The highest state of felicity to which the Bhagavat-Gita points, is an eternal absorption in Brahm (See ABSORPTION), such a state that when the man dies he will never be born again into any form on earth. There is a class of men among the Hindus who devote themselves wholly to preparation for this absorption. These are the YOGIS (which see), who sit sunk in meditation, with their eyes fixed upon the point of their nose. See BRAHM—HINDUISM.

BHAIRAV (the Lord of Terror), one of the incarnations of Shiva, the third person in the Hindt triad.

BHAIRAVA, a festival celebrated among the Hindus in honour of Bhairav, when, according to promise, his votaries suspend themselves in the air by hooks passed through the muscles of the back, and allow themselves to be thus whirled in his honour round a circle of fifty or sixty feet in circumference. See DURGA PUJAH.

BHAVANI, the mother of the Hindu Triad. Various accounts are given of her origin, but the most commonly received version is, that Bhavani, transported with joy at the thought of having existence, expressed her delight in skips and leaps, and while thus cheerfully engaged, three eggs fell from her bosom, from which issued the three Dejotas: the Trimurti or Hindu trinity.

BHAWANA, the exercise of meditation enjoined upon the Buddhist priests. At the close of the day, or at the dawn, they must seek a place where they will be free from interruption, and with the body in a suitable posture, they must meditate on the glory of the Budhas, the excellence of the bana or sacred books, and the virtues of the priesthood.

BHUTA, the general name by which malevolent or destructive spirits among the Hindus are distinguished. The word also signifies element, and hence they may be supposed to have been worshipped as lords of the elements. The worship of these spirits is the only form of religion known in many parts of India, and by some writers it is regarded as the most ancient religion of that country long before the composition of the Vedas. The victims usually offered to the Bhûta are buffaloes, hogs, rams, and cocks. If rice is offered, it must be tinged with blood; and if flowers, they can only be red or blood-like. Intoxicating drinks are also used in this demon-worship. This species of idolatry is found chiefly in desert solitary places, and in the wild recesses of mountains. M. Dubois, speaking of the inhabitants of that long chain of mountains which extend on the west of the Mysore, says, that "the greater part of the inhabitants practise no other worship than that of the devil. Every house and each family has its own particular Bhûta, who stands for its tutelary god; and to whom daily prayers and propitiatory sacrifices are offered, not only to incline him to withhold his own machinations, but to defend them from the evils which the Bhûtas of their neighbours or enemies might inflict. In those parts the image of the demon is everywhere seen, represented in a hideous form, and often by a shapeless stone."

BHIKSHU, or MENDICANTS, one of the four orders of BANDAYA (which see), or priests in Nepal.

BIBLE (Gr. Biblos, the Book), the name usually applied to the Sacred Books of the Christians. They are also called the Scriptures or Writings, the Holy Scriptures, the Old and New Testaments, the last designation denoting that they are the Testament or solemn declaration of the will of God to man.

The Books of the Bible are called Canonical Books, because they are in the catalogue of those books which are looked upon as sacred, to which the name of Canon is ascribed. In this sense they are opposed to such books as are called Apocryphal, which are either not acknowledged as inspired books, or are rejected as spurious and uninspired.

The Bible consists of two separate and distinct portions, the Old Testament or Hebrew Scriptures, and the New Testament or Greek Scriptures. The earlier books of the Old Testament are universally admitted to be of higher antiquity than any other authentic writings which have come down to us. Even Herodotus, the father of Grecian history, lived long after the time of Moses; and Homer, the most ancient of Grecian poets, can lay no claim to a remoteness of antiquity equal to that of the author of the Pentateuch. No doubt Oriental writings have sometimes asserted for themselves an existence long prior to the writings of the Hebrew lawgiver; but such exaggerated statements have long since been set aside as utterly unfounded. The first canonical collection of the Sacred Writings consisted of the Pentateuch or Five Books of Moses. We have the clearest and the most irrefragable evidence that the greatest care was taken by the Hebrews to preserve this sacred deposit. Thus we are informed in Deut. xxxi. 26, that Moses commanded the Levites to take this book of the Law, and to put it in, or rather by, the side of the ark of the covenant. The two tables of the ten commandments were laid up within the ark; but the Book of the Law is supposed to have been placed in a small coffer, which formed an appendage to it. Be this as it may, one thing is certain, that the Book of the Law invariably went along with the ark of the covenant, which the Hebrews prized as their most precious treasure, over which they watched with the most scrupulous anxiety. In this situation the autograph, or original manuscript of the Pentateuch, and the other Sacred Writings, as from time to time they appeared, were preserved down to the building of the temple in the days of Solomon. Previous to that period the ark of the covenant, with its accompanying valuable manuscripts, though kept with unremitting care, had been without a fixed and permanent place of deposit. Now, however, that a large, solid building was erected, which was wholly dedicated to sacred purposes, an opportunity was afforded of assigning to the Sacred Canon a sure resting place. The ark of the covenant, accordingly, as we learn from 1 Kings viii. 6, was deposited in the most holy place, under the wings of the cherubim; and in all probability it was accompanied thither also by the inspired writings, though some allege that they were lodged thenceforth in the treasury.

But while the original manuscripts of the Hebrew Scriptures were thus kept in safe deposit in the temple, transcripts of them appear to have been made for the use of the people. Thus we find in 2 Chron. xvii. 9, a body of Levites and priests sent out by Jehoshaphat, each with a copy of the Sacred Writings in his hands, to go through the cities of Judah and instruct the people. Besides, every seventh year the law was enjoined to be read in public, a practice which would tend to secure the preservation of the Sacred Writings, while the various copies which were made would tend to diffuse the knowledge of them. It would appear, however, that, during the reign of one or other of the wicked kings of Judah, the Book of the Law had, from whatever cause, been removed from its proper place in the temple, and concealed in some obscure corner of the building until it was unexpectedly discovered in the reign of good King Josiah. "Hilkiah, the priest," it is said, "found a Book of the Law of the Lord given by Moses;" in all probability the autograph of the Hebrew lawgiver himself. Soon after the Babylonish captivity ensued, when the original manuscripts of the Sacred Writings appear to have been lost, but not before authentic copies were in the hands of many Hebrews.

The rebuilding of the temple, on the return of the Jews from Babylon to their own land, formed an important era in the history of the Old Testament Scriptures. Up to this time no collection had been made of the separate books into one volume, but the generally received idea among the Jews is, that Ezra, the great reformer of the Jewish church, was the first, aided perhaps by Nehemiah, who collected, revised, and arranged the whole in the form in which they now exist. The Jews, accordingly, regard Ezra as another Moses, the second founder of the Law, and the saying is current among their writers, that "if the Law had not been given by Moses, Ezra was worthy by whom it should have been declared." This inspired arranger of the Old Testament is said to have made also some other improvements. The Hebrew language had fallen into comparative disuse among the Jews during their seventy years' residence in Babylon; and some have affirmed that Ezra first inserted the vowel points in the ordinary copies of the Scriptures, with the view of preventing the knowledge of the peculiar structure and pronunciation of the Hebrew language from being lost or corrupted. It is said that he introduced the use of the Chaldee letters instead of the ancient Samaritan, which had been in use before the captivity. The great benefit, however, which Ezra conferred upon his Jewish countrymen, was the classification and arrangement of the sacred books. He divided them, it is supposed, into three great sections, the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa or Holy Writings. The Law contained only the Pentateuch or first five books of Moses, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The Prophets comprehended the principal historical books, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, called the former prophets, and the strictly prophetic books called the latter prophets, besides being distinguished into the greater, namely, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, reckoned as three, and the twelve minor prophets reckoned as one. The Hagiographa included all the remaining books, that is, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah. This threefold division of the Sacred Books of the Old Testament is mentioned by our blessed Lord, and also by Josephus the Jewish historian. The Hebrew Scriptures were anciently divided into sections or lessons, of which there were fifty-four in the law of Moses. The division into chapters is comparatively of recent date; but the division into verses is of ancient origin, probably soon after, if not during the time of Ezra.

The Jews watched with the most intense and even scrupulous anxiety over the Old Testament Scriptures, lest they might be corrupted or changed even in the smallest degree. They noted at the end of each book the exact number of verses and sections which it contained. It was even calculated how often each letter of the alphabet occurs throughout the Hebrew Bible. The very position and size of all the letters in which any peculiarity was observable were carefully recorded. Any variations of readings, or even the inversion of a single letter, did not pass unnoticed. The middle verse and letter in the several books, the most trifling and seemingly unimportant peculiarity which could be found, was eagerly fixed upon as an additional means of securing the most minute accuracy in the Sacred Writings. The Jews, indeed, held their Sacred Books in the highest veneration, counting it a very heinous sin either to add to, or take away, even a single letter from them. Hence, although there are slight variations in the readings of different copies of the Old Testament, these are evidently unintentional errors of transcribers, and in no case do they affect a vital doctrine.

The books of the New Testament are usually arranged into three classes, the Historical Books, consisting of the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles; the Doctrinal Books, including the fourteen Epistles of Paul and the seven Catholic Epistles, so called because they were chiefly addressed to the converted Jews scattered throughout the Roman empire; and the Prophetical Books, of which there is only one, the Revelation of St. John. The order in which the books are now placed is the most ancient, being that adopted by Eusebius in the early part of the fourth century, and probably by Ignatius, who lived at the close of the first and during the former half of the second century. In proof of the authenticity of the evangelical records, Dr. Paley, in his 'Evidences of Christianity,' has appealed to no fewer than seven testimonies of credible witnesses, stretching from the cotemporaries and friends of the apostles, onward through the three first centuries after the Christian era. It is quite sufficient, however, to appeal to six of the most prominent, the first three being the most remarkable of the apostolic Fathers, Clement, Polycarp, and Papias, while the other three lived in an age immediately subsequent to that of the apostles, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, and Origen.

Not only, however, have we the testimony of credible witnesses to the authenticity of the New Testament records, but there is good reason for believing, that the original manuscripts of the gospel history were in existence long after the time of the writers of them, and thus the correctness of every transcript might be effectually tried and ascertained. They were also translated into various languages, and numerous copies of both the originals and the translations were dispersed over the whole civilized world. A number of the early transcripts are still preserved, and it is pleasing to find an entire agreement between these and the copies of the gospel history which are in ordinary circulation. But, besides, no record on earth has been to such an extent the subject of discussion as that which is to be found in the New Testament, and none, therefore, has been so much the subject of minute, jealous, and watchful attention, both on the part of friends and foes. The incessant contentions between Christians and unbelievers, as well as between opposing sects of Christians themselves, each of them appealing to the language of Scripture in support of their opinions, rendered it next to impossible to effect any, even the slightest alteration, without its instant detection and exposure.

But even admitting the perfect authenticity and integrity of the New Testament records, on what grounds are we to establish the credibility of the statements which these authentic writings contain? On this point the strongest and most effective appeal must be made to the direct evidences of miracles and prophecy. "In what way," asks Paley, "can a revelation be made but by miracles?" "In none," he answers, "which we can possibly conceive." But it must ever be borne in mind, that the proof derived from miracles goes to establish, in the first instance, not the truth of any statements whatever, but simply the Divine authority of Him by whom the miracles are wrought; and from the Divine authority of Christ, we pass, by an almost immediate transition, to the truth of Christianity. Had no miracles been performed by our blessed Lord, we would have had no proper evidence that He came from God, nor could the Christian scheme have asserted any valid claim to a Divine origin. To the gospel, however, no such objection can be offered. Miracles are alleged to have been wrought water was changed into wine; the blind received their sight; the dumb spoke; the deaf heard; the lame walked; and the dead were restored to life. And the principle on which Christ performed these miracles is obvious from his own declaration, "The works that I do in my Father's name they bear witness of me." The distinction is palpable to the most uncultivated mind between those events which are truly miraculous, and that class which embraces even the most surprising of the ordinary phenomena of nature, or the most wonderful discoveries of science; and hence the peculiar value of miracles as evidences and proofs of a system which addresses itself to the illiterate as well as to the learned.

In regard to the argument in favour of the New Testament narratives drawn from the evidence of prophecy, it has been often remarked, as one of its peculiar advantages, that, being gradual and progressive in its fulfilment, the force of this argument is every day becoming stronger and more convincing. The evidence of prophecy, and that of miracles, are to some extent identical; the one being merely a miracle of knowledge, while the other is a miracle of power. Various predictions are to be found in the New as well as in the Old Testament. The clearest and the most important are those which refer to the character, condition, and work of the promised Messiah, and those which relate to the subsequent fortunes of the Christian Church and of the Jewish nation.

In addition to the evidence in behalf of the credibility of the records contained in the New Testament, drawn from miracles and from prophecy, we may advert to another argument deduced from the rapid propagation of the Christian religion in the early ages, in spite of the numerous obstacles which it was destined to encounter. That the extent of its diffusion even in the days of the apostles was remarkable, is plain from the statement of Paul, that from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum, he himself had not failed to declare the unsearchable riches of Christ. At Jerusalem and Antioch, at Ephesus, Athens, Corinth, Thessalonica, and even in imperial Rome, the mistress of the world, churches had been planted, and the truths of Christianity were openly promulgated. The remarkable success, however, of the first promulgators of Christianity rests not solely on their own statements, but is fully attested by contemporary writers. Had it been possible to account for the fact by a reference to mere secondary causes, the acuteness and genius of Gibbon would surely have been able to accomplish the task. It is unnecessary to say, however, that even he has failed, and all that cold sneering infidelity could effect has utterly failed. The circumstances of the case are sufficient to show, that on any other supposition than that of its truth the success of the gospel is wholly unaccountable. In what was probably the most illustrious period of Roman literature, some individuals of high reputation for learning and character adopted the tenets of Christianity, and openly professed their belief in them—and that too without the slightest hope of deriving any worldly advantage—nay, even under the certain impression that they would thereby expose themselves to the ridicule, persecution, and reproach of their fellow countrymen.

And if such was the conduct of enlightened men in regard to what was strictly a question of facts, on which every individual around them was capable of deciding, and, therefore, might have disproved them if it had been possible to do so, to what other conclusion can we possibly come than that the gospel is true? By the pure force of truth alone it overcame the deadliest opposition, and trampling down every obstacle, it made its way to the gates of the palace, and even mounted the imperial throne of the mighty Cæsars.

Another series of proofs of the credibility of the New Testament may be drawn from a careful inspection of the book itself. This is what is called usually the internal evidence. Under this head might be noticed the beautiful adaptation of the truth, whether doctrinal or preceptive, to the nature and condition of man, and its accordance with our highest and most refined notions of moral excellence, as well as the holy and purifying influence of the gospel upon the minds and hearts of those who have embraced it. The influence of Christianity, however, is not merely discernible in the life and conversation of an individual, but it is also strikingly apparent in the beneficial effect which it has exercised over large communities of men. Imperfectly though the motives and principles of Christianity have as yet been brought to bear upon the world generally, it has nevertheless produced a decided improvement in the moral and political condition of those countries which have hitherto received it. Their laws, their institutions, their manners, have alike experienced the ameliorating effects of the gospel of Christ; and though the process of reformation in these points may have been tardy, it has still been sufficiently marked to render it an argument of considerable weight in favour of the truth and divine authority of the Christian system.

While the Bible is divided into two great portions, the Old and the New Testaments, these together form one beautifully connected and consistent system of Divine truth. The books of which the entire volume consists, have been written by many different authors, and at a great variety of different dates, stretching through an immense period in the world's history, and yet the theological system which they contain is complete as a whole, and congruous in all its parts. This of itself affords a strong proof that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God." There are no doubt great diversities of language, conception, and style, discernible in the different books of the Bible; so that the individuality of the sacred writers is quite apparent throughout. Isaiah is in no danger of being confounded with Daniel nor Paul with John. But this forms no ground of objection to the Divine inspiration of the Holy Bible. "It is God who speaks to us there," as Professor Gausson eloquently remarks, "but it is also man;—it is man, but it is also God. Admirable Word of God! it has been made man in its own way, as the eternal Word was! Yes, God has made it also come down to us full of grace and truth, like unto our words in all things, yet without error and sin! Admirable Word, divine Word, yet withal full of humanity, much-to-be-loved Word of my God! Yes, in order to our understanding it, it had of necessity to be put upon mortal lips, that it might relate human things; and, in order to attract our regard, behoved to invest itself with our modes of thinking, and with all the emotions of our voice; for God well knew whereof we are made. But we have recognised it as the Word of the Lord, mighty, efficacious, sharper than a two-edged sword; and the simplest among us, on hearing it, may say like Cleopas and his friend, 'Did not our hearts burn within us while it spoke to us?' With what a mighty charm do the Scriptures, by this abundance of humanity, and by all this personality with which their divinity is invested, remind us that the Lord of our souls, whose touching voice they are, does himself bear a human heart on the throne of God, although seated on the highest place, where the angels serve him and adore him for ever! It is thus, also, that they present to us not only that double character of variety and unity which already embellishes all the other works of God, as Creator of the heavens and the earth; but, further, that mingling of familiarity and authority, of sympathy and grandeur, of practical details and mysterious majesty, of humanity and divinity, which is recognisable in all the dispensations of the same God, as Redeemer and Shepherd of his Church. It is thus, then, that the Father of mercies, while speaking in his prophets, behoved not only to employ their manner as well as their voice, and their style as well as their pen; but, further, often to put in operation their whole faculties of thought and feeling. Sometimes, in order to show us his divine sympathy there, he has deemed it fitting to associate their own recollections, their human convictions, their personal experiences, and their pious emotions, with the words he dictated to them; sometimes, in order to remind us of his sovereign intervention, he has preferred dispensing with this unessential concurrence of their recollections, affections, and understanding. Such did the Word of God behove to be. Like Immanuel, full of grace and truth; at once in the bosom of God and in the heart of man; mighty and sympathizing; heavenly and of the earth; sublime and lowly; awful and familiar; God and man! Accordingly it bears no resemblance to the God of the Rationalists. They, after having, like the disciples of Epicurus, banished the Divinity far from man into a third heaven, would have had the Bible also to have kept itself there. 'Philosophy employs the language of the gods,' says the too famous Strauss of Ludwigsburg, 'while religion makes use of the language of men.' No doubt she does so; she has recourse to no other; she leaves to the philosophers and to the gods of this world their empyrean and their language."

The Jews divided the Pentateuch into fifty or fifty-four paraschi'oth, or larger sections, according as the lunar year of the Jews is simple or intercalary; one of these sections being read in the synagogue every Sabbath day. Some of the Jews attribute this division to Moses, and others to Ezra. The larger sections were divided into smaller or Siderim. Until the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes the Jews read only the Law; but the reading of it being then prohibited, they substituted for it fifty-four Hapthoroth or sections from the Prophets. Under the Maccabees the reading of the Law was renewed, being used as the first, while the reading from the Prophets was adopted as the second lesson. These sections again were divided into Pesukim or verses, which have been also ascribed to Ezra. Such shorter divisions were found to be particularly useful after the Babylonish captivity, when the Law was expounded in the Chaldee dialect, which was then the vernacular tongue, although it still continued to be read in the original Hebrew.

In its original form the text of the Hebrew Bible was written continuously without breaks or divisions into chapters, verses, or even words. A number of ancient manuscripts written in this way, both in the Greek and Latin languages, are still extant. The Jews affirm that when God gave the Law to Moses on Mount Sinai, it was given in a twofold form, the true reading and the true interpretation, and that both these were handed down from generation to generation until they were committed to writing. The true reading is the subject of the Masora, and the true interpretation the subject of the Mishna and Gemara. The Masorites were the first who divided the books and sections of the Hebrew Scriptures into verses, noting carefully the number of verses in each book and section, and the middle verse in each, with other minute particulars of a similar kind.

It is not unlikely that the early Christians may have derived from these ancient Jewish divisions the idea of dividing the New Testament in a similar way. Who first carried out the plan is unknown. It is certain, however, that the New Testament was divided at an early period, probably before the fourth century, into two kinds of chapters, some longer and others shorter. These chapters not being sanctioned by the church, were by no means uniformly adhered to. The most important were the Ammonian sections, so called from their author, a learned Christian of Alexandria in the third century. In the fourth century an edition of Paul's Epistles, viewed as one book, was divided into chapters in one continued series—an arrangement which is still to be found in the Vatican manuscript, and in some others. The Codes Bezae and other manuscripts were divided into lessons in addition to the chapters and sections. It was not until the thirteenth century, however, that the chapters now in use were first introduced throughout the Western or Latin church, for the New Tes tament as well as the Old. No Greek manuscripts are known to be extant in which chapters are found, prior to the fifteenth century. The invention of chapters has sometimes been ascribed to Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of William the Conqueror and William II. Others again attribute it to Stephen Langton, who was also archbishop of Canterbury, but in the reigns of John and Henry III. The real author of this very useful division was Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, who flourished about the middle of the thirteenth century. Having projected a concordance to the Latin Vulgate version, by which any passage might be found, he divided both the Old and New Testament for greater convenience into chapters, the same as we now have. These chapters he subdivided into smaller portions, which he distinguished by placing in the margin each of the letters of the alphabet at equal distances from each other, according to the length of the chapters. The same arrangement was adopted in the fifteenth century for the Hebrew Bible by Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, with this difference, that instead of adopting Hugo's marginal letters, he marked every fifth verse with a Hebrew numeral. The introduction of verses into the Hebrew Bible was made by Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, in the seventeenth century.

The first collection of various readings in the MSS. of the Old Testament, with which we are acquainted, is the Masora, which was probably executed gradually, and not all at once; but the precise time at which it commenced it is difficult to ascertain. It was written sometimes in rolls separate from the text; at other times at the end of the copy of the Scriptures; but in later times, generally on the margin or bottom of the page. About the year 1030, Aaron Ben Asher, President of the Academy at Tiberias, and Jacob Ben Naphtali, President of that at Babylon, published each of them a separate edition of the Old Testament Scriptures; and from these two editions issuing from the two great classes of Jews, the Eastern and the Western, the succeeding copies of the Scriptures have been generally taken. The first attempt to print a Hebrew Bible with various readings, from a collation of a few manuscripts, was made in 1661. After this several further collations were made at different periods. But these are scarcely worthy of being mentioned in comparison of the laborious work of Dr. Kennicott, the first volume of which appeared in 1776, and the second in 1780. This was followed by the still greater efforts of De Rossi, who collected more MSS. and editions in his own private library, than Kennicott had collected in all the great libraries of Europe. In addition to those collected by Kennicott and De Rossi, there are other Hebrew MSS. of great importance. Thus a colony of Jews is said to have settled in China in the first century, probably about the year 73. They possess a number of manuscripts. In their synagogue they have thirteen rolls, each containing the whole Law. They have no vowel points, and are divided into fifty-three sections; but without distinction of books, chapters, or verses. One of these rolls being very ancient, is held in high estimation.

The celebrated traveller, Dr. Edward Clarke, found in the Crimea a number of Karaite Jews, who possessed a number of ancient manuscript copies of the Hebrew Bible. The account which he gives is very interesting. "The room," he says, "where we were entertained, was filled with MSS.; many in the handwriting of our host; others by that of his children, and all in very beautiful Hebrew characters. The Karaites deem it an act of piety to copy the Bible once in their lives. All their manuscript copies begin at the book of Joshua. The Pentateuch is kept apart; not in manuscript, but in a printed version, for the use of schools. They reject the Talmud, every kind of tradition, all Rabbinical writings and opinions, and all marginal interpolations of the text of Scripture; and govern themselves by the pure letter of the law. They pretend to have the text of the Old Testament, in its most genuine state. Being desirous," Dr. Clarke adds, "to possess one of their Bibles, the Rabbi permitted us to purchase a beautiful manuscript copy, written on vellum, about 400 years old; but having left this volume in the Crimea, to be forwarded by way of Petersburg, it was never afterwards recovered." The Karaites are said to have separated from the main body of the Jews soon after the Babylonish captivity.

Dr. Buchanan, in his 'Christian Researches in Asia,' describes a visit which he made to a colony of Black Jews in Malabar, and who are supposed to be a portion of the first dispersion. From that people he obtained a very valuable manuscript copy of the Pentateuch, which is now in the library of Cambridge University. This manuscript is written on goats' skins dyed red. It is about forty-eight feet long, and about twenty-two inches broad. The variations from the common reading amount to about forty, none of them of the slightest importance, or affecting the meaning in the least degree. Four of the readings are peculiar to this copy.

The same veneration and respect which the Jews have in all ages shown to the Old Testament, has been manifested by Christians to the New Testament. Every trace, however, of the original manuscripts of the latter disappeared in a remote antiquity. This may be accounted for in various ways. In all probability they were formed of very perishable materials, being chiefly light papyrus rolls, on which the writing was inscribed with the pencil or calamus, with black ink, and in columns. The writing itself was in the character called uncial or large round letters. These uncial manuscripts went on continuously or without separation of the words; they had no interpunctuation; no initial capitals, no accents and breathings. Before the formal completion of the canon toward the end of the fourth century, scarcely a single copy had been made which contained the whole New Testament. In subsequent times such copies still continued to be rare, and most of those that did exist also contained the Greek Old Testament. The four Gospels were most frequently transcribed. The Pauline were copied more frequently than the Catholic epistles; and these latter generally formed one volume with the Acts of the Apostles, though very often both they and the Pauline epistles were bound up along with the Acts. The Apocalypse was least frequently copied, and by Athanasius in the fourth century, it was first assigned its place among the canonical books.

In the first centuries of the Christian era, parchment superseded papyrus. From the fourth to the eleventh century, it remained almost exclusively in use; then cotton paper came to be more frequently employed than parchment, and soon after linen paper was used. With the use of the papyrus, the employment of the roll form also ceased; and instead of it the book form was introduced. The whole number of New Testament uncial manuscripts of the period, from the fourth to the tenth century, which have come down to us, amounts to forty-one, only three of these embracing the whole New Testament; and of these three there is none without considerable omissions. In regard to the printed text, the first collation of Greek manuscripts of the New Testament was made by Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, in the year 1514, but it was not published until 1520, when it appeared as a portion of the Complutensian Polyglot. But a few years previous, in 1516, there issued from the press of Frobenius at Basle, the first edition of the New Testament in Greek and Latin by the celebrated Erasmus. This was followed by other editions by the same learned man, after consulting several Greek manuscripts. Then succeeded the edition of Colineus, and the valuable editions of the Parisian printer, Robert Stephens. A Greek-Latin edition superintended by Stephens in 1551, is the first in which the Greek text is divided into verses. This division, which he had already three years before introduced into the Vulgate, and which was soon universally received, seems to have been adopted after the example of the Hebrew editions of the Old Testament. Next in succession came the numerous large and small editions of Beza, and after a number of years the Elzevir edition, which is now in general use under the name of the Textus receptus, or the received Text. In 1657 appeared the London Polyglot, executed by the celebrated Walton, with the collation of sixteen additional manuscripts. Soon after was published an edition by Curcellæus with various readings; to which succeeded the valuable work of Dr. Fell, in the preparation of which he had collated forty other manuscripts. Another very important work of the same kind was the edition by Dr. Mill of Oxford, which, after the labour of thirty years, was published in 1707. This edition was succeeded by that of John James Wetstein, which appeared at Amsterdam in 1751-2, in two folio volumes. The first edition of Griesbach was published in 1777, but his great work was his second edition of the New Testament, which was not finished till 1806. In this work Griesbach was not a little indebted to the previous labours and suggestions of Bengel and Semler. After the death of this distinguished critic, the first volume of a third edition was issued by Schulz in 1827. The work of Griesbach excited no little controversy among Biblical critics. His most severe opponent was Matthai, who having obtained possession of more than an hundred manuscripts from Moscow, published an edition of the New Testament in twelve volumes in 1782-1788. Griesbach was ably defended against Matthai by Hug and Eichhorn. The next labourer in the same field was Augustin Scholz, who published an edition of the New Testament, enriched with full prolegomena, the first volume in 1830, and the second and concluding volume in 1836. Besides, there appeared many small editions founded chiefly on Griesbach, the most widely circulated being those of Knapp and Schott, and at a still later period that of Theile. Carl Lachmann, besides a small stereotype edition containing the bare text, issued a large Greek and Latin edition, the first volume in 1842, and the second in 1850. The most recent authors who have revised the text of the New Testament are Tischendorf and Reiche in Germany, and Tregelles in our own country.

Next in importance to the manuscripts of the Bible, may be ranked the versions. The principal versions of the Old Testament are the Alexandrian or Septuagint translation, in the Greek language; the Targums, or translations in the Chaldee; the Syriac version; and the Vulgate, or Latin translation.

The Septuagint translation was executed about B. C. 277. Josephus and Philo state that it was made at Alexandria under the reign of the second Ptolemy, commonly called Ptolemy Philadelphus. Others allege that it was done in the reign of the first Ptolemy, called Soter. The most complete account of the origin and mode of execution of the work is given by Josephus, who adopts the account of Aristeus, one of the persons who was sent by Ptolemy to Jerusalem on this matter. (See SEPTUAGINT.) The most celebrated manuscripts of the Septuagint are the 'Codex Vaticanus,' and the 'Codex Alexandrinus,' and from these the late editions have been printed. Besides the translation of the Seventy, however, there were several other Greek translations of the Old Testament Scriptures, all of them made after the Christian era. The best known are those by Aquila, a Jew, and by Symmachus and by Theodotion, both said to have been Ebionite Christians.

The Chaldee versions of the Old Testament are termed Targums or interpretations. Of these, the most celebrated are those of Onkelos, and of Jonathan Ben Uzziel. The work of Onkelos is a version of the five books of Moses; that of Jonathan is a version of Joshua, Judges, the two books of Samuel, the two books of Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets. Both of these are of considerable antiquity. There is also another Targum on the law called the Jerusalem Targum.

The Syriac version boasts of great antiquity, the inhabitants of Syria having been early converted to Christianity, and therefore requiring a version of the Old Testament Scriptures in the Syriac tongue. Various translations appear to have been made, some of them from the Septuagint. The version which is most highly esteemed is directly from the Hebrew, and bears evident marks of being very ancient. The author of it is supposed to have been a Jewish convert, and the date of it to be in the first century. The Syriac version, brought by Dr. Claudius Buchanan from India, and deposited in the university of Cambridge, is preferred by De Rossi to all others. "This most ancient version," he observes, "follows closely the order of the sacred text, and is more pure than any other."

There exists also a version of the books of the Law made in the Samaritan or Chaldaic Samaritan language, from a copy of the Hebrew Pentateuch in Samaritan characters. It has been conjectured also that there was a Greek version of the Samaritan Pentateuch.

One of the most important versions, and that which is held in great esteem in the Romish church, is the Latin version, sometimes called the Italian, but more generally the Vulgate. This seems to have existed from an early period for the use of the Latin church; at all events, there were various translations into Latin, that which was called the Italian being the most highly valued. Jerome undertook to revise it by desire of Damasus, bishop of Rome; but finding that the Old Testament had been translated, not from the Hebrew, but the Greek version, he resolved to execute an entirely new translation directly from the Hebrew original. That this new version might be as perfect as possible, Jerome passed several years in Judea, and received the assistance of several learned Jews who resided at the school of Tiberias. Since the seventh century, the translation of Jerome has been in general use in the Roman Catholic Church, excepting that of the book of Psalms, the old version of which is still employed; so that the present Vulgate consists of the new Latin translation of the Old Testament by Jerome, and the old Latin version of the New Testament, revised by him. The other Latin version is called the Old Vulgate, of which a few manuscripts remain and have been printed. It was from this version that the translation of Wickliffe was made, and Luther derived considerable assistance from it in preparing his translation into the German language.

The Latin is the oldest of the Western, and the Syriac the oldest of the Eastern versions. Augustine regarded the old Latin version as the most literal and perspicuous of all the translations of the New Testament; and Michaelis, an eminent modern critic, considered the old Syriac version to be the very best translation of the Greek Testament he had ever read. Besides the old Syriac version, which is called Peshito or literal, there is another called the new or Philoxenian version, from Philoxenus bishop of Hierapolis, A. D. 508. This, however, is said to be greatly inferior to the former.

Among the more eminent versions, though of less remote antiquity than the Latin and Syriac, may be ranked two Egyptian versions, the one called the Coptic, and the other the Saidic. The former has been used from time immemorial by the Egyptians, and though from the period of the Saracen conquest the Arabic has been generally spoken in Egypt, and the Coptic little understood, yet this version is used in the public service of the Coptic church in connection with an Arabic translation. The Saidic version is in the dialect of Upper Egypt, or Said, as it is called in Arabic. It once contained all the books of the New Testament, but none of them appears to be now entire. In proof of the antiquity of this version, it has been observed that there is a work in the British Museum, written in the Saidic dialect by Valentinus in the second century, and containing several passages of the New Testament which exactly agree with the same passages in the Saidic version. There are many Arabic translations, but they are supposed to have been made after the time of Mohammed. There is, however, a very ancient Ethiopic version, sometimes called the Abyssinian.

Another ancient version of the New Testament is the Armenian, which is supposed to have been executed by Miesrob in the end of the fourth century, divine service having been performed before that time among the Armenians in Greek or Syriac. The following account of this version is given by Dr. Claudius Buchanan in his 'Christian Researches in Asia':—"The Bible was translated into the Armenian language in the fifth century, under very auspicious circumstances, the history of which has come down to us. It has been allowed by competent judges of the language to be a most faithful translation. La Croze calls it 'The Queen of versions.' This Bible has ever remained in the possession of the Armenian people; and many illustrious instances of genuine and enlightened piety occur in their history. The manuscript copies not being sufficient for the demand, a council of Armenian bishops assembled in 1662, and resolved to call in aid the art of printing, of which they had heard in Europe. For this purpose they applied first to France, but the Catholic Church refused to print their Bible. At length, it was printed at Amsterdam in 1666, and afterwards two other editions, in 1668 and 1698. Since that time it has been printed at Venice. One of the editions, which the author has seen, is not inferior, in beauty of typography, to the English Bible."

The last of the Eastern versions to which we shall advert, are the two Persian versions of the four Gospels, which are supposed to be of considerable antiquity, the oldest having been made from the Syriac, and the other probably from the Greek. That the Christian religion was early introduced into Persia is plain, from the circumstance that a bishop from that country sat in the council of Nice A. D. 325. Chrysostom states that the Persians had translated the doctrines of the gospel into their own tongue.

Among the versions of the West, one of the most ancient, after the Latin, is the Gothic. The translator of this version was the celebrated Ulphilas, a bishop of the Mæso-Goths, and a member of the council of Constantinople A. D. 349. He is said to have invented a Gothic alphabet similar to the Greek, and to have translated directly from the Greek. The four Gospels in Gothic have been preserved in a well-known manuscript, called the Codex Argenteus, from its being written on vellum in letters of silver. There have also been lately discovered in the Ambrosian library at Milan, the thirteen epistles of Paul in the Gothic language.

Very ancient manuscripts of Saxon translations, written between the times of Alfred and Harold, still exist. In his Latin preface Ælfric says he has translated the Scriptures from the Latin into the ordinary tongue "for the edification of the simple, who know only this speech." Alfred himself undertook a translation of the Psalms of David, but died before it was finished.

In addition to these might be mentioned the Slavonic, German, Italian, and other more modern versions, including those of almost every European country. But it is natural that the reader should expect a somewhat detailed account of the translations of the Bible into our own language. The Saxon version was used prior to the Norman conquest, but after that period, the language of England underwent so great a change that another translation was found to be necessary. There are several manuscript English versions still extant, which were written so early as the middle of the fourteenth century, one in particular, by John de Trevisa, who lived in the reign of Richard II., and finished his translation in the year 1357. Towards the end of that century appeared the English translation by Wycliffe, which was made from the Latin version. The first translation, however, of the New Testament from the original Greek was made by Tyndale, and published abroad by his friend Miles Coverdale, by whose name it is usually designated. Various editions followed, and it is somewhat remarkable that during the reign of Henry VIII., notwithstanding the obstacles thrown in the way of all such undertakings, no fewer than fourteen editions of the whole Bible, and eighteen editions of the New Testament, besides separate portions of Scripture, were printed.

The persecutions of Mary, the successor of Henry VIII., having driven from England several pious and learned men, they took refuge in Geneva. Here they prepared a revised translation, first of the New Testament, and afterwards of the whole Bible. Upwards of thirty editions of this version were printed betwixt the years 1560 and 1616, and used to a great extent throughout England. An edition, called the Bishops' Bible, was printed in 1568, under the superintendance of Archbishop Parker, assisted by a number of learned men. It was used in the English churches for forty years, when it was superseded by the admirable version which is still in use as the authorized version of the English Bible. The mode in which this valuable translation was accomplished is thus described by Mr. Richard Thomson, in his 'Illustrations of British History.' "In 1603, James I. commissioned fifty-four of the most learned men in the universities to undertake the work; and directed the bishops to inquire for such persons as were skilled in the sacred languages, or had made the Scriptures their peculiar study. But before this noble labour commenced, seven of the appointed number were deceased; and the remaining forty-seven were divided into six companies, each of which was to meet at a different place, and to prepare a different portion of the Scriptures, though the whole of that portion was to be translated by every person in that company, and the several versions compared together. When any one company had finished its part, it was to be communicated to all the rest, that nothing might pass without general consent; and if, upon review, any objection were made, the passage was to be returned for amendment, or, in case of any disagreement, it was to be referred at the end of the work to the general committee, consisting of one principal person from each company. The division of the Scriptures between these companies, was as follows.—The first met at Westminster; it consisted of ten persons, and translated from Genesis to the end of the second book of Kings. The second met at Cambridge, consisted of eight members, and translated from the first book of Chronicles to the close of Solomon's Song. The third met at Oxford, and consisted of eight individuals, who translated the remainder of the Old Testament. The fourth assembled at Cambridge, included seven persons, and translated the Apocryphal books. The fifth met at Oxford, consisted of eight members, and translated the four Gospels, the Acts, and the Revelation; and the sixth met at Westminster, and included seven persons, who were appointed to translate the Epistles.

"This translation was commenced in the spring of 1607, and occupied almost three years, when three copies of the whole Scriptures were perfected at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. The foundation of this new version was directed to be the Bishops' Bible, though several others of the old English translations, as well as those in the contimental languages, were also used as auxiliaries. When the work was finished, the general committee met at Stationers' Hall, and reviewed and polished it; a final revision being given to the whole by Dr. Miles Smith, Bishop of Gloucester, who wrote the excellent preface originally attached to this translation, and by Dr. Thomas Bilson, Bishop of Winchester. After long expectation and desire of the kingdom, the new version was published in folio, in 1611; and its excellency is, in every way, such as might have been expected from the care with which it was conducted, and the united labours of so many distinguished men. 'It is,' says Dr. Gray, 'a most wonderful and incomparable work, equally remarkable for the general fidelity of its construction, and magnificent simplicity of its language.'

It is difficult to ascertain the precise period at which the English Bible was introduced into Scotland. An act was passed by the Scottish parliament in 1543 declaring it to be lawful for the people to read the Bible in their native tongue. It is not improbable, however, that at that time foreign Bibles alone were in use. The first Bible printed in Scotland was that of Geneva. "Then," says Knox, "might have been seen the Bible lying on almost every gentleman's table. The New Testament was borne about in many men's hands. The knowledge of God did wonderfully increase; and he gave his Holy Spirit to simple men in great abundance."

A version of the New Testament, translated from the Latin Vulgate, and intended for the special use of Roman Catholics, was published at Rheims in 1582; and, in 1609, the Old Testament version at Douay. The two versions together go by the name of the Douay Bible, which is almost always accompanied by notes explaining passages in accordance with the peculiar dogmas of Romanism.

There being a considerable part of the population, in several quarters of Great Britain and Ireland, who speak in languages peculiar to themselves, and are but imperfectly acquainted with the English tongue, it was necessary that versions of the Bible should be prepared suited to these different localities. It was however, not till 1567 that a Welsh New Testament was printed; and even then it was printed in a form so inaccessible to the great body of the people, that it was found to be comparatively useless. About seventy years after another and more convenient edition was issued, and in the course of the last century various and large editions were printed and circulated in Wales at the expense of the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, and also of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

A translation of the New Testament into the Manx language, which is spoken in the Isle of Man, was commenced by Bishop Wilson in the last century, and completed by his successor, Bishop Hildesley, being printed about the year 1760. An edition of the whole Bible was printed in 1775, by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

An 8vo edition was issued in 1819 by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

No New Testament in the Gaelic language, for the use of the large population of the Scottish Highlands, appeared till 1767. This version was executed from the original Greek, by the Rev. James Stuart, minister of Killin, and revised by Mr. Frazer, minister of Alness. Two improved editions of it were published in the years 1796 and 1813, under the superintendence of the author's son, the Rev. Dr. Stuart, minister of Luss. The translation of the Old Testament was undertaken by Dr. Stuart and Dr. Smith, minister of Campbeltown; and was printed in 1802 at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. A new edition in 12mo was published in 1807, under the care of the Rev. Alexander Stuart, minister of Dingwall, and besides this, another edition without alterations was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, having appointed competent persons to revise the whole, passed an act in 1816, declaring it to be the only authorized version of the Gaelic Bible.

The New Testament was translated into the Irish language by Dr. William Daniel, Archbishop of Tuam, in the end of the sixteenth century, and published in 1602 by Sir William Usher. A translation of the Old Testament was begun and finished by the benevolent and pious Bishop Bedell, whose exertions in behalf of the Irish-speaking population of the sister island can never be forgotten. This worthy prelate had resolved to publish his translation at his own expense, but as he was cut off before accomplishing his purpose, the work appeared at the sole cost of the distinguished Christian philosopher Boyle. Various editions of the Irish Bible have been issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS, a Christian sect in England, sometimes called Bryanites, the original founder of the body having been Mr. William O'Bryan, a Wesleyan local preacher in Cornwall, who separated from the Wesleyan Methodists in 1815, and began himself to form societies upon the Methodist plan. His labours were abundantly successful, and in the course of a very few years, so rapid was the progress of the sect, more especially throughout the counties of Devonshire and Cornwall, that, in 1819, there were bordering on thirty itinerant preachers. In that year the first Conference was held, and the connexion was divided into twelve circuits. The cause advanced, and became more flourishing every year, but in 1829 the sect was deprived of its originator, Mr. Bryant having left the body.

In their general arrangements the Bible Christians differ very little from the Wesleyan Methodists. They have the same peculiar system of societies, classes, circuits, local and itinerant preachers. Their affairs also are regulated by an annual conference, and they have adopted rules almost identical with those of the Wesleyans for the guidance of their officers and meetings. The composition of the conference, however, is of a more popular nature than among the followers of Wesley, consisting as it does of equal numbers of ministers and laymen, the former being the whole of the itinerant ministers, and the latter representatives sent from the various societies. The same popular character is communicated also to the inferior meetings. The rules of the body sanction and recommend open-air preaching. They disapprove of the title "Reverend" being applied to their ministers, as being inconsistent with the plainness and simplicity recommended by Christ to all his followers. Females are allowed to act as itinerant preachers, but they are prohibited from taking any share in the government and discipline of the Church.

In doctrine the Bible Christians are at one with the Arminian Methodists, and their forms of public worship are much the same, except in the case of the Lord's Supper, which it is usual for them to partake of in a sitting posture, as more conformable to the mode in which it was at first received by the apostles. Kneeling, however, is not positively forbidden should it be more agreeable to the views and feelings of any persons to engage in the ordinance in that attitude. By the returns of the last census in 1851, the number of chapels in England and Wales amounted to 452. Their congregations are chiefly found in the south-western counties. The minutes of conference for 1852 represent the number of members as 13,862, including both the circuits and Home Missionary stations.

BIBLE SOCIETIES, associations formed for the diffusion of the Word of God. A duty so plainly incumbent on all who believe the Bible to be given by inspiration of God, and to be able to make men wise unto salvation, to spread it far and wide throughout the world, would have led, we might have thought, to the formation of Bible Societies at a much earlier period than any to which they can be traced. The oldest institution of the kind is "The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge," which was formed in 1699, and which printed the New Testament in Arabic, the whole Bible in the Manx language, and four editions in the Welsh, besides many editions in English. This efficient Society is still in active operation. An association was formed in London towards the end of last century for supplying soldiers and sailors with copies of the Scriptures. This Society was afterwards remodelled, taking the name of the "Naval and Military Bible Society," which fully described its highly important though limited sphere of action. A society, under the name of the "French Bible Society," was established in Paris in 1792, but after a feeble existence, maintained with much difficulty for a few years, it was dissolved in 1803. In the following year, on the 7th of March 1804, a national institution on a large scale was organized in London, bearing the name of the "British and Foreign Bible Society." Active measures were instantly adopted to enlist the friends of the Bible, not only in Britain, but throughout Europe, in a holy confederacy for the advancement of the interests of this noble association. The example set by London was speedily followed by other cities. At Nuremberg in Germany a similar society was set on foot, which in two years transferred the seat of its operations to Basle, and speedily expanded into the "German Bible Society."

Meanwhile the parent Society was growing in vigour and importance. In ten years from the formation of the "British and Foreign Bible Society," no fewer than eighty-two independent Bible Societies had been formed in Europe, several of them having auxiliary associations in connection with them. Five important branches had been established in Asia, four of them auxiliary to the British Society, viz. at Calcutta, Colombo, Bombay, and Java; and one at Astrachan, auxiliary to the Russian Bible Society. Two auxiliary societies had been formed in Africa, one in the island of Mauritius and Bourbon conjointly, and one at St. Helena. One hundred and twenty-nine Bible Societies had been formed on the American continent, exclusive of one at Quebec and one at Pictou, with the "Nova Scotia Bible Society," and its auxiliaries throughout the province. Two auxiliaries to the British Society had been established in the West Indies, one at Jamaica, and one at Antigua. During the same period of ten years from its commencement, the British and Foreign Bible Society had secured the formation of five hundred and fifty-nine auxiliaries within the British dominions at home.

The progress which this great national institution has made, and the extent of usefulness to which it has attained, may be learned from the encouraging fact, that, at the jubilee which was celebrated on the 8th March 1853, when the Society had reached the fiftieth year of its existence, it was reported by the secretaries that the association had issued, since its commencement, no fewer than 25,402,309 Bibles and Testaments at the expense of £4,000,000 sterling. The number of languages and dialects in which it had printed and circulated the Scriptures was 148. The number of auxiliary societies directly connected with the parent Society was 4,257.

In the United States of America, the first Bible Society which was formed was established at Philadelphia in 1808. In the course of a very few years similar institutions rapidly spread, so that in 1816, when the American Bible Society was set on foot, there existed upwards of fifty Bible Societies in active operation, of which no fewer than forty-three became auxiliaries to the National Society. The formation of the great Transatlantic Bible Society formed a highly important era in the history of Bible circulation throughout the world. This event took place on Thursday, 11th May 1816, at a meeting held in New York, at which sixty-one delegates appeared from ten different States of the Union, representing from thirty to forty local societies. From the date of its institution to 1st May 1853, this noble institution circulated 9,088,352 copies of the Word of God in many different languages.

Besides the two great societies on both sides of the Atlantic, and their numerous auxiliaries, the Bible Societies in Continental Europe, in Asia and Africa, have circulated five or six millions of copies of the Holy Scriptures in different languages; while the American and Foreign Bible Society, during the sixteen years of its existence, has put into circulation more than half a million of copies of the Scriptures in thirty-five different languages, and as many more in the English language. The aggregate of all the operations of the different Bible Societies is the publication and circulation of nearly 50,000,000 copies of the Bible, in almost all the languages spoken upon earth. Such a result obtained in the course of half a century is a cause of lively gratitude to God, and an earnest of what, by God's grace, may be accomplished in diffusing the Holy Bible throughout every part of the habitable world, until at length the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord.

BLANCHI (Ital. White men), a name given to a section of the FLAGELLANTS (which see) in the fourteenth century, which came down from the Alps into Italy, scourging themselves as they went. They were received almost everywhere with enthusiasm, both by clergy and people. Their leader was put to death in the Papal territory, and the body was dispersed. The prime mover of the penitential pilgrimage of the Bianchi was probably Vincentius Ferrerius, a Spanish Dominican, but their movements being strongly disapproved by the council of Constance, he was induced to discontinue them.

BIBLICISTS, the Biblical or ancient theologians, as they were sometimes called, of the twelfth century, who supported their religious tenets simply by appealing to the declarations of Holy Scripture, along with the opinions of the fathers and the decisions of councils, but without being guided by mere human reasoning. This class of theologians was called Biblicists in opposition to the philosophical or scholastic theologians, who were also called the Sententiarii. The most distinguished of the Biblicists were St. Bernard, Peter the Chanter, and Walter of St. Victor; but the philosophical theologians were thought to be more acute and able in their expositions; and, accordingly, students attended their lectures in great numbers, while few or no pupils were found in the schools of the Biblicists. Roger Bacon, in the thirteenth century, tells us that "the Batchelor, who lectures on the text of Scripture, gives place to the lecturer on the sentences, who is everywhere preferred and honoured by all." This state of matters continued generally to prevail in the theological schools of Europe down to the time of Luther. See SENTENTIARIUM.

BIBLIOMANCY (Gr. Biblios, the Bible, and Manteia, Divination), a mode of divination sometimes practised among the early Christians, by opening the Bible at random, and applying the first passage that met the eye to the peculiar circumstances of the individual. It was customary among the heathens to consult the poets in this way. Homer was chiefly used for this purpose by the ancient Greeks, and Virgil by the Romans. At what precise period this highly improper use of the Sacred Volume was introduced among the Christians does not appear. Augustine refers to it in the fourth century; and some have alleged, that even he himself was at one time addicted to the practice, and that his conversion took place while engaged in this kind of divination. His own explanation, however, is sufficient to dispel such a foolish idea. He says that he heard a voice from some unknown quarter exhorting him to take up the Bible and read; that he proceeded, accordingly, to open the Word of God, and that the first passage which presented itself to his eye was Rom. xiii. 13, 14, "Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." These words he regarded as addressed to him by God, and in all respects applicable to his case. Thus by God's good providence he was led to enter upon a new life of purity and devotedness to the Divine service. Far from favouring Bibliomancy at any period of his life, Augustine strongly disapproved of the practice. "As for those," says he, "who divine by lots out of the gospel, though it be more desirable they should do this than run to ask counsel of devils; yet I am displeased at this custom, which turns the Divine oracles, which speak of things belonging to another life, to the business of this world, and the vanities of the present life."

There were two modes in which the early Christians practised Bibliomancy. One was done by observing, in the first instance, a course of prayer and fasting, longer or shorter, as the case seemed to require, at the close of which the individual opened the Psalms, or perhaps the Gospels and Epistles, noting the first passage that occurred, which was regarded as the answer sent expressly from heaven. Another way in which this kind of divination was followed was by repairing to the church on a particular day, and noting the first words of the Psalms which the congregation were engaged in singing at his entrance, these being viewed as the solution of his difficulty or answer to his prayer. Such a superstitious custom was altogether unworthy of men who owned the Christian name, and yet we learn from ecclesiastical writers, that for many centuries this absurd and impious practice was found to prevail.

The nature and influence of Bibliomancy in the church, during the middle ages, is thus described by Dr. Jamieson: "There was not a single event, of any importance in the ordinary course of human life, in reference to which the Scriptures, contrary to their manifest design, were not appealed to, as a sure and infallible oracle, in all matters of secular interest. Gregory of Tours is the earliest historian who describes this divination as a prevailing practice in his time; and a circumstance which he mentions, as a critical occasion in his own life, affords him an opportunity of detailing the religious observances with which, in the earlier ages, it was gone about. He had long been the favourite minister of Queen Fredegonda; and information had reached him that a dangerous conspiracy had been formed, at the head of which was the Earl of Tours, to hurl him from power, by lowering him in the eyes of his royal mistress, and, if necessary, taking his life. Overwhelmed with apprehension of his danger, he retired in the greatest despondency to a closet, and took with him the Psalms of David, in the hope of deriving from it some direction, or some gleams of hope, in his distressed circumstances; 'and great,' he adds, 'was the comfort he found;' for, having spent some time in prayer, he opened the volume, and the first verse that met his eye, being the 53d of the 78th Psalm, —'He led them on safely, so that they feared not; but the sea overwhelmed their enemies;' he received it as a happy omen of his safety, and left his chamber with the light heart and elastic step of one who had obtained a sure and certain hope of triumph.

"Gregory Nicephoras relates, that the Emperor Andronicus, having thrown into prison his nephew Constantine, who was convicted of having conspired against the life of his imperial uncle, deliberated long whether he ought to pardon the offender, or to punish him as his crimes deserved, and that he was at length determined towards the exercise of mercy by an appeal which he made to the Scriptures. On turning up the book of Psalms, the first passage he met with was the 14th verse of the 68th Psalm, 'When the Almighty scattered kings in it.' 'Persuaded,' says the historian, 'by this passage, that although men are ignorant of the secret springs of Providence, and act independently of them, the quarrels and commotions that break out in the kingdoms of the world form a part of the Divine decrees, he resolved thenceforth on reconciliation with the rebellious prince.'

"Another historian informs us, that the Emperor Heraclius, after having obtained a series of signal victories over Cosroes, King of Persia, was at a great loss to know where he ought to fix his winter quarters, and that having caused a day of extraordinary fasting and prayer to be observed by his whole army, previous to his intended consultation, he solemnly took up the book of Psalms, in presence of his principal officers, and found a passage which determined him to winter in Albania.

"A fourth writer mentions the case of a young lady, whom, contrary to her own inclinations, her family had determined to bestow in marriage on a rich and noble suitor. Having delayed her consent as long as she could, and finding it impossible to escape by ordinary means from a connection so odious to her, she at length informed her lover and her relations that she left the matter in the hands of God, and would cheerfully abide by the result of an appeal to the Sacred Volume. All parties having agreed to this, as a pious and commendable proposition, the Bible was opened, and the verse found being that passage in the Gospel where our Lord said, 'Whosoever loveth his father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me,' the lady exclaimed that the bans were thus forbid by Heaven, and forthwith devoted herself to a single life,—which, at the period referred to, was beginning to be held in great estimation.

"A fifth historian relates, that the famous hermit, who, having stationed himself on a high pillar, obtained the surname of Stylites, was called in his childhood by the name of Daniel, for the following reason. His parents having brought him to the parish minister to be baptized, wished the priest to give him a name, which that individual declining to do, it was proposed to ascertain what was the will of God, and the Scriptures being consequently turned up, the Volume opened at the beginning of the book of Daniel, which from that circumstance became the name of the child.

"Nor was it only in the ordinary events of life that this practice of divining by the Scriptures was observed,—the same appeal was made to the Word of God, for guidance, on occasion of appointing to the highest offices of the Church. Thus, at a contested election in Orleans, when party spirit ran high, and the inhabitants were greatly divided in their choice of a successor to the vacant see, it was suggested that, in the difficult circumstances of the case, and as the likeliest way of restoring harmony and procuring universal concurrence in the appointment, the matter should be left to the decision of the scriptural lot. The proposition was immediately agreed to; and each candidate being, in turn, requested to try his fortune by opening the book of Psalms, none of them met with any passage that seemed to bear the most distant reference to the occasion, except one, who, reading this verse in the 65th Psalm,—'Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causet to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts,'—was nominated in preference to all the rest, as being manifestly pointed out by this apposite passage to be the choice of Providence. On another occasion of a similar kind, it is mentioned in the Life of Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, when that prelate was presiding at an election for the see of Rochester, that the successful candidate obtained the appointment in consequence of his turning up this passage: 'Bring the best robe, and put it on him.'

"Several other instances occur of individuals who, although their appointment was not objected to, yet being so unfortunate as to have an unfavourable omen, were haunted with suspicion of disaster or of crime during the rest of their lives. A few cases may be mentioned,—one was that of a bishop, who, at his ordination, unexpectedly turned up that verse, in the Gospel of Mark, relating to John the Baptist, where it is said, 'The king sent an executioner to prison, and beheaded him,'—an omen which overwhelmed the officiating minister, and led him to address the newly-elected bishop as one that was destined to die a premature and violent death. A second was that of a deacon, who, on opening the Bible, found the leaf wanting,—a circumstance which, among his superstitious countrymen, excited a general suspicion of there being some secret cause, some important qualification wanting, that unfitted him for the sacred office. And a third was that of a bishop who, having led a scandalously immoral life, was accused by his people, before a council, of a variety of crimes; which, said his accusers, we are constrained to expose and lay bare before the world, in accordance with the augury that was given at his ordination, and which was taken from this passage of the Gospel, 'He left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.'" Mark xiv. 52.

So prevalent was the practice of Bibliomancy that various councils of the church found it necessary to prohibit it in the strongest terms. Thus the council of Vannes, A. D. 465, decreed that "whoever of the clergy or laity should be detected in the practice of this art, either as consulting or teaching it, should be cast out of the communion of the church." The council of Agde, about sixty years after, repeated this canon, which was also passed by the first council of Orleans about five years thereafter with little variation. The practice obtained mostly in the West, especially in France, where, for several ages, it was customary on the consecration of a new bishop, to consult the Bible concerning him by this mode of divination. At the Norman Conquest Bibliomancy was introduced into England. At the consecration of William, the second Norman bishop of the diocese of Norwich, the Bible opened at these words, "Not this man, but Barabbas," from which it was concluded, that this bishop should not long continue, and that a robber should come in his place. William died soon after his consecration, and was succeeded by Herbert de Lozinga, another Norman, who was the chief tool in the hands of King William Rufus, in openly selling all ecclesiastical benefices. This simoniacal trader in church preferments had purchased the abbey of Winchester and the abbey of Ramsay for himself. He had also obtained, by the same unlawful means, the bishopric of Norwich, and at his consecration the Bible opened at the words which Christ spake to Judas the betrayer, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" These words, taken in connection with those which had occurred at the consecration of his predecessor, struck him forcibly, leading him to think of his past conduct. In token of his repentance, he built the cathedral church of Norwich, of which he laid the first stone in A. D. 1096. His episcopal residence had been at Thetford, but he transferred it to Norwich, where it has continued down to the present time. See DIVINATION.

BIBRACTE, a goddess anciently worshipped at Autun, in the province of Burgundy in France. The ancient name of the city was Bibracte, capital of the Ædui, and a place of great importance among the ancient Romans. An inscription to the goddess Bibracte is mentioned by Montfaucon; but whether she was a deity separate from the city, or simply the city deified, it is impossible to say.

BIDDELIANS, the followers of John Biddle, the father of English Socinianism. This individual was born in 1616, at Wotton-under-Edge, and educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of A. M. in 1641. A few years after, he published a pamphlet in which he broached, for the first time, principles subversive of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. For this offence he was seized and committed to prison. An act was even passed in 1648, declaring it to be a capital offence to publish anything in opposition to the being and perfections of God, the deity of the Son and of the Spirit. This act, however, never came into operation. Biddle was subjected to severe persecution for his opinions. He was tried for his life in 1655, but he was rescued by Cromwell from his perilous position, and sent into banishment to the Scilly Islands. He soon after recovered his freedom for a time, but was again exiled to the same place on the Restoration, and died a prisoner there in 1662. The 'Twofold Catechism' by this noted Socinian caused great excitement both in England and on the Continent. It was ably answered by various divines of the period, but by none more ably than by the celebrated Dr. John Owen, in his 'Vindiciæ Evangelicæ.' The views of Biddle, on the person of Christ, are thus given by himself, in a 'Confession of Faith concerning the Holy Trinity,' which he published in 1648: "I believe that there is one chief Son of the Most High God; or spiritual, heavenly, and perpetual Lord and King; set over the Church by God, and second cause of all things pertaining to our salvation; and, consequently, the intermediate object of our faith and worship; and that this Son of the Most High God is none but Jesus Christ, the second person of the Holy Trinity." Biddle thus, like the other Socinians, calls Christ the Son of God, not on account of his nature, but on account of the Divine sovereignty with which he is invested as King and Head of the Church. See SOCINIANS.

BIDDING PRAYERS. It was one part of the office of the deacon in the primitive Christian church to direct the people in the different parts of public worship. For this purpose, certain forms of words were used when each part of the service was to commence. In the Apostolical Constitutions a form of this sort occurs immediately after the dismissal of catechumens and penitents. It commences with these words, "Let no one of those that are not allowed come near. As many as are believers let us fall upon our knees. Let us pray to God through his Christ. Let us all intensely beseech God through his Christ." Then follow several petitions in regular order. Chrysostom refers to the practice of bidding prayers. It would appear that the deacon, when believers were alone, all the catechumens having left the church, commanded all to fall down upon the ground or on their knees, and to make particular petitions, for the church and the world generally, for the church in the district, and the bishop or pastor, as well as other special petitions, at the close of which the deacon pronounced the words, "Let us rise," when all rose up together. In bidding prayers, then, the deacon invited the people to engage in prayer specially for all orders of men in the church, and for the whole state of the world. There was a bidding prayer after the consecration of the elements in the Lord's Supper, which is mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions. It was to the effect that God would receive the gift that was then offered to him, to his altar in heaven, as a sweet-smelling savour, by the mediation of his Christ. The deacon also after the communion called upon the people to return thanks for the benefits which they had received. After an exhortation to this effect, he bid them rise up and commend themselves to God by Christ. At the close of the whole service he bid the people bow their heads to God in Christ, and receive the benediction. The whole of the devotions, in short, of the public assemblies of the early Christians were regulated and guided by the deacons of the church. See PRAYER.

BIER. See FUNERAL RITES.

BIFROST, the tremulous and oscillating bridge, which, according to the Scandinavian mythology, connected the terrestrial and supernal worlds. This most ingenious structure, by man called the rainbow, formed the thoroughfare of the gods, while its red stripe emitting flames of fire, effectually prevented the frost and mountain-giants from ascending to heaven. Not only did the gods descend to the earth by means of the bifrost, but the disembodied souls of men returned along the same road to their celestial home. In the Scandinavian creed, as in the Jewish and Christian, the rainbow was symbolical of the world's safety. When the black giants, the thunder clouds, threatened to take heaven by storm, and the flashing, pealing electric bolts had scattered and hurled them to the earth, it was displayed in all its dazzling prismatic splendour, to the anxious gaze of mortals, as the signal of victory on the part of the Æsir over the Ymir offspring; as the pledge of the supremacy of the good over the evil; and as the sure promise of the perpetuity of the universe.

BIKUNIS, a class of nuns in Japan, who wander about with their heads shaved, begging alms. They are in general very profligate in their manners.

BILAL, one of the four officiating priests attached to each mosque among the Malays in Malacca. This was the name of the first Muezzin in the time of Mohammed, and is used by the Malays instead of MUEZZIN (which see). The duties of the Bilal are various. He calls to public prayers: he recites also the Talkin, the service for the dead after the corpse has been lowered into the grave. When a goat or bullock is sacrificed, he receives two fingers' breadth of flesh from the victim's neck.

BILOCATION, the miraculous property which some of the canonized saints of the Church of Rome are said to possess, of appearing in two places at once, or of passing with the velocity of spirits from one place to another. Thus it is said of Liguori, that "God rewarded his zeal by several prodigies; for one day, a person going to confession at the house where Alphonsus lived, found him there at the very time for beginning the sermon in the church. After he had finished his confession, he went straight to the church, and found Alphonsus a good way advanced in his sermon. He was astonished at this circumstance, for at his departure he had left Alphonsus hearing the confessions of other persons. It was therefore reported that Alphonsus heard confessions at home at the same time that he was preaching in the church." This instance of bilocation is extracted from a Life of Liguori, translated by Dr. now Cardinal Wiseman.

BINDACHUL, a town near Mirzapur, to the north of Bengal in Hindustan, where there is a temple dedicated to the sanguinary goddess KALI (which see). At this place religious ceremonies are constantly performed; and thousands of animals are offered in sacrifice. It is chiefly frequented for religious purposes by the THUGS (which see), or leagued murderers, who before setting out on their cruel expeditions, betake themselves to the temple of the goddess, whom they regard as the patroness of murder. They present their prayers and supplications at her shrine, and vow, in the event of success in her service, a large proportion of the booty.

BIRDS (WORSHIP OF). This species of idolatry may have had its origin in a perversion of the statement in Gen. i. 2, that the Spirit of God brooded or fluttered over the face of the waters. Accordingly, a bird is often found to play a conspicuous part in almost all systems of cosmogony. In ancient Greece, Zeus the supreme God was changed into a swan, to make Leda or dark chaos productive. The Zeus of India, Brahma, is surnamed Narayana, or he who moves upon the waters. Among the Aztecs, the eagle is synonymous with their supreme god. The condor was in Peru the symbol of the Deity. The Scandinavians figured the world by the ash Yggdrasil, at the top of which was Odin, under the form of an eagle. Among the ancient Romans, the eagle was the bird of Jove; Juno, the queen of the gods, is represented as having been drawn in a chariot by peacocks; to Apollo were consecrated the hawk and the raven. In the ancient mythology of Egypt we find reference to various sacred birds. The inhabitants of Thebes or Heliopolis worshipped the eagle, which was probably regarded as sacred to the sun. The hawk was also regarded by the Egyptians as sacred, and the ibis, a species of stork, which was regarded as particularly useful in destroying all kinds of serpents. Cuvier has clearly ascertained the species to which the sacred ibis belongs. Its colour, he says, is white, with long disconnected plumes on the wings, of a glossy blackness. In various parts of modern heathendom particular birds are viewed as sacred, for one reason or another, but most generally because they are supposed to be the receptacles of the spirits of deceased relatives. At the Gaboon on the West Coast of Africa, the natives will not eat the parrot because it talks, and too nearly resembles man. Other tribes venerate the owl, and others the vulture. But the variety of birds which have become objects of worship is small compared with the animals which have been regarded as sacred.

BIRTH. In Eastern countries from the earliest times, the birth of a child was eagerly looked for by the parents, and among the ancient Hebrews to be childless was regarded as one of the heaviest calamities with which a married female could be visited. Hence Rachel's hasty exclamation, "Give me children, or I die," and Hannah's vow recorded in 1 Sam. i. 11, "O Lord of hosts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thine handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man child, then I will give him unto the Lord all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head." From Ezek. xvi. 4. it seems to have been the custom to wash the child as soon as it was born, to rub it with salt, and to wrap it in swaddling clothes. The period which the cruel Egyptian monarch chose for the murder of the Hebrew male children, as referred to in Exod. i., appears to have been when the infants were put into the stone troughs for the purpose of being washed. The birth of a son was regarded in the East as an event of peculiar interest, and servants accordingly were dispatched to convey the glad tidings, but no similar joy was manifested on the birth of a daughter. The only ceremony attendant upon the latter event among the modern Jews is, that about six weeks after the birth of a female child, the parents collect a number of young children around the cradle, when they lift up the child and announce her name, giving way for a time to mirth and gladness. On the birth of a child, the modern Jews put up a prayer to God, that if it be a daughter she may resemble Eve, and obtain a husband similar to Adam; and if it be a son, that he may marry a wife like Eve, gentle and obedient. In his 'Modern Judaism.

Mr. Allen gives the following detailed account of the ceremonies attendant on the delivery of a Jewish female. "When a Jewish woman is pregnant, and the period of her delivery is at hand, her chamber is to be decently prepared and furnished with all things necessary for the occasion. The husband, or some other Jew of approved character, takes a piece of chalk, and describes a circle upon each of the walls or partitions around the bed, and upon the door both inside and outside: upon each wall or partition, and about the bed, he also inscribes, in Hebrew characters, the words Adam, Chava, Chuts, Liliith; that is, Adam, Eve; Begone, Liliith: by which they signify, that if the woman be pregnant with a boy, they wish God to give him a wife like Eve, and not like Liliith; but if of a girl, that she may hereafter be a helpmate to her husband, as Eve was to Adam, and not refractory and disobedient, like Liliith. On the inside of the door are likewise written the names, as is alleged, of three angels, which are supposed to defend the child from the injuries of Liliith; who is said to have been transformed into a female demon, and to take delight in debilitating and destroying young infants. By these methods the room is believed to be sufficiently protected against the intrusion of all evil spirits. Leo Modena, who wrote at the commencement of the seventeenth century, represents the use of anti-demoniacal charms on these occasions, as a vain superstition, not very general at that time among his brethren in Italy: but Buxtorf, who wrote about the middle of that century, states it to be commonly practised by the Jews in Germany, and Addison, towards the end of the same century, mentions it as a general custom of the Jews in Barbary. Among the German Jews it still continues."

The Hebrew women were in the habit of nursing their own children unless prevented by some unavoidable necessity; and they made a public feast at the weaning of their children. It is a received doctrine in the Jewish schools, that if children were born lame, or blind, or defective, it was a punishment inflicted for the sin of their parents, who had neglected to discharge some of the legal ordinances, especially some peculiar rites of cleansing and purification.

BIRTH-DAY. Among the ancient Jews the birth-day of a son was celebrated as a festival, which was solemnised every succeeding year with renewed demonstrations of festivity and joy, especially those of sovereign princes, as in the case of Herod, Mat. xiv. 6. Every classical scholar will naturally call to remembrance the birth-day games which were wont to be celebrated in honour of the Roman Emperors. To the student of the Sacred Volume the birth-day feast prepared by Pharaoh for all his servants, as mentioned in Gen. xl. 20, will readily occur. Such feasts have been common from the earliest times.

In the early ages of the Christian church, it was the frequent custom of believers to speak of death as a birth, and of their Christian relatives when they died as then for the first time born. Accordingly the anniversary of their death was held by the relatives as a festival sacred to the memory of their Christian worth, and the occasion was still further hallowed by the observance of the Lord's Supper. It was usual also in these primitive times to celebrate festivals in honour of the martyrs who had fallen in the cause of Christ, and the time selected for such festivals was their birth-day, as it was termed in the language of the period, that is the day on which their earthly troubles had come to a close, and they had entered into eternal rest. This was familiarly spoken of as their birth, or the commencement of a new and better life. The place of meeting on those solemn occasions was the tombs of the martyrs, which were generally situated in secluded and sequestered spots, removed from the busy haunts of men. Such hallowed places were to the early Christians favourite places of resort. The return of the sacred festival, therefore, which summoned them thither, was eagerly hailed as a joyful occasion; and crowds of Christian pilgrims might be seen at these periods wending their way to some martyr's sepulchre. There the birth-day ANNIVERSARIES (which see), were observed with the usual formalities of religious worship, and the celebration of the Lord's supper. An AGAPE (which see), or love-feast was also partaken of in many cases at the martyrs' tombs. See CATACOMBS.

BIRTHRIGHT, the peculiar privileges of the first-born son. These among the Jews were three; a double portion of the paternal inheritance, the right to exercise the priestly office, and authority or rule over his brethren. The Chaldee Paraphrast says the first of these was given to Joseph, the second to Levi, and the third to Judah, in consequence of Reuben having forfeited all the privileges of his birthright. It is plain from the case of Esau, who sold his birthright, that the first-born was entitled to a peculiar blessing at the hand of the parent, and also that he wore a special robe or dress of some kind or another, which marked him out from the rest of the family. He sat at table next to his father, and enjoyed other advantages which gave him a kind of authority in the family. But the greatest and most important of all his privileges was that he was consecrated to God. Hence the charge of profaneness brought against Esau by the apostle Paul, inasmuch as he was impiously divesting himself of one of the most sacred blessings which attached to his position as the first-born. The young men of the children of Israel whom Moses sent, as we are told in Exod. xxiv. 5, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice peace-offerings unto the Lord, are supposed to be the first-born or chiefs of families or tribes, to whom was yielded this solemn office of the primogeniture. This is the last act recorded of the patriarchal economy among the sons of Israel; for soon after, the first-born were redeemed from that duty by the substitution of the Levites in their stead, who from that time became in a peculiar manner the Lord's, dedicated to his service. That the price of redemption was peculiarly paid for the first-born appears clearly, both from the law as laid down in Numb. iii. 45, and also from this circumstance, that if the first-born died within the month or thirty days, from which time, as the Jewish doctors tell us, the redemption money was held to be due, or died even on the thirtieth day, the sum enjoined by the law was not to be paid, or, if it had been previously advanced, was to be returned. These first-born, or the substitutes which redeemed them, and the first-born of the clean cattle, or the redemption of the first-born of the unclean cattle and the first-fruits of their land, were so peculiarly the Lord's, as to be incapable of any other application.

The modern Jews hold that if the first-born of an Israelite be a son, the father is bound to redeem him from the thirtieth day forward. If he redeem him before that time, it is not accounted a redemption; if he omit it after that, he is regarded as guilty of neglecting an affirmative precept. The priests and Levites having been in ancient times exempted from this law of redemption, it is in the same way considered not obligatory on those who are believed to be descendants of Aaron. An account of the ceremony of redeeming the first-born among the modern Jews may interest the reader. "On the thirty-first day after the birth, the father sends for a priest and some friends. The person who acts the part of a priest is one who is supposed to be a descendant of Aaron. The father places his little son on a table, and says to the priest, 'My wife who is an Israelitess, has brought me a first-born, but the law assigns him to thee.' The priest asks, 'Dost thou therefore surrender him to me?' The father answers in the affirmative. The priest then inquires which he would rather have, his first-born, or the five shekels required for his redemption. The father replies that he prefers his son, and, charging the priest to accept the money subjoins these benedictions: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who hast sanctified us with thy precepts, and commanded us to perform the redemption of the son. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who hast preserved us alive, sustained us, and brought us to enjoy this season.'

"The father then produces the value of five shekels—which, among the German Jews, is regarded as a ducat, valued at about nine shillings and fourpence—and the priest asks the mother if she had been delivered of any other child or miscarried. If she answers in the negative, the priest takes the money, lays it on the head of the child and says, 'This son being a first-born, the blessed God hath commanded us to redeem him, as it is said, "And those that are to be redeemed, from a month old thou shalt redeem them, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs." Numb. xviii. 16. While thou wast in thy mother's womb, thou wast in the power of thy Father who is in heaven, and in the power of thy parents; but now thou art in my power, for I am a priest. But thy father and mother are desirous to redeem thee, for thou art a sanctified first-born; as it is written, "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Sanctify unto me all the first-born, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and beast, it is mine." Exod. xiii. 2. He then turns to the father, and says, 'I have received these five shekels from thee for the redemption of this thy son; and behold he is therewith redeemed according to the law of Moses and Israel.'

"This ceremony is followed by feasting and jollity, in which they are permitted to indulge, even when the day of redemption happens to fall on one of their fasts.

"It is not permitted to drive a bargain with the priest, or to agree with him for a lower price than the value of five shekels. This would annul the redemption, and it would require to be done a second time. The priest is at liberty afterwards to return the money to the father; but it must be as an absolute gift, neither preceded nor accompanied by any condition.

"When the father dies before the thirty-first day, the mother is not bound to redeem her son; but a piece of parchment, or a small plate of silver, is suspended on the child's neck, with a Hebrew inscription, signifying—A first-born son not redeemed, or A son of a priest; to teach him, when he grows up, that he belongs to the priest, and must redeem himself."

BISHOP (Gr. Episcopos, an overseer), one who in Episcopal churches has the oversight of the clergy of a diocese or district. The origin and true nature of this office has given rise to the important controversy which has long been carried on between Episcopalians and Presbyterians in reference to the government of the Christian church. The fundamental article of the Episcopal churches on the matter of church government is, that a bishop is superior to a presbyter. The Presbyterian churches, on the other hand, maintain, that all the ministers of the word, all whose office it is to preach and administer the sacraments, are on a level in respect of office and authority.

I. In support of their views, the Episcopalians are accustomed to make their appeal to Scripture, and the doctrine and practice of the ancient Christian church.

1. They draw an argument from the constitution of the Jewish church, in which there were different orders or degrees. The Levites were appointed to discharge various subordinate offices connected with the tabernacle and the temple; the priests were set apart to offer sacrifices; and the high priest, while special duties and privileges were assigned to him, was superior in rank to the whole ecclesiastical officers, and exercised authority over them.

2. They argue that our blessed Lord himself, in the exercise of his ministry while on earth, established a distinction of ranks among the office-bearers of the church, the apostles being placed at the head, corresponding to the bishops, while the seventy disciples answered to the presbyters.

3. They adduce the instances of Timothy and Titus, whom they allege to have been bishops, the one of Ephesus, and the other of Crete.

4. They maintain that by the expression "angels of the churches," in the book of Revelation, can be meant no other than bishops.

Such are the chief arguments drawn from the Word of God by Episcopalians, in support of the doctrine that bishops are an order distinct from and superior to the order of presbyters. But an additional and corroborative class of arguments, they assert, is to be found in the teaching and practice of the ancient Christian church. The office of apostle, it is admitted, stands by itself, and belonged exclusively to the twelve chosen and set apart by our Lord himself. But in virtue of the authority with which they were invested by their divine Master, the apostles nominated their successors, to whom was given the name of bishops. Thus, according to Episcopal writers, the most ancient distinction which occurs is that of the superior clergy into the three separate orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, such a distinction being supported, as they allege, by some of the earliest and most trust-worthy writers of the Christian church. Ignatius, for example, in his epistle to the Magnesians, exhorts them to "do all things in unity, under the bishop presiding in the place of God, and the presbyters in the place of the apostolical senate, and the deacons to whom is committed the service and ministry of Jesus Christ." Clemens Alexandrinus says that "there are in the church the different degrees or progressions of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, in imitation of the angelical glory." Origen refers to such a distinction ten times in his works. "One that is twice married," he says, "can neither be made bishop, presbyter, nor deacon." According to Tertullian, in his work on baptism, "The right of baptizing belongs to the chief priest, who is the bishop; and, after him, to presbyters and deacons, yet not without the authority of the bishop, for the honour of the church, in the preservation of which consists the church's peace."

The first institution of the order of bishops is alleged by Clemens Alexandrinus, followed by Tertullian, to have originated with the apostle John, who, when he was settled at Ephesus, went about the neighbouring regions ordaining bishops, and setting apart such men for the clergy as were signified to him by the Holy Ghost. Irenæus declares that there were bishops as well as presbyters in the apostles' days; and both he and Tertullian allege that the apostles ordained a bishop at Rome. According to the testimony of many ancient writers, James, the brother of our Lord, was the first bishop of Jerusalem. Jerome says he was ordained by the apostles immediately after our Lord's crucifixion. Epiphanius calls him the first bishop; Chrysostom says he was made bishop by Christ himself; the author of the Apostolical Constitutions affirms that he was appointed both by Christ and his apostles. On the statement also of the ancient writers, Euodius is said to have been ordained by the apostles bishop of Antioch, and after him Ignatius; Polycarp, the disciple of John, to have been made bishop of Smyrna; and Papias, bishop of Hierapolis. The ancient writers generally assert that Timothy was ordained bishop of Ephesus by the apostle Paul, who is also said to have ordained Titus bishop of Crete, and Epaphroditus bishop of Philippi.

In confirmation of the assertion that bishops have existed from the earliest times as an order distinct from and superior to the order of presbyters, Episcopalian writers are accustomed to refer to the titles of honour which were wont to be given to bishops in the primitive church. The most ancient of these is the title of apostles. Thus Theodoret says expressly, "The same persons were anciently called promiscuously both bishops and presbyters, whilst those who are now called bishops were called apostles." At an after period they contented themselves with the appellation of successors of the apostles. Another title which they received in token of respect and the high honour in which they were held, was the appellation of princes of the people, or, as Optatus and Jerome, to distinguish them from secular princes styles them, princes of the church. Sometimes they were called presidents or provosts of the church, chief priests, and princes of the clergy. Jerome, indeed, and other writers, frequently use the title as applied to a bishop, of pontifex maximus or chief priest; a title which, though now assumed as the sole prerogative of the Bishop of Rome, denoted in early times any bishop whatever. In the same way, also, we find the title Papa or Pope, Father of the Church, and Father of the Clergy, used as a common title in some ancient writers, of all bishops, and not of the Bishop of Rome exclusively. Nay, they are sometimes spoken of under a higher appellation still, as fathers of fathers, and bishops of bishops; and Gregory Nazianzen styles them patriarchs, while Cyprian says that every bishop is vicar or vicergerent of Christ.

Not only were the bishops in the ancient Christian church superior in title, but also, as Episcopalian writers argue, superior in office to the presbyters. The bishop, in their view, was the absolute independent minister of the church, while the presbyters were merely his assistants, receiving all their authority and power from his hands. In proof of this, Ignatius is quoted, who says in his Epistle to the church of Smyrna, "Let no one perform any ecclesiastical office without the bishop;" and the council of Laodicea to the same effect, "The presbyters shall do nothing without the consent of the bishop." This restriction would seem to have applied not only to baptism and the Lord's supper, but also to the office of preaching. On the testimony of Jerome, Chrysostom, and Epiphanius, it is held that the power of ordaining the superior clergy, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, was never intrusted into the hands of presbyters, but performed exclusively by bishops. Chrysostom indeed makes this the only point of difference between the two offices. It is also alleged by Episcopalians, that in early times bishops always retained to themselves the power of calling presbyters to account, and censuring them if necessary, a power which plainly indicated superiority in rank and authority.

II. In replying to these arguments of the Episcopalians, Presbyterians allege in the outset that they must not be understood as denying, but on the contrary fully admitting the existence of bishops, even in apostolic times, not however, in the sense in which the term bishop is used in Episcopalian churches, that is, a dignitary who rules over the clergy of his own diocese, but simply as an overseer or pastor of a flock, a teaching presbyter on a level in point of rank and authority in the church with other presbyters. It is not the existence of presbyter bishops in the primitive churches that Presbyterians deny, but only that of diocesan bishops, men whose only duties are government or discipline, ordination, and confirmation.

The arguments of Episcopalians in reference to the alleged existence in the early Christian church of diocesan bishops, distinct from, and exercising rule over presbyters, are met by Presbyterians in somewhat the following manner.

1. The argument from the Jewish church as being of the nature of a hierarchy, is answered by alleging that at best the argument amounts to nothing more than a presumption in favour of the Episcopal view. It may be stated in the following form. In the ancient Jewish church a gradation of ranks in the ministry existed. It may be inferred, therefore, that Jesus Christ, in framing the constitution of the Christian church, would adopt a similar plan. The argument thus sought to be established on a mere unsupported inference, Presbyterians consider as both presumptive and presumptuous: presumptive, inasmuch as it proceeds on a mere supposition; and presumptuous, inasmuch as it dares to dictate to the All-Wise himself what course of conduct it behoved him to follow. And, besides, there is so wide and marked a difference between the Jewish and the Christian dispensations, that any analogical argument drawn from the one to the other is neither legitimate nor safe. This argument accordingly is regarded by some Episcopal writers themselves as quite invalid.

2. In answer to the argument that our Lord himself while on earth established a distinction among the office-bearers of the church, by appointing apostles corresponding to the bishops, and the seventy disciples corresponding to the presbyters, it is argued by Presbyterians that the analogy has no force, the seventy having derived their commission directly from Christ, as well as the apostles did, and that, as far as appeared, both their mission and their authority were the same as those of the apostles. But besides, the argument is destroyed by the fact, that the Christian church in its fixed constitution did not, and could not, possibly exist till after the resurrection of Christ from the dead, that great event being the fundamental article on which its whole doctrine rested.

3. The argument deduced from the cases of Timothy and Titus, who are alleged to have been both of them bishops, the one of Ephesus, and the other of Crete, is met on the part of Presbyterians by a decided denial of the allegation. The only evidence to be found in Scripture occurs in the postscripts to the Epistles, addressed to them by Paul, which postscripts are admitted on all hands to be of no authority, having been appended long after the Epistles themselves were written. But not only is evidence wanting in favour of Timothy and Titus having been invested with the office of diocesan bishops, but all the evidence which can be adduced from Scripture on the subject goes to refute the idea that they ever held any such office. Timothy is called not a bishop, but an evangelist, in the Epistles addressed to him, and thus he stood obviously next in rank to an apostle, and had like them a general care of the churches. He was appointed to ordain elders, who are also called bishops, in every city. He was therefore not a bishop, but an archbishop, an office which on all hands is admitted to have had no existence in the apostolical church. Besides, the language of Paul addressed both to Timothy and Titus is completely opposed to the supposition of either the one or the other having been the bishop of a fixed diocese. On this subject Dr. King well remarks, in his able work in exposition and defence of Presbyterian church government: "It has been often asserted and resolutely argued that Timothy was Bishop of Ephesus, and Titus of Crete. But these assertions and arguments have little plausibility; the simplest reading of the New Testament shows them to be forced in the extreme. 'I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus.' Was it needful or decent to beseech a bishop to abide in his diocese? If so, the vice of clerical absenteeism, as has been often observed, had a very early and respectable origin, 'For this cause left I thee in Crete.' Is a bishop in his diocese from being left there? and is he left there for a particular object, and not to fulfil all the duties of his episcopate? The epistles bear that the parties addressed had been fellow-travellers with Paul, and they are required to make all despatch to rejoin him in his journeys. In other portions of the New Testament we find them at various places with the apostle, and sharing in all the changefulness of his eventful pilgrimage. In the last notice we have of Timothy, Paul enjoins him to repair to Rome, 'in words which prove,' says Mr. Newman, 'that Timothy was not, at least as yet, Bishop of Ephesus, or of any other church.' This view of the subject is well put by Dodwell, one of the stoutest champions of Episcopacy. 'Many arguments prove that the office of Timothy was not fixed, but itinerary. That he had been requested to abide still at Ephesus, is testified by the apostle, (1 Tim. i. 3.) He was therefore, when requested, an itinerary. His work of an evangelist is proof to the same effect, (2 Tim. iv. 5.) His journeys so numerous with Saint Paul, and the junction of his name, in common with the apostle, in the inscriptions of the epistles to the Thessalonians, furnish similar proofs. In like manner, the same apostle commands Titus, and him only, to ordain, in Crete, elders in every city, (Tit. i. 5.) He says that he had been left to set in order things that were wanting. He must have been a companion of Paul when he was left. And truly other places also teach us that he was a companion of Saint Paul, and no more restricted to any certain locality than the apostle himself. It is true that Timothy was at Ephesus, and did important work there. But the same can be asserted with at least equal truth of his apostolic superior: 'Watch, and remember, that, by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.' When Paul could so speak to the Ephesian elders, why is he not forthwith proclaimed Bishop of Ephesus? In these early times, Paul, Timothy, and other fellow-travellers, were occasionally together in the same place, so that a single congregation were favoured temporarily with a whole college of diocesans. But to counterbalance this extraordinary privilege, these clergymen of the first order were liable to quit as they had come, in company, and leave a church in the sad situation which Onderdonk ascribes to Ephesus, of having 'no bishop.'"

4. The argument that the "angels of the churches" in the Book of Revelation, can mean nothing else but bishops, is answered by declaring it to be an altogether unwarranted assumption, and even admitting that the expression denotes bishops, it still remains to be proved that they were diocesan bishops, as Episcopalians would allege. On the contrary, each of the churches is declared to have had an "angel" or bishop, and this would seem to favour the Presbyterian rather than the Episcopalian view.

Presbyterians, however, not contented with repelling the arguments of Episcopalians, build an argument based on Scripture in favour of their own opinions. They allege that it is quite capable of proof from an examination of various passages in the New Testament, that bishop and presbyter are convertible terms. On this subject we may quote the following remarks by Dr. Dick in his 'Lectures on Theology:' "When Paul was on his way to Jerusalem, he stopped at Miletus, from which he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders or presbyters of the church. No mention, you will observe, is made of the bishop; but we are at no loss to find the reason. It had several bishops, and these were the very presbyters whom the Apostle had summoned to meet him, for he says to them, 'Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers.' Perhaps prejudice or party-zeal had some influence in rendering the word overseers, in this instance, because the term, in the original, if rendered in the usual way, would not accord with the Episcopalian scheme. The Greek word episcopous, which, indeed, literally signifies overseers, should have been translated bishops here, as it is in other places; but, then, it would have been evident to all, that Paul knew of no distinction between a bishop and a presbyter, because those who were first called presbyters, are now called bishops. In his Epistle to Titus, he says to him, 'For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee. If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly. For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God.' It would be a waste of time to show, that here the bishop and the presbyter are the same person, and no man can resist the evidence, however much he may be disposed. The presbyter must be blameless, for the bishop must be blameless. There would be no force in this conclusion if a bishop and a presbyter were different persons. And hence you perceive the reason why, in his First Epistle to Timothy, he makes no mention at all of presbyters, but speaks only of bishops and deacons. It is, that he did not consider the two former as different; and consequently, in describing the qualifications of the one class, he describes those of the other. For the same reason he takes no notice of presbyters, in his Epistle to the Philippians, but addresses himself to the bishops and deacons. He thus furnishes us with a new argument against Episcopacy. There were several bishops in the Church of Philippi; but how could this be, according to the scheme of our antagonists? More bishops than one in a church seem to them as monstrous as more heads than one upon a human body. It follows that the bishops of Philippi were plain presbyters, and that such were the only bishops in the apostolic age."

In regard to the arguments drawn by Episcopalians from the teaching and practice of the ancient Christian church, Presbyterians readily concede that the Fathers speak of bishops as office-bearers in the church, and lists of the successive bishops of various important places are also to be found. Considerable uncertainty, however, hangs over these lists in consequence of the discrepancies which the statements of different writers exhibit. But even granting that these lists are correct, it still remains to be proved that these were diocesan and not presbyter bishops. Bishops and presbyters have been shown to be convertible terms in Scripture, applied both of them to the same individuals in many passages. If this be the case, then the demand of Episcopalians is reasonable, that Presbyterians should show how it was that the bishop came in process of time to be separate from, and superior to, the other presbyters. On this subject the views of Neander are very plausible. "Since the presbyters constituted a deliberative assembly, it would of course soon become the practice for one of their number to preside over the rest. This might be so arranged as to take place by some law of rotation, so that the presidency would thus pass in turn from one to the other. Possibly, in many places such was the original arrangement. Yet we find no trace, at least in history, of anything of this kind. But neither, as we have already observed, do we, on the other hand, meet with any vestige of a fact which would lead us to infer that the presidency over the presbyterial college was originally distinguished by a special name. However the case may have been then, as to this point, what we find existing in the second century enables us to infer, respecting the preceding times, that soon after the apostolic age the standing office of president of the presbytery must have been formed; which president, as having pre-eminently the oversight over all, was designated by the special name of episcopos, and thus distinguished from the other presbyters. Thus the name came at length to be applied exclusively to this presbyter, while the name presbyter continued at first to be common to all; for the bishops, as presiding presbyters, had no official character other than that of the presbyters generally.

"The aristocratic constitution will ever find it easy, by various gradual changes, to pass over to the monarchical; and circumstances where the need becomes felt of guidance by the energy and authority of an individual, will have an influence beyond all things else to bring about such a change. It may have been circumstances of this kind which, near the times dividing the first and second centuries, tended to give preponderance to a president of the council of elders, and to assign him his distinctive title, as the general overseer. Already, in the latter part of the age of St. Paul, we shall see many things different from what they had been originally; and so it cannot appear strange if other changes came to be introduced into the constitution of the communities, by the altered circumstances of the times immediately succeeding those of St. Paul or St. John. Then ensued those strongly marked oppositions and schisms, those dangers with which the corruptions engendered by manifold foreign elements threatened primitive Christianity. It was these dangers that had called the apostle John to Asia Minor, and induced him to make this country the seat of his labours. Amidst circumstances so embarrassing, amidst conflicts so severe from within and from without—for then came forth the first edict of Trajan against the Christians—the authority of individual men, distinguished for piety, firmness, and activity, would make itself particularly availing, and would be augmented by a necessity become generally apparent. Thus the predominant influence of individuals who, as moderators over the college of presbyters, were denominated bishops, might spring of itself out of the circumstances of the times in which the Christian communities were multiplied, without any necessity of supposing an intentional remodelling of the earlier constitution of the church. In favour of this view is also the manner in which we find the names 'presbyter' and 'bishop' interchanged for each other until far into the second century."

The valuable writings of Hippolytus, lately published by Chevalier Bunsen, show that in his time, that is, the earlier part of the third century, a town was synonymous with a diocese, and that a bishop was set over every city, and even every small town in which were resident any considerable number of Christians. The towns adjacent to Rome, instead of being included in the Roman See, had each its own bishop. Nay, even Hippolytus himself, the author of the works to which we refer, was bishop of Portus, which was merely the harbour of Rome, and a suburb of Ostia. Diocesan bishops, then, or the bishops of provinces, must have been introduced at a later period, at all events, than the early part of the third century. Its first appearance is generally considered to have been due to the rise of one class of the clergy in authority and influence over the rest. In the early ages, Christianity, as is well known, made progress chiefly in cities. As the Christians in the cities increased in numbers and wealth, the city bishops were placed in a new position. Each of them became the constant moderator of a presbytery, consisting partly of ordained ministers; while the country bishop was simply the pastor of a poor, and perhaps scattered congregation. The city bishops for at least a century before the time of Constantine had been gradually acquiring an undue influence. The establishment of Christianity, as the religion of the Roman Empire, gave great accession to their wealth and power. The great city bishops were admitted to the confidence of the emperor. The country gradually sunk in importance and weight. The chorepiscopi or itinerant ministers were the first to have their privileges infringed upon. Mosheim tells us, in speaking of the fourth century, that "this order was in most places suppressed by the bishops, with a design to extend their own authority, and enlarge the sphere of their power and jurisdiction." The first attack made upon them was in the council of Ancyra, A. D. 314, which decreed that they should not be permitted to ordain presbyters or deacons. The council of Antioch, A. D. 342, goes a step further, and ordains that those in villages or rural districts, or those called chorepiscopi, even though they have been ordained by bishops, "must not have the assurance to ordain an elder or deacon without the bishop in the city to which they and their district are subject." In the council of Laodicea, A. D. 360, it is still further decreed, that "bishops ought not to be appointed in villages and rural districts, but periodontai or visiting presbyters, and that these (bishops) already appointed, do nothing without the sanction of the city bishop." It was in the fourth century, according to the historian Du Pin, that "the distinction, distribution and subordination of churches were settled for the most part according to the form of the civil government. The civil provinces formed the body of an ecclesiastical province. The bishop of the civil metropolis was looked upon as the first bishop of the province. Some rights and prerogatives were assigned, and the care of overseeing the whole province was committed to him." Thus gradually and to some extent, at the time imperceptibly, was diocesan episcopacy introduced into the Church, and the bishop of a city congregation was converted into the ruler of an entire province, including all its congregations and all its clergy.

In regard to the appeal which Episcopalians confidently make to antiquity, it may be remarked, that Sir Peter King, in his 'Inquiry into the constitution of the Christian Church,' enters into an elaborate argument with the view of proving from the writings of the Fathers, that presbyters had a right to preach; that they baptized; that they administered the eucharist; that they presided in the consistories together with the bishops; that they had power to excommunicate, to restore penitents, and to confirm; and, finally, that they had the power of ordination. A few of the quotations from the early writers which Presbyterians are wont to adduce, may be briefly referred to. Chrysostom, they consider, is explicit in his testimony. Thus, he plainly observes, "between the bishop and presbyter there is little or no difference; and what the apostle had ascribed to the bishop, the same is also proper to the presbyter, since to the presbyter also the care of the Church is committed." Theodoret, again, remarks, with equal decision, "The apostles call a presbyter a bishop, as we showed when we expounded the Epistle to the Philippians, which may be also learned from this place; for, after the precepts proper to bishops, he describes the things that are proper to deacons. But as I said, of old they called the same men both bishops and presbyters." From the works of Augustine various passages might be quoted to the same effect. Let one quotation suffice. "The Apostle Paul proves, that he understood a presbyter to be a bishop. When he ordained Timothy a presbyter, he instructs him what kind of a person he ought to create a bishop, for what is a bishop unless the first presbyter, that is the chief priest; in fine, he calls his co-priests not otherwise than his co-presbyters." Jerome, also, whom Erasmus terms "the prince of divines," says in words which cannot be mistaken, "A presbyter is the same as a bishop, and before there were, by the instigation of the devil, parties in religion, and it was said among different people, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas the churches were governed by the common council of presbyters." And again, in another passage, "Our intention, in this remark, is to show that among the ancients presbyters and bishops were the very same. But that by little and little the plants of dissensions might be plucked up, the whole concern was devolved upon an individual. As the presbyters, therefore, know that they are subjected, by the custom of the Church, to him who is their president, so let the bishops know that they are greater than presbyters more by custom than by any appointment of the Lord."

Such are the arguments adduced by the Episcopalians on the one side, and the Presbyterians on the other, as to the keenly contested point, whether or not a bishop was, from apostolic times, an office-bearer in the Church of Christ, separate and distinct from a presbyter, being an ecclesiastical dignity of higher rank and authority in the Church.

The power exercised by a bishop, in the early ages of the Church, was strictly spiritual, no claim being arrogated over the persons and the property of men. The ancient bishops of Rome themselves submitted, in all temporal matters, to the authority of the emperors, and it was not until the time of Gregory VII. that the power was assumed to depose Christian princes. As long, however, as the bishops limited themselves solely to spiritual matters, the influence which they exercised, and the respect in which they were held, was such that no Christian traveller ventured to go to a distance from home without letters of credence from his own bishop, which formed a ready warrant for his admission into any Christian community with which he might wish to become connected.

The ancient bishops had the power of framing their own liturgies, provided they kept to the analogy of faith and sound doctrine; and it was within their province to appoint days of fasting to be observed in their particular churches. They were often appealed to as arbiters in secular causes, and Constantine passed a law to confirm the decisions of bishops in such matters, if given in their consistories (See ARBITRATORS). The outward tokens of respect shown to Christian bishops, in early times, were by bowing the head before them to receive their blessing, and kissing their hands. Jerome mentions a most objectionable practice which existed in his time, that the people sung hosannahs to their bishops, as was done to the Saviour on his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It was required by the ancient canons, that no clergyman should become a bishop until he was at least thirty years of age, that being the age at which our blessed Lord entered on his public ministry. This arrangement, however, in course of time, came to be departed from, and has often been greatly abused in the Romish Church, the office being sometimes conferred on minors, and even young children. Such a state of matters was utterly unknown in the primitive ages of the Church.

In the Church of Rome, the pope reserves to himself the right of electing bishops, and even in those cases in which sovereign princes claim the power of nominating to bishoprics, the choice must be approved and ratified by the pope. There are two kinds of Romish bishops, territorial bishops, and bishops in partibus infidelium. To understand this distinction, it must be borne in mind that Rome claims jurisdiction over the whole earth; and that, in the eye of Rome, the whole human family are divided into the faithful (fideles), and the infidels (infideles). Wherever a country is nationally Roman Catholic, the ordinary government of the Church is established, consisting of archbishops, bishops, and priests. But where the adherents of Rome do not form the majority of a country, or where the government does not recognize popery as the religion of the state, that country is ranked among the infidels, and provisional or temporary ecclesiastical arrangement is made in reference to it. For its spiritual government, vicars apostolic are appointed, who not being territorial bishops, or bishops in ordinary, are merely bishops in partibus infidelium, exercising spiritual authority over the faithful in those parts, but incapable of meeting in lawful synod, or of exercising any temporal authority whatever.

The consecration of a Romish bishop is conducted with great pomp and ceremony. In the course of it he takes an oath of fidelity to the pope and the Catholic Church, and engages to persecute and impugn to the utmost of his power all heretics, schismatics, and rebels against the pope and his successors. There are some bishops in the Church of Rome who are mere titular bishops without any dioceses whatever. The pope is regarded in the hierarchy of the Romish Church as universal bishop, and all bishops are suffragans of the ARCHBISHOP'S (which see). Bishop coadjutors are those who are appointed to assist other bishops who may happen to be unable, from age or any other infirmity, to discharge the duties of their office. These have sometimes the right of succeeding to their principal and sometimes not.

In the Greek Church the bishops are chosen from the regular clergy or Caloyers alone, having usually been archimandrites or abbots of some monastery. They are ordained through other bishops. In the Russo-Greek Church every bishop is independent in his own diocese, or dependent only upon the synod. Among the bishops two are called vicar-bishops, the one of Novgorod, the other of Moscow. These have a jurisdiction in some respects inferior to the rest, as any one may appeal from them to the bishop of the diocese, who is called their metropolitan. The office of these vicar-bishops is supposed to have been the same with that of the ancient chorepiscopi among the Greeks, but they are now consecrated prelates with full episcopal functions.

In the Lutheran churches on the continent, it is a point of their ecclesiastical law that the Lutheran, or even Calvinistic sovereigns, possess the jura episcopalia, or rights of a bishop over their Lutheran subjects. But the Lutheran church does not hold the divine right of Episcopacy; and although Prussia, for instance, is divided into different dioceses, the ministers of each diocese are not under a bishop, but as a mere human arrangement, under the inspection of a clergyman who is called superintendent or inspector, and several of these inspectors are under a general superintendent, who, again, can do nothing without consulting his consistory. Although the Lutheran churches allow the power of ordination to any clergyman, yet, as a practice, that rite is generally performed by a superintendent.

In the Church of Sweden, which is Episcopal, the consecration of a bishop is usually performed by the archbishop; but it may be performed by any one of the bishops. The badge of the bishop's office is a golden cross. In ordinations the bishop is assisted by some of the presbyters, and the people add their confirmation. Every bishop in Sweden is also a pastor of a congregation; but, to enable him the better to superintend his diocese, he is provided with a consistory, composed of both clerical and lay members, in the meetings of which he himself presides. Every bishop has it in his power to assemble his clergy in annual synod if he pleases. He is bound, however, to hold visitations throughout his diocese for purposes of discipline; to inquire into the state of the poor, to promote vaccination, and likewise state objects. The acts of these visitations are read in the presence of the people, and then lodged in the archives of the parish for reference in all time coming. The annual revenue of the several Swedish bishops arising from grain, annexed benefices, and other sources, varies from £300 to £1,000 sterling.

Denmark, including Iceland and its other dependencies, has nine bishops, and one superintendent-general, who are all appointed by the king. The bishop of Zealand, whose residence is in Copenhagen, is the proper metropolitan, who alone consecrates the others, and is himself consecrated by the bishop of Fyhn and Langeland, whose residence is nearest to Copenhagen. The king is anointed by the bishop of Zealand, who is permitted to wear the insignia of the highest order of knighthood, and being regarded as the chief dignitary of the church, he is consulted on all ecclesiastical matters. Each bishop is required to draw up and transmit to the king an annual report in reference to the state of the churches and schools of his diocese. Their salaries range from £400 to £1,200 sterling.

The earliest account on record of bishops belonging to the British church, is that, at the council of Arles in Gaul, A. D. 314, convened by the emperor Constantine in the fourth century, there were present the bishops of London, York, and Caerleon. In the Anglo-Saxon church, the bishops as well as other ecclesiastical dignitaries sat in the Witenagemote or supreme council of the nation, by whom, in the earlier period, they seem to have been appointed, receiving the confirmation of their dignity from the pope; but towards the Norman invasion, both bishops and abbots derived their promotion from the king. This was objected to by Gregory VII. about the close of the eleventh century, and the sovereign then invested them only with their temporalities; but in 1215, the great charter of King John confirmed to all the English monasteries and cathedral churches the right of electing their prelates. In the reign of Henry VIII. the election of bishops was thus arranged: "The king, upon the vacancy of the see, was to send his congé d'élire to the dean and chapter, or prior and convent, and, in case they delayed the election above twelve days, the crown was empowered to nominate the person by letters patent. And, after the bishop thus elected had taken an oath of fealty to the king, his Majesty, by his letters patent under the broad seal, signified the election to the archbishop, with orders to confirm it, and consecrate the elect. And lastly, if the persons assigned to elect and consecrate deferred the performing of their respective offices twenty days, they were to incur a præmunire." By a statute of Edward VI., a change was made in the manner of electing bishops, the choice being transferred from the dean and chapters to the crown. The alteration made by the statute of King Edward is no longer in force. The mode of election is now as follows: On the death of a bishop, the dean and chapter of the cathedral in the vacant diocese apply for the royal licence to elect a successor: the licence is sent to the cathedral; but at the same time the dean and chapter receive letters missive from the crown, mentioning the name of the person to be elected, and requiring them to proceed forthwith to the election. The consent of the person to be elected is then formally obtained, after which letters certifying the election are sent to the crown; the royal assent is asked, and the crown issues letters patent to the archbishop of the province requiring him to proceed with the confirmation and consecration. The individual thus elected must be fully thirty years of age. The confirmation having been gone through, the consecration must take place on a Sunday or holiday, three bishops at least being present at the ceremony, who lay their hands upon the head of the new bishop.

England and Wales are divided into twenty-eight bishoprics or dioceses. The bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, rank immediately after the archbishops, taking precedence of the other bishops, and having always a seat in the House of Lords. The bishop of Sodor and Man is not a lord of parliament, nor is he appointed by the king; the patronage of this see is vested in his grace the Duke of Athol. All the other English prelates, except the one who was last consecrated, are spiritual peers, and take precedence of all temporal barons. The bishops are addressed by the title of "Your Lordships" and "Right Reverend Fathers in God."

The first bishop introduced into Scotland appears to have been Palladius, who was consecrated a bishop by Celestine, bishop of Rome, and was sent into Scotland about A. D. 431. We learn from the Scottichronicon, that before the time of Palladius "the Scots had as teachers of the faith and administrators of the sacraments only presbyters and monks following the custom of the primitive church." Episcopalian writers allege that Ninian was the first Scottish bishop. His labours were chiefly confined to Galloway. Attempts were made from an early period to induce the Scots to adopt the ceremonies and observances of the Church of Rome, and to yield implicit subjection to the Pope. All however was unavailing. The Venerable Bede declares of the clergy in the time of Columba in the sixth century, that "in the remote part of the world in which they lived, they were unacquainted with the Roman decrees, and only taught their disciples out of the writings of the evangelists and apostles." Bishops existed for a long period in Scotland, but they were presbyter-bishops, not diocesan bishops. No trace can be found of the latter, indeed, before the time of Malcolm III. and Alexander I., or rather of David I. That about this period—the beginning of the twelfth century—Episcopacy must have been of recent introduction into Scotland, is evident; for on Turgot being elected bishop of St. Andrews in 1109, no one could be found in the kingdom duly qualified to consecrate him; and, accordingly, application was made to Thomas, Archbishop of York, who gladly consented to perform the solemn act, and, in consequence of his having done so, he claimed the Scottish bishops as the suffragans of his see. This claim, however, was denied by both the king and the clergy. David I., however, subjected the Scottish church to the Roman See, and her conformity to the Romish church continued without almost any interruption till the Reformation, though at various periods resistance was made to the encroachments of the Bishop of Rome.

At the Reformation in Scotland, when the hierarchy was shorn of its wealth, which was seized by the nobility, the new order of bishops, who got possession of the sees without the revenues, received the name of tulchan bishops, in allusion to a custom at that time prevalent in the Highlands, of placing a calf's skin stuffed with straw, called a tulchan, before cows, to induce them to give their milk. These pretended bishops, who were mere tools of the nobility, were compelled to demit their offices by an act of the General Assembly of the Scottish Church, held at Dundee in July 1580. In 1597 bishops were again introduced into the Scottish Church by James VI., who, on his succeeding to the throne of England, directed all his efforts towards the establishment of Prelacy in the northern part of his dominions; but in 1638 an Act of Assembly was passed putting an end to diocesan Episcopacy, and restoring the former constitution of the church by Kirk-sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies. Charles II. restored the order of bishops in Scotland in 1661, which, however, continued only for a short time, as in 1689, at the Revolution Settlement, an act was passed "abolishing Prelacy, and all superiority of any office in the church in this kingdom above presbyters." Thus was the order of diocesan bishops finally abolished in Scotland. From that period the Scottish Episcopal church, though it has continued to exist, has had bishops which exercise no more than spiritual authority over their own flocks.

In Ireland bishops seem for a long period to have been simply pastors of single parishes. They were located not only in cities but in villages, and many parts of the country. Speaking of their numbers, Archbishop Usher remarks, "We read in Nennius that at the beginning St. Patrick founded 365 churches, and ordained 365 bishops, besides 3,000 presbyters or elders. In process of time, the number of bishops was daily multiplied according to the pleasure of the metropolitan, and that not only so far that every church almost had a separate bishop; but that also, in some towns or cities, there were ordained more than one." The same author states, that "in 1151, Pope Eugenius, by his legate, John Papiron, transmitted four palls into Ireland, whither a pall had never been brought." Previously to that time, archbishops being unknown in that country, the bishops had ordained one another. But a change now took place in the constitution of the church in Ireland. The village bishoprics were converted into rural deaneries. Gradually the power of the Roman see over the Irish Church increased. The Reformation was mainly carried forward in Ireland by Archbishop Brown, a native of England, who was raised to the see of Dublin in 1535, and from that time the Church of Ireland sought to form a close alliance with the Church of England. Accordingly, after the restoration of Charles II., an Irish convocation adopted the Thirty-nine Articles. At the union of the two countries in 1800, the two churches were united under the title of the United Church of England and Ireland. The Church of Ireland consists of two archbishops and twelve bishops, each of whom visits every part of his diocese annually, the visitations of archdeacons being there unknown.

The first bishop that ever set foot in America was Dr. Samuel Seabury, who was ordained in Aberdeen by the Scottish Episcopal Church in 1784, for the diocese of Connecticut. After the conclusion of the war of independence, an act of Parliament was passed in 1787, authorizing the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, to consecrate three bishops for the dioceses of Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia. Such was the origin of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America.

BLACK CLERGY, the regular clergy of the RUSO-GREEK CHURCH (which see). From them the bishops are chosen. They consist of the Archimandrites or heads of monasteries; the Hegumeni, who preside over smaller convents; the Hieromonachi or monks who are priests; the Hierodiuconi, or monks who are deacons; and, finally, the monks. The Black clergy follow the rule of St. Basil, and like the Greeks observe great austerity.

BLACKFRIARS, a name given, from their dress, to the religious order of DOMINICANS (which see).

BLASPHEMY, the sin of cursing God, or speaking slightly of Him and his attributes. It was a capital crime among the ancient Hebrews, being punished with stoning by the law of Moses, Lev. xxiv. 16, "And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death." The criminal in this case was tried before the Sanhedrim, and being convicted, he was solemnly condemned to die. Thereupon he was led forth to execution without the camp. Each of the witnesses laid his hand upon the blasphemer's head, designed probably to indicate that they acquitted themselves of all share in his crime, and said, "Thy blood be on thine own head, which thou hast brought upon thyself by thine own guilt." The witnesses having removed their hands, the blasphemer was stoned to death by the whole congregation, the witnesses throwing the first stones.

In the early Christian church blasphemy incurred the highest ecclesiastical censures. This sin was distinguished into three kinds, which are noticed by Bingham in his 'Antiquities of the Christian Church.' The first of these was the blasphemy of apostates, whom the heathen persecutors obliged not only to deny, but to curse Christ. Pliny, in giving an account to the emperor Trajan of some Christians who apostatized in the persecution which raged in his time, says, "They all worshipped the Emperor's image, and the images of the gods, and also cursed Christ." The proposal to blaspheme Christ, seems indeed to have been the usual way in which the early Christians were called upon by their heathen persecutors to manifest to the world that they abjured their religion. (See APOSTASY.)

The second sort of blasphemy, which was visited with the heaviest censures of the church in early times, was that of those who made a profession of Christianity, but yet, either by impious doctrines or profane discourses, uttered blasphemous words against God, derogatory to His majesty and honour. In this sense, various kinds of heretics, as for example, Arians and Nestorians, were charged with blasphemy. Chrysostom classes blasphemers and fornicators together, as persons who were to be excluded from the Lord's table. But not only open and avowed heresy which dishonoured God or Christ; even the hasty utterance of profane blasphemous expressions brought an individual under the discipline of the church. The civil law also took cognizance of blasphemy as a heinous crime. In the Code of Justinian it was a capital offence, to be punished with death.

It has often been questioned whether, consistently with religious toleration, blasphemers ought to be punished by the civil authorities. But when we reflect upon the true nature of the offence, there can be little doubt upon the matter. "To plead," as Mr. Robert Hall well remarks, "for the liberty of divulging speculative opinions is one thing, and to assert the right of uttering blasphemy is another. For blasphemy, which is the speaking contumeliously of God, is not a speculative error; it is an overt act; a crime which no state should tolerate." The distinction here referred to is plain, and surely if any well regulated government feels it to be an incumbent duty to protect the characters of either public or private men against aspersion, it is only just and rational that they should restrain men from speaking injuriously of the Author of our being, and the Founder of our faith. The third species of blasphemy, which was heavily punished in the early church, was one of so great importance as to call for separate consideration. See next article.

BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST. This sin has been explained in a great variety of ways. Some have considered it as a lapsing into idolatry and apostasy, and denying Christ in the time of persecution. This was the opinion of Cyprian. It is made by Hilary to consist in denying Christ to be God, thus involving the Arians in this weighty charge. Origen held that those who had received the gifts of the Holy Ghost in baptism, and afterwards run into sin, had committed the unpardonable sin. Some again alleged that it consisted in denying the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Others place this sin in a perverse and malicious ascription of the works of the Holy Spirit to the power of the devil. Augustine makes frequent reference to this crime, and he views it as a continual resistance of the motions and graces of the Holy Spirit, by an invincible hardness of heart, and final impenitence to the end of a man's life. The view which this eminent Christian Father entertained on this difficult point, appears to approach the nearest to the meaning which rises out of a careful comparison of the different passages in which this heinous sin is specially mentioned by our blessed Lord. In considering this point somewhat more fully, it may be well to bring into one view the explanation given by Christ, in the three Evangelists, where it is to be found. Mat. xii. 31, 32. "Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." Luke xii. 10, "And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven." Mark iii. 28—30, "Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme: but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit."

In these passages, Jesus says, that there is one sin which cannot be forgiven. He terms this unpardonable sin, "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost." Taking the expression without reference to the context, in which it is found, many have assigned to it significations which are altogether unwarranted by the connection in which it occurs. The key to the explanation of this mysterious sin, may be discovered, we conceive, in the closing observation of Mark, "Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit." This naturally carries us back to the previous conduct of the Pharisees. Jesus had shortly before cured a man who was possessed of a devil, and was both blind and dumb. The Pharisees had witnessed the miracle, and were so convinced of its reality, that they never attempted for a moment to deny it. But in opposition to the conviction of their understandings, and with the bitterest malignity of heart, they attributed the miracle to the agency of the Prince of Darkness. Such the Redeemer plainly declared was the unpardonable sin of blaspheming against, or speaking evil of, the Holy Ghost. It was a direct, malicious, determinate rejection of the only Saviour. It showed a blinded perversity of mind, and an obstinate hardness of heart, which too plainly proved that they were given over to a reprobate mind, and would finally and for ever perish.

This sin then is unpardonable, not because it is committed against the Holy Ghost, for there are many evil thoughts and expressions against the Holy Spirit of God, which cannot be said to amount to the sin here spoken of. Thus Simon Magus, the sorcerer, was guilty of a very aggravated sin against the Holy Ghost when he offered to purchase with money the power of working miracles. "Thy money perish with thee," says Peter with holy indignation, "because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter, for thy heart is not right with God." But that the sin of Simon Magus did not amount to the unpardonable sin, is plain from the exhortation which Peter gave—"Repent, therefore, of this thy wickedness, and pray God if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee."

Neither is blasphemy against the Holy Ghost unpardonable because of its heinousness and peculiar aggravation. "For the blood of Christ" is expressly declared to "cleanse from all sin." "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men."

But the sin of which Christ speaks is unpardonable from its very nature, as being a determined and final rejection of the pardon which God has offered. Christ comes, but he is rejected. He prefers his claims in the most open and striking manner, so that the understanding is convinced, but the heart remains hard as an adamant stone. With a mind to a certain extent enlightened, though not savingly, in the knowledge of the truth, there is a bitter malicious hatred to Christ and to his cause. This is not a single sinful act, but a complicated state of mind and character. It is described as blasphemy or evil-speaking against the Holy Ghost, because words are the expression of our thoughts, and feelings, and desires. Let us, then, endeavour to discover some of the chief ingredients of the unpardonable sin.

1. It includes a determined suppression of the convictions of the mind, and of the workings of conscience. Paul informs us that, though a blasphemer, he obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly and in unbelief. Though a well-educated and in many points enlightened Jew, yet, so ill instructed was he in the true spiritual meaning of God's Word, that when engaged in persecuting the saints of God, he verily imagined that he was doing God service. Such, however, was not the condition of the Pharisees in the time of our Lord. They were not ignorant. They waited upon the ministry of Christ with the most exemplary diligence. They listened with the most marked attention to every word that he uttered, and they examined with the most jealous scrutiny every miracle that he wrought. None, not even the disciples themselves, had such an extensive outward knowledge of Christ, and versed as they were both in the Law and the Prophets, they were neither ignorant nor unconvinced that Jesus was the very Christ of God. Hence he declared (John vi. 28) as he taught in the temple, "Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am." They knew Christ, but like multitudes in every age, they knew him not savingly. Their knowledge reached the mind, and to a certain extent awakened the conscience, but the heart was as hard and unmoved as ever. Nay, they strove to suppress the rising convictions of their minds, and to lull the voice of conscience. Hence they were engaged in a perpetual struggle against the influence of the light. The light shone around them with the utmost clearness, and yet they not only prevented the entrance of further light, but the very light that was already in them they converted into darkness.

2. A second ingredient of the unpardonable sin is determined and obstinate unbelief. It may appear strange that a man should be convinced and yet unbelieving. In the Scriptural sense of faith, however, this is not unfrequently the case; for it is not so much with the mind as with the heart that man believeth unto righteousness. Did the Word of God reveal nothing more than some abstract notions in which we had no personal concern, the conviction of the mind would be enough. But the Bible reveals Christ in his person and work as available for the salvation of sinners; and therefore faith is well described in the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism, as a receiving of Christ, and resting upon him for salvation. Such a faith implies not merely a persuasion of the mind, but an embracing with the heart. The outward evidence of the truth concerning Christ is strong, but the inward feeling of the need of Christ is stronger still. The Pharisees, however, were determinedly unbelieving. They were not, like Paul before his conversion, ignorant and unbelieving, but they were intelligent, enlightened, and convinced, and yet they were obstinate rejectors of Christ. They were unbelievers in the face of the evidence from without, and the convictions from within. They put away from them the gospel as an idle tale, and they were given up to believe a lie.

3. A third ingredient in the unpardonable sin is a rooted malice and enmity against the person, the work, and the cause of Christ. This malignant spirit was very conspicuous throughout the whole conduct of the Pharisees towards our blessed Lord. With untiring jealousy, they watched his every word, and his every movement, anxious to ensnare him in his talk, or to find some ground of accusation against him. But their malignity knew no bounds, when they saw the effect which his miracles produced upon the people. "This fellow," they cried, "doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils." He is not the Messiah, he is a vile impostor, in league with the friends of hell. Bitter words, but feebly expressive of the hatred of their hearts. Had they not feared the multitude, they would gladly have embroiled their hands in his blood. But his hour was not yet come, and, therefore, by restraining grace alone, were they prevented from accomplishing the purpose of their hearts.

4. The last ingredient which we notice in the unpardonable sin is a total indifference and unconcern about their personal condition. This also was a remarkable feature in the character of the Pharisees. They were diligent in their outward attendance upon the preaching of Christ, and in the observance of many of the outward forms of religion, but they seem never to have entertained the slightest suspicion that they were guilty condemned sinners. They were quite at ease, satisfied that all was well with them. They said, like the Laodicean Church, "We are rich and increased in goods, and stand in need of nothing." In this state they were quite callous. With them all argument was unavailing, all warning utterly fruitless. They said, without the slightest hesitation, 'we see,' while all the time they were in total darkness; they said, 'we live,' while all the time they were dead in trespasses and sins.

Such, we conceive, are the chief ingredients of the unpardonable sin, the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, a sin which, from its very nature, cannot possibly obtain forgiveness in this world or in the world to come. It cannot be forgiven here, for in such a state of mind forgiveness is neither sought nor desired. It cannot be forgiven hereafter, for God's plan of forgiveness has been set at nought, and the only Saviour obstinately, and determinedly, and finally rejected. God is merciful, but he is merciful in his own appointed way, and if that way be disregarded, mercy cannot be obtained.

BLESSING, or BENEDICTION, one of the most solemn parts of Divine service. In the early ages of the world, we find from the Old Testament, that it was usual for private individuals to pronounce solemn blessings on special occasions. The bridal blessing was given to Rebecca, couched in these words, "Be thou a mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate them." This afterwards became a solemn form of benediction in leading the bride to the bridegroom. Nuptial benedictions were used both by the Jews, Greeks, and Romans. It was also customary for the father of a family, when on his death-bed, to summon his children around him, and to give a solemn blessing to each, and on these occasions the prophetic power was sometimes imparted from on high. Thus Jacob, Gen. xlix., blessed his sons and predicted their future destiny. Moses also, Deut. xxxiii., gave a parting blessing to the children of Israel. Among the Jews it was performed by the high priest in a most impressive manner (see AARON'S BLESSING), and it was listened to by the people with deep religious awe. The members of the synagogue, among the modern Jews, are required to repeat at least a hundred benedictions every day, a few of which may be given as a specimen of the whole: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who givest to the cock knowledge to distinguish between day and night. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who openest the eyes of the blind. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who settest at liberty those who are bound. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who raisest those who are bowed down. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who clothest the naked. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast not made me a heathen. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast not made me a slave." For a man.—"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast not made me a woman." For a woman.—"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast made me according to thy will. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who removest sleep from mine eyes and slumber from mine eye-lids. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to wash our hands."

In the early Christian Church, the benediction was pronounced just before the close of the morning service. The deacon called upon the people to bow their heads, and to receive the imposition of hands, or the bishop's benediction, which was given in the following form of words: "O God, faithful and true, that showest mercy to thousands, and ten thousands of them that love thee; who art the friend of the humble, and defender of the poor, whose aid all things stand in need of, because all things serve thee: look down upon this thy people who bow their heads unto thee, and bless them with thy spiritual benediction; keep them as the apple of the eye; preserve them in piety and righteousness, and vouchsafe to bring them to eternal life in Christ Jesus, thy beloved Son, with whom, unto thee, be glory, honour, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, world without end. Amen." When the bishop had thus pronounced the benediction, the deacon dismissed the congregation with the usual form, "Depart in peace." In some cases the sermon in the primitive churches was prefaced with a short form of benediction. In the celebration of the Lord's Supper, also, the bishop gave a benediction to the people immediately after repeating the Lord's Prayer. This was more especially the case in many of the Western churches. Accordingly, the third council of Orleans decreed that all laymen should stay till they had heard the Lord's Prayer, and received the bishop's benediction. And the council of Toledo censures some priests for communicating immediately after the Lord's Prayer without giving the benediction to the people, and orders, that, for the future, the benediction should follow the Lord's Prayer, and that after the communion. In the Apostolical constitutions, after the prayer of the consecration and oblation, the bishop is appointed to pronounce this short benediction, "The peace of God be with you all;" and then, after the deacon has rehearsed a BIDDING PRAYER (which see), the bishop again recommends the people to God in another benediction, beseeching God to sanctify their bodies and souls, and to make them worthy of the good things he has set before them. The constitutions lay down a form of benediction to be pronounced in the ordination of presbyters.

In the Romish Church the act of blessing is not limited to persons, but extends also to inanimate objects. It is enough to pronounce a form of words, and anything whatever is blessed. The act of benediction, however, differs from the act of consecration, the latter being accompanied with unction or anointing with oil, while the former has no such ceremony, but is performed simply by sprinkling holy water, making the sign of the cross, and pronouncing certain prayers. Various forms of benediction are laid down in the Roman Pontifical, in the Missal, and in the Book of Ecclesiastical Ceremonies.

