usually very numerous in those countries where the Holy Office is established.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS. See CONSULTER WITH FAMILIAR SPIRITS.

FAMILISTS, a Christian sect which originated in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century. It was founded by Henry Nicolai or Nicolas, a native of Munster in Germany, who commenced his career in the Low Countries, whence he passed over to England in the reign of Edward VI., and joined the Dutch congregation in London. In 1555 he established a peculiar sect, to which he gave the name of Familists or the Family of Love, declaring that he had a direct commission from heaven to teach mankind that the whole of religion consists in the exercise of divine love; that everything else is of no importance, and that it matters not what views any man entertains of the character of God, provided only his heart burns with a flame of holy love to the Supreme Being. Nicolai published a number of tracts and letters in Dutch for the instruction of his followers. In the preface to one of his tracts, he calls himself "the chosen servant of God, by whom the heavenly revelation should again be made known to the world." The sect developed their peculiar opinions in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In 1575 they laid before parliament a confession of their faith, along with a number of their books, and prayed for toleration. In 1580 the queen and her council undertook to suppress them, and accordingly, their books were ordered to be publicly burnt, and the society dispersed, but they continued to exist in England till the middle of the following century, when they became absorbed in other sects.—A sect has existed for some years in England bearing the name of Agapemone or Family of Love, which, headed by a person of the name of Prince, who was once a clergyman of the Church of England, professes to hold all things in common, and to live together in love, in one common abode, regulated by their own private arrangements, and obeying implicitly the commands of their earthly superior.

FAMILY WORSHIP, the worship of God in the family, a practice which has been observed by good men in every age. It appears to have formed a prominent part of the religion of patriarchal times, and it has subsisted in every period of the Christian church. Each family is a separate community, the most ancient form of society in existence, all the members of which are united together by the tenderest and most sacred ties. It is surely incumbent, therefore, on every family to acknowledge God in their domestic relation, and to praise him for the numberless blessings which in that relation they are permitted to enjoy. In the family is the closest, the most intimate, the most endearing society; a perfect identity of wants and necessities among all the members, and a closer union of interests than can possibly be found in any other situation. What more natural, therefore, than that they should bow together around the family altar, and offer up their united prayers to that gracious Being who expressly styles himself "the God of the families that call upon his name."

Family worship as usually conducted among Christian families consists of praise, reading a portion of Scripture, and prayer, every morning and evening. Such exercises cannot fail, when accompanied with the Divine blessing, to exercise a beneficial influence upon the minds and hearts of those who engage in them in a spirit of true piety. "A household," says the Rev. Robert Hall, "in which family prayer is devoutly attended to, conjoined with the reading of the Scriptures, is a school of religious instruction. The whole contents of the sacred volume are in due course laid open before its members. They are continually reminded of their relation to God and the Redeemer, of their sins, and their wants, and of the method they must take to procure pardon for the one and the relief of the other. Every day they are receiving 'line upon line, and precept upon precept.' A fresh accession is continually making to their stock of knowledge; new truths are gradually opened to their view, and the impressions of old truths revived. A judicious parent will naturally notice the most striking incidents in his family in his devotional addresses: such as the sickness, or death, or removal for a longer or shorter time, of the members of which it is composed. His addresses will be varied according to circumstances. Has a pleasing event spread joy and cheerfulness through the household? it will be noticed with becoming expressions of fervent gratitude. Has some calamity overwhelmed the domestic circle? it will give occasion to an acknowledgment of the divine equity; the justice of God's proceedings will be vindicated, and grace implored through the blood of the Redeemer, to sustain and sanctify the stroke.

"When the most powerful feelings, and the most interesting circumstances, are thus connected with religion, it is not unreasonable to hope that, through divine grace, some lasting and useful impressions will be made. Is not some part of the good seed thus sown, and thus nurtured, likely to take root and to become fruitful? Deeply as we are convinced of the deplorable corruption of the human heart, and the necessity, consequent on this, of divine agency to accomplish a saving purpose, we must not forget that God is accustomed to work by means; and surely none can be conceived more likely to meet the end. What can be so likely to impress a child with a dread of sin, as to hear his parent constantly deprecating the wrath of God as justly due to it; or to induce him to seek an interest in the mediation and intercession of the Saviour, as to hear him imploring it for him, day by day, with an importunity proportioned to the magnitude of the subject? By a daily attention on such exercises, children and servants are taught most effectually how to pray: suitable topics are suggested to their minds; suitable petitions are put into their mouths; while their growing acquaintance with the Scriptures furnishes the arguments by which they may 'plead with God.'"

The regular exercise of family worship has been often found to have left the most durable religious impressions on the minds of the young, so that in after years, and when far separated, perhaps, from their early home, such impressions have been the means of preserving them in the hour of temptation, and leading them to walk with firmness, confidence, and comfort in the steps of a godly father or mother, who was wont often and affectionately to commend them to the keeping and the care of a covenant God.

FANATICI, a name sometimes applied by the Latins to diviners. See DIVINATION.

FANATICISM, such an overwhelming impression of the ideas relating to the future world as disqualifies for the duties of life. "From the very nature of fanaticism," as has been well remarked, "it is an evil of short duration. As it implies an irregular movement, or an inflamed state of the passions, when these return to their natural state it subsides. Nothing that is violent will last long. The vicissitudes of the world, and the business of life, are admirably adapted to abate the excesses of religious enthusiasm. In a state where there are such incessant calls to activity, where want presses, desire allures, and ambition inflames, there is little room to dread an excessive attention to the objects of an invisible futurity."

FANATICS, a name given by the ancients to those who passed their time in temples (fana), and wrought themselves up into a state of religious frenzy in their devotions. Hence it is generally applied to those who allow their zeal in religious matters to outrun their judgment. See ENTHUSIASM.

FANUS, a heathen deity, who protected travellers, and was also considered the god of the year. Macrobius says, that the Phœnicians represented him in the form of a snake with his tail in his mouth.

FAQUI, a name given to the keepers of idols in the island of Madagascar. See MADAGASCAR (RELIGION OF).

FAQUIRS. See FAKIRS.

FARDH, a term by which the Mohammedans describe what is clearly declared in the Koran; and they consider any one to be an infidel who rejects it.

FARNOVIANS, a sect of Socinians which arose in Poland in the sixteenth century. The head of the party was Stanislaus Farnowski, in Latin Farnovius, who embraced the peculiar antitrinitarian opinions of Peter Gonesius or Goniondzki, maintaining the existence of three distinct Gods, but that the true Godhead belonged only to the Father. The doctrine of the supremacy of the Father over the Son approached more nearly to the Arian than the Socinian tenets, but it served as a transition to a complete denial of the mystery of the Trinity, as well as the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Reformed church of Poland suffered much from the progress of these opinions, and at length it split asunder into two parts. In 1565 the Antitrinitarian church, or, as it was called by its members, the Minor Reformed church of Poland, was constituted. It had its synods, schools, and a complete ecclesiastical tical organization. The peculiarities of this body are thus sketched by the late Count Krasinski: "The principal tenets of that church, embodied in its confession, published in 1574, were as follow: 'God made the Christ, i. e. the most perfect Prophet, the most sacred Priest, the invincible King, by whom he created the new world. This new world is the new birth, which Christ has preached, established, and reformed. Christ amended the old order of things, and granted to his elect eternal life, that they might, after God the Most High, believe in him. The Holy Spirit is not God, but a gift, the fulness of which the Father has granted to his Son.' The same confession prohibited the taking of oaths, or suing before tribunals for any injury whatever. Sinners were to be admonished; but neither penalties nor any other kind of persecution were ever to be inflicted. The church reserved to itself only the right to exclude refractory members. Baptism was to be administered to adults, and considered as the sign of purification, which changes the old Adam into a heavenly one. The eucharist was to be understood in the same manner as by the Church of Geneva. Notwithstanding the publication of this catechism, great differences of doctrine continued to prevail among the Antitrinitarians, who agreed only in one point, i. e. the superiority of the Father over the Son; but whilst some of them maintained the dogma of Arius, others went so far as to deny the divinity of Christ." Farnovius, followed by a party, separated from the Antitrinitarians in 1568, and had many adherents, who were distinguished both for influence and learning. But on the death of Farnovius in 1615, the sect was dispersed and became extinct.

FASCELIS (Lat. fascis, a bundle), a surname given to the ancient heathen goddess DIANA (which see), because Orestes is said to have carried her image from Tauris in a bundle of sticks.

FASCINATION. See ENCHANTMENTS, DIVINATION.

FASCINUM, a name given by the ancient Romans to the phallus or symbol of fertility, which was often hung round the necks of children as an amulet, to protect them from evil influences. It was also placed in gardens, or on hearths for the same purpose.

FASCINUS, a deity among the ancient Romans who was believed to protect from sorcery, witchcraft, and evil spirits. He was adored under the form of a phallus, which was supposed to be specially effectual in warding off evil influences. Fascinus was worshipped in a peculiar manner by women in childbirth. The vestal virgins had charge of the worship of this deity. Pliny tells us that the symbol of Fascinus was placed under the triumphal cars of generals to protect them from the injurious effects of envy.

FASTI, the sacred books of the ancient Romans, in which were recorded the fasti dies, or lawful days, that is, those days on which without impiety legal business might be transacted before the prætor.

These Fasti or tables contained a full enumeration of the months and days of the year, the various dates belonging to a calendar, and the various festivals arranged under their different dates. Several specimens of these Fasti have been discovered, but none of them older than the age of Augustus. Before the practice was adopted of preparing such records, it was customary for the pontifices or priests to proclaim, for the information of the people, the appearance of the new moon and the different festivals.

FASTS, seasons of abstinence from food to a greater or less extent, intended to denote mourning or sorrow of any kind. It is not improbable that even in the earliest ages such a mode of expressing grief was frequently adopted, so that when we read of Abraham mourning for Sarah, and Jacob for Joseph, we may presume that fasting formed a part of the ceremonies observed on such occasions. But however extensively private fasting may have prevailed in the first ages of the world, no direct mention of public fasts occurs until the days of Moses, when we find him instituting the annual fast of the Jews called the Great Day of Atonement. (See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) From that time fasts were frequently observed on special occasions. Thus Joshua and the elders fasted in consequence of the defeat at Ai, and the Israelites generally when oppressed by the Philistines. When the Jews returned from the captivity in Babylon, Ezra proclaimed a fast at the river Ahava, and afterwards various fasts were instituted which are still observed by the modern Jews. Extraordinary fasts also were observed by the Jews in seasons of impending calamity. Even the heathen Ninevites were called upon by their king to fast in consequence of the prophetic message of Jonah, that at the end of forty days, if the people repented not, Nineveh should be destroyed; and the extent to which this fast was carried is thus noticed in Jonah iii. 6, 7, "For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste any thing: let them not feed, nor drink water." Besides these public fasts, the Old Testament Scriptures record numerous instances of private fasting. Thus, among many others, it may be noticed that David fasted and prayed during the sickness of his child, as we find mentioned in 2 Sam. xii. 16. In the days of our Lord this exercise was regarded as a special mark of a devotional spirit. Accordingly, the Pharisees fasted twice every week, on the second and the fifth days, priding themselves on the scrupulous exactness with which they observed this practice. On occasions of private fasting the Jews were clothed in sackcloth, with ashes strewed upon their heads, their eyes cast down to the ground, and their garments rent, while they carefully abstained from food until the evening. The Pharisees at such seasons disfigured their faces, and assumed every appearance of negligence that men might see and admire their remarkable devoutness. Our Lord takes occasion, therefore, in his sermon on the mount, to reprove in strong language this spirit of ostentation as entirely opposed to the humility which ought ever to characterise the true spiritual worshipper. The fast which is acceptable to God, according to the teaching of Christ, is not an outward display of sorrow, but inward repentance and godly contrition of heart.

The early Christians breathed much of the spirit of their Master, and the fasts which they observed were of that simple unostentatious description which marked their whole conduct. They were wont from time to time to set apart special and extraordinary seasons which were entirely dedicated to fasting and exercises of devotion. The manner in which these fasts were observed is thus described by Dr. Jamieson: "These fasts being entirely private and voluntary, were more or less frequent, and of greater or less duration and austerity, according to the temper, habit, or outward circumstances of the individual who appointed them. Sometimes they were observed only on the anniversary of a birth-day; by some they were practised at the beginning of every quarter; while others, again, found it expedient to renew them as often as once a-month, or even once a-week. In observing these fasts, the practice of the great majority was to abridge some of their daily comforts only, without subjecting themselves to the pain and inconvenience of total abstinence. Some refrained only from the use of flesh and wine; some contented themselves with a light diet of vegetables or fruit. The Christians in colder latitudes often limited their want of food to a certain number of hours, while those in warmer climates continued their fasting to the close of the day. But whether the duration of their fasts was longer or shorter, and whether they maintained an entire or merely a partial abstinence from food, they considered it a sacred duty inflexibly to adhere to the time and the manner they had resolved on at the commencement. Thus, for example, Fructuosus, an eminent servant of Christ in Spain, being, along with two deacons of his church, apprehended on a Sabbath, because they refused to sacrifice to the gods, lay in prison for several days before they were brought to trial; and on the fourth day, he, together with his companions in distress, agreed to fast. Early in the morning, after they had resolved on this religious exercise, they were summoned to the presence of the magistrate, and as nothing would shake their determination not to sacrifice, they were forthwith condemned to be burnt alive. While the martyrs were on their way to the amphitheatre, the multitude were loud and universal in their expressions of sympathy, especially with Fructuosus, whose conciliatory manners and benevolent character had won him golden opinions, not only with the Christian, but even the Pagan inhabitants of Tarracona, of which he was bishop; and while some of the crowd kindly offered him to drink from a cup of wine, mixed with spices, he declined, saying, 'my fast is not yet ended,'—for it still wanted two hours of the entire day."

Our blessed Lord, while he declares his disapprobation of the ostentatious fasts of the Pharisees, neither forbids nor even discountenances occasional fasts, if observed in a right spirit; on the contrary, in Matth. ix. 15. and xvii. 21, he indicates very plainly that there are peculiar occasions on which fasting is suitable, and may be profitable to the true Christian. Accordingly, the Saviour himself fasted on a solemn occasion. Thus it is said, Matth. iv. 2, that "he fasted forty days and forty nights" before being tempted by the devil. The apostles joined fasting with prayer, as we are told Acts xiii. 2, 3, "As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away;" iv. 23, "And when they had ordained them elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed."

In the age immediately succeeding that of the apostles, little importance appears to have been attached to fasting. Thus in the Shepherd of Hermas these words occur in reference to this religious exercise: "Nothing is done, nothing is gained for virtue by bodily abstinence; rather so fast that you do no wrong, and harbour no evil passion in your heart." From Irenæus we learn that, in the second century, the practice had been introduced of fasting before Easter; and Clement of Alexandria speaks of weekly fasts. Epiphanius thus notices the custom of the church at the end of the fourth century: "In the whole Christian church the following fast days, throughout the year, are regularly observed. On Wednesdays and Fridays we fast until the ninth hour, (i. e., three o'clock in the afternoon;) except during the interval of fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide, in which it is usual neither to kneel nor fast at all. Besides this, there is no fasting on the Epiphany or Nativity, if those days should fall on a Wednesday or Friday. But those persons who especially devote themselves to religious exercises (the monks) fast also at other times when they please, except on Sundays and during the fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide. It is also the practice of the church to observe the forty days' fast before the sacred week. But on Sundays there is no fasting even during the last-mentioned period."

Hitherto fasting had been a strictly voluntary exercise in the Christian church, and the practice does not appear to have been enjoined by ecclesiastical authority before the sixth century. The council of Orleans, however, A. D. 541, decreed that any one who should neglect to observe the stated times of fasting, should be treated as an offender against the laws of the church. In the seventh century, again, the eighth council of Toledo condemns any who should eat flesh during the fast before Easter; and in the following century the neglect of fasting at the stated seasons began to be punished with excommunication. The diet on fast days was restricted to bread, salt, and water. At a later period this severe restriction was to some extent relaxed, and permission was given to use all kinds of food, except flesh, eggs, cheese, and wine; and still later the prohibition was limited exclusively to flesh.

In the Roman Catholic church a distinction is made between fasting and abstinence, different days being appointed for each of these exercises. On days of fasting one meal only is allowed in the twenty-four hours, but on days of abstinence, provided they abstain from flesh and make but a moderate meal, a cold collation is allowed in the evening. Romanists are required to fast on every day throughout Lent, except on the Sundays, on Ember-days, on the vigils of the more solemn feasts, and on all Fridays except those which occur within the twelve days of Christmas, and between Easter and the Ascension. Abstinence, on the other hand, is enjoined on all Sundays during Lent; St. Mark's Day, if it does not fall in Easter-week; the three Rogation-days, all Saturdays throughout the year, and the Fridays already mentioned as excepted, unless either happens to be Christmas-day.

The fasts of the Greek church are very numerous, and kept with remarkable strictness. There are in all 226 days of fasting throughout the year, including the Wednesdays and Fridays of each week, which are regular fast-days. The Greeks regard Saturday as a feast-day like the Sabbath, thus differing entirely from the Romish church, which observes it as a day of abstinence. In the Eastern church Lent is kept with peculiar strictness; the first seven days the people abstain from flesh only, and after this is ended, they are forbidden to eat not flesh only, but also fish, cheese, butter, oil, milk, and eggs, except on Saturdays and Sundays, which are not fasts but feasts. The Copts and Nestorians keep with very peculiar strictness the three days' fast "of the Ninevites," which precedes Lent, some having even abstained from either food or water during the whole seventy-two hours. So scrupulous are the Greeks in observing their fasts, that not even the patriarch himself can give permission to any one to eat flesh if it be forbidden by the church. Besides the Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year, they have four principal fasts;—forty days before Christmas; forty days before Easter; the Lent of St. Peter, which commences at Whitsuntide, and ends on the feast of St. Peter; and the Lent of the Virgin, which begins on the 1st and ends on the 15th August, which is the day of the Assumption. The fasts of the Armenian church, which are more numerous than those of the Greeks, are kept with greater rigidity than any other church in the world. In many of the Reformed churches on the Continent Lent is the only fast which is observed, but in Presbyterian churches, more especially those of Britain and America, all fasts and festivals, which are not enjoined in the Word of God, are discarded as savouring of will-worship.

The fast days observed in the Church of England are the forty days of Lent, including Ash-Wednesday and Good Friday; the Ember-days, the three Rogation-days, and all the Fridays in the year, except Christmas-day, if it fall upon a Friday; and the vigils of certain festivals.

Fasting is a religious observance also among the Mohammedans, who have a great fast, which is kept in the month Ramazan, in commemoration of the Koran having been communicated to Mohammed from heaven. In the course of this fast they must abstain from food every day from daybreak to sun set. According to the Moslem creed, the requisites for a lawful fast are three: 1. The person must profess Islámism; 2. he must have attained the age of puberty, which is fourteen in men, and twelve in women; and 3. he must be of a sound mind. The Mohammedans enumerate five conditions which must be observed in fasting, and ten defects which render it utterly useless. Besides the fast during Ramazan, there are some other days on which the more devout Moslems observe a voluntary fast.

Among the Hindus fasting is accounted an important religious duty. The Institutes of Manu enjoin the Brahman student to beware of eating anything between morning and evening. On the same authority, we learn, that "he who makes the flesh of an animal his food, is a principal in its slaughter; not a mortal exists more sinful than he who, without an oblation to the manes or gods, desires to enlarge his own flesh with the flesh of another creature: the man who performs annually for a hundred years an aswamedha or sacrifice of a horse, and the man who abstains from flesh meat, enjoy for their virtue an equal reward."

The Hindu Brahmins have their days of fasting, which they observe with the utmost strictness. The eleventh day after new moon, and the eleventh day after full moon, are observed as seasons of fasting, during which they give themselves to reading, meditation, and prayer, carefully abstaining from food both day and night. The worshippers of Shiva observe a fast every Monday in November, when they eat no food all day.

Even among the ancient heathens fasting was practised on particular occasions. Both Pythagoras and Empedocles prohibited all their followers from eating animal food. Jupiter had his stated fasts at Rome. Various kings and emperors also, for example Numa, Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Vespasian, and even Julian the Apostate, set apart special days for the observance of the sacred duty of fasting. A general fast was proclaimed in honour of Ceres, which was held every fifth year. In the Eleusinian mysteries rigid fasts preceded the solemnities.

FAST OF THE HOLY APOSTLES, a fast observed by the Greek church in imitation of the apostles, who they suppose prepared themselves by fasting and prayer for going forth to proclaim the gospel of Christ. This fast commences the week after Whitsuntide, and continues till the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul.

FASTS OF THE CONGREGATION, seasons of fasting appointed by the Jews in ancient times, in consequence of any great calamity, such as a siege, pestilence, or famine. They were observed upon the second and fifth days of the week, the fast commencing an hour before sunset, and continuing till midnight of the following day. On these occasions they wore sackcloth next their skin, their clothes were rent, and they put on no shoes; they sprinkled ashes upon their heads, and neither washed their hands nor anointed their bodies with oil. They flocked to the synagogues in crowds, and offered up long prayers. Their countenances were grave and dejected, with all the outward signs of mourning and deep sorrow.

FAST-SYNODS, a name given to Christian synods in ancient times, which met on fast-weeks.

FAT. The Hebrews were forbidden to eat the fat of beasts offered in sacrifice; but they were allowed to eat all the rest of the fat. The two kinds of fat are distinguished by Rabbi Bechai; "one as being separate from the flesh, and not covered by it as by a rind; the other as not separate from the flesh, but intermingled with it. The separate fat is cold and moist, and has something thick and gross which is ill digested in the stomach; but the fat which is united with the flesh is warm and moist." The latter every one was at liberty to eat; but any person who should eat the former was to be cut off from among the people. Josephus says, that Moses forbids only the fat of oxen, goats, and sheep. This coincides with the command given in Lev. vii. 23, "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat." The same view is taken by the modern Jews, who believe that the fat of the clean animals is allowed to be eaten, even that of beasts which have died of themselves. Michaelis tries to account for the prohibition of fat, by alleging that the design might be to encourage the use of olive oil instead of animal fat, and thus to promote agriculture among the Hebrews. It is far more probable, however, that the cause is to be found in the injurious effects of animal fat, as an article of diet in warm climates, where it is often found to give rise to cutaneous diseases.

FATALISTS, those who believe in stern immutable fate or destiny. This doctrine is to be carefully distinguished from that of predestination, of which, indeed, it is a complete perversion. The foreordination of God is the eternal purpose of an all-wise, all-merciful Being, but the eternal decrees of fatalism are blind, unintelligent acts, which place evil and good on the same footing, and attribute the very sins of man to the eternal purpose of his Creator. Fatalism was the favourite tenet of Mohammed, which he urged with the utmost earnestness upon his disciples, and clearly taught them in the Koran. The effect which this doctrine has over the character and conduct of the Moslem is thus delineated by an intelligent writer: "I can but remark how strikingly influential, on national character, the fatalism of the Koran has ever been. 'Allah is great—Allah is good—Allah has unalterably fixed every event and circumstance in which his creatures are concerned. From his predetermination there is no appeal—against it there is no help. The chain of fate binds the universe.' Such is the fatalism of the Koran; and it presents a melancholy picture of a right principle wrought out in error. It is an unrevealed predestination. It is the 'natural man's' view of the sovereignty of God: a view which resolves itself into the notion of a mere despotism. But however erroneous—however opposed to that revelation of Himself as the moral governor of the universe, which God has been pleased to bestow upon man, yet it does actually and effectually influence the followers of the false prophet; and the charge which they bring against the professors of the true faith is, that their avowed principles have but little bearing upon their outward conduct. 'You profess allegiance,' they say, 'to God as your sovereign; but you seek to resist Him by your will. We recognise his will as manifested in his acts, and submit.' Hence, the Turks never commit suicide under distressing affliction or reverses of fortune; such a thing is never heard of. They never mourn for the dead; they do not even murmur under the heaviest burthens of existence. 'Allah is great—Allah is good,' say they. An intelligent gentleman, Mr. La Fontaine, long resident in Constantinople, and familiarized with everything Turkish, once mentioned to me a remarkable instance of this. A Pasha, with whom he had long lived on terms of intimacy, was possessed of an immense—a princely revenue, and was, moreover, the favourite of the Sultan. Under one of those sudden reverses of fortune so commonly connected with Turkish despotism—the result of caprice or intrigue—the Pasha was disgraced, and despoiled of every piastre. He was no longer the favourite of the Sultan—the world was no longer his friend. A few days after his misfortune, instead of flinging himself into the Bosphorus, or blowing out his brains with a pistol,—as many a nominal Christian, under similar circumstances, would have done,—he was seen, with an unperturbed countenance, selling a few lemons at the corners of the bazaars of Constantinople. Mr. La Fontaine saw him so employed, and actually purchased some of his little stock. He inquired whether he did not keenly feel this sad reverse of fortune. 'Not at all,' said he. 'Allah is great—Allah is good. He gave me all that I once possessed—he has taken it again; and he had a perfect and indisputable right to do so. I am well content.' Mr. La Fontaine assured me that this was no singular instance of the powerful activity of the principles in which the Turkish mind is disciplined."

Under the influence of a blind fatalism, the follower of Mohammed rushes into the thickest of the fight, but it robs him of every motive to individual or social improvement.

FATES, three sister goddesses among the ancient Greeks and Romans, who were supposed to preside over and to regulate the whole destiny of man. They were called by the Greeks, Moiræ, and by the Latins, Parcæ. They are generally described as the daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Among the Greeks their names were Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos; among the Latins, Nona, Decima, and Morta. The Fates are sometimes represented as old women, one holding a distaff, another a wheel, and a third a pair of scissors, thus indicating their office as spinning or weaving the thread of human life, and in due time snapping it asunder. They were believed to be inexorable to the prayers and tears of mortals, and their decrees to be immutable. Plato considered the Fates as denoting time past, present, and to come. A similar explanation was given of the DESTINIES (which see) of the ancient Scandinavians.

FATHER (THE). See GOD, TRINITY.

FATHER OF THE HOUSE OF JUDGMENT, a name given by the Rabbins to the SAGAN (which see), or second priest of the Jews.

FATHERS, a term frequently used to denote the early writers of the Christian church. Those nearest the age of the apostles are called APOSTOLIC FATHERS (which see). Sometimes the Fathers are divided according to the language in which they wrote, some being called Greek, and others Latin Fathers. Another division is occasionally followed according to the date at which they flourished, those who lived before the council of Nice, A. D. 325, being termed Ante-Nicene, and those who lived after that council being termed Post-Nicene Fathers. No writers posterior to the twelfth century receive the name of Fathers.

Great difference of opinion has for centuries existed, particularly between Romanists and Protestants, as to the importance and value of the writings of the Christian Fathers. That they contain much that is interesting and instructive is undoubted, particularly as throwing light upon the state of sentiment and feeling in the early ages of Christianity; but that they possess the slightest authority in fixing either the doctrine or practice of the church, all Protestants, with the exception perhaps of the Tractarians of England, confidently deny. The Romish church, however, assigns to the Fathers a prominent place in their complicated rule of faith. Thus in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., the Romanist is bound to declare, "Neither will I ever take and interpret them (the Scriptures) otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." The writings of the Fathers are thus made to occupy a conspicuous place in that body of tradition, which Rome places on an equal footing in point of authority with holy Scripture itself. But it unfortunately happens, that a great diversity of opinion exists among the Fathers as to almost every point of Christian doctrine, and on those topics which are involved in the Romish system, unanimity of sentiment does not exist among the Fathers, but the utmost variety and even opposition of views is everywhere apparent throughout their writings. The truth of this remark is very strikingly shown in Isaac Taylor's 'Ancient Christianity.'

FATHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, an order of monks collected in France by Cæsar de Bus in the sixteenth century, which employed itself in instructing the ignorant, and especially the young. It was enrolled among the legitimate fraternities by Clement VIII. A. D. 1597. Another order bearing the same name, and having the same objects in view, was formed in Italy about the same time by Marcus Cusanus, a knight of Milan, and was approved by the authority of Pius V. and Gregory XIII.

FATHERS OF THE ORATORY, an order of monks founded in Italy by Philip Neri, and publicly approved by Gregory XIII. A. D. 1577. They derived their name from the chapel or oratory which Neri built for himself at Florence, and occupied for many years. It is remarkable that the three most distinguished of the Romish writers on Church History belonged to this order, Baronius, Raynald, and Laderchi. The first named writer was an early pupil of Neri, and succeeded him as head of the order. The exercises of the Oratory were these:—When the associates were assembled, a short time was dedicated to silent prayer; after which Neri addressed the company. Next, a portion of some religious book was read, on which Neri made some remarks. After an hour occupied in these exercises, three of the associates successively mounted a little rostrum, and gave each a discourse about half-an-hour long, or some point of theology, or on church history, or practical religion. The meeting then closed for the day.

FATHERS OF THE ORATORY OF THE HOLY JESUS, a French society of monks instituted in 1613 by Peter de Berulle, a man of ability, who was afterwards raised to the dignity of a cardinal. This institution was intended to oppose the Jesuits, and, along with the Jansenist authors of the Port-Royal, produced several valuable works on science, literature, and religion. The founder of the order, Berulle, was held in such estimation by the Queen of France, that Cardinal Richelieu is thought to have borne him a grudge on account of it. Hence his death in 1629 which was sudden, has sometimes been attributed to poison. They received the name of Fathers of the Oratory, because they had no churches in which the sacraments were administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preached. Like the Italian order of the same name (see preceding article), they devoted themselves to learning, not however limited to the history of the church, but extending to all branches of literature, both theological and secular.

FATHERS OF SOMASQUO, a name given to the CLERKS (REGULAR) OF ST. MAJOLI (which see), from the town Somasquo, where their first general resided.

FATIHAT (Arab. preface or introduction), the title of the first chapter of the Koran, which consists only of the following short prayer, "Praise be to God, the Lord of all creatures, the most merciful, the King of the day of judgment. Thee do we worship, and of thee do we beg assistance. Direct us in the right way, in the way of those to whom thou hast been gracious; not of those against whom thou art incensed, nor of those who go astray." This chapter is held by the Mohammedans in great veneration, and they are accustomed to repeat it frequently in their private devotions.

FATIMAH, the daughter of Mohammed, born at Mecca five years before her father assumed to himself the office of a reformer of religion. She married Ali, the cousin of the prophet, who had probably the best claim to succeed him, and besides, a large body of Mussulmans believe that Mohammed on his deathbed had made an express declaration in his favour. The claims of Ali, however, chiefly through the influence of the prophet's widow Ayesha, were set aside in favour of Abubeker, who was succeeded first by Omar, and then by Othman, and it was not until the murder of Othman that Ali succeeded to the Caliphate, and from his wife was named the Fatimite dynasty of Imâms, or that line of princes which claimed to be directly descended from Ali and Fatimah. Of these Imâms there were twelve, of whom Ali himself is counted the first, and Mehdi the last. The Schiites, including the Mohammedans of Persia, hold both Ali and Fatimah, as well as the twelve Imâms, in the utmost veneration, while they regard Abubeker, Omar, and Othman, as usurpers of the Caliphate. Fatimah they venerate as a saint, and thus the system of the Schiites affords the only instance which occurs in Islamism of giving religious honour to a woman.

FAUNA, a female deity among the ancient Romans, to whom women offered sacrifice in private, calling her the good goddess. She was said to be the wife or sister of FAUNUS (which see), and, like him, to have the power of revealing the future. Some suppose her to have been identical with the Greek APHRODITE (which see), others with Cybele.

FAUNALIA, festivals which were observed by the ancient Romans in honour of FAUNUS (which see), as the god of fields and shepherds. They were kept by the country peasants with mirth and dancing.

Two of these festivals are referred to by Ovid, the one as occurring in February, and the other in March. A lively description is given by Horace, of a third festival which was held on the Nones of December, when lambs and kids were offered in sacrifice to Faunus.

FAUNI, rural deities among the ancient Romans, represented as monsters with bodies like goats, sharp-pointed ears, and horns on their heads. They inhabited the woods along with the nymphs and satyrs.

FAUNUS, a deity worshipped by the ancient Romans as the god of agriculture and cattle. He was also believed to give prophetic announcements of the future. The oracles which he and his wife Fauna gave forth were uttered, one near Tibur, and the other on the Aventine hill near Rome. When any one wished to consult the oracle, the ceremony commenced with the sacrifice of a sheep or other animal, when the skin of the victim having been stripped off, was spread out as a couch, on which the individual lay down to sleep, and the response of the oracle was given in a dream, or by a supernatural voice. This god is often described as dwelling in woods, and sporting with nymphs and satyrs; sometimes even various Fauns are mentioned. In course of time this deity came to be identified with the Arcadian Pan.

FAUSTITAS. See FELICITAS.

FAVOR, a fabulous deity of the ancient Romans, called sometimes the daughter of Fortuna, and represented with wings, and blind.

FEAR. See PAVOR.

FEASTS. See FESTIVALS.

FEATHERS TAVERN ASSOCIATION, a society of clergymen, gentlemen, and a few of the nobility, formed in London towards the end of the last century. They met at the Feathers Tavern, and hence their name. Nearly three hundred clergy men belonging to the Church of England were members of this association. Their object was the reformation of the Liturgy, and accordingly they signed a petition requesting the excision of the damnatory clauses in the Athanasian creed, and the relief of their consciences in the matter of subscription. A keen controversy arose on the subject, and the Feathers Tavern Association was in a short time put down by the force of public opinion.

FEBRIS, the goddess among the ancient Romans who was believed to preserve her votaries from fever. No fewer than three sanctuaries were dedicated to her worship, where amulets were consecrated which had been worn during fever.

FEBRUUS, an ancient Roman deity to whom the month of February was consecrated. The name of this god is derived from an old Latin word februare, to purify, and in connection with purifications he was also regarded as a god of the lower world, and sometimes identified with Pluto. It was a peculiarity of the worship of Februus, that on offering sacrifices to him, the people threw the ashes backwards over their heads into the water.

FEEJEE ISLANDS (RELIGION OF THE). These islands form a group of what are usually known by the name of the South Sea Islands, being situated in the Pacific Ocean, south of the equator. They were originally discovered by Tasman in 1643. The Feejee group comprises 150 islands, about 100 of which are inhabited by a population estimated to amount in all to 300,000. The people are divided into a number of tribes, which are quite independent of, and even bitterly opposed to, one another. They are a fierce and warlike people, addicted in their savage state to CANNIBALISM (which see), and valuing the life of a human being at no higher price than a whale's tooth. Several instances are on record of crews of vessels which happened to visit the islands having been murdered, and their bodies eaten by the natives. The heathen deities of this group of the Polynesian islands are very numerous. The natives believe in a Creator, but trace their own origin to different gods, the greater number ascribing it to a deity called Ové. A certain female deity is said to have created the Rewa people; and yet if a child is born in a deformed state, it is attributed to an oversight of Ové. Another god called Ndengei is worshipped in the form of a large serpent, to whom the Feejeans believe that the spirit goes immediately after death for purification or to receive sentence. It is not permitted, however, to all spirits to reach the judgment-seat of Ndengei; for upon the road it is supposed that an enormous giant, armed with a large axe, stands constantly on the watch, and ready to wound all who attempt to pass him. No wounded person can go forward to Ndengei, but is doomed to wander about in the mountains. An escape from the blows of the giant's axe is ascribed solely to good luck. The natives in their heathen condition were addicted to many revolting customs, such as putting their parents to death when they were advanced in years, committing suicide, immolating their wives at the funeral of their husbands, and offering up human sacrifices.

The first Christian mission to the Feejee islanders was undertaken in 1835, by the Rev. W. Cross and Rev. D. Cargill, two Wesleyan missionaries, who proceeded from Vavau, one of the Friendly Islands, to Lakemba, one of the Feejee group, a small island about twenty-two miles in circumference, and containing not more than a thousand inhabitants. On approaching the shore, the natives appeared to assume a warlike attitude, but the missionaries were permitted to land, and received by the chiefs in a friendly manner. Having settled with their families on the island, they commenced their labours among the people, and in a short time a number of the natives made an open profession of Christianity. The chief, who had at first shown the utmost apparent friendliness to the missionaries, now persecuted the earliest converts. But notwithstanding the opposition thus manifested, the truth made slow but steady progress, and in the course of a few years, with the aid of native teachers and preachers, the missionaries succeeded in introducing the gospel into various other islands of the Feejee group besides Lakemba. These good men toiled with untiring perseverance in their Master's cause, and not without the most gratifying success. In 1845, and in the following year, a religious movement began in Rewa, and speedily extended itself to others of the islands. It is thus described by Mr. Hunt, the biographer of one of the early missionaries: "Business, sleep, and food were almost entirely laid aside. We were at length obliged almost to force some of the new converts to take something for the sustenance of the body. Some of the cases were the most remarkable I have ever heard of; yet only such as one might expect the conversion of such dreadful murderers and cannibals would be. If such men manifested nothing more than ordinary feelings when they repent, one would suspect they were not fully convinced of sin. They literally roared for hours, through the disquietude of their souls. This frequently terminated in fainting from exhaustion, which was the only respite some of them had till they found peace. They no sooner recovered their consciousness than they prayed themselves first into an agony, and then again into a state of entire insensibility. The results of this work of grace have been most happy. The preaching of the word has been attended with more power than before the revival. Many who were careless and useless have become sincere and devoted to God. The experience of most has been much improved, and many have become by adoption and regeneration the sons of God."

One of the most remarkable effects of this revival was the conversion of Varani, a chief of the most cruel and blood-thirsty character. Through the blessing of God upon the faithful preaching of the missionaries, this savage warrior became an eminent trophy of Divine grace, and until he was recently murdered, he maintained a consistent Christian life, recommending the truth as it is in Jesus to all within the sphere of his influence. The work of conversion has been going steadily forward for a number of years, and although the Christians have suffered much from their heathen fellow-islanders, they have adhered with the most laudable steadfastness to their Christian profession. The result on the general habits of the people has been of the most pleasing description. In proof of this we may cite the testimony of Mr. Young, who has lately returned from a visit paid to these islands at the instance of the Wesleyan Missionary Society: "After visiting Lakemba and Rewa, I proceeded to Bau, the capital of the country, and doubtless the deepest hell upon earth. Here I was shown six hovels in which 18 human beings had recently been cooked, in order to provide a feast for some distinguished stranger, and the remains of that horrid repast were still to be seen. I next went to one of the temples, at the door of which was a large stone, against which the heads of the victims had been dashed, previous to their being presented in the temple, and that stone still bore the marks of blood. I saw—but I pause. There are scenes of wickedness in that country that cannot be told. There are forms of cannibalism and developments of depravity that can never be made known. No traveller, whatever may be his character, could have the hardihood to put on record what he witnessed in that region of the shadow of death. I went to see Thakembau, the king of Feejee. He received me with great politeness, and got up and handed me a chair; and his queen knowing I was from England, at once made me a comfortable cup of tea—a thing hardly expected in the palace of a cannibal king. Before I left, King George (of Vavau) arrived at the palace, and I requested him to deal faithfully with Thakembau's conscience, and I believe he attended to my request, and did it with good effect, and I hope the fruit of that visit will be found after many days. But notwithstanding the darkness and impiety, and sin and cannibalism in Feejee, a great work is being effected in that country. The foul birds of night are hastening away, and the Sun of Righteousness is about to arise with majesty and glory in that benighted land. Much good has already been accomplished. We have 3,000 of the people in church-fellowship; 4,000 in the schools; and 6,000 regular attendants on the ministry. We have 50 native teachers, who are valiant for the truth, and who in different parts of the land are making known the power of Christ's salvation."

Through the Divine blessing upon the indefatigable labours of the Wesleyan missionaries, the king made an open profession of Christianity on the 30th April 1854, and the consequence has been, that many of the people also have joined the Christian church. The Church of Rome has made an attempt to obtain a footing here, as in other parts of Polynesia, but the Feejeans have resolutely declined hitherto to receive the Romish priests, and have manifested a growing attachment to the Word of God, and to the faithful and devoted men who labour among them in the simplicity of the gospel. By recent returns there are five stations in this group of islands, and fourteen missionaries, assisted by 490 native teachers, and evangelists are actively employed in diffusing a knowledge of Divine truth among this recently barbarous people. Churches have been gathered which contain nearly 3,000 members. The schools established on the different islands of the group number 120, having upwards of 4,000 scholars. Thus to a great extent, by means of native agency, has this interesting cluster of islands been brought within the sphere of Christian ordinances, and numbers added to the true church of Christ of such as shall be saved.

FEKI (THE BLIND MEN OF), an order of blind devotees in Japan, instituted in A. D. 1150. It boasts of a legendary founder of the name of Feki, who, at the time of the civil war, which ended in the destruction of that family, was taken prisoner by Joritomo. Notwithstanding repeated attempts at escape, he was very kindly treated, and was pressed to enter into the service of his captor. But not being able to look upon the destroyer of the Feki without an irresistible desire to kill him; not to be outdone in generosity, he plucked out his eyes and presented them to Joritomo. There is another, more ancient but less numerous, order of the blind, claiming as its founder a son of one of the emperors of Japan, who cried himself blind at the death of his beautiful princess. This last order is composed of none but ecclesiastics. The other order consists of secular persons of all ranks. Their hair is shaved close to the head, and, though they wear the usual dress of laymen, they may be easily recognized. They are not supported by alms like many other devotees, but most of them are mechanics, who earn their livelihood by their own exertions. Such as have once been admitted members of this community can never renounce it. The general or superior of the order resides at Miaco. He is assisted by ten counsellors, who, along with him, have the power of life and death over the other members of the order, not, however, without some restrictions.

FELICITAS, the goddess of happiness among the ancient Romans, identical with the eutychia of the ancient Greeks. A temple was built to her in Rome B. C. 75, which, however, was burnt down in the reign of Claudius Cæsar.

FERALIA, a festival of the ancient Romans, observed annually in honour of the manes of deceased friends and relations. It was instituted by Numa, and was thus observed during eleven days. The family and acquaintances of the deceased went to the graves and walked round them, offering up prayers all the while to the gods of the infernal regions in behalf of their dead friends, who they believed were inhabiting Tartarus. An entertainment was then prepared, consisting partly of honey, wine, and milk, which was laid on a great stone, and of which the dead were supposed to partake. Flowers, also, frankincense, and other perfumes were provided according to the quality of the deceased. While the Feralia lasted the spirits of the dead were imagined to be permitted to revisit the earth, and to walk about the tombs, participating in the pleasures of the festival. In the course of the eleven days of the feast no marriages were allowed to be celebrated, and the worship of the other deities was suspended all their temples being shut. It is said that the observance of the Feralia having been neglected for some years, all the graves were seen on fire, and the spirits of the dead were heard during the night moaning and bitterly complaining of having been neglected. But upon the revival of the festival those prodigies immediately ceased.

FERETRIUS, a surname of Jupiter, alleged to be derived from the Latin ferio, to strike, because it was customary among the ancient Romans, in taking an oath, to call upon Jupiter to strike them dead if they swore falsely.

FERIÆ (Lat. holidays), a name given among the ancient Romans to all peculiar seasons of rejoicing, including sacred festivals or days consecrated to any particular god. The Ferix were usually divided into two classes, the public and the private, the latter being observed by individuals or families in commemoration of some particular incident or event in their history, while the former were observed by the whole nation, the people generally visiting the temples of the gods, and offering up prayers and sacrifices. Some of the public festivals were regularly observed, and the date of their occurrence was marked in the FASTI (which see), or public calendars. These were termed Ferix Stativæ or stated holidays. Other public festivals were held annually, but not on any fixed day, and received the name of Ferix Conceptivæ. Both these kinds of holidays were kept with feasting and rejoicings of different kinds. But the most solemn class of Ferix were those which were appointed by the public authorities to be observed in consequence of some great national emergency or impending public calamity. These holidays were termed Ferix Imperativæ. They were usually kept for several days. When a prodigy occurred of a rain of stones, such as Livy several times records, Ferix were kept for nine successive days. No lawsuits were allowed to be carried on during the public Ferix, and the people were strictly enjoined to abstain from work under penalty of a fine. It was frequently a subject of discussion with the old Roman casuists, what kinds of work might be lawfully performed on the public Ferix. The introduction of Christianity into the Roman Empire, and more especially its adoption as the religion of the State, led to the abolition of the ancient Ferix, and the substitution in their place, of Christian festivals.

FERIÆ LATINÆ, a festival instituted by Tarquinius Superbus, or, as Niebuhr thinks, at a much earlier period, in honour of the alliance between the Romans and the Latins. It was held on the Alban Mount, and was originally dedicated to the worship of Jupiter Latiaris. When a warlike expedition was to be undertaken, the general was not permitted to set out until he had observed the Latinæ. This festival continued for several, generally six, days. An ox was usually offered in sacrifice by the Roman consul for the time, on the Alban Mount, amid assembled multitudes, who engaged in rejoicings of all kinds. On the two days immediately following the Latinæ, no marriages were allowed to be celebrated, these days being considered as sacred. The Ferix Latinæ seem to have been observed by the Romans until the fourth century.

FERIÆ SEMENTIVÆ, a single festival day observed by the ancient Romans in seed-time, for the purpose of praying for the blessing of the gods upon the seed sown.

FERMENTARIANS. See PROZYMITES.

FERONIA, an ancient female deity worshipped by the Sabines, and afterwards by the Romans. Some suppose her to have been the goddess of liberty, others of commerce, and others still of the earth or the lower world.

FESOLI (CONGREGATION OF), an order of monks founded in the fourteenth century by Charles of Montegraneli. They were also called Mendicant Friars of St. Jerome. The founder lived among the mountains of Fesoli, about A. D. 1386, where he instituted this monastic order, which was approved first by Innocent VII., and afterwards confirmed by Gregory XII. and Eugene IV.

FESSIONIA (Lat. Fessus, wearied), an inferior goddess among the ancient Romans, who assisted those who were wearied.

FESTIVALS (RELIGIOUS), ceremonies of rejoicing and thanksgiving to God. These appear to have been observed from the earliest times. The Sabbath, indeed, instituted by God himself before the fall, may be said to have been the first festival that ever existed. Next in antiquity to the Sabbath, though not of Divine appointment, was the feast of the new moon, or the beginning of the month. This festival seems to have existed long before the time of Moses. It was proclaimed by the sound of trumpets, and was chiefly observed by sacrifices additional to those of other days. In the law of Moses, three great festivals were appointed to be observed annually by the ancient Hebrews. These were the feast of passover, the feast of pentecost, and the feast of tabernacles; two of them lasting for seven, and one for eight successive days. At each of these great festivals, all the Jewish males were bound to be present; and to remove all apprehension as to the safety of their property or their families in their absence, God pledged himself so to operate upon the minds of their enemies that they should not even desire to invade their land during those festal seasons. Though males were thus imperatively enjoined to present themselves, females seem not to have been excluded from the feasts, particularly the passover. Both our Lord and his apostles regularly attended the great festivals of the Jews, but nowhere do we find any command in the New Testament binding Christians in after-times to such observances. After the ascension of Christ, and even after the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the apostles still continued, as long as they were allowed by the Jewish sanhedrim, to observe the various ecclesiastical as well as civil institutions of their countrymen, and to attend at the greater festivals. The same practice was followed by many of the earlier converts to the Christian faith, particularly those of them who had formerly belonged to the Jewish church. The spirit of Chris tanity, however, more especially as developed in the writings of the apostle Paul, was completely opposed to all such special times and seasons as had formed a part of the Jewish system. It claimed the whole life of the believer, and refused to confine its ordinances either to a particular place or a particular time. And although it is an undoubted fact, that even at this early period Christians did select certain days, which they associated with the great facts connected with the history of redemption, "it was only," as Neander well remarks, "a descent from the elevation of the pure spirit, at which even the Christian, still partaking of a double nature, cannot always sustain himself, to the position of sensuous weakness,—a descent which must become the more necessary, in the same proportion as the fire of the first enthusiasm, the glow of the first love, abated."

The festivals which were observed in the primitive church in the age which immediately succeeded that of the apostles, were limited to the weekly Christian Sabbath, and the festivals of Easter and Whitsuntide. The origin of these stated feasts is thus noticed by the distinguished German historian just quoted: "The weekly and yearly festivals of the Christians originated in the same fundamental idea, which formed the centre of the whole Christian life,—the idea of imitating Christ, the crucified and the risen,—imitating him in his death, by appropriating, through faith and repentance, the effects of his death, by dying to self and to the world,—imitating him in his resurrection, by rising with him, in faith, and through the power which he imparts, to a new and holy life, consecrated to God, commencing here in the germ, and unfolding itself to maturity in another world. Hence, the jubilee was the festival of the resurrection; and the preparation for it, the remembrance of Christ's sufferings with penitence and crucifixion of the flesh, was the day of fasting and penitence. Accordingly, in the week, the jubilee or festival of joy was Sunday; the preparation for it were the days of fasting and prayer consecrated to the remembrance of the sufferings of Christ, and of what preceded them, on Thursday and Friday. Accordingly, the yearly festivals were in remembrance of the resurrection of Christ, and of his works after his resurrection and ascension;—the preparation for these, were the remembrance of Christ's sufferings and the fasts."

In the beginning of the second century, we find at the martyrdom of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, the first instance of those festivals in commemoration of the death of the martyrs, which came to be generally observed in the early Christian church. These festivals were regularly held on the anniversary of the day on which the martyr had fallen (see ANNIVERSARIES), and which, in the language of the period, was called his BIRTHDAY (which see). This natural expression of homage to the memory of Christian confessors, which originated in a feeling of ardent devotion to Christ, soon degenerated into a superstitious veneration for all that belonged to these holy men, and at length the Festival of the Martyrs was instituted with the imposing ceremonial observances which the Church of Rome has connected with it.

From the early history of the church, we learn, that down to the fourth century, the only festivals which were observed by the Christians were the Lord's Day, Good Friday, Easter, Whitsuntide, and several anniversaries of the birthdays of martyrs. Augustine mentions all of these as the only festivals which were then regarded as having apostolic usage in their favour. But Christmas he considers as of later origin, and less sacred than the others. And this opinion is borne out by the fact, that the Ante-Nicene fathers are entirely silent as to the existence of such a festival in the church. It is probable, therefore, that the origin of the commemoration of the advent of our Lord, which is usually known by the name of Christmas, is to be dated posterior to the establishment of Christianity by Constantine the Great.

From the fourth century the number of Christian festivals rapidly increased, so that Mosheim informs us that the number of feast-days in the sixth century almost equalled that of the churches. Notwithstanding, however, the growing tendency in the church to accumulate festivals in memorial of sacred events, we find Jerome refusing to acknowledge the authority of such observances, and asserting in plain terms, that "considered from the purely Christian point of view, all days are alike; every day is for the Christian a Friday, to be consecrated by the remembrance of Christ crucified; every day a Sunday, since on every day he could solemnize in the communion the fellowship with Christ though risen." Though such views were entertained by some of the more intelligent of the teachers of the church, the great mass of the people looked upon the multiplication of festivals with a favourable eye. Many professing Christians were found, both in the third and fourth centuries, manifesting a strong tendency to partake in the celebration of heathen festivals and of Jewish observances. Festivals were in process of time established in great numbers for particular saints, and more especially in honour of the Virgin Mary. In the seventh century a festival was instituted in honour of the wood of the cross on which the Saviour hung, and another in commemoration, not of one, but of all saints. It was at this period that Pope Boniface IV., having obtained by gift the Pantheon at Rome, consecrated it to the honour of the Virgin Mary and all the martyrs, as it had before been sacred to all the gods, and particularly to Cybele. Then followed, in the tenth century, the annual festival in memory of all departed souls. The original simplicity of Christian worship was now completely lost sight of, and the Church of Rome, desirous of attracting the favour and exciting the astonishment of the multitude, so rapidly multiplied the number of her festivals, that, in course of time, there was scarcely a single day which was not dedicated to one saint or another of her ample calendar. The Roman breviary contains formularies adapted to these days, and along with a history of each saint, gives the prayer by which, on his own day, and sometimes in his own church, he is to be invoked. The Greek church has been equally lavish in the appointment of her sacred seasons. It is said that there is not a day in the year which is not in that church either a fast or a festival. Among the Mohammedans there are two great festivals in the year, the Little Beiram and the Great Beiram. The lesser of these two follows immediately upon the expiration of the fast of Ramazan, and continues for three days, but the greater takes place on the tenth day of the last month of the year, continuing also for three days. Among the ancient Scandinavians there were three great religious festivals in the year; Yule, celebrated annually at the winter solstice, in honour of Frey or the sun, in order to obtain a propitious year and fruitful seasons; another festival instituted in honour of Goa or the earth, and held at the first quarter of the second moon of the year; and a third instituted in honour of Odin, and celebrated at the beginning of the spring. There were also some feasts in honour of the other gods, and they were often multiplied on occasion of particular events.

Numerous and often splendid festivals have formed distinguishing features both of ancient and of modern heathenism. In the Pagan systems of antiquity we meet with lunar and solar, vernal and autumnal festivals; festivals commemorative of national blessings; and festivals of many kinds dedicated to the gods. The Greek festivals bore throughout a cheerful aspect, while those of the Egyptians and Romans were characterized by gravity, and even mystery. In every nation of modern heathendom, festivals, both regular and occasional, are observed, which are not unfrequently seasons of the most boisterous mirth and unrestrained enjoyment, accompanied with sacrifices to the gods, and religious ceremonies of different kinds.

FETES DE DIEU (Fr. Feasts of God), a solemn festival in the Romish church, instituted for the performing a peculiar kind of worship to our Saviour in the eucharist. It is observed on the Thursday after the octaves of Whitsuntide. This festival is said to have owed its origin to Pope Urban IV., in A. D. 1264, and the office for the solemnity is ascribed to Thomas Aquinas. In consequence of the political commotions of the time, the bull appointing this festival was not universally obeyed. It was confirmed, however, in A. D. 1311, by the general council of Vienne under Pope Clement V.; and in A. D. 1316, Pope John XXII., to heighten the solemnity, added an octave to it, and ordered the holy sacrament to be carried in procession.

FETIALES, a college of Roman priests, whose duty it was to take special care that, in all public transactions with other nations, the public faith should be maintained inviolate. The first institution of this order was attributed to Numa. When the Romans had sustained a real or imaginary injury at the hands of a neighbouring nation, four fetiales were despatched to claim redress, and these four chose one to act as their representative. This deputy proceeded to the confines of the offending tribes, dressed after a peculiar fashion, having a white woollen garland bound round his head, along with a wreath of sacred herbs, which were required to be gathered within the enclosure of the Capitoline hill. Before crossing the border of the land from whose people redress was to be sought, the ambassador offered up an earnest prayer to Jupiter for success, solemnly declaring, at the same time, that he had been sent on no unjust or unreasonable errand. He then crossed the border, and entered the country to which he had been sent. To the first person whom he might chance to meet, he uttered the same statement which he had already addressed to Jupiter, repeating it to the sentinel at the gate of the city, and afterwards to the magistrates in the forum, in the presence of the assembled people. Having delivered his message, he waited for thirty days in the place to obtain an answer, and if in the course of that time no satisfactory reply was received, the deputy pronounced a solemn denunciation, and leaving the town he returned to Rome to render an account of his proceedings to the senate, who, of course, regulated their future conduct by his report. On hearing the state of matters, the whole case was deliberately weighed, and if it was resolved to wage war, the fetial deputy returned forthwith to the border of the enemy's country, and throwing a spear, pointed with iron or smeared with blood, made a solemn declaration of war in the name of the Roman people upon the inhabitants of that land. Considerable doubt has been entertained as to the precise number of which the college of the Fetiales consisted. Some have supposed them to amount to twenty, selected from families of rank, and appointed, not for a time only, but for life.

FETISH-WORSHIP. The word fetish, which is derived from the Portuguese fetisso, an oracle, or revelation of the gods, is applied to the superstitions of the Negroes on the Senegal; and fetichism may be defined as the worship rendered to objects of art or nature, to animate or inanimate bodies, or their qualities. The term fetish was first brought into use by De Brosses, in his treatise 'Du Culte des Dieux Fetiches,' published in 1760. Fetich worship may be said to be the religion of the various countries of Western Africa, and it is found also among various Indian tribes of North America. Mr. Wilson, who has long resided as a missionary on the West Coast of Africa, gives a minute and interesting account of the nature and uses of a fetich. "A fetich may be made of a piece of wood, the horn of a goat, the hoof of an antelope, a piece of metal or ivory, and needs only to pass through the consecrating hands of a native priest to receive all the supernatural powers which it is supposed to possess. It is not always certain that they possess extraordinary powers. They must be tried, and give proof of their efficiency before they can be implicitly trusted.

"If a man, while wearing one of them, has some wonderful escape from danger, or has had good luck in trade, it is ascribed to the agency of his fetish, and it is cherished henceforward as a very dear friend, and valued beyond price. On the other hand, if he has been disappointed in some of his speculations, or been overtaken by some sad calamity, his fetish is thrown away as a worthless thing, without, however, impairing his confidence in the efficacy of fetishes in general. He has simply been unfortunate in having trusted to a bad bone, and with unimpaired confidence he seeks another that will bring him better luck.

"Where a person has experienced a series of good luck, through the agency of a fetish, he contracts a feeling of attachment and gratitude to it; begins to imagine that its efficiency proceeds from some kind of intelligence in the fetish itself, and ultimately regards it with idolatrous veneration. Hence it becomes a common practice to talk familiarly with it as a dear and faithful friend, pour rum over it as a kind of oblation, and in times of danger call loudly and earnestly upon it, as if to wake up its spirit and energy.

"The purposes for which fetishes are used are almost without number. One guards against sickness, another against drought, and a third against the disasters of war. One is used to draw down rain, another secures good crops, and a third fills the sea and rivers with fishes, and makes them willing to be taken in the fisherman's net. Insanity is cured by fetishes, the sterility of women is removed, and there is scarcely a single evil incident to human life which may not be overcome by this means; the only condition annexed is that the right kind of fetish be employed. Some are intended to preserve life, others to destroy it. One inspires a man with courage, makes him invulnerable in war, or paralyzes the energy of an adversary."

Fetishes bear different names, being sometimes called grisgris, and at other times jujus. The latter is the name applied to them in Old Calabar. There are various classes of fetishes, personal, household, and national. They are found in a great diversity of forms, but the most usual shape is that of the heads of animals or of human beings, and almost always supplied with a large pair of horns.

The practice of Fetish-worship is universal in Western Africa. "One of the first things," says Mr. Wilson, "which salutes the eyes of a stranger, after planting his feet upon the shores of Africa, is the symbols of this religion. He steps forth from the boat under a canopy of fetishes, not only as a security for his own safety, but as a guarantee that he does not carry the elements of mischief among the people; he finds them suspended along every path he walks; at every junction of two or more roads; at the crossing-place of every stream; at the base of every large rock or overgrown forest tree; at the gate of every village; over the door of every house, and around the neck of every human being whom he meets. They are set up on their farms, tied around their fruit trees, and are fastened to the necks of their sheep and goats, to prevent them from being stolen. If a man trespasses upon the property of his neighbour, in defiance of the fetishes he has set up to protect it, he is confidently expected to suffer the penalty of his temerity at some time or other. If he is overtaken by formidable malady or lingering sickness afterward, even should it be after the lapse of twenty, thirty, or forty years, he is known to be suffering in consequence of his own rashness."

This species of worship has its foundation in the principles of the human constitution. It is simply the worship of nature, not in its grandest and most sublime aspect as it is seen in the movements of the heavenly bodies, but in the common objects that everywhere present themselves around us. The fetish is to be found in some form or other in all superstitions, and whether in the sunny regions of the south, or in the cold, barren regions of the north, it invests with the idea of the supernatural the individual objects as well as the complex phenomena of nature. Mr. Cruickshank, in his work entitled 'Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast of Africa,' thus adverts to the origin and operation of Fetish-worship among the Fantees: "They believe that the Supreme Being, in compassion to the human race, has bestowed upon a variety of objects, animate and inanimate, the attributes of Deity, and that He directs every individual in the choice of his object of worship. This choice, once made, the object becomes the 'Souman,' or idol of the individual. It may be a block, a stone, a tree, a river, a lake, a mountain, a snake, an alligator, a bundle of rags or whatever the extravagant imagination of the idolater may pitch upon. From the moment that he has made his choice, he has recourse to this god of his in all his troubles. He makes oblations to it of rum and palm-oil; he lays offerings before it of oil and corn; he sacrifices to it fowls and goats, and sheep, and smears it with their blood and as he performs these rites, he prays it to be propitious to him, and to grant him the accomplishment of his petition. These rites and supplications are directed exclusively to his idol, without any ulterior reference in his mind to the Supreme Being. During their performance the idolater is sometimes wrought up to a high pitch of excitement, and, under the influence of his phrenzy, deludes himself with the idea that his idol has mysteriously communicated with him, and granted an answer to his prayer.

He is thus directed, by an extraordinary self-delusion, to the adoption of some ceremonious rite; from the performance of which he expects to obtain the object of his wishes. Nothing can exceed the absurdity of these rites. They have no reference whatever to the subject of petition as a means to an end. To restore to health a sick child, to shield from danger a friend engaged in some perilous enterprise, or to draw down destruction upon an enemy, the idolater may, perhaps, surround his house with a string of withes, hang up some filthy rags to the branch of a tree, or nail a fowl to the ground by means of a stake driven through its body."

The fetishmen are a regular and numerous order, whose whole aim is, by a series of artful contrivances and deceptions, to acquire and preserve a complete ascendancy over the ignorant and superstitious people. When a young person aspires to this office, he is put under the care of some old adept in the art, and subjected to a system of careful discipline and training. Before being selected, however, even as a candidate, the youth is tested as to his power of carrying on the wild, protracted dance, which is considered as a necessary part of the religious rites, and a means of exciting themselves to frantic madness before giving forth the oracles of their god. Besides acquiring skill in the use of herbs for the cure of diseases, they make themselves masters of all sorts of juggling tricks, and like the fortune-tellers of our own country, acquire a thorough knowledge of all the facts connected with the histories of the leading individuals and their families, and by this means they excite the wonder of their dupes, and prepare them for yielding a ready belief to all that shall be said. All this intimate acquaintance with the domestic affairs of the people, they pretend to have received from their god after consulting him with offerings and sacrifices, accompanied with a number of ceremonies, which are fitted to impose upon the credulous. To lend additional effect to their superstitious rites, they generally select as the scene of their operations some dark shady grove apart from the haunts of men.

To give the reader a vivid conception of the power which these fetishmen exercise over the minds of the ignorant populace, we select the graphic description which Mr. Cruickshank gives of the fetish situated at Mankassim, formerly the headquarters of the Fantee power—a fetish regarded as the most powerful deity in the whole country. "No fewer than five priests minister at the altar of this great fetish. Their numbers enable them to bring into operation a more complicated and better arranged machinery for carrying on their tricks; and their acknowledged superiority over all other fetishes, and the consequent estimation in which they are held by the general body of fetishmen in the country, give them advantages in procuring information, which individual fetishmen do not always possess. They are seldom consulted in the first instance. It is only when the matter is of moment, or after other fetishmen have failed to give satisfaction, that they are applied to; so that before the appeal is made to them, they have enjoyed opportunities of making themselves acquainted with the circumstances of each case, and are fully prepared to give their answer. But they take care to surround themselves, with every concomitant calculated to inspire awe and fear in the minds of those who consult them. Their temple is a deep gloomy recess of the forest, where the overhanging foliage is so dense, that scarcely a single ray of light can penetrate it, and where there is no difficulty in concealing the accomplices of their artifice. Into this den they convey their dupes, blindfolded; and amidst strange unearthly noises, which, to the bewildered senses of the poor terrified idolaters, seem at one time to issue from the bowels of the earth, and at another time to rush through the air, they make their sacrificial offerings and invocations to their god whom they have come to consult. The confused ubiquity of the dismal sounds which assail the ears, and make the hearts of the wretched worshippers quail, is accounted for by a band of accomplices being stationed around, some in holes underground, and some among the leafy branches of the trees, and all bellowing out the most unearthly cries and groans, which a long practice in this villanous deception has enabled them to utter. When they have sufficiently subdued the minds of their unhappy victims by this discordant concert, and when by violent dancing and wild and convulsive struggles they have aroused their god to attention, they propound to him the object of their visit. It is not always, however, upon the first application that he will deign a response. This inattention or rather the contemptuous neglect of the fetish, is interpreted by the priest in the way most accordant with his own wishes. The applicants, it may be, are told to wait for a more propitious moment, to observe a religious fast, to appease by offerings the evil spirits, or to bestow a richer gratuity upon the priests. It matters little to those hard-hearted men that they give their dupes long and fruitless journeys in vain. They know that what is obtained with difficulty, is prized proportionally, and they take care that the favours of their fetish shall not be lightly esteemed. When every penny has been got from their victims, which they can, either by cajolery or by threats, extort, an answer to their petition is resolved upon, and delivered with all those imposing artifices, which they so well know how to assume."

A few years ago a deeply interesting train of events occurred in the Fantee country, which deserve notice as having proved the deathblow of fetish worship in that district of Western Africa. The Wesleyan Methodists having established a mission among the Fantees, the Rev. Mr. Freeman was selected as their missionary. In the course of his operations he established a school, and a small body of Christian converts at a village called Assafa, not far from the great fetish of Mankassim to which we have already referred. The fetishmen were annoyed at the settlement of a Christian community in the immediate neighbourhood of the sacred grove. But what more especially roused their indignation was, the circumstance of one of the converts having shot a deer within the precincts of the sacred grove, and thus openly and manifestly insulted their deity. Enraged at this act of the grossest sacrilege, the fetishmen called upon the Fantee chiefs to protect the religion of their country. A meeting of the chiefs was accordingly held, and a resolution taken that they would mutually support one another in avenging the next insult which should be offered to their god. An opportunity soon occurred of carrying out their resolution. An inferior fetishman openly embraced Christianity, and joined the Christian settlement. Full of zeal, and anxious to show his contempt of the idol, he along with two other converts went and cut some sticks in the sacred grove. On learning the daring offence which had thus been committed, Adoo, the leading Fantee chief, summoned his retainers, and attacked the Christian settlement, seized and bound the converts, and carried them captive to Mankassim. The British authorities immediately interposed, demanded the liberation of the prisoners, and summoned Adoo to appear at Cape Coast Castle and answer for his conduct. Adoo hesitated, but at length agreed to appear, provided that his trial took place at Anamaboe, and not at Cape Coast Castle. The trial accordingly was gone through, and terminated in a sentence being pronounced adjudging him to pay a sum by way of compensation for the injuries done to the Christians and their settlement, while the Christians, on the other hand, were required to pay compensation money for the insults done to the fetishmen through their fetish. For a considerable time Adoo refused to fulfil his part of the sentence. The chiefs, however, began to dread the consequences of this obstinacy on the part of their chief, and the influence of the fetishmen was now so evidently on the decline, that it was deemed necessary to adopt some extraordinary measures with the view of retaining their power. Impressed with the urgency of the crisis, a number of fetishmen and fetishwomen met during the night in a lonely spot near Anamaboe, and laid a plan to poison four influential persons, two of them office-bearers in the Wesleyan church, in order that their sudden death might be attributed to the wrath of the fetish, and might thus strike terror into the minds of all classes. This nefarious project, however, was never carried into execution, having been divulged to the authorities by one of the parties who was present at the midnight meeting. Adoo was at length persuaded to obey the summons of the governor, and the matter in dispute was finally settled by the complete submission of the haughty chief. But no sooner was this trial concluded, than a serious charge was brought forward by the authorities against the Fetishmen of conspiracy to poison four persons. This was followed by a demand that the chiefs should bring into court the fetishmen of their several districts. The affair was thoroughly sifted, and the accusation fully proved to the satisfaction even of the chiefs, who were so enraged that they wished the guilty priests to be put to death. A milder sentence, however, was pronounced. The fetishmen were condemned to be publicly flogged, and to be imprisoned for five years, while the fetish women were sentenced to imprisonment for only two years. The spectacle which was now witnessed by the people in the market-place of Cape Coast, of the once venerated and even dreaded fetishmen being subjected to the degradation of public whipping, proved the ruin of fetish worship in the Fantee country. The altar of the great fetish who had been worshipped for ages was now deserted, and the sacred persons of the fetishmen were no longer of any account.

FETVA. No act of the Mohammedan government in Turkey is readily obeyed unless declared to be in strict conformity with the Koran, and obligatory therefore upon all the faithful. This sanction is called Fetva; and for a long period the right of granting it has been exclusively exercised by the Sheik-ul-Islam, who usually consults the College of Ulemas before coming to a decision upon the matter. This privilege has never been resisted but on one occasion by Mourad IV., who boldly decapitated one of them for opposing his will. They have sometimes used the Fetva to dethrone Sultans, and deliver them over to the fury of the Janissaries. All new laws, and even the question of peace and war must await the sanction of the Sheik-ul-Islam.

FEUILLANS, a reformed order of Cistercian monks, founded by an abbot of a monastery named John de la Barriere, in the end of the fifteenth century. The friars of this order were taught to lead a most austere and abstemious life, their diet being restricted to bread, pulse, and water. Pope Gregory XIII., hearing of the remarkable improvement which Barriere had introduced among the Cistercians, sent him a letter of congratulation, and founded a monastery on the same principle at Rome. Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. also expressed their approbation of the Feuillans, and in consequence the congregation gained ground particularly in France. But like monastic orders generally, they gradually declined. They considered themselves as under the special protection of the Virgin Mary, and therefore they wore a white habit.

FEUILLANTES, an order of nuns established on the same principles, and about the same time as the order of FEUILLANS. (See preceding article.)

FIANCELS, a ceremony of BETROTHMENT (which see), as practised in the Romish church, after which an oath was administered to the man by which he bound himself "to take the woman to wife within forty days, if holy church will permit."

FICHTE (THE SYSTEM OF). This eminent German philosopher, who was born at Rammenau, a village of Lusatia, in 1762, may be considered as having given rise to a speculative school of theology in Germany. His peculiar doctrines were developed in his Wissenschaftslehre, or doctrine of science, which is dedicated to an examination of the foundation and essence of knowledge. This he considers as self-consciousness—the Ego, not viewed as an individual, but as generalized and absolute, in short, as God. In this absolute Ego are included Thesis, Antithesis, and Synthesis. "It is from this principle," says Dr. Kahnis, "that Fichte endeavours to deduce all facts of consciousness, and that with mathematical evidence. The method proceeds thus:—that out of the thesis an antithesis is brought forth, which forces to a synthesis, until out of this synthesis a new antithesis is produced, until all antitheses are produced, until all antitheses are exhausted. This is not, of course, the place for bringing out in detail the results of the Wissenschaftslehre. Like Kant, Fichte distinguished between theoretical and practical reason. In the theoretical reason, the Ego affirms itself to be determined by the Non-Ego; in the practical reason, the Non-Ego is itself affirmed and determined by the Ego. The Ego affirms the Non-Ego opposed to it, in order to prove itself to be the absolute deed which again removes the limit which itself had put. Theory has thus its foundation in practice. The absolute Ego has a logical existence only; it exists only in a multitude of finite Egos, the aim and end of which is to raise themselves legally and morally into a universal Ego. This universal Ego is humanity. The history of humanity is pervaded by a progress, in which the Ego more and more proves itself to be the absolute power. This moral progress Fichte called 'God.' This system is in its nature thoroughly subjective; all outward objective being entirely disappears. In this transcendental Idealism, the theology of the ILLUMINISTS (which see) of the middle of the last century reached its height. The whole universe is made the product of the Ego or thinking subject.

FIDELES (Lat. the faithful), a name applied in the early Christian church to the believing or baptized laity, in contradistinction to the clergy and the catechumens. In this sense the word frequently occurs in the ancient liturgies and canons. The Romish church considers the whole world as divided into two classes, the fideles or faithful, and the infideles or unfaithful; the former term being applied to those alone who are within the pale of her communion, and the latter to all who are beyond it.

FIDES (Lat. faithfulness), a goddess among the ancient Romans, whom they held in high estimation as a personification particularly of public faith, to which they attached the utmost importance as a national virtue. A temple to this deity stood on the Capitol at Rome, said to have been built by Numa Pompilius. Her priests were clothed in white robes.

FIDIUS, the son of Zeus or Hercules, a Pagan deity worshipped by the ancient Romans and Sabines, and regarded as the patron and protector of the good faith which should reign between them. A festival in honour of the god was observed annually on the Nones of June. Ovid says that Fidius was also called Sancus and Semo.

FIENDES. See ANGELS (EVIL).

FIERTE, a privilege enjoyed formerly by the archbishops of Rouen in Normandy, in consequence of the miraculous deliverance, which, according to an old legend, St. Romanus accomplished from a dragon which infested the neighbourhood. The manner in which he is said to have effected the miracle was simple enough. The saint stripping off his stole, put it round the neck of the dragon, and gave the monster in charge to a condemned malefactor, whom he had brought along with him for the purpose, and whom he ordered to lead it into the town where it was burned in the presence of the assembled inhabitants. The malefactor obtained his pardon in reward for the bold feat. And in order to keep up the remembrance of this wonderful deliverance, a custom was long preserved in the district, of bestowing pardon every year on Ascension-Day, upon a criminal who might happen to have been condemned to death for any crime whatever, provided only that he should assist to carry in procession the shrine which was called the Pierte of St. Romanus. The particulars of this ceremony are thus given by an old author: "St. Owen, Chancellor of France, succeeded St. Romanus in the see of Roan, and to perpetuate the remembrance of this miraculous deliverance from the dragon, and put the faithful in mind yearly to renew their acknowledgments for so great a benefit, by prayers and thanksgivings, obtained of King Dagobert, in favour of the archbishop, dean, canons, and chapter of Roan, leave and power to choose yearly in their chapter, on the day of the ascension of our Lord, what prisoner soever, and for whatsoever cause he might be detained, and to deliver him from gaol, and obtain his being entirely acquitted, and never prosecuted for any crime committed before. This privilege has often been confirmed by the kings of France, and has been enjoyed by the archbishop, dean, canons, and chapter of Roan, fully, peaceably, and without any opposition. Not one year passed without their delivering a criminal out of prison, except in cases of high treason and as no prisoner had been delivered by them, whilst Richard King of England and Duke of Normandy was himself detained, they got leave to set two at liberty the year following. So inviolably has that privilege been kept, that no accident whatever could interrupt this prerogative of the chapter, not even the captivity of a king, who was their duke and lord. The criminal is always delivered in public; in the presence of all the town, and with great solemnity. Thirteen days before the feast of the Ascension, four canons and four chaplains wearing their surplices and amisses, their usher, or verger, going before them, proceed to the great chamber of the parliament, and to the bailiff's court, and court of aids, where they summon and charge the king's officers to stop, and cause to be stopped, all further proceedings against any criminals detained in the king's prisons, till their privilege has had its full effect. On Rogation Monday two canons in priestly orders go to the prisons, accompanied by two chaplains, the verger of the chapter, and a notary, who is also a priest; they receive there the depositions of those who lay claim to partake in the privilege; this they are employed in till the day of the Ascension; on which the prisoners are re-examined, and asked whether they persist in their confessions, or have a mind to add any thing to them: this being done, about seven in the morning of the same day, all the canons who are priests meet in the chapter-house, call on the Holy Ghost to direct them in their choice, and solemnly swear, that they will not reveal any part of the depositions of the criminals. The depositions are read, they pitch upon the prisoner to be delivered, write his name on a paper sealed with the chapter's seal, and send it by a chaplain in his surplice and amisse to the parliament, which is met to expect their nomination, and having received it, form a decree, which orders, that the prisoner chosen by the chapter shall be delivered up, to enjoy the privilege of St. Romanus's shrine, he and his accomplices. They are accordingly set free and out of prison, the depositions of all the other criminals are burnt upon an altar in sight of all the people. Then the procession begins, in which the dragon under St. Romanus's feet, is carried on a long pole. The shrine of the saint is also carried. The prisoner newly delivered, bareheaded, bears the first supporter; and those who have been set at liberty the seven preceding years help to carry it, each holding a lighted taper in his hand. The procession ended, mass begins, during which the prisoner kneels before each canon, begs pardon for his crime, and is exhorted by them to repentance and amendment of life. After mass the delivered criminal is brought to the house of the master of St. Romanus's confraternity, where, though he should be never so poor, he is feasted with the utmost magnificence. Next morning he appears before the chapter, and, kneeling in the presence of the whole congregation, he is reprimanded according to the heinousness of his crime, by one of the canons deputed for that purpose, and put in mind of giving thanks to God, to St. Romanus, and to the Chapter: Finally, having engaged himself by a solemn promise, to come himself, or send another, each of the seven following years, with a lighted taper, to the procession, he goes to confession to the penitentiary of the cathedral, and receives the absolution of his sins." The ruling idea of this legend may possibly have been derived from a custom of the Jews of having a malefactor set free at the feast of the Passover.

FIFTH-MONARCHY MEN, a sect of enthusiasts which arose in England in the seventeenth century, soon after the restoration of Charles II. They were headed by one Venner, who taught that Jesus Christ would personally descend from heaven, and establish a new and heavenly kingdom, a fifth universal monarchy, on the earth. They raised an armed insurrection, when Venner, with his small but determined band, proclaimed the fifth monarchy, filled London with alarm, and fought with a courage which has seldom been equalled, and probably never surpassed. The greater number of this sect perished either by the sword or on the scaffold.

FIKOOSAU, a mountain in Japan, to which an order of Jammabos or monks go in pilgrimage once a-year,—an extremely difficult task, on account of the precipices with which it abounds. This mountain is believed to be a sort of test by which to try the character of a man, for if a wicked person should venture to undertake the pilgrimage, the devil would enter into him on his first attempt to ascend the sacred hill. See JAMMABOS.

FILIOQUE (Lat. and from the Son), an expression which was inserted in the Niceno-Constantinopolitan creed, at the third council of Toledo, A. D. 589, in opposition to those who held that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father only. The council by this addition meant to declare, that the Holy Spirit, in the constitution of his Person, proceeds from both the Father and the Son. The alteration, which was probably intended to show a strong opposition to the ARIANS (which see), though it commenced in the Spanish church, was soon afterwards adopted by the churches of France and Germany. In A. D. 787, the Eastern accused the Western churches of heresy on this point, and not only so, but they charged them also with sacrilege in corrupting the creed of the universal church by adding the words filioque, "and from the Son," to the article concerning the Holy Spirit. The controversy on this point became more violent in the ninth century. Some French monks residing at Jerusalem as pilgrims, chanted the creed in their worship, with the addition of filioque. The Greeks were indignant at this interpolation, as they called it, and the Franks accordingly despatched one of their number on the subject into France, A. D. 809, to claim the protection of the Emperor Charlemagne. The matter was in consequence discussed in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, and also at Rome, in the presence of the Pope. Leo III. approved of the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, as well as from the Father, but disapproved of the alteration of the Creed by the introduction of the word filioque, and decided that the obnoxious expression should be gradually permitted to fall into disuse. Pope John VIII., however, went still further, calling the doctrine involved in the words filioque, blasphemy. The insertion of the expression was finally adopted by Pope Nicholas I., and continues to be maintained by the Latin churches, while it is as keenly opposed by the Greek and all the other Eastern churches. The latter adhere to the strict statements given in John xv. 26, "which proceedeth from the Father;" but the former, along with all Protestant churches, receive the statement with the addition of the words filioque, "and from the Son," justifying themselves not by the express words of Scripture, but by deductions drawn from the statements of Scripture. It is admitted, on all hands, that the procession of the Spirit is nowhere literally asserted in the Word of God, but it is alleged by the Western churches that the doctrine, though not asserted, is plainly implied. Thus the Spirit is called the Spirit of the Father, and he is with equal distinctness called the Spirit of the Son, as in Gal. iv. 6, "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father;" and Rom. viii. 9, "But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." In consequence of proceeding from the Father, the Holy Spirit is said in Scripture to be sent by him. But our Lord also speaks of the Holy Spirit as the Comforter whom he himself would send. Thus John xv. 26, "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me;" and John xvi. 7, "Nevertheless I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." Such are the arguments by which the Western church defends herself for deviating from the language of the East, and of the ancient creeds—arguments which, it may be observed, are wholly inferential, and rest therefore for their validity on the well-known and universally admitted rule of Scripture interpretation, that legitimate inferences from Scripture are to be held of the same authority as Scripture itself.

FILLES-DIEU (Fr. Daughters of God), an order of nuns in France who devote themselves to visiting the sick. They repeat the penitential Psalms once a-week. Another religious order bearing this name was formed in the thirteenth century, which afterwards became merged in the order of FONTEVRAUD (which see).

FINNS (RELIGION OF THE). The Finns, or inhabitants of Finland, are a peculiar race of people in the North of Europe. Formerly they belonged to Sweden, but in 1809 their country was ceded to Russia, under whose dominion it still continues. The Finns are a race by themselves, and their language, as well as some other peculiarities, seem to indicate that they are of Asiatic origin. It was not till the twelfth century that attempts were made to convert this people to the Christian faith, and their ancient complicated mythology did not fully succumb to Christianity till the sixteenth. It would appear that in the earliest ages of the history of Finland the people worshipped natural objects under sensible forms. All nature was regarded as animated; the sun, the earth, the sea, each was a living, sacred being. In course of time, however, a more modified system of things began to prevail. The various departments of nature were no longer viewed as in themselves gods, but as many of them presided over by certain deities or genii, having bodies and souls like human beings, while many more were without form or substantial framework of any kind. Each of these deities had a special charge over which he exercised an independent rule. With such a mass of deities independent of each other as this system of mythology involved, it might appear at first sight altogether unlikely that the Finns would ever recognize one Supreme Divinity, to whom all beings, both in heaven and earth, are subject. But this idea seems to have, in process of time, fully evolved itself, and the various steps by which the conception of one God was reached may be seen in the word Jumala, which is found in the Finnish runes bearing these three significations, the material sky, the sky-god, and the Supreme Being. The word in its derivation is drawn from a root signifying thunder, that phenomenon in nature which, above all others, was fitted to strike awe into the mind of a northern savage. When Jumala came at length to be limited in its signification to the Supreme Deity, the other meanings were gradually lost sight of, and other words were devised to denote them. Thus the material sky was called Taivas, and the god of the sky Ukko, an old man, a title originally applied as a term of respect to any of the gods, but afterwards limited to the god of the sky, the most eminent of the order of Finnish deities. Ukko is known among the Finns by a great variety of names and titles, all of them expressive of the high functions which, as regulating the great phenomena of nature, he is called to discharge. He sits enthroned on a cloud in the midst of the heavens, bearing the firmament on his shoulders. He wields mighty thunderbolts, and armed like a brave warrior, the lightning is his sword, the many-coloured arch of heaven is his bow, and like the Scandinavian Thor, he brandishes a formidable hammer.

Independently of the sky-god Ukko, each of the heavenly bodies had its own presiding deity who dwelt in a magnificent palace, and regulated all the movements of the planet over which he ruled. Kört presided over the dawn, the goddess Udutar over fogs and mists. The water-god, represented as an old man clothed in a robe of foam, and with a beard of grass, was called Ahti, and his spouse, Vellamo. The venerable pair inhabit their palace at Ahtola, at the bottom of the sea, while the other water-gods, his companions, are not only found in the sea, but in rivers, fountains, and lakes, generally disposed to be friendly to man; but others of them wicked and mischievous. Maan-emo, mother of the earth, was a powerful goddess, said by some to be the wife of the sky-god Ukko. Many were the deities who had the charge of different kinds of grain, and who were earnestly invoked by the tillers of the soil. But the gods who were more especially held in veneration were the forest deities, the chief of whom was Tapio, described as "a tall slender old man, wearing a dark brown beard, a high-crowned hat of fir-leaves, and a coat of tree-moss." The ambrosial drink of this wood-god and his spouse Mielikki, was liquid honey, and for a draught of this delightful beverage the tired hunter often longed and prayed. But besides the forest gods, who were generally mild, gentle, and kind-hearted, the Finns had also their forest demons, who, though few in number, were active in doing mischief. The chief of these demons was Hiisi, who was the Finnish devil, who had his abode in the depth of the forest glade, and whose special delight it was to do injury to men. It is said of him by Castren, an able writer on the Mythology of the Finns, "He has only three fingers on each hand; but his fingers are furnished with sharp nails, wherewith he rends those who fall into his power." This evil spirit sends diseases and calamities of every kind throughout the earth.

Like many other Pagan tribes, the Finns seem to have recognized some sort of existence after death. On the graves of their dead they laid food and clothing, axes, knives, and warlike implements of various kinds, evidently impressed with the idea that such articles might be of use even to those who had quitted this mortal scene. Some supposed the dead to be furnished with new bodies, while others imagined that they became impalpable spirits, which none but the Shamans were privileged to see, though they were believed to wander about amid the darkness and storms of night. The general impression, however, was, that the dead were enemies of the living, and, therefore, they thought of them with dread, and adopted various ceremonies, with the view of propitiating them, or preventing their return to this world. It is a curious fact, that, notwithstanding the awe in which the Finns of ancient times held the dead, they not unfrequently resorted to them for counsel and assistance. The same practice still prevails among the SHAMANISTS (which see) of the North, who believe that when their Shamans or priests fall into a trance, they are wandering through the realms of the dead, and receiving there information which they could never have obtained upon the earth. In the most ancient times the dead were believed by the Finlanders to dwell in their graves for ever. Afterwards, however, the notion came to be entertained, that they inhabited Tuonela, a sort of subterranean world over which Tuoni reigned, but never does the idea of a system of rewards and punishments seem to have occurred to the Finns in their Pagan state. In addition to gods and goddesses, the Finnish mythology recognized also various Haltiat or spiritual powers as presiding over all objects in nature. Several beasts and birds were worshipped by the Finns, but they were particularly addicted to the worship of the bear—a species of idolatry which prevailed at one period extensively in the North. This sacred animal was called Ohto, and received the titles of the Apple of the Forest, and the Pride of the Thicket. Among birds, the wild-duck, the eagle, and the cuckoo, and among insects, bees and butterflies, were esteemed as sacred. Of trees, the oak and the mountain-ash were viewed as particularly holy. Rude stones and rocks were also worshipped by the more remote Finns and Lapps. The stone idol they termed the Storjunker or great ruler; they offered sacrifices upon it, generally the rein-deer, and prostrated themselves before it in certain mountainous districts, far from the ordinary dwellings of men. This worship, which is even at this day prevalent in some parts of Finland, is a relic of the idolatry which was once common to the Norwegians, as well as the Finns and Lapps.

The complicated system of Pagan worship, which we have thus rapidly sketched, continued to prevail among the Finns down to so late a period as the twelfth century. At length the conversion of this singular people was undertaken by Eric IX., king of Sweden, whose zeal for the Church of Rome has given him a place in the calendar. Believing that more peaceful means would be unsuccessful, the enthusiastic monarch resolved to enter upon a warlike crusade for this purpose. He was accompanied in his expedition by Heinrich, bishop of Upsal. A singular circumstance concerning Eric, when engaged in his religious war against the Finns, is thus noticed by Neander: "Kneeling down to thank God, after having won a battle, he was observed to be profusely weeping; and being asked the reason, confessed that it was for pity and commiseration at the fate of so many who had fallen in the fight without being baptized, and were consequently lost when they might have been saved by the holy sacrament." Having effected the conquest, the warlike monarch compelled the vanquished nation of the Finns to profess Christianity, and they were put under the charge of the bishop of Upsal, who had been concerned in the holy war against them. But as their new ecclesiastical ruler treated the Finnish Christians with the utmost harshness and severity, he was himself massacred, and the pontiff Hadrian IV. enrolled him among the saints. For a long period Paganism and Christianity struggled for pre-eminence in Finland. By the influence of the Swedes the Protestant church, which had been established under Gustavus Vasa, A. D. 1526, extended itself in course of time among the Finns. Still, however, Pagan customs and ceremonies maintained their ground. At length when, in 1809, Finland was transferred from Sweden to Russia, an independent Lutheran church was formed in the country over which the archbishop of Abo presides FIR-TREE, a tree accounted sacred among the Japanese, who regard it as having an influence upon their future fortunes. See ARBORICULTURE.

FIRE. No symbol is more frequently used in Sacred Scripture to denote the Divine Being than fire. Thus in Exod. iii. 2, God appeared to Moses on Mount Horeb in the midst of a flame of fire, and again on Mount Sinai, Exod. xix. 18, at the giving of the law. He guided the Israelites through the desert, going before them in a pillar of cloud by day, and in a pillar of fire by night. At the second coming of Christ, we are told, 2 Thess. i. 8, that he shall manifest himself "in flaming fire." Daniel, in describing the Ancient of Days, says, "A fiery stream issued and came forth before him." In ancient times the mode in which Jehovah showed his acceptance of a sacrifice was by the descent of fire from heaven to consume the victim as it lay upon the altar. It is supposed to have been from this circumstance that Cain discovered the acceptance of Abel's sacrifice, and the rejection of his own. Fire is expressly declared to have descended from heaven upon the sacrifices offered by Moses, Manoah, Solomon, and Elijah. The fire which came down from God upon the altar in the Tabernacle, and afterwards upon that in the Temple, was constantly fed and kept alive by the priests, and was regarded as hallowed fire. In imitation of this Jewish custom, we find the ancient Romans employing the vestal virgins to watch over the sacred fire that it should not be extinguished.

So strictly were the Hebrew priests required to use the hallowed fire in all their sacrifices, that Nadab and Abihu were actually consumed by fire from the Lord for using strange fire in their sacrifices. Some of the Jewish writers allege that the sacred fire was extinguished in the days of Ahaz, but the more general opinion is, that it continued to burn till the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans. From that time, according to the great mass of Jewish writers, the hallowed fire ceased to exist, and instead of it, only common fire burned in the second temple. In 2 Mac. i. 18, 19, a fabulous story is told of the sacred fire having been hidden in a pit by some religious priests, and afterwards taken from thence and kindled upon the altar in the second temple. This apocryphal legend is generally rejected by the Jews.

FIRE (HOLY), OF THE GREEK CHURCH. On the Saturday of the Greek Easter week annually, the Greek and Armenian monks in Jerusalem profess to perform a miracle, that of kindling the holy fire. This is called the Day of Charity, and the ceremony is performed in the church of the Holy Sepulchre. A most interesting and picturesque account of this pretended miracle has been given by Mr. Calman, a Jewish convert, who witnessed the spectacle. The narrative is to be found in Mr. Herschell's 'Visit to my Fatherland in 1843.' It is as follows: "To notice all that was passing within the church of the Holy Sepulchre during the space of more than twenty-four hours, would be next to impossible; because it was one continuation of shameless madness and rioting, which would have been a disgrace to Greenwich and Smithfield fairs. Only suppose for a moment, the mighty edifice crowded to excess with fanatic pilgrims of all the Eastern churches, who, instead of lifting pure hands to God, without wrath and quarrelling, are led by the petty jealousies about the precedency which they should maintain in the order of their processions, into tumults and fighting, which can only be quelled by the scourge and whip of the followers of the false prophet. Suppose further, these thousands of devotees running from one extreme to the other, from the extreme of savage irritation to that of savage enjoyment, of mutual revelings and feasting; like Israel of old, who, when they made the golden calf, were eating, and drinking, and rising up to play. Suppose troops of men, stripped half-naked to facilitate their actions, running, trotting, jumping, galloping to and fro, the breadth and length of the church; walking on their hands with their feet aloft in the air; mounting on one another's shoulders, some in a riding and some in a standing position, and by the slightest push are all sent to the ground in one confused heap, which made one fear for their safety. Suppose further, many of the pilgrims dressed in fur-caps, like the Polish Jews, whom they feigned to represent, and whom the mob met with all manner of contempt and insult, hurrying them through the church as criminals who had just been condemned, amid loud execrations and shouts of laughter, which indicated that Israel is still a derision amongst these heathens, by whom they are still counted as sheep for the slaughter.

"About two o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the preparations for the appearance of the miraculous fire commenced. The multitude, who had been heretofore in a state of frenzy and madness, became a little more quiet; but it proved a quiet that precedes a thunderstorm. Bishops and priests in their full canonicals, then issued forth from their respective quarters, with flags and banners, crucifixes and crosses, lighted candles and smoking censers, to join or rather to lead a procession, which moved thrice round the church, invoking every picture, altar, and relic, in their way, to aid them in obtaining the miraculous fire. The procession then returned to the place from whence it started, and two grey-headed bishops, the one of the Greek, the other of the Armenian Church, were hurled by the soldiers through the crowd, into the apartment which communicates with that of the Holy Sepulchre, where they locked themselves in; there the marvellous fire was to make its first appearance, and from thence issue through the small circular windows and the door, for the use of the multitude. The eyes of all men, women, and children, were now directed towards the Holy Sepulchre with an anxious suspense, awaiting the issue of their expectation.

"The mixed multitude, each in his or her own language, were pouring forth their clamorous prayers to the Virgin and the Saints, to intercede for them on behalf of the object for which they were assembled; and the same were tenfold increased by the fanatic gestures and the waving of the garments by the priests of the respective communions who were interested in the holy fire, and who were watching by the above-mentioned door and circular windows, with torches in their hands, ready to receive the virgin flame of the heavenly fire, and convey it to their flocks. In about twenty minutes from the time the bishops locked themselves in the apartment of the Holy Sepulchre, the miraculous fire made its appearance through the door and the two small windows, as expected. The priests were the first who lighted their torches, and they set out on a gallop in the direction of their lay brethren; but some of these errandless and profitless messengers had the misfortune to be knocked down by the crowd, and had their firebrands wrested out of their hands; but some were more fortunate, and safely reached their destination, around whom the people flocked like bees, to have their candles lighted. Others, however, were not satisfied at having the holy fire second-hand, but rushed furiously towards the Holy Sepulchre, regardless of their own safety, and that of those who obstructed their way—though it has frequently happened that persons have been trampled to death on such occasions. Those who were in the galleries let down their candles by cords, and drew them up when they had succeeded in their purpose. In a few minutes thousands of flames were ascending, the smoke and the heat of which rendered the church like the bottomless pit. To satisfy themselves, as well as to convince the Latins, (who grudge so profitable as well as so effectual a piece of machinery being in the hands of the schismatical Greeks and Armenians, and one which augments the power of the priests and the revenue of the convents, and who therefore exclaim against the miraculous fire,) the pilgrims, women as well as men, shamefully expose their bare bosoms to the action of the flame of their lighted candles, to make their adversaries believe the miraculous fire differs from an ordinary one, in being perfectly harmless. The two bishops, who a little while before locked themselves in the apartment of the Holy Sepulchre, now sallied forth out of it. When the whole multitude had their candles lighted, the bishops were caught by the crowd, lifted upon their shoulders, and carried to their chapels amidst loud and triumphant acclamations. They soon, however, reappeared, at the head of a similar procession as the one before, as a pretended thank-offering to the Almighty for the miraculous fire vouchsafed, thus daring to make God a partaker in their lie. An express messenger was immediately sent off to Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, to inform the brethren there, and to invite them also to offer up their tribute of thanks for the transcendent glory of the day. Thus closed the lying wonders of the holy week of Easter." Dr. Wolff, in his Missionary Journal, relates, that the Greek metropolitan, in a letter which he wrote on the subject of this alleged miracle, declared, "The holy fire was known in the time of the Greek emperors; it was then seen in the Holy Sepulchre, and also in the time that the Crusaders were in possession of the place. Many of the Latin historians mention it. From the time of the invasion of the Turks till now, the holy fire is seen both by believers and unbelievers." The pilgrims to the Holy Sepulchre on these occasions are very numerous, consisting chiefly of Greeks, Armenians, and Romanists. The origin of the ceremony has never been traced, and the mode of its accomplishment is carefully concealed. The worshippers believe that the fire comes from above, and that a candle lighted by it will ensure their entrance into heaven, and, therefore, they rush with such frenzy to obtain a portion of the holy fire, that some are frequently found to suffer serious injury in the attempt. Kinglake says, that the year before his visit, nearly two hundred people were killed in the struggle.

FIRE (HOLY), OF THE ROMISH CHURCH. See EASTER.

FIRE (PASSING THROUGH THE), an ancient heathen custom referred to in 2 Kings xvii. 17, "And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments, and sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger." Moloch, to whom this cruel sacrifice was made, was a god of the Ammonites, against whose worship Moses gives the Hebrews a strong warning in Lev. xx. 1—5. The Rabbins, to palliate in some measure this sin, into which their ancestors fell, allege that the custom referred to was nothing more than the ancient heathen practice of passing between two fires, with the view of thereby undergoing purification. This view of the matter, however, is completely disproved by various passages of Scripture, but particularly by Ezek. xvi. 20, 21, where it appears that the children were first slain, and then made to pass through the fire. Some have explained the custom by referring to the description which Diodorus Siculus gives of the Carthaginian deity Chronos, as represented under the form of a brazen statue heated red hot, in the arms of which the child was laid, and fell down into the flaming furnace beneath. That it was a practice of the ancient heathens to pass through fire as a ceremony of initiation, appears evident from what Suidas says of the ancient Persians, that those who were to be initiated into the mysteries of Mithras were to undergo this process. Virgil also says, that the same practice was followed in the worship of Apollo by the Etrurians on Mount Soracte. Chrysostom blames, among other heathenish customs remaining in his time, the lighting two great fires and passing between them. In India, it is considered as most acceptable to the cruel goddess Káli, that her vota ries should walk on the fire. If a man is sick, he vows, "O Kâli, mother, only cure me, and I will walk on fire in your holy presence." It is difficult to come to any definite conclusion as to the precise mode in which the ancient Hebrews made their children pass through the fire. Some suppose that either their parents or the priests led them between two fires; others, that they waved them about in the flames, while the worshippers of Moloch danced round or leaped through the fire. The fire being an emblem of Moloch or the sun, perhaps this ceremony might be intended to denote that the children were thereby consecrated to that deity.

FIRE (STRANGE). In Lev. x. 1, we are informed that Nadab and Abihu "offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not." Considerable difference of opinion has existed as to what is precisely meant by the "strange fire" here mentioned. Some Rabbins, as well as modern critics, have alleged, that the sin of the two youthful priests lay in their offering incense which they had no right to do. This notion, however, is shown to be groundless, by simply noticing the expression, "their censers," which evidently implies that it was part of their duty to offer incense. On carefully examining the whole incident as narrated by the sacred historian, it appears plain that "strange fire" is to be understood as fire not taken from the altar which was there miraculously kindled. Some, however, while they admit that the fire may have been taken from the altar of burnt-offering, allege that the incense was applied to the fire in a manner different from that which God had appointed. To the general opinion that the strange fire had not been taken from the altar of burnt-offering, the objection has sometimes been raised, that it is difficult to conceive from what other quarter it could have been obtained. The Targum of Jonathan alleges, that the offending priests received it from the fires at which the priests' portion of the sacrifices was dressed for food in the court of the tabernacle.

FIRE TEMPLE. See PRYTANEUM, PYRÆUM.

FIRE-WORSHIP. This species of idolatry is of very remote antiquity. It is understood to have existed as far back as the time of Abraham, whose ancestors belonged to Chaldea, where, as is generally believed, Pyrolatry was established by Nimrod, and, accordingly, Abraham's birth-place, Ur, denotes fire. The Jews have an old tradition, that Terah and Abraham were expelled from Chaldea because they refused to worship the fire. Throughout Syria, the worship of fire was mixed up with that of the sun. In the religion of ancient India, AGNI (which see), the resplendent, golden-haired god of fire, occupies a very conspicuous place. The first act of a pious Hindu, when he awoke in the morning, was to invoke Agni. The sacrificial fire was kindled and looked upon as heavenly light come down to dwell with man; it was a god conceived as present, though invisible, before the wood of the sacrifice was lighted, as much as when visible upon the altar. The ancient Medes and Persians held all kinds of fire in religious veneration; for actual, visible fires reminded them of the primitive fire, Ormuzd, the god of fire and of light. (See ABESTA.) In Cappadocia the Magi kept up a perpetual fire in the temples of Anaitis and Amanus. The Sauromatians or Medes of the North worshipped the fire. They have been lost amid the Slavonians, whose religion partook much of the character of Sun-worship, and who maintained sacred fires in honour of Perun at Kiew, of Znicz at Novgorod and in Lithuania, and of Perkunos at Romowe in Lithuania. Among the Celts the virgin priestesses had charge of the sacred fire which was annually renewed at the winter-solstice. (See DRUIDS.) Sacred fires existed also among the ancient Peruvians, the Red Indians, and the Aztecs. In China, at the present day, both the Buddhists or worshippers of Fo, and the sect of Lao-Tzé, maintain their ever-burning holy fires.

Among the ancient heathens fire was held in high veneration. Thus we find that a lamp burned constantly in the Prytanem at Athens in honour of Minerva. Rome worshipped Vesta under the form of a perpetual fire. These sacred fires were kept burning in a variety of places, at Delphi, Argos, Naxos, Rhodes, Tenedos and Ephesus; they were looked upon as essential to the prosperity of the city and of the empire, and the extinction of one of them was regarded as a public calamity, betokening some heavy disaster, or even the overthrow of the nation itself.

These sacred fires, however, have not in all cases been kept constantly burning. The ancient Peruvians annually extinguished their sacred fire for the purpose of kindling it anew. In such cases fire is no longer viewed as an emblem of the eternal God, but of that natural and moral life which requires to be periodically renewed. Thus, in Persia, where fire-worship anciently prevailed, and is not yet entirely abolished, the sacred fire was wont to be extinguished on the death of the king. Among the Mexicans all their fires were put out at the close of each cycle of fifty-two years. Among the Guebres, the last remnants of the ancient fire-worshippers of Persia, all the fires are extinguished once every year. The ancient Romans also were accustomed annually to renew the sacred fire of Vesta on the first of March. See GUEBRES, PERSIA (RELIGION OF ANCIENT).

FIRMAMENT, the material expanse or arch of heaven, which seems to stretch over our heads, and to rest at all points of the horizon upon the earth. The Hebrews considered it as transparent like a crystal or sapphire. Over this arch they supposed were the waters of heaven. Their firmament, therefore, differed from the brazen firmament of the mythology of Homer. The ancient Egyptians saw in the azure firmament, as it were, a celestial Nile. ☉ rather ocean, which communicated on all sides with the ocean which surrounds the earth. The vault of heaven was compared by the ancient Greeks to a round and convex shield.

FIRST-BORN. See BIRTHRIGHT.

FIRST-FRUITS, an offering made to God by the ancient Hebrews of part of the produce of harvest as an acknowledgment of the Divine goodness in sending them fruitful seasons. This was agreeable to the command of God as laid down in Exod. xxii. 29, "Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors: the first-born of thy sons shalt thou give unto me." In the verse which immediately follows, the command is made to extend to animals. Thus verse 30, "Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy sheep: seven days it shall be with his dam; on the eighth day thou shalt give it me." The name first-fruits was derived from the circumstance, that they were offered in the temple before any part of the crop was touched. There were two kinds of first-fruits. The first kind was offered in the name of the whole people, and consisted either of two loaves of bread, or of a sheaf of barley, gathered on the evening of the 15th of Nisan, and thrashed in the court of the temple. This was cleansed and winnowed, then three pints of it were roasted and pounded with incense and oil, and waved by the priest before the Lord towards the four winds; the priest then threw a handful into the fire, and kept the remainder for himself. When this ceremony was concluded, every man was allowed to reap and gather in his harvest. The other kind of first-fruits is said by the Rabbins to have consisted of a sixtieth part of each man's harvest, which every private individual was expected to bring to the temple. These first-fruits consisted of wheat, barley, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, and dates. They were carried in procession by twenty-four persons, preceded by an ox for sacrifice, with gilded horns, and crowned with olive. Besides these two species of first-fruits offered to the Lord, there was another offering of corn, wine, and oil, along with sheep's wool, which was presented for the use of the Levites, according to the command given in Deut. xviii. 4. No precise arrangement is made as to the extent of this gift to the Levitical priesthood; but the Talmudical writers say, that liberal persons were accustomed to give a fortieth, or even a thirtieth, while less generous persons contented themselves with giving a sixtieth part only of the entire produce. The first of these was called an oblation with a good eye, and the second an oblation with an evil eye, and to this tradition our Lord is supposed by some to allude in Matth. xx. 15, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?" The time of offering the first-fruits extended from the feast of Pentecost until the feast of Dedication. It was unlawful for the Jews to gather in the harvest until they had offered to God the omer or new sheaf, which was presented the day after the great Day of Unleavened Bread; neither were they permitted to bake any bread made of new corn until they had offered the new loaves upon the altar on the Day of Pentecost. The practice of offering the first-fruits was not unknown to the ancient heathens. Porphyry says it was appointed by the laws both of Triptolemus and Draco. Diodorus Siculus also mentions it as practised by the ancient Egyptians.

FIRST-FRUITS OF BENEFICES. See ANNATES.

FISH-WORSHIP. The Philistine god DAGON (which see), was represented partly under the form of a fish, and hence Plutarch says, that among the Egyptians, Syrians, and Greeks, to abstain from fish was accounted a sacred duty. Both Cicero and Xenophon affirm, that the Syrians worshipped fish. Lucian says, that they thought them sacred, and, therefore, never used them as food, and he expressly tells us, that "adjacent to the temple at Hierapolis, there was a lake in which many sacred fish were kept, some of the largest of which had names given them, and would come to you when called." Diodorus also affirms, "At this very day the Syrians eat no fish, but adore them as gods." And it is not a little remarkable, that when God warns the Israelites against following the idolatry of the neighbouring nations, he mentions among the graven images that are to be avoided, Deut. iv. 18, "the likeness of any fish that is in the waters."

Fish-worship still prevails in some parts of the heathen world, though not extensively. In one district of Western Africa, on the Bonny river, the shark is held sacred, not perhaps on its own account, but because it is regarded as the dwelling-place or temple of evil spirits, to appease whom human sacrifices are sometimes offered to the voracious fish. So tame, in consequence of the indulgence extended to them, have the sharks on the Bonny become, that, as we learn from Wilson, they come every day to the edge of the river to see if a human victim has been provided for their repast. Father Froes, a Jesuit missionary in Japan, speaks of sacred fishes in a river in that country, which the Bonzes or priests are afraid to taste, lest they should immediately be struck with leprosy in punishment for their audacious sacrilege. One of the principal deities of the Japanese is CANON (which see), who presides over the waters, and is represented as swallowed up by a fish as far as the middle.

FISHERMAN'S RING, one of the Pope's two seals. The impression on it is St. Peter holding a line with bait attached to it in the water. This seal is used for those briefs which are sealed with red wax. See BULL.

FLAGELLANTS (Lat. scourgers), a class of people who appeared first in Italy in the thirteenth century, amid the contests carried on between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, the party friendly to the pope, and the party friendly to the emperor. In the excitement of the period, large bodies of men, girded with ropes, marched in procession through the cities and villages, singing hymns, and calling upon the people to repent. The spectacle which thus presented itself as the Flagellants passed along, produced a great sensation. Such processions spread from Italy to other countries. In Germany especially, the deep impression produced in the minds of the people by the prevalence of the black death contributed to call forth demonstrations of that kind. Large bodies, accordingly, of Flagellants, marched through Flanders, France, and Germany, singing hymns, and scourging themselves till the blood flowed freely. To such an extent did the fanatical spirit spread, that both the civil and ecclesiastical authorities found it necessary to interfere. Pope Clement VI. issued a public prohibition of all such processions, on pain of the heavy censures of the church. This only roused the Flagellants to oppose the dominant church of the time, and at length these processions assumed an heretical tendency. Those who took part in them complained bitterly of the corruptions of the church, declaring that the sacraments in the hands of a wicked clergy had lost their validity, and that nothing remained but to share in the sufferings of Christ, who was so obviously crucified afresh, and put to an open shame. Many of these enthusiastic opponents of mother church were visited with the most bitter persecutions, and not a few died at the stake, both in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The Flagellants held various peculiar opinions, which, to the number of fifty, were condemned by the council of Constance. Their principal tenets were, that the teaching of the Romish church respecting the efficacy of the sacraments, purgatory, prayers for the dead, and the like, are utterly erroneous; and on the contrary, whoever believes simply what is contained in the Apostles' Creed, frequently repeats the Lord's Prayer and the Ave Maria, and at certain periods lacerates his body with scourging, and thus punishes himself for the sins he commits, will attain eternal salvation. It was not so much, however, the affirmative opinions of the Flagellants, as their negative sentiments, their refusal to receive the chief corruptions which had been engrafted on pure Christianity by the Church of Rome, that drew down the thunders of the Vatican upon these zealous, though, in several points, erring enthusiasts.

FLAGELLATION (Lat. scourging), a practice sanctioned by the Romish church, and which they usually term Discipline, whereby an individual, for the mortifying of the flesh, voluntarily scourges himself. Such an exercise of voluntary penance is resorted to in many monasteries at regular intervals, for instance, three times a-week; but in many cases it is much more frequent. In the 'Lives of the Saints Canonized in 1839,' a work edited by Cardinal Wiseman, we find various remarks, which clearly evince the high importance attached to the practice of flagellation. Thus, in speaking of St. Lignori, it is stated, "Seeing the severity with which he disciplined himself, and the austerity of his fasts and mortifications, it was a source of wonder how he could live." And, again, concerning the same saint, we are informed, "His mortifications seemed to increase both in severity and frequency, and one day his secretary had to burst open his door, and snatch the discipline out of his hands, fearing lest the violence with which he scourged himself might cause his death." Of St. Pacificus, we are informed in the same treatise, "Besides the regular disciplines prescribed by rule three times in the week, he cruelly scourged himself thrice each day with chains or cords, so as to fill all those with horror who heard the whistlings of the lash, or saw the abundance of blood which he shed during the flagellation."

The practice, however, is not limited to private individuals; it is regularly performed at Rome on particular days during the time of Lent. The following account of the process is given by an eyewitness: "Being resolved to satisfy my curiosity on this singular subject, by being present at the ceremony, I went one evening, along with several friends, to the church of the Caravita, where it is performed on the Tuesdays and Thursdays of Lent. The service commenced about an hour after sunset. The church is spacious, and the number of men present was, as nearly as we could judge, about five hundred. There were only six or eight small candles, so that from the first we could only see indistinctly. During prayers, two or three attendants entered, each having an iron hoop, on which were suspended about a hundred leathern thongs, which were distributed among the congregation; but some had brought their whips along with them. We examined the thongs and found them exactly like good small English dog-whips, hard and well-knotted towards the point, but we did not succeed in obtaining one. After prayers, we had a sermon of some length, on the advantages of punishing the body for the good of the soul, and especially that sort of penance which is inflicted by means of whips. During the sermon the lights were extinguished one after another, and the concluding part of it was delivered in total darkness.

"After the sermon was concluded a bell rang, and there was a slight bustle and hustling, as if those present were removing part of their dress; a second bell rang, and the flagellation commenced. It lasted fully a quarter of an hour; hundreds were certainly flogging something, but whether their own bare backs, or the pavement of the church, we could not tell. To judge from the sounds, some used the whips, and others their hands, but the darkness was so total, we could see nothing; and besides having some little fear for our own persons we had got into a snug corner where we calculated no thongs could reach us. The groaning and crying were horrible. When the flagellation ceased, prayers were read, during which the penitents put on their clothes and composed their countenances. Lights were brought in and the congregation dismissed with the usual benediction."

The use of the scourge in self-torture was not unknown in the heathen religions of antiquity. Thus the priests of Cybele pretended to propitiate that goddess, and at the same time to excite the compassion of the multitude by flogging themselves with scourges. The Yogis of Hindustan, and the ascetics of all heathen systems, are accustomed to make use of this mode of self-discipline.

FLAMEN, a general name applied to any Roman priest who was devoted to the service of any particular god. The first institution of the order of flamens is generally ascribed to Numa, who is said to have appointed three, under the titles of Flamen Dialis, the priest of Jupiter, Flamen Martialis, the priest of Mars, and Flamen Quirinalis, the priest of Romulus. The number was afterwards increased to fifteen, the three original priests, who were chosen from the patricians, being termed the greater flamens, while the rest who were taken from the plebeians were called the lesser flamens. After being chosen, as is usually believed, by the people, the flamens were installed in office by the Pontifex Maximus or high-priest, to whom the whole sacerdotal order was subject. The proper robe of these priests was the læna, a sort of purple cloak, or almost a double gown, fastened about the neck with a buckle or clasp. It was interwoven curiously with gold, so as to appear very splendid. On their heads they wore the apex, a stitched cap in the form of a helmet, with the addition of a little stick fixed on the top, and wound about with white wool. A peculiar cap called the albo-galerus, which was made of the skin of a white beast offered in sacrifice, with the addition of some twigs taken from a wild olive-tree, belonged only to the flamen of Jupiter, who was considered as the highest of the order. Besides these special articles of priestly costume, the flamens wore also a wreath of laurel. The Flamen Dialis, or priest of Jupiter, was subjected to a great variety of restrictions, the precise object of many of which is not very apparent. He was not allowed to be absent from the city three days in succession. He was forbidden to ride, or even touch a horse, but was required to devote himself assiduously to the duties of his sacred profession. Several superstitious restrictions were laid upon him which it is unnecessary to enumerate. The municipal towns had their flamens; and after the emperors were deified, flamens were appointed to conduct their worship.

FLAMINIA, the name of a young priestess who assisted the Flaminica in her sacred duties. This was also the name given to the house of the Flamen Dialis, from which no one could carry out fire except for sacred purposes.

FLAMINICA, the wife of the Flamen Dialis, or priest of Jupiter among the ancient Romans. She was put under the same restrictions as her husband, and if she died he was compelled to resign his office. Her official costume was a dyed robe; her hair was plaited with a purple band in a conical form, and she wore a small square cloak with a border, to which there was attached a slip cut from a lucky tree. The flaminica was not allowed to mount a staircase consisting of more than three steps; and when she went to the places consecrated to the worship of the gods, she neither combed nor dressed her hair. She sacrificed a ram to Jupiter on each of the NUNDINÆ (which see).

FLANDRIANS. See MENNONITES, ANABAPTISTS.

FLENTES (Lat. Weepers), an order of PENITENTS (which see) in the early Christian church. Their station was in the vestibule or porch of the church, where they lay prostrate, begging the prayers of the faithful as they entered, and desiring to be admitted as AUDIENTES (which see) within the church. Basil says, the first year of penitence was spent in weeping before the gate of the church.

FLINS, an idol of the ancient Vandals, represented under the figure of a great stone, and hence the name, which in Saxon signifies a stone. The stone idol was shaped in the form of death, covered with a long cloak, holding a stick in its hand with a blown bladder, and a lion's skin upon its left shoulder. This idol was imagined to possess the power of restoring the dead to life.

FLORA, the goddess of flowers among the ancient Romans, and regarded therefore as presiding over spring. The worship of this deity was established at Rome in the very earliest times. Varro, indeed, reckons her among the ancient divinities of the Sabines which were adopted by the Romans. Ovid says, that her Greek name was Chloris, which the Romans changed into Flora. Her temple at Rome was situated near the Circus Maximus. She was represented under the figure of a beautiful female, supposed to be blessed with perpetual youth, crowned with flowers, and bearing the horn of plenty in her hand. She was said to be the spouse of Zephyrus, or the west wind, and an annual festival was celebrated in her honour. See next article.

FLORALIA, a festival observed every year at Rome in honour of the goddess FLORA (which see). It was kept for five successive days, commencing on the 28th of April and ending on the 2d of May. The institution of this festival, which was dated B. C. 238, is attributed to the command of an oracle in the Sibylline books. It was celebrated at first with all kinds of innocent mirth and festivity among the rural peasantry of Italy, but afterwards, particularly in towns, it degenerated into a licentious and immoral festival. The design of this festive occasion was to propitiate Flora, and thus obtain a season abundant in fruits and flowers.

FLORINIANS, a sect which arose in the second century, professing the opinions of Florinus, a presbyter, who had in early life been under the teaching of Polycarp, but afterwards adopted high Monarchian views, or the doctrine of one only Creator of all existence, pushing it to such an extreme as to make God the author of evil. It would appear that subsequently Florinus adopted Gnostic opinions, having imbibed the sentiments of the VALENTINIANS (which see), who believed in an independent principle of evil existing out of God. Florinus was excommunicated by the Roman bishop Eleutherius.

FLOWERS (FESTIVAL OF), one of the most classical festivals of the Hindus, celebrated by the Rajpoots during nine days, in honour of Gauri the wife of Mahadeva or Iswara. It takes place at the vernal equinox, the ceremonies commencing on the entrance of the sun into Aries, which is the opening of the Hindu year. At that period clay images are formed of Bhavani, or Gauri, and Shiva, which are immediately placed together. A small trench is then opened in the earth, in which barley is sown. The ground is irrigated, and artificial heat supplied until the grain begins to germinate, when the ladies with joined hands dance round the trench, invoking the blessing of Bhavani on their husbands. After this the young corn is taken up and presented by the ladies to their husbands, who wear it in their turbans. Various ceremonies are then performed during several days within the houses, at the close of which the images are adorned and prepared to be carried in procession. The remaining ceremonies of the festival are thus described by Colonel Tod in his 'Annals of Rajast'han:' "At length the hour arrives, the martial nakaras give the signal 'to the cannonier without,' and speculation is at rest when the guns on the summit of the castle of Ekling-ghur announce that Gauri has commenced her excursion. The cavalcade assembles on the magnificent terrace, and the Rana surrounded by his nobles leads the way to the boats, of a form as primitive as that which conveyed the Argonauts to Colchis. The scenery is admirably adapted for these fêtes, the ascent being gradual from the margin of the lake, which here forms a fine bay, and gently rising to the crest of the ridge on which the palace and dwellings of the chiefs are built. Every turret and balcony is crowded with spectators, from the palace to the water's edge; and the ample flight of marble steps which intervene from the Tripolia, or triple portal, to the boats, is a dense mass of females in variegated robes, whose scarfs but half conceal their ebontresses adorned with the rose and the jessamine. A more imposing or more exhilarating sight cannot be imagined than the entire population of a city thus assembled for the purpose of rejoicing, the countenance of every individual, from the prince to the peasant, dressed in smiles. Carry the eye to heaven, and it rests on 'a sky without a cloud;' below is the magnificent lake, the even surface of the deep blue waters broken only by palaces of marble, whose arched piazzas are seen through the foliage of orange groves, plantain, and tamarind; while the vision is bounded by noble mountains, their peaks towering over each other, and composing an immense amphitheatre. Here the deformity of vice intrudes not; no object is degraded by inebriation; no tumultuous disorder or deafening clamour, but all wait patiently, with eyes directed to the Tripolia, the appearance of Gauri. At length the procession is seen winding down the steep, and in the midst, borne on a throne gorgeously arrayed in yellow robes, and blazing with 'barbaric pearl and gold,' the goddess appears: on either side the two beauties wave the silver châmarâ or fan over her head, while the more favoured damsels act as harbingers, preceding her with wands of silver: the whole chanting hymns. On her approach, the Rana, his chiefs and ministers, arise, and remain standing until the goddess is seated on her throne, close to the water's edge, when all bow, and the prince and his court take their seat in the boats. The females then form a circle round the goddess, unite hands, and with a measured step, and various graceful inclinations of the body, keeping time by beating the palms at particular cadences, move round the image singing hymns, some in honour of the goddess of abundance, others on love and chivalry, and embodying little episodes of national achievements, occasionally sprinkled with double entendres, which excite a smile and significant nod from the chiefs, and an inclination of the head of the fair choristers. The festival being entirely female, not a single male mixed in the immense groups, and even Iswara himself, the husband of Gauri, attracts no attention, as appears from his ascetic or mendicant form begging his dole from the bounteous and universal mother. It is taken for granted that the goddess is occupied in bathing all the time she remains, and ancient tradition says death was the penalty of any male intruding on these solemnities. At length, the ablutions over, the goddess is taken up and conveyed to the palace with the same forms and state. The Rana and his chiefs then unmoor their boats, and are rowed round the margin of the lake, to visit in succession the other images of the goddess, around which female groups are chanting and worshipping, as already described; with which ceremonies the evening closes, when the whole terminates with a grand display of fireworks, the finale of each of the three days dedicated to Gauri."

FO, the name given by the Chinese to BUDHA (which see), who is extensively worshipped among that people.

FOCUS (Lat. hearth or fire-place), dedicated among the ancient Romans to the LARES (which see) of each family. The domestic hearth was looked upon with such veneration, that to swear by the royal hearth was accounted the most sacred oath among the Scythians. On the occasion of religious festivals, the hearth was adorned with garlands.

FONT. The primitive Christians were accustomed to wash before entering the church as a symbol of the purity becoming the house of God. For this purpose, in process of time, the vessel or font of water which was used for washing was introduced into the narthex or porch. Formerly it was situated outside the church. The baptismal font came into use for the purpose of infant baptism, as BAPTISTERIES (which see) fell into disuse, and when the neglect of stated seasons of baptism had rendered the larger baptisteries needless. The font was usually placed at the west end of the church, near the south entrance, to indicate that baptism was the ordinance of admission into the Christian church. They were at one time large to serve for immersion, but as that practice fell into disuse they were reduced to a smaller size. Baronius, the Romish historian, mentions several miraculous fonts which at Easter were spontaneously filled with a sufficient quantity of water to baptize all the catechumens. By the canons of the Church of England, there must be a stone font for baptism in every church or chapel. In Presbyterian and Congregational churches no fixed fonts are put up in the erection of churches. The blessing or benediction of the font is minutely provided for by a regular series of prayers and ceremonies laid down in the Roman Missal, all of which are so framed as to indicate plainly the belief of the Romish church in Baptismal Regeneration.

FONTEVRAUD (THE ORDER OF), an order of Romish monks connected with the BENEDICTINES (which see), which sprung up in the beginning of the twelfth century. It derived its name from the place where its first monastery was erected, on the confines of Angers and Tours. The founder of the order was Robert of Arbriscelles, who prescribed for his followers of both sexes the rule of St. Benedict, but with the addition of some singular and very austere regulations. Thus he united the monasteries for the two sexes, and subjected both the men and women to the government of a female, professedly in accordance with the example of our Lord who commended the apostle John to the care of the Virgin Mary, and would have him to obey her as a mother. The monastery of Fontevraud was set up in A. D. 1100, and its founder travelled for several years about France, establishing monasteries till his death, which occurred in A. D. 1117. The first lady abbess of the order was Bertrade, formerly queen of France. About A. D. 1700 the order was divided into four provinces, those of France, Aquitaine, Auvergne, and Bretagne, which collectively contained fifty-seven priories. Among the abbesses of Fontevraud, it is calculated that there have been fourteen princesses, five of whom have been of the royal house of Bourbon. A few houses of this order once existed in England, having been introduced by command of Henry II.

FONTINALIA, a festival celebrated annually among the ancient Romans on the 13th of October, when the wells were adorned with garlands and flowers thrown into them.

FONTUS (Lat. fons, a fountain), an ancient Roman divinity, supposed to be a son of Janus, and having a temple dedicated to him on the Janiculus. He was the deity who presided over fountains and flowing streams.

FOO, a chimæra or dragon, both of China and of Japan. It corresponds to the Phoenix of the ancients. It is said never to appear but at the birth of a person of uncommon merit, or in order to be the forerunner of some other extraordinary event.

FOQUEQUIO, the name given among the Buddoists or Budhists of Japan to their sacred writings, which they venerate so highly that they are afraid to lay them on the ground or treat them with the slightest disrespect.

FOQUEXUS, a name given to the sect of XACA (which see) in Japan, from a particular book which bears that title.

FORCULUS, an inferior deity among the ancient Greeks, who presided over gates.

FORDICIDIA, a festival celebrated annually in the month of March among the ancient Romans. It was instituted by Numa in consequence of a general barrenness which happened to prevail among the cattle. The name was derived from the sacrifice which was offered of a Forda, which means a cow with a calf.

FORMALISTS, a sect of thinkers, which arose in the twelfth century, amid the keen discussions which took place between the NOMINALISTS and REALISTS (which see). The Formalists professed to hold an intermediate place between the two parties, abstracting the forms of things, and assigning to them the place of universals. Scotus, who flourished in the thirteenth century, is said by some to be the originator of Formalism, but the idea that universals are indeterminate entities really subsisting out of the mind in beings themselves, is to be found in many philosophers of the Middle Ages anterior to Scotus, who, instead of first proposing this solution of the difficult problem, only modified it. See SCOTISTS, THOMISTS.

FORMOSANS (RELIGION OF THE). Formosa is a large island in the Eastern or China Seas, more properly called Tywan. The religion of the islanders is polytheistic in its character, there being recognized among them a plurality of deities, two of whom are regarded as supreme, one of whom resides in the south, and the other in the east. The one is a guardian of men, and the other, who is a goddess, is the guardian of women. They acknowledge also another deity who resides in the north, and is a demon or evil spirit. There are two gods of war, a god of health, a god of forests, and also a god of corn fields. They have besides household gods and deities who preside over the several departments of nature

The first in order of these numberless divinities is the Creator of the universe, to whom they sacrifice a hog, the flesh and bones of which are consumed with sandal-wood. Some have affirmed that the Formosans worship the devil, and they are said to hold the opinion that the souls of the wicked pass at death into demons, who ought to be invoked with prayers, and appeased with sacrifices. The chief of these malignant demons has places erected for his worship; and not only beasts, but human victims also are made to bleed upon his altars. The worship of the gods, which consists of invocations, sacrifices, and libations, is conducted by priestesses called Juibas, who work themselves up into a frenzy, or fall into a trance, during which they pretend to hold familiar intercourse with the gods. The priestesses profess to be possessed of supernatural power, in virtue of which they foretell wet or dry seasons, raise devils, and drive them out of their former habitations.

The ceremonies among the Formosans attendant upon the laying the first bamboo of a house, and more especially of a temple, are of a very peculiar kind. They are thus described by Picart in his Religious Ceremonies of all Nations: "Upon cutting the first bamboo a particular prayer is addressed to the deity who presides over the building. Before they enter upon their work, a considerable quantity of pinang and rice is presented to the gods, who are formally invited to come and take possession of their new tenement, to protect it, &c. After this every one present is obliged to give an account of what dreams he had the preceding night; and he who was the most happy in his slumbers, sets the first hand to the new undertaking. He presents pinang, and some such liquor as is provided for the purpose, to the gods, and begs of them to incline him to be diligent and industrious. When the fabric is reared to a certain height, the proprietor goes in, and makes an oblation for every one present without exception. When they have made such progress as that nothing is wanting but to raise the roof; before it is covered, there are some particular women employed to discover by their art of divination, whether the edifice will be durable. For this purpose they take bamboos, and fill them with water, and squirt it out of their mouths. The manner in which this stream flows down upon the ground, determines the duration of the fabric. The ceremony concludes in a long series of excessive drinking in honour of the gods, who are invited to their revels by a form of prayer, in which they implore their aid and assistance. The sacrifice of a hog is a kind of assurance of good success to the new erection, as well as to the proprietor. The head of the victim which is sacrificed, must be turned towards the east, because the god, who resides in that quarter, is superior to all the rest. The victim is cut all to pieces, but in such a manner as that the head is preserved entire: and those sacred relics are laid upon every thing whereon they are desirous to draw down the benediction of the gods; on their coffers, for instance, that they may be filled with riches; on their swords and bucklers, that they may be inspired with courage and resolution to vanquish their enemies. As to the priestess, she is always handsomely recompensed for her prayers and pains; besides which she is allowed a considerable share of the sacrifice, and always maintains her interest in these idolaters, who imagine, after such sacrifices, the devil dares not touch the least thing whatever which belongs to them."

Their seed-time is introduced by a solemn sacrifice to those gods who preside over the products of the earth. If they happen during that season to kill a wild beast, its liver and heart are made oblations to the same gods. When the harvest commences, their first-fruits are solemnly deposited on a heap of earth in honour of their gods, and when it is fully gathered in, a hog is sacrificed in token of thanksgiving to the deities. Before they engage in war, they consult their dreams, and examine the flight of some particular birds. On their return home, they offer up sacrifices for several successive nights to the manes of their enemies. The manner of taking an oath between two persons consists in breaking asunder a straw. The people follow the custom of painting their arms, shoulders, breasts, and faces; they wear feathers upon their heads, especially on their most solemn festivals, and adorn their arms and legs with small shells. The priestesses profess to heal diseases by means of magic charms and various ceremonies, which they uniformly preface with offering sacrifice to the gods.

The Formosans acknowledge the immortality of the soul. On this subject Picart remarks: "When any person dies, the Formosans erect a little hut, which they dress up with green boughs and other decorations, for the reception of his soul. Four bandrols, or little streamers, are planted, by way of ornament, at each corner. Within there is provided a calabash, or bowl full of fresh water, and a bamboo, that the soul may, without any manner of inconvenience, refresh itself, or wash, whenever it thinks proper. As to their ideas relating to future rewards and punishments, they imagine that the souls of wicked men are tormented, and cast headlong into a bottomless pit, full of mire and dirt; and that those of the virtuous pass with pleasure and safety over it, upon a narrow bamboo bridge, which leads directly to a gay paradise, where they revel in all sensual enjoyments. But when the souls of the vicious attempt to get over this bridge, they slip on one side, and fall headlong into the miry abyss. As to the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, they have no manner of idea of it."

In the seventeenth century the Dutch attempted to introduce Christianity into the island, and although they succeeded in gaining converts for a time, the persecuting spirit of the Pagans was so strong, that the small number of Formosans, who embraced the Christian faith, were either compelled to renounce their Christian profession, or if they persisted in maintaining it, were put to death. The island is in possession of the Chinese, and paganism reigns almost undisturbed.

FORMULA OF CONCORD. See CONCORD (FORM OF).

FORMULA CONSENSUS, a treatise drawn up in 1675 by John Henry Heidegger, a celebrated divine of Zurich, under the sanction of the principal divines of Switzerland. The design of its preparation and publication was to settle four controversies which had previously disturbed the peace of the Reformed churches: 1. It condemned the doctrine of Moses Amyraut (see AMYRALDISTS) respecting general grace, and established in opposition to it the doctrine of special grace. 2. It condemned the opinion of Joshua de la Place concerning the imputation of Adam's first sin. 3. It condemned Piscator's doctrine concerning the active obedience of Christ. 4. It condemned Lewis Capell's critical doctrine concerning the points of the Hebrew text. This profession of faith on these different contested points was annexed by public authority to the common Helvetic formulas of religion, and subscription to it was rigorously enforced in the Swiss churches. The adoption, however, of this formula as one of the recognized standards of the Helvetic churches, caused great dissatisfaction in the minds of many both of the clergy and laity. At length Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, addressed a letter of remonstrance on the subject to the authorities of the canton of Basle, and the republic of Geneva. Mr. Peter Werenfels, who was at the head of the consistory of Basle, so far yielded to the remonstrances of the Elector, that he ceased to require a subscription to the Formula Consensus from the candidates for the ministry, and his conduct in this respect was imitated by his successors. The Consistory of Geneva, however, still continued to maintain the credit and authority of the Formula till 1706, when, without being abrogated by any positive act, it gradually fell into disuse. Even after this time it was still imposed as a rule of faith in several other parts of Switzerland, and was often denounced as an obstacle to the union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. In the canton of Berne it gave rise to very keen disputes, the authorities imperatively requiring all public teachers, and particularly those of the university and church of Lausanne, who were suspected of heresy, to subscribe this formula as the profession of their faith. Several refused to yield obedience to the demand, and were subjected to punishment. The result was, that the Formula lost much of its credit and authority.

FORNACALIA, a festival celebrated among the ancient Romans in honour of the goddess FORNAX (which see). It is said to have been instituted by Numa. The time of its celebration was announced every year by the Curio Maximus. Lactantius mentions this festival as having been observed in his day.

FORNAX, a goddess among the ancient Romans, who was invoked that she might ripen the grain, and prevent its being burnt in the process of baking in the oven. She has sometimes been regarded as identical with Vesta, but at all events she was the goddess of furnaces.

FORSETI, the god of justice among the ancient Scandinavians, who is described in the Edda as the son of Baldur and Nanna, the daughter of Nef. He possesses the heavenly mansion called Glitnir, and all disputants at law, who bring their cases before him, go away perfectly reconciled. His tribunal is said to be the best that is to be found among either gods or men.

FORTUNA, the goddess of chance both among the ancient Greeks and Romans. Her worship in Rome is traced as far back as Ancus Martius and Servius Tullius, and she had numerous temples dedicated to her under different appellations. This deity was distinguished by the Romans into male and female. The goddess is usually represented in a female habit, with a bandage before her eyes, to show that she acts without discrimination, and she appears standing on a wheel to denote her inconstancy. They also gave her in one hand a horn of plenty, to show that she distributes riches, and in the other the helm of a ship, and they seat her upon a globe, all indicating that she governs the world. The Greeks worshipped her under the name of Tyche.

FOX-WORSHIP. This species of idolatry is found only in Japan, the natives regarding the fox as a sort of divinity, though, according to Siebold, they appear doubtful whether to reckon it a god or a devil. If a Japanese feels himself in circumstances of doubt or difficulty, he sets out a platter of rice and beans as an offering to his fox, and if on the following day some of it has disappeared, this is looked upon as a favourable omen. Strange stories are told of the doings of these foxes. Titsingh gives the following by way of specimen: "The grandfather of his friend, the imperial treasurer of Nagasaki, and who had in his time filled the same office, despatched one day a courier to Jedo with very important letters for the councillors of state. A few days after he discovered that one of the most important of the letters had been accidentally left out of the package—a forgetfulness which exposed him to great disgrace. In his despair he recurred to his fox and presented to him an offering. The next morning he saw, to his great satisfaction, that some of it had been eaten; after which, upon going into his cabinet, the letter which he had forgotten to send was nowhere to be found. This caused him great uneasiness, till he received a message from his agent at Jedo, who informed him that, upon opening the box which contained the despatches, the lock of it appeared to have been forced by a letter pressed in between the box and its cover from without—the very same letter, as it proved, left behind at Nagasaki. The more intelligent, says Titsingh, laugh at this superstition, but the great body of the people have firm faith in it. There are in Japan, according to Siebold, two species of foxes, very much like the ordinary ones of Europe and America, and, from the immunity which they enjoy, great nuisances. The white fox, of which the skin is much prized, is found only in the Kurule Islands." At the feast of Ceres, celebrated annually at Rome about the middle of April, burning torches were wont to be fixed to the tails of a number of foxes, which were allowed to run through the circus till they were burnt to death. This practice may have originated from the story of Samson in the Book of Judges.

FRANCE (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF). At a very early period, so early indeed as the second century, Christianity appears to have obtained a footing in Gaul. Flourishing churches at Lyons and Vienne come to our knowledge during a severe persecution to which the Christians were exposed A. D. 177. The origin of these communities is probably to be found in the numbers of Christians who passed from Asia Minor into Gaul in the prosecution of trade. A Christian colony thus established in the country, laboured with success among the natives, and in a short time we find Irenæus, one of the early Apostolic Fathers, exercising the office of bishop over the church of Lyons, which during his life not only maintained a steadfast adherence to Divine truth, but was instrumental in diffusing it all around them. The result was, that for a time Christianity flourished and made rapid progress in Gaul, but after the death of Irenæus, the cause languished, and in the middle of the third century there were only a few small churches. At that period seven missionaries, as we are informed by Gregory of Tours, made their appearance in the country, having been sent thither by the bishop of Rome to convert the idolaters to the Christian faith. Whatever amount of truth there may be in this statement of Gregory, who wrote near the end of the sixth century, it is an undoubted fact that from the middle of the third century the new cause made rapid advances. From Gaul Christianity spread into Germany, and even into Britain. During the fourth and fifth centuries extensive migrations took place into Gaul of those tribes of German origin who had inhabited the districts lying on the banks of the Lower Rhine and the Weser. These Franks, as they were called, were many of them converted to the faith by mingling with the Christian inhabitants among whom their lot was cast.

The country was for a long time subjected to constant political agitation in consequence of the frequent changes of government, and the conflicts between the Burgundians, East-Goths, West-Goths, and Franks. But even under such disadvantageous circumstances, various bishops and abbots so commended the truth by their faithful preaching and consistent lives, that they gained the confidence both of the people and their rulers, and prepared them for embracing Christianity. Thus it was that the Burgundians were converted soon after their settlement in Gaul, but at a later period by their intercourse with Arian tribes settled in these provinces, and especially with the West-Goths, they were led to adopt Arian views. Under King Gundobad, however, who was zealous in behalf of the orthodox doctrine, they were convinced of their error, renounced Arianism, and avowed their adherence to the Nicene creed.

The circumstance which in the early part of the sixth century led to the more rapid progress of Christianity among the barbarous tribes, was the marriage of Chlotilde, the daughter of Gundobad, to Chlodwig, or Clovis, the king of the Salian Franks. The rude warrior, though a heathen idolater, was so tolerant to his Christian queen, as to allow her to dedicate their firstborn son to God in baptism. But the child died, and Clovis from this circumstance drew the conclusion that the Deity of the Christians could neither be powerful nor benevolent. Yet so great was the influence which Chlotilde exercised over her husband, that their second son was also allowed to be baptized. Soon after, this child too was seized with sickness, and Clovis felt assured that its death was certain, but the pious Chlotilde prayed that her child might be spared for the honour of God among the heathen. The child recovered, and she pointed to this joyful result as a proof that the God of the Christians both hears and answers the prayers of his people. By her consistent walk and conversation, this excellent woman produced a most favourable impression on the mind of the idolatrous king. An event, however, which occurred in his own experience, led him to take the decided step of abandoning heathenism and embracing Christianity. He happened to be engaged in a war with the Alemanni, and in a battle which he fought at Zülpich, about twelve miles from Cologne, A. D. 496, he had the mortification of seeing his army in the utmost danger of being defeated. In these critical circumstances he prayed earnestly, as he had been wont, to the gods, but to no purpose; and remembering what Chlotilde had so often told him of the God of the Christians, he directed his supplications to him, promising, if his prayers were heard, that he would become a Christian. To his astonishment and delight the battle turned in his favour, and he straightway ascribed his success to the Christians' God. Perceiving the effect which this providential interposition produced upon the mind of her husband, she persuaded him to receive farther instruction in Divine truth, and the result was, that at the Christmas festival Clovis was publicly baptized. It is said that from this time commenced the practice of addressing the French monarchs by the titles of Most Christian Majesty, and Eldest Son of the Church. A great sensation was produced by the unexpected conversion of Clovis, and more than three thousand of his soldiers are said to have thereafter submitted to Christian baptism. The progress of the good cause was carried forward by Remigius, bishop of Rheims, who has been called the apostle of the Gauls.

But while multitudes of the Franks were thus led to make an outward profession of Christianity, Pagan idolatry still continued to maintain a firm hold of the minds of not a few of the people. Accordingly, A. D. 554, King Childebert passed a law against those who refused to part with their idols. And besides the tenacity with which the votaries of Paganism still adhered to the worship of false gods, Christianity was much retarded by the internal divisions and the numerous wars and revolutions which agitated the kingdom of the Franks. For a time idolatry seemed likely to recover the ground it had lost.

In the end of the sixth century, however, an Irish monk, by name Columban, appeared in France, accompanied by twelve young men, animated by an earnest desire to preach the gospel among the unconverted heathen. Having settled with his companions in the ruins of an old castle in the wilderness of the Vosges, he so won upon the people by his faith and self-denial, that the sons of people of all ranks were sent to him for education. The rule by which his monks were governed was of an extraordinarily severe description, so that Columban was no less feared than he was loved by all under his charge. His piety, his zeal, and the ascetic strictness of his monastic arrangements roused the clergy of the Frankish church to a bitter hostility against the man whose character and conduct were in such striking opposition to their own.

The controversy respecting Easter was about this time agitating the Frankish church, and for the discussion of this disputed point a synod was summoned A. D. 602. Columban took advantage of this assembly of the clergy to call their attention to subjects of far greater importance than that which was the immediate occasion of their meeting. The epistle which he addressed to the synod containing as it did a reproof of the worldly life led by the Frankish bishops, made the faithful monk only still more obnoxious to the clergy. And the same spirit of unshrinking faithfulness brought down upon him the determined hostility of the civil authorities of the country, more especially of the powerful and licentious Brunehild, the grandmother of Dietrich II., who, at that time, ruled the Burgundian kingdom in which Columban's three monasteries were situated. Having thus, by his rigid adherence to the principles of a devoted piety and stern morality, rendered himself an object of bitter hatred to both the ecclesiastical and the civil powers, he was at length, A. D. 610, banished from the Burgundian territory, and ordered to return to Ireland. This command, however, he failed to execute, but retired with his monks to a sequestered spot in the neighbourhood of the Lake of Constance, where he laboured for the conversion of the surrounding Swiss and Suabian tribes.

Notwithstanding the rudeness of the Frankish people, and the worldliness of the clergy, a spirit of living Christianity still existed in some, both of the ministers and members of the church. Accordingly some of the more zealous among the bishops extended their labours beyond their own country to the surrounding tribes. One of the most distinguished of the Frankish bishops engaged in missionary undertakings, was Eligius, who, A. D. 641, was consecrated bishop of the extensive diocese of Vermandois, Tournay, and Noyon, which bordered on a country occupied by heathens, while a large part of the population of the diocese itself were still Pagan idolaters. This devoted man was honoured to accomplish a good work both among his own people and the surrounding districts.

In the eighth century the popes, who had for a long period been seizing every opportunity of exalting their own authority, at length succeeded in uniting the regal crown to the episcopal mitre, and took rank among earthly sovereigns. To the powerful aid of the kings of France, the bishops of Rome were mainly indebted for the worldly aggrandisement and honour which they now attained. Pope Stephen, finding himself in the greatest danger from the threats of the king of the Lombards to push forward the conquests which he had obtained over the exarchate of Ravenna, even to the gates of Rome itself, made application in this extremity for assistance to Pepin, king of France. After a feeble resistance to the arms of Pepin, the Lombards submitted, and their king Aistulphus was compelled to deliver up the exarchate to the Pope and his successors in the chair of St. Peter. The limits of the temporal dominions which the Pope now obtained were much enlarged by successive donations from Charlemagne, the illustrious son and successor of Pepin, in return for which he not only obtained the title of Emperor of the Romans, under the name of Cæsar Augustus, but he earned for himself a place among the saints of the Roman calendar, having been canonized in the twelfth century by Pope Paschal III.

But while the church was thus rapidly rising in worldly greatness, it was as rapidly sinking as a spiritual institution. The great anxiety of the popes was to establish and maintain their temporal power

To effect this object the most unscrupulous means were resorted to, in proof of which, we need only refer to the forgery of the False Decretals and the Donation of Constantine, both of which surreptitious documents appeared about the close of the eighth century. The next three centuries formed one prolonged season of spiritual darkness and death, not in France only, but throughout all Europe. "Nothing," says Mosheim, "could be more melancholy than the darkness that reigned in the Western world during the tenth century, which, with respect to learning and philosophy at least, may be called the iron age of the Latins." The clergy shared in the ignorance and corruption of the age. In place of religion was substituted a blind superstition, and the Church of Christ seemed to have well nigh disappeared from the earth.

In the ninth and tenth centuries the Normans, a race of Goths from Scandinavia, invaded France, and at length took possession of the territory of Neustria, A. D. 912, and embraced Christianity. The ceded territory afterwards became the duchy of Normandy. In fact, France, which could boast of its large dominions under Charlemagne, had dwindled to a shadow under his feeble successors. At the end of the Carolingian period, France was no longer possessed of Normandy, Dauphiné, or Provence. But though deprived of a portion of their territories, the French sovereigns and people still retained much of that ardour and buoyancy of spirit which have ever characterized them. No sooner, therefore, was the proposal for a holy war made by the Pope in the council of Clermont in the end of the eleventh century, than multitudes from France of all ranks and ages avowed their readiness to engage in a crusade to Palestine. (See CRUSADE.) The first armies, indeed, which marched in these sacred expeditions against the Mohammedans of Asia, were raised chiefly among the Franks and Normans. Nay, we find Robert, duke of Normandy, actually mortgaging to his brother William, king of England, the entire duchy of Normandy to enable him to perform his expedition to Palestine. It is impossible to peruse, however cursorily, the history of the Crusades, without being compelled to acknowledge, that to France more than any other country of Europe, is the Church of Rome indebted for the valuable accessions both of wealth and power which it has obtained from these holy wars.

Yet it is an interesting fact, that the very country which was thus mainly instrumental in upholding and strengthening the power of the papacy, was one of the earliest to embrace the doctrines of the Reformation. No country was longer and better prepared for it, and yet nowhere did its adherents meet with more violent opposition. The history of Protestantism in France is written in blood. From first to last the church of Luther and Melancthon, of Calvin and Knox, has had to struggle for existence amid a complicated mass of adverse influences, which would have weakened, or it may be, destroyed any other cause than that which was emphatically the cause of God.

When the Reformation commenced in Germany and Switzerland, many who had imbibed its principles took up their residence in France, attracted by the favour which the king, Francis I., showed to men of learning, and thus the writings of the Reformers found an entrance into that country, and were extensively and eagerly read. The priests became alarmed for the interests of the mother church, and the University of Paris, so early as 1521, issued a formal declaration condemnatory of Luther and his writings. But the new opinions made rapid progress among all classes of the people. One of the earliest to avow attachment to the reformed cause, was Margaret, queen of Navarre, and sister to Francis I., and such was the influence which that excellent princess possessed at court, that the king, to gratify her wishes, was disposed to invite Melancthon to take up his residence in France. The first movement in favour of the Reformation was at Meaux. There, with the express approval of the bishop, Guillaume Briçonet, who, having been ambassador to the Holy See, had, like Luther, brought back from Rome a deep impression of the necessity of a reform in the church, two devout and zealous men, Jacques Lefevre and Guillaume Farel, preached the pure gospel, and were so eagerly welcomed by the people, that crowds flocked both from town and country to hear them. There was an evident thirst for the knowledge of the truth, and to gratify this laudable anxiety for spiritual instruction, the four Gospels were published in French, and widely circulated gratuitously among the poor. Every one began to read them. Light dawned upon their minds, and in a short time a remarkable change was apparent, not only in the opinions, but in the manners, of the inhabitants of Meaux. The movement spread on every side. Several churches were formed, and everything seemed to betoken the greatest prosperity to the cause of the Reformation in France.

The clergy, of course, were no uninterested spectators of this great, and to them alarming movement. They felt that their credit and influence, as well as their revenues, were daily diminishing, and that it was absolutely necessary for them to take some decided step to arrest the advancing progress of the heresy. They complained, therefore, in the most earnest manner to the theological faculty of the Sorbonne, who lost no time in calling upon the parliament of Paris to interfere with a strong hand. The parliament, accordingly, in 1533, ordered a rigorous investigation of the whole matter. The consequence was, that the sword of persecution was unsheathed, and one of the earliest victims, against whom it was directed, was Briçonet, the bishop of the town, who had all along avowed his adherence to the Reformation. But in the hour of danger, the firmness of the prelate gave way; he recanted, and submitting to a fine of two hundred livres, was allowed to return to his diocese, where, till his death, which happened two years after, he continued to discharge his episcopal duties without giving cause to the church again to charge him with favouring the reformed doctrines. The new converts of Meaux were more resolute than the bishop, and many of them died martyrs to the faith, while others sought refuge in the territories of Margaret of Navarre. The Waldensians, more especially, who inhabited the mountains of Provence, were the victims of a most cruel persecution. Multitudes of them were butchered, some burned alive, and others sent to the galleys. Nor did the blood of the Lutherans, as they were called, cease to flow as long as Francis lived. Yet so far were they from being exterminated, that their number was continually on the increase. They were of all ranks, and not a few even of the monks became proselytes to the new religion.