BLOOD. Immediately after the flood, when for the first time the use of animal food was allowed to man, we find it accompanied with the prohibition, Gen. ix. 4, "But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat." According to this command, the blood of every animal was to be poured out before the flesh was eaten, and the reason why this was to be done is declared in these words, "because the blood is the life." Not that Moses is laying down a plain physiological fact, that the blood is a vital fluid, though the Jewish doctors understand it to involve nothing more than a prohibition against cutting off any limb of a living animal and eating it while the life or the life-blood is in it. According to this view, the design of this precept given to Noah was to prevent cruelty to animals, and give the people a horror at the shedding of blood. A far deeper and more important ground, however, of the command to pour out the blood of slain animals is found in the command as given in its more enlarged and detailed form in the Mosaic law, Lev. xvii. 10—12: "And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul. Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood." In this passage the reason alleged for the repetition of the command formerly given to Noah, is not only that "the blood is the life," but that "it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul." It is worthy of notice that the blood is not only prohibited from being eaten, but commanded to be poured upon the earth like water. It would seem as if the Israelites were to be taught that not only the blood of animals offered in sacrifice, but the blood of every animal that was slain even for common purposes, must be treated as if it had in it a sacrificial character. On this subject Maimonides throws considerable light in his remarks upon the manner of killing beasts among the ancient Israelites. He says that he who killed the animal prayed to God in these words, "Blessed be he who has sanctified us by his commandments and has given us his ordinances for the killing of beasts." He adds also, that the beasts killed for eating were to be slain without the temple, and if they were slain in any other place, the carcase was to be buried, not eaten. And besides, a peculiar ceremony was gone through by the Jews, in covering the blood after it was poured out. Before they covered it, they prayed in these words: "Blessed be thou, O Lord our God and Eternal King; who hast sanctified us by thy commandments, and ordained us to cover the blood." Maimonides adds, that even when the blood was mixed with water they were obliged to cover it, provided it retained the colour of blood. Only the blood of clean beasts was covered, as these alone were considered fit to be eaten. The process of covering was this. He that killed the beast made a kind of hillock of dust wherein he poured the blood, which he afterwards covered with more dust. The blood might be covered with anything reduced to powder, as ashes, stones ground down, or lime, but not with a piece of solid stone or wood. This ceremony was to be performed not with the foot, but with the hand, by means of a knife or some other instrument with which the dust was thrown upon the blood.

In all this there was obviously a meaning which it is well worth attempting to discover. The grand spiritual design undoubtedly of the prohibition of the eating of blood, was to preserve upon the minds of the Israelites the great principle of the divine economy in regard to a fallen world, "that without shedding of blood there is no remission." An important, though no doubt subsidiary, object of the law was to prevent idolatry. Now heathen nations were accustomed to take the blood of animals and pour it into a hole in the earth for food to their gods. Particularly when they sacrificed to infernal deities, or devils, having slain the animal, they frequently drank part of the blood, and poured the rest into a pit, consecrating it to the demon in whose honour the sacrifice was offered. They then eat the flesh over or round about the blood, which they left for the demon to come and feast upon. Now there was ample provision made in the Mosaic law against the Jews falling into this idolatrous practice. Thus, in Lev. xix. 26, God prohibits the "eating anything with the blood," or, as the preposition admits of being rendered, "over the blood," thus pointing directly at the idolatrous custom we have been describing.

But God not only prohibits the idolatrous practices of the heathens in so far as blood was concerned; he also laid down a law in reference to the killing of animals which was quite incompatible with their observance of such practices. The law is contained in these words, Lev. xvii. 3—6. "What man soever there be of the house of Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, in the camp, or that killeth it out of the camp, and bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer an offering unto the Lord before the tabernacle of the Lord;

blood shall be imputed unto that man; he hath shed blood; and that man shall be cut off from among his people: to the end that the children of Israel may bring their sacrifices, which they offer in the open field, even that they may bring them unto the Lord, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest, and offer them for peace offerings unto the Lord. And the priest shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and burn the fat for a sweet savour unto the Lord." By this arrangement the person who killed the animal was not to collect the blood as the heathens did, who poured it into a pit for a feast to their demons, but he was to take the blood and sprinkle it upon the altar. And if the Israelites caught any beast or bird in hunting, they were commanded "to pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust," an observance which, as we have seen on the testimony of Maimonides, the Jews followed with great ceremony. The covering it with dust was designed to keep them from offering it to demons as the heathens did, who poured it into an open pit or trench that the gods might feast upon it. And if an Israelite killed any beast without bringing it to the door of the tabernacle, he was supposed to have killed it for idolatrous purposes, and, therefore, he was "to be cut off from among his people." And after the chosen people of God had entered the promised land, he restricts their sacrifices to one place which He should choose; and though he permits them to kill and eat in all their gates, he lays down the express condition that they eat not the blood, but pour it upon the earth, that it might sink into the ground like water. The Jews understood the design of this arrangement, when, as we have seen from Maimonides, they poured out the blood in covering it, not upon solid stone, but upon soft or powdered earth, which would readily absorb it.

Maimonides, the Jewish commentator, speaks of two different kinds of blood, the life-blood, or that which is sprinkled upon the altar, and which springs forth from the animal with great impetuosity when it is slain. He that eats of this sort of blood, it is alleged, is to be cut off from among his people. But the other species of blood, that which issues from the wounded animal before it has begun to die, or which issues by drops from the body after the animal is dead, is not reckoned so sacred as the life-blood, and, therefore, the individual who eats of it is said to deserve only scourging. The Jews hold that of the seven precepts of Noah, as they are termed, only the prohibition against eating blood was given to Noah, the other six having, as they allege, been previously given to Adam.

The question has often been started, Whether the Noachic precept forbidding the eating of blood, and which was repeated in the Law of Moses, be still binding upon Christians? The ground on which the affirmative of this is maintained, rests on the decree of the council of Jerusalem, that the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia, should "abstain from things strangled and from blood," as we read in Acts xv. 29. To understand the full meaning and extent of this apostolic decree, we must bear in mind the circumstances in which it was passed. While Paul and Barnabas were engaged in preaching the gospel at Antioch, certain Christian converts from Judaism came down from Jerusalem, and taught that if a Jew embraced Christianity, he was bound at the same time to be circumcised, and to observe the whole Mosaic Law. The city of Antioch, where these Judaizing tenets were inculcated, was peculiarly favourable for the diffusion of such opinions; for as Josephus informs us, it was the seat of a famous Jewish college, in which were many proselytes of the gate, as they were termed. The originators of the controversy were some of the sect of the Pharisees who had become converts to Christianity, while they still retained many of their former Jewish prejudices. The question in debate had a reference chiefly to proselytes of the gate, who, though they were Gentiles by birth, had renounced heathenism in so far as idolatry was concerned, and before being allowed to live among Jews, required to be circumcised. It became therefore a very natural subject of doubt, whether such proselytes could be acknowledged as belonging to the Christian church without receiving the Mosaic seal of circumcision. When the council at Jerusalem met, therefore, the question came before them in a very peculiar form, and under a strictly Jewish aspect. It was decided accordingly in the way best fitted to obviate the prejudices of the Jewish against the Gentile converts, and to reconcile them to their admission to the Christian church, on the same footing precisely as to privileges with themselves. Such a decree passed under peculiar circumstances, and strictly adapted to these circumstances, was necessarily temporary in its nature, and could only remain in force so long as the Jewish and Gentile converts were not thoroughly amalgamated into one body, and both of them alike brought under the influence of Christian principle. In this view of the matter, it is plain that in the altered circumstances of the Christian Church the decree of Jerusalem can be no longer binding, the circumstances in which it was applicable having long since passed away. The early Christian Church, however, for several centuries, continued rigidly to abstain from eating blood, and clergymen were ordered to observe the apostolic decree on this subject under pain of degradation. The Apostolical canons are clear upon the point, and several decrees of councils were passed upon the subject. Augustine, however, states that in his time the African church no longer regarded the decree of Jerusalem as of force, and few persons, he says, made any scruple of eating blood. The Eastern Church have never ceased to hold it an imperative duty to abstain from things strangled and from blood. The Mohammedans also, whose religion is a mixture of Judaism and Christianity, practise the same abstinence. Both the Romish and the Protestant Churches, however, are agreed in regarding it as no longer obligatory upon Christians to maintain their adherence to what they consider a temporary arrangement made by the apostles under circumstances peculiar to the time at which the decree was passed. "This decree," says Dr. Welsh, "which was conveyed in a letter by brethren who might accompany it with every necessary explanation, was obviously intended for a transition state of the church, when ancient Jewish prejudices and the prevailing customs of heathenism presented a barrier to the diffusion of Christianity. It was wisely calculated to remove difficulties and objections on the part of the Jews; and while it imposed no real burden, and could lead to no misapprehension on the part of the Gentiles, it could scarcely fail to produce a favourable effect upon heathen converts, by marking a distinction between them and their former associates, and drawing them away from the infectious influence of heathen superstitions and pollutions." Individual Christians are here and there to be found who have some scruples as to the eating of blood, but such cases are by no means numerous.

Blood being regarded among the ancient Hebrews as specially sacred, the sprinkling of it in their sacrifices was considered as belonging to the priests alone. The blood to be sprinkled was put into a vessel used for the purpose, and taken by a priest clothed in his official vestments, who carried it in his right hand. The blood of some victims was carried into the holy place, as for example those sacrificed as sin-offerings for the whole nation, the bullock presented for the family of Aaron, and that which was offered by the high priest himself. The blood of other victims was either sprinkled upon the horns or upon the sides of the great altar that stood without. The mode of sprinkling was as follows. The priest carrying the blood in his hand ascended the steps of the altar, and, standing between the east and the south, he dipped the forefinger of his right hand in the blood, and pressing it with his thumb, he touched with the blood that horn of the altar; then in the same way he dipped his finger in blood at each horn, till he came to the south-west horn, which was the last that was sprinkled. The blood that remained at the close of the sprinkling was poured out at the bottom of the altar upon the west side, and was conveyed by a subterraneous passage into the valley of Kedron, where it was sold as manure.

The blood of animals used in burnt-offerings, trespass-offerings, and peace-offerings, was sprinkled upon the sides of the altar after this manner. The priest, as he stood upon the east side of the altar near the north-east corner, was to cast the blood out of the vessel with such force, as that part of it might fall upon the east side where he stood, and part of it upon the north side, and on both sides below the red line that went round about the altar. The same course was followed while the priest stood upon the west side, near the south-west corner, that part of it might fall upon the west side, and part of it upon the south. In this way the Jewish priests imagined that they fulfilled the law, which commanded that the blood should be sprinkled round about upon the altar.

The blood of some sacrifices was carried into the holy place, and put upon the horns of the golden altar, or the altar of incense. In the case of such victims, the blood was sprinkled seven times towards the veil before the most holy place; and then some of it was put upon each horn of the altar, beginning at that between the east and the north, and ending at that between the east and the south, being exactly the opposite of the order observed in sprinkling the horns of the other altar.

The blood of the bullock that was offered for a sin-offering upon the Day of Atonement for the family of Aaron, and also that of the goat which was offered for all Israel, was carried by the high priest into the holy of holies, where it was sprinkled once upwards towards the mercy-seat, and seven times downwards. Then the high priest returned with the blood into the holy place, and sprinkled it in the same manner towards the veil—that is, once above, and seven times below. The blood of each victim, which had been hitherto kept in separate vessels, was now mingled together in one, and the high priest with his finger sprinkled with it the horns of the golden altar, and seven times he poured some of the blood upon the top of the altar. The remainder of the blood was poured at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offering on the west side.

BLOOD BAPTISM. Any one devoted to martyrdom was reckoned, in the early Christian Church, among the catechumens, martyrdom being regarded as a full substitute for baptism, and therefore termed blood-baptism. This notion was derived from various passages in the Sacred Scriptures. Thus Mark x. 39, "And Jesus said unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized;" Luke xii. 50, "But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" Martyrdom was esteemed a passport for heaven, and therefore it was made a substitute for baptism.

BODHI (Singhalese, wisdom), one of the three principles which influence a Buddhist priest. When under its power he is kind and tractable; he eats his food slowly and is thoughtful; he avoids much sleep, and does not procrastinate; and he reflects on such subjects as impermanency and death.

BODHISAT, a candidate for the Budhaship. See BUDHISTS.

BODHISATWA. The incipient state of a Budha, in the countless phases of being through which he passes previous to receiving the Budhaship.

BOEDROMIUS, a surname of Apollo at Athens, indicating him to be a helper in distress. Some suppose that he was so called because he assisted the Athenians in their war with the Amazons, who were defeated on the seventh of the month Boedromion. See next article.

BOEDROMIA, a festival celebrated at Athens in honour of Apollo, under the surname of Boedromius. It was celebrated on the seventh of the Grecian month Boedromion. Plutarch attributes the origin of this festival to the success of the Athenians in the war against the Amazons. No account has come down to us as to the manner in which this festival was observed, except that sacrifices were offered to Artemis.

BOGS, favourite saints among the Russians. A figure of some patron saint, stamped on copper, is carried about in the pocket, or fixed in some small chapel in the house. The practice naturally reminds us of the Lares and Penates among the ancient Romans. The household bog is usually painted on wood; and, in the houses of men of wealth and rank, it is surrounded with diamonds or precious stones, and wax candles or tapers are burned before it. M. Chantreau, in his travels in Russia, mentions having seen in the possession of a member of the directing senate, a cabinet of bogs worth more than a million of rubles, amounting to £222,222 4s. sterling. Men of all classes among the Russians have their bogs, whom they hold in the highest veneration. The most popular of these patron saints are St. Nicholas, St. John the Baptist, St. Sergius, and St. Alexander Newski. In the houses of the poor the bog is sometimes kept in a small and obscure apartment, but the moment a Russian enters a house, if the bog does not immediately catch his eye, he enquires where it is, and, before saluting any of the inmates of the house, he approaches the bog, and crosses himself three times before it, repeating "Lord have mercy upon me." When it has become decayed and worn out, the precious relic is carefully buried in a churchyard or a garden. Sometimes, indeed, it is put into a rapid stream, that it may be borne away by the current.

BOGARDINES. See FRANCISCANS.

BOGOMILES (Slav. Bog, God; milvi, show mercy), a sect of Christian heretics which sprung up in the twelfth century, in the Greek Empire, especially in the region of Philippopolis. They have sometimes been regarded as allied in doctrine to the older Gnostics, but they make no reference to the Æons, nor do they make any allusion to an original evil principle. They were sometimes called Phundaites, from the phunda or girdle which they were accustomed to wear. Their system of opinions regarded chiefly the higher order of spirits, at the head of whom they placed Satanael, whose name somewhat resembles Samael, the angel of death among the Rabbinical Jews. They represented, according to Euthymius, the Divine Being under the figure of an old man, adopting the figure probably from the expression of the prophet Daniel, "The Ancient of Days." We cannot describe the opinions of the Bogomiles more clearly than by adopting the lucid statement of Neander. "Satanael, they regarded as the first-born son of the supreme God—in which they agreed with the Euchites, and with one particular view of the Parsic dualism—who sat at the right hand of God, armed with divine power, and holding the second place after him. To each of the higher spirits God had committed a particular department of administration, while Satanael was placed over all, as his universal vicegerent. Thus he was tempted to become proud; and, intoxicated with the sense of his power and dignity, was for making himself independent of the supreme God, and founding an empire of his own. He endeavoured also to lead away from their allegiance the angels to whom God had entrusted the management of the different portions of the world; and he succeeded with a part of them. The Bogomiles believed they found Satanael described in the unjust steward of the parable, and they expended much labour in expounding the several points in the parable in accordance with this notion. Satanael now called together the angels who had apostatized with him, and invited them to join him in laying the groundwork of a new creation, independent of the supreme God, a new heaven and a new earth; for the Father had not yet deprived him of his divine form, he had not as yet lost the El, but still possessed creative power. He let himself down, therefore, with his apostate companions, into chaos, and here laid the foundations of this new empire; with his angels he created man, and gave him a body formed out of the earth. To animate this being, he meant to give him a portion of his own spirit; but he was unable to carry the work to its completion. Therefore he had recourse to the supreme God, beseeching him to have pity on his own image, and binding himself to share with him in the possession of man. He promised that, by the race proceeding from man, the places of those angels should be made good who had fallen from God in heaven. So the supreme God took pity on this image, and communicated to it a portion of his own spirit, and so man became a living soul. But now, when Adam and Eve, who had been created with him, became radiant with splendour, in virtue of the divine life that had been communicated to them, Satanael, seized with envy, resolved to defeat the destination of mankind to enter into those vacant places of the higher spiritual world. For this purpose he seduced Eve, intending by intercourse with her to bring forth a posterity which should overpower and extinguish the posterity of Adam. Thus Cain was begotten, the representative of the evil principle in humanity; while Abel, the offspring of Adam and Eve, was the representative of the good principle. Satanael ruled in the world he had created. He had power to lead astray the majority of mankind, so that but few attained to their ultimate destination. It was he who represented himself to the Jews as the supreme God. He employed Moses as his instrument; giving him the law, which in fact the apostle Paul describes as begetting sin; he bestowed on Moses the power of working miracles. Many thousands were thus brought to ruin by the tyranny of Satanael. Then the good God had pity on the higher nature in humanity which had proceeded from himself and was akin to his own, in that humanity which had become so estranged from its destination by the crafty plots of Satanael. He determined to rescue men from the dominion of Satanael, and to deprive the latter of his power. For this purpose, in the 5500th year after the creation of the world, he caused to emanate from himself a spirit who was called the Son of God, Logos, the archangel Michael, exalted above all the angels, the angel of the great council, Isa. ix. 6, who was to overthrow the empire of Satanael and occupy his place. This being he sent down into the world in an ethereal body, which resembled an earthly body only in its outward appearance. He made use of Mary simply as a channel of introduction. She found the divine child already in its swaddling-clothes in the manger, without knowing how it came there. Of course, all that was sensible here, was merely in appearance. Satanael, who held Jesus to be nothing more than a man, and saw his kingdom among the Jews drawn into apostacy and endangered by him, plotted his death. But Jesus baffled him in reality, he could not be affected by any sensuous sufferings. He who, though supposed to be dead, was exalted above all suffering, appeared on the third day, in the full vigour of life; when, laying aside the veil of his seeming earthly body, he showed himself to Satanael in his true heavenly form. The latter was forced to acknowledge his supremacy, and being deprived by Christ of his divine power, was obliged to give up the name El, and remain nothing but Satan. Christ then ascended to the right hand of God, to be the second after him, and to occupy the place of the ruined Satanael. When Christ was now removed from the earth, and taken up into heaven, God caused a second power, the Holy Ghost, to emanate from himself, who took the place of the now risen and exalted Christ, by his influences on individual souls and the community of the faithful. It may be noticed as a characteristic peculiarity, that the Holy Spirit was represented by the Bogomiles under the form of a beardless youth, doubtless a symbol of his all-renovating power. They regarded it as the final end of all things, that when Christ and the Holy Ghost should have finished their whole work, all the consequences of the apostasy from God would be removed, and the redeemed souls would attain to their final destination. Then God would receive back into himself those powers which had emanated from him, and all things would return to their original unity "

The Bogomiles rejected baptism with water, holding that the only Christian baptism was a baptism of the Spirit, to be imparted simply by calling upon the Holy Ghost, with the laying on of hands. The mode of admission into the sect was very peculiar. The candidate for initiation passed through a previous course of preparation, which consisted of the confession of sins, fasting, and prayer. He was then introduced into the assembly, when the presiding officer laid the gospel of John upon his head, and they invoked upon him the Holy Ghost and repeated the Lord's Prayer. He was then required to lead a life of probation, in the course of which he observed the strictest abstinence, and, if he faithfully passed through his probationary period, he was again introduced into the assembly, placed with his face towards the east, and the gospel of John again laid upon his head. The whole assembly, men and women, touched his head with their hands, and sung together a hymn of thanksgiving to God, that the man had proved himself worthy to be admitted as a member of their community.

As the Bogomiles refused to admit an outward celebration of baptism, so they seem to have been equally opposed to an outward celebration of the Lord's Supper. They contended against the worship of the Virgin Mary and of saints and images, refusing also all reverence for a crucifix. Euthymius alleges that they rejected the historical books of the Old Testament, but received the Psalms and the Prophets, and all the writings of the New Testament. To the gospel of John they seemed to attach a peculiar value and importance. They looked upon the dominant church as an apostate church, ruled by Satanael, while they represented themselves as the true followers of Christ.

The Bogomiles had no sooner sprung up in A. D. 1116, than their tenets were adopted by individuals belonging even to the highest classes of society. The Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus hearing how rapidly the sect was spreading, resolved to take steps to ascertain the real leaders of the movement. For this purpose he caused several members of the community to be arrested and put to the torture; and by this cruel stratagem he learned that an old monk, by name Basilius, was at the head of the party. The emperor, accordingly, invited this leader of the Bogomiles to a private interview at the palace, pretending that he wished to learn the principles of the sect with the design of joining it. The old man, though at first suspicious, at length acceded to the request. He repaired to the royal residence, and, while unfolding the principles of the community which he headed, a person was stationed by the emperor behind a curtain taking notes of the whole conversation. When sufficient information had been obtained to secure the condemnation of the unwary monk, the curtain was raised, and there stood before him an array of clerical dignitaries, ready to pronounce a sentence likely to suppress the obnoxious sect.

I.

Basilius was forthwith conducted to prison, and numbers of the Bogomiles were arrested, as well as some who had no connection with the sect. To separate the innocent from the guilty, the emperor devised the following plan. He caused the whole of those who had been arrested to appear in a public place before a large assembly, in the centre of which he took his seat on an elevated throne. Two great fires were kindled, the one of them having a cross placed beside it, and the other none. The emperor now declared that all were to be put to death, and those who wished to die as believers were to pay their homage to the cross. Those who obeyed this command were dismissed with a simple admonition, while those who refused to do homage to the crucifix were doomed to perpetual imprisonment. Basilius alone perished at the stake in A. D. 1119. The death of their leader did not prevent the Bogomiles from actively propagating their opinions. They speedily spread themselves throughout the Greek Empire. The writings of a venerated monk, Constantius Chrysomalos, are said to have contributed greatly to the diffusion of these doctrines. It was not, however, till after his death that a synod, assembled at Constantinople in A. D. 1140, under the Emperor Emmanuel Comnenus, pronounced condemnation on him and his followers. In the year 1143, two Cappadocian bishops, Clemens and Leontius, were deposed as Bogomiles by a synod at Constantinople; about the same time, and for the same reason, Niphon, a monk, was sentenced to imprisonment. In the tenets which they held, and the opposition which they manifested to the dominant church, the Bogomiles bore considerable resemblance to the CATHARI and the PAULICIAN* (which see).

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. See MORAVIANS, HUSSITES, TABORITES.

BOIAS, medico-priests among the native Indians of the Caribbee islands. Each of these Boias has a particular genius, whom they pretend to invoke by humming over certain words, and by smoking tobacco. They never call upon this genius or demon, unless in the night, and in a place where there is neither fire nor light. The Boias seem to be conjurers or wizards, who possess the secret of destroying their enemies with charms. The old Boias make their candidates for the priesthood pass through a somewhat severe discipline. The novice is obliged from his infancy to abstain from various kinds of meat, and even to live upon bread and water in a little hut, where he is visited by no person except his masters. To effect his purification, incisions are made in his skin, and tobacco-juice is administered to him freely. His body is rubbed over with gum, which they afterwards cover with feathers, in order to make him exact and diligent in consulting the genii, and obeying their orders. They teach him to cure the diseased, and to conjure up the spirit. When a Boia is summoned in a case of sickness, he immediately orders the fire to be extinguished in the first instance; then he goes into a corner, where he orders the patient to be brought to him. He now smokes a leaf of tobacco, and bruises a part of it in his hands, and, snapping his fingers, blows what he has rubbed into the air. The odour of this perfume attracts the Chemen or good spirit, and the Boia, approaching his patient, feels, presses, and handles, several times in succession, the diseased part, if it be outward, and applying his mouth to the part, he pretends to suck out the diseased matter. Should the patient fail to obtain the expected relief, the Boia lays aside his medical character, and assumes that of a priest, administering consolation to the afflicted person, and endeavouring to reconcile him to a speedy departure from this world.

BONA DEA, a Roman divinity, daughter of Faunus, and an object of worship almost exclusively to females, to whom she made known her oracles. A festival in honour of this goddess was celebrated every year on the 1st of May, the ceremonies being conducted wholly by the vestal virgins, and only females, generally of the higher ranks, were permitted to take part in them. The house of the consul or prætor, where the festival was held, was adorned as a temple with all kinds of flowers except myrtle. The statue of the Bona Dea was covered with a garland of vine-leaves, and a serpent was twined around its feet. The solemnities were conducted by night, with drinking and dancing. The Bona Dea is sometimes regarded by Greek writers as the same with HECATE or PERSEPHONE (which see).

BONI HOMINES (Lat. good men), a name sometimes applied to the CATHARI or PAULICIANS (which see), in the eleventh century.

BONOSIANS, a Christian sect which arose towards the end of the fourth century, headed by Bonosus, a bishop, probably of Sardica in Illyrium. They were accused of maintaining that Mary the mother of our Lord did not always remain a virgin, but bore several children after the birth of Jesus. It is very doubtful, however, whether Bonosus and his followers maintained what has sometimes been imputed to them, that Christ was a mere man, and was the Son of God only by adoption. Yet in the fifth and sixth centuries, there were heretics both in France and Spain, bearing the name of Bonosians, who opposed the doctrine of the Trinity, and of the divinity of Christ. Pope Gregory says, that the church rejected their baptism, because they did not baptize in the name of the three Persons. But the council of Arles, held in the year A. D. 452, by the seventeenth canon, commands the Bonosians to be received into the church by the holy unction, the imposition of hands, and a confession of faith, it being certain that they baptize in the name of the Trinity. The Bonosians have sometimes been confounded with the PHOTINIANS (which see).

BONZES, priests in China, Tartary, and Thibet. Great numbers were formerly attached to each pagoda, and although they lived in monasteries, they were wholly dependent for subsistence on public charity. The most recent travellers, however, inform us, that the moderate provision which they pick up by begging, is quite insufficient for their support, and hence, they are under the necessity of working at some trade for their living. Most of them act as schoolmasters, and those who are incapable of teaching, wander up and down begging from door to door the revenues of the pagodas being no longer adequate for their livelihood. M. Huc, in his 'L'Empire Chinois,' informs us, that they are daily diminishing in numbers. The manner in which they recruit their ranks is singular. The Bonze who is attached to a pagoda, purchases for a small sum one of the children of a poor family. He shaves the boy's head, and appoints him his pupil, or rather his attendant. The poor child waits upon his master on all occasions, and at length becomes accustomed to the life of a Bonze. In course of time he succeeds his master, and thus the race of Bonzes is perpetuated. At one period these priests exercised a powerful influence over the people, but this is no longer the case, their authority and importance being completely gone. In the recent insurrection, the revolutionary party, as M. Huc tells us, sought to render themselves popular by murdering the Bonzes in every district through which they passed.

A large monastery in which the Bonzes resided was generally connected with each pagoda. These monasteries, once so famous, are now almost entirely deserted. M. Huc gives an account of a visit which he paid to one of the most famous of these priestly residences, that which is situated on the island of Pou-tou. More than fifty monasteries, he says, are scattered over the sides of the mountains, and in the valleys, of this beautiful and picturesque island. These large monasteries, however, which were once crowded with Bonzes, are now, as this traveller informs us, "almost entirely abandoned to legions of rats, and to large spiders which weave their webs in peace in the deserted cells." Over each of the monasteries a superior is appointed, who is, however, rather an administrator of temporal goods, than a ruler to whom all the other Bonzes resident there are bound to yield obedience. They are usually distinguished from the laity, not only by the tonsure, but many of them by wearing a chaplet about their necks, consisting of a hundred beads, and, besides, they have at the end of their staff a wooden bird. Though themselves very poor, they are said to be generally charitable to others. They assemble the people to worship by the ringing of some particular bells, and often also by the sound of trumpets. To become a Bonze, any one has only to shave his head and put on a robe with long and wide sleeves, and to give up the office he has only to change his dress and let his hair grow.

We learn from M. Huc, that convents of female Bonzes are found in considerable numbers in China.

particularly in the southern provinces. Their costume differs little from that of the male bonzes. They have their heads completely shaven; they are not confined to their convents, but are often to be seen walking in the public thoroughfares.

BONNET, a covering for the head, worn by the Jewish priests, as appointed in Exod. xxviii. 40. According to the Jewish Rabbis, this article of dress was made of a piece of cloth sixteen yards long, and which covered the head like a helmet or turban. The mitre, however, which was worn only by the high priest, is described by Josephus as a bonnet without a crown, which did not cover the whole head, but only the middle part of it. The bonnet came lower down upon the forehead than the mitre, and rose up higher, tapering upwards to a point. Josephus says that the bonnet worn by private priests was composed of many folds of linen cloth sewed together in the form of a thick woven crown of linen. The whole was covered with a piece of linen cloth which descended to the forehead, that the seams might be concealed. The same author remarks that the high priest's bonnet was identical with that of the priests, except that another piece, of a violet colour, covered the back part of the head and the temples, and was surrounded with a triple crown of gold, in which were small buttons of henbane-flowers. This circle of flowers was interrupted in the fore part of the crown by the plate of gold, on which the name of God was engraven. See MITRE.

BOR, the father of the three Scandinavian gods, Odin, Vili, and Ve. His wife was a Joten or giant-woman, whose name was Besla, the daughter of Böldhorn. From the 'Northern Antiquities' it appears that the creators of the first human pair are all sons of Bör; that the oldest of them, Odin, conferred upon the man and woman life and souls; the second, Vili, motion and knowledge; and the third, Ve, speech, beauty, sight, and hearing, with the addition of raiment. The mode of man's creation was, according to this system, very peculiar. One day as the sons of Bör, or the gods, were taking a walk on the sea-shore, they found two pieces of wood floating upon the water; these they took, and out of them made a man and woman.

BORAC. See ALBORAC.

BORAS, a remarkable race found in all the larger towns in the province of Gujerat in Hindustan, who, though Mohammedans in religion, are Jews in features, manners, and genius.

BORDJ, or, with the article prefixed, ALBORDJ, the mythic world-mountain of the ancient Persians. From this mountain, situated in Persia, all mundane existence took its rise, and the stars leapt into their orbicular paths. Cosmically considered, it is the symbol of creation, and its genetic connection with the Infinite Supreme Essence. The Bordj is affirmed to be the navel of the world, and the mountain of mountaine. It towers far above the most elevated parts of the earth, and, overtopping the clouds, reaches the subtle ether of heaven. From it have descended prophets and lawgivers who imparted to mankind the rays of a purer light, and opened to them the vista of a brighter hope. In short, it was the prolific seed-bed and potent centre of the religious dogmas and liturgic rites of the ancient Persians.

BOREAS, the north wind, represented by the ancient Greeks as dwelling in a cave of Mount Hæmus in Thrace. In the Persian war, the Athenians felt their obligations to Boreas, for destroying the ships of the enemy. The inhabitants of Megalopolis also honoured him with a regular festival held every year, in memory of the assistance which they received from him in their contests with the Spartans. See next article.

BOREASMUS, a festival celebrated by the Athenians in honour of Boreas, the north wind, which had scattered the ships of Xerxes in the Persian war.

BORHAN, the name of God among the Tartars. A Lama of Thibet said to M. Huc, speaking of that people, "They prostrate themselves before all that they meet; all is Borhan in their eyes. At every step they throw themselves on the ground, and lifting their clasped hands to their forehead, cry out, Borhan, Borhan."

BORRELISTS, a sect said to have arisen in Holland towards the middle of the seventeenth century. They were the disciples of Adam Borrel, a Dutch minister who was well skilled in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages. His brother was Dutch ambassador at the court of Louis XIV. The Borrelists were somewhat allied in sentiment to the MENNONITES (which see), though they formed a separate body. They seem to have been noted for strictness of religious deportment, approaching even to austerity. They held the notion that religion, being spiritual in its nature, all outward ordinances of any kind were unnecessary, and indeed inconsistent with true acceptable worship. They maintained also that the Word of God ought to be read without note or comment, and that all human expositions only corrupted the purity of the inspired volume. In many points this sect resembled the Society of Friends.

BORYSTHENES, or DNIEPER, universally revered among the Russians in ancient times as a holy river, and in the holy city Kiev, or Kiew, situated on its right bank, nearly all the gods of the Slavic race were at one time assembled. In an island, at the distance of four days' journey from its mouth, the inhabitants of Kiev in their annual voyages to the Black sea, in the month of June, offered their sacrifices under a sacred oak.

BOSCI (Gr. grazers), a sort of monks in the regions of Syria and Mesopotamia in early times. They derived their name from their peculiar manner of living, as they never dwelt in any house, eat no flesh or bread, nor drank wine, but fed only upon the herbs of the field. This class of monks is mentioned by Sozomen.

BOTANOMANCY (Gr. divination by herbs), a species of divination practised by the ancient Greeks. It was done by writing one's name on herbs and leaves, which were then exposed to the winds, and as many of the letters as remained in their proper places being joined together, contained an answer to their question. See DIVINATION.

BO-TREE (WORSHIP OF THE). It was under the bo-tree that Gotama Budha attained the Buddhahood. The worship of this tree in Ceylon is of very ancient origin. The city of Budha Gaya, which, from the extent of its ruins, appears to have been large and populous, was erected near the bo-tree, and on the very spot on which this town once stood a bo-tree still flourishes, which is regarded by the Buddhists as the same tree under which Gotama sat more than two thousand years ago. European travellers, however, do not regard it as more than a century old. In the court-yard of nearly every monastery or temple in Ceylon, there is a bo-tree, which is said to be taken from the tree at Anuradhapura, brought over to the island in the beginning of the fourth century before Christ. It is generally thought by the Buddhists that the place where the bo-tree stands is the centre of the world. Mr. Spence Hardy, in his work on Eastern Monachism, gives the following account of the origin of the worship of this tree.

"At the time when the usual residence of Gótama was near the city of Sewet, the people brought flowers and perfumes to present to him as offerings; but as he was absent, they threw them down near the wall, and went away. When Anépidu and the other upásikas saw what had occurred, they were grieved, and wished that some permanent object of worship were appointed, at which they might present their offerings during the absence of the sage. As the same disappointment occurred several times, they made known their wishes to Ananda, who informed Budha on his return. In consequence of this intimation, Budha said to Ananda, 'The objects that are proper to receive worship are of three kinds, serírika, uddésika, and paribhógika. In the last division is the tree at the foot of which I became Budha. Therefore send to obtain a branch of that tree, and set it in the court of this wihára. He who worships it will receive the same reward as if he worshipped me in person.' When a place had been prepared by the king for its reception, Mugalan went through the air to the spot in the forest where the bo-tree stood, and brought away a fruit that had begun to germinate, which he delivered to Ananda, from whom it passed to the king, and from the king to Anépidu, who received it in a golden vessel. No sooner was it placed in the spot it was intended to occupy in the court, than it at once began to grow; and as the people looked on in wonder it became a tree, large as a tree of the forest, being 50 cubits high, with five branches extending in the five directions, each 50 cubits in length. The people presented to it many costly offerings, and built a wall around it of the seven gems. As it had been procured by means of Ananda, it was called by his name. Budha was requested to honour it by sitting at its foot as he had sat at the foot of the tree in the forest of Uruwela; but he said that when he had sat at the foot of the tree in the forest he became Budha, and that it was not meet he should sit in the same manner near any other tree.

"The vastness of the ruins near Budha Gaya is also an evidence that the original bó-tree must have been visited by great numbers of pilgrims, and have been regarded with peculiar veneration. It is said that not long after the death of Gótama a number of priests went to worship this tree, among whom was one who, in passing through a village, was accosted by a woman as he sat in the hall of reflection; and when she learnt whither he was bound, and the advantages to be gained by making an offering to this sacred object, she listened with much pleasure, but regretted that as she was poor, working in the house of another for hire, and had not so much as a measure of rice for the next day, it was not in her power to make any offering besides the cloth she wore; and this cloth, after washing it, she presented to the priest, requesting him to offer it in her name to the bó-tree, that she might receive the merit resulting therefrom. The priest acceded to her request, and offered the cloth as a banner. At midnight the woman died, but was born in a déwa-lóka, where she lived in the greatest splendour, arrayed in the most beautiful garments. The day after the priest visited the tree he retired to the forest, and fell asleep; when a female appeared to him, with many attendants, singing sweetly, and playing the most enchanting music. The priest asked her who she was, and she said, 'Do you not know me? I am the female in whose name you presented the cloth. Yesterday I was mean and filthy, but to-day I am clean and beautiful; and this I have gained through the merit of the offering at the bó-tree.'

In the Bo-tree, or ficus religiosa, is observed the same shaking of its leaves, as is seen in the aspen of Syria; and the Buddhists allege, that the leaves thus constantly move out of respect for the great sage. It is customary to plant a bo-tree on the mound under which repose the ashes of the Kandian chiefs and priests. An interesting ceremony connected with this tree, is quoted by Mr. Hardy, from 'Knox's Captivity in Ceylon': "Under the tree, at some convenient distance, about ten or twelve feet at the outmost edge of the platform, they usually build booths or tents; some are made slight, only with leaves, for the present use; but others are built substantial, with hewn timber and clay walls, which stand many years. These buildings are divided into small tenements for each particular family. The whole town joins, and each man builds his own apartment, so that the building goes quite round, like a circle; only one gap is left, which is to pass through the bó-tree, and this gap is built over with a kind of portal. The use of these buildings is for the entertainment of the women, who take great delight to come and see these ceremonies, clad in their richest and best apparel. They employ themselves in seeing the dancers, and the jugglers do their tricks, who afterwards by their importunity get money from them, or a ring off their fingers, or some such matter. Here also they spend their time in eating betle, and in talking with their consorts, and showing their fine clothes. These solemnities are always in the night; the booths all set round with lamps; nor are they ended in one night, but last three or four, until the full moon, which always puts a period to them."

BOURAIT (RELIGION OF THE). This is a people of Mongol origin, who reside in the western part of Siberia, and on the frontiers of China in the government of Irkutsk. Their religion is a mixture of Lamaism and Shamaism. In their huts they have wooden idols, naked or clothed: others are of felt, tin, or lamb's skin; and others again rude daubings with soot by the Shamans, or priests, who give them arbitrary names. The women are not allowed to approach or to pass before them. The Bourait, when he goes out or returns to his hut, bows to his idols, and this is almost the only daily mark of respect that he pays them. He annually celebrates two festivals in honour of them, and at these men only have a right to be present.

BOURIGNONISTS, the followers of Madame Antoinette Bourignon de la Ponte, a native of Flanders, born at Lisle in A. D. 1616. Even in very early life she was characterized by a strong imagination, a lively enthusiastic temperament, combined with a warm devotional spirit. From her natural temperament, therefore, and the peculiar qualities of her mental constitution, she was quite prepared to enter into the spirit and imbibe the doctrines of the Mystics. She conceived herself to be divinely inspired, and to be set apart by God for the important work of reviving the spirit of Christianity, which she alleged to have been extinguished by the theological disputes which had so long agitated the different churches. Madame Bourignon had no desire to found a sect, believing, as she did, that the variety of sects was one of the greatest evils which had befallen the Christian church. Both Roman Catholics and Protestants were in her view alike to be blamed in this matter. She protested equally against both, and wished to retire from the world with a few associates, and there, bound by no vow, distinguished by no peculiar dress, to give themselves up to a life of calm meditation and prayer. The fame of her asceticism and devotional life soon spread, and many resorted to her as their spiritual guide. She believed that she enjoyed the high privilege of knowing the true spiritual meaning of Scripture, and that it was her special vocation to recall the church from formalism to spirituality of worship. To some extent indeed she was successful in rousing individual Christians in Holland and Germany, France and Switzerland and England also, to a more earnest devotional spirit, mingled it might be with partial enthusiasm, but still containing no small portion of true Christian vitality. The Bourignonists became a numerous body, and among them persons of some note. Swammerdam, the naturalist, held their opinions.

Madame Bourignon diffused her peculiar views not only by conversation, but also by her writings, which extend to eighteen volumes. The most important of her productions, and those which are most highly valued, are, 'Light in Darkness,' 'The Testimony of Truth,' and 'The Renovation of the Gospel Spirit.' The hostile attitude which she assumed towards the different churches roused against her a storm of persecution, which drove her from one hiding place to another, throughout Schleswig and Holstein. She died at last in 1680, impoverished and deserted, concealed in a miserable lodging at Amsterdam. Her opinions, however, long survived her, and the Quietist and Mystic pietism which she inculcated, has many admirers even in our own day. The substance of her system is, that religion consists in internal emotion or feeling, and not in either knowledge or practice.

The most distinguished supporter of the Bourignonist principles was Peter Poiret, a Calvinistic minister, who relinquished his office, and gave himself up to the development through the press of the mystical theology which he had embraced. He published a system of divinity, under the title of 'The Divine Economy,' in which he lays it down as a fundamental principle, that the understanding or intellect of man being made for God, is in a manner infinite, so as to be able to exert infinite acts, that is, to raise itself up to the contemplation of God as incomprehensible, infinite, and above all particular forms of conceiving him. Poiret inculcates, therefore, a passive implicit faith, surrendering the understanding to God, and yielding ourselves up to his teaching, and in this way, according to his view, we acknowledge that "God is infinite, and incomprehensible; that he is a Light, a Good, a Wisdom, a Power, a Justice, in a word, a Being above all comprehension and thought." Thus, on the principles of this system, in all matters of religion the understanding is to be utterly inert, and man is reduced to a merely passive machine, without action, and without responsibility. In a quotation which Mr. Vaughan gives in his 'Hours with the Mystics,' Poiret endeavours to meet the objections which naturally occur in looking at the matter in this light. His reply is as follows:—"It will be objected, may be, to what has been said, that this second condition required here of the intellect that means to be enlightened by Faith, is a state of idleness—time lost; and that it is an absurd thing not to make use of the understanding and faculties God has given us, nor so much as endeavour to excite in our minds good and bright thoughts

Here are several things tacked together, and most of them beside the purpose. For at present I am not treating of the means by which one may be introduced, or rather brought, as it were, to the threshold of faith, as I may say; nor of that imperfect and beginning faith, by me styled active. Nor yet do I say, that when one has been enlightened by the light of God, one is not to fix one's mind to the consideration of the lights held out by God: but what I say is this: I suppose a man has already had some glimpse of the divine light by the call of preventing grace, and that he has actively co-operated with it, by turning his understanding towards it, with particular desires of such and such lights; and moreover, that to confirm himself therein, he has deduced in his reason and his other inferior faculties, notions, ratiocinations, images, and words, and other particular exercises wherein he has been exercised long enough to be capable of ascending to the state of pure and altogether divine faith. Upon this supposition, the question is, whether one whose faith has as yet been but weak, and the small light he has had clouded and mixed with great darkness, prejudices, and errors, designing to clear the principles of the light he has from the aforesaid mixture, and desiring to see this divine light in its purity and more fully, —whether, I say, to this end he ought to apply thereto the activity of his understanding, of his meditations, reflections, and reasonings; or else whether, all this apart, he ought to offer his understanding in vacancy and silence to the Son of God, the Sun of Righteousness, and the true Light of Souls? And this last is what we affirm, and against which the objections alleged are of no force."

After the death of Madame Bourignon, the peculiar principles of mysticism which she and her coadjutor Poiret had so sedulously taught, continued to attract many followers in the close of the seventeenth and the opening of the eighteenth century. Some shut themselves up in seclusion and solitude, devoting their whole time and thoughts to religious exercises; others refused to hold communion with any Christian society whatever, and therefore renounced public worship, engaging only in private devotion. Pietist and mystical writers were eagerly read. Thomas à Kempis, Madame Guyon, Arndt, and Spener, and especially the voluminous works of Madame Bourignon, infused into many Christians a relish for an abstract spiritualism, which lavished all its regard upon inward frames and feelings to the almost total neglect of the active duties of the outward Christian life. BOYLE'S LECTURES, a series of eight lectures delivered annually in one of the churches in London, according to an arrangement made by the celebrated Robert Boyle, who, by his will in 1691, bequeathed a large portion of his estate for religious purposes, the income to be annually paid over to acute and eloquent men, who should oppose the progress of impiety, and demonstrate and confirm the truth of natural and revealed religion. For the support of this Lecture, Mr. Boyle assigned the rent of his house in Crooked Lane, London, to some learned divine within the bills of mortality, to be elected for a term not exceeding three years. In course of time, however, the fund was found to be inadequate, and Archbishop Tension procured a salary of £50, charged on a farm in the parish of Brill, in the county of Bucks. Thus the foundation is settled in perpetuity, and the Boyle Lectureship continues to be a valuable institution, for the defence of Christianity against infidel objections of every kind.

BRAGI, the god of eloquence and poetry among the ancient Scandinavians. Bragi is accordingly the Norse name for the poetic art, and also employed to denote a distinguished poet or poetess.

BRAHM, the incommunicable appellation among the Hindus of the Supreme, eternal Spirit, viewed in its own abstract impersonal essence. This Supreme Being, considered as unrevealed, is known by different names, such as Brahm, Parabrahma, Paratma, Ram, or Bhagavat. He is represented as without beginning or end, eternal; that which is, and must remain, unchangeable; without dimensions, infinite; without parts, immaterial, invisible; omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent; enjoying ineffable felicity. And yet, notwithstanding this description, he is often said to be without qualities or attributes. The two statements appear contradictory, and yet they are explained by the Hindu as states of being not contemporaneous, in which case they would be contradictory, but successive, each of them being assumed alternately, after immense intervals of time. On these two successive states, Dr. Duff makes the following remarks in his 'India and India Missions:'

"The primary and proper state of Brahm's being, is that in which he exists wholly without qualities or attributes. When he thus exists, there is no visible external universe. He is then denoted emphatically THE ONE—without a second. Not merely one, generically, as being truly possessed of a divine nature;—not merely one, hypostatically, as being simple, uncompounded, and, therefore, without parts;—not merely one, numerically, as being, in point of fact, the only actually existing deity. No. He is simply, absolutely, and by necessity of nature, one:—and not only so, but he is one in the sense of excluding the very possibility of the existence of any other god. Thus far a Christian might accord in the definition of the divine unity. It is, in words, the very definition which the Bible gives of the unity of the 'only living and true God.' But the Hindu advances a step farther. He conceives, that when Brahm exists in his proper and characteristic state, he is one; not merely in the sense of excluding other gods, but in the sense of excluding the possibility of the existence of any other being whatever. He is thus not merely one, but the one,—the single and sole entity in the universe,—yea more, the only possible entity, whether created or uncreated. His oneness is so absolute, that it not only excludes the possibility of any other god, co-ordinate, or subordinate, but excludes the possibility of the existence of any other being, human or angelic, material or immaterial.

"The Hindu theologian does not stop even here. His Brahm, as already stated, exists 'without qualities or attributes.' What!—literally and absolutely without qualities or attributes? Yes, literally and absolutely so. The possession of qualities or attributes implies multiplicity and diversity of some kind. But Brahm's unity is so perfectly pure, so essentially simple, that it must exclude multiplicity or diversity of any kind. Consequently, he is represented as existing without intellect, without intelligence, without even the consciousness of his own existence! Surely this is the very transcendentalism of unity.

"No wonder though the Hindu often exclaims that his Supreme Brahm is 'nothing.' In any sense, within the reach of human understanding, he is 'nothing.' For the mind of man can form no notion of matter or spirit apart from its properties or attributes. Let Brahm, therefore, be represented as utterly devoid of attributes, and, to human apprehension, he must be actually as nothing,—a mere abstract negation more absolute than darkness, of which it has been remarked, that it is endowed with the property of at any time admitting light; or than silence, which has the quality of admitting sound; or than space, which has the capacity of admitting extension. No wonder though the Hindu confess, with a peculiar emphasis of meaning, that his Supreme Brahm is 'incomprehensible.'"

Thus stripped of all attributes, Brahm is wholly inactive, existing in a state of unbroken sleep, undisturbed repose. This profound slumber, however, is not everlasting in its duration. After unnumbered ages, he suddenly awakes, and starting to a consciousness of his own existence, he exclaims, "Brahm is," or "I am." From that moment he begins to exhibit active qualities and attributes. A desire for duality arises in his mind. In obedience to this desire, the archetype or ideal form of the universe presents itself before him. This is succeeded by an act of volition, which calls the universe into actual existence. This done Brahm relapses into his former state of quiescent repose, renouncing all his active qualities and attributes. Such is the idea of the Supreme Being among the Hindus, one Brahm without a second as he is usually described.

The Hindu Brahm has no temple dedicated to his worship, nor is a single act of adoration ever offered to him. This may appear strange, but the reason which is given by the admirers of Hinduism for the denial of all worship to Brahm is, that the "representing the Supreme being by images, or the honouring him by the institution of sacred rites, and the erection of temples must be perfectly incompatible with every conceivable notion of an all-pervading, immaterial, incorporeal spirit." In Brahm, there was originally existent Swada or the golden womb, the receptacle of all the types of things when he produced Maya, matter or illusion, the source of all phenomena, and by means of which individual existences made their appearance. From the bosom of Brahm came forth the Trimurti or Triad of the Hindus, consisting of Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver of forms, and Shiva the Destroyer of forms, who by this very destruction causes the return of beings to unity, and their re-entrance into Brahm. The Hindus are taught to look forward to absorption into the divine essence, or Brahm, as the ultimate reward, as final beatitude. See next article.

BRAHMA, the Creator, the first member of the Hindu Triad or Trimurti, He is represented as a golden-coloured figure, with four heads and four arms. The origin of Brahma is variously stated by Hindu writers. Some inform us, that, when BRAHM (see preceding article) awoke to consciousness and activity, Brahma and the other two Persons of the Triad sprung from his essence. Others allege that creation sprung from a seed deposited in the waters, which became an egg, from which Brahma the Creator was born. Brahma's first attempts at the production of the forms of animated beings are reported to have been numerous, and far from successful. "At one time," says Dr. Duff, "he is said to have performed a long and severe course of ascetic devotions to enable him to accomplish his wish, but in vain; at another, inflamed with anger and passion at his repeated failures, he sat down and wept,—and from the streaming tear-drops sprang into being, as his first-born, a progeny of ghosts and goblins of an aspect so loathsome and dreadful, that he was ready to faint away. At one time, after profound meditation, different beings spring forth, one from his thumb, a second from his breath, a third from his ear, a fourth from his side, and others from different members of his body; at another, he assumes sundry strange qualities to effectuate his purpose, or he multiplies himself into the forms of different creatures, rational and irrational. As the result of all his toil some labours and experiments, there did proceed from Brahma, directly or indirectly, a countless progeny of animated beings that people the fourteen worlds which constitute the universe."

Having peopled the heavens above, and the worlds below, stored the earth with all stationary and moveable bodies, destined to be occupied by terrestrial spirits, from the substance of his body emanated the human race, consisting originally of four classes or castes. From his mouth came the Brahmans; from his arms the Kshattrya or military caste; from his breast the Vaishya or caste of productive capitalists; from his foot the Shudra or servile caste. According to the Hindu Scriptures, the continued manifestation of the universe is co-extensive with the life of Brahma, which, according to Hindu computation, extends to upwards of three hundred billions of our years. A day of Brahma is termed a kalpa, consisting of four thousand three hundred and twenty millions of solar years. At the close of each kalpa commences his night of repose, which is of equal length with his day. During this long night, sun, moon, and stars are shrouded in gloom. Clouds from above pour down torrents of rain; and the waves of the ocean, agitated with mighty tempests, rise to a prodigious height. The seven lower worlds are at once submerged, as well as the earth which we inhabit, and even the two worlds next in the order of ascent above the earth. In the midst of this tremendous abyss, Brahma reclines on the serpent Ananta or eternity with closed eyes, and reposes in mysterious slumber. During the long night of Brahma, the wicked inhabitants of all worlds utterly perish. When he awakes, the darkness is instantly dispelled, and the universe returns to its pristine order and beauty. A partial disorganization of the ten lower worlds takes place at the close of every kalpa or day of Brahma; and a similar renovation at the succession of every night. And there being thirty-six thousand days and as many nights in his life, there must be thirty-six thousand partial destructions or disorganizations of the larger half of the universe, and as many restorations or reconstructions of it during the full period of its duration. When the life of Brahma shall come to a final termination, there will be no longer a partial destruction, but an utter annihilation. This is called a Maha Pralaya, or great destruction of the entire universe, with all that it contains, when the whole shall be reduced into nonentity, or re-absorbed into the essence of Brahm. After this mighty catastrophe, Brahm, who had fallen asleep after the manifestation of the universe, and had continued to repose during the whole duration of its existence, awakes again, and another manifestation of the universe takes place, all things being reproduced as before, and Brahma the Creator commencing a new existence. Thus, according to the Hindu sacred books, there has been, during the past eternity, and will continue to be during the eternity that is to come, an alternating succession of manifestations and annihilations of the universe at intervals of inconceivable length, stretching throughout each life of Brahma, extending to three hundred billions of our years.

BRAHMANS, in the Hindu system, accounted the highest and noblest caste in the scale of human existence, the nearest in kindred and in likeness to Brahma himself, and deriving their name from him as being his visible representatives in human form. They have been constituted the sole depositaries, the sole interpreters, the sole teachers of the Vedas or sacred books of the Hindus, and in emblem of this, the Brahmans are said to have sprung from the mouth of Brahma. A graphic account is given by Dr. Duff, of the ordinary daily religious observances prescribed to a Brahman, which are as follows, being chiefly drawn from a paper by Mr. Colebrooke, in the 'Asiatic Researches': "When a Brahman rises from sleep in the morning, his first religious duty is to clean his teeth. This is a duty so sacred, that the omission of it would incur the penalty of losing the benefit of all other rites performed by him. It consists in rubbing his teeth with a proper withe or twig of the racemiferous fig-tree, pronouncing to himself this prayer,—'Attend, Lord of the forest; Soma, king of herbs and plants, has approached thee: mayest thou and he cleanse my mouth with glory and good auspices, that I may eat abundant food. Lord of the forest!—grant me life, strength, glory, splendour, offspring, cattle, abundant wealth, virtue, knowledge, and intelligence.' On certain days, when the use of the withe is forbidden,—that is, on the day of the conjunction, and on the first, sixth, and ninth days of each lunar fortnight, he must, as a substitute, rinse his mouth twelve times with water.

"His second duty is carefully to throw away the twig which has been used. It must, on no account, be deposited in any place tainted with any of those multiplied impurities or religious stains enumerated in the sacred writings.

"His third duty is religious ablution. This is a duty, the strict observance of which is fraught with efficacy in removing not only corporeal but spiritual defilements. He may bathe with water drawn from a well, from a fountain, or from the basin of a cataract; but he should prefer water which lies above ground,—choosing a stream rather than stagnant water; a river in preference to a small brook; a holy stream before a vulgar river; and, above all, the water of the Ganges. And, if the Ganges be beyond his reach, he should invoke that holy river, saying,—'O Ganga, hear my prayers; for my sake be included in this small quantity of water, with the other sacred streams.' Then, standing in the river, or in other water, he must hallow his intended performance by the inaudible recitation of certain sacred texts. Next sipping water, which is a grand preparatory to any act of religion, and sprinkling some before him, the worshipper throws water eight times on the crown of his head, on the earth, towards the sky; again towards the sky, on the earth, on the crown of his head; once more on the earth, on the crown of his head; and, lastly, on the ground, to destroy the demons who wage war with the gods. During the performance of this sacred act of ablution, he must be reciting these prayers: 'O waters.

since ye afford delight, grant us present happiness, and the rapturous sight of the Supreme Being. Like tender mothers, make us here partakers of your most auspicious essence. We become contented with your essence, with which ye satisfy the universe. Waters! grant it to us.' Immediately after this first ablution, he should sip water without swallowing it, silently praying in these words,—' Lord of sacrifice! thy heart is in the midst of the waters of the ocean. May salutary herbs and waters pervade thee. With sacrificial hymns and humble salutation we invite thy presence. May this ablution be efficacious.' These ceremonies and prayers being concluded, he plunges thrice into the water, each time repeating the prescribed expiatory texts. Last of all, he, in due form, washes his mantle; and, rising out of the waters, thus terminates his morning ablution.

" Besides the prayers and texts from the Vedas and other sacred books, specifically intended for the different parts of all religious observances, there are certain recitations of peculiar efficacy which are constantly to be rehearsed throughout all the parts of all observances. Amongst those of most frequent occurrence, may be noticed the utterance of the names of the seven superior worlds; the trilateral monosyllable AM, contracted OM, the symbol of the Triad; and the Gayatri, or holiest text of the Vedas, which, in one of its forms, has been thus translated,—' We meditate on the adorable light of the resplendent Generator, which governs our intellects.'

" The fourth morning duty in immediate succession, in which the Brahman is called on to engage, is the important one of worshipping the rising sun. For discharging this duty aright, he must prepare himself by due ceremony and prayer. He begins by tying the lock of hair on the crown of his head, holding much cusu grass in his left, and three blades of the same grass in his right hand; or wearing a ring of grass on the third finger of the same hand. During this ceremony he must recite the Gayatri. The sipping of water next occupies his attention; as this is a requisite introduction of all rites, since without it all acts of religion are pronounced to be vain. Accordingly, he sips water three times,—each time repeating the mysterious names of the seven worlds and the Gayatri,—each time, also, rubbing his hands as if washing them; and finally, touching with his wet hand his feet, head, breast, eyes, ears, nose, and shoulders. After this, he must again sip water thrice, pronouncing to himself the prescribed expiatory texts. If, however, he happen to sneeze or spit, he must not immediately sip water, but first touch his right ear, in compliance with the maxim—' after sneezing, spitting, blowing his nose, sleeping, putting on apparel, or dropping tears, a man should not immediately sip water, but first touch his right ear.' The business of sipping being finished, he next passes his hand, filled with water, briskly round his neck, reciting this prayer,—' May the waters preserve me.' He then meditates with intense thought, and in the deepest silence. Meditates on what?—on something peculiarly sacred and sublime, and correspondent with the awful solemnity of the occasion? Let the hearers judge when they learn, that during this moment of intense devotion, he is striving to realize the fond imagination, that 'Brahma, with four faces, and a red complexion, resides in his bosom; Vishnu, with four arms, and a black complexion, in his heart; and Shiva, with five faces, and a white complexion, in his forehead!' To this sublime meditation succeeds a suppression of the breath, which is thus performed: Closing the left nostril with the two longest fingers of his right hand, he draws his breath through the right nostril; and then closing that nostril likewise with his thumb, he holds his breath, while he internally repeats to himself the Gayatri, the mysterious names of the three worlds, the trilateral monosyllable, and the sacred text of Brahma; last of all, he raises both fingers off the left nostril, and emits the breath he had suppressed through the right. This process being repeated three several times, he must next make three ablutions, with the following prayer:—' As the tired man leaves drops of sweat at the foot of a tree; as he who bathes is cleansed from all foulness; as an oblation is sanctified by holy grass,—so may this water purify me from sin.' To this succeed other ablutions, with various expiatory texts. He must next fill the palm of his hand with water, and presenting it to his nose, inhale the fluid by one nostril, and, retaining it for a while, exhale it through the other, and throw away the water to the north-east quarter. This is considered as an internal ablution which washes away sin. He then concludes by sipping water with the following prayer:—' Water! thou dost penetrate all beings; thou dost reach the deep recesses of the mountains; thou art the mouth of the universe; thou art sacrifice; thou art the mystic word vasha; thou art light, taste, and the immortal fluid.'

" All the preparatory acts being thus concluded, he is now qualified to engage in the direct worship of the rising sun. To this most sacred and solemn duty he thus proceeds: Standing on one foot, and resting the other on his ankle or heel; looking towards the east, and holding his hands open before him in a hollow form, he pronounces to himself the following prayers:—' The rays of light announce the splendid fiery sun, beautifully rising to illumine the universe. He rises, wonderful, the eye of the sun, of water, and of fire, collective power of gods. He fills heaven, earth, and sky with his luminous net; he is the soul of all which is fixed or locomotive. That eye, supremely beneficial, rises purely from the east; may we see him a hundred years; may we live a hundred years; may we hear a hundred years. May we, preserved by the divine power, contemplating heaven above the region of darkness, approach the deity, most splendid of luminaries

Thou art self-existent; thou art the most excellent ray; thou givest effulgence; grant it unto me.' These prayers being ended, the oblation or offering is next presented. It consists of tila, flowers, barley, water, and red sandal wood, in a clean copper vessel, made in the shape of a boat. This the worshipper places on his head, presenting it with the following holy texts:—'He who travels the appointed path (viz. the sun), is present in that pure orb of fire, and in the etherial region. He is the sacrificer at religious rites; and he sits in the sacred close, never remaining a single day in the same spot, yet present in every house, in the heart of every human being, in the most holy mansion, in subtile ether produced in water, in earth, in the abode of truth, and in the stony mountains; he is that which is both minute and vast.' The oblation is then concluded by worshipping the sun with the subjoined text:—'His rays, the efficient causes of knowledge, irradiating worlds, appear like sacrificial fires.' After the oblation follows the invocation of the Gayatri, in these words:—'Thou art light; thou art seed; thou art immortal life; thou art effulgent; beloved by the gods, defamed by none; thou art the holiest sacrifice.' It is afterwards recited measure by measure; then the two first measures as one hemistich, and the third measure as the other; and lastly, the three measures without interruption. The same text is then invoked in these words:—'Divine text, who dost grant our best wishes, whose name is trisyllable, whose import is the power of the supreme being; come thou mother of the Vedas, who didst spring from Brahma, be constant here.' After this address, the Gayatri itself is pronounced inaudibly, along with the trilateral monosyllable, and the names of the three lower worlds, a hundred or a thousand times; or as often as may be practicable,—counting the repetitions on a rosary of gems set in gold, or of wild grains. To these repetitions are subjoined the following prayers to the sun: 'Salutation to the sun: to that luminary, O Brahma, who is the light of the pervader, the true generator of the universe, the cause of efficacious rites. I bow to the great cause of day, the mighty luminary, the foe of darkness, the destroyer of every sin.' Last of all, the worshipper walks towards the south, rehearsing a short text: 'I follow the course of the sun.' 'As the sun in its course moves through the world by the way of the south, so do I, following that luminary, obtain the benefit arising from a journey round the earth, by the way of the south.'

"With the rehearsal of this text terminates the daily morning ablution and worship of the sun.

"One might suppose that such ablutions and ceremonial observances were enough for one day. But no. By one order of Brahmans, similar ablutions and worship of the sun must be renewed at noon; and by a higher order, both at noon and in the evening. In these cases the accompanying ceremonies are the same in spirit and substance as those already detailed,—differing only somewhat in the words and forms,—every day in the year."

From childhood the life of a Brahman is one continued series of superstitious observances. One of the most important occasions in his early life is the investing him with the sacred or triple thread which constitutes him one of the twice-born or perfect Brahmans. When he becomes a student of theology he must provide himself with a mantle, girdle, staff, and other personal apparatus. The legal staff, "made of the canonical wood, must be of such a length as to reach the student's hair; straight; without fracture; of a handsome appearance; not likely to terrify men; with its bark perfect and unhurt by fire." The most minute arrangements are made as to his marriage, his household affairs, the manner in which he is to study the Vedas, the ordinary routine of life, his purification and diet. The directions as to this last point are very curious: "After washing his hands and feet, and sipping water without swallowing it, he sits down on a stool or cushion, but not on a couch nor on a bed, before his plate, which must be placed on a clean spot of ground, that has been wiped and smoothed in a quadrangular form. When the food is first brought in he is required to bow to it, raising both hands in the form of humble salutation to his forehead; and he should add, 'May this be always ours;' that is, may food never be deficient. When he has sat down, he should lift the plate with his left hand, and bless the food, saying, 'Thou art invigorating.' He sets it down, naming the three worlds; or, if the food be handed to him, he says, 'May heaven give thee;' and then accepts it with these words, 'The earth accepts thee.' Before he begins eating, he must move his hand round the plate, to insulate it; he must also, with his hand, trace a line all around, and consecrate the circle by appropriate texts;—for what purpose?—to insulate his person during the meal, lest it should be contaminated by the touch of some undetected sinner who may be present, or who might intrude! He next consummates the consecration of the food, by making five oblations out of it to Brahma and other gods—dropping each oblation on fire, or on water, or on the ground, with the usual addition, 'May this oblation be efficacious.' He sips and swallows water; he makes five oblations to breath by its five distinct names;—and lastly, he wets both eyes. These important and indispensable preliminaries being ended, he may now proceed to partake of his repast; but he must proceed in solemn silence, lifting the food with the fingers of his right hand. After the eating is finished, he again sips water; and concludes the whole by saying, 'Ambrosial fluid, thou art the couch of Vishnu, and of food.'"

Among the Brahmans there are several degrees or orders. Formerly they were employed in austere devotion and abstinence, their business being the worship of the gods; at that time they were supported by kings and princes, and they seem not to have employed themselves in worldly labour. At present only a few are supported by such means, most of them being obliged to enter into all kinds of worldly employment for support, and many of them deriving a scanty subsistence by begging. But however poor they may be, the Brahmans are held in great respect, and any want of reverence to them, especially by the lowest or Sudra class, is accounted one of the most atrocious crimes. They are exempted from taxation, and from the sanguinary laws which affect the other classes. Neither the life nor property of a Brahman can be touched, even though he should be guilty of the heaviest crimes. The duties which properly belong to this high and honourable order are to meditate on divine things, to read the Vedas carefully and diligently, to instruct the young Brahmans, and to perform sacrifices and other religious acts. The most abandoned Brahman retains his rank notwithstanding his crimes; but he will entirely forfeit it by touching impure food, or by some such petty delinquency. No one can become a Brahman but by birth, and the Institutes of Manu declare, that "if a Brahman have not begotten a son, yet shall aim at final beatitude, he shall sink to a place of degradation."

BRANCH. An idolatrous practice is referred to in Ezek. viii. 17, under the expression "putting the branch to the nose." Learned men have differed as to the custom which the prophet thus describes. It may have been that the worshipper with a branch in his hand touched the idol, and then applied the branch to his nose and mouth, in token of worship and adoration. Some writers think that it refers to the worship of Adonis.

BRANCHUS, a son of Apollo, by whom he was endowed with prophetic power, which he received at Didymus near Miletus. At that place he founded an oracle, of which his descendants, the Branchidæ, were the priests, and which was held in great esteem, especially by the Ionians and Æolians. See next article.

BRANCHIDÆ, priests of the temple of Apollo, at Didymus in Ionia. They opened their temple to Xerxes, who plundered it of all its riches. After this they fled to Sogdiana, where they built a city called by their own name. Alexander the Great, after he had conquered Darius, destroyed their city, and put them all to the sword. Oracles were given by the Branchidæ, in the temple at Didymus.

BRANDENBURG CONFESSION. A formula or confession of faith, drawn up in the city of Brandenburg, by order of the Elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (which see).

BRAURONIA, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped in a temple on the Acropolis of Athens. There was an image of her also at Brauron in Attica, which was of great antiquity. See next article.

BRAURONIA, the name of a festival celebrated in honour of the goddess Artemis, at Brauron in Attica, where Orestes and Iphigenia left the statue of the Taurian goddess. The festival was held every fifth year, when a number of young females, about ten years of age, dressed in crocus-coloured garments, walked in solemn procession to the temple of the goddess, where they were consecrated to her service. The priests sacrificed a goat, and the girls went through a ceremony in which they imitated bears, probably because the bear was sacred to Artemis, especially in Arcadia. Another festival bearing the same name, was celebrated every five years at Brauron, in honour of Dionysus. Both men and women took part in this festival.

BRAZEN SEA, a brass laver, which in the first temple stood in the court of the priests. It was an immense vessel of metal, nine feet deep, and more than fifty in circumference. Its precise shape is not known, but it contained somewhere about fifteen or twenty thousand gallons of water. It was made to rest upon twelve oxen, three looking every way, which were supposed by some Jewish writers to have been made by Solomon, in contempt of the golden calf worshipped by the Israelites in the wilderness. Josephus thinks, but without the slightest foundation, that God was offended with Solomon for having made these images. The brazen sea is thus described by Lewis in his 'Hebrew Antiquities:'

"It was placed at the east end of the court of the priests, towards the north-east corner. Its extent and dimensions are thus expressed: it was ten cubits from the one brim to the other, five cubits in height, and thirty cubits in circumference, and contained, say the Jews, of liquid two thousand baths; but of dry things that would lie heaped above the brim, it would hold three. In the brim of it it was perfectly round, and so it continued in the two upper cubits; but below the brim, in the three lower cubits, it was square. It was a hand-breadth thick, and the brim was wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies. About the body of this huge vessel there were two borders of engravings, the work of which are called oxen, not in their full proportion, but the heads only, and the rest in an oval instead of the body; and it is conceived by some, that out of these heads, or out of some of them, the water issued forth, they being made as cocks and conveyances for that purpose. This molten sea was designed for the priests washing themselves before they went about the service. Their washing was twofold, either of their hands and feet, or of their whole bodies; and this vessel served for both uses, but in a different manner. Their hands and feet they washed in the water that ran out by some cocks and spouts of it; but to wash or bathe their bodies they went down into the vessel itself. Now had it been always full of water to the brim, it would have been too deep for them to stand in, and they would have been in danger of drowning; therefore there was such a gage set by cocks or pipes running out continually, that the water was kept at such a height as should serve for their purpose abundantly, and yet should not endanger their persons; and it may properly enough be said, that the water it had constantly in it was two thousand baths, which served for washing; and that it would hold three thousand baths, were it filled up to the brim. The supply of water into this vessel was through a pipe out of the well Etam; though some are of opinion that it was constantly supplied with water by the Gibeonites."

The Jewish priests were bound to wash their hands and feet every day on pain of death. This ceremony was performed at their entrance on their ministrations for the day; but on the great day of atonement, the washing was to be renewed before five of the various duties then to be discharged. A similar vessel, though by no means so magnificent, stood, according to the Talmudists, at the entrance of the tabernacle, but a little on the south side, so that the priests coming into the court went immediately to the laver, and having washed, ascended to the altar. This sea was made of the finest brass, obtained from the brazen mirrors of the Israelitish women. These they brought voluntarily to Moses, who constructed with them lavers for the service of the priests.

BRAZEN SERPENT. To punish the Israelites for their sinful murmuring and repining in the wilderness, God sent great swarms of fiery serpents among them. In great alarm the people cried to the Lord for deliverance from this fearful calamity, and in answer to their prayers God commanded Moses to construct a serpent of brass, and to raise it upon a pole in the sight of the wounded Israelites, that as many as looked upon it might be healed. The result was as God had promised; multitudes were cured, and the brazen serpent was kept as a memorial of so remarkable a deliverance. It continued to be preserved with great care for upwards of seven hundred years; but, in course of time, it became an object of idolatrous worship, and we are told concerning Hezekiah, king of Judah, 2 Kings xviii. 4, "He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves, and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he called it Nehushtan." From the expression used in this passage, "Unto those days the children of Israel burnt incense to it," this species of idolatry would appear to have been of long standing. Hezekiah, however, in righteous indignation, broke the serpent in pieces, calling it in derision Nehushtan, a mere piece of brass. It seems strange, that if the brazen serpent had been worshipped long before the time of Hezekiah, such kings as Asa and Jehoshaphat, who were zealous for the purity of Divine worship, should have permitted such gross idolatry. Rabbi David Kimchi attempts to explain the matter, by alleging that Asa and Jehoshaphat did not destroy the brazen serpent when they abolished idolatry, because they did not perceive that it was worshipped, or that incense was burnt to it in their time. This explanation, however, is by no means satisfactory, and it is far more probable that Asa and Jehoshaphat, while they strongly disapproved of the idolatry into which the people had fallen, contented themselves with a simple prohibition, but that Hezekiah, perceiving the utter inadequacy of such lenient measures to arrest the progress of idolatry among his people, came to the resolution of boldly suppressing the heinous crime by the total destruction of the object of their idolatry. The Nehushtan was ground to powder, and yet the Romanists pretend to show at Milan a brazen serpent which they allege was the identical serpent constructed by Moses.

BREAD (BLESSED). See ANTIDORON.

BREAD (DAY OF), a name given sometimes, in the early ages of the Christian Church, to the Lord's day, because the breaking of bread in the Lord's Supper was so general a custom in the Church on that day. See LORD'S DAY.

BREAD (EUCCHARISTIC), the bread used in the Lord's Supper. In the early ages of the Christian church it was customary for the faithful at the seasons for celebrating the Lord's Supper, to bring with them a free-will-offering, each according to his ability, to the treasury of the church. In the case of the more wealthy Christians, these oblations consisted partly of bread and wine, from which the sacramental elements were taken, the bread being that which was commonly used in the country, and the wine being mixed with water, according to the invariable custom of the ancients. These oblations were not allowed to be presented by any but communicants, and to be prevented from making them was accounted as a sort of lesser excommunication. That the bread which was used in the primitive church, in the Lord's Supper, was common leavened bread, is plain from the very circumstance, that it was taken from the oblations contributed by the people. And, besides, Epiphanius mentions it as one of the peculiar observances of the Ebionite heretics, that they used unleavened bread in the Eucharist, which he would not have noted as a peculiarity had it been the regular practice of the Christian church. The ancient writers never refer to the employment of unleavened bread in the communion, but they often speak of leavened bread, and even call the Lord's Supper fermentum, or leaven, on this account. It is somewhat remarkable, that no Greek writer before Cerularius, whatever complaint he may make against the Roman church, ever hints at their being chargeable with the use of unleavened bread—a strong proof that such a practice was utterly unknown even among them before the eleventh century.

What may have led to the change from leavened to unleavened bread it is difficult with any certainty to say. The conjecture of Bona upon this point, which Bingham thinks probable, is, that the custom was introduced when the people ceased to bring their oblations, and it became necessary for the clergy to provide the elements. The duty thus devolving upon them, it was judged more respectful and solemn to use unleavened instead of leavened bread, and at the same time, probably, they changed from a loaf of common bread that might be broken, to a thin delicate wafer, formed in the figure of a denarius or penny, to represent the pence, as some think, for which our Saviour was betrayed. But whether Bona's conjecture be well-founded or otherwise, one thing seem to be clearly established, that for more than a thousand years the use of unleavened bread in the sacrament of the supper was altogether unknown.

A keen controversy arose in the eleventh century between the Greek and Latin churches, on the question whether leavened or unleavened bread ought to be used in the Eucharist. The former contended for the use of leavened, the latter for the use of unleavened bread. The Greeks accordingly called the Latins, AZYMITES (which see), while the Latins retorted upon the Greeks the charge of being Fermentati or Prozymites. Both parties claim our Lord's example as in their favour, the one party alleging that he made use of the unleavened bread of the passover, and the other asserting with equal vehemence that he employed only common bread. On this point it is impossible to arrive at anything approaching to certainty. But the early Christian writers are completely silent as to the bread being any other than the fermented bread, which was commonly in use. Protestants consider the quality of the bread as of no importance. At the Reformation the greater number of them discontinued the use of unleavened bread. The Lutherans, however, still continue it. The eucharistic bread among the Romanists is made of meal and water, and formed into thin, small circular cakes like wafers, which receive the name of the HOST (which see). The Armenian church follows the Roman in employing unleavened bread. The Nestorians lay peculiar stress on the annual renewal of the holy leaven, a rite which they observe on the same Thursday that is set apart in the other Eastern churches for the sanctification of the chrism. They have a curious tradition that John the Baptist preserved a few drops of water which dripped from our Lord's garment as he came up out of Jordan, and that these were intrusted to the care of John the son of Zebedee; that the latter John received from Christ at the supper a double portion of bread, and having eaten the one, he preserved the other; that he also being present at the crucifixion preserved some of the blood and water that flowed from the Saviour's side, gathering the former upon the bread, and adding the other to the baptismal water; and that the water being mixed with oil, and the bread ground down to powder, they were divided and distributed among the twelve, each of whom went forth to distant nations, provided with holy water for baptism, and leaven for the sacramental bread. In accordance with this tradition, the Nestorians mix oil, the Jacobites oil and salt with the flour in making the eucharistic bread. The loaf which is used by the Greeks in the communion is round, with a square projection in the middle called the Holy Lamb, or the Holy Bread, and on this projection there is a motto implying "Jesus Christ conquers." The motto stamped on the bread among the Copts is, "Holy, holy, holy; Lord of Sabaoth." See LORD'S SUPPER.

BREAD OF THE PRESENCE. See SHEWBREAD.

BREAD (UNLEAVENED), unfermented bread. Among the Jews, the passover has always been celebrated with unleavened bread, the paschal lamb being commanded to be eaten with this kind of bread, on pain of being cut off from Israel, or excommunicated. The reason of this strict injunction seems to have been partly to remind them of the hardships they had endured in Egypt, and hence it is called Deut. xvi. 3. the bread of affliction; and partly in commemoration of the haste with which they had fled from Egypt, not having had time to leaven their dough, and hence the command was given, "Thou shalt eat unleavened bread, even the bread of affliction; for thou camest forth out of Egypt in haste." The Jews are even yet so attentive to the observance of this ceremony, that the greatest care is taken in the preparation of the paschal bread. By the Rabbinical precepts on the point, it was either made of wheat or barley, but it was necessary that it should be of the very best quality. They separated all the moist grains, examined every sack, lest any remainder of old meal should be found in it, and conveyed it to the mill on the backs of horses, and uncovered, lest it should become heated. It was neither to be mingled with oil, nor salt, nor butter. Neither a child, nor a fool, nor a deaf man, nor a Gentile, nor a Christian, was allowed to touch it. Only a Jew was permitted to prepare it, and the Rabbis deemed it a peculiar honour to be so employed.

The modern Jews, before commencing the feast of the passover, are quite alarmed lest the slightest portion of leaven should be found in their houses. On the thirteenth day of the month Nisan, corresponding nearly to our March, all the houses and surrounding premises are examined with the most sedulous care; a candle being lighted, and every hole and corner searched. Before entering upon the search, the master of the house utters the following ejaculation, "Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the King everlasting, who hast sanctified us by thy commandment, and hast enjoined us the taking away of leaven." Not a sentence is uttered between this and the search, and if any leaven is found, it is pronounced useless, and the master of the house repeats this wish, "All the leaven that is in my possession, which I have seen, or which I have not seen, be it null, be it as the dust of the earth, or entirely perish." All the leaven that can be found is collected together in a vessel, carefully preserved during the night, and along with the vessel in which it is deposited, is solemnly burnt a little before noon the next day. No vessels are to be used that have had any leaven in them, and, therefore, the ordinary kitchen utensils are removed, and others put in their place. Sometimes vessels are kept for special use on passover occasions, and employed at no other times. The whole kitchen furniture also is carefully washed first with hot water and then with cold.

After the leaven has been burnt, the unleavened cakes are prepared as many as will be wanted during the feast, to supply the place of common bread. The cakes are usually round, thin, and full of little holes. In general they consist only of flour and water, but the more wealthy Jews enrich them with eggs and sugar, taking care, however, to use only the simple cakes on the first day of the festival. The injunction of the use of unleavened bread during the feast of the passover has been supposed by some to have had a moral design, calling upon the Israelites to cleanse out the old leaven of malice and wickedness, and to cultivate the simple, pure qualities of sincerity and truth.

BREAD (FEAST of UNLEAVENED). See PASS-OVER.

BREAST-PLATE, one of the official garments of the Jewish high-priest in ancient times. It was called the breast-plate of judgment, probably because it was worn on those solemn occasions when the high-priest went into the most holy place, to consult God in reference to such judicial matters as were too difficult for decision by the inferior judges, and referred to the more important civil and religious concerns of the nation. The breast-plate was formed of the same rich brocade as the EPHOD (which see), of two spans in length, and one in breadth. It was doubled, and thus became a span, or eighteen inches square. At each corner was a golden ring. To the two upper rings were attached two golden chains of wreathen work, by means of which it was suspended on the breast. Through the two lower rings were passed ribbons of blue, which were also connected with two corresponding rings of the ephod. Thus were the breast-plate and the ephod inseparably joined together, and the punishment of stripes was decreed against any one who should attempt to divide the one from the other. The breast-plate was set with twelve precious stones in four rows, three in each row. These stones were called URIM and THUMMIM (which see), by means of which God was consulted and answers received. Under the second temple there was a breast-plate made, and stones set in it, but these were never used to ascertain the will of God. Upon each stone was engraven the name of one of the sons of Jacob. The high-priest was not allowed to enter the holy place without being clothed in the sacred breast-plate, except on the great day of atonement, when he wore not his pontifical garments, but a dress of white linen.

The stones of the breast-plate were in some way used as a medium of the oracular responses which the high-priest obtained from Jehovah by consultation in behalf of the Jewish people. Some writers, among whom are Josephus and Philo, suppose them to have been identical with the Urim and Thummim; others regard the two as entirely distinct from one another. Sir Gardner Wilkinson, in his work on the 'Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians,' refers to a pectoral ornament worn by the Egyptian judges, which seems exactly to correspond to the breast plate of the Jewish priests. "When a case," he says, "was brought for trial, it was customary for the arch-judge to put a golden chain around his neck, to which was suspended a small figure of truth ornamented with precious stones. This was, in fact, a representation of the goddess, who was worshipped under the double character of truth and justice, and whose name Thmei appears to have been the origin of the Hebrew Thummim, a word, according to the Septuagint translation, implying truth, and bearing a further analogy in its plural termination. And what makes it more remarkable is, that the chief priest of the Jews, who, before the election of a king, was also the judge of the nation, was alone entitled to wear this honorary badge, and the Thummim of the Hebrews, like the Egyptian figure, was studded with precious stones." See HIGH-PRIEST.

BREIDABLIK, one of the mansions of the celestial regions, according to the ancient Scandinavian mythology. It was the region of ample vision.

BRETHREN, a class of Christians, in England, who assume to themselves this name to indicate their individual state as Christians or brethren in Christ, while they refuse to consider themselves as a distinct religious sect. They arose about 1830, and as their first church was formed in Plymouth, they are generally known by the name of Plymouth Brethren. The peculiar idea which they entertain of a Christian church, is, not that it is a definite ecclesiastical organization, but a recognized union of all who are true believers. They protest against all sects and separate denominations, both Established and Dissenting. They see no reason why the body of Christ, which is really one, should not be also visibly united, having as its sole bond of union the recognition of the same vital truths and fellowship with the same living Head. Separation on account of differences of opinion on minor and non-essential points they regard as sinful and unwarranted by the Word of God. All articles, creeds, and confessions they view as a denial of the sufficiency of Scripture; and the appointment of a regular ministry, and the observance of ritual ceremonies, as a virtual refusal to acknowledge the Holy Spirit as the all-sufficient guide of his people. They disclaim, therefore, all human forms and systems, and profess to submit only to the direction of the Spirit. They disavow all distinction between the clergy and the laity in the Church of God. Any one of the Brethren who possesses the gift, not only may, but is morally bound to use it for the edification of the Church; all believers under the New Testament being a spiritual priesthood, subject to the guidance of the Holy Ghost. In their meetings, accordingly, any one who believes himself to be led by the Spirit to speak for edification may address the assembly. Should any, however, conceive themselves to be possessed of such peculiar gifts as to warrant them in devoting themselves to the work of preaching and expounding, they must do so solely on their own individual responsibility to the Lord, without any appointment or ordination from the brethren. A ministry ordained by man they disclaim, and in the case of the special ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, the latter of which they celebrate weekly, it is in the power of any one of the Brethren to officiate.

In doctrine the Brethren avow principles which differ from those of most Christian churches. They hold that any man in whom the Holy Spirit dwells is a member of the Church Catholic throughout the world; and having received gifts from the Spirit, who divides to every man severally as he will, he may lawfully preach without any authority received from man. Being in a state of grace already, a Christian, in their view, has no need to ask for blessings which he has already received, but simply for increase of them. He is no longer under the law as a rule of life, having been delivered from it by Christ. To preach the law, therefore, to true believers, is distinct legalism, and a denial of the completeness of Christ's work. Many of the "Brethren" believe in the second advent of Christ as a personal advent, and in his millennial reign upon the earth. This is by no means, however, the universal opinion of the body.

By the last census in 1851, the returns gave 132 places of worship as belonging to the "Brethren." This, however, is probably below the actual number, in consequence of their unwillingness, in many cases, to be recognized under any sectarian appellation. The number of adherents at that period did not exceed 6,000 or 7,000; but for several years past they have obtained considerable accessions, and are now a much larger body. In America, also the "Brethren" are making rapid progress.

BRETHREN OF ALEXIUS. See CELLITES.

BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LOT, a Christian institute or association which sprung up in the Netherlands in the fourteenth century, and proved itself one of the means under God of paving the way for the Reformation. The originator of this important institution was Gerhard Groot, a native of Deventer, born in 1340. Having been educated for the church at the university of Paris, he became canon of Utrecht and of Aix. Being a person of rank and fortune, and as yet a total stranger to the influence of divine grace, he gave himself up to worldly pleasure and amusement without regard to his clerical office and its deep responsibilities. But this was only for a time. It pleased God to awaken Groot to more serious and deeper thought. He now became a changed man. Renouncing the vanities of the world, he resolved to devote himself to the spiritual good of his fellowmen. To prepare himself for a life of active usefulness, he retired to a Carthusian monastery, where he spent three years in earnest study of the Holy Scriptures, serious meditation, and prayer. He now returned to active duty, as a private individual, however, not as a priest. "I would not for all the gold of Arabia," said this devout thoughtful man, "undertake the care of souls even for a single night." With such elevated views of the sacred ministry, he refused to be ordained to any higher office than a deacon—an office which conferred on him the right of instructing the people.

Thus, invested with the power of preaching, Groot set out to do the work of an evangelist, travelling through towns and villages everywhere, calling upon the people, like another John the Baptist, to repent and turn to the Lord. Nor did he preach like the priests of his time, in the Latin language, but in their own vernacular tongue, and with an eloquence and a power which attracted crowds to hear him. Wherever he went, he was unwearied in proclaiming the gospel, frequently preaching twice a-day, and for three hours at a time. The result was, that numbers, attracted by curiosity to hear the wonderful preacher, were brought by his instrumentality to the saving knowledge of the truth. The clergy, whose corrupt manners he denounced with unsparing severity, were indignant at the uncompromising fidelity with which their vices were exposed. They complained to the bishop of Utrecht, and prevailed upon that prelate to withdraw from Groot his license to preach. The good man meekly submitted to the orders of his ecclesiastical superior, and now confined himself to a quiet and circumscribed sphere of labour, in which he felt peculiar enjoyment. He settled at Deventer, and loving the society of young men, he gathered around him a number of active zealous youths, whom he employed in copying the Scriptures and other devotional books. This led to the institution of the Brotherhood of the Common Lot. The nature and objects of the society are thus described by Ullmann in his 'Reformers before the Reformation':—"In their mode of life and pursuits they constituted a union of brethren, conformed as far as the circumstances of the times would permit to the apostolical pattern. Combined for the cultivation of genuine piety, they procured for themselves the means of a simple livelihood, partly like the apostle Paul by manual labour, and partly by receiving voluntary donations, which, however, no one was permitted to solicit, except in a case of urgent necessity. To insure their common subsistence, and in token of their fraternal affection, they had introduced among them the principle of a community of goods. In most cases each member surrendered what property he possessed for the use of the society. There seems, however, to have been, at least in the infancy of the institution, no strict and general law upon the subject, such as obtained in the societies of the Pythagoreans and Essenes. All was to proceed from freedom and love. Imitating the Church at Jerusalem, and prompted by brotherly affection, they mutually shared with each other their earnings and property, or consecrated also their fortune, if they possessed any, to the service of the community. From this source, and from donations and legacies made to them, arose the Brother-houses, in each of which a certain number of members lived together, subjected, it is true, in dress, diet, and general way of life, to an appointed rule, but yet not conventually sequestered from the world, with which they maintained constant intercourse, and in such a way as, in opposition to monachism, to preserve the principle of individual liberty. Their whole rule was to be observed, not from constraint, but from the sole motive of good-will constantly renewed, and all obedience, even the most unconditional, was to be paid freely and affectionately, and for God's sake.

"The grand object of the societies, was the establishment, exemplification and spread of practical Christianity. This they endeavoured to accomplish, in the first instance, among themselves, by the whole style of their association, by the moral rigour and simplicity of their manner of living, by religious conversations, mutual confessions, admonitions, lectures, and social exercises of devotion. For the promotion of the same object outwardly, they laboured by transcribing and propagating sacred Scripture and proper religious treatises, but most of all by the instruction of the common people in Christianity, and the revival and improvement of the education of youth. In this last department they form an epoch. It is true that at a much earlier date schools had been instituted in the chief cities of the Netherlands, as for example at Gravesande in 1322, at Leyden in 1324, at Rotterdam in 1328, at Schiedam in 1336, at Delft in 1342, at Hoorn in 1358, at Haarlem in 1389, and at Alkmaar in 1390. But for the most part these schools were not purely scientific. They were at the same time financial enterprises of the towns. The right to set up a school was leased. The consequence was that wages were exacted from the scholars, such as only the more wealthy could pay; while the whole style of the institutions was very defective. Nor was the instruction imparted by the monks in the conventual schools more satisfactory. It was too superficial, and being universally mingled with coarse and superstitious ingredients, was in many ways at variance with true enlightenment. The Brethren of the Common Lot, on the contrary, not merely gave instruction gratuitously, and thereby rendered the arts of reading and writing attainable by all, both rich and poor, and not merely promoted in every way the progress of the more indigent class of students; but what was of most consequence, they imbued education with quite a new life and a purer and nobler spirit."

The system of instruction followed by the Brethren of the Common Lot was thoroughly religious. It was founded upon the Word of God, and while the best of the Church Fathers were used in the schools, as well as useful selections from the heathen moralists, all was directed to the inculcation of a spirit of vital godliness. Nor were these institutions long in commending themselves to public favour. In a short space of time, and at different places in Holland, Guelders, and Brabant, in Friesland, Westphalia, and even as far as Saxony, Brother-houses were erected.

Though professing himself a rigid and zealous adherent of the Romish church, Groot was perhaps unconsciously hastening forward the Reformation. He insisted with the greatest earnestness upon the use of the holy Scriptures, and the multiplication and diffusion of copies of them. Christ was to him the beginning and end of the Bible, the root and stem of life, the sole foundation of the church. The anxiety of this excellent man was to bring back the clergy to the model of apostolic life and doctrine. "Whoever wishes," says he, "to undertake the cure of souls in a worthy manner, ought above all things to have a pure intention. A pure intention, however, requires of him that he seek the glory of God, and the salvation of souls, as his chief object, and it will be a test of this if he undertake the pastoral office even when no temporal advantage is connected with it, and solely for the work's own sake; provided he have sufficient means from other sources to support himself and those dependent upon him."

Groot intended, had his life been prolonged, to have founded a convent of regular canons, with the view of exemplifying the mode of life which he judged to be the most profitable. But death prevented the accomplishment of his scheme. He was cut off by the plague, and his death was calm, peaceful, and resigned.

After the decease of Groot, his disciple Florentius Radewins completed the work that he had begun, by founding in 1386 at Windesheim, in Zwoll, a chapter of regular canons, and afterwards granted to the society a Brother-house in Deventer, in which, under the superintendence of priests, young men were prepared for the sacred office, and pious laymen who plied their different trades, lived together as brethren in community of goods, but without a perpetual vow, endeavoured to promote Christian piety among themselves and others by regular devotional exercises, to which every one had free access. These brethren spread themselves quickly in the Netherlands, and also in Northern Germany. From their resemblance to the BEGHARDS (which see) they quickly fell under the suspicion of the inquisitors, and suffered much persecution.

At the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Brethren of the Common Lot in the Netherlands were attacked by Matthew Grabo, lector of the Dominican monastery at Groningen, who declared their whole method of life unlawful and heretical. The reformed canons of the Windesheim congregation interposed in defence of the Brethren. Grabo was accused before the bishop of Utrecht, and appealed to the Pope. The question was brought before the council of Constance, when the principal authorities pronounced at once in favour of the Brethren, and Grabo was sentenced to renounce his errors. From this time the institution of the Common Lot made rapid progress. Many of the Brethren were engaged in schools, and others were employed in different trades to earn a livelihood. It was a leading object of the association to forward the religious education of the people, and in particular to train up a pious clergy. Thus it soon became a fruitful training school for the monasteries. The jealousy of the Mendicant monks was aroused, and they stretched forth the hand of persecution; but Eugene IV. took the Brethren under his protection, and many of them found it necessary to unite with the Tertiaries of the Franciscans, in order to obtain peace. The hostility of the Mendicants to the Brethren, however, in process of time began to abate, when they saw that the training given to the young brought them also many novices. In Upper Germany and Switzerland, the Brethren of the Common Lot could find no footing; and there the societies of the Beghards remained continually addicted to mendicancy, and became nurseries of heresy.

The Brethren of the Common Lot were associated together in separate communities, under the name of Brother-houses, which are thus described by Ullmann:—"About twenty of them lived together in a domicile, possessing a common fund, and taking their food at a common table. They were again divided into priests, clergy, and laymen. The number of priests was at first very small, because the first brethren, after the example of Gerhard, viewed the spiritual office in all its magnitude and responsibility. Subsequently, however, more of them received ordination as priests, and of these several accepted spiritual offices, and ceased cohabiting with the brethren, whereas others still continued as inmates of their houses. Usually there were four priests or even more in a house, and about twice as many so called clerici, with whom were classed the novices and such laymen as were desirous of practising for a while the brethren's method of life. Reception into a fraternity, usually accorded only after repeated and urgent solicitation (for the brethren were above courting proselytes like the mendicant monks), was preceded by a year of probation, during which the novices were subjected to very rigorous treatment. Nor was it thought desirable during this interval for the probationer to return home, lest he might again become entangled with family affairs and worldly connections. The candidate, on his admission into the Society, was expected to resign his patrimony for the common use. Among the sayings of Florentinus we find the following, 'Woe to him who, while living in a community, seeks his own things, or says that anything is his own!' Whoever passed the trial, and was still desirous of permanently joining the Society, became a clerk. This state corresponded with that of an ordinary monk, excepting that no vow binding for life was exacted. Any clerk was at liberty to leave the Society without incurring canonical penalties; though he required to settle accounts with the brethren, and leave behind him a certain sum of money. The freedom in respect of dress and mode of living, was also greater than in monasteries. The customary dress was a grey cloak, coat, and breeches, without ornament. A cowl of the same colour covered the head, whence they were called cucullati, pupils had the hair shaved from their crowns. The life of the brethren in every house was very methodical. They had fixed hours for devotional exercises, writing, and manual labour. During meals some book was read, the brethren taking duty in turn. On such occasions one of them was also appointed to censure the improprieties that might take place at table. In general an equality, like that between the members of a family, prevailed in the societies, though, for the sake of order, it was requisite that there should be distinct offices. Over every house presided a rector, prior, or prepositus, elected from among the brethren and assisted by a vice-rector."

About the same time as that which saw the commencement of the Brother-houses, female Societies of the Common Lot also arose. Groot had formed a community of women, who lived a simple and retired life, chiefly employing themselves in sewing and weaving, devotional exercises, and the instruction of female children. The sisterhood once begun, rapidly extended. At the head of each house was placed a directress, called Martha, with an under-Martha as her assistant. The chief Martha in Utrecht superintended all the female societies of the district, and visited them once a-year. The houses were formed on the principle of a community of goods.

operate with the most beneficial influence upon society wherever their institutions were planted, until they were absorbed in the men of the Reformation. Luther acknowledged that they had faithfully kept the pure Word, and first introduced the gospel. They were the pioneers, indeed, of the Reformation, and by the encouragement which they gave to the cultivation of polite literature, as well as by the pious, though somewhat mystical spirit which they diffused all around them, they contributed mainly to the hastening of that glorious era when multitudes threw off the yoke of Rome, and claimed for themselves complete liberty of thought and action.

BRETHREN OF THE COMMUNITY, one of the two parties into which the Franciscan order of monks was divided in the beginning of the fourteenth century. They, in opposition to the Spirituals, were strongly in favour of relaxing the strict vow of poverty enjoined by their founder, St. Francis. In A. D. 1310, Pope Clement V. summoned the leaders of both parties to his court, and made great efforts to bring about a reconciliation. After various conferences, the Pope, in the general council of Vienne, A. D. 1312, published a bull, in which he endeavoured to terminate the dispute, by adopting a middle course. To please the Spirituals, he commanded the Franciscans to adhere strictly to their rule, enjoining poverty, while to please the Brethren of the Community, he allowed the Franciscans, where they had no opportunity of procuring a subsistence by begging, to provide themselves with granaries, and to collect and lay up in them what they could procure by begging, while the officers and overseers of the order were to judge when and where such granaries were necessary. This decision quieted the contention for a time; but unhappily it burst forth in France with increased vehemence on the death of Clement V., and, in A. D. 1314, the Spirituals drove the Brethren of the Community out of the monasteries of Narbonne and Beziers, appointed new presiding officers, cast off their former garments, and put on a short, narrow, ill-shaped dress. John XXII., on his elevation to the papedom, directed all his efforts towards a settlement of the dispute, summoning the French Spirituals before him at Avignon, and exhorting them to lay aside the obnoxious dress they had assumed. Some of them complied, but a few refused to submit to the requisition. Indignant at this attempted resistance to his authority, John called in the aid of the Inquisitors, who burned several of the rebels at the stake for no other crime than setting the rule of their founder, St. Francis, above the power of the pontiffs.

The points thus keenly contested were of very inferior importance, referring exclusively to the form of the garments which Franciscans were allowed to wear, and their right to have granaries and cellars in which to store their provisions. The Brethren of the Community wore long, loose, somewhat elegant habits, with ample hoods or coverings for their heads, while the Spirituals wore short, narrow, mean dresses, with small hoods. The Brethren of the Community also, in the seasons of harvest and vintage, laid up corn in their granaries and wine in their cellars; but the Spirituals contended that such a practice was inconsistent with true mendicity. The two parties were bitterly opposed to each other. The Pope, John XXII., however, persecuted the Spirituals with the most unsparing severity, committing numbers of them to the flames without mercy. This persecution raged for a long period, and, from A. D. 1318 to the time of Innocent VI., A. D. 1352, no fewer than one hundred and thirteen persons of both sexes were cruelly put to death in France and Italy. "To these," says Mosheim, "so many others might be added from the historians and documents, printed and manuscript, that I suppose a catalogue of two thousand such martyrs might be made out." See FRANCISCANS.

BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, a sect which arose in the thirteenth century. It seems to have originated in the Pantheistic system, introduced by Amalric of Bena (See AMALRICIANS), which, after the persecution it underwent in Paris, in A. D. 1210, only spread more widely than before. The sect of the Brethren of the Free Spirit made its appearance first under the name of Ortlibenzes, or Ortlibarii, in Strasburg, in A. D. 1212. This name was probably derived from a person called Ortlieb, who made known the doctrines of Amalric in that part of Germany. From Strasburg the sect spread into the rest of Alsace and the Thurgau. In A. D. 1230, they had crept in among the Waldenses in Lyons; in A. D. 1250 they appeared at Cologne, and a few years later they were so numerous among the BEGHARDS (which see) on the Rhine, that they were often confounded with them. In the beginning of the fourteenth century, they made their appearance also in Italy, where Mosheim erroneously alleges them to have had their origin. The peculiar name of Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, seems to have been taken from the words of the Apostle Paul, Rom. viii. 2, 14, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law or sin and death. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Founding on this passage, they alleged themselves to be the true sons of God, brought into the most perfect freedom from the law. The mystic theology which they taught is thus described by Mosheim. "They held that all things emanated from God and would revert back to him; that rational souls were parts of the Supreme Being, and that the whole universe was God; that a man, by turning his thoughts inward, and withdrawing his attention from all sensible objects, may become united in an inexplicable manner with the Parent and First Cause of all things, and be one with him; that persons thus immersed in the vortex of the Deity by long contemplation attain to perfect freedom, and become divested not only of all their lusts, but of the instincts of nature. From these and similar principles they inferred that a person thus raised up to God, and absorbed as it were in the divine nature, is himself God, and such a son of God as Christ was, and therefore is raised above all laws, human and divine. And they maintained, consequently, that all external worship of God, prayer, fasting, baptism, the sacred supper, &c., are mere elements for children, which a man no longer needs when converted into God himself, and detached from this visible universe."

Some of the adherents of this sect limited their notion of the liberty to which the apostle referred, to a freedom from outward worship and ecclesiastical law; thus making religion consist solely in the internal worship of the heart. Others, again, carried the idea of liberty so far as to maintain that it involved a complete exemption from even the possibility of sinning, the believer being so closely united to God that his whole actions and operations must be viewed as done by God himself. That such opinions were maintained by a portion of the brethren is evident from their own writings. "If God wills," says one of their favourite works, "that I should sin, I ought by no means to will that I may not have sinned. This is true contrition. And if a man have committed a thousand mortal sins, and the man is well regulated and united to God, he ought not to wish that he had not done those sins, and he ought to prefer suffering a thousand deaths rather than to have omitted one of those mortal sins."

The teachers of the sect of the Free Spirit wandered from place to place in imitation of the apostles. They were also called apostles by their followers, and laboured by teaching and writing for the extension of their sect. It was owing to the activity of this sect, indeed, that the Inquisition, after a long interval, was revived in Germany in the fourteenth century with fresh energy. Two Dominicans were appointed, about A. D. 1367, to be Inquisitors for Germany. Charles IV., in A. D. 1369, lent the Inquisitors the most powerful support, by the publication of three edicts in their favour. Gregory XI. increased the number of the Inquisitors for Germany to five, and Boniface IX. appointed six for North Germany alone. The Brethren of the Free Spirit did not wholly disappear before the fifteenth century.

BRETHREN OF THE HOLY TRINITY, an order of monks which arose in the end of the twelfth century, in consequence of the holy wars of the Christians in Palestine, in which many Christians became captives among the Mohammedans. It originated with John de Matia and Felix de Valois, two pious Frenchmen, who led a solitary life at Cerefroy, in the diocese of Meaux. The name, Brethren of the Holy Trinity, was given to the order, because all their churches were dedicated to the Holy Trinity. They were also called Brethren of the Redemption of Captives, because of the work to which they directed their energies, the redemption of the Christian captives from the hands of the Mohammedans, a purpose to which they devoted one-third of their revenues. By some ancient writers, Mosheim informs us, this order is called the Order of Asses, because their rule forbids the brethren to ride on horses, and requires them to ride on asses. An order similar to the Brethren of the Holy Trinity was instituted in Spain, A. D. 1228, by Paul Nolasco, and called the Order of St. Mary for the Ransoming of Captives.

BREVIARY (Lat., Breviis, Short), the private liturgy of the priests of the Church of Rome, composed, as has been usually alleged, in the eleventh century. It contains for each day of the year appropriate prayers, psalms, and hymns, Scripture lessons for daily reading, with accompanying comments from the fathers and doctors of the church, and the legends of its saints and martyrs. Such books for the special instruction and guidance of the priesthood, existed long before the Reformation in almost all the national churches of Europe. The name Breviary is obviously intended to convey the idea of a compendium, but the Roman Breviary is the largest of the books of devotion in use in the Church of Rome; so that, in all probability, the name was applied at an early period, to some short collection of prayers and Scripture lessons for the use of the priesthood. Such an epitome was prepared in the time of Pope Damasus for the use of the monks in Palestine, and was afterwards enlarged by Gregory the Great. During the sittings of the Council of Trent, various attempts were made to obtain an authorized version of the Breviary. The council, however, delayed the matter, and at length gave it over into the hands of the reigning pontiff. Three divines, accordingly, were selected, A. D. 1568, by Pius V., to undertake the difficult and delicate task. After the lapse of many years it was still incomplete. It was not indeed until the pontificate of Urban VIII, that, in his own name and the name of his two predecessors, the reformed Breviary appeared as it now stands, with the exception of some additions made since that period, including the new festivals and new saints, with their offices and legends. An edition of the Breviary, with considerable amendments, was prepared by Cardinal Quignonius at the suggestion of Clement VII., with the consent of Paul III. It omitted the office of the Virgin, and was so arranged as to "revive the custom of reading through all Scripture every year, and all the Psalms every week." This new edition of the Romish priest's book of devotion, however, though realizing the theory of the Breviary more completely than the edition actually in use, failed to meet with acceptance in the church generally, being considered as savouring of heresy, being too Protestant and too little Popish in its whole aspect.

The following is a condensed view of the contents of the Romish Breviary:—"The Roman Breviary is divided much in the same manner as the Missal, as to its parts. The Psalms are so distributed, that in the weekly office (if the festivals of saints do not interfere), the whole Psalter would be gone over, though several psalms, viz., the 118th (alias 119th), &c., are said every day. On the festivals of saints, suitable psalms are adopted. The lessons are taken partly out of the old and New Testament, and partly out of the acts of the saints and writings of the holy fathers. The Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, or angelical salutation, the apostles' creed, and the confiteor, are frequently said. This last is a prayer by which they acknowledge themselves sinners, beg pardon of God, and the intercession, in their behalf, of the angels, of the saints, and of their brethren upon earth. No prayers are more frequently in the mouth of Roman Catholics than these four, to which we may add the doxology, repeated in the office at the end of every psalm, and in other places. In every canonical hour a hymn is also said, often composed by Prudentius, or some other ancient father. The Roman Breviary contains also a small office in honour of the blessed Virgin, and likewise what is called the office of the dead. We there find, besides, the penitential and the gradual psalms, as they are called, together with the litanies of the saints and of the Virgin Mary of Loreto, which are the only two that have the sanction of the church."

That the reader may form an idea of the extent of a priest's daily employment in the use of the Breviary, we may quote Mr. Lewis's account of the first Sunday in Advent, as given in his 'Bible, Missal, and Breviary.' "He turns to the beginning of the Breviary, and recites the Lord's Prayer, a Hail Mary, a short prayer to Mary, consisting of a single sentence, the apostles' creed, a halleluiah, and a verse called the Invitatorium, or invitation to praise; Ps. xcvi., "Come let us sing to the Lord," &c., is then said or sung; if he observe the first nocturn, he recites the first fifteen psalms; if the second nocturn, he recites three psalms, Ps. xvi., xvii., and xviii.; if the third nocturn, three psalms, Ps. xix., xx., xxi., also some versicles, and the hymn Te Deum, any one of the nocturns forms a good night's work of recitation. If he prefer the lauds, then he recites seven psalms, with the song of the three children of Babylon, taken from the apocryphal book of Daniel, with the song of Mary (Luke i.); if the prime, that is the hour that is usually in the south of Europe six o'clock in the morning, after the Lord's Prayer, Hail Mary, and the creed, he says or sings one of the hymns of the Breviary, reads the creed of Athanasius, along with certain prayers very suitable to morning devotions. Having completed the office of the Psalter, he has still before him those of the festival, or saint's day, if he is called by duty or inclination to its observance, which includes a Scripture lesson, a homily from a father or doctor, and, if a saint's day, also a church legend, besides prayers and hymns."

Instead of the whole Word of God being perused by the priest in the course of the year, as the true ideal of the Breviary implies, only mutilated extracts are given in the Breviary, and portions which contain the vital doctrines of Christianity are carefully omitted. Thus the Epistle to the Romans, which so clearly unfolds the fundamental doctrine of justification by faith, contains in all 433 verses, of which 259 are omitted. Of the Epistle to the Hebrews more than one-half is not to be found in the Breviary. The other books, both of the Old and New Testaments, meet with similar treatment at the hands of Rome. The Psalter, however, is given in its entire form.

Besides the quotations from Scripture, the Breviary contains numerous passages from the Fathers, amounting to no fewer than 449 quotations or lessons from twenty-eight different Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Of these, 113 lessons are from the writings of Augustine, the most scriptural in his opinions of all the Fathers. The passages extracted for the perusal of the priests, though many of them professing to be expositions of Sacred Scripture, are far from being in accordance with the Word of God. Many of the portions selected, particularly from the writings of Jerome, are evidently introduced to give sanction to the erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices of Rome.

The Breviary contains, however, not only portions of Scripture and quotations from the Fathers, but also numerous legends of the saints, including narratives, in many cases, incredible and absurd, of the miracles which they performed, and the strange events which befell them. The sufferings of various martyrs are also related in the most exaggerated style.

Such is the Romish priest's book of devotion which he is bound diligently and with unvarying punctuality to peruse every day on pain of mortal sin. Dens, in his 'Theology,' considers it as a sufficient excuse for the omission of his daily task, if the priest is engaged in a work of necessity or charity, if he has no Breviary, or even if he has accidentally forgotten his duty. Though the Roman Breviary is most generally in use in the Roman Catholic Church, there are several dioceses, and several religious bodies, even in that church, which have their particular breviaries.

BRIAREUS, one of the Uranids of ancient Greek mythology, who are described as having been huge monsters, with fifty heads and a hundred arms. Homer says, that among men he was called Ægeon, but among the gods Briareus, and that he came on one occasion to the rescue of Zeus, when he was threatened to be put in chains by the Olympian gods. Briareus and his brothers conquered the Titans when they rebelled against Zeus, by hurling at their heads three hundred rocks, which so completely defeated them, that they were cast down to Tartarus or the infernal regions. By some writers Briareus is regarded as a sea god, while most authors look upon him as having been one of the giants who stormed Olympus. Theocritus represents him as one of the Cyclops who resided under Mount Ætna. The most probable opinion, as to the nature and origin of this fabulous monster, is, that he was a personification of volcanoes or earthquakes, or some of the more violent powers of nature. BRIDGE (THE SHARP). See AL-SIRAT.

BRIDGET, ST., (ORDER OF), a religious order established about 1363, by St. Bridget, a Swedish lady. It was confirmed by Urban V. in A. D. 1370, and united nuns and monks in a peculiar manner in the same houses. Each cloister, by the arrangements made by their founder, was to hold sixty sisters, and thirteen priests for their service, along with four deacons, and eight lay brothers. These male persons, though dwelling under the same roof with the sisters, were completely separated from them. The rule of St. Bridget is nearly the same with that of St. Augustine. The religious profess great mortification, poverty, and self-denial; and they are bound not to possess any thing they can call their own, and on no account to touch money. This order spread extensively through Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands. There appears to have been one monastery of this order in England. It was built by Henry V. in 1415, opposite to Richmond on the Thames, now called Sion House. On the dissolution of the monastery at the Reformation, the inmates settled at Lisbon.

BRISÆUS, a surname of the Grecian deity Dionysus, derived probably from Mount Brisa in Lesbos.

BRITISH CHURCH. It is difficult to ascertain with certainty the precise period at which Christianity was first introduced into Britain; but from occasional remarks which occur in some ancient writers, it is believed to have been before the end, and perhaps even the middle, of the first century, somewhere between A. D. 43 and A. D. 61. Tertullian, in his book against the Jews, which was written A. D. 209, affirms, that those parts of Britain into which the Romans had never penetrated, had become subject to Christ, and from this statement, it has been conjectured, that Christianity had then been, for some time, known in the Roman provinces in the south. Eusebins, who flourished in the beginning of the fourth century, mentions the British Islands among the remote countries in which the apostles had preached; and Theodoret, who flourished a century later than Eusebius, states, that fishermen, tentmakers, and publicans, had persuaded many nations to embrace the gospel of Christ, and among these he includes the Britons. Gildas, also, when speaking of the revolt and defence of the Britons under Boadicea, A. D. 61, appears to fix the introduction of Christianity into the British islands to that period. Another argument in favour of the gospel having thus early reached Britain, is drawn from the circumstance, that in A. D. 43, a Roman province having been established in the south-east parts of the island, Pomponia Græcina, the wife of Aulus Plautius, the first governor, was accused of having embraced a strange and foreign superstition, which has been interpreted as meaning that she was a Christian, and probably one of the first who introduced the new religion into Britain. It has also been thought that Claudia, mentioned along with Pudens in 2 Tim. iv. 21, that Epistle having been written, as is supposed, A. D. 66, was the same British lady who is celebrated by Martial, in his Epigrams, iv. 13, xi. 54, for her beauty and virtues.

The question has given rise to no small difference of opinion among the learned, who first preached the gospel in Britain? Many have contended that the conversion of the Britons is to be traced to the labours of the Apostle James, who preached the gospel in Spain, Britain, and other countries of the West. The early martyrdom of this apostle, however, as related in the Acts of the Apostles xii. 1, 2, renders such a supposition very improbable. Others have mentioned Simon Zelotes as having preached in the West, and particularly in Britain, where they allege him to have suffered martyrdom and been buried. Neither is this supposition likely, as the sphere of this apostle's labours has usually been admitted to have been the East Indies. One writer, who belongs to so late a period as the tenth century, contends keenly in behalf of the Apostle Peter as having founded the British Church. He alleges that this apostle spent twenty-three years in Britain, where he established several churches, ordained bishops, priests, and deacons, and having thus planted Christianity in the country, he returned to Rome A. D. 65. In opposition, however, to this idea, it is sufficient to bear in mind, that Peter was the apostle of the circumcision, and, therefore, that he fulfilled his mission by preaching, as is generally believed, in those countries where the Jews chiefly abounded. If the introduction of Christianity into Britain must of necessity be ascribed to an apostle, the evidence greatly preponderates, we conceive, in favour of the Apostle Paul, who is alleged by many ancient writers to have passed the latter years of his life in the western provinces of Rome, of which Britain was one. There is a popular legend, devised by the monks of Glastonbury, which alleges Joseph of Arimathea to have been sent into Britain by Philip, about A. D. 63. The effect of this mission is thus described by Mr. Thomson, in his 'Illustrations of British History:': "Though they preached with great zeal, they could not induce any of the Britons to forsake their ancient superstition; but the king being informed that they had come from far, and behaved modestly, appointed them a residence in an island called Iniswitrin, on the borders of his kingdom, to which two other Pagan princes afterwards added twelve hides of land more. In this wilderness, the angel Gabriel admonished them to build a church to the honour of the blessed Virgin; and they accordingly constructed the first Christian church at Glastonbury. It consisted, however, only of a small oratory, having walls of barked alders, or wicker-wands twisted together, and its roof thatched with straw or rushes. It was sixty feet long, and twenty-six feet broad; the door reached to the eaves of the roof; there was a window over the altar in the east, and it was surrounded by a churchyard capacious enough to hold a thousand graves. An imaginary representation of this church has been engraven by Sammes and Hearne; but another ancient Christian church, erected at Greensted in Essex, by the Saxons, about the eleventh century, partook of nearly the same architectural character. The walls consisted of the upright trunks of large oaks placed close together, roughly hewn on both sides, let into a sill beneath, and a plate above, where they were fastened by wooden nails. The original fabric was twenty-nine feet nine inches long, fourteen feet wide, and five feet six inches high on the sides supporting the ancient roof."

Bede, a monkish historian of the eighth century, reports that Lucius, a British king, requested the Roman bishop, Eleutherus, in the latter part of the second century, to send him some missionaries. The evident design of this tradition is to make the British Church an offspring of Rome. But the peculiarities of the later British Church completely militate against the idea of its having had its origin from Rome; for in many parts of its rites and ceremonies it differed from the usages of the Romish Church, and approached much more nearly to the practices of the churches of Asia Minor. It is well known besides, that during a great part of its early history, while the ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH (which see) submitted to the Papal power, the British Church continued to withstand the authority of the Romish see.

But although the period of the first entrance of Christianity into Britain is far from having been fully ascertained, the British Christians, at all events, appear to have been a numerous body so early as the third century, and the British Church at that period was an organized community. Towards the end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century, the Christians in the Roman province of Britain were exposed to persecution for their religion, and St. Alban, a native of Verulamium, was the first British martyr in that city, which is now named after him, St. Albans. His martyrdom took place about A. D. 286, and at the same time, Aaron and Julius, two citizens of Caerleon, and several other persons of both sexes, were put to death in different parts of the country. This persecution of the British Christians was stopped by Constantius Chlorus, when he was declared emperor, A. D. 305; and peace was fully restored to the Church by the accession of his son, Constantine the Great, in the following year. "Then," says Gildas, "the British Christians came out of the lurking-places, to which they had retired, rebuilt their ruined churches, and kept their sacred solemnities with pure and joyful hearts."

About this period the Arian controversy (see ARIANS) which had broken out at Alexandria, and for a long period continued to agitate the whole Christian church, spread even to the remote shores of the British Islands, where, we learn on the authority of Gildas, this pernicious heresy made alarming progress. It is pleasing, however, to be able to state, in opposition to the monkish historian, that both Jerome and Chrysostom in their writings frequently speak in strong terms of the constancy of the British church Christianity having obtained a firm footing in this remote island, continued to flourish until the Romans left Britain, in A. D. 422, when the nation became exposed to the incursions of the Picts and Scots. At this time sprung up the noxious heresy of Pelagius, a British monk, whose real name was Morgan. Being a native of the country, his opinions (see PELAGIANS) spread rapidly throughout the British Church. The clergy, alarmed at the prevalence of this fatal heresy among their flocks, applied for assistance in suppressing it to the church in Gaul, which forthwith despatched two orthodox prelates to Britain. These prelates, Germanus bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus bishop of Troyes, in their voyage to the British shores, are said to have been exposed to a violent storm, from which they miraculously escaped. Having at length reached their destination in safety, they directed their most strenuous efforts to expose the erroneous character of the doctrines of Pelagius. Their preaching aroused the attention and interest of the people, when, taking advantage of the excitement which their coming had occasioned, they summoned the Pelagians to a public disputation, in the course of which their arguments were felt to be so convincing, that the Pelagian champions could scarcely be defended from popular fury. Having remained some time in Britain, the prelates returned to Gaul, though Germanus afterwards made a second visit to Britain, with similar success, in consequence of the Pelagian heresy having again broken out. After this the British church maintained its orthodoxy for a long period, until the arrival of the Saxons in A. D. 449, when the nation was almost reduced a second time to Paganism.

The Saxons treacherously made themselves masters of the land which they had come professedly to relieve, and leaving the western division of the island only to its ancient possessors, they founded the kingdom of the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy. They had now almost overrun the country, and the Saxons, not contented with having driven the Britons into a narrow district, evinced their violent hatred towards the British church by the murder of its ecclesiastics and the destruction of its churches. As Christianity came to be introduced among the Anglo-Saxons, and a Christian church to be formed, this fierce animosity gradually subsided, or at least changed its character. Having itself submitted to the Papal power, it was desirous that the ancient British church should also own the domination of the bishop of Rome. This they positively refused to do. Having received Christianity at first, not from Rome, but from the East, and never having been accustomed, like the Anglo-Saxon church, to acknowledge the Roman church as their mother, they looked upon themselves as a completely independent church of Christ. In various points of their ecclesiastical arrangements they differed widely from Rome. Among these may be mentioned the time of keeping the festival of Easter, the form of the tunsure, and several of the rites practised at baptism. Rome was indignant at the resistance made by the British church to her power, and the Anglo-Saxon church, unwilling to tolerate an independent church in her immediate neighbourhood, discouraged as far as possible the ancient church of Britain, which, limited to the mountainous districts of Wales, gradually diminished and died away. See ENGLAND (CHURCH OF).

BRITOMARTIS, an ancient Cretan deity who presided over hunters and fishermen. At a later period this goddess became identified with Artemis, the favourite female divinity of Crete. Britomartis was worshipped also at Ægina under the name of Aphæa, or goddess of the moon. She was called Dictymna, from being concealed by fishermen under their nets. Her temples, like those of ARTEMIS (which see), were usually built on the banks of rivers or on the sea-coast.

BRITTINNIANS, a congregation of Augustinian monks, so called from their having been first established at a place named Brittinin, near Ancona in Italy. They were very austere, eat no animal food, fasted from the feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross till Easter, and at other times, every Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, besides the fasts enjoined by the Church. This congregation refused to submit to the bull of Pope Gregory IX., which enjoined the Augustinian monks to lay aside their grey habits, and to put on the black. At length Gregory issued a bull in their favour, in A. D. 1241, allowing them to wear the grey habit, but without the surcingle or belt to distinguish them from the Friars Minor. They joined the general congregation of AUGUSTINIAN MONKS (which see), which was formed by Alexander IV. in A. D. 1256.

BRIZO (Gr., to fall asleep), a goddess worshipped anciently in the island of Delos, as presiding over dreams, regulating their nature, and interpreting their meaning. She was worshipped by women, who brought sacrifices to her in vessels constructed in the shape of boats, and she was invoked more especially to give protection against shipwrecks.

BROCKEN, the mountain of altars, the Olympus of the ancient Saxons.

BRONTES, one of the three CYCLOPES (which see).

BROTHERS (LAY), attendants on the monks in Romish monasteries, who, not being in sacred orders, received the name of Lay Brothers.

BROTHERHOOD, a name given to a congregation of monks residing in a monastery.

BROTHERHOOD OF GOD, a Christian sect which arose in the twelfth century, having for its chief object to restrain and abolish the right and exercise of private war. It was founded by a carpenter at Guienne, who pretended to have had special communication with Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary. He was received as an inspired messenger of God. Many prelates and barons assembled at Puy, and took an oath, not only to make peace with all their own enemies, but to attack such as refused to lay down their arms and to be reconciled to their enemies.

BROWNISTS, a sect which arose in England immediately after the Reformation in the sixteenth century, and which violently opposed the Church of England, affirming it to be Popish and Antichristian. It derived its name from its originator, Robert Brown, a clergyman who had early imbibed the principles of the Puritans, and, although holding the office of chaplain to the lord-treasurer, Burghley, he avowed openly so strong a hatred of the national church, that, in A. D. 1571, he was summoned to appear before Archbishop Parker at Lambeth Palace; and on that occasion he was only rescued from condign punishment by the kind interference of his patron and relative Burghley, who claimed for Brown, as his chaplain, exemption from the authority of the court. The opinions of this Puritan divine were equally opposed to Episcopacy and Presbyterianism. He and his followers maintained, according to Neal, in his 'History of the Puritans,' "that the form of church government should be democratical; that every distinct society was a body corporate, having full power within itself to admit or exclude members, to choose and ordain officers, and when the good of the society required it, to depose them, without being accountable to any other jurisdiction. They did not allow the priesthood to be a distinct order; any lay brother had the liberty of prophesying, or giving a word of exhortation in their church assemblies; it was usual after sermon for some of the members to propose questions, and confer with each other, upon the doctrines that had been delivered. They declared against all prescribed forms of prayer; and as for church censures, they were for an entire separation of the ecclesiastical and civil sword. Some of their reasons for withdrawing from the church are not easily answered. They alleged that the laws of the realm and the queen's injunctions had made several unwarrantable additions to the institutions of Christ: that there were several gross errors in the church service, and these additions and errors were imposed and made necessary to communion: that, if persecution for conscience' sake was the mark of a false church, they could not believe the Church of England to be a true one. They apprehended, further, that the constitution of the hierarchy was too bad to be mended, that the very pillars of it were rotten, and that the structure should be raised anew. Since, therefore, all Christians are obliged to preserve the ordinances of Christ pure and undefiled, they resolved to lay a new foundation, and keep as near as they could to the primitive pattern, though it were at the hazard of all that was dear to them in the world."

Mr. Brown exercised the ministry for several years at Norwich, but was on different occasions arrested and imprisoned for the intemperate language in which he spoke of the Church of England. At length, accompanied by a number of his adherents, he took refuge in Holland, where they were permitted to open a place of worship at Middleburg, in the year 1588. This congregation, however, being distracted by internal dissensions, was speedily dissolved, and their pastor, unable to reconcile the contending parties, returned to England in 1589, where, having renounced his principles, he obtained through the interest of his former patron, Lord Burghley, a rectory in Northamptonshire. His violent temper, however, still continued to involve him in many troubles, and even when upwards of eighty years of age, he was carried to prison for an assault upon the parish constable. He died in jail at Northampton in 1630, "boasting," as Fuller asserts, "that he had been committed to two-and-thirty prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day."

Though forsaken by their leader, the Brownists in Holland still continued to maintain their existence as a separate community, as it appears that they had a chapel at Middleburg in 1592, called the Vischmarkt kerke. A few years after, the sect received considerable accessions in Holland by the arrival of a number of their brethren from England, who had been compelled to emigrate in consequence of the severe persecutions to which they were exposed. The congregation at Middleburg, for a number of years, flourished under the ministry of Mr. Henry Jacob, and from the press of that town issued various works in defence of the Brownist principles, particularly maintaining the congregational or independent form of church government (see CONGREGATIONALISTS), in which each congregation is recognized as independent of all other churches. It is not known how long the Brownists existed in Middleburg as a separate community, but Dr. Stevens, to whom we are indebted for much of our information on the history of this sect in Holland, conjectures that it became extinct in the end of the seventeenth century.

Meanwhile the Brownists in England were subjected to the most arbitrary treatment. An act of parliament was passed in 1580, which punished absence from the parish church with a penalty of £20 a-month, and imprisonment till the fine was paid; absence for a year, not only exposed the delinquent to a fine, but two sureties were required for £200 till he should conform. The result of this oppressive enactment was, that great numbers of the Brownists were sent to prison, where not a few of them died; others were tried by the court of High Commission which had recently been appointed, and condemned to death for no other crime than that they held the opinions and read the writings of Brown. As usually happens when exposed to persecution, the obnoxious sect rapidly increased, and in 1590, they had become so large and important a body, that still more stringent measures were devised by government to arrest their progress. Another act was passed for the avowed object of punishing persons obstinately refusing to come to church. And the punishment was sufficiently severe, indicating that the rights of conscience, at that period, met with no respect. By the act to which we now refer, all persons who were convicted of attending a conventicle, or meeting for religious worship, were to be imprisoned until they should conform; if they continued obstinate, they were to be banished for life; and if they returned home, they were to be punished with death. The effects of this intolerant enactment, in so far as the Brownists were concerned, are thus described by Mr. Marsden, in his 'History of Christian Churches and Sects:': "Hiding themselves from the bishop's officers and pursuivants, those in London met at a retired place in the fields at Islington, where a Protestant congregation had formerly assembled, under similar circumstances, in the reign of Mary. About fifty-six were apprehended on the Lord's-day, while singing hymns, and sent, two by two, to different prisons in London. They suffered a long, miserable confinement, and many died under their barbarous usage; amongst whom was Roger Rippon. He expired a prisoner in Newgate; and his fellow-prisoners placed the following inscription upon his coffin:—"This is the corpse of Roger Rippon, a servant of Christ, and her majesty's faithful subject; who is the last of sixteen or seventeen which that great enemy of God, the archbishop of Canterbury, with his high commissioners, have murdered in Newgate, within these five years, manifestly for the testimony of Jesus Christ. His soul is now with the Lord, and his blood crieth for speedy vengeance against that great enemy of the saints."

Among those whom persecution compelled to seek an asylum in foreign parts was Francis Johnson, who had been imprisoned and expelled from the University of Cambridge in 1588, for avowing Brownist principles. This eminent minister of Christ fled to Holland, and in 1600 the Brownists, who had settled at Amsterdam, chose him as their pastor, and Henry Ainsworth as their doctor or teacher. A few were expelled from the congregation for holding doctrines similar to those which were afterwards promulgated by Arminius (see ARMINIANS). Another schism took place in the Amsterdam congregation on the subject of church discipline. Francis Johnson maintained, that the government of the church was vested solely in the eldership, while Ainsworth held that it was vested in the church generally, of which the elders are only a part. The controversy was conducted with considerable keenness, and at length a separation took place; both parties building separate places of worship, and assuming respectively the names of their leaders, the Franciscan and Ainsworthian Brownists. Soon after Johnson left Amsterdam, and retired to Emden in East Friesland, and his small congregation being forsaken by their pastor, speedily dispersed or joined the other congregation which continued under the pastoral care of Ainsworth till 1622. He was succeeded by John Canne, whose marginal references to the Bible have made his name familiar, and who ministered to the Brownist congregation till his death in 1667. After this sect had existed for more than a century in Amsterdam, the congregation was broken up, and its last representatives, six in number, applied and were admitted in 1701 as members of the British Reformed or Presbyterian Church in Amsterdam. Before taking this step, they conveyed over their chapel to the Dutch deacons, on the understanding that it should only be used by those of the Reformed religion.

Towards the end of the reign of Elizabeth, the Brownists in England were treated with great severity. The opinions which they held on the point of spiritual independence, denying, as they did, the supremacy of the queen in ecclesiastical matters, rendered them particularly obnoxious to the ruling powers of the time. Greenwood and Barrow, two of the leaders of the sect, were publicly hanged at Tyburn; Dr. Reynolds, who attended them in their last moments, having the courage to assure the queen, "that had they lived they would have been two as worthy instruments for the Church of God, as any that had been raised up in that age." About the same time two other Brownist ministers were sentenced to death. One of them was executed, and the other died in prison. The queen seems now to have repented of such cruelty being practised towards men whose characters were blameless, and whose lives were admitted to have been useful.

In 1604, John Robinson, a minister in Norfolk, who held Brownist sentiments and had suffered much on that account, emigrated to Leyden, and established a congregation in that town. This individual is generally thought to be the father of the Independents, in whom the Brownists finally merged. From the Brownist congregation at Leyden numbers emigrated, along with their minister, to America, being among the first of the pilgrim fathers who founded the colony of New England. The Brownists maintained their footing in England, though they made no great progress, during the reigns of James I. and Charles I., but during the Commonwealth they were absorbed into the Independents, and the existence of the sect cannot be traced after the Restoration. See PURITANS.

BRUGGLENIANS, a small party of enthusiasts in Switzerland, which sprung up in 1746 at a small village in the canton of Brugglen, whence they derived their name. Two brothers, Christian and Jerome Robler, pretended to be the two witnesses mentioned in the Apocalypse, and collected a number of followers, who gave credit to their pretensions. One day Christian Robler promised to raise himself to heaven, and take his followers along with him; but when the day came he declined the journey. Both the brothers were arrested, tried, and executed in 1753, and the sect soon after became extinct.

BRUMALIA, heathen festivals among the ancient Romans, alleged to have been instituted by Romulus in honour of BACCHUS (which see). They were celebrated twice a year, on the 12th day of the Kalends of March, and the eighteenth of the Kalends of November. Tertullian mentions the Brumalia among the heathen festivals, which some Christians were inclined to observe, and he produces it as a matter of reproach to Christians that they were not so true to their religion as the heathen were to theirs; for the heathen would never engage in any Christian solemnity, nor join with Christians in such observances, lest they should be thought Christians; but "we," says he, "are not afraid of being thought heathens." By the Brumalia, to which Tertullian refers, some learned men suppose are meant not the feasts of Bacchus, but the festivals of the winter solstice, so called from bruma, winter, and from which they were accustomed to form a conjecture as to their good or bad fortune during the rest of the winter. This superstitious observance seems to have continued among the early Christians till the end of the seventh century, for we find the council of Trullo, A. D. 692, prohibiting the attendance of Christians on the Brumalia under pain of excommunication.

BRYANITES. See BIBLE CHRISTIANS.

BUABIN, a household god of the natives of Tonquin in China. He is regarded as presiding over buildings of every kind, and protecting them from fire, lightning, or any other evil to which they are exposed. On the decease of the owner of a house, the priests burn papers and perfumes in honour of this idol.

BUAKUN, a sacred pond at Cape Coast town in Western Africa.

BUBASTIS, a female deity worshipped among the ancient Egyptians. She was a daughter of Osiris and Isis, and the sister of Florus. The chief seat of her worship was at a town bearing her name, where there was a temple erected, and a festival held in honour of this deity. The animal consecrated to her was the cat, and she herself was usually represented with the head of a cat; and Herodotus tells us that when cats died, they were embalmed and carried to Bubastis. This goddess corresponds to ARTEMIS (which see) of the Greeks, who is at once the moon and Lucina. The cat is here the symbol of the night of chaos, of the moon which is the piercing eye of night, and also the symbol of fertility, because, like Lucina, this deity presides over accouchements. The Bubastis of the Scandinavians is FREYA (which see), whose chariot is drawn by two cats. In all probability, Bubastis was the goddess of the moon, and this completely accords with the statement of Plutarch, that the cat was a symbol of the moon. Josephus, in his 'Antiquities of the Jews,' mentions that Onias, the high-priest, requested permission from Ptolemy and Cleopatra to purge a temple of Bubastis which had fallen into decay at Leontopolis, in the nomos of Heliopolis. This statement shows, that even so late as the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, the worship of this goddess existed in Egypt. It is very probable that Bubastis, being sprung from Osiris the sun, and Isis the moon, represented the new moon.

BUBONA, a goddess, among the ancient Romans, of oxen and cows. Small figures of this deity were placed in the walls of the stables, or pictures of her painted over the manger. By these devices, the animals were supposed to be protected from injury or disease.

BUCHANITES, a sect of visionary enthusiasts which sprung up in Scotland in 1783, deriving their origin and name from a female of the name of Buchan. This remarkable person was born in Banffshire in 1738, of humble parentage. Her mother having died while she was yet in infancy, and her father having soon after married again, Elspeth Simpson, for such was her maiden name, was much neglected in early life, and was indebted to the kindness of a distant relative of her mother for any little knowledge she possessed of reading and sewing. Being a young woman of lax religious principles, she fell into dissolute habits, and is said to have trepanned a working potter at Ayr, by name Robert Buchan, to become her husband, though it has been doubted whether they were ever legally married. Elspeth and her partner now removed to Banffshire, where they commenced a manufactory of earthenware, and this scheme not having succeeded, Buchan set out for Glasgow, leaving his wife behind, who, to provide for herself and her family—then three in number—commenced a school. It was about this period that Mrs. Buchan began to entertain and actively promulgate opinions on religious matters of the most wild and visionary kind. She was a regular attendant on fellowship meetings, where she broached some of the strange views, hinting not obscurely that she had received them directly from heaven. She now became a noted disputant on knotty theological points; her school was neglected, and the pupils rapidly diminished in numbers. By the advice of her friends, Mrs. Buchan and family removed to Glasgow, where she joined her husband, who had found employment in a pottery in that city.

In the end of 1782, the Rev. Hugh White, a minister in connection with the Relief body in Irvine, happened to be assisting at a communion in the neighbourhood of Glasgow. This clergyman was possessed of great popular gifts, and attracted crowds to hear him wherever he preached. Mrs. Buchan availed herself of the opportunity which occurred of hearing Mr. White, and being delighted with his eloquence, as well as impressed with the views which he set forth of divine truth, she wrote him in the most flattering terms, and so much pleased was he with the communication, that he invited her to Irvine, whither she went in 1783, and lived in his house. Her conversation, her visits from house to house, her ready solution of difficulties, but, above all, her expositions of Scripture, raised her very high in the estimation of the religious people of the place. She was listened to as an oracle, and although her sentiments were given forth with the utmost dogmatism and ill-concealed vanity, numbers flocked to converse with her, and to become acquainted with her solution of the mysteries of the Bible. Plausible and insinuating in her general deportment, Mrs. Buchan completely succeeded in gaining over Mr. White to her own views, and while some of the shrewder members of his congregation were not long in discovering the true character of her opinions, as both erroneous and dangerous, he himself became the thorough dupe of this artful and designing woman. The heresy, and even blasphemy, which he now uttered from the pulpit, shocked the great majority of his hearers. He was summoned before the Relief Presbytery of Glasgow to answer for preaching heretical doctrine, and the charge being fully established, he was suspended from the ministry, to the deep regret of a large circle of friends, who admired his talents and loved him as a man, while they wondered at, and heartily pitied, his credulity. The errors which, through the influence of Mrs. Buchan, Mr. White had imbibed, as referred to in the libel proved before the presbytery, were three in number:—1. That sin does not adhere to the believer; 2. That Christ tasted death for all men; and 3. That whilst the bodies of saints under the New Testament are the temples of the Holy Ghost, the saints under the Old Testament were not favoured with this distinction.

A minister charged with deviations so serious from the doctrines of the Word of God, could not possibly be retained in connection with a professedly orthodox church; and it was not surprising, therefore, that Mr. White was declared no longer a minister of the Relief Church. Though thus ejected, however, he still continued to exercise all the functions of the ministry, and a number of his former congregation still adhered to him. He preached first in his own garden, and afterwards, to escape annoyance from evil-disposed persons, in a room in his own house, which was always crowded to excess. Mrs. Buchan stately attended these meetings, and, whenever appealed to, gave explanations as to her views on various passages of the Bible which happened to be under discussion. The populace of Irvine were strongly impressed with the idea that a woman who could exercise so strange an influence over an able and long-respected minister, could be no other than a witch-wife, to use their own homely phrase. They watched every opportunity to lay violent hands on her and her deluded followers. At length, on one occasion they seized her, and, dragging her through all the streets of the town, conveyed her forcibly as far as Stewarton, a village eight miles from Irvine, on the road to Glasgow. On reaching that place, a crowd assembled to gaze upon the notorious woman, and, in the confusion which ensued, the night being dark, she escaped from the hands of her enemies. Some of her adherents went in search of their "Friend Mother in the Lord," as they usually termed her, but were disappointed. They returned to Irvine, and, though past midnight, they held a meeting in Mr. White's parlour to mourn their loss, but while they were comforting one another with the idea that she had ascended to heaven, to their astonishment, to quote the language of one of her followers, "in she stepped, in the grey of the morning, in a most pitiable plight; she was bareheaded, barefooted, with scarcely a rag to cover her nakedness, and all her person covered with blood, yet she was cheerful and said, 'I suffer all this freely for the sake of those I love!'"

Next day a crowd again assembled in the streets of Irvine opposite Mr. White's house, and the magistrates, apprehending a riot, ordered Mrs. Buchan to leave the town without delay. She was accordingly carted off to Glasgow, followed by a number of the townspeople, who threatened to take her life if she returned. Her next visit was to Muthill, in Perthshire, where Andrew Innes, one of the earliest and staunchest Buchanites, resided; but neither she nor Mr. White, who followed her to that place, met with the encouragement which they expected. They therefore retraced their steps to Irvine, the headquarters of the sect. The populace were enraged at the re-appearance of Mother Buchan in their town. The magistrates were strongly urged to apprehend both her and her coadjutor, Mr. White, and to try them for blasphemy. This strong step, however, they were unwilling to take, and contented themselves with banishing Mrs. Buchan from the burgh, ordering her to remove within two hours beyond the bounds of the royalty. To protect her from insult, the magistrates accompanied her about a mile out of town, but, notwithstanding all their efforts, she was grossly insulted by the mob, thrown into ditches, and otherwise ill-used by the way.

About this period, Mrs. Buchan was legally divorced by her husband, a step to which she was completely reconciled, it being a rule of her society to disregard the marriage union on the ground of a text of Scripture which they strangely perverted, "It remaineth that they who have wives be as though they had none." Thus set free herself from all legal ties, the female leader of the Buchanites enforced upon her followers to set aside the bonds of matrimony. The community, accordingly, alleging that sin in their case was impossible, indulged in the most lawless licentiousness.

On leaving Irvine, the Buchanites travelled southward towards Nithsdale. They were forty-six in number, but as they proceeded onward, some of the company returned homewards, professing that they wished to settle their affairs and return. The emigrants found a resting-place for a time in an empty barn at New Cample, a farm near Thornhill. Here the Buchanites commenced what they considered as their apostolic life, "all that believed were together, and had all things common." They were joined by a few of the country people, and as the tenant of the farm was quite willing that they should remain, they built a house for themselves where the whole body, now amounting to sixty, were lodged promiscuously together. The founder of the society was now openly proclaimed by Mr. White to be the woman predicted in the book of Revelation, who had come to enlighten the world, and that she would live until the second coming of Christ, when she would be translated to heaven to meet the Lord in the air.

Crowds of people came from all quarters to see the Buchanites, and Mr. White preached daily, the service being usually closed by a short address from Mother Buchan. When curiosity had somewhat subsided, the country-people of Nithsdale, like the populace of Irvine, became indignant at the encampment in the midst of them of a company of lawless fanatics. They resolved, accordingly, to expel them from the country, and, having fixed upon a particular day, multitudes of people assembled and made an assault upon them, destroying the doors and windows of their house, and breaking in pieces the little furniture they had. The mob sought for "Lucky Buchan," as they called her, and the "Man-child White," wishing to wreak their vengeance upon these originators of the fanatical movement; but arrangements had been previously made for the safety of the leaders, by removing them to Closeburn Castle until the tumult should have passed away. A number of the rioters were apprehended, and, although the Buchanites refused to prosecute, and could scarce'y even be prevailed upon to bear evidence as to the injury they had sustained, upwards of twenty of the most conspicuous and active in the assault were tried at Dumfries before the sheriff of the county and fined.

The enemies of the Buchanites were now more determined than ever to crush them. A prosecution was instituted in the presbytery of the bounds on the ground of blasphemy, but speedily abandoned. An attempt was then made to raise an action against the leaders in the civil courts, but this also failed. The sect waxed more and more bold every day in the promulgation of their absurd doctrines, and Friend Mother announced openly that she was the Holy Spirit of God, the Third Person of the blessed Trinity, and that she had the power, by breathing upon any person, to communicate the Holy Spirit. Mr. White set himself to the task of preparing a work which might afford a clear exposition of the faith and practice of the community. This curious book was published in 1785, under the following lengthy title, 'The Divine Dictionary, or a treatise indited by holy inspiration, containing the faith and practice of the people (by the world) called Buchanites, who are actually waiting for the second coming of our Lord, and who believe that they alone shall be translated into the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall be ever with the Lord.' "There appeared a great wonder in heaven—a woman." Rev. chap. xii. verse 1. Written by that society.' To the mortification of the new sect, which sought nothing more earnestly than notoriety, this exposition of their dogmas, though given forth to the world in the most authentic form, as revised and approved by Mother Buchan herself, excited no sensation whatever, very few copies being purchased, and not a single pen being wielded to controvert its statements. This unexpected neglect was sufficiently galling, but it did not prevent the two leaders from vaunting their strange pretensions openly before the world. Mrs.

Buchan assumed herself to be the woman mentioned in the Apocalypse, who was to remain one thousand two hundred and threescore days in the wilderness while she declared Mr. White to be the man-child that was to rule the nations with a rod of iron. The period of her stay in the wilderness commenced, she alleged, on her first visit to Irvine, when Mr. White was converted and joined her in the great mission which she was destined to fulfil. The days spoken of in Rev. xii. 1, she declared to be literal, not prophetic, days, and, therefore, when the period of 1260 literal days had nearly expired, her followers were on the tiptoe of expectation, fully expecting that they would then ascend along with her to heaven, being translated to glory without tasting of death. The near approach of this expected consummation brought considerable accessions to the ranks of the Buchanites from all quarters. Every day, as it passed, they were looking for the full realization of all their hopes, and the utmost excitement prevailed in the society. The following scene, graphically described by one of themselves, is quoted from a most interesting history of the sect, entitled 'The Buchanites from First to Last,' by Joseph Train.

"One evening when we were as usual all employed, some in the garret, and many below, Friend Mother was in the kitchen surrounded by children, when, on a sudden, a loud voice was heard, as if from the clouds. The children, assisted by our great luminary, struck up the following hymn:—

'Oh! hasten translation, and come resurrection!
Oh! hasten the coming of Christ in the air!'

All the members below instantly started to their feet, and those in the garret hurried down as fast as they possibly could through the trap-door; but it being about midnight, and there being no light in the house, Mr. Hunter, in the agitation of the moment, and being a feeble old man, tumbled headlong down the trap-ladder, while striving to descend from the cockloft. In an instant, however, he bounded from the ground, and, with a voice as loud as a trumpet, joined in the general chorus of 'Hasten translation,' which every one in the house sung most vehemently. The bodily agitation became so great, with the clapping of hands and singing, that it is out of my power to convey a just idea on paper of the scene which it occasioned: every one thought the blessed moment was arrived; and every one singing, leaping, and clapping his hands, pressed forward to the kitchen, where Friend Mother sat with great composure, whilst her face shone so white with the glory of God, as to dazzle the sight of those who beheld it; and her raiment was as white as snow.

"The noise was so loud, that the neighbourhood was alarmed. Thomas Davidson, our landlord, came to our door like a man out of his senses; he rapped and called at the door till he obtained admission; and he, too, squeezed into the kitchen, beseeching her to save him, and the multitude by whom the nouse was surrounded, from the pending destruction which they apprehended was about to destroy the world. She told them to be of good cheer, for neither he nor any of his friends would suffer any damage that night, for she now saw her people were not sufficiently prepared for the mighty change which she intended them to undergo.

"As the light passed from her countenance, she called for a tobacco-pipe, and took a smoke; and, as the extraordinary agitation diminished, the people without dispersed quietly. How long the tumult lasted, I was not in a state of mind to recollect; but I remember, when daylight appeared, of having seen the floor strewn with watches, gold rings, and a great number of trinkets, which had been, in the moment of expected translation, thrown away by the possessors, as useless in our expected country. We did so, because Elijah threw away his mantle, when he was, in like manner, about to ascend to heaven. My own watch was of the number. I never saw it more; but I afterwards learned that John Gibson, our treasurer, had collected all the watches and jewellery then thrown away, and sold them in Dumfries."

The Buchanites were now firmly established in the belief that their Friend Mother was a divine person, after the midnight manifestation which they had just witnessed. She announced to them that to prepare for their approaching translation to heaven without tasting death, it was necessary that they should hold a complete fast, or total abstinence from all food for forty days. This was accordingly agreed upon, and shutting themselves up in their house, they bolted all the doors, nailed down and screened the windows, spent the time in reading and singing hymns composed for the occasion; all the while longing for, and expecting the final conflagration, and the second coming of Christ. One of the sect testified that, during the first four weeks of the fast, there was not as much solid food consumed by all the members of the society as he had seen one individual take at a single meal. The suspicion rose in the neighbourhood, that some of the Buchanites had died of starvation; but on inquiry, by order of the magistrates, no evidence could be obtained of such an event having occurred. And yet the report ran through the whole surrounding country that infanticide was practised at Buchan Ha', as their domicile was termed, and this, combined with what was known as to their repudiation of the marriage tie, and the permission among them of the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes, led the religious people of Nithsdale to view the sect with the utmost aversion, and even horror.

Before the forty days' fast had expired, Mrs. Buchan led out her followers to Templand hill, from which she flattered them they were to ascend bodily to heaven. Platforms were erected on which they stood, Friend Mother's platform being higher than the rest. Each of the company had the hair cut short, with the exception of a tuft, which was left on the top of the head, that the angels might thereby draw them up to heaven. White was in full canonicals, and walked about gazing upwards. The momentous hour came when the ascension was to take place; the whole sect stood on their platforms with their faces towards the rising sun, and their arms extended upwards, each individual expecting every moment to be wafted to the paradise above. As might have been anticipated, they were doomed to disappointment, and Mrs. Buchan attributing the failure of the attempt to their want of faith, led them back to New Cample, enforcing upon them the necessity of repentance, and a more lively confidence in the fulfilment of the Divine promises.

Many of the Buchanites began from this period to doubt the reality of her pretensions—a change of feeling which she ascribed to their being possessed with an unclean spirit, which she professed to remove by various ceremonies. All her skill, however, failed to check the growing discontent of her followers. One after another left the body, and among the fugitives was John Gibson, who, from the beginning, had acted as treasurer. This man laid a claim against Mrs. Buchan and Mr. White for the sum of £85, which they refused to pay. On this the quondam treasurer applied for a fugie warrant against them, and they were thereupon apprehended, and lodged in Dumfries jail. An individual offered bail for both the leaders, which was accepted, and they were set at liberty. When Gibson's claim came into court, his case was dismissed on the ground that he had voluntarily joined the Buchanites, and lodged his funds in the treasury of the body for general purposes. Disappointed at the result of his lawsuit, Gibson laid a charge against Mrs. Buchan and Mr. White before the kirk-session of Closeburn, of having carried on an improper intercourse. The case was referred by the kirk-session to the presbytery of the bounds; but the pursuers failing to appear, the case was dismissed.

In January 1787, Mr. White was summoned to attend a court of county magistrates at Brownhill to give security that none of the society would become a burden on the parish. He was unable, however, to procure the requisite security, and the magistrates decreed that the whole body of the Buchanites should leave Dumfries-shire on or before the 10th of March following. This was a sore discouragement to Friend Mother and her followers; but, through the kind intervention of Thomas Davidson, their landlord, they obtained the lease of a moorland farm at Auchengibbert, in the parish of Urr and stewartry of Kirkcudbright. When the sect removed to their new residence, their funds were nearly exhausted, and every member was obliged to work for hire, though such a step was in complete opposition to the principle which they had all along maintained, that it was sinful for God's people to be indebted for support to the ungodly world. But necessity has no law, and to get subsistence for themselves and their fellow-members, the Buchanites hired themselves out to any one who would employ them. Dr. Muirhead, the minister of the parish in which they now resided, engaged a number of them as reapers during the first harvest after their arrival. A scene which occurred on the harvest-field is thus described by Mr. Train: "A few days after the commencement of their labour, Mother Buchan went, as she said, 'to see how her bairns were getting on with their work.' The moment she entered the field where they were employed, they threw down their sickles, and, after embracing each other, moved towards her in a body, with their heads uncovered, and their hands in a supplicating attitude. They also struck up, with a loud voice, to their favourite tune, 'Beds of sweet roses,' their hymn beginning, 'O hasten translation.' As soon as the music met the ear of 'the Lady of Light,' she stopped, and, raising her hands and eyes towards heaven, stood in that position till they had formed a circle round her; then, uttering a short benediction, she placed the palm of her right hand on the head of a young man, who instantly fell prostrate on the ground as if deprived of life, with his face downward, and, in like manner, she laid her hand on the brow of every other individual in the circle with similar effect. Then, extending her arms and saying a few words, which every ear was raised a little from the ground to hear, and kneeling down, she again touched with the palm of her hand the forehead of each individual in succession, who immediately started up like an automaton figure, raised by the pressure of an internal spring. As soon as these singular devotees had attained an upright position, they embraced each other again. She moved slowly away in the midst of them, while they sung with great vehemence, to the amazement of the remaining reapers, a popular hymn."

The disappointment on Templand hill caused no slight discontent among the Buchanites generally, which went on daily increasing. Mr. White himself, though he had all along been the most active in the movement, was observed from that time to become more distant and reserved in his communications with the members, and to treat Mrs. Buchan with great coolness approaching almost to contempt. The Friend Mother felt deeply this marked change in the deportment of her coadjutor, which was aggravated by the information, that both he and his wife spoke frequently of her in private as a deceiver. All this preyed upon her mind, and it was soon plain to the whole sect that their leader was in a declining state of health. She sunk rapidly, and in a few weeks was stretched on a dying bed, when summoning her followers around her, she exhorted them to remain steadfast in their adherence to the doctrines she had taught them, and assuring them, as with her latest breath, that she was the Holy Spirit of God, and could not possibly die. She admitted that she might exhibit the appearance of being dead, but if they would only believe, she would return in six days to take them with her to heaven; and if they did not believe, she would not return for ten years, or if even then they were unprepared, she would not re-appear for fifty years, when she would assuredly come to bring judgment upon the earth. Shortly after uttering these words, Mrs. Buchan, with the utmost composure, breathed her last. Mr. White, finding that Friend Mother was really dead, tried to persuade her mourning adherents, that she was only in a trance, and when that pretence could no longer avail him, he caused the body to be secretly buried in Kirkgunzeon churchyard, alleging, as is said, that he had seen her taken up to heaven. Her daughters, however, who had left the sect two years before, and resided in the neighbourhood, made application to the magistrates, and to his great mortification, Mr. White was compelled to produce the body.

The death of their leader could not fail to prove disastrous to the sect. Mr. White now attempted to take the entire management of their affairs into his own hands; but the harsh manner in which he had treated Mrs. Buchan, for a considerable time previous to her decease, and the conviction which he openly expressed, that she was an impostor, rendered him no favourite, with some at least of the party. Finding his position by no means comfortable, he renounced the Buchanite tenets, and along with a party who adhered to him, emigrated to the United States of America in 1792, where they separated from one another, and all trace of their former opinions was lost. A small remnant of the sect still continued after Mr. White's departure to cleave to their former principles, and thought only fourteen in number, they took up their abode at Larghill, in the parish of Urr, where the men employed themselves in working their moorland farm, and the women in spinning. Gradually their distinctive peculiarities disappeared, and they became assimilated to the people by whom they were surrounded. The few who survived in 1800 purchased five acres of ground for houses and gardens at Crocketford, near Castle-Douglas, to which, however, they did not remove till 1808, and there they continued to maintain their religious opinions, until one after another they passed away from the earth, leaving behind them not a single heir to lay claim to the singular enthusiastic opinions of the followers of Mother Buchan.

BUDHA, a very ancient generic word having a double root in the Sanscrit language. The one signifies being, existence, and the other wisdom, superior intelligence. It is applied in various Oriental countries to denote a being, partly historical and partly mythical, who, though not regarded as God, is arrayed in all the attributes of Deity. It is also applied to those who seek to be absorbed in Deity. The Budhas are beings who appear after intervals of time inconceivably vast. Before they enter upon their Budhaship, they must pass through countless phases of being, as BODHISATWAS (which see), at one time existing as a divine being, at another as a frog; but all the while accumulating more and more merit, thus becoming all the better fitted for the distinguished honour which is yet awaiting them. In the last stage of their existence, when they are about to become Budhas, they must be born as other human beings are, must pass through infancy, childhood, and youth, until at a certain age they abandon the world, and retire to a desert, where, at the foot of a sacred tree, they receive the office towards which their ambition has been directed for countless ages. In the exercise of the high and honourable duties of Budhas, they obtain supernatural wisdom, whereby they are enabled to direct sentient beings in the path that leads to NIRWANA (which see) or annihilation. At his death a Budha ceases to exist; he enters upon no further state of being. The Budhas are looked upon by their adherents as the greatest of beings, and the most extravagant praises are lavished upon them.

BUDHA (GOTAMA), a historical personage worshipped in Thibet, Tartary, the Indo-Chinese countries, and China, as a divine incarnation, a god-man, who came into the world to enlighten men, to redeem them, and point out to them the way to eternal bliss. This remarkable person, who commenced his career as a mendicant in the East, has given origin to a system of religion which is professed by no fewer than 369,000,000 of human beings, and which, to use the language of Mr. Spence Hardy, to whom we are indebted for a more full and authentic account of Buddhism than to any other author, "has exercised a mightier influence upon the world than the doctrines of any other uninspired author in any age or country."

Gotama Budha was born, B. C. 624, at Kapilawastu, on the borders of Nepaul. At his very birth he started into full consciousness of the greatness of his mission, and, looking around him, he exclaimed, "I am the most exalted in the world; I am chief in the world; I am the most excellent in the world; this is my last birth; hereafter there is to me no other existence." In previous states of existence, as his followers believe, he had been gradually preparing for the office of a Budha. A very short time after his appearance in this world, he showed himself to be possessed of superior power, for when five months old, as we are informed, he sat in the air without any support at a ploughing festival. When he had reached his twenty-ninth year, he retired from the world, and passed six years in the forest of Uruwela, where he went through a course of ascetic discipline. At length, in this same forest and under a BO-TREE (which see), he was exalted to the honour of the supreme Budhaship. The enlarged experience which he obtained at this time is thus described by Mr. Hardy in his valuable work entitled 'Eastern Monachism:' "Whilst under the bo-tree he was attacked by a formidable host of demons; but he remained tranquil, like the star in the midst of the storm, and the demons, when they had exerted their utmost power without effect, passed away like the thunder-cloud retiring from the orb of the moon causing it to appear in greater beauty. At the tenth hour of the same night, he attained the wisdom by which he knew the exact circumstances of all the beings that have ever existed in the infinite worlds; at the twentieth hour he received the divine eyes by which he had the power to see all things within the space of the infinite systems of worlds as clearly as if they were close at hand; and at the tenth hour of the following morning, or the close of the third watch of the night, he attained the knowledge by which he was enabled to understand the sequence of existence, the cause of all sorrow and of its cessation. The object of his protracted toils and numerous sacrifices, carried on incessantly through myriads of ages, was now accomplished. By having become a Budha, he had received a power by which he could perform any act whatever, and a wisdom by which he could see perfectly any object, or understand any truth, to which he chose to direct his attention."

From this time Gotama commenced his ministry, declaring himself to be the teacher of the three worlds, wiser than the wisest, and higher than the highest. Twenty-four Budhas are mentioned by name as having preceded him at immense intervals, all of them having been Kshatryas with the exception of the three last, who were Brahmans; but innumerable Budhas have existed of whom nothing is known, not even their names. But the Budhists are particularly desirous to exalt Gotama above all the Budhas that have ever existed. Their historians pretend to trace his ancestry as far back as to Maha Sammata, whom they account the first monarch of the world, who is himself reckoned to have been of the race of the Sun. Little is known of the doings of Gotama after he entered on his Budhaship. He travelled through many parts of India, and went as far as Ceylon, where the mark of his foot is said to be still pointed out on a rock, called the Peak of Adam, from the circumstance, that the Mussulmans allege the foot-mark to have been that of our first father. But the wanderings of Gotama were not limited to this lower world; he is also affirmed to have visited occasionally the celestial regions. On his return to Benares, where he chiefly resided, he disclosed his system of doctrine in the presence of an innumerable multitude of hearers of all classes. His instructions are contained in a collection of one hundred and eight large volumes, known under the generic name of Gandjour or verbal instruction. This voluminous work, as M. Huc informs us, in his 'L'Empire Chinois,' is found in all the libraries of the great Buddhist convents. The finest edition is that published at Peking at the imperial press. It is in four languages, Thibetan, Mongolian, Mantshou, and Chinese. According to the Singhalese chronology, Budha died B. C. 543, in the eightieth year of his age. Before his death, this eminent sage predicted that his doctrine would be taught upon the earth for five thousand years; but at the end of that time, another Budha, another God-man, would appear, who was destined to be for ages the teacher of the human race. "Onward to that era," he added, "my religion will be exposed to persecution, my followers will be obliged to quit India, and take shelter in the mountainous regions of Thibet, which will thenceforth become the palace, the sanctuary, the metropolis of the true faith." Great difference of opinion has existed as to the age in which Gotama Budha lived. Various Oriental authorities fix it at B. C. 1000, and a few above B. C. 800. We have preferred following the calculation of the Singhalese writers, which is generally regarded as approaching nearest to the truth.

It is somewhat doubtful what is the precise position which Gotama holds in the estimation of his numerous followers. That he was a real historical personage all admit. Some view him as simply an ordinary mortal, whose wisdom was so superior to that of his fellow-mortals, not of his own age only, but of every age, that he is entitled to the highest veneration. Others regard him as a personification of the Divine attribute of wisdom in human shape; others as a Divine incarnation, a God-man, possessed at once of a Divine and a human nature; and others still, as though once a man, yet, in virtue of his Budhaship, having had his humanity so completely lost in his Divinity, that he is in reality God, a man-god.

The great mission which Gotama Budha had marked out for himself, seems to have been to overturn Brahmanism, the ancient religion of the Hindus. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that he met with keen opposition from the Brahmans; but his followers boast, that, in a discussion which he held with the most learned of those priests of the old faith, he so completely triumphed, that the principal disputant who had opposed him, threw himself prostrate before him, and owned himself vanquished. In memory of this victory a festival was instituted which lasts during the first fifteen days of the first month. One of the Buddhist legends, probably founded on the contentions of Budha with the Brahmans, represents him as no sooner having been invested with the Budhaship, than he was attacked by his adversary, Maraya, who came with a great army to prevent him, if possible, from becoming lord of the world. Maraya then brought on a thick darkness, but the body of Budha shone as a thousand suns. In further testimony of his Divine authority, the earth shook 100,000 times, and began to turn round. By this miracle, Maraya was frightened, and acknowledged the superiority of Budha, when forthwith all the gods and Brahmans of the universe came and ministered unto him. From that moment Gotama became a perfect Budha, and during the forty-five years which he held the office, he is alleged to have spoken 84,000 discourses, which are contained in the BANA (which see), or Sacred Books. They were not committed to writing, either by himself or his immediate disciples, but they are said to have been preserved in the memory of his followers during the space of 450 years, after which they were reduced to writing in the island of Ceylon. It can be easily conceived how little confidence can be put in traditions committed to writing after so long an interval of time. It is not improbable, that the discourses and miracles, and even common incidents of the life of Gotama Budha, are little more than a mass of fables. See BUDHISTS.

BUDHA (LIVING), a saint among the Mongol Tartars in Thibet, who, being believed to have passed through various stages of being, is supposed to be fitted for presiding over a LAMASERY (which see). He is also called a Chaberon, and such superiors are in large numbers, and placed at the head of the most important religious establishments. Sometimes one of these sacred personages commences his career, with only a very few disciples; but as his reputation grows, the number of his followers increases, and his temple becomes the resort of many pilgrims and devout persons. The following interesting account of the election and enthronization of a living Budha is given by M. Huc, in his 'Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China:' "When a Grand Lama has gone, that is to say, is dead, the circumstance is no occasion of mourning in the Lamasery. There are no tears, no lamentations, for everybody knows the Chaberon will very soon reappear. This apparent death is but the beginning of a new existence, as it were, one ring more added to the unlimited, uninterrupted chain of successive lives—a regular palingenesis. While the saint is in a state of chrysalis, his disciples are in the greatest anxiety; for it is their most important affair to discover the place where their master will resume life. A rainbow appearing in the air is considered a signal sent to them by their old Great Lama to aid them in their research. Every one thereupon says his prayers, and while the Lamasery which has lost its Buddha redoubles its fastings and prayers, a troop of elect proceeds to consult the Tchurtchun or augur, famous for the knowledge of things hidden from the common herd. He is informed that on such a day of such a moon, the rainbow of the Chaberon has manifested itself on the sky; it made its appearance in such a place; it was more or less luminous, and it was visible so long; then it disappeared amid such and such circumstances. When the Tchurtchun has received all the necessary indications, he recites some prayers, opens his books of divination, and pronounces at last his oracle, while the Tartars, who have come to consult him, listen, kneeling and fall of unction. 'Your Great Lama,' says he, 'has re-appeared in Thibet, at such a distance from your Lamasery. You will find him in such a family.' When these poor Mongols have heard this oracle, they return full of joy to announce the glad tidings to their Lamasery.

"It often happens that the disciples of the defunct have no occasion to trouble themselves at all in order to discover the new birth-place of their Great Lama. He himself takes the trouble to initiate them into the secret of his transformation. As soon as he has effected his metamorphosis in Thibet, he reveals himself at an age when common children cannot yet articulate a single word. 'It is I,' he says with the accent of authority; 'it is I who am the Great Lama, the living Buddha of such a temple; conduct me to my ancient Lamasery. I am its immortal superior.' The wonderful baby having thus spoken, it is speedily communicated to the Lamas of the Soumé indicated, that their Chaberon is born in such a place, and they are summoned to attend and invite him home.

"In whatever manner the Tartars discover the residence of their Great Lama, whether by the appearance of the rainbow, or by the spontaneous revelation of the Chaberon himself, they are always full of intense joy on the occasion. Soon all is movement in the tents, and the thousand preparations for a long journey are made with enthusiasm, for it is almost always in Thibet that they have to seek their living Buddha, who seldom fails to play them the trick of transmigrating in some remote and almost inaccessible country. Every one contributes his share to the organization of the holy journey. If the king of the country does not place himself at the head of the caravan, he sends either his own son, or one of the most illustrious members of the royal family. The great Mandarins, or ministers of the king, consider it their duty and an honour to join the party. When everything is at last prepared, an auspicious day is chosen, and the caravan starts.

"Sometimes these poor Mongols, after having endured incredible fatigues in horrible deserts, fall into the hands of the brigands of the Blue Sea, who strip them from head to foot. If they do not die of hunger and cold in those dreadful solitudes—if they succeed in returning to the place whence they came—they commence the preparations for a new journey. There is nothing capable of discouraging them. At last, when, by dint of energy and perseverance, they have contrived to reach the eternal sanctuary, they prostrate themselves before the child who has been indicated to them. The young Chaberon, however, is not saluted and proclaimed Great Lama without a previous examination. There is held a solemn sitting, at which the new living Buddha is examined publicly, with a scrupulous attention. He is asked the name of the Lamasery of which he assumes to be the Great Lama; at what distance it is; what is the number of the Lamas residing in it. He is interrogated respecting the habits and customs of the defunct Great Lama, and the principal circumstances attending his death. After all these questions, there are placed before him different prayer-books, articles of furniture, teapots, cups, &c., and amongst all these things, he has to point out those which belonged to his former life.

"Generally this child, at most but five or six years old, comes forth victorious out of all these trials. He answers accurately all the questions that are put to him, and makes, without any embarrassment, the inventory of his goods. 'Here,' he says, 'are the prayer-books I used; there is the japanned porringer out of which I drank my tea.'" And so on.

When this ceremony has come to a close, the Chaberon or living Budha is conducted in triumph, amid great excitement on the part of the spectators, to the Lamasery of which he is to be the Grand Lama. As the procession moves along, the Tartars prostrate themselves, and present offerings. On reaching the Lamasery, the child takes his place upon the altar, and men of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest, bow their heads before him. From that time he resides in the temple, receiving the adorations of the devout, and bestowing blessings upon them. It is his duty specially to superintend all that relates to prayers and sacred ceremonies.

BUDHA-VISHNU, one of the AVATARS (which see) or incarnations of Vishnu, the preserver of the world. This Budha is the manifestation of the eternal wisdom, and the ninth of the Avatars. This Budha is to be carefully distinguished from Gotama Budha, the originator of the Buddhist system of religion.

BUDHISTS, those who adhere to the system of belief alleged to have been promulgated by GOTAMA BUDHA, who is said to have lived in the sixth century before Christ. The nations professing their adherence to the doctrines of Buddhism, are the Burmans, Singhalese, Siamese, Nepaulese, Chinese, and Thibetans, amounting to a greater number than are known to profess any other single form of religion on the face of the earth.

The Buddhist system teaches that there are numberless systems of worlds called sakwalas, each having its own earth, sun, and moon, as well as a series of hells and heavens. The sakwalas are scattered throughout space in sections of three and three, each of them being surrounded by a circular wall of rock. The earth inhabited by men is subject alternately to destruction and renovation, in a series of revolutions to which neither beginning nor end can be discovered. There are three modes of destruction. The sakwalas are destroyed seven times by fire, and the eighth time by water. Every sixty-fourth destruction is by wind. All the systems of worlds are homogeneous, and so also are the orders of beings which inhabit them. "With the exception," says Mr. Hardy, "of those beings who have entered into one of the four paths leading to nirwana, there may be an interchange of condition between the highest and lowest. He who is now the most degraded of the demons, may one day rule the highest of the heavens; he who is at present seated upon the most honourable of the celestial thrones may one day writhe amidst the agonies of a place of torment; and the worm that we crush under our feet may, in the course of ages, become a supreme Budha. When any of the four paths are entered, there is a certainty that in a definite period, more or less remote, nirwana will be obtained; and they who have entered into the paths are regarded as the noblest of all the intelligences in the universe. Hence our earth in the time of a supreme Budha, or when the sacred dharma is rightly understood and faithfully observed, is the most favoured of all worlds; the priests, or those who observe the precepts, assume a higher rank than any other order of being whatever; and there is an immeasurable distance between even the most exalted of the dewas or brahmas and 'the teacher of the three worlds,' who is supreme."

Budhism does not, like HINDUISM (which see), acknowledge a creator, a preserver, or a destroyer. The power that controls the world is Karma, literally action consisting of merit and demerit. This Karma still exists after the elements of being have been dissipated. There is no such thing as an immaterial spirit, but the moment that a human being expires, his merit and demerit in its totality is transferred to some other being, the new being originating in the Karma of the previous being, which regulates also all the circumstances of his existence, whether fitted to produce happiness or misery.

On one point the Buddhists have always been completely at variance with the Brahmins—the subject of caste. According to Budhism, there was originally no distinction among the inhabitants of the earth, all being of one race; and although there are actually existing differences among men, arising from the merit or demerit of former births, there is no essential difference between the four tribes, but all are entitled to the same treatment, and an individual from any one of them may aspire to the priesthood.

According to Gotama, the pure unmixed truth is not to be found anywhere, except in his own BANA (which see); hence in Ceylon, as well as in other countries where this system prevails, the sacred books are literally worshipped, and whenever Budhist writers speak of them, it is in strains of the most extravagant laudation. As a specimen of the manner in which the sacred books enlighten their readers, we may quote the following strange explanation, not of existence, but of continued existence. "On account of ignorance, merit and demerit are produced; on account of merit and demerit, consciousness; on account of consciousness, body and mind; on account of body and mind, the six organs of sense; on account of the six organs of sense, touch (or contact); on account of contact, desire; on account of desire, sensation (of pleasure or pain); on account of sensation, cleaving (or clinging to existing objects); on account of clinging to existing objects, renewed existence (or reproduction after death); on account of reproduction of existence, birth; on account of birth, decay, death, sorrow, crying, pain, disgust, and passionate discontent. Thus is produced the complete body of sorrow. From the complete separation from, and cessation of ignorance, is the cessation of merit and demerit; from the cessation of merit and demerit is the cessation of consciousness; from the cessation of consciousness is the cessation of (the existence of) body and mind; from the cessation of (the existence of) body and mind is the cessation of (the production of) the six organs; from the cessation of (the production of) the six organs is the cessation of touch; from the cessation of touch is the cessation of desire; from the cessation of desire is the sensation of (pleasurable or painful) sensation; from the cessation of sensation is the cessation of cleaving to existing objects; from the cessation of cleaving to existing objects is the cessation of a reproduction of existence; from a cessation of a reproduction of existence is the cessation of birth; from a cessation of birth is the cessation of decay. Thus this whole body of sorrow ceases to exist."

The first term of this series, then, is avidyāh, or ignorance, which may be a subjective mode of expressing chaos or night, which is found to be the first step in almost all the ancient cosmogonies. Nearly the same account of the origin of all things is given in the Vishnu Purana of the Brahmins. There we are informed that whilst Brahma was meditating on creation in the beginning of the present Kalpa, there appeared a creation, beginning with ignorance, and consisting of darkness. From that great being appeared fivefold ignorance, consisting of obscurity, illusion, extreme illusion, gloom, and utter darkness.

The Budhist system is essentially atheistical. It recognizes no Creator; it speaks of no self-existent, eternal being; not even such an infinite nihilism as the Brahm of the Hindus. It is a system also of thorough materialism, the individual being viewed as possessed of all that goes to form a sentient being which ceases to exist at death, but he has no soul distinct from the body, or that will survive the death of the body. A Budhist may say, and that rightly, I exist as a sentient being in the world. But he has existed also in many previous states of existence in the same way, and will continue to exist in many more, until he attains nirwana, or a final cessation of existence (see ANNIHILATIONISTS), which is the highest object to be aimed at. But it has been often objected to such views, that they are totally destructive of the moral responsibility of individuals. The mode of argument by which this objection is met in one of the native works, is thus stated by Mr. Hardy in his admirable 'Manual of Budhism.'

"A man plants a mango, and that fruit produces a tree, which tree belongs to the man, though that which he planted was not a tree, but a fruit. A man betrothes a girl, who, when she is grown into a woman, is claimed by the man, though that which he betrothed was not a woman but a girl. A man sets fire to the village, and is punished for it, though it was not he who burned the village but the fire. The tree came by means of the fruit; the woman came by means of the girl; and the fire came by means of the man; and this 'by means of,' in all the cases, is the only nexus between the parties, whether it be the fruit and the man, the girl and the woman, or the fire and he who kindled it. In like manner, when the elements of existence are dissolved, as another being comes into existence by means of the karma of that existence, inheriting all its responsibilities, there is still no escape from the consequences of sin. To this we might reply, that by this process the crime is punished; but it is in another person; and the agent of that crime is less connected with that person than the father is with the child. The parent may see the child and know him; but the criminal has no knowledge whatever of the being who is punished in his stead, nor has that being any knowledge whatever of the criminal."

The doctrine of TRANSMIGRATION (which see) is encompassed with so many difficulties, besides destroying individual responsibility, that it is repudiated by many modern Buddhist writers; but that it is a dogma intimately interwoven with the whole system, as laid down in their sacred books, it is impossible to deny. Among the Nepaulese and Chinese as well as Singhalese adherents of Budha, there is a complete harmony as to this leading point of their system.

Budhism is essentially idolatrous. The worship of images, indeed, was unknown in China before the introduction of Budhism into that country about the Christian era. Gotama Budha, the founder of the system, is an object of worship, and temples are erected to his honour throughout all the countries in which his religious system is adopted, although it is difficult to explain how that exalted personage can give any aid to his worshippers, or hear their prayers, since, according to the teaching of their sacred books, he has ceased to exist. The construction of temples and images of Gotama Budha, indeed, forms the chief employment to which the industry and taste of the inhabitants of Eastern Asia are mainly directed. In this work neither labour nor cost is spared. Monarchs, indeed, are proud to lavish their treasures on these sacred edifices. The temples, which serve also as monasteries, contain a large space for worship, a depository for the images of Gotama, a library, and residences for the clergy. The principal temple in Ava is about six hundred feet in length, and the interior is adorned with upwards of two hundred pillars fifty or sixty feet high, and entirely covered with gold leaf. But the most remarkable of all these buildings is that at Pegu, called the temple of the Golden Supreme. It is raised on two successive terraces, the lower of which is ten feet above the ground, and the upper twenty feet above the lower. The building is pyramidal, composed of brick or mortar, and rises to the height of 361 feet, without excavation or aperture of any kind; but it diminishes very rapidly as it ascends, so that its form has been compared to that of a large speaking-trumpet. The whole is covered with a tee or umbrella fifty-six feet in circumference, the placing of which forms a high religious ceremony, and gives to the temple its sacred character. The framing of images of Gotama Budha is the principal of the few fine manufactures carried on in the Indo-Chinese countries. Some of these images, designed for the great temples, are of gigantic dimensions. That of old Ava has a head eight feet in diameter, and measures ten feet across the breast; the hands are upwards of five feet long, and the entire height is twenty-four feet; yet the whole is described as consisting of a single block of marble. An image in the great temple of Siam is said to be still more stupendous. M. Huc describes the Buddhist temples in Tartary and the worship conducted in them in these words—"They are always fantastical constructions of monstrous colonnades, peristyles, with twisted columns, and endless ascents. Opposite the great gate is a kind of altar of wood or stone, usually in the form of a cone reversed; on this the idols are placed, mostly seated cross-legged. These idols are of colossal stature, but their faces are fine and regular, except in the preposterous length of the ears; they belong to the Caucasian type, and are wholly distinct from the monstrous, diabolical physiognomies of the Chinese Pou-Ssa.

"Before the great idol, and on the same level with it, is a gilt seat where the living Fo, the Grand Lama of the Lamasonry, is seated. All around the temple are long tables almost level with the ground, a sort of ottomans covered with carpet; and between each row there is a vacant space, so that the Lamas may move about freely.

"When the hour for prayer is come, a Lama, whose office it is to summon the guests of the convent, proceeds to the great gate of the temple, and blows, as loud as he can, a sea-conch, successively towards the four cardinal points. Upon hearing this powerful instrument, audible for a league round, the Lamas put on the mantle and cap of ceremony, and assemble in the great inner court. When the time is come, the sea-conch sounds again, the great gate is opened, and the living Fo enters the temple. As soon as he is seated upon the altar all the Lamas lay their red boots at the vestibule, and advance barefoot and in silence. As they pass him, they worship the living Fo by three prostrations, and then place themselves upon the divan, each according to his dignity. They sit cross-legged; always in a circle.

"As soon as the master of the ceremonies has given the signal, by tinkling a little bell, each murmurs in a low voice a preliminary prayer, whilst he unrolls, upon his knees, the prayers directed by the rubric. After this short recitation, follows a moment of profound silence; the bell is again rung, and then commences a psalm in double chorus, grave and melodious. The Thibetian prayers, ordinarily in verse, and written in a metrical and well-cadenced style, are marvellously adapted for harmony. At certain pauses, indicated by the rubric, the Lama musicians execute a piece of music, little in concert with the melodious gravity of the psalmody. It is a confused and deafening noise of bells, cymbals, tambourines, sea-conchs, trumpets, pipes, &c., each musician playing on his instrument with a kind of ecstatic fury, trying with his brethren who shall make the greatest noise.

"The interior of the temple is usually filled with ornaments, statues, and pictures, illustrating the life of Budha, and the various transmigrations of the more illustrious Lamas. Vases in copper, shining like gold, of the size and form of tea-cups, are placed in great numbers on a succession of steps in the form of an amphitheatre, before the idols. It is in these vases that the people deposit their offerings of milk, butter, Mongol wine, and meal. The extremities of each step consist of censers, in which are ever burning aromatic plants, gathered on the sacred mountains of Thibet. Rich silk stuffs, covered with tinsel and gold embroidery, form, on the heads of the idols, canopies from which hang pennants and lanterns of painted paper or transparent horn.

"The Lamas are the only artists who contribute to the ornament and decoration of the temples. The paintings are quite distinct from the taste and the principles of art as understood in Europe. The fantastical and the grotesque predominate inside and out, both in carvings and statuary, and the personages represented, with the exception of Budha, have generally a monstrous and satanic aspect. The clothes seem never to have been made for the persons upon whom they are placed. The idea given is that of broken limbs concealed beneath awkward garments."

The shape of the images of Gotama differs in different countries, according to the peculiar taste of the people. In Ceylon, they resemble a handsome, well-shaped native; but in Siam they are of a more slender figure, and in Nepaul they have often three heads, and six or ten arms. The BO-TREE (which see), or ficus religiosa, under which Gotama sat when he received the Budhaship, is still an object of worship. The Kandians are in possession of the left canine tooth of their sage, and it is preserved by them with the utmost care, being regarded as the very palladium of their country. The impressions of Gotama's foot are also worshipped. One which is seen on the top of Adam's Peak, 7,240 feet above the level of the sea, is the frequent resort of Bud-hist pilgrims. One of the titles of the king of Siam is, the pre-eminently merciful and munificent, the soles of whose feet resemble those of Budha.

Besides the Buddhist temples, there are also found throughout the countries of Eastern Asia temporary erections, in great numbers, in the form of pagodas, which are used by the Buddhist priests for reading the BANA (which see), or Sacred Books, to the people. The Maduwa, as this building is called, is constructed of rough materials, no part of which, however, is seen, the pillars and roof being covered with white cloth, on which mosses, flowers, and the leaves of the cocoa-nut are worked into various devices. In the centre of the interior is an elevated platform for the convenience of the priests, and the people sit around it upon mats spread upon the ground. Lamps and lanterns are suspended throughout the building in great profusion and variety. The time appointed by Budha for reading Bana to the people is during the three months of the rainy season. The scene is striking and beautiful. The females are arrayed in the gayest attire, and flags, and streamers, and figured handkerchiefs float from every convenient point. At intervals tomtoms are beat trumpets blown, and muskets fired, all which, with the glare of many lamps, the display of richest flowers and acclamations of the people, produce a most exciting and bewildering effect.

The copies of the Sacred Books used on these occasions are written in large characters on talipo: leaves, in the Pali language, which is not understood by the people; and as the Bana is seldom interpreted in the vernacular tongue, the knowledge of Buddhist principles, possessed by the great mass of the community, is very imperfect. A class of benevolent persons, however, called Upasakas, endeavour to diffuse information among the people by going from house to house, reading books in the vernacular language, accompanied with familiar expositions.

Budhism varies somewhat in the different countries in which it is professed. The system taught in Ceylon is considered the most ancient, if not the original form, in which it came from the mouth of Gotama. The Singhalese priests, amounting to the large number of 2,500, being nearly 1 in 400 of the population, boast of the remote antiquity of their order, Budhism having been professed in the island for 2,000 years. They are of a thoroughly mendicant description, being wholly indebted for their support to the use of the ALMS-BOWL (which see). According to a legend, which is credited by the natives, Gotama Budha, driven from the continent of India by the persecution of the Brahmans, took refuge in their island, and he ascended into heaven from the summit of Adam's Peak, leaving the impression of his foot on the mountain. It appears to have been towards the sixth century of our era that Brahmanism obtained a decisive victory over the partizans of Budhism, compelling them to flee from Hindustan, and to cross the Himalaya, spreading themselves over Thibet, Mongolia, China, the Burman empire, Japan, and Ceylon. The new religion obtained complete possession of these countries, and is now the prevailing religion of the Indo-Chinese territories and entire East of Asia. M. Huc says, that among all the Buddhist nations which he visited, the Mongols were the most devotedly attached to their religion; then came the Thibetans, next the Singhalese of Ceylon, and last of all, the Chinese, who have fallen into scepticism.

The priests of Budha are all of them monks, residing in the temples, and living in a state of celibacy. In the Burman empire they are very numerous, much more so, indeed, than in Ceylon; and in Siam, where they are called Talapoins, their number is larger still. In Thibet, the superior priests are called Lamas, and are regarded as incarnations of Budha; hence they are called Living Budhas or Chabérons. See BUDHAS (LIVING). Priests of this kind are peculiar to the Budhists of Thibet and Japan. The Buddhism of China is known by the name of the religion of Fo, and in Japan of that of Budso. In Nepal, the priests are called BANDAYA (which see), whence the Chinese BONZE (which see), which in Sanscrit signifies a person entitled to reverence. They are divided into four orders, Bhikshu or Mendicants, Sravaka or Readers, Chailaka or Scantily-robed, and Arhanta or Adepts.

"In some countries where Buddhism is professed," we learn from Mr. Hardy, "it is usual for all persons to take upon themselves, during some period of their lives, the obligations of the priest; but this is probably only an entrance into the noviciate. In Ceylon it is less common for any one thus to assume the yellow robe who does not intend to devote his whole life to the profession. Nearly every male inhabitant of Siam enters the priesthood once in his life. The monarch of this country every year, in the month of Asárha, throws off his regal robes, shaves his head, adopts the yellow sackcloth of a novice, and does penance in one of the wiháras, along with all his court. At the same time slaves are brought to be shaved and initiated, as an act of merit in their converter. The same practice prevails in Ava. Among the Burmans, instead of the expensive mode of putting away a husband or wife, which the common law furnishes, a much easier is often resorted to with complete success. The parties aggrieved merely turn priests or nuns, and the matrimonial bond is at once dissolved. They may return to secular life at any time, and marry another; but, for the sake of appearance, their return to the world is usually deferred some months. It is the custom in China to serve three years as abbot, and after this period to retire into privacy."

The Buddhist priests are under a strict vow of poverty. At their ordination they must possess only eight articles, which consist of three robes of different descriptions; a girdle for the loins; a pálara or alms-bowl; a razor; a needle; and a water-strainer. These are the only things which a priest can be allowed to possess in his own individual right. But whatever may have been the original design of Gotama Budha in regard to the priesthood, their real situation in Ceylon is very different from that of mendicants who renounce all property. The fact is, that the possessions of the temples constitute a large proportion of the cultivated lands in the Kandyan provinces, and yet, with all this wealth, a priest is not allowed to take into his mouth a morsel of food which has not been given in alms, unless it be water, or some substance used for the purpose of cleaning the teeth. Many of the Budhists consider it most meritorious to make a vow never to partake of food without giving a portion to the priests. The tonsure or shaving of the head is required of every priest. The hair must not grow longer than two inches, and, therefore, it is the usual custom to shave once every fortnight. They walk out uncovered with their bald crown exposed to the fiercest rays of a tropical sun. Their entire wardrobe is confined to three robes, which are worn in the simplest manner. The Chinese Buddhist priest prefers garments which are torn and tattered, and have been rejected by others. In Burmah, they tear the cloth into a great number of pieces, but take care that it shall be of the finest quality. The garment worn by the priests in Ceylon is entirely of a yellow colour, though occasionally differing in shade. The Thibetan priests wear silken vests adorned with images, and have a lettered border of sacred texts woven into the scarf. The residences of the priests in Ceylon are usually mean erections, being built of wattle filled up with mud, whilst the roof is covered with straw, or the platted leaves of the cocoa-nut tree. Their residences in Burmah appear to be of the same description, but those in Siam are much superior, having richly carved entrances and ornamented roofs. The priests in Ceylon are seldom seen with any thing in the hand unless it be the alms-bowl or the fan, which, like a hand-screen, is carried to prevent the eyes from beholding vanity. They are usually followed by an attendant called the Abittayá. Cleanliness is strictly inculcated upon them; but they are not allowed to bathe oftener than once a-fortnight, unless in six weeks of summer, and the first month of the rainy season. The priest must use a tooth-cleaner regularly in the morning. It is generally made of some fibrous substance.

The Budhas, the Sacred Books, and the Priesthood, are the triad or sacred three of the Budhists, in which they put all their confidence. The assistance derived from these three gems is called sarana, protection, which amounts to a removal of the fear of reproduction or successive existence, and also a removal of the fear of the mind, the pain of the body, and the misery of the four hells. By reflecting on the three gems, scepticism, doubt, and reasoning will be driven away, and the mind become clear and calm. The Budhists are particularly attached to relics, which they hold in great reverence, more especially the remains of Gotama. The most celebrated relic now in existence is the DALADA (which see), or left canine tooth of the sage. The DAGOBA (which see) or Buddhist monument, is also honoured, from the consideration that such buildings contain relics. Among the Nepaulese, to walk round the dagoba is regarded as one of the most pious acts of Buddhist devotion. Mental prayers are repeated during the process, and a small cylinder, fixed upon the upper end of a short staff or handle, is held in the right hand, and kept in perpetual revolution.

The great object of the devout Buddhist is to attain Nirvana or cessation of existence. He directs his whole efforts, not towards ABSORPTION (which see), like the Brahman, but annihilation. He longs and strives to enter into a state of non-existence, and to become a nonentity. There is much in the moral precepts of Buddhism that is pure and excellent; but in its great fundamental principles, it is a gigantic system of atheism, infidelity, and superstition, spreading like an upas-tree over immense regions of Eastern Asia, shedding a withering, a destructive blight over all that dwell under its shadow.

BUDNÆANS, a sect of SOCIANIANS (which see), which arose in Poland in the sixteenth century, headed by Simon Budny, from whom they derived their name. He and his followers were not contented, like other Socinians, with denying the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, and affirming him to be a mere man, but they denied the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures. Budny, who had many followers in Lithuania and Russian Poland, was deposed from the ministerial office in 1584, and along with his adherents was excommunicated from the Minor Reformed Church of Poland, as the Socinian body in that country termed themselves. It is a remarkable fact, that Budny's translation of the Old Testament Scriptures is considered as the best that has ever been made, while his Commentaries on these Scriptures, as well as on the New Testament, stamped him as an infidel. He is said to have afterwards renounced his infidel principles, and to have been received again into communion with the Socinians.

BUDSDO, the name given in Japan to Gotama Budha, who is worshipped also in that island. See BUDHA, GOTAMA.

BUDSDOISTS, the worshippers in Japan of Budsdo or Gotama Budha. See BUDHISTS.

BUFFALO (SACRIFICE OF THE), a sacred rite which seems to be peculiar to the Malayan Mohammedans in the Straits of Malacca. The buffalo selected for the offering must be without blemish or disease; its fore and hind leg bones, and also its spine, must not be broken after death; neither are the horns to be used for common purposes. The animal to be sacrificed is thrown down in a convenient place near the mosque, with his hind and fore legs bound together; his head is also secured and turned in the direction of the KIBLAH (which see), and water then poured over it. The BILAL (which see) now advances with the sacrificial knife, and turning himself towards the Kiblah, recites a short prayer four times successively, and then divides the wind-pipe and large blood-vessel of the neck of the animal. It is flayed after death, and cut up into two equal parts. One half is distributed among the inhabitants of the Mukim or parish, which consists of forty-four houses; the other half is distributed among the officials of the mosque. The first half is generally cooked and eaten on the spot. On religious occasions, buffaloes are always sacrificed on one of these three days, Friday, Monday, or Thursday. They are also sacrificed at weddings, births, and circumcisions of wealthy persons; at the Chukur Anak, or the ceremony of shaving the heads of children; and finally, when going to war. On these occasions the buffalo need not be without blemish, and is killed according to the usual Mohammedan custom of the Zabbah.

BUG, or BOG, a river flowing into the Black Sea, which was once an object of devotion among the Russians, and one of the consecrated localities of their worship.

BUGRI. See CATHARI.

BUKTE', the name applied to a Lama or Buddhist priest in Tartary, who professes to work miracles, particularly to cut himself open, take out his entrails, and place them before him, and then resume his former condition as if nothing had happened. This spectacle, so revolting to the spectators, is very common in the Lamaseries of Tartary. The Buktè who is to manifest his power, as it is termed by the Mongols, prepares himself by previous fasting and prayer for a considerable period, during which he lives in complete retirement, and observes total silence. The disgusting scene is thus described by M. Huc: "When the appointed day is come, the multitude of pilgrims assemble in the great court of the Lamasery, where an altar is raised in front of the Temple-gate. At length the Buktè appears. He advances gravely, amid the acclamations of the crowd, seats himself upon the altar, and takes from his girdle a large knife, which he places upon his knees. At his feet, numerous Lamas, ranged in a circle, commence the terrible invocations of this frightful ceremony. As the recitation of the prayers proceeds, you see the Buktè trembling in every limb, and gradually working himself up into phrenetic convulsions. The Lamas themselves become excited: their voices are raised; their song observes no order, and at last becomes a mere confusion of yelling and outcry. Then the Buktè suddenly throws aside the scarf which envelopes him, unfastens his girdle, and seizing the sacred knife, slits open his stomach, in one long cut. While the blood flows in every direction, the multitude prostrate themselves before the terrible spectacle, and the enthusiast is interrogated about all sorts of hidden things, as to future events, as to the destiny of certain personages. The replies of the Buktè to all these questions are regarded, by everybody, as oracles.

"When the devout curiosity of the numerous pilgrims is satisfied, the Lamas resume, but now calmly and gravely, the recitation of their prayers. The Buktè takes, in his right hand, blood from his wound, raises it to his mouth, breathes thrice upon it, and then throws it into the air, with loud cries. He next passes his hand rapidly over his wound, closes it, and everything after a while resumes its pristine condition, no trace remaining of the diabolical operation, except extreme prostration. The Buktè once more rolls his scarf round him, recites in a low voice a short prayer; then all is over, and the multitude disperse, with the exception of a few of the especially devout, who remain to contemplate and to adore the blood-stained altar which the saint has quitted."

Such painful ceremonies frequently take place in the great Lamaseries of Tartary and Thibet, and so skilfully is the operation conducted, that even the most intelligent Buddhists believe in the reality of the pretended miracle. Certain days of the year are set apart on which such scenes are exhibited, when great numbers of people assemble, bringing with them offerings of various kinds, which go to enrich the Lamasery. The regular Lamas disclaim all connection with spectacles of this sort, and they are only enacted by lay Lamas of indifferent character and of little esteem among their brethren.

The so-called miracle, which we have just described, is always performed in public, with great pomp and parade. There are others, however, which are practised by a Buktè in private houses. Among these may be mentioned the heating irons red-hot, and then licking them with impunity, and making incisions in different parts of the body, which the instant after leave no trace behind. On these occasions the operations are preceded by the recitation of a prayer addressed to a demon, and if the appeal is without effect, then the being invoked is assailed with insults and imprecations.

BUL, the eighth month in the ancient Hebrew calendar, afterwards called Marchesvan, and corresponding to our October. It was the second month of the civil, and the eighth of the ecclesiastical year, and consisted of twenty-nine days. The sixth day of the month Bul was kept as a fast, because on that day Nebuchadnezzar slew the children of Zedekiah in the presence of their father, whose eyes, after he had witnessed the melancholy spectacle, he caused to be put out.

BULGARIANS, a name given to the CATHARI (which see).

BULL, a brief or mandate of the Pope, which derives its name from the seal (bullæ) of lead, or sometimes of gold attached to it. The lead is stamped on one side with the heads of Peter and Paul, and on the other with the name of the Pope by whom the bull is issued, and the year of his pontificate in which it appears. If the bull refers to a matter of justice, the leaden seal is suspended by a hempen cord; but if it refers to a matter of grace, by a silken thread. The Papal bulls form a very large and important part of ecclesiastical law in use in all Romish countries; but great doubt has often been felt as to the precise bulls which properly form a part of canon law many forged bulls having been palmed upon the world. In the twelfth century many bulls were interpolated under the name of the Popes to subserve particular interests. People returning from a pilgrimage to Rome brought with them interpolated bulls, and put them in circulation. A forger of this sort appeared in Sweden in the time of Innocent III. in the character of a papal legate. Some ecclesiastics were particularly skilful in imitating Papal bulls, and realized considerable sums by the practice. In England, near the close of the twelfth century, such attempts at imposture were publicly condemned, and Innocent III. enacted laws subjecting criminals of this kind to severe punishment, and at the same time laid down special marks by which genuine might be distinguished from spurious bulls. In these circumstances it was felt to be necessary that a new and properly accredited collection of genuine bulls should be prepared. After many attempts to supply this felt desideratum, Pope Gregory IX., in A. D. 1234, caused such a digest to be formed by the general of the Dominicans, Raymund a Peuneforte. The Decretals of Raymund formed a very important addition to Popish ecclesiastical law, and were appointed to be read in all schools, and to be taken for law in all ecclesiastical courts. A second volume of Decretals was collected and arranged by Pope Boniface VIII. and published about A. D. 1298. A third volume was collected by Pope Clement V. and published in A. D. 1308. This last collection is commonly known by the name of Clementines. These three volumes of Decretals or Papal bulls are acknowledged as carrying legal authority in all Popish states, and are called by canonists Patriæ Obedientia. A commentary on the Decretals was published under the title of Novellæ by John Andreas, a famous canonist in the fourteenth century. The Papal bulls issued after the Clementines are usually known by the name of Extravagants. The first series of these are by Pope John XXIII., who was the immediate successor of Clement V., and they received the strange name of Extravagants probably because, in their earliest state, they were not digested nor ranged with the other Papal constitutions, though at an after period they were inserted into the body of the canon law. The collection of Decretals in 1483 was called the common Extravagants. See CANONS.

BULL IN CENA DOMINI. See ANATHEMA.

BULL UNAM SANCTAM, a celebrated Papal decree issued by Pope Boniface VIII., in the commencement of the fourteenth century, and designed to assert the temporal as well as spiritual authority of the Pope. Philip, the then reigning king of France, along with his nobility and commons, publicly disclaimed the Papal authority, in so far as temporal matters were concerned; and, accordingly, Boniface, to assert his double power, issued this famous bull, in which he declares that the church is one body and has two heads, the Pope; that under its command are two swords, the one temporal and the other spiritual. "Either sword," the bull goes on to say, "is in the power of the church, that is the spiritual and material. The former is to be used by the church, the latter for the church. The one in the hand of the priest, the other in the hand of kings and soldiers, but at the will and pleasure of the priest. It is right that the temporal sword and authority be subject to the spiritual power. Moreover, we declare, say, define, and pronounce, that it is a necessary article of faith that every human being should be subject to the Roman pontif." This was the first open assertion in a formal document of the Papal authority being of a twofold character, both temporal and spiritual.

BULL UNIGENITUS, a decree issued by Pope Clement XI., in A.D. 1713, against the French translation of the New Testament with notes by the celebrated Jansenist, Pasquier Quesnel. The publication of this work had occasioned considerable dispute between the two parties in the Church of Rome, the Jesuits and Jansenists; and although Clement had privately lauded the work, he proceeded, at the instigation of the Jesuits, to condemn, in the noted Bull Unigenitus, one hundred and one propositions extracted from the notes of Quesnel. The publication of this bull occasioned the greatest commotions in France. It was accepted by forty Gallican bishops, but opposed by many others, especially by Noailles, archbishop of Paris. A violent persecution arose, and many of the Jansenists were compelled to flee from France to escape the resentment of the Jesuits.

BULL-WORSHIP. This is a far from infrequent form of idolatry in many parts of the world, and it is one of the most natural species of ANIMAL-WORSHIP (which see), when we consider that the bull has been generally regarded as an emblem of the creative power of God. Among the Persians, bulls were anciently consecrated, according to Xenophon, to their Jupiter, that is, to Ormuzd. The horns of the bull were viewed in Judea, Persia, and China, as an emblem of power. Moloch, the great god of the Ammonites, is represented as having a bull's head; so also is the Cretan Moloch, or Minotaur; while the Sicilian god Hebon has the body of a bull. The bull Mnevis in Egypt was consecrated to the sun; and the great bull Apis, which was set up at Memphis, was dedicated both to the sun and moon. The bull was one of the forms under which the god Osiris received universal adoration in Egypt; and this animal being a type or representation of creative power and energy, was an appropriate form in which to exhibit the god of the sun, the source of fertility and productive energy in the earth. Mylitta, the goddess of matter and of nature, is usually seen standing upon a bull, but at Hierapolis she is borne upon lions, while Jupiter has bulls under his feet.

The bull, when it is alone, indicates matter and the world. India and Egypt have represented the history of the world and its four ages by a bull which is supported successively upon four feet, then three, two, and one. Among the Persians, the world-producing egg contains, instead of the world, the bull Aboudad, which includes the germs of all beings. In India the bull is the creating god Brahma; but in the worship of Mithras, which is derived from that of Ormuzd, under the influence of the doctrines which have produced in the Christian Church the Gnostic sects, the world-producing bull is regarded by M. Rougemont, the learned and able author of 'Le Peuple Primitif,' as moist, chaotic, dark, and impure matter, which its adversary, Mithras, the invincible sun, sacrifices, and its death he considers as the emblem of that which the solar and igneous spirit must inflict upon the material and impure body.

But not only is the bull found occupying a conspicuous part in that department of mythology which refers to the sun, it is also seen in emblematic representations of the moon. In a number of monuments, Diana and Artemis, the one the Roman, and the other the Grecian goddess of the moon, are figured with the horns of a bull, or seated on a bull.

In the cosmogony of various nations, the bull is seen in the very foreground of the picture. At Miaco in Japan there is a pagoda in honour of a bull, which is considered as the brother of Aboudad. It is represented upon a broad square altar of massive gold. It wears upon its neck a very rich collar but the object which principally attracts attention is an egg which it holds between its feet and strikes with its horns. The bull is seen standing upon a piece of rock, while the egg swims in water, which is included in a hollow part of the rock. The egg represents chaos. The entire world at the time of chaos was enclosed in that egg, which swam upon the surface of the waters. The moon, by the power of its light and its influence, drew from the bottom of the waters an earthy matter, which was converted insensibly into rock, and there the egg rested. The bull finding this egg, broke its shell with its horns, and from this shell burst forth the world. The breath of the bull produced man. Such is the explanation of the mythical representation given by the Japanese doctors.

The recent excavations of Mr. Layard and M. Botta on the site of the ancient Nineveh have brought to light many figures which show plainly that bull-worship had been practised among the ancient Assyrians, who had probably derived it from Egypt. In the latter country, the three sacred bulls, Mnevis, Onuphis, and Apis, were regarded as of the highest hieroglyphical importance. The first was symbolically adored at Heliopolis; it was of a black colour, had bristly hair, and symbolised the sun. Onuphis was likewise black, had shaggy, recurved hair, and is supposed to have been the emblem of the retroceding sun. Apis was the offspring of a cow, asserted and believed to have been impregnated by a ray of light from heaven. It was necessary that he should be of a black colour, with the exception of two white spots, one of a triangular shape upon the forehead, and another, in the form of a half-moon, upon the right side. Taurus, or the bull, is the second of the signs of the zodiac, and in the Egyptian mythology, Osiris is the sun in Taurus, or the second stage of the vernal sun, whereas the sun in Aries is not Osiris but Ammon, the first light or solar phasis of commencing spring. The Gauls worshipped a brazen bull, and the temple of Juggernaut in Hindostan has in the middle of it an ox cut in one entire stone, larger than life. In Guzerat the bulls consecrated to Shiva are of wonderful beauty. They are perfectly white, with black horns, a skin delicately soft, and eyes rivalling those of the antelope in beautiful lustre. Never was Apis regarded in ancient Egypt with more veneration than is now paid to the bull of Shiva in Hindostan. Besides the living animals, there is in most temples a representation of one or more of the race sculptured in marble or stone.

BULOTU, a word used to denote the invisible world among the inhabitants of the Tonga islands. It was supposed to be peopled with the spirits of departed chiefs and great persons of both sexes; and it was to these chiefly that worship was paid and sacrifices were offered. These spirits in Bulotu were thought to act as intercessors with the superior gods, who were too highly exalted to be approached by men except in this way. An idea prevailed among the people, as we learn from Mr. Mariner in his description of the Tonga islands, that the spirits of men were in the habit of revisiting the earth. They would come in birds or in fish as their shrines. The tropic-bird, king-fisher, and sea-gull, the sea-eel, shark, whale, and many other living creatures, were considered as sacred because they were favourite shrines of those spirit-gods. The natives never killed any of these creatures. To some the cuttlefish and the lizard were gods; while others would lay offerings at the foot of certain trees, under an impression that spirits from Bulotu came to inhabit them. The souls of chiefs were all supposed to go straight to Bulotu after death; but there was no certainty as to the fate of the common people, who, indeed, were scarcely thought to have souls.

BULUH-BATANG, a species of bamboo which grows in Sumatra, and which is supposed by many of the natives to be the habitation of numberless good and evil supernatural beings. Captain Gibson, in an interesting paper read before the American Geographical and Statistical Society, mentions that the Orang Kooboos, both male and female, have been observed to sit round a Buluh-Batang and to strike their heads repeatedly against the trunk of the tree, and utter some rude, grunting ejaculations. This was done whenever any one or all of the band got hurt, or received any special gratification, but mostly when injured. The natives are wont to speak in the most ecstatic language of the good wood-nymphs of the Buluh-Batang.

BUNÆA, a surname of the Grecian goddess HERA (which see).

BURAIICUS, a surname of the ancient god HERACLES (which see), derived from the Achean town of Bura, in the neighbourhood of which there was a statue erected in honour of him, and there was also an oracle in a cave, which was consulted by throwing dice marked with peculiar characters.

BURA - PENNOU, an earth-god among the Khonds of the districts of Ganjam and Cuttack in Hindostan. According to the views of this singular race, the earth was originally a crude and unstable mass, unfit for cultivation or human residence. The earth-god said, "Let human blood be spilt before me." The command was obeyed, and, in consequence, the soil became firm and productive. From that time the deity Bura-Pennou appointed that human sacrifices should be regularly offered. This principle accordingly, the sacrifice of human victims, is a fundamental principle of the religion of the Khonds. Whenever a field is sown with grain, it must be enriched with the blood of a human victim. At every little interval as the crop advances, the same bloody rite is repeated. Should either national or individual calamities occur, the wrath of the earth-god must be appeased with the blood of a man. The victims, which are called merias, are usually Hindus who have been purchased to be used in sacrifice. The unhappy meria is brought to the village with his eyes blindfolded, and he is lodged in the house of the abbaya or patriarch. He is considered as a consecrated being until it comes to his turn to be sacrificed. We extract an account of one of these revolting sacrifices of human beings to Bura-Pennou from a report made on the subject to the British government a few years ago, as contained in the 'Friend of India.'

"From these festivals of sacrifice no one is excluded, and during their celebration all feuds are forgotten.

"They are generally attended by a large concourse of people of both sexes, and continue for three days, which are passed in the indulgence of every form of gross excess in more than Saturnalian license.

"The first day and night are spent exclusively in drinking, feasting, and obscene riot. Upon the second morning, the victim, who has fasted from the preceding evening, is carefully washed, dressed in a new garment, and led forth from the village in solemn procession with music and dancing.

"The meria-grove, a clump of deep and shadowy forest trees, in which the mango, the bur, the saul, and the peepul generally prevail, usually stands at a short distance from the hamlet, by a rivulet which is called the meria-stream. It is kept sacred from the axe, and is avoided by the Khond as haunted ground: my followers were always warned to abstain from seeking shelter within its awful shades. In its centre, upon the day of sacrifice, an upright stake is fixed, and generally between two plants of the sun-kissar or buzzur-dauti shrub, the victim is seated at its foot, bound back to it by the priest. He is then anointed with oil, ghee, and turmeric, and adorned with flowers, and a species of reverence, which is not easy to distinguish from adoration, is paid to him throughout the day. And there is now eager contention to obtain the slightest relic of his person; a particle of the turmeric paste with which he is smeared, or a drop of his spittle, being esteemed, especially by the women, of supreme virtue. In some districts, instead of being thus bound in a grove, the victim is exposed in or near the village, upon a couch, after being led in procession around the place of sacrifice.

"Upon the third morning, the victim is refreshed with a little milk and palm sago, while the licentious feast, which has scarcely been intermitted during the night, is loudly renewed. About noon, these orgies terminate, and the assemblage issues forth with stunning shouts, and pealing music, to consummate the sacrifice.

"As the victim must not suffer bound, nor, on the other hand, exhibit any show of resistance, the bones of his arms, and if necessary, those of his legs are now broken in several places.

"The acceptable place of sacrifice has been discovered the previous night, by persons sent out for this purpose, into the fields of the village, or of the private oblator. The ground is probed in the dark with long sticks, and the first deep chink that is pierced is considered the spot indicated by the earth-god. The rod is left standing in the earth, and in the morning four large posts are set up around it.

"The priest, assisted by the abbaya, and by one or two of the elders of the village, now takes the branch of a green tree, which is cleft a distance of several feet down the centre. They insert the victim within the rift, fitting it in some districts to his chest, in others, to his throat. Cords are then twisted round the open extremity of the stake, which the priest, aided by his assistants, strives with his whole force to close. He then wounds the victim slightly with his axe, when the crowd, throwing themselves upon the sacrifice, and exclaiming, 'We bought you with a price, and no sin rests on us,' strip the flesh from the bones.

"Each man bears his bloody shred to his fields, and from thence returns straight home; and for three days after the sacrifice, the inhabitants of the village, which afforded it, remain dumb, communicating with each other only by signs, and remaining unvisited by strangers. At the end of this time, a buffalo is slaughtered at the place of sacrifice, when tongues are loosened."

It is not usual to find the earth represented as a god, but as a goddess. It seems more probable that the sacrifices thus offered were made not to Bura-Pennou, who is supposed by some to be a solar god, but to Tari-Pennou, his companion, who was a goddess of the earth.

BURCHAN, the name of the idols of the Calmuck Tartars. Most of their gods are supposed to have been spiritual beings, who, after passing through all the different degrees of transmigration, have at last raised themselves to the dignity of divine beings by great deeds and extreme sufferings.

BURNT-OFFERINGS, sacrifices consumed by fire. These are the most ancient sacrifices in the world. They are often mentioned in heathen authors. Xenophon says, that in early times they sacrificed whole burnt-offerings of oxen to Jupiter, and of horses to the sun. The sacrifices of animals were the most common among the Greeks and Romans. (See SACRIFICES.) But the sacrifice which was known by the name of the burnt-offering was specially a Jewish service. Of sacrifices, in which the animals were either wholly or in part consumed by fire, there were four kinds—the whole burnt-offerings, the sin-offerings, the trespass-offerings, and the peace-offerings. The first of these was all consumed except the skin. Of the second some part was burnt, the rest being given to the priests, who were to eat it in the courts of the tabernacle. The trespass-offerings, which formed the third kind of burnt-offerings, were also partly consumed by fire, and partly eaten by the priests. In regard to the peace-offering, a different arrangement took place, some part of it being burnt, while the breast and the shoulder were given to the priest, and the remainder was eaten by the person who brought the offering along with his friends. It was the first, in which the whole animal was consumed by fire, that properly received the name of the burnt-offering. In early times burnt-offerings were sacrificed by every head of a family in his own dwelling; but afterwards, probably to prevent idolatry, special regulations were laid down as to the manner in which the rites were to be performed.

In the case of a burnt-offering, every individual was bound to bring his sacrificial victim to the door of the tabernacle, for the purpose of being offered upon the ALTAR OF BURNT-OFFERING (which see), which stood in the centre of the outer court. When the animal was thus brought, it was said to be offered up to God. The time appointed for sacrificing was in the day. The animals used were bullocks, sheep and goats, and, in cases of extreme poverty, turtle doves and pigeons might be offered. No beast could be sacrificed before it was seven days old, and special care was taken that it should be without blemish. The rites of the burnt-offering are thus described by Mr. Lewis, in his 'Hebrew Antiquities: "The man that brought a sacrifice led him up into the court of the tabernacle, and afterwards into the inner court of the temple, and stood with him before the altar with his face to the west, as in the sight of God. The most holy sacrifices were led through the gate of the court upon the north, called the gate of offering; the less holy were led through the southern gate; and the victims that were young and tender had their feet tied, and were carried in by the persons that owned them.

"Then was he to lay his two hands, pressing with all his force, upon the head of the victim between his two horns, though some conceive that the laying on of one hand was sufficient; yet the practice of Aaron, who laid his two hands upon the goat on the day of expiation, became a general canon, and two hands were commonly laid on. This imposition of hands was followed by a confession of sin in this form: I have sinned, O God, I have transgressed and rebelled, I have done this or that (naming the particular offence), but now I repent, and let this victim be my expiation; that is, let the punishment which I have deserved fall upon the head of this my sacrifice. And this confession of sin was thought so necessary, that without it the sacrifice was attended with no cleansing quality, and was wholly ineffectual.

"In the same place where hands were laid upon the victim was he slain, and that instantly and without delay. The sacrifice was tied down to the rings at the slaughtering place upon the north side of the altar, if it was one of the most holy; but if not, it might be killed in any part of the court, but generally towards the east. The victim to be slain was bound, his fore legs and hinder legs together, and laid thus bound with his head towards the south, and his face towards the west; and he that killed him stood upon the east side of him, with his face westward, and then cut through the throat and the wind-pipe at one stroke: the blood was then caught in a bason by another person, who continually stirred it about, lest it should coagulate before it was sprinkled. But the blood of the red cow was always received by the priest in his left hand. The killing of the sacrifice was regularly and ordinarily the office of the priests; yet it might upon occasion be done by another, by a woman, a servant, or unclean person, who, though he could not come into the court, yet was allowed to stand without, and by stretching his hand within to slay the sacrifice. But this rite could not be discharged by a person that was deaf, or a fool, or a minor, who were not qualified to attend to the sacred action they were about."

was then stripped of its skin, and divided into pieces. Wood was now brought to the altar, and the priests, carrying the portions of the divided sacrifice, went to the ascent of the altar, and there laid them down and salted them. This salt, which was called the salt of the covenant, was indispensable to the efficacy of the offering. (See SALT.) The parts of the sacrifice being salted, the priest that was to offer them carried them up the ascent of the altar, and threw them into the fire along with the fat. This fat the Jews say was laid upon the head of the sacrifice when it was cast into the fire, and the whole animal was thus consumed, except the skin, which was given to the priest.

Besides the burnt-offerings sacrificed on special occasions, there were two regular burnt-offerings called the daily sacrifice, one of them being offered every morning at nine o'clock, and the other at three o'clock in the afternoon. Each consisted of a lamb of the first year without blemish. Some burnt-offerings were positively enjoined by the law; others were voluntarily presented for a vow or a freewill-offering. The constant burnt-offerings are thus enumerated by Lewis: "The daily sacrifice of two lambs, which were burnt together with their meat-offering and drink-offering upon the altar. Upon every seventh day or Sabbath four lambs. Upon every new moon distinctly for itself as a new moon, or first day of the month, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs. Upon the fifteenth day of the first or passover month, being the first of the seven days of that great festivity after the passover, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs; and so for seven days continually. In the sheaf of the first fruits one he-lamb. In the feast of first fruits, if we consult the Levitical book, we find seven lambs, one bullock, and two rams; but in the book of Numbers, seven lambs, one ram, and two bullocks. In the first day of the seventh month, or the feast of trumpets, one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs. Upon the tenth day of the seventh month, or the day of expiation, one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs. Besides this offering, there was a ram for the high-priest himself, and another for all the people. Upon the fifteenth day of the seventh month, being the beginning of the feast of tabernacles, thirteen bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs, and so constantly for seven days; only every day there decreased one bullock from the offerings, till at the seventh day there were but seven bullocks. Upon the eighth and last day there was offered but one of each."

Burnt-offerings are sometimes called Holocausts, from the circumstance that the offerings were wholly burnt upon the altar. Such sacrifices were those most commonly in use before the time of Moses. An account of the manner in which they were to be offered is laid down in Lev. i. They were remarkably emblematic of a sense of sin on the part of the worshipper, and of a recognition of the great principle laid down by God himself, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," the whole animal being consumed by fire as an offering of a sweet-smelling savour unto the Lord.

BURRIBURRI, the name given among the Negroes of New Guinea to God, the Creator.

BUSTAMI, a Mohammedan mystic in the ninth century of our era, who taught that the recognition of our personal existence was idolatry, which is the worst of crimes. He held that man is absorbed in God, and when he adores God he adores himself. He considered himself as identified with the power, the wisdom, and the goodness of the universe. He would say, "I am a sea without bottom, without beginning, without end. I am the throne of God, the word of God. I am Gabriel, Michael, Israfil; I am Abraham, Moses, Jesus." Such language indicates Bustami to have been a Pantheist of the worst description. Similar doctrines have been revived in our own day by an American writer of great popularity. See INTUITIONISTS.

BUSTUM, a place appointed for burning the bodies of the dead among the ancient Romans. The Bustum was in the immediate neighbourhood of the place of sepulture, that when the body was consumed the ashes might be interred.

BUSUM, or SUMAN (sacredness), the native name used by the Ashantees and Fantees, for the deities worshipped by the Negroes, and which are called by the Europeans FETISHES (which see).

BUSUMPRAH (sacred river), a divinity among the Ashantees. This river issues from a large rock about half-way up the side of a mountain, near a little crevice called Samtasu. There the special presence of the god is supposed to abide, and sacrifices are consequently offered. On the northern bank of the river is a fetish-house or temple, where Ashantee travellers make oblations to the deity of the river before they venture to plunge into the stream.

BUTH, an individual who is said to run furiously on certain days of the year through the city of Lhasa in Thibet, killing recklessly all whom he meets, in honour of the goddess Manipa, who is imagined to take peculiar delight in the shedding of blood.

BUTO, a goddess among the ancient Egyptians, who, as some think, represented the full moon, and was worshipped along with Horus and Bubastis at the town of Buto. She is identified by the Greeks with the goddess Leto. She was accounted by Herodotus one of the eight principal Egyptian divinities. By the Greeks generally she was thought to be the goddess of night, and in accordance with this view, the shrew-mouse and the hawk were sacred to her.

BYTHOS (Gr. the abyss), the primal essence, among the Valentinian Gnostics, where the spirit is lost in contemplation. According to this system, all existence has its ground in the self-limitation of the Bythos, which has in it a fulness of divine life which flows out in the complete series of ÆONS (which see). The first self-manifestation of the Hidden One, the Monogenes, is called distinctively the invisible name of the Bythos, or that wherein the Bythos has conceived himself. Irenæus speaks of a class of Valentinians who considered the Bythos to be something exalted above all opposition, of which even existence could not be predicated; the Absolute identical with Nothing.

BYZANTINE CHURCH, those who acknowledge subjection to the patriarch of Constantinople, who is the head of the Oriental or GREEK CHURCH (which see).

BYZANTINE RECENSION, the name usually applied to the text of the Greek New Testament used in Constantinople after that city became the metropolis of the Eastern empire. In the opinion of Michaelis, most of the manuscripts found in the convent on Mount Athos are of the Byzantine edition. Griesbach reckons upwards of one hundred manuscripts of this class.

BYZAS, the founder of Byzantium, now called Constantinople. He was said to be sprung from the gods, being a son of Poseidon and Ceroessa, the daughter of Zeus and Io. But Byzas was the name of the leader of the Megarians, who, B. C. 658, founded Byzantium.

CAABA. See KAABA.

CABARNUS, the ancient name given in the island of Paros to a priest of DEMETER (which see). It was also the name of a mythical personage from whom Demeter learned that her daughter had been carried off.

CABBALA (Heb. tradition or reception), a term sometimes used in an enlarged sense to denote all the traditions which the Jews have received from their fathers; but more frequently applied to denote those mystical interpretations of Scripture and those metaphysical speculations concerning the nature and perfections of God which are said to have been handed down by a secret tradition from the earliest ages. This mysterious system of theological science has been held in the highest esteem by many Jews, conducting the mind, as they allege it does, by an easy process to the knowledge of the sublimest truths. The Cabbalists regarded the Mishna as the soul of the law, and preferred it to the revealed or written word, while they deemed their own Cabbala as the soul of the soul of the law. It is with them a mystery concealed from the uninitiated, chiefly consisting in viewing the words of the sacred Scriptures as involving abstruse meanings, which may be ascertained by combining the letters of which they are composed in different forms. To maintain the antiquity of this system of teaching, it has been alleged that Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai on three different occasions; that during the first of these periods he received the written law; that during the second he was instructed in the Mishna; while the last forty days were spent in the study of the Cabbala. The great Jewish legislator is imagined to have explained the principles of this mysterious science in the first four books of the Pentateuch, which treat of the existence and attributes of God, while, in the book of Deuteronomy, the Cabbala is not to be found. Some Jewish writers, however, plead for a still more remote antiquity as belonging to their favourite traditional science, it having been taught, they say, by God to angels immediately after the fall of man, and the angel Raziel having been despatched from heaven on very purpose to instruct Adam in the mysteries of religion by means of the Cabbala. Different angels also were employed to initiate the succeeding patriarchs in this difficult science, Tophiel having been the teacher of Shem, Raphael of Isaac, Metatron of Moses, and Michael of David.

No Cabbalistic writings are to be found, however, which are not evidently of a date posterior to that of the destruction of the second temple. The most celebrated of them are the Sepher Jetsira, or book of the creation, and the Sepher Zohar, the book of splendour. The former is ascribed by some Jews to the patriarch Abraham, but others, with greater probability, attribute it to the famous Rabbi AKIBA (which see). The author of the Zohar is believed to have been a disciple of Akiba, named Simeon Ben Jochai, whom the Jews consider as the prince of Cabbalists, and to whose authority they implicitly bow on every point not contradicted in the Talmud. Simeon is supposed to have lived some years after the destruction of Jerusalem. The emperor Titus Vespasian is said to have condemned him to death, but having escaped, he concealed himself along with his son in a cave, where, with the assistance of Elias, who occasionally descended from heaven to instruct them, they prepared the Zohar, a production of great fame, as containing the Cabbalistic mysteries, expounded with greater fulness than in any other work. A brief view of this noted book may be of some interest to the reader. The first part is called mystery, and well does it deserve the name, from the mysterious doctrines which it teaches, all of them supported by passages extracted from the Old Testament, and explained in a very peculiar way. It mentions the Microprosopon, or the little face, and the Macroprosopon, or long face, with his spouse, with the different dispositions of his beard, and other circumstances equally trifling and absurd. The second part is called the Great Synod, and enters more into particulars, explaining the dew of the brain of the old man, and of the great face. He afterwards examined his skull, and his hair, his forehead, eyes and nose, and every part of the great face, but particularly his beard, which is represented as "transcending all encomium. Neither prophet nor saint ever came near it. It is white as snow, and reaches even to the middle. It is the ornament of ornaments, and the truth of truths; wo unto him that toucheth it." This marvellous beard consists of no fewer than thirteen parts, which none but the initiated can comprehend. The third part of the Zohar is called the Little Synod, and contains the last farewell which Simeon Ben Jochai took of his disciples. His last words were written by Rabbi Abba, and contain further explanations in reference to the old man who had formed the subject of the two former parts. "His head," said he, "is concealed in a superior place where it is not seen; but it expands its forehead, which is beautiful and agreeable. It is the complacency of delights, and therefore it has there the figure of a forehead, which appears with the brightest light, and when it appears, the complacency is manifest in all the worlds. The prayers are heard, the face of the little visage is enlightened, the eyes are as admirable as the forehead. They always behold, and never sleep, for the Psalmist says, 'He that keepeth Israel never sleeps,' and, therefore, he has neither eyelids nor eyebrows." Simeon speaks with the same obscurity of all the other parts of the little face.

But the question naturally arises in the mind, What can be the meaning of all this? It is a mysterious allegorical representation of some important truths. The following brief explanation may suffice. "The Cabbalists distinguish three kinds of worlds, and represent them under the figures of three men, called the celestial man, the terrestrial man, and the archetype, or original and model of the other. To each of these men they appropriate a woman, and all the parts of the human body, pretending that these parts are so many significant symbols, representing the operations and effects of the Deity. They imagine also a long and a little face, to which they, in the first place, assign some wives, because the production of all things is effected by union. They, in the second place, ascribe to them a brain, which is concealed, by which they insinuate that God comprehends all things in his secret council. They, in the third place, assert 'that the skull is full of a white dew as clear as crystal,' by which they mean that all colours have a very subtle principle, and that every thing is white. They teach, in the fourth place, that the little face has two arms, which are expressive of his bounty and severity. They further describe his body as beauty, his right thigh as power, and his left as glory. They, in the fifth place, attribute to him abundance of hair, which overshadows a part of that radiance and effulgence that would dazzle and confound the saints, who, in their present imperfect state, are incapable of beholding that lustre which surrounds divine perfection." From this imperfect exposition it is plain, that under the figure of the old man, with the different parts of his body, are veiled divine truths of no ordinary importance.

We are informed that in the very act of expounding these mystical allegories, Rabbi Simeon expired. While he had been engaged in teaching his disciples, a bright light filled the house, which so dazzled those present that they could not look steadfastly upon the face of their instructor. A fire also was seen to burn at the door of the house, which effectually prevented the entrance of all except Simeon's more immediate disciples; and when both the fire and the dazzling brightness disappeared, they perceived that the lamp of Israel was extinguished. The burial of this eminent Rabbi was strictly private, and it was reported that while the last sad ceremony was being performed, and the body was about to be let down into the grave, a voice was suddenly heard from heaven exclaiming, "Come to the marriage of Simeon; he shall enter into peace, and rest in his chamber." And when the coffin was actually deposited in the tomb, a voice was again heard saying, "This is he who caused the earth to quake and the kingdoms to shake." Such legends strikingly indicate the high estimation in which Rabbi Simeon is held among the Jews.

The Cabbala has been usually divided into three kinds:—(1.) The Gematria, which consists in taking the letters of a Hebrew word for arithmetical numbers, and explaining every word by the arithmetical value of its letters. (2.) The Notaricon, which consists in taking every particular letter of a word for an entire diction. (3.) The Themurah, which consists in transposing or changing the letters. Cabbalistic science was a favourite study of the Jews in the middle ages. At that dark period, diagrams were frequently drawn in particular forms and inscribed with mystical Hebrew words, or rather special combinations of Hebrew letters, which were supposed to act as amulets or charms, healing diseases, averting calamities, and otherwise exerting magical influence. The following figure, called the Shield of David, may give the reader some idea of these talismanic diagrams. We are indebted for it to Allen's 'Modern Judaism,' and the Hebrew inscription, Aglá, is composed of the initial letters of four Hebrew words, which may be rendered, "Thou art strong for ever, O Lord," or "Thou art strong in the eternal God."

The Cabbala is commonly divided into two branches. The one treats of the perfections of God and of the celestial intelligences, and receives the name of the chariot, or Mercava, because they suppose that Ezekiel has explained the chief mysteries in the chariot which he mentions in the beginning of his visions. The other is called Bereschit, or the beginning, and includes the study of the material universe, taking its name from the Hebrew word with which the Mosaic account of the creation opens in the book of Genesis. In the Cabbalistic system are included ten sephiroths or splendours, ten names of God, ten orders of angels, ten planets, and ten members of the human body, and these corresponding to the ten commandments. The ten splendours are denominated the crown, wisdom, understanding, magnificence, might, beauty, victory, glory, the foundation, and the kingdom. The ten names of God corresponding to these ten splendours are "I am that I am," Jah or the Essence, Jehovah, God the Creator, the Mighty God, the Strong God, God of Hosts, the Lord God of Hosts, the Omnipotent, and the Lord Adonai. The ten orders of angels are the seraphim, cherubim, thrones, dominions, virtues, powers, principalities, archangels, angels, and souls. The ten planets are the empyreal heaven, the primum mobile, the firmament, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon. The ten members of the human body are the brain, the lungs, the heart, the stomach, the liver, the gall, the spleen, the reins, the vitals, and the womb.

The greatest secret of the Cabbala is found in the sephiroths or splendours, and to obtain an acquaintance with these requires much earnest and industrious application. A greater excellence is attributed to the first three of these splendours than to any of the rest. They approach nearer to the infinite, and constitute the chariot Mercava, which it is unlawful to explain to any except the initiated. Some Christian writers imagine that in these three special sephiroths is involved the idea thus plainly seen to exist among the Cabbalistic Jews, of a Trinity of Persons in the Godhead. It is most probable, however, that these sephiroths were, like the other, only attributes of God, not Persons of the Godhead. Hence we find the Cabbalists representing these splendours as united to the divine essence, and as flowing from it like colours from the flame.

"In order to provide for the communication and subordination of the splendours," says an intelligent writer, "they have also supposed numerous canals through which these influences are communicated. Corresponding to the number of the Hebrew letters, they have formed twenty-two canals, to convey the influence of the superior to all the inferiors. From the crown issues three, one terminating in wisdom, a second in understanding, and a third in beauty. From wisdom proceeds a fourth emptying itself into understanding, a fifth into beauty, a sixth into magnificence. In this manner the whole is conducted, and each one performs a particular operation. Each canal has also a particular seal, consisting of three letters. The first is that letter which denotes the number of the canal, and denotes one of the perfections of God, and the other two letters are taken from the name of God, Jah. Two examples will illustrate this matter. The letter L is the number of the twelfth canal, issuing from might, and terminating in beauty. To this letter is united Ja, and these constitute the God of the thirty ways of wisdom. The letter T is the number of the twenty-second canal, to which being added the letters Ja, we obtain 'the God who is the end of all things.' To each canal is annexed some appellation of the Deity, and the letters of the name Jehovah, in a similar manner, as one of the names of God, are annexed to each of the splendours."

Carrying out their mystical system, these fanciful writers described thirty-two ways and fifty gates which lead men to the knowledge of all that is secret and mysterious, whether in nature or religion. All the ways proceed from wisdom, as Solomon says, "Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." The fifty gates are degrees of knowledge, which have never been wholly attained, no man having ever entered the fiftieth gate. Moses passed through the forty-ninth, but could proceed no farther, as God had said to him, "Thou shalt not see my face;" and the fiftieth gate forms the entrance to the residence of the Almighty whom no man hath seen or can see.

In their love of mystery, the Cabbalistic divines discover mysteries in every letter of the Hebrew language, each letter having a relation to the splendours or to the works of creation. The universe, in their view, was formed with an analogy to the Hebrew letters, and hence they imagined that a certain combination of letters constitutes the beauty and excellence of the universe. Thus it is, that by the assistance of a letter, one may attain the knowledge of many things connected with it. The number seven is with them the perfect number by which all things were formed. Not only do they attach peculiar value and importance to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, but even the accents are considered to have in them an inherent virtue. Words are also twisted into a thousand extravagant and fantastic meanings, and when words do not signify what they wish, they change them by certain rules so as to extort from them the desired signification. The word Jehovah, in particular, they hold in the utmost veneration, asserting it to be an inexhaustible fountain of wonders and mysteries. It serves as a bond of union to all the splendours, and forms the pillar upon which they all rest. Every letter of which this ineffable name consists is fraught with mysteries, which only the initiated can comprehend. It includes all things, and he who pronounces it takes the whole universe into his mouth.

The Cabbalists apply their mysterious science to five different purposes; to the investigation of nature, hence called the "Natural Cabbala;" to the discovery of the beautiful connection which exists among the works of God, therefore denominated "Connecting Cabbala;" to the contemplation of celestial subjects, which is designated the "Contemplative Cabbala;" to the purposes of astrology, or the "Astrological Cabbala;" and to miraculous or healing purposes, which constitutes the "Magical Cabbala."

CABBALISTS, those Jewish doctors who profess to believe in the doctrines of the Cabbala, or oral tradition of the Jews. The Cabbalistic opinions have been revived in modern times, and openly taught by Fabre D'Olivet, who maintains that there is a mystery involved in every letter of the Hebrew alphabet.

CABEIRI, obscure divinities in ancient Greek mythology of whom little is known, and concerning whom there has been much dispute among the learned. They were worshipped chiefly in Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. It has been supposed by some that they were originally worshipped in Phrygia, and that the name of Cabeiri, which has puzzled many philologists, was derived from Mount Cabeirus in that country. The earlier Greek writers speak of these mysterious deities as descended from inferior gods, Proteus and Hephestus. In Samothrace they are represented as having formed a sort of triad, consisting of AXIEROS, AXIOCERSUS, and AXIOCERSA (which see), thought to be identical with Demeter, Persephone, and Hades. Later writers, such as Strabo, regard the Cabeiri not as regular divinities, but like the Corybantes and Curetes, mere attendants on the gods. Some authors consider them as identical with the Roman Penates or household gods. In addition to the Samothracian there seem to have been also Boeotian Cabeiri. That they were worshipped among the Macedonians is certain, from the circumstance that Alexander, at the close of his Eastern expedition, set up altars to the Cabeiri. Herodotus speaks of them as having been worshipped even at Memphis in Egypt. They are sometimes identified with the Dioscuri, or Castor and Pollux. See next article

CABEIRIA, festivals of the nature of mysteries, celebrated in all the different places in Greece where the worship of the Cabeiri was observed. (See preceding article.) Inviolable secrecy being required of all the initiated, little is known of the rites practised in the Cabeiria. Those of Samothrace were held every year, and continued for nine days. The initiated, on admission, passed through various purifications, which were understood to cleanse them from all crimes, even of the most atrocious description; and in token of their admission they were presented with a purple ribbon, which was worn around the body as a charm against evils of different kinds. The Cabeiria of Lemnos, which were less famous than those of Samothrace, were celebrated by night, and protracted throughout nine nights, during which all fires in the island were extinguished as being impure. Sacrifices offered to the dead, and a sacred vessel, which the Cabeiri were supposed to accompany, was sent to Delos to bring new fire, which was distributed among the people. Authors are silent about the manner in which the Cabeiria were observed in other places where the Cabeiri were worshipped. (See MYSTERIES).

CACA, a Roman goddess, who received divine honours in return for having revealed the place where the cattle were concealed which her brother Cacus had stolen from Hercules. A perpetual fire was kept burning in her temple.

CACUS, in the Roman mythology, a giant, the son of Vulcan or fire, represented by Ovid in his 'Fasti' as vomiting fire and whirlwinds of smoke against Hercules. He is said to have stolen a portion of the cattle which belonged to Hercules, and to have hid them in a cave. Cacus was betrayed by his sister Caca, and he was accordingly slain by Hercules. He is generally considered as some evil demon personified, but Rougemont suggests, in his 'Le Peuple Primitif,' that the whole story of Cacus may have a reference to the volcanic districts of Italy, which were often fabled as being the scene of contests between the giants and the gods.

CADHARIANS, a Mohammedan sect who deny predestination, and hold that human actions are solely regulated by the free-will of man himself. One of the Mohammedan doctors terms them the Manicheans of the Mussulman faith, because they maintain the existence of two original co-ordinate principles, the one Divine and the other human.

CADIR, an order of Mohammedan monks founded by Abdu'l-cadir-Gilani, who died at Bagdad in A. D. 1165. Once a-week they spend a great part of the night in turning round, holding one another by the hand, and incessantly exclaiming Hai, Living, one of the attributes of God. They never cut their hair nor cover their heads, and go always barefooted. They may leave their convents at pleasure, and are under no vow of celibacy.

CADIZADELITES, a modern Mohammedan sect who bear some resemblance in their general deportment to the ancient Greek Stoics, affecting peculiar gravity and austerity of manner, and avoiding all feasts and amusements. They have introduced some innovations into the Mohammedan system, in so far as practice is concerned. Thus they have invented some new ceremonies, in praying at funerals for the souls of the departed. This sect causes their Imam to cry aloud in the ears of the dead man, calling upon him to remember that there is but one God, and his prophet is one. They read the Bible in the Slavonian tongue, and the Koran in Arabic. They drink wine during the great Mohammedan fast of Ramadan; but they neither put cinnamon nor other spices in it. In public and private they are constantly speaking of God, and incessantly repeating the cry, "There is but one God only." Some of them spend whole nights in this way, sitting and inclining their bodies towards the ground. This sect loves and protects the Christians from all insults on the part of other Mohammedans. They believe that Mohammed is the Paraclete or Comforter promised by Christ to be sent from the Father after he himself should leave the world. They hate images and the sign of the cross. They are circumcised, and justify their adherence to this custom by the example of Christ. In short, the Cadizadelites seem to have adopted a system of faith and practice which is little else than a confused mixture of Mohammedanism, Christianity, and Judaism.

CADMILLUS, a deity generally spoken of in connection with the Cabeiri of the ancient Greeks, and supposed to be identical with HERMES (which see), the messenger of the gods.

CADMUS, a divinity worshipped in ancient times in various parts of Greece. He is reckoned by some a Pelasgian, and by others a Phœnician god. He is said to have been a son of Agenor and Telephassa. Having been sent out by his father in search of his sister Europa, whom Zeus had carried off to Crete, he failed to find her, and settled along with his mother in Thrace. On consulting the oracle at Delphi as to the hiding-place of Europa, he was told to desist from the search, and to follow a cow of a particular kind until he reached a spot where the animal would fall down from fatigue, and that on that spot he should build a town. He obeyed the command of the oracle, and built Thebes in Bœotia. As he resolved to sacrifice the cow to Athena, he despatched messengers to a neighbouring well to fetch water for the sacrifice. The well, however, was guarded by a dragon which killed the messengers, and the monster was in turn destroyed by Cadmus, who, at the suggestion of Athena, sowed the teeth of the dragon, in consequence of which a troop of armed men sprung up who slew one another, with the exception of five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Having been invested with the government of the city which he had built, he received from Zeus, Harmonia for his wife, by whom he had several children. Afterwards removing from Thebes, Cadmus became king of the Cenchœans, and finally he and his wife were changed into dragons, and removed by Zeus to Elysium.

Cadmus is said, by some writers, to have been a worshipper of Dionysus, who married his daughter Semele, and to have introduced the worship of that deity into Greece along with civilization. To Cadmus the Greeks are said to owe the original alphabet of their language, which consisted of sixteen letters, and which appears to have come to them from Phœnicia. The whole story of Cadmus, indeed, told in several different ways, seems to be a mythical representation of the immigration of a colony at a very early period from Phœnicia into Greece, bringing with them the use of a written alphabet and various important arts, which formed the groundwork of that high civilization and refinement by which the Greeks were afterwards characterized.

CAF. See KAF.

CAFRES (RELIGION OF). See KAFIRS (RELIGION OF).

CAFUR, the name of a fountain in the Mohammedan paradise, thus referred to in the Koran, "The just shall drink of a cup of wine, mixed with the water of Cafur, a fountain whereof the servants of God shall drink; and they shall convey the same by channels whithersoever they please." See PARADISE.

CAIANIANS, a Christian sect mentioned by Tertullian, in his work, 'De Baptismo,' as denying the necessity of outward baptism. They have sometimes been confounded with the CAINITES (which see), from which, however, they were altogether distinct.

CAINITES, a Gnostic sect of the second century, whom Neander considers as belonging to the great stock of the Ophites or Serpentians. They derive their name from the very high estimation in which they held Cain. Such was their hatred of the Demiurge or the god of the Jews, and also their dislike of the Old Testament, that they regarded the worst characters recorded in that ancient Jewish record, such as Cain, Korah, Dathan, Abiram, the inhabitants of Sodom, and even Judas the traitor, as entitled to veneration, as having rebelled against the Demiurge, who was in their view an enemy of the true God. These men, usually accounted wicked, were, according to the system of the Cainites, the sons of the Sophia, and the instruments which she employed in opposing the Demiurge's kingdom. They were fervent admirers of Judas Iscariot, whom they looked upon as alone of all the apostles possessed of the true Gnosis, and as having procured the death of Christ from the laudable motive of thereby destroying the kingdom of the Demiurge. Origen, therefore, was fully justified in denying to such a sect the title of Christian, opposed, as they were, in the very fundamental principles of their system, to both the person and the work of Christ.

CALABAR (RELIG. OF). See FETISH-WORSHIP.

CALENDARS, books in which were recorded, in ancient times, the memorials of the days on which the Christian martyrs suffered. At first only those who actually died for the cause of the Redeemer had the honour of being mentioned in the registers; but afterwards eminent confessors were also included. These calendars were usually kept in the churches, and are sometimes confounded with the diptychs.

CALF-WORSHIP. The worship of this animal seems to have had its origin in Egypt, which was the chief seat of Animal-Worship of almost every kind. The great ox-god Mnevis was worshipped at Heliopolis in Lower Egypt, while the ox-god Apis was worshipped at Memphis in Upper Egypt. The former object of idolatry, that of Mnevis, is supposed by Sir Gardner Wilkinson to have given origin to the worship of the golden calf, which is minutely described in Exod. xxxii. as having been engaged in by the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness. After speaking of the worship of the sacred animals in general, Wilkinson remarks, "The Hebrew legislator felt the necessity of preventing the Jews from falling into this, the most gross practice of which idolatry was guilty. The worship of the golden calf, a representation of the Mnevis of Heliopolis, was a proof how their minds had become imbued with the superstitions they had beheld in Egypt, which the mixed multitude had practised there." The Israelites, when employed in worshipping the calf which Aaron had made, held a festival on the occasion; for it is said, "the people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play." And Moses is further said to have seen "the calf and the dancing." The most ancient popular rites of the Egyptians, according to Creuzer, were of the nature of orgies, and the fundamental character of their religion was Bacchanalian. Sensual songs were sung, with the accompaniment of noisy instruments. This accounts for the remark, Exod. xxxii. 17, "And when Joshua heard the noise of the people as they shouted, he said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp."

The gold from which the calf was made by Aaron was obtained from the Israelites in the form of earrings; and, in reference to this the observation of Wilkinson is valuable, "The golden ornaments found in Egypt consist of rings, bracelets, armlets, necklaces, ear-rings, and numerous trinkets belonging to the toilet; many of these are of the times of Osirtasen I. and Thothmes III., contemporaries of Joseph and Moses." The same author shows that earrings were commonly worn in Egypt. Rings of gold were so common in Egypt, according to Rosellini, that they took, to a certain extent, the place of coin, and many times were used in trade. Besides the calf worshipped in the wilderness, we find, at a much later period, king Jeroboam setting up calves to be worshipped by the people in different parts of Palestine, particularly at Dan and Bethel. Both Aaron's and Jeroboam's calves were constructed of gold, which was the very metal used by the Egyptians in making the statues of their gods. In imitation of the Egyptians, also, Jeroboam had no sooner set up his idol-calves than, as Aaron had done, he ordained a feast or festival in honour of them. It is worthy of notice that Jeroboam does not select Shechem, the capital of his kingdom, as the seat of the calf-worship, but, as the Egyptians worshipped one ox-god at Memphis and the other at Heliopolis, so he set the one calf-god in Bethel and the other in Dan, at the two extremities of his kingdom.

Throughout the whole of the Sacred Scripture this species of idolatry is spoken of in terms of reproach. The idol-calves are termed devils in 2 Chron. xi. 15; and Hosea, on account of this idolatrous worship, calls Bethel—in chap. x. 5, 8—which means the House of God, by the name of Bethaven, that is, the house of vanity or wickedness. That the divine wrath was kindled against the Israelites for worshipping the golden calf is plain, from the fact that by the command of Moses the Levites put three thousand of them to death; and a pestilence was commissioned to destroy those who escaped the sword. The withered hand of Jeroboam was an evidence that his idolatry did not pass unpunished; and though he and many of his successors still adhered to calf-worship, the crime was not unavenged, for calamities the most severe and protracted were brought upon the whole nation.

Bryant, in his 'Mythology,' regards this form of idolatry as having originated in the ARK (See ARK-WORSHIP), which he regards as identical with the ox or calf. This, however, though maintained with much learning and acuteness, we cannot but regard as more ingenious than well-founded.

CALIGÆ, boots, or rather half-boots, which in ancient Roman warfare were worn by soldiers as a part of their military equipment, and in the early Christian church were worn by bishops as emblematical of that spiritual warfare in which they were engaged. The use of common shoes was censured as unbecoming. In A. D. 789, the priests were required to wear shoes made after the fashion prevailing at Rome. In the middle ages the priests wore in the summer a lighter kind of boots called æstivalia.

CALIPH, or KHALIF (Arab. Successor), the highest ecclesiastical dignity among the Saracens, or rather the supreme dignity among the Mohammedans, vested with absolute authority both in religious and political matters. The caliphs are regarded as the vicars or representatives of Mohammed. It is one of the titles of the Grand Signior of Turkey, as the successor of Mohammed, and it is also a title of the Sufi of Persia, as the successor of Ali. Being the imâm, or chief priest of islamism, it was the duty of the caliph to begin the public prayers in the principal mosque on Friday, and also to deliver the sermon. Afterwards the sermon was preached by an assistant, while the devotional exercises continued to be conducted by the caliph in person. He headed the pilgrims in their journey to Mecca, and led the armies of the empire to battle. The caliphs usually rode to the mosque on mules. At one of the windows of the caliph's palace there always hung a piece of black velvet, twenty cubits long, which reached to the ground and was called the caliph's sleeve, which the grandees of the court were wont to kiss every day with great respect. When Bagdad was taken by the Tartars and the caliphate destroyed, the Moham medan princes appointed each in his own dominions a special officer to discharge the spiritual functions of the caliph. The name of this officer in Turkey is MUFTI (which see), and in Persia he is called Sadue, being both of them officers vested with high spiritual authority. See next article.

CALIPHATE, the office of a caliph in Mohammedan countries. It continued from the death of Mohammed till the taking of Bagdad by the Tartars in the 655th year of the Hegira. Even after this period, the title was claimed by individuals in Egypt, who assumed to be of the family of the Abassides, and the successors of the Arabian prophet. Their authority, however, though to a certain extent acknowledged, was very limited in its nature, being entirely restricted to religious matters. The honour of being the true caliphs and successors of Mohammed is asserted at present by the emperors of Morocco to belong exclusively to them. The title, however, which they take, is that of grand-scheriffs.

CALISTA, a nymph of Diana in ancient Roman mythology, who, having been detected in an intrigue with Jupiter, is said to have been turned along with her child into bears. Both of them were afterwards transferred by Jupiter to the heavens as constellations, under the names of Ursa Major and Ursa Minor, the Greater and the Lesser Bears.

CALIXTINES (Lat. Calyx, a cup), a party of the Hussites, or followers of John Huss, in Bohemia, in the fifteenth century, who separated from their brethren on the question as to the use of the chalice or cup in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The council of Constance, A. D. 1418, had passed a decree, which was afterwards confirmed by the council of Trent, denying the cup to the laity, and limiting the communion, in both bread and wine, to the officiating priests alone. The fathers of the council found the utmost difficulty in reconciling the people particularly of Bohemia, to this prohibition, the version of Wycliffe's New Testament, and probably other versions in other languages, having been at this time widely circulated. One of the most learned Romish divines of the period wrote an elaborate treatise against 'Double Communion,' in which he sets it forth as one ground of his fears, that the denial of the cup to the laity would be unacceptable to the community generally, that "there are many laymen among the heretics who have a version of the Bible in the vulgar tongue, to the great prejudice and offence of the Catholic faith."

Before the decree of the council of Constance had passed, which declared the lawfulness of communion in one kind only—a practice which had crept into the church before it was ecclesiastically sanctioned—an active and zealous minister of the reforming party in Bohemia, Jacobel de Mise, began to preach publicly on the subject, proving incontestably from Scripture that all communicants were entitled to receive the eucharist in both kinds. This opinion was adopted and publicly supported by John Huss himself, and by a number of priests, with the full approbation of the people generally. The communion was dispensed in both kinds, accordingly, in several churches in Prague. The practice spread extensively throughout the kingdom, and several curates and vicars who disapproved of the use of the cup by the laity, found it necessary to excommunicate those of their people who adhered to the practice of the reforming party. The result was that a large party was formed, who, in A. D. 1419, repaired to a mountain, where they erected a tent in the form of a chapel, in which they performed divine service, and administered the communion to the people in both elements. From this interesting service, the Hussites termed the mountain Tabor, which, in the Bohemian language, means a tent, and hence the followers of Huss came to be called TABORITES (which see). The mountain where they had thus been privileged to assemble and partake of the communion in the precise manner which was in accordance with its original institution, became a favourite place of meeting. Large crowds assembled there for divine worship and the observance of the Lord's Supper. Dr. M'Crie mentions, in a short notice of the Taborites, that on one day there were present on Mount Tabor, as they called their meeting-place, above forty-two thousand people.

Notwithstanding this great movement in favour of Scriptural doctrine and practice among the reformed party in Bohemia, there were still, even among them, not a few who were unwilling to surrender some of those tenets and observances which the Romish Church had introduced. The dogma of transubstantiation, the celebration of the mass, and the practice of auricular confession, were retained by some of the Hussites, while they were discarded by others. The consequence was that a great schism took place among them, which, commencing in a diversity of opinion and practice, ended in an open rupture. The one party took the name of Calixtines, from their distinguishing tenet, that the cup ought not to be withheld from the laity in the sacrament of the supper; while the other party retained the name of Taborites, which had previously belonged to the whole united body. The old city of Prague, the capital of Bohemia, with the principal nobility, adhered to the Calixtines; the inhabitants of New Prague, with those who dwelt at Tabor and the neighbourhood, were the principal supporters of the other party. They were both united in their opposition to Rome and to the greater number of her unscriptural dogmas, but the effectiveness of their assaults against the common enemy was much diminished by their ecclesiastical separation from one another.

The Emperor Sigismund, successor to Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, had declared himself decidedly in favour of Rome, and against the Hussites. Three political parties at that time divided Bohemia: the Roman Catholics and the majority of the nobles, even those of them who adhered to the Calixtines, wished to retain Sigismund in the government; the party of Prague, supported by a large body of the Calixtines, were in favour of elevating another king to the throne; and the whole faction of the Taborites, with Ziska at their head, wished to have no king at all. The party of Prague proposed to offer the crown of their country to the king of Poland; and both the Calixtines and Taborites were at one in sanctioning and carrying out this proposal. Embassies were repeatedly despatched to Poland on the subject. The sovereign, who then occupied the throne of Poland, was Vladislav Jaguillon, grand duke of Lithuania, who had become a Christian on his marriage with Hedvige, queen of Poland, in A. D. 1386. When the offer of the crown of Bohemia was made to him, he was advanced in years, and being naturally of a somewhat irresolute character, some time elapsed before he came to a decision. At length he made up his mind to reject the offer, more especially as his acceptance of it was violently opposed by the Roman Catholic clergy of Poland, by whom the Hussites were regarded as dangerous heretics; but, in combination with his cousin, the grand duke of Lithuania, Jaguillon agreed to assist the Bohemians in their struggle against their own sovereign, who wished to hand them over to the tender mercies of Rome. Coributt, a nephew of the king of Poland, was despatched to the aid of the Hussites with five thousand cavalry and a sum of money. The arrival of Coributt with his Polish horsemen in Prague was a source of joy to the reforming party, but a cause of alarm to the adherents of the Emperor Sigismund. Having been educated in the Greek church, the gallant stranger was in no small favour with the Hussites, as he could conscientiously partake of the communion in both kinds, while the royal party industriously circulated the most unfavourable reports concerning him, as, for instance, that he was not baptized in the name of the Trinity, because he was a Russian, and an enemy to the Christian name. A strong party wished to elect Coributt king of Bohemia, but at length matters were so far compromised that he was constituted regent of the kingdom.