Henry II. ascended the throne of France in 1547 on the death of Francis, and in so far as the Reformed were concerned, he maintained the same persecuting policy as that which had characterized the reign of his father. The civil courts were called upon to exterminate all heretics. The estates of those who fled for the sake of religion were ordered to be confiscated. Protestant books were forbidden to be imported; and to possess such works was declared a penal crime. There was one work which above all others shed a bright halo of glory around the French Reformation. This was Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, one of the ablest and most powerful defences of Scriptural, evangelical truth which has ever issued from the press. "Spreading abroad in the schools," says De Felice, "in the castles of the gentry, the houses of the burghers, even the workshops of the people, the Institutes became the most powerful of preachers. Round this book the Reformers arrayed themselves as round a standard. They found in it everything—doctrine, discipline, ecclesiastical organization; and the apologist of the martyrs became the legislator of their children." This remarkable book was published by Calvin in 1535, and dedicated to Francis I. It did much to call forth the sympathies of thoughtful men in favour of the reformed opinions as grounded no less on Scripture than on sound reason; as the views of men, not of weak and wavering intellect, but of gigantic power and profound reflection. About the same time the Reformation in France received an additional impulse by the translation of the Scriptures into the French language by Olivitan, the uncle of Calvin. This was hailed as a great boon by the friends of truth. Soon after the Psalms of David were turned into verse by one of the popular poets of the day, and set to music. Thus was the national taste for the first time enlisted on the side of truth and righteousness, instead of being perverted as it had hitherto been to superstitious and sinful purposes. "This holy ordinance," says Quick in his Synodicon, "charmed the ears, hearts, and affections of court and city, town and country. They were sung in the Louvre as well as by the Pres des Clerks, by the ladies, princes, yea, and by Henry II. himself. This one ordinance alone contributed mightily to the downfall of popery, and the propagation of the gospel. It took so much with the genius of the nation, that all ranks and degrees of men practised it in the temples and in their families. No gentleman professing the Reformed religion would sit down at his table without praising God by singing. Yea, it was an especial part of their morning and evening worship in their several houses to sing God's praises."

All these means, along with the faithful preaching of the gospel, were crowned with the Divine blessing; and the Lutheran cause made such rapid progress that persecution was aroused against it in the most virulent form. But all attempts to exterminate the adherents of the Reformation in France were utterly fruitless. The blood of the martyrs proved in an eminent degree the seed of the church. Two princes of the blood, the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, besides a great number of the nobility and gentry, were the friends and supporters of the Protestants. But up to this period the new doctrines were only professed by isolated individuals, a large body doubtless in the aggregate, but acting separate and apart from each other, without any distinct organization or uniting principles. A number of proselytes had been accustomed for some time to meet together for worship in the house of a private individual in an obscure quarter of the Faubourg St. Germain. It was in 1555 that the first avowed French Church on Reformed principles was established at Paris. For thirty years no churches had existed, but only gatherings of people without fixed pastors, or regular administration of the sacraments. No sooner, however, was a congregation formed at Paris with a minister, elders, and deacons, than the example was followed at Poitiers, Angers, Bourges, and other places. These churches, however, were as yet isolated and independent of each other. It was resolved that a general synod should be convoked as soon as possible at Paris, as being the most convenient town for holding a secret assembly, composed of a large number of ministers and elders. Many difficulties lay in the way of such a meeting, which if convened would run the risk of attracting the notice and arousing the vengeance of the persecuting government. The result was, that only thirteen churches sent deputies to the first Synod of the French Protestant Church, which assembled privately on the 25th of May 1559. This was an eventful day for France, for on this day the foundations of the French Reformation were laid.

At this first national Synod a complete ecclesiastical organization was established. What has cost other churches many a protracted meeting, many a stormy debate, was effected silently, and as it were at a sitting. The deliberations of this assembly were characterized by a simplicity and moral grandeur, a calmness, a dignity, a firm trust in God, which command respect. In the face of almost certain death, these earnest Christian men adopted a confession of faith, catechism, and directory for worship, composed by Calvin, and likewise formed a system of church government. The doctrines of their confession were strictly Calvinistic, their forms of worship of the most simple and most ostentatious character, and their system of church government wholly Presbyterian.

The Confession of Faith consisted of forty articles, embracing all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity; and the Form of Church Government also contained forty articles, which have since been extended by successive synods, and the Form now contains no fewer than two hundred and twenty articles. The Constitution of the Protestant Church of France, as developed in the original draft, is thus sketched by De Felice: "The consistory was elected at first by the common voice of the people; it was completed afterwards by the suffrages of its own members; but the new selections were always to be submitted for the approval of the flock, and if there were any opposition, the debate was to be settled either at the colloquy or at the provincial synod. To be eligible for the consistory imposed no condition of fortune, or of any other kind.

"The election of the pastors was notified to the people in the same way, after having been made by the provincial synod on the colloquy. The newly elected minister preached during three consecutive Sundays. The silence of the people was held to signify their consent. If there were any reclamations, these were carried before the bodies charged with the choice of pastors. There was no further appeal against the voice of the majority.

"A certain number of churches formed the conscription of a colloquy. The colloquies assembled twice a-year at least. Each church was represented by a pastor and an elder. The office of these companies was to arrange any difficulties that might arise, and generally to provide for whatever was conformable to the welfare of their flocks.

"Beyond the colloquies were the provincial synods, also composed of a pastor and an elder of each church. They assembled once in each year at least. They decided upon whatever had not been settled in the colloquies, and upon all the important matters of their province. The number of these synods has varied. Sixteen has been the general number, since the union of Béarn to France.

"Lastly, at the summit of the hierarchy was placed the national synod. It was, whenever it was possible, to be convoked year by year; which, however, scarcely ever took place, owing to the misfortunes of the times.

"Composed of two pastors, and of two elders of each particular synod, the national synod was the supreme court for all great ecclesiastical matters, and every one was bound to render it obedience. The deliberations commenced by reading the confession of faith and of discipline. The members of the assembly must adhere to the first, but might propose amendments of the other. The presidency belonged of right to a pastor. The duration of the sessions was indeterminate. Before the closing of each session, the province in which the following synod would be holden, was designated."

This church organization, as well as the Confession of Faith, was the work of Calvin, and bears throughout the genuine stamp of the Geneva model. It was Presbyterian in its essential features; and the hitherto disjoined churches were now united in one compact ecclesiastical system, which prepared them for realizing the truth of the saying, that union is strength. And the time chosen for the adoption of such a form of government was peculiarly seasonable. If before the Protestant church was constituted the Reformed had been exposed to bitter persecution—matters now became much worse. In twelve years from the time when the first Synod was held, the martyrologist speaks of not less than forty towns or cities where persecution prevailed. Yet so rich was the blessing which rested upon this suffering section of Christ's church, that at the end of this short period of hot persecution, it was found, as we learn from Dr. Lorimer in his Historical Sketch of the Protestant Church of France, that "so rapid had been the diffusion of the gospel, under the outpouring of the Spirit, that Beza could count 2,150 churches in connection with the Protestant Church of France; and the churches were not small or insignificant in point of strength. In some there were 10,000 members. The church of Orleans had 7,000 communicants, and the ministers in such churches were proportionally numerous: two ministers to a church was common, and that of Orleans had five. At this period there were 305 pastors in the one province of Normandy, and in Provence there were 60. All this betokens wonderful growth."

The same year in which the Protestant church was organized, the death of Henry II. and the succession of Francis II., a youth of sixteen, feeble both in body and mind, introduced a state of matters far from favourable to the cause of the Reformation. Catherine de Medicis, the king's mother, the duke of Guise, and his brother, the duke of Lorraine, governed France during the minority, and being bitterly opposed to the Lutherans or Sacramentarians, as the Protestants were sometimes called, they put forth the utmost endeavours to crush them. They sent forth new edicts for exterminating the heretics. A vast system of terror now prevailed throughout France; nothing was heard of but delations, confiscations, pillages, sentences of death, and bloody executions. Yet amid the violence and carnage of the period, the Reformed took a decided step in advance. They no longer held their secret meetings which had exposed them to the calumnies of their enemies; they now worshipped in public.

After a reign of only seventeen months, Francis II. died in 1560, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles IX., not yet eleven years old. Catherine de Medicis, his mother, was regent, and anxious to establish her power, she sought the friendship of the king of Navarre, and of the Protestants, who were now a large and influential body in the country. Nay, she even feigned herself to be a favourer of Reformed doctrines. All things at court assumed a changed aspect. The Protestants seemed at length to have obtained the ascendancy. A decree was issued forbidding all disputes on matters of religion; the imprisoned Protestants were released, and toleration was given to all who would outwardly conform to the established religion, unless they chose to quit the country. This decree was only partially executed throughout the provinces. The idea was started of a possible compromise between Popery and Protestantism, and, if possible, to effect this a conference was held at Poissy, between divines of both churches, leading, however, as might have been anticipated, to no favourable result. In January 1562, a national convention was held at St. Germain, when it was agreed that the Protestants should be allowed to hold private meetings for worship till a general council should decide all religious disputes. A civil war now broke out. Much blood was shed, and many towns were taken and ravaged.

Peace was at length concluded in 1563, in consequence of which, Protestant worship was, for a time at least, tolerated in particular places throughout France. The treaty, however, was but imperfectly kept, and the Protestants, finding that the court was in reality seeking their ruin, commenced the war anew in 1567, under Coligny and the prince of Condé. Hostilities were carried on for several months, and, early in 1568, peace was again concluded on nearly the same terms as before. The cessation of hostilities was only for a very short time, when the war broke out anew with greater violence than ever. The queen of Navarre now took the field on the side of the Protestants, and, after a considerable loss on both sides, peace was once more concluded in 1570 on favourable terms. The court now resorted to various expedients, with the view of lulling the Protestants into a false security, and the Admiral Coligny, the young king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, were invited to court. All this apparent friendship was false and deceitful, preparatory only to one of the most fearful tragedies which has ever been recorded in the pages of history. We refer to the massacre on St. Bartholomew's eve, Aug. 22, 1572.

The first victim on that melancholy occasion was Admiral Coligny, and with him five hundred noblemen and about 6,000 other Protestants were butchered in Paris alone. Orders were despatched to all parts of the empire to massacre the Huguenots, as the Protestants were generally named. Thirty thousand, according to De Thou, himself a Romish historian, and seventy thousand according to Sully, a Protestant, perished by the hands of assassins under the authority of Charles IX. When the intelligence of this wholesale butchery reached Rome, the Pope ordered a jubilee throughout Christendom, and he himself went in procession with his cardinals to offer thanksgivings to Almighty God for the murder of so many thousand heretics.

This fearful catastrophe, though it inflicted a heavy blow upon Protestantism in France, left a considerable remnant who, though weakened and discouraged, were not utterly overthrown. For six years after the massacre the annual meeting of the synod of the Protestant church was discontinued. By a singular interposition of Divine Providence, the ministers had many of them been spared amid the general havoc, and this was the means of keeping the people together, as well as of sustaining them under the heavy discouragement to which their spirits were liable. And still more to refresh their drooping hearts, a new and greatly improved edition of the Protestant version of the Scriptures issued at this time from Geneva. Thus, in the day of deep adversity and gloom, when the most arbitrary restrictions were put upon their meetings for Divine worship, the work of God was still going forward among this oppressed and persecuted people. In the course of twenty-six years only six National Synods were held, in all of which, however, the church showed herself decided in the maintenance of the truth of God against heresy of every kind, but more especially against the corruptions of the Church of Rome. During the whole of this period the history of the French Protestants is a series of alternations of war and peace, persecution and rest, and at the end of it the congregations were reduced to one-half of their former number.

The year 1598 forms a memorable era in the history of French Protestantism, as being the year in which was published the edict of Nantes, the first effectual measure in favour of the friends of the Reformation which had ever been passed by the government of France. The author of this important edict was Henry IV., who, though educated in the Protestant faith, had for State purposes shortly before this time joined the Church of Rome. It was scarcely to have been expected that an act of toleration should have come from such a quarter. But it was honourable to Henry, that in the face of the most decided opposition from the Romish clergy, he threw over his Protestant subjects the ample shield of his royal protection, and gave them an extent of liberty which they had never before experienced. They were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and declared eligible to all public offices. They received equal rights and privileges in all universities and public schools. That equal justice might be measured out to them with their Popish fellow-subjects, courts were established in the principal cities, which were composed of judges half Protestant and half Catholic. They were also permitted to establish public worship in particular places, only within certain limits, none within several miles of Paris; but to counterbalance these restrictions, which were felt to be hardships, they obtained an annual grant of about 40,000 crowns for the support of their ministers.

The edict of Nantes, though encumbered with some annoying regulations, was hailed by the poor persecuted Protestants as a mighty boon. They had scarcely known a breathing-time from suffering and trial during the forty years which had elapsed since the first National Synod had been held. During that period they had passed through no fewer than nine civil wars, four pitched battles, and three hundred engagements with their enemies. Several cities had been besieged, and from first to last nearly 1,000,000 Protestants had lost their lives in the cause of God and their religion. Well might the church therefore rejoice and give thanks to the Almighty that the sword of persecution had at length returned to its scabbard, and the basis of their religious liberties was laid. Under the protection of this edict to which Henry adhered during the remainder of his life, the ministers who had been scattered by persecution returned to their flocks, and the churches, like those of the early Christians, "had rest and were multiplied." They were in close fellowship with the Church of Geneva and the Flemish Protestants. Their doctrine was sound, their discipline strict, and among their ministers and professors were men eminent alike for their piety, their talents, and their learning.

This period of peace and prosperity came to a close at the death of Henry, who was assassinated in 1610. Louis XIII., who succeeded to the throne, was a bigoted Roman Catholic, and the edict of Nantes, accordingly, which had been so beneficial to the Protestants, was now a dead letter. The new monarch began his reign by committing himself and his kingdom to the care and patronage of the Virgin Mary. In the course of a few years he attacked the Protestants in various places, besieging their strongholds, and putting many of them to death, while his prime minister, Richelieu, prevailed upon many of the Protestant leaders, by means of bribes, to desert the Protestant cause. Amid all these discouragements, however, the Reformed Church as a body suffered no material diminution, but on the contrary, seemed to gain in numbers during the thirty-three years of this reign. At length in 1643 the king died, and was succeeded by his son Louis XIV., who, by a continued series of tyrannical acts, set at naught the whole provisions of the edict, until at last it was wholly repealed. For fifteen years no meeting of the National Synod of the Protestant Church had been permitted to assemble, and in 1660 the last meeting of that venerable body was held. The Presbyterian constitution of the church was now broken up, and persecution once more raged with tremendous fury. Romish missionaries were sent forth over the country to stir up the populace against the Protestants, and books full of calumnies and lies were published with the same design, while the authors of these vile slanders were well remunerated by the government for their services. The Protestants complained to the king of the injustice with which they were treated, but their complaints were unheeded.

And now the preparations which Louis had been making for twenty years were complete, and only the last, the crowning act, remained to be consummated—the revocation of the edict of Nantes. "On Thursday," says Dr. Lorimer, "the 8th of October 1685, the fatal revocation was signed, and the doom of the Protestant Church sealed. The revocation consists of a preface and twelve articles; the preface, which is meant as an apology for the measure, is, as might have been expected, full of notorious falsehoods. 'By the first article, the king suppresses and repeals the protective edicts in all their extent; and ordains that all the temples which are yet found standing in his kingdom shall be immediately demolished. By the second, he forbids all sorts of religious assemblies of what kind soever. The third prohibits the exercises of religion to all lords and gentlemen of quality, under corporal penalties, and confiscation of their estates. The fourth banishes from the kingdom all the ministers, and enjoins them to depart thence, within fifteen days after the publication of this edict, under the penalty of being sent to the galleys. In the fifth and sixth, he promises recompenses and advantages to the ministers and their widows who should change their religion; and ordains, 'That those who shall be born henceforward shall be baptized, and brought up in the Catholic religion;' enjoining parents to send them to the churches, under the penalty of being fined five hundred livres. The ninth gives four months' time to such persons as have departed already out of the kingdom to return, otherwise their goods and estates to be confiscated. The tenth, with repeated prohibitions, forbids all his subjects of the said religion to depart out of his realm, them, their wives and children, or to convey away their effects, under pain of the galleys for the men, and of confiscation of body and goods for the women. The eleventh confirms the declarations heretofore made against those that relapse. The twelfth declares, that as to the rest of his subjects of the said religion, they may, till God enlightens them, remain in the cities of his kingdom, countries, and lands of his obedience, there continue their commerce, and enjoy their estates, without trouble or molestation upon pretence of the said religion, on condition that they have no assemblies under pretext of praying, or exercising any religious worship whatever.'"

"Afterwards," says Quick, "they fell upon the persons of the Protestants, and there was no wicked ness, though ever so horrid, which they did not put in practice, that they might force them to change their religion. Amidst a thousand hideous cries and blasphemies, they hung up men and women by the hair or feet upon the roofs of the chambers, or hooks of chimneys, and smoked them with wisps of wet hay till they were no longer able to bear it; and when they had taken them down, if they would not sign an abjuration of their pretended heresies, they then trussed them up again immediately. Some they threw into great fires, kindled on purpose, and would not take them out till they were half roasted. They tied ropes under their arms, and plunged them to and again into deep wells, from whence they would not draw them till they had promised to change their religion. They bound them as criminals are when they are put to the rack, and in that posture, putting a funnel into their mouths, they poured wine down their throats till its fumes had deprived them of their reason, and they had in that condition made them consent to become Catholics. Some they stripped stark naked, and after they had offered them a thousand indignities, they stuck them with pins from head to foot; they cut them with penknives, tore them by the noses with red hot pincers, and dragged them about the rooms till they promised to become Roman Catholics, or that the doleful cries of these poor tormented creatures, calling upon God for mercy, constrained them to let them go. They beat them with staves, and dragged them all bruised to the Popish churches, where their enforced presence is reputed for an abjuration. They kept them waking seven or eight days together, relieving one another by turns, that they might not get a wink of sleep or rest. In case they began to nod, they threw buckets of water in their faces, or holding kettles over their heads, they beat on them with such a continual noise, that those poor wretches lost their senses. If they found any sick, who kept their beds, men or women, be it of fevers or other diseases, they were so cruel as to beat up an alarm with twelve drums about their beds for a whole week together, without intermission, till they had promised to change. In some places they tied fathers and husbands to the bed-posts, and ravished their wives and daughters before their eyes. And in another place rapes were publicly and generally permitted for many hours together. From others they pluck off the nails of their hands and toes, which must needs cause an intolerable pain. They burnt the feet of others. They blew up men and women with bellows till they were ready to burst in pieces. If these horrid usages could not prevail upon them to violate their consciences and abandon their religion, they did then imprison them in close and noisome dungeons, in which they exercised all kind of inhumanities upon them. They demolish their houses, desolate their hereditary lands, cut down their woods, seize upon their wives and children, and mew them up in monasteries. When the soldiers had devoured all the goods of a house, then the farmers and tenants of these poor persecuted wretches must supply them with new fuels for their lusts, and bring in more subsistence to them; and that they might be reimbursed, they did, by authority of justice, sell unto them the fee-simple estate of their landlords, and put them into possession of it. If any, to secure their consciences, and to escape the tyranny of these enraged cannibals, endeavoured to flee away, they were pursued and hunted in the fields and woods, and shot at as so many wild beasts. The provosts and their archers course it up and down the highways after these poor fugitives; and magistrates in all places bear strict orders to stop and detain them without exception; and being taken, they are brought back, like prisoners of war, unto those places from whence they fled."

The view which was taken by the Romish church of these acts of treachery, cruelty, and oppression towards the unoffending Protestants of France, was quite apparent from the conduct of Innocent XI., the then reigning Pope, who wrote a special letter to Louis on the occasion, which he concludes in these remarkable words: "The Catholic Church shall most assuredly record in her sacred annals a work of such devotion towards her, and celebrate your name with never-dying praises, but, above all, you may most assuredly promise to yourself an ample retribution from the Divine goodness for this most excellent undertaking, and may rest assured that we shall never cease to pour forth our most earnest prayers to that Divine goodness for this intent and purpose." And still further in commemoration of this event, Louis had three medals struck with different devices, all of them intending emblematically to declare that the French Protestant church was destroyed.

The consequence of the revocation of that edict, which the Protestants had long regarded as the charter of their liberties, was, that multitudes of them emigrated to other countries. Great numbers of the Protestant population of France now sought a home on other shores, although in taking this step they subjected themselves to almost incredible hardships. The most vigorous steps were taken by the government to stem if possible the torrent of emigration. To avail ourselves of the graphic narrative of De Felice: "Guards were placed at the entrance of the towns, at river-ferries, in the ports, on the bridges, the highways, at every avenue leading to the frontiers, and thousands of peasants joined the troops posted from distance to distance, that they might earn the reward promised to those who stopped the fugitives. Everything failed. The emigrants purchased passports, which were sold to them by the very secretaries of the governors, or by the clerks of the ministers of state. They bought over the sentinels with money, giving as much as six thousand and even eight thousand livres as the price of escape. Some, more daring, fought their way across the frontiers, sword in hand.

"The majority marched at night, by remote and solitary paths, concealing themselves in caverns during the day. They had itineraries prepared expressly for this kind of travelling. They went down precipices, or climbed mountain-heights, and assumed all sorts of disguises. Shepherds, pilgrims, soldiers, huntsmen, valets, merchants, mendicants: they were always fugitives. Many, to avoid suspicion, pretended to sell chaplets and rosaries.

"The eyewitness Bénéoit has given us a minute account:—'Women of quality, even sixty and seventy years of age, who had, so to speak, never placed a foot upon the ground except to cross their apartments, or to stroll in an avenue, travelled a hundred leagues to some village, which had been indicated by a guide. Girls of fifteen, of every rank, exposed themselves to the same hazard. They drew wheelbarrows, they bore manure, panniers, and other burdens. They disfigured their faces with dyes, to embrown their complexion, with ointments or juices that blistered their skin, and gave them a wrinkled aspect. Women and girls were seen to counterfeit sickness, dumbness, and even insanity. Some went disguised as men; and some, too delicate and small to pass as grown men, donned the dress of lackeys, and followed on foot, through the mud, a guide on horseback, who assumed the character of a man of importance. Many of these females reached Rotterdam in their borrowed garments, and hastening to the foot of the pulpit, before they had time to assume a more decent garb, published their repentance of their compulsory signature.'

"The sea facilitated the evasion of a host of the Reformed. They hid themselves in bales of merchandise, in casks, under heaps of charcoal. They huddled together in holes in the ship's hold, and there were children who passed whole weeks in these insupportable hiding-places without uttering a cry that might betray them. Sometimes the peril of an open boat was hazarded without a mouthful of provisions, the preparation of which might have prevented the flight of the fugitives, who thus put to sea with only a little water or snow, with which mothers moistened the lips of their babes.

"Thousands of emigrants perished of fatigue, cold, hunger, or shipwreck, and by the bullets of the soldiery. Thousands of others were captured, chained to murderers, dragged across the kingdom to inspire their brethren with greater fear, and were condemned to labour at the oar on board convict vessels. The galleys of Marseilles were filled with these unfortunates, among whom were ancient magistrates, officers, people of gentle blood, and old men. The women were crowded into the convents and the tower of Constance, at Aigues-Mortes. But neither threats, nor dangers, nor executions, could prevail against the energy and heroic perseverance of an oppressed conscience.

"The court became alarmed at the depopulation of the country and the ruin of industry. It thought that it was less a matter of faith that excited the French to flee from France, than the attraction of danger, and one day it therefore threw open all the outlets from the country. The next day, finding that the emigration had only multiplied, it closed them."

The spectacle of the noblest and best of France's sons and daughters fleeing from her shores in the cause of God and his truth, awakened the eager sympathy of almost all the other nations of Europe. Everywhere the Protestant refugees were hospitably welcomed both by governments and private individuals. Their wants were amply supplied; opportunities were afforded them of earning an honest subsistence, and churches were in many places generously erected for them that they might worship God according to their own conscientious convictions. England, Switzerland, Holland, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, vied with each other in showing kindness and respect to these persecuted Huguenots, and colonies of them were founded even in North America, and at the Cape of Good Hope.

Nor did the fearful depopulation of the country which extended at the lowest calculation to from 300,000 to 400,000 souls, in the least diminish the ardour of Louis and his ministers in persecuting the heretics. Not more than a million Protestants in all probability were left behind, but these were subjected to the most cruel treatment. They were required to send their children to Roman Catholic schools, and to have them taught the Roman Catholic catechism. Nay, matters were pushed even to a still greater length. The children from five to six years of those who still adhered to the Protestant faith, were ordered to be taken forcibly from the parents and consigned to the care of Roman Catholic relatives, or failing these, to convents or hospitals. Houses were appointed to be searched, suspected writings seized, and Bibles committed to the flames.

These violent measures produced an effect the very reverse of that which was intended. The Protestants daily multiplied throughout the whole country, and holding their religious meetings in secret, in the depth of the forest, on the mountain top, or in the sequestered valley, they vowed to maintain their faith in the face of danger or even death. Such determination was more especially manifested by the Protestants in the provinces of Lower Languedoc, Vivarais, and Cevennes. In other parts of France worship in public was impossible, and for a long time religious services were limited to the privacy of the domestic circle.

Learning that in some parts of France the persecuted brethren were still holding meetings for Divine worship, some of the pastors who had emigrated again returned to their country, with the view of comforting and encouraging their scattered flocks; but no sooner were the king and the government informed that these good men had once more set foot on the shores of France, than a proclamation was issued condemning them to death, and threatening the in fiction of perpetual confinement in the galleys against those who afforded them a shelter, or tendered them the slightest assistance, while a large reward was promised to their captors, and the punishment of death was pronounced against all who should be found attending the religious meetings. Thus authorized by law, the soldiers with bloodthirsty cruelty sought everywhere to discover the Protestants, and wherever in the solitude of the mountains could be heard the sound of prayer or praise, the pious little bands were ruthlessly butchered while in the very act of worshipping their God. "The prisons," we are told, "were overflowed; the galleys choked; and as there were no means of lodging so many convicts, a great number were transported to America, where they nearly all miserably perished."

These scenes of cruelty and blood awakened feelings of the deepest compassion in the minds of many of the Romanists themselves. The Jansenists, in particular, remonstrated strongly with the government, calling upon them to adopt a milder line of policy, but the Jesuits and the great body of the clergy persisted in urging measures of extreme severity. M. de Noailles, who had been promoted to the archbishopric of Paris, and who was an avowed Jansenist, used his influence with the king in favour of lenient measures. This was followed up by a faithful memorial breathing the same tone, from Fénelon, archbishop of Cambray. The unbending spirit of Louis, however, refused to yield, and the fervent pleadings of many, imploring him to spare the Protestants, were only answered by the publication of the edict of the 13th April 1698, which solemnly confirmed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

Thus the eighteenth century opened upon the Protestants of France in the midst of a reign of terror. They persisted in holding their religious meetings, but their ferocious persecutors discovering their private retreats, often suddenly surrounded them and put multitudes to the sword. No wonder that amid the excitement of such scenes, hunted like partridges on the mountains, and without an earthly friend on whom they could rely, these unhappy men should have imagined themselves the objects of the special favour of God. No wonder that they looked upon their leaders as authorized prophets or inspired men. The blame of such enthusiastic notions rests only with those who were guilty of deeds of oppression, such as were well fitted to drive even wise men mad. (See CAMISARDS.) Hence the south of France was the scene of a bloody war, from 1702 to 1704. The populace almost to a man was in arms against the government. Holland and England espoused the cause of the insurgents, and offered to send them supplies both of men and arms. The aspect of affairs was now sufficiently alarming, Louis and his court began to tremble, and Marshal de Villars was despatched to Languedoc with orders to adopt a conciliatory course. The wary soldier succeeded by promises of toleration in persuading the Camisards to lay down their arms, and peace was once more restored.

Louis XIV. had now reached advanced years, and was living almost alone, having been bereft of his children and grandchildren. In the exhausted state of the country, with ruined commerce, and an empty treasury, the aged monarch had no heart now for those measures of severity and violence which had so long marked his reign. The word Protestant he neither liked to hear nor ventured to utter. He wished to bury in oblivion events, the recollection of which only burdened his conscience. Hence it was that for a number of years following the war of the Camisards, a kind of modified toleration prevailed throughout France, which would have continued probably undisturbed had not the king's Jesuit confessor, Le tellier, extorted from him the declaration of the 8th March 1715. This melancholy enactment bore "that those who shall have declared that they will persist and die in the pretended Reformed religion, whether they have abjured or not, shall be reputed as having relapsed." A law so monstrous the parliament of Paris delayed to register for a month. "The king," said the procurator-general, "has indeed abolished the exercise of the pretended Reformed religion by his edicts, but he has not precisely ordained that the religionists should abjure, and embrace the Catholic religion. It is difficult to understand how a man who does not appear to have been ever converted, should nevertheless have fallen back into heresy, and that he should be condemned as if the fact were proved."

A few months after having issued this extraordinary enactment, Louis XIV. died, declaring to some of the ghostly fathers who waited upon him at his last moments, that in his public acts he had been guided by their advice, and, therefore, that he threw upon them the responsibility of those acts. Philippe d'Orleans, who was appointed regent on the death of the king, was a tolerant, though not a religious man; accordingly he declined to act with severity against the Protestants, and even entertained the idea of repealing the Edict of Revocation, though fear of the Romish clergy prevented him from carrying his plan into execution.

In consequence of the trying situation in which the Protestant church of France had long been placed, its internal character could scarcely fail to have been seriously injured. The want of regular pastors, the number of uneducated men full of zeal with little discretion, who had taken upon themselves the office of instructors, the prevalent notion both among preachers and people of supernatural inspiration and ecstasy—each and all of these gave rise to irregularities in the church, which prevented sober-minded and intelligent friends of Protestantism from taking part in its religious exercises. It was most desirable, therefore, that immediate steps should be taken to put an end to these excesses. Providence raised up one, who by his character and peculiar gifts was well qualified to discharge this urgent duty. The name of this remarkable man, who earned to himself the honourable title of "Restorer of the Protestantism of France," was Antoine Court. He commenced his great work by the establishment of prayer meetings wherever he could succeed in forming them. To check the disorders caused by pretences to inspiration, he called together the preachers of Cevennes, joining a few intelligent laymen with them, thus forming synods or conferences which met from year to year. The very first of these in 1715, a few days before the king's death, made some most important changes, such as reviving the office of elders; forbidding women to speak in the religious assemblies; adopting the Bible as the sole rule of faith, and rejecting all individual revelations as unscriptural and dangerous. Every successive synod made some contribution to the re-organization of the Protestant church.

But while the Reformed communion was recovering gradually from its depressed condition, a heavy blow was inflicted upon it by the appearance of the last great law against the Reformed, which was published on the 14th of May 1724, in the form of a royal declaration. The provisions of this measure of Louis XV., then fourteen years of age, were eighteen articles, being a recapitulation of the most severe measures which had been passed during the reign of Louis XIV. A summary of this royal proclamation we give in the words of De Felice: "He declared as follows—the punishment of perpetual imprisonment at the galleys for men, and seclusion during life for women, with confiscation of their property, if they attended any other worship than that of the (Roman) Catholic religion; punishment of death against all the preachers; of the galleys or imprisonment against those who sheltered or assisted them in any way whatever, and against those who omitted to denounce them; an order to parents to have their children baptized within twenty-four hours by the curate of the parish, to send them to the (Roman) Catholic schools and catechisms until the age of fourteen, and to the Sunday and feast-day teachings until the age of twenty; an order to midwives to report all births to the priests, and to physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries to give notice of every serious illness of the new converts, and authority for the priests to have interviews with the sick by themselves. If any one refused the sacrament or directed a member of his family to refuse it, he incurred the penalty of having relapsed. There was to be no legitimate marriages, except such as were celebrated according to the canons of the church. Parents were not allowed to send their children out of the kingdom to be educated, nor to marry them there; but on the other hand, the minors of those parents who were abroad, might marry without the consent of their relations. The certificates of Catholicity were declared obligatory for all offices, all academic degrees, all admissions to trading corporations. Finally, the mulcts and confiscated property were to be appropriated for the relief of the re-united subjects who might be in want."

Both the magistrates and the Romish clergy were agreed in using severity towards the Protestants, but the motives by which these two parties were respectively actuated were widely different. The one party was desirous of promoting civil unity; the other was equally anxious for spiritual unity. The one would be quite satisfied with a merely outward conformity to the Romish faith; the other would be contented with no other conformity than that which sprung from the heart. The Protestants were not slow to perceive this difference of sentiment as to the grounds of persecution between the civil and ecclesiastical powers. The stringency with which the priests sought to drive Protestants into the Church of Rome, only drove them farther from it. Multitudes rallied round Antoine Court, and the church of the wilderness became a numerous body. The synods rapidly increased, and the restorer of French Protestantism, seeing the necessity of a band of faithful pastors being reared, opened a theological school at Lausanne, over which he presided during the last thirty years of his life. It was this college which supplied pastors to the French Protestants until the time of Napoleon.

From 1730 to 1744 the Reformed churches enjoyed a season of comparative calm, of which they eagerly availed themselves to reorganize their churches. The religious movement extended, and the pastors being few in number, found it necessary to act the part of missionaries. With the view of encouraging one another in the laborious work in which they were engaged, they convened a national synod, which met on the 18th August 1744, in a sequestered spot in Lower Languedoc. The proceedings commenced with an open declaration of inviolable fidelity to the king, after which they adopted several measures fitted to advance the cause of Protestantism in France. The congregations were enjoined to hold their meetings as much as possible in the open air, and the pastors were forbidden to discuss controverted points in the pulpit. Antoine Court came from Lausanne to be present at this synod, and he had the satisfaction on the occasion of preaching the gospel to an audience of ten thousand persons.

No sooner did the news reach Paris that a national synod had been held by the Protestants, and that they were evidently regaining their former strength and courage, than Louis XV. was prevailed upon to sign two ordinances still more cruel than any which had preceded them. Besides declaring a sentence of death against all the Protestant pastors, and of perpetual imprisonment at the galleys against all who harboured them, the very place in which a pastor might happen to be arrested was pronounced liable to a fine of three thousand livres. To execute such barbarous enactments as these ordinances contained was of course impossible; but by issuing such edicts, the king and the court were plainly intimating their desire that the persecution of former days should be renewed. Children were accordingly forcibly abducted from their parents, and a thousand acts of merciless oppression were perpetrated upon the poor Huguenots. A fresh emigration was the result, and availing themselves of their vicinity to the sea, no fewer than six hundred families belonging to Normandy alone fled from the kingdom. Numbers were flogged, others were fined in enormous sums, some were imprisoned for life, and not a few sentenced to suffer death. In vain did the unhappy Huguenots appeal to Louis XV. in these calm, dignified, respectful words: "We cannot live without following our religion, and we are compelled, however unwillingly, to supplicate your majesty, with the most profound humility and respect, that you may please to allow us to leave the realm with our wives, our children, and our effects, to retire into foreign countries, where we may freely worship God in the form we believe to be indispensable, and on which depends our eternal happiness or misery." The king and his council refused to grant even this reasonable request, and only treated the suppliants with aggravated cruelty. Particularly after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, the meetings were again attacked; the intendant was ordered to rebaptize the children of the Reformed, and to proceed to a re-benediction of their marriages. "Some," says Antoine Court, as quoted by De Felice, "ten, twelve, and fourteen years old, absolutely refused to be led to the church, and it was necessary to drag them there by main force; some uttered piercing shrieks that went to the heart; others threw themselves like young lions upon those who tried to seize them; others, again, who had no other means of showing their despite, turned the ceremony into ridicule which they were forced to undergo: when they were covered with a white cloth, and the water was about to be sprinkled upon their heads, they exclaimed: 'Are they going to shave us?' The curate and the garrison of Lussan so greatly tortured the children of the village in dragging them to the church, where they shut them up under lock and key, that some of them told the curate they seemed to see the devil whenever they looked upon him, and others, still more desperate, spat in his face."

Notwithstanding the determined resistance of the Protestants, baptism was administered to the children by force. This roused the indignation of the Reformed, more especially in the mountains of Languedoc, and had not the zeal of the priests been checked by the government, it seemed to be almost certain that the war of the Camisards would be fought over again.

For a time the Protestants in Languedoc, as well as in other places, enjoyed comparative tranquillity, but on a sudden, in February 1754, the Marshal de Richelieu, who happened to be governor of Languedoc, and had hitherto exercised rule in a spirit of mildness, and even kindness, issued imperative orders to arrest the new converts, to watch and disperse the meetings, to seize the preachers, and shoot them if they attempted to fly. This unexpected change in the policy of Richelieu excited both astonishment and alarm in the minds of the Protestants of the south of France. Some meetings were suspended, others were attacked by a rude and brutal soldiery, who hesitated not to perpetrate the most fearful enormities upon the assembled worshippers.

This sudden outburst of violence was followed in a short time by a period of toleration, during which the Reformed were permitted to hold consistories and synods, as well as meetings for religious worship, without dread of interruption or molestation. Two synods were assembled in the province of Lower Languedoc in 1760; one of them consisting of twenty pastors and fifty-four elders; the other of fifteen pastors and thirty-eight elders. The meetings for worship became more regular, and were held more openly; in some places under the eye of the magistrates. The gaols were gradually emptied of prisoners, whose only crime had been that they were present at a desert meeting, or had given shelter to a Protestant pastor. This improved state of matters, however, was disturbed by the capital execution at Toulouse of four persons in one case, and a venerable old man at another. Such cases as these occurring at a time when the rest of France was in the enjoyment of religious calm, awakened a strong feeling of shame and indignation in the bosoms of even the most bigoted Romanists. They were unwilling to be regarded as sympathizing even in the slightest degree with the judges and priests of Toulouse. On the contrary, they strove by their whole deportment towards the Protestants to show that their hearts revolted from all such acts of intolerance and barbarity.

Thus it was that from 1760 to 1787 each day lightened the burden of the long-oppressed Huguenots. No doubt, in that long interval, they were subjected to many petty vexations and annoyances. They were often compelled to pay heavy fines and suffer ruinous extortions. In cases which regarded them in courts of law, the sentences of the judges were ambiguous and contradictory. Still a partial toleration was felt to be an unspeakable blessing by men whose past history had been almost an unbroken series of calamities and trials of the heaviest kind. As the century rolled on, the spirit of the age in France became more decidedly tolerant. The school of Voltaire, the statesmen, and learned men of the time, argued strongly in favour of civil and religious liberty. Louis XVI. hesitated, but public opinion assumed a still higher tone. At length the strong feelings on the subject, which had now become almost universal, found expression in the assembly of the Notables held in 1787. The king could resist no longer, and, in November following, the Edict of Toleration received the royal signature. The privileges which this important document granted to Non-

Catholics were these: the right of living in France, and of exercising a profession or trade in the kingdom, without being disturbed on account of religion; the permission to marry legally before the officers of justice; the authority to record the births of their children before the local judge; and a regulation for the interment of those who could not be buried according to the Roman Catholic ritual.

Measured and incomplete though these concessions were, the edict which granted them was received by the whole body of the Protestants throughout France with feelings of joy and thanksgiving to God. All the churches now proceeded to reconstitute themselves on the ancient basis. The Constituent Assembly, in 1789, threw open to Protestants equally with Roman Catholics, all the offices of state, and another decree pronounced them eligible to every civil and military office without exception. The following year saw Rabaut Saint Etienne, the son of a long-prescribed Protestant pastor, nominated president of the Constituent Assembly. One decree after another passed in favour of religious liberty. The property formerly confiscated on account of religion, which was still in the possession of the State, was restored to the heirs of the lawful proprietors. All the rights of French citizens were restored to the descendants of the refugees, on the sole condition that they should return to France, and take the civic oath. To every man was guaranteed the exercise of the religious worship to which he was attached.

But the practice of a people is not always thoroughly consistent with the theory of their government. So it was with the French during the first Revolution. The liberties of the Protestants were firmly secured by law, but they were shamefully violated in fact. The Protestants were legally eligible to all civil and military appointments, but they were nevertheless systematically excluded from all municipal councils, and generally from all elective offices. The constitution of 1793 professed to guarantee to the whole French people the free exercise of their worship. But in a few short months the Convention substituted the Decade for the ancient division of the week, and attempted to compel all to work on the Sabbath, whatever might be their scruples on the point. All religious worship was now abolished, both Protestant and Roman Catholic. The churches were shut, and the pastors prohibited from discharging the duties of their office. Piety now confined itself to the family and the closet.

Such a state of things could not possibly continue long. Public opinion demanded the restoration of religious freedom, and, in 1795, it was decreed that "no one shall be prevented from exercising the worship he has chosen, provided he conforms to the laws; no one can be forced to contribute to the expenses of any creed; the Republic salaries none." Some of the Reformed churches now sought to reorganize themselves, but the process was difficult, laborious, and slow. One of the first acts of Napoleon Buonaparte, on becoming first consul, was to sign a concordat with the legate of Pius VII.; but although the Pope had urged strongly the acknowledgment of the Roman Catholic religion as the religion of the State, the utmost his holiness could obtain was the insertion in the preamble of the concordat of these words, "The government of the Republic recognizes the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion as the religion of the great majority of the French people." This was nothing more than the statement of a well-known and admitted fact. In all respects the Protestant pastors and the Romish clergy were on an equal footing, with the single exception of pecuniary support. The Romish bishops and priests were paid from the public treasury, but the Protestant pastors received no State pay whatever, and were in one sense separated from the State. Napoleon, however, did not relish the idea of Protestantism being totally independent of his authority. Hence arose the law of the year X. (1802) which, while it gave a State endowment to the Reformed church, took away from it every pretension to spiritual independence. The principal changes introduced by this law in the constitution of the church are thus detailed by Dr. Lorimer:

"No doctrine, nor alteration of doctrine, shall be published or taught, without being first authorised by the Government.

"The maintenance of ministers shall be provided for, wherever the property and oblations of the communities fall short.

"The articles for the liberty of foundations in the organic laws of the Catholic worship, shall be common to the Protestant Churches.

"There are to be two seminaries, one in the East of France for the instruction of ministers of the Confession of Augsburg, and the other at Geneva for the Reformed Churches. The professors are to be named by the First Consul, and no minister to be appointed without a certificate of his having studied in the seminary of his religion. The rules for the government of these seminaries to be also settled by the Government.

"The Reformed Churches of France shall have pastors, local consistories, and synods. There shall be a consistorial church for every 6,000 souls of the same communion. Five consistorial churches shall form the district of a synod.

"The number of the ministers or pastors in the same consistorial church cannot be increased without the authority of Government.

"The pastors cannot resign without stating their motives to Government, which shall approve or reject them.

"The title of election shall be presented to the First Consul for his approbation.

"All the pastors now in exercise are provisionally confirmed.

"Each synod shall be composed of a pastor and "

notable of each church. The synods shall superintend the celebration of worship and conduct of ecclesiastical affairs, and all their decisions shall be submitted for the approbation of Government. The synods cannot assemble until they have received the permission of Government, and no Synodal Assembly shall last more than six days."

During the fourteen years of the Consulate and the Empire, the Protestant church was weak and inefficient. The forms were preserved, but the life of religion was well nigh gone. In 1807 there were not more than two hundred pastors; there is more than double that number now. The French seminary founded by Antoine Court at Lausanne had been transferred to Geneva; but as it was found to be inadequate to the purpose of its formation, the Emperor, in 1808, created a Faculty of Protestant theology at Montauban. The restoration of the Bourbons to the throne of France took place in 1814, and although equal protection was, at that time, declared to be given to every form of worship, the people, particularly in the south, began to threaten the Reformed with new persecutions. But on the re-entry of Napoleon into Paris, the Protestants felt that they could now count upon the protection of the laws. This security, however, was of short duration. Under the government of Louis XVIII. they were assailed in the south by the populace with a savage ferocity which knew no bounds. The Duke d'Angoulême was despatched by the king to inquire into the state of the southern provinces. He found the places of worship at Nismes closed, and a part of the population compelled to flee for their lives, while others were in close concealment. After the lapse of six months, the Protestant worship was re-established at Nismes, on the 17th of December 1815. In the other departments of France, with a few exceptions, all was quiet, and neither the persons nor property of the Protestants were exposed to the least molestation. Under Charles X. the numbers who avowed their adherence to the Protestant faith steadily and sensibly increased. From 1817 to 1830, while the charter secured equal liberty to all creeds, the government of the Restoration was by no means strict in its adherence to this great and important principle. Attempts were made to concuss the Protestants into an acknowledgment of Popery, so far as to pay some outward act of homage or respect to her religious processions. The law of sacrilege allowed profanation of Protestant worship, without incurring the penalty of imprisonment, while the profanation of Romish worship was to be visited with the punishment of death. Charles X., as he advanced in years, gave himself up to the guidance of priests, and the consequence was, that the greatest partiality was shown to Romanists in the distribution of public offices. But if not enjoying royal favour, the Protestant Church of France was permitted to operate with unfettered activity in the great work of propagating Christianity. To her is due the honour of having been instrumental in the formation at first, and in the maintenance ever since, of the Bible Society of France; the Religious Tract Society, and the Society for the Encouragement of Primary Instruction.

The Revolution of 1830, which called Louis Philippe to the dignity of King of the French, led the Protestants to expect that their position would be improved. The Chamber of Deputies, in revising the Charter, abrogated the sixth article upon the religion of the State, and readopted the terms of the concordat as to the Reformed Catholic religion being the religion of the majority of the French. But though the expectations of the Protestants were disappointed, their numbers steadily increased, so that in 1838 the Calvinist or Reformed church had eighty-nine consistories, and about four hundred and sixty ministers; while the Lutheran church had thirty-seven consistories, and nearly two hundred and sixty ministers. In the course of ten years more, during which the liberties of the Protestant churches were becoming gradually more circumscribed, and the influence of the Romish priesthood gathering strength, another revolution brought Louis Napoleon upon the scene. Now a very general hope was entertained that the cause of religious liberty in France would receive a mighty impulse. An assembly of the delegates of the Reformed churches was held in Paris in May 1848. The chief point which came under discussion was, the relation between the Church and the State, when the great majority declared themselves in favour of the alliance being preserved, without however compromising the independence of the church. It was resolved also to call a regular assembly to take into consideration the state and prospects of Protestantism. Being only a voluntary meeting, not recognized by the law, only from seventy to eighty members attended. It was proposed that a confession of faith should be drawn up, which might be acknowledged as the creed of the French Protestant churches. This proposal, however, gave rise to a very keen and stormy debate, the majority being of opinion that doctrinal points should not be taken up by the assembly; the variety of sentiment on such subjects which existed among French Protestants being in their view a sufficient reason for avoiding all discussion on matters of the kind. A minority of the members, small in number, but bearing a high character for piety and zeal, contended earnestly for a confession of faith, as being absolutely necessary to preserve the unity of the churches and their harmony in doctrine; but finding that the great majority of the meeting was opposed to their views, they protested and withdrew, resolved to form themselves into a separate body. The majority continued their sittings, and having revised the constitution of the French Protestant churches, they drew up a scheme of ecclesiastical organization which they laid before the Minister of Public Instruction, with a view to the recognition of the churches by the State. The constitution which was embodied in the scheme, but which the government has never formally recognized, was the Presbyterian system of the early Protestant Church of France.

The minority who had left the assembly, along with a few congregations who were standing separate from the Protestant churches, formed themselves into a new Christian communion under the name of the Union of the Evangelical Churches in France. The first meeting of the synod of this body took place on the 20th August 1849, when a profession of faith was drawn up, and a form of church organization. Their synod is held not annually, but every alternate year. Since its original formation, this body has been slowly on the increase, and now numbers 26 churches, 22 ministers, and nearly 2,000 members.

For three years after the revolution in 1848, considerable doubt existed as to the precise relation between the Church and the State. In December 1851, however, when Louis Napoleon became Emperor of France, the proclamation of the constitution of the empire embodied in it a recognition of the concordat of 1801, as still regulating the relations in Church and State. This was a heavy disappointment to the Protestants, who were flattering themselves that under Napoleon III. their position would be greatly improved. The Romish church, however, maintains a complete ascendancy at this moment in France, not only in numbers, Protestants being only a small fractional part of the whole population, but in influence and power. The government nominally tolerates all forms of religious worship, but throughout the whole country, Protestants are subjected to numberless annoyances and restrictions, and petty persecutions at the hands of the local authorities. The latest accounts reckon the Protestants of France of all denominations at no more than 800,000, while the Roman Catholics number nearly 36,000,000.

FRANCIS (St.) D'ASSISI, a celebrated name in the Romish calendar, having been the originator of the well-known order of FRANCISCANS (which see). He was the son of a rich merchant at Assisi in Italy, where he was born in A. D. 1182. His early education was directed towards preparation for a mercantile life, but at the age of twenty-four he was brought under serious impressions while laid on a sick-bed. From the date of his recovery he seems to have been liable to frequent dreams and visions, which he regarded as loud calls from heaven to enter upon the life of a monk. Thus on one occasion he saw in vision a palace filled with weapons, each of them marked with the sign of the cross, and on asking to whom they belonged, he was answered, "To thee and thy soldiers." For a time Francis imagined that his vocation was to rebuild ruined churches, and accordingly he went from place to place collecting money for this purpose. But on one occasion while attending mass, the words of Christ to his disciples, Mat. x. 9, 10, "Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves: for the workman is worthy of his meat;" were impressed deeply upon his mind, and imagining that he was called to obey literally this injunction of our Lord, he assumed the dress referred to, and in a state of literal poverty he wandered about preaching repentance. Thus he gathered round him a number of followers whom he resolved to associate in a religious brotherhood, professing in all its strictness and austerity, evangelical poverty. He repaired accordingly to Rome, and laid his rule before Pope Innocent III., from whom he is said to have received little or no encouragement to carry out his project. But a vision at night is said to have led his Holiness to sanction the plan and rule of Francis.

In A. D. 1210, Francis had only eleven followers, and in the following year they had so increased in number, that he sent a large company of them to travel all over Italy, preaching, and, as mendicant friars, begging their bread. The order rose into high reputation, and in A. D. 1215 Innocent III. declared his public approbation of the Franciscan society. The first general chapter of the order was held in the following year, and Cardinal Ugolino, afterwards Pope Gregory IX., became its patron.

Animated by an ardent missionary spirit, Francis D'Assisi joined an expedition against the Saracens in 1219, with no other view than to preach the gospel to the soldiers. At the siege of Damietta in Egypt, we find him acting as a missionary in the Christian army, and not contented with preaching repentance among those who professed his own faith, he resolved in the fervour of his zeal to go over to the Mohammedan army with the view of addressing them also. He was seized accordingly, and dragged as a prisoner before the Sultan of Egypt. The Moslem functionary, contrary to the expectations of Francis, received him with respect, invited him to preach for several successive days before himself and his officers, sending him back afterwards to the camp of the Franks with this parting request, "Pray for me, that God may enlighten me, and enable me to hold firmly to that religion which is most pleasing to him."

Francis founded three different spiritual orders. The first, which was called by the name of the MINOR BROTHERS or FRIARS MINORS, was confirmed by Pope Honorius III. The second was an order of nuns, called after the first superintendent, the order of St. Clara. The third, which was called the order of Penitent Brothers, was founded in A. D. 1221, and consisted of pious laymen, who would not, or could not, renounce the family life, and were permitted to live together in a kind of spiritual union, after one rule, and under one superior.

Shortly before the death of Francis, it is alleged that, after earnest prayer for conformity to Christ, there appeared wounds in his hands and feet and side, like those of our Saviour on the cross. These stigmata of St. Francis, as they are called, were five in number, and bled continually, but at his death no wounds could be seen in his body. For two years after he resided at Assisi in a state of great weakness, and at last died on the 14th October A. D. 1226. He was buried at Rome, and his name was inserted in the catalogue of Romish saints.

FRANCIS (Sr.) DE PAULA, a celebrated Romish saint, born in Calabria, who founded the order of MINIMS (which see) in the fifteenth century. He was educated in a Franciscan convent at St. Mark, in his native province, and in a short time came to surpass all the other monks in strict observance of the rule of St. Francis. At fifteen years of age he took up his abode in a hole in a rock where he practised many austerities. It was in 1435 that he laid the foundations of his order, building several small cells and a chapel which he dedicated to St. Francis d'Assisi. As the number of his disciples increased, he erected a monastery and church at Paula. He erected another convent at Spezzano in 1453, a third at Crotona in 1460, and a fourth at Milazzo in Sicily. In connection with this last monastery, it is related of Francis, that when some mariners refused to convey him from Italy to Sicily on account of his poverty, the saint calmly spread his cloak upon the sea, and thus was carried safely over as on dry land. The new order set on foot by Francis, made rapid progress in Italy; and its founder having been invited by Louis XI. to visit France, he complied with the invitation, and succeeded in introducing his order into that country also. Soon after it was established in Spain under Ferdinand and Isabella, who built a monastery for the Minims at Malaga. The order was admitted into Germany under the Emperor Maximilian about the year 1497. Francis died in 1507 at the very advanced age of ninety-one, and he was canonized by Pope Leo X. in the year 1519.

FRANCIS (Sr.), FRATERNITY OF THE GIRDLE OF, a devotional society in the Church of Rome. The members dress in a sack of an ash colour; they tie this sack with a thick cord adorned with a large chaplet of wood; they wear an escutcheon on which are the arms of the order of St. Francis; in processions they walk barefooted, carrying in their hand a large wooden cross.

FRANCIS (Sr.), HERMITS OF. See MINIMS (ORDER OF).

FRANCISCANS, a celebrated order of mendicant monks which arose in the thirteenth century, deriving its name from St. Francis d'Assisi, its founder. It was formally approved by Honorius III. A. D. 1223; and had become very numerous when Francis died A. D. 1226. By way of displaying his humility, he called the members of his order Fratriculi or Little Brothers, which in Italian is expressed by Fratricelli, and in Latin by Minores or Minors. The rule which the Franciscans received from their originator was, to the effect that they were to live in common, observe chastity, and yield obedience both to the Pope and to the superior of the order. An indispensable condition of admission into the order was, that all applicants must sell their whole possessions, of whatever kind, and give the proceeds to the poor; and it was also required that they should perform a year's novitiate, at the close of which they might be admitted on vowing that they would never quit the order on any account. The friars were bound to make use of the Roman Breviary, and the lay brothers to recite every day for their office seventy-six paternosters. Besides observing Lent, the members of the order were required to fast from All Saints' day to Christmas. They were forbidden to ride on horseback unless in cases of urgent necessity; and in travelling from place to place they were enjoined to eat whatever was set before them. They were forbidden in the strictest manner to receive money either directly or indirectly, and while they were to derive their subsistence from the labour of their own hands, they must receive as wages anything except money. They were imperatively required to possess nothing of their own, and should the proceeds of their labour be insufficient for their maintenance, they must go a-begging, and with the alms they collected they must help one another. Their habit was appointed to consist of a tunic, a hood, a cord for a girdle, and a pair of drawers.

The order of Franciscans were furnished with power to grant indulgences, and thus, though professed mendicants, they were in possession of ample means of support. This privilege rapidly gained for them a wide-spread popularity, rendering them powerful rivals to the bishops and priests, and also to the other monastic orders. The rule of St. Francis, as has been already mentioned, prescribed absolute poverty; but immediately after the death of their founder, many of the Minors, as they were called, departed from this rigorous enactment, and Gregory IX., A. D. 1231, relaxed the severity of the law. This step on the part of the Pope, however, gave rise to a keen controversy among the Franciscans, and appeal having again been made to Rome, Innocent IV., A. D. 1245, decided in favour of those who wished a relaxation of the rule, declaring that Franciscan monks might hold lands, houses, furniture, books, &c., and might use them freely; but that the right of property in all such cases belonged to St. Peter, and to the Church of Rome, without whose consent nothing should be sold, exchanged, or in any way transferred to others. This decision of the Pope excited no small discontent in the minds of the Cæsarians or Spirituals of the order, some of whom retired into the deserts to carry out their austere views, while others were banished for their refractory conduct.

An entire change, however, took place in the whole aspect of affairs as regarded the Franciscans, by the election of John of Parma to the office of general of the order, A. D. 1247. Being opposed to the relaxation of the rule of St. Francis, he recalled the exiles, and enjoined a strict observance to the very letter of the law on which the order was founded. The result was, that in the course of two short years he was compelled to resign his office, and several who agreed with him in sentiment were cast into prison. The general who succeeded was the celebrated Father Bonaventura, who wished, in order to prevent a division of the contending parties, to occupy neutral ground. The controversy, however, continued to be carried on with keenness on both sides, and A. D. 1257, Alexander IV., being invited to decide between them, ratified the interpretation of the rule of St. Francis given by Innocent IV. But at an assembly of the order held A. D. 1260, the interpretation of Innocent was abrogated, so far at least as it differed from the interpretation previously given by Gregory IX.

Besides the controversy which raged among the Franciscans in regard to the true meaning of their rule, the order was distracted by a dispute which arose as to the prophecies of Joachim, an abbot of Flora in Calabria, who was looked upon by the Italian populace generally as an inspired man, whose predictions of the future were to be viewed as equal in authority with those of the ancient prophets. This favourite seer, whose prophecies were contained in a work called 'The Everlasting Gospel,' and by the vulgar, 'The Book of Joachim,' foretold, among other things, the destruction of the Romish church, as being corrupt and offensive to God. He taught that two dispensations had already passed, those of the Father and of the Son, and that a third, still more perfect than the other two, was at hand, namely, the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. The stricter party of the Franciscans, or the Spirituals, as they were called, maintained that Joachim was a true prophet, and indeed that he was that angel whom John in the Revelation saw flying through the heavens.

In the midst of these bitter contentions another work appeared bearing to be 'An Introduction to the Everlasting Gospel,' and which contained the bold statements, that St. Francis was the angel mentioned in the Revelation; that the Gospel of Christ would be abrogated in the year 1260, and that this new Everlasting Gospel of Joachim would take its place; and, finally, that this change would be brought about by itinerant barefooted friars. This book, which is said to have been the production of a Spiritual Franciscan, named Gerhard, was published at Paris A. D. 1254, but instead of exalting the Franciscans, as was its obvious design, it only roused the popular indignation all the more against them, so that Alexander IV., A. D. 1255, was compelled to forbid its circulation; and by authority of the university of Paris it was publicly burned.

Under the prudent management of Bonaventura, the Franciscan order maintained comparative tranquillity during his life, but, after his death, the dissensions, which had formerly been carried on in reference to the rule of their founder, broke out with as great violence as ever. One party earnestly desired the rule to be abrogated as being beyond the power of human nature fully to practise; the other party were equally desirous that the primitive strictness should be observed. In conformity with the wishes and opinions of the latter, Pope Nicolaus III. published, in A. D. 1279, the famous constitution which confirmed the rule of St. Francis in all its original austerity and strictness. In this document the monks were required to renounce, or, as the papal decree termed it, expropriate all right of property or ownership, and they were allowed merely the use of things necessary, not of their property, which belonged, as Innocent IV. had decided, to the Church of Rome. The constitution thus given by Nicolaus failed to satisfy the Spiritual party of the Franciscans, particularly those in the province of Narbonne in France, who were headed by Peter John Oliva, a man held in great repute for sanctity and learning. Under the guidance of this individual, whom they regarded as a prophet, the Spirituals assailed the more lax monks of the order. The contention was carried on with great vehemence on both sides; but at length a general was appointed over the order who allowed the ancient discipline to become prostrate, and even the appearance of poverty to become extinct. In Italy and France, as well as in other countries, the Spirituals continued to protest loudly against the prevailing laxity of opinion and practice among the members, until at length, under Boniface VIII., they seceded from the rest, openly condemning the interpretation which Nicolaus III. had given of their rule. In 1294, some of the Italian Spirituals were allowed by Coelestine V. to form a new and separate community, professing to strip themselves of all possessions and all property, according to the original arrangement of St. Francis. This distinct society, however, was suppressed by Boniface VIII.; but various associations continued to exist in Italy in spite of the Pope, and from that country they spread over the greatest part of Europe, contending earnestly against the corruptions of the Church of Rome, down even to the time of the Reformation. (See FRATRICELLI.) The Franciscans, as well as their rivals the Dominicans, probably from the very fact of their being Mendicant monks, acquired great reputation and vast influence in every country where they were found; and, accordingly, they were objects of the utmost jealousy, and even hatred, among all ranks of the clergy, as well as in the universities. The great privileges which they enjoyed above the other orders of monks, gave them such power that they were able to undermine the ancient discipline of the church, and to take into their own hands the management of all religious concerns. Such was the extent of their popularity, that they were the favourite preachers and chosen confessors of the people in every European country which had embraced the Christian faith.

“But the greater the influence,” as Neander remarks, “exercised by the mendicant friars, as preachers and confessors, and as persons who mixed familiarly with all classes, upon the people—so much the more pernicious would it prove when it came to be abused by ignorant and badly-disposed men; and of such there would be no want as the branches of these orders extended and multiplied. The causes that had introduced corruption amongst the other monkish societies, as soon as they attained to eminence, were not inactive in the case of these; and soon, many evils began to intermingle with the benefits which flowed from them. As they enjoyed the special favour of the popes, and, through their respective generals in Rome, stood in close relations with the popes—they allowed themselves to be employed by the latter as instruments for exacting money, and for other bad purposes.”

The Franciscans came into England in the reign of King Henry III., while their founder was still alive. The first establishment of the order was at Canterbury. In the affair of the divorce which Henry VIII. sought, he was violently opposed by the Franciscan monks, and accordingly this order was the first which was banished from the kingdom at the time of the Reformation, and above two hundred of them were thrown into prison, and others cruelly treated. See MENDICANT ORDERS. For an account of the contests which so long raged between the Dominicans and Franciscans, see DOMINICANS.

FRATERCULI. See FRATRICELLI.

FRATERNITIES, societies established in Roman Catholic countries for the improvement of devotion. They are of different kinds. Some take their names from instruments of prayer, as for example, the Fraternity of the Rosary, and that of the Scapulary. The Girdle of St. Francis forms a third society of this kind, and the Girdle of St. Austin a fourth. Italy, Spain, and Portugal are the countries where these Fraternities abound, but some of them are found also in Britain. Some of them are called ARCH-FRATERNITIES (which see), as giving law to the rest.

FRATRICELLI, a class of Franciscan monks who professed to observe the rule of St. Francis more strictly than the rest of the order, and therefore possessed no property either individually or collectively, but derived their whole subsistence from begging. The Fratricelli have sometimes been confounded with the Spiritual party among the Franciscans, but although somewhat resembling them, they were far from being identical; the Spirituals never having separated from the great community of the Franciscans, while the Fratricelli had so completely disjoined themselves from the order, that they assumed to themselves a distinct head or leader, and regarded Pope Celestine V. as their legal founder, denying Boniface and all the occupants of the Holy See who opposed them to be true pontiffs. The Fratricelli wore mean and tattered garments, and wandered about from place to place, declaiming against the corruptions of the Church of Rome and the vices of the clergy, and predicting a time of reformation as at hand. The Franciscans have never been willing to admit that the Fratricelli were at all connected with the disciples of St. Francis, while they cannot deny that they professed and practised the rule of St. Francis. They agreed in opinion with the BIZOCHI (which see), and BEGUINES or BEGHARDS (which see), while they differed from them in being real monks. St. Francis himself during his life called his disciples by the name of Fratricelli or Little Brothers; and although the word was sometimes used in the thirteenth century as a term of reproach among the Italians, applied to those who assumed the appearance of monks, while they did not belong to any of the monastic orders, yet as applied to the stricter Franciscans it was coveted as a term of honour by those who chose a life of the severest poverty.

FREETHINKERS, a name which was often assumed by DEISTS (which see) of the last century, and is not unfrequently adopted by Infidels of the present day, to express their boasted freedom from religious prejudices, and from connection with any religious system. In the Report of the Census of 1851, two congregations in England return themselves as Freethinkers.

FREETHINKING CHRISTIANS, a sect which arose in London in the year 1796, professing to be a Christian church founded on the principles of free inquiry. The originators of this body separated from a congregation of Trinitarian Universalists with which they had been connected. The new sect rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, that of the atonement, and indeed all the peculiar doctrines of Christianity. Then they took another step on the road towards infidelity, by dispensing with the sacraments, and denying the immateriality of the soul. At length they declared their disbelief of the inspiration of the Scriptures, and ended with the abolition of all the forms of public worship, their meetings, which for convenience sake are still held on the Sabbath, resembling rather a debating society than a Christian church. They continue to assemble regularly on the Sabbath, and to discuss religious points, intermingling them with debates on social questions. This infidel body has for several years past been decidedly on the increase both in England and Scotland.

FREY, the tutelar deity of the ancient Swedes, who, according to the Edda, presided over the seasons of the year, and bestowed peace, fertility, and riches. The Scandinavian festival of Jul was celebrated in honour of Frey or the Sun, in order to obtain a propitious year and fruitful seasons. In the great temple of Upsal, Frey stood at the left hand of Thor, and was represented of both sexes, and with various other attributes which characterized productivity. On the festival in honour of this god, sacrifices, feasting, nocturnal assemblies, and all the demonstrations of the most intense joy prevailed. Frey is declared in the Edda to be one of the most celebrated of the gods.

FREYJA, the sister of FREY (which see), and goddess of love among the ancient Scandinavians. She was invoked to obtain happy marriages, and easy childbirths. She dispensed pleasures, enjoyments, and delights of all kinds. The Edda styles her the most favourable of the goddesses; but she went to war as well as Odin, and divided with him the souls of the slain. She is generally thought to have been the same with the Aphrodite of the Greeks, and Venus of the Romans, since the sixth day of the week, which was consecrated to her under the name of Friday or Freyja's day, was called in Latin Dies Veneris, or the day of Venus. Freyja is mentioned in the Edda as the most propitious of the goddesses; her abode in heaven is called Fólkvang, the folk's mead or dwelling. In the field of battle she asserts her claim to one half of the slain, the other half belonging to Odin. "Her mansion," says the Edda, "called Sessrúmnir, is large and magnificent; thence she sallies forth in a car drawn by two cats. She lends a very favourable ear to those who sue to her for assistance. It is from her name that women of birth and fortune are called in our language Freyjor. She is very fond of love ditties, and all lovers would do well to invoke her. She is wedded to a person called Odur, and their daughter, named Hnossa, is so very handsome that whatever is beautiful and precious is called by her name (hnosir). But Odur left his wife in order to travel into very remote countries. Since that time Freyja continually weeps, and her tears are drops of pure gold. She has a great variety of names, for having gone over many countries in search of her husband, each people gave her a different name. She is thus called Mardöil, Horn, Gefn, and Syr, and also Vanaðis. She possesses the necklace Brising." The learned Icelander, Finn Magnusen, regards Frey and Freyja as the personifications of the sun and moon.

FRIDAY, the day set apart by the Mohammedans as their weekly Sabbath, which like the Jews they commence at sunset on the previous evening. Various reasons have been assigned for the selection of this day, some accounting for it by alleging that on a Friday Mohammed entered into Medina, others stating it to be in commemoration of the creation of man. The most probable reason however is, that the ancient Arabians held their solemn assemblies on that day, and Mohammed, in introducing his new religion, made no change in this particular. But whatever may have been the ground of its original appointment, it is regarded by the Mohammedans as the chief and most excellent of all days, and they imagine that the last general judgment will happen on this day. The public services, which occupy only a portion of the day, the rest being devoted to business and recreation, commence at noon, and besides the usual prayers, there are additional ceremonies performed, including the reading or reciting of parts of the Koran from the reading-desk, and the delivery of sermons from the pulpit by the Imáms. These religious services are performed with the utmost gravity and decorum. Both in the Greek and Latin churches Friday has always been regarded as a litany or humiliation day, in memory of the crucifixion of Christ which took place on this day. In the early Christian church, divine worship was celebrated on Wednesdays and Fridays, which received the name of stationary days, because they continued their assemblies on these days to a great length, till three o'clock in the afternoon. For this reason they were also called half-fasts, in opposition to the Lent fast which lasted till evening. Tertullian, Clemens, Alexandrinus, and Origen, refer to the custom of observing Wednesdays and Fridays as fast-days; and Tertullian says that on these days they always celebrated the communion.

FRIENDS (SOCIETY OF), a denomination of professing Christians, commonly called Quakers, which arose in England about the middle of the seventeenth century. Its founder was George Fox, the son of a weaver, at Drayton in Leicestershire, who in 1646 began to promulgate his peculiar sentiments, which seemed to constitute the last and probably the extremest of those protests which the Reformation lodged against the ritualistic religion of the Church of Rome. When Luther protested against the errors of Rome, Christianity had been reduced to a system of empty and unmeaning forms; the life of religion had almost totally disappeared, and a dead ritualism now occupied its place. In these circumstances the light of the Reformation began to dawn, and the first feeble forth-puttings of life to manifest themselves. With Luther, Melancthon, Zuingle, Calvin, the light became gradually clearer, and the life stronger and more palpable. At length a living church stood forth amid the darkness which enshrouded the professing Christian church, and asserted its position as the true Reformed church of Christ. In the struggle which then took place between light and darkness, between life and death, it is not at all surprising that some ardent minds should have rushed into extreme opinions. Of these George Fox must be regarded as the representative of a large and respectable body. Early impressed with the importance of true spiritual religion, and the utter inefficiency of the mere forms of worship to give life and energy to the soul, he spent much time in retirement, reading, and meditating upon the Scriptures, and earnestly praying for the revelation of inward light by the communication of the Holy Spirit. He speaks of himself as "knowing pureness and righteousness at eleven years of age." The Reformation in his view had done much towards introducing a more spiritual worship, but even after all that had been accomplished, he conceived that too much reliance was even yet placed on outward forms and on the agency of human means, to the neglect of the Holy Spirit of God, the necessity and importance of whose agency in the enlightenment, conversion, and sanctification of the soul, he was disposed to estimate far more highly than all subordinate agency whatever. Impressed deeply with the strong views which he had begun to entertain on this subject, George Fox felt it to be his duty to make known his principles throughout England. He accordingly set out on a preaching tour throughout different counties, traveling generally on foot, and everywhere declining to receive compensation for his labours. His preaching was eminently successful in persuading many to adopt his peculiar opinions, and in the course of a few years he gathered around him a large body, who conscientiously avowed their firm belief in the doctrines which he taught.

At the period when Fox commenced his ministry, the minds of the English people were much disturbed by the civil war which raged throughout the country, and their opinions were quite unsettled both as to political and religious matters. In such a state of the public mind any new theory, whether it regarded the church or the State, required only to be propounded to meet with ready acceptance from not a few. Hence, wherever George Fox promulgated his opinions, novel and extravagant though they might appear to some, he found crowds of admiring auditors, and a considerable body of ardent believers. All worship, he taught, which is acceptable to God must be conducted in spirit and in truth, and therefore all ritual religious services are unnecessary. On several occasions, we find him accordingly carrying his principles so far as to go into places of public worship and address the congregation during the time of service. This liberty seems to have been exercised to a greater extent than according to our modern notions was consistent with either prudence or propriety. But how often do we find cases in the history of every body of Christians in which zeal outruns discretion.

The ardour and enthusiasm which characterized some of the adherents of the new sect, exposed them to much misrepresentation and reproach. Cases of indiscretion are recorded which no doubt were exceptional and rare. To give some colour to the sever-

ities practised against them, pretexts were drawn from supposed violations of the regulations of civil policy: "A Christian exhortation to an assembly after the priest had done and the worship was over, was denominated interrupting public worship, and disturbing the priest in his office; an honest testimony against wickedness in the streets or market-place, was styled a breach of the peace; and their appearing before the magistrates covered, a contempt of authority; hence proceeded fines, imprisonments, and spoiling of goods. Nay, so hot were some of the magistrates for persecution, even in Cromwell's time, that by an unparalleled and most unjust misconstruction of the law against vagrants, they tortured with cruel whippings, and exposed in the stocks, the bodies of both men and women of good estate and reputation, merely because they went under the denomination of Quakers."

Several obsolete statutes were brought to bear most heavily upon Friends, though originally enacted with a view of reaching the Papists, who refused to conform to the established religion. Among these was an act passed in the 23d year of Henry VIII.'s reign, against subtracting or withholding tithes; obliging justices to commit obstinate defendants to prison, until they should find sufficient security for their compliance. Laws were made in Elizabeth's reign for enforcing a uniformity of worship, authorizing the levy of a fine of one shilling per week for the use of the poor, from such as did not resort to some church of the established religion, every Sabbath or holiday; and also another establishing a forfeiture of twenty pounds per month for the like default. A third law empowered the officers to seize all the goods, or a third part of the lands, of every such offender for the fine of twenty pounds. And, as if these were not sufficiently severe, another was enacted in the 35th year of Queen Elizabeth, obliging offenders in the like case to abjure the realm, on pain of death. No sect, indeed, suffered more severely than Friends from the disgraceful and intolerant acts against Protestant Dissenters, which were passed, from time to time, during the long period which elapsed, from the reign of Elizabeth to that of William and Mary, when the Toleration Act of 1688 secured religious liberty to all nonconformists. Friends, however, were still subject to prosecutions for tithes, and for refusing to swear; but, in 1695, a bill was carried in Parliament allowing the solemn affirmation of a Friend instead of an oath.

It is impossible to deny that, in the early history of this sect, individuals were sometimes found who mistook the promptings of their own minds for the impulses of the Holy Spirit, exposing the community to which they belonged to unmerited odium, but it is equally undeniable, that many of the followers of George Fox were earnest and devout men, who "felt," to use the language of one of their number, "that they needed to know more the power of Christ Jesus in their own hearts, making them new creatures, bruiseing Satan, and putting him under their feet, and re-awakening their souls up into the divine image, which was lost in Adam's fall, and sanctifying them wholly in body, soul, and spirit, through the inward operations of the Holy Ghost and fire." By the preaching of George Fox, such men were led to see that they had been resting contented with a mere historical belief of the doctrines of the gospel, without seeking to experience the living power of the truth in their hearts by the effectual inworking of the Holy Spirit. The rapid spread of the doctrines of the Friends was surprising, and although attempts were made to represent them to Cromwell as dangerous, and even seditious persons, the Protector was too sagacious and far-sighted to be prevailed upon to treat with intolerance a sect which, whatever might be thought of their theoretical opinions, were among the best friends and promoters of peace and good order in the country.

The infant society was soon joined by persons belonging even to the most noble families, as well as by several ministers of the gospel. In the course of a few years meetings were formed in all parts of the United Kingdom, and although exposed to severe persecution, the body continued to increase in numbers, and some zealous members of the Society travelled to foreign countries, believing themselves to be divinely called to propagate the truth of God. Some passed over to the Continent, preaching and establishing meetings in Holland and other countries; while others found their way into Asia, and even among the barbarous tribes of Africa. About the same period, some members of the Society of Friends arrived in America, and so rapid has been the progress of the sect in the United States, that at this day, by far the largest body of the Friends is to be found in that country.

In the reign of Charles II. both the doctrine and discipline of the Friends began to assume a more definite and fixed character; a result, for which they were chiefly indebted to the wisdom of their founder. Fox commenced at an early period to establish meetings for discipline, and the first objects to which the attention of these meetings was directed, were the care of the poor and destitute; the manner of accomplishing marriages; the registry of births and deaths; the education and apprenticing of children; the granting of suitable certificates of unity and approbation to ministers who travelled abroad; and the preservation of an account of the sufferings to which the Friends were subjected in maintaining their religious principles.

It must be quite obvious, even to the most superficial thinker, that the peculiar doctrinal views of the Friends cannot fail to affect materially the whole practical arrangements of the body. Thus the all-importance attached to the teaching of the Holy Spirit leads them to reject a ministry specially trained for the office, and to regard every one, whether male or female, on whom the gift has been conferred by the Holy Spirit, from above, as having a call from heaven to preach the gospel. Accordingly, there is no paid ministry in the Society of Friends; and any brother or sister, who feels a conscious impulse from the Spirit to address the brethren, is allowed to do so. It not unfrequently happens, accordingly, that meetings are held for public worship, in which the whole time is occupied in secret meditation and prayer, without a single word being uttered by any one in the assembly. The practice of silent worship is thus defended by Elisha Bates: "When some formerly were urging our Lord to go to the feast of tabernacles, he said unto them: 'My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready,' John vii. 6. And his disciples can often adopt a similar language, feeling their utter incapacity, of themselves, for any good word or work; and that they know not what to pray for as they ought, without the helping influence of the Spirit of Truth: and therefore, they cannot presume to set about this solemn engagement, without the necessary qualification. For if 'no man can call Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Ghost,' how can any act of devotion be performed without this influence? Neither prayer, praise nor thanksgiving, can be acceptable, unless it arise from a sensible feeling in our hearts; which is produced only by the operation of grace there. This brings us into a sense of our own condition, and gives access to the Father of Mercies. Worship performed without these qualifications, must be will-worship, and as unacceptable as those outward pretences of the Jews, while their hearts were far from God.

"We, therefore, believe it right, when we assemble for the purpose of Divine worship, to sit down in reverent silence; endeavouring to abstract our minds from all things but the one great object of adoration: and in this humble, waiting state of mind, to remain in silence, unless we should be favoured with the qualification and command for vocal language, in preaching, prayer, or praise.

"God is a Spirit, and can be approached only by spirit. Hence vocal sound is not necessary to convey to him the desires, which his own Divine influence has raised in our hearts. Language is only necessary to convey sentiments from man to man. Our Father, who seeth in secret, and who knows what we need before we ask him, and who enables us, by the help of his own Divine influence, to make intercession according to his will—sees, hears, and knows what thus passes in the secret of the heart, without the intervention of words.

"When a number of individuals thus sit down, in solemn silence, waiting upon God—their minds being abstracted from all inferior objects, and their spirits engaged in exercise for the arising of the Word of Life, a spiritual communion is felt, and they are mutually helpful to each other. The heavenly virtue and solemnity is felt to flow as from vessel to vessel. For when a meeting is thus gathered in the name and power of Christ, he is often pleased to appear among them in great glory, revealed to that perception and quickened understanding, which is the effect of his own Divine work in their hearts. All this may be effected, though there may not have been a word spoken in the meeting.

"There is, in silent worship, something so beautiful, so sublime, so consistent with the relation in which we stand to God, that it appears strange there should exist a single doubt of its propriety."

In the view of the Friends, outward ceremonies are not only useless, in a strictly spiritual religion, but they are absolutely injurious, withdrawing the mind from that pure abstracted communion with God which forms the very essence of acceptable devotion. Hence they reject baptism in the outward dispensation of it, admitting only the baptism of the Holy Ghost. They reject also the outward observance of the Lord's Supper, believing that its true object is accomplished by the inward communion of the soul with God. On the same ground, namely, that religion is purely spiritual in its character, they reckon it proper to avoid the observance of all fasts or festivals of a sacred kind, all outward adorning of churches, and the use of music in worship, whether of a vocal or instrumental character.

From the constancy with which they dwell on the necessity of the illumination of the Spirit, and their depreciation of the outward means of grace, the Friends have sometimes been charged with a want of sufficient reverence for the written Word of God. This, however, they uniformly deny, alleging that they hold the Bible in such veneration, that they obey its precepts to the very letter. Thus, in regard to swearing, they literally "swear not at all," even in a court of justice. "Thou shalt not kill," they strictly and literally obey by refusing to become soldiers, or to draw the sword even in self-defence; regarding war as opposed to the whole spirit of the gospel. In obedience to the command of Christ, which they interpret literally, they "call no man Master," and as Jesus said to his disciples, "Be ye not called Rabbi," they refuse to give or to take titles of honour and respect of every kind, addressing every one, man and woman, by their plain Christian name, or by the simple expression, "Friend;" and they always use the singular pronoun, "thou" and "thee," instead of the customary plural "you." They remain covered in the presence of the sovereign, in courts of law and in the church. Their dress is simple, their mode of living temperate, their whole deportment grave and sedate. They discountenance all frivolous amusements, or the reading of trifling productions. As they refuse remuneration for preaching the gospel among themselves, they decline to contribute for the support of the ministers of other denominations. Hence they refuse to pay tithes or church-rates, preferring to allow their goods to be seized and sold by the public authorities for the payment of the tax. As the natural consequence of their opinions, they are strongly opposed to the endowment of any religious denomination by the State.

The Friends look upon the Sabbath as a day specially set apart for religious duties, and inculcate its observance both by public and private worship; and while they regard every day as alike holy, they gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of setting apart one day in seven, in common with other Christians, for the public worship of God. The Pagan names which custom has imposed upon days and months, are rejected by the Friends, who substitute "first day" for Sunday, "second day" for Monday; and in the same way they use "first month" for January, "second month" for February, and so forth.

To administer discipline and arrange the affairs of the Society, the Friends have monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings. The females have a similar series of meetings, not however to exercise discipline, but simply for mutual edification. Every child of a member is, in virtue of his descent, entitled to all the privileges of the Society. Marriage is regarded as a Divine ordinance, but they view the interference of a priest in the matter as uncalled for, holding a human priesthood to be abrogated under the gospel. The monthly meetings consist of all the congregations within a limited circuit, and the objects for which they assemble are various, chiefly having a reference to the admission of new members, the granting of certificates to those who are changing their place of residence, the exercise of discipline, and the election of elders to watch over the ministry. Attention is also paid at these meetings to the making provision for poor members, and securing education for their children. Quarterly meetings are composed of several monthly meetings, from which they receive regular reports of their proceedings, while it is also their duty to hear appeals from their decisions. The yearly meetings, again, are composed of the quarterly meetings, or representatives from them. These are the final courts of appeal, and they have the general superintendence of the whole Society in a particular country. Connected with the yearly meeting there is a meeting for sufferings, composed of ministers, elders, and members chosen by the quarterly meetings. The original design of this assembly was to make application to government in behalf of those members of the Society who were exposed to suffering and persecution in the early history of the body. Its object, however, is now completely changed, and it forms a standing committee appointed to watch over the whole concerns of the Society when the yearly meeting is not assembled. There are frequent meetings, also, of preachers and elders for mutual consultation and advice. The Friends are not allowed to carry their disputes into the regular courts of law, but are bound by the laws of the Society to submit the matter to the arbitration of two or more of their fellow-members.

From the rise of the Society of Friends till the Revolution in 1688 they were exposed to the most severe and harassing persecutions, ostensibly because they refused to take oaths, or to pay tithes, but in reality because of their nonconformist principles. Since the Revolution they have enjoyed the benefits of the Toleration Act. By enactments passed in the reign of William IV., their affirmations are accepted in courts of law instead of oaths, and by the abrogation of the Test Acts they have been rendered eligible to public offices. It would appear that since 1800, the Friends have been diminishing rather than increasing in numbers, a state of matters which they themselves account for by the constant emigration of members to America, where the Friends exist in large numbers. In 1800, the number of their meeting-houses in England amounted to 413, while the census in 1851 reports only 371, corresponding probably to not more than 20,000 members. In Scotland only six meeting-houses are reported, so that in all likelihood there are not more than 1,000 persons belonging to the Society of Friends in the northern parts of the island. Nearly twenty years ago a small secession from the body took place in Manchester, which did not exceed the number of 200 members, who assumed to themselves the name of Evangelical Friends. This body was but short-lived, the place of worship which they built for themselves having, in the course of a few years, been disposed of to another Christian body, and the congregation scattered.

The controversy which agitated the Society for some time, and led to a partial secession, is usually known by the name of the Beacon controversy, and involved the three points of Immediate Revelation, Perceptible Guidance, and Universal Saving Light. The seceding body argued, that the doctrine of the Society of Friends, in regard to Immediate Revelation, as being attested by consciousness alone, was a virtual denial of the Inspired Word of God, as being the only test of truth. In a certain sense, undoubtedly, as Dr. Wardlaw very clearly shows, in his 'Friendly Letters to the Society of Friends,' it is admitted by Christians generally, that the Holy Spirit imparts spiritual discernment to the soul, and this spiritual discernment may, in a modified sense, be called the revealing of Christ to the mind. But the grand difference between the general doctrine and that of the Friends is, that, in the belief of the former, the Holy Spirit teaches no more than what is contained in the Bible, but in the belief of the latter, the Spirit unfolds to the understanding of believers, the great principles contained in the Holy Scriptures, applying them to the various exigencies and duties of life. This view the Seceders regard as trenching on the authority of the inspired word. Such a doctrine, say they, excludes the Holy Scriptures from the place which Protestant Christians uniformly assign to them, that of being the sole standard and rule of faith and obedience. And, indeed, this consequence would seem naturally to follow, did the Friends not plainly assert their belief, that "the Scriptures form the only fit outward judge of controversies among Christians, and that whatever doctrine is contrary to their testimony, may, therefore, be justly regarded as false." The Society of Friends refuse to give the Scriptures the title of the Word of God, reserving that title for Jesus Christ personally, and the Holy Spirit, by which he operates on the soul of the believer. They maintain, however, that the Holy Scriptures were given by inspiration of God, and that they are to be "reverently received, diligently read, and their commands faithfully obeyed." Besides, it is true of the Friends that no body of Christians lend a more efficient support to Bible Societies, or show greater zeal in diffusing the Scriptures all around them.

The doctrine of Perceptible Guidance is another of those peculiar tenets maintained by the Friends, which has been keenly disputed by the seceding party among them. To understand the precise meaning of this expression, we may simply quote the statement of William Penn on the subject. "When neither man," says he, "nor Scriptures are near us, yet there continually attends us that Spirit of truth, that immediately informs us of our thoughts, words, and deeds, and gives us true directions what to do, and what to leave undone. Is not this the rule of life? If ye are led by the Spirit of God, then are ye sons of God." Now, it is an undoubted truth, that every Christian depends upon the influence of the Spirit of God for grace to discharge the duties and endure the trials of life. The only point in dispute between the Friends and other Christian denominations is, whether the grace by which the Christian is guided be perceptible or not, and if perceptible, whether it is capable of being distinguished in our consciousness from the unassisted operation of our own thoughts. Even the Friends themselves, if we may take Mr. Gurney as representing the sentiments of his fellow-members, acknowledge that there is no infallible means of distinguishing between the true guide and the false guide. If so, then how are we to know that the impulses which we attribute to the Holy Spirit are not the dictates of our own imagination. We are compelled to seek a test external to ourselves, by which to try the two competing guides within the soul, and that test is no other than the Holy Scriptures of truth. But it is due to the Friends to state, that while they hold the doctrine of immediate spiritual guidance, they fully recognize the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. Bible classes are in some places held in which the young are carefully instructed in the doctrines and precepts of the Bible, the teachers being members of the Society of Friends.

The last point which gave rise to the controversy between the seceding party and the general Society of Friends was the Universality of Saving Light or Grace, or in other words, the Arminian doctrine that Jesus Christ by his finished work upon the cross hath brought all men into a salvable state, so that, to use the words of Dr. Adam Clarke, "every human soul may be saved, if it be not his own fault." The doctrine held by the Friends on this subject is, that "independently of any outward information whatever, every individual human creature may in himself come to the virtual knowledge of the Saviour." In some of the earlier writings of Friends, a few unguarded expressions occur, such as "Saving Light," and "the Christ within," which are seldom if ever to be found in the writings of Friends at the present day. These, however, have doubtless given rise to much misunderstanding on the part of those who are not intimately acquainted with the doctrines of the body. And this circumstance alone may account for the controversy on the three peculiar doctrines, the maintenance of which by the Friends gave rise some years ago to an extensive schism in the body. No change, however, has taken place in either the doctrines or discipline of the Society itself, but on the contrary, in the Minute of the London yearly meeting in 1848, they plainly avow their determination to "uphold their ancient standard of faith and practice in all its fulness, spirituality, and simplicity."

FRIENDS (SOCIETY OF) IN AMERICA. The origin of this sect in America is due to the violent persecutions which the Friends were called upon to endure in England in the early period of their history. About ten years after George Fox had first promulgated his peculiar opinions, so large a band of followers had gathered round him, that both Church and State began to dread the new sect which had arisen, and was daily growing in numbers and in influence. They were Nonconformists of a peculiar kind, more stern and unyielding than any that had yet appeared. They refused to pay tithes, believing that their doing so would be on their part a virtual recognition of an unchristian system. No wonder that in the intolerant reign of the Second Charles, these earnest men should call down upon them the vengeance of Laud and the Star Chamber. In the face of the most cruel persecution, the followers of Fox were steady and persevering in their proclamation of what they believed to be the truth of God. The result was, that thousands were imprisoned and their goods confiscated, while some, wearied and worn out with grinding oppression, sought a home on a foreign shore. Of these, two female Friends, Mary Fisher and Ann Austin, sailed for America. They reached the port of Boston in July 1656, and their arrival roused the inhabitants of the town to such fury that the poor unoffending women were not suffered to land, but compelled to return in the same ship to England. The most stringent enactments were passed against the introduction of Friends into the colony. All however was ineffectual, numbers found their way into the town of Boston, and their principles were embraced by a considerable number of the people. The spirit of persecution now burst forth in America with even greater virulence than in England. The peaceable Friends were treated with the most inhuman cruelty, and several of them were put to death on the gallows. The New England Puritans exhibited a savage cruelty towards the persecuted strangers who had landed on their shores, such as it is impossible to read without feelings of horror. Some had their ears cut off, others their tongues bored through with a hot iron, others were stripped naked and publicly whipped, many were heavily fined, many were imprisoned, and many more were doomed to perpetual exile.

Mr. Marsden, in his 'Christian Churches and Sects,' gives a lively picture of the last hours of some of the martyrs of this bloody period in New England: "The first victims who sealed their testimony with their blood were William Robinson, a merchant of London, and Marmaduke Stephenson of Yorkshire, who, together with Mary Dyer, the wife of a respectable colonist, were sentenced to the gallows in October, 1659. Robinson and Stephenson had been banished under the law of the previous year; they soon returned, and paid the forfeit of their lives. Mary Dyer was reprieved after the halter had been put about her neck; for it appears that these cruelties disgusted many of the colonists, and that Endicot, struggling between a sense of shame, and the impulses of fanaticism, was disposed, upon the whole, to spare her life. She was conveyed on horseback, attended by four guards, to Rhode Island; in the spring she returned to Boston, and was immediately brought before Endicot, and condemned to die the next day. She was led through the town, guarded with a troop of soldiers, the drums beating all the way, to drown her voice, had she attempted to address the people. She was again beneath the gallows, when a reprieve was offered if she would promise to return into banishment. 'In obedience to the will of the Lord I came,' she said, 'and in his will I abide faithful unto death.' She was told that she was guilty of her own blood, to which she made answer thus: 'Nay; I came to keep bloodguiltiness from you, desiring you to repeal the unrighteous and unjust law of banishment under pain of death, made against the innocent servants of the Lord; therefore, my blood will be required at your hands who wilfully do it; but for those who do it in the simplicity of their hearts, I desire the Lord to forgive them. I came to do the will of my Father, and in obedience to His will I stand, even to death.' Thus Mary Dyer bore her last testimony to the two great Quaker doctrines of implicit submission to the guidance of the inward light, and of passive quietude in suffering without wrath and almost without remonstrance.

"We might give a frightful catalogue of men and women whipped from town to town, through the New England States; but it is enough to show the discipline through which Quakerism passed in its infancy, and the character of the age in which it was cradled so roughly. The people of England and the Parliament were shocked; and Endicot and his friends felt it necessary to send home an apology for their cruelties, and 'to vindicate themselves,' as they say, 'from the clamorous accusations of severity.' They advance no extenuation, except the necessity of providing for their own security against 'the impetuous, frantic fury' of the Quakers—the impetuous, frantic fury, to wit, of Mary Dyer!

"Other martyrs followed. In 1661 William Leddra and Wenlock Christison thought fit to return from banishment, and were immediately imprisoned in chains. When brought to trial, Leddra asked, reasonably enough, 'What evil have I done?' The court answered, that his own confession was as good as a thousand witnesses; that he maintained the innocence of the Quakers who had been put to death; and, moreover, that he kept his hat on in court; and that he said thee and thou. 'Will you put me to death,' said he, 'for speaking English, and for not taking off my clothes?' 'A man,' replied the court, 'may speak treason in English.' 'And is it treason,' he rejoined, 'to say thee and thou to a single person?' He received no answer; but ten days afterwards he was hanged, exclaiming, 'I commit my righteous cause to thee, O God.' Christison was asked upon his trial by Endicot the governor, 'What dost thou here?' 'I am come here,' said the prisoner, 'to warn you that you shed no more innocent blood, for the blood which you have shed already cries to the Lord God for vengeance to come upon you.' Whereupon it was said, 'Take him away, gaoler.' He was brought up again, and tried by a jury, for the colonists now began to fear the opinion of the mother-country; he was brought in guilty, protesting manfully against the iniquity of their proceedings. 'I appeal,' said he, 'to the laws of my own nation; I never heard or read of any law in England to hang Quakers!' His courage saved his life: in a few days, Wenlock and twenty-seven of his friends were set at liberty. Wenlock treated his judges with contempt. 'What means this?' said he, 'have you a new law, that I am to be set at liberty?' 'Yes,' said they. 'Then,' he replied, 'you have deceived most people.' 'How so?' said they. 'Because they thought the gallows had been your last weapon.' Two of the company, Peter Pearson and Judith Brown, as some atonement for the wounded honour of the magistrates, were stripped to the waist, fastened to a cart's-tail, and whipped through the town of Boston. Soon afterwards an order arrived from Charles II., who was now restored, dated the 9th of December, 1661, commanding Endicot to desist from further proceedings against the Quakers; whatever their offence, and whether they had been condemned or not, they were to be sent over to England, together with the respective crimes and offences laid to their charge, and tried according to the laws of the land at home.

Happily for the persecuted Quakers, Governor Endicot died the next year. One of his last acts, in defiance of the crown, was the flogging of a Quaker.

It was with such a baptism of blood that the Society of Friends in America commenced its career. The principles of the body, however, continued to spread with the most amazing rapidity. In 1682, a large accession was made to their numbers by the arrival of William Penn from England, who, having had an extensive tract of land made over to him by royal charter, planted the flourishing colony of Pennsylvania. In the first year of its settlement, nearly three thousand colonists arrived, and with various fluctuations, the colony of Pennsylvania, with its large capital city Philadelphia, which contains about half a million of inhabitants, continues to be the chief seat of the Friends in America. In Indiana, the number of Friends amounts to about 40,000. The youth of the New England Friends, Dr. Schaff informs us, desert largely either to the Episcopal church or to the indifferent world.

The Friends in America are calculated to amount to nearly 200,000. As a body they are orthodox in doctrine, and firmly cleave to the Bible and the original doctrine and discipline of the sect; but a small party, named from their founder, Elias Hicks, HICKSITES (which see), having departed from the truth, separated from the main body in 1827. They hold Unitarian and rationalistic opinions in reference to the divinity of Christ, and identify the inward light with natural reason. The Hicksite Friends are among the most strenuous advocates of abolitionism and female emancipation. A class of American Quakers, contrary to the general views of the Friends, who condemn all war as unlawful, joined in the Revolutionary War, and hence received the name of "the Fighting Quakers." At an early period, immediately after the death of Fox, which occurred in 1691, George Keith, one of the most learned members of the Society, who had settled in Pennsylvania, became involved in a controversy with his brethren on the human nature of Christ, which terminated in 1695 in his expulsion from the body with his adherents. This gave rise to a sect called after their founder KEITHIANS (which see).

FRIENDS OF GOD, Christian societies which were formed in the south and west of Germany, as early as the thirteenth century, and continued onwards gradually preparing the way for the Reformation in the sixteenth century. These societies had their principal seats in Strasburg, Basle, Cologne, and Nuremberg. The name by which they were known, Friends of God, was not intended to designate an exclusive party or sect, but simply to denote that the members had reached that stage of spiritual life at which they were actuated by disinterested love to God, such as they considered was indicated by the words of our blessed Lord in John xv. 15, "Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." One of the Friends of God, the Dominican John Tauler, thus comments on this passage, "The 'henceforth' was from the time they forsook all and followed him; then they were his friends and no longer servants." The characteristic features of the Friends of God as they were exhibited in practical life are thus noted by Neander: "From the number of these Friends of God came those monks and ecclesiastics who took the liveliest interest in the spiritual guidance of the laity, preached in the German language, and laboured not merely to educate the laity to orthodox thinking, to the devotional exercises of the church, to mortifications, and to various kinds of good works, but to lead them forward to a deeper experience of Christianity, to a truly divine life according to their own understanding of it. Great and striking was the difference between the common preachers who were eager to display their own acuteness and learning, who amused the people with tales and legends, warned them only against the grosser sins, and recommended almsgiving and donations to the church, and these preachers belonging to the Friends of God, who entered profoundly into the internal religious life, and sought to trace sanctification back to a hidden life in God as its inmost ground. Great and striking the difference between those who had no other object in view than to work on the imagination by descriptions of hell and of purgatory, and thus to frighten men from sin or drive them to purchase indulgences, and those men who pointed beyond fear and the hope of reward, to the love of God which could desire no higher portion than Himself! From the number of these Friends of God came those priests, who, scorning to be troubled by the common scruples during the time of the papal interdict and amidst the ravages of the Black Death, bestowed the consolations of religion on the forsaken people. They put forth from Strasburg, a letter addressed to the collective body of the clergy, arguing to show the injustice and wrong of leaving the poor ignorant people to die under the ban. Thus Tauler in Strasburg, without fear of the black vomit, which carried off many of the clergy, laboured incessantly during the interdict for the welfare of the people. These Friends of God could pursue their work with the less opposition because they recognized in all the standing regulations of the church the divine appointment; because they followed the principle of passive obedience, where it did not directly contradict the demands of their own consciences, and strictly submitted to their ecclesiastical superiors. They recommended the conscientious discharge of all duties required by the church laws, looked upon every outward exercise of religion prescribed by the church as a preparation for a higher stage of spiritual perfection; and yet they knew how to warn men at the same time against all externalization of religion and supposed meritoriousness of good works. They pointed constantly from external things to the more hidden depths of the religious life. Thus Tauler, in a sermon where he compares many prelates of his time with blind leaders of the blind, after having spoken of the several gradations of spiritual superiors, from the pope downwards, remarks: 'Were they all disposed to treat me ill, to be wolves to me and snap at me, I am still to lay myself in true resignation and submissiveness humbly at their feet, and to do it without murmur or gainsaying.' The same preacher says: 'Behold, for this, have all works been invented and devised, with good exercises of virtue, such as prayer, reading, singing, fasting, watching, and kneeling, and whatever other virtuous exercises there may be, that the man may be occupied therewith and kept away from foreign, unsuitable, ungodly things. Know, that shouldst thou let thyself be stabbed a thousand times a-day, and come to life again; shouldst thou let thyself be strung to a wheel, and eat thorns and stones; with all this, thou couldst not overcome sin of thyself. But sink thyself into the deep, unfathomable mercy of God, with a humble, submissive will, under God and all creatures, and know that then alone Christ would give it thee, out of his great kindness, and free goodness, and love, and compassion.'

The Friends of God exercised a powerful influence over the laity, not only by their preaching and attention to common pastoral duties, but by acting as confessors and guides, urging upon those who submitted to them the duty of following their instructions as if they heard a voice from heaven. It often happened, accordingly, that priests adopted as confessors laymen whom they might happen to regard as more advanced than they in the Divine life. Thus we find a layman, A. D. 1340, impelled by a thrice-repeated vision, travelling to Strasburg that he might further enlighten John Tauler, who at that time was considered one of the most distinguished preachers, and after hearing from him a sermon on Christian perfection, the lay-stranger plainly told him that he considered him a mere man of books and a Pharisee. So deeply was the mind of Tauler impressed with what this layman told him, that he chose him as the Friend of God, who was to be his guide, and submitted himself wholly for a time to his directions. The layman, who thus became the confessor of a priest, was Nicholas of Basle, a man of great influence in his day, and who, belonging to the ancient church of the Waldenses, devoted himself to the work of introducing a more experimental Christianity. And in this respect he had a great advantage over the other Friends of God, not being fettered by the enslaving tendencies of the ritualism of Rome. Nicholas continued through a long life to propagate the pure gospel both in Germany and France, but at length in his old age he was arrested at Vienna by the Inquisition, and burned as a heretic at the stake. It was scarcely to be expected that in an age when men were simply groping after the light, there should have existed no differences of opinion among the members of societies so numerous and wide-spread as the Friends of God. The fundamental idea of their teaching was, that men ought to long after union with God, and while the due subordination of the creature to the Creator was kept in view, as well as the infinite distance of sinful man from a holy God, there was little danger of such an idea leading to heresy. But when man began to throw aside his becoming humility, and to exalt and even deify himself, the consequence was, the gradual introduction of a fanatical pantheism, opposed to all positive revelation, to everything supernatural, to every intimation of a God above the world. Thus there arose in these Christian societies, in course of time, two parties widely differing from each other, a Theistic and a Pantheistic party, the first considering it necessary to unite the contemplative with the practical in actual life, the intuitive absorption in God with active love; while the other regarded it as the highest perfection to attain a pantheistic quietism that despised all active labour. The writings of Eckhart afford examples of the latter teaching; the writings of Ruysbrock, and Tauler of the former. The pantheism of Eckhart is displayed in such propositions as these: "We are transformed wholly into God, and transformed into him in the same way as, in the sacrament, the bread is transformed into the body of Christ. I become thus transformed into him, because it is he himself who brings it about that I am his. All that the Father gave to his Son when born into human nature, all this he has given to me; I except nothing here, neither unity nor holiness; but he has given all to me as to himself. All that the holy Scriptures say of Christ, is true also of every good and godlike man. Everything that belongs to the divine essence, belongs also to the godly and righteous man; therefore such a person does all that God does, and with God created the heavens and the earth, and is a begetter of the eternal Word, and God can do nothing without such a person. The good man must make his own will so identical with God's will as to will all that God wills; because God, in a certain sense, wills that I should have sinned, I ought not to wish that I had not sinned."

In the view of these Pantheists the great thing was God in the mind or consciousness of man. They imagined the creatures to be in themselves nothing; God the true being, the real substance of all things. Against such erroneous mystics Ruysbrock earnestly contended. "No doubt they reckon themselves," says he, "very wise and holy; but as they have not been baptized with the Divine Spirit and true love, they do not find God and his kingdom, but only their own essence, and a formless repose in which, as they fancy, they enjoy felicity." Their radical error Ruysbrock viewed as developing itself in a fourfold form, either as directed against the Holy Ghost, constituting what may be termed Pantheistic Quiet- ism; or against the Father, forming Pantheistic Realism; or against the Son, a form of heresy which Ullmann proposes to call Panchristianism; or generally against God and the church, constituting pure Nihilism. The first form of heresy consisted in their placing themselves above the Holy Spirit, and in claiming a perfect identity with the absolute which reposes in itself, and is without act or operation. The second form consisted in placing themselves simply and directly on an equality with God, considering themselves as by nature God, and having come into existence by their own free will. The third form consisted in putting themselves upon a level with Christ, both according to his divine and human natures. The last form of heresy consisted in setting themselves on a level with the absolute nullity, having wholly lost themselves, and having become that nullity which they believed God to be. The spirit of Pantheistic mysticism in the different forms thus referred to, in process of time pervaded extensively the affiliated societies of the Friends of God. But by the strenuous efforts of Ruysbrock a more correct mode of thinking began to manifest itself, along with an earnest desire for practical reform. These two tendencies were combined in the teaching of Ruysbrock, and by his influence and instructions he was the instrument of giving John Tauler to Germany, and Gerhard Groot to the Netherlands, both of whom originated brotherhoods or societies more pure in doctrine and more practical in their spirit than the Friends of God. We refer to the Brethren of the Common Lot, the Brethren of the Free Spirit, and similar institutions, which tended powerfully to train the public mind to more correct views of Divine truth, and thus operated as useful forerunners of the Reformation.

FRIGGA, the principal goddess among the ancient Scandinavians. She is supposed to have been the Earth, which many ancient nations worshipped, calling her Mother Earth, and the Mother of the Gods. Frigga was the daughter of Fjörgyn, and as the wife of Odin, the Alfadir or All-Father, they and their offspring form the race that are called the Æsir, a race that dwelt in Asgard the old, and the regions around it. Frigga was at once the daughter and the wife of Odin. Their firstborn son was Asa-Thor, who is endowed with strength and valour, and therefore hath power over everything that hath life. Frigga has a magnificent mansion in Asgard called Fensalir.

FUNERAL RITES. It seems to have been the custom of the Hebrews at a very early period to bury their dead a few days after the vital spark had fled, as it was inconvenient to keep a dead body long unburied, any one who touched it being by the Levitical law ceremonially unclean, and consequently deprived of spiritual privileges, as well as cut off from all intercourse with friends and neighbours. During their sojourn in Egypt the Hebrews deferred burial, and it was probably in reference to this practice that Moses extended the period of uncleanness contracted from a dead body to seven days, that the people might be induced to hasten the interment of their dead. The Jews used no coffin for the burial of the dead, but simply a bier or narrow bed, consisting of a plain wooden frame on which the body was placed, and thus carried by bearers to the tomb. In 2 Chron. xvi. 14, it is said of the bier or bed in which king Asa was laid after his death, "And they buried him in his own sepulchres, which he had made for himself in the city of David, and laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art: and they made a very great burning for him." The coffin was not used except in Babylon or Egypt.

Funeral processions among the ancient Orientals were often on a grand scale, more especially when the deceased was a person of high rank. Thus we read an account of the funeral of Jacob in Gen. l. 7—9, "And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, and all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company." At the funeral of persons of inferior rank, the corpse was followed to the grave by the friends of the deceased, and also by mourners hired for the occasion. It appears to have been customary among many ancient nations to throw pieces of gold and silver along with other precious articles into the grave immediately after the body was deposited there. In very early times the dead were buried in caverns; afterwards the more humble classes were laid in holes dug in the earth, while the more wealthy were deposited in subterraneous recesses, either natural or artificial. The entrance into these latter burying-places was by a descent of a number of steps which led to several apartments. The bodies were laid in niches in the walls. The portals of these tombs were kept carefully closed, and the doors were painted white on the last month of every year, the month Adar, probably in order to prevent those who came to the passover from touching them, and thereby being rendered ceremonially unclean. To secure a family burying-place was regarded among the Jews as a matter of great importance, and accordingly, a minute account is given in the Book of Genesis of the purchase by Abraham of a sepulchre from the sons of Hetli. To be deprived of burial was accounted one of the heaviest of calamities, and it is denounced against Jezebel as a punishment for her crimes. The family tombs of the Jews were generally near their houses, and often in their gardens. Such was the case with the sepulchre belonging to Joseph of Arimathea, in which the body of our blessed Lord was laid. There seems to have existed at Jerusalem a separate burying-place for the Jewish kings, and no greater dishonour could be shown to any of their monarchs than to exclude him from this privileged resting place.

The modern Jews, instead of close coffins use four plain boards loosely joined together; and the Rabbies say that the bottom should only consist of laths, in order that the worms may destroy the body the sooner, for according to Rabbi Isaac, "A worm in a dead body is as painful as a needle in a living one." When the corpse is laid within the four plain boards, there is put over the other sepulchral garments the Talleth or square garment with fringes, which the deceased had been accustomed to wear in the synagogue. The funeral rites are thus described by Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism': "When the body is carried to the place of interment, the coffin is opened; and some earth, supposed to have been brought from Jerusalem, is placed under the head in a small bag, or strewed about the body, as a preservative. The relations and friends of the deceased then approach the corpse, one after another, holding one of his great toes in each hand, and imploring him to pardon all the offences they had committed against him in his life-time, and not to report evil against them in the other world: and the nearest relations have their garments rent.

"Among the Jews in some countries, it is customary, after the coffin has been nailed up, for ten men to walk in solemn procession round it seven times; repeating at the same time, prayers for the soul of the deceased: but this custom is not universal.

"When the coffin is placed in the ground, each of the relations throws some earth upon it; and as soon as the grave is filled, the persons who have conducted the interment, all run away as fast as possible, lest they should hear the knock of the angel, who is supposed to come and knock upon the coffin, saying in Hebrew: Wicked! wicked! what is thy Pasuk?" See DEAD (BEATING THE).

"When the relations return from the funeral, they all sit down upon the floor, and a chair is placed before them, with eggs boiled hard, a little salt, and a small loaf; a small portion of which is eaten by each of them, in order to break the fast which they profess to have kept from the moment of the decease: and ten Jews who have passed the age of thirteen, repeat prayers for the dead morning and evening; and at the close of these prayers, the sons of the deceased, or his nearest male relatives, repeat the Kodesh,—a prayer which is considered as having sufficient efficacy to deliver the deceased from hell."

It is a current belief among the modern Jews, that the final resurrection will take place in Canaan, and that those who are buried in other countries will be rolled through subterranean caverns till they reach that sacred country. One of the greatest objects of ambition, therefore, with every Israelite is, that if at all practicable he may draw his last breath in the land of Palestine; and it is not unusual for those who have it in their power, to resort thither in their old age, with the view of dying on the sacred soil, and thus sparing themselves the long journey after death, which, as they imagine, they would otherwise be compelled to undertake. When the modern Jews, in the case of a burial, reach the place of interment, a speech is addressed to the dead in such terms as these, "Blessed be God, who has formed thee, fed thee, maintained thee, and taken away thy life. O Dead! he knows your number, and shall one day restore your life. Blessed be he that takes away life and restores it."

At the first introduction of Christianity, the custom of burning the dead prevailed throughout the whole Roman Empire, but the early Christians protested against this custom, and manifested a decided preference for the practice of burying the dead after the example of the Jews. They had at first no separate burial-places, but laid their dead in the public places of interment, which, according to both Jewish and Roman laws, were situated outside the cities. It was not until the fourth century that an open space around the church was selected by the Christians as a place appropriated for the burial, first of the clergy, and afterwards of the members of the church. The practice of consecrating burying-grounds was not introduced before the sixth century. The dead began to be interred within the walls of churches so late as the ninth century. See CEMETERY. Places of interment among the early Christians were often styled sleeping places, the death of believers being considered as a falling asleep in the Lord. The church did not approve of separate family sepulchres, but preferred that all the brethren should rest together in one common place of interment. In times of persecution the Christians were wont to bury their dead by night, and with the utmost secrecy. But in times of peace, as under Constantine and his sons, the funerals of Christians took place by day, and with no small pomp and ceremony. Under Julian the Apostate, the practice of burying under cloud of night was restored by law.

The following detailed account of the funeral rites of the primitive Christians is given by Mr. Coleman in his 'Christian Antiquities:' "The body was borne on a bier in solemn procession to the burial-place, and followed by the relatives and friends of the deceased as mourners, among whom the clergy and some others were reckoned. Besides these, many others, as spectators, joined in the procession. These processions were sometimes so thronged as to occasion serious accidents, and even the loss of life. It was the duty of the acolyths to conduct the procession. The bier was borne sometimes on the shoulder, and sometimes by the hands. The nearest relations, or persons of rank and distinction, were the bearers. Even the bishops and clergy often officiated in this capacity.

"The tolling of bells at funerals was introduced in the eighth and ninth centuries. Previous to the use of bells the trumpet and wooden clappers were used for similar purposes.

"Palms and olive branches were carried in funeral processions for the first time in the fourth century, in imitation of Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The cypress was rejected because it was a symbol of mourning. The carrying of burning lamps and tapers was earlier and more general. This was a festive representation of the triumph of the deceased over death, and of his union with Christ, as in the festival of the Lamb in the Apocalypse. The Christians repudiated the custom of crowning the corpse and the coffin with garlands, as savouring of idolatry. But it was usual with them to strew flowers upon the grave.

"Psalms and hymns were sung while the corpse was kept, while it was carried in procession, and around the grave. Notices of this custom are found in several authors. These anthems were altogether of a joyful character. But Bingham has well remarked, that 'we cannot expect to find much of this in the first ages, while the Christians were in a state of persecution; but as soon as their peaceable times were come, we find it in every writer. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions gives this direction, that they should carry forth their dead with singing, if they were faithful. "For precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints;" and again it is said, "Return to thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee. And the memory of the just shall be blessed: and the souls of the just are in the hand of the Lord." These, probably, were some of the versicles which made up their psalmody on such occasions. For Chrysostom, speaking of this matter, not only tells us the reason of their psalmody, but also what particular psalms or portions of them they made use of for this solemnity. "What mean our hymns?" says he; "do we not glorify God and give him thanks that he hath crowned him that is departed, that he hath delivered him from trouble, that he hath set him free from all fear? Consider what thou singest at that time, Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee. And again; I will fear no evil, because thou art with me. And again; Thou art my refuge from the affliction which compasseth me about. Consider what these psalms mean. If thou believest the things which thou sayest to be true, why dost thou weep and lament, and make a mere pageantry and mock of thy singing? If thou believest them not to be true, why dost thou play the hypocrite so much as to sing?" He speaks this against those who used excessive mourning at funerals, showing them the incongruity of that with this psalmody of the church.'

"Funeral prayers also constituted an appropriate part of the burial service of the dead.

"Funeral orations were also delivered, commemorative of the deceased. Several of these are still extant, as that of Eusebius at the funeral of Constantine; those of Ambrose on the deaths of Theodosius and Valentinian, and of his own brother Satyrus; those of Gregory, and of Nazianzum upon his father, his brother Cæsarius, and his sister Gorgonia.

"The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered at funerals, and often at the grave itself. By this rite it was intimated that the communion of saints was still perpetuated between the living and the dead. It was a favourite idea that both still continued members of the same mystical body one and the same on earth and in heaven. This mode of celebrating the Supper was also an honourable testimony to the faith of the deceased, and of his consistent Christian profession in life. The Roman Catholic superstition of offerings and masses for the dead took its rise from this ancient usage of the church. Some time previous to the sixth and seventh centuries, it became customary to administer the elements to the dead—to deposit a portion of the elements in the coffin—to give a parting kiss of charity, and to conclude the funeral solemnities with an entertainment similar to the agapæ. Of these usages the first mentioned were speedily abolished, and the last was gradually discontinued. It was universally customary with Christians to deposit the corpse in the grave, as in modern times, facing the east, and in the same attitude as at the present day."

Among the Mohammedans, the corpse is always buried on the day of the decease, or about twelve hours after it, the body having been previous to interment carefully washed, wrapped in grave-clothes, and placed on a bier covered over with a shawl, but it is not a Moslem custom to bury in coffins. The funeral procession is headed by six or more poor men, generally blind, who march slowly along chanting in a mournful tone the Mussulman profession, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet." Then follow the male relations of the deceased, along with two or more Dervishes carrying the flags of their order. Next in the procession come a number of boys carrying a copy of the Koran, and chanting aloud parts of a poem in reference to the events of the judgment day. Immediately after follows the bier carried head foremost by the friends of the deceased, and behind the bier walk the female mourners and wailing women shrieking loudly. The female relatives and friends have their heads bound round with a strip of linen or muslin, usually blue, tied behind in a knot, and the ends hanging down a few inches. Among the lower classes the mourning women have frequently their faces, heads, and bosoms covered with mud. In the cases of the funerals of the wealthy, the procession is sometimes preceded by several camels carrying provisions which are to be distributed to the poor at the tomb.

The bier is first taken to the mosque where the service for the dead is read, at the close of which the procession is again formed, and marches slowly to the burial ground, where the body is taken out and laid in the vault or grave, with the face turned towards Mecca. It is not an infrequent custom to leave a jug of water on the top of the grave, and to hang rags of different colours as votive offerings on the branches of the trees. The last act of the funeral rites of the Moslems is a peculiar ceremony already noticed under the article DEAD (EXAMINATION OF THE). The Turks generally believe that the soul is in a state of torment after death, until the body has been deposited in the grave, and accordingly, their funeral processions, instead of walking slowly and solemnly along, march at a quick and lively pace. It is declared in the Koran, that he who carries a dead body forty paces, procures for himself the expiation of a great sin.

Mr. Jowett, in his 'Christian Researches in Syria,' thus describes the funeral rites of the Montenegrins, which resemble somewhat those of the Oriental nations: "The deceased person is laid out for twenty-four hours, in the house where he expires, with the face uncovered; and is perfumed with essences, and strewed with flowers and aromatic leaves, after the custom of the ancients. The lamentations are renewed every moment, particularly on the arrival of a fresh person, and especially of the priest. Just before the defunct is carried out of the house, his relations whisper in his ear, and give him commissions for the other world, to their departed relatives or friends. After these singular addresses, a pall or winding-sheet is thrown over the dead person, whose face continues uncovered, and he is carried to church; while on the road thither, women, hired for the purpose, chant his praises amid their tears. Previously to depositing him in the ground, the next of kin ties a piece of cake to his neck, and puts a piece of money in his hand, after the manner of the ancient Greeks. During this ceremony, as also while they are carrying him to the burial-ground, a variety of apostrophes is addressed to the defunct, which are interrupted only by mournful sobs, asking him why he quitted them? why he abandoned his family? he whose poor wife loved him so tenderly, and provided everything for him to eat; whose children obeyed him with such respect, while his friends succoured him whenever he wanted assistance; who possessed such beautiful flocks, and all whose undertakings were blessed by Heaven."

It is the peculiarity of Eastern funerals that meditation and plaintive psalmody is more abundant than the other services. Touching addresses are also given as it were from the dead to his surviving relatives, as well as lamentations over him in return, as they bestow a parting kiss upon the clay-cold corpse. The custom is very prevalent among Christians of the Greek church, of putting into the hands of the deceased at his interment a written form of absolution, which is understood to be a discharge in full from all the sins which he has committed during life. The funeral rites observed in the Russo-Greek Church are thus described by Dr. Pinkerton: "As soon as a Russian dies, the corpse is immediately washed with lukewarm water; the members of the body are all placed in their natural position, the eyelids and lips carefully closed, his best wearing apparel is put on, and the body is placed upon a bier, in an empty room among the rich, and below the sacred pictures in the huts of the poor. The Psalms are read over it night and day, until it is removed to the church on the day of interment, accompanied by the clergy, carrying pictures of the saints in their hands, and by the nearest friends, and a chorus of singers, who chant psalms as the procession moves slowly along the streets. 'It is still the practice among all ranks, but especially of the lower, to weep and make loud lamentations over their dead, uttering unconnected sentences in their praise. During the funeral procession, their excess of grief frequently discovers itself in this way. But to hire mourners for the express purpose of acting a part on such occasions, is not usual in Great Russia; and in Little Russia, this mode of publicly expressing grief is nearly done away with.' At the church, the burial-service (some parts of which are most pathetic and beautiful) is read over the body, after which the relatives and friends embrace the corpse, and, asking forgiveness, (as they express themselves,) take their last farewell. During the whole ceremony and service, the countenance is uncovered, and the head decorated with a crown made of gilt paper, or some more costly material, according to the condition of the deceased. At the shutting of the coffin, that which has been ridiculously styled the passport, after being read over the corpse by the officiating priest, is put into the hand of the deceased."

The ancient Northern nations were accustomed to burn their dead, a practice which was followed also by the ancient Britons, after which the ashes of the deceased were carefully collected and deposited in hilly mounds, which are called BARROWS (which see). Sometimes, however, the relics were placed in a chest, and in a later age in a funeral urn; but the custom of burying the dead had begun to be practised by the Anglo-Saxons when their history was first written by the Christian clergy, and was never afterwards discontinued. The ordinary coffins were of wood, and the superior ones of stone. Kings were interred in stone coffins, their bodies being wrapped in linen, but the clergy were dressed in their priestly vestments. "When a hero or chief," as Mallet informs us in his Northern Antiquities, "fell gloriously in battle, his funeral obsequies were honoured with all possible magnificence. His arms, his gold and silver, his war-horse, and whatever else he held most dear, were placed with him on the pile. His dependants and friends frequently made it a point of honour to die with their leader, in order to attend on his shade in the palace of Odin. Nothing, in fact, seemed to them more grand and noble than to enter Valhalla with a numerous retinue, all in their finest armour and richest apparel. The princes and nobles never failed of such attendants. His arms, and the bones of the horse on which Chilperic I. supposed he should be presented to this warrior god, have been found in his tomb. They did in reality firmly believe, and Odin himself had assured them, that whatever was buried or consumed with the dead, accompanied them to his palace. The poorer people, from the same persuasion, carried at least their most necessary utensils and a little money, not to be entirely destitute in the other world. From a like motive, the Greeks and Romans put a piece of silver into the dead man's mouth, to pay his passage over the Styx. The Laplanders to this day provide their dead with a flint and every thing necessary for lighting them along the dark passage they have to traverse after death."

Among the Chinese the funeral rites are of a very peculiar description. As soon as an individual dies, his body is enclosed in an air-tight coffin, and kept for seven weeks in the house, in the course of which time, every fourth day is devoted to special funeral ceremonies. Food is offered to the dead body, the essence of which it is supposed to eat, and prayers are put up by Buddhist and Taoist priests for the happiness of their spirits. Women are the principal mourners among the Chinese, and it is often a most affecting sight to see them kneeling and howling in lonely burial-grounds, by the graves of their husbands and children. Their places of burial are in barren hills and mountain sides, but sometimes vaults are preferred: great numbers of dead bodies are placed in plank coffins, and retained above ground for many years. The deceased members of the same family may sometimes be seen laid side by side in open sheds to the amount of fifteen or twenty. The Buddhist priests burn the bodies of their dead and place them in common vaults.

The Japanese either burn or bury the corpse according to the wish of the person, which is usually expressed on his death-bed. Of the funeral ceremonies observed at Nagasaki, Titsingh, an old writer, gives the following account: "The body, after being carefully washed by a favourite servant, and the head shaved, is clothed according to the state of the weather, and (if a female, in her best apparel) exactly as in life, except that the sash is tied, not in a bow, but strongly fastened with two knots, to indicate that it is never more to be loosed. The body is then covered with a piece of linen, folded in a peculiar manner, and is placed on a mat in the middle of the hall, the head to the north. Food is offered to it, and all the family lament.

"After being kept for forty-eight hours, the body is placed on its knees in a tub-shaped coffin, which is enclosed in a square, oblong box, or bier, the top of which is roof-shaped, called quan. Two ifays are also prepared—wooden tablets of a peculiar shape and fashion, containing inscriptions commemorative of the deceased, the time of his decease, and the name given to him since that event.

"The ifays and quan, followed by the eldest son and the family, servants, friends and acquaintances are borne in a procession, with flags, lanterns, &c. to one of the neighbouring temples, whence, after certain ceremonies, in which the priests take a leading part, they are carried, by the relatives only, to the grave, where a priest, while waiting their arrival, repeats certain hymns. The moment they are come, the tub containing the body is taken out of the quan and deposited in the grave, which is then filled with earth and covered with a flat stone, which again is covered with earth, and over the whole is placed the quan and one of the ifays, which is removed at the end of seven weeks, to make room for the sisete, or grave-stone. If the deceased had preferred to be burnt, the quan is taken to the summit of one of two neighbouring mountains, on the top of each of which is a sort of furnace, prepared for this purpose, enclosed in a small hut. The coffin is then taken from the quan, and, being placed in the furnace, a great fire is kindled. The eldest son is provided with an earthen urn, in which first the bones and then the ashes are put, after which the mouth of the urn is sealed up. While the body is burning, a priest recites hymns. The urn is then carried to the grave, and deposited in it, and, the grave being filled up, the quan is placed over it.

"The eldest son and his brothers are dressed in white, in garments of undyed hempen stuff, as are the bearers, and all females attending the funeral, whether relatives or not; the others wear their usual dresses. The females are carried in norimons, behind the male part of the procession, which proceeds on foot, the nearest relatives coming first. The eldest daughter takes precedence of the wife. The eldest son and heir, whether by blood or adoption, who is the chief mourner, wears also a broad-brimmed hat, of rushes, which hang about his shoulders, and in this attire does not recognize nor salute anybody."

In Western Africa funerals are conducted in a style of great pomp and magnificence. On this subject Mr. Wilson, who was many years a missionary in the country, affords minute information. "The corpse," he tells us, "is washed, painted, and decked in the handsomest clothes, with the greatest profusion of beads that can be procured, and is then placed in a rude coffin, in some conspicuous place, while the ordinary funeral ceremonies are performed. The character and pomp of the ceremonies, of course, depend upon the age and the standing of the man before death. If he has been a person of importance in the community, his friends and the townspeople assemble at an early hour in front of the house where the corpse reposes, and form themselves into a circle, enclosing a large open space. A live bullock, tied by the four feet, is placed in the centre of the circle, and is to be slaughtered at the proper time, nominally for the dead, but really for the visitors who come to participate in the ceremonies. Every body is expected to bring some kind of present for the dead, which may be a string of beads, a knife, a plate, a pipe, or a looking-glass; all of which are laid in the coffin, or by its side, to be taken to the grave. Most of the men are expected to bring with them a good supply of powder, and testify their respect for the dead by the number of times they fire their guns in the open square, and the amount of ammunition with which they are loaded. Sometimes fifty or a hundred men are discharging their muskets at the same time, not only stunning the ears of all around, but enveloping themselves so completely with the smoke as not to be seen except by the flash from the fire-pan. The only precaution observed, is merely to elevate the muzzles of their guns above the heads of those in the circus with themselves.

"When these ceremonies are concluded, two persons take up the coffin (which, among the Grebos, is usually a section of a canoe boxed up at the two ends) to carry it to the graveyard. Sometimes the dead refuses to leave the town, and the bearers are driven hither and thither by a power which they affect not to be able to withstand. They go forward for a few moments, and then are suddenly whirled around, and carried back at the top of their speed. The head man of the family then approaches the bier, and talks plaintively and soothingly to the corpse—inquires why he is unwilling to go to the grave-yard—reminds him that many of his friends and kindred are already there, and assures him that every attention will be given by his surviving friends to his future wants.

"Under the influence of this persuasion, the restraints which were imposed upon the bearers are relaxed, and they set out once more to the place of burial. They have not gone far, however, when they are thrown violently against some man's house, which is tantamount to an accusation that the proprietor, or some other member of the household, has been the cause of the death. The suspected person is at once arrested, and must undergo the 'red-water' ordeal. The corpse, after this, is borne quietly to its resting-place, when the bearers rush to the water side, and undergo a thorough ablution before they are permitted to return to the town. Guns are fired, morning and evening, for some weeks afterward, in honour of the dead, provided he has been a man of prominence and influence in the community. Food is occasionally taken to the place of burial for months and years afterward, where a small house is built over the grave, furnished with a chair or mat, a jug to hold water, a staff to use when he walks abroad, a looking-glass, and almost every other article of furniture or dress that a living man would need. All blood-relations are required to shave their heads, and wear none but the poorest and most tattered garments for one month. The wives are required to come together every morning and evening, and spend an hour in bewailing their husband."

The funeral ceremonies in Southern Africa are of a very peculiar kind. They are thus described by Mr. Moffat, missionary in that continent: "When they see any indications of approaching dissolution in fainting fits or convulsive throes, they throw a net over the body, and hold it in a sitting posture, with the knees brought in contact with the chin, till life is gone. The grave, which is frequently made in the fence surrounding the cattle fold, or in the fold itself, if for a man, is about three feet in diameter, and six feet deep. The body is not conveyed through the door of the fore-yard or court connected with each house, but an opening is made in the fence for that purpose. It is carried to the grave, having the head covered with a skin, and is placed in a sitting posture. Much time is spent in order to fix the corpse exactly facing the north; and though they have no compass, they manage, after some consultation, to place it very nearly in the required position. Portions of an ant-hill are placed about the feet, when the net which held the body is gradually withdrawn; as the grave is filled up, the earth is handed in with bowls, while two men stand in the hole to tread it down round the body, great care being taken to pick out every thing like a root or pebble. When the earth reaches the height of the mouth, a small twig or branch of an acacia is thrown in, and on the top of the head a few roots of grass are placed; and when the grave is nearly filled, another root of grass is fixed immediately above the head, part of which stands above ground. When finished, the men and women stoop, and with their hands scrape the loose soil around on to the little mound. A large bowl of water, with an infusion of bulbs, is then brought, when the men and women wash their hands and the upper part of their feet, shouting 'pùla, pùla,' rain, rain. An old woman, probably a relation, will then bring his weapons, bows, arrows, war axe, and spears, also grain and garden seeds of various kinds, and even the bone of an old pack-ox, with other things, and address the grave, saying, 'there are all your articles.' These are then taken away, and bowls of water are poured on the grave, when all retire, the women wailing, 'yo, yo, yo,' with some doleful dirge, sorrowing without hope. These ceremonies vary in different localities, and according to the rank of the individual, who is committed to the dust. It is remarkable that they should address the dead; and I have eagerly embraced this season to convince them that if they did not believe in the immortality of the soul, it was evident from this, to them now unmeaning custom, that their ancestors once did. Some would admit this might possibly have been the case, but doubted whether they could have been so foolish. But with few exceptions among such a people, argument soon closes, or is turned into ridicule, and the great difficulty presents itself of producing conviction where there is no reflection. When we would appeal to the supposed influence of the dead body in neutralizing the rain-maker's medicines for producing rain, and inquire how such an influence operated, the reply would be, 'The rain-maker says so.'

Such are a few specimens of the funeral ceremonies of modern heathendom. We pass now to notice the peculiar customs in this respect of the ancient Pagans. So important was the burial of the dead accounted among the Greeks of antiquity, that it was believed a soul could not enter Elysium until the body was interred; and accordingly, if a dead body was found lying unburied, any individual who passed that way considered it a sacred duty to throw earth upon it. To leave a relative unburied was in the understanding of the Greeks one of the most heinous crimes which a man could commit; and the sooner any one could make arrangements for burying his dead so much the greater honour was he considered as paying them. In some places the funeral took place on the day immediately following the decease, but the most general custom was that which was decreed by the laws of Solon, namely, to carry out the body for burial early in the morning of the third day, before sunrise. Hired mourners accompanied the funeral procession playing plaintive airs on the flute. The corpse was preceded by the men, and followed by the women. The practices both of burning and burying the dead seem to have alike prevailed in the early period of Grecian history. The former custom has been already noticed. See DEAD (BURNING THE). If the body was not burnt, it was placed in a coffin, which was usually constructed of baked clay or earthenware, and borne to the place of interment outside the town, where sometimes a simple mound of earth or stones marked the place of burial, while in other cases a splendid tomb was erected over the dead, having a suitable Greek inscription. At the close of the funeral ceremony, a feast was held in the house of the nearest relative, and on the second day a sacrifice was offered to the dead.

The ancient Romans, even in the earliest times, buried their dead, though from the Twelve Tables it appears that they practised also burning. At one time all funerals took place under cloud of night, but afterwards this custom was only followed in the case of the poor. The interment usually took place on the eighth day after death. In the case of the wealthy the funeral procession was arranged by an individual selected for the purpose. In front marched musicians of different kinds playing melancholy strains, and behind these followed hired female mourners, who sung the nenia or funeral hymn in praise of the deceased. Then came in some cases buffoons, one of whom imitated the actions and even gestures of the deceased. The slaves followed whom the deceased had liberated, each of them wearing the cap of liberty. The corpse was preceded by images of the deceased and of his ancestors, along with the crowns or military decorations he had won.

In the funeral processions of the ancient Romans, the dead body of a poor man was carried on a bier or coffin, but when the deceased happened to be wealthy his corpse was placed upon a couch, constructed sometimes of ivory, covered with gold and purple, and carried to the tomb on the shoulders of his nearest relatives, or in some instances, of his freedmen. The other relations and friends of the deceased followed immediately behind the body, uttering loud wailings, and the females beating their breasts. The sons of the deceased walked in the procession with their heads veiled, and the daughters with their heads uncovered and their hair dishevelled. It was an ancient practice to carry the body through the forum, where the funeral train halted for a time, and an oration was pronounced in those cases in which the individual who had died was a man of note. At the close of this public eulogium, the procession moved slowly forward to the place of interment outside the city.

Roman burial-places were either public or private. The former were of two kinds; one for illustrious citizens who were interred as a mark of respect at the public expense, usually in the Campus Martius; the other for poor persons who were unable to purchase ground for themselves. Private burial-places were generally situated by the sides of the roads leading to Rome. It was not uncommon for the rich to have tombs built of marble, of various sizes and forms, according to the wealth and taste of the owner. It was usual for the family to give a feast in honour of the dead, sometimes on the day of the funeral, and at other times at the end of the nine days' mourning.

FUNERAL SERVICE, the office which the Church of England appoints to be read at the burial of the dead. It is said to have been of great antiquity, and to have been used both in the Eastern and Western churches. This service is read over all the dead indiscriminately, with the exception of those who die unbaptized, of self-murderers, and those who die under sentence of the greater excommunication. It has often been objected to the Funeral Service, that it contains language which cannot be used in reference to men generally, being only applicable in its true signification to those who have died in the Lord. Thus it declares, "That Almighty God of his great mercy hath taken to himself the soul of this our dear brother." "We give God hearty thanks that it hath pleased Him to deliver him out of the miseries of this sinful world." "We pray God that when we ourselves depart out of this life, we may rest in Christ as our hope is this our brother doth." "We commit his body to the ground, earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, in sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Such expressions as these occurring in an office read over the dead indiscriminately, cannot fail to offend the consciences of not a few both of the ministers and members of the Church of England.

FURIES See EUMENIDES.

FURINA, an ancient Roman goddess, who had a grove consecrated to her at Rome. She is said to have presided over thieves and robbers, but her name must have early disappeared from the Roman Pantheon, as Varro says, that in his time the name of this goddess was almost forgotten.

FURINALIA, an annual festival celebrated by the ancient Romans, in honour of the goddess FURINA (which see). It was observed towards the end of July, and the sacred services were conducted by a flamen.

G

GABRES. See GUEBRES.

GABRIEL (Heb. God my strength), the name of an angel four times mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures. He is referred to twice in the Book of Daniel, as sent from God to instruct the prophet, and twice in Luke's Gospel, as commissioned to make known, first to Zacharias, then to the Virgin Mary, the approaching birth of Christ. In Luke i. 19, he thus describes himself, "I am Gabriel that stand in the presence of God," and hence we are warranted in concluding that he occupies a place of special honour and dignity among the angelic hosts. A Jewish tradition is mentioned in the Book of Tobit, that there are seven spirits who stand continually in the presence of God, one of whom is Gabriel, who the Jews believe is stationed on the left hand of the throne. This angel is held in far higher estimation among the Mohammedans than the other angels as being in their view the chief ambassador of God and the personal friend of their prophet, who brought him the revelations from heaven which compose the Koran, and who conducted him to heaven mounted on his horse ALBORAC (which see). They regard him besides as decidedly hostile to the Jews, on account of their rejection of the Messiah, whom he particularly honours. Both the Talmud and the Koran abound in fables concerning the angel Gabriel. The Mohammedans allege that Gabriel possesses the power of descending from heaven to earth in an hour, and of overturning a mountain with one single feather of his wing.

GABRIEL (Str.) CONGREGATION OF, a so ciety of laymen founded by Cæsar Bianchetti, at Boulogne, about A. D. 1646, for improvement in Christian knowledge and virtue. ●

GABRIEL (FESTIVAL OF), a festival in honour of the archangel Gabriel, celebrated by the Greek church, on the 26th of March.

GABRIEL (ST.), and MICHAEL (ST.) (FESTIVAL OF), a festival held on the 1st of November by the Greek church, in honour of the two archangels Gabriel and Michael.

GAD, an ancient Syrian god. According to Solomon Jarchi, Gad is the name of an idol representing the star or constellation that presides over happy births, according to the ancient proverbs, Let Gad make him happy, and Let there be no weariness for him. Gad is supposed to have been the planet Jupiter, but some think it was Mars, and others allege it was the Moon, while Jurieu conjectures it to have been the Sun. In Gen. xxx. 11, occurs a much-contested passage, which our version translates, "And Leah said, A troop cometh, and she called his name Gad." In Arabic, the planet Jupiter is called Gad, and the Targum of Jonathan renders Leah's saying, "A propitious star cometh," while the Septuagint and the Vulgate give the meaning of the phrase simply, "good fortune." The Jews call the planet under whose presiding influence any one is born, good fortune, and at the marriage of their daughters present them with a ring, on which the words "good fortune" are engraved, and therefore Leah's expression has been supposed to mean that, according to astrological superstition, Gad was born under the propitious influence of the planet Jupiter.

GÆA. See GE.

GÆEOCHUS (Gr. the holder of the earth), a surname applied to Poseidon, under which he was worshipped near Therapne in Laconia. The same surname is also applied to other deities, as to Artemis at Thebes.

GAIANISTS, a sect of the MONOPHYSITES (which see), which arose in the sixth century, deriving its name from Gaianus, archdeacon of Alexandria, under the patriarch Timotheus III., at whose death, A. D. 543, he was elected patriarch of Alexandria by the monks and the populace in opposition to Theodosius the bishop of the court party. Great disturbances arose in Alexandria, and Gaianus was deposed, after which he fled first to Carthage, then to Sardinia, when we hear little more about him. Gaianus and his followers held the opinion of Julian of Halicarnassus, who maintained that the divine nature had so insinuated itself into the body of Christ from the very moment of his conception, that his body changed its nature and became incorruptible. Hence the sect received also the name of APHTHARTOCITES (which see).

GALENISTS, a name given to a party of the MENNONITES (which see) in Holland, in the seventeenth century. Their name was derived from their first teacher, Galenus Abrahams de Haan, a medical man, and a minister at Amsterdam, who taught that the Christian religion was not so much a system of doctrines to be believed, as of precepts to be obeyed, and he considered that all ought to be admitted to the privileges of the Christian church who believed in the inspiration of the Bible, and led pure and blameless lives. Galenus Abrahams besides was accused of leaning towards Socinian sentiments. The States-General of Holland, however, investigated the charge, and acquitted him on the 14th of September 1663. His chief opponent was Samuel Apostool, from whom originated the APOSTOOLIANs (which see), and who strenuously defended not only the divinity of Christ and the influences of his death, but also the peculiar sentiments of the Mennonites respecting the visible church of Christ on earth. The consequence of this contest was a schism among the Flemings in Amsterdam, the two opponents being ministers of the same church in that city. Some years afterwards the Waterlander church in Amsterdam united with the Galenists, who admitted all sects of Christians into communion with them, and were the only Anabaptists in Holland who refused to be called Mennonites. Galenus, in his Apology for his sect, recites one hundred and three articles of their opinions, which are chiefly upon mutual toleration and charity. He teaches that the Scripture, particularly the New Testament, is sufficient for salvation. He opposes the doctrine of original sin. He thus states the opinions of the sect upon the divinity of Christ: "We believe and profess that Jesus, born of the Virgin Mary, bred at Nazareth, and crucified, is truly the Messiah, the Son of God, who was to come into the world, in whom the patriarchs hoped with joy; whom they expected and earnestly desired; who was represented by many figures in the old law, and foretold by the prophets long before his coming.

"We think this profession is sufficient as to the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that it is not necessary for salvation to make any further inquiries as to his pre-existence, his becoming man, the union of what is called the two natures, divine and human, and other points so hotly contested amongst Christians; since Christ himself, and his apostles, were satisfied with this plain confession.

"But to explain our thoughts further on that subject: though we are fully convinced that the foregoing confession, with true obedience, suffices for salvation; yet we believe that the Son of God, whom St. John calls the Word or Speech, did not begin to exist when born of the blessed Virgin Mary: but that being the splendour of the glory of God his Father, and the imprinted image of his person, he has been in God his heavenly Father, before the world, this visible world was made. We acknowledge likewise and profess, that Jesus Christ our Lord, the Son of the living God, has been given unto us as our great Prophet, as our chief and eternal sacrificing Priest, and as our heavenly King."

The Galenists held that the submission of Christians was due to Christ alone, and therefore they refused to obey the decisions of councils, synods, or any ecclesiastical assemblies whatever. Christianity was in their view a mere system of morality. They rejected infant baptism, agreeing in this with the Mennonites generally, but they refused to acknowledge the practice of washing the feet, as at all designed by Christ to be literally followed by Christians in every age. They denied the power of the church to excommunicate its members, or to go beyond brotherly exhortations or remonstrances; and if these fail, the erring brother is to be plainly told in the presence of the brethren that communion and Christian brotherhood cannot be kept with them. Such were the chief peculiarities of this sect of ANABAPTISTS (which see).

GALILÆANS, a term of reproach sometimes applied to the early Christians. It was most generally used by Julian the Apostate, whenever he spoke of Christ or Christians. Various ancient writers say that he not only used the word himself, but that he forbade any one to call them by any other name, imagining that by such a decree he would entirely abolish the name of Christians.

GALILÆUM, the name given to the catechumenal oil in the Greek church. It is considered as sanctified by the drops of MEIRUN or holy CHRISM (which see), which are mingled with it.

GALILEANS, a sect which arose among the Jews A. D. 12. The circumstances which occasioned its rise were rather political than religious. About this period Judea became a Roman province, and was annexed to Syria, of which Quirinus was then governor. On obtaining this accession to his rule, Quirinus appointed a tax to be raised for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Roman establishments. The imposition of a tax upon them roused the indignation of the Jews, and a party was formed to resist the payment of tribute. It was headed by Judas the Galilean, from whom it took the name of Galileans, although it was more frequently known by the names of Zealots and Gaulonites. The doctrine which Judas inculcated upon his followers was, that the Jews had no king but God, and that it was contrary to the law of Moses for a Jew to pay tribute to a foreign power. In company with one Zadok, a Sadducee, he succeeded in gathering round him a large party, who raised a partial insurrection against the Roman government, which was, however, speedily quelled, and Judas its leader slain. Two of the sons of Judas, James and Simon, attempted, after the death of their father, to revive the party which had been scattered, but they perished by the hand of justice. Menahem, the third son, having seized a strong fort, with the warlike weapons deposited in it armed his followers, and was bold enough to besiege Jerusalem. He levelled a tower, and had well-nigh taken the city, but the besieged, erecting a strong wall, succeeded in defeating the assaults of the enemy. Menahem took upon himself the title of king, and, pretending to be actuated by zeal in behalf of the Jewish religion, headed a rebellion against the Romans; but his schemes were obviously the result of personal ambition rather than patriotism, and some of his countrymen discovering his design, subjected him to a cruel death. The rebellion did not end here. Eleazer, the grandson of Judas, rose to eminence among the Galileans or Zealots, and called upon all the Jews, under pain of death, to join the standard of revolt. He at last shut himself up in the castle of Masna, and, after holding out against the Romans for a long time, persuaded his followers rather to massacre one another than surrender themselves into the hands of their enemies. They did so, and only two women and five children survived to relate the dismal story.

GALILEE, a name given to a particular portion of a church in England, which is separated from the rest of the building. It is generally situated towards the west end. Sometimes, as Dr. Hook informs us, it was a gallery for seeing processions, sometimes a porch for penitents, and for placing the corpse before burial. The galilee is often found in the oldest churches.

GALINTHIAS, a goddess to whom sacrifices were offered generally at the festival of Heracles at Thebes. When the Mærcæ and Eilythia sought to prevent Alcmena from giving birth to Heracles, Galinthias interposed, and by an act of deception frustrated their purpose; whereupon these goddesses were so enraged, that they changed her into a cat or weasel. But Heracles, in return for the kindness of Galinthias, made her his attendant, and caused her to be worshipped at his own festival.

GALLI, priests of CYBELE (which see) among the ancient Romans, who received the worship of this goddess from the Phrygians. They were selected from the lowest classes of society, and were allowed at certain times to ask alms from the people. The chief priest among them was called Archigallus. In their fanaticism they mutilated themselves, thinking thereby to render themselves purer and more acceptable to the deity to whose service they were attached.

GALLICAN CHURCH, a name used to denote the Romish church in France, which has always stood on a different footing, in its relations with the see of Rome, from all the other portions of the same church throughout the world. Ever since the wars of the investitures they had been tenacious of their rights, and the French clergy had claimed, and frequently exercised, an exemption, in particular cases, from that general control in ecclesiastical affairs which is uniformly assumed by the holy see; an exemption which forms the foundation of what have been usually termed the rights of the Gallican church. Pretensions of this kind occur in history as far back as the time of St. Louis, and it is not improbable that they are of even earlier date; but in

A. D. 1438, the council of Basle, in opposition to Eugenius IV., who had summoned another council at Florence, passed several canons for the future regulation of the church, restricting the power of the Pope, and rectifying various abuses in church discipline. Eugenius, enraged at this open rebellion against his authority, rejected the new canons, and thereupon the council passed a decree deposing him from his papal dignity. His Holiness, however, triumphed over his opponents, and the regulations were not sanctioned by the head of the church; but notwithstanding they met with the approval of Charles VII., who at that time occupied the throne of France. Glad of this opportunity of asserting the independence of the Gallican church, Charles recommended an assembly of divines, which was then met at Bourges, to adopt the regulations of the council of Basle. This assembly, which is known by the name of the PRAGMATIC SANCTION, in fulfilment of the royal suggestion, sanctioned the regulations of Basle as the general rules of ecclesiastical discipline in France—a decision which is generally known by the name of the PRAGMATIC SANCTION (which see). The privileges thus secured rested on two maxims: (1.) That the Pope has no right to order any thing in which the temporalities and civil rights of the kingdom are concerned. (2.) That while the Pope's supremacy in things spiritual is admitted, his power in France is limited by the decrees of ancient councils received in that realm.

The canons thus formally adopted by an assembly of the French clergy were considered as forming the charter, as it were, of their ecclesiastical independence and liberty. Many and strenuous were the attempts of succeeding pontiffs to procure the repeal of these obnoxious decrees; but the French clergy and people persisted in maintaining their validity, and adhering to them as being essential, in their opinion, to the peace and prosperity of the kingdom. The sovereigns of France, too, were far from averse to any plan whereby they might be rendered independent of the papal see, and the Pragmatic Sanction was all the more agreeable to them, as it made provision for the nomination to benefices being submitted to the royal approbation, prohibited the payment of annates to the Pope, and put an end to the sale of ecclesiastical dignities. Accordingly, while the canons of the council of Basle are said to have been abrogated by successive kings of France, particularly Louis XI. and Louis XII., the claims of the French clergy, under the Pragmatic Sanction, were still considered as in full force. But Leo X. succeeded to the popedom, and keeping in view the aggrandizement of the church, he persuaded Francis I., king of France, to allow the abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction, in express terms, by both the Pope and the king, and that instead of it should be substituted an act investing the king with greater power in the ecclesiastical concerns of the kingdom than he had hitherto possessed. Hence originated the celebrated concordat, by which the nomination to all ecclesiastical benefices within the French dominions was granted to the king, with a reservation of the annates to the Roman see; and besides, the right of deciding all ecclesiastical controversies, with some few exceptions, was given over to the judicature of the sovereign without appeal. The conduct of both Francis and Leo was viewed by the French clergy with the utmost indignation. The university of Paris, in particular, lifted its bold remonstrance against both parties; defending the proceedings of the council of Basle in opposition to Eugenius IV.; asserting the rights of the Gallican church, and impeaching the character of Leo X. without reserve, while they appealed from both king and Pope to a future council. Even the laity were jealous of the authority in ecclesiastical matters which the king had unexpectedly obtained, thus combining in his own person both temporal and spiritual power.

In this position matters remained, in so far as the Gallican church was concerned, until the reign of Louis XIV. when a conspiracy was formed in behalf of that ambitious sovereign, to revive the empire of Charlemagne, and at the same time to re-establish popery throughout all Europe. Pope Innocent XI., although his election was chiefly due to French influence, was far from favouring the projects of Louis; he made several efforts, on the contrary, to restrain the royal prerogative in the conferring of benefices; and in attempting to destroy or limit the liberties of the Gallican church, he had nearly produced a schism in that country. In 1678 commenced a keen controversy between Louis XIV. and the Pope on the subject of the "Regale," the name given to the code which contained the privileges of the Gallican church. The pontiff made use of his ordinary weapons, edicts, bulls, and threats of excommunication. Louis, on his part, threw contempt upon the empty menaces of the Vatican, forbade the admission of the papal bulls into France, and declared it to be a capital crime in any of his subjects either to publish or obey them. The contest was conducted on both sides with great violence. At length, in 1682, the French king summoned a convocation of his bishops to meet at Paris, for the purpose of formally and definitively settling once more the precise relations which existed between the Gallican church and the see of Rome. The assembly consisted of eight archbishops, twenty-six bishops, and thirty-eight other clergymen. The ancient doctrine in reference to the exclusively spiritual authority of the Pope, and its inferiority to the authority of councils, was laid down by the assembly in four propositions as follows:

"1. That God has given to St. Peter and to his successors, the vicars of Christ, and to the church itself, power in spiritual things and things pertaining to salvation; but not power in civil and temporal things: our Lord having said, 'My kingdom is not of this world;' and again, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.' And therefore that injunction of the apostle stands firm: 'Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. There is no power but of God; and the powers that be are ordained of God.' Therefore, in temporal things kings and princes are subject to no ecclesiastical power of God's appointment; neither can they directly or indirectly be deposed by the authority of the keys of the church, nor can their subjects be exempted from fidelity and obedience, nor be absolved from their oath of allegiance. And this principle, which is necessary to the public tranquillity, and no less useful to the church than to the state, ought by all means to be held fast, as being consonant to the Word of God, to the tradition of the fathers, and to the example of the saints.