Meantime, the two parties into which the Hussites were divided, the Calixtines and the Taborites, came to an open disagreement. The nobles and nagistrates of Prague formed the resolution, in 1419, of treating with the Emperor. Ziska, the leader of the Taborites, declined to take a part in this treaty, and left Prague indignant at the conduct of the nobility. When Sigismund, however, attacked the city with a powerful army, Ziska returned to its defence. The circumstances which led to the separation of the two parties of the reforming faction are thus described by Dr. M'Crie: "While the Taborites resided in Prague on this occasion, they performed divine service according to the mode which appeared to them most scriptural. Their ministers wore their beards like other men, they had not the shaven crowns of the Popish priests, and they were dressed in clothes of a grey or brown colour. They did not repeat the canonical hours. They performed worship sometimes in the open air, sometimes in private houses, avoiding the churches, either because they were dedicated to saints, or because they were profaned by images. They observed none of the ceremonies of the mass. Before communicating, the whole assembly, kneeling, repeated the Lord's Prayer. After this, the minister who was to officiate, approached a table covered with white linen, upon which stood the bread and wine. The bread was cut or broken, for they did not use wafers. The wine was not in cups of gold or silver which had been consecrated, but in vessels of pewter, wood, or stone. The minister pronounced, with a loud voice, and in the vulgar tongue, the words of consecration. This being finished, he caused the other ministers present and the people to communicate. They did not elevate the eucharist after consecration, and consequently did not adore it; nor did they keep any of it till next day.

"This service, so simple, so novel, shocked the university and a great many of the priests in the city of Prague. They had banished the costly and superfluous ornaments of the service, but they retained all the other rites, and in particular used the canon of the mass. Zealous for the old ritual, they could not refrain from publicly exclaiming against the Taborites for their neglect of it. These, in their turn, blamed the Popish service as totally destitute of Scripture authority, and stigmatized those who stickled for it as Pharisees. The people mingled in the quarrel of their priests; one party approved the Calixtine rite, another preferred the Taborite. Some of the inhabitants refused to receive the communion from the hands of their priests, unless they laid aside their sacerdotal vestments; and the women, at the instigation of their husbands, hindered them from performing the service with their ornaments. It was in this manner that, in the year 1420, the sad division originated."

The principles of the Calixtines were perhaps more obviously opposed to those of the Romish church than might have been expected at that period. They required that the Word of God should be expounded to the people with all simplicity, and with a view to edification; that the communion should be dispensed in both kinds; that the clergy should devote themselves exclusively to their ministerial work, and strive to exhibit a holy and consistent example to their flocks, and that should any of them be guilty of violating the laws, they should be punished accordingly. They taught that the circumstantials of divine institutions were, in many cases, left to be regulated by human arrangement, and that the opinions of the fathers were only to be regarded when not contrary to Scripture.

Various conferences were held between the Calixtines and the Taborites, with a view, if possible, to come to a common understanding upon the disputed points. But all such meetings were ineffectual. They differed on several, even of the essential, doctrines of Christianity, but more especially on the eucharist. The Calixtines agreed with the Roman church on transubstantiation, and various other matters connected with the Lord's Supper, and only dissented from them on two points; they administered it under both elements, and they gave it to infants, justifying the practice by the statement of our blessed Lord, John vi. 53, "Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." The Calixtines continued for several years to maintain their peculiar tenets, but joined with the Taborites in opposing the encroachments of Rome. War had raged in Bohemia for a long period, and in 1433 the council of Basil, desirous of putting an end to the civil distractions of the country, invited the Bohemians to attend the council. They appeared at Constance to the number of three hundred men, and in name of their countrymen proposed the four following articles: (1.) Whoever would be saved must receive the eucharist in both kinds (2.) Temporal authority is forbidden to the clergy by the Divine law. (3.) The preaching of the Word of God should be free to every man. (4.) Public crimes must by no means go unpunished. On these points four Bohemian divines and four members of the council disputed for fifty days. The council answered their demands in so equivocal a manner that they abruptly broke off the negotiation and returned home. The Calixtines were disposed to close the war, but the Taborites sternly refused to yield. Afterwards Æneas Sylvius, who was sent into Bohemia by the council, succeeded in reconciling the Calixtines to the Roman see, by simply acceding to their wish on what they regarded as their grand distinctive point, the granting the use of the cup to the laity. See HUSSITES, TABORITES.

CALIXTINS, the followers of George Calixtus, a distinguished Lutheran theologian of the seventeenth century. He was born in 1586 at Melby in Holstein, and after a brilliant career as a divine and professor, he died in 1656. His treatises on the various points of controversy between Protestants and Romanists were considered as among the most acute, learned, and conclusive polemical writings of the time. He gave rise to a class of Christians who received the name of Syncretists, and who alleged that the points of difference between the Calvinists and Lutherans were of less importance than the doctrines in which they were agreed, and that the doctrine of the Trinity was less distinctly declared in the Old Testament than in the New. By the assertion of these opinions he exposed himself to the persecution of the Lutheran theologians, from whom, however, he was protected by the elector George I. of Saxony, at the diet of Ratisbon in 1655. The Calixtins endeavoured to unite the Romish, Calvinist, and Lutheran churches in the bonds of charity and mutual kindness, alleging that the fundamental doctrines of Christianity were preserved pure in all the three communions, and that the opinions of the first five centuries were to be held as of equal truth and authority with Scripture itself.

CALIZA, the ceremony among the Jews called "the loosing of the shoe," which is performed when an individual refuses to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed unto his brother. In such a case, it is decreed in Deut. xxv. 9, 10, "Then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." The ceremony is gone through in the following manner. Three Rabbis, accompanied by two witnesses, go out on the preceding evening, and agree upon a proper spot where the transaction is to take place. Next day, at the close of the morning service, the congregation repair to the locality fixed on, where the Rabbis call the widow and the brother-in-law before them, who, in the presence of the assembly, make a public declaration that the object of their appearance is to procure their freedom and discharge. The principal Rabbi examines the man, argues with him, and endeavours to prevail upon him to marry this his brother's widow. If he refuses to comply with the request, he is again subjected to an examination upon the point, and if still determined, he puts on a shoe which is too large for him, and the woman, attended by one of the Rabbis, repeats Deut. xxv. 7, "And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother." Then the brother-in-law immediately replies, "I like not to take her;" and upon this, the woman looses the shoe and takes it off, throwing it upon the ground with the utmost anger and disdain, repeating with the assistance of the Rabbi, "So shall it be done unto the man that will not build up his brother's house, and his name shall be called in Israel,

The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." This form of words she repeats thrice, and thrice the witnesses reply, "His shoe is loosed." The Rabbi now informs the widow that she is at liberty to marry whom she pleases, and if she requires a certificate to that effect, it is immediately granted. The permission to marry is called by the Jews Caliza. In ancient times a man was held in great respect who complied with the injunction to marry his brother's widow; but the custom is seldom followed among the modern Jews, who, when they marry their daughters to one of several brothers, are in the habit of requiring a previous contract to be drawn up, engaging that, in case of the husband's decease, the widow shall be set at liberty without relinquishing any of her pretensions. Some will oblige the husband if he happens to become dangerously ill, to grant his wife a divorce that her brother-in-law, after his decease, may have no claims upon her.

CALLIGENEIA, a surname of DEMETER or of GÆA (which see).

CALLIOPE, one of the nine muses in the ancient mythology of the Greeks and Romans. Calliope was the muse of epic poetry, and is usually represented with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper. See MUSES.

CALLIPHANA, a priestess of Velia, who was made a Roman citizen B. C. 98, preparatory to the Velienses obtaining the Roman franchise.

CALLIPYGOS, a surname of APHRODITE (which see).

CALLISTE, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Athens.

CALLISTEIA, a festival celebrated at Lesbos, at which females assembled in the temple of Hera, when the fairest received the prize of beauty. A contest of the same kind took place in Arcadia, and another among the Eleans, but in this last men only were permitted to contend for the prize of beauty.

CALOYERS, the general name applied to the monks of the Greek church. The word is taken from a Greek word kalogeroi, good old men. They follow universally the order of ST. BASIL (which see). They have among them three ranks or degrees: the Novices or Probationers, termed Archari; the Proficient, called Microchemi; and the Perfect, named Megalechemi. Such of them as read mass are properly named regular priests, who become in course of time Hieromonachi, sacred monks, and never officiate but on solemn festivals. The Caloyers are likewise divided into Cœnobites, Anchorets, and Recluses.

An applicant for the privilege of becoming a Caloyer makes known his wish, in the first instance, to the Hieromonachus. In former times, the Superior or Archimandrite, always examined the novice, and obliged him, by way of probation, to reside for three years in the convent, at the close of which period, his head was shaved in the form of a crown. This custom was established in the reign and by the appointment of the Emperor Justinian. Afterwards the year's probation was reduced to six months; the novice, however, was bound, though in a layman's habit, to practise for a considerable time the laws and constitutions of a monastic life. If, at the termination of the probationary period, he was determined to persevere in his original purpose, the superior accompanied him to church, where, after making solemn inquiry into the motives by which he was actuated in proposing to become a monk, he gave him the dress of his order, and, after reciting several prayers suited to the occasion, he cut off a lock of his hair, which he affixed with a piece of wax to the church wall close to the altar.

The Cœnobites were formerly under very strict discipline, which, however, is now much relaxed. Their chief employment from midnight to sunset is reciting their sacred office. The Anchores reside in private dwellings near the monasteries, spending their time through the week in cultivating a little spot of ground, and mingling their manual labours with frequent devotional exercises. The Recluses again, shut themselves up in grottos and caverns on the tops of mountains, and subsist wholly upon alms sent them from the neighbouring monasteries. Those of the Caloyers who reside in monasteries are engaged in the almost incessant repetition of prayers. They commence at midnight by reciting an office two hours in length, which from the time at which it is repeated is called the Mesonjection or midnight office. They then retire to their cells till five in the morning, when they repeat the terce, sext, and mass, after which they repair to the refectory, where a lecture is read till dinner. At four o'clock in the afternoon they say vespers; and at six go to supper, after which they recite an office called the Apodipho; and at eight each monk retires to his chamber for repose till midnight. Every day after matins they confess their faults on their knees to their superior.

The dress of the Caloyers is black, or at least dark brown, being a kind of cassock girt round about them with a surcingle or belt of the same colour. They wear also black, flat-crowned caps, with a piece of black cloth sewed to the lining, and hanging down upon the shoulders. The dress somewhat varies in the different classes of monks. The Achari, probationers or monks of the lowest order, wear nothing but a plain dark tunic made of coarse cloth. The professed monks, or Microchemi, wear a larger and much handsomer dress. The Perfect again, or Megalochemi, wear a full-sleeved gown and scapulary, and when they die are buried in these robes as the badges of their profession. In addition to the usual monastic dress, the Caloyers wear over their shoulders a square piece of stuff, on which are represented the cross, and the other marks of the passion of our Saviour, with these contracted words, J.C. X.C. N.C., that is, Jesus Christus vincit, Jesus Christ conquers.

Dr. Henderson, in his valuable edition of Buck's 'Theological Dictionary,' gives the most recent account of the monasteries in which the Greek monks reside: "The most considerable monastery of the Greek Caloyers in Asia, is that of Mount Sinai, which was founded by the Emperor Justinian, and endowed with sixty thousand crowns revenue. The abbot of this monastery, who is also an archbishop, has under him two hundred religious. This convent is a large square building, surrounded with walls fifty feet high, and with but one gate, which is blocked up to prevent the entrance of the Arabs. On the eastern side there is a window, through which those within draw up the pilgrims in a basket, which they let down by a pulley. Not many miles beyond this, they have another, dedicated to St. Catharine. It is situated in the place where Moses made the bitter waters sweet. It has a garden, with a plantation of more than ten thousand palm trees, from whence the monks draw a considerable revenue. There is another in Palestine, four or five leagues from Jerusalem, situated in the most barren place imaginable. The gate of the convent is covered with the skins of crocodiles, to prevent the Arabs setting fire to it, or breaking it to pieces with stones. It has a large tower, in which there is always a monk, who gives notice by a bell of the approach of the Arabs, or any wild beasts.

"The Caloyers, or Greek monks, have a great number of monasteries in Europe; among which that of Penteli, a mountain of Attica, near Athens, is remarkable for its beautiful situation, and a very good library. That of Callimachus, a principal town of the island of Chios, is remarkable for the occasion of its foundation. It is called Niamogni, i. e. the sole Virgin, its church having been built in memory of an image of the holy virgin, miraculously found on a tree, being the only one left of several which had been consumed by fire. Constantine Monomachus, emperor of Constantinople, being informed of this miracle, made a vow to build a church in that place, if he recovered his throne, from which he had been driven; which he executed in the year 1050. The convent is large, and built in the manner of a castle. It consists of about two hundred religious, and its revenues amount to sixty thousand piastres, of which they pay five hundred yearly to the grand seignior. There is in Amourga, one of the islands of the Archipelago, called Sporades, a monastery of Greek Caloyers, dedicated to the Virgin; it is a large and deep cavern, on the top of a very high hill, and is entered by a ladder of fifteen or twenty steps. The church, refectory, and cells of the religious who inhabit this grotto, are dug out of the sides of the rock with admirable artifice. But the most celebrated monasteries of Greek Caloyers are those of Mount Athos, in Macedonia. They are twenty-three in number; and the religious live in them so regularly, that the Turks themselves have a great esteem for them, and often recommend themselves to their prayers. Every thing in them is magnificent; and, notwithstanding they have been under the Turk for so long a time, they have lost nothing of their grandeur. The principal of these monasteries are De la Panagia and Anna Laura. The religious, who aspire to the highest dignities, come from all parts of the East to perform here their noviciate, and, after a stay of some years, are received, upon their return into their own country, as apostles. The Caloyers of Mount Athos have a great aversion to the Pope, and relate that a Roman pontiff, having visited their monasteries, had plundered and burned some of them, because they would not adore him."

In addition to the Caloyers or monks properly so called, there are also attached to each monastery a number of lay-brothers, who devote themselves to the cultivation of the ground that the regular monks may be undisturbed in their devotional exercises. Over all the Caloyers there are visitors or exarchs, who visit the convents under their inspection, with the principal, if not sole, design of collecting the taxes paid by the different monasteries to the patriarch. The Greek monasteries are in general very rich, particularly some of those on Mount Athos. There are also mendicant friars, who wander up and down the country receiving contributions for the support of their respective convents.

Besides the monasteries, various nunneries are found in which female Caloyers reside, and who, in the intervals of their devotional exercises, employ themselves in sewing and knitting useful articles of dress, which they sell to the Turks, who have free admission at particular periods for the purchase of the articles wrought by the nuns. These female Caloyers are many of them widows. They make no vow, and are not confined to the convent, which they may leave at any time. The abbot of the monastery to which the nunnery is attached, sends one of his most venerable monks to visit the nuns every day, and officiates for them as their priest and father confessor; but all other priests are forbidden under severe penalties to enter the nunneries. CALUMET, supposed to be derived from the French word chalumeau, a pipe, regarded by the North American Indians with the utmost veneration, viewed by them as a mystery, and as a present made by the Sun to mankind. The Calumet is thus described by La Potherie, who resided in Canada about the end of the seventeenth century. "It is a kind of very long pipe made of red stones, adorned with the heads of woodpeckers, and of a kind of ducks that perch upon trees. The head of those birds is of the finest scarlet in the world, and is beautified with fine feathers." In the middle of the tube or body of the Calumet, they hang or fix certain feathers, taken from the wings of a bird, which they call Kibou, a kind of eagle. They always dance the Calumet before they undertake any considerable enterprise. Father Hennepin gives us a much more accurate description of this instrument: 'The Calumet,' says he, 'is a great smoking-pipe, of red, white, or black marble. It is pretty much like a poll-axe; has a very smooth head, and the tube, which is about two feet and a-half long, is made of a pretty strong reed or cane, set off with feathers of all sorts of colours, with several mats made of woman's hair, variously interwoven. To this they fix two wings, which makes it something like Mercury's caduceus, or the wand which ambassadors of peace held formerly in their hands. They thrust this reed through the necks of huars, which are birds speckled with black and white, and about the bigness of our geese, or through the necks of the above-mentioned ducks. These ducks are of three or four different colours. Every nation adorns the Calumet, as custom, or their own fancy shall suggest. The Calumet is a passport to all who go to the allies of such nations as send it. It is a symbol of peace, and they are universally of opinion, that some great misfortune would befall any person who should violate the faith of it. It is the seal of all undertakings, of all important affairs, and public ceremonies.' La Hontan relates, that the 'tube of the Calumet is four or five feet long, and the body of this pipe is about eight inches (in diameter I suppose) and the bowl in which the tobacco is laid, three.'"

The North American Indians looked upon the sun as the lord of the universe, and they were wont to offer him tobacco, which they called smoking the sun. A religious ceremony of this nature is thus briefly noted by Picart: "The chiefs of the families assemble by day-break at the house of one of their principal men. The latter lights the Calumet, offers it thrice to the rising-sun, and waving it with both his hands according to its course, till he comes to the point from whence he first began, he addresses his prayers at the same time to the Sun, implores his protection, beseeches him to direct him in his undertakings, and recommends all the families of the canton or province to his care. After which the chief smokes in the Calumet, and presents it to the assembly, in order that every member of it may smoke the Sun in his turn." This ceremony is never performed but on important occasions.

Travellers tell us that the North American Indians have their Calumet of war, and their Calumet of peace, which are known from each other by the difference of the feathers. Whenever a people, whose herald has left the Calumet with another people, is attacked by an enemy, that which received it is bound to stand by the invaded nation. In case a mediator, in the heat of the battle, presents the Calumet, there immediately follows a suspension of hostilities; and if both sides accept of it, and smoke out of the Calumet, a peace is immediately concluded. La Potherie informs us, that by red feathers on the Calumet assistance is denoted; white and grey mixed signify a solid peace and an offer of assistance, not only to those to whom the Calumet is presented, but also to their allies. A Calumet that is red on one side, and white and grey mingled together on the other, has a double meaning, either for war or peace, according to the side which is turned. The Calumet dance is often called the Indian war-dance. The following account of it as given by an old traveller, may be interesting: "They surround the hall-room with branches of trees, and spread a great mat made of bulrushes, painted with several colours, and place on this mat, which serves for a carpet, the maniton, or tutelary deity, of the person who gives the dance. They place the Calumet to the right hand of this god; for this festival is celebrated in his honour, or it is he at least that presides at the ceremony; and they raise round the Calumet a trophy of bows, arrows, clubs, and axes. After having thus disposed things in their order, and a little before the dance begins, that is to say, as the assembly grows more and more numerous, they go and salute the deity. This homage consists in perfuming him with tobacco. The finest voices are allowed the best seats, and the rest range themselves in a ring under the trees, all of them in a sitting posture. One of the chief in the assembly takes up the Calumet, in a very respectful manner, and holding it in both his hands, dances in cadence, himself dancing at the same time, observing always to keep time with his fingers. All the motions of the Calumet are odd and whimsical, and have perhaps their meaning. They sometimes show it to the assembly, then present it to the sun, and often hold it towards the ground; they extend its wings, as if they were going to set it a flying; lastly, they bring it near the mouths of those present, as if they were going to give them the Calumet to kiss. This is the first act of that rejoicing, which we may call a religious festival. They afterwards have a combat, to which they are animated by the sound of drums, or a kind of kettle-drum; and the voices sometimes sing in chorus with the warlike instrument. Then the savage, who has the Calumet in his hand, invites some young champion to take up the weapons that are hid under the mat, and challenges him to fight with him; when the young warrior taking his bow, his arrows, and axe, attacks him who has the Calumet in his hand. The combat is fought in cadence, when the Calumet, which at first seemed to quit the field, is declared to be victorious. They were certain that fate would declare in its favour. The third act of the ceremony relates entirely to the conqueror of the young warrior. He relates his military achievement to the assembly, striking with a club upon a post that is fixed in the centre of the circle, at the conclusion of every incident, as La Hontan assures us; and when he has no more to say, the president of the assembly makes him a present of a fine robe of beaver skin; after which the Calumet is given into the hands of another savage, and from thence to a third, and so on till the whole assembly have performed the same ceremony. If the Calumet is danced upon account of an alliance, the president concludes the ceremony, by presenting the Calumet to the deputies of the nation with whom the alliance is made." When the Calumet of peace is brought to an Indian village, all the villagers, especially the young persons, dance round the person bringing it. In short, whenever anything of importance is to be performed, the Calumet occupies a prominent place in the matter.

CALVIN (JOHN), the celebrated French reformer, was born 10th July 1509, at Noyon in Picardy. Born of respectable parents, he received a somewhat liberal education in early life, and enjoyed the privilege of studying several years at the College-de-la-Marche in Paris under the tuition of Maturin Cordier, one of the distinguished scholars of his day. Reared from infancy in the Romish faith, he entertained a warm attachment to its ritual, and a natural aversion to those heretical opinions which had already given rise to a bitter persecution. But while young Calvin was at heart a keen Romanist, he gave early symptoms of being influenced by firm conscientiousness and careful attention to the most scrupulous morality. Among his fellow-students, indeed, he was conspicuous for assiduous devotion to study, and for a rare combination of acuteness and profundity of genius. He was afterwards sent to the college of the Capettes, founded in the city of Noyon. Here he spent his whole time in study, and having shown from infancy a peculiar inclination towards sacred pursuits, his father early destined him for the church. At that period it was a common practice to confer ecclesiastical titles and revenues on children. Accordingly, when only about twelve years of age, John Calvin was invested with the chaplaincy of La Gesine. On the eve of Corpus Christi day, the bishop solemnly cut off the child's hair, and by this ceremony of the tonsure, Calvin was admitted into the number of the clergy, and became capable of entering into holy orders, and of holding a benefice without residing on the spot. Two years after this the city of Noyon was visited with a severe pestilence, which cut off many of the citizens. The father of the young chaplain, desirous to remove his son from the scene of danger and death, sought leave of absence for him during the plague, and, having obtained it, Calvin was sent to Paris to prosecute his studies still farther. While resident in the capital, he found a home in the house of an uncle, Richard Canvin, where he applied himself to his studies with the utmost assiduity, and made great progress in the Latin language and literature. The friends of the Reformation had already become numerous in France as well as in Germany, and the fires of persecution were burning with fearful intensity. It was not likely that the thoughtful and penetrating mind of the young student could fail to reflect on the points of controversy between the Romanists and the Reformed. But whatever may have been his internal struggles, he still tenaciously adhered to his early faith, and at the age of twenty he obtained, through the influence of his father, the rectory of Pont L'Eveque at Noyon, and a benefice in the cathedral church. For a short time he held this double appointment, and officiated as a Romish priest in his native town. He was not long, however, in resigning his sacred office, with the consent, and, as it would appear, by the advice of his father. He now applied his mind to the study of the civil law at Orleans, under a lawyer of great eminence, Pierre de l'Etoile. This sudden change of pursuit might have appeared strange, had we not reason to believe that the mind of the young French curé had been gradually undergoing an important revolution. By the careful study of the Scriptures, accompanied with deep meditation and earnest prayer, he had become convinced of the erroneous character of many of the Romish dogmas, and feeling that he could no longer conscientiously minister at the altars of a church which he believed to be resting on an unscriptural foundation, he renounced all connection with it, and devoted himself meanwhile to secular studies. In the interesting department of law he made rapid proficiency; but still more rapid was his progress in Scriptural knowledge. He made no secret in his letters to his friends of the change which had taken place in his religious views. Many of the reformed resorted to him for advice and instruction. He passed to Paris, and there he distinguished himself in literature by publishing, at the early age of twenty-four, a commentary on Seneca's celebrated treatise on clemency. The reformed cause had secured for itself numerous warm friends in the French capital, and Calvin identified himself with the most zealous and active among them. Nicholas Cop, in particular, who was summoned before the authorities to answer for having exposed the errors of the national religion, was his intimate friend and associate. This naturally awakened the suspicions of the Roman Catholic clergy, who were preparing to apprehend him, when he fled from Paris, and threw himself upon the protection of the Queen of Navarre, at whose intercession with the French government the storm of persecution was quelled.

Calvin had not yet formally renounced his connection with the Church of Rome; but the fierce and bloody persecutions by which Francis I. sought to extirpate the reformed party in France, revolted the mind of the young and pious partisan of the reformed opinions to such an extent, that he resolved to abandon a church which could sanction the torture and even the death of many of the most eminent and pious in the land. Quitting France, Calvin proceeded to Basle in Switzerland, where he published his 'Christian Institutes,' which has occupied down to the present day a pre-eminent place in theological literature, as a standard work on the leading doctrines of the Christian system. This admirable view of Scriptural truth he dedicated to Francis I., as an indignant reproof of his persecuting spirit towards the warm and consistent friends of Christian truth.

About this period the light of the Reformation began to dawn in Italy, and Calvin, hearing the glad news, hastened to that country that he might urge on the glorious work; and, assisted by the Duchess of Ferrara, who had embraced the Protestant faith, he was instrumental in diffusing the knowledge of the Gospel. From Italy he passed to France, where, after settling some domestic matters, he set out with the intention of travelling to Basle or Strasburg; but, in consequence of the war which was then raging along his proposed route, his steps were providentially directed to Geneva, the city which was destined to be the scene of his useful and energetic labours in the cause of Christ throughout the whole of his future life.

The great French reformer reached Geneva in the autumn of 1536. It was an interesting period. The gospel had already found its way into the city, having been faithfully preached for a short time by William Farel and Peter Viret. "In 1532," says D'Aubigne, "Geneva became the focus of the light, and the Reformation, which was here essentially French, was established on the shores of the Leman lake, and gained strength in every quarter." The arrival of such a man at such a time lent new energy and life to the reformed movement. Farel insisted that he should take up his abode in the city, and help forward the good cause. Calvin yielded to earnest solicitation, and immediately he commenced the duties of an active and laborious ministry which was remarkably owned of God. The lax morality which prevailed around him was rebuked by the strictness and consistency of his whole conversation and conduct. In conjunction with Farel and Viret he opposed the re-establishment of superstitious ceremonies and feasts. The Romanists were enraged at the zeal and success of the reformed pastors, and compelled them to quit Geneva, when Calvin found refuge in Strasburg, where he was appointed a professor of theology, and pastor of a French church. His labours in the city he had left, brief though they had been, were attended with marked success. He had published a formulary of doctrine and a catechism, and at his instigation, the citizens of Geneva had, on the 20th July 1539, openly abjured the errors of Popery, and declared their formal adherence to the Reformed faith. After he had gone to Strasburg, Calvin still continued to maintain a regular correspondence by letter with his former friends. The reformed churches, both in Switzerland and Germany, felt the banishment of the Genevan pastors to be a sore discouragement. Urgent remonstrances were made against this arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the authorities of the city, but to no effect. They obstinately refused to recall the sentence of banishment which they had passed.

Meanwhile Calvin was diligently and zealously prosecuting his work both as a professor and minister in Strasburg. His fame as a theologian was every day on the increase. His labours were much appreciated, and the civil authorities of the place lent him encouragement and support. While resident there, he republished his 'Christian Institutes' in an enlarged form, a 'Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans,' and a treatise on the Lord's Supper. About the same time, at the suggestion of Bucer, he married Idolette de Bure, the widow of a leader among the Anabaptists. In 1540 he was invited to return to Geneva, but it was not until September of the following year, that he yielded to the repeated and pressing invitations of the citizens and council; and, quitting Strasburg with reluctance, where his labours had been so remarkably blessed, he took up his abode again in Geneva, and there officiated with great perseverance, zeal, prudence, and disinterestedness, till his death in 1564. Before consenting to return, he laid it down as a necessary condition that the Presbyterian form of church government should be formally adopted by the Genevan churches. In accordance with his wish, therefore, the senate passed a decree to that effect. All week-day fasts and festivals were now abolished. The pastors were required by the consistory not only to preach the gospel, but to visit and catechise their flocks with diligence and regularity. Calvin himself was abundant in useful labours, far beyond what the physical constitution of most men could have endured. He preached one whole week in every two, lectured three times every week, presided every Thursday at the meeting of the consistory, of which he was the perpetual president or moderator, and on every Friday he expounded a portion of sacred Scripture to his congregation. Besides, he wrote commentaries on many of the books of Scripture, published various polemical works of great ability, and conducted a most extensive private correspondence. His house was the frequent resort of men of learning and piety from all quarters; and such was the affability and kindness of this great and good man, that his counsel and advice were never sought in vain. To those in particular who were persecuted for conscience' sake, he was ever ready to tender his assistance. In Geneva they found an asylum, and in the house of Calvin a home.

On one point have the enemies of Calvin fixed, as detracting not a little from the high and otherwise unsullied reputation of the great Reformer. We refer to the connection which he is alleged to have had with the persecution and death of Michael Servetus. For more than a century and a half have both Romish and Protestant writers laid the death of the heretic at the door of Calvin; and so much mystery has hung over the whole transaction, that even the most ardent admirers of the Reformer have found it difficult satisfactorily to exculpate him. Recently, however, documents have come to light which have happily set the long-disputed question completely at rest. M. Albert Rilliet, a Unitarian clergyman of Geneva, has discovered the original records of the trial of Servetus before the "Little Council of Geneva," and published, in 1844, a small treatise on the subject, which has been recently translated from the French, with notes and additions, by Dr. Tweedie. In this seasonable production, sufficient evidence is adduced to free Calvin from the slanderous imputation under which he has so long laboured, of being, to no small extent, instrumental in procuring the condemnation to capital punishment of this arch-heretic. After a careful and detailed examination of the whole circumstances as given in the original records, Rilliet arrives at the conclusion that Servetus was "condemned by the majority of his judges, not at all as the opponent of Calvin, scarcely as a heretic, but essentially as seditious." His sentiments, as appears from the evidence brought forward, particularly towards the close of the trial, were not only of an infidel and blasphemous character, but seditious and revolutionary. It was the latter aspect of his sentiments that chiefly, if not exclusively, led to his being burnt at the stake. The court which tried the case was a civil, not an ecclesiastical tribunal; and Calvin, besides not being a member of the council, was even excluded from political rights along with the other clergy, by being denied a seat in the "council-general." Moreover, Servetus was not condemned by Calvin's adherents in the "Little Council," they themselves being a small minority, and wholly unable to control the decision of the body. The stain, therefore, which has long unjustly attached to one of the ablest and most esteemed of the leaders of the Reformation, must be considered as now wholly removed, by the publication, at the late period, of the authentic documents which Rilliet has providentially brought to light.

Through the fame and the influence of this distinguished theologian, the Genevan church rapidly increased in numbers, and was looked upon as the centre-point of the reformed cause. At his suggestion a college was established by the senate in 1558, in which he and Theodore Beza, along with others of great erudition and high talents, were the teachers. This seat of learning soon acquired so great fame that students resorted to it from England, Scotland, France, Italy, and Germany, in pursuit of sacred as well as secular learning. By this meant the principles of the Reformation spread widely over the various countries of Europe. To John Calvin the Protestant churches must ever owe a deep debt of gratitude, and, among Presbyterians in particular, his memory will be embalmed, as having given to their system of church polity the weight of his influence and great name. See next article.

CALVINISTS, those who have adopted the peculiar theological sentiments of the illustrious French reformer. The opinions of John Calvin were first promulgated by him in the city of Geneva, and thence they were carried into Germany, France, the United Provinces, and Britain, and have since been adopted by almost all evangelical Christian churches throughout the world. In opposition to the doctrines laid down by Calvin in a systematic form in his 'Institutes,' ARMINIUS (which see), a Dutch divine of eminence, taught a system of theology which is known by the name of its originator (See ARMINIANS), and which denied the main points of the Calvinistic theology. The contention which thus arose between the two opposite systems of doctrine, led to the Synod of Dort being convened in 1618, and at this celebrated ecclesiastical convention, the theological tenets of Calvin were approved, digested, and systematized, thus establishing Calvinism as a regular form of theological belief, the substance of which is to be found in the writings of the great Reformer. Calvinists, however, maintain that their opinions, instead of originating with Calvin, were long before set forth in the writings of Augustine, and are in fact to be found embodied in the Word of God.

Calvinists have been usually considered as divided into three parties, which are known by the name of Hyper-Calvinists, Strict Calvinists, and Moderate Calvinists. The first, or Hyper-Calvinists, are nearly identical with ANTINOMIANS (which see). The Strict Calvinists follow the sentiments of Calvin himself and of the Synod of Dort. The Moderate or modern Calvinists, again, differ both from Calvin and the Synod of Dort on two points—the doctrine of reprobation, and the extent of the death of Christ.

The Strict Calvinists, then, are the true representatives in opinion of the great Reformer on the leading points of Christian doctrine. To commence with the first of the five points, we would call the attention of the reader to the much-disputed doctrine of predestination, or the eternal purpose of God, according to which he fore-ordains whatsoever comes to pass. The word, however, is often limited to those purposes of which the spiritual and eternal state of man is the object, or, in other words, it includes the doctrines of election and reprobation. "Predestination," says Calvin, "we call the eternal decree of God, by which he hath determined in himself what he would have to become of every individual of mankind. For they are not all created with a similar destiny, but eternal life is fore-ordained for some, and eternal damnation for others. Every man therefore, being created for one or the other of these ends, we say he is predestinated either to life or to death."

The same doctrine is thus exhibited in a more expanded and detailed form in the articles of the Synod of Dort.

"As all men have sinned in Adam, and have become exposed to the curse and eternal death, God would have done no injustice to any one, if he had determined to leave the whole human race under sin and the curse, and to condemn them on account of sin; according to those words of the apostle, 'All the world is become guilty before God.' Rom. iii. 19, 23; vi. 23. . . .

"That some, in time, have faith given them by God, and others have it not given, proceeds from his eternal decree; for 'known unto God are all his works from the beginning,' &c. (Acts xv. 18; Eph. i. 11.) According to which decree he graciously softens the hearts of the elect, however hard, and he bends them to believe; but the non-elect he leaves, in just judgment, to their own perversity and hardness. And here, especially, a deep discrimination, at the same time both merciful and just, a discrimination of men equally lost, opens itself to us; or that decree of election and reprobation which is revealed in the Word of God; which, as perverse, impure, and unstable persons do wrest to their own destruction, so it affords ineffable consolation to holy and pious souls.

"But election is the immutable purpose of God, by which, before the foundations of the earth were laid, he chose out of the whole human race—fallen by their own fault from their primeval integrity into sin and destruction—according to the most free good pleasure of his own will, and of mere grace, a certain number of men, neither better nor worthier than others, but lying in the same misery with the rest, to salvation in Christ, whom he had even from eternity constituted Mediator and Head of all the elect, and the foundation of salvation; and, therefore, he decreed to give them unto him to be saved, and effectually to call and draw them into communion with him by his word and Spirit; or he decreed himself to give unto them true faith, to justify, to sanctify, and at length powerfully to glorify them, &c. Eph. i. 4—6; Rom. viii. 30.

"This same election is not made from any foreseen faith, obedience of faith, holiness, or any other good quality or disposition, as a pre-requisite cause or condition in the man who should be elected, &c. 'He hath chosen us (not because we were) but that we might be holy,' &c. Eph. i. 4; Rom. ix. 11—13; Acts xiii. 48.

"Moreover, holy Scripture doth illustrate and commend to us this eternal and free grace of our election, in this more especially, that it doth testify all men not to be elected; but that some are non-elect or passed by in the eternal election of God, whom truly God, from most free, just, irreprehensible, and immutable good pleasure, decreed to leave in the common misery, into which they had, by their own fault, cast themselves; and not to bestow on them living faith and the grace of conversion; but having been left in their own ways, and under just judgment, at length, not only on account of their unbelief, but also of all their other sins, to condemn and eternally punish them, to the manifestation of his own justice. And this is the decree of reprobation, which determines that God is in no wise the author of sin (which, to be thought of, is blasphemy), but a tremendous, incomprehensible, just Judge and Avenger."

In opposition to all this, Arminians deny absolute and unconditional decrees, and maintain that the decrees of God respecting men have been founded upon the foresight of their conduct. They hold that God, having foreseen, without any decree, that Adam would involve himself and his posterity in sin and its consequences, purposed to send his Son to die for the whole fallen race of mankind, and to give them sufficient grace to improve the means of salvation; and knowing beforehand who would believe and persevere to the end and who would not, he chose the former to eternal life, and left the latter in a state of condemnation.

Calvinists differ from Arminians in so far as election is concerned, mainly on the point as to the ground on which election proceeds in the divine decree. The former believe the choice of certain persons from all eternity to everlasting life, to be an act of pure sovereignty on the part of God; while the latter as firmly believe that it proceeds upon the ground of their foreseen qualifications. In other words, the Calvinists assert the decree to be unconditional, and the Arminians, on the other hand, maintain that it was conditional. On this important question Scripture is explicit. It ascribes election wholly to grace, to the exclusion of works, and these two grounds of election are represented as incompatible and mutually destructive. Thus, Rom. xi. 5, 6, "Even so then, at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace. And if by grace, then it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work." Besides, it is worthy of special notice that faith and holiness, which the Arminians make the ground of election, are expressly declared in Scripture to be its effects. This is plainly taught in Eph. i. 4, "According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love." And in Rom. ix. 10—13, the apostle Paul produces the case of Jacob and Esau as an illustration of the truth that the election of individuals, whether to happiness or misery, is to be traced to divine sovereignty, altogether irrespective of their works: "And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated."

Another point in reference to election on which Calvinists are at variance with Arminians, regards the immutability of the divine decree. The doctrine of Arminius and his followers was, that the purposes of God are subject to change, so that an individual who is one of the elect to-day may become one of the reprobate to-morrow. Calvin, and all who adopt his system of theology, believe, on the contrary, that the purpose of God in regard to his elect people cannot be reversed, being immutable. On this point, also, the Word of God utters no uncertain sound. Our Saviour, in his intercessory prayer, declares concerning his followers, John xvii. 6, 12, "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word. While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name: those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the scripture might be fulfilled." And the intimate and indissoluble connection which exists between election and final salvation is set forth in these explicit words, Rom. viii. 30, "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified."

Another distinctive article of the Calvinistic creed is the doctrine of reprobation, or that act of God by which, while, from all eternity he elected some, he rejected others. This mysterious doctrine is not only denied by Arminians, but also by some who are known by the name of Moderate or Modern Calvinists. On this point Calvin himself says, referring to the apostle's reasoning upon the case of Jacob and Esau: "Now, with respect to the reprobate whom the apostle introduces in the same place:—as Jacob, without any merit yet acquired by good works, is made an object of grace, so Esau, while yet unpolluted by any crime, is accounted an object of hatred, Rom. ix. 13. If we turn our attention to works, we insult the apostle, as though he saw not that which is clear to us: now that he saw none is evident, because he expressly asserts the one to have been elected, and the other rejected, while they had not yet done any good or evil, to prove the foundation of Divine predestination not to be in works.—Secondly, when he raises the question, whether God is unjust, he never urges, what would have been the most absolute and obvious defence of his justice, that God rewarded Esau according to his wickedness; but contents himself with a different solution,—that the reprobate are raised up for this purpose, that the glory of God may be displayed by their means.—Lastly, he subjoins a concluding observation, that 'God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.' You see how he attributes both to the mere will of God. If, therefore, we can assign no reason why he grants mercy to his people, because such is his pleasure, neither shall we find any other cause but his will for the reprobation of others: for when God is said to harden, or show mercy to whom he pleases, men are taught by this declaration to seek no cause besides his will."

The doctrine of reprobation necessarily follows from that of election. The two words are correlative terms, so that it is impossible for any man intelligently to believe in election and yet deny reprobation. When of a number of individuals some are chosen, it follows of course that the rest are rejected. But we are not left to mere deduction on the subject. The Calvinist confidently appeals to Scripture. If the names of some are said in the Word of God to be "written in the book of life," we read also of others whose names are "not written." If we find an apostle speaking of "vessels of mercy," we find him also speaking in the same passage of "vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction." And reprobation, as well as election, is traced by the Calvinists to the sovereign will of God. On this point, the following judicious remarks are made by Dr. Dick, in his 'Lectures on Theology:' "If we inquire into the reason why God passed over some in his eternal decree, while he extended mercy to others, we must content ourselves with the words of our Lord, which were spoken in reference to the execution of his purpose:—'Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.' It may be supposed, indeed, that we need not resolve the decree of reprobation into the sovereignty of God, as a sufficient reason, for it may be found in the moral character of its objects, who, being considered as fallen and guilty creatures, may be presumed to have been rejected on this account. But although this may seem at first sight to have been the cause of their reprobation, yet upon closer attention we shall see reason to change our opinion. It is obvious that, if they had not been considered as fallen, they would not have been rejected, unless we adopt the Supralapsarian hypothesis, which affirms that they were viewed only as creatures, and that, by that uncontrolled power which may make one vessel to dishonour, and another to honour, their appointment to perdition, for the glory of Divine justice, was prior to the purpose to permit them to fall. There is something in this system repugnant to our ideas of the character of God, whom it represents rather as a despot, than the Father of the universe. But, although their fall is pre-supposed to their reprobation, it will appear that the former was not the reason of the latter, if we recollect that those, who were chosen to salvation, were exactly in the same situation. Both classes appeared in the eyes of God to be guilty, polluted, and worthy of death. Their sinfulness, therefore, could not be the reason of rejection in the one case, since it did not cause rejection in the other. If it was the reason why some were passed by, it would have been a reason why all should be passed by. As, then, it did not hinder the election of some, it could not be the cause which hindered the election of others. You ought not to think that there is too much refinement and subtlety in this reasoning. If you pay due attention to the subject, you will perceive that, as the moral state of all was the same, it could not be the cause of the difference in their destination. If there was sin in the reprobate, there was sin also in the elect; and we must therefore resolve their opposite allotment into the will of God, who gives and withholds his favour according to his pleasure: 'He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.'"

Such, then, is a rapid view of the first of the five points distinctively held by Calvinists—election and its correlative reprobation.

The second essential doctrine maintained by Calvinists is what is known by the name of particular redemption, implying that the death of Christ, as an atonement for the guilty, had not a mere general efficacy, as the Arminians allege, but a special and particular application to the elect alone. In other words, Christ died not for all men, but for those alone who were given to him by the Father. This point is thus explained by the synod of Dort: "God willed that Christ, through the blood of the cross, should, out of every people, tribe, nation, and language, efficaciously redeem all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation, and given to him by the Father." And the same doctrine is taught in numerous passages of the Sacred Scriptures. Jesus himself alleges, in his intercessory prayer, that he has received power over all flesh for this end, "that he might give eternal life to as many as" the Father "had given him." And again, John xvii. 6, "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word." Still further limiting the efficacy of his intercession to a certain class, and thus declaring his atonement on which his intercession was founded to be equally limited, he says, ver. 9, 10, "I pray for them; I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine. And all mine are thine, and thine are mine; and I am glorified in them." Jesus also expressly calls himself the "good Shepherd, who giveth his life for the sheep," and that we may be at no loss as to the character of his sheep as a limited class, he adds, John x. 27, 28, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand."

It is not to be denied that there are some passages in the New Testament which seem to militate against the doctrine of a limited atonement, and a particular redemption, which Calvinists so strenuously maintain. But it is equally undeniable, that there are other passages which represent the design of Christ's death as limited. Both classes of passages are, however, quite capable of being harmonized, as has been already shown in another article. (See ATONEMENT CONTROVERSY.) It must never be forgotten that the sacred writers must not be always understood as using universal terms in the strict unqualified sense; thus the world sometimes signifies a part of the world, and all is put frequently for many. It is not by such terms, therefore, that we are to determine the extent of the atonement, but by a careful consideration of the whole case in its entire aspect and bearings.

The third leading point of the Calvinistic system asserts the moral inability of man to do what is good and acceptable in the sight of God; or, as it is expressed in the Westminster Confession of Faith, "Man, by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all ability to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as a natural man, being altogether averse from that good, and dead in sin, is not able, by his own strength, to convert himself, or prepare himself thereunto." This doctrine is thus stated by the synod of Dort: "All men are conceived in sin and born the children of wrath, unfit for (inepti) all saving good, inclined to evil, dead in sin, and the slaves of sin; and without the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit they neither are willing nor able to return to God, to correct their depraved nature, or to dispose themselves to the correction of it." In support of the doctrine of moral inability, Calvinists adduce many passages of the Word of God. They point to the description given in the Mosaic records of the actual state of mankind before the flood, Gen. vi. 5, "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." And again, immediately after the flood, Gen. viii. 21, "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." The language of David concerning himself is equally explicit, Psalm li. 5, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." Job also, speaking of the frailty and misery of man, says, xiv. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one." How often do we find the necessity of regeneration urged in the Sacred Writings: "Marvel not," says our Lord to Nicodemus, "that I said unto you, you must be born again." We are called upon by an apostle to "put off the old man, and put on the new." We are said to be "saved not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." And the very apostle who thus testifies to the necessity of a radical change in the whole nature of man if he is ever to obtain eternal salvation, adds his own personal testimony to his utter inability to think even one good thought as of himself, Rom. vii. 18—21, "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me."

The Calvinistic doctrine of man's moral inability to do of himself, and without Divine assistance, what is good in God's sight, has given rise to many objections on the part of Arminians, Socinians, and others. For instance, the question has been often asked, Does not this doctrine make the Creator the author of sin in the creature? The reply to this question may be given in the words of President Edwards, as quoted from his work on the 'Freedom of the Will:' "They who object that this doctrine makes God the author of sin, ought distinctly to explain what they mean by that phrase, the author of sin. I know the phrase, as it is commonly used, signifies something very ill. If by the author of sin be meant, the sinner, the agent, or actor of sin, or the doer of a wicked thing; so it would be a reproach or blasphemy to suppose God to be the author of sin. In this sense I utterly deny God to be the author of sin; rejecting such an imputation on the Most High, as what is infinitely to be abhorred; and deny any such thing to be the consequence of what I have laid down. But if, by the author of sin is meant the permitter, or not a hinderer of sin; and, at the same time, a disposer of the state of events, in such a manner, for wise, holy, and most excellent ends and purposes, that sin, if it be permitted or not hindered, will most certainly and infallibly follow; I say, if this be all that is meant, by being the author of sin, I do not deny that God is the author of sin, (though I dislike and reject the phrase, as that which by use and custom is apt to carry another sense) it is no reproach for the Most High to be thus the author of sin. This is not to be the actor of sin; but, on the contrary, of holiness." And, pursuing this line of argument, the same profound writer continues,—"That there is a great difference between God's being concerned thus, by his permission, in an event and act, which, in the inherent subject and agent of it, is sin (though the event will certainly follow on his permission), and his being concerned in it by producing it and exerting the act of sin: or between this being the order of its certain existence by not hindering it, under certain circumstances, and his being the proper actor or author of it, by a positive agency or efficiency. As there is a vast difference between the sun's being the cause of the lightness and warmth of the atmosphere, and brightness of gold and diamonds, by its presence and positive influence, and its being the occasion of darkness and frost in the night by its motion, whereby it descends below the horizon. The motion of the sun is the occasion of the latter kind of events, but it is not the proper cause efficient or producer of them, though they are necessarily consequent on that motion, under such circumstances; no more is any action of the divine Being the cause of the evil of men's wills. If the sun were the proper cause of cold and darkness, it would be the fountain of these things, as it is the fountain of light and heat, and then something might be argued from the nature of cold and darkness, to a likeness of nature in the sun; and it might be justly inferred, that the sun itself is dark and cold, and that his beams are black and frosty. But from its being the cause no otherwise than by its departure, no such thing can be inferred, but the contrary; it may justly be argued, that the sun is a bright and hot body, if cold and darkness are found to be the consequence of its withdrawal; and the more constantly and necessarily these effects are connected with, and confined to its absence, the more strongly does it argue the sun to be the fountain of light and heat. So, inasmuch as sin is not the fruit of any positive agency or influence of the Most High, but, on the contrary, arises from the withholding of his action and energy, and under certain circumstances, necessarily follows on the want of his influence; this is no argument that he is sinful; or his operation evil, or has any thing of the nature of evil; but, on the contrary, that He, and his agency, are altogether good and holy, and that He is the fountain of all holiness. It would be strange arguing, indeed, because men never commit sin, but only when God leaves them to themselves, and necessarily sin, when he does so, and, therefore, their sin is not from themselves, but from God; and so, that God must be a sinful being; as strange as it would be to argue, because it is always dark when the sun is gone, and never dark when the sun is present, that therefore all darkness is from the sun, and that his disc and beams must needs be black."

The fourth characteristic point of Calvinism is the doctrine of irresistible, or rather invincible, grace, which implies that although for a time grace operating in the soul may be resisted and opposed, it cannot finally be resisted, but will ultimately render the sinner willing in the day of Jehovah's power. This doctrine, indeed, necessarily follows from that of the omnipotence of God. His power none can effectually withstand. He can not only subdue the most refractory and disobedient, but he can take away the spirit of opposition, and so influence the hearts of men, that their submission shall become voluntary. To assert otherwise would be to take the work of conversion out of the hand of God, and commit it to man himself, thus contradicting the statement of the Redeemer, "No man cometh unto me except the Father which hath sent me draw him." God is expressly said to work in us not only to do, but "to will," as well as "to do according to his good pleasure;" and, accordingly, "He worketh in us the work of faith with power." We "are saved by faith, and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God."

The chief objection urged against irresistible grace, as maintained by Calvinists, is, that such a doctrine goes to destroy man's free agency, converting him into a mere machine. An objection of this kind might have some force were man compelled by an external force to do something against his will. But the power of grace is of a totally different description. It operates not externally, but internally; not in opposition to our mental constitutions, but in complete harmony with them; leading us to act not against our wills, but with their entire concurrence. "True liberty," as Dr. Dick remarks, when speaking on this subject, "consists in doing what we do, with knowledge and from choice; and such liberty is not only consistent with conversion, but essential to it; for if a man turn to God at all, he must turn with his heart. God does not lead us to salvation without consciousness, like stones transported from one place to another; nor without our consent, like slaves who are driven to their task by the terror of punishment. He conducts us in a manner suitable to our rational and moral nature. He so illuminates our minds, that we most cordially concur with his design. His power, although able to subdue opposition, is of the mildest and most gentle kind. While he commands, he persuades; while he draws, the sinner comes without reluctance; and never in his life is there a freer act of volition than when he believes in Christ, and accepts of his salvation." The regeneration of the soul, or the infusion of spiritual life, is wholly the work of Divine grace, but no sooner is that new life imparted than it operates actively in conjunction with the Holy Spirit in the work of conversion. The renewed soul acts because it has been acted upon. It moves willingly and readily towards God, because it is gently drawn by the effectual agency of the Spirit.

The fifth and last point of the Calvinistic system is the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, or their continuance in a state of grace, until they reach the kingdom of glory. The following statement of this important article is given by the synod of Dort: "God, who is rich in mercy, from his immutable purpose of election, does not wholly take away his Holy Spirit from his own, even in lamentable falls; nor does he so permit them to decline (prolabi), that they should fall from the grace of adoption, and the state of justification; or commit the sin unto death, or against the Holy Spirit; that, being deserted by him, they should cast themselves headlong into eternal destruction. . . . So that not by their own merits or strength, but by the gratuitous mercy of God, they obtain it, that they neither totally fall from faith and grace, nor finally continue in their falls and perish."

Arminians, on the other hand, maintain, to use their own language, "that true believers may apostatize from the true faith, and fall into such sins as are inconsistent with true and justifying faith; nay, it is not only possible for them to do so, but it frequently comes to pass. True believers," it is added, "may, by their own fault, become guilty of great and abominable crimes, and may continue and die in the same, and consequently may finally fall into perdition." The Arminian view is also held by Romanists, and is found embodied in the decrees of the council of Trent. It is to be observed, that on one point both Calvinists and Arminians are agreed, that believers may be, and occasionally are, guilty of heinous transgressions. It is enough to refer simply to the cases of David in the Old Testament, and Peter in the New; both of them, it must be admitted, eminent saints, and yet both chargeable with the most aggravated crimes. These prominent cases are eagerly laid hold of by the adversaries of the doctrine of perseverance, as favouring their views of the doctrine. But however striking these cases were, as proving the apparent falling from grace, they have no bearing upon the possibility of the final apostasy of believers, seeing both of them are well known to have been effectually recovered from their backsliding, and restored to the friendship and favour of their God.

Numerous passages of Scripture are quoted by Calvinists in proof of the perseverance of the saints in a state of grace, and the impossibility of their final apostasy from the faith. Thus Jesus says of his sheep, John x. 28, 29, "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." The Apostle Paul plainly teaches the perseverance of the saints, when he says, Rom. viii. 35, 37, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us." And to the same effect we find it stated in Isa. liv. 9, 10, "For this is as the waters of Noah unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."

This doctrine, so consolatory to the Christian, Calvinists are wont to argue on various grounds. (1.) On the Divine decree concerning believers as being from its very nature immutable and everlasting. (2.) From the covenant which Jehovah hath made with his people, which warrants them confidently to rest assured, that "He who hath begun a good work in them will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ." His covenant is expressed in these explicit words, Jer. xxxii. 40, "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." (3.) Jesus Christ hath purchased his people with his own blood, and to maintain that they could fall away finally from grace would be to maintain that the deed of purchase could become invalid and without effect. (4.) The people of Christ must finally be saved, for his intercession, founded on his atoning death, is ever being made with the Father in their behalf, that they may be preserved from evil and conducted safely to heaven. (5.) The Holy Spirit is promised to dwell in his people, not for a time only, but for ever. Thus Jesus declares to his disciples, John xiv. 16, "And I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." And again, he promises, John iv. 14, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." The Holy Spirit is said also to "seal" believers "unto the day of redemption," and to be in them "the earnest of the heavenly inheritance." Now an earnest is a part given as a pledge or security for the future possession of the whole.

Such are the five articles of the Calvinistic system, as maintained by the Reformer himself, and afterwards set forth by the synod of Dort, in opposition to the Arminians or Remonstrants in Holland. The first Calvinistic church, properly so called, was that which Calvin planted at Strasburg; but the first regularly constituted Calvinistic church recognized by civil authority was formed at Geneva in 1541. It was established on strictly Presbyterian principles, and the ecclesiastical framework which was then set up, served as a model to other reformed churches, some of which assumed the Calvinistic, and others the Lutheran type. The Calvinists maintained the real though spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and rejected alike the Romish transubstantiation, the Lutheran consubstantiation, and the Helvetic notion introduced by Zwingli, that the eucharist was nothing more than a commemorative rite. On the relation which the church bore to the civil power, Calvin was remarkably decided, holding the church to be a separate and independent institution having the power of legislation within itself, and subject only to the authority of Christ, its sole head and ruler. He asserted strongly the principle of a complete parity among the ministers of Christ, all of them being possessed of equal rank and power. He rejected prelatish bishops, and established a consistory or presbytery consisting of pastors and lay elders, who regulated at stated meetings the affairs of individual churches, subject only to the revision of a synod, or combination of different presbyteries, which also statedly assembled for this purpose.

The Swiss reformed churches were at first opposed to the Calvinists of Geneva on the subject of the eucharist, and that of predestination. In a short time, however, Calvin succeeded in effecting a completely harmonious union between the two churches; and no long period elapsed before the reformed church had spread over a great part of Europe, framed in its doctrine and discipline after the model church of Geneva. The Prussian reformed church has, since the Reformation, oscillated between the Calvinistic and Lutheran systems. The Protestants of France established a close alliance with Geneva, and under John Knox, a disciple of Calvin, the Church of Scotland was originally founded, and has continued down to the present day to rest on the principles, both in doctrine and discipline and ecclesiastical government, of the church of Geneva. But in process of time, that church, which was the mother and the mistress of all the churches of the Reformation, fell from its proud elevation. Arianism, Socinianism, and latterly Rationalism, have robbed Geneva of its ancient glory, and reduced it to a condition so humiliating, that its citizens have scarcely even the semblance of religion. But within the last thirty or forty years, in the first instance through the labours of Mr. Robert Haldane, and latterly of Dr. Malan, Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, Dr. Gausson, and others, a goodly band of faithful devoted Christians have arisen in Geneva, who, by exerting a beneficial influence upon all around them, bid fair, with the blessing of God, to revive the work of Christ in that city.

CALVINISTIC CHURCHES. When, through the commanding influence of Calvin, the doctrines and polity which that great Reformer had established in the Church of Geneva were embraced by a large number of the Protestant churches, not only throughout Germany, but in France, the United Provinces, and Great Britain, these came to be distinguished as Calvinistic, in opposition to the Lutheran churches. Such churches on the Continent of Europe are known by the name of Reformed instead of Calvinistic, and the latter epithet has come to be applied to those Christian communities or churches which have adopted the doctrines of Calvin, in opposition to those of Arminius. The term is now used in a strictly theological, rather than an ecclesiastical sense; and applies to individuals rather than churches, with the exception, perhaps, of the Whitefield or Calvinistic Methodists, who profess to adhere to Calvinistic doctrine, and thus to differ from the Wesleyan or Arminian Methodists. The distinction, however, no longer holds to the same extent as it did during the lifetime of the respective leaders. Nor are those churches which are mainly Calvinistic in their doctrine, so far as their standards are concerned, necessarily Calvinistic in their teaching from their pulpits. Many instances to the contrary are to be found in all Christian churches, even in those whose symbolic books are strictly Calvinistic.

CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. See METHODISTS (CALVINISTIC).

CALYBE, a priestess of JUNO (which see).

CALYDONIUS, a surname of DIONYSUS (which see).

CAMALDULENSIANS, an order of monks founded at Camaldoli in the Apennines near Arezzo, by Romualdus, an Italian, in the early part of the eleventh century. The leading idea of the founder of this order, was completely to reform the monastic system, by introducing the simple habits of the Eastern monks. Romualdus, who was sprung from the stock of the dukes of Ravenna, seems to have been a person of stern, austere disposition, who made even emperors tremble before him. He attracted around him many disciples, but his assemblage of hermitages at Camaldoli, in the Florentine province, was the most renowned of the establishments which he formed. Romualdus died in A. D. 1027, at the advanced age, as is alleged, of one hundred and twenty. This order consists of Cœnobites and Eremites, both subjected to rigorous and severe regulations. The dress of the Camaldulensians is white, and consists of a cassock, a long scapulary, and a hood. They wear also a gown or cloak with large sleeves. The hermits of the order wear only a short dress, consisting of a cassock, a scapulary, and a hood.

CAMBRAY (A SECT IN). In the earlier part of the eleventh century, a Christian sect was discovered in the diocese of Cambray and Arras, which was supposed to have had its origin in the teaching of Gundulf, an Italian, and which, by the strangeness of some of its tenets, seems to have had connection with some of the Oriental sects. They rejected marriage, and held a state of celibacy to be indispensable to a participation in the kingdom of heaven. They alleged the marriage intercourse between Adam and Eve to have been the first sin into which the apostate spirit Satanael enticed mankind. The disciples of Christ, they maintained, both male and female, ought to live together only in spiritual fellowship. From Luke xx. 34, 35, they inferred that only the children of this world entered into the married state, but that it is the duty of believers to lead a life wholly estranged from sense, and like that of the angels. But along with these extravagant notions, this nameless sect combined some opinions which indicated that they had risen above the prevailing errors of their time. They held, for instance, the utter inefficacy of mere outward sacraments to purify the heart. The following summary of their creed is given by Neander:—"It consisted in this, to forsake the world, to overcome the flesh, to support one's self by the labour of one's own hands, to injure no one, to show love to all the brethren. Whoever practised this needed no baptism; where it failed, baptism could not supply its place. From these doctrines we might be led to suppose that these people had imbibed thoroughly Pelagian principles, and opposed legal morality and moral self-sufficiency to the Augustinian doctrine of the church. The bishop so understood them, and hence unfolded to them, in opposition to these tenets, Augustin's doctrine of grace. But the theory of Augustin is directly at variance with the doctrine of that whole race of sectarians touching redemption as a communication of divine life to the spirits held bound in the corporeal world, touching the consolamentum, and all that is connected therewith. Even here, then, we find the practical consequences alone avowed by them, separated from the dogmatic grounds from which they were derived. They were also opposed to the worship of saints and of relics, and ridiculed the stories told about the wonders performed by them. But it is singular to observe that they at the same time held to the worship of the apostles and martyrs, which in all probability they interpreted in accordance with their other doctrines, and in a different manner from what was customary in the church. They were opposed, like the Paulicians, to the worship of the cross and of images, they spoke against the efficacy of the priestly consecration, the value of a consecrated altar, and of a consecrated church. 'The church,' said they, 'is nothing but a pile of stones heaped together; the church has no advantage whatever over any hut where the Divine Being is worshipped.' They, like the older Euchites, denounced church psalmody as a superstitious practice."

The doctrines of this sect were first broached in the neighbourhood of Liege, and soon spread to Cambrai and Arras, where the archbishop assembled a council at the last mentioned town, in A. D. 1025, before which several members of the sect who had been arrested were summoned to appear. Their doctrines having been examined, the archbishop addressed to them a discourse in refutation of their tenets and in vindication of the Romish faith. They professed to be convinced by the prelate's arguments, and subscribed a recantation with the cross, thus obtaining absolution for their heresy. The sect, instead of being by this means suppressed, continued to maintain its ground for a long period. Towards the end of the eleventh century, a sect of this kind once more made its appearance in the diocese of Cambrai and Arras. The most conspicuous person belonging to it was a man of the name of Ramihed, who was summoned before the archbishop on the charge of heresy. On examination, it was found impossible to convict him, and, as a test of his innocence, he was requested to receive the eucharist. This, however, he refused, alleging the clergy of all ranks to be guilty of simony, or of covetousness under some form or other. A charge of this nature could not fail to rouse the indignation of the clergy, who, without further hesitation, declared Ramihed a heretic, and stirred up against him the fury of an ignorant and fanatical populace, by whom he was rudely seized and thrust into a small hut, where, while he was prostrate on the ground in prayer, they applied a torch to the building, and consumed him in the flames. The cruel persecution to which the leader of the sect was subjected tended greatly to increase its numbers, and to give it such importance and permanence, that in the twelfth century the sect was still found in many towns of the district.

CAMBRIAN CHURCH. See WALES (CHRISTIANITY IN).

CAMENÆ, four female divinities belonging to the religion of ancient Italy. They were prophetic nymphs, bearing the names respectively of Antevorta, Postverta, Carmentis, and Ægeria. The Roman poets, even at an early period, apply the name of Camene to the MUSES (which see).

CAMERONIANS, a name applied by some writers to the Scotch COVENANTERS (which see) from Richard Cameron, one of the leading ministers of that body, who fell at the battle of Airmoss in Ayrshire, in 1680, fighting against Prelacy. See REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

CAMERONITES, the followers of John Cameron, who was born at Glasgow in 1580, and after having studied theology in his native land, emigrated to France, where he became a distinguished professor, successively at Bordeaux, Sedan, and Saumur. He was recognized as the leader of a party of Calvinists in France, who held that the will of man is only determined by the practical judgment of the mind: that the cause of men's doing good or evil proceeds from the knowledge which God infuses into them, and that God does not move the will physically but only morally, in virtue of its dependence on the judgment. The synod of Dort, which was convened in 1618, to consider the points of difference between Calvinism and Arminianism, expressed themselves strongly against the views of Cameron, which differed rather nominally than really from the views of the synod; the latter laying down the principle that God not only enlightens the understanding, but moves the will, whereas the former taught that God enlightened the understanding, which thus moved and directed the will. It is not surprising, therefore, that Cameron considered his own doctrines as quits in harmony with those of the Synod of Dort.

CAMIS, the honoured dead among the Japanese whom they worship as ranking among the gods. When they burn a dead body, they consider the deceased person to whom the body belonged as entitled to veneration, as having now entered into the immediate fellowship of the gods, and they believe that the souls of all the departed have a direct relation with the living. Very good souls whom the high priest canonizes become Camis or protecting geniuses of men. They are believed to attend at the festivals of the dead; but lest they should prefer to remain in their dwellings, they pretend to compel their attendance by throwing stones. The souls of the wicked are imagined to wander through the air writhing in pain and anguish. The souls of very bad men are said to enter into the bodies of foxes, or into those of men whom they render sick and utterly destroy. According to this strange system of belief life is mingled with death, Hades with the earth, and the principal ground of fear is that the spirits of the dead may return and do injury to the living. It is among the SINTOISTS (which see) that this worship of the dead prevails in Japan, and hence the system has sometimes received the name of the religion of the Camis. To these deified heroes they build temples or MIAS (which see), and offer sacrifices; swear by them, and implore their patronage and assistance in all important undertakings, hoping to receive benefit from them in this life, though they have no such expectation as to the world to come.

CAMISARDS, the name given to the French Protestants in the mountainous district of the Cevennes, who took up arms in defence of their civil and religious liberties in the commencement of the eighteenth century. The struggle which ensued at that time between the Huguenots and their persecutors is generally known by the name of the Camisard war, from the white frocks which the peasants who were the chief actors wore. Many of the Protestants both in France and other countries were opposed to this military rising on the part of the Huguenot peasantry. A Synod of the Swiss Church made a public and solemn remonstrance on the subject. But so severe and galling had been the persecution to which the Protestants had been subjected for many years previous, that their long forbearance is more to be admired than their ultimate resistance to be blamed. The following description of the struggle is given by Dr. Lorimer in his 'Historical Sketch of the Protestant Church of France.'

"The Camisards numbered from 6,000 to 10,000 persons able to carry arms. They were distributed over the country, in parties of a few hundreds, familiarly acquainted with mountain passes and retreats, and able, at a small risk to themselves, to inflict serious injury upon their persecutors. They were headed, not by captains or pastors regularly educated, but by bold untaught young men, who joined the soldier and the preacher in the same person. Fired with the warmest enthusiasm, some of them guided by prophetic impulse, and accounting themselves the commissioned messengers of heaven, the deepest religious feeling mingled with the struggle. The enemy was repeatedly paralysed before their religious fervour; and their moral character corresponded with their religious profession. We are informed that there were no quarrels nor slanderings among them, that oaths and obscenity were unknown, that goods were held in common, and that they addressed their chief as brother. In short, they discovered high moral propriety and the greatest brotherly love. So deep and general was the enthusiasm, that women—wives and daughters—gladly bore a part in the warfare, and astonished even their enemies with deeds of surpassing valour; and severely were they tried. This civil war of the mountains lasted for four successive years, by day and by night, in summer and amid the snows and storms of winter. Large districts of many square miles were laid waste with fire and sword by the Popish troops. In one case 166, in another 466, hamlets and villages were devastated at once, and the horrors of winter were added to those of conflagration. The worst banditti were let loose against the peasants. Proved felons were preferred to them, and the Court and Popish Bishop, instead of showing any commiseration, applauded the most atrocious proceedings; nay, the Pope granted the pardon of sin to all who imbrued their hands in the blood of the peasantry. But with all this, the Camisards were successful in many engagements, and instead of being destroyed because they resisted, their resistance procured them better terms of peace than they would otherwise have enjoyed. Indeed, there is reason to think, that had they started earlier, and conducted a wise and vigorous opposition throughout, they might have procured a favourable pacification, not only for themselves, but for the Protestants of France generally. Even as it was, they were not overcome. They gave in, but it was at the persuasions of a Protestant noble. Their leading chief, Cavallier, though young and plebeian, received an important command in the French army, and died holding an honoured place in the British service; and, at least for a season, which only bad faith interrupted, the Camisards obtained the great object for which they toiled and sacrificed—freedom of religious worship—a freedom which filled them with joy, and made the country resound with the voice of psalms. Doubtless, their struggle was not unstained with bloody revenge,—but this is justly attributable to the dire persecution which they suffered. The oppressor, in the eye of reason, is responsible for the aroused passion of the oppressed. What could be expected of men who knew that certain death awaited them the moment they fell into the hands of their Popish enemies?—that, in all the considerable towns and villages of the district, the gibbet was ever standing ready, and the executioner within call? What could be expected of men who knew that their very psalm singing inspired with deadly hatred, and, to use the language of a Roman Catholic general employed against them, 'blistered, not only the ears, but the skins of the (Popish) clergy?'—or what peace or toleration could be looked for from men animated by such a spirit? What prospect of safety but in resistance? It may be added, that so righteous did both England and Holland account the struggle of the Camisards, that steps were taken to assist them, though the good intention was not rendered effectual."

The name of Camisards has also been given to a number of fanatical enthusiasts who arose among the Protestants of Dauphiny towards the end of the seventeenth century. They are said to have made their appearance in A. D. 1688, to the amount of five or six hundred of both sexes, who gave themselves out to be prophets, inspired as they declared by the Holy Ghost. The most exaggerated accounts of these pretended prophets have been given by M. Gregoire and other Romish writers. About 1709 a body of these men came over to England, where they succeeded in collecting around them a considerable number of followers. They proclaimed the near approach of the kingdom of God, the happy times of the church, and the millennial state. They are actually said to have predicted, but on what grounds we are not told, that these glorious events would take place within three years of the time of their prediction. They are alleged to have pretended to possess the gift of tongues, the power of working miracles, and even of raising the dead. The French Protestant ministers in London endeavoured to expose their delusions. One of the most noted of these enthusiasts was a member of the congregation of Dr. Calamy, who in consequence preached a series of sermons on the subject. This eminent divine, one of the most distinguished of the nonconforming ministers of his day, witnessed an individual in one of these fits of so-called inspiration which he thus describes:—"I went into the room where he sat, walked up to him, and asked him how he did; and, taking him by the hand, lifted it up, when it fell flat upon his knees, as it lay before. He took no notice of me, nor made me any answer; but I observed the humming noise grow louder and louder by degrees, and the heaving in his breast increased, till it came up to his throat, as if it would have suffocated him; and then he at last began to speak, or, as he would have it taken, the Spirit spake in him. The speech was syllabical, and there was a distinct heave and breath between each syllable; but it required attention to distinguish the words. When the speech was over, the humming and heaving gradually abated; and I again took him by the hand, and felt his pulse, which moved pretty quick; but I could not perceive by his hands any thing like sweating, or more than common heat."

Both from the pulpit and the press many warnings were given against these unhappy fanatics, but they still continued to increase in numbers both in England and in Scotland for several years. Gradually, however, as uniformly happens in all such cases of public enthusiasm and excitement, the fervour of both leaders and followers died away, and the Camisards disappeared. "There can be little doubt," as Dr. Lorimer judiciously remarks, "that, in France, they were one of the spurious fruits of protracted persecution. In such circumstances, many minds get unhinged and excited, and men betake themselves to the prophecies of the future as a refuge from the misery of the present. Hence mysticism, and claims to inspiration, and extravagant proceedings of a religious kind, frequently appear in persecuting times. The persecutor may justly be held responsible for these evils." In these observations we fully concur, as affording a satisfactory explanation of what Romish writers have often brought as a reproach against Protestantism, alleging that such displays of extravagance are its natural fruits. See FRANCE (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF), HUGUENOTS.

CAMPANÆ, a name used first by Bede in the seventh century, and employed generally afterwards to denote the bells used in churches to summon the people to public worship. The word is supposed to be derived from Campania, a province in Italy, where bells were first invented. (See next article.)

CAMPANARII and CAMPANATORES, the bell-ringers in churches from the seventh century and onwards. The usual business of these officers was to ring the bell for public worship.

CAMPITÆ (Lat. Campus, a plain), one of the names applied to the DONATISTS (which see), because they held their meetings on the plains.

CANCELLI. See BEMA.

CANDIDATI (Lat. Candidus, white), the CATECHUMENS (which see) of the early Christian church, so called because they were accustomed to appear dressed in white on their admission into the church by baptism.

CANDLEMAS-DAY, a festival instituted in the reign of Justinian in the sixth century. It takes place annually on the 2d of February. The Greeks called it Hypantè or Hypapanitè, meeting, because then Simeon and Anna met the Saviour in the temple. The Latins call it the feast of St. Simeon, the Presentation of the Lord, and usually Candlemas, because many candles were then lighted up as had been done on the Lupercalia, the festival, among the ancient Romans, of the ravishment of Proserpine, whom her mother Ceres searched for with candles. It reminds one also of the feast of Lights among the ancient Egyptians, and of the feast of Lanterns among the modern Chinese.

Candlemas-day in Rome is one of the most gorgeous festivals throughout the year. Sitting in his chair of state, the Pope is borne on the shoulders of eight men into St. Peter's Church, accompanied by cardinals, bishops, prelates, and priests. Candles are brought to him in immense numbers. They are incensed, sprinkled with holy water, and blessed. Then they are distributed. Each cardinal approaches, receives a candle, kisses the Pope's hand, and retires. Each bishop approaches, receives a candle, kisses the Pope's knees, and retires. Each inferior functionary on the occasion approaches, receives a candle, kisses the Pope's foot, and retires. On a sudden an immense number of candles are lighted, in the blaze of which the Pope is carried round the church, and retires, granting an indulgence of thirty years to all the faithful present. Such is Candlemas at Rome.

The candles are blessed on this festival in the following manner in the Romish church. Terce being ended, the priest, vested in a violet-coloured pluvial, or without the casule, with ministering attendants similarly dressed, proceeds to bless the candles placed before the altar at the Epistle side of it; and there standing with his face to the altar, offers up several prayers to the effect that the Lord would "bless and sanctify these candles for the uses of men, and the health of their bodies and souls, whether on land or sea;" and that he would pour forth his "benediction upon these waxen tapers, and sanctify them with the light of his grace." At the close of the hallowing prayers, the celebrant puts incense into the thurible, then sprinkles the candles thrice with holy water, and fumes them thrice with the incense. Then one of the higher clergy comes up to the altar, and from him the celebrant receives a candle; after which the celebrant, standing before the altar with his face to the people, distributes the candles; first to the more dignified ecclesiastic from whom he had himself received it; next to the deacon and subdeacon; then to the rest of the clergy one by one in succession; and last of all to the laity. All kneel and kiss the candle and the hand of the celebrant except prelates, if present. When the celebrant begins the distribution of the candles, the choir sing the following Antiphon, "For a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of thy people Israel." Then follows the Canticle, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word." Here the Antiphon is repeated, and so on, after each verse of the Canticle, to the end. A procession now commences round the church. The singers walk in front, and the incense-bearer follows. The taper-bearers, with the cross-bearer between them, come next, and then the clergy. Those who are on the right side carry their tapers in their right hands, and those who are on the left, in their left hands. Then follows the bishop between two assistant deacons, with a taper in his left hand, and with his right bestowing his benediction on his flock. They all carry lighted tapers, and the reason assigned for it is, that they represent Jesus Christ, who is the light of the world. During the procession antiphons are sung, such as the following, "Make ready thy bed-chamber, O Zion; receive Christ thy King; embrace Mary who is the gate of heaven; for she it is that carries the King of Glory, of new light." When the procession is finished, the celebrant and his ministers having taken off the violet-coloured vestments, put on white ones for mass. The candles are held lighted in their hands during the reading of the Gospel, and at the elevation of the sacrament to the communion; but if the mass be on a Sunday the candles are not lighted.

CANDLESTICK (GOLDEN), a part of the furniture of the Jewish tabernacle. It was placed in the first apartment over against the table of show-bread on the south side. According to the Rabbins, it stood five feet from the ground, on a base from which the principal stem rose perpendicularly. On both sides of the stem there projected upwards, in a curved line, three branches at equal distances, and of the same height. These branches were adorned with six flowers like lilies, with as many knobs like apples, and little bowls like half almond shells, placed alternately; and upon each of these branches, as well as at the top of the stem, there was a golden lamp, which was lighted every evening, and extinguished every morning. Josephus says that only three of them were kept lighted in the day-time. The lamps were fed with pure olive-oil, and the care of them was committed to the priests. Not only the candlestick itself, but the tongs and snuff-dishes, were of pure gold; and the whole apparatus weighed a talent or 113 lbs. troy weight.

In place of one golden candlestick which formed a part of the prescribed furniture of the tabernacle or Moses, Solomon, as we are informed, 2 Chron. iv. 7, made ten, probably after the same pattern, which he placed in the Temple, five on the right side of the sanctuary, and five on the left. No account is given of their height, or of the extent of their branches. Besides, there is mention made of silver candlesticks designed by David, but how large they were, and where they were placed, is nowhere recorded. According to Josephus, when the second temple was destroyed, A. D. 70, its vessels and articles of furniture were carried in triumph to Rome, and among these the candlesticks, which were lodged in the temple built by Vespasian. On the arch of Titus, accordingly, there is represented the form of the golden candlestick, as it was carried in triumphal procession into the city.

That the Jewish candlestick, as a part of the furniture both of the tabernacle and temple, had a typical signification, admits not of a doubt; and, indeed, it is adduced both in the Old Testament and in the New, with an obviously symbolical meaning. Thus we find it presented in the vision of Zechariah, which is thus described iv. 1—3, "And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep, and said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof; and two olive trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof." On this vision Professor Bush offers the following valuable observations: "The candlestick seen by the prophet differed from that made by Moses by being surmounted by a bowl, out of which, as from a reservoir, the oil was conducted through golden pipes to each of the lamps; and this bowl was moreover supplied by oil that flowed in a peculiar manner through two branches of two olive-trees standing on either side of the candlestick, v. 11—14. This part of the vision especially attracted the curiosity and interest of the prophet. 'Then answered I, and said unto him, What are these two olive-trees upon the right side of the candlestick and upon the left side thereof? And I answered again, and said unto him, What be these two olive branches which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves? And he answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord. Then said he, These are the two anointed ones (Heb. 'sons of oil'), that stand by the Lord of the whole earth.' These variations from the Mosaic model are certainly very remarkable; still in general significancy we have no doubt the symbol in each case is the same. The candlestick with its branches and its lighted lamps, represents the church in its multiplied unity, as a medium for shedding abroad the beams of revealed truth amidst the darkness of a benighted world. But as the natural light of lamps is sustained by oil, so spiritual light is sustained by truth. Truth is its appropriate and genuine pabulum; and in the imagery of the vision before us, the obvious design is to represent the manner in which the churches are furnished with the nourishment of truth." That this typical explanation is the true one, we cannot doubt, since we find the prophetic seer in the Apocalypse using these words, Rev. i. 19, 20, "Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter; the mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches." Accordingly, Professor Bush continues, "Since then a candlestick in general is the scriptural symbol of a church, a candlestick with seven branches must be the symbol of the universal church, spread abroad through all its numerous particular congregations, each one in its allotted station, shining through both its members and ministers, and giving light to the world. For the number seven being used by the sacred writers to denote not merely an indefinite multitude, but totality and perfection, the seven branches are doubtless to be understood as denoting all the various and dispersed congregations of the great spiritual body; while their all proceeding from one shaft plainly implies, that all those congregations are united in the one body of the universal church. 'In this character,' says Stonard, 'the church began to show itself, when the children of Israel, grown into a numerous people, were first collected and incorporated into a regularly formed body of believers in the true God, obeying, serving, and worshipping him according to his known will; and yet more conspicuously, when they were planted in the land of Canaan and spread over it, presenting to view many congregations of religious persons, spiritually united in one general community. The unity thereof was sufficiently guarded by the unity of the tabernacle, and afterwards of the temple in 'the place which God had chosen to put his name there.' At the same time, there were doubtless many synagogues scattered over the whole country, somewhat in the nature of our parish churches, wherein the several congregations met to celebrate Divine worship and receive religious instruction. The Jewish church still more completely answered to this symbol, on the return from the Babylonian captivity, when in almost all cities, towns, and populous villages, synagogues were erected, and numerous congregations assembled, professing the belief, service, and worship of the true God, reading, teaching, preaching, and hearing his holy word; and that not within the narrow bounds of Palestine only, but through almost every part of the civilized world. But doubtless the real, proper, perfect antitype of the candlestick is to be found in the Christian church, when the gospel was published, and its light diffused among all the nations of the world, illuminating its dark corners with the knowledge of truth and salvation." The light of the candlestick, then, symbolically denoted the spiritual illumination which God communicates to his people through his word and ordinances by the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit.

CANEPHOROS (Gr. kaneon, a basket, and phero, to carry), the individual among the ancient Greeks, particularly at Athens, who carried, in a circular basket, the apparatus used in the act of sacrificing. It was accounted a highly honourable employment, and was generally assigned to a virgin, who carried the basket on her head to the altar. In the case of a private individual who wished to offer sacrifice, the duty of Canephoros was discharged by his daughter, or an unmarried female relative. In the public festivals, on the other hand, such as the Dionysia, the office was intrusted to two virgins of the first Athenian families.

CANNIBALS, those who feed on human flesh. There are undoubted proofs of such a barbarous and revolting practice having existed among some nations in almost all ages. Homer, Herodotus, Strabo, Pliny, and various other ancient authors, refer to actual cases in which cannibalism was found to prevail among nations and tribes of men, which they expressly name. Homer mentions the Cyclops and Lestrygonæ, and Herodotus the Scythians and the Massagetæ, as having indulged in the practice of eating human flesh. The ancient Britons are even said to have drunk the blood of their enemies, and made drinking-cups of their skulls. Among the aborigines of America, cannibalism seems to have been connected with superstitious observances, it being accounted pleasing to the Great Spirit that they should devour the bodies and drink the blood of those whom they had taken captive in war. The custom is said to have prevailed in the South Sea islands, in New Zealand, and New Caledonia, when these islands were first discovered. The Romish missionaries allege, that cannibals are to be found in the interior of Africa, and even some parts of Asia. The Battas, a tribe of people in the island of Sumatra, are said by Mr. Marsden to practise this horrible custom "as a species of ceremony; as a mode of showing their detestation of crimes by an ignominious punishment, and as a horrid indication of revenge and insult to their unfortunate enemies. The objects of this barbarous repast are the prisoners taken in war, and offenders convicted and condemned for capital crimes." The same barbarous practice is mentioned by the Wesleyan missionaries as recently followed in the Feejee islands. In a work entitled 'Modern India,' published a few years ago, the author, Dr. Spry, who was connected with the Bengal medical staff, describes a tribe of cannibals found in the neighbourhood of Chittagong, which is the grand depot established for the purpose of taming and rearing the Company's elephants. The narrative of Dr

Spry is as follows: "The pursuit of wild elephants in these regions has brought us acquainted with a race of cannibals scarcely to be distinguished from the monkeys with which they herd. Were not the information relative to these people so strongly authenticated as to leave no doubt upon the minds of those who desire to make inquiries upon the subject, the reader might justly refuse to credit the existence of a set of savages, scarcely worthy of the name of man. . . . The Kookees, as these brutal wretches are called, have, according to the account afforded me by Major Gairdner, protuberant bellies: they are low in stature, with set features, and muscular limbs. They speak a dialect peculiar to themselves, and build their villages on the boughs of the forest trees. They do not appear to have any settled abiding place, but wander in herds from one wilderness to another. When a site favourable to their purpose has been found, the whole community immediately set to work to collect bamboos and branches of trees, which are afterwards fashioned into platforms, and placed across the lofty boughs of the different trees. On this foundation the rude grass superstructure is raised which forms the hut. When these sheds are completed, and every family provided with a habitation, the women and children are taken into their aerial abodes. The men then lop off all the branches within reach of the ground, and having constructed for themselves a rough ladder of bamboos, they ascend the trees by means of this rude staircase, drawing it up after them to prevent the intrusion of strangers, and a necessary precaution against the encroachments of their four-footed companions of the forest. In this manner they repose, floating in the branches, and cradled by the wind, partaking more of the savage ferocity of brutes than the milder charities of man.

"To persons who have travelled much in India, the mere circumstance of a whole tribe of natives choosing to take up their permanent habitations in the trees would not excite much surprise, since the watchmen, who are employed in the charge of mango groves, or other valuable fruit cultivations, often form a sort of nest on the branches of some neighbouring trees, a small hut, or rather shed, just sufficient to shield the body from the inclemency of the weather, being raised upon a platform resting on the boughs. The Kookees, therefore, in this particular only, differ from more civilized natives, forced by necessity upon expedients of the kind, by living constantly in trees; in other respects there is fortunately no similarity, even to the most degraded beings of the human race. They openly boast of their feats of cannibalism, showing, with the strongest expressions of satisfaction, the bones and residue of their fellow-creatures who have fallen a prey to their horrible appetites. So intent are they in their search after human flesh, that the superintendent was always obliged to send out the men employed in hunting the elephants armed with muskets, and in not fewer than parties of ten. One poor man they unfortunately caught while off his guard, and devoured him almost before his life blood had congealed in his veins. Attempts have been made to subdue and civilize these people, and one of their head men was won over, and employed by Major Gairdner at the elephant depot, but he could not be induced to relinquish his old habits. In a short time he was detected in the commission of a murder, and was executed by the civil authorities of Chittagong. When the tidings of this man's fate reached the ears of his former associates, they became greatly incensed, and for a long time afterwards exerted themselves, happily in vain, to obtain possession of the person of the superintendent, who had frequently occasion to cross their path in the execution of his duty. These people, strange as it may appear, are living within 150 miles of Calcutta, the metropolis of British India and the seat of government, and yet their existence even is scarcely known by the people who are not in authority—comparatively little information from the woods and jungles of the savage portions of Bengal finding its way to the Calcutta newspapers. The existence of cannibals in India is a fact only recently established, and many were of opinion that the races were extinct; it has now, however, been proved beyond all question, that the Kookees, who infest the blue mountains of Chittagong, and the Goands, inhabiting the hill forests of Nagpore, both feed upon human flesh. There is this distinction in favour of the latter, that they partake of it only occasionally, and in compliance with a religious custom—while the Kookees delight and banquet on the horrid repast."

Many exaggerated accounts have no doubt been given by various travellers on the subject of cannibalism; and stories of the most disgusting character have been told of the ferocity of savage tribes, who are in the habit of killing and eating their enemies, from no other feeling than a voracious desire for human flesh. Lopez and Merolla, who visited Congo, on the west coast of Africa, in the sixteenth century, actually report, that among the savage tribes in that quarter, human flesh was not only eaten but openly sold in the markets, and that the subjects offered themselves to the sovereign for the gratification of his palate.

CANON, a deity worshipped in Japan, said by some to be the son of AMIDAS (which see), and to preside over the waters and the fish. He is the creator of the sun and the moon. This idol is represented with four arms like his father, is swallowed up by a fish as far as his middle, and is crowned with flowers. He has a sceptre in one hand, a flower in another, a ring in a third, while the fourth is closed, and the arm extended. Canon is sometimes represented, as for example in the temple of a thousand idols, with seven heads upon his breast, and thirty hands all armed with arrows. There are thirty-three principal pagodas, which are peculiarly consecrated to the god Quamwon or Canon. It is regarded by some of the Japanese as a solemn religious duty to go on pilgrimage to each of these pagodas in succession. These devotees, as they pass along from temple to temple, sing a hymn in honour of their god. They are dressed in white, and wear about their necks a list of the several temples of Canon which they are still to visit.

CANON (Gr. a rule), a catalogue in the early Christian Church of the ecclesiastical office-bearers of any particular church.

CANON OF THE MASS, the fixed and inviolable part of the mass of the Roman church, in which consecration is made. It is sometimes called the action or secret, that part of the mass-prayers which Romanists call "the very sum and heart, as it were, of the Divine sacrifice." It is what Tractarians call the Liturgy of St. Peter. But we learn from Roman Catholic authors themselves, that the Canon of the Mass is the work not of one, but of several persons. Pope Innocent III. and Durandus after him, say, "That the secret which, according to others, is called the Canon, and the action, was not composed all at once by one person, but gradually by many persons, is evident from this among other proofs, that the commemoration of the saints is repeated thrice in it, for in the second commemoration those primitive saints are supplied who seemed wanting in the first." The revision and enlargement of the Canon, however, is chiefly the work of Gregory the Great, and some authors, for example, Mosheim, go so far as to term him its author. Notwithstanding, however, the alterations which were introduced into the Canon by Gregory, all the Ritualists testify that it has received many other additions and interpolations since Gregory's time. By the arrangements of the Romish Rubric, the whole of the Canon must be muttered, with the exception of a word or two, here and there, which are to be said aloud. The reasons alleged for this secrecy are various. Thus Innocent III. explains the matter: "The Canon is celebrated in a secret voice, lest the holy words should become common; for it is reported, that when of old the Canon used to be recited publicly, and in a loud voice, almost all came to know it by means of that usage, and used to chant it in the public places and streets; whence, when certain shepherds were once reciting it in the field, and had placed their loaf upon a stone, the bread, at the utterance of the words, was turned into flesh, and they themselves, by a Divine judgment, were struck with fire from heaven. On which account the holy Fathers agreed that those words should be uttered in silence, forbidding, under anathema, that they should be uttered by any but priests over the altar, and in the mass, and in their sacred vestments."

From internal evidence alone we are forced to the conclusion, that the Canon of the Mass is the work not only of various hands, but of various ages. On this subject, Mr. Lewis judiciously remarks, in his

'Bible, Missal, and Breviary,' "The name secret given to certain prayers in every mass, whispers that there was a time when the church did not wrap up all her service in the secrecy of a dead language—when secrecy was the exception, not the rule. In the ordinary of the mass the priest is directed to turn to the people, and, in a voice slightly raised, to say to them, 'Pray, brethren, that mine and your sacrifice may be acceptable to God the Father Almighty,' indicating the time when Divine service was equally intelligible to all. In the Canon of the Mass we have a prayer offered up after consecration, when the elements are supposed to have become Christ himself, beseeching Almighty God to command that the elements be carried up by the hands of angels to heaven; the idea of angels conveying Christ to heaven betraying its antiquity, at least, that it preceded the present sacramental theory of Rome, and standing in curious contradiction to the prayer in the same Canon, said to have been inserted by Pope Innocent III., entreating that it may 'adhere to his bowels.' These, and many such internal evidences discover the successive growths of the mass from times and sentiments the most pure, to superstitions the most gross. From Bishop Ambrose have been borrowed prayers and hymns which the Church of Christ may use with edification. Then was added the Nicene Creed to declare the orthodox faith as to the person of Christ. In the sixth century, Gregory the Great added the Lord's Prayer to the mass as a fixed part of it, and seems to have first conceived the idea of giving the churches a common liturgy. This he may have done to correct abuses which had crept in, as well as from a desire to extend the influence of the Roman See, whose supremacy was yet unacknowledged. To Gregory are ascribed many little versicles, such as repetitions of 'Lord, have mercy'—'Christ, have mercy'—and the insertion of the Litany which the English Church has so well reformed, and which, as adopted into her church service, forms perhaps the most beautiful part of her public devotions. To Gregory, also, are ascribed the composition and arrangements of those chants that still bear his name. But whatever efforts this energetic pontiff made for establishing liturgical uniformity, it is certain he never attained it, even in Italy. The liturgy, called the Ambrosian, was used in the diocese of Milan down to a recent period, if not occasionally still used in its celebrated cathedral. The French Church had its Gallican, and in Spain the Gothic liturgy was received as canonical until the eleventh century. It was not until after the Council of Trent that 'the liturgy of St. Peter' was imposed even on all the Roman ecclesiastical world; and that council was the first that declared, 'that if any one should say that the mass should be celebrated in the vulgar tongue, let him be accursed.'"

CANON OF SCRIPTURE. See BIBLE.
CANONESSES, an order of religious females, disinct from nuns, which was established by Lewis the Meek in the ninth century, and placed on the same footing and under the same rule as the order of CANONS (which see). In the twelfth century they embraced the rule of St. Augustine, and were accordingly called Regular Canonesses of St. Augustine.

CANONICÆ, virgins in the early Christian church who dedicated themselves to Christ, and were called Canonical Virgins, from being enrolled in the CANON (which see), or books of the church.

CANONICAL, that which is done in accordance with the canons of the church. See CANONS (ECCLESIASTICAL).

CANONICAL HOURS. These, in the Church of Rome, begin with vespers or evening prayer, about six o'clock or sunset. Then succeeds compline, and at midnight the three nocturns or matins. Lauds are appointed for cock-crowing, or before break of day; at six o'clock or sunrise, prime should be recited, and terce, sext, and none, every third hour afterwards. Under the Jewish economy, the only canonical hours we read of are those of the morning and the evening sacrifice, at the third and the ninth hour, or nine o'clock in the morning and three o'clock in the afternoon of our time. The prophet Daniel speaks of praying to God at morning, noon, and night. In apparent accordance with the example of the prophet, Tertullian mentions the third, sixth, and ninth hours of prayer; and these hours are recommended to Christians by Cyprian, as suitable hours for prayer, without the slightest hint that the church had laid down any rule upon the subject. Cassian informs us that the monks of Egypt, with whom the monastic life commenced, never observed any other canonical hours for public devotion, but only morning and evening early before day. Not long after, the monks of Mesopotamia and Palestine began to meet publicly at the third, sixth, and ninth hours for psalm-singing and devotion. The compline, or bed-time service, was not known in the ancient church as distinct from the evening service. Those additional canonical hours, which are now observed by the Roman Catholic Church, were gradually introduced from the practices of the Eastern monks, there being in the three first centuries no other hours of public prayer but the morning and evening. Chrysostom also frequently mentions the daily service in the church morning and evening. When the writers of the fourth century speak of six or seven hours of prayer, their remarks exclusively apply to the practice of the monks, not of the whole body of the church. Thus Chrysostom, while he never adverts to more than three public assemblies in the church, tells us, in describing the monks, that they had their midnight hymns, their morning prayers, their third, and sixth, and ninth hours, and, last of all, their evening prayers. As the author of the Constitutions, however, who lived in the beginning of the fourth century, gives directions as to these various hours of prayer, it is not unlikely that in some of the Eastern churches they had come to be already observed. The hours of prayer came to be seven, after the example of the Psalmist David, "Seven times a-day do I praise thee," and to afford direction in the various services of the day, a regular form of devotion was drawn up. See next article.

CANONICAL HOURS, one of the offices of the Church of Rome contained in the BREVIARY (which see), and called, by way of distinction, the church office. It is a form of prayer and instruction combined, consisting, for the special guidance of the clergy and the religious of both sexes, of the psalms, lessons, hymns, prayers, anthems, and versicles, separated into different portions, and to be said at the different hours of the day, which are held to be Canonical hours. (See preceding article.) The church expressly obliges every clergyman in higher orders, and every one who possesses an ecclesiastical benefice, as well as the religious of both sexes, to recite it every day, in private, at least, if they cannot attend the choir, or are not obliged to do so. The canonical hours of prayer are still regularly observed by many religious orders, but not so regularly by the secular clergy, even in the choir. When the office is recited in private, it is often held to be quite sufficient if the whole be gone through in the course of the twenty-four hours. The omission is held as a mortal sin, unless for good and sufficient cause. Besides, all who are in possession of benefices, forfeit them by omission of this duty in reciting the canonical hours. It is related of Luther, that having, while a monk, for many days through study neglected the recitation of the canonical hours, in compliance with the Pope's decree, and, to satisfy his own conscience, he actually shut himself up in his closet, and recited what he had omitted with such punctilious exactness and with such severe attention and abstinence, as brought on a total want of sleep for five weeks, and almost produced symptoms of a weakened intellect.

CANONICAL LETTERS. These, also called Letters Dimissory, were granted in the early Christian church to the country clergy who wished to remove from one diocese to another. The council of Antioch forbade country presbyters granting such letters, but the chorepiscopi were allowed to give them. No clergyman was allowed to remove from his own church or diocese, without canonical letters from the bishop of the diocese to which he belonged. These canonical or dimissory letters might be either granted or refused at the will of the bishop.

CANONICAL LIFE, the mode of life pursued by those of the ancient clergy of the Christian church who lived in community. It held a kind of intermediate place between the monastic and the clerical style of living. The canonical life of the clergy seems to have owed its origin to Chrodegang, bishop of Mentz, about the middle of the eighth century. He directed that the Benedictine rule should be the model after which the union among them should be formed. The chief point in which they differed from the mendicant orders was the possession of property. "They lived together," says Neander, "in one house; sat together at one table; a portion of meat and drink was measured to each, according to a prescribed rule; at the canonical hours they assembled to join in prayer and song; meetings of all the members were held at fixed times; and, in these assemblies, passages of Scripture, with the rule of the order, were read, and those who had broken it were rebuked." This new mode of living was much admired, and was received, with some few alterations, at the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, A. D. 816, as the general rule of the French church. This alteration in the life of the clergy, as long as it continued to be observed, exercised a most beneficial influence; but, as the rule came to be relaxed, corruption crept in, and at length it fell into disuse. See CANONS (ORDER OF).

CANONICAL OBEDIENCE (OATH OF), an oath which is administered to every clergyman of the Church of England on being licensed to a curacy or instituted to a benefice, in which he swears to give obedience to the bishop of the diocese in which his cure or benefice is situated.

CANONICAL PENSIONS, annuities granted in the ancient Christian church to those who had spent the greatest part of their lives in the service of the church, and desired to be disburdened of their office on account of age and infirmity. It was granted out of the revenues of the church, but not without the authority or approbation of the synod.

CANONIZATION, a ceremony in the Romish Church by which persons deceased are canonized, or raised to the rank of saints. It follows upon the process of BEATIFICATION (which see). The earliest canonization by the Popes of which we have authentic records, is that of Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg, by John XV. in A. D. 995. Yet bishops, metropolitans, and provincial councils were concerned in such acts for more than a century after this. And it was not till the pontificate of Alexander III. in the twelfth century, that the Popes claimed the exclusive power of adding new saints to the calendar. This was effected in a council held at Rome, A. D. 1179, and, ever since, the power of canonization has been considered as vested solely in His Holiness.

The process of canonization is carried forward with great deliberation. "As soon after the beatification," to use the words of Cardinal Wiseman, "as there is reason to believe that additional miracles have been wrought by the servant of God, the postulants humbly petition the Congregation of Rites to obtain the signing of the commission for resuming the cause, and the expediting of fresh remissorial to the same or other delegates, instructing them to receive evidence of the miracles reported to have taken place." Two miracles are required before beatification, and two more before canonization. The Pope, on being applied to, resumes the case of the beatified person, with the view of testing his qualifications for the higher rank which is claimed for him. A secret consistory is accordingly, in the first instance, summoned, at which the petition in favour of the proposed saint is taken into consideration, and appointed to be examined by three auditors of the Rota, and the cardinals are directed to revise all the instruments relating thereto. A second private meeting is held, at which the cardinals make their report. If the report be favourable, a public meeting of the consistory is held, at which the cardinals pay their adoration to his Holiness, and, immediately thereafter, a long eulogium is pronounced upon the virtues, miracles, and high qualifications of the proposed saint. A semi-public consistory is now held, at which the Pope attends in his mitre and pluvial. The votes of the prelates are taken for or against the canonization, and, as soon as it is resolved upon by a plurality of voices, the Pope intimates the day appointed for the ceremony.

On the canonization day, the Pope officiates in a white dress, and the cardinals are habited in the same colour. St. Peter's church at Rome is hung with rich tapestry, on which appear, embroidered with gold or silver, the arms of his Holiness, or the arms of that prince or state which may have made application for the canonization. The church is splendidly illuminated with wax tapers, and a magnificent throne erected for the Pope. A gorgeous procession marches to St. Peter's with colours flying. The ceremony, as it took place at the canonization of four Italian saints in May 1712, is thus detailed by Picart: "As soon as his Holiness had quitted his taper and mitre, he went and prostrated himself before the holy sacrament, in the chapel of the holy Trinity. The ecclesiastical senate followed his pious example. His Holiness then taking back the taper and mitre, returned to his chair, and was carried to the altar of the apostles. There he gave the taper to his cup-bearer (who held it in his hand during the whole ceremony), knelt upon his seat, and prayed for some considerable time; after which he bestowed new benedictions on the congregation, went up to his throne to perform the function of the vicar of Jesus Christ, and there received the adoration of the sacred college. After this the most ancient of the cardinal-bishops went up to the pontifical throne, and placed himself on the right, but so that his face was towards the left. The cardinal, who was deputed to demand the canonization, moved forwards to the steps of the throne, having the cardinal-legate of Bologna on his left-hand, and a consistorial-advocate on his right; the master of the ceremonies, who attended the cardinal-postulant, being on the legate's left. They first bowed to the altar and his Holiness; then the cardinal-postulant rose, and the advocate, addressing himself in his eminency's name to the holy Father, begged that he would be graciously pleased to order the four Beati to be enrolled amongst the saints of the Lord. had he spoken, but one of the gentlemen of the Pope's bed-chamber, secretary of his briefs, standing up, resumed the discourse, and made a short eulogium on the merit and virtues of the four Beati, who were all natives of Italy, and had immortalized themselves by their religious achievements.

"The gentleman of the bed-chamber closed his harangue with an exhortation to the assembly to beg the light of God's Spirit upon so delicate an occasion. Then his Holiness rose off his throne, and all the clergy knelt; two musicians of the chapel, dressed in their surplices, and kneeling, sung the litanies of the saints; after which the cardinal-postulant for the canonization repeated his instances; and this was succeeded by a prayer to Almighty God to implore the assistance of his Holy Spirit, and then the holy Father sung the Veni Creator Spiritus, which is a hymn addressed to the third Person in the Sacred Trinity. The two musicians sung the verse which begins with Emitte Spiritum, and the Pontiff called upon the Holy Ghost, whilst they continued standing with tapers in their hands before the steps of the throne. A third and last request, made in the same manner as the former, succeeded this invocation. Then the secretary of the briefs resumed the discourse, and declared it was time to acquiesce with God's commands. 'His Holiness,' continued he, 'is going to make a decree for raising Pius V., Andrew D'Avellino, Felix de Cantalice, and Catharin de Bologna to the rank of saints, to the glory of God, and the honour of the Catholic Church, in order that their names may be called upon for ages to come.' After these words, the secretary withdrawing, the cardinals stood up, and Christ's vicar, by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, pronounced the decree of canonization, thereby commanding, that from thenceforth those Beati should be looked upon as saints by the Catholic Church, and their festival be solemnized upon their respective birth-days. The apostolic prothonotaries and notaries immediately drew up an act of this canonization, and Te Deum was sung by way of thanksgiving."

The idea of canonization is evidently borrowed from the ancient heathens, who deified heroes and great men after their death. (See APOTHEOSIS.) It was a ceremony unknown before the end of the tenth century, even in the Romish Church. The power of canonization in the Greek Church is vested in the patriarchs and bishops in convocation, who, while they are cautious in conferring the honour only upon those who have been distinguished for their virtues and piety, have, nevertheless, so swelled the calendar of saints, that they are more numerous than the days of the year. On each of their festival days, and from their number, two of them are sometimes assigned one day, masses are said in honour of them, and the history of their life and miracles is publicly read. The lives of the saints are in four volumes folio. They are read at the matin service in monasteries, but not often in parish churches.

CANONRY, the office held by the CANONS OF A CATHEDRAL (which see) in England. By the Act 3d and 4th Vict., the canonries are reduced to one hundred and thirty-four.

CANONS, a name given to the clergy in the primitive Christian church, for which two reasons are assigned; one, that they were subject to the CANONS ECCLESIASTICAL (which see), or general rules of the church; the other, that they were usually registered in the canon, or list of the authorized office-bearers. Whatever may be its origin, the appellation is often found in the ancient councils. At an after period, it came to be applied to all who were entitled to receive maintenance from the church, such as monks, virgins, and widows, all of whom were enrolled as canonici, or canons. Sometimes the word was used to denote a tax raised for ecclesiastical, and even for civil purposes. Thus Athanasius, when he complains of having been unjustly accused of imposing a tax upon Egypt for the support of the church of Alexandria, calls the tax a canon; and in the Theodosian code, the word is employed to denote the tribute of corn that was exacted from the African provinces for the use of the city of Rome. The APOSTLES' CREED (which see) was also called canon, the rule, as being the recognized standard or rule of faith.

CANONS (APOSTOLIC). See APOSTOLICAL CANONS.

CANONS (BOOK OF), rules framed for the government of the Scottish Church, by order of Charles I., and designed to establish Episcopacy, and subvert the Presbyterian constitution of the church. In 1634 it was agreed upon, that a Book of Canons and a Liturgy should be framed in Scotland, and communicated to Laud, Juxon, and Wren for their revision and approval. In April of the following year, a meeting of the prelates was held in Edinburgh, to see what progress had been made in the framing of the Book of Canons. After the Scottish prelates had prepared the document, it was sent to Laud, by whom it was revised and amended. This Book of Canons was confirmed under the great seal, by letters patent bearing date 23d May 1635. Dr. Hetherington, in his 'History of the Church of Scotland,' gives the following brief digest of the canons: "The first decrees excommunication against all who should deny the King's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs; the next pronounces the same penalty against all who should dare to say that the worship contained in the Book of Common Prayer (a book not yet published, nor even written) was superstitious or contrary to the Scriptures. The same penalty was decreed against all who should assert that the prelate form of church government was unscriptural. Every minister was enjoined to adhere to the forms prescribed in the Liturgy, on pain of deposition; which Liturgy, as before stated, was not yet in existence. It was decreed also, that no General Assembly should be called, but by the King; that no ecclesiastical business should even be discussed, except in the prelatial courts; that no private meetings, which were termed conventicles, and included Presbyteries and Kirk-Sessions, should be held by the ministers for expounding the Scriptures; and that on no occasion in public should a minister pour out the fulness of his heart to God in extemporary prayer. Many minute arrangements were also decreed respecting the ceremonial parts of worship, as fonts for baptism, communion-altars, ornaments in church, modes of dispensing the communion elements, the vestments of the clerical order, and all such other idle numberies as the busy brain of Laud could devise, or the fantastic fooleries of Rome suggest." Such were some of the principal regulations framed for the guidance of the Scottish clergy by the royal fiat. The utmost excitement prevailed throughout the country, when the character of the Book of Canons came to be known. It was looked upon by the people generally as decidedly Popish in its tendency, and designed to pave the way for the introduction, not of Prelacy only, but ultimately of Popery itself. Though Episcopacy had been established in Scotland for thirty years, the publication of the Book of Canons, instead of reconciling the Scottish nation to that mode of ecclesiastical government, only tended to increase the antipathy with which it was regarded.

CANONS (ORDER OF). In the eighth century the great corruption of the whole sacred order gave rise to a new kind of priests, who held an intermediate place between the monks or regular clergy, and the secular priests. These followed partly the discipline and mode of life of monks; that is, they dwelt together, dined at a common table, and joined together in united prayer at certain hours; yet they took no vows upon them like the monks, and they performed ministerial functions in certain churches. They were at first called by the name of the Lord's Brethren; but afterwards took the name of Canons. The institution of this order is commonly attributed to Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, who about A. D. 750 subjected the priests of his church to a somewhat monastic mode of living, requiring them to live in community, to sing hymns to God at certain hours, and also to observe other rites, and by his example, first the Franks, and then the Italians, the English, and the Germans were led to found convents of canons. In the ninth century, Lewis the Meek cherished this order with great partiality, and extended it through all the provinces of his empire. He also added to it an order of Canonesses, which had been unknown in the Christian world before that time. He summoned a council at Aix-la-Chapelle A. D. 817, at which the rule of Chrodegang was altered, and new rules were framed, which were issued by Lewis as his own ordinance. The following abstract by Schlegel contains its most essential features: "First the prevailing error, that the prescriptions of the Gospel were obligatory only upon monks and clergymen, is confuted; and then the distinction between monks and canons is defined. The latter may wear linen, eat flesh, hold private property, and enjoy that of the church; the former cannot. Yet equally with the monks they should avoid all vices and practise virtue. They should live in well secured cloisters containing dormitories, refectories, and other necessary apartments. The number of canons in each cloister should be proportioned to the exigencies of the church to which it belonged. In their dress they should avoid the extravagances of ornament and finery, and likewise uncleanness and negligence, &c. The second part of the rule relates to canonesses, and contains twenty-eight articles. The first six are extracts from the fathers, and relate to the duties of ladies who consecrate themselves to God. They may have private property, yet must commit the management of it to some kinsman or friend by a public act or assignment. They may also have waiting-maids, and eat in the refectory and sleep in the dormitory. They are to be veiled and to dress in black. Their business must be prayer, reading, and labouring with their hands; and especially they must fabricate their own clothing from the flax and wool given to them."

From this time numerous convents of canons and canonesses were founded in every part of Europe, and endowed with ample revenues by pious individuals. This order, however, in process of time degenerated like the others. The same dissoluteness of morals, which in the eleventh century pervaded the whole sacred order, infected also the monastic establishments of the canons. It was deemed necessary by Pope Nicolaus II., in the council at Rome A. D. 1059, to repeal the old rule for canons adopted in the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, and to substitute another in its room, establishing a better and stricter system of discipline. By this means nearly all these associations underwent a considerable reform. Some of them, however, did not consent to adopt the new rule in all its extent. Hence arose the distinction between regular and secular canons; the former name being applied to those who had all things in common, without any exception whatever, while the latter was given to those who had nothing in common but their dwelling and table.

CANONS OF A CATHEDRAL, also called PREBENDARIES, the former being a name of office and ministry, and the latter having reference to a prebenda, which denoted an endowment or revenue. At the period of the Conquest, there were in England nineteen bishoprics, not including the bishopric of the Isle of Man, which has no Cathedral Chapter, and all of these were associated with bodies of secular canons, except two, Winchester and Worcester, where Benedictine monks had been substituted in their places. The same substitution appears to have been gradually effected in other churches, namely Canterbury, Durham, and Rochester, but the secular clergy recovered their ground, and kept it till the time of Archbishop Lanfranc after the Conquest. From the Conquest to the Reformation the canons consisted of presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons, each prebendal stall being annexed to one of these three orders of ministry; and a certain number of each order, as the services of the church then required, were enjoined to be always resident together. It appears to have been a general rule, that a certain part of the whole body of canons should be always in residence. The canons had each a prebend, the endowment of which generally consisted of the tithes of some parish. There was besides a common property of the church called communa, from the revenues of which the several members received a daily distribution when resident and taking their part in the daily offices. The duty of residence, and the emoluments attached to it, were in process of time confined to a portion of the whole body of Canons; and the non-residents were compelled by statute to pay, each a certain portion, one-fifth, one-sixth, or one-seventh, of the income of his prebend to the common fund of the church for the benefit of the resident Canons. Hence arose the title of Canons Residentiary. The Chapter, however, was still considered to comprehend all the Canons; the right of being summoned to Chapter meetings and of voting, still remaining as before. But it appears that by degrees the small body of residents acquired the chief management of the common property, and enjoyment of the privileges and revenues of the church. During the period which elapsed between the Reformation in England, and the reign of Charles II., the alterations in the rule of residence for Deans and Canons were so extensive as almost to amount to a new constitution. What had been the exception before, became now the rule. The term of obligatory residence was reduced to ninety, sixty, and even so little as fifty days, and in many cases the provision for the constant presence of one-third, or one-fourth part of the Canons appears to have been abandoned. These changes are believed to have been due to Archbishop Laud, who was appointed to revise the Cathedral statutes.

In 1835 William IV. issued a commission for the examination of Cathedrals and Collegiate Churches in England and Wales, which has led, among other changes, to the suspension of a certain number of canonries, so as to leave generally four in each cathedral, although a few cathedrals retain five or six, one or two being attached to archdeaconries or professorships; and Christ Church, Oxford, retains its whole number of eight, one attached to an archdeaconry, and four to professorships. The non-residentiary canonries in the old foundations are retained, but without emolument. The bishops of the new cathedrals are authorised to appoint a certain number of Honorary Canons, to take rank next after the Canons, but without emoluments. The Canons are allowed to hold each one benefice, without restriction as to distance or value. The residence of every Canon is fixed at three months at least. The incomes of the suspended canonries in the new cathedrals are directed to be paid over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Two canonries at Westminster are annexed to the two parishes of St. Margaret's and St. John's. The Canons of the Old Foundation are to be appointed generally by the bishops, and no person can take the office of a Canon until he has been six years complete in priest's orders, except in the case of professorships. Power is given to remove the suspension of a canonry if an endowment of £200 per annum be provided. The canonries in the gift of the Crown are confined to the cathedrals of Canterbury, London, Oxford, Worcester, and the collegiate churches of Westminster and Windsor; those in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, to Gloucester, Bristol, Norwich, and Rochester. The whole number of residentiary canonries, according to the provisions of 3d and 4th Vict. c. 113, is one hundred and thirty-four. The collegiate churches of Ripon and Manchester are now made Cathedral churches, annexed to newly founded bishoprics, and to each of them are attached a dean and four canons. In the case of Manchester, to each of the four canonries is annexed one of four rectories and parishes in Manchester and Salford. A cathedral commission was appointed in 1852, which issued its report in 1854, and from that report we have received much of the information which is embodied in this article. See CATHEDRAL, DEAN and CHAPTER.

CANONS ECCLESIASTICAL, the rules or laws laid down by the councils of the Christian church, and possessing the force of ecclesiastical law. From the time of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, councils began to be convened which drew up rules and regulations, not only in regard to the doctrine, but also the discipline and government of the church. These decrees, as they were called, of the councils were collected into three volumes by Ivo, bishop of Chartres in France, about A. D. 1114. This collection of the Decrees was corrected about thirty-five years afterwards by Gratian, a Benedictine monk, and published in England in the reign of King Stephen. These Decrees were received by the clergy of the Western or Latin Church, but never by those of the Eastern or Greek church.

But the body of canon law includes not only the Decrees; it also embodies the Decretals or letters of the Popes (see BULL), which have also been collected into three volumes, and commented upon by John Andreas, a distinguished canonist in the fourteenth century, in a work well known by the name of the Novellæ. These Decrees and Decretals constituted at one period the whole body of the canon law, but afterwards the decretals collected by Pope John XXIII., and commonly called the Extravagants, were admitted and placed on a footing with the rest of the canons. The canon law was introduced into England, though its authority was never recognized to the same extent as in other countries. Some of the canons were admitted by the English sovereigns and people, while others were rejected. For a time the Pope claimed an ecclesiastical jurisdiction independent of the king, but at the Reformation the Papal power was completely disowned, and no Bull or decree of the Pope could from that time be even published in England without the permission of the civil power.

Besides the foreign canons, there were a number of provincial constitutions passed for the government of the English church, which derived their force only from the royal assent, for from the time of William I. to the Reformation, no canons or constitutions passed by any synod were permitted to be acted upon without the royal assent. The provincial canons were collected and arranged by Lyndwood, Dean of the Arches in the reign of Henry VI. A general revision of the canons was proposed at the Reformation, and the important task was intrusted to Archbishop Cranmer. The work was finished, but as the king died before it was confirmed, the old canons continued in force till the reign of James I., when the clergy being assembled in convocation A. D. 1603, the king gave them leave by his letters patent to treat, consult, and agree on canons. A revised collection of canons was accordingly prepared, and being authorized by the king's commission, they were confirmed by act of parliament, and became part of the law of the land, and continue so to this day, though some of them regulating matters of inferior moment, such as the dress of the clergy, have been allowed to become obsolete.

CANONS MINOR, also called VICARS, clergymen in England attached to a cathedral under the dean and chapter. During the period from the Conquest to the Reformation, each Canon was bound to maintain a vicar skilled in music, to supply his place when absent, in the ministrations of the church. This seems to be the origin of the Minor Canons. Before the Reformation they were enjoined to keep perpetual residence, and never to be absent without leave from the dean. In 1835, power was given by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with the sanction of an order in council, to reduce the number of Minor Canons; in no case more than six, nor less than two; each to have an income of £150; each may hold one benefice, but within six miles of the cathedral. The Minor Canons are in general constantly resident, and divide the services of the cathedral church between them.

CANONS (WHITE). See PRÆMONSTRATENSIANS.

CANOPUS, one of the divinities of the ancient Egyptians, supposed to be the god of water, and represented, as some allege, in the shape of a jar with small feet, a thin neck, a swollen body, and round back. Jars are frequently seen on the Egyptian monuments; but the existence of a jar-god is at best somewhat problematical. Rougemont thinks, that it is highly probable that Canopus, or the jar-god, was an image of the Spirit of God, producing and penetrating the world. In the opinion of Jomard, based upon his researches among the antiquities of Egypt, the image of Canopus is supposed to represent the spherical Nile-cup, and is emblematical of the fact, that this cup is the mysterious mundane cup, containing the primordial elements of fire and water, and that being offered to the great god of nature, he is to determine the just proportion of the mixture. In reference to Egypt, Heracles is surnamed Canopus or Canobus, the god of the waters; and the Canobian and the Heracleian mouths of the Nile are synonymous phrases.

CANTABRARI, officers among the ancient heathens who carried the ensigns and banners of their gods in their processions, and games, and festivals.

CANTHARUS, a cistern of water, which, in the ancient Christian churches, was placed in the atrium or court before the church, that the people might wash their hands and face before they entered the place of worship. While, by some authors, this cistern is called cantharus, by others it is termed phiale. Among the ancient Romans, the cantharus was a kind of drinking-cup with handles. This was also the name of a cup sacred to BACCHUS (which see).

CANUSIS, an order of monks or secular priests in Japan, who officiate in the mias or temples. They are either maintained by the money which had been originally given to found the mia to which they may happen to belong, or by a pension from the Dairi, but their principal support is derived from the voluntary contributions of the devotees. The Canusis wear, as a badge of their office, either a white or yellow robe over their ordinary dress. Their cap, which is made in the shape of a boat, is tied under the chin with silken strings. Upon this cap are tassels with fringes to them, which are longer or shorter according to the rank of the person who wears them. Their beards are close shaven, but their hair is very long. The superiors, however, wear it curled up under a piece of black gauze. At each ear is a large piece of silk, which comes forward over the lower part of the face. The order of the Canusis depends, with respect to spiritual concerns, on the decision of the Dairi, and with regard to temporal matters, they are subject, like all other ecclesiastics, to the authority of a judge, who bears the title of spiritual judge of the temple, and is appointed by the secular monarch. The superiors of the Canusis are remarkable for their pride and contempt of the common people. They are to be seen scattered throughout all the provinces and cities of the empire. The leading monks reside at Miaco, but, though invested with great authority and influence over the people, they are always subject to the imperial authority, which punishes ecclesiastical delinquents with death.

The Canusis, in their discourses to the people, dwell chiefly on points of morality. They preach from a rostrum or pulpit, and alongside of them is placed the tutelary idol of the sect, or order to which they belong, and to this idol the devotees present their freewill-offerings. On each side of the pulpit there is a lighted lamp suspended from the canopy; and a little below it is a desk or pew for the younger priests, where some of them sit and others stand. The preacher wears a hat upon his head, shaped like an umbrella, and holds a fan in his hand. Before commencing his sermon, he appears to meditate for a little, then rings a small bell by way of enjoining silence upon his audience; and on silence being obtained, he opens a book which lies upon the cushion before him, containing the moral precepts and fundamental principles of the religion of his sect. Having chosen his text, he delivers his discourse, which is usually clear and vigorous in its language, and strictly methodical in its arrangement. The peroration very often consists of a high-flown eulogium upon the order to which the preacher belongs. The audience are called upon by the ringing of the little bell, to kneel down and say their prayers, sometimes before, and sometimes after the sermon. On certain days set apart for praying for the dead, the Japanese priests, as well as monks, sing the Namanda to the sound of little bells, for the repose of their deceased friends.

CAPELLANI. See CHAPLAINS.

CAPEROLANS, a congregation of monks in Italy, in the fifteenth century, who derived their name from Pietro Caperole, their founder. The monasteries of this order are found at Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona.

CAPITOLINS, a term of reproach applied by the NOVATIANS (which see) to the Catholics for receiving such as went to sacrifice at the Capitol at Rome.

CAPITOLIUM, a small temple which is said to have been erected by Numa on the Esquiline hill, and dedicated to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. This was the original or old Capitolium, but the appellation was afterwards given to the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, which stood on the Tarpeian rock, and was said to have derived its name from a human head (caput) being found on digging the foundations of the building. It was begun to be built by Tarquinius Priscus, continued by Servius Tullius, and completed by Tarquinius Superbus. It was three times burnt down, and as often rebuilt at the public expense. The Capitolium contained three temples within the same peristyle, and under the same roof; the middle being dedicated to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, with the temple of Minerva on the right, and that of Juno on the left. The term Capitolium was also used to denote other temples besides those of Rome.

CAPITULA, instructions given by the prelates in former times to regulate the proceedings of the clergy of their dioceses.

CAPITULARIES, the imperial ordinances of the Franks, which, after the extension of their empire, were distinguished from the national laws. All royal enactments, particularly in later times, were called Capitularia or Capitula, perhaps from their consisting of different heads (capita) or chapters. From the intimate connection, or rather confusion, of the church with the state, these Capitularies frequently referred to ecclesiastical matters, and were passed at assemblies in which bishops took a part. The first collection of Capitularies, which was published in 1545, was edited by Vitus Amerpachius, and was limited to the principal Capitularies issued by Charlemagne on ecclesiastical and civil affairs. A great collection of the Capitularies of the Franks was afterwards prepared with notes, by Stephen Baluze, and published in two volumes folio, at Paris in 1677, and reprinted at Venice in 1771, and a new edition appeared at Paris in 1780.

CAPITULUM, in ecclesiastical writers was employed to denote part of a chapter of the Bible read and explained, and afterwards the place where such exercises were performed received the name of domus capituli, the house of the Capitulum.

CAPNOMANCY (Gr. capnos, smoke, and mantia, divination), a species of divination employed by the ancient heathens in their sacrifices. If the smoke was thin and light, and went straight upwards, the omen was favourable; but if the smoke was thick and dark, not rising upwards, but resting like a cloud over the fire, the omen was unfavourable. See DIVINATION.

CAPTA, a surname of MINERVA (which see), worshipped on the Cœlian hill at Rome.

CAPUCHE, a cap or hood worn by a particular order of Franciscan friars, hence called CAPUCHINS (see next article). It is sewed to the dress, and hangs usually down the back.

CAPUCHINS, a religious institution of the order of St. Francis, derived from the capuche which they wore. It originated with Matthew Bassi, a minor Observantine friar of the duchy of Spoleto in Italy, who asserted, in 1525, that he had a divine call to observe a stricter rule of poverty. He retired, accordingly, to a solitary place, accompanied by other twelve monks, forming, with the permission of the Pope, Clement VII., a new congregation. They were allowed by the Pope the privilege of wearing the square capuche, and admitted among them all who would consent to wear the appointed habit. The vows of this order were of the strictest and most austere character; and so great was its success, that the other Franciscans looked upon the Capuchins with the bitterest envy and malignity. Thus the order of the Capuchins commenced A. D. 1527. The rules drawn up for their government by Bassi enjoined, among other things, that the monks should perform divine service without singing, and that they should say but one mass a day in their convents. Hours were arranged for mental prayer morning and evening; days of discipline were appointed, and also days of silence. They forbade the monks to hear the confessions of seculars, and enjoined them always to travel on foot; they recommended poverty in the ornaments of their church, and prohibited in them the use of gold, silver, and silk; the pavilions of the altars were to be of stuff, and the chalices of tin.

The order of the Capuchins soon spread all over Italy, and was introduced also into Sicily. It was established in France in 1573, with the consent of Pope Gregory XIII. In the course of the following century it passed into Spain, and so rapidly has it been diffused over the whole world, that it is one of the largest and most widely spread orders in the Romish church; and besides, it is the order which is the most respected, and held in the highest repute among the whole of the monastic institutions. Father Paul observes, that "the Capuchins preserve their reputation in consequence of their poverty; and that if they should suffer the least change in their institution, they would acquire no immovable estates by it, but would lose the alms they now receive." There is an order of Capuchin nuns, as well as monks. These, following the rules of St. CLARA (which see), were first established at Naples in 1538, by a pious and devout lady, belonging to a noble family of Catalonia in Spain. The monastery was put by the Pope under the government of the Capuchins, and, accordingly, the nuns having adopted the dress of that order, were called Capuchines, and on account of their austerity they received the name also of "Nuns of the Passion." Monasteries of the same kind were formed in various places.

CAPUT EXTORUM, the convex upper portion of the liver in animals, from the appearance of which, in the victims slain in sacrifice, the ancient Roman soothsayers drew their auguries. If that portion of the animal was sound and healthy, the omen was favourable; but if unhealthy, the omen was unfavourable. If this portion of the liver was wanting, it was a bad sign, but if it was well marked and double, it was a good sign. See DIVINATION.