"2. That plenary power in spiritual things so exists in the apostolic see and in the successors of Peter, vicars of Christ, that at the same time the decrees of the holy œcumenical council of Constance, approved by the apostolic see, and confirmed by the practice of the Roman pontiffs and of the whole church, and observed by the Gallican church with perpetual veneration, respecting the authority of general councils, as contained in the fourth and fifth sessions, must also be valid and remain immovable. Nor does the Gallican church approve of those who infringe upon the force of these decrees, as if they were of dubious authority or not fully approved; or who pervert the words of the council by referring them solely to a time of schism.

"3. Hence the exercise of the apostolic power is to be tempered by the canons, which the Spirit of God dictated, and which the reverence of the whole world has consecrated. The rules, customs, and regulations received by the Gallic realm and church are also valid, and the terms of the fathers remain immovable; and it concerns the majesty of the apostolic see that statutes and usages confirmed by the consent of so great a see and of such churches should retain their appropriate validity.

"4. In questions of faith likewise, the supreme pontiff has a principal part, and his decrees have reference to all and singular churches; yet his judgment is not incapable of correction, unless it has the assent of the church."

These propositions, which so clearly and explicitly stated the old doctrine of the Gallican church, were unanimously adopted by the convocation, approved by Louis XIV., and registered by the parliament of Paris on the 23d March 1682. Thus ratified and confirmed, this important document was appointed to be publicly read and explained in all the schools of the kingdom from year to year, and to be subscribed by all clergymen and professors of universities. This was a heavy blow aimed at the authority of the Pope over the Gallican church; and feeling the importance of the crisis, Innocent XI. summoned to his aid the most able writers he could command. The four propositions were condemned from the press by Italians, Spaniards, and Germans, all of whom, however, were successfully met by the celebrated Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, who, by order of the king, wrote and published a learned and able defence of the controverted propositions, establishing, by the most powerful arguments, the Gallican doctrine as to the exclusively spiritual authority of the Pope. The liberty and independence of the Gallican church were now secured by the complete establishment of the "Regale," which continued from this time undisturbed until the First French Revolution in 1789, when the Gallican church was utterly overthrown, and religion under every form was wholly disowned. Napoleon I., in 1801, restored the Romish church in France, and entered into a concordat with Pius VII., by which the government received the power of appointing the clergy, the Pope resigned the right of restoring the spiritual orders, but retained the privilege of the canonical investiture of bishops, and claimed the revenues which arose from it. This concordat, however, was abolished in 1817, and another concordat entered into between Louis XVIII. and Pius VII., placing the Gallican church on the same footing on which it stood in the concordat which was framed in 1516, between Francis I. and Leo X. This arrangement excited the greatest discontent among the French people. The Jesuits had been restored in 1814; and the Gallican church was now placed in a state of entire dependence on the Romish see. During the reign of Louis Philippe, the papal authority was maintained nominally in France, without making much effort to increase its power. But since the Revolution of 1848, and more especially since Napoleon III. assumed the imperial government, Ultramontane principles have made rapid and extensive progress, and the once boasted liberties of the Gallican church are contended for only by a small and uninfluential minority.

GAMAHEA, a word used by the THEOSOPHISTS (which see) to express that wisdom which was to explain and facilitate the union of the celestial and terrestrial in the phenomena and processes of nature.

GAMELIA, the name applied to a sacrifice among the ancient Greeks, which the parents of a girl about to be married were accustomed to offer to Athena on the day before the marriage. The word came at length to be applied to marriage solemnities in general.

GAMELII, ancient Grecian divinities who presided over marriage. Plutarch enumerates five,—Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Peitho, and Artemis; but the greater number of the gods were considered as included under the term Gamelii.

GAMES. It was customary among the heathen nations of antiquity to celebrate games in honour of their gods. Sacred games, indeed, formed an important part of the ritual service of the ancient polytheist, while the modern heathen also makes use of the same practices on occasion of the festivals of his gods. But the most splendid solemnities of this kind which have been transmitted to us in the records of ancient history are the celebrated games of Greece. The chief of these were four in number, the Olympic and the Pythian games, celebrated every fifth year; and the Nemean and the Isthmian every third year. These games, which continued for several days, consisted of such exercises as leaping, wrestling, boxing, and throwing the discus or quoit; also races on foot, on horseback, and with chariots. Multitudes assembled from all parts of Greece on these festive occasions, and the most intense interest was manifested by the spectators in the result of the contests. Many were the candidates for victory, and only men of blameless character were privileged to enter the lists. After months spent in anxious preparation, they appeared on an appointed day before the assembled crowd of onlookers. At the commencement of the festivities a herald proclaimed the names of the competitors, and announced the established rules of the games, without the due observance of which no one, even though he obtained the victory, could carry off the crown. The combatants stripped off their garments that they might be wholly unencumbered. As soon as the signal was given the contest commenced. All was activity, energy, and intense anxiety to secure the victory, while the crowded spectators gazed with intense interest upon the exciting scene. In full view was placed the prize which awaited the successful competitors. On an elevated seat, at the farthest extremity of the race-course, sat the judges appointed to decide to whom the reward of victory was due. The contest was hazardous, but no exertion was accounted too great to obtain the conqueror's crown. The name of the victor was proclaimed by the herald with a loud voice, amid the deafening acclamations of the multitude; the wreath of conquest was placed upon his brow, and a branch of palm was put into his right hand. The prize was worthless in itself—a sprig of laurel or wild-olive, or even common parsley—but as the token of victory, it was held in the highest estimation, and its happy possessor was an object of admiration and envy to the whole assembly. He was lifted into a proud triumphal chariot, and conducted home with the greatest pomp and ceremony. The city was proud which owned him as her son, and honours of every kind were heaped upon his head.

To these famous Grecian games there are frequent allusions in the New Testament. Thus the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews compares the life of the Christian to a foot-race, Heb. xii. 1—3, "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds." The following passage in the First Epistle to the Corinthians contains an evident allusion of the same kind, 1 Cor. ix. 24—27: "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away." And again, Phil. iii. 12—14, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." In the same spirit, and with similar allusions, the Apostle Paul, writing to Timothy a little before his martyrdom, says, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

Among the Romans also, as well as among the Greeks, games were very frequently celebrated at the festivals of the gods. Thus games were instituted in honour of Apollo, and the Circensian games in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. There were games in commemoration of deified heroes, as for instance, the Emperor Augustus. To avert calamities also, such festivities were sometimes resorted to. Thus a plague having broken out in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, the Tarentine games were instituted for the purpose of propitiating the infernal deities.

Among the important changes which took place in the manners and customs of the Jews after the time of Alexander the Great, may be mentioned the introduction of games in imitation of the nations of Pagan antiquity. Games were first introduced at Jerusalem in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 174, by the profligate high-priest Jason. An innovation of this kind gave great offence to the more pious Jews of the time. Emboldened by success, however, Jason advanced a step further, and in the following year, when games were celebrated at Tyre, in honour of Hercules, he despatched some Jews of his own party to that city with three hundred talents as an offering to the god. But the deputies, instead of devoting the money to purposes of idolatry, spent it in building ships of war. At length the revival of Jewish worship under the Maccaean princes put an end to the celebration of these Pagan games ; but they were renewed by Herod the Great, in order to ingratiate himself with the Emperor Augustus, to whom he consecrated them, and ordered them to be celebrated like the Olympic games every fifth year. The Jews were so indignant at this attempt to involve them in the practice of heathen customs, that, as we learn from Josephus, some of them entered into conspiracy to put Herod to death, and, doubtless, they would have accomplished their purpose had not the plot been discovered, and the conspirators sentenced to undergo capital punishment.

GANAPATYAS, the worshippers of Ganesa or Ganapati, a Hindu deity. They can scarcely be considered as a distinct sect, Ganesa being worshipped by all the Hindus as having power to remove all difficulties and impediments. Hence they never commence a journey, or engage in any important work, without invoking his protection. Some, however, pay this god more particular devotion, and, therefore, may be considered as specially entitled to be called Ganapatyas. And yet Ganesa is never exclusively venerated, and the worship, when it is paid, is addressed to some of his forms.

GANESA, a Hindu deity, the son of Mahadeva, or Shiva and Parvati. He is accounted the god of prudence and wisdom, who removes all hindrances out of the way, so that when about to engage in any difficult undertaking, a Hindu uniformly invokes this deity. He is considered as corresponding to the Hermes of Greece, or the Mercury of Rome, the great teacher, and presiding deity of authors. The greater number of the temples in the sacred city of Benares are dedicated either to Shiva, or his son Ganesa. The latter is always addressed as "that God upon whose glorious forehead the new moon is painted with the froth of Ganga." He is generally represented sitting cross-legged, with four arms and hands, and having the head and proboscis of an elephant. His temples are frequently ornamented with carvings and paintings of the limbs, but most frequently the head of this animal. Ganesa had formerly six classes of worshippers ; in the present day, he cannot boast of any exclusive worship, although he shares a kind of worship along with all the other gods.

GANGA (Sanskrit, the river), a name applied to denote the river Ganges in Bengal, one of the most sacred rivers in Hindustan. It is regarded as a deity ; and washing in its waters is viewed as securing the cleansing of the soul from sin in this life, and more especially as a valuable preparative in the prospect of dissolution. It is one of the four rivers which in the cosmogony of the Hindus have their source in the holy mountain of Meru. In their sacred writings this holy stream receives the most extravagant laudations. "The distant sight of it," as Dr. Duff informs us, "is declared to be attended with present benefit : the application of a few drops of its water may remove much pollution : daily bathing in it is followed with inestimable advantages, both in this life, and in that which is to come : immersion in it on certain auspicious days of the moon and certain conjunctions of the planets, may wipe away the sins of ten births, or even of a thousand : ablution, accompanied with the prescribed prayers, on particular days of high festival, may entitle to a residence in one of the heavens of the gods, and insure an amount of blessings which no imagination can conceive." Sometimes strangers and friendless persons are left to die upon the banks without being permitted to drink the waters of the purifying stream. The practice is almost universal among the higher classes of Hindus to offer their dying relatives as a sacrifice to Ganga, and it is actually affirmed that were this barbarous custom of exposing the sick on the banks of this river abolished, thousands would recover from their diseases, who, in consequence of its prevalence, are doomed to certain death. Often the poor invalid is literally killed by his body being partly immersed in the Ganges, or by large quantities of the water being poured into his mouth when he is in a state of dangerous weakness. And it is a recognised principle of HINDUISM (which see), that when once the sick are brought forcibly down to the river's side to die, they cannot legally be restored to health. They are from that moment dead according to Hindu law ; their property passes to the next heir according to the terms of the bequest ; and should any one who has thus been exposed recover from his disease, he cannot be received into society, but becomes an outcast, so degraded in the estimation of his friends, that even his own children will not eat with him, nor give him the slightest accommodation. The consequence of this barbarity is, that the wretched survivor has no alternative left him save to associate henceforth with those who are outcasts like himself. And accordingly, about fifty miles north of Calcutta there are two villages whose inhabitants are wholly composed of individuals of this description.

Not only, however, are multitudes of the sick and the dying thus sacrificed to Ganga ; there are also many cases of voluntary self-sacrifice to the sacred river. It is often the last resource of a superstitious Hindu, who has sunk into hopeless poverty, disgrace, or disease. Some of the Shastras besides, encourage suicide in the Ganges, holding out to the self-murderer the promise of a temporary residence in the heaven of one of the gods. When a person has formed the resolution of thus sacrificing himself to the river-god, he goes through the preliminary process required by the Sacred Books, of making a present of gold to the Brahmans, and inviting them to a feast. This done, he dresses himself in red garments, and adorns himself with garlands of flowers, marching down to the river accompanied by a band of music. On reaching the sacred stream he takes his seat upon the bank, repeating the name of his idol, and declaring that he is now about to renounce his life in this place, in order to obtain such or such a benefit in the next world. All the preliminary rites being now concluded, the formal act of self-sacrifice now commences. "The devotee," to use the language of Dr. Duff, "accompanied by one or more Brahmans, to officiate on the occasion, and utter the incantations,—proceeds in a boat into the middle of the stream, furnished with a supply of cord and water-pans. Then the pans are fastened to the neck and shoulders; and, while they remain empty, they keep the victim afloat. These are generally filled, sometimes by the friends in the boat, sometimes by the devotee himself, as he is carried buoyant along the current;—but when once they are surcharged, they sink; and down they drag the victim to the bottom, amid the incantations of ghostly confessors, the rejoicings of friends, and the shouts of applauding multitudes on the shore. A few gurgling bubbles rise on the surface, and speedily disappear,—all the monument that is ever raised to perpetuate the remembrance of the victim of superstition." How strikingly do such scenes fulfil the language of Holy Writ, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of horrid cruelty."

GANGA SAGOR, a sacred island among the Hindus, situated at the point where the great western or holiest branch of the Ganges unites its waters with those of the Indian Ocean. Though dark, flat, and swampy, it forms one of the most celebrated places of pilgrimage in India, the waters of the sacred river being considered as peculiarly purifying at this spot. On the island stands a ruinous temple dedicated to Kapila, the distinguished sage who founded the Sāṅkhya system, one of the chief schools of Hindu philosophy. The temple is usually occupied by a few disciples of Kapila, belonging to the class of ascetics, who always keep an arm raised above their heads. Crowds repair to this temple in Ganga Sagor twice every year, at full moon in November and January, to perform obsequies for the benefit of their deceased ancestors, and to practise various ablations in the sacred waters. It was calculated that in 1837 no fewer than 300,000 pilgrims resorted thither from all parts of India. At one time the open and public sacrifice of children on occasion of the great festival took place on an enormous scale, but this inhuman practice is prohibited by the British government, and therefore has become comparatively rare.

GANGAS, the idolatrous priests of the inhabitants of Congo, a Portuguese settlement in Western Africa. While one Supreme Being is acknowledged by the Negroes of this district, they worship also a number of subordinate deities who preside over the different departments of nature, and the Gangas employ themselves in teaching the people to worship by various rites and ceremonies, but more especially by donations of food and apparel, which they appropriate to themselves as their means of support. These men are supposed to have a considerable influence with the deities, and hence they pretend to bring down blessings upon the people, to avert judgments, to cure diseases, and to undo witchcraft.

GANNINANSES, (Singhalese, from gana, an assemblage), a name applied in Ceylon to the novices as well as priests among the BUDHISTS (which see).

GANJ BAKSHIS, a division of the SIKHS (which see), in Hindustan, who are said to have derived their name from their founder. They are few in number, and of little note.

GANYMEDES, the son of Tros and Calirrhoe, accounted by the ancient Greeks the most beautiful of men, and said to have been carried off to heaven by Zeus, that he might act as cupbearer to the gods. He was identified with the divinity who was said to preside over the sources of the Nile, and he was placed by astronomers among the stars, under the name of Aquarius or the water-bearer.

GAONS, a class of Doctors among the modern Jews. They were also called Excellents, an appellation indicating either their real or their supposed goodness. Their principal men were placed at the heads of the different academies. In consequence of their extensive learning, and their high intelligence, they were regarded as the interpreters of the law, consulted upon difficult and important matters, and their decisions were received with the utmost veneration. The decisions, however, of each Gaon, were only considered to be of force in that province where he resided, and his authority was acknowledged. The first of the order of Gaons was Chanan Meischka, who flourished about the beginning of the sixth century, and re-established the academy of Pundebita, which had been shut up for fifty years. About A. D. 763, one Jehuda, who was blind, belonged to this order of learned men. About the end of the tenth century, one Scherira appeared and rose to considerable eminence as a Gaon. Before his death he had retired from public life, and resigned the employment of a public teacher to his son. This doctor, whose name was Hadi, flourished in the beginning of the eleventh century, and was esteemed the most excellent of all the Excellents. With him terminated the order of Gaons, for about this time the academies of Babylon were destroyed, and the remains of the Jews were driven into Spain and France, where they formed new establishments, and exchanged the title of DOCTORS for that of RABBINS (which see).

GARLANDS. Among the ancient heathens it was customary to adorn the victims intended for sacrifice with fillets and garlands; and it was also a common practice to put garlands on the head of their idols. An allusion to the use of garlands by the heathen occurs in Acts xiv. 13, "Then the priest or Jupiter, which was before their city, brought oxen and garlands unto the gates, and would have done sacrifice with the people." It is not obvious for what precise purpose the garlands were brought on this occasion, but it is not unlikely that they were meant to be placed on the heads of the apostles. The trees and flowers which were used on such occasions, were such as were most pleasing to the god in whose worship they were employed. The custom of weaving garlands for the gods is still found in almost all idolatrous countries. In the Hindu festivals and processions, for example, the images of the gods are decked out with garlands. The priests, and both the male and female worshippers, also wear sweet-scented garlands on festive occasions.

GARMANAS, Hindu priests mentioned by the geographer Strabo, and by which were probably meant Budhist priests. They are represented as having been very austere, feeding on fruits and roots, and wearing only a covering made of the bark of trees.

GARMR, the fabulous dog who, in the ancient Scandinavian mythology, was said to guard the entrance to the infernal regions. It corresponds to the CERBERUS (which see) of the ancient Romans.

GARUDA, the sacred bird of Vishnu among the Hindus, as the eagle was the sacred bird of Jupiter among the ancient Romans. Both these deities are represented as riding upon their respective birds. Garuda was worshipped by the Vaishnavas in the golden age of Hindu idolatry.

GASTROMANCY (Gr. gaster, the belly, and manteia, divination), a mode of divination practised among the ancient Greeks, in which they filled certain round glasses with pure water, placing lighted torches round about them. Then they prayed to the deity in a low muttering voice, and proposed the question which they wished to be answered. Certain images were now observed in the glasses representing what was to happen.

GATES. The gates of Oriental cities have always been accounted places of great resort, markets being held there, and also courts of justice. There public business of every kind is wont to be transacted. When Abraham purchased a field from the sons of Heth for a burial-place, the bargain was made "at the gate of the city." An instance of a contract entered into at the gate of the city, is thus given in Ruth iv. 1, 2, 9, 11, "Then went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down. And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem." Before the gates of temples and other buildings used for sacred purposes, there was in ancient times a wide enclosure within which the people worshipped, and which looked toward the entrance of the edifices. "This was the Hieron," says Dr. Jamieson, "at the gates of holy places,—a part of the area or court or the building that was considered sacred, not only because it was the place where the people stood to worship, but also because religious rites were frequently performed there; and hence we find frequent allusions in scripture to the peculiar sanctity with which the gates or entrances of those venerable buildings were regarded, and to the homage which was offered there. Thus Ezekiel says, the people of the land shall worship at the door of the gate before the Lord in the Sabbaths, and in the new moons; and in the beautiful song of the sons of Korah, the gates of the sanctuary at Jerusalem are represented as of greater value and interest in the sight of God, than all the dwellings of Jacob. The knowledge of the peculiar sanctity that was attached to the entrance of a temple, explains the reason of the threshold being chosen for the demolition of Dagon's image. The temporary triumph which the Philistines had gained over the forces of Israel, signalized by the capture of the ark and sacred symbols of its worship, had intoxicated that idolatrous people, and led them in the fulness of their enthusiastic rejoicing, to proclaim a festival of thanksgiving to their national deity, to whose aid they ascribed the success of their arms. It was meet, therefore, upon an occasion when the true God, to punish his people for their apostacy, and convince them of their sins, had allowed the ensigns of his presence to fall dishonoured into the hands of the enemy, to vindicate his supremacy, and exhibit a striking proof of his living irresistible power; and no evidence more memorable could have been given of the vanity of his idol antagonist, than that in the august presence of Israel's God, the statue of Dagon was overthrown and dismembered on the threshold of his temple, the very spot which, in the estimation of his votaries, his rites had invested with more than ordinary sacredness."

GATES (HOLY), the name given to the folding gates in the centre of the Iconostasis or screen, which in the modern Greek churches separates the body of the church from the holy of holies. The holy gates are opened and shut frequently during the service, part of the prayers and lessons being recited in front of them, and part within the adytum or most holy place.

GATES (HOLY) OF ST. PETER'S AT ROME. These gates are never opened except in the solemnity of a jubilee, which now takes place every twenty-five years, when the Pope grants a plenary indulgence. On the twenty-fourth day of December of the jubilee year, all the clergy secular and regular in Rome assemble together at the Apostolical Palace, and from thence they march in procession to St. Peter's. When the clergy come into the great square in front of the Basilica, they find the doors of the church shut. Meanwhile the Pope, the cardinals, and bishops, dressed in white robes, with mitres on their heads, meet in Sixtus's chapel, where the Pope sings the Veni Creator with a lighted taper in his hand. All the cardinals, having each of them tapers in their hands, proceed to the Swiss portico, where the holy Father nominates three of them his legates a latere, to open the gates of the Lateran church, the church of Santa Maria Maggiore, and that of Santo Paolo. It is reserved for the Pope himself to open the sacred gate of St. Peter's. A throne is set in front of the gate, on which the Pope sits for a short time, when he is presented with a golden hammer, which he takes in his right hand. Then rising from his throne, the Pope advances forward and knocks at the sacred gate. His clergy follow him with tapers in their hands. The pontiff knocking thrice at the gate, says aloud, "Open to me the gates of righteousness," to which the choir add, "This is the gate of God, the just shall enter in," &c. At this moment a temporary wall of stone, which has been loosely set up, is made to fall down, and the people eagerly gather the rubbish, portions of which they preserve as sacred relics. In the midst of the confusion which thus ensues, the Pope returns to his throne, where he calmly takes his seat. As soon as the rubbish has been removed, and the passage to the holy gate cleared, his Holiness leaves his throne, and begins the anthem, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," &c., in which the choir loudly join. Being arrived at the holy gate, he repeats several prayers, takes the cross, kneels down before the gate, begins the Te Deum, and slowly passes through the holy gate, still singing as he goes along. He is followed by his clergy. After vespers the cardinals change their white robes for their ordinary dress, and accompanying his Holiness to the door of his apartment, leave him there, the ceremony being concluded. GA'YATRI, the holiest verse of the Vedas among the ancient Hindus. It is addressed to the sun, to which it was daily offered up as a prayer in these words, according to the translation of Colebrooke: "Let us meditate on the adorable light of the divine sun (Savitri); may it guide our intellects. Desirous of food, we solicit the gift of the splendid sun (Savitri), who should be studiously worshipped. Venerable men, guided by the understanding, salute the divine sun (Savitri) with oblations and praise." Professor Horace Wilson gives it a more condensed form, "Let us meditate on the sacred light of that divine sun, that it may illuminate our minds." In the first or Vedic era of the history of India, sun-worship occupied no inconsiderable place in the worship of the Hindus. See HINDUISM.

GAZEL, love songs with which the Mohammedan dervishes, called BACTASCHITES (which see), salute every one they meet. They are applied by way of allegory to the Divine love.

GAZITH, a place in which the Jewish Sanhedrim sat. It was a building erected of hewn stone, after the second temple was finished. Half of this fabric was holy and half common; that is, half of it stood within the court, and half of it within the CHEL (which see). The Gazith was near the altar of burnt-offerings, half of it being within the sacred court where the altar stood; and being thus near to the Divine presence, the Sanhedrim felt their obligation all the more to exercise righteous and impartial judgment. See SANHEDRIM.

GAZOPHYLACIUM, the treasury outside the church, in the days of the early Christians, in which the oblations or offerings of the people were kept. The word also denotes the chest in the temple of Jerusalem, in which the rich presents consecrated to God were kept; and it was sometimes used to imply the apartments in the temple in which the provisions for sacrifice and those allotted to the priests were stored.

GE (Gr. the earth), a goddess worshipped among the ancient Greeks as a personification of the earth. She is mentioned in Homer's Iliad as having black sheep offered in sacrifice to her, and as being invoked in oaths. Hesiod speaks of Ge as the offspring of Chaos, and the mother of Uranus and Pontus. She gave birth also to a variety of different beings, both divinities and monsters. In early times she had oracles both at Delphi and Olympia; she was worshipped as the all-producing parent, and was considered as the patroness of marriages. The worship of this goddess was universal among the Greeks. Among the ancient Romans the earth was worshipped under the name of TELLUS (which see).

GEDALIAH (FAST OF), a Jewish fast kept on the third day of the month Tisri, and said to be the same that Zechariah calls, viii. 19, "the fast of the seventh month." It is observed in memorial of the murder of Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam.

GEHENNA. This word, which is derived from two Hebrew words, signifying the valley of Hinnom, is applied to a valley near Jerusalem, where it was customary, in ancient times, for the Hebrews to offer up children to the god Moloch. It was also called Tophet, from the Hebrew word Toph, which denoted the Tympanum or Drum, with the noise of which the priests were wont to drown the cries of the children. Nothing is known concerning Hinnom, from whom the valley seems to have derived its name. The valley, or rather ravine, is only about 150 feet in breadth, and is said to have been shaded in ancient times with trees. From the human practices followed there, the valley was denounced by Jehovah, Jer. xix. 6, "Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor The valley of the son of Hinnom, but The valley of slaughter." It was polluted by Josiah, who made it a kind of cess-pool for the city. After the captivity the Jews regarded the place with abhorrence, remembering the cruelties of which it had been the scene, and after the example of Josiah they threw into it the carcasses of animals, the dead bodies of malefactors, and all kinds of refuse. Constant fires were kept up in the valley to consume the filth which might otherwise have caused a pestilence. Hence it was regarded as a striking type of hell, and Gehenna came to be used to indicate the place of everlasting torment. The Mohammedans, however, do not consider the pains of Gehenna as eternal, but temporary and purgatorial.

GEMARA (Heb. perfect), a commentary on the Jewish MISHNA (which see). Two of these commentaries were prepared, the one at Jerusalem, and the other at Babylon. The former is supposed to have been the work of Rabbi Jochonan, who lived about the middle of the third century, while the latter, which is the more highly esteemed of the two, is supposed to have been the work of Rabbi Ashé, and some of his immediate successors, about the middle of the sixth century. The importance attached to the Gemara by the Jews may be seen from the following passage of the Talmud: "They who study the Bible do what is neither virtue nor vice; they who study the Mishna perform something of a virtue, and on that account receive a reward; but they who study the Gemara perform what may be esteemed the greatest virtue." The oral law is preferred by the Jews to the written law, and the Gemara to both; thus it is said, "The Bible is like water, the Mishna like wine, and the Gemara like spiced wine." "The law is like salt, the Mishna like pepper, and the Gemara like balmy spice." "At five years of age," says the Mishna, "let the child begin to study the Scriptures; let him continue to do so till the age of ten, when he may begin to study the Mishna. At the age of fifteen let him begin to study the Gemara." The Gemara or Jerusalem Talmud was considered defective, as containing the sentiments of only a small number of Jewish doctors. Besides, it was written in a mixed and impure language. Hence the Amorajim or Gemarists, the chief of whom was Rabbi Asa, produced the Gemara or Babylonian Talmud, which contains the traditions, the canons of the Jewish law, and all questions relating to the law. The Talmud consists of the Mishna and the Gemara, or commentary upon the Mishna. The Jerusalem Talmud is printed in one large folio volume; and the Babylonian extends in some editions to twelve, and in others to thirteen folio volumes.

GEMARISTS See AMORAJIM.

GEMATRIA, the Cabbalistic arithmetic of the Rabbinical Jews, or a species of Cabbala, which consisted in taking the letters of a Hebrew word for arithmetical numbers, and explaining every word by the arithmetical value of the letters. Any two words or phrases occurring in different texts, and containing letters of the same numerical amount, are considered mutually convertible; and any one or more words which, when added together, are of the same amount as any particular text, are viewed as giving the latent signification of that text. Thus the letters of the Hebrew words signifying "Shiloh shall come," amount to 358. Now, the Hebrew word Messiah contains precisely the same number; and hence the Cabbalists conclude, that on the principles of the Gematria, this is a satisfactory proof that the prophecy contained in Gen. xlix. 10, refers to the Messiah. Again, the word Branch in Zech. iii. 8, is of the same numerical value with the word Comforter, a name given to the Messiah by the Talmudists, and hence it is thought to be proved beyond question that the Branch of Zechariah is no other than the Messiah. See CABBALA.

GEMS (THE THREE). Among the BUDHISTS (which see), Budha, the sacred books, and the priesthood are accounted the three gems. They form the Triad, in which they place all their confidence and trust, and the worship of the Three Gems is universal among Budhists wherever they are found. The assistance they derive from this Triad is called sarana, protection, which, as we learn from Mr. Hardy, is said to destroy the fear of reproduction or successive existence, and to take away the fear of the mind, the pain to which the body is subject, and the misery of the four hells. By reflecting on the Three Gems the mind is delivered from scepticism, doubt, and reasoning, and becomes quite serene, calm, and unruddled.

GENEALOGIES, the register of the descent of individuals or families, which was accounted so important among the ancient Hebrews, that a special set of officers called Shoterim were set apart for the purpose of keeping such records. In all nations, even from the earliest times, such genealogical writings seem to have been carefully preserved. Even in the patriarchal period we find traces of them, as in Gen. x. 10, "And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar." The vast increase of the Hebrew population during their residence in Egypt rendered genealogical records absolutely necessary, that the tribes might be kept distinct from one another. The charge of these records was intrusted first to the Shoterim or scribes, and afterwards to the Levites. In later times these documents were kept in the temple. It is not at all unlikely that some confusion may have been introduced in regard to particular families during the Babylonish captivity; but on their return to Palestine the Hebrews seem to have reduced the whole to complete order, as is quite evident from the care with which genealogical descents are traced in the First Book of Chronicles. And so carefully was the purity of lineage maintained in regard to the priesthood, that after the captivity those who could not produce their genealogical descent were excluded from the sacred office. Josephus also informs us, that the Jews had an uninterrupted succession of high-priests preserved in their records for nearly 2,000 years. Jerome declares that the Jews knew the genealogies from Adam to Zerubbabel as intimately as they knew their own names. The great importance of this marked attention to the genealogy of each family among the Jews arose from the necessity which existed of preserving the line of descent of the Messiah in unbroken continuance from Abraham and David. Hence the minuteness with which this line is traced by the Evangelists Matthew and Luke. And it is not a little remarkable, that the great end for which such genealogical records were kept having been accomplished, and there being no further necessity for them, the Jews have now utterly lost their ancient genealogies, and from the time of their total dispersion under Adrian, not a single family is able to produce the record of their connection with any one of the tribes of Israel. This is of itself a satisfactory proof that Messiah is already come, and that he is no other than Jesus of Nazareth, whose lineage has been so fully and accurately traced in each link back to David, to Abraham, and even to Adam. On this subject the late Dr. Welsh makes the following striking observations: "I cannot but remark, that the mere list of names by which Matthew connects our Saviour with Abraham, and by which Luke connects him with Adam, has always appeared to me inexpressibly sublime, and calculated to inspire us with a deep sense of the superintending providence of God. We are carried through a period of many thousand years, and amidst the revolutions of the mightiest empires, and the rise and fall of many kingdoms, and the convulsions of external nature, and a long succession of the generations of men,—amidst all these we see the hand of God continually exercised in bringing to pass his eternal decrees. We have, as it were, the fountain of a stream, scarcely discernible in its first beginning, in danger of being dried up in a scorching desert, then of being confounded amidst kindred floods, then of being lost amidst the interminable swamps of a new region, and finally, swallowed up in an opening of the earth and lost apparently to human vision for ever; and after having traced it through so many different and distant climes to such a termination, it rushes forth again revealed to view with matchless beauty and grandeur. The imagination of man is bewildered in attempting to form an idea of the long succession of many nations, and of the changes that took place in society from the times of Adam, and Abraham, and David, to that of Christ. But amidst the infinite diversity of human character, and the fearful ebullitions of human passions, and the wide varieties of human situation, and amidst the many millions of human beings that came into the world and fulfilled their little part, and then passed away and were forgotten, amidst all this endless diversity of human beings, and human passions, and human plans, the purpose of the Almighty is in variably the same, and it he effects alike by the consent, the co-operation, the indifference, the ignorance, the opposition of man. In the king and in the slave, in the palace and in the cottage, in the city and in the fields, in the mountain and in the valley, in the righteous and in the wicked, we find the operations of Providence towards the same beneficent, the same God-like end. The faith of Abraham, the idolatry of Amaziah, the lowliness of Joseph, and the glory of Solomon, are all made to work together to one event. In the sheep-cotes of Mamre, in the prison-houses of Egypt, in the corn-fields of Boaz, on the throne of Judah, among the willows by the rivers of Babylon, in the temple of Jerusalem, in the work-shops of Galilee, in the manger of Bethlehem,—in all these we see the impress of the finger of God. And I cannot but think that in this commencement of the history of the New Testament church, we have, in the reference that is made to the former dispensation, and in the fact that God never for a moment forgot the word which he spoke to a thousand generations, a pledge that in his own time God will not fail to accomplish all that he has spoken respecting his kingdom. In contemplating the gloomiest periods of the Christian church, we also may derive encouragement in the belief that the Almighty has never wholly deserted the earth. And when the circumstances of the church appear most desperate, it should be remembered that it was when the cause of Israel and of mankind seemed lost for ever, when the throne of David was levelled in the dust, when the royal blood was almost lost amongst the meanest of the people, it was then that God raised up a Horn of salvation in the house of his servant David."

GENERATION (ETERNAL), an expression used by Christian divines in reference to the Second Person of the Trinity, in order to indicate his derivation from the Father. The idea is involved in the Sonship of Christ. See SON OF GOD. It is dangerous to discuss the matter with too great minuteness, as we are apt to be led away by false analogies, reasoning from what is human, to what is purely divine. Hence the Christian Fathers speak with great caution on the point. "Speculate not upon the Divine generation," says Gregory Nazianzen, "for it is not safe. Let the doctrine be honoured silently; it is a great thing for thee to know the fact; the mode we cannot admit that even angels understand, much less thon." Athanasius to the same effect declares, "Such speculators might as well investigate where God is, and how he is God, and of what nature the Father is. But as such questions are irreverent and irreligious, so is it also unlawful to venture such thoughts about the generation of the Son of God." Chrysostom also states in the same cautious spirit, "I know that he begat the Son: the manner how I am ignorant of. I know that the Holy Spirit is from Him; how from Him I do not understand. I eat food; but how this is converted into my flesh and blood I know not. We know not these things which we see every day when we eat, yet we meddle with inquiries concerning the substance of God." But while the Fathers thus prudently avoided seeking to be wise above what is written, or to explain what is and necessarily must be inexplicable, they nevertheless held the doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son as the only-begotten of the Father, and fully participating in the divinity of the Father. Hence we are commanded to honour the Son even as we honour the Father.

The doctrine of the derivation of the Son from the Father as conveyed in the expression Eternal Generation, gave rise at an early period to mistakes and misconceptions. The Valentinians and Manichees, for example, in the second century, rushed into the heresy of a sort of ditheism, or the asserting of such a separation between the Father and the Son as to make two Gods. The Eclectics again, and others who held the doctrine of Emanations, considered the Son to be both individually distinct from the Father, and of an inferior nature. The Arians both ancient and modern have uniformly denied the eternal generation of the Son, maintaining him to have had a beginning of existence, and to be essentially inferior to the Father. See ARIANS. The doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son, however, has not only been denied by both Arians and Socinians, but even by some in other respects orthodox Trinitarians, who believe the Sonship of Christ to be founded not on a natural, but an official relation to the First Person in the Godhead. They deny his eternal generation chiefly from the difficulty which they feel in conceiving of anything in the Divine nature, analogous to the process which the term generation denotes in its application to creatures. But it is altogether inconsistent with the nature of the subject to allow the mind to draw any such analogies. There can be no likeness between generation as used in a human sense, and the same term when applied to one of the Persons of the Godhead. The only intention in using such an expression in reference to the Son of God, is to express at one and the same time a distinction of persons, and a mutual relation between the Father and the Son. To go beyond this general explanation of the matter, and to assert that the generation of the Son consisted in the communication of the Divine essence and perfections to him; or to assert that the Father did not beget the essence of the Son, but the person, is to attempt an exposition of that which it transcends the human faculties fully to comprehend. See TRINITY.

GENESIA, offerings mentioned by Herodotus, and probably consisting of garlands of flowers which were wont to be presented by the ancient Greeks, at the tombs of their deceased relatives on the return of each anniversary of their birthdays.

GENESIUS, a surname of Poseidon, under which he was anciently worshipped near Lerna in Greece.

GENETÆUS, a surname of Zeus, from Cape Genetus on the Euxine Sea, where he had a temple.

GENETHLIA (Gr. the nativity), the name given among the early Christians to the festivals which they were wont to observe on the anniversary of the death of the martyrs, terming it their BIRTHDAY (which see), as being the day on which they were born to a new and nobler state of being.

GENETHLIACI, a term which Augustine states was used to denote soothsayers, who pretended to calculate men's natiivities (genethlia) from the stars, and thus to predict their good or bad fortune. Such individuals were treated with the utmost severity under the heathen emperors of Rome, and by the early Christians they were expelled from the church.

GENETHLIUS, a surname of Poseidon, under which he was worshipped at Sparta.

GENETYLLIDES, a class of goddesses in ancient Greece, who presided over generation and birth.

GENETYLLIS, a goddess among the ancient Greeks, who presided over births. It was a surname also both of Aphrodite and of Artemis.

GENEVA (CHURCH OF). The principles of the Reformation were first introduced into Geneva, not by John Calvin, as has generally been believed, but by William Farel, who preached the gospel there with acceptance in the year 1532, but was driven from the city by the instigation of the bishop. This zealous Reformer was succeeded in Geneva by Anthony Froment, who, however, experienced the same treatment. A change, however, came over the views of the people, and the council, instead of supporting the bishop, abandoned him, and he found it necessary to retire from the city in 1533; whereupon the two banished ministers were recalled, and Reformed principles having acquired the ascendancy among all classes, Farel and Froment, along with Peter Viret, gathered around them a strong body of Protestants in Geneva; and so rapidly did the cause make progress in the city, that in 1535 the council declared themselves on the side of the Reformation. But though a Reformed church was thus formed in the city, having a numerous congregation drawn from all classes, it was not fully organized and established until the arrival of John Calvin in 1536. This eminent Reformer, who was a native of France, having been born there in 1509, was led to embrace Reformed principles, which he sought with diligence and zeal to diffuse among his countrymen. His fame had reached Switzerland, and having been provident tially in the course of his travels brought to Geneva, he was persuaded to take up his residence in the town, and to devote himself to the building up of the newly formed Protestant church. Farel and Viret gladly availed themselves of the counsel and assistance of such a man as Calvin. His very presence with them they felt to be a tower of strength. And no sooner had he commenced his labours in conjunction with them, than the church and city of Geneva began to be torn with internal dissensions, a party having arisen who sought to restore some of the superstitious observances and feasts which the Reformation had happily abolished. The council joined in this retrograde movement, and the consequence was, that Calvin and Farel were banished from the republic. The church of Geneva suffered severely from the exile of her pastors, but the faithful among them were cheered by many a precious letter of comfort and encouragement. The citizens had publicly abjured Popery, and avowed their adherence to the Reformation on the 20th July 1539. Mourning the bereavement they had sustained through the arbitrary conduct of their civil rulers, again and again did they petition the council to recall their beloved pastors from exile. For a time their entreaties, earnest and urgent though they were, passed unheeded; but at length in 1540 a formal invitation was forwarded to Strasburg, both from the citizens and council, not only permitting, but imploring the return of Calvin. It was not, however, until September of the following year, that he yielded to the repeated and pressing invitations of the Genevans. It was a joyful day for the Church of Geneva when the great French Reformer found his way back to the scene of his former labours. They prized the privilege, and gave thanks to God for it. From 1541 till 1564, when he was called to rest from his earthly labours, did Calvin continue to build up the church in Geneva, which he had been chiefly instrumental in founding; and such was the practical wisdom of this distinguished man, that the organization and working of that church rendered it a model to all the Reformed churches of Europe. Not only on account of the purity of its doctrine, but also the completeness of its form of church government, the church which Calvin had set up in Geneva became one of the most influential churches of the Reformation. And what tended powerfully to extend its usefulness was the college which in 1558 Calvin had persuaded the senate to found in Geneva. There Calvin and Beza taught, and thither accordingly students in great numbers repaired from France, Italy, Germany, England, and Scotland. Geneva thus became a central point whence issued the light of the Reformation in all directions. In fact, the fame of Calvin and the celebrity of the college which he founded, have procured for the Church of Geneva the distinction of being the mother of the Reformed churches, as Wittenberg was that of the Lutheran communities.

One of the greatest benefits which Calvin conferred upon Geneva, and through it upon many of the Reformed churches throughout other countries, was the establishment of the Presbyterian form of church government. In opposition to the views of Zwingli, he maintained that the church is possessed of the power of self-government, independent of the civil magistrate, whose jurisdiction ought to be limited exclusively to temporal affairs, and in so far as the church was concerned, Calvin left to the magistrate the protection of the church, and an outward care over it. He held also entire parity by divine appointment of all the ministers of Christ. This principle lies at the foundation of that form of church government which Calvin introduced at Geneva. And following out this fundamental principle, he refused to acknowledge a gradation of offices among the pastors of the church; but established a judicatory or consistory, composed of ruling elders and teaching elders, the former being members of the church set apart solely to rule in the church, and the latter being set apart both to teach and to rule. This ecclesiastical body he invested with a high degree of power and authority. He also convened synods, and restored to its former vigour the ancient practice of excommunication. These arrangements were made with the consent of a majority of the senate.

The Church of Geneva thus threw off at one and the same time both Popery and Episcopacy, adopting a system of church government which bore somewhat of the republican character of their civil government. Calvin was principally concerned in the construction of both; and accordingly they bore no slight resemblance in the regular gradation of courts. The sovereign power of the state was vested in three councils, the general council, the council of two hundred, and the council of twenty-five. The general council was composed of those citizens and burgesses who had reached the age of twenty-five years; and the meetings of this council took place twice a-year for the election of magistrates. In this council was vested also the power of making laws, and settling as to war and peace, as well as of raising subsidies for the necessities of the republic. The council of two hundred was composed of two hundred and fifty citizens and burgesses, each of whom must be thirty years of age. The members of this council were elected for life, unless they became bankrupts, or were degraded by the censure which was annually made. This council formed the supreme court of justice, and were consulted on all matters of importance. The council of twenty-five or little council, as it was generally called, was chosen from the council of two hundred, all the members being elected for life, except in cases of bankruptcy or degradation.

The organization of the ecclesiastical bore some resemblance to that of the civil courts. The clergy on all public occasions held the same rank as the members of the council of twenty-five. The consistory was composed of all the pastors of the republic, and twelve lay elders, two of them being members of the little council, a third one of the auditeurs, and the remaining nine taken from the council of two hundred. The pastors were perpetual members of the court, but the elders were only chosen for six years. The consistory met every Thursday, and Calvin was perpetual moderator during his life, but after his death a different arrangement was adopted, the moderator being changed every week, each of the pastors occupying the chair in rotation. It was the province of the consistory to take cognizance of all public scandals, and to inflict ecclesiastical penalties, but for civil punishment of delinquents it was necessary to hand them over to the little council.

Not only, however, did the church of Geneva differ in ecclesiastical organization from the churches holding by Luther, Zwingli, and other coadjutors, but also in their views as to the Lord's Supper. On this subject, Mosheim remarks: "The system that Zuingle had adopted with respect to the eucharist, was by no means agreeable to Calvin, who, in order to facilitate the desired union with the Lutheran church, substituted in its place another, which appeared more conformable to the doctrine of that church, and in reality differed but little from it. For while the doctrine of Zuingle supposed only a symbolical or figurative presence of the body and blood of Christ in the eucharist, and represented a pious remembrance of Christ's death, and of the benefits it procured to mankind, as the only fruits that arose from the celebration of the Lord's supper, Calvin explained this critical point in a quite different manner. He acknowledge a real though spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament; or in other words, he maintained, that true Christians, who approached this holy ordinance with a lively faith, were, in a certain manner, united to the man Christ; and that from this union the spiritual life derived new vigour in the soul, and was still carried on, in a progressive motion, to greater degrees of purity and perfection. This kind of language had been used in the forms of doctrine drawn up by Luther; and as Calvin observed, among other things, that the divine grace was conferred upon sinners, and sealed to them by the celebration of the Lord's supper, this induced many to suppose that he adopted the sentiment implied in the barbarous term impanation, and differed but little from the doctrine of the Lutheran church on this important subject. Be that as it may, his sentiments differed considerably from those of Zuingle; for while the latter asserted that all Christians without distinction, whether regenerate or unregenerate, might be partakers of the body and blood of Christ, Calvin confined this privilege to the pious and regenerate believer alone."

In its early history none of the Reformed churches was equally privileged with the Church of Geneva in point of theological teaching. Under the ministry of such a master in theology as Calvin, that church could not fail to obtain an accurate and even profound knowledge of Divine truth; and such was the power with which Calvin expounded and enforced both from the pulpit, the professor's chair, and the press, the grand cardinal points which distinguished the Calvinistic from the Lutheran and Zwinglian churches, that he succeeded in bringing nearly the whole Reformed church, not in Switzerland only, but throughout Europe, to embrace his views. The consequence was, that while the Presbyterian system of church government which Calvin set up at Geneva was received only to a limited extent, as for example, by the French, the Dutch, the Scotch, and some other churches, his theological system, which even now goes by the name of CALVINISM, speedily obtained a very wide reception throughout the various churches of the Reformation. To such an extent was this the case, that in the beginning of the seventeenth century, no school of Protestant theology enjoyed a higher reputation than that of Geneva. Even then, however, there were a few divines, who, like Henry Bullinger of Zurich, deviated from the doctrines maintained in the Geneva school; and even among the Calvinists themselves there arose keen contentions between the Supralapsarians and the Sublapsarians, the former maintaining that God had from all eternity decreed the fall of man, the latter asserting that he had only permitted it, but not decreed it. No long time, however, elapsed before these petty divisions in the Genevan school were lost sight of, amid the keen and protracted controversy which arose in Holland between the Calvinists and Arminians, leading to the Synod of Dort in 1618, where the doctrines of Geneva triumphed. The great reputation, however, which the Genevan academy once enjoyed, began gradually to decline after the establishment of the Dutch republic, and the erection of the universities of Leyden, Franeker, and Utrecht. The Church of Geneva also, in process of time, became deeply imbued with the errors of the Dutch Arminians on the one hand, and the French Amyraldists on the other. Yet sound divines, even in her times of manifest declension, were found in her chairs of theology; and hence in the dispute which arose in reference to the opinions of La Place, we find Francis Turretin investigating the Genevan church to adopt the doctrine of the immediate imputation of Adam's sin as an article of faith, and thus to declare their belief in an imputation founded on the sovereign decree of God, and not one naturally consequent on the descent of men from Adam. Among the associated ministers of Geneva, there were some who held and sought to propagate the errors both of Amyraut and La Place, and being some of them men of eloquence and learning, they succeeded in persuading others to embrace heretical opinions. Matters began to assume a serious aspect, and the principal divines of Switzerland, accordingly, in the year 1675, had a book drawn up by John Henry Heidegger, a celebrated divine of Zurich, in opposition to the French opinions. This treatise, which went by the name of the FORMULA CONSENSUS (which see), was appended by public authority to the common Helvetic formulas of religion. Many felt that they could not conscientiously sign this formula. Hence commotions arose in various parts of Switzerland, and among others, in the republic of Geneva, where several attempts were made to procure its abrogation, but without effect, as the Formula still maintained its credit and authority until the year 1706, when, without being abrogated by any positive enactment, it gradually fell into disuse.

In the early part of the eighteenth century, the Church of Geneva began rapidly to fall from the high position which it had once occupied among the churches of the Reformation. Not only did it cease to be Calvinistic in its doctrines, but actually assumed the lead in the inculcation of Arian and even Socinian views. In the middle of the century D'Alembert, in the French Encyclopédie, publicly charges its company of pastors with denying the divinity of Jesus Christ. Voltaire, in a letter to D'Alembert in 1763, glories in the departure of the Genevans from the ancient purity of their theological creed. The pastors feebly attempted to set themselves right in the eyes of the Christian public, by a vague statement which they sent forth to the world. It was too obvious, however, to be explained away, that while their ecclesiastical formularies were still strictly orthodox, the pastors were practically promulgating Arian or Socinian opinions. Such a discrepancy between the recognized standards of the church and the public teaching of its pastors soon became apparent to all. The pastors of Geneva saw that the time had come for modifying the standards, if they would preserve a character for consistency before the world. They published, accordingly, a new 'Catechism or Instruction of the Christian Religion for the use of the Swiss and French Protestant Churches;' and by maintaining complete silence on the doctrine of the 'Trinity, of justification by faith, and other peculiar doctrines of the Christian system, they taught, in a negative form at least, what amounted simply to a system of modern deism. To carry out their views still farther, they quietly withdrew the Confession of Faith from the Liturgy in use in the Church of Geneva, and introduced convenient changes into the Liturgy itself, and even into the venerable translation of the Scriptures. Both from the pulpit and the professor's chair, an uncertain sound was given as to the vital doctrines of Christianity. Continuing thus for a long series of years to suppress the truth, if not to inculcate error, the company of pastors, in May 1817, passed a resolution, that all candidates for the sacred ministry should subscribe the following engagement:

"We promise to refrain, so long as we reside and preach in the churches of the canton of Geneva, from maintaining, whether by the whole or any part of a sermon directed to that object, our opinion, 1. As to the manner in which the Divine nature is united to the person of Jesus Christ; 2. As to original sin; 3. As to the manner in which grace operates, or as to efficacious grace; 4. As to predestination.

"We promise, moreover, not to controvert in our public discourses the opinion of any one of the pastors on these subjects.

"Finally, we engage, should we have occasion to express our thoughts on any one of these topics, to do it without insisting upon our particular views, by avoiding all language foreign to the Holy Scriptures, and by making use of the phraseology which they employ."

The circumstance which led the pastors to draw up this engagement, was the formation of a Protestant Evangelical Church at Geneva, which had been set on foot for the purpose of maintaining evangelical doctrine to which the company of pastors were so bitterly opposed. A persecution now commenced against the separatists, not only on the part of the pastors, but also of the government. They have continued to keep their ground, however, in the face of sore discouragement. It is gratifying to be able to state, that a very decided improvement has taken place among both the pastors and people of the church of Geneva, and the truth of God has begun to be faithfully preached once more in the city where Calvin so long lived and laboured in his Divine Master's cause, and where D'Aubigné, Gausson, and Malan have preached and written in defence of the pure Christianity of the New Testament.

GENEVIEVE (ST.), FESTIVAL OF, a Romish festival observed at Paris on the 3d of January, in honour of St. Genevieve, patroness of that city.

GENEVIEVE (ST.), CONGREGATION OF. This congregation of regular canons originated about the year 1615, and all the monasteries connected with it are under the abbot of St. Genevieve, who is their superior-general. Their costume is a white cassock, a surplice, and a long fur with a square cap, but in winter, instead of the fur and the cap, they wear a large black cowl with a hood.

GENEVIEVE (ST.) NUNS OF, an order of nuns at Paris, called also from their founder, Miramiones, who established the community in 1630. Another order bearing the same name was founded in 1636 by a lady named Mademoiselle Blosset. They educated young children, visited the sick, and employed themselves in deeds of charity and benevolence. The two communities, which were thus called by the name of St. Genevieve, were united together in 1665, Madame de Miramion being chosen superior. For some time the community took the name of Miramiones, and was joined in course of time by several other communities. The rules of the order required a sister to undergo two years probation before being admitted into the body, and also to be twenty years of age on her entrance into the order. She made no vows, but as soon as she became a member of the community, she was bound to repeat the office of the holy virgin every day, and to spend an hour, morning and evening, in secret prayer. The habit of the order was of black woollen stuff.

GENII, a subordinate class of deities among the ancient Pagans, who were looked upon as the guardians and protectors of men from their cradles to their graves. Both the Greeks and Romans had a firm belief in the existence of these tutelary spirits, who carried the prayers of men to the gods, and brought down the answers from the gods to men. The Greeks called the Genii by the name of Demons. Every person had a good and an evil genius assigned to him through life; the good genius to incite him to deeds of virtue and piety, and the evil to prompt him to deeds of wickedness and crime. Hesiod, who speaks of the Genii as numbering 30,000, represents them as the souls of the righteous who lived in the golden age of the world's history. Plato not only gives one of these Genii to each man during life; but makes him conduct the soul of the man at death to Hades. Among the ancient Romans the Genii were viewed as not only attending man through life, but as actually producing life, and hence they were called often Dii Genitales, and an additional idea which the Romans connected with the Genii was, that every animal, as well as man, and even every place, had a special genius assigned to it. It was customary at Rome for each man to worship his own genius, especially on his birthday, with libations of wine, incense, and garlands of flowers. The whole Roman people as a nation had a particular genius to whom sacrifices were offered on special occasions. The Genii are to be carefully distinguished from the Lares, to whom was committed the guardianship of families, but the Larentalia were celebrated in honour of both the Lares and the Genii. In compliment to the emperors it was a frequent custom to swear by their genius, and Suetonius relates that Caligula put several persons to death because they refused to swear by his genius. The genius of Socrates, the Greek philosopher, must be familiar to almost every reader. That the modern heathen, in very many instances, believe in the existence of Genii has been abundantly shown in the article DEMONS.

A belief in Genii has prevailed in Asia from the remotest ages, and the Mohammedans assert, that before the time when the Mosaic narrative commences, the earth was inhabited by a race of beings intermediate between men and angels, which they call Gins, Genii, or Devs. Some Mussulman authors say that the dynasty of the Genii lasted seven thousand years; and that of the Peris, beings of an inferior but still a spiritual nature, two thousand years more. The sovereigns of both were for the most part named Solomon; their number amounted to seventy-two. "In riches, power, and magnificence," says Dr. Taylor, "these monarchs surpassed every thing that the race of Adam has witnessed;

but the pride with which such glories inspired them filled their breasts with impiety, and their monstrous crimes at length provoked the wrath of the Omnipotent. Satan, or Eblis, was commissioned to destroy them; he exterminated the greater part of the perfidious race, and compelled the rest to seek refuge in the vast caves beneath the mighty Káf. Káf is the name of the mountain frame-work which supports the universe; it includes both the Caucasian chains, Taurus, Imäus, and the most lofty peaks in Asia; its foundations rest on the mysterious Saklirath, an enormous emerald, whose reflection gives an azure colour to the sky. It was the confidence with which his victory filled Satan, that induced him to refuse homage to Adam. When the Gins fled to Káf, their leader, Gian-Ibn-Gian, carried with him an enchanted shield, graven with seven mystic signs, the possession of which entitled him to the sovereignty of the universe. Adam, directed by an angel, pursued the rebellious Gin to the capital which he possessed beneath the earth, and wrested from him the magic buckler. After his death, the buckler remained concealed in the island of Serendib, or Ceylon, where it was discovered by Kaiomers, king of Persia, who became, in consequence, sovereign of the East. The successors of Kaiomers, sustained by the power of this spell, subdued, not only men, but the Genii and Giants of Kaf; and, while they retained the shield, were lords of the material universe. No account is given of the manner in which it was lost. To the Persian narrative the Arabians add, that the Genii were subjected by Solomon, the son of David, and forced to aid in building his mighty structures, and that, at the period of Mohammed's mission, many of them embraced the creed of Islám, since which period they have ceased to hold communication with human beings."

GENITRIX (Lat. the mother), a surname among the ancient Romans of Cybele, but more frequently of Venus.

GENTILES, a word generally employed to indicate every other nation except the Jews. In the New Testament the Gentiles are often spoken of as Greeks, and the word is used by Paul not only to denote the uncircumcised in opposition to the Israelites, but generally those who are ignorant of the true God, and devoted to idolatry.

GENUAL. See EPIGONATON.

GENUFLECTENTES (Lat. kneelers), a class of CATECHUMENS (which see) in the early Christian church, who were so called from their receiving imposition of hands while they knelt upon their knees. They sometimes had the name of catechumens more especially appropriated to them. Hence that part of the Liturgy which referred to them, was particularly called "The prayer of the catechumens," which was recited at the close of the sermon, along with the prayers of the ENERGIUMENS (which see) and penitents. The kneelers had their station within the nave or body of the church, near the ambo or reading-desk, where they received the bishop's imposition of hands and benediction.

GEORGE (ST.), FESTIVAL OF, a festival observed by the Greek church on the 23d of April, in honour of St. George of Cappadocia, one of their most illustrious saints.

GEORGE (ST.), FESTIVAL OF, a Romish festival held on the 23d of April, in honour of St. George, the patron saint of England. The order of the Knights of the Garter, founded by Edward III., was put under the protection of this saint who is celebrated for his deeds. The greatest exploit attributed by the Romish legends to St. George is his overcoming the fabulous dragon in Libya.

GEORGIAN CHURCH. Georgia, anciently called Iberia, is a fertile Asiatic province on the southern declivity of the Caucasus, and now subject to the Russian empire. The prevailing religion in the country before its conversion to Christianity was probably some modification of the ancient Persian system. They worshipped an image of Ormuzd, though image worship formed no part of the genuine Zoroastrian religion. The circumstances which led to the introduction of Christianity among the Iberians in the fourth century, are intensely interesting. They are thus detailed by Neander: "Under the reign of the emperor Constantine, a Christian female, perhaps a nun, was carried off captive by the Iberians, and became the slave of one of the natives of the country. Here her rigidly ascetic and devotional life attracted the attention of the people, and she acquired their confidence and respect. It happened that a child who had fallen sick, was, after the manner of the tribe, conveyed from house to house, that any person who knew of a remedy against the disease might prescribe for it. The child, whom no one could help, having been brought to the Christian woman, she said that she knew of no remedy; but that Christ, her God, could help even where human help was found to be unavailing. She prayed for the child, and it recovered. The recovery was ascribed to the prayer; this made a great impression, and the matter finally reached the ear of the queen. The latter afterwards fell severely sick, and sent for this Christian female. Having no wish to be considered a worker of miracles, she declined the call. Upon this, the queen caused herself to be conveyed to her; and she also recovered from her sickness, through prayers of this female. The king, on hearing of the fact, was about to send her a rich present; but his wife informed him that the Christian woman despised all earthly goods, and that the only thing she would consider as her reward was when others joined her in worshipping her God.

This, at the moment, made no farther impression on him. But some time afterwards, being overtaken, while hunting, with gloomy weather, by which he was separated from his companions, and finally lost his way, he called to mind what had been told him concerning the almighty power of the God of the Christians, and addressed him with a vow that, if he found his way out of the desert, he would devote himself entirely to his worship. Soon after the sky cleared up, and the king safely found his way back. His mind was now well disposed to be affected by the preaching of the Christian female. Afterwards he himself engaged in instructing the men, while his queen instructed the women of his people. Next they sent in quest of teachers of the gospel and clergy men from the Roman empire; and this was the beginning of Christianity among a people where it has been preserved, though mixed with superstition, down to the present times."

From their vicinity to the Armenians, the Georgians joined that people in separation from the Greek church, but after a lapse of fifty years they returned to the orthodox Eastern church. It is difficult to ascertain when they came to be subject to the patriarch of Constantinople, but their subjection was limited to the mere payment of tribute, as for fifteen centuries they had independent patriarchs of their own, who governed their church without interference from any other power. The Georgian church was represented in the synod of Vagharshabad by its catholicos and a number of bishops; but A. D. 580, in spite of the remonstrances of the head of the Armenian church, the rejected decrees of Chalcedon were adopted by the Georgian ecclesiastics, who have ever since formed a part of the orthodox Greek church. They continued to maintain the doctrines and to adhere to the practices of the Greek church, so that when Georgia became a Russian province by its conquest from Persia in 1801, there was no difficulty in combining them with the other branches of the Oriental church. From that time the Georgian church has been under the ecclesiastical authority of the archbishop of Tiflis, subject of course to the sanction of the Holy Legislative Synod of the Russian-Greek church. The only peculiarity which distinguishes it from the other Eastern churches is that it delays the baptism of children till their eighth year.

In connection with the Georgian church, there are a number of monasteries, the monks of which follow the rule of St. Basil. They are habited like the Greek monks. There are also a number of nunneries, in which the Georgian females are carefully educated, so that it has been noticed as a remarkable trait of the Georgians, that the women are better instructed in a knowledge of Christianity than the men, or even than the priests themselves.

GERIZIM (MOUNT), TEMPLE ON, a temple

erected by Sanballat, who obtained permission from Darius Nothus for that purpose. The circumstances which led to its erection are minutely detailed by Josephus. The substance of his account is as follows: "Manasses the brother of Jaddua the high-priest had married Nicasso the daughter of Sanballat, which thing the elders of the Jews resenting as a violation of their laws, and as an introduction to strange marriages, they urged that either he should put away his wife, or be degraded from the priesthood; and accordingly Jaddua his brother drove him away from the altar, that he should not sacrifice. Upon this Manasses addressing himself to his father-in-law Sanballat, tells him, that it was true indeed that he loved his daughter Nicasso most dearly, but he would not lose his function for her sake, it being hereditary to him by descent, and honourable among his nation. To this Sanballat replied, that he could devise such a course, as that he should not only continue to enjoy his priesthood, but also obtain a high-priesthood, and be made a primate and metropolitan of a whole country, upon condition that he would keep his daughter, and not put her away; for he would build a temple upon Mount Gerizim over Sichem, like the temple at Jerusalem, and this by the consent of Darius, who was now monarch of the Persian empire. Manasses embraced such hopes and promises, and remained with his father-in-law, thinking to obtain a high-priesthood from the king: and whereas many of the priests and people at Jerusalem were involved in the like marriages, they fell away to Manasses, and Sanballat provided them lands, houses and subsistence: but Darius the king being overthrown by Alexander the Great, Sanballat revolted to the conqueror, did him homage, and submitted himself and his dominions to him; and having now a proper opportunity he made his petition, and obtained it, of building this his temple. That which forwarded his request was, that Jaddua the high-priest at Jerusalem had incurred Alexander's displeasure for denying him help and assistance at the siege of Tyre. Sanballat pleaded, that he had a son-in-law, named Manasses, brother to Jaddua, to whom very many of the Jews were well affected, and had recourse; and might he but have liberty to build a temple in Mount Gerizim, it would be a great weakening to Jaddua, for by that means the people would have a fair invitation to revolt from him. Alexander easily condescended to his request, and so he set about the building with all possible expedition. When it was finished it made a great apostacy at Jerusalem, for many that were accused and indicted for eating forbidden meats, for violating the Sabbath, or for other crimes, fled away from Jerusalem to Sichem and to Mount Gerizim, and that became a common sanctuary for offenders. Thus far the historian."

The important historical fact which Josephus has here placed in the reign of Darius Codomanus, belongs properly to the last years of Darius No-

thus, from whom Sanballat received permission to build a temple for the Samaritans. The temple on Mount Gerizim occupied five years in building. It was planned on the model of the temple of Jerusalem, and stood for nearly two hundred years, when it was destroyed by Hyrcanus, king of the Jews, about B. C. 130. It is said to have been rebuilt by the Samaritans, but of this there is no absolute certainty. We find, however, in the conversation which our Lord held with the Samaritan woman, as narrated in John's Gospel, that the question was started as one which was commonly debated, whether men ought to worship at Jerusalem or on Mount Gerizim, showing evidently that if the temple was not rebuilt on Gerizim, the Samaritans at all events regarded it as still a peculiarly sacred place. Josephus gives an account of a dispute which arose at an earlier period between the Jews and Samaritans in reference to their temples. The arguments of the Samaritans in behalf of Mount Gerizim were, that on that mountain Abraham, and afterwards Jacob, built an altar unto the Lord, and thus consecrated it as a place for worship; and that for this reason God appointed it to be the hill of blessing. But the Jews could plead a far higher antiquity for their worship at Jerusalem than for that at Gerizim; and besides, Jerusalem was the place which God specially chose to place his name there.

GERMAN REFORMED CATHOLICS, a sect which arose in Germany in 1844, arising out of the famous protest of the Romish priest, John Ronge, against the superstitious veneration paid in that year to the seamless coat of Christ at Treves. See COAT (HOLY) AT TREVES. The protest was obviously so well founded, and loudly called for by the wild enthusiasm which animated thousands of pilgrims, that Ronge was looked upon as a second Luther sent to rebuke the superstition of the age, and to complete the downfall of the Man of Sin. Multitudes of Roman Catholics from various parts of Germany flocked to the standard of the new Reformer, who, however, instead of inculcating upon his followers the principles of a pure Christianity, soon showed himself to be only a teacher of rationalism and infidelity. Some, however, both priests and laymen belonging to the Romish church, gladly joined the movement, under the impression that they might possibly obtain a reform of some acknowledged abuses in the church. One of those most desirous of a Reformation in the Church of Rome was Czerski, to whom numbers of the new sect looked for guidance in seeking church reform; but they were not long in discovering that Czerski was too weak and vacillating to be the leader of a party. The new sect was joined by two eminent scholars, Theiner and Regenbrecht. But the system wanted positive grounds on which to rest; it was purely negative in its character. It was not long accordingly in declining even from the position it had reached, and at length resolved itself into lumanitarianism and worldly politics. The revolution of 1848 was so far favourable to the new sect, that they obtained complete liberty even in Bavaria and Austria. Ronge, who had now shown himself to be at heart an infidel, was elected a member of the Parliament of Frankfort, and joined the extreme radical party. The true character of the man was soon after this made too apparent. He absconded to England with another man's wife, and sank into the obscurity and contempt which his whole conduct merited. In a short time, the congregations which had been so rapidly formed, were as rapidly dissolved, either by being absorbed in other sects, or by being suppressed by the governments. In Vienna they quietly returned to the Roman church; in other places they joined the Protestant churches. Thus terminated a sect which it was at first supposed would give rise to a second Reformation of the Roman Catholic church, but being founded not on the revival of spiritual life and activity, but on a dead and ineffective rationalism, very speedily came to nothing.

GERMAN EBENEZER SOCIETY, a class of Christians from Germany, who emigrated to America only a few years ago. They are located six or seven miles east of Buffalo, in the State of New York. They number somewhere about a thousand souls, and are Prussian Lutheran Dissenters. Their property is held in common. Religion pervades the whole arrangements of the community. Each family commences the day with the worship of God, and at night on returning from labour they assemble by neighbourhoods, and spend an hour in prayer and praise. The afternoon of Wednesday and Saturday is devoted to religious improvement; and they are peculiarly strict in their observance of the Sabbath.

GERMANY (CHRISTIANITY IN). It has sometimes been alleged that Christianity was first introduced into Germany as early as the time of the apostles. But Ireneus, who was bishop of Lyons in the latter half of the second century, is the first who speaks in explicit terms of the spread of Christianity in Germany, referring, however, in all probability, exclusively to those districts of Germany which were in subjection to the Roman Empire. The first positive information we obtain respecting churches as established in Germany, is towards the end of the third century, when we read of the Bishops Eucharius, Valerius, and Maternus, who planted and presided over the churches of Treves, Cologne, Liege, and Mentz. The names of the bishops of these churches are found in the lists of the councils of Rome and Arles held under the authority of Constantine in the years 313 and 314. About the same time that we first hear of churches on the Rhine, the flames of persecution mark the spread of the gospel towards the Danube. Thus Afra, martyr of Augsburg, was committed to the flames about A. D. 304. The German nations who invaded the Western Roman Empire in the fifth century, were either Christians before that event, or they became so immediately afterwards, that they might establish their authority in a Christian country. It is difficult to ascertain how the Vandals, Suevi, and other tribes were led to embrace the Christian faith. The Burgundians, who took possession of a part of the Roman territory on the banks of the Rhine, voluntarily became Christians near the commencement of the century, imagining that by taking such a step they would enlist the God of the Christians on their side, and thus be protected against the incursions of the Huns. Towards the middle of the century they joined the Arian party to which also the Vandals, Suevi, and Goths belonged.

In the end of the sixth century, a number of new churches were founded by zealous missionaries, who, under Columbanus, an Irish monk, had passed over to the Continent, and laboured for the conversion of the Swabians, Bavarians, Franks, and other nations of Germany. St. Kilian succeeded in planting the gospel in Franconia, and converting the duke, and a large proportion of his subjects, who had hitherto been wholly pagan; but in the midst of his benevolent exertions, he fell a martyr to his Christian faithfulness, about A. D. 696. Such was the respect in which the memory of this indefatigable missionary was held, that he became the tutelary saint of Würzburg. Several of the companions of Willibrord, the apostle of the Frieslanders, passed into Germany, and spread a knowledge of Christianity among various German nations, as for instance, in Westphalia, and other neighbouring provinces. But while some of the German tribes had thus become Christian, the great mass of them were still involved in the darkness of Paganism. In the eighth century, however, the cause of Christianity received a powerful impulse from the labours of Winifrid, an English Benedictine monk of noble birth, who afterwards bore the name of Boniface, and who, by his extraordinary success as a missionary, earned the honourable title of the Apostle of Germany, though it is to be feared, he sought rather the advancement of the Church of Rome, than the promotion of the cause of Christ. This famous man is said to have been a native of Devonshire, born in A. D. 680. His early life was passed in English monasteries, where he was trained for the sacred office, and at the age of thirty he was ordained a presbyter.

In the year 715, Winifrid, animated with ardent zeal, undertook a voluntary mission to Friesland, with two monks for companions. King Radbod, however, gave him no encouragement, and he returned to his convent. Unwilling to remain without active employment, he formed the project of a mission to Germany, and having obtained a formal commission from Pope Gregory II., he set out for that country, where he preached in Bavaria and Thuringia, and passing into Friesland, spent three years in assisting the aged Willibrord, bishop of Utrecht. Having again set out on a visit to Rome, he was created a bishop by the Pope, and his name changed from Winifrid to Boniface. He now returned through France to Germany, where he preached the gospel among the Hessians, fearlessly rebuking their idolatrous customs, and openly demolishing an oak consecrated to the Scandinavian god Thor. From Hesse he proceeded to Thuringia, where he effected a similar reform.

On the accession, A. D. 731, of Gregory III. to the Papal chair, Boniface despatched an embassy to Rome, giving an account of his missionary labours among the pagan tribes of Germany. His Holiness received the narrative of his successful mission with great satisfaction, and in token of his approval sent him an additional supply of relics, and also raised him to the rank of an archbishop. In the year 738 Boniface visited Rome a third time, attended by a large retinue of priests and monks, and was most graciously received by the Pope. On his return through Bavaria, in the capacity of Papal legate, he divided that country into four bishoprics. In A. D. 741, he erected four more bishoprics in Germany, and in A. D. 744, he established the famous monastery of Fulda. As a reward for his missionary labours, and his fidelity to the See of Rome, Boniface was constituted, by Pope Zacharias, archbishop of Mentz, and Primate of Germany and Belgium. Thus exalted to one of the highest official dignities which Rome could confer, he presided in several councils held in France and Germany, where he signalized himself by the rigid strictness with which he enforced adherence to the canons of the Church of Rome. In his old age he left his archbishopric, and set out on a mission to Friesland, where with fifty-two companions, he was barbarously murdered by a party of pagans, who were enraged at the rapid progress which Christianity was making among their fellow-countrymen. It is quite possible besides, that they may have been not a little provoked by the military aspect which the journeys of this professed apostle of the Prince of Peace were made to assume, he having marched into Thuringia at the head of an army, and having a band of soldiers as his body-guard at the very moment when he was attacked by the pagan Frieslanders.

There were other monks, however, besides Boniface, who applied themselves to the conversion of the German tribes. Of these may be mentioned Corbinian, a French Benedictine monk, who laboured at Freysingen in Bavaria for six years; Pirmin, also, a French monk, who taught Christianity amid circumstances of no small difficulty and danger in Helvetia, Alsace, and Bavaria; Lebwinn, an English Benedictine monk, who, with twelve companions, engaged in a mission to West Friesland, on the borders of the pagan Saxons; Willibald, an Anglo-Saxon monk of honourable birth, who assisted Boniface in his missionary labours, and afterwards was appointed bishop of Eichstadt.

Towards the end of the eighth century, Charlemagne, king of the Franks, undertook the important task of converting to Christianity the Saxons who occupied a large portion of Germany. This he sought to effect partly by threats and actual force of arms, partly by flattery and promises of rewards. Such means were successful in gaining over converts in great numbers to a mere nominal adherence to the Christian faith. To prevent them from apostatizing, however, the whole machinery of the Romish church, bishops, schools, monasteries, and so forth, were set up in the midst of them. In this way Charlemagne, by force or flattery, established an outward and empty form of Christianity in the extensive district of Germany inhabited by the Saxons. By the same speedy process he succeeded in Christianizing the Huns inhabiting Pannonia. The employment of such unhallowed means for advancing the Christian cause were not likely to be productive of any substantial and lasting benefit to the country. In the tenth century, accordingly, we find remains of pagan superstition still existing in various provinces of Germany, and Christianity but imperfectly established in many places. To remedy this state of matters, the Emperor, Otto the Great, erected bishoprics in various towns; built convents for those who preferred a monastic life, and established schools for the instruction of the young. On the bishops and monks he lavished the royal treasures with unsparing hand, endeavouring in this way to show his regard for the ministers of religion, while in reality he was only giving scope for that indulgence in luxury and extravagance which ere long came to be regarded as characteristics of the corrupt clergy of the middle ages.

At the commencement of the thirteenth century, Prussia was still to a great extent under the power of Pagan superstition, and the efforts which had hitherto been made for the conversion of the people had been almost wholly fruitless. Accordingly, the knights of the Teutonic order of St. Mary undertook the task of subjugating the Prussians, and converting them to the Christian faith. The war was of fifty-three years' duration, and at the end of that long period the conquest was effected, and Christianity became nominally the religion of Prussia. The remains of the old superstition were extirpated by the Teutonic knights and the Crusaders, not, however, by the diffusion of the gospel, but by wars and massacres.

In the course of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries Christianity had not only taken deep root in the German states, but the corruptions of the Papal system had become so strongly developed, that both individuals and communities arose from time to time complaining loudly of the numerous abuses which had crept into the dominant church. It had become a hierarchy, or rather a hierarchical state. The priesthood had interposed with a claim of divinely ordained power and authority between God and his people, between the members of the church and the Divine Head of the church. The clergy asserted their right to be regarded as the exclusive expounders of divine revelation, the guardians of tradition, and the dispensers of all higher blessings. Out of the church it was maintained there is no salvation, and apart from the priesthood, no church. Thoughtful men felt that such views were wholly opposed to the true idea of the church of Christ as set forth in the Bible. And not only did her doctrines proclaim the Church of Rome to be a heretical church, but her practices also. The reflective mind of Germany, as represented by Luther, was not long in discerning this, and proclaiming it as with a voice of thunder in the ears of the whole of Christendom. The intrepid German monk raised the standard of Reformation, and nations flocked around it. Like Dagon before the ark of God, the Romish church fell before the Bible in the hands of Luther. Long had been the conflict between the Popes and the Emperors of Germany for preponderance of power and authority over the people, but in the sixteenth century, an obscure monk—such is the invincible force of truth—effected a complete triumph at one and the same moment over Rome and Romanism.

From the date of the Reformation, Germany has continued to be, to a large extent, a Protestant country. Ever since the peace of Westphalia in 1648, which terminated the thirty years' war, and secured full liberty of worship and equality of rights to the two contending parties, Germany has been almost equally divided between Roman Catholicism and Evangelical Protestantism. The former, as we learn from Dr. Schaff, is numerically stronger, being calculated to amount to 21,092,000; but the latter, though numbering only 16,415,000, makes up the deficiency by a decided intellectual superiority. On the whole, the south of Germany is predominantly Roman Catholic, the north predominantly Protestant. "In Austria," continues Dr. Schaff, "about five-sevenths, in Bavaria about two-thirds, of the population profess the papal creed. Prussia numbers ten millions of Protestants and six millions of Catholics, while the kingdom of Saxony, the Saxon principalities and Mecklenburg, are almost entirely Lutheran. In Hanover, Württemberg, Baden, Hesse Cassel and Hesse Darmstadt, Nassau, Oldenberg, and the four Free Cities, the Protestant Confession has likewise the preponderance. But there is hardly a single state in Germany where the two churches are not mixed, the Catholics being subject to a Protestant, or the Protestants to a Catholic monarch. In Saxony we have the singular anomaly that a Roman Catholic prince rules over an almost entirely Lutheran population." The Protestant church in Germany is divided and cut up into a great number of separate sections. Each little government, or duchy, or principality, has its own church with its separate polity, worship, and administration quite independent of all the others. Territorially considered, there are no less than thirty-eight Protestant churches within the limits of the German confederation. Theologically viewed, however, there are only three branches of the Protestant church as connected with the state, the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Evangelical United Church. Each of these we propose to consider in separate articles.

GERMAN LUTHERAN CHURCH. The Lutheran and the Reformed churches are the two great branches of Evangelical Protestantism. They are as old as the Reformation itself. They agree in all the essential doctrines of Christianity, but they represent two distinct ecclesiastical individualities. The Lutheran church is not only named from Luther, but pervaded by his genius and influence, and even the Reformed church in Germany is not altogether unaffected by Lutheran or rather moderate Melancthonian influences. The origin of the Lutheran church is properly to be dated from A.D. 1520, when Leo X. expelled Luther and his adherents from the Romish church. It acquired form and consistency when the public confession of its faith was laid before the diet at Augsburg. See AUGSBURG CONFESSION. But the consolidation of the Lutheran church in Germany took place in A.D. 1552, when Maurice, the Elector of Saxony, formed the religious pacification with Charles V. at Passau.

The Lutheran church in Germany, after the example of its illustrious founder, asserts the great Protestant principle that the Bible and the Bible alone is the only and a perfectly sufficient rule of faith and obedience. Yet it cannot be denied that most of the Lutheran symbols are silent upon the question as to the supreme and exclusive authority of the Sacred Scriptures, a principle which is asserted as a fundamental one in the symbols of the Reformed churches. The Lutherans accordingly retained those parts of the ancient system which were not expressly forbidden by the word of God; while the Reformed held that those doctrines and ceremonies were alone to be retained which the word of God sanctioned and commanded, and that all others were to be unsparingly rejected. The symbolical books of the Lutheran church are the Augsburg Confession, with the Apology; the Articles of Smalcald and the catechisms of Luther, the larger and shorter. To these may be added the Formula of Concord, which is held in high estimation by the strict old Lutherans.

The grand vital truth which Luther proclaimed as against the Romanists was the doctrine of justification by faith alone, which the great Reformer was wont to term "the article of a standing or a falling church." This was the shibboleth of the Reformation, and the holding forth of this central doctrine of Christianity proved the overthrow of the Papal system. It struck at the very root of Romish theology. But in some points Luther still held firmly by the ancient faith. Thus it happened in the case of the Lutheran dogma of the real presence in and with and under the material elements in the Lord's Supper, a dogma which, while it receives the name of Consubstantiation, may be said to differ little, if at all, from Romish Transubstantiation, and is liable indeed to the same objections, involving, as it does, a belief of the ubiquity of the body of Christ, and the actual material partaking of it by the unworthy as well as the worthy communicants.

So intent was the great German Reformer on a revival of scriptural theology, which Rome had long obscured and perverted, that he directed little, perhaps too little, attention to the government and discipline of the church. The consequence was that freedom from the authority of the Roman pontiff was only exchanged for subjection to the authority, even in ecclesiastical matters, of temporal princes. Hence the Lutheran churches generally, and it is in an emphatic sense true of the Lutheran church in Germany down to the present day, have become interwoven with the state, so that spiritual independence has always, in that country, been a thing unknown. The congregations have not even the right of electing their pastors. "They are exclusively ruled by their ministers as these are ruled by their provincial consistories always presided over by a layman, the provincial consistories by a central consistory or Oberkirchenrath, and this again by the minister of worship and public instruction, who is the immediate executive organ of the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown."

In regard to rites and ceremonies, the Lutheran church, while it has removed the grosser elements of the Romish ritual, such as the mass, the adoration of saints and relics, and the use of the Latin language instead of the vernacular in conducting divine service, adheres much more closely to the stated liturgical and sacramental system of Romanism than the Reformed church, which has adopted the utmost simplicity of worship. But in the Lutheran church of Germany down to the time of its union with the Reformed church in 1817, there was a warm spiritual life which beat with a steady pulsation in the hearts of both clergy and people, showing it to be a living section of the living church of Christ. A party of strict Lutherans refused to join the Union. This party is thus described by Dr. Schaff: "They take no part in the Evangelical Church Diet, and still less in the Evangelical Alliance. In this, they are more consistent than the Hengstenberg-Stahl party, who still remain in the Union. As the Puseyites confine the true church to the Episcopal organizations, and what they call the Apostolical Succession, so these high church Lutherans would fain confine it to a certain system of doctrine as embodied in the unaltered Augsburg Confession, Luther's Catechisms, and the Form of Concord. To this, every other department of church-life is made subordinate, as if religion were identical with orthodoxy or correct belief, whilst it is in reality life and power, affecting the heart and will even more than the head and intellect.

"It is especially the Lutheran tenet of the eucharist, commonly called consubstantiation, (although they disown the term,) i. e., the view that Christ's body and blood are really present in, with and under the visible elements, which they make the touchstone of true orthodoxy. They conscientiously refuse to commune with those who hold to a merely symbolical, or dynamic, or spiritual real presence, and who confine the reception of the res sacramenti to the believing communicants. Some of them, I am certain, would at any time rather commune with Roman Catholics than with Zwinglians or Calvinists.

"The late excellent Claus Harms, a thoroughly original and truly pious Lutheran minister, winds up his ninety-five theses, which did a very good work in 1817, with the proposition:—'The Catholic Church is a glorious church, for it is built upon the Sacrament; the Reformed Church is a glorious church, for it is built upon the Word; but more glorious than either, is the Lutheran Church, for it is built both upon the Word and the Sacrament, inseparably united.' But many of the modern champions of Lutheranism would deny even this virtue to the Reformed Church, and charge it with rationalism, false subjectivism and spiritualism. Their excuse is that their views of the world are confined to certain sections of Germany. Were they properly acquainted with France, Holland, England, Scotland and the United States, they would probably form a very different opinion of the most active and energetic sections of Protestant Christendom. But much as they dislike the Reformed Church, they hate still more heartily the Union, which they regard as the work of religious indifference and even downright treason to Lutheranism, tending to poison and to destroy it.

"The most learned and worthy champions of this Lutheran theology are Harless, of Munich; Löhe, of Anspach; the whole theological faculty of Erlangen, (except Herzog,) especially Thomasius, and Delitzsch; Kahnis, of Leipzig; Kliefoth, and Philippi, of Mecklenburg; Vilmar, of Marburg (who was originally Reformed); Petri, of Hanover; Rudelbach, a Dane, and Guericke, of Halle.

"Their principal theological organs are the 'Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche,' founded by Harless, and now issued monthly by the theological faculty of Erlangen; the 'Zeitschrift für die gesammte Lutherische Theologie und Kirche,' a quarterly review under the editorial supervision of Rudelbach and Guericke; and the 'Kirchliche Zeitschrift,' of Kliefoth and Mejer in Mecklenburg.

"As much as these admirers of the Form of Concord unite in the opposition to the Union and the Reformed Confession, they are by no means agreed among themselves. Some years ago a heated controversy broke out in their ranks concerning the nature of the ministerial office, which was carried on also by two old Lutheran Synods in the United States, (the Synod of Missouri, and the Synod of Buffalo,) with disgraceful violence and passion. More recently, Philippi, of Rostock, attacked Hofmann, of Erlangen, and charges him with denying the true Lutheran doctrine of justification and of the atonement. The Lutheran conference which assembled at Dresden, in the summer of 1856, resolved to reintroduce private confession and absolution, and the Consistory of Munich issued an order to the churches of Bavaria to that effect. But it was answered by a number of protests from Nuremberg, and other strongholds of Lutheranism, which goes to show, that this hierarchical movement meets with no response from the heart of the people. In Mecklenburg, where this party is especially zealous, the churches, I am told, are nearly empty, and the statistics of illegitimate births are so awfully humiliating, that it would be far more important to revive general Christianity and good morals, than to denounce the Union, and to persecute Baptists and Methodists."

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH. The founder of this church was Ulrich Zwingli, a native of Switzerland, born in what is now called the canton of St. Gall, on the 1st of January 1484. Educated for the church, he early displayed talents of no common order, and when his studies were completed, he was chosen pastor of Glaris, the chief town of the canton of that name. There he remained ten years, in the course of which he had devoted much of his time and attention to the study of theology, not only in the works of Romish divines, but in the writings of Wickliffe, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague. The result was, that his mind became imbued with those principles and views which qualified him to take an active part in the work of the Reformation. Even while still connected with the Church of Rome, he preached evangelical doctrine, and sought a reform of the errors, immoralities, and superstitions which had overspread the church. His labours in the cause of the Reformation in Switzerland were contemporaneous with, if not actually prior to, those of Luther in Germany. The opinion which Zwingli held of the German Reformer will be best stated in his own words: "Luther," says he, "is a very brave soldier of Christ, who examines the Scriptures with a diligence which no person else has used for the last thousand years. I do not care if the papists call me a heretic as they do Luther: I say this, there has not existed any person since the commencement of the Romish pontificate, who has been so constant and immoveable as Luther in his attacks on the Pope. But to whom are we to look as the cause of all this new light and new doctrine? To God, or to Luther? Ask Luther himself: I know he will answer that the work is of God. Luther's interpretations of Scripture are so well founded, that no creature can confute them; yet I do not take it well to be called by the papists a Lutheran, because I learned the doctrine of Christ from the Scriptures, and not from Luther. If Luther preaches Christ, so do I: and though—thanks to God—innumerable people, by his ministry, and more than by mine, are led to Christ, yet I do not choose to bear the name of any other than of Christ, who is my only captain, as I am his soldier. He will assign to me both my duties and my reward, according to his good pleasure. I trust every one must now see why I do not choose to be called a Lutheran; though nevertheless, in fact, no man living esteems Luther so much as I do. However, I have not on any occasion written a single line to him, nor he to me, directly or indirectly. And why have I thus abstained from all communication with him? Certainly not from fear, but to prove how altogether consistent is the Spirit of God, which can teach two persons, living asunder at such a distance, to write on the doctrines of Christ, and to instruct the people in them, in a manner so perfectly harmonious with each other."

At an early period in the history of the Reformation, a difference in point of doctrine began to appear between Zwingli and Luther. This difference related to the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, Luther alleging a material presence in and with the elements, while Zwingli taught that to eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood, was symbolically to express our faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Zwingli in 1527 wrote an explanation of his doctrine on this subject, and addressed it to the German Reformer. To this Luther replied, in an elaborate treatise, entitling it, 'Defence of the Words of Jesus Christ against the Fanatical Sacramentarians.' The controversy continued till 1529, when attempts were made to unite the contending parties. These efforts were chiefly promoted by the Landgrave of Hesse, who eagerly pressed a conference between the contending parties at Marburg. This was at length agreed to, and a public discussion took place between Luther and Melancthon on the one side, and Zwingli and Œcolampadius on the other. The debate, however, led to no satisfactory conclusion, but while both parties agreed to differ amicably on this one point, the Swiss and German divines drew up fourteen articles containing the essential doctrines of Christianity, which they signed by common consent.

The one grand point of difference between the Lutherans and Zwinglians continued to be maintained with undiminished firmness on both sides, and while the former presented their system of opinions at the Diet of Augsburg, the latter gave in their confession of faith, which agreed in every thing with the other except in the contested article in reference to the doctrine of the presence. Zwingli himself also sent to the diet a particular confession of faith, containing twelve articles relating to the principal doctrines of Christianity.

"This great man," says Mosheim, "was for removing out of the churches, and abolishing in the ceremonies and appendages of public worship, many things which Luther was disposed to treat with toleration and indulgence, such as images, altars, wax-tapers, the form of exorcism, and private confession. He aimed at nothing so much as establishing in his country a method and form of divine worship, remarkable for its simplicity, and as far remote as could be from every thing that might have the smallest tendency to nourish a spirit of superstition. Nor were these the only circumstances in which he differed from the Saxon Reformer; for his sentiments concerning several points of theology, and more especially his opinions relating to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, varied widely from those of Luther. The greater part of these sentiments and opinions were adopted in Switzerland, by those who had joined themselves to Zuinglius in promoting the cause of the reformation, and were by them transmitted to all the Helvetic churches that threw off the yoke of Rome. From Switzerland these opinions were propagated among the neighbouring nations, by the ministerial labours and the theological writings of the friends and disciples of Zuinglius; and thus the primitive Reformed church that was founded by this eminent ecclesiastic, and whose extent at first was not very considerable, gathered strength by degrees, and made daily new acquisitions."

The principle which lies at the foundation of the Reformed church in Germany was declared by Zwingli, while he was yet pastor of Glaris,—that the Bible is above all human authority, and to it alone in all religious matters must appeal be made. Acting on this principle, he swept away from the church's ritual, as well as from her creed, all that was not authorized by the word of God either by a warrant expressed or implied. The right of private judgment in the interpretation of the Scriptures was also laid down as in his view an essential principle of the Reformation.

The influence of the school of Calvin was felt by the German as well as by the other Reformed churches. The spirit which issued from Geneva speedily diffused itself far and wide among the churches of the Reformation, so that those of them more especially which took the name of Reformed in opposition to the Lutheran became rather Calvinian than Zwinglian, in doctrine at least, though not perhaps in church polity. The points on which Calvin chiefly differed from Zwingli related to the Lord's Supper and the government of the church. In reference to the Lord's Supper, Calvin maintained that Christ was really present in the Supper, not materially, however, but spiritually; while Zwingli denied the presence of Christ in either sense, and maintained that the elements were only symbols of that faith by which we receive pardon and eternal life. On the question of church government Calvin and Zwingli differed as widely as on the subject of the Supper. Zwingli maintained the principle that in a Christian state the church is subject to the civil magistrate in all her arrangements. Calvin, on the contrary, claimed for the church an autonomy or power of self-government, subject only to Christ her head, while the duty of the civil magistrate he held to

But while Zwingli and Calvin, by their combined influence, went far to give origin to the Reformed church, it was indebted also to several others among the Reformers for its establishment and constitution. Of these may be mentioned Ceolampadius, Bullinger, Farel, Beza, Ursinus, Olevianus, Cranmer, and Knox. It took its rise in German Switzerland, and found a home afterwards in the Palatinate, on the Lower Rhine, in Friesland, Hesse, Brandenburg, and Prussia. In Germany it has always been modified by Lutheran or rather by Melancthonian influences. The Reformed church, in her doctrine as well as her practice, draws a strict line of demarcation between scripture and tradition, discarding all that is not warranted by scripture. She separates also in the clearest manner between the sacramental sign and the sacramental grace, never confounding the two, nor attempting to allege that they are necessarily and inseparably connected together. The doctrine of the universal priesthood of believers is a recognized principle in the Reformed church, and hence, in the organization and outward frame-work of the church lay-elders and deacons, along with a strict discipline, have been introduced, thus creating a congregational and synodical self-government. "Romanism," says Dr. Schaff, "may be called the church of priests; Lutheranism, the church of ministers and theologians; Calvinism, the church of congregations and a free people." The Reformed church is more simple and primitive in its mode of worship than the Lutheran, and exhibits a practical energy and activity, liberality and zeal, which show it to be animated by a living power which fits it for accomplishing a great work in evangelizing the nations. "The Reformed divines in Germany," as we learn from Dr. Schaff, "are not strict Calvinists, especially as regards the doctrine of predestination; but stand in close affinity with the moderate or Melancthonian school of the Lutheran church. Hence they fell heartily in with the Union-movement, which originated with a Reformed prince, and are mostly identified with what we have called the Centre of the Evangelical Union. So Ebrard, for several years Reformed Professor in Zürich, and in Erlangen—now President of the Consistory in the United church of the Bavarian Palatinate; Herzog, his successor in the Reformed Professorship at Erlangen, a native of Basel and formerly member of the United Faculty of Halle; Sack, of Magdeburg; Hundeshagen and Schenkel, who were called from Swiss Universities—the one from Berne, the other from Basel—to Heidelberg in Baden, where the two denominations are likewise united; Hagenbach, the excellent Professor of church history in Basel, and editor of the Reformed Church Gazette for German Switzerland, but not differing in his theological position from the former; J ange, formerly of Zürich, now labouring in Bonn. These are the most distinguished Reformed divines, who may just as well be enumerated under the first subdivision of our first class.

"Schweizer, of Zürich, on the other side, the able but unsound historian of the theology of the Reformed church, sympathizes most with the left or anti-symbolical wing of the school of Schleiermacher, and contributes to the Protestant Church Gazette, of Krause.

"The recent revival of Confessional Lutheranism, and its attacks upon the Reformed church, have roused the Reformed Confessionalism, especially in Hesse, and called forth a series of controversial works of Heppe in Marburg, and a denominational Reformed Church Gazette, published by Göbel, in Erlangen.

"For some years past, an annual Reformed Conference was held in connection with the sessions of the Evangelical Church Diet, in which Hundeshagen, Schenkel, Lange, Sack, Ebrard, Sudhoff, Heppe, Göbel, Herzog, Krummacher, Mallet, Ball, and other distinguished Reformed divines and pulpit orators take part. The last one was held at Lübeck, in September 1856, and resolved to call a general conference of German Reformed ministers and laymen at Bremen, in 1857. It would be desirable to give these scattered churches of the Reformed communion a regular organization and compact unity, which would increase their efficiency. At present, however, the main forces of the German Reformed church are flowing in the channel of the evangelical Union. If exclusive Lutheranism should succeed in breaking up the Union, it would call forth, as in the latter part of the sixteenth century, a powerful reaction and revive the spirit of Reformed denominationalism. But even in this case, the Reformed church would hold on to the evangelical Catholic theology of Germany, and carry it forward in friendly co-operation with the moderate section of the Lutheran church."

GERMAN UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, the name given to the largest of the three branches of the Protestant church in Germany. It was formed in 1817 at the instance of King Frederick William III., by a union of the Lutheran and the Reformed churches under one government and worship. This union was effected in connection with the third centennial celebration of the Reformation. Attempts to unite the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Germany commenced shortly after their separation in the sixteenth century. This was the object which was contemplated by the Landgrave of Hesse, in the famous conference held at Marburg in 1529, where the leaders of the German and Swiss Reformations agreed upon fourteen fundamental articles of faith, while they differed only on the doctrine of the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper. One of the most zealous among the Reformers in seeking to promote the union referred to, was Martin Bucer, who, after various fruitless efforts, succeeded at length in 1536 in prevailing upon Luther and Melancthon to sign the Wittenberg Concordia, which proved, however, only a temporary compromise. In Bohemia a union was effected between the Lutherans and Reformed in 1570 by the Consensus of Sendomir, which also was of short duration. Melancthon, in the latter part of his life, had his heart set upon a union with the Reformed, and, for this purpose, he even proposed an alteration of the Augsburg Confession in 1540, a document which is usually appended to the Confession under the name of The Apology. The exclusive Lutheran party gained the complete ascendancy in Germany towards the end of the sixteenth and throughout the seventeenth centuries. But even during that period, when the prejudices of the Lutheran party against the Reformed were at their height, men of a conciliatory disposition from time to time appeared, who, like Melancthon, were disposed to make large concessions in order to bring about a union of the two opposing parties. Such were Calixtus, Leibnitz, Spener, and Zinzendorf, all of whom wished to unite the Christian confessions. The Reformed have always been more disposed to union than the Lutherans; and this has been more especially characteristic of the German Reformed, who have been all along animated to a large extent by the spirit of the school of Melancthon.

During the latter part of the eighteenth century, the differences among Christian churches were altogether lost sight of in Germany, amid a rising tide of indifferentism and infidelity, which threatened for a time to sweep away Christianity itself; and even when the religious spirit began to revive in the opening of the nineteenth century, the minds of Christians were almost wholly occupied in attempting to stem the torrent of infidelity which, taking its rise in France, had swept over Germany, and left the Christian churches in that country nothing but a name. Frederick, falsely surnamed the Great, prided himself on being the patron and the friend of French infidelity, and lending all his influence to its propagation among his subjects, he rendered Germany more completely infidel than even infidel France itself.

At length, after a keen and protracted struggle, Christianity resumed its former power over the minds of the German people, more especially after they had been emancipated from the French yoke. Such was the time selected by Frederick William III. of Prussia for effecting a union of the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. Chevalier Bunsen, in his 'Signs of the Times,' says, that the king matured the idea on his visit to England in 1814, and that he made the first arrangement for a union and a new liturgy in St. James's Palace in London. It was proposed to celebrate in Germany the third centennial jubilee of the Reformation, and in anticipation of this festival, which was so well fitted to recall the broad general principles of Protestantism, irrespective of the differences among Protestant churches, he issued, on the 27th September 1817, the memorable declaration, that it was the royal wish to unite the separate Lutheran and Reformed confessions in his dominions into one Evangelical Christian church, and would set an example in his own congregation at Potsdam by joining in a united celebration of the Lord's Supper at the approaching festival of the Reformation. The execution of this plan was intrusted to the provincial consistories, synods, and clergy generally. The Synod of Berlin, headed by Schleiermacher and nearly all the clergy and laity of Prussia, responded cordially to the royal decree. And not in Prussia only, but in most of the German States, with few exceptions, the example of the king was followed.

The proposal for union started by the king was first adopted in Nassau, each clergyman of the United Church engaging to "teach the Christian doctrine, according to the principles of the Evangelical Church, in such a manner as he himself after honest inquiry, and according to the best of his convictions, draws it from Scripture." In the Palatinate of Rhenish Bavaria the union was effected in 1818, with an expression of respect for the symbolical books used by individual Protestant churches, but acknowledging no other ground of faith or rule of doctrine except the Scripture. In Baden, the Union was recognized in 1821, with an acknowledgment of both the Augsburg Confession and Heidelberg Catechism, as much, and in so far, as the right of free inquiry was claimed in the Augsburg Confession, and applied in the Heidelberg Catechism. The resolution adopting the Union in Rhenish Hessa was passed in 1822, with the declaration that "the symbolical books common to the two separated churches should in future also be the rule of teaching, with the exception of the doctrine on the Lord's Supper contained therein, and on which they had hitherto differed." In Würtemberg also the Union was accepted in 1827. But Saxony, Hanover, Bavaria proper, and Mecklenburg, were too exclusively Lutheran, while Switzerland was too exclusively Reformed to require any such change as the Union contemplated, and therefore matters continued as before. The Protestants of Austria also still exist in two separate branches, the church of the Helvetic Confession, and the church of the Augsburg Confession.

Thus the pious wish of Frederick William III. to combine the whole Protestants of Germany into one Church organization has not yet been fulfilled. On the contrary, it has rendered Germany the battlefield of a theological war, which is raging as keenly at the present hour as it did thirty years ago. The intentions of the king in bringing about the Union were undoubtedly righteous and benevolent. He had no wish to set aside the Confessions, as many alleged, but he seemed scarcely to be aware of the importance of symbolical books in order to the maintenance of the purity and unity of a church, and more especially he seems to have lost sight of the fact, that multitudes would gladly accede to the proposed Union from no other wish than to get quit of the restrictions of a Confession altogether. Thus the benevolent aims of the pious monarch might after all be frustrated, and such was unhappily the result of the royal decree of 1817. A great mass both of the German clergy and laity embraced the Union from feelings of a pure indifferentism or vague latitudinarianism, which hailed the removal of all those restrictions which a creed or confession imposes.

The Union which the king contemplated was simply a union of government and worship. He did not advert to the doctrinal differences which existed, and in his proclamation of the Union he made no mention whatever of the symbolical books, which indeed had gone almost entirely out of use. To carry out the Union, it was the design of the monarch gradually to introduce Presbyterian and Synodical government, such as belongs to the Reformed church, and to have a liturgy published for the whole kingdom, which should be drawn chiefly from Lutheran sources.

In 1821 the new Liturgy was issued by the king, who commanded its reception, while the adoption of the Union was simply recommended, but not absolutely ordered. Seven years before, a clerical commission had been appointed for the preparation of a book of church service, but not having satisfactorily accomplished the object of their appointment, the king took the work into his own hands, and, with the assistance of the court chaplains and a pious layman, produced a Liturgy which was authoritatively enjoined to be used throughout his whole dominions. It was afterwards submitted to consistories for revision in 1829, and is reported to be at this moment (1857) again under revision. The introduction of this guide for public worship prepared by the sovereign himself, met with violent opposition from many both of the friends and foes of the Union. One of the most eminent divines which Germany has produced in modern times—Schleiermacher, disapproved of the step as an unhalloved and unlawful interference on the part of the king with the internal affairs of the church. The magistrates of Berlin, and also twelve clergymen of that city, rejected the Liturgy. To induce the dissentients to acquiesce, a new edition was prepared; in the second part of which many of the old prayers and formularies were inserted. This change decided the majority of the clergy to accept it.

On the 25th of June 1830, the third centenary of the presenting of the Augsburg Confession was celebrated. The king embraced this opportunity of completing his object; and, in virtue of his royal authority, he commanded that, on that day, the new Liturgy should be read in all the churches. But as some of the Lutheran clergy, among whom was Dr

Scheibel, professor in Breslau, refused to read it, several were suspended from their offices, to the great grief of their flocks. A great number of Lutheran clergymen were similarly treated the following year; and if they ventured to preach the Gospel and administer the sacraments in private houses, to their parishioners, they were thrown into prison, and compelled, with their families, to quit their respective parishes. And not only were pastors thus persecuted, many Lutheran families were also fined or imprisoned. In 1834 an edict was issued, by authority of the king, declaring all Lutheran worship illegal. This roused the attention of the public more than ever to the character of the new Liturgy; and, in the course of a few years, about twenty thousand publicly renounced the New United church, and determined to adhere to the tenets and the forms of the Lutheran church. They frequently presented petitions for toleration, to the king and his ministers, but in vain. The reply was imperative. They must either belong to the United church or submit to the punishment which their obstinacy had entailed upon them. This disgraceful persecution has been the most violent in Silesia and the grand-duchy of Posen, where most of the inhabitants are Lutherans.

The churches being in many instances deprived of their pastors, the ordinance of baptism could no longer be duly administered; and when, from a feeling of duty and necessity, the father of a family performed it, he was likewise sent to prison. The Lord's supper could only be observed during the night. The meetings for prayer, which were held in private houses, were broken up by the police. At a place in the duchy of Posen, they literally pulled the people from off their knees by the hair of their heads. It appears that, besides a number of private Christians, eleven ministers were sent to prison, some of them two or three times, for a quarter of a year together; and if, after regaining their liberty, they again visited their people, they were almost sure of being sent back to their dungeons.

In this state of circumstances, the persecuted Lutheran communities made a representation to the government; but instead of an answer, the police and commissioners were sent to distrain their goods, and carry off whatever they pleased. From one poor man they took away his whole provision for cattle, and also his cow; amounting, altogether, to one hundred and eighty francs! This cruel treatment was borne with the utmost meekness and resignation. Petitions and remonstrances, couched in the most respectful terms, were made to the civil authorities; but no redress could be obtained, nor any alleviation of the rigorous measures adopted against them. At length, in 1835, the suffering Lutherans in Silesia were led to believe that the Prussian government would grant them passports for emigration; and one of their ministers, named Augustus Kavel, was sent to England, to make arrangements on the subject with the South Australian Company. Those arrangements were completed; a large vessel was chartered by the company, to take them out; and Kavel's flock, to the amount of some hundreds, had already embarked on the Oder, for the purpose of joining this vessel at Hamburg, having previously settled their affairs, and disposed of their surplus goods, when a government order was received, commanding them to return to their homes, where they were kept in suspense for nearly two years, consuming that little property which should have served them for capital in a new country. In the meantime, the South Australian Company had obtained other labourers; and it was not to be expected that they should again incur the heavy responsibility of providing the means of emigration for these persecuted people. The Prussian government having at length granted the desired permission, in the year 1836, six hundred individuals were sent out to the colony, through the princely aid of a British merchant, who also, with true Christian hospitality, maintained the distressed pastor during the two years he was kept waiting in this country.

In the beginning of the year 1837, a new Cabinet order appeared which seemed to promise a speedy termination of the unhappy persecution against the Lutheran church. The ordinance is to the following effect:—

1st. No new prosecution shall be commenced against the Lutherans, without the consent of the ministry of spiritual affairs.

2d. The prosecutions now pending shall be closed, and judgment given, but the execution of judgment shall be suspended till the king shall have confirmed the same.

3d. The Upper Court of Justice of Breslau shall no longer give judgment in the present prosecutions, but the judgment already given shall not be reversed.

The expectations, however, which the Lutherans formed in consequence of the appearance of this government decree, were soon destined to be disappointed. The civil power still continued to trample on the rights and liberties of the people, until the accession of the present king in 1840, who no sooner ascended the throne than he put an end to the persecutions which had so long disgraced the government of his predecessor. The Old Lutherans, as they are called, were permitted in 1845 to organize themselves into a separate ecclesiastical body, in the capacity of Dissenters, their legal existence and recognition being secured, though without pecuniary support from the state.

The most eminent theologians of the United church began now to think of carrying through an ordination formula, in which the consensus of the two churches was to be contained without depriving the individual congregation of the right of giving a call on the ground of the particular confessions. The principal task of the General Synod of 1846 consisted in carrying through this well-considered plan, but the ordination formula was by itself rendered impracticable. The revolutionary spirit which pervaded the continent in 1848 was by no means favourable to the progress of Christian churches. Soon after that season of political commotion there arose within the United Evangelical church itself a strong Lutheran party, headed by Hengstenberg, who endeavoured to make the Union instrumental in advancing a High Church Lutheranism, by urging the necessity of a separate organization of both the Lutheran and Reformed churches within the general frame-work of the National church. To meet the views, to a certain extent, of this influential party, the present king of Prussia issued an order, dated 6th March 1852, authorizing the Oberkirchenrath, or supreme ecclesiastical court, which he had given to the United Evangelical church in 1850, to recognize a confessional division among its members. The consequence was, that at the meeting of the court, the members avowedly ranged themselves, some on the side of the Lutheran and others on the side of the Reformed Confessions, while Nitzsch was the only member who declared that he belonged to both churches, admitting the consensus of both. This solitary representative of the principle of the Union in a confessional sense was afterwards joined by Hoffman, formerly president of the Evangelical Missionary establishment at Basle. Thus, through the influence chiefly of Hengstenberg, the Union was seen to be not an amalgamation of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, but a mere confederation of three parties, the Lutherans, the Reformed, and the Unionists or Evangelicals proper. This discovery called forth violent protests from the Prussian Universities, and the king found it necessary to issue an explanatory order, dated July 12, 1853, declaring that the decree of the previous year was intended simply to secure to the Confessions all proper guarantee and protection within the established church, but by no means to abolish or even to disturb the Union of the two evangelical denominations founded by his father, and thus to create a schism in the national church. The truth is, the king has no sympathy with the exclusive spirit of the New Lutherans, and such is his desire for the union of all true Christians, that he has recently invited the Evangelical Alliance to hold its next general conference at Berlin. Another still more important step on the part of the king, is his resolution to call a General Synod during the present year (1857), and with this view he summoned a preparatory Evangelical Conference, consisting of fifty-seven delegates, which met in one of the palaces of Berlin in November 1856, to consider various important topics which will be submitted for decision to the proposed synod. The subjects laid before the Conference were these: the introduction of a Presbyterian form of government into the congregations of the Eastern provinces, the revival of the offices of deacons and deaconesses in the church, the revision of the present Liturgy, and the reform of the laws of marriage. The Conference closed its sessions on the 5th of December last, and its deliberations were found to be more favourable to the cause of the Union than was at first expected, and it holds out a pleasing prospect for the future theology of Germany, that the Conference contained not a single representative of the rationalistic school.

The present state of ecclesiastical parties in Prussia is thus described by Dr. Schaff, to whose recent work on Germany we readily acknowledge our deep obligation: "The anti-confessional or latitudinarian Unionists, who base themselves on the Bible simply, without the church symbols, and embrace, besides the left wing of Schleiermacher's school, a number of liberal divines of different shades of opinions, held together by the mutual opposition to the reactionary tendencies in religion and politics, are deprived of power and influence in the highest councils; but they still live, are numerically strong in the ministry and laity, and hope for a radical change in their favour in case of an accession of the Prince of Prussia to the throne, who is known to be opposed to high-church tendencies, and rather loose and indifferent in matters of religion. But, as he is only two years younger than the king, his brother, such an event is neither probable nor desirable.

"The evangelical Unionists, or the consensus party, which takes for its doctrinal basis the Bible, and the common dogmas of the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions, is strongest in the universities, but in the minority in the Oberkirchenrath.

"The strict Confessionalists, who regard the Union as a mere confederation of the two Confessions under a common state-church government, and who are for the most part strict symbolical Lutherans and monarchical absolutists, although comparatively small in number, have at present the ascendancy in the seats of power and influence. It can hardly be disputed that the ultimate tendency of their zealous efforts is the dissolution of the Union altogether. A few of them have a strong leaning to Romanism, and would at any time prefer a union with Popery to a union with the Reformed confession. Their Lutheran brethren of other states have quite recently, in a conference at Dresden, resolved upon the reintroduction of auricular confession. 'Straws show which way the wind blows.'

"In the case of a dissolution of the Prussian Union, which though not very probable, is by no means impossible, both the Lutheran and the Reformed churches would be reorganized on their separate confessional basis. But the majority of the people would not be prepared to go back to the old state of things which they regard as for ever surmounted by the Union of 1817. The radical Unionists would perhaps run into the principle of independence. The orthodox Unionists would strive to build up a United Evangelical Church, on the consensus of the two confessions, with a small membership, perhaps, at the beginning, but—as an intelli gent correspondent of the New York 'Independent' said some time ago—'with more theological learning at her command than any other church on the globe.'

"None of the three parties is willing to separate itself from the connection with the state, each striving to obtain the lion's share in the control of the establishment. But all the apparent indications to the contrary notwithstanding, the principle of freedom of religion and public worship, as already remarked, is making slow but sure and steady progress all over Europe, and the time may not be far distant, when the present relation of church and state will undergo a radical change.

"The present state of the Prussian Union is very excited, confused, unsatisfactory and critical. But it must not be forgotten, that its very troubles and agitations are indications of life and energy, as the somewhat similar movements of the low-church, high-church, and broad-church parties in the Anglican Communion, and must result at last in good. For nothing can be considered a failure which essentially belongs to the ever progressing historical development of Christ's kingdom on earth. The great merits especially of the German evangelical Union-divines for the solution of the doctrinal differences between the two great divisions of Protestantism, and for the promotion of all branches of sacred science and literature, are immortal, and have already made an impression upon the more recent French, Dutch, English, Scotch and American theology, which can never be effaced."

GERMAN LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA. The first emigration of German Lutherans to America is probably to be traced as far back as 1680, when the grant of Pennsylvania was given to Penn by Charles II. In twenty years from that date several hundred families emigrated from Germany to Pennsylvania, the greater proportion of whom belonged to the Lutheran church. The tide of German emigration, however, fairly commenced in 1710, when about 3,000 Germans, chiefly Lutheran, who had taken refuge in England from Romish intolerance, were sent at the expense of the government of Queen Anne to the United States of America. These were followed in 1727 by a large number of Germans from the Palatinate, from Wurtemberg, Darmstadt, and other parts of Germany. This colony which settled in Pennsylvania, was long destitute of a regular ministry, but was partially supplied with ordinances for twelve years by several ministers who had come from Sweden. At length in 1748, the German Lutheran Church in America was organized by Dr. Henry Melchiar Mühlberg, a missionary of the Halle Orphan House, who laid the foundation of what was called the United Ministry, and of the still existing Pennsylvania Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. This devoted minister of Christ, who had been educated in the school of Francke, and had imbibed a large portion of his spirit, laboured for nearly half-a-century among his German brethren in America, and is justly regarded as the father of the Lutheran Church in that country. Mühlberg was soon joined by other labourers in the same field, but the increase of pastors was by no means commensurate with the increase of the Lutheran population. When the first synod was held in 1748, there were only eleven regular Lutheran ministers in the United States. Three years after that time the number of congregations was estimated at about forty, and the Lutheran population at 60,000.

The Lutheran Church in America, as well as the other religious denominations of that country, suffered not a little from the disturbing influences of the Revolution. Its evil effects upon the religion of the people were felt for many a long year. Both the ministers and members of the German Lutheran Church, amid the political commotions which agitated their adopted country, experienced in consequence a sensible decline of vital religion. But with the return of peace, and a more settled state of society, came a decided improvement in the spiritual aspect of the church. The hearts of good men were cheered, and their prospects brightened. But while the German Lutherans were gradually increasing in numbers, and their zeal in the cause of Christ sensibly reviving, the want of organization was deeply felt and lamented, the church having gradually become divided into five or six different, distant and unconnected synods, which had no regular intercourse with each other. This evil, however, was remedied in 1820 by the formation of the General Synod of the American Lutheran Church; and the result of this general organization was soon felt in every department of her interests. Some of the permanent benefits which have sprung from it are the formation of a Scriptural formula of government and discipline; and the institution of a theological seminary and a college.

Within the last twenty years the German Lutheran Church has made the most gratifying progress. It stretches over all the Middle and Western States, and some of the Southern. According to its latest statistical reports, it numbers nearly 900 ministers, and perhaps thrice as many congregations. It has eight theological seminaries, five colleges, and nine periodicals, four in English, and five in German. Its home missionary field is larger than that of any other American denomination, and its missionary spirit and liberality are growing every year.

Though forming one united body, this church contains within it three different parties, the Old Lutheran, the New Lutheran, and the Moderate or Melancthonian party. The New Lutheran party, which is probably the largest of the three, consists chiefly of native Americans of German descent, and hence assumes to be the American Lutheran Church. The Old Lutheran party consists of a portion of the more recent emigrants from Saxony, Prussia, Bavaria, and other countries. This division of the Lutheran Church in America is engaged at present in a keen controversy on the subject of the clerical office, the two contending parties being the Synod of Missouri, and the Synod of Buffalo; the one holding the common Protestant view which makes the clerical office only the organ of the general priesthood of believers; the other holding the Romanizing doctrine of a separate clerical office resting on ordination, and specifically different from the general priesthood of believers. The Melancthonian party occupies a middle position between the New and the Old Lutherans. It is represented by the oldest and largest Synod, that of Pennsylvania, and partly also by the United Synod of Ohio. The Old Lutherans in America, like the strict Lutherans in Germany, hold the whole Book of Concord, laying particular stress on the Formula Concordiæ, while the Melancthonians content themselves with the Augsburg Confession and the Catechism of Luther. The New Lutherans reject the binding authority of all Lutheran symbols, except the Augsburg Confession, which, however, they receive only as an expression, "in a manner substantially correct," of the cardinal doctrines of the Bible, the only infallible rule of faith and practice. This party reject several Lutheran doctrines and practices, such as exorcism, private or auricular confession, lax views of the Sabbath, and the Lutheran doctrine of baptism in its relation to regeneration and the Lord's Supper.

The church government of the German Lutheran Church in America is in a somewhat confused and disjointed state, the Synods standing separate and apart from each other, differing in many cases in doctrinal views from one another. It was proposed to unite them in the triennial General Synod which was instituted in 1820; but several of the Synods refused to take any part in it. The General Synod assumes no legislative power, but only professes to give advice, and avoiding discussions on doctrinal points, it devotes its whole energies to the cause of education and that of missions. Besides the Synod, there is a ministerium consisting entirely of clergymen. The congregations are generally quite independent, and under no fixed system. All the children are baptized and confirmed without any regard to religious qualifications either in themselves or their parents.

Great differences are also found to exist between the Old and New Lutherans in the mode of conducting religious worship. In the Old Lutheran churches a liturgical altar-service is used, with crucifixes and lighted candles; but among the New Lutherans there is a rejection of all symbolical rites and ceremonies, and a very restricted use of liturgies, of which they have several, as well as a number of German and English hymn-books. An additional point of difference between the chief parties in the American Lutheran Church, has a reference to the revival system, the New Lutherans making use of what are called the new measures, particularly the anxious bench, from about the year 1830; while the Old Lutherans, and also the Pennsylvania Synod, set themselves against all such mere human means of promoting revivals. The controversy on this subject was carried on with great keenness for a considerable time, but has now nearly subsided, and the system of new measures is almost wholly confined to the Western States. It is worthy of remark, however, that amid all the diversities of opinion which exist among the ministers and members of the German Lutheran Church in America, it is making rapid progress as a body, and when we consider that the Germans in the New World, including their English-speaking descendants, are estimated at nearly four millions, and that the number of German emigrants to the United States, averages at present at least 150,000 a-year, we can scarcely overrate the importance of a church which seems destined to occupy a very conspicuous place among the numerous Transatlantic denominations of Christians.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. As in Germany, the Reformed are not so numerous in the United States as the Lutherans. Their church was founded by emigrants chiefly from the Palatinate, who crossed the Atlantic in the time of Penn, and hence its principal seat in the early period of its history was Eastern Pennsylvania. It receives accessions from the Rhenish provinces and other parts of Germany, where the Reformed are found. Its churches are most numerous in Pennsylvania, and next to this in Ohio, where of late this denomination has made great progress. It has also several congregations in Maryland and Virginia, but in the more southern districts, and in the far west, it has done little more than gained a footing. The constitution of this church is Presbyterian, and it has two synods, an Eastern and a Western, separated by the Alleghany mountains; and each synod is subdivided into a number of classes or district synods. The ecclesiastical polity of the German Reformed Church in America, is formed after the model of the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH (which see), to which she was subordinate until 1792, and it was only in 1819 that she adopted an independent constitution of her own. According to the most recent accounts she numbers about 300 ministers, and nearly 100,000 communicants; three theological seminaries, and as many colleges, two German, and four English popular and scientific periodicals.

The Heidelberg Catechism is the only symbolical book of the German Reformed Church in America, though the Reformed Church in Germany has several others besides. Subscription to the Catechism is not required from candidates for the ministry at their ordination; a mere verbal profession of the doctrine of the church being deemed sufficient. A professor of theology makes the following declaration at his ordination: "You, N. N., professor elect of the Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church in the United States, acknowledge sincerely, before God and this assembly, that the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament, which are called the canonical scriptures, are genuine, authentic, inspired, and therefore divine scriptures; that they contain all things that relate to the faith, the practice, and the hope of the righteous, and are the only rule of faith and practice in the church of God; that, consequently, no traditions, as they are called, and no mere conclusions of reason, that are contrary to the clear testimony of these scriptures, can be received as rules of faith or of life. You acknowledge, farther, that the doctrine contained in the Heidelberg Catechism, as to its substance, is the doctrine of the holy scriptures, and must, therefore, be received as divinely revealed truth. You declare sincerely that, in the office you are about to assume, you will make the inviolable divine authority of the holy scriptures, and the truth of the doctrine contained in the Heidelberg Catechism, the basis of all your instructions. You declare, finally, that you will labour according to the ability which God may grant you, that, with the divine blessing, the students intrusted to your care may become enlightened, pious, faithful, and zealous ministers of the gospel, who shall be sound in the faith."

During the last ten or twelve years, the German Reformed Church in America has been agitated by various keen theological controversies. The character of its teaching being chiefly that of the Evangelical United Theology of Germany, which is the joint product of both the Augsburg and the Heidelberg Confessions, it has been charged by other denominations with laxity of doctrine, and a neglect, if not a denial, of some of the cardinal truths of Christianity. The theological movement is going forward, and time alone will develop what is to be the result of it. Meanwhile the body is active and energetic both in home and foreign missionary work, seeking to discharge conscientiously the great work which has been assigned to them as a church, in the midst of a large and growing German population in America.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION OF THE WEST. This body of Christians corresponds in America to the Evangelical United Church of Prussia, and like its prototype in Europe, it rather aims at a union of the Lutheran and Reformed confessions, than boasts of having accomplished it. In this small denomination, which is as yet but in its infancy, those emigrants from Germany who have been baptized and confirmed in the United Evangelical Church may find a home. This church was instituted on the 4th of May 1841 at St. Louis, Mobile, by seven ministers of the United Church of Germany, and at present (1857) it numbers about thirty ministers. The object contemplated by the formation of this body is thus stated in the first paragraph of its revised statutes: "The object of the Association is, to work for the establishment and spread of the Evangelical Church in particular, as well as for the furtherance of all institutions for the extension of the kingdom of God. By the Evangelical Church we understand that communion which takes the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God and our only infallible rule of faith and practice, and commits itself to that exposition of the Scriptures laid down in the symbolical books of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, chiefly the Augsburg Confession, Luther's Catechism, and the Heidelberg Catechism, so far as these agree; and where they differ, we hold alone to the relevant passages of Scripture, and avail ourselves of that freedom of conscience which prevails on such points in the Evangelical Church." At its original formation this church was intended only for the more Western States; but an association connected with it, and having the same object in view, has been since formed in Ohio. It is not improbable that Evangelical Churches may spring up in other parts of the United States, and may prove of signal benefit to both the German Lutheran and German Reformed churches in that country.

GERON (Gr. the old man), a surname under which Nereus was worshipped at Gythium in Laconia.

GEROWIT, the god of war, and also of the sun among the ancient tribe of the Wends. A colossal buckler was wont to be suspended in his temple.

GERSHONITES, one of the three great branches of the LEVITES (which see), whose office it was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle on the western side of which they encamped. The Gershonites were under the conduct and direction of Ithamar.

GHASL, one of the three kinds of Mohammedan ablutions or purifications. It is a species of immersion in water, and three rules are to be observed in its performance. 1. Those who do it must resolve to please God. 2. The body must be thoroughly cleansed. 3. The water must touch the whole skin and all the hair of the body. The Sonna, which is the oral or traditional law of the Mohammedans, requires five additional circumstances. 1. That the BISMILLAH (which see) be recited. 2. That the palms of the hands be washed before the vessels are emptied into the washing place. 3. That before the prayers some lustration should be made with peculiar ceremonies. 4. That to cleanse the surface of the body the skin should be rubbed with the hand. 5. That all this be continued to the end of the ablution.

GHAT, a flight of steps leading down from a Hindu temple to the waters of GANGA or other sacred streams. The Ghat is often remarkably handsome, and the pious Hindus will often lavish lakhs of rupees upon the construction of this part of a building, which is regarded as peculiarly sacred from its leading to the sacred river where the Hindu performs his ablutions.

GHAZI KHAN, a holy Mussulman, who first subdued the country of Dinagepore in Hindustan to the Mogul power; and whose humanity and impartial justice have gained for him the worship not only of true Moslems, but even of the Hindus themselves, who frequently perform long and painful pilgrimages to his tomb at Sheraghat.

GHAZIPORE, the favourite residence of GHAZI KIAN (which see). This place is remarkable for a sect of Brahmans who reside in it, practising religious ceremonies in great secrecy. They reject the belief of metempsychosis, which is a leading object of the Hindu faith. They teach that the entire universe was created by a Supreme Deity; that the souls of men were before this life pre-existent in the Divine Being, into which they will ultimately be again merged after having been purified from all evil and earthly propensities. A profound secrecy is imposed upon all the adherents of the sect, as to the immediate forms and observances with which their tenets are bound up; they are subject entirely to the Brahmans in the direction of their domestic affairs, and subsist upon a common stock, which is in the hands of the Brahmans. There is a marked resemblance in the opinions and observances of this sect to the ancient Pythagoreans.

GHET, a bill of divorce among the Jews. See DIVORCE.

Ghibellines, the faction which favoured the Emperors of Germany during those fierce contentions between the Popes and Emperors, which for several ages filled Italy and Germany with discord and bloodshed.

GHOST (HOLY). See HOLY GHOST.

GHOSTS. See DEMONS, SPIRITUALISTS.

GIABARIANS, a Mohammedan sect which denied the free agency of man, and taught that God is the Author and Origin of all the good and bad actions which man commits.

GIANTS. The Hebrew word niphlim, translated giants in Gen. vi. 4, is by several commentators regarded as referring not to bodily stature, but to enormity of wickedness; but no such interpretation can be given of the same word in Num. xiii. 33, which in that passage, at all events, denotes literal giants. We find the Rephaim spoken of, a race of Canaanitish giants, from whom was descended Og, king of Bashan, who is described in Deut. iii. 11, as a giant. The same word Rephaim is sometimes understood in other passages of Scripture, to refer to the spirits of the dead who are in a state of misery, and hence it seems to denote hell. It cannot be denied, however, that there have been men in ancient times of extraordinary stature. Thus Og was so gigantic that his bed was nine cubits long, and four broad. Goliath of Gath was six cubits and a span in height, which is computed by some to be ten feet seven inches, or according to others, nine feet six inches. In the time of Joshua and of David giants appear to have been common. Men of extraordinary stature have been mentioned by many writers in modern times.

The story of the giants occupies a conspicuous place among the fables of ancient mythology. Homer refers to them as a savage race of men, who were under the rule of Eurymedon, and because of their insolence towards the gods were utterly extirpated. Hesiod, on the other hand, considers them not as human, but divine beings descended from Uranus and Ge, having horrific countenances, and the tails of dragons. They are said to have made an attack upon heaven with immense pieces of rock, and large trunks of trees. In this contest the giants were all of them slain by the gods, and some of them buried under volcanic islands. This fabulous war between the giants and the gods has probably been intended as a mythical description of some of the more striking phenomena of nature.

GIANTS OF THE FROST. See HRIMTHURSAR.

GIBON, the name of a remarkable idol-temple in Japan. It is surrounded with thirty or forty smaller temples all arranged in regular order. The temple itself is a large but narrow building. In the middle room, which is separated from the others by a gallery, stands a huge idol surrounded with many others of smaller dimensions.

GICHTELIANS, or GICHTELLITES, a small sect of mystics who appeared in Holland in the beginning of the eighteenth century. They were also called by the name of ANGELIC BROTHERS (which see).

GICKNIAHORES, hermits belonging to the ARMENIAN CHURCH (which see), who pass their lives in meditation on the tops of rocks. They are remarkable for the austerity of their manners.

GIFTS (SPIRITUAL). In the primitive Christian church each individual member was believed to be possessed of certain charismata or spiritual gifts, communicated to him by the Holy Spirit, and he was expected to co-operate with all the others, according to the nature and extent of his gifts, for the edification of the whole church, and the advancement of the common cause. Thus, though there were diversities of gifts, it was the same Spirit which wrought in them all for the increase and prosperity of the body of Christ. Nor did the Spirit work independently of, but by means of, the peculiar natural talents of the individual, elevating his natural gifts into spiritual charismata. The consequence of this was, that some were possessed of the gift of government, others of teaching, and so forth. The church was thus, as Neander describes it, a whole, composed of equal members, all the members being but organs of the community, as this was the body quickened by the Spirit of Christ. The spiritual gifts of the early Christians may be regarded as of a twofold character, the first belonging to the peculiar operation of the Holy Spirit in the apostolic age, and therefore special and extraordinary, the second belonging to the operation of the Holy Spirit through all succeeding ages of the church, and therefore common and ordinary.

GILBERTINES, a Romish order of religious founded in England by Gilbert of Sempringham, in Lincolnshire, in the reign of Henry I., in the twelfth century. The men followed the rule of St. Austin, and the women that of St. Benedict. The monasteries of this order were for some time very numerous in England.

GIMLI, one of the heavens or future abodes of the blessed among the ancient Scandinavians. The word means "the palace covered with gold," and was regarded as the place where, after the renovation of all things, the just were to enjoy delights for ever. It was also called Vingólf, and is regarded by Finn Magnusen as the heaven for righteous men, while he holds that there are other heavens for righteous giants, and for righteous dwarfs.

GINGOSIN, the name under which one of the ancient emperors of Japan was worshipped.

GINNUNGA-GAP, the cup or gulf of delusion, a vast void abyss which the ancient Scandinavians believed to be the primeval state of material creation, and the link of connection between its north and south poles. Into this capacious cup, light, as impalpable ether, flowed from the south, or at least from a torrid region, the envenomed streams of Eli-vâgar, and the farther they retired from their source, the more the heat, considered as the antagonism of cold, became reduced in its temperature, and at last the fluid mass congealed in Ginnunga-gap. Into this frozen mass flowed heat from Muspelheim, and thus was created the giant Ymir in the likeness of man, from whom descended the race of Frost-Giants or Hrimthursar (which see).

GIPCIERE, a small satchel, wallet, or purse worn by Romish monks.

GIRDLE, an indispensable article of Oriental dress, used for various purposes, but chiefly to confine their loose-flowing robes by which they were liable to be impeded in any work requiring activity and freedom. Some have alleged that the Jews wore two girdles, an upper and an under, the one worn above the tunic for the purpose of girding it; the other worn under the shirt and around the loins. The upper girdle was sometimes made of leather, as in the case of John the Baptist; but more generally of worsted woven into a variety of figures, and made to fold several times round the body. It is often used as a purse. The dervishes of the present day wear girdles of the same description as that of the Baptist. Among Orientals no stronger expression of affection and confidence could be shown to any one than the unloosing of the girdle, and presenting it as a gift. The Hebrews regarded it as a mark of distinction to wear a richly embroidered girdle, and at this day in the East, people of rank wear very broad silken girdles, ornamented with gold and silver and precious stones.

The girdle formed a part of the official dress of the Jewish high-priest, and indeed of the whole priesthood. It was composed of a mixed material of linen and worsted of different colours, and was worn throughout the whole year except on the day of atonement, when he had only a girdle of fine linen. Josephus asserts that these girdles were thirty-two ells long, and four fingers broad. When the priests were not engaged in official work, both ends of the girdle hung down to their very feet, but when employed in the exercise of any part of their priestly office, they threw them over their left shoulder.

When a peculiar costume came to be worn by the clergy in the Christian church, the girdle was employed as a cincture binding the alb round the waist. In former times it was flat and broad, and sometimes adorned with jewels; in the Roman Catholic church it has been exchanged for a long cord with dependent extremities and tassels.

GIRDLE OF ST. AUSTIN (FRATERNITY OF), a devotional society of the Church of Rome. The girdle which they wear is composed of leather, and it is alleged by the devotees, that the Blessed Virgin, who is Empress both of men and angels, wore it. The law of nature, the written law, and the law of grace, have all derived advantages from the use of this girdle. Our first parents, it is argued, wore coats of skins, and must therefore have had leathern girdles, and belonged to this order. Elias is adduced as an instance of its use under the written law, and John the Baptist of its use under the law of grace.

GIRDLE OF ST. FRANCIS. See FRANCIS (ST.), FRATERNITY OF THE GIRDLE OF.

GIWON, the domestic or tutelary god of the Japanese, an image of whom is generally stationed before the doors of their houses. He is called also God-su-ten-oo, which means "The Prince of the Heavens, with the head of an ox." The Japanese ascribe to this deity the power of averting from them all kinds of diseases, particularly small-pox.

GIZBARIM, certain officers employed in the service of the ancient Jewish temple. They were not to be less than three in number, and their office consisted in being the first receivers and treasurers of all that belonged to the treasury of the temple; for example, the half-shekel contributed by every Israelite, the vessels offered to the service of the temple, and things vowed or devoted to it. In the case of anything that was to be redeemed, they stated the price, and received the money. In short, they were sub-collectors or sub-treasurers under the seven IM-MARCALIM (which see).

GLASSITES, a Christian sect which arose in Scotland in the eighteenth century, deriving its name from its founder, Mr. John Glas. In England and America, it is usually known by the name of Sandemanians, from Mr. Robert Sandeman, a native of Perth, who became at an early period a convert to the doctrines inculcated by Mr. Glas, and ultimately became better known in connection with the sect than the founder himself. Mr. John Glas was born 5th October 1695, at Auchtermuchty in Fife, of which parish his father had been appointed minister about the period of the Revolution. Young Glas was educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, and having passed through the ordinary curriculum of candidates for the ministry, he was licensed by the presbytery of Perth. Soon after, he was ordained in 1719 minister of Tealing, a rural parish, near Dundee. From the outset of his ministerial career, Mr. Glas approved himself to be a faithful and devoted servant of the Lord Jesus, "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," earnest in preaching salvation by the sovereign grace of God. His fame as a preacher attracted numbers from the surrounding parishes to wait upon his ministry.

Not more than a very few years had elapsed after Mr. Glas commenced his ministry in Tealing, when he began to entertain, and even openly to promulgate, both from the pulpit and in his ministrations from house to house among his people, certain peculiar sentiments on the nature of Christ's kingdom. It was a favourite topic with the Established clergy of the time, in their pulpit addresses, to inculcate the binding obligation of the National Covenant and of the Solemn League and Covenant. While studying this subject, Mr. Glas was led to the conclusion that the kingdom of Christ not being of this world, but essentially spiritual and heavenly in its nature, was distinct from all earthly kingdoms, and entirely independent of the support of worldly governments. Thus he arrived at the notion that all national establishments of religion were unlawful and utterly inconsistent with the true nature of the church of Christ. This appears to have been the first exhibition in Scotland of what is now familiarly known as the Voluntary principle. Another opinion naturally arising out of the views which Mr. Glas had been led to entertain was, that the church of Christ being spiritual, ought to consist not of professing Christians, but of true spiritual Christian men. In this point he approached to the sentiments of the Independents, or as they are now generally called, the Congregationalists.

These opinions being avowedly opposed to the doctrines set forth in the standards of the Established Church of Scotland, Mr. Glas was summoned in 1727 to appear at the bar of the Presbytery of Dundee, of which he was a member, and afterwards at the bar of the provincial synod of Angus and Mearns. In his examination before the courts of the church, he made a clear and explicit statement of his peculiar opinions. He denied the Divine authority of the Presbyterian form of church government, and declared his decided disapproval of those passages in the Westminster Confession which treat of the power of the civil magistrate, circa sacra, and of those which treat of liberty of conscience. In regard to the form of church government laid down in the Word of God, he maintained that a congregation or church of Jesus Christ, with its presbytery or eldership, is in its discipline subject to no jurisdiction under heaven, but to Christ alone. He avowed his conviction that every assembly of believers holding the faith and hope of the gospel is a Christian church. When questioned as to the lawfulness of established churches, he openly declared his firm belief that every national church established by the laws of earthly kingdoms is antichristian in its constitution, and persecuting in its spirit.

The avowal of opinions so completely opposed to the standards of the church left the Synod no other alternative than to suspend Mr. Glas from his office as a parish minister, which they accordingly did in April 1728. In the face of this decision of the provincial synod, however, he still continued to exercise his ministerial functions, and therefore in October of the same year, the Synod pronounced a still stronger sentence, deposing him from the office of the holy ministry; "prohibiting and discharging him to exercise the same, or any part thereof in all time coming, under the pain of the highest censures of the church." This sentence was confirmed by the Commission of the General Assembly on the 12th March 1730.

After the deposition of Mr. Glas, a small body of the parishioners of Tealing separated from the Church of Scotland, and adhered to him, voluntarily putting themselves under his ministry. A church was now formed on Congregational principles, and the first point to which they directed their attention was the subject of Christian elders. Denying the lawfulness of a lay-eldership, they held that there ought to be in every Christian assembly a plurality of elders, or as they are often called in Scripture, bishops or overseers. Mr. Francis Archibald, accordingly, one of their number, was conjoined with Mr. Glas in this office, and several members of the church were appointed as deacons. Thus was constituted the first Glassite church, which existed for some time in Tealing, but in a short time was transferred to Dundee. The members were most of them poor, and several who belonged to the wealthier classes finding the burden of contributing to the necessary expenses somewhat heavy, under specious pretences withdrew themselves from the connection. At its first formation the Glassite church observed the ordinance of the Lord's Supper monthly, but in a short time they came to the conviction that it was the practice of the primitive church to celebrate the sacrament of the supper as often as they assembled for public worship, and accordingly, they kept the ordinance every first day of the week, counting it to be the chief purpose of their meeting on that day that they might break bread. The discipline of the church was exercised with remarkable strictness and fidelity, to preserve as far as possible the purity of communion.

After his deposition, Mr. Glas removed with his family from Tealing to Dundee, where his church continued regularly to assemble, and gradually to gather members, not only from the town, but from the surrounding parishes. Other churches holding the same principles, and placed on the same footing, now arose in different parts of the country. The difficulty, however, was how to supply these churches with elders. In a short time, however, this difficulty was overcome. At their meetings on the Lord's day, they followed the apostolic injunction in Heb. x. 24, 25, exhorting one another in brotherly love. By attending to the practice of exhortation, those of the brethren who possessed gifts for edifying the church soon exhibited their peculiar qualifications in this respect. Some were accordingly selected and set apart by fasting and prayer to the office of the eldership. The appointment of men to the ministerial office, who had never been trained for it by a previous university education, was looked upon by the other Christian denominations as a serious infringement upon the order of Christ's church. The clergy of Dundee inveighed from the pulpit against the followers of Mr. Glas for this anomaly in their ecclesiastical arrangements. Notwithstanding the reproaches which were heaped upon them at this time for ordaining unlearned elders, the brethren, firmly believing that their conduct in this matter had a good Scriptural warrant, went forward without hesitation in setting apart godly men, mighty in the Scriptures, as elders in the new churches which were formed. The first whom the brethren appointed to the eldership was James Cargill, who had been a glover, and whose gifts for edification were of no common kind. This man officiated as an elder for many years in a little church in Dunkeld.

Mr. Glas removed from Dundee to Edinburgh, where he officiated for several years as an elder in a Glassite church, which was formed in that city. He afterwards settled in Perth, labouring with the most exemplary zeal and diligence until 1737, when he returned to his beloved flock in Dundee, among whom he spent the remainder of his life. Nor were his labours confined to any one place; he visited the churches which had been founded in various parts of Scotland, comforting and establishing the brethren in the truth, and taking a lively interest in all their concerns. The churches which held the opinions of Mr. Glas were called Independents, being formed on strictly Congregational or Independent principles, but they had no connection whatever with the English Independents, from whom they differed on many material points. The peculiar principles on which the sect of the Glassites was founded, are set forth with great fulness, and a constant reference to Scripture, in the work which Mr. Glas published while his case was pending before the courts of the Church of Scotland. That work is entitled, 'The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning his Kingdom, John xviii. 36, 37, explained and illustrated in Scripture Light.' This was followed by various other writings, which tended more perhaps than his oral teaching to diffuse his opinions far and wide. Two ministers resigned their charges in the National Church and joined the Glassite body, in consequence of having imbibed their principles. These were Mr. George Byers, at St. Boswell's in Teviotdale, and Mr. Robert Ferrier, at Largo in Fife. The former officiated for two years as an elder in the Glassite church in Edinburgh, and afterwards for several years in a church at Hippielaw in Teviotdale; the latter, on leaving the Established Church, refrained for a time from joining the Glassites, under some misapprehensions as to Mr. Glas, but at length having overcome these, he entered so cordially into the views of the body, that he published an edition of Mr. Glas's 'Testimony of the King of Martyrs,' with a Preface, in which he explained his own motives for leaving the Established Church of Scotland, and cleaving to Mr. Glas and the churches of Christ in connection with him.

A circumstance which, about this time, tended to give the writings of Mr. Glas a more extended circulation, was the publication by Mr. Robert Sandeman of Perth, of Letters on Mr. Hervey's 'Theron and Aspasio,' addressed to the author, who was a pious and much-respected minister of the Church of England. Mr. Sandeman had studied for two years at the university of Edinburgh, but instead of entering into one of the learned professions, as was at first his object, he returned to Perth, and became a linen manufacturer. At an early period he was led to embrace the views of Mr. Glas, and married his daughter Catharine, after having joined the church. In a few years he was called to the office of a Christian elder. This office he exercised not only in the church at Perth, but also at Dundee and at Edinburgh. The publication of Mr. Sandeman's Letters on Theron and Aspasio excited considerable interest throughout the whole country, and was the means of first making the sect known in England, where it has ever since been called, not after Mr. Glas as in Scotland, by the name of Glassites, but after Mr. Sandeman, by the name of Sandemanians. A discussion arose fifty years after, south of the Tweed, on the subject of justifying faith as explained by Mr. Sandeman in his Letters. Able pamphlets and treatises were published on both sides of the question, and among others, Mr. John Fuller argued the point with singular acuteness and logical power, in 'Strictures on Sandemanianism in Twelve Letters to a Friend.' This controversy on faith in all its branches, extended, with some intervals, to a period of more than twenty years. A consideration of the questions involved in this important and interesting controversy, we reserve for the article SANDEMANIANS. In 1760, Mr. Sandeman went to London on the earnest invitation of some who had embraced his opinions, and he assisted in founding a church there. Other churches were planted in other towns in England. Having been strongly urged to visit America, Mr. Sandeman crossed the Atlantic in 1764, accompanied by Mr. Cargill. In that country several churches were planted on Glassite principles, particularly in New England. While Mr. Sandeman laboured indefatigably in preaching the gospel, and edifying the Transatlantic churches, he brought upon himself considerable opposition, particularly in consequence of the political opinions which he avowed, and which were, as might have been expected, strongly in favour of the mother country. The obloquy to which he was thus exposed, and the trials which he was called to endure, bore heavily upon his spirits, but after suffering for a time with the most exemplary patience, he finished his earthly course at Denbury, Connecticut, leaving behind him a sweet savour of that truth which he delighted to proclaim.

In the course of a very few years after the deposition of Mr. Glas, and the secession of his adherents from the Church of Scotland, the secession of the Four Brethren took place on entirely different grounds from those of the Glassites. See ASSOCIATE PRESBYTERY. The Established Church felt doubtless that it had nothing to fear from Mr. Glas and his followers, who were never likely to be very numerous, but it was otherwise with the new secession, and the General Assembly therefore resolved to exhibit a spirit of forbearance by mitigating or modifying the censure inflicted on Mr. Glas. Accordingly, without any application either from him or his friends, the Supreme Court of the National Church in May 1739, "did take off the sentence of deposition passed by the Commission 12th March 1730, against Mr. John Glas, then minister of Tealing, for independent principles; and did restore him to the character and exercise of a minister of the gospel of Christ; but declaring, notwithstanding, that he is not to be esteemed a minister of the Established church of Scotland, or capable to be called or settled therein, until he should renounce the principles embraced and avowed by him, that are inconsistent with the constitution of this church."

The peculiarity of the Glassite churches is, that they have a plurality of elders, pastors, or bishops in each church, who are chosen according to the instructions given by Paul to Timothy and Titus, without regard to previous education for the office, and even although the person so selected should happen to be actively engaged in secular employment. To have been married a second time is a disqualification for the office. The elders are ordained by prayer and fasting, imposition of hands, and giving the right hand of fellowship. The discipline of the churches is strict, and they hold it to be unlawful to eat or drink with excommunicated members. In all the proceedings of the church unanimity is considered as necessary, and if any member therefore differs in opinion from the rest, he must either surrender his judgment to the church, or be shut out from its communion. The Glassites regard it as unlawful to join in prayer with any one that is not a brother or sister in Christ. In addition to the weekly observance of the Lord's Supper, they have also love feasts after the example of the primitive Christians, and on these occasions it is incumbent on every member to be present. These love-feasts are held between the morning and afternoon services. It is customary on the admission of a new member to the church for each brother and sister to receive him with a holy kiss. Mutual exhortation is practised at their meetings on the Lord's day, any member who possesses the gift of edifying the brethren, being allowed to address the church. This denomination of Christians consider it to be their duty to abstain from blood, and from things strangled; considering the decree of the first council of Jerusalem to be still obligatory upon all Christians. The practice of washing each other's feet is also observed in obedience to what they consider a literal and express injunction given by our Lord to his disciples and followers in all ages. They regard it as unlawful literally to lay up treasures on earth, and each member considers his property liable to be called for at any time to meet the wants of the poor, and the necessities of the church. They look upon a lot as sacred, and accordingly they disapprove of all lotteries and games of chance. They make a weekly collection before the Lord's Supper for the support of the poor and defraying other necessary expenses. The Glassites hold no communion or fellowship whatever with other churches. The Glassites are much fewer in number than they formerly were. According to the last census in 1851, their churches in Scotland amounted to only six, with a membership probably not exceeding in all 800. In England the number of Sandemanian churches reported by the Census officers was six, having in all probability not more than 700 members.

GLAUCUS, a sea-god, an attendant on NEPTUNE (which see). It was believed in ancient Greece that once every year this deity visited all the coasts and islands accompanied by sea-monsters. He was worshipped particularly by fishermen and sailors.

GLEBE, church-land, or land belonging to a parish church. In the most general sense of the word, glebe is applicable to any land or ground belonging to any benefice, see, manor, or inheritance. In Scotland, the law requires the glebe to extend to four acres of arable land, though it generally, in point of fact, exceeds that measure. Besides the arable glebe, most parish ministers in Scotland have a grass glebe sufficient for the support of a horse and two cows.

GNOSIMACHI (Gr. knowledge-haters), a sect which is said to have sprung up in the fourth century, headed by one Rhetorius, who maintained that the essence of Christianity consisted not in speculative doctrines, but in practical conduct. "But it may be a question," as Neander well remarks, "whether there was ever a regularly constituted sect professing such indifference to doctrines; whether the fact ever amounted to anything more than this, that individuals at different times, and in different places, were led by the same opposition, and the same tendency of mind to entertain these views:— of which individuals Rhetorius may have been one."

GNOSTICS (Gr. gnosis, knowledge), the general name applied to various classes of heretics, which arose at an early period in the Christian church. The word from which their name is derived, had been previously used in schools of philosophy, to denote a higher and esoteric science, unknown to the vulgar. As used by the Gnostics themselves, however, it was designed to express the superiority of their doctrines to those of the Pagans and the Jews, as well as to the popular views of Christianity. The systems of Gnosticism were various, all of them referable to two fixed historical centres, Syria and Egypt. Hence, there was a marked difference between the Syrian and the Alexandrian Gnosis, the former being characterized by a predominance of Dualism, the latter by a predominance of Pantheism. The combination of these two principles gave rise to Manicheism.

The rise of the various Gnostic sects at so early a period in the history of the Christian church, is to be traced to the prevalence of a theoretical spirit which sought to solve all the great problems of religion by mere human speculation. The systems of thought which were thus to account for all difficulties, and to explain all mysteries, were themselves complicated in their nature, being composed of elements drawn from the Platonic philosophy, Jewish theology, and old Oriental theosophy. It is impossible even cursorily to examine Gnosticism in the diversified aspects which it assumes, without being at almost every point reminded of the old religious systems of Asia, Parsism, Brahmanism, and Budhism. Neander thinks that the class to which the speculations of the Gnostics belong is that of Oriental Theosophists, and that eminent ecclesiastical historian still further remarks: "They differed radically from the thinkers of the West. They moved rather amidst intuitions and symbols than conceptions. Where the Western thinker would have framed to himself an abstract conception, there stood before the soul of the Gnostic a living appearance, a living personality in vivid intuition. The conception seemed to him to be a thing without life. In the eye of the Gnostic everything became hypostatized, which to the Western thinker existed only as a conception. The image, and what the image represented, were, in the Gnostic's mode of representation, often confounded together; so that the one could not be divided from the other. Hurried along, in spite of himself, from intuition to intuition, from image to image, by the ideas floating before or filling his mind, he was in no condition to evolve these ideas and place them in the clear light of consciousness. But if we take pains to sift out the fundamental thoughts lying undeveloped in their symbols, and to unfold them clearly to our consciousness, we shall see, gleaming through the surface, many ideas, which, though not understood by their contemporaries, were destined, in far later ages, to be seized upon once more, and to be more fully carried out by a science regenerated through the influence of faith. Intuition, anticipating the lapse of ages, here grasped in an immediate way what the process of logical analysis was to master only after long and various wanderings beyond and short of the truth."