CAPUTIATI, a semi-political denomination which appeared in the twelfth century, deriving their name from a singular kind of cap which distinguished their party. They wore upon their caps a leaden image of the Virgin Mary. Their avowed object was to level all distinctions, to abolish magistracy, and to remove all subordination among mankind, restoring what they considered as primitive liberty and natural equality. This sect soon disappeared.

CARAITES (Heb. Karaim, textualists), a small modern sect of the Jews, who avow their attachment to the text of the Scriptures. They are chiefly found in the Crimea, Lithuania, and Persia; at Damascus, Constantinople, and Cairo. The name was originally given to the school of Schammai, about thirty years before Christ, because they rejected the traditions of the elders, which were believed by the school of Hillel and the Pharisees. They disowned also the fanciful interpretations of the Cabbala (which see). The Caraites themselves claim a very high antiquity, alleging that the genuine succession of the Jewish church is to be found only with them; and, accordingly, they produce a long list of doctors reaching in an uninterrupted series as far back as Ezra the scribe. Whether this claim be well-founded or not, it cannot be denied that the sect has existed for many centuries. The Rabbinites have been accustomed to regard them as Sadducees, but their doctrines are in no sense the same with the tenets of that infidel sect. They believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures, the resurrection of the dead, and the final judgment. They deny the Messiah to be already come, and reject all calculations as to the time of his appearance; yet they say that it is proper that "even every day they should receive their salvation by Messiah the son of David." They differ from the Rabbinites in various ceremonies, in the observance of their festivals, and are much more strict in their observance of the Jewish Sabbath. Their opinions differ from the Rabbis as to the sacredness and indissoluble character of the marriage tie. The principal difference between the Caraites and the rest of the Jews is, that they adhere closely to the text of the Scripture, and reject all paraphrases, additions, and glosses of the Rabbis.

The ten fundamental articles of the Caraitic creed are as follows:

"1. That all material existences, the worlds and all that are in them, are created.

"2. That the creator of these things is himself uncreated.

"3. That there is no similitude of him, but that he is in every respect one alone.

"4. That Moses our master (peace to his memory) was sent by him.

"5. That with and by Moses he sent us his perfect law.

"6. That the faithful are bound to know the language of our law and its exposition—that is, the Scripture and its interpretation.

"7. That the blessed God guided the other prophets by the prophetic spirit.

"8. That the blessed God will restore the children of men to life at the day of judgment.

"9. That the blessed God will render to every man according to his ways and the fruit of his deeds.

"10. That the blessed God has not rejected his people in captivity, even while under his chastisements; but it is proper that even every day they should receive their salvation by Messiah the son of David."

One of the most eminent doctors of the Caraitic sect, Caleb Aba, who flourished towards the end of the fifteenth century, has given a very distinct account of the schism between the Caraites and the Rabbinitis. He alleges it to have rested on three grounds which he thus states :

“First.—The Rabbinitis think that many things were delivered orally to Moses on mount Sinai, which are not comprehended in the written law; that these things were delivered by Moses to Joshua his disciple, by Joshua to the elders, and by them to their successors from generation to generation: so that all these things were never written by the hand of Moses, but were transmitted by oral tradition only, till a period arrived in which, when the oral law was in danger of being wholly forgotten, it was thought expedient by the men of that age to commit to writing whatever each individual had received from his predecessor.—But we Caraites believe none of these things; but only those which the blessed God commanded to him who was faithful in his house, even all things that are found written in the law.

“Secondly.—The Rabbinitis maintain, that those things which are written in the law require expositions to be derived from the Cabbala, which they fabricate according to their own fancy. But we, on the contrary, believe that all scripture brings with it its own interpretation: and that if in some places it is very concise, there are others in which its sense is more fully stated, and that the scripture is to be considered as addressed to beings endued with understanding.

“Thirdly.—They assert that the law has given them the power of adding or diminishing, in those things which pertain to the precepts and exhortations of the law, according as shall appear right to the wise men of each generation; even, they say, if those wise men should decree the right hand to be the left, or the left hand to be the right. But this we altogether deny.”

The Caraites differ from the Rabbis also in regard to several of the leading Jewish feasts. They reject the Rabbinical calendar, and celebrate the feast of new moon only when they can observe that luminary. They make use of Talleth; but have no Menzmoth or Tephillin, alleging that the passages in which these things are believed by the Rabbis to be enjoined, are to be understood not in a literal, but in a figurative meaning. They have no printed copies of the Scriptures, and therefore they prize highly the manuscripts, and every member of their synagogue is expected to transcribe the whole or the greater part of the Law at least once in the course of his life. Mr. Elliot, in his ‘Travels in the Three Great Empires of Austria, Russia, and Turkey,’ mentions that they are in possession of Tartar Targums, or versions of the Old Testament in that language. This traveller gives the most gratifying account of this small sect of the modern Israelites, having met with various members of the body in the course of his journeys.

“From all we could ascertain, in personal conference with these sons of Israel, and with their neighbours, as well as from what is recorded concerning them, it appears that they hold the Jewish faith in much purity and simplicity; adhering so strictly to the letter of the Law, that, as their rabbi informed us, they allow no fire to be seen in their town on the Sabbath, neither for light, warmth, culinary purposes, nor even for smoking; though it is well known the Talmudists find little difficulty in evading the Levitical prohibition. Their morals are unusually blameless. At Odessa, where several hundreds of them are established as merchants, they enjoy a high character for honesty and general probity—forming a striking contrast to the Jews of other denominations. In Poland, the records of the police prove that no Karaite has been punished for an offence against the laws for four centuries; and in Gallicia, the Government has exempted them, on account of their good conduct, from the imposts levied on other Hebrews, conferring on them, at the same time, all the privileges enjoyed by their Christian fellow-subjects.”

There is some evidence that the Caraites, though opposed to tradition, adopted the use of the Hebrew points at a very early period, thus seeming to contradict the opinion of those who maintain the comparatively recent origin of the vowel points.

CARBONARI (Lat. charcoal-men), a modern politico-religious sect in Italy, supposed either to have originated from the Freemasons, or to have been formed in imitation of that institution, meeting in secret societies, and observing certain mystical rites and signs. Like the Freemasons they pretended to derive their first principles from the Scriptures, applying them, however, chiefly to political purposes. In 1820 the Pope issued a bull of great length against these Carbonari, containing numerous passages of Sacred Scripture, in which obedience to the constituted authorities is recommended as a precept of the Divine Law. His Holiness afterwards observes, that Clement XII. in 1738, and Benedict XIV. in 1751, had condemned and proscribed the secret society of Freemasons, of which that of the Carbonari is only a ramification. Following the example of these popes, the sovereign pontiff pronounces the same condemnation of these new sectaries, fulminating the pains of excommunication against all who shall become affiliated members of the Carbonari, or who shall not immediately withdraw from the association. Such secret societies, however, notwithstanding the anathema of the Pope, are still in active operation in various parts of Italy.

CARDEA (Lat. Cardo, a hinge), a female deity among the ancient Romans, who presided over and protected the hinges of doors, preventing the entrance of evil spirits into houses.

CARDINAL (Lat. Cardo, a hinge), one of the highest officers of the Church of Rome. The word has been long in use as an ecclesiastical term, and was applied originally to the regular clergy of the metropolitan churches. In Italy, Gaul, and other countries, these churches received the name of cardinal churches; and their ministers were called cardinals. Cardinalis sacerdos was the title of a bishop; cardinales presbyteri or diaconi were names given to those who held an office in the church, not temporarily, but as a fixed appointment. In the tenth century, the canons of the cathedral churches, in contradistinction from the clergy of the parochial churches, were denominated cardinals. In the eleventh century, however, the term became restricted to the Romish church, and was used to denote the seven suffragan bishops in the immediate vicinity of Rome. These were the bishops of Ostia, Porta, St. Rufina, St. Sabina, Palestrina, Frascati, and Albano, and although, from their neighbourhood to the city of Rome, they were well adapted to aid the Pope with their counsel, they seem at first to have possessed no rights superior to those of the other clergy. But Nicholas II., at the Lateran council in A. D. 1059, enacted a special law on the subject of papal elections, by which it was provided that the Pope should be chosen by the cardinal bishops and priests, with the concurrence of the rest of the Roman clergy, and of the Roman people, and with a certain participation of the emperor, and that none other than a person so chosen should be considered as pope. Thus was laid the foundation of the college of cardinals, which forms the ecclesiastical council of the Pope. To these seven bishops, which, by the union of Porta with St. Rufina, have since been reduced to six, was given the name of cardinal bishops of the church of Rome, or cardinals of the Lateran church, implying that they form the hinge on which the church turns.

The election of the Pope being thus taken out of the hands of the emperors, and vested in a small body of the clergy, the hierarchy of the church was rendered in a great measure independent both of the great body of the clergy and of the secular power. This bold encroachment of the ecclesiastical upon the civil authorities was afterwards contested by the princes of the German States, especially by those of Saxony and the house of Hohenstaufen. But these conflicts uniformly issued in favour of the Pope. In the year A. D. 1179, Alexander III., through the canons of the Lateran, succeeded in carrying the encroachment a step, by rendering the election of the Pope by the college of cardinals absolutely valid in itself, without the ratification of the emperor. Similar decrees were issued by Innocent III. A. D. 1215, and Innocent IV. A. D. 1254. At length Gregory X. in A. D. 1274, finally established the conclave of cardinals for the election of the Pope, which exists to this day. The further history of this important body is thus briefly sketched by Mr. Coleman in his 'Christian Antiquities':

"The college of cardinals, which, until the twelfth century, had been restricted to Rome and its vicinity, has since been greatly enlarged, so as to become the supreme court of the church universal.

Priests of illustrious name in other provinces and countries have been elevated to the dignity of cardinals. Of this Alexander III. gave the first example in the year 1165, by conferring the honour upon Galdinus Sala, archbishop of Milan, and upon Conrad, archbishop of Mentz. But, to the injury of the church, the greater part have ever been restricted to the limits of Rome and Italy.

"The formal classification of the cardinals into three distinct orders—1. Cardinal bishops; 2. Cardinal presbyters; 3. Cardinal deacons—was made by Paul II. in the fifteenth century. He also gave them, instead of the scarlet robe, which they had worn since the year 1244, a purple robe, from whence they derived the name of the purple—a title indicative not merely of their superiority to bishops and archbishops, but of their regal honours and rights. Boniface VIII. gave them the title of eminentissimi, most eminent; and Pius V., in 1567, decreed that no other should have the name of cardinal.

"The number of cardinals was at first not less than seven, and, after having ranged from seven to fifty-three, it was reduced again, in the year 1277, to the minimum above mentioned. The General Assembly of the church of Basil limited the number to twenty-four; but the popes from this time increased them at their pleasure. Under Leo X. there were sixty-five cardinals; Paul IV. and Pius V. decreed that the maximum should be seventy—equal in number to the disciples of Jesus. These were arranged under the following grades:—1. Six cardinal bishops with the following titles: the bishops of Ostia, Porta, Albano, Frascati, Sabina, and Palæstrina. 2. Fifty cardinal priests, who were named after the parochial and cathedral churches of Rome. 3. Fourteen cardinal deacons, who were named after the chapels. This number was seldom full; but since 1814 they have again become quite numerous."

The chief cardinal-bishop, cardinal-priest, and cardinal-deacon, are called chiefs of the order. In this quality they possess the prerogative in the conclave of receiving the visits of ambassadors, and giving audience to magistrates. All cardinals, on their promotion to the dignity, lose all the benefices, pensions, and offices they may have hitherto held. From the moment of their investment with the cardinalate, these places are held to be vacant, and it rests with the Pope to restore their benefices to them, and to bestow others upon them that they may have it in their power to live suitably to their princely dignity. They are now supposed to be entitled to dispute precedence with the nearest relatives of sovereigns, and with all princes who are not actually invested with royal authority. The red caps which cardinals wear, were bestowed upon them by Innocent IV. in the council of Lyons held in A. D. 1243; while the red gown was appointed by Paul II. in A. D. 1464. Gregory XIV. bestowed the red cap upon the regular cardinals, who wore only a hat before. At one time the title "most illustrious" was that which was usually applied to cardinals, but Urban VIII. gave them the still higher title of "Eminence." When they are sent to the courts of princes, it is in the quality of legates a latere; and when they are sent to any town, their government is called a legation.

The office of a cardinal is that of a spiritual prince, to govern the church in all parts of the world, and hence the Romish clergy from different countries are allowed to aspire to the dignity. When the cardinal goes to Rome to receive his hat from the Pope in person, he must be dressed in a rural habit, that is, a short purple dress. The moment he reaches the city he must pay his respects to the Holy Father, but must put on long vestments when he goes to audience; and on returning to his house he must remain there until a public consistory is held. The ceremony of receiving the red hat from the Pope's hands is thus described by Picart:

"On the day of the public consistory, the new cardinal goes thither in his coach of state, attended by his friends, in order to receive the red hat. In case the candidate be an archbishop or a bishop, he must wear the black pontifical hat. The eldest cardinals walk two and two into the hall of the consistory; when after having paid obeisance, or kissed the Pope's hand, two cardinal-deacons advance forward toward the cardinal elect, and lead him to the Pope, to whom he makes three very low bows; the first at the entrance of his Holiness's apartment, the second in the middle of it, and the third at the foot of the throne. He then goes up the steps, kisses his Holiness's feet, who also admits him ad osculum oris, or to kiss his mouth: this being done, the cardinal elect performs the osculum pacis, which is done by embracing all the senior cardinals, and giving them the kiss of peace.

"This first ceremony being ended, the choir chaunt the Te Deum, when the cardinals walk two and two to the papal chapel, then march round the altar, with the cardinal elect, accompanied by one of the seniors, who gives him the upper hand for that time only. This being done, the cardinal elect kneels on the steps of the altar, when the chief master of the ceremonies puts the cape or capuche on his head, which hangs behind his cope; and whilst they are chaunting the Te Ergo of the Te Deum, he falls prostrate on his belly, and continues in this posture; not only till this hymn is ended, but also till the cardinal-deacon, who is then standing at the altar on the epistle-side, has read certain prayers inserted in the Pontifical.

"These prayers being ended, the new cardinal rises up: his cape is lowered; after which the cardinal-deacon, in presence of two heads of orders, and the cardinal camerlingo, presents him the bull of the oath he is to take. Having read it, he swears 'He is ready to shed his blood for the holy Romish Church, and for the maintenance of the privileges of the apostolic clergy, among whom he is incorporated.'

"All the cardinals return afterwards into the chamber of the consistory, in the same order as they came out from thence. The newly elected cardinal goes thither also, walking on the right hand of that senior cardinal who accompanied him to the chapel. He then kneels down before the Pope; one of the masters of the ceremonies draws the capuche over his head, and his Holiness puts the red velvet hat over the cape, repeating certain prayers at the same time.

"Then the Pope withdraws, and the cardinals, as they go out of the consistory, stop in the hall, where they make a ring; whereupon the newly elected cardinal comes and salutes them in the middle of it, and thanks them one after the other, for the honour they have done him in receiving him as one of their brethren. His compliment being ended, the senior cardinals come one after another, and congratulate him on his promotion."

The red hat, which has with such pomp and ceremony been bestowed upon the cardinal, is carried to his palace in a large silver gilt basin. In the first secret consistory which is held after his election, the cardinal attends, when the Pope performs the ceremony of shutting his mouth; that is, his Holiness lays his hand upon the mouth of the newly elected cardinal, with the view of reminding him that he is now bound to exercise the utmost prudence and circumspection in his speech. In the second or third consistory, another ceremony is gone through of opening his mouth, on which occasion the Pope addresses an exhortation to the new cardinal, gives him his title, and puts on the ring-finger of his right hand a gold ring set with a sapphire, to show, according to a bull of Gregory XV., that "the church is now his spouse, and that he must never abandon her." The formal address of the Pope to the cardinal in opening his mouth is couched in these words, "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, we open your mouth that you may give your opinion in our conferences and councils, in all necessary cases, or in such as relate to the cardinals or their functions; in our consistory, out of the consistory, or at the election of a sovereign pontiff."

When the Pope is pleased by special favour to send the hat to an absent cardinal, the following ceremony takes place:—"The hat, in this case, is carried by an honorary chamberlain, or a gentleman of the Pope's household, together with a brief, directed to the nuncio, or the bishop of the place where the cardinal elect resides. As soon as the latter hears of the approach of the chamberlain who brings the hat, he sends his household to meet him, and as many of his friends as he can get together for that purpose, to do him the greater honour, when they all make their entry together in cavalcade, if allowed by the custom of the place. Then the Pope's chamberlain holds the red hat aloft on the mace, in order that it may be seen by all the spectators.

"The Pope's envoy, and the prelate who is to perform the ceremony, meet on a Sunday, or some high festival, at the newly elected cardinal's with their domestics and as many friends as they can get together, and go in cavalcade to the principal church of the place in the following order:—

“The march is opened by the drums and trumpets; then come the livery-servants. The soldiers upon guard, in case there be any, or the inhabitants of the town under arms, march before the gentlemen, and afterwards the Pope's chamberlain appears in a purple habit, holding the red hat aloft and uncovered. Immediately after follows the newly elected cardinal, with his cope on, his capuche on his head, and over all a black hat. On the right hand the prelate marches who is to perform the ceremony, and on his left some other person of quality, such as the chief nobleman of the place; and behind him the coaches of the cardinal, and of all such persons as are proud of doing him honour, with a great train. When this ceremony is performed in any place where a king or prince resides, their guards always attend on the newly elected cardinal.

“When the cavalcade is come to the church, mass is sung in it, and it is usual for the king or prince of the place, as also the chief lords and ladies of the court, to be present at it. Mass being ended, the prelate who is to perform the ceremony puts on his cope and mitre; then, being seated in an easy chair which stands on the steps of the altar, with his back turned to it, the person who brought the hat lays it on the altar, and presents the Pope's brief to the prelate, who gives it to his secretary, and this latter reads it with an audible voice, so as to be heard by the whole congregation. Immediately after, the prelate makes an oration in praise of the newly elected cardinal, and, at the conclusion, declares that he is ready to deliver the hat to him, according to His Holiness' order.

Another ceremony of considerable length, and which it is unnecessary to describe in detail, takes place when a cardinal enters upon formal possession of his title. On that occasion all the congregation come and kiss his hand, with the exception of the officiating priest, to whom he gives the kiss of peace on his right cheek. He enjoys all episcopal rights in his own church, but is not obliged to residence. Cardinals assist, with their rochet on, in such offices as are performed on the most solemn festivals in their churches, where they bless the people in a solemn manner, and are seated under a canopy on a kind of throne. Their testimony is to be taken in a court of justice without the formality of an oath, and their single testimony is considered in Romish countries as equal to that of two witnesses. They have it in their power to grant an hundred days indulgence to any one, and they acknowledge no judge or superior; but the Pope alone, particularly in criminal matters; for, as to civil matters they are always heard before the auditors of the apostolic chamber.

When a cardinal dies, his body is embalmed as soon as possible after death, and the corpse is carried into the church where his obsequies are to be solemnized. The church is hung inside with black velvet and adorned with escutcheons, on which are represented the arms of the deceased. A great number of tapers are lighted up on both sides of the nave. The body of the deceased cardinal, dressed in pontifical vestments, with a mitre on his head, is laid on a bed of state in the middle of the church, with his feet towards the great gate, and his head towards the high altar. The office of the dead is performed by several monks and priests in presence of the cardinals with great solemnity. At night the body is stripped and laid in a leaden coffin, which is put in another of cypress-wood, covered with black cloth. The interment usually takes place with great pomp, a solemn procession conducting the body to its place of burial. A devotion of nine days is observed for deceased cardinals, on the first and last days of which a hundred and fifty masses must be said, when a small piece of money and two small candles are given to each officiating priest. On each of the other seven days a hundred masses are said.

CARIUS, a surname of ZEUS (which see), under which he was worshipped at Mylassa in Caria, and also in Thessaly and Bœotia.

CARMATHIANS, a heretical sect of Mohammedans, so called from their founder, Carmath, who promulgated his doctrines in the end of the ninth century. Himself a man of an austere life, he alleged that it was the duty of every man to pray, not five times, throughout the day, but fifty times. And this practice he established among his followers, who found it necessary to neglect their worldly avocations and to apply themselves to a life of almost incessant devotion. They ate many things forbidden by Mohammed, and believed that the angels were the guides of all their actions. They alleged the Koran to be an allegory, and prayer to be a symbol of obedience paid to the Imam, or chief of their sect. Instead of giving the tenth of their goods, which the Mohammedans are enjoined to give to the poor, the Carmathians laid aside one-fifth part of their substance for the Imam. Their founder inculcated upon them an inviolable secrecy as to the doctrines which he taught, revealing them to none except the members of their own sect; and, as a symbolical representation of this enforced silence, he established a system of fasts. The strange doctrine was laid down, that fidelity to the Imam was denoted by the zeal and professed sanctity of their founder, who, anxious to propagate extensively the new opinions, chose twelve of his chief followers, whom he called apostles, and to whom he gave special authority over the members of the sect. The civil authorities, however, considering the new doctrine as opposed to the Koran, seized Carmath and imprisoned him; but having escaped from prison, his followers zealously spread the report that he had been delivered miraculously, and was taken up to heaven. In a short time he made his appearance in another part of the country, and, being hotly pursued by his enemies, he fled into Syria and was never more heard of. After the disappearance of Carmath, however, the sect which he had formed still continued to exist, and, in order to enhance the fame of their founder, they sedulously taught that he was a divinely commissioned prophet, who had been sent into the world to publish a new law to mankind, to suppress the legal ceremonies of Mohammedanism, and to inculcate the true nature and duty of prayer, in opposition to the erroneous creed of the Mussulmans. The existence of this sect was but temporary. It flourished for some years, but in process of time died away.

CARMELITES, an order of monks established in the twelfth century on Mount Carmel in Palestine. It was founded by Berthold, a Calabrian, who pretended to have been guided by a vision of the prophet Elijah, to choose this spot as the seat of a tower and a small church, which he occupied with only ten companions. From this small beginning arose the important order of the Carmelites, which some writers have attempted to trace back as far as the time of Elijah, who they allege was called "bald-head" because he had adopted the tonsure. By some writers it was argued that there had been a regular succession of hermits upon Mount Carmel from the sons of the prophets to the time of Christ, and that these hermits had from an early period continued the succession to the twelfth century. In A. D. 1205, this order obtained a rule from the Latin patriarch, Albert of Jerusalem, which consisted of sixteen articles, requiring them, among other things, to confine themselves to their cells, except when at work, and to spend their time in prayer; to possess no individual property; to fast from the festival of the Holy Cross till Easter, except on Sundays; to abstain from eating flesh altogether; to labour with their hands; and to observe total silence from vespers till the terce of the next day. This rule was mitigated to a considerable extent by Innocent IV., and by Honorius III. the Carmelites were placed among the approved orders of the Romish Church, and he gave them the name of Brothers of the Virgin Mary. On the conclusion of the peace with the Saracens, A. D. 1229, the Carmelites left Syria, and dispersed, some of them to Cyprus, others to Sicily, and others to France. In A. D. 1240, they came to England, and at one time they had about forty religious houses in that country. In the sixteenth century, St. Theresa, a Spanish lady, undertook to reform the order. They were now divided into two classes. The Carmelites of the ancient observance were called the mitigated, or moderate; the reformed, or those of the strict observance, were called BAREFOOTED CARMELITES (see next article), because they went with their feet bare. The former were distributed into forty provinces, under one general. The latter quarrelled among themselves, and became divided into the congregation of Spain, containing six provinces, and the congregation of Italy, embracing all the rest. There were nine or ten religious houses of the Carmelites in Scotland. It is one of the most celebrated of the mendicant orders in the Romish Church, and is often known by the name of the order of St. Mary of Mount Carmel. By Pope John XXIII. Carmelite monks were exempted from episcopal jurisdiction, and secured against the pains of purgatory. Urban IV. gave three years of indulgence to those who should call the Carmelites, Brothers of Mary. That part of their rule which forbade them to eat flesh was repealed by Eugene VI., in reward for having burnt alive one of their own order who had declared that the Church of Rome had become so corrupt as to require a reformation. The Carmelite order wear a cassock, a scapulary, a patience, a hood of a brown colour, a white plaited cloak, and a black hat. According to a tradition of the Carmelites, Simon Stock, the prior-general, A. D. 1251, received the scapulary from the Virgin. "The Virgin appeared to me," Stock is made to say, "with a great retinue, and, holding up the habit of the order, exclaimed, 'This shall be a privilege to thee, and to the whole body of the Carmelites; whosoever shall die in it will be preserved from the eternal flames.'"

CARMELITES (BAREFOOTED), a branch of the Carmelite order which was originated by a lady of the name of Theresa, who was born of noble parents at Avila in Spain, A. D. 1515. At the age of twenty she entered a convent of Carmelite nuns; and being impressed with the necessity of a reformation of the order, she built a small convent at Avila, under the name of St. Joseph, and in the congregation of nuns which she thus formed, began those improvements which were rapidly adopted by others. Seventeen monastic establishments were constituted on the same model, and, in A. D. 1562, Pius IV. confirmed and approved her rule. Theresa died in 1582, and was canonized by Gregory XV., in 1622. The order now under consideration wear the same dress as the other Carmelites, but of a very coarse cloth, and go barefooted, hence their name.

CARMENTA, one of the CAMENÆ (which see) or prophetic nymphs of the ancient Roman mythology. A temple was reared to her in Rome at the foot of the Capitoline hill, and a festival celebrated in her honour, called CARMENTALIA (see next article). She is said to have been the mother of Evander the Arcadian by Hermes, and having persuaded her son to kill his father, she fled with him to Italy, where she gave oracles to the people and to Hercules. She was put to death by her son at the advanced age of one hundred and ten, and then was ranked among the gods. The Greek name was Themis, and the Latin Carmenta was probably derived from carmen, a verse, prophecies being usually delivered in verse.

CARMENTALIA, a Roman festival in honour of CARMENTA (see preceding article). Plutarch alleges it to be as ancient as the time of Romulus, the founder of Rome. The Carmentalia were celebrated annually on the 11th January.

CARNA, a Roman goddess who was thought to preside over the vital organs of the human body, such as the heart, the lungs, and the liver. She had a sanctuary on the Coelian hill at Rome, and a festival was celebrated in her honour on the 1st of June, and, on that occasion, beans and bacon were offered to her.

CARNEI (Lat. Caro, flesh), an opprobrious name applied by the ORIGENIANS (which see) to the early Christians, because of their maintenance of the doctrine that the bodies of men after the resurrection should be composed of flesh and bones as they are now, only altered in quality, not in substance.

CARNEIUS, a surname of Apollo, under which, from very ancient times, he was worshipped in various parts of Greece, but especially in the Peloponnesus. Some derive the epithet from Carnus, a soothsayer whom Hippotes killed, and, in consequence of this deed of slaughter, Apollo sent a plague upon the army of Hippotes as he was marching to Peloponnesus. To propitiate the god, the worship of Carneius Apollo is said to have been instituted. By others, the surname is derived from Carnus or Carneius, a son of Zeus and Europa, who was a special favourite of Apollo. A festival was regularly kept in Greece to Carneius Apollo. (See next article.)

CARNEIA, a great national festival among the ancient Spartans in honour of Apollo CARNEIUS (see preceding article). It commenced on the seventh day of the Grecian month Carneios, and continued for the space of nine days, during which nine tents were pitched in the neighbourhood of the city, and in each of these tents nine men lived as in the time of war. A boat is also said to have been carried sound, on which was a statue of Apollo Carneius adorned with garlands. Sacrifices were offered during the Carneia by a priest called Agetes, to whom were allotted, as his attendants, five men chosen from each of the Spartan tribes, who continued in office for four years, during which they were doomed to celibacy. Musical contests took place as a part of the Carneia.

CARNIVAL, a Romish festival, celebrated at Rome and Venice with the most unbounded mirth and revelry. It is held from Twelfth Day till Lent, and in the south of Germany is called Faschings. The word carnival seems to be derived from the Latin words carne and vale, because at that festival Romanists took leave of flesh; but Ducange considers it to have had its origin in the Latin name given to the feast in the middle ages, carne-levamen. As the long fast of Lent was to commence immediately after the carnival, it was thought to be a suitable employment to devote themselves, during the festival, to all kinds of enjoyment, spending the season in such excess of pleasure and riot as to resemble, if it was not an intended imitation of, the pagan Saturnalia of the ancient Romans. The carnival lasts for eight days, and, during the latter days of the festival more especially, Rome exhibits a scene of the most unbridled folly, mummery, and absurdity of every kind. Mr. Whiteside, in his 'Italy in the Nineteenth Century,' declares the carnival, from his own personal observation, to be "a scene of buffoonery, jollity, extravagance, and caricature, which has no parallel in the world;" and the same interesting and faithful traveller goes on to remark: "The carnival in Naples is contemptible compared with that in Rome, and yet the Neapolitans are naturally more excitable than the Romans. I bear willing testimony, however, to the invincible good humour of the Italian people. The most entertaining of their caricatures consisted in their grotesque delineations of real life in all its varieties. There was an impudent mountebank who imitated a lawyer, and ridiculed the learned profession; he was dressed in black, with wig and peruke, a false nose, spectacles, and band; carried a law book under his arm, which he occasionally opened; wrangled with the passengers, threatened, abused, would put the folk in his process, and bring them to condign punishment. I almost considered the impostor as personal in his behaviour towards me, but I remained dumb in the presence of a master spirit. All professions are ridiculed except the priesthood; no allusion is made to monks, nuns, friars, or priests. Every other business in life is ludicrously mimicked, down to the carrying of sick men to the hospital. A patient is brought out on an open litter, wrapped in a blanket, and carried along with apparent tenderness and most diverting attention, to the house of reception. The very physic is administered to the pretended patient, who swallows the dose of wine more willingly than if it were the doctor's drugs. The serious affairs of life are made to exhibit a ludicrous aspect; everything is travestied, and yet is there nothing attempted which is offensive or indecent."

It is a remarkable proof of the strange inconsistency which pervades the whole system of Romanism, that, at the very time when the madness of the carnival is at its height, the cardinal-vicar issues spiritual invitations to the faithful, beseeching them to shun the dissipation of the season, and to visit the churches and stations, where religious services appropriated to the time are being performed.

At Venice, the carnival is conducted with peculiar mirth and gaiety. Shows, masquerades, theatrical exhibitions of various kinds, form the leading diversions of this joyous season; and occasionally a boat-race adds to the hilarity of the period.

CAROLOSTADIANS, the followers of Andrew Bodenstein, better known by the name of Carolostadt, from the place of his birth. This able and learned man was one of Luther's earliest and warmest friends and adherents. Decidedly devoted to the cause of the Reformation, Carolostadt, in the ardency and impetuosity of his zeal, would have all the rites of Popery abolished at once. Putting himself at the head of a body which was animated by the same enthusiastic and headstrong feelings with himself, he strove with tumultuous violence to effect a change in the public service and ritual of the church, and especially to establish a novel and irregular mode of celebrating the Lord's Supper. Luther took immediate steps to put an end to these violent proceedings, and by his prudent and energetic measures, he succeeded in setting to rest the agitation which prevailed among many of the friends of the reformed cause. But Carolostadt, though silenced for a time, was not convinced; and resigning, accordingly, the professorship which he held at Wittemberg, he repaired to Orlamunde, where he was invited to officiate as pastor, and proceeded to propagate, by means of the press, the extreme views which he entertained, besides encouraging his followers in the destruction of images. The chief point on which he differed from Luther was his rejection of the real presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the holy sacrament, a doctrine to which Luther still adhered, though not in the form of transubstantiation, yet, at least, in that of consubstantiation. The actual state of the question as between the two learned divines, is thus stated by Pfizer in his 'Life of Luther': "The doctrine established in the Catholic Church since the first Lateran council in 1215, that the bread and the wine were transformed into the body and blood of Christ by the priestly consecration of the elements during the supper, (or during mass), was only in so far changed by Luther, that he avoided the expression; but he taught that in the bread and wine, the body and blood of Christ, in the strict sense of the terms, were received and enjoyed, according to the words of the institution, 'This is my body,' &c. Carolostadt believed this to savour too much of the Papal doctrine, and his explanation of these words comprehended a denial of the real presence and of the actual enjoyment of the body of Christ in the sacrament. This he accomplished by the harsh and somewhat forced assumption, that Christ had spoken these words, not with reference to the bread, but indicating his own body. This view appeared to Luther as a profanation and violation of the sacrament, and he declared his opposition to it in the most unmeasured terms. In a pamphlet which he published against these prophets, 1525, he says, 'Dr. Carlstadt has fallen away from us, and has become our bitterest foe. Although I deeply regret this scandal, I still rejoice that Satan has shown the cloven foot, and will be put to shame by these his heavenly prophets, who have long been peeping and muttering in concealment, but never would come fairly out until I enticed them with a guilder: that, by the grace of God, has been too well laid out for me to rue it. But still the whole infamy of the plot is not yet brought forward, for still more lies concealed which I have long suspected. This will also be brought out when it is the will of God, for ever praised be his name that the good cause has so far prospered that my interference is not absolutely necessary; there are men enough to cope with such a spirit. I know, also, that Dr. Carlstadt has long been brewing this heresy in his mind, though till now he has not found courage to spread it abroad.'

"To the greatest astonishment and vexation of Luther, other learned and pious men took up the views of Carlstadt, only adopting another mode of interpretation, and either explaining that in the expression 'This is my body,' the word is was equivalent to represents; or my body, was the same as the symbol of my body. However various the modes of explanation, they all agreed in teaching the spiritual presence and influence of Christ instead of his bodily presence in the sacrament. Luther saw the extension of these sentiments with inexpressible grief and anger. Very many of those of whom he had entertained the highest opinion, adopted the new views, or, what was enough to excite the gall of such a man as Luther, did not find them so abominable and worthy of reprobation as he did, who saw in them nothing less than the dishonour and degradation of the sacrament. In his letters and writings, he expressed himself in most unmeasured terms; he calls them 'his Absalom's sacrament-conjurors,' compared to whose madness he feels compelled to call the Papists mild and tame, and who were to him satanic instruments of temptation. 'The sacramental pest,' says he again, 'continues to rage and to increase in strength and virulence.'

The views of Carolostadt were held by many of the reformed, particularly in Switzerland, and ably defended by Zwingli and Ecolampadius. The sacramental question, in consequence, occupied much of the attention of Luther, and besides giving it a large place in his sermons, he published, in 1528, a treatise specially devoted to the subject, under the title,

'Confession of Christ's Supper, against the fanatics.' The contest between the two opposing parties was keen and protracted, and, after several fruitless attempts on the part of individuals, the Landgrave Philip of Hesse, actuated chiefly by political motives, endeavoured, in 1529, to bring about a reconciliation. With this view he recommended a religious conference at Marburg. Neither Luther nor Zuinglius discovered much eagerness for the interview, but at length both yielded to the persuasion of friends. The result was, that a list of articles was drawn up and published, in which the Swiss churches conformed generally to the Lutheran views, excepting on the point of the sacrament. The articles were signed by ten divines of each party. It was also agreed that the controversy, which had for some time been carried on with such unseemly violence on both sides, should henceforth cease.

CAROLS, hymns sung by the people at Christmas, in memory of the song of the angels which the shepherds heard at the birth of the Redeemer.

CARPOCRATIANS, a Gnostic sect of the second century, named from Carpocrates of Alexandria, with whom it originated. His doctrinal system, which passed into the hands of his son Epiphanes, was founded on a combination of Platonism with Christianity. The ideas of Plato as to the pre-existence of the soul, and that higher species of knowledge which comes to a man in the form of a reminiscence from an earlier state of being, pervade the whole gnosis of Carpocrates, which is thus described by Neander, with his usual philosophical discrimination and accuracy: "The Gnosis consisted in the knowledge of one supreme original being, the highest unity, from whom all existence has flowed, and back to whom it strives to return. The finite spirits ruling over the several portions of the earth, seek to counteract this universal striving after unity; and from their influence, their laws, and arrangements, proceeds all that checks, disturbs, or limits the original communion lying at the root of nature, which is the outward manifestation of that highest unity. These spirits seek to retain under their dominion the souls which, emanating from the highest unity, and still partaking of its nature, have sunk down into the corporeal world, and there become imprisoned in bodies; so that after death they must migrate into other bodies, unless they are capable of rising with freedom to their original source. From these finite spirits the different popular religions had derived their origin. But the souls which, led on by the reminiscences of their former condition, soar upward to the contemplation of that higher unity, reach a state of perfect freedom and repose, which nothing afterwards is able to disturb. As examples of this sort, they named Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, among the heathens, and Jesus among the Jews. To the latter they attributed only great strength and purity of soul, which enabled him, through the reminiscences of his earlier existence, to attain the highest flight of contemplation, break free from the narrow laws of the God of the Jews, and overturn the religion which had proceeded from him, although educated in it himself. By virtue of his union with the Monad, he was armed with a divine power which enabled him to overcome the spirits of this world and the laws by which they govern the operations of nature, to work miracles, and to preserve the utmost composure under sufferings. By the same divine power, he was afterwards enabled to ascend in freedom above all the powers of these spirits of the world to the highest unity—the ascension from the world of appearance to Nirwana, according to the system of Budha. This sect, accordingly, made no distinction between Christ and the wise and good men among every people. They taught that any other soul which could soar to the same height of contemplation, might be regarded as standing on an equality with Christ. In the controversy against converting the religious life into a mere outward matter, they took sides with St. Paul, but on a directly opposite principle; not on the principle of faith, in the apostle's sense, but on that of an Antinomian pantheism, which looked down upon morality of life with a sort of contempt. Hence they foisted a meaning wholly alien from their true import, upon those fundamental positions of St. Paul respecting the vanity of the merit of good works, and respecting justification, not by works, but by faith alone. What they understood by faith was a mystical brooding of the mind absorbed in the original unity. 'Faith and love,' said they, 'constitute the essential thing; externals are of no importance. He who ascribes moral worth to these, makes himself their slave; subjects himself to those spirits of the world from whom all religious and political ordinances have proceeded. He cannot advance after death beyond the circle of the Metempsychosis; but he who can abandon himself to every lust, without being affected by any, who can thus bid defiance to the laws of those mundane spirits, will after death rise to the unity of that original Monad, by union with which he was enabled, here in the present life, to break loose from every fetter that had cramped his being.'

The Carpocratians appear to have made use of magical incantations. They believed that the ordinary laws of nature were framed by the inferior spirits, and that whoever was united to the Monad, and could rise above the subordinate gods, was invested with the power of working miracles. In this way they explained the miracles of our blessed Lord. They paid divine honours to an image of Christ, which, as they alleged, came originally from Pilate. They also worshipped the images of Pagan philosophers, and, on the testimony of Clement of Alexandria, we learn, that at Sama in Cephalene, an island in the Ionian sea, a temple, a museum, and altars were built in honour of Epiphanes, the son of Carpocrates, who, though he died at the early age of seventeen, wrote a work in which his father's system was fully unfolded. Two inscriptions have been lately discovered at Cyrene in Africa, which have given rise to a conjecture that the sect of the Carpo-craticians continued till the sixth century, but considerable doubts exist among the learned as to the genuineness of these inscriptions. It is not unlikely that the sect disappeared at a somewhat earlier period.

CARTHUSIANS, a religious order which was instituted in the eleventh century. The name is derived from Chartreux (Cartusium), not far from Grenoble in France, a valley where Bruno of Cologne, a very learned man, and founder of the order, settled, about A. D. 1084, with twelve companions. On this spot a monastery was erected, but the Carthusians, instead of taking up their residence within its walls, lived in separate cells, by the side of it, where each individual spent the whole day by himself in silence, occupied in devotional exercises, spiritual studies, or corporeal labour. They maintained throughout the utmost simplicity and austerity, refusing to keep in their possession a single vessel of gold or silver except the communion cup. Their time was spent chiefly in transcribing books, particularly the Bible and old theological works. They prized their library above all their other possessions. The Carthusians are perhaps the strictest and the most severe in their discipline of all the monastic institutions of Rome; and, in consequence of this, there have always been very few nuns in connection with the order. Carthusians wear haircloth next the skin; they are not permitted to eat animal food, must prepare their own victuals, and eat alone, not in common. Almost perpetual silence is enforced. They are not allowed to go out of the monastery under any pretence whatever. They are all clothed in white, except their plaited cloak, which is black. The superiors of the order never took the name of abbots, but have always been called priors. Monasteries belonging to them are found in France, Italy, Germany, and other Roman Catholic countries, where rich Carthusian charter-houses are often found. At an early period after the institution of the order, they passed into England, where the order amassed considerable wealth, but their monasteries, with their ample revenues, shared the fate of the other monastic institutions at the period of the Reformation.

CARTULARIES, documents in which were contained the contracts, sales, exchanges, privileges, immunities, and other transactions connected with the churches and monasteries. The design of these papers was to preserve the ancient deeds, being much later than the facts mentioned in them.

CARYATIS, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), under which she was worshipped at Caryæ in Læconia, and a festival was held in honour of her every year, accompanied with national dances, which were conducted by Lacedæmonian women. Hymns were also sung upon the occasion.

CASA, one of the names anciently used to denote a church, as, for example, Candida casa, White-church.

CASSOCK, the undress of all orders of the clergy. In the Church of Rome, it varies in colour according to the dignity of the wearer. Priests have black cassocks; bishops, purple; cardinals, scarlet; and popes, white.

CASTE, a name used to denote the hereditary distinctions of classes in Hindostan. The number of castes or tribes is four, namely, the Brahmans, the Kshatriyas, the Vaishyas, and the Shudras. It is not improbable that the practice of observing caste may have been derived by the Hindus from the ancient Egyptians; for it is a curious fact noticed by Maurice in his Indian Antiquities, that the sons of Mizraim, a name by which the Egyptians are frequently mentioned in the Bible, were divided, according to Herodotus, into seven, but, according to Diodorus Siculus, into five great tribes, hardly, if at all, different, in regard to the occupations assigned to them, from those of Hindostan. The first of these was the sacred or sacerdotal tribe, who were supported at the public expense, a third part of the produce of the lands of Egypt being allotted for their maintenance, and the expenses of public worship. The second tribe, like that of India, was composed of soldiers. The third, Herodotus speaks of as shepherds, but Diodorus calls them traders. The fourth tribe consists of husbandmen; and the fifth of artificers.

The origin and nature of the system of caste is thus described by Dr. Duff in his valuable work, India and India Missions:—"By a species of emanation or successive eduction from the substance of his own body, Brahma gave origin to the human race, consisting originally of four distinct genera, classes, or castes. From his mouth, first of all, proceeded the Brahman caste—so designated after the name of the great progenitor, as being the highest and noblest in the scale of earthly existence, the nearest in kindred and in likeness to Brahma himself, his visible representatives in human form. At the same time there flowed from his mouth, in finished and substantial form, the four Vedas, for the instruction of mankind in all needful knowledge. Of these, the Brahmins were constituted the sole depositaries, the sole interpreters, the sole teachers. To all the rest of their fellow-creatures they were to give out such portions and fragments, and in such manner and mode, as they might deem most expedient. Hence their emanation from the mouth of Brahma became an emblem of their future characteristic function or office, as the sole divinely appointed preceptors of the human race. From Brahma's arm, the protecting member of the body, next emanated the Kshatriya, or military caste, the source of emanation being emblematic of their future office, which is to wield martial weapons for the defence of the rest of their fellows from internal violence, and external aggression. From Brahma's breast, the seat of life, originated the Vaishya, or caste of productive capitalists whether pastoral, agricultural, or mercantile, the source of their origination being emblematic of their future function, which is to raise or provide for themselves and the rest, all the necessaries, comforts, and luxuries, which serve to support or exhilarate human life. From Brahma's foot, the member of inferiority and degradation, sprung the Shudra, or servile caste, placed on the base of society, the source of their production being emblematic of their future calling, which is to perform for the other castes all manner of menial duties, either as serfs or manual cultivators of the soil, domestic attendants, artisans, and handicraftsmen of every respectable description.

"According to this rigid and unmodified account of the origin of man, it must at once appear that caste is not a civil but a sacred institution, not an ordinance of human but of divine appointment. The distinction which it establishes between one family or tribe of man and another, is not of accident, but of essence, not of arbitrary human will, but of eternal decree and necessity of nature. The difference which the various sources of derivation tend to originate and perpetuate, is not specific but generic. It is a difference of kind as complete as if the races had sprung from absolutely different primeval stocks. Hence, according to the strict spirit of the system, a man of one genus or caste can no more be transformed into the member of another genus or caste—whether from a higher to a lower or from a lower to a higher—no more than a lion can be changed into a mole, or a mole into a lion; a whale into a flying-fish, or a flying-fish into a whale; a banyan tree into a thorn, or a thorn into a banyan tree; a rose into a thistle, or a thistle into a rose. Each caste has, by divine ordination, its own peculiar laws and institutions, its own duties and professions, its own rites and customs, its own liberties and immunities. The violation of any fundamental principle, such as the eating of some strictly prohibited article of food, entails a forfeiture of caste with all its rights and prerogatives. This implies something more than mere degradation from a higher to a lower order within the pale of caste. Should a Brahman, for instance, violate the rules of his caste, he has it not in his power to enfranchise himself in the special privileges of any of the three lower. No: he sinks beneath the platform of caste altogether—he becomes an absolute outcast. His own genus is completely changed, and he cannot be transformed into any other existing genus. He must henceforward form a new genus of his own. Just as if we deprived the lion of his shaggy mane and brawny paws, and changed his carnivorous into a graminivorous propensity, he would at once become an outcast from the present leonine genus, and incapable of being admitted into the genus of tigers, or bears, or any other; and, if the mutilated transformed creature should perpetuate its kind, there would arise an entirely new genus of animals. Hence it follows, that beneath the fourth, or lowest caste, there may be a class of beings belonging to no caste, as if realizing the words of the poet, 'beneath the lowest depth a lower still'—a class composed of outcasts from the four privileged orders—the residuum of the refuse and offscourings of all the rest—held in the utmost detestation and abhorrence—compelled to resort to the least reputable, and often to the most loathsome occupation for subsistence—doomed to be subjected to all the pains, and penalties, and indignities of excommunication and outlawry in this life, and to irreparable disadvantages as regards all preparation for the life to come."

The institution of caste keeps the Hindus in a system of complete bondage, preventing the introduction of improvements among the people, and obstructing, to a lamentable extent, the progress of Christianity. No individual can rise from a lower caste to a higher, but must remain contentedly in the same caste in which he was born, and must follow the profession of his ancestors, however alien it may be to his capacity or inclinations. The higher castes look down with the utmost contempt upon the lower, and will not condescend even to eat with them. The Shudras, or lowest caste, are kept in a state of most painful degradation, being compelled to perform the most menial offices for a Brahman, while they are positively prohibited from amassing property of any kind, while they are excluded from religious privileges, the Vedas never being read in their hearing. The indignities, insults, and even injuries which they endure at the hands of the higher castes, are often of the most painful description. The labour performed by one caste will not be done by those of any other caste, there being a special description of labour for each class of men. The evil effects of the system of caste upon the operations of the Christian missionaries, is a universal source of complaint among these devoted men; and, so deeply impressed has the present excellent bishop of Calcutta become with the utter inconsistency of caste with Christianity, that he has addressed two charges to the missionaries of the Church of England, requiring them no longer to tolerate distinction of caste in the native churches. In descanting on the unseemly aspect which those churches presented in which the heathen usage of caste was retained, he remarks, "The different castes sat on different mats, on different sides of the church, to which they entered by different doors. They approached the Lord's table at different times, and had once different cups, or managed to get the catechists to change the cup before the lower castes began to communicate; they would allow no persons at baptism of an inferior caste, and they had separate divisions in the burial grounds." Such a state of matters is plainly at utter variance with the whole spirit and precepts of the religion of Christ, and cannot be retained without palpable sin in any churches calling themselves Christian. CASTRENSIS, a name sometimes given to the Thuriferary or incense-bearer, an assistant of the patriarch in the Greek Church, who, besides the duty implied in his name, that of carrying the incense, covers also the consecrated vessels or implements with a veil, during the anthem to the sacred Trinity, and assists the celebrant in putting on his sacerdotal vestments.

CASUISTS, those who study and endeavour to explain the intricate problems connected with cases of conscience. Casuistry, with its difficult and subtle distinctions, was a favourite subject of inquiry among the schoolmen in the middle ages. Their object was, not so much to ascertain the various points of moral science, as to raise a series of perplexing questions, the settlement of which could be productive of no practical advantage whatever. In the course of these unprofitable discussions, they frequently confounded the natural principles of right and wrong, and so palliated the delinquencies, both of themselves and others, that vice was encouraged and virtue discountenanced by their inquiries. The text-book of this science for a long period during the dark ages, was the Summa Raymundiana, to which were added in the fourteenth century, Summa Astesana and Summa Bartholina, Pisanella, or Magistrucchia. The work, in particular, of the Minorite Asteanus was so popular, that it was printed nine times in the course of the fifteenth century. In its original form, the science of casuistry simply consisted in the application of the principles of sacred Scripture to particular cases. But, in process of time, this useful department of knowledge had degenerated into what M. Feore, the preceptor of Louis XIII., termed "the art of quibbling with God." The character of "a subtle casuist" came to be preferred to that of "a lover of truth." The Jesuits of the Romish Church, by virtue of the wire-drawn distinctions of the old casuists, succeeded in corrupting morality in nearly all its departments. A few of the perverted moral principles which some of these men taught are thus mentioned by Mosheim: "That a bad man who is an entire stranger to the love of God, provided he feels some fear of the divine wrath, and, from dread of punishment, avoids grosser crimes, is a fit candidate for eternal salvation. That men may sin with safety, provided they have a probable reason for the sin, i. e. some argument or authority in favour of it. That actions in themselves wrong and contrary to the Divine law are allowable, provided a person can control his own mind, and in his thoughts connect a good end with the criminal deed; or, as they express it, knows how to direct his intention right. That philosophical sins, that is, actions which are contrary to the law of nature and to right reason, in a person ignorant of the written law of God, or dubious as to its true meaning, are light offences, and do not deserve the punishments of hell. That the deeds a man commits when wholly blinded by his lusts and the paroxysms of passion, and when destitute of all sense of religion, though they be of the vilest and most execrable character, can by no means be charged to his account in the judgment of God, because such a man is like a madman. That it is right for a man, when taking an oath or forming a contract, in order to deceive the judge and subvert the validity of the covenant or oath, tacitly to add something to the words of the compact or the oath; and other sentiments of the like nature."

In their practice the Jesuits were quite as lax as in their principles. Thus Pascal tells us, in his Provincial Letters, "that when they happen to be in any part of the world where the doctrine of a crucified God is accounted foolishness, they suppress the offence of the cross, and preach only a glorious and not a suffering Jesus Christ. This plan they followed in the Indies and in China, where they permitted Christians to practise idolatry itself, with the aid of the following ingenious contrivance: they made their converts conceal under their clothes an image of Jesus Christ, to which they taught them to transfer mentally those adorations which they rendered ostensibly to the idol Cachinchoam and Keum-fucum. This charge is brought against them by Gravina, a Dominican, and is fully established by the Spanish memorial presented to Philip IV., king of Spain, by the Cordeliers of the Philippine Islands, quoted by Thomas Hurtado in his 'Martyrdom of the Faith,' page 427. To such a length did this practice go, that the Congregation De Propaganda were obliged expressly to forbid the Jesuits, on pain of excommunication, to permit the worship of idols on any pretext whatever, or to conceal the mystery of the cross from their catechumens; strictly enjoining them to admit none to baptism who were not thus instructed, and ordering them to expose the image of the crucifix in their churches, all which is amply detailed in the decree of that congregation, dated the 9th of July 1646, and signed by Cardinal Capponi."

Both the doctrines and practices of the Jesuits were pointedly condemned in the seventeenth century by the Dominicans and Jansenists, and, at length, so violent did the opposition to the Casuists become, that Pope Alexander VII. found it necessary to issue a bull in 1659, condemning them to a certain extent, and, in 1690, Alexander VIII. condemned particularly the philosophical sin of the Jesuits.

The Casuists are sometimes divided into Probabilists and Probabiliorists. The first, which includes the Jesuits, maintain that a certain degree of probability as to the lawfulness of an action is enough to secure against sin. The second, supported by the Dominicans and the Jansenists, insist on always taking the safest or the most probable side. The writings of the Casuists are very numerous. Escobar the Jesuit made a collection of the opinions of the Casuists before him; and Mayer has published a library of Casuists, containing an account of all the writers on cases of conscience, ranged under three heads, the first comprehending the Lutheran, the second the Calvinist, and the third the Romish casuists.

CAT-WORSHIP. This form of idolatry, the precise origin of which it is difficult to ascertain, seems to have chiefly prevailed in Egypt. In that country anciently, Bubastis, one of the goddesses, was represented with the head of a cat; and as the cat, from the peculiar structure of its visual apparatus, possesses the power of seeing objects distinctly in the dark, it has been supposed by some authors to have been, among the Egyptians, a symbol of the night of chaos, and of the moon, which is the brilliant eye of our nights. The cat seems also to have been used as an emblem of fertility, Bubastis, the cat-goddess, being regarded as presiding over the delivery of pregnant women. The Cadmeans are said to have carried with them into Greece the worship of the Egyptian Bubastis, as a cat-goddess is found among the ancient divinities of Bœotia, under the name of Galinthius. Among the ancient Scandinavians, Freya was revered as a cat-goddess, her car being drawn by two cats. Even in modern times, all traces of this peculiar species of idolatry have not entirely disappeared. Among the Mohammedans, the most marked attention and kindness are shown to this animal, particularly in Egypt. The cat also plays an important part in the magical practices of the Laplanders, and in the superstitious legends and popular tales of the Germans.

CATACOMBS, subterranean tombs, in which the early Christians were wont to be buried, more particularly in times of severe persecution. Even in days of outward tranquillity, the usual sepulchres of converts to the Christian faith were situated in lonely and sequestered spots, where there was less probability of their remains being exposed to violation and insult. For a resting-place to their dead, Christians, like their Master, were frequently indebted to some kind and compassionate stranger who supplied them with some unoccupied piece of ground, where they might be safe from the rude indignities of their heathen foes. By far the greater number, however, of the primitive Christians were buried in catacombs, or under-ground sepulchres. As the result of laborious excavations, these interesting abodes of the dead, which so often afforded a refuge to the faithful living, have been fully examined. In these gloomy caverns, lying beneath the city of Rome, the early Christians were often accustomed to conduct their worship as well as to bury their dead. The following brief description, from the pen of Dr. Jamieson, in his 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians,' may afford the reader some idea of these interesting subterranean churches: "The descent was made by a ladder, the foot of which stood in a broad and spacious pathway, which extended like a street along the whole length of the place. This principal entrance opened, at intervals, into smaller passages, which again led into a variety of chambers; and on either side of them were several rows of niches pierced in the wall, serving as catacombs, and filled with coffins. The chambers were painted, for the most part, like the churches, with passages of history from the Old and New Testaments. In the centre of the large street was an open square, large and commodious as a market-place, in which those who took refuge there in those troublous times, were wont to congregate for worship, and the comfort of which, as a place of abode, was greatly promoted by the liberal use which the Christians made of spices and perfumes on their dead. In the more distant of these cemeteries, whose remoteness rendered them less liable to be disturbed, there were small apertures left in the surface of the ground, through which a dim twilight was admitted; but the others, where these were closed, were absolutely dark, and, except by the aid of lights, impassable; so that, on any sudden surprise, the refugees had only to extinguish their lamps to insure their safety from the invasion of their enemies. The depth of these vaults was sometimes so great, that two or three storeys were ranged one above another and the whole aspect of the place conveyed the impression of a city under ground."

Nor did the Christians inhabit these tombs for only a brief space of time when persecution was at the hottest. For years they were often doomed to live in the unbroken silence of the catacombs. On this subject Dr. Jamieson goes on to remark: "In these retreats multitudes lived for weeks and months, without seeing sun, moon, or stars. The aged and the poor were maintained by the munificent liberality of those whose affection to their cause had provided the sanctuary, or by the contributions of the young and vigorous, who poured the fruits of their industry into the common fund, as they returned, under the friendly protection of night, to the company of the proscribed believers. In these profound and spacious caverns, whose gloom and solitude were but ill relieved by the glimmer of a hundred tapers, and whose walls were lined with immense rows of catacombs, in which reposed the august remains of their fathers and brethren, who had died in the faith, they spent their midnight vigils in edifying one another with the things pertaining to the common salvation; and while the storeyed vaults echoed with the notes of praise, piety was fanned into a holier fervour, faith awakened the sublimest emotions, and the close contact of the living with the venerable dead, whose spirits were still in communion with their survivors on earth, gave to the hope of immortality all the strength and vividness of a present reality, filling the hearts of all with a 'joy unspeakable and full of glory,' far more than compensating for their banishment from the cheerful haunts of men. Long after their meetings had ceased to be clandestine, the cemeteries continued to be the favourite haunts of the Christians; and it was the more convenient to use them for the offices of devotion as well as of burial, that the followers of Jesus required no consecrated temple, no gorgeous altar, no outward pomp, or emblems of religion."

In the sixteenth century the extensive catacombs underneath the city of Rome were submitted to careful examination, and a large collection of the monuments discovered there are now removed, and arranged chiefly at the entrance to the Vatican museum, the long corridors of which are completely lined with inscriptions plastered into the wall, amounting to more than three thousand. A few years ago, Dr. Maitland published a work of great interest, entitled 'The Church in the Catacombs,' which contains a general survey of the inscriptions thus rescued from oblivion, and preserved from demolition and decay on the walls of the Vatican. One of these we select as a specimen of the simple, earnest, living Christianity of these early times: "In Christ, Alexander is not dead, but lives beyond the stars, and his body rests in this tomb. He lived under the Emperor Antonine, who, foreseeing that great benefit would result from his services, returned evil for good. For while on his knees, about to sacrifice to the true God, he was led away to execution. O sad times! in which sacred rites and prayers, even in caverns, afford no protection to us. What can be more wretched than such a life? and what than such a death? when they could not be buried by their friends and relations. At length they sparkle in heaven. He has scarcely lived who has lived in Christian times."

The ornaments accompanying these inscriptions are of great simplicity, consisting chiefly of palm leaves, or olive branches, or the figure of a cross rudely scratched on the stone. The following is the monogram or figure which is frequently used in these inscriptions for the words "In Christ," as Dr. Maitland, with great probability of truth, interprets it:

From the general brevity of these inscriptions little information is afforded on the subject of the doctrines of Christianity; but some highly important inferences may be drawn from the silence which they maintain on errors and superstitions which prevailed in the Church of Rome in later times, and are still firmly held by the adherents of Romanism. On this point Dr. Maitland remarks: "In general, in the inscriptions contained in the Lapidarian gallery, selected and arranged under Papal superintendence, there are no prayers for the dead, no addresses to the Virgin Mary, nor to the apostles or earlier saints. The distinctive character of these remains is essentially Christian; the name of Christ is repeated in an endless variety of forms; the second person of the Trinity is neither viewed in the Jewish light of a temporal Messiah, nor degraded to the Socinian estimate of a mere example, but is invested with all the honours of a Redeemer. On this subject there is no reserve. On stones innumerable appears the Good Shepherd, bearing on his shoulders the recovered sheep, by which many an illiterate believer expressed his sense of personal salvation. One 'sleeps in Christ;' another is buried with a prayer that 'she may live in the Lord Jesus.' But most of all, the cross in its simplest form is employed to testify the faith of the deceased; and whatever ignorance may have prevailed regarding the letter of the Holy Writ, or the more mysterious doctrines contained in it, there seems to have been no want of apprehension of that sacrifice, 'whereby alone we obtain remission of our sins,' and are made partakers of 'the kingdom of God.' The elements of a pure faith were written 'with an iron pen, in the rock, for ever;' and if the Church of after times had looked back to her subterranean home, 'to the hole of the pit whence she was digged,' she would have sought in vain for traces of forced celibacy, the invocation of saints, and the representation of Deity in painting or sculpture."

These monuments throw considerable light upon the customs and institutions of Christians in early times. Thus the original AGAPÆ (which see) or love-feasts, are distinctly referred to, and actually represented on several of the monuments. The feast, as held in the catacombs, is exhibited in a picture found in a subterranean chapel, in the cemetery of Marcellinus and Peter. In this painting the three guests are seen seated, and a page supplies them with food from the small round table in front, containing a lamb and a cup. The two matrons who preside, personifying Peace and Love, have their names written above their heads according to the Etruscan practice. See CRYPTS.

CATÆBATES (Gr. kata, down, and baino, to go), a surname among the ancient heathens of several gods. Thus it was applied to Zeus, as coming down in thunder and lightning; to Apollo as protecting those who were journeying abroad; and to Hermes as conducting the shades down to Hades.

CATAPHRYGIANS, a name given to the sect of the MONTANISTS (which see), from the country (Phrygia) to which Montanus belonged.

CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS, seminaries which seem to have commenced so early as the second century, having as their object to educate teachers for the Christian Church. A school of this kind existed at an early period in Alexandria in Egypt, and the first catechist, to whom the charge of it was committed, was Pantænus, a man of learning, who had himself been conducted to Christianity by the way of philosophical inquiry. The instructions of this eminent man were attended partly by educated Pagans who, after having been converted to Christianity, were seized with the desire of devoting themselves to its service; and partly by young men who, born and reared within the pale of the Christian Church, were desirous of being farther instructed with the view of preparing themselves for the office of the ministry. Thus in Alexandria arose the first theological school, the first Christian seminary in which theology was taught as a science, and defended equally against the assaults of Greek philosophers and Gnostic heretics. Pantænus was succeeded in his catechetical office by his disciple Clement, who was distinguished for the mildness and moderation with which he met the opponents of the truth. But the second great teacher of the Alexandrian school was Origen, who, from the peculiar character of his mind, preferred speculation to practice, and the speculative tendency he carried so far as to reduce the most plain and obvious truths of Scripture to mere figurative representations. He almost entirely lost sight of the letter, in his anxiety to ascertain the spirit of the Bible. True, he admitted in so many words that both the spirit and the letter ought to be adhered to, and that it was never right to give up the letter unless after the most careful examination. Yet in the face of this admission, he explained the simple historical facts both of the Old Testament and the New, by treating them, in most cases, as figures and emblems of some fanciful and imaginary conceptions.

Though the school of Alexandria was the earliest and the most distinguished of the Christian catechetical schools, there arose many similar institutions in the Eastern church between the second and the fifth centuries. They have sometimes been confounded with another class of schools which also abounded in the early Christian Church,—those namely which were intended to instruct catechumens in the simple doctrines of Christianity. The one class, or the catechumenal schools, were of a simpler, while the other class, or the catechetical schools, were of a more advanced description. The Alexandrian catechetical school, in particular, assumed a very high position, both as a theological and a literary institution. For a long period it was the favourite resort of students from all quarters of Europe, as well as from the numerous African churches. But, in the course of time, when Alexandria became the chief seat of the keen contentions between the heretical Arians and the orthodox Athanasians, the schools of the city were broken up, and in the middle of the fourth century those once famous seminaries of theological learning no longer existed. The catechetical school which was next in fame to the Alexandrian, was that of Antioch, which seems to have been in active operation in an early period of the third century, though it can scarcely be said to have reached the zenith of its renown until the latter part of the fourth century, before which time the rival school of Alexandria had disappeared. The two schools were entirely opposed to each other in their mode of theological teaching. The Antiochian adhered closely to the literal, while the Alexandrian school adhered with equal tenacity to the allegorical, system of Bible interpretation. The views of the school of Antioch were thus more sober and safe; those of the school of Alexandria were more fanciful and dangerous. And yet both owed their ruin to the outbreak of fatal heresies; for the Nestorian and Euty-chian heresies proved the destruction of the schools at Antioch, just as the Arian heresy proved the destruction of the schools at Alexandria. Of a character similar to those at Antioch and Alexandria were the schools instituted at Edessa, in the third century, and that established at Nisibis by the Nestorians in the end of the fifth century. At a still later date the catechetical schools of the Eastern church were succeeded by the cathedral and monastic schools of the Western church, which even so late as the sixth century had never established catechetical schools even at Rome.

CATECHISMS, systems of instruction drawn up in the form of question and answer. The catechetical mode of teaching was employed even among the ancient heathen philosophers as the readiest and the most effective method of communicating information, and exercising the minds of those who were under instruction. It was the favourite plan adopted by Socrates in training his hearers to a knowledge and belief of philosophical truth. From an early period it was found to be the best mode of conveying to the ignorant an acquaintance with the elements of Christian doctrine. A long time was considered to be necessary to train catechumens or candidates for baptism. Bingham, in his 'Christian Antiquities,' gives the following rapid summary by the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, of the chief points of doctrine in which catechumens were to be instructed in the early Church: "Let the catechumen be taught before baptism the knowledge of the Father unbegotten, the knowledge of his only-begotten Son, and Holy Spirit; let him learn the order of the world's creation, and series of Divine providence, and the different sorts of legislation; let him be taught, why the world, and man, the citizen of the world, were made; let him be instructed about his own nature, to understand for what end he himself was made; let him be informed how God punished the wicked with water and fire, and crowned his saints with glory in every generation, viz. Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and his posterity, Melchisedec, Job, Moses, Joshua, Caleb, and Phineas the priest, and the saints of every age; let him also be taught, how the providence of God never forsook mankind, but called them at sundry times, from error and vanity to the knowledge of the truth, reducing them from slavery and impiety to liberty and godliness, from iniquity to righteousness, and from everlasting death to eternal life. After these, he must learn the doctrine of Christ's incarnation, his passion, his resurrection, and assumption; and what it is to renounce the devil, and enter into covenant with Christ." ●

These were the chief points of the catechetical instruction given before baptism, not to the catechumens indiscriminately, but as arranged into different classes, who were taught those doctrines which were considered suitable to their capacity and extent of progress. Some departments of Christian truth, as for example that which referred to the eucharist, were reserved for a later stage, when the catechumen had been washed with the water of baptism. But before they were admitted to baptism, these catechumens were subjected to a very careful and searching examination as to their proficiency in the knowledge of Christianity, and if approved they were sometimes called electi or chosen. At their last examination before the administration of the rite, they were required to repeat the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. In all ages of the Church, catechetical instruction has been much in use, suited to different capacities and different stages of knowledge. And at a very early period after the Reformation, catechisms were drawn up by all, or nearly all, the Reformed churches of Europe. It being the essential characteristic of Protestantism to diffuse sound scriptural knowledge among all classes of the people, catechisms were found to be invaluable for the accomplishment of this important end. Nor have orthodox churches only availed themselves of this important engine of diffusing the knowledge of their principles; heretical churches, also, have seen the necessity of framing catechisms for the diffusion of their peculiar tenets, more especially among the young.

CATECHISM (CHURCH OF ENGLAND), a small manual, containing a simple explanation of the doctrines held by the church in the form of question and answer. In its original form it consisted of no more than a repetition of the baptismal vow, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. Afterwards, however, by order of King James I., an addition of a short and plain exhibition of the doctrine of the sacraments, was drawn up by Bishop Overall, and approved by the other bishops. This catechism is embodied in the Book of Common Prayer, and is now enjoined to be taught on Sundays and holidays, although in the first book of King Edward VI. it was not required to be taught oftener than once in six weeks. At the instigation of Bucer, a more frequent performance of this important duty was enjoined, though the precise periods of catechising were still left indefinite in the Rubric. Both the Rubric and the Canons, however, are now explicit and imperative on this point. Thus the Rubric enjoins: "The curate of every parish shall diligently upon Sundays and holydays, after the second lesson at evening prayer, openly in the church instruct and examine so many children of his parish sent unto him, as he shall think convenient, in some part of the catechism. And all fathers and mothers, masters and dames, shall cause their children, servants, and apprentices, (who have not learned their catechism) to come to the church at the time appointed, and obediently to hear, and be ordered by the curate, until such time as they have learned all that therein is appointed for them to learn." The fifty-ninth canon also declares: "Every parson, vicar, or curate, upon every Sunday and holyday before evening prayer, shall, for half an hour or more, examine and instruct the youth and ignorant persons of his parish, in the ten commandments, the articles of the belief, and in the Lord's prayer; and shall diligently hear, instruct, and teach them the catechism set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. And all fathers, mothers, masters, and mistresses, shall cause their children, servants, and apprentices, which have not learned the catechism, to come to the church at the time appointed, obediently to hear, and to be ordered by the minister until they have learned the same. And if any minister neglect his duty herein, let him be sharply reprov'd upon the first complaint, and true notice thereof given to the Bishop or Ordinary of the place. If after submitting himself he shall willingly offend therein again, let him be suspended. If so the third time, there being little hope that he will be therein reformed; then excommunicated, and so remain until he be reformed. And likewise if any of the said fathers, mothers, masters, or mistresses, children, servants, or apprentices, shall neglect their duties, as the one sort in not causing them to come, and the other in refusing to learn, as aforesaid; let them be suspended by their Ordinaries, (if they be not children,) and if they so persist by the space of a month, then let them be excommunicated." Besides these strict regulations, parents are charged in the office of Public Baptism to have their children carefully instructed in the Church catechism before they are brought to the bishop for confirmation.

CATECHISMS (ASSEMBLY'S LARGER and SHORTER), brief manuals of Scripture truth, drawn up originally by the General Assembly of Divines at Westminster in 1647. So early as 1592, a short Catechism or "Form of Examination," was prepared by Mr. John Craig, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, who gave also the following directions as to the use of this manual, "Therefore it is thought needful, that every pastor travel with his flock, that they may buy the samen buick and read it in their families, whereby they may be the better instructed; and that the samen be read and learnt in lector's (reading) schools, in place of the little catechism." The catechism which was thus intended to be superseded by Craig's Catechism, was drawn up by Calvin, and for a long period in general use throughout the Reformed Churches. For a considerable period the Scotch Assembly urged on more especially by Henderson, had under their consideration the propriety of drawing up, among other documents, such a Catechism as might be used generally in the three kingdoms. This work, however, was never accomplished until the meeting of the Westminster Assembly in 1643. This Assembly, which sat for upwards of five years, was convened by authority of the English Parliament, at the instance of the Scottish church. It was composed of 121 divines, with 30 lay assessors and commissioners from the Church of Scotland, consisting of 4 ministers and 3 elders. It was in 1647 that the Assembly, while engaged in considering the different heads of a Confession of Faith, appointed Committees also for the important purpose of drawing up two Catechisms, a Larger and a Shorter. Dr. Belfrage, in his Exposition of the Shorter Catechism, gives the following details as to its preparation: "While the Confession of Faith was under discussion in the Assembly, committees were appointed to reduce it into the form of catechisms, one Larger, for the service of a public exposition in the pulpit, according to the custom of foreign churches; the other Smaller, for the instruction of families. It has been generally thought, that a draught or sketch was prepared by some individual of the Shorter Catechism, and laid before the Committee for their revisal. It is not certainly known who this individual was. I have heard it said by a theologian of great research, and now with God, it was his conviction that it was Dr. Arrowsmith. Brooke, in his history of the Puritans, says that he united with several of his brethren in drawing up the Assembly's Catechism; and Baillie, in his Letters, says that the Catechism was composed by a committee, of whom Dr. Arrowsmith was one. None of the Assembly was more competent to the task. He officiated for some time as one of the university preachers at Cambridge, where his education had been completed. It was while officiating as a preacher at St. Martin's, Ironmonger's Lane, London, that he was called to sit in the Assembly of Divines. Baillie mentions a circumstance which shows the high estimation in which he was held in that council. He calls him a learned divine, on whom the Assembly had put the writing against the Antinomians. He was promoted to be Master of John's College, Cambridge, where he discharged the duties of his office with exemplary diligence.

"The excellent Dr. M'Crie, whose researches have shed so much light on the character, doctrines, and conduct of our Reformers, states, in a communication with which he has favoured me, that from a circumstance mentioned by Baillie, he is inclined to think that Mr. Palmer was concerned in the first draught of the Catechism. In volume first of the Letters, page 431, he says, 'It was laid on Mr. Palmer to draw up a directory for catechising.' The directory contains no article on this point. In the same volume, page 440, he says, 'Mr. Palmer's part about catechising was given in, and though the best catechist in England, did not suit, but was left in our hands to frame according to our mind.' There is a work published by this divine, entitled, 'The Principles of the Christian Religion made Plain and Easy,' in which a considerable similarity to the Shorter Catechism may be traced. Palmer was constituted Master of King's College, Cambridge, and showed the greatest solicitude to promote religion and learning, maintained several poor scholars at his own expense in the college, and when he died, left a considerable benefaction for the same purpose.

"In running over Wodrow's MSS.," says Dr. M'Crie in his communication, 'I recollect noticing a statement that he had received information from some person, that the Catechism was composed by Dr. Wallis. This was the celebrated mathematician of that name, who was one of the secretaries to the Westminster Assembly. Perhaps the statement may have arisen from his official situation, and his name having been seen appended to the printed copy of that work. It would be a feather in the cap of our little formulary, and no real disparagement to the philosopher, that its draughtsman was Dr. Wallis. In one of his works he avows that he obtained much insight from the discussion of so many learned divines, in composing the Confession and Catechisms, but says nothing of his having any hand directly in its compilation.'

"There was another member of the Assembly, Dr. Gouge, who may be thought to have some claim to the honour, from his learning and activity, and also from an excellent and comprehensive scheme of divinity, in the form of question and answer, which bears his name. He was minister of Black Friars, London, was appointed a member of the Assembly, and was in such reputation, that he often filled the Moderator's chair in his absence. Amidst claims so varied, I am inclined to think, with all due veneration for the memory of the rest, that the weightiest is that of Dr. Arrowsmith. Baillie says, 'We have nearly agreed in private on a draught of Catechism, on which, when it comes in public, we may have little debate.' From the MSS. of Mr. George Gillespie, it appears, that after the report had been given in and considered, the Catechism was recommitted, that improvements suggested by the wisdom of the Assembly might be made. I find in the letters of Baillie various hints respecting the progress of the Catechism. 'We made long ago,' says he, 'a pretty progress in the Catechism, but falling on rule and long debates, it was laid aside till the Confession was ended, with the resolution to have no matter in it but what was expressed in the Confession, which should not be debated again in the Catechism.' In another letter of later date, he says, 'We have passed a quarter of the Catechism, and thought to have made a short work with the rest, but we have fallen into such endless janglings about the method and the matter, that all think it will be a long work: the increase of all heresies is very great.'

When the Committee had accomplished their task, the Shorter Catechism was submitted to the Assembly and approved of, first in separate parts, and then as a whole. It was then laid before Parliament, by whom it was sanctioned. Circumstances, however, intervened which prevented it from being licensed by the King. In 1648 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had it under consideration, when, after deliberation, they adopted the following deliverance:—"The General Assembly having seriously considered the Shorter Catechism, agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster, with the assistance of commissioners from this Kirk, do find, upon due examination thereof, that the said Catechism is agreeable to the Word of God, and in nothing contrary to the received doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Kirk, and therefore approve the said Shorter Catechism, as a part of the intended uniformity, to be a Directory for catechising such as are of weaker capacity." The following year it was also ratified by the Scottish Parliament. From that time down to the present, the Shorter Catechism has been used not only among Presbyterians in Scotland, but extensively among other denominations throughout the three kingdoms, and in the United States of America, besides being translated into many different languages, and highly valued as one of the most precious of uninspired compositions. On this subject Dr. James Brewster thus remarks: "In the Reformed Protestant Churches of Holland, the Shorter Catechism is divided into fifty-two sections, one of which is prescribed as the regular subject of discourse during the afternoon service every Lord's Day, so that all the parts of the Catechism may be successively explained in the course of every year. All the Presbyterian denominations in Scotland, who have separated from the Established Church, not only retain this Shorter Catechism as a part of their standards, but hold it in the highest estimation, as an instrument of religious instruction among their people. The Presbyterian Dissenters in England were accustomed to testify the greatest regard for this little summary of Christian doctrine; and their provincial Synod in London, at one time published several directions for its being employed in catechising children and servants 'on the Lord's Day in the afternoon before sermon, to the end that the whole congregation may receive benefit thereby.' The Independents also, especially in England, have borne the strongest testimonies to its excellence; and the Wesleyan Methodists have embodied a considerable portion of its contents in one of their summaries of Scripture truth. Throughout the vast extent of the Christian Church in the United States of America, it is not only held in great estimation, but brought into general use in their schools, their pulpits, and their theological seminaries."

CATECHISTS, officers in the early Christian church, whose duty it was to instruct the CATECHUMENS (which see) in the first principles of religion, and thereby prepare them for the reception of baptism. This office was at first discharged apparently by the bishop or pastor himself. On Palm-Sunday it was customary for the bishop to catechize such of the catechumens as were to be baptized on Easter eve. The duty in course of time came to be performed not by the bishop only, but also by presbyters and deacons. At length the office of catechist was conferred, as in the church of Carthage, on some individual who happened to distinguish himself among the church readers. At Alexandria, however, it was necessary that those who held this office should be men both of ability and learning, and in consequence of the high character of those who were chosen as catechists, the school of Alexandria, instead of being an elementary school for catechumens, became a CATECHETICAL SCHOOL (which see) for instruction in the more difficult points of theology. The proper duty of the catechist was to point out to catechumens, not publicly in the church, but generally in some private place, as for instance, the BAPTISTERY (which see), the special obligations under which they would come in entering the Christian church, and the duties they were bound to discharge as members of the church. Deaconesses were also employed as catechists to teach the female catechumens. An officer bearing the name of catechist is still found in the Greek church, whose duty it is to instruct and prepare for baptism, all such as renounce heretical tenets, and desire to be admitted into the pale of the church. In modern times the name of catechists has been applied to a class of godly men, who, though not invested with the clerical office, are employed frequently in places where the means of grace are scanty, in reading and familiarly expounding the Word of God from house to house among the humbler classes.

CATECHUMENIA, a word used to designate the place in which the catechumens were instructed, whether the baptistery, or a place set apart for the special purpose. It was besides, a name given to the upper galleries in the early Christian churches, where the women sat, and which were situated above the porticos of the men, upon pillars. They were also called hyperoa or upper rooms, and in one of these the empress commonly sat when hearing Divine service performed. These apartments were sometimes used as places where councils were held. Thus the council of Constantinople is said to have met in the right hand galleries of the church of Alexius, and some others are mentioned as having been held in the same place.

CATECHUMENS (Gr. learners), candidates for baptism in the ancient Christian church. Great importance was justly attached to this order, as is evident from the fact, that schools were specially instituted for their instruction, over which CATECHISTS (which see) were appointed. One part of the church service was designed for their particular benefit, and when it was concluded they were dismissed. The circumstances in which the order of Catechumens had its origin are thus described by Dr. Jamieson in nis 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians : ' " While those who were entitled to partake of the Lord's Supper were exclusively denominated the faithful, and considered as occupying the rank of perfect or approved Christians, there were several other classes of persons, who, though connected with the church, and forming constituent parts of it, were yet separated from and inferior to the former, being in various stages of advancement towards a qualification for the holy rites of the gospel. These orders, known by the name of catechumens, were distinguished from each other by lines of demarcation, beyond which none was allowed to pass without a long and gradual preparation ; and between a newly-made catechumen and a Christian in the rank of the faithful, there was as wide a difference in the eye of the primitive church as between an infant of a day and one who has attained the stature of a full-grown man. In the records of apostolic times we shall in vain look for any traces of this distinction ; for then a heathen no sooner made an avowal of his faith in Christ than he received the initiatory rite of Christianity. His conversion was immediately followed by his baptism, and whatever shades of difference there might be in the knowledge of the new converts, all were considered as equally entitled to the outward sign as they were to the inward and spiritual benefits of the ordinance. But in process of time, when the church was enlarged by a daily increasing influx of members from heathenism, and when her purity was no longer guarded by the presiding care of those who possessed the miraculous gift of discerning spirits, the pious solicitude of her rulers in after-times gave rise to the custom of deferring the admission of converts into the fellowship of the church, till clear and satisfactory evidence was obtained of their fitness, in point of knowledge and sincerity, to be enrolled in the ranks of the disciples. The dear-bought experience of the primitive Christians had convinced them that the gross habits of idolaters were not easily, and all at once, in many instances, relinquished for the pure and spiritual principles of the gospel, and that multitudes of professed believers held their faith by so slender a tie that the slightest temptation plunged them anew into their former sensuality, and the first alarm drove them back into the enemies' camp. To diminish, and if possible, to prevent the occurrence of such melancholy apostasies, which interrupted the peace and prosperity of the Christian society, and brought a stain on the Christian name, was a consummation devoutly wished for by the pious fathers of the primitive age ; and accordingly, animated by a spirit of holy jealousy, they adopted the rule, which soon came into universal practice, of instituting a severe and protracted inquiry into the character and views of candidates for admission to the communion of the church, of not suddenly advancing them to that honourable degree, but of continuing them for a limited period in a state of probation. It was thus that the order of the catechumens arose—an order which, though unknown to the age of Peter and Paul, boasts of a very early introduction into the primitive church ; and at whatever period its date may be fixed, its origin is to be traced to the laudable desire of more fully instructing young converts in the doctrines of the Christian faith, and at the same time affording them opportunities to give evidence of the sincerity of their profession, by the change of their lives and the holiness of their conversation."

Some of the early Fathers speak of certain mysteries more especially connected with the eucharist, which were carefully concealed from the catechumens. These were usually known by the name of ARCANI DISCIPLINA (which see). There was no specific rule as to the precise age at which Jewish and heathen converts were admitted into the list of catechumens. At such a period most of them were, of course, adults, and sometimes, as in the case of Constantine the Great, they delayed the reception of baptism till they found themselves on a dying bed. They were not bound to remain among the catechumens for any fixed period, but much depended on their proficiency. By the council of Il-iberis, A. D. 673, the time of instruction was named as two years ; and by that of Agatha, A. D. 506, it was limited to eight months. Cyril of Jerusalem and Jerome required catechumens to observe a season of fasting and prayer for forty days.

The catechumens were early divided into separate classes according to their advancement in Christian knowledge. The most general and the simplest classification was into the imperfect and the perfect, or the beginners and the proficient. On the enrolment of any individual in the list of catechumens, he was admitted by the imposition of hands. The discipline to which he was thereafter subjected, in preparation for baptism, is thus rapidly summed up by Dr. Jamieson : " The moment that a heathen announced his resolution to abandon the religion of his fathers, and to embrace that of Jesus, he was introduced to the pastor of the place, who, having laid his hand upon his head, (a ceremony of very frequent use in all the offices of the ancient church,) and prayed that he might become a partaker of the grace of the gospel, consigned him to the care of some missionaries, whose duty it was from time to time to wait upon him privately, and in his own house, to instruct him in the elementary principles of the Christian faith. At an appointed time, and when he had satisfied his private instructors of his capacity to profit by the services of the church, he was permitted to come into the congregation, where he stood in a particular place appropriated to the hearers—those who were admitted to hear the scriptures read, and the plain and simple discourses on the fundamental articles of faith and points of duty, which always formed the subject of the preliminary exhortations of the church. If the proficiency and conduct of the catechumen during his continuance in this lower rank were approved of, he was, at a certain period, advanced to a higher order, which was privileged not only to be present at the reading of the scriptures, and the delivery of the sermons, but also at the prayers, which were described as concluding the first service. After remaining the appointed time in this more advanced stage of his progress, he was successively privileged to be present at the public prayers of the church, to hear the discourses addressed to the faithful on the higher and more abstruse doctrines of Christianity, and even to witness, at a humble distance, the dispensation of the Lord's Supper. He was then considered ripe for baptism, and immediately put upon a new course of discipline, preparatory to partaking of the holy mysteries at the next celebration of the solemnity. Hitherto he had been trained, by a regular course of catechetical instructions in private, to a knowledge of the leading doctrines and duties of the gospel, and now he was subjected to frequent and minute examinations in public on every branch of his religious education. If approved, he was forthwith instructed in some of the sublimer points of Christianity, which had been hitherto withheld from him, such as the doctrine of the Trinity, the union of the Divine and human natures in Christ, the influences of the Spirit, and the way in which a participation of the symbols of a Saviour's love gives spiritual nourishment to the soul. He was allowed to employ the Lord's Prayer, the use of which was considered as the exclusive privilege of his adopted children; and was enjoined to commit to memory the creed, as a formula which embodied in a small compass all the grand articles of revealed truth which it had been the object of his protracted discipline to teach him. For twenty successive days he continued a course of partial fasting, during which he had daily interviews with his minister, who, in private, and secluded from the presence of every other observer, endeavoured, by serious discourse, to impress his mind with a sense of the important step he was about to take, and more especially prayed with him in the usual solemn form, by imposition of hands, that he might be delivered from any evil spirit that had possession of his heart, and be enabled to consecrate himself a living sacrifice to God and the Saviour. Such was the discipline of the catechumens—a discipline to which all ranks and descriptions of men, who were desirous of being admitted into the bosom of the church, were in primitive times indiscriminately subjected. 'None,' to use the words of Lord King, 'were permitted to enjoy the privileges of the faithful till they had in a manner merited them; which was, when they had, through a considerable time of trial, manifested the sincerity of their hearts by the sanctity and purity of their lives. When they had changed their manners, and rectified their former habits, then they were washed with the waters of baptism, and not before.'"

The catechumens in the ancient church were allowed to be present at, and take part in, one portion of the public prayers, which followed immediately after the sermon; but they were excluded from those prayers which were peculiar to the faithful or communicants only. At the close of the sermon, before any of the prayers began in the service of the catechumens, a deacon called generally upon all Jews and infidels, and such of the catechumens and penitents as were simply in the stage of audientes, or hearers, to withdraw. Prayers were then offered specially on behalf of the catechumens, commencing with a BIDDING PRAYER (which see), which was an exhortation and direction how the congregation were to pray for them; and to every petition, the people, and especially the children, were accustomed to subjoin, "Lord, have mercy upon them." After the bidding-prayer, the deacon called upon them to bow down and receive the bishop's benediction. Chrysostom mentions that the catechumens were invited also to pray for the protection and guidance of the ANGEL OF PEACE (which see), for peace upon all that awaited them, peace in the present, and peace in the future, and for a Christian end. In consequence of bowing the knee before the bishop, the catechumens at this stage were sometimes called genuflectentes, kneelers. On leaving this class, they were considered regular candidates for baptism, and, as such, their names were registered in the diptychs, or church books. To this custom Gregory of Nyssa alludes, when he says, in his treatise on Baptism, "that as he inscribed the names with ink in the earthly roll, so might the finger of God write them down in his imperishable book." In the North-African church, the bishop gave to those whom he received as competentes, or prepared for baptism, while signing the cross over them as a symbol of consecration, a portion of salt, over which a blessing had been pronounced. This was intended to signify the divine word imparted to the candidates, as the true salt for human nature.

It would appear, from various early writers, that catechumens were exercised for twenty days before receiving baptism. (See EXORCISM.) By the ceremonies followed on this occasion, which consisted of prayer, insufflation, imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross, evil spirits were expelled from the heart; and during the same period the catechumens were exercised with abstinence and fasting. At this time they were taught to repeat the words of the Creed, and then of the Lord's Prayer, besides being fully instructed in the responses which they were required to make in baptism. When prepared for the ordinance, they went veiled, or with their faces covered for some days before its administration. Another ceremony which may be mentioned, was the custom of touching the ears of the catechumens, and saying unto them, "Ephphatha," "Be opened," denoting the opening of the understanding to receive the truth of God. Ambrose mentions, also, another practice which was followed in the case of catechumens, that of anointing the eyes with clay, in imitation of the manner in which our Lord opened the eyes of the blind man as recorded in John ix. 6, "When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay." In the African church, a lighted taper was put into the hands of catechumens during the ceremony of exorcism. It is also said, that though catechumens were not permitted to partake of the eucharist, yet they had something like it which they called consecrated bread, taken out of the same oblations which supplied the elements of the eucharist. This practice may be the foundation of the ANTI-DORON (which see) of the Greek Church. Augustine makes a reference to what has been called the sacrament of the catechumens, which Bingham supposes not to have been the consecrated bread, but only a little taste of salt; for, in a passage of Augustine's writings, where he is speaking of himself as a catechumen, he says, that at that time he was often signed with the cross of Christ and seasoned with his salt.

The punishment usually inflicted upon catechumens when, during the course of their training, they fell into gross and scandalous offences, was to protract the period of their probationary instruction. While the ordinary time was two years, transgressors were sometimes obliged to continue three, and, at other times, five years; but, in the case of very aggravated sins, till the hour of their death. In case catechumens died without baptism by neglect or their own default, they were doomed to be buried in silence, and no mention was ever after made of them among others in the prayers of the church. But if they were suddenly cut off while preparing for baptism, they were considered as on the same footing with martyrs, quite prepared for death.

CATENA PATRUM, a collection of passages from the old church fathers, arranged according to the books of the Bible, which they were designed to illustrate.

CATHARINE (St.), FESTIVAL OF, held in the Romish Church in honour of Catharine of Sienna, who lived towards the close of the fourteenth century. She appears to have been a mystic, whose whole life was spent amid the most extravagant delusions. Her visions commenced at six years of age. She pretended that on one occasion she had been blessed by a vision in which the Saviour appeared to her, accompanied by the Holy Mother, and numerous saints, in whose presence he solemnly espoused her, placing on her finger a golden ring adorned with four pearls and a diamond. After the vision had vanished the ring still remained, visible only to herself. She boasted also that she had sucked the blood from the wound in the Redeemer's side, that she had received his heart in exchange for her own, and that she bore on her body the marks of his wounds, though they were imperceptible to all eyes but her own. She travelled throughout all Italy, teaching, warning, exhorting, and proclaiming to crowded audiences, the wonders which she had seen in heaven and hell during the trance in which all thought her dead. She bore five years of privation, and was tormented by devils. It was partly in consequence of the pretended revelations of Catharine, that Gregory XI., the last of the Avignon popes, was persuaded to remove his court to Rome, in A. D. 1374, where he died in 1378.

CATHARISTS, or CATHARI (Gr. katharos, pure), a term applied in different ages to those who professed to maintain peculiar purity, both in doctrine and life. The Novatians received this name in the fourth century. It was especially applied to the PAULICIANS (which see) of the seventh and following centuries, by way of reproach, as differing from the tenets of the dominant church. The sects which bore the appellation of Catharists were scattered in different countries, and under different names. The peculiar opinions which they seem to have held, particularly in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, from their similarity to the Gnostic sects, bear evidently an oriental impress, although elaborated into a thoroughly independent system. One party assumed the existence of two original and opposite principles, and of two creations corresponding to these two principles; while the other party held only a relative Dualism, and regarded the evil principle as a spirit fallen from God, and as having given origin to a revolution in the universe. These may be considered as the distinctive doctrines which separated the two divisions of Catharists from one another, although they were knit by a firm bond in their common opposition to the Church of Rome.

The more rigid Catharists set out in their theological system from an absolute Dualism. They believed in the existence, from all eternity, of two principles and two creations. The good God gave origin to all imperishable existence, but to the evil deity must be traced all perishable existence. This lower world, as being perishable, is the work of the evil principle, and the higher world, as being imperishable, is the work of the good principle. In accordance with this system, they explained numerous passages, both of the Old and New Testaments, in which an opposition is asserted between the world and God, between the flesh and the Spirit. And not contented with appealing to Scripture in support of their doctrines, they claimed Aristotle also as favourable to their views. Satan, they alleged, had intruded into the heaven of the good, and led a third part of the heavenly souls into apostacy. These heavenly souls were middle beings between a higher and a lower class. To each soul corresponded a spirit and a heavenly body. In punishment of their apostacy, they were driven from heaven along with Satan their leader, and separated both from their spirits and the heavenly bodies. Hence they are ever appearing under the veil of some human body, in which Satan has confined them. They believed in different gradations of heavenly souls, according as they belonged to different princes of heaven, the highest being composed of those who were described as the spiritual Israel, and for whose salvation more especially Christ came into the world.

The Catharists believed Christ to be the highest spirit after God, yet differing from him in essence, and subordinate to him; and they viewed the Holy Spirit as in like manner different from the Son, and subordinate to him. "The Son of God," to use the language of Neander, "united himself to a spirit, soul, and body, in that heavenly world, and so descended, with the annunciation of the angel, into Mary, and again went forth from her. Herself, however, they regarded as a higher spirit, who appeared on earth for the purpose of becoming the instrument or channel for the appearance of the Son of God in humanity. They taught, like the Valentinians, that the heavenly body of Christ was, by a special act of divine power, so modified, that it seemed like an earthly one, and could be perceived by the senses. Yet they must explain all sensuous acts and affections to which Christ subjected himself as unreal, mere appearances. They maintained, likewise, that all the accounts of the miracles wrought by Christ, were to be understood only in a spiritual sense, as symbols of the spiritual miracles wrought by him." A party among the Catharists regarded the apostle John, whom they especially revered, as an angel, who, being destined to remain till the second coming of Christ, was still on the earth. Another party, called ORDIBARII (which see), taught that a Trinity first began to exist at the birth of Christ. The man Jesus became Son of God by his reception of the Word announced to him, and he was the son of Mary, not in a corporeal, but in a spiritual sense, being born of her by the annunciation of the Word; and when by the preaching of Jesus others were attracted, the Holy Ghost began to exist. The new birth was, in the view of the stricter Catharists, a restoration of the relation between the soul and its corresponding spirit, from which it had been separated by the apostasy. They believed in a threefold judgment; first, the expulsion of apostate souls from heaven; second, that which began with the appearance of Christ; third, when Christ shall raise his redeemed to the higher condition, or, in other words, when the souls shall rejoin the spirits and the heavenly bodies they had left behind them in heaven. It is said that the strict Catharists rejected the whole Old Testament, with the exception of Isaiah. They are also alleged to have set a high value on an apocryphal book called the Ascension of Isaiah, which gives countenance to some of their most prominent doctrines.

The milder Catharists did not maintain the existence from all eternity of an evil spirit, but held, on the contrary, that all evil had its origin in the apostasy of a good spirit. Matter they supposed to have proceeded from God, and the form given to it from Satan. The sun, moon, and stars, they looked upon as intelligences which had fallen. From the one heavenly soul of Adam, all other souls were believed to have been derived. They denied original sin, considering it as impossible, seeing that men were sprung from Adam only by bodily descent. Satan was with them the god of the Old Testament who revealed himself to Abraham, and brought the flood upon the world, while from God proceeded the deliverance of Noah. Moses and the prophets were, in their view, servants of Satan, and they looked upon the Old Testament and the New as opposed to each other. They denied the lawfulness of war, objected to capital punishment, and would admit of no other testimony than a simple yea or nay. They agreed with the stricter Catharists on the subject of the Trinity. They held that Mary was not really the mother of Christ, but only the channel through which he passed into the world. They denied the resurrection of the body, contended against infant baptism, and even regarded water-baptism generally as a device of Satan in order to suppress the true baptism of the Spirit, which, they maintained, should be performed by the imposition of hands in connection with prayer. This rite they termed CONSOLAMENTUM (which see), and maintained that the Holy Spirit was therein communicated, not by the visible, but by an invisible hand contained under the visible. In regard to the Lord's Supper they were of opinion that Christ, when he uttered the words, "This is," pointed to his own body; or they explained the words of the institution in a symbolical sense, "this is" being equivalent to "this signifies." They believed in transubstantiation, or the conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. In their love-feasts, which they also observed, the presiding officer of the sect imparted the blessing by reciting the Lord's Prayer.

The Catharists openly dissented from some of the leading doctrines of the dominant church. They objected to the sacrament of penance, and denied the necessity of a satisfaction for sins committed after baptism. In confessing their sins to the bishop, the members of the sect prostrated themselves before him in Eastern fashion, praying in these words: "Have mercy upon us, O Lord. I never must die, but inherit thee on high, that I may have a good end." The bishop then bestowed on each the consolamentum, with the imposition of hands, while he thrice repeated, "And that thou mayest be a good man." Rainer, in his treatise against the Catharists, says that they did not receive the writings of the fathers. The four evangelists they readily acknowledged, alleging that they had written in a saving way, because they had written upon the heart, while the other four—namely, Jerome, Augustin, Ambrose, and Bernard, had written unprofitably, because they only wrote on the lifeless parchment. They rejected the authority of church tradition, the hierarchy, the worship of saints and images, the value of pilgrimage, thus maintaining at that early period, some of those very principles which formed the groundwork, at a later period, of the Protestant Reformation. On one important point, however, they were entirely at variance with the tenets which afterwards made up the Protestant doctrine as opposed to the Church of Rome. We refer to the high position which the Catharists assigned to good works in the matter of salvation. The perfects, as they were called, or stricter Catharists were expected to practise a morality of the most rigidly ascetic description. They were required to abstain from meat, eggs, and cheese. Marriage was discountenanced, as leading, in their view, to sin.

The sect was divided into two classes, the one consisting of the Perfect, or good men, and the other of believers. The former class corresponded to the elect in the sect of the Manicheans. They represented themselves as wandering about, exposed to persecution, and without a settled home, living like the Saviour, who knew not where to lay his head. From the number of the Perfect were chosen the presiding officers of the sect; first, a bishop; then, under him, a greater and a lesser son; and, finally, a deacon. Several were set apart from their childhood for the office of bishop, and educated for that purpose. One important part of their training consisted of the regulation of their food, which consisted of no other milk but the milk of almonds, and no flesh, but fish; and, in other respects, they were obliged to observe the rigid diet of the Perfect.

The Catharists were zealous in disseminating their principles everywhere, travelling about from village to village and from house to house, embracing every opportunity of expounding the Scriptures, and teaching their peculiar doctrines to the uninitiated. Wherever they went, they were almost certain of meeting with a kind and cordial reception from individuals who sympathized with their principles. In particular, the Perfect were received into the houses of believers with great respect. The inmates thrice bowed the knee to receive their blessing. The members of the sect who might happen to reside in the neighbourhood quickly assembled, to whom a sermon was preached, pointing out not only the truth of God as set forth in the Scriptures, but its opposition to the regular teaching of the dominant church. Still further to propagate their peculiar tenets, they took in the daughters of indigent noblemen, and educated them gratuitously, at the same time instilling into their minds an acquaintance with the Word of God.

The avowed opposition of the Catharists to the doctrine and hierarchy of the Church of Rome naturally excited the jealousy and indignation of the clergy. The most absurd reports were raised as to the practices of this obnoxious sect; and the ignorant populace, goaded to fury by the calumnious representations of the clergy, hurried many of the unoffending Catharists to the stake. Thus it was that in the countries on the Rhine and in France, many of these so-called heretics were doomed to suffer the most cruel and unjust treatment, and persecuted even to death. This was more especially the case towards the end of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth centuries. In vain did the amiable Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, interpose in behalf of what he considered a class of well meaning though mistaken sectaries. His representations were attended with but partial success in stemming the tide of persecution. The ruthless persecutors were struck with amazement at the calmness and intrepidity with which the Catharists met an excruciating death, but they endeavoured to explain away the strange anomaly by ascribing it to the power of Satan. The blood of the martyrs was in their case, as in that of every other sect of Christians, the seed of the church. Like the Israelites of old, the more they were oppressed, the more they multiplied and increased. Though multitudes of them were compelled to take refuge in dens and caves of the earth, the sect daily received accessions to its numbers, both in Italy and France, and thus the Catharists continued, under various different names, but with the same principles, at least in substance, to hold their ground in the face of all opposition, until the glorious reformation of the sixteenth century rendered their leading principles extensively predominant throughout various countries of Europe.

CATHEDRA, a seat among the ancients, but more especially applied among the Romans to a soft seat used by women. Afterwards it came to be used as signifying the chair or pulpit from which lectures were read. It was also employed to denote the raised chair in which the bishop or presiding pastor sat. Cathedra is also the name of an Episcopal see.

The bishop's throne, as well as the place in which it was situated, was frequently called BEMA (which see). Gregory Nazianzen speaks of himself as bishop sitting upon the high throne, and the presbyters on lower benches on both sides about him. This arrangement has sometimes been supposed to have been adopted in imitation of the Jewish synagogues, in which, according to Maimonides, the law was placed in the wall at the upper end, and on each side the elders were seated in a semicircle.

CATHEDRAL, the chief church of a diocese, or a church in which is a bishop's see, so called from the episcopal cathedra or chair. Cathedrals had their origin in England in the early Missionary colleges, each consisting of a bishop, with his associated clergy, living together, and maintained by common funds, and from these colleges went forth preachers of the gospel into all parts of the bishop's diocese or parish. In this original form the Cathedral church was called Episcopium. After the Conquest, Cathedral institutions assumed a somewhat altered form more completely adapted to the particular circumstances of the times. Each Cathedral church, with its bishop, appears as the spiritual metropolis of a diocese, divided into a number of different parishes, each having its own minister and its separate endowment. The Cathedral body now became of an administrative rather than a missionary character. The regular, organized system, however, of Cathedral churches was introduced by the Norman bishops on their promotion to English sees, and continues to this day with some modifications, in the nine English cathedrals of the old foundation, viz. York, St. Paul's, London, Chester, Exeter, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln's, Salisbury, Wilts. On the same footing there are four cathedrals in Wales, St. Asaph, Bangor, Llandaff, and St. David's. Besides these cathedrals of the old foundation, there are eight Conventual cathedrals, which were constituted with deans and chapters by King Henry VIII. These are Canterbury, Durham, Carlisle, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Winchester, and Worcester. There were also five cathedrals founded, together with new bishoprics, by Henry VIII. viz. Bristol, Peterborough, Oxford, Gloucester, and Chester. There are two additional cathedrals, Ripon and Manchester, which may be considered rather as collegiate churches.

The members of each cathedral are as follows: the bishop, presiding over the whole body, the dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacons, canons, vicars, and other officers. The four cathedrals in Wales were less perfect in their constitution than the English cathedrals. Thus the dean was wanting at St. David's and Llandaff. The dean and chapter regulate the affairs of cathedrals, and are only amenable to the bishop's jurisdiction as a body in chapter assembled. All offences of individual members are corrected by the authority of the dean, according to the capitular statutes. During the period which elapsed between the Conquest and the Reformation, a remarkable feature in the administration of cathedrals was the chapter council, in which the bishop presided over the whole capitular body, and with their advice and assistance framed regulations for the cathedral church, and other parts of diocesan government. The chapter council of Salisbury has been assembled several times since the Reformation, under the name of the Pentecostal chapter.

In the early part of the sixteenth century, several changes were made in the cathedrals of the old foundation, not however materially affecting their constitution. In some of the old cathedrals, however, the statutes have not been remodelled, and are, therefore, now in many respects inapplicable to the English Liturgy. The eight Conventual cathedrals were changed after the suppression of the monasteries into eight chapters of dean and canons. The design of the thirteen new chapters founded by Henry VIII., is thus set forth in the preamble of the statutes: "That the pure worship of God may be maintained, and the Holy Gospel assiduously and purely preached; and besides this, that to the advancement of the Christian faith and piety, the youth of our realm may be trained up in sound learning, and the poor for ever maintained."

In 1835, William IV. issued a commission to consider the several cathedral and collegiate churches of England and Wales, with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them conducive to the efficiency of the Established church. Several important improvements have been made in the cathedral system as the result of the inquiries of this commission. As examples of these may be mentioned, the reduction of the number of canonries to four attached to each cathedral, with the exception of Christ church, Oxford, which is allowed to retain eight; the retaining of the non-residentiary canons in the old foundations, but without emolument; the reduction of the number of minor canons, and the reduction of the incomes of future deans and canons.

Another commission was issued for the same purpose by Queen Victoria in 1852, and the report which contains the result of their inquiries was published by authority of Parliament in 1854. Many valuable suggestions, as appears from the Report, have been made to the commissioners, which, if adopted, will undoubtedly render the cathedral system more efficient than it has been since its first institution. One of the main purposes for which cathedrals were founded was to impart Christian instruction, especially to those who were under training for holy orders in the church. By an edict of Charlemagne, schools were attached to every cathedral in his dominions; and till about the end of the tenth century almost the only seminaries were found in cathedral and conventual institutions. On inquiry the commissioners have found, that the cathedrals of England have never wholly lost this feature of their original constitution, but of late years various steps have been taken towards carrying out this important object of cathedrals still more extensively. And it must be admitted, that the tendency of legislative enactments, in recent years, has been to render, in some degree, the revenues of cathedrals more conducive to the improvement of clerical training in connection with university education. In this has originated, only a few years ago, the establishment of the university of Durham, and the endowment still more recently of several professorships in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. See CANONS of a CATHEDRAL, CHAPTER.

CATHOLIC CHURCH (Gr. catholicos, universal), a name applied to the Christian church, which is almost as ancient as the church itself. It was used in early times to distinguish the church from heretical sects, which were usually confined to particular districts, or a limited party of men, and, therefore, could not be considered as catholic; but the Church of Christ was well entitled to the name, because it was universally diffused over the whole world. Nor was any one in the first ages of Christianity acknowledged to be a Christian unless he professed himself to belong to the catholic church, which from the beginning recognized a living, outward union among all its members, however far they might be separated from one another. In many districts, Christianity very early made progress in the open country, and as soon as a sufficient number of converts were gathered together, a regular congregation was formed, with its presiding officers, presbyters, or bishops, who were quite as independent as the presiding officers of the city churches. These rural bishops or CHOREPISCOPI (which see), as they were afterwards called, probably existed in the earliest periods of the church, though we do not find them mentioned by name before the fourth century. In all probability Christianity was first extended from the cities into the rural districts, so that both congregations, and their presiding officers in the country, would be subordinate to the city bishop. In the same way Christianity would spread from the principal cities to the other provincial towns. As converts multiplied, the churches of a province constituted a whole, at the head of which stood the church of the metropolis, whose bishop became, in relation to the other bishops of the province, chief among his equals. In course of time the churches, which had been founded by apostles, and to whom they had addressed their epistles, came to be held in peculiar veneration, and whenever there was any controversy, whether in regard to doctrine or practice, these apostolic churches, as they were sometimes called, were consulted in the first instance. Such were especially Rome, Antioch, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Coriuth.

The superiority thus assigned to particular churches over the others did not rest here. The Church of Rome, the great capital of the world, and the city where it was very anciently reported that both Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom, naturally arose into pre-eminence above the other sedes apostolicæ, or churches which had been privileged to enjoy the presence and preaching of the apostles. From the church at Rome, indeed, had originated many of the churches of the West, and Irenæus speaks of this church in such terms as clearly shows, if we may believe the ancient Latin translation of the writings of that early father, the original Greek text being unfortunately lost, at how early a period the church of Rome asserted a pre-eminence over the other churches. Both Irenæus and Tertullian speak of Peter and Paul as the founders of that church, but neither of them held that the Roman Church was entitled to be called the cathedra Petri, Peter's chair, or to exercise rule and authority over all other apostolic churches. But this idea seems to have gradually arisen and gained ground, for we find Cyprian styling the Roman Church "the chair of Peter, the principal church from which sacerdotal unity has arisen." At a much earlier period than the days of Cyprian, we find an evident tendency in the Roman bishops to lord it over the churches. Thus about A. D. 190, Victor, bishop of Rome, went so far in this direction as to excommunicate the churches of Asia Minor on account of an unimportant dispute about the time of celebrating Easter. In the writings of Tertullian may be found traces of the same spirit, as having been exhibited in his time by the Roman bishops, who issued peremptory edicts on ecclesiastical matters, and endeavoured even to make themselves be regarded as bishops of bishops. These arrogant and presumptuous claims were met on the part of the whole Eastern and many of the Western churches with determined resistance. Even Cyprian, who, looked upon the Roman church as Peter's chair, maintained with the utmost firmness and energy the independent right of individual bishops to manage the affairs of the churches according to their own principles, and he openly denied the right which was claimed by the Church of Rome to determine all matters of church controversy. About this time, the middle of the third century, two Spanish bishops had been deposed by a synod for certain grave offences. They appealed to Stephanus, bishop of Rome, who, asserting a supreme judicatory power, reversed the sentence of the Spanish ecclesiastical court, and restored the deposed bishops to office. This gave rise immediately to a question in Spain, whether the one sentence or the other was to be respected, and held as valid, and the Christian churches of North Africa were applied to for their opinion. A synod, accordingly, was convened upon the point at Carthage, and Cyprian was commissioned by the Synod to reply, that in their opinion, the decision of the Roman bishop was without force and void, and that the two deposed bishops should on no account be permitted to hold office.

The first ecclesiastical decree, which was passed in favour of the usurped authority of the Roman church, was that of an obscure council held at Sardis during the Arian controversy in A. D. 347. Among other things this council declared, that "in the event of any bishop considering himself aggrieved by the sentence of the bishops of his province, he might apply to the bishops of Rome, who should write to the bishops in the neighbourhood of the province of the aggrieved bishop, to rehear the cause; and should also, if it seemed desirable to do so, send some presbyters of his own church to assist at the rehearing." A second step towards the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, was a law enacted A. D. 372 by the emperor Valentinian, which empowered the bishops of Rome to examine and judge other bishops. Towards the close of the fourth century, the custom became somewhat extensive of referring to the decision of the Roman bishops all questions concerning the apostolic customs and doctrines. This gave them occasion to issue a number of de- cretals, as they were called, which soon assumed a tone of apostolic authority, and were received with high respect in the West. "From this time forth," says Gieseler, "there was no controversy in the East, in which each party did not seek to win the bishop of Rome, and through him the Western church, to its cause, vying with each other in flattery and servility. At the councils, his legates were always treated with the greatest deference, and at the council of Chalcedon they for the first time presided." The council of Chalcedon here referred to, was convened A. D. 451, and to the no small annoyance of Leo the Great, the then bishop of Rome, a canon was passed, which declared the same rights, honours, and privileges, to be due to the bishop of Constantinople as had hitherto been conceded to the bishop of Rome, and the same council confirmed the bishop of Constantinople in the spiritual government of those provinces over which he had claimed superiority.

From this period commenced the contest for superiority between Constantinople and Rome, the Eastern and the Western capitals. Various circumstances combined, however, to augment the influence and authority of the Roman See, not the least of which was the readiness with which the claims to superiority, put forth by the bishops of Rome, were submitted to by the heathen tribes, which now overran the Roman Empire. The ancient capital fell into the hands of the invading barbarians, and thus was suddenly deprived of its political importance, and the Romish bishops found it necessary, therefore, if they would maintain the authority which they had gained, to assert their spiritual claims with greater boldness than ever. They put forth, accordingly, a divine right of supremacy, alleging that they were the regular lineal successors of the apostle Peter, who, they asserted, without either scriptural or historical proof, was the first bishop of Rome, and appointed by Christ to be the supreme head of the church upon earth. It was felt to be all the more necessary to urge these claims to spiritual supremacy, as Rome had now lost its political importance, and the rival city of Constantinople was fast rising into the first rank of influence and dignity. During the fifth century, this contest for supremacy was carried on with the utmost keenness between the bishop of Rome and the patriarch of Constantinople, and towards the close of the same century, John the faster, bishop of Constantinople, assumed the title of universal bishop. This arrogant claim on the part of the Eastern patriarch roused the jealousy of his Western rival, and Gregory the Great, who was at that period bishop of Rome, to establish the more firmly his own authority, invented the fiction of the power of the keys as committed to the successor of the apostle Peter, rather than to the body of the bishops as had been hitherto supposed. Besides this bold attempt to outbid the pretensions of his rival, Gregory denounced in the strongest terms the assumption of the title of "universal bishop" as vain, blasphemous, antichristian, and execrable. The remonstrances of the Roman bishop were utterly unavailing. The patriarch John continued to use the obnoxious title, and after his decease, his successor Cynacus adopted the same pompous appellation. But the very title, the use of which by the patriarch of Constantinople had roused the indignation of Gregory the Great, was, at the earnest entreaty of his successor Boniface III., conferred upon him by the emperor Phocas, a cruel and bloodthirsty tyrant, who had made his way to the throne of Greece by the murder of his predecessor. From that important era, A. D. 606, the bishop of Rome took to himself the title of "Universal Bishop," thus showing himself to be the ANTICHRIST (which see), or man of sin predicted in the Word of God, and from that time the church of Rome claimed to be the CATHOLIC or universal church, to the exclusion of all from the pale of the church and the salvation of Christ who refuse to acknowledge subjection to the Pope of Rome. The epithet Catholic, however, applies in no sense to the church of Rome, which cannot with truth pretend to be universal, seeing that a larger portion of the Christian world itself repudiates the claim, including not only the immense body of Protestants, but the whole Greek or Eastern church, which has a far stronger claim to antiquity and lineal descent from the apostolic church than Rome with all her boasting can venture to assert.

CATHOLIC CHURCH (ROMAN). See ROME (CHURCH OF).

CATHOLIC EPISTLES, a title given to certain books of the New Testament. These are seven epistles in number, namely, one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The appellation Catholic is bestowed upon them, because, instead of being addressed, like the other Apostolic Epistles, to particular churches, they are directed to Christians generally. The term Catholic, as applied to these Epistles, was first used by Eusebius, as a common appellation in the fourth century; but at an earlier period, John's first epistle is repeatedly called a Catholic epistle by Origen, and by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria. Dr. Hammond, followed by Mac-knight, supposes that the epistles in question obtained the name of Catholic, as being universally acknowledged and therefore canonical.

CATHOLICOS, a name given to the heads or patriarchs of the ARMENIAN CHURCH (which see), of which there are at present three, although originally there was only one, who usually held his seat at the imperial residence. The highest dignitary is the catholicos of Etchmiadzin, who has under his jurisdiction the whole of Turcomania or Armenia Major. He has been appointed by the Czar since 1828, Armenia having been subject to Russia from that time, and he has under him a synod and an imperial procurator. The next in rank is the catholicos of Sis, a city in Cilicia, who has a limited province in Syria and the south of Anatolia. The third catholicos, that of Aghtamar, an island in Lake Van, rules over Koordistan, but his authority is somewhat doubtful. This functionary assumed the title of catholicos in A. D. 1114, and although not recognized for two centuries, it was at length admitted; but to this day his authority is looked upon with no very favourable feelings. The catholicos alone can ordain bishops, and consecrate the sacred oil which is used in various ceremonies of the church. Both the Georgian and Mingrelian Christians have a pontiff at their head, who bears the title of catholicos, but who pays tribute to the patriarch of Constantinople.

CATHOLIKIN, two officers in the ancient Jewish temple, who were head treasurers, and were only inferior in authority to the high-priest and the Sagan. Maimonides says of the catholikin, that "they were to be to the sagan as the sagan was to the high-priest, substitutes and assistants, and next in place and honour." The business of the temple more especially consisted of its service and the management of its revenues. Now, as there were inferior priests that performed the daily service, and as there were treasurers of a lower order that received the oblations, and whatever was brought into the common stock; so the high priest, the sagan, and the two catholikin were overseers both of the one and the other, that the treasury might be properly arranged for the use of the temple, and that the sacred service might be performed as it ought to be.

CATIUS, a god among the ancient Romans, who was looked upon as developing the minds of children when beginning to think.

CATOPTROMANCY (Gr. catoptron, a looking-glass, and manteia, divination), a species of divination by which objects or persons are alleged to appear to the eyes of a spectator in a mirror. See DIVINATION.

CAUCON, the most ancient god of the Messenians.

CAUSIUS, a surname of ÆSCULAPIUS (which see), derived from Caus in Arcadia, where he was worshipped.

CAVEAT, a caution entered in the spiritual courts in England to stop probates, licenses, administrations, &c. from being granted without the knowledge of the party that enters it.

CEBRON, a river-god in Troas.

CECILIA (St.) FESTIVAL OF, a festival of the Romish church, celebrated on the 22d November, in honour of St. Cecilia, virgin and martyr.

CEIMELIARCHS (Gr. ceimelia, sacred vessels, and archo, to rule), subordinate officers in the early Christian church, whose duty it was to take charge of the sacred vessels, utensils, and such precious things as were laid up in the sacred repository of the church. The office was usually assigned to some presbyter who had deacons under him.

CEIMELIARCHIUM, the repository of the vestments, vessels, and utensils in ancient Christian churches, which were committed to the charge of the CEIMELIARCH (see preceding article), as overseer of the deacons in this department at least of their duty.

CELEDONES, goddesses among the ancient Greeks, who were believed to possess, like the Sirens, the most attractive and winning influence by their songs.

CELESTIAL DEITIES, those of the superior gods of the Roman mythology who were supposed to have their abode in heaven. They possessed peculiar authority, and were held in the highest reverence. As the celestial above all the other gods were imagined to be pre-eminently employed in the government of the world, and, therefore, to have the greatest influence over the affairs of men, the worship awarded to them was of the highest kind. The names of these illustrious divinities among the Romans were Jupiter, Apollo, Mercury, Bacchus, and Mars; Juno, Minerva, Venus, Latona, and Aurora.

CELESTIAL NYMPHS, those genii among the ancient heathens who guided the spheres of the heavens, and dispensed the influences of the stars among the inhabitants of the earth.

CELESTINES, an order of Romish monks instituted by Peter de Meudon, a monk in the thirteenth century, who was elected Pope in A. D. 1294, under the name of Celestin V. The order was confirmed at the second general council of Lyons by Pope Gregory X. in A. D. 1273. The Celestines soon increased to a great extent in Italy, and were introduced into France by Philip the Fair. Some allege this order to have been instituted by Peter Damien, so far back as A. D. 1078, and that the dress of those monks was of a blue or celestial colour, whence they received the name of Celestines. There are thirty-nine monasteries of this order in Italy, and twenty-one in France. The monks wear a white cassock with a patience, scapulary, hood, and cowl, all black.

CELIBACY, the unmarried state. "Forbidding to marry" is laid down in Sacred Scripture as one of the marks of the great apostasy predicted by the Apostle Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 3. Keeping this passage in view, it is somewhat remarkable that the Romish church alone is characterized by the denunciation of marriage as in particular circumstances unlawful and sinful. Thus the council of Trent declares, "Whosoever shall affirm that persons in holy orders or regulars who have made a solemn profession of chastity may marry, let him be accursed." Again, the same council decrees, "Whosoever shall affirm that the conjugal state is to be preferred to a life of virginity or celibacy, and that it is not better and more conducive to happiness to remain in virginity or celibacy than to be married, let him be accursed." This attempt to throw discredit on the married state is at utter variance with the express statements of the Divine Word. The institution of marriage, while man was yet in a state of innocence, untarnished by the evil effects of the fall, shows that, in its original essential character, this appointment must be sinless. Besides, the most eminent of the ancient saints were married; for instance, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and Moses. By the express arrangement of God, the high-priest under the Mosaic law was to be married, as we find in Lev. xxi. 12—14. The Apostle Peter and the Evangelist Philip, were both married, and our blessed Lord, while on earth, graced a marriage-feast with his presence, and performed his first miracle on the occasion. "That the clergy may not marry" is the doctrine of the Church of Rome, "and that marriage is to them a pollution." "A bishop must be the husband of one wife" is the doctrine of the Bible, "one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity." Aaron the high-priest was married, Exod. vi. 23. Caiaphas the high-priest was married, John xviii. 13. Paul asserts his liberty to marry if he chose, 1 Cor. ix. 5.

While both the Old and New Testaments unite in discountenancing celibacy, and speaking favourably of the married state, it is strange that unscriptural notions on this subject should have begun at so early a period to prevail in the Christian church. Even in the commencement of the third century we learn, from the writings of Tertullian, that celibacy had already come to be regarded as highly meritorious, and marriage as to some extent a dishonour and a discredit to Christians of both sexes. Thus this earliest of the Latin fathers, when dissuading from second marriages, says, "May it not suffice thee to have fallen from that high rank of immaculate virginity by once marrying, and so descending to a second stage of honour." Mosheim represents the notion as being prevalent at a very early period, that the married were more exposed to the influence of wicked demons than the unmarried. This absurd idea led, as a natural consequence, to the opinion being extensively spread, that unmarried men were far more suitable for the sacred office than such as had contracted the defilement of matrimony. In the time of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, who suffered martyrdom A. D. 258, many young women had been prevailed upon to take the vow of perpetual celibacy, and the language in which this Christian writer addresses them shows in what estimation these vows were held. "Great are the wages," says he, "which await you; the high reward of virtue, the great recompense to be conferred upon chastity. Not only shall your lot and portion be equal to that of the other sex, but ye shall be equal to the angels of God."

The first decree which formally prohibited clergymen from marrying after ordination, was passed at a council held at Ancyra in Galatia, A. D. 314. Even this decree, however, was not absolute and universal in its application; for it excepted those who at the time of their ordination made an explicit profession of an intention to marry, as being in their case unavoidable. Clergymen who were in this position received a license to marry, and were declared free from all censure for so doing. If a candidate for ordination was already married, he was not called upon to put away his wife, unless he had married a widow, or a divorced person, or a harlot, or a slave, or an actress. An attempt was made at the council of Nice, A. D. 325, but without success, to procure an enactment that all clergymen, who had married before their ordination, should withdraw from their wives. The utmost, however, that the favourers of celibacy could obtain from the council was a fresh sanction to the established rule or tradition, that none should marry after ordination. It is plain, from the writings of even the most eminent of the Nicene fathers, that the most extravagant notions prevailed in the fourth century as to the sanctity and merit of the celibate life. At length, Siricius, who occupied the Papal chair from A. D. 385 to 398, issued his decrees strictly enjoining celibacy on the clergy; which decrees, however, while they were readily admitted and re-echoed by several western synods, were rejected with the utmost firmness by the synods of the east. And it was not, indeed, for several centuries after this period that the doctrine of celibacy, as enforced by Siricius and his successors, was submitted to by the great mass of the French, German, Spanish, and English clergy.

In the theology of Rome, the bishop, the priest, and the deacon are forbidden to marry; but Romish writers are far from being agreed on the question, whether celibacy be of divine or human appointment. One party considers it as being commanded by God, and, therefore, a matter of faith and moral obligation, which neither the pope nor the universal church can alter or modify. Of this opinion were Jerome, Epiphanius, Siricius, and Innocent. Another party reckons the celibacy of the clergy a matter of merely human appointment, and, therefore, a point not of faith, but of discipline, capable of being altered or even repealed by human authority. This is the view of the subject which is most generally recognized in the Romish church. A third party exists among Romanists which strongly disapproves of the doctrine of the celibacy of the clergy, regarding it as not only useless, but hurtful. The opposition to the prohibition of marriage, which has been manifested even in the bosom of the Romish communion, has in every age been persevering and powerful. The celibacy of the clergy, says Pius II., is supported by strong reasons, but opposed by stronger. The German emperor and clergy supplicated Pius IV. to repeal the enactments on this subject. Augustine, the Bavarian ambassador at Trent, petitioned the council against clerical celibacy, which he declared was not of divine right, nor commanded by God. The French king and clergy presented a similar petition to the pope in 1561. No doctrine, indeed, maintained by the Church of Rome has been productive of more wide-spread discontent and greater mischief within her pale than the doctrine of clerical celibacy.

CELL, the private apartment of a monk in a Romish monastery. In its primary sense, the word means a store-room of any kind. The interior of a temple among the ancient heathens was also called cella; and as there was sometimes more than one cella under the same roof, each of them received the name of the deity whose statue it contained. The inner parts of the porticos of the ancient Christian churches were sometimes divided into little cells or places of retirement on the walls of the church, where any one might privately employ himself in reading, meditation, or prayer. The cell of a Romish monk is a small apartment, and some idea of its furniture may be formed from the following brief extract from Cardinal Wiseman's 'Lives of the Five Saints.' Describing the cell which was occupied by St. Joseph of the cross, he says, "A rough seat and a table, a bed, consisting of two narrow planks with two sheepskins, and a wretched woollen coverlet, a stool to rest his wounded legs upon;—these, with his Breviary, formed the whole furniture of his cell."

CELLITES, a sect which arose at Antwerp in the fourteenth century. Its members were also called Alexians, or brethren and sisters of Alexius, because they had Alexius for their patron saint. The name Cellites was derived from the cells in which they resided. They spent their time chiefly in visiting and comforting the sick, conversing and praying with the dying, attending to the burial of the dead, more particularly of those who had died of the plague, and following their remains to the grave with funeral dirges. From the slow solemn strains in which they sang these dirges, they were spoken of by the common people under the familiar appellation of LOLLARDS (which see). They were laymen who devoted themselves to works of mercy, thus supplying the lack of service among the clergy who at that period neglected their duty to a melancholy extent.

CELLULARI, a name sometimes given to monks, as in the writings of Sidonius Apollinarius, from their living in cells. See MONASTERY.

CELTS (RELIGION OF THE). See DRUIDS.

CEMETERY (Gr. place of repose), a place of interment. For the importance attached to the abodes of the dead, and the purposes to which they were applied among the early Christians, see CATACOMBS. In the Romish church great importance is attached to the consecration of a cemetery. On the day preceding the ceremony five wooden crosses are placed throughout the cemetery, a higher one in the centre, and four others, each the height of a man, at the different extremities. In front of each of the crosses a wooden post is fixed in the earth, and on its top are placed three candles of three ounces weight each; also ladders by which the pontiff may ascend so as to reach the summits of the crosses; a large vessel full of water, a vessel of salt, and a faldstool in front of the central cross. In the morning, the pontiff, dressed in pontifical robes, proceeds to the ground with the ministers, whereupon the fifteen candles are lighted, and the pontiff, taking off his mitre, and standing before the central cross and candles, says the first prayer: "That at our entrance here, this cemetery be purified, hallowed, sanctified, and consecrated." The ceremony proceeds thus: "Then the pontiff having put on his mitre, lies before the cross on the faldstool, and the litany is chanted with the usual thrice repeated additions, suited to the occasion. The litany ended, the pontiff rises in his mitre, and blesses the salt and water. This done, he goes to the cross in the extremity, opposite to the central one, and there begins, his mitre off, the Antiphon, 'Sprinkle me, O Lord,' with Psalm I, 'Have mercy upon me, O God.' During this chant he goes round and perambulates the whole ground of the cemetery, moving to the right, and sprinkling the holy water everywhere. This finished, he returns to the cross in the centre; and there putting off his mitre, and looking to the cross itself, he says another prayer, that God would 'vouchsafe to purify, hallow, and sanctify this cemetery.' After this he censes the same cross; and fixes on its summit one of the three lighted candles, and in like manner the other two, on the two arms of the same. Which done, he puts on his mitre, and goes to the cross behind the central one; still sprinkling as he goes, and saying with the ministers the following Psalms, viz. vi. and xxxi. Which concluded, the pontiff standing before that same cross, having put off his mitre, says, a third 'hallowing and sanctifying' prayer, 'that the bodies entering into this cemetery may have here a seat of rest and protection from all incursion of evil spirits.' The Collect concluded, he censes the cross itself, and puts the three candles on it exactly as on the preceding one. Then putting on his mitre, he proceeds to the cross on the right of that in the centre, always sprinkling the cemetery with the holy water as he goes, and saying with the ministers, Psalm xxxvii. The Psalm ended, the pontiff standing before that cross, and putting off his mitre, says:

"O Lord God, shepherd of eternal glory . . . vouchsafe, we most humbly beseech thee, to keep this cemetery of thy servants from all filthy defilement, and the snares of unclean spirits, to cleanse and hallow it; and cease not to grant to the human bodies coming into this place perpetual purity; that whosoever shall have received the sacrament of baptism, and persevered to the end of life in the Catholic faith, and at their departure out of this world, commended their bodies to repose in this cemetery; the souls of the same, together with their bodies, may, at the sounding of the angelic trumpets, receive the everlasting rewards of the heavenly joys. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

"Next he censes the cross itself, and fixes the candles on its summit and arms, &c., as before. Then he goes to the cross on the left hand, still sprinkling, &c., and singing with the ministers, Psalm ci. There he performs the same ceremonies; and then returns to the cross in the centre, sprinkling on, and chanting Psalms cxxix. and cxlii. When standing before the cross itself, and taking off his mitre, he again 'beseeches God to vouchsafe to hal + low, sancti + fy, and conse + crate this cemetery,' &c. Then, with his hands stretched before his breast, he says the Preface; after which he repeats all the same rites as at the other crosses; and then offers another hal + lowing Collect. The consecration is concluded with a mass in the church."

Burial places in early times received the name of cemeteries, sleeping-places, not only from the belief that the dead rest from their earthly labours and sorrows, but as pointing out the hope of a future resurrection. In early times churches were often erected over the graves of martyrs, and in the places where the cemeteries were, and accordingly a cemetery came to be used for the name of a church. Gregory of Tours, who lived about A. D. 570. is the first writer who makes any mention of the consecration of cemeteries. The heathens were accustomed, in ancient times, to reckon these places sacred, and the violation of them a kind of sacrilege. See CHURCH-YARD.

CENÆUS, a surname of ZEUS, derived from Jape Cenæum in Eubœa, where he had a temple.

CENOBITES, a name given to monks who lived in communities, as distinguished from hermits or ANCHORETS (which see), who lived alone. The founder of the Cenobite system was Pachomius, who, in the beginning of the fourth century, established a society of monks on Tabennæ, an island of the Nile in Upper Egypt; and so popular did the new and freer mode of ascetic life become, that during the lifetime of Pachomius himself, his adherents numbered 3,000, and afterwards 7,000 members. So rapidly did it go on increasing, that in the first half of the fifth century the Cenobites numbered no fewer than 50,000. The whole association was called a cœnobium, a term which afterwards came to be applied to single cloisters. Pachomius was originally at the head of the whole institution, and afterwards his successors the abbots of the cloister, in which the institution had its origin, continued to be regarded as the superiors of the whole cœnobium. The title which the superior received was abbot or abbas-general, or as he was styled in Greek, the ARCHIMANDRITE (which see). The original arrangements of a cœnobium are thus described by Neander:

"The entire monkish society was distributed, according to the various degrees of progress which its members had attained in the spiritual life, into several classes, twenty-four in all, after the number of letters in the alphabet; and each of these classes had its own presiding officer, as to each also was assigned its particular labours. They employed themselves in the ordinary monkish avocations; such as weaving baskets, for which they made use of the rushes of the Nile, fabricating mats or coverings, not neglecting, however, other kinds of business, such as agriculture, and ship-building. At the end of the fourth century, each cloister possessed a vessel of its own, built by the monks themselves. Palladius, who visited the Egyptian cloisters about this time, found, in the cloister of Panopolis,—which also belonged to this association of monks, and contained within it three hundred members,—fifteen tailors, seven smiths, four carpenters, twelve camel-drivers, and fifteen tanners. Each cloister had its steward who provided for the bodily wants of all, and with whom the fabrics, when finished, were deposited; and all these stewards were placed under a general steward of the whole association, who was stationed at the principal cloister. The latter had the oversight of the income and expenditure of the entire cœnobium; to him were given over all the products of monkish labour. He shipped them to Alexandria, where they were sold, to provide means for purchasing such stores as the cloisters needed; and whatever remained after these wants were supplied, was distributed among the poor, the sick, and the decrepit, of this populous, though impoverished country. A part also was sent to the prisons. Twice in the year, on the feast of Easter, and in the month Mesori, (about the season of our August,) all the superiors of the single cloisters met together in the principal cloister. At the last meeting, they brought in reports of the administration of their office. It was at this time, the reconciliation of all with God and with each other was celebrated.

"No person who wished to be taken into the society of the monks was admitted at once; but he was first asked, whether he had not committed a crime, and was not seeking refuge, among the monks, from civil penalties; whether he was his own master, and therefore warranted to decide on his mode of life; whether he deemed himself capable of renouncing his property, and everything he called his own. He must, in the next place, submit to a period of probation, before he could be received into the number of regular monks. He was adopted on pledging himself to live according to the monastic rules. Pachomius also founded, at this early period cloisters of nuns, which received the means of support from the cloisters of the monks."

The circumstances which suggested to Pachomius the formation of the first conventual establishment for females were these:—"During his seclusion on the island of Tabenna, he was visited by his only sister, anxious to behold a brother from whom she had been so long divided. But the stern recluse, in conformity with a vow he had made never to speak to woman, refused, notwithstanding her repeated solicitations, to admit her to an interview. He sent her, however, an injunction to imitate his example, by withdrawing herself from the world, and to form an institution for those of her own sex, similar to that which he had himself founded. With these instructions she complied, and, under the superintendence of Pachomius, a place of retreat for female recluses, over which she presided, was in a short time formed on the neighbouring island of Tismene. As Pachomius died in A. D. 348, the erection of this, the first Christian convent, may be dated somewhere between the years 340 and 350. The conventual profession does not, however, appear to have been so popular, at this period, as the monastic. In A. D. 420, the nunnery of Tismene contained only four hundred inmates, whereas the monastery of Tabenna, even in the lifetime of its founder, numbered more than twice as many thousands. Indeed, the progress of the conventual institution, compared with the monastic, was for long very tardy; and it was not till the commencement of the eighth century, as we learn from Hospinian, that the erection of nunneries became in any measure general.

"The date now assigned to the first foundation of conventual institutions is somewhat later than that generally claimed by the writers of the Church of Rome. According to the learned men of that persuasion, two female saints, Syncletica and Basilissa, who both lived nearly half a century before the sister of Pachomius, contest the honour which we have assigned to the latter. It does not, however, appear, from any evidence to which we have had access, that either of these ladies, although eminent recluses of their day, attempted the formation of what may be considered as a conventual establishment. It is, besides, extremely improbable that the convent, the less popular institution of the two, should, in point of time, have preceded the monastery. The title, therefore, to the honour in question must, we conceive, be awarded to the nameless sister of the abbot of Tabenna; for, to the disappointment, doubtless, of the fair sisterhood of modern days, the designation of their illustrious foundress has, unhappily, been engulfed in the oblivious stream of time."

Numerous similar communities to those established by Pachomius, rapidly sprung up in all parts of Egypt, adopting his rule, which indeed seems to have been in very general repute in the East, until it was superseded by that of Basil. Even after that period it was still followed by some monastic communities, for as late as the middle of the eleventh century, Anselm, bishop of Havelberg, relates that he saw in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, a monastery of this ancient order, containing a fraternity of five hundred monks. From Egypt the Cenobite system passed into Syria, and thence into Persia, where under the sanction of Mohammedanism it still continues to exist. Before the close of the fourth century, the system had spread extensively along the southern shores of the Mediterranean, and flourishing monasteries were formed in the provinces of Carthage, Thagaste, and Hippo, and southward in the regions of Abyssinia and Ethiopia. Thus in an incredibly short space of time, had this novel and singular institution firmly established itself throughout the whole of Christianized Africa, and in every part of that vast and populous region which stretches from the Nile and the Euphrates to the Euxine and the Archipelago. See MONACHISM, MONASTERY.

CENONES, an order of ecclesiastical functionaries among the Montanists of the second century which were superior to bishops and distinct from them.

CENOTAPHS, empty monuments erected in honour of the dead, who were either buried elsewhere, or whose bodies could not be found. Such buildings were usual among the Greeks and Romans, and were accounted religious structures. After these erections were completed, the souls of the deceased, for whom they were intended, were three times called upon by name to occupy the habitations prepared for them.

CENRAWATH, a sect of the BANIANs (which see) in Hindostan, who hold the transmigration of souls so strictly, that they will not kill the smallest insect. Their Brahmans or priests wear a piece of linen on their mouth that no flies may enter. The members of this sect drink no water without previously boiling it, lest they should happen to swallow some insects. They have no belief in either a heaven or a hell, but believe in the immortality of the soul, which, they alleged, passed from one body of man or beast into another, according to its deserts. They burn the bodies of the old, but bury those of children under three years of age. Their widows are not obliged to bury themselves along with their husbands, but they take upon themselves the vow of perpetual widowhood. Women as well as men may enter into the priesthood, but the women must be above twenty years of age, while the men are received into the sacred office so early as nine years old. Any one who becomes a priest must assume the priestly dress, take the vow of chastity, and practise great austerities, sometimes to such a degree, that for nine days in succession they take nothing but water with a certain bitter wood grated into it. This sect is held in great contempt by all the other sects of the Banians.

CENSURES (ECCLESIASTICAL), the various punishments inflicted by the Christian church upon delinquent members of her communion, in virtue of that authority which has been committed to her by Christ, the great King and Head of the church. The power of inflicting censures was originally a mere spiritual power, extending not to the bodies, nor even to the worldly property of men, except in so far as that property was ecclesiastical, and bestowed by the church, in which case she asserted her right to resume that which she herself had given. The better to enforce her censures, and carry them out into actual effect, it was sometimes necessary even in early times to call for the assistance of the secular power, both under heathen and Christian magistrates. In various councils canons were passed authorising such appeals to the civil authority, that the censures of the church might have their due force upon contumacious and obstinate offenders. It was not contemplated, however, that ecclesiastical offences should be visited with those severe punishments which were afterwards introduced by civil magistrates. Thus in the Theodosian Code are to be found some laws which doom heretics to death. But such severe enactments were very rarely carried into execution. The ancient discipline of the church, while it excluded offenders from spiritual privileges, left all their natural or civil rights unaffected. A master did not lose his natural authority over his servants, nor a parent over his children, by losing the privileges of Christian communion. Such an unwarranted extension of ecclesiastical authority was reserved for the Church of Rome in the time of Pope Gregory VII., commonly known by the name of Hildebrand, who claimed the right as head of the church on earth, to lay princes under the highest excommunication or anathema, and then, in virtue of this sentence, to depose them from their thrones, absolve the subjects from their allegiance, and to dispose of their kingdoms at pleasure.

The discipline of the ancient Christian church being limited to the exercise of a mere spiritual power, its ecclesiastical censures were of a strictly moral character, intended to bear upon the minds and the consciences of the erring members of the church. The first and most lenient of these censures consisted in a simple ADMONITION (which see) of the offender, which was solemnly repeated once or twice before proceeding to a more severe punishment, according to the apostolic arrangement, "A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject." The space thus afforded for repentance after solemn admonition, usually extended to the period of ten days; at the close of which, if the offender remained obstinate and refractory, the church went on to pronounce the still heavier sentence of EXCOMMUNICATION (which see), or exclusion from the privileges of the Christian society. This form of ecclesiastical censure was of a twofold character, which was called, according to the extent of its severity, the lesser or the greater excommunication. The lesser excommunication was usually termed separation or suspension, and consisted in exclusion from the participation of the eucharist and the prayers of the faithful, the offender being obliged to leave the church when the service of the catechumens was ended. The council of Eliberis orders this species of ecclesiastical punishment to be inflicted for the space of three weeks, on those who, without necessary cause, were absent from church for three successive Sabbaths. The greater excommunication is usually called in the ancient canons the total separation and the ANATHEMA (which see). It consisted in a total expulsion from the church, and separation from all communion in holy offices with her, the offender being not only debarred from the eucharist, but from the prayers, and hearing the Scriptures read or expounded in any assembly of the church. Nor was this exclusion limited to the particular church with which the excommunicated person had been connected, but as soon as the sentence was pronounced, notice was given to other churches, and sometimes by circular letters to all eminent churches throughout the world, that all churches might confirm and ratify this act of discipline by refusing to admit such a one to their communion. This solemn ecclesiastical censure extended beyond the public communion of the church, even to the private intercourse of life, for Christians were forbidden to receive excommunicated persons into their houses, or to eat at the same table with them; they were not to converse with them familiarly, while living; nor perform the funeral obsequies for them when dead, according to the usual rites of Christian burial. Such directions as these were drawn up on the model of the rules laid down by the apostle Paul, in regard to notorious offenders, who continued impenitent. Thus in writing to the church at Corinth, he says, 1 Cor. v. 11, "But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one not to eat." And in the same spirit he charges the Christians at Thessalonica, 2 Thess. iii. 14, "If any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed." The apostle John also is equally explicit on this subject in his Second Epistle, ver. 10, 11, "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds."

Such was the abhorrence in which the ancient church held those who were under censure, that she allowed no gifts or oblations to be received from them, and even refused to retain in her possession those gifts which any such persons had freely offered while they were in communion with her. The council of Laodicea forbade all men to frequent their cemeteries, and meetings held at the monuments of their pretended martyrs, or anywhere to pray with them. The same council also forbids all members of the church to intermarry with heretics, unless they promise to become Christians. Some authors allege that in extreme cases, to the heaviest censures of the church was added execration, or devoting the offender to temporal destruction. This seems to have been resorted to in the case of Julian the Apostate. It was the anathema maccanatha of the apostle Paul, by which prayer was made unto God that he would remove the malefactor out of the world. An instance of this is to be found in Gal. v. 12, when the apostle says, "I would that they were even cut off which trouble you."

The objects of ecclesiastical censure included, in the ancient Christian church, those members of the church who fell into great and scandalous crimes after baptism. Infidels and unbelievers were not liable to church discipline; neither, indeed, were catechumens, who held a middle position between heathens and Christians, and could only be punished, therefore, by being degraded to a lower rank in the list of catechumens. In the infliction of censures, the church made no distinction of sex or quality, for women were subjected to discipline as well as men, not, however, in their case—at least in the early ages—of a public character, but they wept, and fasted, and did other works of repentance in private. In the punishment of flagrant offences, no regard was had to difference of rank, the rich and the poor being viewed in the eye of the church as equally obliged to submit to the laws of discipline, and even civil magistrates and princes were not exempted from ecclesiastical censures. But in early times, the excommunication of princes never went beyond the suspension of them from the privileges of the church, in no case interfering with the exercise of their temporal authority, or tampering in the slightest degree with the tie which connected them with their subjects. To prevent the possibility of this, they avoided laying upon princes the anathema, or greater excommunication. The first supreme prince, indeed, that ever underwent this highest kind of church censure, was the emperor Henry, by Pope Hildebrand.

When the early church found it necessary and for edification, to administer ecclesiastical discipline, the utmost caution was exercised not to involve the innocent in the same condemnation with the guilty. In no case, therefore, was a son made to suffer for the offences of his parent, nor a wife for those of her husband; and on the same principle, the practice which has been so common among the popes of later times, of laying whole churches and nations under interdict, was unknown among the ancient Christians. Some date the original of interdicts from the time of Alexander III., about A. D. 1160. The most general opinion, however, is, that they must be traced still further back to the time of Hildebrand, who was the first to take it upon him to depose princes. So afraid was the early church of condemning the guiltless, that an unjust sentence of that kind was believed to recoil upon the head of him that pronounced it. Thus Augustine declares, "That a man had needs be very careful whom he binds on earth, for unjust bonds will be loosed by the justice of Heaven; and not only so, but turn to the condemnation of him that imposes them; for though rash judgment often hurts not him who is rashly judged, yet the rashness of him that judges rashly will turn to his own disadvantage. In the meantime it is no detriment to a man to have his name struck out of the diptychs of the church by human ignorance, if an evil conscience do not blot him out of the book of life." To avoid this misapplication of ecclesiastical centures, the ancient church laid down several useful rules to be observed in the exercise of discipline. Thus, besides the salutary regulation that no one was to be subjected to ecclesiastical censure without receiving a previous admonition, it was also ordered that no man should be condemned in his absence, without being allowed liberty to answer for himself, unless he contumaciously refused to appear. Another important regulation was, that censures should only be inflicted in case of legal conviction, which might be reached either by the confession of the offender himself, by the credible evidence of trustworthy witnesses, or by the fact being so notorious as to preclude all necessity of a regular proof. If any man had been exposed to church censure unjustly, whether living or dead, and the injustice was discovered after his decease, then the mode which was followed in order to restore him to the communion of the church, was to insert his name in the diptychs from which it had been expunged.

But the question still remains to be considered what were the particular crimes which subjected offenders in the early church to ecclesiastical censures. The distinction which has long been recognized in the Romish Church between mortal and venial sins was then unknown, at least in the sense in which Romanists understand the distinction. All sins were viewed as mortal, that is, deserving of death in the sight of God, the principle being recognized which is stated by the apostle Paul, Rom. vi. 23, "The wages of sin is death." But, at the same time, it was readily admitted that some sins were more heinous and aggravated than others. A threefold distinction is laid down by Augustine in his book on faith and works. Thus some sins are so great as to deserve to be punished with excommunication, as the apostle says, "To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord." Again, there are other offences which are simply to be visited with admonition, such as those to which our Lord refers when he says, "Tell him of his fault between him and thee alone; if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." Lastly, there are other offences which are to be met by forgiveness, as our Lord teaches in his own prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." The last species of offences here referred to by Augustine, cannot be considered as exposing the offender to the public censures of the church; and accordingly, that distinguished Christian writer speaks in other places of only two kinds of ecclesiastical crimes, which he terms mortal and venial, the former not being pardoned without a public expression of repentance. Tertullian mentions among lesser sins, which did not bring men under the censure of excommunication, all infirmities of the flesh to which mankind universally were more or less exposed. Among these he reckons anger, unjust or unduly prolonged, quarrelling, evil-speaking, a rash or vain oath, a failure in our promise, a lie extorted by modesty or necessity, and sins which are the result of peculiar temptations, incidental to the avocations or circumstances of individuals. The more heinous sins, which involved excommunication, the same author enumerates as murder, idolatry, fraud, apostacy, blasphemy, and fornication. Of these, idolatry is called by Cyprian the summum delictum, the highest of all crimes, the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Augustine mentions that there were some in his time who limited the greater sins to three only—adultery, idolatry, and murder. These alone demanded public penance, but all others, they alleged, might be easily compensated for by giving of alms. In inflicting the censures of the church, due care was uniformly taken that the crimes charged were overt acts, and not sins which were merely cherished in the heart, without being carried into outward act.

Ecclesiastical censures were usually inflicted upon offending clergymen in the ancient church with greater severity than upon others. For, while all other offenders might, by submitting to public penance, recover the privileges which they had lost, it was otherwise with the clergy, who, when they had fallen into crimes which were a scandal to their profession, were straightway deposed from the sacred office. In some very flagrant cases, they were also excommunicated, but with this peculiarity, that though by repentance they might be restored to the communion of the church, they were not thereby restored to the office of the ministry, but could only communicate as laymen. Some canons did not require them to do public penance in the church; others obliged them to submit to that part of discipline also. The crimes which were considered as inferring degradation from the clerical office, appear to have been theft, murder, perjury, fraud, sacrilege, fornication, adultery, and such like gross and scandalous offences. Another offence which was viewed as calling for deposition from the ministry, was that of falling away in time of persecution, and, so careful was the early church in watching over the purity of its clergymen, that drinking and gaming of every kind were prohibited under the same penalty of deprivation. The taking of usury, also, was punished with deposition.

CENSER, a vessel employed in offering incense in the service of the Jewish tabernacle and temple. The censers of the Jews were generally of brass, but sometimes of gold, and their precise form can only be guessed at from the appearance of the censers represented on the Egyptian monuments, which are simply small cups with lids such as could be carried in the hand. A censer was used by the ancient Greeks and Romans in their sacred rites under the name of ACERRA (which see). The censer is used both in the Greek and Romish Churches in their sacred services, but the form of it, and its suspension by chains, suggests rather the heathen than the Jewish censer. Two words are found in the Hebrew Bible which are both of them rendered censer in the authorized version. The first, mechateh, is used to describe the censers of Aaron, and of Korah and his company. They appear to have been composed of brass or copper. The same word is also applied to the censers of gold afterwards made by Solomon. But the censer which king Uzziah held in his hand while he attempted to burn incense in the house of the Lord, as we find recorded in 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, is described by an entirely different word from the former, being mekatheret, which appears to have been an implement used by idolaters, as the prophet Ezekiel says (viii. 11) that the seventy apostate Jews engaged in idolatrous worship had each of them his censer (mekatheret) in his hand. This might be perhaps an inferior kind of censer appropriate to the priests, and common to them all. It is not, however, certain that the mechateh was peculiar to the high priest, as we find it used by the sons of Aaron (Lev x. 1), and also by 250 companions of Korah.

CENTENARIUS (Lat. centum, a hundred), an officer in ancient monasteries, who presided over a hundred monks.

CENTEOTL, the great or primitive goddess of the Mexican mythology, who was destined to put an end to the human sacrifices which were offered at Mexitli, and to re-establish the simple offerings of the first-fruits of harvest. She was the originator of agriculture, and taught the art to mortals.

CENTIMANES (Lat. centum, a hundred, and manus, a hand), a name given to Briareus, Gyges, and Cottus, three giants in ancient Roman mythology, who were possessed each of a hundred hands. They assisted Jupiter in overthrowing the Titans.

CENTURIES (MAGDEBURG), a celebrated ecclesiastical history, compiled by a society of Lutheran divines, known by the name of the Magdeburg Centuriators. It was published between the years 1559 and 1574, in thirteen volumes folio, each volume containing one century. The name of the entire work was derived from the city where the first part of their history was finished, and from the chronological mode in which they conducted their undertaking. The individual who chiefly presided over the preparation of the work was the learned Flacius Illyricus. The history is divided into periods of centuries, in which the authors undertake to give a complete view of the aspect which the church presented, in a series of chapters, amounting to sixteen, with numerous subdivisions. Everything connected with the propagation and persecutions of Christianity, is set forth century by century in three distinct chapters. This is followed by a statement of the articles of doctrine taught by ecclesiastical writers, with extracts from their works upon forty heads of doctrine, constituting a whole body of divinity. The succeeding chapters are devoted to a description of heresies, the rites and ceremonies of religion, schisms, councils, the lives of eminent persons, miracles and prodigies, the affairs of the Jews, religions foreign to the church, and finally, the political condition of the world. "The learning and industry of the Centuriators," says Dr. Welsh in his 'Elements of Church History,' "have never been disputed. Their work has been considered as a storehouse by Protestant divines in succeeding times. In Germany it superseded all farther inquiry into church history for upwards of a century, and its influence in determining the mode in which historians direct their inquiries, has been more or less felt even to our own days. Very serious objections, however, may be made to this great undertaking. Notwithstanding the multitude of subjects which the authors proposed to illustrate, some of the most interesting in the field of historical investigation are wholly omitted; and by the mode of division, all interest in the work as a continued narrative is necessarily destroyed. The natural relations which connect different subjects are wholly disregarded, and, it must be added, that the prejudices of the authors sometimes misled them into error." It cannot be denied that the arrangement followed by the Magdeburg Centuriators is objectionable, but Mosheim having constructed his church history on the same plan, has done more than any other author to render the division into centuries popular in Britain and even on the continent. Dr. Welsh, who disapproves of the plan in the strongest manner, says, "It is as if we were to study the geology of a country, not by examining continuously the natural position of the strata, but by determining the spaces for observation by concentric circles at the distance of mile-stones." A new edition of the 'Magdeburg Centuriators' was commenced in 1757 at Nuremberg, but was carried only to the sixth volume in 4to. An edition, somewhat abridged, was published by Lucius at Basil, 1624, thirteen volumes in three, large folio. This edition is most current among the Reformed, though disapproved by the Lutherans. Cæsar Baronius, a father of the oratory, at the instigation of Philip Neri, founder of the Society of the oratory, undertook to confute this history, in a work of twelve volumes folio, each volume likewise embracing one century. His work is entitled 'Annales Ecclesiastici,' and was published at Rome between the years 1588 and 1607, and afterwards at Mentz, with the approbation of the author. The latest, most splendid, and most complete edition, was published with the corrections of Antony Pagi, a French Franciscan, and the continuation of Odoric Raynald, at Lucca, 1738—1756, in thirty-eight volumes folio. Raynald's continuation reaches to the year 1565. James de Laderchi, likewise a father of the oratory, extended the annals to the year 1572. Henry de Sponde, or Spondanus, bishop of Pamiers, likewise composed a continuation of Baronius to the year 1640, in three volumes folio. Abraham Bzovius, also a Polish Dominican, continued Baronius to the year 1572, in eight volumes folio.

CEPHALONOMANCY (Gr. kephale, the head, and manteia, divination), a species of divination practised occasionally among the ancient Greeks with an ass's head, which they broiled upon coals, and, after muttering a few prayers, mentioned the person's name whom they suspected of the crime in question. If the jaws moved and the teeth chattered, they thought the guilt was sufficiently discovered.

CEPHISSUS, the divinity of the river Cephissus.

CERBERUS, the many-headed dog of ancient mythology which guarded the entrance of Hades. According to Hesiod, he had fifty heads, but later writers assign him only three heads, while some poets call him hundred-headed, and many-headed. The employment of this fabulous monster was to admit the shades into the infernal regions, while he prevented their return to the abodes of the living.

CERDONIANS, a Gnostic sect of the second century, who derived their name from Cerdo, a teacher from Antioch in Syria, who held to the purely Dualistic Gnosis. According to Irenæus, he taught at Rome that the God of the Jews is to be carefully distinguished from the God of the Christians. Epiphanius alleges that Cerdo affirmed that Christ was not born, but had only the appearance of a body, that he denied the resurrection of the dead, and rejected the Old Testament. He seems to have been one of the first who recommended the celibate life. Marcion, one of the most noted leaders of the Gnostics, is universally believed to have borrowed a considerable number of the peculiar doctrines of his system from the instructions of Cerdo. See MARCIONITES.

CEREMONIES, outward acts employed in Divine service to impress the mind of the worshipper, and, by an appeal to the outward senses, to convey important truths to the intellect and the heart. From the intimate connection which subsists between the physical constitution of man and his intellectual and moral nature, ceremonies have ever formed a necessary part of religious worship in all ages and countries. From the earliest period, while the promise of a Mediator was given to restore man to the favour and friendship of God, we find at the same time the ceremony of sacrifice instituted, in which was embodied the great principle, that without shedding of blood there is no remission. In the whole of the varied and interesting observances of the Jewish ritual, were embodied the grand abstractions of the Christian system, which were thus brought to bear with peculiar force on the minds of the people. Visible symbols or signs, in fact, through the whole course of the Jewish history, were the medium of communication between heaven and earth. Even posterior to the advent of our Lord, we find that the same mode of instruction appears to have been adopted: and the condition of the Jews at that time rendered its adoption the more expedient. So rude and uncultivated were they; to such a degree had they lost sight of the spirituality of the moral, and the great end of the ceremonial law, that simple external signs were absolutely necessary to convey any religious ideas to their minds. They, at least the great mass of them, trusted to their sacrifices and external offerings for the pardon of sin, thus substituting the letter for the spirit, the type for the antitype. In these circumstances, our Lord resorted to a mode of instruction admirably adapted to the exigencies of the case—we refer to the employment of parables. Accustomed as the Jews of those days were to think of religion as consisting merely of external observances, and employed as they were in sedulously tithing mint, and anise, and cummin, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law, parabolic instruction was the simplest and easiest mode of leading their minds away from such a false view of divine truth, to the spiritual perception of it. Their ceremonies were originally intended to point their thoughts to a higher and nobler economy. When our Lord, therefore, appeared upon earth, with the express design of introducing a new dispensation, there was a beautiful propriety in his adopting a mode of teaching, which combined somewhat of the material nature of the old with the spirituality of the new scheme. Under a plain and possible story, finely wrought in all its details, the Divine teacher revealed some sublime doctrine, or enforced some necessary duty; and many, no doubt, who listened with interest, would remember with advantage the doctrine in the one case, and the duty in the other, long after the narratives themselves were forgotten.

This adaptation of the truth to our physical nature appears to have been carefully kept in view in the institution of the standing ordinances of the church. In the sacramental symbols an impressive exhibition is made to our bodily senses of some of the most important and interesting truths of the Christian system, and not only are these truths significantly represented, they are also impressively sealed upon the believing children of God. In other words, by the sensible display given in the solemn ordinances of baptism and the supper, ample provision is made for the emblematic exhibition of the truths as well as the actings of God in reference to His people. Both were held forth under a figure in the ancient economy; all that referred to the plan of reconciliation was sensibly taught in the mission and mediation of the God-man, Christ Jesus. The full development of the plan, however, in its application to individual believers, was yet to be made known. The general principles, if we may so speak, of the scheme of salvation were fully taught in the Bible, but the application of these principles to believers separately could only be represented by some standing memorial. Hence the institution of the sacramental ordinances in which, by external symbols, the leading truths of the gospel were set forth, both in their abstract meaning and in their practical bearing upon individual Christians.

But while certain standing ceremonies have been instituted in the Christian church, the question has been often proposed, whether the church is authorized in instituting ceremonies which were not originally either enjoined or practised by our Lord and his apostles. One thing is certain, that the conduct of the Jews, in this respect, in the days of our Lord, met with his explicit and decided disapproval. Thus, he plainly declares, in reference to all ceremonies of merely human invention, Matth. xv. 9, "But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." By the word "doctrines" in this passage, Jesus points to certain significant ceremonies, such as the Pharisaical washing of hands, cups, tables, and other outward emblems by which it was designed to teach and signify holiness. All sacred ceremonies of man's devising, then, are plainly to be condemned as an addition to the Word of God which is forbidden no less than a taking away from it. In the Old Testament church there was an almost complete uniformity in the ritual observed in the worship and service of God. And in the early Christian church, although there was not an uniformity in all particulars among all the churches, for instance in the point of fasting, some fasting on the Sabbath, others not; some taking the Lord's Supper fasting, others not; although likewise there was a great difference between the custom of one church and another in the time and manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper, and in other particulars, still there was a remarkable uniformity in the primitive church, even in many things belonging to church government and form of worship. The danger attendant on the introduction of unscriptural and unwarranted ceremonies into the church is strikingly seen in the history of the Church of Rome, which has originated many innovations, not only indifferent in themselves, but very absurd and injurious to religion. Dr. Middleton, in his 'Letters from Rome,' has very strikingly pointed out the conformity between the Pagan and Romish ceremonies, exemplifying it in the use of incense, holy water, the placing of lamps and candles before the shrines of saints, votive gifts round the shrines of the deceased, and other similar ceremonies. In 1646, a history of ancient ceremonies was published by M. Ponce, tracing the rise, growth, and introduction of each rite into the church, and its gradual abuses as they appeared. Many of them he traces to Judaism, but still more to heathenism.

It may be interesting to the reader to notice the gradual progress of innovation in the ceremonies of Christian worship. We learn from Eusebius that even so late as the third and fourth centuries there was considerable variety in the mode of conducting religious worship among Christians. Some difference of opinion, indeed, seems to have existed as to the precise manner in which certain rites had been observed in apostolic times; for when a contest arose in the second century between the Eastern and Western Christians respecting the day on which Easter should be observed, Eusebius informs us that the former maintained that John was the author of their custom, and the latter that Peter and Paul were the authors of theirs. Again, the Greek and Latin churches, at a later period, disputed whether leavened or unleavened bread should be used in the Lord's Supper; and both of them contended, that their respective opinions were warranted by the practice of the apostles. From the peculiar aspect which the Christian church presented in its primitive state, the converts being drawn partly from the Jews, and partly from the heathens, it is quite plain that the apostles permitted some diversity in the outward ceremonies, according as the Jewish or the Pagan converts predominated in particular churches. Various writers contend, that, in the earliest ages of Christianity, both the Jewish and the Christian Sabbaths were held sacred; and it is not improbable that this may have been the case in those churches which were composed chiefly of converts from Judaism. Besides, Thursday and Friday, but especially the latter, were observed as days of fasting and prayer, consecrated to the remembrance of the sufferings of Christ, and of what preceded them. On these days, meetings were held for prayer and fasting till three o'clock in the afternoon. These arrangements, however, were not obligatory upon any one, but observed by each member of the church according to his special necessities and inclinations. In the Eastern Church the Jewish and the Christian Sabbaths were distinguished from the Station days, as Thursday and Friday were termed, by the exclusion of fasts, and by the standing position in prayer. But in the Western, and especially in the Roman church, the Jewish Sabbath was held as a fast-day.

The opposition which was early manifested between the communities composed of Jewish, and those composed of Gentile Christians, had an important influence in modifying the ceremonies of religious worship. The churches in which Jewish converts prevailed retained, along with the whole Jewish ceremonial law, all the Jewish festivals, though they gradually assigned to them a Christian import. On the contrary, among the churches of Gentile Christians there were probably from the first no yearly festivals whatever. Controversies very early arose between the Church of Asia Minor and the Church of Rome, as to the time of keeping Easter, the former alleging that the fourteenth day of the month Nisan ought to be regarded as the day of Christ's passion on whatever day of the week it might occur; the latter maintaining that a Friday should always be consecrated to the memory of Christ's passion, a Sunday to the memory of Christ's resurrection. The dispute was carried on for a long period with the utmost bitterness on both sides. In the end of the third century, so sharp did the contest become, that Victor, bishop of Rome, published a sentence of excommunication against the churches of Asia Minor on account of this trifling point of dispute. Another annual religious festival, which was introduced at an early period into the Christian church, was the Pentecost or Whitsunday, observed in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles. The period which elapsed between Easter and Whitsuntide was also regarded as in some sense sacred. There was no fasting during this interval; prayers were made in the standing, and not in the kneeling posture; and in many of the churches there seems to have been a daily service, at which the communion was celebrated. The days on which martyrs died (see BIRTH-DAYS) were also held sacred from an early period. In the second century they were everywhere observed; and they are often mentioned by Tertullian and Cyprian.

Twice a-year, namely, at Easter and Whitsuntide, baptism was publicly administered in the ancient Christian church. The candidates for it were immersed wholly in water, with invocation of the Sacred Trinity, after having repeated the creed and renounced their sins and transgressions. The baptized were signed with the cross, anointed, commended to God by prayer and imposition of hands, and finally directed to taste some milk and honey. The eucharist was celebrated chiefly on the Lord's Day with a portion of bread and wine consecrated with prayer. The wine was mixed with water, and the bread was divided into small pieces. Portions of the consecrated bread and wine were usually sent to the sick and absent. It is even affirmed, that in very early times the eucharist was given to infants. AGAPÆ (which see) or love-feasts were also partaken of by the primitive Christians.

Public worship was observed originally in the room of some private member of the church. Gradually, as circumstances required, the place was fitted up in a manner suited to the object. An elevated seat was constructed for the reading of the Scriptures and the delivering of the sermon; a table was set for the distribution of the Lord's Supper, which so early as the time of Tertullian received the name of altar. As the communities increased in numbers and wealth, buildings were erected specially for Divine service. This appears to have been the case even in the third century. In the time of the outward prosperity of the church, under the reign of Diocletian, many splendid churches had already arisen in the large cities.

The introduction of images was opposed to the whole spirit of the Christian system, but the converts from paganism who had been accustomed to such modes of worship, were the first to make images of Christ; as for example, the Gnostic sect of the Carpocratians, who placed images of the Redeemer beside the busts of Plato and Aristotle. It was not in the first instance in the church, but in the family, that religious images came into use among the Christians. Accustomed to observe everywhere around them the objects of the Pagan mythology, they were naturally anxious to substitute other emblems more agreeable to their religious and moral sentiments, as for example, a shepherd carrying a lamb on his shoulder, to represent our Redeemer rescuing the repentant sinner; a dove the symbol of the Holy Spirit, or an anchor the token of Christian hope. Religious emblems passed from domestic use into the churches, as early probably as the third century; for the council of Elvira in A. D. 303 forbade "the objects of worship and adoration to be painted on the walls." The visible representation of the cross must have early found its way among the Christians, both in their domestic and ecclesiastical life. This token was used by them on almost every occasion. It was the sign of blessing when they rose in the morning, and when they retired at night, when they went out, and when they came in. Such is the tendency of our fallen nature to confound the symbol with the idea which it represents, that we can scarcely be surprised that even so early as the third century the sign of the cross should have been abused to purposes of superstition. The use of incense was introduced about the same time into many Christian churches, probably in imitation of a prevailing custom of the heathens in their religious worship. From the same source seem to have arisen exorcisms, the multiplication of fasts, and the aversion to matrimony. After the manner of the pagan mysteries, the eucharist was so far dispensed in secret, that neither penitents nor catechumens were allowed to be present at its dispensation. This holy ordinance was commonly administered every Lord's Day, as well as on other festival days; and in times of persecution daily.

In the course of the third century some innovations were introduced in the ceremonies attendant on the sacrament of baptism. Exorcism came to be practised as a necessary part of the ordinance, that the soul of the candidate for baptism might be delivered from the bondage of Satan, and introduced into the service of God. Another ceremony, also hitherto unknown to the church, was added to the baptismal rite. The persons baptized returned home decorated with a crown and a white robe. Great importance was now attached to the practice of fasting. The Latins kept every seventh day as a fast, but the Greek and Oriental Christians refused to imitate them in this point.

No sooner had Constantine the Great renounced paganism, and recognized Christianity as the established religion of the Roman Empire, than he hastened to erect gorgeous churches which he adorned with pictures and images. These buildings for Christian worship were consecrated with great pomp and imposing rites, borrowed in great measure from the ancient pontifical code of the Romans. The ceremonies which were introduced at this time into the ordinary service of the church, and which tended to approximate it to the heathen worship, are thus briefly noticed by Mosheim:—"The prayers had declined very much from their primitive simplicity and solemnity, and became turgid and bombastic. Among the public hymns the Psalms of David were now received. The public discourses among the Greeks especially were formed according to the rules for civil eloquence, and were better adapted to call forth the admiration of the rude multitude who love display than to amend the heart. And that no foolish and senseless custom might be omitted in their public assemblies, the people were allowed to applaud their orators as had been practised in the forum and in the theatres; nay, they were instructed both to applaud and to clap their preachers. Who could suppose that men professing to despise vain glory, and who were appointed to show to others the emptiness of all human things, would become so senseless?

"The first day of the week, on which Christians were accustomed to meet for the worship of God, Constantine required by a special law to be observed more sacredly than before. In most congregations of Christians five annual festivals were observed, in remembrance namely of the Saviour's birth, of his sufferings and death for the sins of men, of his resurrection, of his ascension to heaven, and of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon his ministers. Of these festivals that of the fourteen days sacred to the memory of Christ's return to life was observed with much more ceremony than the rest. The Oriental Christians kept the memorial of the Saviour's birth and of his baptism on one and the same day, namely, the sixth day of January, and this day they called Epiphany; but the western Christians seem always to have consecrated the twenty-fifth day of December to the memory of the Saviour's birth; for what is reported of the Roman bishop, Julian I. that he transferred the memorial of Christ's birth from the sixth of January to the twenty-fifth of December, appears to me very questionable. The untoward success of the age in finding the dead bodies of certain holy men increased immensely the commemorations of the martyrs. Devout men would have readily consented to the multiplication of festivals, if the time that Christians consumed in them had been employed to advance them in true holiness; but the majority spent the time rather in idleness and dissipation and other vices than in the worship of God. It is well known among other things what opportunities of sinning were offered to the licentious by the Vigils, as they were called, of Easter and Whitsuntide.

"It was believed that nothing was more effectual to repel the assaults of evil spirits and to propitiate the Deity than fasting. Hence it is easy to discover why the rulers of the church ordained fasts by express laws, and commanded as a necessary duty what was before left at discretion. The Quadragesimal or Lent fast, as it was called, was considered more sacred than all the rest, though it was not as yet fixed to a determinate number of days. But it should be remembered that the fasts of this age differed much from those observed by Christians in preceding ages.

Anciently those who undertook to observe a fast abstained altogether from food and drink; in this age many deemed it sufficient merely to omit the use of flesh and wine, and this sentiment afterwards became universal among the Latins.

"For the more convenient administration of baptism sacred fonts or baptisteria were erected in the porches of the temples. This sacred rite was always administered, except in cases of necessity, on the vigils of Easter and Whitsuntide, with lighted wax candles and by the bishop, or by the presbyters whom he commissioned for that purpose. In some places salt, a symbol of purity and wisdom, was put into the mouth of the baptized; and everywhere a double anointing was used, the first before and the other after the baptism. After being baptized the persons appeared clad in white gowns during seven days."

From the days of Constantine a marked change was observed in the whole aspect of Christian worship. A pompous ceremonial took the place of the ancient simplicity. Various ornaments were added to the sacerdotal garments, in order to increase the veneration in which the clergy were held. The temples were fitted up with unbounded magnificence, adorned with images of the apostles and saints, but more especially with an image of the Virgin Mary holding the infant Jesus in her arms. Altars and reliquaries of solid silver were procured in various places, and no expense was spared to supply the churches with sacred utensils of the most costly description.

This obvious departure from primitive simplicity, however, was not limited to the external ceremonies of the church, but extended also to its worship and discipline. Thus the agapæ or love-feasts, which had formed in early times one of the most striking evidences of the harmony and mutual kindness which prevailed among Christians, were found in the fourth century to have so far degenerated in their character, that it was necessary to prevent them from being held in churches. The strictness of the ancient discipline towards ecclesiastical offenders was now greatly relaxed. The more heinous delinquents, it is true, were still liable to public censures. But the practice of voluntary confession before the church of private offences and secret sins, had for some time fallen into desuetude; and in most places, both of the East and West, private confessions before a priest had been substituted in place of public confessions before the church.

In the sixth century, the differences chiefly arose in respect of rites and ceremonies between the Greek and Latin churches. The Nestorian and Eutylian heresies in particular, gave origin to various forms which were designed to characterize the contending sects. In the Western Church, Gregory the Great, signalized his pontificate by the introduction of a number of ceremonies which were altogether new. To him is generally admitted to be due the invention of the canon of the mass, or at least he must be accorded the honour of having wholly remodelled the old canon. He discriminated also the different times, occasions, and places of public worship, and framed a service for each. Hence the vast multiplications of liturgical formulas in the Roman Church. It was in the time of Gregory too, that churches both in the East and West were erected in great numbers, in memory, and to the honour, of the saints. The number of festivals and saints' days were almost as numerous as the churches. At the period at which we have now arrived, the festival began to be celebrated of the Purification of the Virgin Mary.

The ceremonies of the Greek church were not a little increased in number by the enactments of the Trullan council, which was held at Constantinople A. D. 692, and which, as being supplemental to the fifth and sixth general councils, is commonly called Concilium Quinisextum. Nor were the Roman pontiffs of the seventh century behind in making additions to the ceremonies of the church. Pope Honorius instituted a festival in honour of the wood of the cross on which our Lord was crucified; and Pope Boniface also consecrated the Feast of All Saints. The churches were now adorned in a more luxurious and magnificent style than they had been even in the time of Constantine. The confessional of St. Peter at Rome was covered with pure silver, and the great doors at the entrance of the church were overlaid with the same precious metal.

Christianity thus gradually lost the simplicity which had characterized it in apostolic times, and dwindled down into a system of external ceremonies. The multiplication and regulation of these became the chief object of solicitude, and to effect this, both the doctrines and duties of religion were almost wholly neglected. The mass of the Romanists was now looked upon as the principal part of divine worship. One addition after another was made to its already cumbrous ceremonial, and Pope Gregory III. seems to have converted the whole into a series of superstitious observances. Charlemagne directed his efforts to the abolition of various superstitious rites, abolishing the worship of images, limiting the number of holidays, rejecting the consecration of bells with holy water, and introducing several other useful and important regulations. But while thus endeavouring to effect some improvements in the observances of the church,—this emperor remained devotedly attached to the Roman pontiffs, and exerted his influence in inducing all the churches of the Latin Christians to adopt the entire ritual of the Romish worship.

So complicated at length did the public rites of religion become, that in the ninth century works began to be published, having for their sole object the explanation of divine offices, as religious ceremonies were in that age termed. The minuteness with which these treatises detailed the various particulars of the cumbrous ritual, shows the exaggerated importance attached to the mere externals of religion. Churchmen were chiefly employed in regulating the cumbrous forms of worship. Hence the splendid furniture of the temples, the numerous wax-candles burning at noon-day, the multitudes of pictures and statues, the decorations of the altars, the frequent processions, the splendid dresses of the priests, and masses appropriate to the honour of saints. Every new saint which was added to the calendar, called for the appointment not only of a new feast-day, but of new forms of worship, and new religious rites. But while the worship of the saints thus rose into prominence, that of the Virgin Mary came every day to occupy a more conspicuous place in the ritual of the Romish church. Masses were celebrated, and flesh abstained from on Saturdays in honour of Mary; the daily office of St. Mary was introduced, which was afterwards confirmed by Urban II.; the rosary now came into use, consisting of fifteen repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and one hundred and fifty Ave Marias; the crown of St. Mary also was invented, which consisted of six or seven repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and sixty or seventy Ave Marias, according to the age, ascribed by different authors to the Holy Virgin.

Although Rome had thus for centuries been adding to the number of the rites of Christian worship, the innovations which she had introduced were very slow in being adopted in many parts of the Latin world. Spain, in particular, showed itself for a long period most reluctant to part with its ancient liturgy, called the Mozarabic or Gothic, and to adopt that of Rome. Gregory VII., however, in the eleventh century, succeeded in persuading the Spaniards to lay aside their long-cherished prejudices, and to fall in with the arrangements of the Romish ritual. The Greek church was at this period as completely overrun with superstition as the Latin, and, accordingly, both its public and private worship received various additions to its outward rites and ceremonies, not only by decrees of councils, but by the mere personal recommendations of individual patriarchs. Among the Latins a new festival was instituted A. D. 1138, in honour of the immaculate conception of the Virgin,—a doctrine which, though opposed by Bernard and others, was now extensively believed in the Romish church. Pictures and ornaments of various kinds were found in almost all the churches. Even the floors were covered over with paintings of saints and angels. New churches were consecrated with sprinkling of holy water and other superstitious ceremonies. More than one altar was now found in the same church, for in the twelfth century we find mention made of the high altar. In many churches the altars were ornamented with gold, silver, precious stones, and costly pictures. Expensive lamps and candles were kept burning before the images of saints, which were only to be extinguished for three days preceding Easter. The eucharist was still administered in both kinds, but Clement III. decreed that only unleavened bread should be used, and that the wine should be mixed with water. The doctrine of transubstantiation having now become a received dogma of the Latin church, the adoration of the host followed as a natural consequence. This practice seems to have been first introduced by Guido, a Cistercian monk, whom the Pope had created a cardinal, and despatched as his legate to Cologne. It was naturally succeeded by other rites designed to do honour to the consecrated bread. Splendid caskets were constructed in which God, in the form of bread, might reside, and be carried from one place to another. Processions were formed to convey the host to the houses of the sick. In addition to these numerous rites connected with the transubstantiated bread, a new festival was instituted in honour of the body of Christ as present in the holy supper. This festival was imposed by Urban IV. upon the whole church in A. D. 1264, but in consequence of the death of that pontiff soon after signing the decree, it was not universally observed by the Latin churches until Clement V. in A. D. 1311 confirmed the edict of Urban.

A very important addition was made to the public ceremonies of the church towards the close of the thirteenth century, by the institution of the year of jubilee by Boniface VIII., who decided that every hundredth year all who should confess and lament their sins, and devoutly visit the church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, should receive plenary remission of their sins. Finding that this new festival brought both honour and gain to the church of Rome, some future pontiffs limited it to shorter periods than a century. Thus Clement VI. repeated the jubilee in A. D. 1350, and both Gregory XI. and Urban VI. wished to reduce the interval to thirty-three years, the supposed years of our Lord's age at his crucifixion; but were prevented by death from accomplishing their design. Boniface IX. first attained the object. Paul II. ordered that the festival should be kept every twenty-five years. Yet death, in his case, also compelled him to resign the benefit of the alteration to his successor, Sixtus IV. One pope after another seems, as darkness gradually covered the church, to have been anxious to signalize his reign by some addition to the ceremonies of religion. Innocent V. instituted festival days in commemoration of the spear which pierced the Saviour's side, of the nails which fastened him to the cross, and of the crown of thorns which he wore in the judgment-hall. Among many other superstitious rites, John XXII. added the angel's salutation to Mary to the prayers in common use.

True spiritual religion had now almost wholly disappeared, and given place to a gorgeous system of external worship calculated only by parade and glitter to gratify the senses of an ignorant multitude. The worship of the Virgin was substituted for that of Jesus, and legends were framed to enhance the estimation in which she was held. Indulgences were openly sold to enrich the coffers of an avaricious priesthood. Mimic shows were got up; trifling ceremonies were devised; incense and holy water were used in profusion, and the worship of the professing Christian church was nothing more than a raree show. The discourses of the few priests who were capable of preaching, consisted of an account of pretended miracles, ridiculous fables, and silly legends strung together without method and without skill. The authority of holy mother church was loudly proclaimed, the influence of the saints with God, the dignity, glory, and all-prevailing efficacy of the prayers of the Virgin Mary, the surpassing value of relics, the indescribable utility of indulgences, the awful torments of purgatory, such were the principal themes on which the clergy descanted in their addresses to the people. No wonder that in these circumstances a deplorable ignorance of divine things everywhere prevailed, and superstition, united with gross corruption of morals, characterized the great mass of the population of so-called Christendom.

It was when matters had reached this crisis that, in the sixteenth century, the Reformation took place in Germany, which speedily extended itself over the other countries of Europe, leading to a change in the rites and ceremonies of the church, as well as in many points of doctrine. The Protestant party held, that all the innovations which the Romanists, in the course of time, had introduced into the church, ought to be rejected as of merely human invention. Many of these rites, however, were retained by the Reformed Church, chiefly on the ground that they were matters of comparative indifference, not affecting the character of the church as a Christian body. In England, accordingly, when the Reformed religion had been adopted as the established religion of the country, the Puritans complained that so much of the leaven of Antichrist should still be permitted to remain in the Church of Christ. For example, they wished the abolition of all saints' days, and the prohibition of the sign of the cross, more especially in the sacrament of baptism. They were opposed to the employment of sponsors in baptism while the parents were still living. They disapproved of the Apocrypha being read or expounded in public worship. They called for the abolition of various rites and customs, which they regarded as unscriptural, such as kneeling at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, bowing at the name of Jesus, giving the ring in marriage, the prohibition of marriage during certain times of the year, and the licensing it for money, as also the confirmation of children by episcopal imposition of hands. The Puritans, while they objected to these and other rites belonging to the Romish system, held also that all human traditions are superfluous and sinful; that only the laws of Christ are to be practised and taught, and that mystical and significant ceremonies in religion are unlawful. Queen Elizabeth was herself violently opposed to the Puritans during the whole of her reign, but several persons belonging to her court, and even some of her most eminent ecclesiastics, were favourable to them, and approved of their opposition to the Romish ceremonies. Accordingly, some continued to wear the prescribed clerical vestments, and others laid them aside; some administered the sacrament kneeling, and others standing, or even sitting; some baptized in a font with the sign of the cross, and others in a basin without it. This unseemly and unsettled state of things continued for some years, whilst the Puritan party was increasing in numbers and in influence. The queen at length interfered, and in 1565 directed her ecclesiastical commissioners to devise some means of bringing about an exact uniformity. Upon this, a book called 'Advertisements,' was set forth by Archbishop Parker, containing orders for preaching, administering the sacraments, and the dress of ecclesiastical persons: to which were added certain protestations, to be made, promised, and subscribed by all for the future admitted into the church. The queen did not give her authority to these Advertisements till some years after; but she issued a proclamation requiring conformity in the use of the vestments, under penalty of prohibition from preaching, and deprivation, which the archbishop in several instances carried into effect. The London ministers were cited before him, and thirty-seven out of ninety-eight refused to promise compliance with the ordained ceremonies; whilst the younger students at Cambridge were so infected with the Puritan doctrines, that the famous Thomas Cartwright, and 300 more, threw off their surplices in one day, within the walls of one college.

The suspended clergymen, finding that renewed applications to the queen and her ministers were ineffectual, in 1566 published a treatise in their own vindication; in which they alleged, that neither the prophets of the Old Testament, nor the apostles of the New, were distinguished by their garments; that such a distinction was not introduced into the Christian Church until long after the appearance of Antichrist; that the habits to which they objected had been connected with idolatry and sorcery, were an offence to weak Christians, and an encouragement to papists; that they were only human appointments, and even if they had been indifferent, the imposition of them was an infringement of Christian liberty. And, finally, the suffrage of foreign divines was cited, who all condemned them, though they were not willing to hazard the dawning Reformation solely on their account.

As none of the points were conceded to the Puritans, in 1566 they came to the resolution of separating from the parish churches, and assembling in private houses, or wherever they could enjoy their own form of worship. They debated, however, as to whether they should retain any of the Common Prayer; or, since they were parted from the English Church, whether they should not set up a new order of service more conformable to the Scriptures and the practice of foreign divines. The latter was decided upon, and the established liturgy was entirely laid aside. The ceremonies of the Church of England have continued, down to the present day, in much the same condition as they were in the reign of Elizabeth, and the controversy between that church and Dissenters turns upon the single point of the twentieth article, "That the church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies,"—a point which is strenuously denied by all Dissenters, though the same article guards this power claimed for the church against abuse, by asserting, "Yet it is not lawful for the church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written; neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another." The caution thus introduced is without avail, since the church herself is to be the judge of what is or is not opposed to the Word of God. The great safety of any church is simply to adhere to the arrangements of Christ and his apostles in the Scriptures, and thus to trench in nothing upon the simplicity of primitive Christianity.

CEREMONIES (MASTERS OF THE), attendants on the Pope, usually six in number, two of them being called assistants, and the other four supernumeraries. Their duty is to regulate all pontifical functions, acquaint the cardinals with their duties, and issue orders to all persons belonging to the court. They have admission into the conclave, and likewise into the congregation of rites, but only one goes to the ceremonial congregation. Whenever the Pope sends any cardinal à latere out of Rome, he deposes one of the supernumerary masters of the ceremonies to wait upon him. These officials are generally clothed in purple cassocks, with black buttons and facings, and sleeves trailing on the ground, but in the papal chapel they wear a red cassock like the rest of the cardinals, and rochets like the prelates. When they appear in this ceremonial habit, they do not give precedence to any of the Pope's officers or domestics, with the exception of the major-domo, the naster or first gentleman of the bedchamber, and the chief cup-bearer.

CERES, one of the principal female divinities of the ancient Romans, which they derived from the Greeks, by whom she was termed DEMETER (which see). She was the daughter of Saturn and Vesta, and the mother of Proserpine. Ceres was accounted the goddess of fruits, who first taught men the art of husbandry, and is usually represented as a tall majestic woman with yellow hair, crowned with ears of corn, bearing in her right hand poppies and wheat, and in her left a lighted torch. The reason of this last emblem is to be found in the legend, that when her daughter Proserpine was stolen by Pluto, she sought her with lighted torches through the whole world, until she learned from Arethusa that she had been carried by Pluto to the infernal regions. The distressed mother made her complaint to Jupiter, who, moved with compassion, allowed Proserpine to live half the year with her mother in the heavens, and the other half with her husband in the regions below. The worship of Ceres seems to have reached the Romans through Sicily. The first temple to this goddess was dedicated at Rome in B. C. 496, and a festival (see next article) was instituted with games in honour of her, over which a Greek priestess presided, to indicate that the worship of Ceres was borrowed from the Greeks. Ceres, though a foreign divinity, soon rose to great importance among the Romans, the decrees of the senate being deposited in her temple, which was committed to the special care of the ædiles. In his work on the 'Nature of the Gods,' Cicero defines the name of Ceres as given from her power of bearing fruits, thus showing that by this goddess was represented the earth. The greater Eleusinian mysteries, which were observed in the autumn, were dedicated to Ceres, and the lesser to her daughter Proserpine. (See ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES.) Bulls were sacrificed to Ceres on those festal occasions; libations were made to her of their blood, which they poured upon the earth, the prolific lap of the patron goddess, and their flesh was burnt upon her numerous altars. In the AMBARVALIA (which see), a sow, a sheep, and a bull, were sacrificed to Ceres, and hymns sung in her honour. Ceres was honoured at Catania in Sicily, as she was at Rome.

CEREAIA, a festival anciently celebrated at Rome in honour of CERES (see preceding article), generally on the ides of April, though some think a few days earlier. To represent Ceres wandering in search of Proserpine, women clothed in white dresses ran up and down with lighted torches in their hands. During the festival games were celebrated in the Circus Maximus, to which none were admitted unless clothed in white.

CERIDWEN, a goddess of the ancient Cymri, corresponding to the Ceres of the Romans, or Demeter of the Greeks.

CERINTHIANS, one of the earliest of the Gnostic sects, which derived its name from its founder Cerinthus, who is said to have been a contemporary of the apostle John. He was the first who taught that system of Judaizing Christianity, which gradually ripened into Gnosticism. Epiphanius represents him as by birth a Jew, and according to Theodoret, he received his training in the school of Alexandria. Early writers inform us, that he resided at Ephesus while John was in that city, and Irenæus tells a story of John having met Cerinthus in a public bath at Ephesus, and that on seeing the heretic, he instantly fled out, saying that he was afraid the bath would fall upon so noted an enemy of the truth and kill him.

The most varied accounts have been given of the doctrines of Cerinthus, according as the writers are disposed to attach more prominence to the Gnostic, or to the Judaizing element. Irenæus inclines chiefly to the former view, and Cains, a presbyter at Rome, and Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, incline to the latter. Neander regards Cerinthus as best entitled to be considered as the intermediate link between the Jndaizing and the Gnostic sects. He was in fact one of the first who framed a regular system of heresy after the apostolic times. Being himself a Jew, it was natural that his starting point should be decidedly Jewish. Accordingly, he sets out with the doctrine that between God and the world there exists a countless number of intermediate angels or spirits, of various ranks and degrees. By their instrumentality the world was originally created, and all its concerns were arranged and presided over by one who was placed at the head of the angels, and who, though himself ignorant of the character of God, represented him in the superintendence of this lower world, and more especially as the ruler of the Jewish people, and the being through whom the Supreme God revealed himself to them. The view which Cerinthus gave of the constitution of the Person of Christ, approached somewhat to the sentiments of the Ebionites, at least in so far as concerned the denial of the supernatural conception of Christ. He believed Jesus Christ to be simply a Jewish man, sprung of Joseph and Mary, and so remarkable for his piety and purity that he was selected to be the Messiah. The commencement of his higher destiny, when he became invested with Divine attributes, was, according to the Cerinthian system, to be dated from the hour of his baptism by John the Baptist, when the Spirit descended upon him in the form of a dove. The Spirit of the Messiah, which now entered into Jesus, was the true heavenly Christ himself, by whom he was miraculously endowed with the knowledge of the Supreme God, and invested with the supernatural power of working miracles. The man Jesus was the organ through whom the heavenly Christ manifested himself to men, but being superior to all suffering, no sooner was the man Jesus given into the hands of men to be crucified and slain, than the Christ or the Logos left him, and returned to the Father. Epiphanius alleges that Cerinthus denied the resurrection of Jesus, but this assertion is supported by no other writer. Cerinthus held that the Jewish Law was in a certain sense binding upon Christians. He taught also that there would be a resurrection of the body, and that the righteous would enjoy a millennium of happiness in Palestine, where the man Jesus having conquered all his enemies, through the power of the heavenly Christ united to him, would reign in the glorified Jerusalem over all his saints. Cains and Dionysius attribute carnal views on this subject to Cerinthus, which it is very unlikely that he ever held. Epiphanius charges him with rejecting Paul because of that apostle's renunciation of circumcision, but it is far from probable that he rejected the whole of the Epistles of Paul, though he may have objected to some of them. It is an ancient opinion, that the apostle John wrote his Gospel mainly with a view to refute Cerinthus, but many theological critics are opposed to the idea. Epiphanius says, that Cerinthus was head of the faction which rose at Jerusalem against the apostle Peter, on account of some uncircumcised persons with whom that apostle had eaten; and also that he was one of the leaders in the disturbance raised at Antioch in Syria, contending for the necessity of circumcision. He is said to have been endowed with a prophetic spirit, and to have published many prophecies and revelations throughout Phrygia and Pisidia. He began to propagate his heresy towards the close of the first century.

CEROFERARII (Lat. cera, wax, fero, to carry), taper-bearers in the Church of Rome, whose office it is to walk before the deacons with a lighted taper in their hands. (See ACCENSORII.) Similar officers are found in the Greek church.

CEROMANCY, a species of divination practised among the ancient Greeks by means of wax, which they melted and let drop into water within three definite spaces, and by observing the figure, distance, situation, and connection of the drops, foretold future events, or answered any question proposed. See DIVINATION.

CESARINS, a religious order which arose in the thirteenth century, in consequence of various abuses having crept into the order of St. Francis. The abuses complained of, however, having been reformed, the order of the Cesarins ceased to exist.

CESSATION, an act of discipline in the Church of Rome, styled technically cessatio a divinis, when for any notorious injury or disobedience to the church, a stop is put to all divine offices and the administration of sacraments, and Christians are deprived of church burial. An interdict differs from a cessation, in that during the former divine service may be performed in such churches of any place interdicted, the doors being shut, as are not expressly under the interdict, and even may be celebrated solemnly on certain high festivals, but in a cessation, no religious service can be performed solemnly; the only liberty allowed is in order that the consecrated host may be renewed, to repeat every week a private mass in the parish churches, the doors being shut; taking care also not to ring the bell, or to admit more than two persons to administer in it. Moreover, it is lawful during the cessation to administer baptism, confirmation, and penance, to such persons as desire it, provided they are not excommunicated, or under an interdict. The viaticum or extreme unction may also be administered, but then the prayers which are said before and after that administration must not be repeated. Cessation may be incurred by a whole diocese, a city, a village, or one or more churches.

CESSION, a term used in the Church of England, when a church is void in consequence of the incumbent of any living being promoted to a bishopric.

CESTUS, the girdle of Venus, the goddess of Love among the ancient Romans. It was said to have this property, that whatever female wore it would become lovely in the eyes of him whom she wished to please. Venus used it to win the affections of Mars, and Juno borrowed it from her when she wished to attract the regards of Jupiter.

CHACAM, the name given in some countries to the chief or presiding rabbi among the modern Jews, who holds a spiritual, and to some extent a civil, authority over a country or large district. He has the power of inflicting ecclesiastical censures, excommunications, and anathemas, the consequences of which are believed to extend beyond the present life. He takes cognizance of all violations of the Sabbath, all disregard of the fasts or festivals, all marriages, divorces, and commercial contracts, and all cases of adultery or incest. He hears and determines appeals against decisions of inferior rabbis within his district, and decides all difficult questions of the law. The chacam preaches three or four sermons in a year. The name chacam, or wise man, or doctor, is usually applied to the chief rabbi among the Spanish and Portuguese Jews.

CHAITYA, the name applied among the Budhists to all objects proper to be worshipped. Such objects Gotama Budha declared to be of three kinds. The first class includes the relics of his body, which were collected after his cremation. The second includes those things which have been erected on his account or for his sake, which the commentators say, mean the images of his person. And the third includes the articles he possessed, such as his girdle, his alms-bowl, the robe he put on when he bathed, the vessel from which he drank water, and his seat or throne. All these are called Chaityas, on account of the satisfaction or pleasure they produce in the mind of those by whom they are properly regarded.

CHAKIA-MOUNI, a name adopted by Budha according to the legendary accounts given by the Mongol books, which are only translations from the Thibetan or Sanscrit. The narrative differs considerably from the Singhalese version of the story which has been already noticed under the article BUDHA (GOTAMA). The Mongolian legend is as follows. Soutadanna, a chief man of the house of Chakia, of the caste of the Brahmins, reigned in India over the powerful empire of Magadha. He married Mahamaya, the great illusion, but did not consummate his marriage with her. While still a virgin, she conceived by divine influence, and on the fifteenth day of the second month of spring she gave birth to a son, whom she had carried three hundred days in her womb. A king, an incarnation of Indra, captized the young god in a divine water. The child received the name of Arddha-Chiddi, and was instantly recognized as a divine being, while it was predicted that he would surpass in holiness all preceding incarnations. Every one adored him as the god of gods, a title which in Mongolian is Tingri-in-Tingri. The utmost care having been lavished upon his childhood, he was committed at the age of ten to the care of an eminent sage under whose instruction he acquired a knowledge of poetry, music, drawing, the mathematics and medicine. He made such rapid progress in knowledge that he puzzled his teacher with various perplexing questions. Without the slightest assistance he acquired the knowledge of fifty different languages with their peculiar characters, and thus he was supernaturally fitted to fulfil his great mission, the enlightenment of the world, and the diffusion of the knowledge of religion among all nations. At the age of twenty he married a virgin of the race of Chakia, by whom he had a son named Bakhobi, and a daughter. Soon after he left his wife and family, and resolved to give himself to a life of contemplation. Having mounted a horse accordingly, which was brought him by an angel from heaven, he fled to the kingdom of Oudipa on the banks of the Naracara. There he assumed the priestly office, cut off his hair, and took the dress of a penitent, and exchanged his name for Gotama, that is, one who obscures the senses. After having spent six years in the desert, far from the abodes of men, and accompanied only by five favourite disciples, he set out to exercise his apostleship. Having reached BENARES (which see), the holy city, he mounted the throne, taking the name of CHAKIA-MOUNI, or the penitent of Chakia.

Having given himself up for a time to preparatory meditations, the great sage made public proclamation at Benares of the new system of doctrine. His instructions are contained in a collection of 108 large volumes, known by the generic name of Gandjour or verbal teaching. They treat chiefly of the metaphysics of creation, and the frail and perishable nature of man. The best edition of this great work is that of Pekin, being in four languages, Thibetan, Mongolian, Mantchoo, and Chinese. No sooner were the new doctrines made public, than Chakia-Mouni met with the keenest and most determined opposition from the priests of the ancient religious creeds of India, but challenging them to open controversy, he obtained a complete triumph over them, in honour of which a festival was instituted, which is held during the first fifteen days of the first month.

Chakia-Mouni laid down as the foundation of his religious system certain established principles of morality. These he reduced to four: 1. The power of pity resting upon immoveable bases. 2. The avoidance of all cruelty. 3. An unlimited compassion towards all creatures. 4. An inflexible conscience. Then follows the decalogue or ten special prescriptions and prohibitions. 1. Not to kill. 2. Not to rob. 3. To be chaste. 4. Not to bear false witness. 5. Not to lie. 6. Not to swear. 7. To avoid all impure words. 8. To be disinterested. 9. Not to avenge one's self. 10. Not to be superstitious. The new prophet pretended to have received these precepts by revelation from heaven; and when he died at the age of eighty, they began to spread throughout all Asia, as a divine code of morality designed to regulate the actions of men. Before bidding a last farewell to his disciples, the sage predicted that his doctrine would prevail for five thousand years; that at the expiry of that period there would appear another Budha, another man-god, predestined to be the teacher of the human race. Till that time, he added, my religion will be exposed to constant persecution, my followers will be obliged to quit India, and to retire to the highest mountains of Thibet, a country which will become the palace, the sanctuary, and the metropolis of the true faith.

Such is the Mongolian legend of the history of the famous founder of BUDHISM (which see), a system which, being first devised in Hindustan, crossed the Himalaya, and became the predominant religion of Thibet, Bokhara, Mongolia, Burmah, Japan, Ceylon, and to a great extent even of the vast empire of China. The Brahmans regard Budha as an avatar or incarnation of Vishnu.

CHALASSA, an idol worshipped by the ancient Arabians. It was destroyed in the tenth year of the Hegira.

CHALCICÆCUS, a surname given to Athena at Sparta, as the goddess of the brazen house, her temple in that city being built of brass, and containing also her statue of brass. A festival was instituted in honour of Athena under this surname. See next article.

CHALCICÆCIA, a festival celebrated every year at Sparta, in honour of Athena, as the goddess of the brazen house. A procession of young men in full armour repaired to her temple, where sacrifices were offered.

CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. This church, which acknowledges subjection to the Papal See, comprehends, according to the 'Annals of the Propagation of the Faith,' the Patriarchate of Babylon, the Archbishoprics of Diarbekr, Jizeirah, Morab, Aderbijan, and the Bishoprics of Mardin, Sirid, Amadia, Salmas, and Karkut, with ten bishops, and one hundred and one priests. The number of the Chaldean Catholics is said to be reduced to 15,000. For a long period the Romanists have been making great efforts to gain converts, more especially among the Nestorians on the banks of the Euphrates and the Tigris. So far back as 1681, a patriarch was ordained by Pope Innocent XI., over such of the Nestorians as had seceded to Rome, under the title of Mar Yoosuf or Joseph, Patriarch of the Chaldeans. The seat of this functionary was at Diarbekr until the year 1778, when this line of patriarchs was discontinued on the submission of Mar Elias of Elkosh, one of the two regular patriarchs of the Nestorians to the papal jurisdiction. The Chaldean Catholics are usually styled by the Pope Chaldean Christians, a title which belongs to the rest of their countrymen, as much if not more than to them. The books of the Chaldean Catholic Church are written in the ancient Syriac language, and are the same with those of the Nestorians, with the exception of such modifications as have been introduced to render them conformable to the creed of Rome. All the clergy except the metropolitan bishop and the patriarch are allowed to marry before ordination, but not after it. The American missionaries at Mosul, and among the Nestorians, have succeeded in gaining several converts from the Chaldean Catholics, and although Papal influence has been used with the Pasha to interrupt, and if possible, defeat the labours of these devoted heralds of the cross, they still persevere in propagating the truth, and in building up a Protestant church amid all the opposition and even persecution to which they are exposed.

CHALDEE PARAPHRASES, or TARGUMS, a name given to translations of the Old Testament into the Chaldee tongue. When the Jews were carried captive into Babylon, they naturally lost some part of their own language, and acquired a knowledge of the Chaldee which was spoken in the land of their exile. Thus there appear to have been three dialects of the Chaldee. 1. The language spoken in the Babylonish empire. 2. The Syriac, spoken by the people of Syria. 3. The Jewish dialect, approaching more to the original Hebrew. Hence the necessity for Chaldee Paraphrases, on account both of the Jews in Chaldea, and also of those in Judea, many of whom had lost all knowledge of the original Hebrew. Accordingly, in the service of the synagogue, a passage was first read in the Hebrew Scriptures, and then translated to the people into the Chaldee dialect. In this way numbers of translations were formed, which in course of time yielded to a few of acknowledged superiority, which were generally adopted both for public and private use. The most celebrated of these are the Targums or Paraphrases of Onkelos, and of Jonathan Ben Uzziel; the former being a version of the five books of Moses, and the latter a version of Joshua, Judges, the two books of Samuel, the two books of Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets. The Targum of Onkelos is undoubtedly the most ancient now extant. It is rather a version than a paraphrase, being rendered from the Hebrew word for word, and with great exactness. It has always been preferred by the Jews to all other Targums, and being set to the same musical notes with the Hebrew Text, it is thus fitted to be read in the same tone with it in the public assemblies. The Targum of Jonathan resembles that of Onkelos in purity of style, but is much more of the nature of a paraphrase, particularly his version of the later Prophets. The Jews allege that he was the favourite disciple of Hillel, and lived before the time of our Lord. They hold him in so high estimation, that they consider him as equal even to Moses himself.

Besides these two celebrated Targums, there is another Targum on the Law, which is called that of Jerusalem. It is not a continued paraphrase as the rest are, but only a commentary on some passages here and there as the author thought the text required an explanation, and sometimes whole chapters are passed over. It is written by an unknown hand, and the time when it was composed is uncertain, but it is conjectured to have been written after the third century. There are also Targums on all the other books of the Old Testament, excepting Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, which may possibly have been lost.

CHALICE, the cup in which the wine used in the eucharist is administered. In the early ages of the church it was generally composed of the most simple materials, for example, of glass or wood. According to Irenæus, supported by Epiphanius, the impostor Marcus, of the second century, used a glass cup in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and the custom seems to have continued for several centuries. But when the simplicity of primitive Christianity gave way before a carnal system of ceremonies, more costly materials came to be employed in the dispensation of the Supper. Hence we find gold and silver cups mentioned in the inventory of churches in the sixth and seventh centuries.

The use of the chalice, or communicating in both kinds, is denied by the Church of Rome to the laity, who are allowed to communicate only in one kind; the right of communicating in both kinds being reserved only for the officiating priest. This practice has not the slightest sanction from the Word of God. Our blessed Lord, when first instituting the sacrament of the supper, administered both the bread and the wine to all his disciples, using these remarkable words in reference to the cup, "Drink ye all of it." He neither dispensed the sacrament nor authorized its dispensation under one form only. This indeed has been generally conceded by Romish doctors and councils, and even by the council of Trent itself, which acknowledges our Lord's administration of each species in the original institution. And yet these theologians and councils urge the propriety of half-communication, alleging that all to whom the cup at the time of institution was presented were not laymen but priests; and the use of the wine by the clergy affords no example for its distribution to the laity. But unfortunately for this argument, it applies to the bread equally with the wine, so that if it be valid, both ought to be denied to the laity. Half-communication seems to have been utterly unknown in the first ages of the church. "One bread," says Ignatius, "is broken, and one cup distributed to all." "The deacons," says Justin Martyr, "give to every one present to partake of the blessed bread and wine." Chrysostom too is equally explicit, "One body and one cup is presented to all." According to Jerome, "the priests who administer the communion, divide the Lord's blood among the people." These authorities, extending through the four first centuries, might be corroborated by the evidence of many others.

The first who practised half-communication were the Manicheans, who abhorred wine, and it is worth noticing that Pope Leo in A. D. 443 commanded this heretical sect to be excommunicated, on account of the denial of the cup,—a practice which his Holiness accounted sacrilege. Pope Gelasius in A. D. 495 spoke in the strongest and most condemnatory terms of this Manichean practice. Pope Urban in A. D. 1095, presiding in the council of Clermont, which consisted of two hundred and thirty-eight bishops, declared that "no person, except in cases of necessity, is to communicate at the altar, but must partake separately of the bread and wine." Pope Paschal, so late as A. D. 1118, issued enactments to the same effect. "Our Lord himself," says he, "dispensed the bread and the wine, each by itself; and this usage we teach and command the holy church always to observe." By the confession of Bellarmine, Baronius, and Lyra, the ancient church celebrated this institution in both kinds. And even the council of Trent declares, that "both elements were often used from the beginning of the Christian religion; but in process of time this usage was changed for just and weighty reasons." It is an important fact, that in denying the cup to the laity, the Church of Rome differs from all other Christian churches, Eastern and Western, at the present day. The only sect of antiquity who are known to have practised half-communication were the Manicheans, from whom the Latin church seem to have adopted it. The former held wine in abhorrence, accounting it the gall of the Dragon; the latter held, and still hold, the sacramental wine in such veneration, as to account it unfit to be used by any other than a priest, and that too only when engaged in sacred service.

Nor was the use of the chalice withheld all at once from the laity. The practice was introduced gradually and by slow successive steps. At so early a date as the end of the sixth century, the custom seems to have found its way into some churches, of dipping the bread in the wine before presenting it to the communicant. This erroneous practice had become frequent in the eleventh century; and the council of Clermont condemned it as an unscriptural mode of communion. A second step in the same direction was taken by the introduction of the strange device of suction. Pipes or quills, generally of silver, were annexed to the chalice, through which the communicant was required to suck the wine, or as it was imagined, the blood of the Redeemer. The design of this absurd process was to prevent the spilling of the sacred fluid, which by the words of consecration was thought to become possessed of a Divine character.

So late as the twelfth century, the denial of the chalice to the laity is admitted, even by Romish authors, to have been unknown. In the following century, however, the practice begins to make its appearance. Father Bonaventura, who died in 1274, mentions its introduction into some churches, and his testimony is supported by that of Aquinas. It was first enacted into a law two hundred years later by the council of Constance, and this enactment was renewed and confirmed by the council of Basil in 1437. The matter was discussed at great length in the council of Trent in 1562 amid great variety of opinion. Twenty-nine voted for the restoration of the cup, and thirty-eight against it. Fourteen were for deferring the decision, and ten for sending a delegation to Germany to investigate the subject. Twenty-four were in favour of referring the question to the Pope, and thirty-one to the prelates. At length the dispute terminated in the production of canons, which approved in the strongest manner of half-communion, and a discretionary power of granting or refusing the cup to the laity was vested in the Roman pontiff. The utmost difference of opinion now manifested itself throughout the whole of Europe. The Spaniards and Italians were violently opposed to the restoration of the sacramental cup, and France, Germany, Bohemia, Poland, and Hungary contended as keenly in its favour. The Trentine decree is now universally admitted to be the rule of the church throughout the Roman Catholic world.

CHALINITIS (Gr. chalinos, a bridle), a surname of ATHENA (which see), derived, it is supposed, from that goddess having tamed Pegasus, the winged horse, and given him to Bellerophon.

CHALKEIA (Gr. chalkos, brass), a festival of great antiquity, celebrated at Athens at first in honour of Athena, when it received the name of Athenaia. Afterwards it was kept in honour of Hephaestus, and being celebrated only by artizans, especially smiths, it was called Chalkeia.

CHAMMANIM, temples in honour of the sun, which the ancient Hebrews erected in imitation of the Syrians and Phœnicians. These buildings are frequently referred to in the Old Testament; but the authorized version translates the Hebrew word by the general term "images." The word chammanim thus rendered, is found in Lev. xxvi. 30; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4; Is. xvii. 8; xxvii. 9; Ezek. vi. 4.

Considerable variety of opinion prevails as to the precise object to which the chammanim refers. Rabbi Solomon Jarchi says, that they were idols which they set upon towers, and he alleges that the name chammanim was given to them because they were exposed to the sun. Jurieu argues that the word being generally joined in the Old Testament with groves and altars, must be understood as referring not to images, but places appropriated for the idolatrous worship of the sun. He agrees accordingly in opinion with Aben-Ezra, that they were "arched houses, built in honour of the sun, and in the form of a chariot." These, therefore, may have been the chariots of the sun which Josiah is said to have burnt, and may be the same with the fire-temples of the ancient Persians, "in the midst of which," says Strabo, "is an altar upon which the magi keep an immortal fire, upon a heap of ashes." Maundrell, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, mentions that he saw the remains of several of these enclosures in Syria.

CHAMSI, called also Solares, a small sect mentioned by Hyde, in his 'History of the Ancient Religion of the Persians,' as inhabiting a certain district of Mesopotamia. He describes them as amounting to not more than a thousand souls, having no priests nor doctors, and no places of meeting, except caves, where they perform their religious worship, the mysteries of which are kept so secret, that they have not been discovered even by those who have been converted to the Christian religion. Being compelled by the Mohammedans to declare themselves members of some Christian communion, they chose the Jacobite sect, baptizing their children, and burying their dead according to the customs of these Christians. They believe in the propitiatory death of Christ. Some have supposed the Chamsi to have been a branch of the ELCESAITES (which see), a heretical sect of Christians in the second century.

CHAMYNE, a surname of DEMETER (which see), in Elis.

CHANCEL. See BEMA.

CHANCELLORS, laymen deputed to bear certain secular causes in name of the bishops. In ancient times the clergy were allowed even by emperors and kings to exercise jurisdiction in certain civil matters, such as marriages, adultery, wills, &c., which were decided by them in their consistory courts. In process of time individuals were selected to act as assistants or substitutes of the bishops in this department of their duty. The first mention of chancellor by name occurs in the Novel of Heraclius in the seventh century, where twelve chancellors are stated to be allowed in the great church of Constantinople. The cancellarii or chancellors in the civil courts were not judges, but officers attending the judge in an inferior station, and called cancellarii, because they stood ad cancellos, at the rails or barriers, which separated the secretum from the rest of the court. The ecclesiastical chancellors, however, occupied the position of assistants or advisers in giving judgment and were generally experienced in civil and canon law. There appear to have been no chancellors in England until the reign of Henry II. At length a chancellor became an indispensable officer to a bishop, who was bound to elect one, and if he refused, the archbishop could appoint one. When chosen, a chancellor derives his authority not from the bishop, but from the law, and his jurisdiction extends throughout the whole diocese, and to all ecclesiastical matters.

CHANCELLOR (THE POPE'S). This functionary, who claims for his office an antiquity as far back as the time of Jerome, wrote formerly, in the Pope's name, all the rescripts, doubts, and scruples with respect to faith, which bishops and others proposed to him. Till the pontificate of Gregory VIII., in A. D. 1187, this office had always been conferred on a bishop or cardinal; but this Pope, who had himself filled the office of chancellor, conferred it upon a canon of St. John of Lateran, who assumed the title of the Pope's vice-chancellor, as did also five or six other canons of the same church, who exercised it after him. But Boniface VIII. restored it to the college of cardinals, still retaining the subordinate title of vice-chancellor, though the duties were undoubtedly those of a chancellor. This dignity is purchased, and is held for life. The jurisdiction of the cardinal vice-chancellor, as he is called, extends to the issuing out of all apostolical letters and bulls, and also to all petitions signed by the Pope, except those expedited by brief, under the fisherman's ring.

CHANCERY (THE POPE'S), a court at Rome, which is sometimes styled the apostolic chancery, and which consists of thirteen prelates, being a regent and twelve referendaries, who are called registers of the High Court, and are clothed each in a long purple robe. The court at which the Pope is understood to preside assembles thrice a-week, viz. on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, in the vice-chancellor's palace. The registers of this court draw up the minutes of all bulls from the petitions signed by the Pope, and collate them after they are written in parchment. Those bulls which collate to benefices are issued only on the payment of certain fees proportionable to the value of the benefices. John XXII., though he did not invent the regulations and fees of the apostolic chancery, is admitted, by Romish writers, to have enlarged them, and reduced them to a more convenient form.

CHANDRA, the goddess of the moon among the Hindus. She is also called Somvar, and presides over Monday.

CHANG-KO, a goddess worshipped by the Chinese.

CHANT, a word which, in its most extended meaning, is used to denote the musical performance of all those parts of the liturgy of the Church of England which are permitted by the rubric to be sung. Dr. Hook draws the following distinction between singing and chanting: "Chanting does not apply to the performance of those metrical versions of the Psalms, the use of which in parish churches, though legitimate, as sanctioned by authority, is not contemplated by the rubric. Neither does it apply to those musical arrangements of the Canticles and of the Nicene Creed, used in collegiate churches, and technically called 'services.' The chant properly signifies that plain tune, to which the prayers, the Ātany, the versicles and responses, and the Psalms, and where services are not in use, the canticles, are set in quires and places where they sing. In the chant, when properly and fully performed, both the minister and the choir bear their respective parts. The minister recites the prayers, and all the parts of the service which he is enjoined to say alone, (except the lessons,) in one sustained note, occasionally varied at the close of a cadence: and the choir makes the responses in harmony, sometimes in unison. But in the Psalms and Canticles both the minister and choir join together in the chant, without distinction; each verse being sung in full harmony." In the principal cathedrals the prayers have always been chanted, and down to a recent period the same practice has been uniformly followed, wherever choral foundations existed. From Ambrose of Milan was derived a chant called the Ambrosian chant. From Gregory the Great, who was the great patron of sacred music in the sixth century, originated the famous Gregorian chant, a plain system of church music, which the choir and the people sung in unison. There are two modes of chanting in present use in the Church of England, the single and the double chant. The former, which is the more ancient of the two, is an air consisting of two parts; the first part terminating with the point or colon (;) which uniformly divides each verse of the Psalms or Canticles in the English Prayer Book; the second part terminating with the verse itself. The double chant is an air consisting of four strains, and consequently extending to two verses, a species of chanting which does not appear to be older than the time of Charles II. The chanting of the Psalms is said to have been derived from the practice of the Jewish church.

CHANTRY, a little chapel or particular altar in a cathedral church, built and endowed for the maintenance of a priest to sing masses, in order to release the soul of the donor out of purgatory. These prayers being chanted, the place was called a chantry, and the priest a chanter. There were many chantries in England before the Reformation, and any man might build a chantry without the leave of the bishop. The doctrine of purgatory does not seem to have been admitted in England before the thirteenth century, and, accordingly, the erection of chantries cannot be traced farther back than that period. In the last year of the reign of Henry VIII. the chantries were given over into the hands of the king, who had power to issue commissions to seize those endowments. Those which escaped this arrangement were given to his successor, Edward VI., in whom they became vested, and from that time none could build a chantry in England without the royal license.

CHANTERS. See CHORISTERS.

CHAOS, the oldest of the gods, according to Hesiod, and from him sprang the earth; Tartarus, that is, the inner abyss in or under the earth; and Amor, or the lovely order and beauty of the world. The same author informs us, that Chaos brought forth

Erebus, or gloominess, and Nox, or night, and from these two sprang air and day, that is, when light was divided from the darkness, and both together formed one day; which corresponds very closely with the Mosaic description in the Book of Genesis. The Chaos of Hesiod is unformed matter, "without form and void," as Moses terms it. Some Pagan nations consider it to have been the result of the ruin of a former world, which had perished by fire. The very term chaos, which has come to us from Greece through the Romans, is thought by M. Rougemont to be of Semitic origin, and to be derived from cahal, which signifies to be extinguished. This derivation proceeds upon the idea, that the chaotic state preceded the formation of the earth in its present aspect, and was itself the ruined condition of a former world destroyed by fire. On this subject Professor Sedgwick remarks: "The Bible instructs us that man and other living things have been placed but a few years upon the earth; and the physical monuments of the world bear witness to the same truth. If the astronomer tells us of myriads of worlds not spoken of in the sacred records, the geologist in like manner proves (not by arguments from analogy, but by the incontrovertible evidence of physical phenomena) that there were former conditions of our planet, separated from each other by vast intervals of time, during which man and the other creatures of his own date had not been called into being. Periods such as these belong not, therefore, to the moral history of our race, and come neither within the letter nor the spirit of revelation. Between the first creation of the earth, and that day in which it pleased God to place man upon it, who shall dare to define the interval? On this question Scripture is silent, but that silence destroys not the meaning of those physical monuments of his power that God has put before our eyes, giving us at the same time faculties whereby we may interpret them, and comprehend their meaning." Chaos, according to the ancient cosmogonies, denoted the empty, infinite space which existed before the creation of the world, and out of which gods, men, and the whole universe arose. Ovid, however, describes it as the confused mass out of which all things arose. Thus, in the beginning of his 'Metamorphoses,' he says:

"Before the appearance of the earth and sky
Which covereth all things, Nature
Throughout the universe had but one form,
Which men have named Chaos—'Twas a Raw and shapeless mass—a heap of Nature's Discordant seeds wildly huddled together."

What was the precise state of the chaotic mass before the fiat of the Creator it is impossible to say. But no sooner did the Spirit of God brood upon the face of the waters than a world of beauty and order straightway sprang into existence.

CHAPEL, a building erected for Divine worship. The name is derived from capella, which primarily means a certain kind of hood, and refers to an ancient custom of the kings of France, who, when they took the field against their enemies, carried with them St. Martin's capella or hood, which was kept in a tent as a precious relic, the place in which it was deposited being termed capella, and the priests, to whose charge it was committed, capellani. In the fifth century, the name of capellæ or chapels was applied to oratories or private churches, which were built about that time in France, and afterwards became common in the West. Constantine the Great seems to have been the first who introduced this kind of private worship. Eusebius merely says, that he converted his palace, as it were, into a church, being accustomed to hold meetings in it for prayer and reading the Scriptures. Sozomen, however, affirms still more plainly, that Constantine had erected a chapel in his palace; and that it was also his custom to set apart in war a particular tent for Divine worship, which certain of the clergy were appointed to conduct. It appears also that several persons of note followed the example of the emperor, and had chaplains in their houses. Hence the decree of the second Trullian council, that no clergyman should baptize or celebrate the Lord's Supper in a private chapel without the consent of the bishop. After the Crusades, many places where sacred relics were preserved received the name of chapels. In England there are various kinds of chapels; 1. Domestic chapels built by noblemen, that their families and households may engage together in private worship. 2. College chapels connected with the different universities. 3. Chapels of Ease for the accommodation of parishioners who may reside at an inconvenient distance from the parish church. 4. Parochial chapels, which, though Chapels of Ease, have a permanent minister or incumbent. 5. Free chapels, such as were founded by kings of England, and made exempt from episcopal jurisdiction. 6. The burial places of people of rank, which are attached to churches, are sometimes termed chapels. 7. The places of worship built by Methodists and Protestant Dissenters generally in England, are usually termed chapels, though the name is denied to them by the Anglo-Catholics of the Church of England.

CHAPELS (UNION), a name given to those places of worship in which the service of the Church of England is performed in the morning, and the service of Dissenters in the evening. Such buildings were intended to unite both parties.

CHAPELLE ARDENTE, or castrum doloris, a form sometimes followed in the Romish church in the case of masses for the dead, when the deceased happens to be a person remarkable for his rank or virtues. A representation of the deceased is set up with branches and tapers of yellow wax, either in the middle of the church, or near the tomb of the deceased, where the priest pronounces a solemn absolution of the dead.

CHAPLAIN, the minister or incumbent of a CHAPEL (which see). Although, in the days of Constantine, the emperor himself and a few of his nobles may have had private chaplains, the practice seems not to have been generally followed for a long period. At length, however, in the Byzantine empire, the emperor and empress were permitted to have private chaplains in their palaces. Hence the origin of court preachers. "Whether tempted," says Neander, "by this example, or induced by the necessity arising from the migratory character of their court, the Frankish princes selected certain clergymen to accompany them, and perform the service of the church. At the head of these ministers was an arch-chaplain, and this body of clergy exercised, by their constant and close intercourse with the prince, an important influence on the affairs of the church. The example of the prince was followed by other great men. Nobles and knights appointed private chaplains, and placed particular priests in their castles. This practice was attended with very injurious consequences. The clergy thus employed and protected, threatened to make themselves independent of the bishop's inspection. The result was that the proper services of the parish church lost their dignity: they were attended only by the peasantry; the rich and poor had now their distinct worship of God. The knights, moreover, often selected for their chaplains worthless men, mere rambles, who contented themselves with the most mechanical repetition of the liturgy, and were ready to become the instruments of any vice or folly. Even serfs were sometimes appointed by their masters to this office, and though chaplains were still expected to perform the most menial duties. Both religion and the clerical character were disgraced by these abuses. Numerous regulations were introduced to oppose them, and secure the respect due to the public service of the church."

In England the Queen has forty-eight chaplains, four of whom are in attendance each month, preach in the royal chapel, read service in the family and to the Queen in her private oratory, and say grace in the absence of the clerk of the closet. In Scotland, the Queen has six chaplains, whose only duty at present is to pray at the election of peers for Scotland to sit in parliament.

According to a statute of Henry VIII. the persons vested with the power of retaining chaplains, together with the number each is allowed to qualify, are as follow:—an archbishop, eight; a duke or bishop, six; marquis or earl, five; viscount, four; baron, knight of the garter, or lord chancellor, three; a duchess, marchioness, countess, baroness, the treasurer or comptroller of the king's house, clerk of the closet, the king's secretary, dean of the chapel, almoner, and master of the rolls, each of them two; chief justice of the king's bench, and warden of the cinque ports, each one. All these chaplains may purchase a license or dispensation, and take two benefices, with cure of souls. A chaplain must be retained by letters testimonial under hand and seal, for it is not sufficient that he serve as chaplain in the family. The name of chaplain is given also to ministers who officiate in the army and navy, in jails, public hospitals, and workhouses.

CHAPLET, an instrument of devotion used by Roman Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and other Eastern communions. It consists of a string of beads by which they count the number of their prayers. Ecclesiastical antiquaries are considerably divided as to the origin of chaplets. They seem to have had no existence, however, earlier than the twelfth century, when they are said to have been introduced by the Dominicans, who claim the merit of inventing this supposed aid to devotion as belonging to their founder, St. Dominic, to whom also is traced the honour of originating the Inquisition. The Mohammedans are allowed to have borrowed the use of chaplets from the Hindus, and the Spaniards, among whom St. Dominic laboured, may have received them from the Moors. These bead-strings were in common use in the thirteenth century, and then, as now, they consisted of fifteen decades of smaller beads for the Hail Mary, with a large one between each ten for the Paternoster. It was not, however, till the fifteenth century that the rosary, as chaplets came to be called, started into very high estimation in the Roman Catholic world. Alain de la Roche, a Dominican friar, pretended to have had an interview with the Virgin Mary, in the course of which she communicated the peculiar virtues of this implement of devotion. The story is thus related by Southey, in his 'Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ:' "The prodigious virtues of the rosary were manifested at Carcassons, where there dwelt so active and pertinacious a heretic, that Dominic, not being able to convert him by reasoning, (and as it appears, not having at that time the efficacious means of fire and faggot at command,) complained to the Virgin what mischief this monster was doing to the cause of the faith; upon which a whole host of devils was sent into the heretic to punish his obstinacy, and give the saint an opportunity of displaying his power. The energumen was in a dreadful state; and well he might be; for when, in the presence of the people, he was brought before Dominic for help, and the saint throwing a rosary round his neck, commanded the foul fiends, by virtue of that rosary, to declare how many they were, it appeared that they were not less than fifteen thousand in number: the heretic had blasphemed the rosary, and for every decade of that sacred bead-string, a whole legion had entered him. Grievously, however, as he was tormented, the devils themselves were not less so, when being thus put to the question, they were compelled to answer all that the saint asked. Was what he preached of the rosary false, or was it true? They howled in agony at this, and cursed the tremendous power which they confessed. . . . Whom did they hate most? . . . Whom but Dominic himself, who was their worst enemy on earth! . . . Which saint in heaven did they fear most, and to which might prayers with most confidence be addressed, and ought the most reverence to be paid? So reluctant were they to utter the truth in this case, that they entreated he would be pleased to let them reply in private; and when he insisted upon a public answer, they struggled with such violence, that fire issued from the eyes, mouth, and nostrils of the miserable demoniac. Touched with compassion at the sight, Dominic adjured the Virgin by her own rosary to have mercy upon him. Immediately heaven opened, the blessed Virgin herself, surrounded with angels, descended, touched the possessed with a golden wand, and bade the fiends make answer. Bitterly complaining of the force which was put upon them, they exclaimed at last,—‘Hear, O ye Christians! this Mary, the mother of God, is able to deliver her servants from hell: one supplication of hers is worth more than all the prayers of all the saints; and many have had their sins, unjustly so we think, forgiven them, for invoking her at the point of death. If she had not interposed we should ere this have destroyed Christianity; and we confess and proclaim that no one who perseveres in her service and in the use of the rosary can perish.’”

The same Dominican monk was favoured with another visit from the Virgin, complaining of the neglect into which her rosary had fallen: “By the Ave Marias it was, she said, that this world had been renovated, hell emptied, and heaven replenished; and by the rosary, which was composed of Ave Marias, it was that in these latter times the world must be reformed. She had chosen him as her dearest and most beloved servant, to proclaim this, and exhort his brethren to proclaim it, and she promised to approve their preaching by miracles. With that, in proof of her favour, she hung round his neck a rosary, the string whereof was composed of her own heavenly hair; and with a ring made of that same blessed hair, she espoused him, and she blessed him with her virgin lips, and she fed him at her holy bosom.”

The historians of the Crusades allege, that Peter the Hermit first taught the soldiers the use of chaplets, which he himself had invented. But the greater number of Romish writers attribute the discovery to St. Dominic, who appears, at all events, to have been the originator of the ROSARY (which see), a large chaplet consisting of one hundred and fifty beads. Chaplets are in use in China among the worshippers of Fo or Budha. The devotees of this sect wear a chaplet about their necks or round their arms, consisting of one hundred middle-sized beads, and eight considerably larger. At the top, where Roman Catholics fix their crucifix, they have one very large bead made in the fashion of a gourd. The Chinese probably were in the habit of using these bead-strings long before they were known in Christendom. The Japanese, also, say their prayers upon a chaplet or rosary. Each sect has one peculiar to itself. The chaplet of one sect consists of two circles, one over the other. The first or uppermost consists of forty beads, and the lowest of thirty. The Budsdoists in Japan are obliged to repeat their prayers one hundred and eight times over, because the Bonzes assure them that there are as many different sins which render a man polluted and unclean, and each devotee ought to be provided with a prayer for his spiritual defence.

CHAPLETS (MARRIAGE). The crowning of the married pair with garlands, was a marriage rite peculiar to many nations professing different forms of religion. Tertullian inveighs against it with all the zeal of a gloomy Montanist; but it is spoken of with approbation by the fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries, from whom it appears that the friends and attendants of the bridal pair were adorned in the same manner. These chaplets were usually made of olive, myrtle, amaranth, rosemary, and evergreens, intermingled with cypress and vervain. Chaplets were not worn by the parties in the case of a second marriage, nor by those who had been guilty of impropriety before marriage. In the Greek church the chaplets were imposed by the officiating minister at the altar. In the Western church it was customary for the parties to present themselves thus attired.

CHAPTER. See BIBLE.

CHAPTER (CATHEDRAL), the governing body of a cathedral. It consists of the dean with a certain number of canons or prebendaries, heads of the church. This body corresponds to the ancient senate of the early presbyters, who assisted the bishop in his ecclesiastical government. During the lifetime, and still more on the death, of the bishop, the cathedral chapter formerly took a part in the administration of affairs in the diocese. The most important concerns, according to the canon law, shall not be undertaken by the bishop without consultation with the chapter. From this governing body certain members were chosen to examine the candidates for ordination, and the priests as to their care for the souls under their charge. The chapter is styled by the canon law concilium and senatus episcopii. As they formed a corporation, they acquired property, and became independent of the bishop, whom they had also in England, as elsewhere, the power of choosing. The old English cathedrals had, generally speaking, a common property, from which the expenses of the fabric and other necessary outgoings were defrayed, and from which also the dean and resident officers and canons received a daily portion according to their time of residence, the dean's share being double that of a canon. The new cathedrals have a corporate property from which are paid the stipends and expenses. The revenues of twenty-six cathedrals and two collegiate churches in 1852 amounted to £313,005 2s. 9d. Out of this sum the amount divided between the members of the chapters in the same year was £160,713, and about one-sixth part of the revenue is now paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The greater part of the revenues of the chapters is derived from fines paid on the granting or renewal of leases.

The chapters, as has been already noticed, at a former period possessed the power of electing bishops. Henry VIII., however, assumed this right as a prerogative of the crown. Their authority no longer extends over the diocese during the life of the bishop, but in them is vested the whole episcopal authority during the vacancy of the see.

CHAPTERS (THE THREE), (Lat. capitula, heads), three subjects condemned by a decree of Justinian passed A. D. 544, commonly called Justinian's creed. The obnoxious points were (1.) The person and writings of Theodorus, bishop of Mopsuestia, whom the decree pronounced a heretic and a Nestorian. (2.) The writings of Theodoret, bishop of Cyricus, in so far as they favoured Nestorianism, or opposed Cyril of Alexandria and his twelve anathemas. (3.) An epistle said to have been written by Ibas, bishop of Edessa, to one Maris a Persian, which censured Cyril and the first council of Ephesus, and favoured the cause of Nestorius. To understand the dispute about the Three Chapters, it must be remembered that the orthodox doctrine on the person of Christ was opposed to the Nestorians on the one hand, who dis severed the two natures of Christ, and the Eutychians or Monophysites on the other hand, who confounded them together. In opposing these two extremes, the orthodox were somewhat divided, some leaning to the one party, and others to the other party. Those who, in their zeal against the Nestorians, approached near to the Monophysites, were ready to condemn the Three Chapters, while they were defended by those who were inclined to favour the Nestorians. To this latter party belonged Theodorus, Theodoret, and Ibas. In this controversy the Oriental church took a very lively interest, but in the Western church where both the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies had prevailed to no great extent, the Three Chapters were felt to be of little consequence. It was a bold step in Justinian, on the ground simply of his civil authority as emperor, to issue a decree condemning the Three Chapters, but having rashly taken the step he resolved to persevere in it. The church was agitated long and severely on the subject, and at length the opinions held forth in the Creed of Justinian having received ecclesiastical sanction, the doctrine on the person of Christ, as consisting of two natures in one person, became the settled opinion of the Catholic Christian church, and has continued so to this day.

CHARAK PUJAH, one of the most popular festivals in Eastern India. It is held in honour of Shiva, in his character of Maha Kali; or time, the great destroyer of all things. The consort of Shiva is Parvati, under the distinction, and appropriate form of Maha Kali. In course of time, accordingly the goddess Kali has come to occupy a most conspicuous place in the annual festival of the Charak Pujah. She is of all the Hindu deities the most cruel and revengeful. Dr. Duff informs us that, according to some of the sacred legends, she "actually cut her own throat, that the blood issuing thence might spout into her mouth;" and images of this horrid spectacle are to be seen this day in some districts of Bengal. This blood-thirsty divinity is the protectress and special guardian of the Thugs, who profess to plan and to execute their sanguinary depredations under her auspices. The festival of Charak Pujah also, though held in honour of her lord, as the great destroyer, is embraced as an occasion of adoring Kali as his destructive energy. It is described in the following graphic and glowing style by Dr. Duff in his 'India and India Missions.'

"The festival itself derives its name of Charak Pujah from chakra, a discus or wheel; in allusion to the circle performed in the rite of swinging, which constitutes so very prominent a part of the anniversary observances. An upright pole, twenty or thirty feet in height, is planted in the ground. Across the top of it, moving freely on a pin or pivot, is placed horizontally another long pole. From one end of this transverse beam is a rope suspended, with two hooks affixed to it. To the other extremity is fastened another rope, which hangs loosely towards the ground. The devotee comes forward, and prostrates himself in the dust. The hooks are then run through the fleshy parts of his back, near the shoulders. A party, holding the rope at the other side, immediately begins to run round with considerable velocity. By this means the wretched dupe of superstition is hoisted aloft into the air, and violently whirled round and round. The torture he may continue to endure for a longer or shorter period, according to his own free-will. Only, this being reckoned one of the holiest of acts, the longer he can endure the torture, the greater the pleasure conveyed to the deity whom he serves; the greater the portion of merit accruing to himself; and, consequently, the brighter the prospect of future reward. The time usually occupied averages from ten minutes to half an hour. And as soon as one has ended, another candidate is ready,—aspiring to earn the like merit and distinction. And thus on one tree from five to ten or fifteen may be swung in the course of a day. Of these swinging posts there are hundreds and thousands simultaneously in operation in the province of Bengal. They are always erected on the most conspicuous parts of the towns and villages, and are surrounded by vast crowds of noisy spectators. On the very streets of the native city of Calcutta, many of these horrid swings are annually to be seen, and scores around the suburbs. It not unfrequently happens that, from the extreme rapidity of the motion, the ligaments of the back give way, in which case the poor devotee is tossed to a distance, and dashed to pieces. A loud wail of commiseration, you now suppose, will be raised in behalf of the unhappy man who has thus fallen a martyr to his religious enthusiasm. No such thing! Idolatry is cruel as the grave. Instead of sympathy or compassion, a feeling of detestation and abhorrence is excited towards him. By the principles of their faith he is adjudged to have been a desperate criminal in a former state of being; and he has now met with this violent death, in the present birth, as a righteous retribution, on account of egregious sins committed in a former!

"The evening of the same day is devoted to another practice almost equally cruel. It consists in the devotees throwing themselves down from the top of a high wall, the second storey of a house, or a temporary scaffolding, often twenty or thirty feet in height, upon iron spikes or knives that are thickly stuck in a large bag or mattress of straw. But these sharp instruments being fixed rather loosely, and in a position sloping forward, the greater part of the thousands that fall upon them dexterously contrive to escape without serious damage. Many, however, are often cruelly mangled and lacerated; and in the case of some, the issue proves speedily fatal.

"At night, numbers of the devotees sit down in the open air, and pierce the skin of their foreheads; and in it, as a socket, place a small rod of iron, to which is suspended a lamp, that is kept burning till the dawn of day, while the lampbearers rehearse the praises of their favourite deity.

"Again, before the temple, bundles of thorns and other fire-wood are accumulated, among which the devotees roll themselves uncovered. The materials are next raised into a pile, and set on fire. Then the devotees briskly dance over the blazing embers, and fling them into the air with their naked hands, or toss them at one another.

"Some have their breasts, arms, and other parts, stuck entirely full of pins, about the 'thickness of small nails, or packing needles.' Others betake themselves to a vertical wheel, twenty or thirty feet in diameter, and raised considerably above the ground. They bind themselves to the outer rim, in a sitting posture, so that, when the wheel rolls round, their heads point alternately to the zenith and the nadir.

"But it were endless to pursue the diversity of these self-inflicted cruelties into all their details. There is one, however, of so very singular a character, that it must not be left unnoticed. If the problem were proposed to any member of our own community to contrive some other distinct species of torture,—amid the boundless variety which the most fertile imagination might figure to itself, probably the one now to be described would not be found. Some of these deluded votaries enter into a vow. With one hand they cover their under lips with a layer of wet earth or mud; on this, with the other hand, they deposit some small grains usually of mustard-seed. They then stretch themselves flat on their backs,—exposed to the dripping dews of night, and the blazing sun by day. And their vow is, that from that fixed position they will not stir, will neither move, nor turn, nor eat, nor drink,—till the seeds planted on the lips begin to sprout or germinate. This vegetable process usually takes place on the third or fourth day; after which, being released from the vow, they arise, as they doatingly imagine and believe, laden with a vast accession of holiness and supererogatory merit."

Such scenes as these form a most impressive though painful commentary on the declaration of Sacred Scripture, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of horrid cruelty." What a contrast to the spirit which the gospel everywhere inculcates! See HINDUISM, KALI, SHIVA.

CHARAN DASIS, one of the Vaishnava sects among the Hindus. It was instituted by Charan Das, a merchant of the Dhusar tribe, who resided at Delhi in the reign of the second Alemgir. Their doctrines of emanation are much the same as those of the Vedanta school, though they correspond with the Vaishnava sects in maintaining Brahm, or the great source of all things, to be Krishna. They renounce the Guru, and assert the pre-eminence of faith above every other distinction. They differ from the other Vaishnava sects, in requiring no particular qualification of caste, order, or even sex for their teachers; and they affirm that they originally differed from them also in worshipping no sensible representations of the deity, and in excluding even the Tulasí plant and the Sálagram stone from their devotions; though they admit that they have recently adopted them, in order to maintain a friendly intercourse with the followers of Rámánand. Another peculiarity in their system is, the importance they attach to morality, while they do not acknowledge faith to be independent of works. They maintain that actions invariably meet with punishment or reward. Their Decalogue is as follows: (1.) Not to lie. (2.) Not to revile. (3.) Not to speak harshly. (4.) Not to discourse idly. (5.) Not to steal. (6.) Not to commit adultery. (7.) Not to offer violence to any created thing. (8.) Not to imagine evil. (9.) Not to cherish hatred. (10.) Not to indulge in conceit or pride. These precepts, however, do not exhaust their system of morality. They enjoin upon their followers also to discharge the duties of the profession or caste to which they belong, to associate with pious men, to put implicit faith in the Guru or spiritual preceptor, and to adore Hara as the original and indefinable cause of all, and who, through the operation of Máyá, created the universe, and has appeared in it occasionally in a mortal form, and particularly as Krishna.

The followers of Charan Dás consist of two classes, the clerical and the secular. The latter are chiefly of the mercantile order; but the former lead a mendicant and ascetic life, and are distinguished by wearing yellow garments, and a single streak of sandal down the forehead, a necklace and rosary of Tulasi beads, and a small pointed cap, round the lower part of which they wear a yellow turban.

The authorities of the sect are the Sri Bhāgavat and Gítá. Their chief seat is at Delhi, where there is a monument to the memory of the founder. This establishment consists of about twenty resident members. There are also five or six similar Mat'hs at Dehli, and others in the upper part of the Doab, and their numbers are said to be rapidly increasing.

CHARENTON (THE DECREE OF), a celebrated decree of the Reformed Church of France, passed in the second synod of Charenton A. D. 1631, by which a way was opened up for the professors of the Lutheran religion to hold sacred and civil communion with the Reformed. The words of the decree, as given in Quick's 'Synodicon in Gallia Reformata,' were these: "The province of Burgundy demanding whether the faithful of the Augsburg Confession might be permitted to contract marriages in our churches, and to present children in our churches into baptism, without a previous abjuration of those opinions held by them contrary to the belief of our churches, this Synod declareth, that inasmuch as the churches of the Confession of Augsburg do agree with the other Reformed churches in the principal and fundamental points of the true religion, and that there is neither superstition nor idolatry in their worship, the faithful of the said Confession, who, with a spirit of love and peaceableness, do join themselves to the communion of our churches in this kingdom, may be, without any abjuration at all made by them, admitted unto the Lord's table with us, and as sureties may present children unto baptism, they promising the Consistory that they will never solicit them, either directly or indirectly, to transgress the doctrine believed and professed in our churches, but will be content to instruct and educate them in those points and articles which are in common between us and them, and wherein both the Lutherans and we are unanimously agreed." Before this attempt in France at a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, the same object was sought to be accomplished in England by James I., who, in 1615, tried to reconcile the two parties through the instrumentality of Peter du Moulin, a celebrated divine among the French Reformed. These well meant efforts, however, both in France and England, failed to accomplish the desired result.

CHARGE, an address delivered by a bishop in Episcopal churches at a visitation of the clergy belonging to his diocese; and in Presbyterian churches an address delivered to the minister on the occasion of his ordination to the pastoral office.

CHARI DEI (Lat. Beloved ones of God), a name alleged by Tertullian to have been sometimes applied to believers in the early Christian church, because their prayers and intercessions were powerful with God to obtain freedom for others as well as for themselves. Accordingly, that eminent father exhorts penitents to fall down at the feet of these favourites of heaven, and to implore them to make intercession with God for them.

CHARILA, a heathen festival, anciently observed among the inhabitants of Delphi, once in every nine years. The circumstances which led to its institution at first, are related by Plutarch to the following effect. The Delphians having been visited with a famine, they proceeded with their wives and children to the gate of the king, entreating his assistance. Being unable to supply the wants of the whole of the inhabitants, he distributed meal and pulse only to the better sort. Among the applicants was a little orphan girl, who earnestly entreated a share of the royal bounty, but instead of granting her relief, the king beat her with his shoe, and drove her from his presence with every insult and indignity. The girl, though a destitute orphan, felt the affront deeply, and unable to brook the insulting treatment, hastily untied her girdle and hanged herself with it. After this the famine is said to have increased, and brought along with it extensively prevailing disease; whereupon the king consulted the oracle of Apollo, which declared that the death of the virgin Charila must be expiated. After long search as to the meaning of the reply of the oracle, the Delphians discovered that the virgin Charila was the orphan whom the king had beaten with his shoe, and, therefore, as the oracle directed, certain expiatory sacrifices were established, which were to be performed every nine years. The mode of their celebration was in accordance also with the occasion of their appointment. The king, who presided at the festival, distributed meal and pulse to all who applied, whether strangers or citizens. When all had received their portion, an image of the virgin Charila was brought in, when the king smote it with his shoe, and then the chief of the Thyades conveyed it to a lonesome and desolate place, where a halter being put about its neck, they buried it in the same spot where Charila was interred.

CHARIS (Gr. grace), the personification of grace and beauty among the ancient Greeks. The Charites or Graces are said by Hesiod to have been the daughters of Zeus and Eurynome or Eunomia, one of the Oceanides; or as others affirm, of Dionysus and Aphrodite. They were three sisters, named respectively Aglaiā, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. See GRACES.

CHARISTIA (Gr. charis, grace), a solemn feast among the ancient Romans, to which only immediate relatives and members of the same family were invited, for the purpose of arranging amicably any disputed matter, and effecting a reconciliation among friends who might happen to be at variance. This feast was celebrated on the 19th of February, and it is referred to by Ovid in his Fasti.

CHARITY (CHARTER OF), the name which Pope Stephen gave to the constitutions which he drew up for the regulation and guidance of the Cistercian monks, when he united their monasteries into one body. See CISTERCIANS.

CHARITY OF OUR LADY (ORDER OF THE), an order of monks founded towards the end of the thirteenth century. It originated in the erection of an hospital for the sick and poor in the diocese of Chalons in France. The order was confirmed by Boniface VIII. in A. D. 1300, and flourished for a time, but becoming disorderly and corrupt, it gradually dwindled away, and soon became extinct.

CHARITY OF OUR LADY (NUNS HOSPITAL-CLERS OF THE), an order of nuns founded at Paris in 1624, by Francis de la Croix. The religious of this hospital were obliged by vow to administer to the necessities of poor and sick females. They were distinguished by a dress of grey serge. The constitutions of this order were drawn up by the Archbishop of Paris in 1628, and approved by Pope Urban VIII. in 1633.

CHARITY OF ST. HIPPOLYTUS (RELIGIOUS HOSPITALCLERS OF THE), an order founded in 1585 in Mexico, by Bernardin Alvarez in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. This charitable Mexican founded an hospital for the poor, dedicating it to the honour of St. Hippolytus the martyr. Bernardin drew up constitutions for the government of the order, which received the approbation of the Pope. Afterwards some others of the same kind were built, and being united, they formed a congregation under the name of the Charity of St. Hippolytus.

CHARMS. See AMULETS.

CHARMER, one who makes use of charms. The Jews understand by the word as employed in Deut. xviii. 11, a person that practises magic by the use of certain words and sounds, as well as signs and ceremonies, which they allege have been appointed by the devil to accomplish what is beyond the power of man; to charm a serpent, for example, so as to prevent it from stinging or inflicting any injury. In ancient times they spoke in verse or rhyme, and hence the word "charmer" is translated by the Septuagint, "one that sings his song." To this sort of superstition the Jews were at one time very much addicted, and when they threw away their own charms, they substituted for them the words of Scripture. Thus they pretended to cure wounds by reading from the Law, Exod. xv. 26. "I will put none of these diseases upon thee." A charmer was generally thought to have intercourse with evil spirits under whose influence he acted. Ludolph translates the word that we interpret "charmer," by the words "gathering together in company." The allusion is supposed to be to an ancient kind of enchantment, by which various kinds of beasts were brought together into one place, distinguished by the Rabbin into the great congregation and the little congregation, the former implying that a great company of the larger sort of beasts were assembled together, and the latter an equally great company of the smaller sort of beasts, such as serpents, scorpions, and the like. Charmers of various kinds have been found in many nations, both in ancient and in modern times. Shaw, Bruce, Lane, and others, who have been in the Levant, testify to the prevalence particularly of serpent-charmers. The most famous serpent-charmers of antiquity were the Psylli, a people of Cyrenaica, whose power Pliny ascribes to a peculiar odour about their persons, which the serpents abhorred. The most potent form of words used in India against serpents, is said by Roberts to be, "Oh! serpent, thou who art coiled in my path, get out of my way; for around thee are the mongoos, the porcupine, and the kite in his circles ready to take thee." In Egypt, as Mr. Lane informs us, the following words are used to attract serpents from their hiding-places, "I adjure you by God, if ye be above, or if ye be below, that ye come forth: I adjure you by the most Great name, if ye be obedient, that ye come forth; and if ye be disobedient, die! die! die!" In all heathen nations, but particularly in Southern and Western Africa, charmers are found to exercise a remarkable influence over the minds of the people. The FETISH (which see) of many Negro tribes is regarded with the utmost veneration. The whole religious history of our race, indeed, in so far as it is uninfluenced by Divine revelation, shows a striking tendency to contemplate most of the objects and phenomena of external nature in the light of charms, viewing them as possessed of life and power. On this subject, Mr. Gross remarks, in his ingenious work on the Heathen Religion, "The wind moans or howls; the stream leaps or runs; the tree nods or beckons; the rains are tears, which heaven, in sorrow or in anger, sheds upon the earth; and the fantastic cloud-forms are so many ghostly warriors, ominously hovering over the human domicile. Besides, the fire bites: its flames are tongues, which—like the serpent-locks of Medusa—encircle and devour their victim. Hail is the algid missile of some shaggy or sullen frost king, the Joetun Rime, for example, in Scandinavian mythology. The earth is a mother, producing and nourishing an innumerable progeny, and hence called Ceres, or Alma Nostra. Here we find not only impersonation, but also apotheosis; and the reason is, that man, more sentient than rational, is restricted in the unfolding process of his inner life, to the intercourse with the objects of sense, unable as yet to rise to abstract ideas. 'You remember,' writes the author On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History, 'that fancy of Aristotle's, of a man who had grown to maturity in some dark distance, and was brought, on a sudden, into the upper air to see the sun rise. What would his wonder be,' says the philosopher, 'his rapt astonishment at the sight we daily witness with indifferoace! With the free, open sense of a child, yet with the ripe faculty of a man, his whole heart would be kindled by the sight, he would discern it well to be godlike, his soul would fall down in worship before it. Now, just such a childlike greatness was in the primitive nations. The first Pagan Thinker among rude men, the first man that began to think, was precisely the child-man of Aristotle. Simple, open as a child, yet with the depth and strength of a man. Nature had, as yet, no name to him; he had not yet united under a name the infinite variety of sights, sounds, shapes, and motions, which we now collectively name universe, nature, or the like, and so with a name dismiss it from us. To the wild, deep-hearted man, all was yet new, unveiled under names or formulas; it stood naked, flashing in on him there, beautiful, awful, unspeakable. Nature was to this man, what to the Thinker and Prophet it for ever is, preternatural. This green, flowery, rock-built earth, the trees, the mountains, rivers, many-sounding seas; that great deep sea of azure that swims overhead; the winds sweeping through it; the black cloud fashioning itself together, now pouring out fire, now hail and rain: what it it? Ay, what? At bottom we do not yet know; we can never know at all. It is not by our superior insight that we escape the difficulty; it is by our superior levity, our inattention, our want of insight. It is by not thinking that we cease to wonder at it. Hardened around us, incasing wholly every notion we form, is a wrappage of traditions, hearsays, mere words. We call that fire of the black thunder-cloud "electricity," and lecture learnedly about it, and grind the like of it out of glass and silk: but what is it? What made it? Whence comes it? Whither goes it? Science has done much for us; but it is a poor science that would hide from us the great, deep, sacred infinitude of Nescience, whither we can never penetrate, on which all science swims as a mere superficial film. This world, after all our science and sciences, is still a miracle; wonderful, inscrutable, magical, and more to whomsoever will think of it."

CHARON, a son of Erebus, regarded among the heathen nations of antiquity as the ferryman of the infernal regions, employed in carrying in his boat the shades of the dead across the Styx, and other rivers of the lower world. For this service Charon was supposed to receive from each an obolus, and, accordingly, it was customary to put a coin of that value into the mouth of every dead body before burial.

CHAROPS, a surname of Hercules, under which he had a statue erected to him on the spot where he was said to have brought forth Cerberus from the infernal regions.

CHARTOPHYLACES, officers in the early Christian church, identical with the CRIMELIARCHS (which see). The name given also to grand officials in the Greek church.

CHARTREUX (ORDER OF). See CARTHUSIANS.

CHASIBLE, CHASUBLE, or CASULA, the outermost dress which was formerly worn by the priest in the service of the altar. It was in a circular form, with an aperture to admit the head in the centre, while it fell down so as completely to envelop the person of the wearer. In the Romish church it is cut away at the sides, so as to expose the arms, and leave only a straight piece before and behind. The Greek church, which retains it in its primitive shape, calls it Phaelonion. That which is worn by the Greek Patriarch is embellished all over with triangles and crosses, from which it sometimes received the name of Polystaurium. The phaelonion or cloak is supposed to be the garment which Paul left at Troas, and hence, as is alleged, his peculiar anxiety that it should be brought him, it being an ecclesiastical robe.

CHASCA, the name of the planet Venus, under which it was worshipped among the ancient Peruvians.