The principal questions to which the speculations of the Gnostics were directed had reference to the origin of creation; such as How the finite could be evolved from the infinite? How creation can be conceived to have a beginning? and more especially in this department of thought, How a purely spiritual Being could originate a material world and a perfect Being, a world which is characterized by many imperfections? Whence have arisen the destructive powers of nature? What is the origin of moral evil? Such were some of the most important and intricate of those problems which the Gnostics set themselves to solve, and for the satisfactory solution of which all their theories and hypothetical systems were principally framed.

Hence at the foundation of most of the Gnostic systems lies the idea of two different and opposite worlds, the one the region of light, the other of darkness; the one the region of purity, the other of sin; the one the region of happiness, the other of wretchedness; the one the region of immortality, the other of mortality. Now in this duality of worlds so distinct, so diametrically opposite in their natures, it seems impossible to find a point of harmony so as to account for their creation by one Supreme, Perfect Being. To bridge over this apparently impassable gulf, the doctrine of EMANATIONS (which see) was borrowed from the Neo-Platonists. These emanations from the Divine essence were supposed to form a series which became less and less perfect in proportion as it was distant from the original source. The primary emanations were nearest in purity and perfection of character to the Divine essence from which they immediately sprung, thus giving rise to the superior world. At a remoter point of the series, the diminution of perfection became more and more apparent, thus giving rise to the inferior world. This hypothesis was obviously framed upon the supposition, that from the very first link in the chain in-perfection began to be developed, which went on increasing progressively until at length imperfection became as it were the rule, and perfection the exception. But on this theory it is plain that there must have been a link in the chain in which perfection and imperfection were in equilibrio, neither having the preponderance. It is at this point that the DEMIURGE (which see) of the Gnostics is introduced, being the last emanation of the Pleroma, and the first person of the inferior world. A theory of this kind was a libel upon creation, which it supposed belonged not to the Supreme Being, but to an inferior being, who from his very nature was composed of perfection and imperfection in equal parts or proportions.

The primal source of being, according to the chief Gnostic systems, was the BYTHOS (which see), which like the БРАХМ (which see) of Hinduism was an invisible, incomprehensible being, enjoying perfect and imperturbable quiescence, and from whom all emanations proceeded. This Supreme Being, and the emanations which composed the superior world, together formed the Pleroma or fulness of intelligences, which are called ÆONS (which see). These Æons varied in numbers in the different Gnostic systems, those of the Basilidians amounting even to three hundred and sixty-five.

Gnosticism in all its phases contains the element of a fall, extending not to man merely, but to the whole inferior world, which as the production of the Demiurge is necessarily degraded. This fall is in some of the systems intimately connected with Hylé or matter, which was believed to be essentially corrupt. This Platonic notion is found to characterize the Alexandrian, as distinguished from the Syrian Gnosis. The mixture of matter with spirit, the imprisonment of souls in material bodies, was regarded by this class of Gnostics as sufficiently accounting for the appearance of moral evil in the world. The Gnostic sects which originated in Syria, however, adopted a different theory, embodying in it the Dualism of the old Parsic or Zoroastrian system. It supposed two original kingdoms, the one of evil, the other of good, which encroaching gradually upon one another, gave rise to a mixture of the two opposite elements of good and evil. Thus the Alexandrian Gnostics attempted a solution of the difficult question as to the origin of moral evil on a Monoistic hypothesis; while the Syrian Gnostics were equally confident of having found a solution in the invention of a Dualistic hypothesis.

Intimately connected with the explanation which the Gnostics gave of the fall, was their explanation of the recovery or redemption of man. The work of the Demiurge, we have seen, was to originate evil, and therefore it was not possible that he could also be the originator of good. It was necessary that one of the higher intelligences or Æons should descend from the superior to the inferior world, in order to teach man how he should find his way back to the bosom of the Pleroma. This Æon is Christ, the open enemy of the Demiurge, and the destroyer of his creation. In most of the systems the Divine emanation or Æon who became the Christ, took not a real, but only a seeming body, it being impossible in their view that a pure Æon should assume a corporeal body, which as being composed of Hylé or matter, was necessarily impure. And following out the same line of thought, they alleged the God or Jehovah of the Jews to be the Demiurge, and the law which he promulgated in the Old Testament to be inferior and imperfect, whereas the law which Christ promulgated in the New Testament was the expression of the mind of the Bythos or Unknown Father. Before the coming of Christ men were under the Demiurge of the Jews, an inferior deity, but since that period men have been under the Great God, who is essentially holy, and just, and good. Valentinus taught his followers that mankind might be divided into three classes: (1.) The Hylic, or those who were under the power of matter as their guiding principle. This is exemplified in Pagans. (2.) The Psychical, or those who are subject only to the Demiurge. This is instanced in the Jews. (3.) The Pneumatic or Spiritual, or those who seek to return into the Pleroma. This is manifested in true Christians. Thus we learn, according to this Gnostic system, that the grand desire of man ought ever to be to rise from the Hylic or Psychical up to the class of the Spiritual, who alone shall find bliss in the bosom of the Pleroma.

Such is a connected view of Gnosticism in its general fundamental principles, as it developed itself in the Christian church in the second and the earlier part of the third century. The practical influence of this complicated philosophico-religious system is thus sketched by Neander: "This difference between the Gnostic systems was one of great importance, both in a theoretical and a practical point of view. The Gnostics of the first class, who looked upon the Demiurge as an organ of the supreme God, and his representative, the fashioner of nature according to his ideas, the guiding spring of the historical evolution of God's kingdom, might, consistently with their peculiar principles, expect to find the manifestation of the divine element in nature and in history. They were not necessarily driven to an unchristian hatred of the world. They could admit that the divine element might be revealed even in earthly relations; that everything of the earth was capable of being refined and ennobled by its influence. They could, therefore, be quite moderate in their ascetic notions, as we find the case actually to have been with regard to many of this class; although their notion of the hylé, continually tended to the practically mischievous result of tracing evil exclusively to the world of sense; and although their over-valuation of a contemplative Gnosis might easily prove unfavourable to the spirit of active charity. On the contrary, the other kind of Gnosis, which represented the Creator of the world as a nature directly opposed to the supreme God and his higher system, would necessarily lead to a widely fanatical and morose hatred of the world, wholly at war with the spirit of Christianity. This expressed itself in two ways; among the nobler, and more sensible class, by an excessively rigid asceticism, by an anxious concern to shun all contact with the world—though to fashion and mould that world constitutes a part of the Christian vocation. The morality, in this case, to make the best of it, could be only negative, only a preparatory step of purification in order to the contemplative state. But the same eccentric hatred of the world, coupled with pride and arrogance, might also lead to wild enthusiasm and a bold contempt for all moral obligations. The principle once started upon, that the whole of this world is the work of a finite, ungodlike spirit; that it is not susceptible of any revelation of divine things; that the loftier natures who belong to a far higher world, are here held in bondage; these Gnostics easily came to the conclusion, that everything external is a matter of perfect indifference to the inner man,—nothing of a loftier nature can there be expressed; the outward man may indulge in every lust, provided only that the tranquillity of the inner man is not thereby disturbed in its meditation. The most direct way of showing contempt and defiance of this wretched, hostile world was, not to allow the mind to be affected by it in any situation. Men should mortify sense by braving every lust, and still preserving the tranquillity of the mind unruffled. We must conquer lust by indulgence,—said these bold spirits—for it is no great thing for a man to abstain from lust who knows nothing about it by experience. The greatness lies in not being overcome by it, when clasped in its embrace. Though the reports of enemies ought not to be used without great caution and distrust, and we should never forget that such witnesses were liable, by unfriendly inferences, or the misconstruction of terms, to impute to such sects a great deal that was false; yet the characteristic maxims quoted from their own lips, and the coincident testimony of such men as Irenæus and Epiphanius, and of those still more unprejudiced and careful inquirers, the Alexandrians, place it beyond all reasonable doubt, that they not merely expressed, but even practised, such principles of conduct. Besides, that enemy of Christianity, the Neo-Platonic philosopher, Porphyry, corroborates this testimony by citing from the mouth of these persons maxims of a similar import. ‘A little standing pool,’ said they, ‘may be defiled, when some impure substance drops into it; not so the ocean, which, conscious of its own immensity, admits everything. So little men are overcome by eating; but he who is an ocean of strength takes everything and is not defiled.’ Not only in the history of Christian sects of earlier and more recent times, but also among the sects of the Hindoos, and even among the rude islanders of Australia, instances may be found of such tendencies which defied all moral obligations—tendencies that have arisen from speculative or mystical elements, or it may be from some subjective caprice setting itself in opposition to all positive law. In the connection of the present period, the false striving of the subjective spirit after emancipation, after breaking loose from all the bonds, holy or unholy, whereby the world had been hitherto kept together, is quite apparent. And this aim and tendency might seem to have found a point of union in that unshackling of the spirit, so radically different in its character, which Christianity brought along with it.”

The peculiar opinions of the different Gnostic sects had of course a marked effect upon their views of Christian worship and ordinances. Some of them held that salvation rested simply on knowledge; and that the man who possessed knowledge needed no more. Hence they held that baptism and the Lord’s supper were altogether unnecessary. Others again, for example, the Marcosians, maintained a twofold baptism, the first or psychical baptism being administered in the name of Jesus the Messiah of the psychical natures, by which believers obtained the forgiveness of sin, and the hope of eternal life in the inferior kingdom of the Demiurge; the second, or pneumatic baptism, being administered in the name of the Christ from heaven, united with Jesus, whereby the spiritual nature attained to self-consciousness and to perfection, and entered into fellowship with the Pleroma. When these two species of baptism were dispensed two different formulæ of consecration were used, and in the case of pneumatic baptism, the person to whom the ordinance was administered was anointed not with oil, but with a costly balsam. The Marcosians also practised a peculiar ceremony, anointing the dead with this balsam mingled with water, and pronouncing a form of prayer.

The special doctrines and practices of the different sects of Gnostics will be found under their separate heads, each of them being known by different names.

GOD, the term used in the English language to denote the Supreme Being. The corresponding word in Latin is Deus, in Greek Theos, and in Hebrew Elohim. Those who deny the existence of such a Being are called ATHEISTS (which see).

The first question which regards God is that which concerns the fact of His existence—a fact which is sought to be established by writers on the subject, by two different modes of reasoning, the one being termed a priori, the other a posteriori, the one directed to prove that God must be, and the other that He is. These two different tracks of thought have uniformly been pursued by two different classes of thinkers. The argument for the necessary existence of the Divine Being lies strictly within the domain of the abstract reasoner, while the argument from design to the designer, from the works to the workman, belongs to the popular expositor of Natural Theology.

The argument from necessity has been treated by several writers of great ability and metaphysical acumen, of whom may be noticed Mr. Locke, Dr. Cudworth, Dr. Samuel Clarke, and Mr. Gillespie. The argument as conducted by Mr. Locke occurs in the tenth chapter of his fourth book of his Essay on the Human Understanding, and may be thus briefly stated: "Man knows that he himself is. He knows also that nothing cannot produce a being, and something must therefore be eternal. That eternal being must be most powerful. And most knowing. And therefore God."

The a priori argument of Dr. Cudworth, as given in his Intellectual System, may be thus stated in his own words: "Whatsoever is, or hath any kind of entity, doth either subsist by itself, or else is an attribute, affection, or mode of something that doth subsist by itself. For it is certain that there can be no mode, accident, or affection of nothing; and, consequently, that nothing cannot be extended nor measurable. But if space be neither the extension of body, nor yet of substance incorporeal, then must it of necessity be the extension of nothing, and the affection of nothing, and nothing must be measurable by yards and poles. We conclude, therefore, that from this very hypothesis of the Democritick and Epicurean atheists, that space is a nature distinct from body, and positively infinite, it follows undeniably that there must be some incorporeal substance whose affection its extension is; and because there can be nothing infinite but only the Deity, that it is the infinite extension of our incorporeal Deity."

Dr. Clarke, whose argument is precisely similar to that of Dr. Cudworth, sets out in his reasoning from the fundamental propositions, That something must have existed from all eternity, and that this something must have been a being independent and self-existent. Space and time, or as he calls it, duration, proves, he argues, the existence of something whereof these are qualities, for they are not themselves substances, and he concludes the Deity must be the infinite being of whom they are qualities. Having, from these propositions, established in his view the existence of God, he deduces still further from these same propositions the whole qualities or attributes of God.

It is interesting to observe the different phases which the a priori argument for the existence of a God assumes, in so far as the element or datum is concerned, from which it sets out as admitted on all hands to be indisputable. This datum is invariably some aspect or other of the notion of infinity. Proceeding on this fundamental notion, some of the ablest writers in the scholastic ages sought to establish the existence of a God. Thus Anselm of Canterbury reasons: "The fool may say in his heart: There is no God (Ps. xiv. 1.), but he thereby shows himself a fool, because he asserts something which is contradictory in itself. He has the idea of God in him, but denies its reality. But if God exists in idea, he must also exist in reality. Otherwise the real

God, whose existence we may comprehend, would be superior to the one who exists only in imagination, and consequently would be superior to the highest imaginable object, which is absurd; hence it follows, that that, beyond which nothing can be conceived to exist, really exists."

In the same category may be classed the argument of Des Cartes, which infers from the conception of his existence the fact of his existence. It is thus stated by the philosopher himself:

Proposition.—"The existence of God is known from the consideration of His nature alone."

Demonstration.—"To say that an attribute is contained in the nature, or in the concept of a thing, is the same as to say that this attribute is true of this thing, and that it may be affirmed to be in it."

"But necessary existence is contained in the nature, or in the concept of God."

"Hence it may with truth be said that necessary existence is in God, or that God exists."

The same argument Des Cartes still further explains by an illustration: "Just as because, for example, the equality of its three angles to two right angles is necessarily comprised in the idea of a triangle, the mind is firmly persuaded that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles; so, from its perceiving necessary and eternal existence to be comprised in the idea which it has of an all-perfect Being, it ought manifestly to conclude that this all-perfect Being exists." Kant, taking up this illustration, thus exposes the fallacy of the Cartesian argument: "If I do away with the predicate in an identical judgment, and I retain the subject—that is to say, do away with the equality of the three angles to two right angles, and yet retain the triangle, or do away with necessary existence, and yet retain the idea of an all-perfect Being—a contradiction arises. But if I annul the subject together with the predicate, then there arises no contradiction, for there is no more anything which could be contradicted. To assume a triangle, and yet to do away with the three angles of the same, is contradictory; but to do away with the triangle together with its three angles is no contradiction. It is just the same with the conception of an absolutely necessary being. If you do away with the existence of this, you thus do away with the thing itself, together with all its predicates in which case there can be no contradiction."

By far the most philosophical and thoroughly conclusive exhibition of the a priori argument, however, is that which is given by Mr. Gillespie in his work entitled 'The Necessary Existence of God.' Our limited space compels us to content ourselves with rapidly sketching the various steps of the lucid demonstration of this able author, to whom the modern philosophical world owe a deep debt of obligation for having placed this difficult part of natural theology in a light so clear and convincing. Mr. Gillespie thus lays down the successive steps of his argument: Part. 1. Prop. I. Infinity of Extension is necessarily existing. Prop. II. Infinity of Extension is necessarily indivisible. Corollary from Prop. II. Infinity of Extension is necessarily immovable. Prop. III. There is necessarily a Being of Infinity of Extension. Prop. IV. The Being of Infinity of Extension is necessarily of Unity and Simplicity. Sub. Prop. The Material Universe is finite in extension. Prop. V. There is necessarily but One Being of Infinity of Extension.—Part 2. Prop. I. Infinity of Duration is necessarily existing. Prop. II. Infinity of Duration is necessarily indivisible. Corollary from Prop. II. Infinity of Duration is necessarily immovable. Prop. III. There is necessarily a Being of Infinity of Duration. Prop. IV. The Being of Infinity of Duration is necessarily, of Unity and Simplicity. Sub. Prop. The Material Universe is finite in duration. Corollary from Sub. Prop. Every succession of substances is finite in duration. Prop. V. There is necessarily but one Being of Infinity of Duration.—Part 3. Prop. I. There is necessarily a Being of Infinity of Expansion and Infinity of Duration. Prop. II. The Being of Infinity of Expansion and Infinity of Duration is necessarily of unity and simplicity. Prop. III. There is necessarily but one Being of Infinity of Expansion and Infinity of Duration.

The second division of Mr. Gillespie's argument goes to establish the attributes of this necessarily existing Being. The steps are as follows: Part 1. Prop. The simple, sole Being of Infinity of Expansion and of Duration is necessarily Intelligent and All-Knowing. Part 2. Prop. The simple, sole Being of Infinity of Expansion and of Duration who is All-knowing is necessarily All-Powerful. Part 3. Prop. The simple, sole Being of Infinity of Expansion and of Duration who is All-Knowing and All-Powerful is necessarily, entirely Free.

The third division contains the single Prop., The Simple, Sole, Being of Infinity of Expansion and of Duration, who is All-Knowing, All-Powerful, and entirely Free, is necessarily, completely Happy: and the Sub. Prop., The Simple, Sole Being of Infinity of Expansion and of Duration—who is All-Knowing, All-Powerful, entirely Free, and completely Happy, is, necessarily, perfectly Good. Thus by a closely connected chain of reasoning does Mr. Gillespie conclusively establish the Necessary Existence of the Being and Attributes of God, on a basis much firmer than any on which it has ever before been made to rest.

The a priori argument as stated by the Schoolmen too often involved vicious reasoning in a circle. As an instance we may adduce the argument as stated by Wesselius, following in the wake of Anselm: "The non-existence of God would involve that something did not exist which necessarily must exist." The same objection may with justice be alleged against the same argument as stated by Des Cartes, that in the very idea of God are contained such things as necessarily imply his existence, and necessary existence being admitted on all hands to belong to the idea of God, therefore, we may with as much truth affirm that God exists, as that all the angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. The entire force of this argument obviously rests on the assumption that the strongest evidence which we can have of the existence of anything, is a clear and distinct perception of it in our minds. But the atheist will never for a moment admit that our idea of a God is a certain and irrefragable proof of the existence of a God. We must start in the argument, as Mr. Gillespie does, from an admitted primary intuition or ultimate element of human consciousness, and such an intuition is found in the twofold notions of Space or Expansion, and Time or Duration. But to reason from our idea of God, to the actual existence of God, "seems, to use the language of Dr. Clarke, "to extend only to the nominal idea or mere definition of a self-existent Being, and does not with a sufficiently evident connection refer and apply that general nominal idea, definition or notion, which we frame in our own mind, to any real particular being actually existing without us."

Another argument for the existence of God may be thus briefly stated. Something now exists, and therefore something must from all eternity have existed. The truth of this proposition is indisputable, but in order to bring it to bear upon the existence of a God, it will be necessary to prove by a kind of exhaustive process, that the something which must have existed from eternity could be no other than God. The general proposition has been readily conceded by atheists both of ancient and of modern times, and for the indefinite word something they have substituted the universe, alleging it to be eternal. See ETERNITY OF THE WORLD. But that matter or the universe is not eternal might be proved in a variety of ways. Dr. Dick, in his Lectures on Theology, presents the proof in the following form: "If it has subsisted from eternity, it must have subsisted as it is; there being, on the hypothesis of atheists, no cause to produce a change, and a change being inconsistent with the idea of necessary existence. Hence we see, by the way, that matter cannot be that being which has existed from eternity. If it existed from eternity, it exists by necessity of nature. But it is an express contradiction to suppose that which exists necessarily, not to exist; and yet we are all sensible that there is no contradiction in supposing the non-existence of matter, for we can all conceive it to be annihilated. It is a contradiction to suppose that which exists necessarily, to exist in any other state or form. But we can conceive matter to be in motion or at rest; and finding some parts of it in the one state, and some in the other, we conclude that its existence is not necessary, but contingent. We can conceive it to be differently modified; that it might have wanted some of its properties, and possessed others which do not belong to it; that the frame of the universe might have been different; and that in our system there might have been more or fewer planets, and these might have been attended with more or fewer satellites. But if the universe is self-existent, it must have always been as it now is. The sun must have always been the centre of this system, and the planets must have always described their orbits around him. There must have been eternal revolutions of Saturn and the Georgium Sidus, and eternal revolutions of the Earth and Mercury. Now, as these revolutions are performed in different times, and, on the supposition of their eternity, are all infinite in number, it follows that we have infinites which as infinites must be equal, but being made up of revolutions performed in unequal times, are unequal. But this is impossible, and the hypothesis from which it is deduced is absurd."

The a posteriori argument for the existence of a God is founded on the admitted principle, that where design is apparent there must have been a designer. Now it is easy to show, that the world around us teems with proofs of intelligent design. Whether we look to the beautiful and complicated structure of the human body, or to the laws which regulate the processes of the human mind; whether we contemplate the world of animated or inanimate matter, all proclaim the existence of a First Cause, possessed of intelligence and wisdom. In the early history of the human mind, the transition was rapid from the unintelligible wonders of nature to the workings of a superior intelligence. All nature was spiritualized; not only was there believed to be a soul in man, but in the plants, the animals, the very elements, nay, the world itself, so that even the abstract idealism of Fichté and Schelling arrives with all its laborious and mysterious efforts at nearly the same conclusions with the earliest exertions of human reason, those exertions which were the natural outgoings of man towards that exalted Being, in the knowledge of whom all his future knowledge could only find its consummation and its end.

To disprove, if possible, the doctrine of Final Causes, Mr. Hume attempted to start a prior question as to the validity of such a mode of reasoning. We can only argue from design in his view, when we previously know something of the alleged Designer, and what is the nature of the work that we are to expect at his hands. Thus from what we have learned of the capabilities of mind, we may safely reason from the nature of the work to the power and skill of the workman. But the universe, Mr. Hume alleges, is an effect so completely singular, that we can draw no valid conclusion from it as to the wisdom and skill of the great Creator. Now in this course of reasoning there is an obvious fallacy. It proceeds upon the assumption that the argument from Design involves far more than it actually does. From the limited extent of our mental constitution, we admit, that it is impossible for us to form any proper conception of infinite intelligence, but we can proceed so far at all events as to recognize the traces of intelligence when they present themselves. This Mr. Hume readily concedes in reference to the works of man, but the singularity of this effect—the Universe—he holds to preclude all deduction from it. In many respects, however, the singularity of the Universe is of no consequence it has one thing in common with all other objects, that it bears marks of being an effect; and therefore by an original principle of our constitution we must refer it to a Cause. Though we may not know enough to declare what is the Design, the effect being singular; we know enough at all events to recognize traces of a Design, and hence we argue a Designer. Now such traces are numberless and infinitely varied. They appear in the structure of the whole, and in the structure of its particular parts. And if one single evidence of design in a piece of human workmanship shows wisdom and skill in the workman, may we not conclude from the innumerable proofs of design which the universe presents, that the Being who formed it is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working.

In addition to the arguments for the existence of a God which we have now noticed, there are several others of a strictly subordinate character. Thus we may infer the existence of such a Being from the belief in His existence which has pervaded all ages and nations; from the order and regularity which prevail in the operations of nature, and the beneficial influences which arise from the moral arrangements of the universe; and finally, we may infer the existence of a Supreme Being from the existence of miracles and prophecy, both of which attest the existence of a Being of omnipotence and omniscience, who is the Supreme Governor and Lord of the universe.

Of the essential nature of God, strictly speaking, we can know nothing, and can form no adequate conception. "Who can by searching find out God?" But though we cannot describe or even know the essence of the Divine Being, we may understand the kind and qualities of that being which he possesses. He is a Spirit, an invisible being that understands and wills, but without material substance or bodily parts. Very little, however, is said in Scripture of the mode of the Divine existence, and the information which is conveyed upon the subject is of a merely negative kind, for while Jesus Christ describes God as a spirit, he explains the word in these terms, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." God is made known to us in his revealed word chiefly by his attributes or perfections, which ought never to be conceived of as anything distinct from his being, or imagined ever to exist as separate from one another. The Divine attributes or excellencies are sometimes divided into communicable or incommunicable perfections, the former being such as are capable in some measure of being possessed by his creatures, viz., wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth; the latter being such as belong to God alone, viz., infinity, eternity, and immutability. At other times the Divine attributes are divided into natural and moral, the former including his greatness, power, wisdom, spirituality, infinity, eternity, and unchangeableness, being such as belong essentially and exclusively to the nature of God, constituting his incomprehensible essence; and the latter including his holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, which together form the law of his nature, according to which he invariably acts and orders all things, and present in him a character which demands our supreme love and imitation.

To know that God is, and to know, as far as we are capable of ascertaining, what He is, forms the highest of all knowledge worthy of the earnest and prayerful examination of every intelligent creature in the universe.

GOLDEN AGE, used to denote, in the ancient heathen mythology, the reign of SATURN (which see), when justice and innocence were supposed to have reigned throughout the earth, and the soil produced what was necessary for the subsistence and enjoyment of mankind. From the circumstance of Saturn being coupled with the age of innocence, some have supposed him to be identical with Adam, and the Golden Age to be descriptive of the purity and felicity of Eden.

GOLDEN ROSE. In 1366, Pope Urban V. sent a golden rose to Joan, queen of Sicily, at the same time passing a decree that the Popes should consecrate one on the fourth Sunday in Lent every year. This golden rose is set in precious stones, and is often sent as a mark of peculiar affection from the Pope of Rome to crowned heads. A gift of this nature was sent from the reigning Pope, Pius IX., to Louis Napoleon III., Emperor of France. His Holiness blesses the rose in the apartment where the ornaments are kept, immediately before going to hear mass in his own chapel. The blessing of the rose is performed with frankincense, holy water balm, and musk, mixed together. The benediction being ended, the Pope leaves the room, one of his privy chamberlains carrying the rose before him and laying it on a candlestick. Then a Cardinal Deacon presents it to his Holiness, who taking it in his left hand, proceeds onward to the chapel, blessing the faithful with his right hand uplifted along the whole line of way. After this the golden rose is returned to the Cardinal Deacon, who gives it to a clerk of the chamber by whom it is laid upon the altar. Mass being ended, his Holiness gives the rose to any one for whom he wishes to express peculiar favour. It is one of the most signal tokens of regard which is ever bestowed by the Pope in his sacred character.

GOOD FRIDAY, the Friday in Passion Week which probably was called by way of eminence Good Friday, because on that day our blessed Redeemer was believed to have obtained for his people all good things by his atoning death upon the cross. This day was observed in the ancient Christian church as a strict fast. The customary acclamations and doxologies were omitted, and no music was allowed but of the most plaintive description. No bell was rung for Divine worship on this day. None bowed the knee in prayer, because by this ceremony the Jews reviled Jesus, as we are informed in Mat. xxvii. 29. Neither was the kiss of charity used on this day, because with a kiss Judas betrayed his Lord. The sacramental elements were not consecrated on Good Friday, the altars were divested of their ornaments, and the Gospel of John was read because he was a faithful and true witness of our Lord's passion. On Good Friday the ceremony is practised in the Church of Rome of unveiling and adoring the cross. (See CROSS, ADORATION OF THE.)

What follows the ceremony of adoring the cross as practised in the Sistine Chapel at Rome is thus described by an eye-witness: "When the adoration was concluded, the procession set out to the Pauline Chapel, to bring the host from the sepulchre in which it was deposited yesterday.

"On arriving in the Pauline the Pope knelt and prayed, and the officiating Cardinal gave the key of the sepulchre to the Sacristan, who unlocked the door and took out the box containing the host. He then took out the host, and placed it in the vessel formerly mentioned, and presented it to the Cardinal, who presented it to the Pope, who covered it with a corner of his mantle, and set out with the procession to carry it back to the Sistine Chapel. The choir sang during the procession the hymn, 'Vexilla Regis prodeunt,' 'The standards of the King come forth;' and on the Pope's entry into the chapel the verse, 'O cruz, ave, spes unica,' 'Hail, O cross, our only hope.'

"The Pope carries the host to the altar, where he delivers it to the officiating Cardinal, who transfers it from the chalice to a paten. Wine and water are poured into the chalice, and the Cardinal officiating performs the rest of the service of the mass, using the host which had been deposited in the sepulchre. The mass on this occasion, as on several others during holy week, is not performed exactly in the usual manner, several of the prayers and benediction: being omitted; and in taking the sacrament the Cardinal puts a portion of the host (which he divides into three parts) into the chalice with the wine, and swallows both together. What became of the other two portions I do not know.

"In the afternoon the Tenebræ and Miserere are again performed; after which the Pope and Cardinals descend to St. Peter's, to adore the three great relics. The Pope and Cardinals kneel in the great nave of the church, and the relics are exhibited from a balcony above the statue of St. Veronica. The height at which they are displayed is so great, that, though I have been present repeatedly, I could never distinguish anything more than that they were glittering caskets of crystal set in gold or silver, and sparkling with precious stones. They are said, and by Roman Catholics believed, to contain the three following treasures:—a part of the true cross, one half of the spear which pierced our Saviour's side, and the Volto Santo, or holy countenance.

"The ceremony of the exhibition and adoration of these relics lasted about a quarter of an hour. The Pope and the Cardinals appeared to be praying while they knelt, but the whole was performed in silence. As soon as each Cardinal was satisfied, he rose from his knees and retired."

The Saxons were accustomed to call Good Friday by the name of Long Friday, probably because of the long fastings and services practised on that day.

GOOD SONS (THE ORDER OF), a congregation of religious of the third order of the Romish monks of St. Francis. It was founded in A. D. 1615 at Armantieres, a small town in Flanders, by five pious artisans who formed themselves into a small community, living in common, and wearing a black habit peculiar to themselves. In 1626 they embraced the third rule of St. Francis. The order gradually made progress, and in 1670 it consisted of two congregations, that of Lisle being added to that of Armantieres. Shortly after, a third was established in the diocese of St. Omer. Louis XIV. gave them the direction of various public hospitals. The order consisted of a number of families, each having a superior, a vicar, and three counsellors. They practised great austerity, and used the discipline of the scourge three times a-week.

GORGONS, fabulous monsters in ancient heathen mythology. Homer speaks of only one, but Hesiod mentions three, whose names were Stheino, Euryale, and Medusa. Earlier traditions assign them a residence in the Western Ocean, but later give them a dwelling-place in Libya.

GOSAINS, or GOSWAMI, the priests of Eklinga in Rajast'han. They all wear the distinguishing mark of the faith of Shiva, which is a crescent on the forehead. Their hair is braided, and forms a species of tiara round the head, which is frequently adorned with a chaplet of the lotus-seed. Like the other ascetics, they disfigure their bodies with ashes, and wear garments of a deep orange colour. They bury their dead in a sitting posture, and the tumuli which are erected over them are generally of a conical form. It is not uncommon to find Gosains, who have made a vow of celibacy, following secular pursuits, such as the mercantile and military professions. The mercantile Gosains are among the richest merchants in India. In regard to those who enter the army, Colonel Tod, in his 'Annals of Rajast'han,' tells us, that "the Gosains who profess arms, partake of the character of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. They live in monasteries scattered over the country, possess lands, and beg or serve for pay when called upon. As defensive soldiers they are good."

GOSPELS, the name given to the narratives of the history of our blessed Lord as written by the four Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The word Gospel is Saxon, and denotes good saying, probably from the glad news of salvation which the Gospels contain. The Christian church never acknowledged any more than the four Gospels as canonical; but no sooner were they generally recognized as of Divine authority, than heretics who had deviated from the truth of God, began to support their doctrines by resorting to the expedient of forging gospels under the name of some of the apostles, or even of our Lord himself, taking care to embody their own peculiar tenets in these spurious productions. Irenæus, in the second century, mentions that the Gnostics had a large number of such apocryphal writings; and in the following century their number was greatly increased. Many of these books have passed into oblivion, and a collection of those which are still extant was embodied by Fabricius in the beginning of last century in his Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti. From these corrupt Gospels Mohammed seems to have derived the limited information which he possessed concerning the life of Christ; and the Oriental legends in general concerning our Lord are all drawn from apocryphal sources. See APOCRYPHA. That these works are not to be received as genuine, is plain not only from their vast inferiority to the canonical gospels, but still more decidedly from the fact that they were not recognized by the Fathers.

The Gospels form, along with the Acts of the Apostles, that portion of the New Testament which is strictly historical. The purpose which the four writers of these Gospels seem to have in view is obvious from the whole structure of their writings. There are no marks of an intention on the part of any of the Evangelists to give to their narratives a regular chronological order, but rather to present to the reader such a body of well-authenticated facts in reference to the life, ministry, and sufferings of Christ, as might exhibit the nature, and afford sufficient proof of the truth of Christianity. Adopting this as the explanation of the purpose of the writers, we get rid of the difficulties with which the authors of Harmonies of the Gospels have had to contend. These Harmonies may be reduced to two classes; the first being that which supposes all the four Evangelists to have adhered in their narratives to the order of time; and the second that which adopts one of the Evangelists as the standard in point of chronological order to which the order of events in the other Gospels must be adjusted. It is difficult, however, implicitly to accept either of these hypotheses, but the preferable plan seems to be to fall back upon the solution of the matter adopted by Bengel and Michaelis, which, while it does not wholly lose sight of the chronological arrangement, keeps chiefly in view the great end or purpose for which the Gospels were composed. This purpose is very clearly stated by one at least of the Evangelists. Thus John xx. 30, 31, asserts in express terms that the purpose of his writing was to make such a selection of facts as might be good ground of faith in the divine mission of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name."

It is well worthy of remark, that while the great general purpose which the four Evangelists had in view was the same, the execution of this purpose has in it such variety as might be expected in the works of independent writers. Thus, besides the peculiarities of style belonging to each of the Evangelists, they have also each of them something peculiar in both the selection and statement of the events in the life of Jesus. The diversities which have thus arisen in the Gospel narratives have been eagerly seized upon by modern infidels, more especially by Strauss in his Das Leben Jesu, as constituting discrepancies so serious as to affect, if not entirely to destroy, our belief in the genuineness and truth of the Gospels themselves, and thus to uproot our confidence in the truth of Christianity. To ward off such assaults as those made by Strauss and other infidel writers of the same class, it has been usual either to deny the existence of the diversities alleged, or to make an attempt at doing away with them by reconciling the Gospel narratives with each other. That apparent diversities exist in the statements of the four Evangelists, we admit, but before endeavouring to reconcile them, a question arises, the solution of which may go far, in every unprejudiced mind, towards the reconciliation, which is: Whence do such diversities arise? To this important question Mr. Gillespie has addressed himself with great ability and power in his recent work, entitled 'The Truth of the Evangelical History of our Lord Jesus Christ, proved in opposition to Dr. D. F. Strauss.' In the First Part of this Treatise—the only Part yet published—and which, treating as it does of the distinctive designs of the Four Evangelists, is complete in itself—Mr. Gillespie alleges, "The design will throw light on the event recorded: while at the same time the event will give evidence of, while it illustrates the design." The special object of each of the Evangelists is thus stated by Mr Gillespie:

"1. Matthew.—The great special object of Matthew is, to prove the Messiahship of Jesus, or that Jesus is the Messiah promised to the Jews: in other words, to evince from the Old Testament Scriptures, or in conformity with them, taken in conjunction with the events in the life of Jesus, that 'this is Jesus, the king of the Jews.' As a matter of course, therefore, Matthew's Gospel is primarily for Jews: First, for the Jews of that day, and, secondly, for those of all subsequent times. And as evidence that those, who would attain to Matthew's end, must use Matthew's means, it is to be noted that persons seeking to convert Jews, or Jewish-minded persons, of the present day to Christianity, pursue no other course than seeking to show, from the Old Scriptures, that they testify of Jesus—the very course pursued by Matthew.

"2. Mark.—The chief special design of Mark is, to set forth and prove, that Jesus was a divinely commissioned teacher; Mark's medium of proof being the miracles wrought, and not the fact of Jesus's Messiahship. Mark's history was, therefore, primarily intended for the benefit of Gentile readers, of that age, in the first place, and, in the second, of all subsequent ages. And those who have had to do with Gentiles, since Mark, must begin their method for conversion to the faith of Jesus where Mark began, namely, with setting forth and proving the miracles of Jesus. It is to be noted, that the second Evangelist proved, by setting forth, with all the circumstances of time, and place, and person, the miraculous events he records. For he wrote so near the times of which he treats, that any, thinking it worth their while, could verify his account on the spot, by an investigation of the fact-basis of the so recent tradition.

"3. Luke.—The great special purpose of Luke cannot be so easily stated in few words: however, Luke's great purpose has relation to the development of the humanity, or human nature, of that Jesus who, born of Mary, had however been conceived by the Holy Ghost. Luke's purpose is, to detail the history of Jesus, as 'the seed of the woman,' with a constant eye to the private or personal aspect of the man,

"4. John.—In the last place, John has, for his peculiar object, the exhibition of the nature, or personal character, of the Divine LOGOS, together with his character and offices, being incarnate: His nature, as the only begotten, or proper, Son of God: his character and offices, as that true Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.

"Thus, if these views be correct, it will be found, that Matthew is to be so far opposed to Mark, and Luke to John; besides other oppositions which I do not touch on at present. Matthew's great idea will be the proof of the Messiahship; Mark's the proof of a Divine commission: while Luke, being contrasted so far with John, will dwell on the development of the humanity; as John will delight, and expatiate, in the contemplation of the Divine glory of the common Saviour."

There can be little doubt that proceeding on the great principle thus laid down, Mr. Gillespie will throw much additional light on the differences and seeming discrepancies which exist in the Evangelical narratives. This indeed seems to be the right direction which speculation ought to pursue if it is ever to solve the difficulties referred to.

In the ancient Christian church the utmost respect was paid by the audience to the reading of the Gospels, which took place at the right hand of the altar, both the reader and the people standing. Cyprian represents this as having been the uniform practice in Africa. The Apostolical Constitutions recommend both the clergy and the people to stand during the reading of the Gospels. It was a general rule of the ancient church that the hearers sat during the ordinary reading of the Scriptures, and rose when the Gospels were read. If in the course of delivering a sermon the preacher introduced a passage from the Gospels the assembly immediately stood up—a custom which is thus explained by Chrysostom. "If the letters of a king are read in the theatre with great silence, much more ought we to compose ourselves and reverently to arise and listen when the letters, not of an earthly king, but of the Lord of angels, are read to us." Jerome is the first who mentions the custom of burning lighted candles in the Eastern church, though not in the Western, when the Gospels were read. No other ancient writer makes reference to this practice. In some churches, on particular solemn occasions, as for instance, on the anniversary of our Lord's passion, three or four lessons were read out of the Gospels on the same day. This custom prevailed particularly in the French churches. In the time of Justinian oaths were taken with the four Gospels in the hand, and special reference was made to them in the form of the oath. The practice was also common in the early Christian church in the ordination of a bishop, for two bishops to hold the book of the Gospels over his head. The ceremony of laying the Gospels upon the head of the bishop when about to be ordained, seems to have been in use in all churches.

GOSPELLER, a name applied to the priest in the Church of England, who reads the Gospel in the Communion Service, standing at the north side of the altar. In some cathedrals one of the clergy is specially appointed to perform this duty, and accordingly receives the name corresponding to it.

GOSPELLERS, a term of reproach applied both before and at the time of the Reformation, to those who encouraged the circulation of the Scriptures, and adhered strictly to the doctrines of the gospel in opposition to the traditions of the church.

GOSSIP, a word familiarly used in England to denote a sponsor for an infant in baptism. See SPONSORS.

GOTHS (CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE). The Goths constituted a large portion of the Germanic family of nations, and occupied a considerable district of country, first on the coast of the Baltic, and afterwards of the Black Sea. Their religion was of a strictly Pagan character, but having been actively engaged along with other wild tribes in incursions upon the Roman empire, in the course of the third century they gradually imbibed the Christian faith, which before this time was extensively received throughout the whole empire. By Sozomen, in particular, we are informed, that among the captives who were carried away by the Goths after an incursion into Thrace and Asia Minor, there were Christian priests whose holy life and heavenly doctrines induced their barbarian masters to relinquish the worship of their own gods, and to form themselves into churches under the guidance of the new pastors who had been brought among them. Additional teachers were sent for, and by their diligence and zeal Christianity was rapidly diffused among tribes who, until that time, had been characterized by the most barbarous and savage manners. No better evidence could be adduced of the success which attended the labours of these Christian teachers than the fact that among those who subscribed the decrees of the Nicene Council, A. D. 325, is to be found the name of Theophilus, bishop of the Goths.

Descended from the Roman captives, to whom under God the Goths owed their knowledge of Christianity, was the celebrated Ulphilas, who, by his translation of the Scriptures into their native tongue, did much for the promotion of the Christian cause among the Gothic tribes. This illustrious man, who was by birth a Cappadocian, rose to the dignity of a bishop of the Mæso-Goths, and took his seat as a member of the Council of Constantinople A. D. 349. He is said to have invented a Gothic alphabet similar to the Greek, and animated by the spirit as he has been called by the name of the apostle of the Goths, he devoted himself to the benevolent work of translating the Scriptures from the Greek into the Gothic language. The manuscript of this work still exists under the name of the CODEX ARGENTEUS (which see), from its being written on vellum in letters of silver. Some doubt exists as to the precise time when Ulphilas lived and laboured. It is probable, however, that he exercised the office of a bishop among the Goths in the time of Constantine, and until near the end of the reign of the Emperor Valens. In the course of that lengthened period, he conducted on several occasions the most important negotiations between the Goths and the Roman Emperors; and so beneficial were his services in the capacity of mediator between the contending parties, that Philostorgius, says Constantine, was accustomed to call him the Moses of his time. For a long time, Ulphilas adhered to the Nicene doctrines in regard to the Person of Christ, but at a later period of his life he seems to have been prevailed upon to adopt Arian views.

The Goths were divided into two great tribes or nations, the western or Visigoths, and the eastern or Ostrogoths; both of which were often engaged in mutual hostilities. To the former class Ulphilas belonged, and when he sought therefore to diffuse Christianity among the rival tribes, a spirit of violent opposition was manifested, and persecution broke forth with such severity that many of the Christians, even of those who held Arian opinions, died as martyrs in the Christian cause. By this means the gospel spread extensively among the Goths.

One of the most zealous in labouring for the conversion of the Gothic tribes was the great Chrysostom, who, while patriarch of Constantinople, set apart a particular church in that city for the religious worship of the Goths, the Bible being there read in the Gothic translation, and discourses preached by Gothic clergymen in the language of their country. To promote the conversion of these barbarous tribes, he adopted the wise expedient of having native missionaries trained, who, he very properly supposed, would be more successful than others in labouring among their own people. In connection with this subject, we may quote an interesting incident related by Neander: "On a certain Sunday, in the year 398 or 399, after causing divine worship to be celebrated, the Bible to be read, and a discourse to be preached, by Gothic ecclesiastics, in the Gothic tongue, to the great surprise, no doubt, of the refined Byzantians in the assembly, who looked down upon the Goths as barbarians, he (Chrysostom) took advantage of this remarkable scene to point out to them, in the example before their own eyes, the transforming and plastic power of Christianity over the entire human nature, and to enlist their sympathies in the cause of the mission. He delivered a discourse, which has come down to us, full of a divine eloquence, on the night of the gospel, and the plan of God in the education of mankind. Among other things he remarks, quoting the passage in Isa. lxx. 25: "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock." The prophet is not speaking here of lions and lambs, but predicting to us that, subdued by the power of the divine doctrine, the brutal sense of rude men should be transformed to such gentleness of spirit, that they should unite together in one and the same community with the mildest. And this have you witnessed to-day—the most savage race of men standing together with the lambs of the church—one pasture, one fold for all—one table set before all.' This may refer either to the common participation in the sacred word, which had been presented first in the Gothic and then in the Greek language, or to the common participation in the communion."

In the fifth century, Christianity was not merely extensively known among the Goths, but their clergy made the Christian Scriptures a subject of special study. Hence the learned Jerome, while residing at Bethlehem A. D. 403, was not a little astonished at receiving from two Goths a letter in reference to certain discrepancies which they had observed between the vulgar Latin and the Alexandrian version of the Psalms. This of itself was a satisfactory proof that both Christianity and Christian culture had already made extensive progress among a people who, at a comparatively recent period, had emerged from a state of barbarism. Nay, even among those Gothic tribes who were still blinded by Pagan superstition, such was the civilizing influence of Christianity, that when Alaric, who commanded the army of the Visigoths, poured down with his immense hordes upon the Roman territory, and took possession even of Rome itself, they respected the Christian churches, and spared them amid the almost universal devastation. Not a stone of the sacred buildings was injured, and those who had taken refuge in the churches from the fury of the Pagan invaders, found there a safe and secure asylum. The intermixture of the conquerors and the conquered was highly beneficial to the Goths in many respects. Thus we find a Goth, by name Jordanes, writing in the Greek language a history of his country from the earliest times down to A. D. 552. The appearance at so early a period of such a work by the native of a recently barbarous tribe shows that the civilizing, if not the converting, influences of Christianity were deeply and widely felt.

GOVIND SINHIS, a sect belonging to the Sikh community in India. They are the professed followers of Guru Govind, the tenth teacher in succession from Nānak, the apostle of the Sikhs, and we are told that he flourished at the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century. Totally unlike the doctrines of Nānak, those of Govind are of a worldly and warlike spirit. He ordered his adherents to allow their hair and beards to grow, and to wear blue garments; he permitted them to eat all kinds of flesh except that of kine, and he threw open his faith and cause to all of whatsoever caste, who were willing to abandon Hinduism or Islamism, and to join an armed fraternity who devoted themselves to a life of plunder. It was then only that the Sikhs became a people, and were separated from their Indian countrymen in political constitu-dion as well as religious tenets. At the same time the Sikhs are still to a certain extent Hindus; they worship the deities of the Hindus, and celebrate all their festivals; they derive their legends and literature from the same source, and pay great veneration to the Brahmanas. The impress of their origin is still therefore strongly retained, notwithstanding their rejection of caste, and their substituting the sacred compilation of Guru Govind for the Vedas and Puranas of the Hindu system.

GRAAL, the holy vessel or St. Graal, as it is sometimes called, supposed by the Romanists to have been the vessel in which the paschal lamb was placed at our Saviour's last supper.

GRACE (CONTROVERSIES UPON). See AUGUSTINIANS, CALVINISTS.

GRACES, three goddesses among the ancient Greeks and Romans who were said to be personifications of grace and beauty. By some they have been accounted daughters of Zeus, by others of Apollo, and by others of Dionysus. (See CHARIS.) Their names, according to Hesiod, were Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. They were generally considered as attendants on other divinities, and as contributing to the promotion of gracefulness, elegance, sociality, and cheerfulness, both among gods and men. The Fine Arts, Poetry and Music were accounted their special favourites.

GRADIVUS, a surname of Mars, under which he had a temple outside the Porta Capena on the Appian Road. Numa is said to have appointed twelve Salii as priests of this god to attend on his temple.

GRADUAL. The antiphony which, before the Reformation, supplied the anthems or verses for the beginning of the Communion, the Offertory, &c. was often called the Gradual, because some of the anthems were chanted on the steps (Lat. gradus), of the ambo or reading-desk.

GRADUAL PSALMS, a name given to the fifteen psalms reaching from the cxx. to cxxxiv., which are also called Songs of the Steps or Degrees, because they were sung when the Jews came up either to worship in Jerusalem at the annual festivals, or perhaps from the Babylonish captivity. Some have supposed that the epithet gradual (Lat. gradus, a step), was applied to these Psalms because they were sung by the Jewish companies in ascending to Jerusalem by a steep rocky ascent, or in ascending the flight of steps which led to the temple.

GRÆÆ (Gr. the old women), daughters of Phorcys, and believed to have been sea-goddesses in the ancient heathen mythology, and personifications of the white foam of the sea.

GRAMMA (Gr. writing), a name applied by some early Christian writers to the APOSTLES' CREED (which see) as being appointed to be committed to memory by the catechumens.

GRANDIMONTANS (ORDER OF), a community of Romish monks, which derived its name from the circumstance that Muret, where they were first established, was near to Grandmont in the territory of Limoges. This order was founded by Stephen of Thiers, a nobleman of Auvergne, who obtained permission from Gregory VII. in A. D. 1073, to institute a new species of monastic discipline. The rule drawn up for their guidance was of a very severe character. It inculcated poverty and obedience as first principles; prohibited the monks from possessing land beyond the bounds of the monastery; denied the use of animal food even to the sick, and to remove all temptation prevented the keeping of cattle. Silence was enjoined upon the inmates of the monastery, and they were strictly forbidden to converse with females. The care and management of the temporal affairs of the community were intrusted to the lay brethren, while the clerical brethren were required exclusively to devote themselves to spiritual matters. For a time the Order maintained a considerable reputation for sanctity and strictness of discipline; but in consequence of internal dissensions it at length fell into disrepute.

GREEK CHURCH. This church, which takes to itself the name of the Catholic and Apostolic Oriental Church, is the most ancient of existing Christian churches. It was the special command of Christ to his disciples, that they should "go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," adding these words, "beginning at Jerusalem." The church of Jerusalem then was the mother of Christian churches. There the apostles remained until the promise of the Father had been fulfilled in the marvellous outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. No sooner had they been fully prepared for their work by the extraordinary communication of spiritual gifts, than a persecution having arisen they were scattered abroad, and travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, and it is expressly said, that there were some among them who "spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus." Paul and Barnabas spent a year in Antioch, and there the disciples were first called Christians. Thence the apostles passed through Asia Minor into Europe. By the arrangements of Divine Providence, Paul was carried a prisoner to Rome, where he dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ. In the meantime Christianity was making progress in many countries, and among other places a church was founded in Alexandria. Flourishing churches were planted both in the East and in the West; and at as early a period as the second century a dispute arose between the Eastern and Western churches in reference to the observance of EASTER (which see). This controversy was conducted with considerable warmth on both sides, and a difference of opinion as to the time of the observance of this sacred season forms one of the marks of distinction between the two churches.

In the fourth century another point of controversy was started between the churches of the East and the West. The establishment of Christianity as the recognized religion of the Roman Empire by Constantine the Great formed an important era in the history of the Christian church. In A. D. 324, the Emperor founded the new capital of his dominions Byzantium or Constantinople. The bishop of Rome, the old capital of the empire, and the bishop of Constantinople, the new capital, began to contend for precedence. In the second General Council, the bishop of Constantinople was assigned a place next to the bishop of Rome, and by a decree of the Council of Chalcedon, they were both declared to be of equal rank. At the close of the sixth century the contest for supremacy raged with greater severity than at any former period. The bishop of Constantinople not only claimed to exercise unrivalled dominion over the churches of the East, but maintained his own dignity to be equal to that of the bishop of Rome. Gregory the Great took an active part in resisting this claim; and John, the Faster, bishop of Constantinople, having assumed the title of universal bishop, Gregory, naturally supposing that his rival meant to assert supremacy over the whole Christian churches, opposed his pretensions with the utmost vehemence, denouncing the title as blasphemous and antichristian. The patriarch John, however, still continued to urge his claim, and having soon afterwards been removed by death, his successor Cynacus adopted the same pompous title as his predecessor. And it is not a little remarkable that the same title of Universal Bishop, which had been so loudly denounced by Gregory when assumed by his rival of Constantinople, was actually adopted by his own successor Boniface when conferred upon him by the Emperor Phocas.

For a long period a spirit of secret animosity prevailed between the Eastern and the Western churches. At length in the eighth century this hostile feeling found vent for itself in the keen controversy which ensued on the subject of image-worship. The Emperor Leo the Isaurian commenced the dispute by openly denouncing the use of images in Christian churches as unlawful and idolatrous. All who supported this view of the question were termed Iconoclasts or Image-Breakers. Pope Gregory the Second commenced a persecution of those who remonstrated against image-worship. From religious differences arose political commotions, which continued to rage for years; and although the Greek Emperor Constantine VI. and his mother Irene restored the use of images, the division between the Eastern and the Western churches on this subject became decisive and marked. The last General Council in which the churches of the East and West were united, was the Second Council of Nice, held A. D. 787, which the Eastern churches refuse to account œcumenical.

In the course of the controversy on image-worship, another question arose which referred to the abstruse theological point connected with the constitution of the Person of the Holy Spirit, whether he proceeded from the Father only, or from the Father and the Son. It would appear that either in the fifth or sixth century the Spanish church had introduced into the Constantinopolitan creed the words FILIOQUE (which see), "and from the Son." It is not improbable that this alteration in the creed may have originated in a desire to oppose the Arian doctrine, which denied the identity of nature between the Father and the Son. But from whatever motive it may have arisen, the change was adopted by the churches of France and Germany. The Greek churches, however, refused to recognize the additional filioque, accusing the Western churches of heresy on this point, while they in their turn maintained the change to be consistent with strict orthodoxy. This addition to the creed still forms a distinctive ground of separation between the two churches.

The hostility which thus existed between the East and West was much augmented by an event which took place in the ninth century, the Emperor Michael having deposed Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, and substituted a layman in his room. In 861, this step on the part of the Emperor was sanctioned by a large synod of divines, at which the papal legates were present, and gave their vote in its favour. Pope Nicholas, however, the following year summoned a council at Rome, which excommunicated Photius and his adherents, they in their turn excommunicating the Pope, and accusing him of heresy. The dispute lasted for a considerable period, widening the breach still more between the Eastern and the Western churches.

In the eleventh century Michael Cellularius, patriarch of Constantinople, revived in all their strength the accusations which had been so often made against the doctrines and practices of the Romish church, complaining more especially that in the celebration of the eucharist the Romanists made use of unleavened bread. The Pope, indignant at the conduct of Cellularius, forthwith issued against him a sentence of excommunication. Through the influence of the Emperor a reconciliation was attempted, but the negotiations were altogether fruitless, and at length, by a solemn written anathema which was placed on the great altar of St. Sophia, Cellularius and all his adherents were cut off from the fellowship of Rome. The whole Eastern church was thus virtually excommunicated; and the Greek and Roman churches continue to this day in a state of complete separation from each other.

At various intervals endeavours have been made, but without success, to effect a reunion of the Eastern and Western churches. One of the most noted of these attempts was that which originated with the Greek Emperor, Michael Palæologus, instigated in all probability chiefly by political motives. Under his sanction the representatives of the contending parties met at Lyons A. D. 1274, and a show of harmony was restored, which led only to a temporary compact between the Pope on the one side, and the Emperor on the other, without effecting a reconciliation of the two churches. Again in the fifteenth century another effort of a similar kind was made by John Palæologus, which produced only partial and temporary results, without contributing materially to accomplish the main object contemplated, though a nominal union was concluded at Florence in 1438. This union was not acceded to by the Lithuanian churches, although some prelates had attempted to introduce it. The Jesuits, however, exerted themselves to the uttermost to subject the Greek church in Poland to the supremacy of Rome. The ground having been prepared, "the archbishop of Kioff, in 1590," says Count Krasinski, "convened a synod of his clergy at Brest, in Lithuania, to whom he represented the necessity of a union with Rome, and the advantages which would thereby accrue to their country and to their church; and, indeed, it was certainly not only more flattering to the self-love of the clergy, but even more congenial to the feelings of the more intelligent of them, to depend upon the head of the Western Church, who was surrounded by all the prestige that wealth and power can give, and whose authority, supported by men of the most eminent talents and learning, was acknowledged by powerful and civilized nations, than on the patriarch of Constantinople, the slave of an infidel sovereign, by whose appointment he held his dignity, and presiding over a church degraded by gross ignorance and superstition. The archbishop's project found much favour with the clergy, but met with a strong opposition from the laity. Another synod was convened at the same town in 1594, at which several Roman Catholic prelates assisted. After some deliberation, the archbishop and several bishops signed their consent to the union concluded at Florence in 1438, by which they admitted the Filioque, or the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, purgatory, and the supremacy of the pope; retaining the Slavonic language in the celebration of Divine service, and the ritual, as well as the discipline of the Eastern Church. A delegation was sent to announce this event at Rome, where it was received with great distinction by Pope Clement the Eighth. After the return of that delegation, the king, in 1596, ordered the convocation of a synod for the publication and introduction of the union. It assembled again at Brest; and the archbishop of Kioff, as well as the other prelates who had subscribed to that union, made a solemn proclamation of this act, addressed thanks to the Almighty for having brought back the stray sheep into the pale of his church, and excommunicated all those who opposed the union."

The greater part of the laity, headed by Prince

Ostrogski, palatine of Kioff, declared against the measure, and at a numerous meeting of the nobility and clergy adverse to Rome, the bishops who had brought about the union were excommunicated. The party of the union, however, supported by the king and the Jesuits, began an active persecution against its opponents, and a great number of churches and convents were taken from them by violence. The result was, that the union divided the Eastern Church of Poland into two opposite and hostile churches. About 3,500,000 Uniates or United Greeks are still found in the Austrian dominions. A few years ago the Uniates of Little Russia, to the number of 2,000,000, were received back into the Muscovite branch of the Eastern church, on disowning solemnly the Pope's supremacy, and acknowledging the sole Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Various overtures have from time to time been made by Rome to the orthodox Eastern Church, with a view, if possible, to bring about a union of the two churches. The most recent official communication on the subject was a letter from the reigning Pope, Pius IX., addressed in 1848 to the Christians of the East, urging upon them by various arguments to return to the bosom of the Church of Rome. To this letter the Greek patriarchs penned a reply in the form of 'An Encyclic Epistle of the One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, to the faithful everywhere,' protesting against what they considered heresies on the part of the Romish Church, more particularly the doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Ghost, and the western innovations respecting baptism, holy orders, and the communion of the laity in one kind. To this protest the Greek patriarchs added these remarkable words, "Of these heresies which have spread over a great part of the world for judgments known to the Lord, Arianism was one, and at the present day Popery is another. But like the former, which has altogether vanished, the latter also, though not flourishing, shall not endure to the end, but shall pass and be cast down, and that mighty voice shall be heard from heaven, It is fallen!"

The rule of faith according to the Greek church includes the Holy Scriptures and the decrees of the first seven general councils. They deny infallibility either to their patriarch or to the church, and yet they refuse the right of private judgment to the laity in matters of religion. One of their distinctive doctrines refers to the nature and constitution of the Holy Spirit, who they allege to be consubstantial with the Father and the Son, but to proceed from the Father only. The Sacred Scripture they hold is to be received "according to the tradition and interpretation of the Catholic church," which is believed to have an authority not less than that of Sacred Scripture, being guided by the unerring wisdom of the Holy Ghost. Election is maintained as proceeding on foreseen good works, and not on the sovereign decree of God. They admit the intercession of saints and angels, and above all, of the Virgin Mary, "the immaculate Mother of the Divine Word."

The Greek church has seven sacraments, which it terms "mysteries." These are baptism, chrism, the eucharist, penance, ordination, marriage, and the euchelaion or holy oil. In baptism, while both immersion and affusion are allowed, the act of immersion is the most general, and that too three times repeated in accordance with the threefold name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Before administering the ordinance, four prayers of exorcism are repeated, towards the close of which the priest blows on the infant's mouth, forehead, and breast, commanding the evil spirit to depart; while the sponsor also blows and spits upon the child. Among the Copts the exorcism is accompanied by making the sign of the cross thirty-seven times. In the Greek church, oil is mixed with the water in baptism, being poured upon it three times in the form of a cross. The oil is applied also in the figure of a cross to the child's forehead, breast, back, ears, feet, and hands; each application of the oil being accompanied with one of the following sentences: "A. B. is baptized with the oil of gladness;" "for the healing of the soul and body;" "for the hearing of faith," "that he may walk in the way of thy commandments," "thy hands have made me and fashioned me."

Corresponding to the Confirmation of the Western churches, the Greeks have the sacrament of Chrism, which follows immediately upon the dispensation of baptism. In this mystery, the forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet are anointed with holy ointment in the form of a cross, the priest declaring each time that he applies the oil, "The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost." In the course of seven days from the celebration of this ceremony, the child is brought again to the priest, who having washed it, cuts off some of its hair in four places on the crown of its head. This is designed to denote the dedication of the child to God. The CHRISM (which see) is prepared and sanctified by a bishop during Passion Week annually. And not only is the Chrism used in baptism consecrated for the purpose, but the ordinance is not considered to be valid unless the water used has been specially consecrated and blessed, a service which is termed the Benediction of the Waters.

The eucharist is administered in the Greek church both to laity and clergy in both kinds; and even infants are allowed to partake of it. Leavened bread is uniformly used, and in a particular form. (See ANTIDORON.) The wine is mixed with warm water, which Chrysostom explains as denoting the fervour of the saints. The mode of administration of the elements is somewhat peculiar. In general, for the practice varies, the communicants stand with their hands crossed on their breast, while the priest with a spoon puts into their mouth some of the bread

Penance consists among the Greeks of extraordinary fastings or almsdeeds. Wednesday and Friday in each week are regular fast-days, and throughout the year there are in all two hundred and twenty-six appointed fast-days. Ordination is a complicated process in the Greek church. Marriage consists of three parts: the betrothal, the coronation, and the dissolving of the crowns. Prayer-oil or euchelaion is a sacrament administered in cases of sickness, but not like the extreme unction of the Roman Church in the anticipation of death. Seven priests are employed in this ceremony. Relics are held in great estimation among the Greeks, and in the eucharist the cloth on the altar is required to have in its web particles of a martyr's remains. The practice of signing with the cross prevails to a very great extent among the adherents of this church, the cross of the Greeks, however, being equi-limbed, while the cross of the Latins is elongated. The saints of the Greek calendar are more numerous than the days of the year. Purgatory has never been fully admitted in the Greek church.

GROVE-WORSHIP. At a very early period, even in the patriarchal ages, we find groves mentioned in connection with Divine worship. Thus in Gen. xxi. 33, we are informed that "Abraham planted a grove in Beersheba, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God." Various opinions have been entertained as to the origin of sacred groves. Some have supposed that such places were selected as being most agreeable to the worshipper, and to this reason the prophet Hosea seems to allude in his remark, iv. 13, "They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery." "We pay a kind of adoration," says Pliny, "to the silence of the place;" and Seneca observes to the same purpose, "The great height of the trees, the retirement of the place, and the awe-inspiring shade serve to confirm a belief in the Divinities." Strabo affirms that it was so common to erect temples and altars in groves, that all sacred places, even those where no trees were to be seen, were called groves. In process of time, these groves became the scene of the most impious and abominable rites. So completely at length did the groves become associated with idolatry, that the Israelites were commanded by God to cut down and burn their groves with fire, and to pluck down utterly all their high places. It has been alleged also that sacred groves originated with the worship of demons or departed spirits. Hence the sacred groves being constantly furnished with images of the heroes or gods that were worshipped in them, a grove and an idol came at length to be regarded as almost identical terms. Thus 2 Kings xxiii. 6, "And he brought out the grove from the house of the Lord, without Jerusalem, unto the brook Kidron, and burned it at the brook Kidron, and stamped it small to powder, and cast the powder thereof upon the graves of the children of the people." Hence the use of such groves was strictly forbidden to the Israelites in Deut. xvi. 21, 22, "Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God, which thou shalt make thee. Neither shalt thou set thee up any image; which the Lord thy God hateth."

GUDARAS, a Hindu sect, deriving their name from a pan of metal, which they carry about with them, and in which they have a small fire for the purpose of burning scented woods at the houses of the persons from whom they receive alms. In the process of begging they only repeat the word Alakh, expressive of the indescribable nature of the deity. They have a peculiar garb, wearing a large round cap, and a long frock or coat, stained with yellow clay. Some also wear ear-rings, or a cylinder of wood passed through the lobe of the ear, which they term the Khechari Mudra, the seal or symbol of the deity, of Him who moves in the heavens.

GUEBRES, the descendants of the ancient Persians, who retain the old religion. Nearly two thousand families of these fire-worshippers still linger in Persia, chiefly in Yezd and in other cities of Kerman, under the name of Guebres, but they are found in greater numbers in India, to which their ancestors retired, and chiefly about Bombay, under the name of PARSIS (which see). The Guebres never allow the sacred fire to be extinguished.

GURU, a teacher among the Hindus, occupying in some degree the place of the Confessor of the middle ages. He is looked upon as a representative and vehicle of divine power, and therefore entitled to the most implicit submission on the part of the man whose Guru he is.

GYMNOSOPHISTS (Gr. gymnos, naked, and sophos, wise), a legendary sect of religionists in India, who were either altogether naked, or but imperfectly clothed. Some of these ascetics dwelt in the woods, and others lived among men, but passed their lives in the most extreme austerities and acts of self-denial. When Alexander the Great reached Taxila, he met with some Gymnosophists, and was quite amazed at the patience they exhibited in the endurance of pain. Mr. Spence Hardy tells us, that the Gymnosophists are referred to in the legends of the Budhists, and in speaking on the subject he goes on to remark: "In the age of Gótama they appear to have been held in high honour, and to have been regarded as possessing a virtue that raised them to superhuman pre-eminence. They could only perpetuate these honours by a strict observance of their professions; but at times there were individuals who disregarded the precepts of the community, and emulated the extravagancies of the Gnostics; teaching, like them, that as everything outward is utterly and entirely indifferent to the inward man, the outward man may give himself up to every kind of excess, provided the inward man be not thereby disturbed in the tranquillity of his contemplation; and representing themselves as like the ocean, that receives everything, but is still, from its own greatness, free from pollution, whilst other men are like the small collection of water that is defiled by a single earth-clod." Arrian, in speaking of the Indian Gymnosophists, represents them as having been well skilled in the art of divination, and in the art of healing. There are said to have been ascetics among the ancient Greeks, as well as among the Egyptians, resembling, if not actually identical with, the Gymnosophists of India.

GYROVAGI, a kind of monks mentioned by Benedict, always wandering, who committed great excesses; and of whom he says it is better to be silent about them than to speak of their iniquities. Both monks and nuns of this class are spoken of by Augustine as leading an unsettled life, at one time stationary, at another wandering; some sold the relics of martyrs, and others led an idle and unprofitable life.

FAITHS OF THE WORLD.

HABADIM, a branch of the modern Chasidim or Jewish Pietists in Poland, which was founded in the eighteenth century by Rabbi Solomon, in the government of Mohileff. Their name Habadim is composed of the initial letters of three Hebrew words, denoting wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge. They may not improperly be called Quietists, as their distinguishing peculiarity consists in the rejection of external forms, and the complete abandonment of the mind to abstraction and contemplation. Instead of the baptisms customary among the Jews, they go through the signs without the use of the element, and consider it their duty to disengage themselves as much as possible from matter, because of its tendency to clog the mind in its ascent to the Supreme Source of Intelligence. In prayer, they make no use of words, but simply place themselves in the attitude of supplication, and exercise themselves in mental ejaculations.

HABBA, a sort of garment which the Mohammedans throw over their shoulders after purification, somewhat in imitation of the Jewish Talleth.

HABDALA (Heb. distinction), a ceremony which is considered as dividing or separating the Jewish Sabbath from the other days of the week. It commences after the concluding service in the synagogue. "On their return," says Mr. Allen, "from this service they light a wax candle, or a lamp with two wicks, which is usually held by a child; and the master of the family, taking a glass of wine in his right hand, and a box containing some spices in his left, recites several passages of scripture: "Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust, and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.—Salvation belongeth unto the Lord: thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah.—The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.—The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour." Thus may it also be unto us.—"I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord."

II.

Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created the fruit of the vine.' At these words a little of the wine is to be poured upon the floor. Then taking the glass of wine in his left hand, and the box of spices in his right, he says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created divers spices.' Here he smells the spices, and presents them to his family that they may have the same gratification. Then standing near the candle or lamp, he looks at it with great attention, and also at his finger nails, and says 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created the light of the fire.' Then taking the wine again in his right hand, he says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast made a distinction between things sacred and profane; between light and darkness; between Israel and other nations; between the seventh day and the six days of labour. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who hast made a distinction between things sacred and profane.' As soon as this benediction is finished, he tastes the wine himself, and then hands it round to all the company." In some places where the Jews happen to be unable to bear the expense of performing the Habdala at home, the Chassan or reader performs it in the synagogue at the close of the Sabbath services. Those who are unable from any peculiarity in their circumstances to attend to this duty either at home or in the synagogue, are allowed to compensate for its performance by privately ejaculating at the close of the last Sabbath service, a short benediction, not mentioning the name of God; "Blessed be He who hath made a distinction between things sacred and profane." Thus the Sabbath terminates, and the people are at liberty to resume their ordinary week-day employments. See SABBATH (JEWISH.)

HADAD. See ADAD.

HADES, a name given among the ancient Greeks and Romans, especially by the poets, to Pluto, the god who was believed to preside over the infernal regions. He is represented as being the son of

A *

Chronos and Rhea, the husband of Persephone, and the brother of Zeus and Poseidon. He bore the character of being a fierce, cruel, and inexorable tyrant, dreaded by mortals, who, when they invoked him, struck the earth with their hands, sacrificed black sheep in his honour, and in offering their sacrifices stood with averted faces. The grim Hades shut up the shades of the dead in his dark domains. His wife Persephone shared the throne of the lower world with her cruel husband. And not only did Hades rule over the infernal regions; he was considered also as the author of those blessings which sprung from the earth, and more especially of those rich mineral treasures which are contained in the bowels of the earth. The worship of Hades pervaded both Greece and Italy. In Elis, at Athens, and Olympia, temples were built for the worship of this infernal deity. Among the earlier Greek poets, more especially in Homer, the name Hades is assigned to the god, but among the later writers it was applied also to his kingdom. See next article.

HADES, the dwelling-place of the dead, and hence the Septuagint renders by this word the Hebrew Sheol, while in the authorized English version of the New Testament it is generally rendered hell. In the classical writers both of Greek and Roman antiquity the word Hades is almost always used to denote the infernal regions, where the shades of the dead were believed to have their abode. Among the ancient Hebrews it was supposed to be a place of thick darkness, such as is referred to in Job x. 21, 22, "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness." Here the spirits of the dead are supposed to dwell till the resurrection in a state in which they are wholly devoid of thought and sensation. The word Hades in the New, as well as Sheol in the Old Testament, is often used in the most general sense to denote the state of the dead, including the grave as the residence of the body, and the world of spirits as the abode of the soul. In some cases, indeed, both words are employed either in reference to the body or the soul taken separately. From a minute consideration, however, of the various cases in which the word Hades occurs in the New Testament, we are brought to the conclusion that it expresses the state of the dead.

HADITH, a word used by the Mohammedans to express the sayings of Mohammed, and which were handed down by oral tradition from one generation to another. There are said to be six authors of these traditions, among whom are Ayesha the wife of the Prophet; Abú-Horeira, his intimate friend; and Ebn Abbas, his cousin-german. The collection of these traditions made by Khuarezmi, amounts to 5,266; all of which the Mohammedan doctors allege ought to be committed to memory, and where that cannot be done, they ought to be transcribed.

HADJI, or EL-HHAGG (Arab. pilgrim), a title given to a Moslem who has performed the pilgrimage to Mecca and Mount Arafát. He is not entitled to be called a Hadji until he has gone round the Kaaba at Mecca seven times, kissing the black stone each time. It is also indispensable that he should have visited Mount Arafát, six hours distant, on which Abraham is believed to have offered up his son. See MECCA, (PILGRIMAGE TO).

HAFEDHAH, an idol of the ancient Arabians, usually invoked on obtaining a prosperous journey whether by sea or land.

HAFIZI (Arab. keepers), a name given to Mohammedans who commit the Koran wholly to memory, and are on that account regarded as holy men intrusted with God's law.

HAGIGAH, the sacred feast that took place on the morrow after the celebration of the Paschal Supper, and also one of the two peace-offerings which those Jews who engaged in the passover were required to bring along with them to the solemnity. The peace-offerings behoved to be some beast, bullock or sheep, and they were called also the passover of the herd. These passover offerings were esteemed holy things, and none in their defilement might presume to eat of them.

HAGIOGRAPHIA (Gr. holy writings), the name given to the third division of the Jewish Scriptures, comprising the Book of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, and also the two Books of Chronicles. Besides being called Hagiographa, this class of the Hebrew Scriptures was also called KETUBIM (which see) or Writings, because they were not orally delivered as the Law of Moses was, but were immediately revealed to the minds of their authors who wrote under the influence of Divine inspiration.

HAGIOSCOPE, a word used by English ecclesiastical writers to describe openings made through different parts of the interior walls of the church, generally on either side of the chancel arch, so as to afford a view of the altar to those worshipping in the aisles.

HAICTITES, a Mohammedan sect who profess to believe in Jesus Christ as well as in Mohammed. They regard Jesus as the true Messiah, and believe that he existed from all eternity, and that he took upon himself a true human body. They believe that he will come again to judge the world at the last day in the same body which he had on earth; that he will destroy Antichrist, and reign forty years, at the close of which the world will come to an end.

HAIL MARY. See AVE MARIA.

HAIR (CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH). The Jews in ancient times attached great importance to long hair. Accordingly we find that the length of Absalom's hair led to his death, 2 Sam. xviii. 9, "And Absalom met the servants of David. And Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away." One of the most degrading forms of expressing contempt among the Jews was plucking off the hair. We find Nehemiah (xiii. 25) mentioning this as a punishment inflicted upon those who had contracted irregular marriages, "And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves." "Baldhead" seems also to have been used occasionally as a strong term of reproach. Thus 2 Kings ii. 23, "And he went up from thence unto Beth-el: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head." Shaving the head is sometimes referred to by the Hebrew prophets as denoting metaphorically affliction, poverty, and disgrace. The vow of the NAZARITE (which see) shows the importance which was attached to the hair as a sacred emblem among the ancient Hebrews. In ancient Greece also the hair was not unfrequently used for superstitious purposes. Thus it appears from Homer that parents were accustomed to dedicate the hair of their children to some god; and when the children had reached adult age, the hair was cut off and consecrated to that same deity. In the account which Virgil gives of the death of Dido, he mentions that the highest lock of her hair was dedicated to the infernal gods. To such practices there seems to be an allusion in Lev. xix. 27, "Ye shall not round the corner of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard."