CHASIDIM (Heb. saints), a modern Jewish sect originated in 1740 by a Polish Jew, named Rabbi Israel Baal Schem, who taught first in Poland, and afterwards in Podolia. They recognize the Cabala as the foundation of their doctrines and practices. They discipline themselves with fasting and other austerities, abstain from animal food, and in general from all earthly enjoyments. Baal Schem was revered by his followers as the representative of the Deity upon earth, whose commands they were bound implicitly to obey. He bore the title of Tzadik, or the righteous, a name which the sect still retain instead of that of Rabbi. The founder died in 1760 and after his death his three principal disciples, who were also his grandsons, were elected chiefs of three divisions of the Chasidim, and its unity being once broken, the sect was split up into a number of separate communities or associations. Meanwhile the number of adherents had increased from ten to forty thousand. Israel Baal Schem is said, in the books of the Chasidim, to have been taken up into heaven, there to live in the society of angels, acting as mediator with God, and reconciling to Him every Jew who brings up his children in the doctrines of the Chasidim. "The dignity of Tzadik," as we are informed by Da Costa, "continued high in esteem long after the death of Israel Baal Schem; not only was its possessor venerated as holy, but his whole family shared in the deference paid to him, and all his relations were looked upon as saints among the Jews. His books, his clothes, his furniture, and especially his tomb, were considered as preservatives from sin, and instrumental in its expiation. To serve the Tzadik gave a right to eternal life hereafter,—to converse with him was to be in a state of beatitude here upon earth."

The Chasidim have separate synagogues, and use the prayer-book of the Spanish Jews. They reverence the Talmud less, and the Sohar more than the other Jews, and the grand object which they profess to seek after is a perfect union with God. Much of their time is spent in contemplation and in prayer, during which they use the most extraordinary contortions and gestures, jumping, writhing, howling, until they work themselves up into a state of intense excitement approaching to madness. As a preparation for their devotions they are said to make a liberal use of mead, and even of ardent spirits, with the view of inducing cheerfulness. Messrs. Bonar and McCheyne visited a synagogue of the Chasidim at Tarnapol, and witnessed a dance in honour of the law, which they thus describe: "At first they danced two and two, then three or four all joined hand in hand; they leaped also as well as danced, singing at the same time, and occasionally clapping hands in a manner that reminded us of the Arab dance and song in the East. A few seemed quite in earnest, with a wild fanatical expression in their countenances, while others were light and merry." Dr. McCaul, in his 'Sketches of Judaism and the Jews,' mentions some of the religious customs of the Chasidim. "Their chief means of edification," he says, "is the spending the Sabbath-day with the Tzadik. On Friday afternoon and evening, before the approach of the Jewish Sabbath, waggon-loads of Jews and Jewesses, with their children, pour in from all the neighbourhood from a distance of thirty, forty, or more miles. The rich bring presents and their own provisions, of which the poor are permitted to partake. The chief entertainment is on Saturday afternoon at the meal which the Jews call the third meal, during which the Tzadik says Torah, that is, he extemporises a sort of moral-mystical-cabbalistical discourse, which his followers receive as the dictates of immediate inspiration. For the benefit of those who are too far removed to come on the Saturday, the Tzadik makes journeys through his district, when he lodges with some rich member of the sect, and is treated with all the respect due to one who stands in immediate communication with the Deity. He then imposes penances on those whose consciences are burdened with guilt, and dispenses amulets and slips of parchment with cabbalistic sentences written on them to those who wish exemption from sickness and danger, or protection against the assaults of evil spirits." The sect of the Chasidim seems to have been an offshoot from the Sabbathaists, who also originated in Poland, and like the Chasidim, its doctrines are derived partly from the Talmud and partly from the Cabbala. They declare themselves, indeed, as originally Talmudist Jews, and their Liturgy is that of the Sephardim, while their hymns and poems are of Cabbalistic tendency. At last the entire discrepancy between the tenets of the Chasidim and the Talmud became evident, when in 1755, a certain Meschullam, a member of the sect, publicly burnt a copy of the Talmud in the midst of the Jewish quarter of a city in Podolia. The Talmudist rabbins in Poland, however, had before this time discovered that the Chasidim were opposed to their authority, and had excommunicated them as a heretical sect. See SABBATHAISTS.

CHASSAN, the reader or chanter in a modern Jewish synagogue.

CHASTE BRETHERN AND SISTERS, a name which the APOSTOLICI (which see) of the twelfth century assumed to themselves, in consequence of their preference of celibacy to marriage.

CHASTITY, a virtue worshipped among the ancient heathens, two temples being dedicated to the worship of this deity at Rome; the one entered only by ladies of patrician rank, and the other being designed for ladies of plebeian birth. In both temples no matron was permitted to offer sacrifice unless she had an unblemished character, and had been but once married; such matrons being honoured with the crown of chastity. This goddess is usually represented under the figure of a Roman matron wearing a veil, and in the modest attitude of putting it over her face.

CHAZINZARIANS, a sect which arose in Armenia in the seventh century, deriving their name from the Armenian word chazus, a cross, because they were accused of worshipping the cross. They held an annual feast in honour of the dog of their false prophet Sergius.

CHEIMAZOMENI (Gr. tossed as in a tempest), a name given sometimes by Greek writers to demoniacs or energumens, who were possessed with an evil spirit. The modern Greeks also have in their Euchologium a prayer for those that are tossed with unclean spirits. Some learned men, however, think that the Cheimazomeni were such penitents as, from the heinousness and aggravation of their crimes, were not only expelled out of the communion of the church, but cast out of the very atrium or court, and porch of the church, and put to do penance in the open air, where they stood exposed to the inclemency of the weather.

CHEIRODOTUS. See DALMATICA.

CHEIROMANCY (Gr. cheir, the hand, and man-teia, divination), foretelling future events in the history of an individual from the appearance of the hands.

CHEIRON, one of the centaurs of ancient fabulous mythology, to whom the Magnesians, until a very late period, offered sacrifices. He was alleged to have been killed by a poisoned arrow shot by Heracles, and afterwards placed by Zeus among the stars.

CHEIROSEMANTRA, the wooden board which is struck by a mallet among the Greeks to summon the people to church. This is the usual call to worship both among the orthodox and heretics in the East, in consequence of the prohibition of bells by the Turks, who imagine that their sound drives away good spirits.

CHEIROTHESIA (Gr. cheir, the hand, and tithe-mi, to put or place), a word used in the original Greek of the New Testament to indicate ordination, though it literally signifies IMPOSITION OF HANDS (which see). To the cheirothesia in the ordination of office-bearers, the Episcopalians attach a very great importance.

CHEIROTONIA (Gr. cheir, the hand, and teino, to stretch out), a word used in the original Greek of the New Testament to indicate the election of office-bearers in the Christian church. The act of election was performed either by casting lots or by giving votes, signified by elevating or stretching out the hands. To the latter mode of election, the word cheirotomia refers. It is sometimes translated "ordain" in the authorized version. Thus Acts xiv. 23, "And when they had ordained them elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed." Hence the two words cheirothesia and cheirotomia being both translated ordination, in one instance at least, the Congregationalists found an argument thereupon in favour of both election and ordination being vested in the Christian people. Presbyterians, on the other hand, allege that the two words are essentially distinct, and that the cheirotomia by the Christian people ought not to hinder the cheirothesia or laying on of hands by the Presbytery. See ORDINATION.

CHEL, one of the courts of the second temple of Jerusalem. The Hebrew expositors define it to be a space of ten cubits broad, encompassed with a wall, between the mountain of the house and the courts, so that it may justly enough be called the enclosure or outer verge of the courts. The ascent from the mountain of the house into the Chel was by twelve steps, or six cubits, every step being half a cubit in elevation; and the Chel being ten cubits broad, it was level with the wall of the court of the women. The wall by which the Chel was enclosed was not so high as the other walls about the temple, and there were many passages through this wall into the Chel, one before every gate that led into either of the courts; and on each side of the passage was a pillar on which was a notice written in Greek and Latin, warning strangers not to enter into that place, but to beware of treading upon holy ground. When the Jews were subject to the Syro-Grecian kings, this bar against strangers was scornfully broken through in thirteen places; but the Jews repaired the breaches, and ordered that thirteen prayers should be offered against the heathen kingdoms, if a stranger presumed to approach to any of the places where the breaches had been made.

CHEMARIM (Heb. the black ones), an order of priests of Baal, who probably derived their name from the black garments which they wore when sacrificing, or as others think, because they painted their faces black. The word only appears once in the English translation, viz. Zeph. i. 4, "I will also stretch out mine hand upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place, and the name of the Chemarims with the priests." Lowth considers the chemarim to have been an order of superstitious priests appointed to minister in the service of Baal, and who were his peculiar chaplains. In Hosea x. 5, the Hebrew word chemarim is used to denote the priests who officiated in the service of the golden calves set up by Jeroboam at Dan and Bethel. The Jews still use the word, and apply it in derision to Christian ministers, because they officiate in black robes.

CHEMOSH, an idol of the Moabites sometimes confounded with Baal-Peor or Balphegor. It is supposed to be derived from an Arabic word signifying swift, and hence Chemosh has been thought, like Baal, to be an emblem of the sun. According to Strabo and Ammianus Marcellinus, this god is considered as identical with Apollo, to whom they give the name of Chomeus, and who is also considered as representing the sun. It is very probable, therefore, that Chemosh was the great solar god of the Moabites. Solomon, as we are informed 1 Kings xi. 7, erected an altar to this deity on the Mount of Olives. No information is given in Scripture as to the precise form of the idol Chemosh, but if it resembled Baal, it must have been of the ox species, and the rites of worship of a riotous and immoral character. So much do the Moabites appear to have been identified with the worship of this national god, that they are described in Num. xxi. 29, as the sons and daughters of Chemosh. Jerome says, the image of Chemosh was placed in a temple upon Mount Nebo. Jurieu regards him as a representation of Noah, who is also identical with Comus, the god of feasts.

CHERA, a surname of HERA (which see).

CHEREM, the second degree of excommunication among the Jews, and commonly called the greater excommunication. The offence was published in the synagogue, and at the time of the publication of the curse, candles were lighted, but when it was ended they were extinguished to denote that the excommunicated person was deprived of the light of heaven. His goods were confiscated; his male children were not admitted to be circumcised; and if he died without repentance, by the sentence of the judge a stone was cast upon his coffin or bier, to show that he deserved to be stoned. He was not mourned for with any solemn lamentation, nor followed to the grave nor buried with common burial. The sentence of cherem was to be pronounced by ten persons, or in the presence at least of ten persons. But the excommunicated person might be absolved by three judges, or even by one, if he should happen to be a doctor of the law. The vow called cherem among the Hebrews, or the accursed thing, is nowhere enjoined by Moses, nor does he mention in what respects it was distinguished from other vows, but takes it for granted that this was well known. The species of cherem with which we are most familiar was the previous devoting to God of hostile cities against which the Israelites intended to proceed with the utmost severity. The intention of pronouncing the cherem was to excite the people to war. In such cases all the inhabitants were doomed to death, and it was not allowed to take any portion of plunder. The beasts were slain; all other things were ordered to be consumed with fire, and what could not be burned, as for example, gold, silver, and other metals, were deposited in the treasury of the sanctuary. When the city was destroyed, a curse was pronounced, as in the case of Jericho, upon any man who should attempt to rebuild it.

CHERUBIM, mysterious representations frequently mentioned in Sacred Scripture. Much discussion has taken place among the learned as to the real nature of these creatures, and a great variety of opinion still exists upon the subject. The very etymological meaning and derivation of the word Cherub is at this day a matter of doubtful disputation. The most prevalent opinion for a long period, and that which has been revived of late years by Mr. Elliott, in his Horæ Apocalyptice, regards them as simply angelic natures, but whether it is the name of a distinct class of celestial beings, or is intended to designate the same order as the Seraphim, cannot be with certainty determined. Michaelis held that they were a sort of thunder-horses of Jehovah, somewhat similar to the horses of Zeus in the ancient heathen mythology of the Greeks; while Herder, and several other German writers of more recent times, maintained them to have been merely fabulous monsters, like the dragons of ancient story, who were supposed to guard certain treasures. It was a kindred idea of Spencer in his erudite work, 'De Legibus Hebræorum,' that the cherubim were of Egyptian origin, and designed to be an imitation of the monster-shapes which so much abounded in the ancient religion of Egypt, and which were thence transferred to Assyria and Babylon. It is unfortunate, however, for this theory, that figures having the precise form of the Hebrew cherubim are not to be found in the representations on the Egyptian monuments, and so general is the occurrence of compound figures in the mythology of all the nations of antiquity, that there is no special reason for assigning their origin to Egypt exclusively, rather than to India, or Persia, or China. Other men of great erudition, among whom may be mentioned Philo, Grotius, and Bochart, followed in more recent times by Rosenmuller and De Wette, regard the cherubim as having been symbols of the Divine perfections, or representations of the attributes of the Godhead.

The cherubim in Eden, referred to in Gen. iii. 29, seem to have differed from those in the hidden sanctuary of the temple; the former, like the cherubim in Ezekiel and Revelation, having the appearance of life in the highest state of activity, and therefore well termed "the living ones," while the latter were fixed inanimate objects represented with wings overshadowing the mercy-seat. The place which the cherubim may have held in the primitive worship of Eden, is alleged by Dr. Fairbairn, in his instructive work on the Typology of Scripture, to have been as follows: "Their occupation of Eden must have afforded a perpetual sign and witness of the absolute holiness of God, and that as connected with the everlasting life, of which the tree in the midst of the garden was the appropriate food. This life had become for the present a lost privilege and inheritance to man, because sin had entered and defiled his nature; and other instruments must take his place to keep up the testimony of God, which he was no longer fitted to maintain.

"But while in this respect the cherubim in Eden served to keep up the remembrance of man's guilt, as opposed to the righteousness of God, the chief purpose of their appointment was evidently of a friendly nature—a sign and emblem of hope. They would not of themselves, perhaps, have been sufficient to awaken in the bosom of man the hope of immortality, yet, when that hope had been brought in by other means, as we have seen it was, they came to confirm and establish it. For why should the keeping of the tree of life have been committed to them? They were not its natural and proper guardians; neither was it planted to nourish the principle of an undying life in them; they were but temporary occupants of the region where it grew, and being ideal creatures, whatever they kept, must obviously have been kept for others, not for themselves. Their presence, therefore, around the tree of life, with visible manifestations of divine glory, bespoke a purpose of mercy toward the fallen. It told, that the ground lost by the cunning of the tempter, was not finally abandoned to his power and malice, but was yet to be re-occupied by the beings for whom it was originally prepared; and that in the meantime, and as a sure pledge of the coming restoration, Heaven kept possession of it by means specially appointed for the purpose. Eden thus had the appearance of an abode, though for the present lost, yet reserved in safe and faithful keeping for its proper owners, against the time when they should be provided with a righteousness qualifying them for a return to its pure and blessed privileges; and there was set before the family of man a standing pledge, that the now forfeited condition of immortality would be restored.

"It would not be difficult, we conceive, for the first race of worshippers, with the aptness they possessed for symbolical instruction, to go a step farther than this, and derive one lesson more from the appearance of the cherubim in Eden. While these could not fail to be regarded as witnesses for God's holiness, in opposition to man's sin, and signs of God's purpose to rescue from the power and malice of the tempter what had been lost; they would also very naturally suggest the thought, that the fulfilment of that purpose would even more than recover what was lost. These ideal creatures, which were placed for a season in paradise in man's room, united in their compound structure powers and faculties super-additional to those which were now possessed by man, or had ever been his—combining with man's intelligence, the capacity for productive labour and usefulness peculiar to the ox, the might and dominion of the lion, the winged speed and far-seeing penetration of the eagle. The garden of God, and the tree of life, as emblems of hope to the church, being now in the keeping of creatures possessed of such a singular combination of qualities, was surely fitted to awaken the conviction, that a higher place and destiny was to be won for man in the new creation; and that when the lost inheritance should be recovered, and the restitution of all things should take place, the nature of man should be endowed with other gifts and faculties for the service of God, than it originally possessed. Eden was not only maintained in its primeval honour after the fall, but it seemed rather to have gained by that unhappy event; higher beings kept possession of its treasures, brighter manifestations of divine glory hung around its approach; clearly indicating to the eye of faith, that the tempter should be more than foiled, and that what tended in the first instance to defeat the purpose, and deface the blessed workmanship of God, should be ultimately overruled in his providence, for ennobling and beautifying this territory of creation."

The cherubim in the most holy place of the Jewish tabernacle and temple, are thus described in the Mosaic Law, Exod. xxv. 18, 19. "And thou shalt make two cherubims of gold, of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy seat. And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof." Nothing more is known of these figures than that they were winged creatures. Grotius supposes them to have resembled a calf in figure, while Spencer and Bochart imagine them to have borne the image of an ox. Others again allege them to have been compound figures like those in Ezekiel and Revelation, having each of them the figure of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. The attitude, however, in which they are represented, as looking down upon the mercy-seat, is scarcely consistent with the idea of a four-faced creature. From the account given of the cherubim by Moses, we learn, that they were two in number, stationed one at each end of the mercy-seat or propitiatory which covered the ark. The Shechinah, or visible manifestation of the Divine glory, was revealed from between the cherubim, and on this account they are termed "cherubim of glory." Those in the tabernacle were of beaten gold, but those in the temple of Solomon, which were much larger, were composed of the wood of the olive-tree. The faces of these cherubim looked one to another, to signify, as the Jews allege, their mutual harmony and love, and both looked toward the cover of the ark, to show that they were keepers of the Law, which was deposited under the mercy-seat. Their wings were stretched on high, to indicate that they were ready to fly to execute the Divine commands. Their wings were expanded over the ark, so as to form a seat, which was called the throne of God.

One of the most difficult points in theological literature is to ascertain the symbolical meaning and design of the cherubim, whether as found in Eden, or as represented in the tabernacle and temple. Bähr, whom Dr. Fairbairn has chiefly followed in his discussion on this subject, declares the cherub to be "a creature, which, standing on the highest grade of created existence, and containing in itself the most perfect created life, is the best manifestation of God and the divine life. It is," he continues, "a representative of creation in its highest grade, an ideal creature. The vital powers communicated to the most elevated existences in the visible creation, are collected and individualized in it." Hengstenberg has attempted to establish a similarity between the Hebrew cherubim and the Egyptian sphinxes, alleging the only difference to be, that in the cherubim the divine properties were only indirectly symbolized, so far as they came into view in the works of creation, whilst in the sphinx they were directly symbolized. No small discussion has taken place on the point, whether the cherubim adumbrated a human or an angelic order of beings. Dr. Fairbairn, following in the steps of Bähr, says on this point: "Its essential character consists in its being a creature; it is the image of the creature in its highest stage, an ideal creature. The powers of life, which in the actual creation are distributed among the creatures of the first class, are collected and concentrated in it. All creation is a witness of the powers of life that are in God, and consequently the cherub, in which the highest powers of life appear as an individual property, by means of its four component parts, is a witness, in the highest sense, of the creative power which belongs to the invisible God—of the majesty, (or power to rule and judge,) the omnipresence and omniscience, and finally the absolute wisdom of God. As such a witness, it serves for the glorification and honour of God, nay, it is the personified living praise of God himself; and on this account the object of the ceaseless activity of the four living creatures in the Apocalypse is made to consist in the perpetual praise and adoration of God: 'They rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. And when those beasts (living creatures) give glory, and honour, and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever, the four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things and for thy pleasure they are, and were created.'"

Other writers, however, instead of regarding the cherubim as testifying to the attributes of God as displayed in creation, view them rather as symbolizing the Divine glory as displayed in redemption. Thus Mr. Holden remarks: "In attempting to explain the hieroglyphic meaning of the cherubim, it is easy for a luxuriant imagination to transgress the bounds of sobriety and reason; but some spiritual instruction they were doubtless meant to convey; and the proto-evangelical promise, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent, combined with the reflected light from subsequent revelations, points out the mystery of redemption as the leading object of the celestial vision. The free communication with the tree of life was forbidden to the fallen, rebellious creature, and the only access to it that now remained was through the mediatorial office of a Redeemer, who has remedied the evil originating from the fall. This was typically discovered in the glorious and cherubic appearance at the entrance of the garden of Eden, an appearance not intended to drive our first parents from the tree of life in terror, but to inspire them with hope, to demonstrate to them that the Divine mercy was still vouchsafed to man, though now fallen, and to be an emblematical representation of the covenant of grace."

Parkhurst and the Hutchinsonian school hold a kindred opinion, declaring the cherubim to be "emblematical of the ever-blessed Trinity in covenant to redeem man." Professor Bush again considers them as a symbol of holy men, and in his view the cherubic symbol in its ultimate scope, pointed forward to that condition of regenerate, redeemed, risen, and glorified men, when they shall have assumed an angelic nature. Following out this idea, he goes on to observe: "Were the cherubim men—men standing in covenant relation with God—men possessed of renewed spiritual life, and thus enjoying the divine favour—then may we not conclude, that this unique combination of forms represents some marked and definable attributes in the character of those whom the symbol adumbrates? What then are the distinguishing traits in the character of the people of God, which may be fitly represented by emblems so unique? How shall the hieroglyphic be read? The face of the ox reminds us of the qualities of the ox, and these, it is well known, are patient endurance, unwearied service, and meek submission to the yoke. What claims has he to the title of a man of God who is not distinguished by these ox-like attributes? The lion is the proper symbol of undaunted courage, glowing zeal, triumph over enemies, united with innate nobleness, and magnanimity of spirit. The man, as a symbol, we may well conceive as indicating intelligence, meditation, wisdom, sympathy, philanthropy, and every generous and tender emotion. And, finally, in the eagle we recognise the impersonation of an active, vigilant, fervent, soaring spirit, prompting the readiest and swiftest execution of the divine commands, and elevating the soul to the things that are above."

Dr. Candlish, in his Contributions towards an Exposition of the Book of Genesis, advances a somewhat similar view of the cherubim to that which has been advanced by Professor Bush, and which seems to be more ingenious than correct. His view is stated in these words: "They are not angelic, but human symbols, in some way associated with the church, especially viewed as redeemed, and significant of its glorious power and beauty, as presented before the throne of God and of the Lamb. The very same character may be ascribed to the living creatures of Ezekiel's visions, and to the cherubim, wherever they are mentioned in the Old Testament. They typify and shadow the complete church, gathered out of all times and nations, and from the four corners of the world, in attendance on her Lord and Saviour, in his redeeming glory. In the holy place of the tabernacle and the temple, the mercy-seat sprinkled with atoning blood—the cherubim bending over and looking upon it—the glory of the Lord, the bright Shechinah light, resting in the midst,—fitly express in symbol the redemption, the redeemed, and the Redeemer; believers, with steadfast eye fixed on the propitiation, whereby God is brought once more to dwell among them; Jehovah meeting, in infinite complacency with the church which blood has bought, and blood has cleansed. So also, when faith beholds God as the God of salvation, he appears in state with the same retinue Angels, indeed, are in waiting; but it is upon or over the cherubim that He rides forth. It is between the cherubim that He dwells. The church ever contemplates Him as her own, and sees Him rejoicing over her in love."

It is impossible to enumerate the great variety of opinions which have been entertained in reference to the symbolical meaning of the cherubim. Philo imagined that they were emblems of the two hemispheres, and Athanasius of the visible heavens. Both ancient and modern writers, indeed, have differed so widely in their views on this subject, that, after all that has been written upon it, even by men of the most extensive erudition, we must be contented to regard the matter as still involved in mystery and doubt.

CHERUBICAL HYMN, a sacred ode, held in high estimation in the ancient Christian church, and still embodied in the liturgy of the Church of England. Its original form was in these words, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts; heaven and earth are full of thy glory, who art blessed for ever. Amen." Ambrose of Milan refers to this hymn under the name of Trisagion, telling us, that in most of the Eastern and Western churches, when the eucharistic sacrifice had been offered, the priest and people sung it with one voice. Jerome also speaks of it as having been sung as a confession of the Holy Trinity. Towards the middle of the fifth century the form used by the church was in these words,

Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us;" the three expressions of adoration being intended to apply to the Three Persons of the Trinity. This form is sometimes ascribed to Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, and Theodosius the Younger; and it continued to be used until the time of Anastasius the emperor, who, or as some say, Peter Gnaphens, bishop of Antioch, caused the words to be added, "that was crucified for us;" the design of this addition being to introduce the heresy of the Theopaschites, who maintained that the Divine nature itself suffered upon the cross. To avoid this error, the hymn was afterwards amended in the time of the emperor Zeno, and made to read thus:—"Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Immortal, Christ our King, that wast crucified for us, have mercy upon us." These additions introduced great confusion into the Eastern churches, while the Western churches refused to receive them, and some of the European provinces that they might apply it, as of old, to the entire Trinity, expressly used the words, "Holy Trinity, have mercy on us." The cherubical hymn was regarded as forming a necessary part of all communion services. It occurs in the English Prayer Book, a little before the prayer of consecration in the Communion Office. Dr. Hook supposes it to be derived from the apostolic age, if not from the apostles themselves.

CHIBBUT HAKKEFER, the beating of the dead, which, the Jewish Rabbis allege, is performed in the grave by the angel Duma and his attendants, who hold in their hands three fiery rods, and judge at once the body and the soul. This is alleged to be the fourth of the seven judgments which are inflicted upon men after death, and which are said to be referred to in the threatening, Lev. xxvi. 28, "Then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins."

CHICOCKA, a deity among the natives of Loando in Western Africa, who is believed to be the guardian of their dead. His statue, composed of wood, is erected in the neighbourhood of their burying grounds, and he is believed to prevent the bodies from being clandestinely removed, or the dead from being insulted, or compelled to work, hunt, or fish.

CHILD-BIRTH. See BIRTH.

CHILIASTS. See MILLENARIANS.

CHIMÆRA, a monster in ancient Greek mythology, which breathed out fire, and was said to have been sprung from the gods. Her body exhibited in front the appearance of a lion, behind that of a dragon, and in the middle parts that of a goat. Hesiod represents her as having three heads, and Virgil places her at the entrance to the infernal regions. The fable of the Chimæra is probably founded on a volcano of that name, near Phaselis in Lycia.

CHIMERE, the upper robe worn by a bishop, to which the lawn sleeves are generally attached. When assembled in convocation, the bishops wear a scarlet chimere over the rochet, which was indeed the usual dress of bishops until the time of Elizabeth, when it was changed for black satin, as being more befitting the episcopal dignity and gravity.

CHIMHOAM, the guardian deity, among the Chinese, of their provinces, cities, and courts of judicature. There are temples erected to his honour throughout the whole empire. The mandarins, when they enter upon any important office, are obliged in the first place to do homage to the Chimhoam of the particular city or province which is committed to their care, and having taken a formal oath that they will faithfully discharge the trust reposed in them, they consult the guardian deity about the most effectual mode of executing the duties of their office. This act of homage must be repeated twice a-year.

CHINA (RELIGION OF). See BUDHISTS, CONFUCIANS, TAOISTS.

CHINA, a deity worshipped on the coast of Guinea, in Western Africa. An annual procession in honour of this god takes place about the latter end of November, when the rice is sown. The people having assembled at midnight, at the place where the idol is kept, they take it up with great humility and reverence, and walk in procession to the appointed station where sacrifice is to be offered. The chief priest marches at the head of the assembly, and before the idol, bearing in his hand a long pole with a banner of silk fastened to it. He carries also several human bones, and some rice. When the procession has reached the appointed place, a quantity of honey is burnt before the idol; after which each one presents his offering. The whole assembly then offer up earnest prayer for a prosperous harvest; at the close of which they carry back the idol in solemn silence to its ordinary place of residence. This deity is represented by a bullock's or a ram's head carved in wood; and sometimes it is formed of paste, composed of the flour of millet, kneaded with blood, and mixed with hair and feathers.

CHINES, idols formerly worshipped by the Chinese. They were constructed in the form of a pyramid, and curiously wrought. Some allege that they contained a kind of white ants, that lie hid in their small apartments. So much did the Pagan Chinese stand in awe of these idols, that they were accustomed when they purchased a slave, to carry him before one of the Chines, and after presenting an offering of rice, and other kinds of food, they prayed to the idol, that if the slave should run away, he might be destroyed by lions or tigers. This ceremony so alarmed the poor slaves, that they seldom ventured to abscond from their masters, even although subjected to the most cruel treatment. One of these pyramidal temples is said to exist outside the walls of Foncheou, the capital of the province of Fokien.

CHIPPUR (Heb. pardon), a name given by the Hebrews to the great day of atonement, because on that day the sins of the whole people were understood to be expiated or pardoned. See ATONEMENT (DAY OF).

CHISLEU, or KISLEV, the third month of the civil, and the ninth of the ecclesiastical year, according to the Jewish calendar. It contains thirty days, and corresponds to part of our November and December. It is during this month that the winter prayer for rain commences. Various Jewish festivals occur in the course of it. Thus, besides the feast of new moon, on the first day of the month, there is a feast on the third in memory of the idols which the Asmoneans cast out of the temple. On the seventh is held a fast which was instituted because Jehoiakim burned the prophecy of Jeremiah which Baruch had written. Dr. Prideaux places this fast on the twenty-ninth day of the month, but Calmet supposes it to have been on the sixth, and that on the following day a festival was celebrated in memory of the death of Herod the Great, the cruel murderer of the children of Bethlehem. On the twenty-fifth day of Chisleu commenced the feast of dedication, which was kept for eight days as a minor festival in commemoration of the dedication of the altar after the cleansing of the temple from the pollution of Antiochus by Judas Maccabeus.

CHITONE, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see).

CHITONIA, a festival celebrated in ancient times in honour of Artemis, under the surname of CHITONE (which see), and in an Attic town of the same name. The same festival was also celebrated among the Syracusans.

CHIUN, the name of an idol among the Canaanites and Moabites. It is referred to in only one passage of Sacred Scripture, viz. Amos v. 26, "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves." This passage is quoted by the martyr Stephen, with a somewhat different reading, evidently derived from the Septuagint, which makes no mention of Chiun, Acts vii. 43, "Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them; and I will carry you away beyond Babylon." Dr. Clarke supposes Chiun to be a literal corruption of Rephan, a change, however, which is not sanctioned by a single MS. or version of the Old Testament. It has been thought, with some degree of probability, that the translators of the Septuagint, writing in Egypt, had rendered the word Chiun by Rephan or Remphan, which in Coptic is used to denote the planet Saturn. Vossius supposes both Remphan and Chiun to signify the moon.

CHLOE, a surname of DEMETER (which see), as presiding over the green fields. Under this surname she was worshipped at Athens in a temple near the Acropolis.

CHLOIA, a festival celebrated at Athens in ancient times in honour of DEMETER CHLOE (see preceding article). It was held in spring when the blooming verdure began to appear, and amid much rejoicing a ram was sacrificed to the goddess.

CHLORIS, the spouse of Zephyrus, and the goddess of flowers among the ancient Greeks, identical with Flora among the Romans.

CHOIR, a name given to the BEMA (which see) of primitive Christian churches, from the singing or the service by the clergy. The Bema is now usually termed chancel, in speaking of parish churches, and choir when speaking of cathedrals or collegiate churches. Congregations usually assemble in the choirs of cathedrals, while the clergy occupy the stalls on each side.

The word choir is also used to signify a body of men set apart to perform all the services of the Church in England. The whole body corporate of a cathedral, form, properly speaking, the choir. But the term is more commonly restricted to denote the body of men and boys who perform the service to music. The choir is usually divided into two parts, stationed on each side of the chancel, in order to sing alternately the verses of the psalms and hymns, each side answering to the other.

CHOREPISCOPI, or CHOR-BISHOPS, a name given in ancient times to country bishops, the word being probably derived from chora, which in Greek signifies the country. The existence of these church officers must be traced back to a very remote period, as there can be little doubt that, in many districts, Christianity very early made progress in the open country; and wherever Christians were found in sufficient numbers to form separate ecclesiastical communities, they would naturally choose their own pastors or bishops, who were, of course, quite as independent as the presiding officers in the city churches. In the fourth century they seem to have begun to be spoken of by a distinct name, that of chor-bishops, as separate from and in conflict with the city bishops. The chor-bishop presided over the church of a principal village, and to him a certain number of village churches, which had their own pastors, were subject. It is not improbable that some of these clerical dignitaries had abused their authority, as we find, in the fourth century, synods decreeing that the chor-bishops should only have power to nominate and ordain ecclesiastics of the lower grade without consulting the city bishop. The council of Sardica and the council of Laodicea at length wholly forbade the appointment of chor-bishops, and the latter council ordained that, in place of the country-bishops, visitors should be appointed who should take the general oversight of the country churches. But at a later period chor-bishops were still to be found in the churches of Syria and in the West. No small discussion has taken place among ecclesiastical writers as to the precise nature of the authority possessed by the chor-bishops, some maintaining that they were simply presbyters dependent on the city bishops, others that they held an intermediate place between presbyters and bishops and others still, that they exer cised the full episcopal authority. The last opinion is most probably the correct one; and in the independent exercise of their office, they came into collision with the city bishops, who, of course, were not long in seeking and finding an excuse, for, in the first instance, curtailing, and afterwards altogether abolishing the office.

CHOREUTÆ, a heretical sect who maintained that the Christian Sabbath ought to be kept as a fast.

CHORISTERS, singers in a CHOIR (which see). Those attached to cathedrals in England are provided with education free of cost. They have annual stipends varying between £27 per annum at Durham, and £3 6s. 8d. in the least wealthy cathedrals, with other small allowances; and in many cases an apprentice fee on quitting the choir of £10, £20, or £30. In the case of the old cathedrals, the precentor, or one of the canons, was charged by the old statutes with the care of their education; but in the new cathedrals, the musical teaching of the choristers is assigned to the organist or one of the lay clerks, who are, in many cases, scholars of the Grammar School, while we do not find any provision for their superintendence by a canon, as in the case of the old cathedrals.

CHORKAM, the most exalted of celestial regions, according to the doctrines of HINDUISM (which see), and at which, if a soul of a higher caste arrives, it shall undergo no farther transmigrations.

CHoubRET, a festival among the Mohammedans in India, which begins with fear and sorrow, and ends with hope and joy. On this occasion they commemorate the examination of departed souls by good angels, who write down all the good actions which they have done in this life, while the evil angels record with equal minuteness all their bad deeds. (See DEAD, EXAMINATION OF). This record they believe is perused by God, and accordingly they are afraid, and utter a few prayers, examine themselves, and give alms. But flattering themselves that their accounts will be settled in their favour, and that their names will be written in the Book of Life, they conclude the solemnities of the choubret with illuminations, and bonfires, and rejoicings of various kinds.

CHOURIA VANKCHAM, the order of the sun, a name given to one of the two principal orders of the rajahs among the Hindus. They are regarded as the offspring of the sun, or, in other words, their souls are believed to have formerly dwelt in the very body of that luminary, or to have been, in the opinion of some of them, a luminous portion of it.

CHRISM, oil consecrated by the bishop, and used in the Romish and Greek churches in the administration of baptism, confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction. There are two kinds of chrim; the one a composition of oil and balsam, which is used in baptism, confirmation, and orders; the other is plain oil consecrated by the bishop, and used in anointing catechumens and in extreme unction. The use of chrim is referred to by very ancient Christian writers as having been used first in confirmation, and at a later period in baptism. The author of the Constitutions speaks of two kinds of oil. The one is called mystical oil, and the other mystical chrim, and he gives a distinct form of consecration for each of them. The one was applied before the party went into the water, and might be performed by a deacon, and the other after the party had come out of it again, and could only be performed by a bishop. According to Bishop Pearson, the use of chrim came into the church shortly after the time of the apostles. No mention of it is made, however, until the third century, when it is referred to by Origen and Tertullian, in speaking of confirmation. From a very remote period chrim has been used at baptism both by the Greek and Latin churches, with this difference however, that the Greeks anoint the body all over, the Latins only the top of the head. Confirmation is termed chrim by the Greek church, when they anoint the forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, signing them with the cross, the priest saying each time, "The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost." The preparing and sanctifying of the chrim in the Eastern church is an annual work, occupying several days, and the ceremony can only be performed during Passion week. The Nestorians condemn the use of chrim, and substitute in its place olive-oil alone, alleging that the latter is peculiarly suitable, not only because the olive is an emblem of peace, but also because, as the leaves of this tree do not wither and fall off, so those anointed with the holy olive-oil shall not wither in the day of judgment, nor fall away into hell. The following is the usual mode of preparing and consecrating chrim in the Greek church, "The ingredients are no less than twenty in number; and each of them has previously received a separate episcopal benediction. On the Monday they are sprinkled with holy water, and put into a large cauldron. The priests pour in wine and oil, in such quantity that the mixture may continue boiling for three days, and in such proportion that there may be always a certain fixed depth of the wine below the oil. During the entire process, deacons stand by stirring the mixture with long rods; while a number of priests are in attendance, who in succession keep up the reading of the Gospels, recommencing at Matthew should they reach the conclusion of John. On the Wednesday, the perfumed oils are added; and on the Thursday the bishop consecrates the whole with the sign of the cross; after which it is deposited in urns and distributed throughout the cities of the patriarchate. This ceremony can be performed only in one place for any one branch of the church. Thus, for the Russo-Greek church it always takes place in the Patriarchal Hall at Moscow. In describing this room and the curiosities which it contains, Dr Henderson says: 'The most remarkable object in this splendid exhibition of sacred utensils was a large flagon, made of mother-of-pearl, which still contains some of the oil brought from Constantinople on the introduction of Christianity into Russia in the tenth century. It is preserved with great care, so that when only a few drops are taken from it, as on the present occasion, their place is supplied by some of that which had been prepared at a former period, by which means its perpetual virtue is supposed to be secured."

The ceremony of preparing and consecrating chrism in the Romish church takes place with the utmost pomp on holy Thursday. On the morning of that day, three jars, full of the purest oil, are placed in the Sacarium, and there carefully kept; one for the oil of the sick; another for the oil of catechumens; and the third, a larger one, for the chrism; and this last must be covered with white cere-cloth, but the other two with cere-cloth of a different colour. At the office for the consecration of the chrism there ought to be present, besides the pontiff and his assistants, twelve priests, seven deacons, seven subdeacons, acolyths, and others, all in white vestments. A procession is formed, which marches to the altar, an incense-bearer first, and next to him two taper-bearers. On reaching the altar the mass is proceeded with. Then follows the making of the holy oils, commencing with the oil for the sick. This process being finished, the officiating priests and deacons go in procession to bring forth the chrismal oil, and the oil of catechumens. For the rest of the ceremony we avail ourselves of the description of Foye, in his 'Romish Rites, Offices, and Legends.'

"They return with the jars in the following order: first, an incense-fumer, fumigating; then a subdeacon, bearing the cross between two acolythes, carrying blazing tapers; next two chanters singing: O Redeemer, accept the song of those hymning thyself. After whom, are the subdeacons and deacons, two and two; then a deacon, carrying a vessel full of balsam; next, two deacons carrying the two jars, having clean napkins hanging down from their necks before their breasts, and holding the jars embraced with the left arm, and wrapped in the extremities of their napkins,—yet so as that they may be seen from the middle upward; the deacon, carrying the oil for the holy chrism, being on the right; next follow the twelve priests, two and two.

"Having arrived in this order within the presbytery, the Pontiff, taking off his mitre, rises: and, having the jar of chrismal oil before him on the table, and the balsam, first of all hallows the balsam, praying thus:

"O Lord, the progenitor of all creatures, who by thy servant Moses didst command the sanctifying of ointment, to be made of mixed aromatic herbs, we most humbly beseech thy mercy; that, by a large bestowment of spiritual grace, thou infuse the plenitude of thy sanctification into this ointment, the produce of the rooted trunk. Be it spiced unto us, O Lord, with the joyousness of faith; be it a perpetual chrism of priestly unguent; be it most meet for the imprinting of the heavenly banner; that whosoever, being born again of holy baptism, shall be anointed with this liquor, may obtain the most plenary benediction of their bodies and souls, and be aggrandized for ever by the conferred reward or beatified faith.

"Then taking his mitre, and yet standing, he blends, on the paten, the balsam with a small portion of the chrismal oil, taken out of the jar, saying:

"Let us pray our Lord God Almighty, who by a wonderful economy hath inseparably united to true manhood the incomprehensible Godhead of his only-begotten and co-eternal Son, and by the co-operating grace of the Holy Ghost, anointed him above his fellows with the oil of gladness; that man, composed of a two-fold and singular substance, though destroyed by the fraud of the devil, might be restored to the everlasting inheritance from which he had fallen: to this end, that he hal+low, with the perfection of the Holy Trinity, these created liquors or diverse species of creatures, and by hallowing, sanctify them, and grant, that blended together, they become one; and that whosoever shall be outwardly anointed of the same, be so inwardly anointed, as to be freed from all soil of corporal matter, and joyfully made partaker of the heavenly kingdom.

"This ended, the Pontiff sits, retaining his mitre, and breathes fully three times in the form of a cross over the mouth of the chrismal jar, still wrapt in the napkin. Next, the twelve vested priests come up in order, making a reverence to the sacrament on the altar, and to the Pontiff; and standing before the table, one by one, they successively breathe, in the same way as the Pontiff had done, over the mouth of the jar, in the form of a cross. Then, making a reverence again as before, they return to their places—Which being done, the Pontiff rises, and standing in mitre, reads the chrismal exorcism, saying:

"I exorcise thee, thou creature of oil, by God the Father Almighty, who made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is; that all the might of the adversary, all the host of the devil, and all the incursion, and all the spectral power of Satan be rooted out, and put to flight from thee; so that thou be to all that shall be anointed of thee, for the adoption of sons by the Holy Ghost. In the name of God the Father Almighty, and of Jesus + Christ his Son our Lord, who with him liveth and reigneth (as) God, in the unity of the same Holy + Ghost.

"Then putting off his mitre, and holding his hands stretched out before his breast, he says the Preface. The second, or petitionary part, is as follows:

"Therefore, we beseech thee, O holy Lord, &c that thou vouchsafe to sanctify with thy benediction the fatness of this creature, and blend therewith the might of the Holy + Ghost, the power of Christ thy Son co-operating, from whose holy name it has received the name chrism . . . that thou establish this creature of chrism for a sacrament of perfect salvation and life to those that are to be renewed by the baptism of spiritual laver; that the corruption of their first birth being absorbed by the infusion of this hallowed unction, the holy temple of every one of them be redolent with the odour of the acceptable life of innocence; that, according to the sacrament of thy appointing, being indued with Royal and Priestly, and Prophetic dignity, they be clothed in the robe of an undefiled gift; that it (the chrism) be to those that shall be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, the chrism of salvation, and make them partakers of eternal life, and crowned with heavenly glory.

"This preface ended, the Pontiff puts back into the chrisal jar the mixture of balsam and oil, blending it with the same, and saying:

"Be this mixture of liquors atonement to all that shall be anointed of the same, and the safeguard of salvation for ever and ever. R. Amen.

"Then the deacon having taken away from the jar the napkin and silk-cover, the Pontiff taking off his mitre, and bowing his head, salutes the chrism, saying: HAIL, HOLY CHRISM.

"This he does a second, and a third time, raising his voice each time higher and higher: after which he kisses the lip of the jar. Which being done, each one of the twelve priests advances successively to the table, and having made a reverence to the sacrament that is on the altar, and to the Pontiff sitting in mire, kneels before the jar three times, each time at a different distance, saying at each kneeling, in a higher and higher tone, Hail, holy Chrism. And then reverently kisses the lip of the jar."

If any of the old chrism remains when the new is made, it is put into the church lamps to be burned before the sacrament; and whatever remains in the pyxes or capsules is consumed in fire with its silk, and then the pyxes are replenished with the new chrism.

CHRISMA (Gr. unction), a name sometimes given in the ancient Christian church to the ordinance of baptism, as denoting the unction or anointing of the Holy Spirit. Gregory Nazianzen makes reference to this title.

CHRISOME, a white garment, which in ancient times was used in the office of baptism, the priest putting it upon the child while he uttered these words, "Take this white vesture for a token of innocence."

CHRIST (Gr. christos, anointed), one of the names or titles applied in Sacred Scripture to the Son of God, the second Person of the blessed Trinity, as the Anointed One, consecrated by Jehovah to be the Saviour of His people. The term is equivalent in meaning to the MESSIAH (which see) of the Old Testament, and has an obvious reference to the holy anointing under the Law, by which certain persons were consecrated or set apart to particular offices. (See ANOINTING.) Jesus is said, Ps. xlv. 7, to have been "anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows," an expression which implies that he was anointed above those who possessed a fellowship with him in the exercise of similar offices, as types of himself. Thus Aaron was anointed high priest, Saul was anointed king; Elisha was anointed prophet; Melchisedec, king and priest; Moses, priest and prophet; David, king and prophet. Yet none was ever anointed to the exercise of all these together, in one comprehensive union, except the Christ of God. In him alone were combined the offices of a prophet, a priest, and a king, in their highest and holiest exercise, and to these he was anointed with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. At his baptism the Spirit descended upon him like a dove, and in one of the Jewish synagogues we find that he declared, applying the language of Isaiah to himself, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised." He became Jesus as the Saviour for the sake of his people, and as the Saviour he was anointed, or became Christ, that he might accomplish their salvation. The copious anointing with the Holy Ghost became apparent in every word that he spoke, and in every action that he did. Whatever was consecrated with oil under the Jewish economy was regarded as holy, and being thus consecrated to God, whatever touched it was also holy. And so it is with the Christ, the Holy One of God. He is not only holy in himself, but he communicates of his Holy Spirit to all his people. He is their glorious and exalted Head, and the anointing wherewith he is anointed, flows down to the very humblest and meanest of his members. The Apostle Paul speaks of believers as the anointed of God, and in this respect Christ and his people are one. They have an unction from the Holy One, and they know all things. (See next article.)

CHRISTIANS, a name given to the followers of Christ, as being, like himself, anointed ones. They were first called by this name at Antioch in A. D. 44. It has been often supposed that to the designation of Christians an allusion is made in Is. lxxv. 15, where it is declared, that they shall "leave their name," that of Jews, "for a curse unto my chosen: for the Lord God shall slay thee, and call his servants by another name." The corresponding name of Anointed, however, was early applied to God's believing people. Thus Psalm cv. 15, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." They were Christians, or anointed, through faith in their Saviour, by the unction of the Holy One. The name of Christians is applied to all who profess their belief in Christ, and subjection to his authority. But the Christian in reality is alone anointed with the Holy Ghost, who sets the soul apart for the service of God, brings the soul by faith into the presence of God, enjoins him to walk continually as in that presence, admits him to communion and love with the Father and Son, enables him to live under a habitual feeling of the gracious privileges conferred upon him, renews the mind after the image of Christ, causes it to rejoice in the holy and righteous will of Jehovah, and inspires a gracious longing and waiting for the purity as well as peace of the kingdom of glory.

The name Christian appears to have been unknown except by remote allusion before its introduction at Antioch. The various names by which the followers of Christ were distinguished previous to that time are thus referred to by Mr. Hall of Leicester. "Among themselves the most usual denomination was, Brethren. Acts xxviii. 13, 14, 'And we came the next day to Puteoli, where we found brethren.' 'If any man,' saith St. Paul, 'that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, with such an one no not to eat.' They were styled 'believers.' Acts v. 14, 'And believers were the more added to the Lord, both of men and women.' They were denominated 'disciples.' Acts xxi. 16, 'There went with us also certain of the disciples of Cæsarea, and brought with them Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge.' Their enemies, by way of contempt, styled them Nazarenes: thus, Tertullus accuses Paul of being 'a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes.' Of similar import to this was the appellation of Galileans, and the terms heresy, or sect, meaning by that a body of men who had embraced a religion of their own, in opposition to that established by the law. And this appellation of Galileans was continued to be employed by the enemies of Christ as a term of reproach as late as the time of Julian, who reigned about the middle of the fourth century, and used it incessantly in his invectives against Christians. The followers of Christ were also styled 'men of this way:—'And I persecuted this way unto the death.'"

The question has been raised, Whether the appellation Christian was of human or of divine origin. The Scriptures are silent on the point, so that it is impossible to speak with certainty on the subject. Benson, Doddridge, and others, incline to the opinion that it was assumed by a divine direction. Mr. Hall follows in the same track, arguing the matter thus: "It is not at all probable an appellation so inoffensive, and even so honourable, originated with their enemies; they would have invented one that was more opprobrious. But supposing it to have been assumed first by the disciples themselves, we can scarcely suppose they would have ventured to take a step so important as that of assuming an appellation by which the church was to be distinguished in all ages, without divine direction; especially at a time when the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were so common, and in a church where prophets abounded. For 'there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul.' Is it to be supposed that they would assume a new appellation without recourse to the prophets for that direction; or that, supposing it to have had no other than a human origin, it would have been so soon and so unanimously adopted by every part of the Christian church? This opinion receives some countenance from the word here used, 'and the disciples were called (chrematisai) Christians first in Antioch,' a term which is not in any other instance applied to the giving a name by human authority. In its genuine import, it bears some relation to an oracle. Names, as they are calculated to give just or false representations of the nature of things, are of considerable importance; so that the affixing one to discriminate the followers of Christ, in every period of time, seems to have been not unworthy of divine interposition." Neander, however, accounts for its application to believers in a very different way. "As the term Christ," he says, "was held to be a proper name, the adherents of the new religious teacher were distinguished by a word formed from it, as the adherents of any school of philosophy were wont to be named after its founder." Once introduced, the term Christian soon came into general use. When Peter wrote his first epistle, it seems to have been a familiar name; for he thus speaks, 1 Pet. iv. 16, "Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf;" and James refers to it as a highly honourable appellation, Jam. ii. 7, "Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?" In the times of persecution it was accounted enough to put the question, Art thou a Christian? and if it was answered in the affirmative, the severest tortures were considered to be justly inflicted, while the martyr gloried even at the stake in the confession, "I am a Christian."

Christians form the society of the faithful, or the subjects of that spiritual kingdom which God hath established in the earth, under the administration of his Son Jesus Christ. All who belong to this spiritual community, commonly known by the name of the church, are agreed in maintaining the fundamental doctrines of the Bible. "The essential element, however, of true and saving faith," as Dr. Welsh well observes, "may appear in a great diversity of forms, and be mixed up in various combinations with other conditions of the religious character. The perception of what is of vital moment, may be connected with apprehensions more or less clear and consistent of other truths. A prominence may be given to one class of subordinate truths to the comparative neglect of others. In some instances, the truths of revelation may find their way at once to the belief and practice, with little or no acquaintance on the part of those who receive them with the philosophy of the evidence by which they are supported, and with scarcely any attempt to trace their mutual connections, or their relations to the truths of other systems. In other instances, where they may operate with equal power, their character and the theory of their energy may be made the subject of speculative consideration. And not being delivered in the Scriptures in a systematic manner, and the language in which they are conveyed often admitting of different interpretations, they may be moulded into various scientific forms. They may be progressively developed in the advancement of true science, or they may be distorted by partial exhibition, or they may be vitiated by an admixture of the errors of a false philosophy. Accordingly, the views of Divine truth vary from age to age, whether considered in the faith of individuals, in the symbols of churches, or in the systems of philosophical theologians. Alterations are sometimes made in the creeds and confessions of churches. And even in cases where profession of adherence continues to be made to the same ecclesiastical standards, there are often fluctuations in the living mind of the spiritual community. New principles of exegesis,—the attempt to accommodate the ecclesiastical system to the newly discovered truths of philosophy,—the experience of influential individuals bringing into greater prominence views that had not been recognised as essential,—the progress of error demanding a dogmatical declaration of what had previously been left undefined,—these, and other causes, lead continually to alterations or modifications of the internal character of the church."

The diversities to which Dr. Welsh here refers, though all of them quite consistent with a firm adherence to the fundamental principles of the gospel, have given rise to numerous sects and communities which form branches of the catholic Christian Church. The divisions which thus prevail in the great Christian community have sometimes been adduced as an argument against the truth of that system of Christianity which they all of them profess to believe. This objection has been current among the opponents of Divine truth, both in ancient and in modern times. It is sufficient, however, to reply, that in the great fundamental doctrines of the religion of the Bible, all sects professing Christianity are found to be generally agreed. The differences which exist are chiefly on minor and unimportant points; and these differences are not more than the well-known differences in the mental constitutions of individuals warrant us to expect. Perfect uniformity in doctrine and practice would have been inconsistent with that free agency which belongs to every member of the human family. The very diversity of sentiment, therefore, which is found among professing and even real Christians, is an argument for, and not against, the Divine origin of our holy faith.

CHRISTEMPORIA (Gr. selling of Christ), a name sometimes given in the ancient Christian church to SIMONY (which see).

CHRISTEN, a word often used as denoting "to baptize," from the belief which prevails in the Romish church, and even among many Protestants, that every baptized person is thereby constituted a member of Christ.

CHRISTENDOM, a general term used to denote all those parts of the world which profess Christianity. It is calculated that the entire population of the earth amounts to 800,000,000 souls, of which the inhabitants of Christendom are not supposed to exceed one-fourth or 200,000,000. This includes Roman Catholics, Protestants, the Greek and Eastern churches.

CHRISTI, an appellation given by St. Ambrose to believers in Christ, founded on Ps. cv. 15, "Touch not mine anointed," or my Christs, as it is rendered according to the Vulgate.

CHRISTIANS (BIBLE). See BIBLE CHRISTIANS.

CHRISTIANS, or CHRISTIAN CONNEXION, a denomination of Christians in the United States of North America. It originated about the commencement of the present century, by a simultaneous movement in different parts of the country. The leading idea was to acknowledge no earthly leader, such as Luther, or Calvin, or Wesley, to shake off all human creeds and prescribed forms of worship, to take the Bible as their only guide, leaving every individual to be his own expositor of the Sacred Word, and without bowing to the decisions of synods or churches, to judge for himself on his own responsibility. Following out this principle, they held diversity of sentiment to be no bar to church fellowship. The sect first attracted attention in New England, where it was composed chiefly of individuals who had separated from the CALVINISTIC BAPTISTS. (See BAPTISTS, AMERICAN.) Soon after the first formation of the denomination, they were joined by several large churches belonging to the Calvinistic Baptists, who seceded from the Baptist body, and united with them. The Freewill Baptists showed themselves somewhat favourable to the new sect for a time, but afterwards renounced all fellowship with them. In the Southern States, again, the first associations of Christians consisted chiefly of seceders from the Methodists, and in the Western States from the Presbyterians. With such a mixed body of members, their cardinal principle was universal toleration. At their first outset as a separate sect, they were almost unanimously Trinitarian in sentiment; but after a time they ceased to hold the doctrine of the Trinity, and professed to deny the divinity of Christ. The principles upon which their churches were at first constituted are thus stated by the Rev. Joshua V. Himes, a minister of the connexion: "The Scriptures," he says, "are taken to be the only rule of faith and practice, each individual being at liberty to determine for himself, in relation to these matters, what they enjoin. No member is subject to the loss of church fellowship on account of his sincere and conscientious belief, so long as he manifestly lives a pious and devout life. No member is subject to discipline and church censure but for disorderly and immoral conduct. The name Christian is to be adopted to the exclusion of all sectarian names, as the most appropriate designation of the body and its members. The only condition or test of admission as a member of a church is a personal profession of the Christian religion, accompanied with satisfactory evidence of sincerity and piety, and a determination to live according to the Divine rule, or the gospel of Christ. Each church is considered an independent body possessing exclusive authority to regulate and govern its own affairs."

From the latter part of this extract it appears that the Christian Connexion adopt the Congregationalist mode of church government; and in accordance with the usual arrangements of that body, they have also associations which they term conferences. Ministers and churches represented by delegates formed themselves in each state into one or more conferences, called State Conferences, and delegates from the conferences formed the United States' General Christian Conference, which, however, only existed for a short time, when it was given up. The State Conferences, though useful in the way of consultation and advice, are understood to have no authoritative control over individual churches. The body boasts of having no founder, and having sprung up as by magic about 1803, in three different localities at once, New England, Ohio, and Kentucky, in opposition to the bondage of creeds and sectarian distinctions. It has now diffused itself over almost every one of the states, and extended into Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. They have a book association in full operation for the publication and sale of books and periodicals designed to promulgate the peculiar opinions of the sect, thereby increasing its numbers, and in every way promoting its interests.

CHRISTIANS. According to the Report of the last census of Great Britain in 1851, no fewer than ninety-six congregations in England and Wales returned themselves under this general appellation, unwilling probably to identify themselves with any sectarian designation. One congregation takes the name of Orthodox Christians; one of New Christians; one of Primitive Christians; two of New Testament Christians; one of Original Christians; and one of United Christians.

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. Eight congregations appear in the returns of the last census of Great Britain under this designation, acknowledging simply an adherence to the great principles of Christianity.

CHRISTIANITY, the religion promulgated by Christ, and professed by Christians. It is embodied both in its principles and precepts in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which all denominations of Christians believe to be a Divine revelation, and the only rule of faith and obedience. It is no doubt true, that there is a natural as well as a revealed religion, and both of them beautifully correspond to each other. There is nothing indeed more obvious and striking to a reflective mind than the adaptation of our moral constitution to that extensive system of moral truth which is contained in the Bible. Whether we reflect upon those primary religious principles which are inherent in the breast of every man, or those principles which, though essential to our nature, are never fully developed until their counterpart is made known to us by revelation, we are struck with amazement at the strangeness of the position which we occupy, as at once the inherent possessors of important, though somewhat mysterious truths, and the expectants of still clearer, and, to us at least, more deeply interesting discoveries. In the one case we may be viewed as already possessed of an important class of religious sentiments to which the name of natural religion has usually been given; while in the other, we must be considered as prepared, by our knowledge of these elementary truths, for the reception of still higher and more enlarged information. Hence it is, that we are wont to argue for the necessity of a Divine revelation from the demand which is made on the part of our moral nature for the filling up of a system of knowledge which has been already imparted to us in dark and indefinite outline. The information, in regard to spiritual and divine objects, which we have received from nature, is necessarily scanty and imperfect, and yet it is enough to convince us that, in our destitute and helpless condition, it is far from being unworthy of the kind and merciful Father, "in whom we live, and move, and have our being," to make known to us such a revelation as would satisfy the cravings of our moral constitution, and relieve us from a state of darkness and doubt.

A revelation, then, is necessary to man, and not unworthy of God, and, accordingly, it has been bestowed. The revelation thus imparted is Christianity. The question, however, may be, as indeed it has often been, put, How shall it be known whether this alleged revelation be of human or of Divine origin? The reply to this question, fraught with importance to every human being, involves the extensive subject of the evidences of Christianity, both external and internal. The peculiar aspect and bearing of the argument in behalf of Christianity must obviously depend, in no slight degree, on the creed of the individuals for whom it is intended. Some writers, accordingly, have judged it proper to commence by establishing the principles of pure Theism; but the greater number of objectors to the truth of Christianity, far from being Atheistical in their sentiments, admit, not merely the existence of God, but all the other principles of natural religion, and may thus be considered as in a condition not unfavourable for entering with candour into the examination of the Christian evidences. Approaching the subject, then, in such a spirit, we remark, that the first point involved in the EXTERNAL or HISTORICAL evidence in favour of Christianity, concerns the authenticity of the New Testament, or the question, whether the books which it contains were written by the persons whose names they bear.

Now, in determining the authenticity of the New Testament, precisely the same method of proof may be adopted as in the case of any other literary production of a past age. "We know," says Augustine, "the writings of the apostles as we know the works of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Varro, and others, and as we know the writings of divers ecclesiastical authors; forasmuch as they have the testimony of contemporaries, and of those who have lived in succeeding ages." An unbroken chain of testimony of unquestionable veracity may be traced upwards to the very age of the apostles, which goes to establish beyond a doubt that the writers of the New Testament were the very persons to whom the composition of its several parts is ascribed. Besides, contemporary writers can be adduced, Heathen and Jewish, as well as Christian, who bear unanimous testimony to the same fact. The language of the writings is characteristic of the age, nation, and circumstances of their authors; and the style and genius of the productions harmonize with the peculiarities of mind and disposition which belonged to their respective writers. An additional confirmation of the argument may be derived from the admitted fact, that amid all the bitter opposition to which the apostles were exposed, and notwithstanding the numerous and keen controversies of their age, nowhere in the writings of even their most virulent enemies, whether Heathen or Jewish, is to be found even the remotest insinuation that the New Testament did not contain the genuine productions of the men to whom they are attributed.

Intimately connected with the question as to the authenticity of the New Testament, is that of its integrity, or whether it may not have undergone some material alteration since the period at which it was written. On the impossibility of any such alteration having taken place, Bishop McIlvaine makes the following judicious observations. "The Scriptures, as soon as written, were published. Christians eagerly sought for them; copies were multiplied; carried into distant countries; esteemed a sacred treasure, for which disciples were willing to die. They were daily read in families, and expounded in churches; writers quoted them; enemies attacked them; heretics endeavoured to elude their decisions; and the orthodox were vigilant, lest the former, in their efforts to escape the interpretation, should change the text. In a short time, copies were scattered over the whole inhabited portion of the earth. Versions were made into different languages. Harmonies, and collations, and commentaries, and catalogues, were carefully made and published. Thus universal notoriety, among friends and enemies, was given to every book. How, in such circumstances, could material alterations be made without exposure? If made in one copy, they must have been made universally; or else some unaltered copies would have descended to us, or would have been taken notice of and quoted in ecclesiastical history, and the writings of ancient times. If made universally, the work must have been done either by friends, or by heretics, or by open enemies. Is it supposable that open enemies, unnoticed by Christians, could have altered all or a hundredth part of the copies, when they were so continually read, and so affectionately protected? Could the sects of heretics have done such a work, when they were ever watching one another, as jealously as all their doings were continually watched by the churches? Could true Christians have accomplished such a task, even if any motive could have led them to desire it, while heretics on the one hand, and innumerable enemies on the other, were always awake and watchful, with the Scriptures in their hands, to lay hold of the least pretext against the defenders of the faith? It was at least as unlikely that material alterations in the New Testament should pass unnoticed and become universal, in the early centuries and in all succeeding ones, as that an important change in a copy of the constitution of the United States should creep into all the copies scattered over the country, and be handed down as part of the original document, unnoticed by the various parties and jealousies by which that instrument is so closely watched, and so constantly referred to. Such was the precise assertion of a writer of the fourth century, on this very subject. 'The integrity,' says Augustine, 'of the books of any one bishop, however eminent, cannot be so completely kept as that of the canonical Scripture, translated into so many languages, and kept by the people of every age; and yet some there have been, who have forged writings with the names of apostles. In vain, indeed, since Scripture has been so esteemed, so celebrated, so known.' Reasoning with a heretic, he says: 'If any one should charge you with having interpolated some texts alleged by you, would you not immediately answer that it is impossible for you to do such a thing in books read by all Christians? And that if any such attempt had been made by you, it would have been presently discerned and defeated by comparing the ancient copies? Well, then, for the same reason that the Scriptures cannot be corrupted by you, neither could they be corrupted by any other people.'

Not less important than the authenticity and integrity is the credibility of the New Testament, for it is quite possible that a book may be quite authentic and yet not credible; or in other words, that it may have been written by the author whose name it bears, and yet its statements may not be worthy of confidence. "Suppose, then, for a moment," says the author we have just quoted, "that they were not honest in their statements—that they knew they were endeavouring to pass off a downright imposition upon the world. We will not speak of their intellect in such a case, but of their motive. Now, it would be difficult to suppose that any man could devote himself to the diligent promotion of such an imposture without some very particular motive. Much more that, without such motive, the eight various writers concerned in the New Testament should have united in the plan. What motive could they have had? If impostors, they were bad men; their motive, therefore, must have been bad. It must have been to advance themselves, either in wealth, honour, or power. Take either, or all of these objects, and here, then, is the case you have. Four historians, with four other writers of the New Testament—all, but one of them, poor unlearned men—undertake to persuade the world that certain great events took place before the eyes of thousands in Judea and Galilee, which none in those regions ever saw or heard of, and they know perfectly well did never occur. They see beforehand that the attempt to make Jews and Heathens believe these things will occasion to themselves all manner of disgrace and persecution. Nevertheless, so fond are they of their contrivance, that though it is bitterly opposed by all the habits, prejudices, dispositions, and philosophy—all the powers and institutions of all people—they submit cheerfully to misery and contempt—they take joyfully the spoiling of their goods—they willingly endure to be counted as fools and the obscuring of all things—yea, they march thankfully to death, out of a mere desire to propagate a story which they all know is a downright fabrication. At every step of their progress they see and feel, that instead of any worldly advantage, they are daily loading themselves with ruin. At any moment they can turn about and renounce their effort, and retrieve their losses; and yet, with perfect unanimity, these eight, with thousands of others equally aware of the deception, persist most resolutely in their career of ignominy and suffering. Not the slightest confession, even under torture and the strong allurements of reward, escapes the lips of any. Not the least hesitation is shown when to each is offered the choice of recantation or death. He that can believe such a case of fraud and folly as this, can believe any thing. He believes a miracle infinitely more difficult of credit than any in the gospel history. I charge him with the most superstitious and besotted credulity. In getting to such a belief, he has to trample over all the laws of nature and of reasoning. Then on what an unassailable rock does the honesty of the writers of the New Testament stand, if it can be attacked only at such sacrifices. How evident it is, not only that they could have had no motive to deceive, but that, in all their self-devotion and sacrifices, they gave the strongest possible evidence of having published what they solemnly believed was true."

If then the authenticity and credibility of the New Testament be satisfactorily established, the authenticity and credibility of the Old Testament writings may be considered as resting on nearly the same foundation. The Christian and Jewish Scriptures are indeed intimately and essentially connected with each other. The former proceeds upon, and uniformly takes for granted, the truth and divine authority of the writings of Moses; frequent quotations and references are made, in the writings of the apostles, to the law and the prophets as divinely inspired; the arguments in behalf of the New are completely parallel to those in favour of the Old Testament; the objections made by infidels and cavillers to the one, are just in substance the objections made to the other; and thus the two portions of the Bible stand upon the same footing both as to their authenticity and credibility.

Such are the evidences in support of Christianity as a simple statement of facts; it is necessary, however, in order to vindicate the Christian faith, that a conspicuous place be assigned in the argument to the more powerful and direct evidences of miracles and prophecy. "In what way," asks Paley, "can a revelation be made but by miracles?" "In none," he answers, "which we can possibly conceive." But it is important to remark, that the proof derived from miracles goes to establish, in the first instance, not the truth of any statements whatever, but simply the Divine authority of Him by whom the miracles are wrought; and from this an almost immediate transition may be made to the truth of Christianity itself. Had no miracles been performed by our blessed Lord, we would have had no proper evidence that he came from God, nor could the Christian scheme have asserted any valid claim to a Divine origin. To the gospel of Christ, however, no such objection can be offered. Miracles are alleged to have been wrought; water was changed into wine; the blind received their sight, the dumb spoke, the deaf heard, the lame walked, and the dead were restored to life. And the principle on which Christ performed those miracles is obvious from his own declaration, "The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me." The distinction is palpable even to the most uncultivated mind, between events which are truly miraculous, and even the most surprising of the ordinary phenomena of nature, or the most wonderful discoveries of science; and hence the peculiar value of miracles as evidences and proofs of a system which addresses itself to the illiterate as well as to the learned.

Another and powerful class of evidences in favour of Christianity is usually drawn from prophecy. The evidence of prophecy and that of miracles are to some extent identical, the one being a miracle of knowledge, while the other is a miracle of power.

The mode of investigation, however, is somewhat different. In examining the alleged prophecies, it is necessary previously to inquire, whether the writings in which they are contained were really penned before the events which constitute the fulfilment of the prophecies took place. This, to be sure, is no very difficult matter in the case of the Old Testament, as the Hebrew Scriptures were notoriously written long before the advent of our Lord. Another preliminary step also is necessary in our inquiries into the evidence drawn from fulfilled prophecy, viz., whether the event be in its nature such as to require for its prediction more than human prescience. Of this point we have satisfactory evidence in the peculiar nature of Christ's character and offices, as far transcending all that could enter into the conception of men. Some analogy, it may be said, is discoverable here between prophecy and miracles. The one demands a previous inquiry, whether the prediction can be considered as amounting to a miracle of knowledge; and surely the other demands a scrutiny as strict to ascertain whether the facts narrated amount, supposing them true, to a miracle of power.

It has sometimes been alleged by writers on the Christian evidences, that the argument drawn from fulfilled prophecy possesses a peculiar advantage over that drawn from miracles, inasmuch as the former is gathering strength as time advances, while the latter is becoming gradually weaker the further we recede from the period when the miracles were actually performed. Thus Dr. Inglis, in his 'Vindication of the Christian Faith,' remarks, "The infidel who pleads, in justification of his unbelief, that he would have believed in Christ if he had seen the miracles which are ascribed to him, can offer no corresponding vindication of himself for resisting that evidence which results from the fulfilment of prophecy, in the appearance and work of Christ upon earth. For, even at the present day, we have very nearly, if not altogether, the same advantage that was enjoyed by any who have gone before us, for deliberately judging and ascertaining whether those events, which the prophets foretold, could be foreseen or anticipated by human sagacity, and whether the things foretold have been in their time and order fulfilled." To the observation here made we decidedly object, it being impossible for us to concede for a moment that the evidence of miracles can ever lose ought of its force, even by the lapse of ages. Had the proof been drawn from mere human tradition, this might, and in all probability, would have been the case; but when we reflect that the miraculous facts were recorded by eye-witnesses, soon after the period of their performance, who thus exposed themselves to contradiction from their countrymen, if it had been possible to contradict them; when we consider, besides, that the credibility of these writers, and the genuineness and authenticity of their writings, is as capable of proof at this day as it was at least in the third century, we cannot but regard this species of evidence as remaining, and ceteris paribus, destined to remain essentially the same in point of validity, now that we have got beyond the sphere of the immediate friends and companions of the apostles, and their immediate descendants. While we readily admit that the evidence of miracles cannot possibly receive additional force, we do not see, on the other hand, how it can be in the slightest degree deteriorated simply by the flight of time. Ages may elapse, but the proof of the reality and truth of our Lord's miracles must, we conceive, remain undiminished in its power as long as the volume of inspiration shall continue to unfold its pages to the sinful and suffering children of men.

While, however, the argument drawn from miracles cannot possibly lose a single iota of its power as time flows onward, it is readily admitted that neither does it gather the slightest addition to its force. The utmost that can be said is, that it remains stationary. But it is undoubtedly otherwise with the argument from prophecy, which receives with the progress of advancing time a continually growing force. As the history of the world gradually develops itself, one prediction after another comes to be fulfilled, and with this additional advantage, that evidence of this kind presents itself before our eyes. "The sublime appeal of men," as has been eloquently remarked, "professing to be commissioned of God, to the events of thousands of years thereafter, as witnesses of their truth; the moral grandeur of that appeal which—after having deposited in the hands of nations a prediction of minute transactions which the innumerable contingencies of a long retinue of centuries are to bring out—stakes its whole cause upon a perfect fulfilment, thus resting itself singly upon the omniscience and omnipotence of God, and separating to an infinite distance all possibility of human support; this is a dignity to which nothing but the inspiration of the Scriptures can pretend—a noble daring on which nothing else was ever known to venture." Nor does this evidence limit itself to one period of the world's history. It commences at the remotest period of the past, and stretches onward through a course of more than four thousand years, only ending its predictions with the very close and consummation of all things. It is unnecessary to enter into minute details in order to point out the fulfilment of the long series of Bible prophecies, opening at the fall of man in Eden, and closing with his final recovery in the heavenly Paradise. Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, Edom, and Judea, all attest as with one voice the truth of ancient prophecy. But the clearest and the most important of Scripture predictions are those which refer to the character, condition, and work of the promised Messiah, and those which relate to the subsequent fortunes of the Christian church, and of the Jewish nation. On the last mentioned subject, the conversion and ultimate restoration of the Jewish people to their national glory, Dr. McIlvaine offers the following powerful observations: "There is nothing in the history of nations so unaccountable, on human principles, as the destruction and the preservation of the Jews. 'Scattered among all nations'—where are they not? Citizens of the world, and yet citizens of no country in the world—in what habitable part of the world is not the Jew familiarly known? He has wandered every where, and is still every where a wanderer. One characteristic of this wonderful race is written over all their history, from their dispersion to the present time. Among the nations, they have found no ease, nor rest to the soles of their feet. Banished from city to city, and from country to country; always insecure in their dwelling-places, and liable to be suddenly driven away, whenever the bigotry, or avarice, or cruelty of rulers demanded a sacrifice—a late decree of the Russian empire has proclaimed to the world that their banishments have not yet ceased. Never certain of permission to remain, it is the notorious peculiarity of this people, as a body, that they live in habitual readiness to remove. In this condition of universal affliction, how singular it is that among all people the Jew is 'an astonishment, a proverb, a by-word.' Such is not the case with any other people. Among Christians, Heathens, and Mohammedans, from England to China, and thence to America, the cunning, the avarice, the riches of the Jew are proverbial. And how wonderful have been their plagues! The heart sickens at the history of their persecutions, and massacres, and imprisonments, and slavery. All nations have united to oppress them. All means have been employed to exterminate them. Robbed of property; bereaved of children; buried in the dungeons of the inquisition, or burned at the stake of deplorable bigotry—no people ever suffered the hundredth part of their calamities, and still they live! It was prophesied that, as a nation, they should be restored; consequently, they were not only to be kept alive, but unmingled with the nations, every where a distinct race, and capable of being selected and gathered out of all the world, when the time for their restoration should arrive. The fulfilment of this forms the most astonishing part of the whole prophecy. For nearly eighteen hundred years, they have been scattered and mixed up among all people; they have had no temple, no sacrifice, no prince, no genealogies, no certain dwelling-places. Forbidden to be governed by their own laws, to choose their own magistrates, to maintain any common policy—every ordinary bond of national union and preservation has been wanting; whatever influences of local attachment, or of language, or manners, or government, have been found necessary to the preservation of other nations, have been denied to them; all the influences of internal depression and outward violence which have ever destroyed and blotted out the nations of the earth, have been at work with unprecedented strength, for nearly eighteen centuries, upon the nation of Israel; and still the Jews are a people

—a distinct people—a numerous people—unassimilated with any nation, though mixed up with all nations. Their peculiarities are undiminished. Their national identity is unbroken. Though scattered upon all winds, they are perfectly capable of being again gathered into one mass. Though divided into the smallest particles by numerous solvents, they have resisted all affinities, and may be traced, unchanged, in the most confused mixtures of human beings. The laws of nature have been suspended in their case. It is not merely that a stream has held on its way through the waters of a lake, without losing the colour and characteristic marks of its own current; but that a mighty river, having plunged from a mountain height into the depth of the ocean, and been separated into its component drops, and thus scattered to the ends of the world, and blown about by all winds, during almost eighteen centuries, is still capable of being disunited from the waters of the ocean; its minutest drops, having never been assimilated to any other, are still distinct, unchanged, and ready to be gathered, waiting the Voice that shall call again the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah. Meanwhile, where are the nations among whom the Jews were scattered? Has not the Lord, according to his word, made a full end of them? While Israel has stood unconsumed in the fiery furnace, where are the nations that kindled its flames? Where the Assyrians and the Chaldeans? Their name is almost forgotten. Their existence is known only to history. Where is the empire of the Egyptians? The Macedonians destroyed it, and a descendant of its ancient race cannot be distinguished among the strangers that have ever since possessed its territory. Where are they of Macedon? The Roman sword subdued their kingdom, and their posterity are mingled inseparably among the confused population of Greece and Turkey. Where is the nation of ancient Rome, the last conquerors of the Jews, and the proud destroyers of Jerusalem? The Goths rolled their flood over its pride. Another nation inhabits the ancient city. Even the language of her former people is dead. The Goths!—where are they? The Jews!—where are they not? They witnessed the glory of Egypt and of Babylon, and of Nineveh; they were in mature age at the birth of Macedon and of Rome; mighty kingdoms have risen and perished since they began to be scattered and enslaved; and now they traverse the ruins of all, the same people as when they left Judea, preserving in themselves a monument of the days of Moses and the Pharaohs, as unchanged as the pyramids of Memphis, which they are reputed to have built. You may call upon the ends of the earth, and will call in vain for one living representative of those powerful nations of antiquity, by whom the people of Israel were successively oppressed; but should the Voice which is hereafter to gather that people out of all lands be now heard from Mount Zion, calling for the children of Abra nain, no less than four millions would instantly answer to the name, each bearing in himself unquestionable proofs of that noble lineage." ●

In addition to the leading arguments in favour of Christianity drawn from miracles and prophecy, that which is deduced from the rapid propagation of the Christian religion in the early ages, in spite of the numberless obstacles which it was destined to encounter, may be considered as one of the most powerful secondary proofs. That the extent of its diffusion in the days of the apostles was remarkable, no reflecting man can possibly doubt. Paul, for example, declares that from Jerusalem, round about unto Illyricum, he himself had not failed to declare the unsearchable riches of Christ. At Jerusalem and Antioch, at Ephesus, Athens, Corinth, Thessalonica, and even in imperial Rome, the mistress of the world, churches had been planted, and the truths of Christianity were openly promulgated. Thus extensively diffused throughout almost every part of the Roman empire, the same apostle felt himself warranted in addressing his Colossian brethren, to speak of the truth of the gospel, "which," says he, "is come unto you as it is in all the world;" and again in the course of the same chapter he admonishes them "not to be moved away from the hope of the gospel, which," he adds, "was preached to every creature under heaven." But the remarkable success of the first promulgators of Christianity rests not simply on their own statements, but is fully attested by contemporary writers. Had it been possible to account for the fact by a reference to mere secondary causes, the acuteness and genius of Gibbon would surely have been able to accomplish the task. It is unnecessary to say, however, that even he has failed, and all that cold sneering infidelity could effect has utterly failed. The circumstances of the case are sufficient to show that on any other supposition than that of its truth, the success of the gospel is wholly unaccountable. In what was probably the most illustrious period of Roman literature, some individuals of high reputation for learning and character adopted the tenets of Christianity, and openly professed their belief in them—and that too without the slightest hope of deriving any worldly advantage—nay, even under the certain impression that they would thereby expose themselves to the ridicule, persecution, and reproach of their fellow-countrymen. And if such was the conduct of enlightened men in regard to what was strictly a question of facts, on which every individual around them was capable of deciding, and therefore might have disproved them if it had been possible to do so, to what other conclusion can we possibly come than that the gospel is true? By the pure force of truth alone it overcame the deadliest opposition, and in full confirmation of the proverbial adage that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," it flourished amid persecution, and trampling down every obstacle, it made its way to the gates of the palace, and even mounted the imperial throne of the mighty Cæsars. To what other than to a divine power is the success of Christian truth in the first ages of its propagation to be attributed? It is this, and this alone, which could sustain the Christian convert in the view of those trials and persecutions to which for the truth's sake he was doomed, and which could enable him amid them all to bear up with a heroic firmness and fortitude which no terrors could shake and no opposition appal. It is this, and this alone, which could urge forward the Christian cause in a career of unexampled rapidity, which even the malignity that would willingly frustrate was forced to promote, and before which the towering imaginations of even the proudest hearts were effectually subdued.

As naturally flowing out of the argument to which we have now adverted, another striking proof of the truth of Christianity may be found in its holy and purifying influence on the minds of those, whether individuals or communities, who sincerely embrace it. Without this, indeed, the unbeliever would have just reason to complain of the practical inutility of the system, the truth of which we had been labouring to demonstrate. Of the effect of Christianity, however, upon the minds and hearts of all who truly believe it, the Christian advocate may well boast. It enlarges the mind, refines the taste, and purifies the heart. No man can be sincerely a Christian without being in every sense the better for it. Select an individual from the humblest walks of life, whose soul has undergone a spiritual and saving change. See how his furrowed and care-worn countenance is lighted up with the smile of a holy and placid contentment. He enjoys a peace that passeth all understanding, and a hope that is full of immortality; and though doomed daily to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, his soul is often cheered amid his hours of toil by the hopes and consolations of the gospel. A purer, a loftier, a more powerful principle of holy living has begun to animate his whole mind and heart than has hitherto stirred within his bosom. Impelled by this holy, this ennobling principle, he engages in his daily avocations with a mind elevated to the contemplation of objects the purest and the most sublime, with a heart no longer debased by earthly and grovelling desires, and with his whole soul devoted to the service and the glory of his redeeming God. The hallowing influence of Christianity bears with equal efficacy upon the hours of his active engagements, and upon the calmer and more retired seasons of private meditation and prayer. He seeks first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and he engages also with the utmost activity in the duties of his station, in obedience to the command of God, and in compliance with his providential arrangements. The beneficial influence of Christianity is not merely discernible in the life and conversation of an individual believer, but in the improved moral standing of nations who have simply professed to embrace it. Their laws, their institutions, their manners, have alike experienced the ameliorating effects of the gospel of Christ; and though the process of reformation in these respects may have been tardy, it has nevertheless become so obvious and well-marked, as to render it an argument of considerable weight in favour of the truth and divine authority of the Christian system.

HAVING thus briefly sketched the EXTERNAL or HISTORICAL EVIDENCES of Christianity, it is necessary, in order to complete the vindication of the religion of the Bible, that a short view be presented of the INTERNAL EVIDENCES, which are founded on a survey of Christianity itself, as it is set forth in the revealed Word. Is there anything in the very doctrines of our Christian faith which claim for them a supernatural origin? Do they commend themselves to our reason, our heart, our conscience, as irrefragably true, and not only as truths, but such truths as are completely suited to our condition, both as creatures and sinful creatures? Should these questions be clearly shown to admit of only one answer, and that an affirmative one, then does the conclusion necessarily follow, that the Christian revelation is not unworthy of God, but, on the contrary, that there is in its very doctrines strong presumptive evidence of its Divine origin. Take, for example, the view which Christianity gives of the Divine nature and character. It tells us that "God is a Spirit," and thus sweeps away the complicated and elaborate theories of ancient and modern materialists. On this point the Bible is throughout plain and explicit. It announces from first to last, One Living, Personal God, the Maker and moral Governor of the universe. How dark, vague, and unsatisfactory the views on this subject of the most distinguished heathen writers of antiquity! All the philosophers, except those who discarded altogether the idea of a deity from their creed, agreed in admitting a plurality of gods. Even Socrates and Plato, though on various occasions they speak of one supreme and omniscient Being, too often evince by other remarks of a very different tone, that their belief in the unity of God was not the result of permanent and satisfied conviction. Nor were the writings of the ancients less erroneous on the subject of the Divine attributes. Not only were their deities uncertain and variable in their individual character, but divided into factions at once opposed to each other, and to the welfare of mankind. Every nation had both its patrons and its foes in the synod of Olympus, and its prosperity or decline was less to be attributed to its own virtues or vices than to the favour of the gods on the one hand, or their enmity on the other. These deities, besides, were not more human in their discord than in their wants, their desires, and their enjoyments. Even the Zeus of the Greeks, and the Jupiter of the Latins, exalted though he was in the ranks of the celestial hierarchy, is often set forth as a being possessing many of the imperfections and weaknesses of frail erring man; nay, he is sometimes held forth as degraded in vice below the most depraved of mortals. How different is the God of the Christian system! He is not only the greatest and most exalted being in the universe, but characterized by absolute, essential holiness, and unsullied purity. Seated on the throne of the universe, He rules his creatures with impartial sway, yet looking down with complacent satisfaction upon all that seek to love him and obey his commands. His unsearchable greatness and ineffable majesty are beautifully blended with compassion for the weakness of his erring creatures. He is slow to anger, plenteous in mercy; holy, and yet full of love; a just God, and yet a Saviour; just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly who believe in Jesus. What more sublime than the brief but emphatic declarations of Scripture, "God is light," "God is love!"

It is no doubtful proof besides of the Divine origin of Christianity, that it gives a satisfactory explanation of the difficulties which surround the present state of things. Wherever we cast our eyes, we behold numberless proofs of wisdom and goodness, but at the same time there are apparent discrepancies and anomalies which frequently puzzle and perplex the thoughtful mind. Both the works of creation, and the arrangements of providence, present us with a state of things which it is difficult to reconcile with perfect order and unmixed benevolence. Christianity, however, fully and satisfactorily accounts for the introduction and continued existence of both physical and moral evil in the world. God is shown to be just and true in all his ways, as well as holy in all his works. In the moral government of our race, his justice is exercised as well as his goodness, the guilty being punished, while the righteous are rewarded. Thus it appears plain why man, the creature of God, is treated as an alien and an enemy. He has sinned, and therefore justice and righteousness alike require that he should endure the punishment consequent upon sin. Hence it is that man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward. Sin and suffering are in the lot of the human being intimately and inseparably connected, and death being the wages of sin, it hath passed upon all men because all have sinned. Thus it is that by the introduction of this one element,—the justice of the Divine Being,—Christianity unlocks the mystery of the present aspect of matters both in the natural and moral world.

Another question which Christianity completely solves, and thus shows itself to be Divine, is the momentous inquiry, How a sinful man can obtain pardon, justification, and acceptance before God. A deep-felt consciousness of guilt is an inherent principle in the heart of every man, and hence even from the earliest times it has been an object of eager anxiety to find some mode of propitiating the Divine favour. The solemn inquiry has been proposed by multitudes in their inmost souls: "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" These questions Christianity most satisfactorily answers. It points to a sacrifice of infinite value, which has been offered as an atonement for the sins of men. "Behold the Lamb of God," it says, "which taketh away the sins of the world." By this one sacrifice the demands of the law and justice of God are fully satisfied, and God is seen to be at once a just God and yet a Saviour.

And how can Christianity be other than divine, seeing that through it life and immortality have been brought so clearly to light! Men in all ages indeed, and by the unaided operations of their own reason, have formed to themselves faint, shadowy, impalpable conceptions of a world beyond the grave. But nowhere, unless in the Bible, is the doctrine of immortality set forth as a subject of well-grounded practical belief. There it is exhibited in connection with the grand peculiarities of the Christian system, the doctrines of atonement and justification. It is set forth so closely connected with these peculiar and essential articles of the Christian system, that it cannot be separated from them. The heaven of the Bible, unlike the Elysium of the ancient Heathens, or the paradise of Mohammed, is a place of happiness consisting of purely spiritual enjoyments, and designed only for the morally good. If such be the future state described in the Scriptures,—not reserved, as among the Greeks and Romans, for poets, statesmen, and philosophers, whose only qualifications were of an intellectual kind, but belonging simply to the pure in heart and holy in life,—we cannot rid ourselves of the conviction that the sacred writers have supplied no ordinary evidence of their inspiration, in the very place which they assign to a future state in the view of Christianity which they unfold. Among the heathen authors of antiquity, their place of punishment was peopled by persons who had been guilty of flagrant violations of the admitted laws of morality; but the abodes of happiness were assigned without the slightest regard to moral character. It is the peculiar merit, however, of the Christian scheme, that while it plainly declares that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord," it also reveals an effectual method by which sinful man may recover the heaven he has lost, and at the same time acquire a meetness for its pure and blessed mansions. The doctrine of immortality is thus made to occupy a conspicuous place in the religious system, and also to subserve in the highest degree the interests of Christian morality and piety; perfect consistency and harmony is preserved in the whole scheme, and Christianity shows itself to be divine

But in discussing the Internal Evidences of the Christian system, while various points have thus been usually adduced which cannot fail to recommend the system to the reflecting mind, as of supernatural origin, it is on the peculiar doctrines of Christianity that we would be disposed chiefly to rest the argument for its divinity. By pursuing a different method of reasoning, no little injury has frequently been done to the cause of true religion. Under the delusive idea, that by depriving Christianity of all that was peculiar, and by endeavouring to reduce it to a level with natural religion, they were thereby serving the cause of truth, some well-meaning but injudicious defenders of the religion of the Bible have unwittingly furnished the infidel with powerful weapons wherewith to assail the Christian system. The result, accordingly, has been such as might have been anticipated. Bolingbroke, Tindal, Collins, and many others of the same school, have directed their utmost efforts to show that nothing is revealed to us in the Bible which was not previously revealed to us in the religion of nature, or if there be any mysteries of which mankind were before ignorant, they are merely resolvable into the figurative phraseology in which the authors wrote, or into subsequent corruption and interpolations of the record itself. Thus it is that, under the guise of affected friendship, the deadliest blows have been aimed at all that is vital in the Christianity of the Bible; and that too, arising from no other cause than the injudicious conduct of its real friends. It is not in Germany alone that this spirit of rationalism has been diffusing its withering influence; in Britain also has such a spirit been gradually gaining ground. The consistency of revelation with reason, is, no doubt, when properly conducted, a powerful and effective branch of the Internal Evidences, but it ought never to be forgotten, that there is a point in the argument beyond which we dare not go, a point where reason ends, and implicit faith in revelation must begin. The human mind is not capable of discovering by its own unassisted efforts all that the Bible unfolds to us, otherwise what necessity for the Bible at all? If, then, there be truths peculiar to the Christian system, there is no necessity for the slightest anxiety on the part of the defenders of Christianity to reconcile any apparent inconsistency between these peculiar Christian truths and the principles of reason. A strong presumptive argument, it is true, may be founded on the fact which in most instances can be shown by analogy, that what is peculiar to Christianity is not contrary to reason. Such an argument, however, can never amount to more than a presumption in its favour; and though it may be powerful enough to silence the cavils of objectors, it adds little to the direct force of the Christian evidence. The essential and primary elements of all religious truth may be learned by the pure efforts of reason unaided by revelation, and all revealed religion in fact proceeds on the existence of that class of truths which is included under the term Natural Religion. But to assert this is just tantamount to the assertion that the Scriptures are accommodated to the nature of the beings to whom they are addressed. This is not all, however, that may be said in reference to their value. They state, no doubt, what is addressed to our reason, and what proceeds on the supposition that there are some truths which unassisted reason has discovered, but they do more, for they state, and in this their peculiar excellence consists, many truths which the reason of man hath not discovered, and by its most strenuous and sustained exertions never could discover. And the danger is, that in deference to a certain class of sceptics and unbelievers, these peculiarities of the Christian system should either be entirely overlooked, or attempted to be so modified as to suit the caprice of those who, while they profess an adherence to the doctrines of revelation, are all the while still more devoted admirers of human reason. All systems of religion, even the most degrading, are founded to some extent on natural religion, or, in other words, on those religious sentiments and feelings which are inherent in the constitution of every mind. But from these Christianity stands separate and apart; and the exhibition of its peculiarities, as contradistinguished from every other system of religious doctrine, forms a most important branch of the Christian evidences.

The peculiar doctrines of Christianity, those which mark it out as separate and distinct from all the other systems of religion, that either are, or have been prevalent in the world, may be resolved into three: The doctrine of atonement by the blood of Christ; that of justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ; and that of sanctification by the indwelling operation of the Holy Spirit. These form the grand distinguishing characteristics of the gospel system, and the revelation of these doctrines, which could never have been discovered by mere human reason, imparts to Christianity a valid title, to be regarded as supernatural in its character, and evidently sprung from God.

Man, as a moral being, must be viewed in a twofold aspect—as subject to the Divine law, and as having transgressed that law. In the one view he is a responsible agent, and in the other he is a rebel against the government of God, and therefore, liable to the punishment due to sin. He has sinned, and therefore he must die, for it is an established principle of the Divine government, that “the soul that sinneth, it shall die.” How then can sinful man escape the righteous indignation of an offended God? Not surely by a departure on the part of Jehovah from the strict demands of justice, and by the proclamation of an arbitrary act of indiscriminate pardon. Such a mode of acting would be plainly inconsistent with the spotless perfection of the nature of God, and with the maintenance of his authority as the Moral Governor of the universe. But it may be asked, Might not the repentance of the sinner be regarded as an adequate satisfaction to the justice of God? No such plea, we reply, is for a moment admitted even in an earthly court of law; what reason then have we for indulging the expectation that in the far higher and holier jurisprudence of heaven, repentance can be viewed as an expiation for sin? Christianity, however, provides a full and complete atonement in the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who “suffered the just for,” or in the room of, “the unjust, that he might bring us unto God,”—words which plainly set before us the idea of substitution. He who was the Holy and the Just One, suffered in the place of us who were unjust or unrighteous. “He was wounded for our transgressions,” says the prophet Isaiah, “he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed.” “He bore our sins in his own body on the tree.” “The Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all.” The sufferings of Christ then were strictly penal, that is, they bore the character of a punishment, not, however, for his own sins, he being absolutely sinless, but for the sins of others.

Christ the propitiation for sin is a peculiarity in the Christian system, which of itself is sufficient to stamp it as of heavenly origin. True, infidels have sometimes quarrelled with the doctrine of substitution, it being inconsistent, as they imagine, with absolute justice, that the innocent should suffer for the guilty. To compel the innocent, we admit, to suffer against their will, in place of the guilty, would be both cruel and unjust. Christ, however, voluntarily and readily undertook his people's cause. “He offered himself up a sacrifice for sin.” And besides, there was a grand peculiarity in the case of our gracious substitute, which marked him out as separate from, and infinitely superior to, all other substitutes, inasmuch as no one can be permitted by an earthly ruler to suffer in room of another, for the plain and obvious reason, that the generous substitute has no right voluntarily to give away his own life, neither has the magistrate any right to accept it. Far different, however, was the case with our great Redeemer. He could declare with truth his absolute and inalienable right over his own life. “No man taketh my life from me; I lay it down of myself, and I take it up again.” It is plain then that no obstacle to the legal substitution of Christ existed, in so far as the sufferer was concerned. He suffered willingly, and he had a right to lay down his own life if he chose. But the question may still be asked, How could the crimes of any one be charged upon another? To this question the reply is simple. It is never asserted that Christ actually, and in person became a sinner, but the doctrine of Scripture is, that he was made sin, or judicially, and in law, treated as a sinner. He was the representative, the substitute of sinners; and does not even human law recognise the principle of substitution? Does not the law account an individual free from the consequences of a debt if it has been already paid by his surety? And yet, though the same principle meets us in many different forms; though we often see in the ordinary course of events, children suffering for the sins of their parents, wives for the crimes of their husbands, and friends for the vices of their friends, it is strange that Christianity should be taunted with injustice in representing the righteous Governor of the universe as passing by the guilty, and making the innocent Jesus suffer in their room. This objection obviously proceeds upon a very erroneous view of the true design of punishment. In a well-regulated state, punishment is not inflicted with the view of wreaking vengeance upon the criminal, but solely and exclusively for fulfilling the ends of good government; and if in any case it were consistent with the maintenance of the authority of law and the well-being of the commonwealth that mercy should be exercised, its exercise in such a case would not be considered as inconsistent with the demands of justice. If the principles thus laid down be correct, it follows that full satisfaction having been made to the Divine law and justice by the voluntary sufferings of Christ in the room of his people, and the rectitude of the Divine government having been fully maintained in the transaction, mercy and truth may meet together, and righteousness and peace embrace each other, while God is seen to be just, even when he justifies the ungodly who believe in Jesus. Admitting then that neither the law nor the justice of God was compromised by the substitution of Christ in room of guilty man, the question still offers itself, Did the sufferings of Christ completely fulfil the purpose required? Had he been a mere man, no sufferings, however painful or protracted, which he could have endured, would have been available as an atonement for others, just because, as it is impossible for a creature to do more than his duty to his Creator, it is impossible for a sinful creature to suffer more than his iniquities deserve. All is due even to the utmost extent of his powers, whether of doing or suffering, and, therefore, both reason and Scripture agree in declaring, that "no man can redeem his brother, or give to God a ransom for him." But it was a peculiar excellence of our Substitute, that he was not simply man, but God as well as man, Emanuel, God with us, or in our nature. His humanity suffered, and his divinity lent infinite value and efficacy to his sufferings. "He gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet-smelling savour." Justice was satisfied, mercy triumphed, sinful man was pardoned.

The substitution of Christ, however, in his people's room, is a strong evidence of the divine origin of Christianity, not only because He has thereby procured pardon for all who believe on him, but also because He has thereby procured for them a valid title to the possession of heaven. The sufferings of Christ, as we have already seen, were an adequate atonement for sin, and thus obtained the deliverance of the sinner from punishment. Christ suffered the penalty due to sin, and on that account the sinner is pardoned, but he is not entitled to a single benefit beyond the privilege of pardon. The culprit is dismissed from the bar, but that is the full amount of his privilege. As far as we have yet viewed the matter, we have seen the sinner by his surety satisfying the penal, but we have not yet seen him satisfying the preceptive part of the law. The alternative in earthly courts is simply punishment, or acquittal from punishment, but the alternative in the court of heaven is punishment, or reward. It was necessary, therefore, that Christ, in order to complete his work as Mediator, should not only atone for sin, but that he should so perfectly obey the Divine law which we had broken, as to earn for us, and in our name, a title to that reward which we had forfeited. That perfect obedience, accordingly, he yielded, an obedience both active and passive, that is, he both performed the duties which the law required, and he suffered the punishment which the broken law demanded. The sufferings of Christ, then, may be viewed in a twofold aspect, as propitiatory, and as meritorious; propitiatory, inasmuch as they averted from us the threatened punishment, and meritorious, inasmuch as they procured for us the forfeited reward. Man, by his disobedience to the Divine law, at one and the same time forfeited the reward of everlasting happiness, and incurred the punishment of everlasting woe. When Christ, therefore, stood in our room, it behoved him both to discharge us from the penalty, and to earn for us the reward. The former he accomplished by his propitiatory sufferings and death; the latter he accomplished by his meritorious sufferings, even unto death. He became the willing servant of the Father, and he was made under the law, that he might redeem us who were under the law. As God, he was above all law, being the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge, but he condescended to yield obedience to the law, which he himself had given, and by his active as well as suffering obedience, he obtained eternal glory for himself, and eternal blessedness for all his people. He hath taken possession of heaven in their name; he hath entered it as their forerunner, and "he will come again to receive them to himself, that where he is they may be also."

The obedience to the law which Christ wrought out for his people, is imputed to them or put down to their account, as a justifying righteousness, in virtue of which they have a valid claim to the possession of the heavenly inheritance. This is the spotless robe, clothed in which believers stand accepted in the Beloved. They receive it in the exercise of a lively faith, and thus to them Christ becomes the end of the law for righteousness, and they are "found in him, not having their own righteousness, which is of the law, but the righteousness which is of God by faith." This is the "righteousness which, without the law, is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets." This is "the righteousness of God, which is by faith in Jesus Christ, unto all, and upon all, them that believe;" and upon the footing of this righteousness alone can guilty man expect to find acceptance in the sight of a holy God. By the revelation of such a righteousness, Christianity shows itself in the clearest and the most convincing manner to be of supernatural and heavenly origin.

But while ample provision has thus been made in the Christian scheme for our deliverance from hell, and our admission to heaven, the argument in favour of the Divine origin of our religion acquires additional strength from the fact, that provision has also been made for our preparation for heaven. If by the righteousness of Christ his people are justified, it is no less a scriptural truth, that, by the Spirit of Christ, his people are sanctified. In virtue of his perfect obedience, Jesus, on his ascension to the Father, obtained gifts for men, the greatest of which, and that which includes all the others, was the gift of the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to commence, to carry forward, and to perfect the work of sanctification in the soul of the believer. The gift of the Spirit was consequent upon the work of Christ, and it was not before the ascension and glorification of the Lord Jesus that the Spirit was fully given. But no sooner had Jesus gone to the Father than the Spirit came with Pentecostal power, and three thousand souls were converted in a day. There is no doubt a fullness of holiness in Jesus to purify the most polluted sinner. But though the fountain of holiness be full, not one drop can flow into the believer's soul, unless by the effectual operation of Jehovah's grace. He must "work in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." The initial step of the work of sanctification is the arousing of the sinner to a consciousness of his true condition in the sight of God. The eyes of his understanding are opened to see his sinful state, and with anxious heart he exclaims, What shall I do to be saved? The Spirit now takes of the things that are Christ's, and shows them to the convinced sinner, making known to him the soul-refreshing truth, that Christ is a Saviour. The first step, or that of conviction, is accomplished by the instrumentality of the law, and the second step, or that of conversion, by the instrumentality of the gospel. But both are the work of the Spirit of God. The soul is now gradually purified through the indwelling operation of the Spirit; remaining corruption is daily and hourly mortified, and at length the work of sanctification being perfected, the believer will be presented by Christ to the Father, holy and unblameable, and un-reproveable in his sight.

Such is a rapid view of the peculiar doctrines of the Christian scheme, those which are specially adapted to meet the character and condition of man as a guilty ruined sinner, and surely we may well draw the inference, that a religion, so admirably fitted to supply the wants and relieve the anxieties of sinful mortals, cannot have sprung from any other than a Divine origin. But while the most effective line of argument, in so far as the internal evidences of Christianity are concerned, appears to be that which is founded on the peculiar doctrines of the system, a collateral line of proof may also be drawn from the peculiar precepts which it inculcates. Morality addresses itself not so much to the understandings as to the hearts and the consciences of men. And in this respect the morality of the Bible is singularly effective. Not content with tracing all overt acts of crime to the inward workings of the naturally depraved heart, it directs all its efforts towards applying a remedy to the very source of the evil. It puts in the very foreground love of the Redeemer, a principle which, more than any other, is fitted to lay hold of the affections of the human being, and to mould him into a conformity to the image of Him who hath loved his people with an everlasting love, and in mercy hath redeemed them. This is the most powerfully constraining influence which could possibly operate upon the mind of a Christian. The work of Christ is to him all his salvation, and, therefore, the glory of Christ becomes all his desire. His heart glows with gratitude to his gracious Redeemer, and as he thinks of all the love and the mercy which he hath experienced at the hands of Jesus, his heart overflows with love, and he longs with ever-increasing earnestness to be like his Lord.

The moral precepts of Christianity are the purest, the noblest, the most sublime, evidently deriving their origin from the Fountain of all purity and truth. Its fundamental, its all-pervading principle is love, love to God, and love to man. In this heaven-born religion, love is the fulfilling of the law. And in laying this truth at the foundation of its moral system, Christianity proclaims the absolute necessity of a renewal of the whole nature, a new birth to holiness and God. Without this radical, vital change, there can be nothing in man that is truly good or acceptable in the sight of the heart-searching God. What stronger evidence could be adduced of the divine origin of the religion of Christ, than that which may be derived from the nature, bearing, and connection of its moral precepts! The morality and the doctrines of the Bible are closely and indissolubly joined; they form one compact and consistent whole.

In a sketch of the Evidences of Christianity, the subject admits of being pursued in various directions, all of them leading to the same satisfactory conclusion. Thus an important argument may be drawn in favour of the truth and divinity of the Christian system, by comparing, or rather contrasting it with all merely human systems of religion, whether of ancient or of modern times. There is a gorgeous splendour thrown by classical writers over the mythology of Greece and Rome, which is apt at first view to dazzle and mislead the superficial inquirer. But such a delusion is only for a time. A closer examination speedily lays open to us the absurd, degrading, and immoral character of the entire system. Essentially idolatrous and polytheistic, it lavished divine attributes on the most insignificant or worthless objects. Natural causes and material forms were converted into gods, and so rapidly was their Olympus peopled, that twenty thousand deities were scarcely deemed sufficient for the hierarchy of heaven. And not only were these deities so numerous, that, as one of the ancient authors confesses, it was easier to find a god than a man, but the morality which these divinities both inculcated and practised, was of the most polluted and impure description. The result was, that in nations the most distinguished for learning and taste, profligacy prevailed among all classes of society to the most deplorable extent. Their "elegant mythology," as Gibbon terms it, was unable to control the fierceness of their passions, or to prevent them from sinking into the lowest state of moral degradation. On the contrary, their religion too often gave countenance to vice both in public and private.

Nor, if we pass from the examination of ancient to that of modern systems of religion, do we find any reason to congratulate ourselves on the transition. It was the boast of Zoroaster that he abolished idolatry among the Persians, of Mohammed that he accomplished the same work among the Arabians, and of Gotama Budha that he had reformed the Brahmanism of India; but whether we contemplate Parseeism, Islamism, Hinduism, or Buddhism, we cannot fail to be struck with the striking contrast which they afford to Christianity in every aspect in which they can be viewed. Hinduism is a gigantic system of polytheism, exceeding in the number of its gods even the most idolatrous systems of antiquity. All nature, the meads, the groves, the streams, the mountains, the skies are peopled by the Hindu with appropriate demons, genii and demigods. True, it has its Brahm, one Great Spirit, the Supreme Being, infinitely exalted above every other being in the universe, but then he is not, like the Christian's God, possessed of every possible perfection both natural and moral; on the contrary, although all natural attributes are ascribed to him, his primary and proper state of being is that in which he exists wholly without qualities or attributes of any kind; and when in another state of being he is represented as possessed of active qualities, these in no respect partake of the nature of moral attributes. The supreme god of the Hindus is represented, it is true, of ineffable felicity, to a participation in which all his votaries are taught to aspire as being final beatitude. But instead of the felicity of Brahm resembling in the least degree the ineffable felicity of the Christian's God, which consists in the ever-active contemplation of his own glory, and the communication of happiness to all his creatures, it is represented as consisting only of idle slumber and utter inactivity, while men are taught to direct all their energies in this world towards the attainment of a state of utter and eternal unconsciousness. What a god to worship, what a heaven to seek! No wonder if the believers of such a creed should be degraded almost to the level of the beasts of the earth. Equally injurious upon the minds of all within the reach of their influence must be the absorption of the Hindu, and the annihilation of the Buddhist religion. How striking the contrast which such doctrines exhibit to the heaven of Christianity, where all is active happiness and love and joy! How can we venture to compare the Hindu Triad with the Christian Trinity, or the Avatars of Vishnu with the incarnation of Jesus? Krishna may be adorned by Oriental poetry with all the graces of loveliness and elegance, but his attractiveness is that of the effeminate voluptuary. What a contrast to the character of the holy, the meek, the lovely Jesus! How degrading the worship of the Hindu pagodas! In these temples of pretended worship, no fewer than three hundred and thirty millions of deities are adored. Prayers, tortures, alms-deeds, ablutions, a thousand expedients are resorted to by these poor benighted idolaters to recommend themselves to the favour of their gods, while the Christian, being justified by faith, has peace with God through his Lord Jesus Christ. The Hindu seeks moral purity by bathing in the waters of an earthly river, but the Christian gladly resorts by faith to the all-cleansing fountain of Immanuel's blood. Nor are the future prospects of the Hindu less dismal than his present degraded condition. One can only look forward to an incessant migration through millions of successive births; another to a temporary abode in a region of unbounded sensual indulgences; and a third as the highest enjoyment to a literal absorption in the Deity, and a consequent loss of all personal identity. What a contrast to the blessed prospects of the Christian, as he looks forward to the ineffable happiness of being for ever with the Lord, and enjoying the ever-during pleasures which are at God's right hand!

Christianity, however, can not only afford to be compared with the complicated idolatrous systems both of ancient and of modern times; it may admit of a comparison with those systems of religion which have been the most violently opposed to idolatry. Of these the ancient Zoroastrians, and the modern Mohammedans are perhaps the most conspicuous. The Zoroastrians, or Parsees as they are now termed, have ever held all kinds of idolatry or image worship in the most intense abhorrence. The only material objects to which in their view adoration ought to be paid, are the natural elements, especially the fire, which they regard as the purest and most appropriate symbol of the Supreme Being. Hence the altar fires they have come to regard as sacred, and they are, and have ever been, guilty, notwithstanding their boasted hatred of idolatry, of worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator. But if there is one characteristic of Christianity which more than another elevates it above all human systems of philosophy and religion, it is the prominence which it gives to the spirituality of the Divine nature. That God is a spirit, it lays down as a doctrine not only to be believed, but to be habitually present to our minds, that we may be led with our whole souls to "worship Him in spirit and in truth." The God of the Christian is a living, personal, immaterial Being, to whom no material object, whether in heaven or on earth, can be compared; and, therefore, it is written as the imperative command of Jehovah, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them."

And while the Parsee religion strenuously maintains the unity of the Great First Source of all things, it attempts feebly to resolve the problem of the existence and introduction of evil in the world, by alleging that creation presents an antagonism throughout all its departments (see ABESTA), a perpetual strife which is carrying onward both in the physical and moral worlds, and which, in the view of Zoroaster, admits of no satisfactory explanation, unless by the supposition of two living, opposing beings, which are ever exerting a powerful, counteracting influence. The only legitimate inferences from such a dualistic system is, that God is the author of imperfection and evil. How infinitely preferable is the simple explanation of the difficulty which Christianity gives! It represents the Creator as pure and holy, while all creation, when it first issues from his hands, is absolutely good, both physically and morally good. It is at an after period that sin is introduced through the influence of the Tempter; and physical evil is unknown until moral evil has entered into the world. Such a solution of the problem is at once plain and satisfactory. It proposes no such impossible hypothesis as that of the Abesta, that there are two powerful ever-operative agencies at work, equally strong and mutually destructive. Christianity on the contrary represents good to be the rule of God's works, and evil the exception, the latter destined to be extirpated by the mighty power of Him who, when He had formed all things, pronounced them "very good."

One more system still remains to be noticed, which also lays claims to a divine origin—the religion of Mohammed, the great Eastern impostor, which for more than twelve centuries has exercised a powerful influence over a large portion of the world. Preceded by Judaism and Christianity it has borrowed from both, and it is impossible to read the pages of the Koran without being struck with the extent to which its author has been indebted to the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospels. One truth above all others, the Prophet of Arabia sought to inculcate upon all his followers,—the unity of the Divine Being. On this subject he speaks in terms of remarkable beauty and power. "God! There is no God but he, the living and self-subsisting. Neither slumber nor sleep seizeth him. To him belongeth whatsoever is in heaven and on earth. He knoweth that which is past and that which is to come. His throne is extended over the universe. He is the high, the mighty." The gods of Paganism are rejected by Mohammed with the utmost contempt and abhorrence. But while he attempts to convey to the readers of the Koran the most sublime conceptions of the Divine Being, in the same breath he impiously dares to exalt himself to a level with the Deity. "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his Prophet." Thus was the one true God, whom he had professed to exalt, placed on a footing with a sinful man, and made to sanction the vices, to subserve the passions, and to abet the foulest crimes of his pretended messenger. The god of Islam is the patron of licentiousness and corruption; an inconsistent and contradictory Being, making or unmaking laws, announcing, confirming or repealing decrees according to the capricious dictates of a scheming and ambitious mortal. What a contrast does the God of Christianity present! "The High and the Holy One." "Just and true in all his ways, and holy in all his works." "Without variableness or shadow of turning, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." "I am the Lord, I change not."

The religion of the Koran exhibits throughout principles completely the reverse of those which we could believe to have come from a righteous and merciful God. It estimates the piety of the faithful by their cold-bloodedness, and promises glory, honour, and immortality to those who are the most zealous in the persecution and murder of the infidels. And not only were the immediate followers of the prophet commanded to go forth on a war of extermination; the same ruthless precepts were bequeathed to the Mohammedans of every future age. Islamism was thus destined by the prophet to subjugate the world to its sway by devastation and blood. How different the spirit which marks the Christian system! "Verily, I say unto you," was the declaration of its Author, "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you." Christianity is essentially the religion of peace, its Author is the Prince of Peace, who hath made peace by the blood of his cross; and with a voice re-echoing throughout the whole habitable world, it proclaims "peace upon earth, and good will to the children of men." It is destined to advance, and even to "cover the earth;" but its progress is marked at every step by civilization and happiness. Imperfectly though this blessed system has yet been brought to bear upon nations, it is impossible to deny that the moral and political condition of those countries who have embraced it has undergone a most decided improvement. Their laws, their institutions, their manners, all exhibit the ameliorating influence of the gospel of Christ, thus affording a strong additional evidence of the divinity of the Christian system.

What has been the result indeed of all the systems, whether of philosophy or religion, which have ever been invented by the wisdom of men? Has the world been one whit the better for them? Have they improved the condition of the human family? Have they made men better acquainted either with the nature of God, or their own nature? Have they diffused a pure morality, promoted the true welfare of man, and effected a marked improvement on the social and political aspect of nations? Alas! the contrary has been the case. But of Christianity, and Christianity alone, can it be said, that the doctrines which it teaches, the morality which it inculcates, the spirit which it breathes, and the hallowed influence which it exercises both upon communities and individuals, are such as to extort from every unprejudiced mind the prompt and unqualified admission, that the hand that constructed such a system is, and must be, DIVINE.

CHRISTMAS, a festival celebrated in honour of our Lord's nativity. It begins with the Advent on the last day of November, and continues until Epiphany, on the 6th of January; and is more particularly observed on the 25th of December. This festival seems to have first made its appearance in the Roman church, under the Roman bishop Liberius, after the middle of the fourth century. At a period somewhat later, it spread into Eastern Asia. Chrysostom, in a discourse delivered at Antioch A. D. 386, mentions that it had first become known there less than ten years before. The crowded churches at this period on Christmas-day showed the interest which the people generally took in this new festival. Some, however, were dissatisfied at the institution of such a festival, and a controversy arose upon the subject; one party denouncing it as an innovation, while others affirmed that it had been known of old from Thrace to Cadiz. Not that any difference of opinion existed in the church as to its object, but many doubted, and justly, whether the time of its observance was founded on any other than a mere arbitrary arrangement. Chrysostom, in his homilies, enters into an elaborate defence of the day usually observed as Christmas. The festival thus introduced was not received with equal readiness by all the churches; those of Jerusalem and Alexandria rejecting it as an innovation, and resolving, in preference, to unite the commemoration of Christ's nativity with the ancient feast of the Epiphany—a combination which they attempted to justify by quoting Luke iii. 23, from which passage they inferred, that the baptism of Christ took place on the very day of his nativity. It is not long, however, before we find the Alexandrian church observing the feast of Christ's nativity as a separate festival by itself. In some of the Greek churches such confusion existed on the subject of the two festivals, that the name Epiphany or Theophany was actually given to the feast which others termed Christmas.

Neander gives a very interesting and satisfactory account of the manner in which the Christmas festival came to be observed first in the Roman church, from which it passed to the other churches. The explanation is as follows: "Precisely in this season of the year, a series of heathen festivals occurred, the celebration of which among the Romans was, in many ways, closely interwoven with the whole civil and social life. The Christians, on this very account, were often exposed to be led astray into many of the customs and solemnities peculiar to these festivals. Besides, these festivals had an import which easily admitted of being spiritualized, and with some slight change transformed into a Christian sense. First came the saturnalia, which represented the peaceful times of the golden age, and abolished for a while the distinction of ranks, the distance between servants and free men. This admitted of being easily transferred to Christianity, which, through the reconciliation of man with God, through the restoration of the fellowship between God and man, had introduced the true golden age, representing the equality of all men in the sight of God, and brought the like true liberty as well to the freeman as to the slave. Then came the custom, peculiar to this season, of making presents (the strenæ), which afterwards passed over to the Christmas festival; next, the festival of infants, with which the saturnalia concluded,—the sigillaria, where the children were presented with images; just as Christmas was the true festival of the children. Next came a festival still more analogous to the Christmas, that of the shortest day, the winter solstice; the birth-day of the new sun about to return once more towards the earth (dies natalis invicti solis). In the case of this last-named feast, a transition to the Christian point of view naturally presented itself, when Christ, the sun of the spiritual world, was compared with that of the material. But the comparison was carried still further; for, as in the material world, it is after the darkness has reached its highest point that the end of its dominion is already near, and the light begins to acquire fresh power; so, too, in the spiritual world, after the darkness had reached its highest height, Christ, the spiritual sun, must appear, to make an end of the kingdom of darkness. In fact, many allusions of this kind are to be found in the discourses of the church fathers on the festival of Christmas.

"That Christian festival which could be so easily connected with the feelings and presentiments lying at the ground of the whole series of pagan festivals belonging to this season, was now, therefore, to be opposed to these latter; and hence the celebration of Christmas was transferred to the 25th of December, for the purpose of drawing away the Christian people from all participation in the heathen festivals, and of gradually drawing over the Pagans themselves from their heathen customs to the Christian celebration. This view of the matter seems to be particularly favoured in a New Year's discourse by Maximius, bishop of Turin, near the close of the fourth century, where he recognises a special divine providence in appointing the birth of Christ to take place in the midst of the pagan festivals; so that men might be led to feel ashamed of pagan superstition and pagan excesses."

Augustine candidly admits that Christmas was neither derived from apostolic usage, nor sanctioned by any general council. And this view is confirmed by the fact, that the ante-Nicene fathers are all of them silent on the subject of such a festival, even while enumerating the other festivals of the church. Some writers have derived it from the Jewish Encaenia or Feast of the Dedication, while others agree with Neander in tracing it to the Heathen Saturnalia. Whatever may have been its origin, it is somewhat important to observe, that from its first institution many of the western nations transferred to it some of the foolish customs which prevailed in the pagan festivals observed at the same season, such as adorning fantastically the churches, mingling puppet-shows and dramas with worship, universal feasting and merry-making, visits and salutations, presents and jocularities, and even revelry and drunkenness. For some time after the introduction of the festival in commemoration of the nativity of Christ, the Eastern and Western churches differed as to the day on which it ought to be celebrated; the former keeping it on Epiphany or the 6th of January, the latter on the 25th of December. It was not until the sixth century that anything like unanimity prevailed as to the day for observing Christmas. In the Roman church Christmas is accounted a very high festival. Three masses are performed, one at midnight, one at daybreak, and one in the morning. In the church of Santa-Maria Magiore at Rome, they profess to have the cradle in which the Saviour was laid at his birth, and on the feast of the nativity they bring out the cradle before daybreak, and amid processions of priests, monks, nuns, preceded by incense-bearers, accompanied by singers, and guarded by soldiers, it is placed on the high altar to be seen and worshipped by the faithful. On Christmas day, and for eight days after, a Presepio is exhibited in almost every church in Italy, and sometimes even in private houses. The word Presepio means a stable or manger, and it is now applied to the representation of the nativity, in which men and animals are fantastically arranged in the interior of a room. The Saviour is generally exhibited lying on the ground, or on the Virgin's knee, between an ox and an ass. Joseph is also present, and several angels, and sometimes the three kings of the east presenting their offerings. Flowers and fruit, apples and oranges, are frequently strewed on the floor of the Presepio by the visitors, and sometimes money also is given. In many Greek churches a similar representation is to be seen on Christmas eve. In the Church of England, and all Lutheran churches, the feast of the nativity is observed as a very solemn festival, and at the close of divine service and the dispensation of the eucharist, the day is looked upon as an occasion of rejoicing and congratulation. The Church of Scotland, and all Presbyterian as well as Congregational churches, decline to celebrate this festival, regarding it as of human appointment, and unwarranted either by Scripture or the practice of apostolic times.

CHRISTOLYTES (Gr. Christos, Christ, and Luo, to loose), a Christian sect which arose in the sixth century, in consequence of the keen disputes which took place at that time, in reference to the nature of the body of Christ. The Christolytes maintained that, on the descent of Christ into hell, he left both his body and soul there, and only rose with his Divine nature to heaven.

CHRISTOPHORI (Gr. Christos, Christ, and Phero, to carry), one of the names sometimes ascribed to Christians by the early Fathers, probably from the circumstance that believers may be supposed to carry Christ in their hearts, and hold habitual communion with him, as it is written, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them." See CHRISTIANS.

CHRISTO SACRUM, a sect or society formed at Delft in Holland in 1801, by Onder de Wingaard, an aged burgomaster of that city. The object of the founder was to unite, if possible, all denominations who held the divinity of Christ, and redemption through his blood; and, accordingly, all are admitted into fellowship who maintain these cardinal doctrines, on whatever other points they may differ. The sect, which had one place of worship at Delft, is quite extinct, though, while it existed, various works were published in defence of its doctrines.

CHRODO, a god of the ancient Germans, represented under the figure of an old man, on a pedestal, with his head bare, and a large fish under his feet. He is dressed in a tunic, which is girt around him with a sash, the ends of which hang flowing to the right and left. In his left hand he holds a wheel, and in his right a large basket with fruits and flowers. He is supposed by some to have been identical with the Roman god Saturn.

CHRONITÆ (Gr. chronos, time), a reproachful name applied by the Arians of the fourth century to the orthodox Christians of the period, by which they designed to intimate that their religion was only temporary, and would speedily have an end.

CHRONOLOGY. See ÆRA.

CHRONOS (Gr. time), a name which the ancients give to SATURN (which see), as the god of time. Accordingly, the fable of Saturn devouring his children, is explained by supposing time to devour days, months, and years, which are produced by him. "The father of Zeus," writes Kaiser.

"was defined as time or Chronos, according to a more recent system of Theogony, because he reigned prior to his great son, though, as regards rank, he is inferior to him." Zeus, however, considered as demiurgos and governor of the world, is Chronos or time realized in cosmos.

CHRYSOSTOM (Sr.), FESTIVAL OF, celebrated by the Greek church on the 13th of November.

CHRYSOSTOM (Sr.), LITURGY OF, one of the numerous liturgies used in the Greek church. It is in ordinary use all the year round, with the exception of certain appointed days, on which the liturgy of St. Basil is substituted for it.

CHTHONIA AND CHTHONIUS, surnames applied to the shades or gods of the infernal regions among the ancient Greeks, such as Hecate, Nyx, and especial Demeter, in whose honour a festival was instituted bearing the name of Chthonia.

CHTHONIA, a festival celebrated at Hermione, in honour of DEMETER, surnamed CHTHONIA (see preceding article). Pausanias represents it as celebrated every year in summer by a procession, at the head of which marched the priests and magistrates. Those who joined the procession wore white garments, with chaplets of flowers on their heads, on which was an inscription recording the premature death of Hyacinthus. In the rear of the procession was led a heifer, which was conducted into the temple of Demeter, and there sacrificed by four old women with shut doors. Thereafter the temple was thrown open, and another heifer was led in, which was also sacrificed. The same operation was performed on four different animals in succession, all of which were made to fall on the same side on which the first fell. Ælian says, that the heifers were sacrificed not by the matrons mentioned by Pausanias, but by the priestess of the goddess. The Lacedæmonians are said to have celebrated the same or a similar festival.

CHURCH (German, Kirche, a kirk, from Gr. Kuriakon, belonging to the Lord), a word used in a variety of different signification. (1.) It is employed to denote the whole body of Christians, or all who profess to believe in Christ, and vow subjection to his authority. This is usually termed the CATHOLIC CHURCH (which see). (2.) Any particular body of Christians, who belong to one particular locality, and are wont to hold communion with one another in the same ordinances. Thus we read of the church at Ephesus, the church at Antioch, the church at Colosse. (3.) A particular sect or denomination of Christians, distinguished by adherence to certain doctrines, or the observance of certain ceremonies. Thus the Greek church, the Romish church, the Church of England, the Abyssinian church, the Armenian church. (4.) The term church is sometimes applied to a single congregation of Christians. (5.) Sometimes the word denotes the clergy in contradistinction to the laity; and vice versa. (6.) It is occasionally employed in early writers to denote the people as distinguished from the clergy or ecclesiastics. (7.) It very frequently denotes the building within which a particular congregation or society of Christians assemble for the celebration of divine service.

CHURCHES. The places in which Christians assemble for worship have received different names at different periods. The primitive appellation of such a building seems to have been the Greek word ecclesia, as we find in 1 Cor. xi. 18, 20 and 22. In the early writers it is sometimes called the Lord's house, the house of prayer, a temple, all which names were familiarly used in the third and fourth centuries. The first place of meeting among the primitive Christians seems to have been a room in the house of some member of the church. As the congregations became larger, particularly in towns, it became necessary to select a more suitable place of assembly. The church at Ephesus held their meetings for a time in the house of Aquila and Priscilla where Paul preached to them. Gradually these private apartments would be fitted up in a style better adapted for public worship. An elevated seat would be introduced for the speaker, and a table set for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Separate buildings for the special purpose of divine service were erected so early as the third century, at which time they are expressly mentioned in the edict of Gallien. The Chronicle of Edessa speaks of a Christian church as standing there even in A. D. 202. In the time of Diocletian, many splendid churches had already been built in the large cities, and more than forty then existed in Rome. Mr. Coleman, in his 'Christian Antiquities,' gives the following sketch of the progress made in the erection of edifices for Christian worship onward to the Reformation: "After the persecution of Diocletian, under Constantine and his successors, the demolished churches were rebuilt, and such as had been closed were again opened. Pagan temples were, in some instances, converted into Christian churches; but they were usually destroyed, as not suited for public worship. Churches in great numbers were erected in a style of magnificence before unknown in Constantinople, in Jerusalem, and throughout the cities of Palestine, and solemnly dedicated to the worship of God. This religious rite was first introduced by Constantine.