As an expression of sorrow for the dead, the hair was frequently cut off, and hence we find the prophet Jeremiah declaring, xvi. 6, "Both the great and the small shall die in this land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them." The same custom appears to have prevailed among the ancient Greeks, and Herodotus speaks of it as a universal practice throughout the world, except in Egypt, where the hair of the head and beard was allowed to grow in seasons of mourning, being at all other times shaved. It was a custom among the Greeks to hang up the hair of their dead at the door to prevent any one from defiling himself by entering the house. Eastern females have always considered the plaiting and adorning of their hair as an indispensable part of their toilette. To this practice we find frequent allusions in Sacred Scripture. Thus Paul strongly condemns it, 1 Tim. ii. 9, "In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array." Peter also adopts a similar strain of reproof, 1 Pet. iii. 3, "Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel." The idolaters who worshipped the heavenly bodies, but more especially the Arabians, in imitation of Bacchus, used to cut their hair equal behind and before, to make their head in the form of a hemisphere, and they likewise shaved the hair of their beards. It was probably in opposition to these practices that the Hebrews were enjoined to let the hair of their heads grow, and not to mar the corners of their beards.

HAIRETTES, a sceptical sect among the Mohammedans, who profess to doubt everything, and to hold their minds in constant equipoise, believing nothing, and maintaining that it is absolutely impossible to distinguish truth from falsehood. On any controverted point, therefore, their usual remark is, "God knows it, we do not." Notwithstanding this sceptical turn of mind, they scrupulously observe the Mohammedan ceremonies and laws, both civil and religious. Members of this sect have occasionally been raised to the dignity of MUFTI (which see), or chief of the Mohammedan law; but it has been alleged that they have been somewhat negligent in performing the duties of that high station, being ready to sign any thing, appending however their usual saying, "God knows what is best." The FETVA (which see) of the Mufti or Sheik-ul-Islam being in many cases of the highest importance, rashness or want of due consideration in signing it may be attended with the most dangerous consequences.

HAI-VANG, the god of the sea among the Chinese, answering to the Poseidon of the Greeks, and the Neptune of the Romans. He is represented holding a magnet in one hand, and a dolphin in the other, and with dishevelled hair to indicate the disturbed state of the waters.

HAKEM (EL), SECT OF. See DRUZES.

HAKEMITES, a heretical sect among the Mohammedans, originated by Hakem-ben-Haschem, who made his appearance about the middle of the second century from the Hegira. Being a man of considerable acuteness, he succeeded in attracting a great number of followers. He maintained that God assumed a human form after he had ordered the angels to adore Adam; that he appeared in the shape of several prophets and other great men, princes and kings. He met with great opposition in propagating his peculiar sentiments, and it is said of him that he threw himself into a cistern full of aqua-fortis, in which his whole body was consumed except his hair, which floated on the surface. Before committing suicide, he had taught his followers that he would return to them after death in the shape of an old man mounted on a grey horse, and that in this form he would conquer the whole world, and compel all nations to embrace his religion. In expectation of this event, the sect of the Hakemites is said by some authors to have lasted above five hundred years after his death.

HALAL, what is permitted and sanctioned by the Mohammedan Law.

HALCYON CHURCH, a denomination of Christians which arose in 1802 in Columbia, North America. The members of this sect reject all creeds and confessions of faith. They admit of only one person in the Godhead, and maintain that the Father cannot be known as a person but as he was pleased to assume personality in his Anointed or Christ. They deny the doctrine of eternal punishment, and hold that the existence both of apostate spirits and impenitent men will cease at the close of Christ's mediatorial kingdom. They deny infant baptism, and their mode of administering the ordinance to adults is peculiar. The persons to be baptized walk down into the water in procession, attended by the congregation, and accompanied with vocal and instrumental music. The ordinance is then dispensed in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom they allege is exhibited in one glorious Person, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The Halcyons devote their children to God, not by baptism, but by dedicating them in prayer, and placing them under the guardianship of the members of the church, who take them into their arms and bless them.

HALDANITES. See BAPTISTS (SCOTTISH). CONGREGATIONALISTS (SCOTTISH).

HALF-COMMUNION. See CHALICE.

HALIA, one of the Nereides in the ancient heathen mythology. This was the name also of a goddess worshipped among the Rhodians, as the spouse of POSEIDON (which see)

HALIACMON, a river-god of Macedonia, sprung from Oceanus and Thetys.

HALLE (Gr. hals, the sea), a name given among the ancient heathens to sea-nymphs in general.

HALLEL, certain psalms which were accustomed to be sung by the Jews on very solemn occasions. It was divided into the Great Hallel and the Lesser Hallel, the former being understood to be Ps. cxxxvi., and the latter comprising six psalms, from Ps. cxliii. to Ps. cxviii. inclusive.

HALLELUJAH. See ALLELUIA.

HALLENSIAN CONTROVERSY. See PLETISTIC CONTROVERSY.

HALOSYDNE, a surname of Amphitrite and Tethys as being seaborne.

HAMADRYADES, subordinate female divinities among the ancient heathens, who presided over woods and forests. See DRYADES.

HAMET (SECT OF), the followers of Hamet, a Mohammedan prophet, who in 1792 began to teach on the Western Coast of Africa. He rejected the ancient doctrine of the Caliphs, and by the modifications which he sought to introduce into the Mussulman creed, he gathered around him a great number of disciples. At length Hamet was killed, and two of his generals disputing for the command, the successful one sold his antagonist to a French slave-dealer.

HAMMON. See AMMON.

HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE. See CONFERENCE (HAMPTON COURT).

HAMUL, the angel who was regarded by the ancient Persians as the inspector of the heavens.

HANBALITES, one of the four orthodox sects of the Mohammedans, which derived its name from Ahmed-ebn-Hanbal, who is said to have been so well versed in the traditions of Mohammed, that he could repeat a million of them by rote. This zealous Mohammedan teacher strenuously maintained the eternity of the Koran, and thus brought upon himself the vengeance of the Caliph al Môtasem, who held the Koran to have been created. The controversy on this disputed point raged for a time with great keenness on both sides, and at length Hanbal, by the command of his antagonist, was imprisoned and scourged. He continued, notwithstanding, to propagate his opinions until his death, which took place towards the middle of the second century from the Hegira. The sect of the Hanbalites, from which the sect of the Wahabees seems to have been derived, prevails principally in the wilder districts of Arabia; its austere tenets being well suited to the simple manners of the Bedouins. In the reign of the Caliph Al Râdi, the Hanbalites, enraged at the wide prevalence of a luxurious spirit, raised a serious commotion in Bagdad, breaking into houses, spilling any wine they discovered, destroying musical instruments, and burning rich garments. Considerable alarm was excited for some time among the inhabitants of the city, and it was not without considerable difficulty that the disturbance was quelled. In these tumults several thousand lives were sacrificed.

HAND (CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH THE). The custom of kissing the hand as an act of adoration seems to have existed in very early times. Thus we find a distinct reference to it in Job xxxi. 27, "And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." In the East, even at the present, one of the most usual modes of paying respect to a person of superior rank is by kissing his hand and putting it to the forehead. A Mohammedan, when he cannot observe this custom, commonly kisses his own hand and raises it to his forehead. An oath is often taken in Oriental countries by joining hands, and to this practice there seems to be an obvious allusion in Ezek. xxi. 14, "Smite thy hands together," and again verse 17, "I will also smite mine hands together, and I will cause my fury to rest: I the Lord have said it."

One of the most expressive modes also in the East of indicating sorrow and deep humiliation is by putting the hands to the head. Hence we find it said in Jer. ii. 37, "Yea, thou shalt go forth from him, and thine hands upon thine head: for the Lord hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them." The same attitude in token of sorrow is frequently met with on the paintings in the tombs of Egypt. Mr. Roberts also, referring to modern customs in the East, says, "When people are in great distress they put their hands on their head, the fingers being clasped on the top of the crown. Should a man who is plunged into wretchedness meet a friend, he immediately puts his hands on his head to illustrate his circumstances. When a person hears of the death of a relative or friend he forthwith clasps his hands on his head. When boys have been punished at school, they run home with their hands on their head. Parents are much displeased and alarmed when they see their children with their hands in that position, because they look upon it not merely as a sign of grief, but as an emblem of bad fortune."

HANDKERCHIEF (HOLY), a handkerchief said to have belonged to St. Veronica, on which is supposed to have been imprinted the likeness of the face of our blessed Lord. The legend is, that when Christ was led to crucifixion, Veronica, who followed him, put a handkerchief to his face, on which the impress of his features remained. This holy relic is still preserved at Rome, and exhibited for the veneration of Romanists on certain festivals. Dr. Middleton says, that two different holy handkerchiefs exist; the one alleged to have been sent by Christ himself as a present to Agbarus, prince of Edessa, who by letter had requested a picture of him; the other given by Christ at the time of his crucifixion to a holy woman, by name Veronica, upon a handkerchief which she had lent him to wipe his face upon that occasion. Both these handkerchiefs are said to be kept with the utmost reverence, the one in St. Sylvester's church, the other in St. Peter's, where, in honour of this sacred relic, there is an altar built by Pope Urban VIII., with a statue of Veronica, bearing a suitable inscription. It is related by Bower, upon the authority of Mabillon, that Pope Innocent III. composed a prayer in honour of the image imprinted upon the handkerchief, and granted a ten days' indulgence to all who should visit it, and that Pope John XXII. promised no less than ten thousand days' indulgence to every one who should repeat the following prayer, "Hail, holy face of our Redeemer, printed upon a cloth as white as snow; purge us from all spot of vice, and join us to the company of the blessed. Bring us to our country, O Happy Figure, there to see the pure face of Christ." The holy handkerchief is also said to be preserved which wrapped our Lord's face in the grave.

HANDS (IMPOSITION OF). In very ancient times the most usual ceremony adopted in conveying a blessing to another was to lay the hands solemnly upon the head of the individual accompanied with prayer. Thus in Gen. xlviii. 14, we find Jacob laying hands upon the heads of Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his dying blessing. The high-priest also, when he pronounced a blessing upon the people, was wont to stretch out his hands as it were over the heads of the assembled multitude. And when our Lord conveyed a blessing to the Jewish children, we are told, "he laid his hands on them and prayed." According to the Law of Moses, the ceremony to be followed in confessing sin over the head of an animal presented as a sin-offering, was to lay both hands upon the head of the victim. Witnesses also, when charging any one with a crime, laid their hands upon the head of the accused. The same custom was followed by the apostles, as we learn from Acts viii. 17, when they conferred the Holy Ghost on those who were baptized.

The imposition of hands has from a very early period formed an essential part of the ceremony by which priests and ministers have been consecrated and set apart to the sacred office. Thus in Num xxvii. 18, we are informed that when Moses constituted Joshua his successor he laid his hands upon him. In this solemn act indeed, accompanied with prayer, ordination to the ministry has usually consisted. The manner of performing the ceremony has differed at different times. As a part of the ordination of Christian ministers it has been usually traced to apostolic institution and practice. Three passages of Scripture are generally referred to in support of this ceremony. Thus in Acts viii. 17, mention is made of the apostles laying hands on those whom Philip had baptized; and in Acts xix. 6, Paul is said to have laid his hands on those whom he baptized after John's baptism; and finally, in Heb. vi. 2, imposition of hands is ranked as one of the elementary principles of religion. Hence CHEIROTHESIA (which see), the Greek term for the imposition of hands, is frequently used in the early Christian writers as synonymous with ordination. In the baptism of catechumens in the primitive Christian church, one of the ceremonies practised was the imposition of hands upon the head of the candidate, who stood with his head bowed down in a submissive posture. This was also one of the rites of CONFIRMATION (which see).

HANIFEES, an orthodox sect of Mohammedans, who derived their name from their originator Abu-Hanifa, the first of the Islamite casuists, who flourished in the second year of the Hegira. He learned the dogmas of the Mohammedan faith and its principal traditions from persons who had lived in the time of the prophet; and though he is now regarded as the chief authority among the Sonnites, he was through life a devoted partisan of the family of Ali. Being a man of inflexible uprightness, he shrunk from accepting the office of judge which was offered to him, and was in consequence thrown into prison. While in confinement he is said to have read the Koran no fewer than seven thousand times. According to D'Ohsson, he was poisoned by command of the Caliph for having in the Ulema or Council of the doctors of the law, resisted the severe punishment which it was proposed to inflict on the citizens of Mosul, A. D. 767. The Hanifees are usually called the followers of reason, because they are principally guided by their own judgment in giving a decision upon any point, while the other Mohammedan sects adhere more closely to the letter of tradition. This sect, as we learn from Dr. Taylor, was first established in Irák; it is now the established faith of the Turks and Tartars, but it has branched into numerous subdivisions.

HANUCA. See DEDICATION (FEAST OF).

HANUMAN, the Ape-God of the Hindus, son of Pavan, lord of the winds. There is a reference to Hanuman in the Ramayana, an ancient epic poem, in which the monkey-general is introduced as heading the Cushites or Negroes of India, who had come to the assistance of Rama, and the Ariens of the Ganges. In memorial of the effective assistance which he rendered to Rama-Vishnu, a small pagoda is erected in his honour within the temples of Vishnu.

HAPHTOROTH, fifty-four sections of the Old Testament prophets, appointed to be read in the service of the Jewish synagogue. The Rabbies say that their forefathers read only the Law until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, who conquered the Jews about B. C. 167, and issued an edict at Antioch commanding the inhabitants of the country to embrace the Pagan religion professed by the conqueror. Besides dedicating the Jewish temple to the worship of Jupiter Olympius, he prohibited the reading of the Law in the synagogues on pain of death. In consequence of this tyrannical prohibition, the Jews substituted a series of selections from the Prophets, which they termed Haphtoroth; and even when the reading of the Law was restored in the time of the Maccabees, the reading of the Prophets was still continued, and has remained in force down to the present day. The Jews in different countries have not in all instances chosen the same passages from the prophets; and there is no evidence to prove that in ancient times the lessons read from the prophets were the same as now. Dr. Adam Clarke remarks, that though the Jews are agreed in the sections of the Law which are read every Sabbath, yet they are not agreed in the Haphtoroth, for it appears in the selections from the prophets, that the Dutch and German Jews differ in several instances from the Italian and Portuguese. It is somewhat remarkable, that while, as we learn from Luke iv. 16—21, the sixty-first chapter of Isaiah was read in the synagogue in the days of our Lord, this and almost all the other prophecies respecting the Messiah are omitted in the modern Haphtoroth. From the custom among the Jews of reading regular portions of the Law and the Prophets in the synagogue, is supposed to have originated the custom in many Christian churches of reading a lesson every Sabbath out of the Old and New Testaments.

HARA, one of the names of SHIVA (which see), the Hindu deity.

HARAM, the term used by the Mohammedan doctors to denote what deserves a reprimand or punishment, being expressly forbidden by the Law. It is the opposite of HALAL (which see). The word Haram also signifies a sacred thing from which infidels are to abstain, as the temple of Mecca or Mohammed's tomb at Medina.

HARBADS, a name substituted by Zoroaster for the Magi of the ancient Persians, and designed to denote the priests of the Guebres or Parsees, or Fire-Worshippers. Certain fixed regulations were laid down as to the appearance and costume of the Harbads. They were required to wear long beards, and conical-shaped caps falling down on their shoulders, and quite covering their ears. Their hair was never cut except as a sign of mourning for a near relative. When performing divine service before the fire, the cap was anciently so made as to cover the mouth of the officiating priest, but the priest of the modern Guebres wears a piece of stuff cut square for that purpose. The cloak or Sudra was of a scarlet colour, with long sleeves, and falling down to the middle of the leg. Round the body was worn a cloth sash or girdle of camel's hair, from which hung down four tassels, intended to remind the Harbad of four established maxims, which he ought never to forget. The first tassel was designed to remind him that he must have one God alone, one omnipotent Being always before his eyes; the second, that he was bound to believe in all the articles of the Magian faith; the third, that he must acknowledge Zoroaster as God's genuine and true disciple; and the fourth, that he must resolve by the grace of God, never to weary of well-doing. These girdles were believed to be of divine institution, and it was required of all the faithful of both sexes to wear them, that by the possession of this invaluable treasure they might overcome the devil and all his works. If, however, any one should happen through inadvertency or mistake to lose his girdle, he must neither eat, drink, speak, nor stir one foot until he has purchased a new one from some Harbad. The man who has lost his girdle has in their view lost his benediction. See PARSEES.

HAREM, the apartment in the East set apart exclusively for the women. It would appear that although polygamy was forbidden by the Law of Moses, the Hebrew kings, especially Solomon, formed to themselves large establishments of wives and concubines. In 1 Kings xxii. 25, we find mention made of the "inner chamber," which is supposed to refer to the harem, the words denoting literally a chamber within a chamber. In the East, the harem is held sacred, so that even the officers of justice dare not intrude therein, unless they have received certain information that a man is within the harem contrary to the law; and if on entering the harem they do not find what they look for, the women may punish and even kill them. The Mohammedan law requires that the faces of women be concealed from the view of men, with the exception of their husbands, fathers, and sons. In Egypt the strictest precautions are taken that no male visitors be allowed to enter the interior of the harem, not even the slaves who are in attendance. "Women," says Mr. Lane, "often pay visits to each other's harems, and sometimes spend whole days in gossip, the display of finery, smoking or story-telling. It is deemed a breach of etiquette for the master of the house to enter the apartment on such occasions, unless his visit be upon some imperative occasion; even then he must give the usual notice of his approach, so that the strange lady may veil and retire." Female existence in the Oriental harem is one monotonous and unvarying scene of indolence and self-indulgence. The women seldom leave their apartments to take exercise in the open air, but reclining on soft divans, they spend their time in gold embroidery, or in trifling amusements, while they pamper their appetites with large quantities of sweetmeats, and a variety of rich dishes, the preparation of which they carefully superintend. In addition to this, by the constant use of relaxing, warm, and vapour baths, they soon grow so large that the symmetry of their forms and the regularity of their features entirely disappear, and nothing of beauty remains but the eyes. "When the moral state of the harem is closely examined," we are told in the Journal of a Deputation to the East, "a sad picture of depravity and misery is discovered. The women are left wholly uneducated, being unable either to read or write; their time is mostly occupied in attending to their toilette, feasting their appetites, frivolous gossip, and domestic squabbles. As respects the intellect, they live and die in a state of mental childhood; and with regard to morals, being without the restraints of either religion or reason, they are wholly abandoned to the sway of the sensual and malevolent passions of our fallen nature. Envy, jealousy, and malice are the natural fruits of this deep moral debasement. The elder women have generally the rule, by custom, over their juniors; factious intrigues against one another, acts of tyranny and cruel revenge, are the inevitable consequences of such a social system; so that, could the private and domestic life of the harems be disclosed, the majority of them would be found little pandemonia."

HARIGARA, a word which, when pronounced along with Shiva and Rama, is believed by the Hindus to bring down numberless blessings upon him who utters it. The moment these three sacred words escape from the lips, all sins are cancelled and blotted out, but if they are thrice repeated, the gods are so honoured that they are at a loss to find a recompense equal to the merit. Such privileged persons are no longer obliged to pass into other bodies, but are straightway absorbed in Brahm.

HARIOLI, magicians who are mentioned by Tertullian as waiting on the altars of the heathen to receive their inspiration from the fumes of the sacrifices.

HARISCHANDIS, a sect composed of doms or sweepers in the western provinces of Hindustan. Their name bears an allusion to the Pauranic prince Harischandra, who, becoming the purchased slave of a man of this impure order, instructed his master, it is said, in the tenets of the sect. What these tenets were, however, is not known and Dr. H. H. Wilson thinks it may be doubted whether any adherent of the sect now exists.

HARKA-RE, a deity worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. He was the son of AMMON (which see), and supposed to be identical with the Grecian HERACLES (which see).

HARLOTS. See PROSTITUTION (SACRED).

HARMONAH, a goddess of the Shemitic nations corresponding to HARMONIA (which see) of the Greeks.

HARMONIA, a goddess among the ancient Greeks. She was the daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, or, as some allege, of Zeus and Electra. Cadmus, king of Thebes, received Harmonia in marriage, and all the gods of Olympus graced the nuptials with their presence. On that occasion the newly wedded spouse received either from Aphrodite or Athena a fatal necklace, which caused mischief and misfortune to every one who possessed it. After passing through various hands, it was at length dedicated in the temple of Athena at Delphi. Both Harmonia and Cadmus are said to have been changed into dragons, and transferred to Elysium; or as others affirm, they were carried thither in a chariot drawn by dragons.

HARMONIES, works designed to exhibit the narratives of Scripture in chronological order, so as to manifest the harmony or agreement of the statements made by the different writers. Attempts of this kind have been made from an early period after the completion of the canon. Thus Jerome mentions Theophilus of Antioch as having written a harmony of Scripture; but if such a work ever existed, it has long ago perished. Eusebius speaks with approbation of a harmony of the four gospels prepared about the middle of the second century by Tatian, and also of another work of a similar kind by Ammonius, an Alexandrian, in the commencement of the third century. Both harmonies have long ago been lost. Eusebius himself, who wrote in the early part of the fourth century, composed a very celebrated Harmony of the Gospels, in which he arranged the various events narrated by the Evangelists in ten tables, which serve as very useful indices to the four Gospels. A work having in view the object of a Harmony of the Evangelists was written about A. D. 400, by the illustrious Augustin, bishop of Hippo. Various attempts were made to harmonize the Sacred Writings, but more especially the Gospels, from the middle ages onward to the Reformation, but no work of the slightest value has been preserved. From the Reformation down to the present day, several harmonies have appeared both in Britain and on the Continent. Of these Lightfoot, Doddridge, and Macknight have been the most favourably received in our own country, and still more recently Towns end's Old and New Testaments, arranged in Historical and Chronological Order, has been received with a considerable measure of public approbation. The term Harmony is now almost exclusively limited to a chronological arrangement of the narratives as given by the Four Evangelists. In this respect Archbishop Newcome and the Rev. Richard Greswell have done good service by presenting the parallel passages in a tabular form. Some of the harmonists proceed on the idea that the Evangelists intended to preserve the order of time, while others as strenuously deny that they had any such object in view. In Germany of late years, several carefully prepared harmonies have been published, among which may be mentioned De Wette and Lücke, Matthæi, Clausen, Roediger, Reichel, Overbeck, and Ziegler.

HARMONY SOCIETY, a community of Separatists in North America. Its founder was George Rapp, a Lutheran, who emigrated with a considerable number of followers from the kingdom of Wurtemberg in Germany. This excellent man, who was born in 1757 at Maulbronn, seceded from the Lutheran church at the age of twenty-five, and gathered around him a few adherents, to whom he officiated as pastor. In the midst of much opposition, and even open persecution, Rapp continued to maintain and to propagate his peculiar sentiments. At length he resolved to seek an asylum in the United States. Thither, accordingly, he went in 1803, accompanied by three friends, and purchased lands in Butler county. In the course of the two following years, about one hundred and twenty-five families joined Rapp and his companions, and in 1805 an association was formed on the model of the primitive church at Jerusalem, mentioned in Acts iv. 34, 35, "Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need." The town which they formed on the principle of having all things in common, was situated about one hundred and twenty miles north of Philadelphia, and so well did the scheme succeed, that in 1815 they sold their property in Butler county, and formed a new establishment on an improved plan in Posey county, Indiana. Here they remained only two years, when they again sold their property and removed to Beaver county, Pennsylvania, where they built a third town called Economy, and devoted themselves with the most commendable industry to agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and by the exertions of the whole community, amounting to somewhere about 4,000, not only are the wants of the members supplied, but a considerable surplus is yearly amassed. No member is allowed to join the community until he has passed through a year's probation, at the end of which he is required to sign a written contract, containing the basis or terms of membership, in which he surrenders not only his property, but himself personally to the community.

He loses in a manner his individuality, and becomes the property of the whole, being lost in the mass, each one living for all, and all for one. The venerable founder of this community, George Rapp, died in 1847. Immediately after his decease, the Society appointed a board of elders, consisting of nine members, seven of whom attend to the internal, and two to the external concerns. Jacob Henrici was chosen to succeed George Rapp as spiritual guide. A vote of six of the nine elders is binding. They can remove any one of the nine, and fill all vacancies.

HARPIES, fabulous birds of remarkable rapacity and swiftness which occur in the legends of ancient heathen mythology. Only one is mentioned by Homer, under the name of Podarge or swift-footed, the spouse of Zephyrus. Any one who was suddenly taken away by death was supposed to have been carried off by the Harpies. Two of these monstrous creatures are spoken of by Hesiod, under the names of Aëlo and Ocypete, who were so rapid in their motions as to outstrip the winds in their flight. Their residence has been placed either in the islands called Strophades, at the entrance of Orcus, or in a cave in the island of Crete. They are represented as fierce birds, with human heads and long claws. The harpies of Virgil had the face of a woman, and came out of Tartarus. Among the Greeks these creatures personified the tempests. The birds of Stymphalus were no doubt the harpies of some Arcadian tribes.

HARPOCRATES, the god of silence among the ancient Egyptians, said by some to have been the son of Isis; by others, of Isis and Osiris. His statues were usually placed in the temples near to the images of Osiris and Isis, to intimate, as Varro supposes, that the people ought to observe silence, and not divulge that these divinities had ever been mortals. Harpocrates was exhibited under the form of young man with one finger on his mouth, indicating silence. Egyptians cut his figure upon precious stones, which they carried about with them as amulets. Sometimes he was represented as mounted upon an ostrich, with the sun and moon upon the reverse; at other times he is represented with a lion's head and birds round it.

HARUSPICES. See ARUSPICES.

HARVEST (FESTIVAL OF). The Jews were accustomed in ancient times to observe a peculiar ceremony in honour of the introduction of harvest. On the second day of the passover, or the morrow after the Sabbath, as its first day was called, a sheaf of barley was waved before the Lord as an offering of the first fruits of the harvest in the name of the whole people. This ceremony was accompanied with a special sacrifice. The festival was observed annually according to the arrangements laid down in the law of Moses, Lev. xxiii. 10—14, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest : and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you : on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it. And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf an he-lamb without blemish of the first year for a burnt-offering unto the Lord. And the meat-offering thereof shall be two-tenth deals of fine flour mingled with oil, an offering made by fire unto the Lord for a sweet savour : and the drink-offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of an hin. And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God : it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings."

HASSAN, the eldest son of Ali, and the second of the twelve Imáms, of the line of Ali. On the death of his father A. D. 661, Hassan was immediately proclaimed Caliph and Imám in Irak; the former title he was forced to resign to Moáwiyah, the latter or spiritual dignity his followers regarded as inalienable. His rival granted him a pension, and permitted him to retire into private life. After nine years spent chiefly in devotion, Hassan was poisoned by his wife Jaadah, who had been bribed to perpetrate the crime by Yezid, the son of Moáwiyah. Hossein having learnt from the physician of the horrid deed, hastened to his brother's death-bed, and entreated him to name the murderer; but the dying prince replied, "O brother! the life of this world is made up of nights that vanish away. Let the murderer alone until we both meet at the judgment-seat of God, where justice will assuredly be done." Hassan appears to have been, like his father Ali, a person of amiable and pious dispositions, but at the same time to have been deficient in firmness and decision of character. It is said that when he surrendered the Caliphate A. D. 669 to Moáwiyah, he stipulated that the anathemas pronounced against his father Ali in the mosques should be discontinued, but that he afterwards was weak enough to concede the point so far as to be satisfied with the condition that they should not be pronounced in his presence. Hence one party have named him the disgrace of Mussulmans, while the ardent Schiites call him the young prince of Paradise.

HASSIDEANS. See ASSIDEANS.

HATI, one of the two wolves in the Scandinavian mythology which pursue the sun and moon. The one called Sköll pursues the sun, while the other called Hati, the son of Hrodvitnir, runs before her, and as eagerly pursues the moon that will one day be caught by him.

HATTEMISTS, a sect which arose in Holland in the seventeenth century, deriving its name from Pontian von Hattem, a minister in the province of Zealand. He pushed the Calvinistic doctrine to an extreme length, so as to teach the doctrine of a fatal and unintelligent necessity. He inculcated upon his followers that men were not responsible for their actions, whether good or bad; that religion does not consist in active obedience, but in patient suffering and undisturbed tranquillity of mind. He also alleged that Christ by his death did not satisfy Divine justice, or expiate the sins of men; but that he signified to us that there was nothing in us to offend God, and in this way he made us just. This sect, as well as the kindred and contemporary sect of the VERSCHORISTS (which see), is no longer known by name to exist in Holland, but the extravagant opinions of Von Hattem are not altogether unknown in that country even at the present day.

HAUDRIETTES, an order of Romish nuns hospitaliers at Paris, founded in the reign of St. Louis, by Stephen Haudry, one of the secretaries of that prince. At first it was limited to twelve poor females, but the number gradually increased, and the order was confirmed by several popes. The members of this order afterwards received the name of Nuns of the Assumption. They wear a black habit and a crucifix on their breast. They observe the rule of St. Augustin, and make a vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

HEAD-DRESSES. In ancient times particular forms of head-dresses were considered as sacred, and appropriated to the gods. This is evident from the specimens of the Egyptian monuments in the British Museum. Thus on the figure of Osiris may be seen a species of crown which seems to have belonged to that deity at least, if not to others in the land of the Pharaohs. It consists of a conical cap, flanked by two ostrich feathers with a disk in front, placed on the horns of a goat. Among the Jews, while the turban anciently formed the common head-dress of both men and women, those worn by persons in sacred offices differed in some particulars from the ordinary turban. Thus Josephus says, speaking of the ordinary priest: "Upon his head he wears a cap, not brought in a conical form, nor including the entire head, but still including more than the half of it. It is called a mitre, but its make is such that it resembles a crown. It is made of thick swathes, but the contexture of it is linen, and it is folded round many times, and sewed together, besides which, a piece of fine linen covers the whole cap from the upper part, and reaches down to the forehead, and conceals the seams of the swathes, which would otherwise appear unseemly. This adheres closely to the head that it may not fall off during the sacred service." Again, the same Jewish historian remarks in regard to the high-priest's head-dress: "The high-priest's tiara or mitre was like that of the other priests, only it had another of purple or violet colour above, and a crown of gold of three rows about that, and terminating above in a golden cap, about the size of the joint of the little finger." In front of the mitre was a plate of gold tied with a blue lace, and on the plate were inscribed the words "Holiness to the Lord" in Hebrew characters. The modern Jews wear the Te-

PHILLIM (which see), or frontlets between the eyes, which they imagine to be commanded by the law of Moses. The Mohammedan sects are known by the colour of their head-dress. Thus the sect of Ali are distinguished from the rest by their green turbans.

HEALTH, a heathen deity worshipped in ancient times under the Latin names of Sanitas or Salus, both of which indicate health. Pausanias asserts the worship of this goddess to have been very common in Greece; and he says that there was an altar for this among other deities in the temple of Amphiaraus. The temple of the goddess of health stood in the city of Rome, on the Mons Quirinalis. The Greeks worshipped this goddess under the name of HYGIEIA (which see).

HEATHENS. See PAGANS.

HEAVEN. This word is frequently used in a strictly material signification as forming a part of the created universe. Thus Gen. i. 1, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." The ancient Hebrews, however, seem to have entertained very strange notions as to the structure of the material heaven, believing it to be a solid arch resting on pillars, and having foundations. Thus Job xxvi. 11, "The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof." And in other passages the heaven is compared to a curtain, or the covering of a tent, as in Ps. civ. 2, "Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain." The ancient Jews believed that there were several different heavens, the lower, the middle, and the third or higher heavens. The lower heaven they considered as including the clouds and the atmosphere; the middle as being the stellar or starry region; and the third as being the heaven of heavens, or the habitation of God and his angels.

The word heaven, however, is used not only in a material but also in a spiritual sense, to indicate the future abode of the righteous after death. That such a state of happiness exists after death is evident both from reason and Scripture. The belief in a heaven beyond the grave, accordingly, is not limited to Christians, being a recognized article of the creed of Heathens, Jews, and Mohammedans. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans the heaven which they allotted to the good was called ELYSIUM (which see), the precise locality of which was a subject of considerable discussion. Though the writers of classic antiquity, particularly the poets, declared the happiness of souls in Elysium to be complete, some of them believed that the blessed inmates would, many of them, return again to earth, and pass into new bodies, destroying all recollections of Elysian bliss, by drinking of the waters of Lethe, one of the rivers of hell. Eternal blessedness was, in the view of the ancient Pagans, reserved for those only who were distinguished for their exalted virtues, and who were accordingly admitted into the society of the gods, while their idola or simulacra, as the poets alleged, continued to reside in the lower regions. The views of different heathen nations in regard to heaven are well described by Mr. Gross, in his valuable and ingenious work, 'The Heathen Religion in its Popular and Symbolical Development:'. "The ancient Mexicans, as it appears from the statement of Kaiser, taught the existence of numerous spirit-abodes, into one of which the innocent shades of children were received; into another,—the sun, the valiant and illustrious souls of heroes ascended; while the corrupt and hideous ghosts of the wicked were doomed to grovel and pine in subterranean caverns. Nine heavens served to circumscribe their fanciful visions and ardent dreams of future bliss. The Greenlanders were contented to predicate the doctrine of but one future Eden, which they located in the abyss of the ocean, and to which skilful fishermen alone might dare to aspire with the confident hope of success. The relentless martial spirit of the Appalachian Indians, proclaimed itself in consigning their cowardly red brethren to the profound chasms of their native mountains, where, overwhelmed by snow and ice, they fell victims to the tender mercy of shaggy and ferocious bears. The aborigines of America were unanimous in their belief in the immortality of the soul, and a happy state hereafter, somewhat similar to the Elysian bliss of the Greeks and Romans; but of a Hades, they know little and speak seldom, and the savage-like Appalachian hell just described, is one of the remarkable exceptions in the general creed. 'All,' writes Doctor Robertson, 'entertain hopes of a future and more happy state, where they shall be for ever exempt from the calamities which embitter human life in its present condition. This future state they conceive to be a delightful country, blessed with perpetual spring, whose forests abound with game, whose rivers swarm with fish, where famine is never felt, and uninterrupted plenty shall be enjoyed without labour or toil. But as men, in forming their first imperfect ideas concerning the invisible world, suppose that there they shall continue to feel the same desires, and to be engaged in the same occupations, as in the present world; they naturally ascribe eminence and distinction, in that state, to the same qualities and talents which are here the objects of their esteem. The Americans, accordingly, allotted the highest place in their country of spirits, to the skilful hunter, the adventurous and successful warrior, and to such as had tortured the greatest number of captives, and devoured their flesh. These notions were so prevalent, that they gave rise to a universal custom, which is, at once, the strongest evidence that the Americans believe in a future state, and the best illustration of what they expect there. As they imagine that departed spirits begin their career anew in the world whither they are gone, that their friends may not enter upon it defenceless and unprovided they bury together with the bodies of the dead their bow, their arrows, and other weapons used in hunt ing or war; they deposit in their tombs the skins or stuffs of which they make garments, Indian corn, manioc, venison, domestic utensils, and whatever is reckoned among the necessaries in their simple mode of life. In some provinces, upon the decease of a cazique or chief, a certain number of his wives, of his favourites, and of his slaves, were put to death, and interred together with him, that he might appear with the same dignity in his future station, and be waited upon by the same attendants. This persuasion is so deep-rooted, that many of the deceased person's retainers offer themselves voluntary victims, and court the privilege of accompanying their departed masters, as a high distinction."

The heaven of the Hindu is absorption in Brahm, and of the Buddhist, annihilation or Nirvana. The priesthood of the ancient Egyptians taught the immortality of the soul under the name of Palingenesia, or a second birth, being a return of the soul to the celestial spheres, or its reabsorption into the Supreme Being, without regard to the doctrine or the necessity of transmigration—a doctrine which was inculcated only upon the illiterate multitudes who could form no conception of the existence of the soul without the body. The ancient Scandinavians held that there were two different heavens; the one, the palace of Odin, which they called VALHALLA (which see), where that august divinity received all who died a violent death; and the other called GIMLI (which see), or the palace covered with gold, after the renovation of all things, was to be the everlasting home of the righteous, where they were to enjoy ecstatic and perennial delights. "The heroes," says the Edda, "who are received into the palace of Odin, have every day the pleasure of arming themselves, of passing in review, of ranging themselves in order of battle, and of cutting one another in pieces; but as soon as the hour of repast approaches, they return on horseback all safe and sound to the hall of Odin, and fall to eating and drinking. Though the number of them cannot be counted, the flesh of the boar Saehrimmir is sufficient for them all; every day it is served up at table, and every day it is renewed again to its original bulk: their beverage is ale and mead; one single goat, whose milk is excellent mead, furnishes enough of that liquor to intoxicate all the heroes. Odin alone drinks wine, the only fermented liquid to the use of which his good taste or his superior dignity invites his attention. A crowd of virgins wait upon the heroes at table, and fill their cups as fast as they empty them."

The Jewish Rabbis teach that there is an upper and a lower paradise or heaven. "Between them," says one writer, "is fixed a pillar: by this they are joined together, and it is called the strength of Zion. By this pillar, on every Sabbath and festival, the righteous climb up and feed themselves with a glance of the Divine majesty till the end of the Sabbath or festival; when they slide down and return to the lower paradise." Both in the upper and the lower paradise there are said to be seven apartments for the residence and reward of the righteous. The inhabitants of these dwellings, in so far as the upper paradise is concerned, are thus described by Rabbinical tradition: "It is stated, that there are seven parties or orders which shall hereafter stand before God, and that each of these orders or parties has its particular abode or dwelling in the upper paradise. The first party or order consists of those who, for the kingdom and honour of God, suffered death, by the government under whose authority they were: as the Rabbi Akiba and his disciples were put to death by the government of Rome. The second order consists of those who have been drowned in the sea. The third is the Rabbi Jochanan Ben Zachai and his disciples. The fourth order consists of those on whom descended a cloud which covered them. The fifth consists of those who have repented: and in the same place as the penitents, stand the perfectly righteous. The sixth order consists of those who never married, and who in all their lives never tasted of sin. The seventh consists of the poor, who exercised themselves in the Bible and Mishna, and in an honest vocation.—Observe, then, that to every order is allotted a distinct abode: and the highest order, beyond which none can go, consists of those who, for the kingdom and honour of God, suffered death from the government under which they lived; as the Rabbi Akiba and his disciples."

The souls of the righteous, according to the Jewish Rabbis, do not ascend to the upper paradise immediately after they have quitted the body, but they are represented as undergoing a previous kind of noviciate in the lower paradise, which is situated midway between this corporeal world and the upper heaven. And even on reaching the purer abodes of the blessed disembodied spirits, are said to be in the habit of revisiting this lower world, and even of occasionally passing to the other apartments of the righteous. Thus the Rabbis affirm: "In paradise, every one has his particular abode, and is not allowed to go out, or ascend to the dwelling of his superior neighbour; for if he do, he is presently consumed by his neighbour's great fire. And thus they are called standers, because they stand or keep to their posts, or allotted places. There are, indeed, some pious ones, but their number is small, who, being worthy of cleaving to the holy and blessed God, are suffered to ascend or descend, to go into the upper and lower places, and to walk in all the quarters, and about all the gates and apartments: and this is a pre-eminence above which there is none: and these, when they walk about in the palaces of the angels, the quarters of paradise, and the dwellings of the other righteous, communicate to them of the lustre of that wisdom which God has abundantly vouchsafed to them."

The Mohammedans believe in "a heaven prepared for the blessed among the faithful, that is, for the professors of the true religion, and followers of the holy prophet Mohammed; in which they shall be with him enjoying perpetual light and all heavenly pleasures, always beautiful, in their full strength and vigour, brighter than the sun, and thought worthy to see face to face the Most High God, and to adore him." They hold also that there are eight heavens or different degrees of happiness. Mohammed undoubtedly held out to his followers a heaven of carnal pleasures, in which the lowest appetites of man should have their full and free indulgence, but at the same time he taught in the Koran that the height of happiness will consist in seeing God face to face; that this pleasure will be the greatest, and make us forget all the other pleasures of Paradise, and amongst others those which are common to men and beasts. Mohammedan writers have allowed sensual pleasures to form a part of the lowest degree of happiness in heaven; others have excluded them entirely from those blessed mansions. The prophets are believed to go to heaven directly; the martyrs are in the throats of birds who live only on the fruits of Paradise; the souls of the common faithful either are about the graves, or in the well Zemzem, or with Adam in the lowest heaven.

HEAVE-OFFERINGS, ceremonies observed by the Jews under the Law, the offerings being lifted upwards in token of being presented to the Almighty; and, as was generally the case, being waved towards the four quarters of the earth, hence called a wave-offering, with the view of indicating that He to whom the offerings were presented was the Proprietor of the universe. In a few cases animals were subjected to the ceremony of heaving before they were killed. More commonly, however, it was performed with some particular parts after they were cut up; especially with the breast and right shoulder in all cases of peace-offerings, which were appropriated for the use of the priests by a perpetual statute. Bloodless offerings also were at times presented with the same ceremony, according to the injunction contained in Exod. xxix. 22—28. Before any bread was made of the corn of the land, a cake was first made out of the dough, consisting of a four and twentieth part, which was heaved, and then, as was the case with all heave-offerings, it was given to the priests. The Rabbis called by the name of Therumah or a heave-offering, the oblation which was given to the priests of corn and wine and oil, and whatever else was required to support life. The Hebrews called this payment sometimes the great heave-offering, in comparison of the tithes which the Levites paid to the priests, and which was called the heave-offering of the tithes.

HEBDOMADARI, a name applied to monks in ancient times by Cassian and Jerome, from their weekly service.

HEBDOMAGETES, a surname of Apollo, because, as some think, sacrifices were offered to this god on the seventh of every month, or as others suppose, because at the festivals in honour of this god the processions were headed by seven boys and seven maidens.

HEBDOMAS MAGNA (Lat. the great week), an appellation given anciently to the week before Easter, which was observed with the greatest strictness and solemnity. The reasons of the observance are fully stated by Chrysostom, as quoted by Bingham: "It was called the great week, not because it consisted of longer days or more in number than other weeks, but because at this time great things were wrought for us by our Lord. For in this week the ancient tyranny of the devil was dissolved, death was extinct, the strong man was bound, his goods were spoiled, sin was abolished, the curse was destroyed, paradise was opened, heaven became accessible, men and angels were joined together, the middle wall of partition was broken down, the barriers were taken out of the way, the God of peace made peace between things in heaven and things on earth; therefore it is called the great week: and as this is the head of all other weeks, so the great sabbath is the head of this week, being the same thing in this week as the head is in the body. Therefore in this week many increase their labours; some adding to their fastings, others to their watchings; others give more liberal alms, testifying the greatness of the Divine goodness by their care of good works, and more intense piety and holy living. As the Jews went forth to meet Christ, when he had raised Lazarus from the dead; so now, not one city, but all the world go forth to meet him, not with palm-branches in their hands, but with alms-deeds, humanity, virtue, tears, prayers, fastings, watchings, and all kinds of piety, which they offer to Christ their Lord. And not only we, but the emperors of the world honour this week, making it a time of vacation from all civil business, that the magistrates, being at liberty from business of the law, may spend all these days in spiritual service. Let the doors of the courts, say they, now be shut up; let all disputes, and all kinds of contention and punishment cease; let the executioner's hands rest a little: common blessings are wrought for us all by our common Lord, let some good be done by us his servants. Nor is this the only honour they show to this week, but they do one thing more no less considerable. The imperial letters are sent abroad at this time, commanding all prisoners to be set at liberty from their chains. For as our Lord, when he descended into hell, set free those that were detained by death; so the servants, according to their power imitating the kindness of their Lord, loose men from their corporal bonds, when they have no power to relax the spiritual." Fasting was carried by many Christians to a much greater extent on this week than on any other, some eating nothing the whole week till the morning of the resurrection. Epiphanius says, that during this week the people lived chiefly on dry meats, namely, bread and salt and water, which they only used at evening.

HEBDOME (Gr. the seventh), a festival observed by the ancient Greeks in honour of Apollo, on the seventh day of every month, because one of them happened to be the birthday of the god. The festival was celebrated chiefly at Athens, when hymns were sung to Apollo, and the people walked in procession, carrying sprigs of laurel in their hands.

HEBE, the female attendant and cup-bearer of the gods, according to the ancient heathen mythology. She was the daughter of Zeus and Hera, and Homer in his Odyssey represents her as having been the wife of Heracles. She was worshipped at Athens under the name of Hebe, and at Rome under the corresponding Latin name of Juventas, both names signifying youth.

HEBON, a god anciently worshipped in Sicily in the shape of a bull. See BULL-WORSHIP.

HEBREWS, a name given to the descendants of Abraham according to the flesh. It was derived, as some think, from Heber or Eber, the father of Peleg, and the son of Salah, who was the grandson of Shem. Others, however, founding their idea on the meaning of the word Heber, which signifies one that passes, or a pilgrim, have derived the term Hebrews from the circumstance that Abraham and his family passed or journeyed from the other side of the Euphrates into Canaan. In reference to the name Hebrew, we may remark, that a peculiar expression occurs in Phil. iii. 5, where the apostle Paul speaks of himself as a "Hebrew of the Hebrews." In assuming such an appellation, the apostle probably meant to intimate that he was of pure unmixed Hebrew lineage, without the slightest admixture of Gentile blood. See JEWS (ANCIENT).

HECAERGE, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see).

HECAERGUS, a surname of APOLLO (which see). Servius speaks of a person of this name who was a priest of both Apollo and Artemis.

HECATÆA, apparitions mentioned in a strange story related by Eusebins. He gives an account of a magical statue of HECATE (which see) of a very extraordinary composition. It was said to be made by order of Hecate herself. They took myrrh, incense of Arabia, styrax, and certain animals called ascalabote, which some interpret to be lizards, others rats, and others moles; they reduced them all to powder, and made of them a paste which they moulded into the figure of Hecate. All those who exercised magic arts invoked this goddess. The ceremonies were performed at midnight by a river-side, under a tree called lotus, by a person in an azure-coloured garment, who was to dig a deep hole in the ground, and then cut the throat of an ewe-lamb, and burn it on a pile of wood over the hole, all the while pouring out honey and calling on Hecate. All being rightly done, certain apparitions called Hecatæa were seen which changed themselves into various shapes.

HECATE, an ancient heathen goddess, said to be the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. She is said to have been sent in search of Persephone, to whom, when she was found, she became the constant attendant and companion, thus becoming a goddess of the infernal regions. In her capacity as a ruler in Tartarus, she had charge of the souls of the departed. Sometimes she is represented as having three bodies, and at other times three heads, but always accompanied by Stygian dogs. The worship of Hecate prevailed in different parts of Greece, but more especially at Athens and Argos, where small statues in honour of this goddess were kept inside the houses, or in front of them, and also at points where two cross roads met.

HECATOMB (Gr. hecaton, an hundred, and bous, an ox), a sacrifice among the ancient Greeks, of a hundred oxen, offered only upon very extraordinary occasions. Herodotus mentions such a sacrifice as having been offered by Clisthenes. Instead of being limited to oxen, however, the word is sometimes applied to denote the sacrifice of a hundred animals of any sort. Others again regard it as occasionally used to denote simply a large sacrifice of any kind a definite being used for an indefinite number. Pythagoras is said to have offered a literal hecatomb in token of joy and gratitude, that he had discovered the demonstration of the forty-seventh proposition of the First Book of Euclid, viz., That in a right-angled triangle, the square of the hypotenuse is equal to the square of the other two sides. From the word hecatomb, was probably derived the name of the Greek month Hecatombæon, which commenced on the first new moon after the summer solstice, and thus corresponded to the latter part of June and the first part of July, according to our reckoning.

HECATOMBÆA. See HERÆA.

HECLA, a volcanic mountain in Iceland, which was believed by the natives in their Pagan state to be the mouth of the infernal regions.

HEGELIANS, the followers of one of the latest and most eminent philosophers of Germany. The philosophy of Hegel is strictly rationalistic in its character, religion with him being not a matter of emotion and sentiment, but strictly of reason and thought. He regarded thought as the point of union between the human nature and the divine. "With him," says Morell, "God is not a person, but personality itself, i. e. the universal personality, which realizes itself in every human consciousness as so many separate thoughts of one eternal mind. The idea we form of the Absolute, is to Hegel the Absolute itself, its essential existence being synonymous with our conception of it. Apart from, and out of the world, therefore, there is no God; and so also, apart from the universal consciousness of man there is no Divine consciousness or personality. God is with him the whole process of thought, combining in itself the objective movement, as seen in nature, with the subjective, as seen in logic, and fully realizing itself only in the universal spirit of humanity. With regard to other theological ideas, Hegel strove to deduce philosophically the main features of the evangelical doctrine. He explained the doctrine of the Trinity by showing that every movement of the thinking process is, in fact, a Trinity in Unity. Pure independent thought and self-existence answers to the Father—the objectifying of this pure existence answers to the Son, God manifested in the flesh; while the Spirit is that which proceedeth from the Father and the Son, the complete reunion of the two in the church. Hegel's Christology, again, agrees in the main ideas with the evangelical doctrine, except that his attempt to deduce the whole from philosophical principles gives to it a complete air of rationalism. He views the idea of redemption as the reunion of the individualized spirit of man with the Spirit of eternal truth and love. By faith we become one with God, forming a part of himself, members of his mystical body, as symbolized in the ordinances of the Church. This view of the Christian doctrines has been more fully developed by Strauss, who has entirely denied a historical truth to the New Testament, and made the whole simply a mythological representation of great moral and spiritual ideas. On the doctrine of immortality, Hegel has said but little, and that little by no means satisfactory. However the depth and comprehensiveness of his system may charm the mind that loves to rationalize upon every religious doctrine, it can, assuredly, give but little consolation to the heart, that is yearning with earnest longings after holiness and immortality."

In the view of Hegel, the absolute religion to which all the others are only preparatory stages is Christianity. In the God-Man is manifested the unity of man with God. In the mind of mankind God evolves himself, and thus it is that mankind's knowing of God is God's knowing of himself. The revelation of absolute knowledge is the very essence and design of Christianity, according to the system of Hegel, and hence he held in utter contempt all mere emotional religion. Thus, referring to the system of Schleiermacher, he declares, "If religion in man be founded on feeling only, this feeling can be correctly defined only as the feeling of dependence; and hence the dog would be the best Christian, for he has this feeling most strongly developed in himself, and lives chiefly in this feeling. The dog has even cravings for salvation when his hunger is appeased by a bone."

During his life, the doctrines of Hegel were ably supported by a few faithful and devoted followers, particularly by Daub, Heinrichs, and Marheinecke; but it was after his death in 1831 that a school of Hegelians assumed to itself a decided place in the literature of Germany. In the outset of their career as a philosophico-religious sect, the first and chief effort of this body of profound thinkers was to establish the accordance of the system which their master had bequeathed to them, with the doctrines of Christianity as laid down in the Bible. In connection with this main subject, the first point of controversy which arose referred to the question, whether immortality in the sense of a personal existence after death had ever been taught by Hegel. The disciples of the Hegelian school now split into two parties, the orthodox and the unorthodox party. The former included Gabler, Göschel, Rosenkranz, and Schaller. The latter was headed by Strauss, the celebrated author of Das Leben Jesu, the Life of Jesus, a work which, published in 1835, denied the historical existence of the God-man, and pushed to its farthest limits the idea of Hegel, that not Christ but mankind was the Son of God. In boldness of statement the disciple far outran the master. He attempted to prove that the Christ of the Gospels is historically impossible, and can only be understood as a myth. Professing as Strauss did to follow in the steps of Hegel, the 'Life of Jesus' no sooner appeared, than it called forth from all quarters of Germany the loudest denunciations, not only against its author personally, but against the whole Hegelian school to which he belonged. Strauss was followed by the Tübingen school, including Baur, Teller, and Schwegler, who laboured to show that all the books of the New Testament, with the exception of five, were the fabrications of the second century. Feuerbach went still farther, and exerted his utmost ingenuity to show that theology was only a reflection of anthropology, and all religion only a dream. Thus was the absolute idealism of Hegel pushed by his followers to the extreme of infidelity, and no-religion. But at this point matters reached their crisis, and as might have been expected, a decided reaction took place. The ablest theologians of Germany entered the field of conflict in defence of the revealed truth of God. Neander, Tholuck, Lücke, Hoffmann, and Ebrard, with a host of others, replied to Strauss and the Tübingen school so effectively, that the whole religious aspect of Germany has within the last fifteen or twenty years undergone a complete revulsion in favour of evangelical Christianity.

HEGIRA (Arab. flight), the grand era from which all Moslem time is reckoned. It dates from the 16th July A. D. 622, being the precise period at which the prophet Mohammed fled with his followers from Mecca to Medina, that he might escape the persecution of the Koreischites. On account of rivalries in commerce, the inhabitants of Medina were jealous of those of Mecca, and no sooner therefore did the prophet arrive in their city, than they professed themselves his followers, and Mohammed seizing the opportunity declared his mission, and took up his residence in the town. This was in the fourteenth year after he had proclaimed himself a prophet, during the reign of Heraclius in Constantinople, and Khosron Parvis in Persia. The Medinese were delighted to receive the prophet, and forthwith changed the name of their city from Yatreb to Medinet-al-Nabi, which signifies the city of the prophet.

convent, the abbot or archimandrite of a monastery in connection with the Greek church.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, a "Form of Instruction," as it was originally called, drawn up by Caspar Olevianus and Zechariah Ursinus in 1562, for the use in the first instance of the Reformed Church of the Palatinate, but afterwards received throughout nearly the whole of the Reformed Churches. This excellent catechism, which was also called the Palatine Catechism, was the model on which the Westminster Divines formed the Shorter Catechism of the Presbyterian churches in Britain. In later times the Heidelberg Catechism was translated into almost all the modern languages, and many commentaries were written upon it. It is divided into 129 questions, and it consists of three principal parts: 1. Concerning the misery of man in consequence of sin; 2. Concerning the redemption from that state; and 3. Concerning man's gratitude for that redemption. The Heidelberg Catechism is a recognized symbolic standard by the Dutch Reformed Church both in Holland and America.

HEIDELBERG CONFESSION, a confession drawn up by Bullinger, and published by order of the Elector Palatine A. D. 1564. It appeared at first in Latin, and afterwards a German translation was prepared by the author himself. Though designed originally for the use of the Reformed Churches in the Palatinate, it came to be generally recognized by the Calvinian churches both in Germany and France.

HEIDRUN, a she-goat, which in the ancient Scandinavian mythology is said to stand above Valhalla, or the heaven of heroes, and to feed on the leaves of a very famous tree called Lærath. From the teats of this she-goat flows mead in such abundance, that every day a vessel large enough to hold more than would suffice for all the heroes, is filled with it.

HEIFER, a young cow anciently sacrificed by the Jews in the temple of Jerusalem. It is called in Num. xix. 2, by a term which in the original signifies "the red heifer." Special and minute directions were given in the Law of Moses in reference to the sacrifice of this animal. A heifer wholly red was to be selected, without one single spot of any other colour, "free from blemish, and on which the yoke had never yet come." This animal was to be brought to the priest, who was to slay her without the camp. Having slain the heifer, he was to dip his finger in the blood, and to sprinkle it seven times before the tabernacle; after which he was to burn the carcase, and taking cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wood, to cast them into the flames. The ashes were then to be gathered up, (see ASHES), and laid in a clean place for the use of the congregation, by the sprinkling of which ashes in water, it became a water of separation. This peculiar ceremony is supposed by some to have been intended as a reproof to the superstitions of idolatrous nations. But such a view of the matter can scarcely be maintained, when we consider that cows never were sacrificed by the Egyptians, being considered as sacred to Isis. In connection with the red colour of the heifer, Sir William Ouseley has shown, that almost all over the East, idols were painted or smeared with red. It has been supposed that a red heifer was sacrificed every year by the Jews, and its ashes distributed over all the towns and cities of Israel. Maimonides, however, denies this, and states, "Nine red heifers have been sacrificed between the delivering of this precept and the desolation of the second temple. Our master Moses sacrificed the first; Ezra offered up the second; and seven more were slain during the period which elapsed from the time of Ezra to the destruction of the second temple; the tenth, King Messiah himself shall sacrifice; by his speedy manifestation he shall cause great joy. Amen: May he come quickly." See IDOLATRY.

HEIMDALL, the porter or sentinel of the gods among the old Scandinavians. His province was to watch at one of the extremities of the bridge BI-FROST (which see), for fear the giants should make use of it to get into heaven. "It was a difficult matter," says Mallet, "to surprise him; for the gods had given him the faculty of sleeping more lightly than a bird, and of discovering objects by day or night farther than the distance of a hundred leagues. He had also an ear so fine that he could hear the very grass grow in the meadows and the wool on the backs of the sheep. He carried in the one hand a sword, and in the other a trumpet, the sound of which could be heard through all the worlds." The Prose Edda thus describes him: "One of them (the deities) is Heimdall, called also the White God. He is the son of nine virgins, who were sisters, and is a very sacred and powerful deity. He also bears the appellation of the Gold-toothed, on account of his teeth being of pure gold, and also that of Hallinski-thi. His horse is called Gulltopp, and he dwells in Himinbjörg at the end of Bifrost. He is the warder of the gods, and is therefore placed on the borders of heaven, to prevent the giants from forcing their way over the bridge. He requires less sleep than a bird, and sees by night, as well as by day, a hundred miles around him. So acute is his ear that no sound escapes him, for he can even hear the grass growing on the earth, and the wool on a sheep's back. He has a horn called the Gjallon horn, which is heard throughout the universe." In the confusion of the last times, Loki and Heimdall fight and mutually kill each other.

HEL, a term which in the Scandinavian mythology is synonymous with the hell or hades—the lower regions of other creeds, with the important exception, however, that it does not imply either a place or a state of punishment.

HELA, the goddess of Death among the ancient Scandinavians. She was said to have been banished into the lower regions, where she has the government of nine worlds, into which she distributes those who are sent to her. Eating and drinking appear to have been observed in the hall of Hela, much in the same manner as in that of Odin. In the Alvis-mal, mention is made of a kind of corn which grows in the infernal regions, and it is stated that the inhabitants are regaled plentifully with supplies of mead. The regions over which Hela ruled were reserved for those that died of disease or old age. Her palace was Anguish; her table Famine; her waiters were Slowness and Delay; the threshold of her door was Precipice; her bed Care; she was livid and ghastly pale; and her looks inspired horror. Hela, who thus ruled over nine worlds in Nifheim, was the daughter of Loki, the contriver of all mischief, and the disgrace of gods and men.

HELENA, the daughter of Zeus and Leda, and being possessed of remarkable beauty, she was said to have been carried off by Thesens to Attica. She was delivered by the Dioscuri, who conveyed her to Sparta, where amid numerous suitors she became the wife of Menelaus. Afterwards she was seduced and carried off by Paris to Troy, thus giving rise to the Trojan war.

HELENA'S (St.) DAY, a festival in the Romish church, celebrated on the 18th of August in honour of the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great. This female saint is said to have discovered the wood of the true cross at Jerusalem, some two hundred and fifty years after the total destruction of that city by the Romans.

HELICONIDES, a name given to the Muses of ancient Greece, from Mount Helicon, where there was a sanctuary dedicated to their worship.

HELOGABALUS, an ancient Syrian deity, alleged by Dio and Herodian to be the Sun, the name being said to be derived from the Greek word helios, the sun. The symbol of this god was a large stone or rock, rising up in the form of a mountain; and at Rome he was worshipped under the form of a pyramidal stone. The Roman Emperor Elagabalus was in his early days a priest of this Syro-Phoenician Sun-god; and even after he had ascended the throne of the Cæsars, he demanded that his favourite god should take the precedence of all the gods of Rome, and even of Jupiter himself.

HELIOS, the Sun or the Sun-god of ancient Greece, the son of Hyperion and Theia. He is represented as riding in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds round the world. He is often confounded with Apollo, who is sometimes represented with rays round his head. Wherever Helios was worshipped, sacred flocks of oxen are mentioned in connection with this god, and in Sicily in particular, which was anciently sacred to him, he is said to have had large flocks of sheep and oxen. Temples to the worship of Helios appear to have existed in Greece at a very early period, and in later times in a great variety of different parts of Greece, more especially in the island of Rhodes, where the celebrated Colossus was an image of Helios or the Sun. The animals offered in sacrifice to this god were white, and especially white horses were used for this purpose. Of the animals, the cock was considered as particularly sacred to Helios. The worship of the Sun was practised also among the ancient Romans, not however under the name of Helios, which was peculiar to Greece, but under that of SOL (which see).

HELL. Both in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures there are two words, Sheol and Hades, which are sometimes translated "hell," but which denote the world of departed spirits in general; while there are other two words similarly translated—Tartaros and Gehenna—which signify the place of eternal punishment reserved for the wicked after death. The existence of a hell as well as of a heaven, of a place of everlasting misery as well as of a place of everlasting happiness, forms an essential part of every religious creed. The Amenti of the ancient Egyptians, the Patala of the Hindus, and the Orcus of the Romans, refer to a future state; but the doctrine of a future punishment is found embodied in all religious systems, whether Christian, Heathen, Jewish, or Mohammedan.

The Christian Scriptures describe hell as a place of torment, the bottomless pit, the worm that never dies, the fire that never shall be quenched. The eternity of hell's torments is placed on precisely the same footing as the eternity of heaven's bliss. Thus, "The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." Some have ventured to deny the eternal duration of the punishment of the wicked, but the same word which is used in the Bible to express the duration of the misery of the wicked, is employed also to express the duration of the happiness of the righteous; and we have no reason to believe that the inspired writers would use the same word to express ideas essentially different from one another. The Jewish Rabbis, as we have seen in the article HEAVEN, believe in an upper and a lower heaven, and in the same way they believe that there is an upper and a lower hell. Some of them suppose that hell was created before the world, while others assign its formation to the second day of creation, and thus they account for no declaration being made concerning the work of that day that it was good. The usual appellation which the Rabbis give to hell is Gehennom, to which the Talmud adds seven other names, said to be applied to seven mansions into which hell is divided. It is further alleged, that "in hell there are seven dwellings or divisions; and in each division six thousand houses and in each house, six thousand chests; and in each chest six thousand barrels of gall." A high rabbinical authority affirms each of the divisions of hell to be as far in depth as one can walk in three hundred years. The whole extent is thus described in the Talmud: "Egypt is four hundred miles in length, and the same in breadth. Egypt is equal in extent to a sixth part of Ethiopia; Ethiopia to a sixth part of the world; the world to a sixth part of the garden in Eden; the garden to a sixth part of Eden; Eden to a sixth part of hell. The whole world, therefore, in respect of hell is but as the cover of a caldron; and the extent of hell is inadequately expressed even by this comparison."

A Rabbinical writer, quoted by Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism,' says of the first division: "In it there are many caverns, and in them are fiery lions: and when a man falls into one of those caverns, the lions devour him: and when he is consumed, he appears again, as perfect as if he had not been touched by the fire: and they who are thus restored, are afterwards thrown into the fire of every cavern in the first division.—In it are ten of the seventy nations: and among them is Absalom.—An angel beats every one with a fiery whip,—and they are thrown in and consumed with fire. Then are brought forth others, whom he likewise beats; and they are thrown into the fire. And thus are all of them served, till all have had their doom. Last of all, Absalom is brought forth, in order to his receiving the same punishment. But then is heard a voice from heaven, saying, Beat him not, neither burn him; because he is one of the sons of my beloved, who said at mount Sinai, All that the Lord hath said, we will do. This process of beating and burning is said to be repeated seven times in the day, and three times in the night; but Absalom is declared to be exempted from it all. The same writer proceeds to describe each of the six other infernal mansions as containing ten of the seventy nations who undergo the same punishments, and one or more wicked Israelites who enjoy the same exemption as Absalom. Such is the manner in which rabbinical justice dispenses vengeance to the Gentiles, and impunity to wicked Israelites. The Talmud declares, that the fire of hell has no power over the sinners among the Israelites. Another oracle says: Hereafter both the Israelites and the people of the world shall go down to hell: and the people of the world shall be consumed and destroyed; but the Israelites shall come out again unhurt."

Many of the Jews believe in hell, not as an eternal dwelling-place of the wicked, but, to the Israelites at least, as a place of temporary purgatorial punishment; and the Rabbis teach that the prayers of a son are of powerful efficacy in delivering his father's soul from hell. The repetition of the KODESH (which see), also, a certain prayer in the daily morning service, is powerful in accomplishing the same end. Very wicked people are believed by some Rabbis to be annihilated. The torments of hell, whether they be temporary or eternal in the view of Jewish writers, are at all events alleged to have seasons of intermission. Thus Menasseh says, "Even the wicked, of whom it is said that they descend into hell, and ascend not from thence, enjoy rest on the Sabbath. The Sabbath is therefore called 'a delight,' because thereon those above and below are both delighted. Another writer says: the Sabbath is to the wicked in hell a day of rest.—But for this they receive a double punishment on the sixth day. Another says, that they have every day, at each time of prayer, morning, evening, and night, an hour and half of rest. Wherefore they rest, in the whole, every day, four hours and half.—They likewise rest twenty-four hours, every Sabbath; which, added to the other, make fifty-one hours of rest in the week.'

According to the teaching of various Rabbis there are three kinds of punishment in hell—heat, cold, and the perturbation of the soul. The heat they suppose to be occasioned by a violent fire, which, in the opinion of some, "is not properly a body that can receive its sustenance from wood and other combustible matter reducible to ashes, but God maintains and feeds it, and keeps it shut up in a place; as he has placed millions of angels in heaven." The punishment is said by some to be increased by changing its character, the unhappy victim being plunged at one time in scorching flames, and at another in freezing cold. To these material torments are also added the anxieties and devouring anguish of a guilty conscience.

The Mohammedans, like the Jews, divide hell, which they term Gehennom, into seven portions, but they are not agreed as to the inhabitants of its several districts. The most common opinion in regard to them is, that the first division, Gehennom, properly so called, is destined for those worshippers of the true God who have not acted up to the principles of the faith which they professed; the second division, called Lodha, is for the Christians; the third, named Hothama, is for Jews; the fourth, denominated Säiv, is destined for the Sabeans; the fifth, called Sacar, is for the Magians or Guehres; the sixth named Gehim, will receive Pagans and idolaters, while the seventh, the severest place of punishment in the lowest depths of the abyss, is named Hooviat, and reserved for the hypocritical professors of religion. A guard of nineteen angels keep watch over each of these apartments. Instead of the seven divisions, one Mohammedan commentator says, that hell has seven gates, by which he allegorically intimates seven sins: 1. Avarice; 2. Gluttony; 3. Hatred; 4. Envy; 5. Anger; 6. Luxury; and 7. Pride. Another says that these gates are seven members by which men commit sin.

The Mohammedans believe that the punishment of those in the district of Gehennom will not be eternal, but that after their crimes are expiated by purgatorial flames, they will be admitted into paradise. Between heaven and hell they believe there is an intermediate place called ARAF (which see).

The Hindus believe in a graduated scale of future punishments as well as rewards; the less wicked being sunk into a lower position in the next birth—the more wicked being sent down to one or other of innumerable hells, to reappear, however, on earth, in mineral, animal, and vegetable forms before they rise to the human,—the most wicked of all being doomed to experience the misery and woe of perdition till the time of the dissolution of all things.

According to the system of the Budhists there are eight principal narakas, or places of torment, all of them situated in the interior of the earth, and so enclosed that there is no possibility of escape from it. The following description of the Budhist hell is given by Mr. Spence Hardy in his 'Manual of Budhism :'
 "Under the great Bó-tree, at the depth of 100 yojanas, is the roof of Awíchi, the flames from which burst forth beyond the walls, and rise to the height of 100 yojanas. There are 16 narakas called Osupat, exterior to Awíchi, four on each side. The distance from the centre of Awíchi to the outermost part of the Osupat narakas is 19,400 gows, and at this part they verge upon the great sea. By the power of the beings who suffer in Awíchi, the doors of the Osupat narakas are continually opening and shutting. The flames proceeding through the doors, when they are thus thrown open, burst upon the waters of the sea, to the distance of many yojanas, and thus cause a vacuum. Towards this vacuum the water of the sea is continually drawn, in a powerful manner, and with great noise and tumult, so that any ship coming near would be undoubtedly destroyed. This naraka is called Awíchi, from a, negative, and wíchi, refuge, because it affords no way of escape; it allows of no intermission to its misery.

"There is also the hell called Lókántarika, which is the intervening space between every three sakwalas. In this world, there is above neither sun, moon, nor light; and below there is water, extremely cold. The darkness is incessant, except in the time of a supreme Budha, when occasionally the rays proceeding from his person, and filling the whole of the 10,000 sakwalas, are seen; but this appearance is only for a moment, like the lightning, no sooner seen than gone.

"The inhabitants of Sanjíwa live 500 years, each year being the same length as a year in Cháturmarájika, so that their age is 160,000 kelas of the years of men. In Kálasútra the age is 1,296,000 kelas of years. In Sanghata it is one prakóti and 368,000 kelas. In Rowrawa, it is eight *prakóti*s and 2,944,000 kelas. In Maha Rowrawa, it is sixty-four *prakóti*s and 3,568,000 kelas. In Tápa, it is 530 *prakóti*s and 8,416,000 kelas. In Awíchi it is an entire anta-kalpa."

The hell or infernal regions of the ancient heathens was a mighty kingdom over which Pluto reigned, and within its vast domains included the whole subterranean world. Four rivers, Acheron, Styx, Cocytus, and Phlegethon, must be passed by the dead before they found an entrance to the gloomy realms of the shades below. According to the description of Virgil the regions of this kingdom were five in number. The first or preparatory region was the abode of all kinds of diseases, distresses, discord, and war, and next to these centaurs, harpies, giants, and fabulous monsters of every description. The second region was that of the waters through which flowed the Styx. The third was Erebus, in which Virgil places infants, persons condemned to death without cause, suicides, and those who had fallen in war. This region was watched by Cerberus, the three-headed dog; and here was erected the judgment-seat of Minos, who assigned to each one of the shades its special residence. The fourth region was called Tartarus, where dwelt those who had been guilty of great crimes. The fifth region was Elysium, the abode of the blessed.

In the Scandinavian mythology the wicked first pass to Hel, which seems simply to denote the abode of the dead, and thence to Helheim or Nifheim, which is represented as being the dwelling-place of HELA (which see), in the ninth world. This, like Val halla, was not an eternal but a temporary place of residence, and in a remote futurity the inhabitants of both regions will be consigned by Alfadir, either to Gimli or to Nastrond, both of which will be eternal.

HELLENISTS, a name applied to the Grecian Jews who lived in Egypt and other countries where the Greek language was spoken, thus being distinguished from the Hebrews, properly so-called, who used the Hebrew tongue. It was in the time of Alexander the Great that the Jews began to divide themselves into Hebrews and Hellenists. They became acquainted at this era with the language, literature, and philosophy of the Greeks. The Greek translation of the Seventy was accomplished at this time, and synagogues were rapidly multiplied in all parts of the world. Thus, in a most remarkable manner, was preparation made for the diffusion of that blessed Gospel which should come from the Jews. No less important was the change which now took place upon the character and habits of the Jews themselves. Their literature had even from the remotest periods of their history been of a peculiar and almost exclusive nature. By the influence, however, of the language and literature of Greece, which at this period began to be largely felt, the foundation was laid of a new epoch in Jewish literature, which received the name of Hellenistic. Thus arose the Alexandrian school of philosophy, which, by combining Grecian with the Oriental modes of thinking, led to the diversified forms of Gnosticism which formed so characteristic a feature in the aspect of Christianity during the first two centuries after the Christian era.

HELLOTIA, a festival celebrated at Corinth in honour of Athena, and also in Crete in honour of Europa.

HELLOTIS, a surname of Athena at Corinth, supposed to be derived from Hellotia, a daughter of Timander, who, having taken refuge in the temple of Athena, when Corinth was burnt down by the Dorians, was destroyed, along with her sister, in the temple. A short time after this disaster, the plague broke out at Corinth, and it was declared by the oracle that the pestilence should not cease until a temple was erected in honour of Athena Hellotis. The term Hellotis was also used as a surname of Europa in Crete.

HELMSTADIAN CONTROVERSY, a name given to the controversy raised by Calixtus in the seventeenth century, from Helmstadt, the place where it originated. See CALIXTINS.

HELVETIC REFORMED CHURCHES. Christianity was first introduced into Helvetia or Switzerland, in the seventh century, by St. Gall, a native of Ireland. This pious monk was educated at Bangor near Belfast, under Columbanus, and was one of twelve Irish monks who left Ireland about A. D. 589, with the view of diffusing a knowledge of Christian truth on the continent of Europe. For twenty years these zealous Irish missionaries laboured in Burgundy, and at the end of that period, through the opposition of the Pagans in that district, Columbanus was driven into exile, accompanied by St. Gall. Ascending the Rhine, they entered Switzerland about A. D. 610, and took up their residence at the head of the lake of Zurich. Here the natives were wholly under the influence of Pagan idolatry, and St. Gall, burning with zeal, set fire to the Pagan temple of the district, casting the idols into the lake. This, as might have been anticipated, instead of gaining over the people to the side of Christianity, only roused their indignation against the missionaries, and the result was, that St. Gall and his companions were compelled to seek refuge in flight. Passing through the canton of St. Gall, they formed a settlement at Bregentz, at the eastern extremity of the lake of Constance. Taught by past experience that the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God, the monks conducted their mission here with zeal, tempered with prudence, and, accordingly, they met with some measure of success. At the end of two years, however, through the influence of the Pagan part of the population, they were banished from this place also. Columbanus and his companions, discouraged by the treatment they had experienced in Switzerland, quitted the country, and retired to Italy, leaving St. Gall behind so sick as to be unable to be removed. On recovering from his illness, he repaired with a few adherents to a sequestered spot, where he erected the monastery of St. Gall in the canton of the same name. Here he spent the rest of his days in works of piety and devotion, while from his monastery the light of Christianity was diffused over the surrounding country. St. Gall lived to a very advanced age, and died at Arbon A. D. 640.

After the death of Gallus or St. Gall, several of his scholars continued to labour for the conversion of the Swiss, founding monasteries, and sending forth missionaries to impart to the people a knowledge of Divine truth. Several monks also in succession came from Ireland, through whose exertions a Helvetician church was formed, strictly Romish in its character, and yielding implicit submission to the Papal power. Paganism gradually lost its hold of the country, and Christianity, in the form of Romanism, was substituted in its place.