"In his zeal for building churches, Justinian I. far surpassed all others, and throughout his long reign, from A. D. 527 to 565, made this the great business of his life. But his chief care he expended in building the magnificent and colossal church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople. Such was the splendour of this work, that at the consecration of it he exclaimed, 'I have surpassed thee, O Solomon.' The perpendicular height, from the summit of the grand arch to the pavement of this edifice, was one hundred and eighty feet. Some idea of this great work may be obtained from the number of ministers and attendants who were appointed by the decree of the emperor for the service of this church. They were as follows: sixty presbyters, one hundred deacons, forty deaconesses, ninety subdeacons, one hundred and ten readers, twenty-five singers, one hundred door-keepers; making a retinue of five hundred and twenty-five ministers and attendants! The value of 40,000 pounds of silver was expended in ornamenting the altar and the parts adjacent. The entire cost was nearly 5,000,000 dollars.

"After the death of Justinian, the zeal for building churches greatly declined, and few of any notoriety were erected from the fifth to the eighth century. The arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting, had fallen into disrepute, and the churches which were erected were of an inferior character, devoid, in a great degree, of ornament and taste.

"The Byzantine, or ancient Gothic style of architecture was introduced under Theodoric, in the beginning of the sixth century; and in this and the following centuries many churches of this order were built in Italy, Spain, France, England, and Germany. From the seventh to the twelfth century the resources of the Christian church were expended chiefly on cloisters, monasteries, and other establishments suited to the ascetic life to which Christians of those ages generally addicted themselves.

"The vast cathedrals of Europe, in the style of modern Gothic, are the product of the middle ages, and some of them date back even to the thirteenth century. About this time ecclesiastical architecture attained to the height of its perfection. After the introduction of the pointed arch, at the beginning of this period, buildings were erected which exceeded, in size and architectural beauty, all which had hitherto been dedicated to the services of the church. The style of architecture which obtained at this time has been usually denominated Gothic, or new Gothic; but it may more properly claim the title of German, or English. It prevailed in Germany, the Netherlands, England, and Denmark; and from those countries it was introduced into Italy, France, and Spain. Some suppose that Saxony is the country to which its origin may be traced.

"Some antiquaries regard the beautiful architecture of this period as a sudden effect produced by the invention of the pointed arch, while others contend that it was the result of a gradual improvement in the art during the course of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Certain, however, it is, that this style of building, after having attained its perfection more or less rapidly in the thirteenth century, prevailed almost exclusively during the fourteenth and fifteenth.

"Opinions are divided also upon a question relating to the quarter from which this style was originally derived. Some persons suppose that it was brought from the Arabians or Saracens at the time of the Crusades, or from the same people in Spain and Sicily at a still earlier date. And it seems likely that some of its forms, at least, may have originated in this quarter. Others refer the design to the talent and invention of one or two great masters whom they supposed to have flourished in the early part of the century, but without being able to say who they were; while others again consider that we are indebted for the improvement to the societies of masons, which existed from a very early period, and were greatly encouraged by popes and emperors during the middle ages. They had lodges in England and on the continent. Some place their beginning in Germany, others in France, and others in England under the Saxon kings. These architectural corporations must not be confounded with the modern freemasons.

"Early in the eleventh century began the system of raising money for ecclesiastical buildings by the sale of indulgences. The example of this practice was set by Pontius, bishop of Arles, in the year 1016. According to Morinus, (De Sacram. Pœnit. lib. vii. c. 14, 20,) the French bishops professed, during the twelfth century, to remit a third or fourth part of penance to persons who should contribute a certain sum of money towards the building or restoring of a place of worship. In this way, Mauritius, bishop of Paris, built the splendid cathedral of Notre Dame, and four abbeys; for which, however, he incurred the censure of some of his contemporaries. In later times the example was frequently followed at Rome; and it is well known that the collection of Peter's pence, and the sale of indulgences in raising money for the building of St. Peter's, was one of the proximate causes of the German reformation."

The original form of Christian churches appears to have been oblong, sometimes with parallel sides, but more frequently of an elliptical figure like a ship, and, accordingly, the building was sometimes termed a ship, and at other times the ark of Noah, and the boat of Peter. For several centuries after the time of Constantine the Great, churches were most frequently erected in the form of a cross. The circular form being generally adopted in building heathen temples, was sedulously avoided by the Christians in building their churches. "The spot chosen for the site of a new church," says Dr. Jamieson, "was generally an elevated piece of ground, consecrated by being the burying-place of a martyr,—the primitive Christians deeming a church built over the remains of those who were faithful unto death, a more suitable memorial of their excellencies, than a monumental pillar erected to their honour. It accordingly received their name, which was inscribed on the front of the edifice. The church was approached through a spacious area, in the middle of which was a fountain, in which every one, as he entered, washed his hands—an act intended for a significant memorial of the purity of heart that alone can constitute an acceptable worshipper. The entrance was formed by a longitudinal porch, within which kings laid down their crowns, soldiers their arms, and magistrates or judges the insignia of their office. At one end of it stood poor strangers, or such of that destitute order as, from their distress being recent and sudden, were allowed to make known their wants by asking alms of their brethren,—while on the opposite side were stationed gross offenders, who, being excommunicated, and deprived of the privilege of entering the church, implored, on their bended knees, and with all the agony of remorse and the deepest affliction, the prayers and sympathies of the faithful. The interior of the building—which was often in the form of a cross, or an eight-sided figure, but most generally of an oblong shape, resembling that of a ship,—was divided into different compartments, corresponding to the different classes of hearers that composed the primitive Church. The penitents—under which term were included all offenders who had made some progress in their course of discipline,—occupied the first place on passing from the porch. Next to them were those new converts who were preparing for baptism,—while the body of the church was filled by the congregation of the faithful,—widows and young women by themselves, and the young men by themselves,—the men with their sons, the women with their daughters, sitting apart from each other, either on opposite sides of the church, or, as was frequently the case, the male part of the audience remained on the ground floor, while the females had a gallery appropriated for their use. At the further end, opposite the main entrance, was the pulpit, or elevated bench, from which the minister read the Scriptures and exhorted the people; and immediately behind this was the place set apart for celebrating the communion,—the consecrated elements of which were deposited on a plain moveable table, covered with a white cloth. Here and there were niches in the walls, sufficiently large to hold one or two persons, each of which was furnished with a copy of the Scriptures, for the use of those who might choose to retire in the intervals of public worship, to read and to meditate in these little recesses. Besides this provision, invaluable in those days, when books were all in manuscript and costly in price, texts of Scripture appropriate to each class of hearers were inscribed on that part of the wall that lay immediately contiguous to the place they occupied in the church, and were so selected, as to be perpetual remembrancers of the temptations incident to their age, of the duties belonging to their condition, and the motives and encouragements to steadfastness in faith and virtue. Thus, to let one example suffice, over the space assigned to the young women, was engraven in large characters this passage of Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 34: 'There is difference between a wife and a virgin; the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy in body and in spirit.' For the benefit of those who could not profit by such means of Christian instruction, the custom was latterly introduced of decorating the walls of churches with pictures of the scenes and characters of sacred history. Adam and Eve eating the forbidden fruit,—Joseph sold by his brethren,—David encountering Goliath,—Solomon dedicating his temple,—Mary and the infant Jesus,—the Saviour expiring on the cross, were delineated to the eye,—intended, like historical paintings, to keep in remembrance the persons and events they were meant to represent, and especially to enable the illiterate to read that in the picture which they had not education enough to do in the book. It was towards the end of the third century when this innovation crept into the Church; and although, doubtless, it sprang from a pious and well-meaning zeal for the instruction of the ignorant, yet it was an imprudent measure, productive of the worst consequences, and tending to accelerate the superstition which was then advancing with gigantic strides over the whole Christian world."

It does not appear that, for the first three centuries at least, any particular arrangement was adhered to in fitting up the interior of churches; but about the fourth century a definite plan came into general use. The body of the church was divided into three parts, corresponding to the three classes in which Christians were arranged—the clergy, the believers, and the catechumens. This division corresponded also to the different parts of the Jewish temple, the holy of holies, the sanctuary or holy place, and the court. The three divisions of Christian churches were: (1.) The BEMA (which see) or sanctuary, a sacred enclosure round the altar, railed off from the rest of the church, and appropriated to the clergy. (2.) The Naos or NAVE (which see), occupied by the faithful or lay members of the church. (3.) The NARTHEX (which see) or ante-temple, the place appropriated for penitents and catechumens, and which was sometimes divided into the outer and inner. Besides these three separate divisions of the interior of churches, there were outer buildings of different kinds, which usually bore the name of Exedrae, the most important of which was the BAPTISTERY (which see), which were erected close by cathedral churches. Libraries were at a very early period collected and kept in connexion with the churches. These were sometimes very extensive, as seems to have been the case with the library of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, which contained 120,000 volumes. Schools also, particularly for the instruction of catechumens, were very early established in connexion with the churches. The bishops and clergy had houses allotted to them, adjacent to the church. Bathing houses and public rooms for rest and refreshment, are also mentioned, as well as hospitals for the poor and sick, which were erected in the immediate vicinity of churches. BELLS (which see) were not in use earlier than the seventh century. Organs do not occur as a part of the furniture of churches, until the time of Charlemagne, who received one as a present from Constantine Michael which was set up in the church at Aix-la-Chapelle.

The early Christians exercised peculiar care in the construction of the doors of their churches, from their anxiety to preserve secrecy in celebrating the mysteries of their religion, that not only the profane, but even their own penitents and catechumens, might be prevented from intruding into the sacred edifices. To guard the entrance, accordingly, a special class of men were set apart by the solemn rites of ordination. These officials were termed Ostiaarii or door-keepers. There were generally three main entrances to the churches, each of them provided with outer and inner doors. The different sexes entered by different doors, as they occupied different parts of the churches. The doors were made of the choicest and most durable wood, richly ornamented, and sometimes constructed of solid brass or bronze. Inscriptions of various kinds, and the date of the building or dedication of the church, were usually written on the doors. The appearance of the pavements and walls of the early Christian churches is thus briefly described by Mr. Coleman: "The floor of the church consisted of pavement carefully laid, or smooth marble. In large churches the narthex had a pavement of plaster; the flooring of the nave was plastering or boards; whilst the choir was adorned with mosaic. Not unfrequently there was a tessellated pavement of particoloured and polished marble, constituting a rich mosaic work. A curious specimen of this ancient mosaic was found in 1805, near Salzburg, delineating the story of Theseus and Ariadne. Such decorations, in imitation of the Jewish temple, (1 Kings vi. 15—30,) were used in the churches so early as the fourth century. From the seventh to the tenth century it became customary to encumber and disfigure the nave and choir with the graves of the dead, and from that period the floors were occupied with pallisades, monuments, and epitaphs; and all unity and symmetry was destroyed.

"The walls and the canopy were also ornamented with inscriptions, mosaics, paintings, and bas-reliefs. The paintings were executed on wood, metals, and canvas. The bas-relief was executed in gypsum, mortar, stone, or metal, in imitation of the ornaments of the temple. Votive offerings of shields, arms, standards, and the like, were also hung upon the walls. To these the lights were attached and suspended from the canopy. Vaulted roofs are of later origin."

Churches were held in great veneration among the primitive Christians. They entered the building with the utmost reverence and respect, having previously washed at least their hands, and sometimes also their faces. In Eastern churches, particularly those of Abyssinia, they put off their shoes. The emperors, when they attended divine service, laid down their arms at the church door, left their usual body guard behind them, and put off their crowns. In the fourth and fifth centuries, during the heat of the Arian controversy, churches were sometimes made the scene of the most unseemly contentions and disorders, so that Honorius decreed, A. D. 398, the sentence of scourging and banishment upon any one who should enter the church and disturb the minister in the discharge of his duties; and if he interrupted the religious services, he was to be sentenced to death by any court civil or military. I was an ancient and very general custom to kiss the threshold of the doors, and the altars of the churches, in token of reverence. Afterwards it became usual to kiss the paintings and utensils. In early times churches were carefully guarded from secular and sacrilegious uses. The ceremony of dedicating or consecration of churches commenced in the reign of Constantine, when they were rebuilt, after having been destroyed in the Diocletian persecution; and in the fourth and fifth centuries, anniversary feasts, called ENCŒNIA (which see), were introduced, which were kept in memory of the dedication of churches. (See DEDICATION OF CHURCHES.) By the laws of Justinian, no man was allowed to begin to build a church before he had given security to the bishop of a maintenance for the ministry, and the repairs of the church, and whatever else might be necessary to uphold Divine service in it. Churches were sometimes used as places of refuge for criminals (see ASYLUM), and they were also employed as the safest repository for things of value, as well as the best security and retreat in times of common calamity and distress. When Alaric the Goth took and sacked Rome, he gave orders that all the churches should be inviolable, and whoever fled to them should be spared, in consequence of which numbers of the heathens as well as the Christians escaped.

In England, churches cannot be erected without the consent of the bishop, and they are not recognised in law until they have been consecrated by the bishop, though the canon law supposes that that ecclesiastical dignitary has the power to permit divine service, including the administration of the sacraments, to be performed in churches and chapels which have not been consecrated. The repairs of the church must be executed by the CHURCHWARDENS (which see), and the expenses defrayed from the CHURCH RATES (which see) raised by assessment on the parishioners. If any addition is proposed to be made to the church, the consent of the parish must be previously obtained; and if the addition be inside the church, the license of the ordinary is necessary. When the repairs are of an ordinary and obviously necessary kind, the churchwardens are not obliged to consult the parishioners, the parish being understood to have constituted them their trustees. The rector of the parish is bound to keep the CHANCEL (which see) of the parish church in good condition.

In Scotland, the expenses incurred in building, enlarging, and repairing parish churches, are wholly defrayed by the heritors or proprietors, who are assessed in purely landward parishes, according to the valued rents of their estates; and in parishes partly rural, partly burghal, according to the actual rent of their properties. Should the heritors fail to discharge their legal obligation in repairing an old or building a new church, the matter comes under the cognizance of the presbytery of the bounds, who have power, on the report of competent tradesmen, to order the necessary repairs, or if the case require it, the erection of a new church. The size of a parish church has been fixed by statute to be such as shall accommodate two-thirds of the examinable population, a phrase which is understood as including all the parishioners above twelve years of age. The precise extent of the presbytery's power, in the question of building or repairing churches, is well explained by Dr. Jamieson in his article on the Church of Scotland, in the 'Cyclopædia of Religious Denominations': "It is not the province of the ecclesiastical court to interfere with the proposed site of the church, with the style of its architecture, or with the amount of expenditure. They have to determine only whether it be sufficient for the wants of the population; and even should it be contemplated to remove the church from one part of the parish to another, to the inconvenience of the minister and some of the people, the right of deciding in such a case belongs not to the presbytery, but to the lords of session, who act as commissioners, and by whom a purpose of removal, if backed by three-fourths of the heritors, and the general voice of the inhabitants, may be sanctioned. The church sittings are distributed according to the same rules which determine the proportion of expense each heritor has to pay in the erection or repair of the building. The heritors first of all choose their family seats. After the patron, the chief heritor has the right of choice, and all the rest according to the relative amount of their valued rents. Then the area of the church is divided in conformity with the same rules; different parts are appropriated to different heritors, and as the sittings are intended for the accommodation of their respective tenantry, it is not competent for any proprietor to lease them, or to bestow them on strangers. Should he sell his estate, or portions of his estate, the sittings in the church are transferable along with the property, either in whole or in part. This division of the area of a church is sometimes made by the kirk-session or by the presbytery; but as disputes may arise, and a single proprietor has it in his power to dispute their arrangement, it is usual to invite the services of the sheriff, whose judicial distribution carries the force of a legal enactment. In landward parishes the church accommodation is free, but in towns magistrates are entitled to let the sittings in churches,—only, however, for the purpose of levying rent sufficient to keep the edifice in proper repair, and defray the expense of ordinances."

CHURCHING OF WOMEN, a service of the Church of England, used when women are desirous of returning thanks to Almighty God for deliverance from the pains and perils of childbirth. It may have had its origin possibly in the Jewish ceremony of purification enjoined in Lev. xii. The Rubric, at the end of the service, appoints that the woman who comes to give thanks, must offer accustomed offerings, and if there be a communion it is becoming in her to partake of it.

CHURCH LAWS. See CANONS (ECCLIASTICAL).

CHURCH-RATES, an assessment made upon the inhabitants of any parish in England for meeting the expenses of repairing the parish church. The rate must be agreed upon at a meeting of the churchwardens and parishioners, regularly called by public intimation in the church; and the law provides, that "the major part of them that appear shall bind the parish, or if none appear, the churchwardens alone may make the rate, because they, and not the parishioners are to be cited, and punished in defect of repairs." Church-rates have for a long time been very unpopular in England. No rate can be raised at the mere instance of the bishop without the consent of the parishioners. Houses as well as lands are chargeable with rates, and in some places, as in cities and large towns, houses alone may be charged. A rate for repairing the fabric of the church is to be charged upon the land, and not the person, but a rate for providing ornaments is personal, upon the goods, and not upon the land. If a person reside in one parish, and has land in another, which he himself occupies there, he shall be charged for the land to repair the church in which the land lies; and if the lands are let in farm, not the landlord, but the tenant must pay. The rector of a parish being at the whole charge of repairing the chancel, is not liable to be charged for repairing the body of the church, unless he happens to have lands in the parish which do not form part of the rectory.

CHURCH REVENUES. See REVENUES (ECCLIASTICAL).

CHURCHWARDENS, officers of great antiquity in the Church of England, whose special charge it is to take care of the goods of the church, and to act as trustees for the parishioners. They form a lay-corporation, and may be sued in law. It is their duty to repair the church, imposing a rate upon the inhabitants for that object, not, however, without their full consent given at a public meeting regularly called. Originally the churchwardens formed a sort of jury, for the purpose of inquiring into, and attesting any irregularity of conduct, either on the part of clergy or people. Hence they were called synods-men, by corruption sidesmen, and they are also sometimes termed questmen, as making inquiry into offences. The churchwardens or questmen are chosen the first week after Easter, or some week following, according to the direction of the Ordinary. The minister and parishioners, in the first instance, endeavour to agree upon the individuals who may be invited to accept the office, but should they find themselves unable to come to an agreement in the matter, then the law ordains that the minister shall choose one, and the parishioners another. If, however, the parish is entitled by custom to choose both churchwardens, then the minister cannot insist upon his right. They continue only one year in office, unless re-elected. It is also provided by canon 89, that "all churchwardens at the end of their year, or within a month after at the most, shall, before the minister and parishioners, give up a just account of such money as they have received, and also what particularly they have bestowed in reparations, and otherwise for the use of the church. And last of all, going out of their office, they shall truly deliver up to the parishioners whatsoever money or other things of right belonging to the church or parish, which remaineth in their hands, that it may be delivered over by them to the next churchwardens, by bill indented." The usual practice is for the rector of the parish to choose one, who is commonly called the rector's churchwarden, and the parishioners assembled in the vestry choose another.

CHURCHYARD, ground set apart for the burial of the dead, and which derives its name from being usually situated in the immediate vicinity of a church. It does not appear before the sixth century to have been customary to have burial-places adjoining to the church, and even then it was contrary to all laws, both ecclesiastical and civil, to bury in the church. About A. D. 563, as Bingham informs us, the council of Braga in Spain gave permission to bury, if necessary, in the churchyard under the walls of the church, but forbade any to be buried within the church. The same privilege allowed in Spain extended, in the course of the same century, to France, and the custom of burial in churchyards was gradually adopted in other countries. The consecration of such places of interment is referred to by no writer before Gregory of Tours, A. D. 570, who mentions that the burial-places in his time were usually consecrated by sacerdotal benediction. The heathens were accustomed to reckon such places sacred, and to regard the violation of them in any way as a sort of sacrilege, and Justinian in his Code applies to such an offence both the name and the punishment of sacrilege. From the sacredness attached to burial-places, valuable ornaments and treasures were frequently deposited in these abodes of the dead. The sacred purposes to which burying grounds were often put among the early Christians, may be seen in the article CATACOMBS. The consecration of churchyards is treated of under article CEMETERIES. In England, the churchwardens of each parish are bound by law to take care that the churchyards be well and sufficiently repaired, fenced, and maintained with walls, rails, or pales, according to the custom in each place. In some cases, this duty devolves upon a proprietor, whose lands may happen to be adjoining to the churchyard. Though maintained at the expense of the parishioners, the churchyard is the freehold of the parson, who, however, is not allowed to cut down trees growing there except for the necessary repairs of the chancel.

CHUYCHU, the name given to the rainbow, which was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of Peru, in South America.

CIAM, one of the principal deities in the most ancient religion of China. He was considered as the king of heaven, having dethroned Leu, a former king, and seized the kingdom. Leu having been forcibly excluded from heaven, is said still to rule in a mountain on earth, while Ciam exercises supreme authority in the heavenly world. His representative on earth is regarded by the sect of Li-Laokun, as their high-priest or pontiff, a dignity which has been hereditary in one family for a thousand years. This viceroy of the heavenly king resides usually in Peking, and is a great favourite at court, being regarded as a master in the art of exorcism, and therefore held in high estimation.

CIBORIUM, a small temple or tabernacle placed upon the altar of Roman Catholic churches, and containing the host or consecrated wafer. The Ciborium is also termed the Pyx. In some of the more magnificent churches in ancient times, as in that of Sancta Sophia, the altar was overshadowed with a sort of canopy, which, among the Greeks, was usually termed Ciborium. This canopy was raised in the form of a little turret upon four pillars at each corner of the altar. The heads of the pillars were adorned with silver bowls. The top of the canopy was in the form of a sphere adorned with graven flowers, and above the sphere stood the cross, while the several arches between the pillars were hung with veils or curtains, which served also to conceal the whole altar. The term Ciborium was anciently applied to denote this canopy, and it is only in modern times that it came to denote the Pyx.

CIDARIA, a surname of the Eleusinian DEMETER (which see), under which she was worshipped at Pheneus in Arcadia.

I.

CIRCASSIANS (THE RELIGION OF THE). This people inhabit the mountain valleys in the northern declivities of the Caucasus. They are chiefly Mohammedans, but there are still remains of a system of Paganism, which seems formerly to have been the universal religion of the country. At one time, it is true, through the zeal of the Georgian queen, Thamar, an attempt was made to spread the light of Christianity on these shores, which, however, attained no farther success than the erection of a few wooden crosses on the acclivities here and there. On passing these mouldering remains of the outward emblems of the Christian faith, the people make a hasty obeisance, the reason of which they are unable to explain in any other way than that their fathers had done so before them. Islamism has supplanted the ancient Paganism of Circassia, and has diffused a spirit of equality among the people, which has tended to limit the hereditary power of the nobles, and to raise the condition of the serf. Besides, it has constituted from sea to sea a rampart against the encroachments of the Russians, and by introducing a strong religious element into their minds, has prevented them from yielding to the sway of the czar. "The bonds by which Circassia, notwithstanding her independence," as an intelligent traveller well remarks, "an independence guaranteed by the distinctions of race, customs, and language, is united to Turkey, are those of a common faith; and the strength of these bonds must depend on that of the religious zeal which is so peculiarly powerful with Mussulmans, binding every heart in which it burns in an electric chain of sympathy, an element of adhesion, strong as it is subtle, and upon which the sword makes no more impression than it would on fire itself." Strong, however, as is the partiality of the Circassians for the Moslem faith, there are still numerous traces of the ancient Pagan system which formed the religion of the country. As an example, we quote from 'A Year among the Circassians,' by Mr. Longworth, a description of a Pagan festival which is still observed: "The wooden representative of the deity Seoseres, consisting of a post, with a stick placed crosswise towards the top, had been planted in the centre of the grove, and the lads and lasses had danced about it in a ring. The oldest of the patriarchs present, who officiated as priest, had then come forward and delivered a thanksgiving for the success of the harvest. Offerings, in the shape of bread, honey, and triangular cheesecakes, and, lastly, an ample bowl of boza, were duly presented to the idol; but he showing no stomach for them, they were handed to his votaries, who had apparently much keener appetites. To crown the whole, a bull was led to the foot of the wooden deity, and there sacrificed, having his throat cut with a cama. The carcass was taken away, roasted, and afterwards distributed to the multitude, that they might eat and be merry. This, in fact, seemed to be the principal object that had brought them together; and till it lamism can furnish an apology for feasting and good fellowship as satisfactorily, it seems improbable that the joyous old Pagan rites will be hastily abandoned." But although the Mussulman creed has failed in abolishing some of the old Pagan customs, it has notwithstanding obtained for itself a strong footing in the country, and exercises an influence over the people so powerful as to be almost incredible to those who have not been intimately conversant with the habits of this singular nation. Thus the traveller, from whom we have already quoted, narrates the effect which the ceremony of taking the national oath administered upon the Koran had upon the minds of the people: "The ceremony of taking the oath, which was curious to us as spectators, had a deep and thrilling interest for those who were engaged in it. We perceived, on first attending it, what was meant by hanging the Koran. Two copies of that book were suspended by cords to a wooden frame erected in the snow. It had, to our eyes, much the look of a gibbet, but was regarded with feelings of the profoundest veneration by the superstitious multitude. Even those who were engaged at mark-firing in a neighbouring field, cast ever and anon expressive glances at it; for on this simple apparatus was enthroned the tremendous majesty of the oath, and around it were marshalled the chieftains, elders, and judges of the land; while, one by one, the humbled population of that district presented themselves before it, and having abjured all traffic and communication with the Russians, all rapine and violence among themselves, made a public confession of all their former transgressions. These practices, as I have before had occasion to observe, inferred of themselves no degree of infamy, unless they had been previously renounced by oath, so that there was nothing very humiliating in the acknowledgment of them. That which was felt more severely was the payment of fines; but, however heavy their amount, none sought to evade them by perjury; and it was a truly affecting spectacle to see the gray-headed warrior, whose scars proclaimed him a stranger to fear of every other description, thus powerfully agitated before the dread volume of the Mussulman law, and depositing his rifle, his bow, or his pistol, in proof of his sincerity."

A further relic of that period in the history of Circassia, when Christianity had at least some footing in the country, is to be found in a very ancient annual festival called Merem, which is still observed for about a fortnight in the month of October. Troops of young folks on this occasion go from house to house in succession, and spend the night in dancing, singing, and mirth of every kind. Part of the ceremony consists in some of the company holding cakes with cheese in them, which they wave about, while all shout out an invocation to Merem, begging her always to send them health, plenty, and happiness. The Circassians allege that this festival was anciently instituted in honour of the mother of Jesus. Mingled, however, with these remains of a corrupt Christianity, which had once been introduced by Romish missionaries, the relics of ancient Pagan superstition are still to be found in various parts of the country. Thus Tschiblé, the god of thunder, war, and justice, is regarded as entitled to the best sheep of the flock when a victory is gained, and this deity confers sanctity on every object which he condescends to smite with lightning. As an instance of this, Mr. Bell, in his 'Journal of a Residence in Circassia,' relates the following incident; "On the evening of the 19th, in ascending the small valley of Kwaff to seek quarters for the night, I saw parties of people diverging from it for their homes. We then came to a lofty pole, which was firmly planted in the ground. On the upper end was transfixed the head of a goat, whose skin stretched by sticks waved from the pole like a banner in the breeze,—close at hand were a sort of canopy formed by four poles, with a flat roof of branches and leaves thickly intertwined, and a small circular inclosure of stout wicker-work. The latter I found to be the sacred spot on which the goat had received his blessed death by a thunderbolt, while his mortal remains—saving the head and skin aforementioned—were inclosed in the roof of the canopy. Immediately adjoining these trophies, a large circular space of the grass trodden and withered, showed where the males and females of the neighbourhood had danced and feasted during the three preceding days, in commemoration of the honour conferred on this valley by Tschiblé, the spirit of thunder."

The same writer, who spent three years in Circassia, and had thus ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with the manners and customs of this singular people, gives the following remarkable instance of the strange combination of Christianity with Paganism, which forms a marked peculiarity of their religion: "Luca has just been attending a celebration at one of the numerous crosses in this part of the country, each of which it appears has its special day. The rites appear to be a mixture of those of Christianity and of some other faith. On this occasion only about fifty persons were present, each of whom who is head of a family brought with him a table or tables for refreshments. Besides these two or three goats were sacrificed, lighted tapers being placed at their heads at the time, while others were placed on the cross. At a short distance from the latter the tables were arranged, and each person on passing them took off his bonnet; but no one approached the cross excepting some three or four individuals who said aloud a short prayer—an invocation to the Deity for the averting from them of war, pestilence, and every other evil, and sending them plenteous harvest and happiness. On approaching the cross and saying the prayer, one of these individuals held in one hand some of the eatables taken from the tables, and in the other a bowl of the national drink, shuat, which were then distributed among the congregation."

Upon the race of the Adighé in Circassia, Paganism seems to have a firmer hold than upon other tribes of the Caucasus. Besides the spirit of thunder, who is held in great veneration, there are other deities which are also worshipped. Among these may be mentioned Tleps, the god of fire, who appears to have been a legacy from the ancient Persians; and Isooserisch, the god of wind and water, who is supposed to have the elements under his control. This latter deity is more especially honoured by those who have relatives at sea. The mode of worship in this case is curious. The offerings to the god are placed on a stream communicating with the ocean, and his answers as to the fate of the absent about whom he is consulted, are heard in the rustling of the wind, or seen in the passage of the clouds. The other principal deities adored by the Circassians are Mesitcha, the god of the forests, under whose sacred oaks, in the manner of the ancient Scandinavians, the nation holds its councils; Sekutchka, the god of travellers, who rewards hospitality, reminding the Hellenist of Zeus Xenios; Pekoasch, a sort of nymph or naiad; and Achin, the god of horned cattle, in honour of whom the cow is said voluntarily to leave the herd, and to march readily to the place of sacrifice, a willing victim to a venerated deity.

Thus among the tribes of the Caucasus does the strange phenomenon present itself of a religion compounded of two elements the most heterogeneous, Christianity and Paganism, the latter, however, so completely preponderating, that it is now difficult to discover among the people any distinct traces of the Christian faith.

The Circassians are a brave, warlike, independent people, who have defied for many years all the armies sent by Russia to subdue them. The Russians have been obliged to erect a line of fortresses along the banks of the Kuban and Terek, in order to check their invasions. The largest tribe dwells in the district of Daghestan, on the banks of the Caspian, where, under the command of Schamyl, their indomitable chief, they have often set the Russians at defiance. Their form of government is strictly feudal, their habits of life loose and predatory, and their moral character deeply degraded by the custom which has long prevailed of selling their daughters as slaves, the Circassian women having been always in great request as wives by the rich Turks. The number of their chiefs or uzdens is reckoned at 1,500, and that of the whole population amounts to above 200,000.

CIRCE, a famous sorceress of antiquity. She was a daughter of Hyperion by Aéropé, according to some, and a daughter of Æëtes by Hecate, according to others. She had her residence on the island of Æëa, where she was visited by Odysseus, who remained with her a whole year.

CIRCENSIAN GAMES, a festival instituted by Romulus, the founder of the city of Rome. They were celebrated in honour of the god Consus, the god of counsel, and hence they were at first termed Consuales. When the Circus Maximus was afterwards erected by Tarquinius Priscus, and the games were held in that magnificent building, they received the name of Circenses, in honour of the unrivalled structure. The games commenced with a procession, in which the statues of the gods were carried upon wooden platforms, which were borne upon the shoulders of men. The heavy statues were drawn along upon wheeled cars. There were six different kinds of games practised on the occasion. 1. Chariot races. 2. An equestrian battle, which was simply a mock fight by young men of rank. 3. A representation of a battle, with a regular camp, in the circus. 4. Wrestling. 5. Hunting. 6. A representation of a sea-fight. Part of the games were abolished by Constantine the Great, and another part by the Goths; but the chariot races continued at Constantinople till the thirteenth century. The Circensian games were held in great estimation, and hence received the name of Ludi Magni, great games. The celebration continued four days, beginning on the 15th of September. They were votive offerings, which were gifts conditionally promised to the gods, under the solemn obligation of a vow. Kennet, accordingly, when speaking of votive games, says: "Such particularly were the Ludi Magni, often mentioned in historians, especially by Livy. Thus, he informs us, that in the year of the city five hundred and thirty-six, Fabius Maximus the dictator, to appease the anger of the gods, and to obtain success against the Carthaginian power upon the direction of the Sibylline oracles, vowed the great games to Jupiter, with a prodigious sum to be expended at them; besides three hundred oxen to be sacrificed to Jupiter, and several others to the rest of the deities. M. Acilius, the consul, did the same thing in the war against Antiochus. And we have some examples of these games being made quinquennial, or to return every five years. They were celebrated with Circensian sports four days together.

CIRCLE, the symbol of eternity among the ancient Egyptians, Persians, and Hindus. The year in performing its revolution, forms a circle or ring without beginning or end, and thus analogous to eternity. Sanchoniathon tells us, that the Egyptians represented the world under the figure of a fiery circle, in the midst of which was Kneph, under the form of a serpent. Pythagoras placed fire in the centre of the celestial sphere, which was supposed to be circular. Among the ancient Celtic remains, several stones are frequently found placed in a circle, with a large stone in the centre. The solar year among the Egyptians was symbolized by the golden circle of King Osymandyas. It played a conspicuous part among the architectural decorations of the Egyptians, and was divided into three hundred and sixty-five segments. Among the ancient Britons and Gauls, the Druids performed circular dances around the sacred oak-tree, in honour at once of the tree, and the deity who was supposed to dwell in it.

CIRCUMCELLIONS, a sect of Donatists which arose in North Africa in the fourth century. They received their name, which signifies vagrants, from the cellæ, or cottages of the peasants around which (circum) they hovered, having no certain dwelling-place. They styled themselves AGONISTICI (which see), or combatants, pretending that they were combating and vanquishing the devil. They are represented as having despised labour, and subsisted entirely upon alms, having evidently sprung from the ancient Ascetics. Whilst the Pagans were still in power, parties of these Circumcellions had often demolished the idols on their estates, and thus exposed themselves to martyrdom for their zeal. In A. D. 317, Constantine addressed a rescript to the North African bishops and communities, calling upon them to exercise forbearance towards these ardent iconoclasts. Nor was this toleration only temporary, but during the whole of the emperor's life they experienced the utmost tenderness at his hands. On one occasion, when they had demolished a church which he had caused to be erected for the Catholics in the town of Constantina, he ordered it to be rebuilt at his own expense, without demanding indemnification from the Donatists. The death of Constantine produced a complete change in the imperial policy. The Western Emperor Constans, to whom North Africa fell after the death of his father, set himself to attempt the union of the Donatists once more to the dominant church. At first he endeavoured, by the distribution of money under the name of alms, to win over the Donatist churches. These means, however, having proved unavailing, more forcible measures were resorted to. The Donatists were ordered to be deprived of their churches, and to be attacked by armed troops while assembled for divine worship. Bribery and persecution were alike ineffectual. "What has the emperor to do with the church?" was the scornful language with which Donatus, bishop of Carthage, repelled the advances of the emissaries of the court. The Donatists now became still more enraged with the dominant church, and began openly to avow their decided opposition to any union, of whatever kind, between the Church and the State. This doctrine was quite in unison with the views and feelings of the Circumcellions. The extravagant steps to which they now resorted, and the hot persecution which ensued, are thus described by Neander: "They roved about the country, pretending to be the protectors of the oppressed and suffering—a sacred band who were fighting for the rights of God. Perhaps they rightly perceived that there was a great deal in the relation between the proprietors and their oftentimes heavily oppressed boors, between masters and slaves, that was at variance with the spirit and doctrines of Christianity. But in the way in which they were disposed to better the matter, all civil order must be turned into confusion. They took the part of all debtors against their creditors: their chiefs, Fasir and Axid, who styled themselves the leaders of the sons of the Holy One, sent threatening letters to all creditors, in which they were ordered to give up the obligations of their debtors. Whoever refused to obey was attacked on his own estate by the furious company, and might congratulate himself if he could purchase back his life by the remission of the debt. Whenever they met a master with his slave, they obliged the former to take the place of the latter. They compelled venerable heads of families to perform the most menial services. All slaves who complained of their masters, whether justly or unjustly, were sure of finding with them assistance and the means of revenge. Several of the Donatist bishops, desirous of clearing their party from the reproach of being the abettors or advocates of such atrocities, when they found themselves unable to produce any effect by their representations on the fanatics, are said to have besought themselves the interposition of the civil power against men who refused to be governed and set right by the church; and thus gave the first occasion for resorting to force for the purpose of checking the outrages of the Circumcellions. Now came in those exhortations of Donatus, and other like-minded bishops, to excite the Circumcellions to revolt. Their ferocious deeds furnished a welcome pretext for resorting to other persecuting measures. It was determined that the unity of the church should be forcibly restored; the Donatists were to be deprived of their churches, and compelled to worship with the Catholics. It cannot be exactly determined how much, in all that was done, proceeded from imperial edicts, and how much from the despotism, the passion, or the cruelty, of individual commanders. Force continually excited the fanatic spirit still more; the report spread that the emperor's image was set up after the Pagan manner in the churches, and the worship paid to it which is due only to God. Many Donatist bishops and clergymen, many Circumcellions, fell victims to the persecution. It is natural to suppose that the reporters of the facts on the Catholic side would seek to curtail, and those on the other side to exaggerate, the truth; hence an accurate statement is out of the question. Certain it is, that many Circumcellions sought only the glory of martyrdom. Finally it came to that pass, that they threw themselves from precipices, cast themselves into the fire, and hired others to kill them. The most eminent bishops of the Donatist party, such as Donatus of Carthage, were exiled; and thus it was imagined a final check had been given to the resistance of the Donatists. So much the more violent was the reaction when a change of political relations took place, and the party hitherto oppressed thereby recovered once more its freedom. This came about under the reign of the Emperor Julian, in the year 361. The Donatists in conformity with their peculiar principles, were quite satisfied that Christianity should cease, under the Pagan ruler, to be the dominant religion of the state. Their bishops transmitted to him a petition, in which they besought a ruler who regarded only justice, to rescind the unjust decrees that had been issued against them. There could be no difficulty in obtaining a favourable answer, since the petition perfectly agreed with the principles of this emperor. He therefore issued an edict by which everything which under the preceding reign had been unlawfully undertaken against them, was to be annulled. As they were now reinstated in possession of the churches which had been taken from them, their separatist fanaticism displayed itself in the wildest freaks. They regarded those churches, and the church furniture, as having been stained and polluted by the use which the profane had made of them while they were in their possession; they dashed the utensils of the church to pieces; they painted over the walls of the churches; they polished down the altars, or removed them entirely from the churches."

The Circumcellions were the most zealous party of the DONATISTS (which see), and in their doctrinal views agreed with that sect. They counted it their duty to take the sword in defence of their religious principles, and thus multitudes of them perished by the sword, though the sect was not totally suppressed before the seventh century.

CIRCUMCISION, a solemn rite practised by the Jews and various other nations from very early times. Considerable discussion has been raised as to the period at which it was first instituted, but the earliest authentic record of its appointment is found in Gen. xvii. 10, 11, "This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you and thy seed after thee; Every man child among you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you." From this passage it plainly appears, that the rite was appointed to be observed by Abraham and his male descendants in all generations, as the sign or token of a covenant which God made with the Jews. Herodotus, who lived more than a thousand years after the days of Moses, is the most ancient profane writer who adverts to the custom, and he declares it to have existed long before his time among several nations, particularly the Egyptians and Ethiopians. Some have earnestly contended that the practice was first known among the Egyptians, but it must be remembered, that we learn from the narrative of Moses, that the Israelites were circumcised before they went down into Egypt, and, therefore, could not have learned the rite in that country. Besides, from the writings of Moses, which, not to speak of their inspiration, are admitted on all hands to be the most ancient historical records in existence, there is no evidence that the Egyptians had ever practised that rite previous to its first institution in the case of Abraham. Nay, we are informed expressly, that Abraham circumcised the men-servants whom he had brought with him out of Egypt. Jeremiah and Ezekiel, also, both of them rank the Egyptians among the uncircumcised. Thus Ezek. xxxi. 18, "To whom art thou thus like in glory and in greatness among the trees of Eden? yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden unto the nether parts of the earth: thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword. This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord God." Jer. ix. 25, 26, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will punish all them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised; Egypt, and Judah, and Edom, and the children of Ammon, and Moab, and all that are in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness: for all these nations are uncircumcised, and all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart." It appears to be far more probable, therefore, that the Egyptians had borrowed the rite from the Israelites.

The question naturally arises, what were the objects to be served by the institution of the rite of circumcision? It may be viewed in a twofold aspect, as a sign and a seal. The first and most obvious design of this rite, was to be a sign or token of the covenant which God entered into with the Jews in the person of their father Abraham. It was a distinguishing mark upon every male Israelite, separating the nation from the rest of the world, and denoting their peculiar relation to the true God as his own chosen, covenanted people. And still further, this expressive rite was a memorial to Abraham and his posterity of their engagement to be the Lord's people, dedicated to his service. Bearing about in his body this distinguishing mark, the Israelite was continually reminded that he was under the most solemn obligations to be devoted to the glory of his covenant God. Circumcision seems also, from various passages of Scripture, to have been designed to convey, as in a figure, some very important moral truths. Thus it pointed out the necessity of "putting off the whole body of sin," "crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts," "circumcising the heart, to love the Lord with all the heart, and all the soul." And Jeremiah expresses the figurative bearing of the ordinance still more strongly, iv. 4, "Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart, ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem: lest my fury come forth like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings." The apostle Paul, in Rom. iv. 9—13, teaches us still farther, that circumcision is "a seal of the righteousness of faith," or in other words, a figurative representation of that circumcision of the heart which is an inward seal of justification by faith. Such were some of the designs which Jehovah seems to have had in view in enjoining the observance of this rite upon Abraham and his posterity. The Jews are frequently termed in Scripture "the circumcision," while the Gentiles are called "the uncircumcision." Jesus Christ himself, being a Jew, was circumcised that He might be made under the law, and thus fitted to redeem them that were under the law. No uncircumcised persons were reckoned members of the Jewish church, or could partake of the great festivals, particularly the Passover.

The Jewish nation, without exception, continued tenaciously to practise circumcision throughout their whole history, until the formation of the Christian church, when a Judaizing party arose among the converts from Judaism to Christianity, who maintained the perpetual obligation of the Law of Moses. For a time they not a little disturbed the church, and endeavoured to force Paul to yield to their views in circumcising Titus, a Gentile convert, who had accompanied him to Jerusalem. Paul successfully resisted their pretensions, but soon afterwards he was followed to Antioch by some of the party, who raised a controversy, which threatened to produce a schism in the church. The matter was referred to a council of the apostles and elders, which was summoned to meet at Jerusalem. After a full consideration of the subject, the council decided that circumcision was not to be regarded as binding upon the Gentiles, and nothing farther was exacted from them than "the abstaining from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." This decree, which was characterized by the most consummate wisdom, was obviously designed for a transition period of the church's history, and to last only for a time, as appears from the very nature of the case, as referring to a mere temporary difficulty, and also from the conduct of Paul, who, in the latter part of his apostleship, as we learn from Rom. xiv. 2, and 1 Cor. viii., does not seem to have insisted upon its uniform observance in every particular.

Circumcision was appointed to be performed on the eighth day, and so strict are the Jews in observing this, that even when that day happens to be the Sabbath, they perform the operation notwithstanding, according to the common proverb, that "the Sabbath gives place to circumcision." The parents who neglected this ordinance were commanded to be cut off from among the people, and the Beth-Din, or House of Judgment, was to see it performed. The father of a child may perform the operation of circumcision if he chooses, but in every synagogue there is an individual to whom the office is generally committed, and who must be a Jew, a man of experience, vigilance, and industry. Women not being circumcised themselves, cannot assume the office of circumcisers, unless it be absolutely necessary, no man being at hand. It is not lawful for a Christian to circumcise, but if at any time the rite has been performed by a Christian, some of the blood must be afterwards drawn from the circumcised part by an Israelite before the sacrament can be considered as valid. A circumciser may be known by his long and sharp nails, which are the badge of his profession. The instrument employed in operating may be of any material used for cutting, as stone, glass, or wood, but a very sharp steel knife is generally used. Among the richer Jews the haft is sometimes cased with silver, and embellished with jewels.

Along with the circumciser there is associated in the ceremony another individual, usually termed the Baal-Berith or master of the covenant. The proper time for performing the operation is between the rising and the setting of the sun, usually in the morning when the child is fasting. It may either be performed in the synagogue or in some room of the father's dwelling-house. The ceremony itself is thus described in a Modern History of the Jews: "The morning of the eighth day being arrived, and all things prepared, two seats covered with rich carpets are placed, and, when in the synagogue, near the holy ark. Then comes the 'master of the covenant,' and sits down in one of the seats, while the Mohel or circumciser, stands by him. Then several Jews follow, one of whom cries with a loud voice, to bring all things which are necessary for the solemn operation. Several boys follow. One carrying a large torch in which are placed twelve candles, to represent the twelve tribes of the children of Israel. Next two more, carrying cups full of red wine, another carrying the circumcising knife, which is formed of stone, glass, iron, or commonly similar to a razor, and among the opulent, set in silver, or adorned with precious stones. And another boy brings a dish of sand, while the last boy brings a dish of oil, in which are clean rags to be applied to the wound. Before the infant is circumcised, he is carefully washed, and laid in clean clothes, because no prayers can be offered for him while he is defiled. All things being thus prepared, the boys and all present stand in a circle, and the circumciser in the centre. Some of whom generally bring spices, cloves, cinnamon, and wine, to give to any person if he should faint during the operation.

"The god-father then sits down upon one of these seats, and the circumciser before him, who sings the song of Moses after Israel had passed through the Red sea. The women then bring the child to the door of the synagogue, but they are not permitted to enter; but the god-father goes and takes the child, and sits down with him in his seat, and cries with a loud voice, saying, 'Blessed be he that cometh,' by whom is understood Elias, who they suppose comes to occupy the empty seat, because the Jews have a tradition among them, that he is always present at the baptism of every child, and for him the empty seat is placed; therefore when that seat is prepared, they say 'This seat is for the prophet Elias.' They also suppose that unless he is invited he will not come.

"The child is then laid upon the knees of the god father, and the circumciser takes the knife from the boy, and with a loud voice says, 'Blessed be thou, O God, our Lord, King of the world, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and given us the covenant of circumcision.' Meanwhile he performs the operation, throws the cut off part among the sand, and restores the knife to the boy. From another boy he takes the cup of red wine, drinks a mouthful, and squirts some of it upon the infant, and with it washes away the blood, and binds up the wound, having anointed it with oil. The ceremony being ended, the father of the child says, 'Blessed be thou, O God, our Lord, King of the world, who hast sanctified us in thy commandments, and hast commanded us to succeed into the covenant of our father Abraham.' To this, all the congregation reply, 'As this infant has happily succeeded into the covenant of our father Abraham, so happily shall he succeed into the possession of the law of Moses, into marriage also, and other good works.' Then the circumciser washes himself, and the god-father rising, and standing opposite to the circumciser, takes the other cup of wine, and prays over the infant, saying, 'O our God, God of our fathers, strengthen and preserve this infant to his father and mother, and grant that his name among the people of Israel may be called Isaac, (here he names the child,) who was the son of Abraham. Let the father rejoice in him that came out of his loins. Let the mother rejoice in the fruit of her womb, as it is written, 'thy father and thy mother shall be glad, and she that bare thee shall rejoice.' And God says by the prophet, 'when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live.' Here the circumciser puts his finger into the other cup, in which he had spilt the blood, and moistens the lips of the child three times with that wine, supposing that he shall live longer, because of the blood of his circumcision. Then standing near to the ark, he prays for the whole congregation, and particularly for long life to the parents and to the boy. The cut off part is cast into the sand, in allusion to that promise, 'I will make thy seed as the sand of the sea,' and that of Balaam, 'Who can number the dust of Jacob?' that is, his posterity, whose foreskin is cast into the dust. By this also, they say that the curse upon the serpent is fulfilled, 'Dust shalt thou eat,' that is this skin in the dust, so that the serpent can have no more power over them. The child being thus made a Jew, they return home, and restore him to his mother's arms."

When a Jewish child is sick on the eighth day, circumcision is postponed. In a case of acute disease affecting the whole body, it is deferred seven days after the child is perfectly recovered, but if the disease be slight or partial, the ceremony is performed immediately on recovery. If the child die before the eighth day, being uncircumcised, the operation is performed upon the dead body in the burial ground, that the reproach of uncircumcision may be taken away, and not be buried with him. No prayers are said on such an occasion, but a name is given to the child, in order that at the resurrection, when he shall be raised with the rest of the Jews, and every individual shall know his own father, mother, and family, this infant also may by his name be recognized by his parents. Spurious children are circumcised in the same manner as legitimate children, but some parts of the usual benediction are omitted. In the case of two sons at a birth, there are two circumcisers, and the preparations are all doubled. The ceremony of circumcision, in every Jewish family which can afford the expense, is concluded with a sumptuous entertainment, to which numerous friends and acquaintances are invited.

Circumcision has not been practised among the Jews alone, but among different nations which make no pretensions to be of Jewish origin. Thus the Abyssinians (see ABYSSINIAN CHURCH) practise circumcision upon children of both sexes, between the third and the eighth day after their birth. The existence of this strange peculiarity among the Abyssinians may possibly arise from the circumstance that some of the Ethiopians, who first embraced Christianity, may have previously been Jewish proselytes. That Jews at one time abounded in that country, is plain from the fact, that their descendants, estimated by Dr. Wolf at 200,000, are still in Abyssinia known by the name of Felashas. The Copts also observe the rite of circumcision; but Dr. Wilson states, that he had been informed by the patriarch, that it was practised more as a civil than a religious custom. They circumcise privately, without any fixed age for its performance. It is a curious fact, that although circumcision is not even once referred to in the Koran, the Mohammedans, nevertheless, hold it to be an ancient Divine institution, and though they do not regard it as in all cases absolutely indispensable, they yet practise the ceremony as proper and expedient. They do not imitate the Jews, however, in circumcising on the eighth day, but defer it until the child is able distinctly to pronounce the two leading articles of their faith. "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet," or until some convenient time between the age of six and sixteen. Circumcision is practised among all the tribes in Western Africa, with the exception of those on the Grain Coast, and the neglect of it exposes a man to much ridicule. There are other traces of Judaism which are also found among these tribes. Thus they follow the Jewish practice of sprinkling the blood of animals upon the doorposts of their houses, and about the places where their fetishes are kept; and in the house of their chief priest there is an altar with two horns, to which criminals fly, and lay hold of these horns, as the Jews did of old, and no man can remove them but the high-priest himself.

CIRCUMCISED (THE), a sect of Judaizing Christians, which arose in Lombardy in the twelfth century, deriving their name from the circumstance that along with other Jewish customs they practised circumcision. They were also called PASAGINI (which see).

CIRCUMCISION (THE GREAT), a name sometimes applied by early Christian writers to the ordinance of baptism, because it succeeds in the room of circumcision, and is the seal of the Christian covenant, as that was the seal of the covenant made with Abraham. Thus Ephiphanius says, The carnal circumcision served for a time till the great circumcision came, that is baptism; which circumcises us from our sins, and seals us in the name of God.

CIRCUMCISION (FESTIVAL OF THE), celebrated on the 1st of January, in commemoration of the circumcision of Christ. It did not receive that name, however, till the eleventh century, having been previously called the Octave of the Nativity, being the eighth day from that event. The day was not observed as a festival of any kind before the sixth century. It was anciently kept as a fast by Christians in opposition to the Pagans, who held a feast on that day in honour of the god JANUS (which see).

CISTÆ, small chests or boxes, which among the ancient Greeks were carried in procession in the festivals of Demeter and Dionysus. These boxes contained sacred things connected with the worship of these deities. In the worship of Dionysus, or the Indian Bacchus, who has been sometimes identified with Noah, the cista mystica, the mystic chest or ark, occupied a conspicuous place. See ARK-WORSHIP.

CISTERCIANS, a monastic order originated in the end of the eleventh century by Robert, abbot of Molesme in Burgundy, and reformed by BERNARD (which see) of Citeaux or Cistercium, in the diocese of Chalons in France. The fame which the reformer acquired for piety and strictness of discipline extended itself to the order which he had reformed. After spending only three years at Citeaux, Bernard was appointed abbot of a new monastery at Clairvaux, and here, such was the remarkable efficiency of the system pursued, that monasticism attained in consequence fresh vigour and impulse, convents being everywhere formed after the model of Clairvaux. In the short space of thirty-seven years, the convents of this order had increased to the number of sixty-seven, and at the death of Bernard, in A. D. 1153, no fewer than one hundred and sixty Cistercian monasteries had been formed in all parts of Europe. The high reputation which the order rapidly reached excited the envy and jealousy of the older monasteries, particularly those of the Cluniacensians. The two rival fraternities were distinguished by their head-dress, the new order wearing a white cowl, and the old, a black one. Earnestly did Bernard endeavour to bring about a good understanding between the two parties, but though the tract which he published on the subject contains some valuable exhortations, it failed entirely to accomplish the benevolent end with which it had been written. The Cistercian order were regulated by the rule of St.

Benedict, which they professed rigidly to observe. Under the pontificate of Innocent II., their monasteries became very wealthy by the great donations bestowed upon them. From their reformer they were sometimes called Bernardines. At their outset they had no possessions, and lived only by alms and by the labour of their hands. This self-denying spirit, however, was not of long duration; as donations poured in upon them, the fatal thirst for gold was awakened, and their chief efforts were directed to the amassing of wealth. Under the pernicious influence of luxurious habits, the order gradually lost its reputation, and became as degraded as the other monastic orders had been. The dress of the Cistercians is a white cassock with a narrow patience or scapulary, and when they go abroad, a black gown with long sleeves. They allege that St. Bernard was commanded by the Virgin Mary to wear a white dress for her sake.

CITATION, a summons formally served upon a person charged with an offence, at the instance of an ecclesiastical judge or court, requiring him to appear on a certain day, at a certain place, to answer the complaint made against him.

CITIES OF REFUGE, six cities appointed by Moses as places to which the Hebrew man-slayer might resort, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges, and that the kinsmen of the deceased might not pursue and kill him. Three of the cities were situated on one side of the Jordan, and three on the other. Those on the eastern sides were Bezer in the tribe of Reuben; Ramoth-Gilead in the tribe of Gad; and Galan in the half tribe of Manasseh. Those on the western side were Hebron in the tribe of Judah; Shechem in that of Ephraim; and Kadesh-Naphtali in that of Naphtali. Every proper arrangement was made for the comfort and protection of the offender during his residence in these cities. Although an individual, who might be accused of manslaughter, found shelter in one of the cities of refuge, he was not thereby beyond the reach of law. He was still liable to be summoned before the judges and the people, that he might prove that the crime with which he was charged was accidental and involuntary, not deliberate and intentional. If found guilty not of casual manslaughter, but of murder, he was sentenced to suffer death. If proved to be innocent of intentional shedding of blood, he was allowed to remain undisturbed in the city to which he had fled, during the lifetime of the high-priest; after which he might go at large. Should the AVENGER (which see) pursue him into the city of refuge and kill him, he himself was condemned to die. The roads which led to the cities of refuge were kept carefully in a good state of repair, that there might be no obstacle in the way of any man who sought to flee thither and at every little interval sign-posts were set up, pointing out the way. Thus the escape of the unintentional manslayer was in every way facilitated that no one might become the victim of blind revenge. The same principle has been recognized in both heathen and Christian countries. See ASYLUM.

CLANCULARII, a Christian sect which arose after the Reformation in the sixteenth century. They alleged that if religion was seated in the heart, there was no need of any outward expression of it. Like many of the Anabaptists who appeared about the same time, both in Germany and Holland, they denied the necessity of public ordinances and social meetings for worship. Their opinions in these matters somewhat approached to those of the FRIENDS (which see), attributing all to the operation of the Holy Spirit, and nothing to the outward means of grace.

CLARA'S (ST.) DAY. A festival of the Romish church observed on the 12th of August.

CLARENDON (CONSTITUTIONS OF), sixteen articles drawn up in the council of Clarendon in England, A. D. 1164, with the view of more accurately defining the regal power in respect to the clergy, and circumscribing within narrower limits the prerogatives of the bishops and clergy. These constitutions, as they were called, were drawn up by the king, Henry II., and ratified in a full assembly of the great lords, barons, and prelates of the nation. But Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, for a long time refused to subscribe to them, and it was not without the greatest reluctance that he was at length prevailed upon to do so. This haughty prelate afterwards repented of having adhibited his name to the document, and sought and obtained absolution from the Pope, who, at the same time, disapproved of most of the articles, and pronounced them null and void. (See BECKET, THOMAS A, FESTIVAL OF). The passing of the Constitutions of Clarendon being an important era in the history of the Church of England, inasmuch as it formed one of the first attempts made to assert and to establish the authority of the state over the church, it may be well to put the reader in possession of the articles in detail.

"I. When any difference relating to the right of patronage arises between the laity; or between the laity and clergy, the controversy is to be tried and ended in the king's courts.

"II. Those churches which are fees of the crown cannot be granted away in perpetuity without the king's consent.

"III. When the clergy are charged with any misdemeanour, and summoned by the justiciary, they shall be obliged to make their appearance in his court, and plead to such parts of the indictment as shall be put to them. And likewise to answer such articles in the ecclesiastical court as they shall be prosecuted for by that jurisdiction: always provided that the king's justiciary shall send an officer to inspect the proceedings of the court Christian. And in case any clerk is convicted, or pleads guilty, he is to forfeit the privilege of his character, and be protected by the Church no longer.

"IV. No archbishops, bishops, or parsons, are allowed to depart the kingdom without a licence from the crown, and provided they have leave to travel, they shall give security not to act or solicit any thing during their passage, stay, or return, to the prejudice of the king or kingdom.

"V. When any of the laity are prosecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, the charge ought to be proved before the bishop by legal and reputable witnesses: and the course of the process is to be so managed, that the archdeacon may not lose any part of his right, or the profits accruing to his office; and if any offenders appear screened from prosecution upon the score either of favour or quality, the sheriff, at the bishop's instance, shall order twelve sufficient men of the vicinage to make oath before the bishop, that they will discover the truth according to the best of their knowledge.

"VI. Excommunicated persons shall not be obliged to make oath, or give security to continue upon the place where they live: but only to abide by the judgment of the Church in order to their absolution.

"VII. No person that holds in chief of the king, or any of his barons, shall be excommunicated, or any of their estates put under an interdict, before application made to the king, provided he is in the kingdom: and in case his highness is out of England, then the justiciary must be acquainted with the dispute, in order to make satisfaction: and thus that which belongs to the cognizance of the king's court must be tried there; and that which belongs to the court Christian, must be remitted to that jurisdiction.

"VIII. In case of appeals in ecclesiastical causes, the first step is to be made from the archdeacon to the bishop: and from the bishop to the archbishop: and if the archbishop fails to do justice, a farther recourse may be had to the king; by whose order the controversy is to be finally decided in the archbishop's court. Neither shall it be lawful for either of the parties to move for any farther remedy without leave from the crown.

"IX. If a difference happens to arise between any clergyman and layman concerning any tenement; and that the clerk pretends it held by frank-almoine, and the layman pleads it a lay-fee: in this case the tenure shall be tried by the enquiry and verdict of twelve sufficient men of the neighbourhood, summoned according to the custom of the realm. And if the tenement, or thing in controversy, shall be found frank-almoine, the dispute concerning it shall be tried in the ecclesiastical court: but if it is brought in a lay-fee, the suit shall be followed in the king's courts, unless both the plaintiff and defendant hold the tenement in question of the same bishop: in which case, the cause shall be tried in the court of such bishop or baron; with this farther proviso that he who is seized of the thing in controversy shall not be disseized pending the suit, upon the score of the verdict above-mentioned.

"X. He who holds of the king, in any city, castle, or borough, or resides upon any of the demesne lands of the crown, in case he is cited by the archdeacon or bishop to answer to any misbehaviour belonging to their cognizance; if he refuses to obey their summons, and stand to the sentence of the court, it shall be lawful for the Ordinary to put him under an interdict; but not to excommunicate him till the king's principal officer of the town shall be pre-acquainted with the case, in order to enjoin him to make satisfaction to the Church. And if such officer or magistrate shall fail in his duty, he shall be fined by the king's judges. And then the bishop may exert his discipline on the refractory person as he thinks fit.

"XI. All archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, who hold of the king in chief, and the tenure of a barony, are for that reason obliged to appear before the king's justices and ministers, to answer the duties of their tenure, and to observe all the usages and customs of the realm; and, like other barons, are bound to be present at trials in the king's court, till sentence is to be pronounced for the losing of life or limbs.

"XII. When any archbishopric, bishopric, abbey, or priory of royal foundation, becomes vacant, the king is to make seizure: from which time all the profits and issues are to be paid into the exchequer, as if they were the demesne lands of the crown. And when it is determined the vacancy shall be filled up, the king is to summon the most considerable persons of the chapter to the court, and the election is to be made in the Chapel Royal, with the consent of our sovereign lord the king, and by the advice of such persons of the government as his highness shall think fit to make use of. At which time, the person elected, before his consecration, shall be obliged to do homage and fealty to the king, as his liege lord: which homage shall be performed in the usual form, with a clause for the saving the privilege of his order.

"XIII. If any of the temporal barons, or great men, shall encroach upon the rights or property of any archbishop, bishop, or archdeacon, and refuse to make satisfaction for wrong done by themselves or their tenants, the king shall do justice to the party aggrieved. And if any person shall disseize the king of any part of his lands, or trespass upon his prerogative, the archbishops, bishops, and archdeacons shall call him to an account, and oblige him to make the crown restitution.

"XIV. The goods and chattels of those who lie under forfeitures of felony or treason, are not to be detained in any church or churchyard, to secure them against seizure and justice; because such goods are the king's property, whether they are lodged within the precincts of a church, or without it.

"XV. All actions and pleas of debt, though never so solemn in the circumstances of the contract, shall be tried in the king's courts.

"XVI. The sons of copyholders are not to be ordained without the consent of the lord of the manor where they were born."

These articles were no doubt effectual to some extent in checking the growing power of the clergy, but at the same time they tended to establish the doctrine that the sovereign is governor over the church, which has come to be a recognized principle in English church polity.

CLARENINS, an order of religious founded by Angelus, a Celestine hermit, in the thirteenth century, who, upon the persecution raised against the Celestines, retired with some companions into Italy, and founded this new congregation. After the death of their founder, this order diffused itself over different parts of Italy, and established also several convents of nuns, who were under the same rule with themselves. Pope Sixtus IV. issued a Bull in favour of the Clarenins, granting them permission to put themselves under the authority of the general of the Franciscans, and to assume the habit of that order. This occasioned a division among them, some adhering to the old observances, and others adopting the rule, and submitting to the general of the Order of St. Francis. At length, in A. D. 1566, Pius V. abolished the order of the Clarenins as a separate and distinct order, incorporating them with the FRANCISCANS (which see).

CLARISSINES, an order of nuns originated by Clara of Assisi in Italy, the first abbess of the Franciscans. This enthusiastic female had gone on a pilgrimage to Rome and the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem. Having become acquainted with Francis of Assisi, the founder of the Franciscan order, she was persuaded to leave her family and friends, to cast in her lot with the followers of St. Francis, and having shaved her head, to take a vow of submission to his direction. By the advice of her spiritual guide, Clara founded, in A. D. 1212, the order of Poor Maids, which was afterwards named from her the order of St. Clara, she herself being its first superintendent. In A. D. 1224, it received its rule from Francis, and Clara obtained the title of the greatest poverty for her order from Innocent III., or as some say, Honorius III. From the church in which the order was instituted, the sisters were sometimes called the nuns of St. Damien. In the neighbourhood of that church, Clara lived forty and two years, mortifying her body with fasting, watchings, and all kinds of austerities. Next her flesh she wore the skin of a bristly boar, lay on hard wooden boards, and went barefooted. In Lent, and at other fasting times, she lived only on bread and water; and tasted wine only on Sundays. Her reputation for piety and austerity having rapidly spread, her followers so multiplied, that many monasteries of this order were formed in different parts of Italy. In 1219, the order passed into Spain, and thence into France

By the rule of St. Francis which they followed, the sisters were allowed to retain no worldly possessions whatever, and they were enjoined silence from the compline to the tierce of the following day. For dress they were permitted to have three tunics and a mantle. After the death of its founder, the order made even greater progress than it had done during her life, and at this day it is one of the most flourishing orders of nuns in Europe. After the conquest of Mexico by Cortez, some nuns of this order were dispatched to that country, where they formed settlements at different places, devoting themselves to the instruction of young Indian females. These religious communities continue still to flourish.

CLASSIS, in the Dutch Reformed Church, both in Holland and America, corresponds to the PRESBYTERY (which see) of other Presbyterian churches.

CLEMENTIA, a heathen goddess worshipped among the ancient Romans, being a personification of the virtue of clemency. Temples and altars were reared in honour of this deity in the time of the Emperors, and she is still seen represented on the coins of Tiberius and Vitellius, with a patera in her right, and a lance in her left hand. Claudian describes her as the guardian of the world. Plutarch and Cicero tell us, that the Romans dedicated a temple to her by order of the senate, after the death of Julius Cæsar.

CLEMENTINES, a remarkable apocryphal book, belonging to the second or third century. It is called the Clementines or the eighteen Homilies, in which, as it is pretended, Clement, descended from a noble family in Rome, and afterwards bishop of the church in that city, gives an account of his conversion, and of the discourses and disputes of the apostle Peter. The author seems to have adopted the doctrines of the Elcesaites, and he sets himself to combat the Gnostics in the person of Simon-Magus. He opposes also the Montanist prophesying, the hypostatic doctrine of the Trinity, and millenarianism. The doctrines directly inculcated in this strange production are thus briefly sketched by Gieseler in his able Compendium of Ecclesiastical History: "God, a pure, simple being of light, has allowed the world to be formed in contrasts, and so also the history of the world and of men runs off in contrasts, corresponding by way of pairs, in which the lower constantly precedes the higher. From the beginning onward God has revealed himself to men, while his Holy Spirit, from time to time in the form of individual men, (Adam, Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Jesus), as the true prophet constantly announced the very same truth, and in Jesus, caused it also to be communicated to the heathen. According to the law of contrasts, false prophets also are always produced in addition to the true, who corrupt the truth. Thus the original doctrines of Mosaism are perfectly identical with Christianity; though they have not been preserved in their purity in the Pentateuch, which was not composed till long after Moses; and in the present form of Judaism, have been utterly perverted. In general, the truth has been constantly maintained in its purity only by a few by means of secret tradition. Man is free, and must expect after death a spiritual continuation of life with rewards and punishments. The conditions of happiness are love to God and man, and struggling against the demons which draw away to evil through sensuality. For this purpose these sectaries prescribed abstinence from animal food, frequent fastings and washings, recommended early marriage and voluntary poverty, but rejected all sacrifice."

Though the doctrines which the Clementines taught were received only by a few persons in Rome and Cyprus, yet the book attracted no small notice, and was generally regarded rather as the corruption of a genuine writing by heretics, than as a forgery. Accordingly, not long after a work appeared professing to purify the Clementines from heresy, and altering it entirely that it might be conformed to the standard of the orthodoxy of the day. This expurgated edition of the Clementines exists now only in the Latin translation of Rufinus, under the title Recognitiones Clementis. Neander considers the Clementines as a sort of romance, partly philosophical and partly religious, and though he admits it to be a fiction, it appears to him to be clearly a fiction drawn from real life.

CLEMENTINES, a sect which arose in the present century in the south of France, particularly in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees, deriving their name from a priest of the name of Clement, who is said to have been their founder. They dissent from the Church of Rome on various points, expressing a strong dislike to several Popish ceremonies, while they retain the mass, and practise confession. They reject the use of images in churches, and some of their priests use the French language instead of the Latin in their prayers. The adherents of this sect are generally favourable to Augustinian doctrines, and are characterized by a serious and devout deportment, irreproachable purity of morals, and strict observance of the Lord's day.

CLERESTORY, the name applied to denote the upper tier or story of windows in churches, above the roof of the aisle on the outside, and above the pier arches on the inside.

CLERGY, a term by which those invested with the ministerial office came to be distinguished from the laity or ordinary members of the church. Such a distinction seems to have been wholly unknown in the early ages of Christianity. In Sacred Scripture all believers are termed God's heritage, or cleri, or clergy. Thus 1 Pet. v. 3, "Neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." The same apostle speaks of all believers also as, without distinction, "a royal priesthood." As long as the church was viewed in this purely spiritual aspect, deriving its whole life in all its members from union to Christ, no distinction was for a moment recognised among different classes within its pale. But when the church came to be viewed chiefly in its outward aspect, the universal priestly character of its members was gradually lost sight of, and the idea was formed of the necessity of a particular mediatory priesthood attached to a distinct order. The change which thus took place in the views of many Christians is seen as early as the time of Tertullian, who calls the bishop a high priest. Such a mode of expression shows that Jewish modes of thinking had begun to insinuate themselves into the minds of Christians, and a false comparison was instituted between the Christian priesthood and the Jewish. We find Cyprian in his writings completely imbued with such erroneous notions, and attaching to the terms clerus and clerici the unauthorized meaning of a class of persons pre-eminently consecrated to God, like the Levites of the Old Testament, who received no particular allotment in the division of the lands, but were to have God alone for their inheritance, and to receive tithes from the rest for the administration of the public functions of religion. It is quite possible, however, that when the term clergy was first adopted, the full extent of the comparison with the Levites might not be perceived. This may have been reserved for a later period in the history of the church. The Greek word cleros, as Neander thinks, signified originally the place which had been allotted to each one in the community by God's providence, or the choice of the people directed by that providence; hence the church offices were particularly denominated cleroi, and the persons chosen to them clericoi.

But while an order thus arose in the church denominated clergy, and to whom the office of teaching began to be exclusively confined, it was long before the universal priesthood of Christians lost its hold upon the great body of the faithful. Even in the third century, so unwilling were many to drop this idea, that many bishops of the East were accustomed occasionally to invite competent laymen to preach the word. And in the Apostolical Constitutions, there is an ordinance under the name of the apostle Paul, decreeing, "If any man, though a layman, be skilful in expounding doctrine, and of venerable manners, he may be allowed to teach, for all should be taught of God." In very early times, when the great body of Christians were drawn from the poorer classes, it is not unlikely that the presbyters and deacons who taught in the church, continued to exercise their former trades and occupations for the support of themselves and families. As the Christian communities, however, became larger, and the spiritual duties of the teachers were in consequence more multiplied, the task of maintaining the presbyters on whom the spiritual calling now devolved, was felt to belong to the whole members of the church. The clergy were now gradually withdrawn from all worldly occupations, and in the third century they were strictly forbidden to undertake any secular employment of whatever kind. Another motive which had a powerful influence in accomplishing the separation of the spiritual from the secular in the Christian ministry, is thus noticed by Neander: "When the idea of the universal Christian priesthood retired to the back-ground, that of the priestly consecration which all Christians should make of their entire life went along with it. As men had distinguished, in a way contradictory to the original Christian consciousness, a particular priesthood from the universal and ordinary calling of all Christians; so now they set over against each other a spiritual and a secular province of life and action, notwithstanding Christ had raised the entire earthly life to the dignity of a spiritual life. And from this view of the matter it was deemed necessary to forbid the priestly, consecrated clergy, all contact with the world and the things of the world. Thus we have here the germ out of which sprang at length the whole medieval priesthood and the laws of celibacy. But by this outward holding at a distance of secular things, the worldly sense could not be charmed away from the clergy, nor the sense for divine things awakened in them. This external renunciation of the world might be the means of introducing into the heart a spiritual pride, hiding the worldly sense under this mask. Cyprian quotes 2 Tim. ii. 14, as warranting the prohibition of worldly employments. But he could not remain ignorant of what, at this particular time, when the universal Christian calling was commonly regarded as a militia Christi or Christian warfare, must have immediately suggested itself to every one, that these words applied to all Christians, who, as soldiers of Christ, were bound to perform their duty faithfully, and to guard against every foreign and worldly thing which might hinder them in their warfare. Acknowledging and presupposing this himself, he concludes, 'Since this is said of all Christians, how much more should they keep themselves clear of being involved in worldly matters, who, engrossed with divine and spiritual things, ought never to turn aside from the Church, nor have time for earthly and secular employments.' The clergy, then, were, in following that apostolic rule, only to shine forth as patterns for all others, by avoiding what was foreign to their vocation, what might turn them from the faithful discharge of it. But still that false opposition between the worldly and the spiritual, found here also a point of attachment."

The clergy seem to have been chosen to their office in the primitive Christian church according to no definite and fixed rule, but probably in a variety of different ways according to circumstances. We have full information in the New Testament as to the mode pursued in the election of deacons, the choice being in their case vested in the whole church. It is not unlikely, as we might argue from analogy, that the same mode of election would be generally followed in regard to other church officers. On this point, Clemens Romanus cites a rule as having been handed down from the days of the apostles, to the effect that church offices "should be filled according to the judgment of approved men, with the consent of the whole community." This rule, if authentic, would seem to indicate that the apostles themselves had, in the first instance, nominated to offices in the church; and this idea is in complete accordance with the charge which Paul gives to Titus, to ordain presbyters or elders in every city. Cyprian held that the whole Christian community had the power of choosing worthy, or rejecting unworthy bishops. Nor was this a mere form, but an undoubted privilege, which the members of the church were not slow to claim. Sometimes it happened that a bishop was proclaimed by the voice of the community, even before arrangements had been fully made for his regular election.

There appears no evidence of any difference of rank among the clergy, either in the age of the apostles or of their immediate successors, nor indeed until the establishment of Christianity under Constantine. Before that period a distinction had probably existed among the clergy themselves, some of them being recognized as superior, and others as inferior. But it was a long time before even these relations became so distinct as they have been since the establishment of the Eastern and Western hierarchy in the eighth century. The primitive presbyters first found it necessary to contend against the pretensions of the bishops to superiority; and afterwards against the deacons, but especially the archdeacons, who took the side of the bishops. On the other hand, bishops themselves had to maintain an arduous and protracted struggle with the archbishops, primates, and patriarchs. The contest with the patriarchs in particular, resulted in the popish supremacy. It was Constantine the Great, who first invested the Christian priesthood with peculiar honours. The Christian bishops, it was supposed, ought at least to be equal in rank to the Jewish priesthood, who, besides, being distinguished from those who were not anointed with the sacred oil, were considered as entitled to the highest respect in virtue of their office. Constantine himself claimed a sacred character. Eusebius terms him a bishop duly constituted by God. Gratian was the last emperor who took upon himself this title. The clergy, in virtue of their office, were viewed as the appointed guardians of the morals of the community, and even the highest magistrates and princes submitted to the censures of the church. But while their spiritual authority was thus readily respected, we can gather no proof that for a long period they were considered as holding any peculiar elevation of rank in civil life. On the re-establishment of the Western empire, however, their civil and political relations were clearly defined; and under the Carlovingian dynasty the bishops obtained the rank of barons and counts, and thus invested with civil dignity, they took part in all political, as well as ecclesiastical matters, and were regular members of all imperial diets. At a later period bishops, archbishops, and abbots, were by statute laws made princes of the empire, and electors.

From the fourth century, when the clergy were duly acknowledged by the civil authorities as a distinct body, they were invested with peculiar privileges. Even previous to his conversion, Constantine conferred upon the clergy of the Christian church privileges equal to those enjoyed by the Jewish and Pagan priests. Those of the early emperors who favoured Christianity, added to these privileges from time to time, until they became both numerous and valuable. The most important of these special advantages are thus noticed by Mr. Coleman in his 'Christian Antiquities':

"1. Exemption from all civil offices, and secular duties to the state. Such exemption was granted by Constantine A. D. 312; and in 319 and 330 it was extended to the inferior order; and the reason assigned for conferring this privilege was, that 'the clergy might not for any unworthy pretence be called off from their religious duties,' or, as Eusebius expresses it, 'that they might have no false pretence or excuse for being diverted from their sacred calling, but rather might rightfully prosecute it without molestation.' By this right they were excused from bearing burdensome and expensive municipal offices. The Jewish patriarchs and pagan priests enjoyed a similar exemption.

"2. Exemption from all sordid offices, both predial and personal. This right was also granted by Constantine and confirmed by Theodosius the Great and Honorius. The right relieved them from the necessity of furnishing post-horses, &c. for public officers, and sometimes from that of constructing and repairing public highways and bridges.

"3. Exemption from certain taxes and imposts, such as the census capitum, analogous to poll-tax; but the learned are not agreed respecting the precise nature of it; the aurum tironium, an assessment for military purposes, a bounty paid as a substitute for serving in the army; the equus canonicus, the furnishing and equipping of horses for military service; chrysargyrum, commerce-money, duties on articles of trade assessed every five years, and paid in silver and gold; the metatum, a tax levied for the entertainment of the emperor and his court as he travelled, or for judges and soldiers in their journeys; the collatio superindicta et extraordinaria, a direct tax levied on special emergencies. Certain taxes on real estate they were required to pay.

"4. Exemption from military duty. This right is not expressly stated, but fairly inferred from many considerations.

"5. Exemption in certain civil and criminal prosecutions. They were not required to give testimony under oath. Neither were they required to make oath to affidavits, but instead thereof they attested the truth of them on the Bible at home.

"6. No ecclesiastical matters were to be tried before secular courts. Of this nature were all questions of faith and practice which came appropriately under the cognizance of presbyteries, bishops, or synods, together with all such acts of discipline as belonged to individual churches, in which the clergy were allowed a controlling influence.

"The primitive church had originally no other authority than that of deposing from office, excommunicating, and pronouncing their solemn anathema; but after the church became dependent upon the civil authority, that power was often exercised to redress the offences of the church. Heretics especially were thus brought before courts of justice. For it is undeniably evident that heresy was regarded as an actionable offence, deserving severe punishment. Offences of a graver character were at all times punishable, not in ecclesiastical, but in secular courts of justice.

"7. Bishops, like the Jewish patriarchs, were often requested to settle disputes and act as arbitrators and umpires in civil matters. They were also common intercessors in behalf of criminals for their reprieve or pardon when condemned to death."

In regard to the costume of the clergy, to which so much importance is attached in the Romish church, it is generally admitted that during the three first centuries their dress differed in no respect from that of the laity. But although this was undoubtedly the case with their ordinary dress, it is not unlikely that when engaged in official duty they might wear some peculiar clerical dress. Tradition ascribes even to the apostles themselves certain insignia of office. Hegeippus, as mentioned by Eusebius, assigns to John, James, and Mark, a golden headband, and to Bartholomew a splendid mantle. The Koran also speaks of the apostles under the name of Albati, in allusion, as it would seem, to the traditional notion that they wore white robes. But whatever may be said of these unauthorized suppositions, it is not until the fourth century that we find councils beginning to regulate the costume of the clergy. The council of Laodicea gave orders that the Orarium or robe of an officiating minister should not be worn by the subordinate attendants, readers or singers. The fourth council of Carthage forbade the deacons to use the white surplice, unless when engaged in the discharge of the ministerial office. The monks appear to have been the first who assumed the ecclesiastical garb in ordinary life, and the practice is condemned by Jerome in strong language. Bellarmine has traced the clerical costume through eight or nine hundred years. It would appear to have been originally white. The bishops of Constantinople, and the higher order of clergy in the fourth century, assumed the black robe, while the Novatians retained the white. But since the tenth century the modern Greek church have changed the colour of their costume. On festivals in honour of saints, they usually wear a purple robe. In the seventh and eighth centuries, red, blue, and green was worn in clerical vestments as well as black and white. Innocent III. prescribed white as the emblem of purity, to be worn by confessors and young persons, red as a suitable memorial of the apostles and martyrs, green for Sundays and feast-days, and black for fasts, funerals, and Lent. Violet was worn at first, only twice a-year, but afterwards became common in some churches. The clerical tuncure was introduced between the sixth and eighth centuries, and continued to be an essential requisite of the clergy, while the other ornaments of the head were endlessly varied both in the Eastern and Western churches. The use of the wig was of a date still later, and was universally adopted, and continued in use for a long time, after which it was laid aside. It was introduced in the Protestant churches in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Sandals, and a kind of half-boot called caligæ, were at first in common use among the clergy, and the use of ordinary shoes was regarded as unclerical. In A. D. 789, the priests were required to wear shoes made after the fashion at Rome. In the middle ages, they wore a kind of boot in summer, called cæstivalia.

On the mode in which the clergy have been maintained, see articles REVENUES (CHURCH), TITHES.

CLERGY (BENEFIT OF), a privilege enjoyed by persons in holy orders, which had its origin in the claim asserted by the clergy in Romish countries, to be wholly, or at least to a certain extent, exempt from lay jurisdiction. In England, it was at first confined to cases of felony, when committed by clergymen; but although such was the original design of the privilege, it came at length to extend to almost every man, the word clerk being applied in the laws of England to every man who was able to read. The privilege was accorded to peers, whether they could read or not, and by statutes passed in the reign of William and Mary, women also became entitled to claim the privilege. A clergyman sought benefit of clergy, when he asserted his right to be delivered to his ordinary to purge himself of felony. The right was extended to the laity by an act passed in the reign of Elizabeth, whereby every man to whom the benefit of clergy was granted, though not in orders, was put to read at the bar after he was found guilty, and convicted of felony, and so burnt in the hand, and set free for the first time, if the ordinary or deputy standing by should say, "He reads as a clerk;" otherwise he was to suffer death. This privilege, while it existed in England, was attended with great abuses, but by the statute of 7th and 8th Geo. IV. c. 28, it was entirely abolished, so that no felon, whether clerical or lay, can claim exemption from trial by the ordinary civil tribunals of the land. The benefit of clergy is still retained in one or two of the States of North America, while it has been formally abolished in all the others. By an act of Congress of April 30, 1790, it is enacted, that benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed upon conviction of any crimes, for which by any statute of the United States the punishment is or shall be declared to be death.

CLERGY (BLACK). See BLACK CLERGY.

CLERGY (REGULAR), those monks or religious in the Church of Rome who have taken upon themselves holy orders, and perform the offices of the priesthood in their several monasteries. In the Greek church, their dress is a long cloth robe of a brown colour, and confined with a girdle. Their monastic life is of a very austere description; they never eat meat, and during the fasts only bread and fruits. Some of them live always upon bread and water, and spend their time almost entirely in their devotions.

CLERGY (SECULAR), those of the Romish clergy who are not of any religious order, and have the care and direction of parishes. In the Greek church, the secular are not so highly honoured as the regular clergy, and are generally of a humbler station in life, as well as very illiterate. The secular Greek priests who are married, are distinguished by a white muslin band round their bonnet of black felt.

CLERGY (WHITE), the Russian secular clergy.

CLERICI ACEPHALI, a name given to vagrant clergymen in the Romish church, or such ecclesiastics and monks as wandered about from one district to another. The council of Pavia, in A. D. 850, issued an edict against these clergy, declaring that while it was a praiseworthy thing that the laity should be desirous of having the mass continually celebrated in their houses, they should be on their guard against employing for this purpose any but ecclesiastics duly approved by the bishops.

CLERICIS LAICOS, a bull issued by Boniface VIII. in A. D. 1296, and aimed against Philip the Fair, king of France. In this bull all princes and nobles were pronounced under ban who demanded tribute under any form from the church and the clergy; and all who paid such tribute were involved in the same condemnation and penalty. The circumstance which led to the publication of this bull, was the demand made by Philip that the spiritual order, in common with all other classes, should contribute money towards defraying the expenses of his wars. Boniface looked upon such a demand as an encroachment upon the liberties of the church, but the king, in a declaration which he issued in answer to the bull, argued that the church of Christ consists not of the clergy alone, but also of laymen, and, therefore, that the clergy have no right to appropriate to themselves exclusively the ecclesiastical freedom which belongs to all, understanding thereby the freedom obtained for us by the grace of Christ. The king further reminded the Pope, that Christ had enjoined the priests of the temple both to render to God the things that are God's, and to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

CLERK. From a coin struck during the triumvirate of Augustus, Anthony, and Lepidus, some have supposed the clerk, writer, or scribe, referred to in Acts xix. 35, and translated in our version "town-clerk," to have been a sacred officer, who officiated under the presidency of the Asiarchs, when the Ephesians solemnized games in honour of Diana. The word "clerk" was formerly used in our language simply to denote any learned man, and in the statute law of England, implied any individual who could read, but now it is the common appellation by which clergymen distinguish themselves when signing any deed or instrument.

CLERK (PARISH), an ecclesiastical officer in the Church of England, who conducts or leads the responses in a congregation, and otherwise assists in the services of the church. In cathedrals and collegiate churches there are several of these lay clerks; in parish churches generally there is but one who is styled the parish clerk. In some of the old cathedrals, the lay vicars or clerks form a corporation either jointly with the priest vicars or by themselves, and have a common estate. In the new cathedrals they do not form a corporation, but in some cases have a common estate given to them subsequently to the foundation, besides their statutable payments from the chapter. The annual income of each lay clerk varies from £114 12s. at Durham, to £40 at Peterborough, and about £30 at Christ Church, Oxford. They have not, in general, houses of residence. They are expected commonly to attend the cathedral services twice every day throughout the year. Before the Reformation, and for some time after, the parish clerks were all clergymen, and the duties which they were called upon to discharge included the ordinary functions of a curate. They assisted the incumbent in performing divine service, reading the Scripture lessons of the day, and leading the sacred music. At present, in some places, the parish clerk is in holy orders, but in such cases he generally has a deputy clerk to perform the ordinary duties. The general practice, however, is for the minister, in whom the right of election is by statute vested, to confer the office upon a layman. The regular duties of the parish clerk are to lead the responses, to give out the psalms or hymns which are to be sung during service, to announce notices of vestry or parish meetings, to attend on the officiating minister at baptisms, marriages, and funerals, and to assist in keeping a careful register of such proceedings. By the canons, the clerk must be at least twenty years of age, known to the parson, vicar, or minister, to be of honest conversation, and sufficient for his reading, writing, and also for his competent skill in singing. When chosen, and appointed to the office, he is generally licensed by the Ordinary, after which he takes oath to obey the minister. The clerk may be deprived of office by the incumbent from whom he received his appointment, and if unjustly deprived, the churchwardens may restore him.

CLERKS (APOSTOLICAL). See APOSTOLIC CLERKS.

CLERKS (MINOR). See FRANCISCANS.

CLERKS (REGULAR), a name given to various religious orders or societies which sprung up in the Church of Rome at the period of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. The object of these institutions was to aim at imitating and restoring the ancient virtue and sanctity of the clergy, which had to a great extent declined.

CLERKS OF THE COMMON LIFE. See BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LOT.

CLERKS (REGULAR) OF ST. MAJOLI, a religious order which arose in Italy in the sixteenth century. They were also called the Fathers of Somasquo, from the name of the town where their first general resided. The founder of the order was Jerome Æmilianus. It was approved by Paul III. in 1540, and then by Pius IV. in 1543. Its members took upon themselves the office of carefully instructing the ignorant, and especially the young in the precepts of Christianity.

CLERKS (REGULAR) OF ST. PAUL. See BAR-NABITES.

CLERKS (THEATINS), an order of religious which arose in the Church of Rome in the sixteenth century. It took its name from Theate or Chieti in the Neapolitan territory, whose bishop at that time was John Peter Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV., who founded this society in 1524. The brethren of this order were bound to keep a vow of voluntary poverty, and to live upon the bounty of the pious. They were required to succour decaying piety, to improve the style of preaching, to attend upon the sick and dying, and to oppose all heretics manfully and vigorously.

CLEROMANCY (Gr. cleros, a lot, and manteia, divination), a method of divination by lot, which was in use among the ancient Greeks and Romans. It was generally performed by casting black and white beans, small clods of earth, pebbles, dice, or other things, into an urn or other vessel. After making supplication to the gods, they drew them out, and according to the characters or marks by which they were previously distinguished, conjectures were formed of what should happen. The practice of divining by lot, according to Tacitus, prevailed also among the ancient Germans. "Their mode of proceeding by lots," says he, "is wonderfully simple. The branch of a fruit-tree is cut into small pieces, which being distinctly marked, are thrown at random on a white garment. If a question of public interest be pending, the priest of the canton performs the ceremony; if it be nothing more than a private concern, the master of the family officiates. With fervent prayers offered up to the gods, his eyes devoutly raised to heaven, he holds up three times each segment of a twig, and as the marks rise in succession interprets the decree of fate. If appearances prove unfavourable, there ends all consultation for that day; if, on the other hand, the chances are propitious, they require for greater certainty the sanction of auspices." Among the ancient Romans, the lots were often little tablets or counters, which were usually thrown into a sitella or urn having a neck so narrow that only one lot at a time could come to the top of the water when it was shaken. Sometimes the names of the parties using them were inscribed upon the lots, and in later times verses from illustrious poets were written upon little tablets. After the introduction of Christianity, the practice became common among the early Christians of using the lot as the heathens had done, but instead of the writings of the poets, they substituted the Bible, which they opened at random, regarding the passage which first met the eye as the answer to their inquiry, or the solution of their difficulty. This superstitious custom was condemned by various councils. See BIBLIOMANCY, DIVINATION.

CLETA, one of the two Charites or GRACES (which see), which the Spartans anciently worshipped, the other being Phæenna.

CLIDOMENI, a term used in one of Cyprian's epistles, to denote DEMONIACS (which see).

CLINIC BAPTISM, the name given in the ancient Christian church to baptism, when administered to a person in sickness or on his death-bed. The practice of administering the ordinance in these circumstances often led to great abuse, as many persons, though professing Christianity, delayed submitting to baptism in the expectation that they would receive it when they came to a sick or dying bed. Constantine the Great, though openly avowing his belief in the Christian system, was not baptized until a short time before his death. If an individual recovered health after having received clinic baptism, he was subjected to several disabilities, and in particular, he was not permitted to enter into holy orders. This mode of dispensing baptism could only be done by sprinkling, and not by immersion, or washing the body all over. A question, therefore, arose in the time of Cyprian, whether persons thus baptized were to be looked upon as complete Christians; and that eminent father resolves it in the affirmative, at the same time leaving it to others who had doubts as to the validity of clinic baptism, to repeat the ordinance by immersion if they thought right. Although it was undoubtedly the practice, and even the law of the early church, to deny ordination to those who had undergone clinic baptism, the council of Neocæsarea permitted them in time of great exigence, or in case of great merit, to be ordained. Thus Novatian, as we are informed by Eusebius, was ordained on account of his pregnant parts, and the hopes which the church entertained of him, although he had been admitted into the church by clinic baptism. In cases of extreme sickness, this kind of baptism was considered as valid, even when administered to an individual in a state of utter unconsciousness. See BAPTISM.

CLIO, one of the nine MUSES (which see) worshipped by the ancient Greeks and Romans. She was the Muse of history, and is usually represented in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books.

CLOACA, a name applied by Gregory the Great to the baptismal font. See BAPTISTRY.

CLOACINA, a surname of Venus among the ancient Romans, said to be applied to that goddess from an old Latin verb cloare or cluere, to purify, because Romulus and Tatius had caused their armies to purify themselves with sacred myrtle branches, on the spot which was afterwards occupied by the temple of Venus Cloacina.

CLOISTERS, a covered walk usually occupying the four sides of a quadrangle, which is generally an appendage to a monastery. The term is used sometimes to denote the monastery itself. In the early Christian churches the porticos about the area were called also cloisters, which formed the exterior narthex of the church.

CLOTH (PURCHASE OF THE), a ceremony followed by the modern Jews in forming contracts. All bargains, sales or agreements, are reckoned duly executed, and in full force, when both parties have touched the clothes or the handkerchief of the witnesses, which is a kind of oath called the Purchase of the Cloth.

CLOTHES (RENDING OF THE) a very ancient mode of expressing sorrow in the East. Immediately on the death of any person, his relations rent their garments from the neck downwards in front to the girdle, and a cry of lamentation filled the room. This practice was never omitted by the Hebrews in case of any sorrowful event. It was forbidden, however, to the high priest, who never tore his robe except when he heard blasphemy. The modern Jews only faintly imitate this custom, cutting a small portion of their garments to show that they are afflicted. On the decease of a brother or sister, wife, daughter, or son, they take a knife, and holding the blade downwards, give the coat or other upper garment a cut on the right side, and then rend it about a handbreadth in length. On the decease of a father or mother, the rent is made in the same manner on the left side in all the garments. See MOURNING.

CLOTHO, one of the three FATES (which see) of the ancient heathens. Clotho was regarded as the spinning fate, and hence her symbol was a spindle with which she spun the thread of man's destiny. She is generally represented as a grave maiden with a spindle or a roll, which denotes the book of fate.

CLUNIACENSIS, a congregation of Benedictine monks which arose in the tenth century, having Odo, abbot of Cluny or Clugni in France, at their head. It happened that the rule of St. Benedict had been so far departed from by many monks of the Latin church, that a reform in this respect seemed to be imperatively called for. This was afforded by Odo, a French nobleman, who, from his position as abbot of a monastery, took occasion not only to restore the original strictness of the Benedictine rule, but also to impose additional rites and obligations. He evidently attached a high value to the moral power of Christianity, and sought to infuse into the monks under his care a greater regard to the real spirit of the Christian system, than to its mere external forms. To show that it was possible even for a layman to lead a holy and pious life, he composed a biographical account of Count Gerald of Aurilly, a man distinguished above those of his own order by his diligent and faithful study of the Scriptures, by his devotional habits, his lively sympathy in all Christian objects, his beneficence and his gentle treatment of his tenants. The mode of living which Odo prescribed to the Benedictine monks, procured for its author great fame and popularity, and at length the salutary regulations were adopted by numerous monasteries throughout Europe, which united in a kind of association under the abbot of Cluny. Many of the ancient monasteries in France, Germany, Italy, Britain, and Spain, embraced the new and stricter rule thus introduced; and the new monasteries which were founded came under the same discipline. Thus was formed that congeries of associations, which, under the name of Cluniacensians, rapidly rose into wealth, fame, and power. The convent of Cluny was originally founded in A. D. 910, by Duke William of Aquitania; but it was under Odo that its fame became general. From this time lay abbots gradually disappeared in France. Under the immediate successors of Odo the order continued to flourish. In course of time, however, its original strictness of discipline became gradually relaxed, and its popularity in consequence declined.

In the twelfth century, an individual was appointed to the office of abbot of Cluny, who was one of the most distinguished men of the church in his times, and to whom even his contemporaries gave the title of Venerable. This man, Peter Mauritius, infused new life and vigour into the Cluniacensian order. Of this remarkable person, and the beneficial influence which he exercised, Neander gives the following interesting sketch: "He was descended from a family of consideration in Auvergne, and is to be reckoned among the many great men of the church on whose development the influence of Christian training, by pious mothers, had a lasting effect. The character of his mother, who later in life became a nun, was delineated by his own pen with filial affection, soon after her death. Under him the order took a different direction from that in which it had originated. As this man, distinguished for his amiable and gentle spirit, strongly sympathized with everything purely human, so, under his guidance, the monastery, before consecrated alone to rigid asceticism, became a seat also of the arts and sciences. A Christian delicacy of feeling, far removed from the sternness and excess which we elsewhere find in monasticism, forms a characteristic trait in the character of this individual. To a prior, who was not disposed to relax in the least from the zeal of an over-rigid asceticism, he wrote: 'God accepts no sacrifices which are offered to him contrary to his own appointed order.' He held up to him the example of Christ: 'The devil invited Christ to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple; but he who came to give his life for the salvation of the world, refused to end it by a suicidal act,—thereby setting an example, which admonishes us that we are not to push the mortification of the body to self-destruction. With great boldness, he told even the popes their faults. Thus he wrote to Eugene the Third: 'Though you have been set by God over the nations, in order to root out and to pull down, to build and to plant (Jer. i. 10); still, because you are neither God nor the prophet to whom this was said, you may be deceived, betrayed, by those who seek only their own. For this reason, a faithful son, who would put you on your guard against such dangers, is bound to make known to you what has been made known to him, and what you perhaps may still remain ignorant of.'"

About this time a new order, the CISTERCIANS (which see), attracted so much notice in consequence of the strict discipline enforced by Bernard of Clairvaux, that the envy of the older monkish societies was naturally excited. The Cluniacians and the Cistercians now passed into a state of mutual hostility. Bernard composed a tract upon the subject, in which he exhorted both parties to mutual forbearance and love. But these benevolent efforts were unavailing. The controversy waxed warm on both sides. The Cluniacians accused the Cistercians of too great austerity; the Cistercians, on the other hand, taxed the Cluniacians with having abandoned their former sanctity and regular discipline. To this contest was added another respecting tithes. In A. D. 1132, Innocent II. issued a decree exempting the Cistercians from the payment of tithes on their lands; and as many of these lands had paid tithes to the Cluniacians, that order was greatly offended at this indulgence shown to their rivals by the pontiff, and, accordingly, they engaged in a warm controversy both with the Cistercians and the pontiff himself. This dispute terminated in some kind of adjustment which was brought about in A. D. 1155. The monks of Cluny were addicted to ostentation and display in their places of worship. Hence they were reproached by the Cistercians with having their churches "immensely high, immoderately long, superfluously broad, sumptuously furnished, and curiously painted." So that men were led to admire that which was beautiful more than that which was sacred. At one time such was the pride of this order, that the head of their monastery actually claimed the title of abbot of abbots. The matter was referred to a council held at Rome in A. D. 1117, in the pontificate of Paschal XI., when the title was decided rightfully to belong to the abbot of Monte Cassino, that being considered as the most ancient of all the monasteries.

CNEPH, or CNUPHIS, an ancient Egyptian divinity, corresponding to the Greek AGATHODÆMON (which see), a name which was also applied to this deity by the Phœnicians. Both Strabo and Eusebius represent him as having been worshipped in the form of a serpent; and in the amulets of later times he is seen as a serpent or dragon raising itself on its tail, having rays about its head, and surrounded with stars. Plutarch regards him as having been a spiritual divinity. According to Eusebius, he was the creator and ruler of the world, in the Egyptian mythology, and represented as a man with dark complexion, having a girdle, and a sceptre in his hand. He was said to have produced an egg, the symbol of the world, from which sprung Ptha, or, as he is called by the Greeks, Hephestus. Cneph then was among the Egyptians the first emanation of the Supreme Being, the efficient reason of things, the creator, the demiurgus.

CNIDIA, a surname of APHRODITE (which see), derived from the town of Cnidus in Caria, for which Praxiteles made his celebrated statue of the goddess.

COADJUTOR, one ordained to assist the incumbent of a parish who may happen to be disabled by infirmity or old age. In the early church, bishops chosen in these circumstances were called bishops coadjutor. They were subordinate to the bishop, whom they were appointed to assist during his life, and succeeded him when he died.

COAT, the innermost garment worn by the Jewish high-priest in ancient times. It was made of fine linen, and therefore white. It fitted close to the body, and was provided with sleeves coming down to the wrist, while the coat itself was so long as to reach down to the heels. The Hebrew doctors say, that if the high-priest happened to have a plaster upon a sore between the inward garment and his skin; or if his garments had a rent in them, or were stained with dirt, or any pollution, his ministration was invalid and of no effect. The coat was woven of chequer or diced work like diaper, and was worn by all the priests in their ministrations without any difference. The coat or robe of the ephod which was worn by the high-priest, in addition to the robes worn by the other priests, was made of blue wool, and worn immediately under the EPHOD (which see). Its Hebrew name is mêil, an under garment reaching down to the feet. It was a distinguishing priestly vestment, and therefore Christ appears, Rev. i. 13, "clothed with a garment down to the feet," thus showing himself not only to be invested with the priestly office, but to be the great High-Priest of his church. This coat or robe was a long linen gown of sky blue colour. It was all of one piece, and so formed as to be put on, not like other garments which are open in front, but like a surplice, over the head, having a hole in the top through which the head could pass, which was strongly hemmed round with a binding to prevent it from rending, and provided with openings or arm-holes in the sides in place of sleeves. Round its lower border were tassels made of blue, purple, and scarlet, in the form of pomegranates, interspersed with small gold bells, in order to make a noise when the high-priest went into or came out from the holy place. We are not informed what was the exact number of the pomegranates and bells. The Rabbinical writers are nearly unanimous in alleging the entire number of bells to have been seventy-two, placed alternately with as many pomegranates of embroidered work. While the body of the coat was of a blue colour, the hem or border was richly dyed of variegated hues. Josephus says, that about eight years before the destruction of the temple, the Levites obtained permission to wear a linen coat or tunic, which gave considerable offence to the priests.

COAT (HOLY), OF TREVES, a Roman Catholic relic, which for the last fifteen hundred years has been regarded as the peculiar glory of the city in which it is preserved. It is confidently believed by many of the votaries of Romanism to be the identical seamless coat which was worn by our blessed Lord, and for which the Roman soldiers cast lots at his crucifixion. The tradition respecting this relic is thus related in an article which appeared a few years ago in the pages of the Athenæum, from the pen of an intelligent correspondent, who gives also an account of the exhibition of the Holy Coat, he himself having been an eye-witness on the occasion :

"Its origin, as a received object of veneration, remounts to the early part of the fourth century, when the Empress Helena undertook her memorable journey to Palestine. According to the tradition of Treves, it was then and there that the Holy Tunic was discovered. Helena's selection of Treves as the place of deposit, arose not only from her predilection for the city where she had so long dwelt, and where some accounts say she was born; but from the reputation which it enjoyed of being a second Rome and the capital of the Empire beyond the Alps. An interval of more than 800 years ensued, during which no mention is made of the Holy Tunic. Towards the close of the 9th century, Treves was sacked and burned by the Normans, and nothing is said to have been saved from their ravages but the holy relics, which a constant sense of danger had caused the clergy to preserve in crypts constructed expressly for their security. The traditional existence of the Holy Tunic only remained, for that which fear originated, custom retained, and even in times of safety the altar in or beneath which the relic was presumed to lie was alone indicated; the relic itself was never shown. In the quarrel between Adrian and the Emperor in 1157, Frederic, when he assembled a synod at Treves, alluded to the existence of the Tunic there, for in his letter to Archbishop Hillinus, he says:—'Since then you are the primate beyond the Alps and the centre of the whole Empire, and that your cathedral, that of Treves, is renowned above all others for the possession of the Coat without Seams, &c.' Other proofs are also given in regard to its alleged locality, which was at length put beyond doubt in the year 1196, by the discovery of the relic in the adytum of the Cathedral, when Archbishop John the First embellished and restored the building. It was for the first time shown publicly on the 1st of May, 1196, amidst the acclamations of the whole people, after which it was again shut up in the high altar. Another interval of 316 years occurred before the relic was again seen, when it was brought forward, at the instance of the Emperor Maximilian, who had assembled a diet in Treves. The opening of the altar took place on the 14th of April, 1512, before all the dignitaries of Treves, and a wooden box, inlaid with ivory, of very beautiful workmanship, was found. It was sealed, and when opened the robe was discovered with a written inscription, 'This is the coat without seam of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' On the 12th of May following, the relic was once more displayed to an immense concourse of people, with no less effect than on the first occasion; an effect which suggested to Leo X. the idea of turning it prominently to account, in the sale of indulgences. His bull, dated 15th of January, 1514, granted a plenary indulgence to all who came to Treves to confess their sins before the sacred Tunic,—and, that opportunity might not be wanting, he ordered that it should be publicly exhibited every seven years. The Reformation however intervened before the first term prescribed by the Pope, and it was not till 1531 that the exhibition again took place. During the remainder of the 16th century, the relic was exposed at four different periods, in 1545, 1553, 1585, and 1594,—but the Thirty Years War occupied the attention of Germany too closely to admit of much religious ceremonial, especially when the opposing armies were under such strong religious influence: it was therefore not until after the peace of Westphalia, 20th of February, 1655, that it was again shown. The dread of the arms of Louis XIV. induced the electors of Treves to transport the relic to the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein; nor was it again made visible till 1725, when it was shown to the Archbishop of Cologne. Other public exhibitions subsequently took place at Ehrenbreitstein in the 18th century; but when the French armies approached the Rhine in 1794, it was no time for trusting the security of the Holy Tunic even to a fortress. It was then conveyed away and deposited in a place, the secret of which was known only to a very few persons, whose interest it was not to divulge it. It became afterwards known that that place was Bamberg, where it remained till 1803, and was then removed by the electors to Augsburg. A dispute afterwards arose for its possession between the Duke of Nassau and the Church of Treves; and the King of Bavaria also put in his claim for it—but it was finally decided by Napoleon, the arbiter at that time of all things spiritual as well as mundane, that restitution should be made to Treves, and in 1810, it was once more brought to its accustomed resting-place. The exhibition in that year was one remarkable for its display, and for the number of the pious who flocked to the electoral city to behold the relic,—no less than 227,000 people! So much for history and tradition, which I have given at some length, that a reason might be more satisfactorily rendered for the enthusiasm which has attended the exhibition of 1844, which I have just arrived in time to witness.

“It may seem strange, that at a period when the minds of the great masses in Germany are directed towards utilizing objects, an effort—and a successful one—should have been made to compete with the advancing world, and that too with weapons from the old armoury of Papal Rome; but such is the case, for a greater concourse of people has assembled this year in Treves than was ever known before. The number of those who have already visited the shrine since the 18th of August exceeds a million! and that number will be considerably augmented before the exhibition is finally closed. Six weeks was the period originally prescribed, but as every day brought pilgrims in thousands from every country, far and near, an additional week was granted, and the term extended to Sunday the 6th of October. But however vast the enumeration of the faithful (to say nothing of the curious), however great the accumulation of money offered before the altar of St. Peter, the object of the Romish church would have failed, comparatively speaking,—but for more important results. Adopting for device, the text of St. Mark (ch. 6. v. 56), ‘and all who touched it were cured,’ the young Countess Jeanne de Droste-Vischering, of Munster, niece of the present Archbishop of Cologne, was the first whose malady was submitted for cure by touching the holy robe. The success was triumphant! the young lady who had, it is said, tried all the baths in Germany for the last three years to remove her lameness, no sooner bent before the relic and touched the sacred cloth than her limbs were straightened, her figure became once more erect,—and she quitted the cathedral, leaving her crutches behind her in memory of her miraculous cure. There the crutches remain, beside the high altar, and there I have this day seen them, when, one amongst many thousands, I passed before the relic. But the Countess is not the only instance of the efficacy of the Holy Tunic in similar cases. It is positively affirmed that no less than thirteen cures have been performed by the same means:—a boy who had been blind from childhood; a girl who was deaf and dumb; and several others affected with permanent maladies, subjected to the test, have all been sent away restored! My valet de place told me he had himself known one subject, a complete cripple, who was now as straight as an arrow: I inquired where all these people lived, and was told ‘in distant villages,’—inaccessible of course to the casual inquirer.

“After this, you may be curious to know something of the relic itself, and the mode of visiting it. The Tunic is a robe of a reddish-brown colour, stretched out flat upon a piece of white silk in a glass frame placed upright upon the high altar. The sleeves are displayed; and it measures 5 feet each way from one extremity to the other. In its texture it is difficult to say how it has been wrought, so that Brower’s description holds perfectly good. He says, in his ‘Annals of Treves’ (tom. ii. p. 91), ‘The threads are so fine and so closely united, that the eye cannot discover whether the vestment is woven or wrought with a needle. . . . The colour is reddish, and in the light of the sun resembles unprepared cinnamon.’ At a short distance it resembles the stamped leather now manufactured to imitate oak wainscoting, but on a closer examination one sees that the material is evidently flax. The folds are apparent, and the surface of the cloth appears to shale, or rather crack,—the result of age. It has no collar,—merely a hole for the head to pass through, and must have reached to the ancles. The case in which it is contained, is of the same form as the tunic,—like the letter T,—and at the base on either side is an aperture through which the officiating priests introduce the medals, pictures, hooks, and other objects to be blessed by contact with the sacred vestment. The manner in which it is inspected is in procession formed in a double line, marshalled by the Prussian gendarmerie outside the doors of the cathedral. The procession advances slowly until the steps of the high altar are passed, and a momentary pause is made before the relic, to gaze upon it and deposit an offering. The amount collected in this manner must have been very great, for each day produces an enormous heap, in which, though copper predominates, a great deal of silver appears, and now and then gold pieces and scheine or paper-money. When I state that this procession begins to form at an early hour in the morning, and continues to stream into the cathedral until midnight, with no other intermission than the occasional closing of the doors to prevent too dense a crowd, some idea may be formed of the numbers that are daily admitted. To facilitate the approach to strangers and foreigners, certain hours are set apart, when, by applying at a different door, admission to the cathedral is given, and the line of the procession intercepted, thus obviating the necessity of waiting for some hours bareheaded in the streets. The mass of people endure the delay without an impatient look; they keep close file, it is true, but are chiefly engaged in chanting the Ave Maria,—the women first and then the men, in a clear ringing tone. Where all the crowds come from, seems a wonder,—but the stream is continuous, and its component parts are always changing. In point of costume it is curious, the head-dresses of the women being of such various form and colour, and the physiognomy and expression so different. The finest effect of the procession is witnessed at night, when the cathedral is lit up and the deep tones of the vesper bell peal through the aisles like the diapason notes of an organ. The body of the church is but feebly illuminated in comparison with the altar, where a blaze of light surrounds the shrine, but this comparative dimness adds to the effect, as the pilgrims slowly advance along the centre aisle, between rows of banners above the tombs of the Electors, whose heavy folds sweep the marble floor. It is impossible for any building to be better adapted for the purpose of a procession than this old Byzantine cathedral, as the floor continues to rise by successive flights of steps from the nave to the choir, from thence to the lower altar, and from thence again on the south side by a very high flight leading to the altar of St. Peter; which is thus elevated at least 20 feet above the western entrance, and enables the spectator to catch a glimpse of the upper part of the relic the instant he enters the aisle.

"The streets of Treves are at this moment scarcely less attractive to the stranger than the cathedral—from daylight till dusk, and from dusk till daylight again, with but a short interval for sleep,—there is one continuous movement and hum of people all having the same object in view, to join the processions. The sight witnessed, they spread over the city for a few hours, and then disappear to make way for fresh comers."

COCCEIANS, a denomination which arose in the seventeenth century, deriving its name from its founder, John Cocceius, in German Koch, Professor of Divinity at Leyden in Holland. Cocceius and Voetius were two of the most eminent expositors of Scripture among the Reformed at the period in which they lived. The latter adhered only to the literal sense in both the Old and the New Testaments, and considered the predictions of the ancient prophets as being all fulfilled in events anterior to the coming of Christ, and, therefore, not at all applicable to the Messiah. He supposed, however, that those prophecies which are applied in the New Testament to Christ, have, besides their literal sense, a secret and mystical meaning which relates to Christ, to his history and mediation. Cocceius proceeded on very different principles in interpreting the Sacred volume. He supposed that the whole Old Testament represented, as in a mirror, the history of Christ and of the Christian church, and that the predictions of the ancient prophets were to be literally understood as applying to Christ. He held also that the entire history of the Christian church down to the end of time was prefigured in the Old Testament. The Cocceian mode of interpretation was followed by many Dutch, Swiss, and German divines, but strenuously opposed by the sect of the Voetians. The strange extravagance of the leading principle laid down by Cocceius, could scarcely be defended even by his warmest friends—that the language of the Bible must signify all that it can be made to signify. Such a hermeneutic principle as this would lead in the hands of ingenious and subtle men to the most perverted explanations of multitudes of passages in the Word of God. The following brief view of the leading opinions of Cocceius is given by Mosheim: "Theology itself, in the opinion of Cocceius, ought to be freed from the trammels of philosophy, and to be expounded only in Scriptural phraseology. Hence, perceiving that the sacred writers denominate the method of salvation which God has prescribed, a covenant of God with men, he concluded that there could be no more suitable and pertinent analogy, according to which to adjust and arrange an entire system of theology. But while intent solely on accommodating and applying the principles of human covenants to divine subjects, he incautiously fell into some opinions which it is not easy to approve. For instance, he asserted that the covenant which God made with the Hebrew nation through the medium of Moses, did not differ in its nature from the new covenant procured by Jesus Christ. He supposed that God caused the ten commandments to be promulgated by Moses, not as a law which was to be obeyed, but as one form of the covenant of grace. But when the Hebrews had offended him by various sins, and especially by the worship of the golden calf, God, being moved with just indignation, superadded to that moral law the yoke of the ceremonial law, to serve as a punishment. This yoke was in itself very burdensome, but it became much more painful in consequence of its import. For it continually admonished the Hebrews of their very imperfect, doubtful, and anxious state, and was a kind of perpetual memento that they merited the wrath of God, and that they could not anticipate a full expiation and remission of their sins till the Messiah should come. Holy men indeed under the Old Testament enjoyed eternal salvation after death; but while they lived, they were far from having that assurance of salvation which is so comforting to us under the New Testament. For no sins were then actually forgiven, but only suffered to remain unpunished, because Christ had not yet offered up himself as a sacrifice to God, and therefore could not be regarded, before the divine tribunal, as one who had actually assumed our debt, but only as our surety."

The Dutch churches were agitated for many years with the keen controversies which were maintained between the Cocceians and their opponents, the Voetians, with varied success. At length the Cocceian came to be absorbed in the Cartesian controversy. At first, and for a considerable time, Cocceius was opposed to Des Cartes, but at length both came to be so far identified, that the most violent combatants of the one were equally violent combatants of the other. Not that the Cocceian theology and the Cartesian philosophy have any natural connection with each other. Yet it so happened, by a strange coincidence, that those who took Cocceius as their guide in theology, took Des Cartes as their master in philosophy. Thus the Cartesians and the Cocceians became one united band, contending against the Voetians with the utmost earnestness and vigour. Throughout the remainder of the seventeenth century, the two parties were engaged in keen controversy. Other sects arose in Holland, which pushed the principles of the Cartesian philosophy beyond their legitimate boundaries into absolute atheism. Thus the Verschorists and the Hattemists, combining the doctrines of Spinoza with those of Cocceius, produced in 1680 a new system of religion, which was at once absurd and impious. See DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

COCYTUS, one of the four rivers which were said in the ancient heathen mythology to be passed over by the dead on their entrance into the infernal regions. The Cocytus is represented as sending forth a hollow melancholy sound. See TARTARUS.

CODEX ARGENTEUS (Lat. silver copy), a celebrated manuscript of the four gospels in the Mæso-Gothic language, deriving its name from its being written on vellum in letters of silver. The people for whom this version was intended are not to be confounded with the Goths of Sweden. They came from the east of the Borysthenes, and gradually moving westward, settled in Wallachia. Here the celebrated Ulphilas invented a Gothic alphabet of twenty-five letters, "four of which," Gibbon informs us, "he invented to express the peculiar sounds that were unknown to the Greek and Latin pronunciation." This indefatigable benefactor of a barbarous people was himself by birth a Cappadocian, was a bishop of the Mæso-Goths, and a member of the council of Constantinople in A. D. 349.

For a long period it was thought that the labours of Ulphilas had been limited to the translation of the four Gospels, but from the discoveries which have been made in the course of the present century, it is now regarded as an undoubted fact that he must have translated the entire Bible. This work, which has earned for him an immortal name, he accomplished in the reign of the Emperor Valens. In his version of the New Testament, he has followed the original Greek; while in that of the Old Testament he has adhered to the Septuagint. From its antiquity, as well as its general fidelity, the Gothic version of Ulphilas occupies a high place in the estimation of biblical critics. Philostorgius alleges that he designedly omitted the Books of Samuel and the Kings, from an apprehension that the warlike spirit of his nation might be roused by the relation of the Jewish wars.

A variety of opinion exists as to the age of the Codex Argenteus, which is limited to the four Gospels, and these in an imperfect state. Some go so far as to imagine that it is the very copy which Ulphilas wrote with his own hand; while others suppose it to have been completed by a bishop of Thrace, towards the latter end of the fourth century. The history of the silver manuscript is somewhat interesting and curious. At a very remote period, it would seem to have been the property of Alaric, King of Toulouse, whose kingdom and palace was destroyed by Chlodovic or Clovis, in or about A. D. 507. Others again say, that it belonged to Amalric, who had been conquered by Childebert in A. D. 531. For many centuries this book had been subsequently preserved in the Benedictine monastery of Werden, on the river Ruhr, in the county of Mark, in Westphalia, where it was discovered in 1597 by Anthony Marillon, who extracted a few passages, which he inserted in a work entitled, 'A Commentary on the Gothic Alphabet.' Some time after, Arnoldus Mercator observed it in the same place, and having translated some verses of it, Gruter gave them to the world in his 'Inscriptiones Antiquæ.' From Werden it was carried to Prague, where in 1648, when that city was stormed by the Swedes under the command of Count Königs-mark, it was found by that nobleman, who presented it along with other treasures to his sovereign, Queen Christina. After remaining for some time in the royal library, it disappeared during the confusion which preceded the abdication of the queen, having been taken, as is supposed, by Isaac Vossius to the Netherlands, where it was discovered again in 1655. While the Codex Argenteus was in the Netherlands, it was copied by Francis Junius, a learned antiquarian, and for the first time given to the world. Some writers assert that it was purchased back again by Charles XII. King of Sweden, but whether such be the fact or not, this valuable manuscript is at present in the University of Upsala, carefully bound or covered over with silver, embossed with the likeness of Ulphilas engraved upon it. The present state of the manuscript is thus described by Dr. Loewe, in a learned article in the 'Journal of Sacred Literature': "This codex, of which there are 188 pages of a quarto size, is written on very thin and smoothly-polished vellum, which is for the greater part of a purple colour. On this ground the letters, which are all uncial, i. e. capitals, were afterwards printed in silver, the initials, and some other passages excepted, which are in gold. To the latter belong the three first lines of the Gospels of St. Luke and St. Mark, which are impressed with golden foil, as were most probably those of St. Matthew and St. John. At the commencement of a section, or chapter, the whole is distinguished by golden characters, and so it is with the beginning of the Lord's Prayer, and the titles of the Evangelists, which are all illuminated in gold. From the deep impression of the strokes, the celebrated Michaelis has conjectured that the letters were either imprinted with a warm iron or cut with a graver, and afterwards coloured, a circumstance, which is said to have led to the discovery of those letters, the colour of which had faded. But it has been recently proved that each letter was painted, and not formed in the manner supposed by Michaelis. Most of the silver letters have become green in the course of time whereas the golden ones are as yet in a superior state of preservation. This covering of the letters with gold and silver is a characteristic feature in some ancient and modern Asiatic writings, and in most of the Canticles, Missals, Breviaries, etc. of the Middle Ages. The adjective argenteus, therefore, as used in connection with the 'codex' in question, refers solely to this circumstance. Some parts of this codex, which is said to have amounted formerly in all to 320 pages, have a pale violet hue." The Codex Argenteus is undoubtedly the most ancient specimen extant of the Teutonic or German language.

CODEX CAROLINUS, a name given to a manuscript containing some fragments of the Gothic version of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which is preserved in the library of the Duke of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel. It was discovered in 1756 by Francis Anton Knittel, in a Codex Rescriptus belonging to the ducal library. This MS., which is on vellum, contains the version of Ulphilas in one column, and a Latin translation in the other. It is supposed to belong to the sixth century, and was so defaced by another work written over it, that it was with great difficulty decyphered and restored. It is written in the character of the Codex Argenteus, but neither so beautiful nor so interesting as that manuscript. Both of them, however, have received great improvement from the discoveries made in the Ambrosian Library in Milan in 1817 by Cardinal Majo, the late learned librarian of the Vatican. Dr. Loewe, in the article from which we have already quoted, gives the following account of these discoveries: "While examining two Codices Rescripti, Majo discovered in one of them some Gothic writing, which, ere long, proved to be fragments of the Book of Kings, Ezra, and Nehemiah. Thus encouraged, he continued his inquiries, and had the satisfaction to find four other Codices Rescripti, containing in like manner portions of Ulphilas' Gothic version. Having communicated his discoveries to Count Carlo Ottavio Castiglioni, the latter joined Majo in his inquiries, so that we are indebted to both these savans for whatever we know concerning some considerable portions of this interesting production. Availing ourselves of the labours of these distinguished men, we shall notice a few of the MSS. they discovered.

"The first of them consists of 204 quarto pages; it is on vellum, and contains the Homilies of Gregory the Great on the Prophecies of Ezekiel, which, judging from their appearance or character, must have been produced about the eighth century. Beneath this are contained the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, 1 and 2 of Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, as also a portion of the Gothic Calendar, all of which is written in a more ancient Gothic handwriting. The Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, and to Timothy, constitute the main part of this interesting MS., and are almost entire. The titles of the Epistles are given at the heads of the pages on which they commence, and are pretty readable. Of the other Epistles, there are considerable fragments only. The whole seems to have been written by two different writers or copyists, as there exists a marked difference in the writing, the one being more finished and pleasing than the other. Some savans have traced various readings in some of the margins, which are said to be written in a very small hand.

"The second manuscript consists of 156 quarto pages, on much thinner vellum. It contains St. Jerome's Exposition of Isaiah, written in Latin belonging to the eighth or ninth century. Under this Exposition may be seen the Gothic Version of St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, and to Titus. What is wanting in the former MS. is found in this, which has some various readings peculiar to itself.

"In the third manuscript, which is a Latin volume of a quarto size, are contained the plays of Plautus, and part of Seneca's Tragedies of Medea and Edipus. In this volume Cardinal Majo discovered fragments of the Books of Kings, Ezra and Nehemiah. This discovery is of the utmost importance, as being among the few fragments of Ulphilas' Version of the Old Testament extant. This fact, moreover, furnishes a refutation of the assertion that Ulphilas designedly omitted the Books of Kings for the reasons already alluded to. The date of the Latin writing of this MS. is supposed to be the eighth or ninth century.

"The fourth and last manuscript which we shall notice, consists of a single sheet in small quarto, and contains four pages of the Gospel according to St. John in Latin, under which are found the very fragments of chaps. xxv. xxvi. and xxvii. of the Gospel of St. Matthew, which are wanting in the Codex Argenteus.

"All these manuscripts are written in broad and thin characters, without any division of words or of chapters, but with contractions of proper names, not unlike those we find in ancient Greek MSS. Some sections have been discovered which are indicated by numeral marks or larger spaces, and sometimes by large letters. The Gothic writing is said to belong to the sixth century."

The whole of Ulphilas's version, as it now exists, comprising the Codex Argenteus, the Codex Carolinus, and the Ambrosian MSS., include very large portions of the four Gospels, the Epistles of St. Paul, the Books of Kings, Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and some parts of the Psalms. The latest and most finished critical edition of the entire remains of Ulphilas is that of Gabelenz and Loebe, published at Leipzig 1836—1847. Still another work supposed to be from the pen of Ulphilas, has been discovered by H. F. Massmann, who found it among some manuscripts belonging to the libraries of Rome and Milan. It is an exposition of the Gospel according to John, and has been published along with a Latin version, explanatory notes, an historical inquiry, and a Gothic-Latin Dictionary. See BIBLE.

CÆLICOLÆ (Lat. Cælum, heaven, colo, to worship), heaven-worshippers, a heretical sect which arose in the end of the fourth century in Africa. They are condemned by two different rescripts of the Emperor Honorius, but the precise nature of their opinions is not known. In the Theodosian code they are ranked as Jews, and hence some have considered them as apostates from the Christian to the Jewish faith, but this is far from being certain or even probable. This name was sometimes applied by Pagans to the early Christians by way of derision and reproach.

CÆLUS. See URANUS.

COEMPTIO, one of the methods of contracting marriages among the ancient Romans, according to which the parties solemnly bound themselves to each other by the ceremony of giving and receiving a piece of money. See MARRIAGE.

CENOBITES. See CENOBITES.

COLÆNIS, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), derived from a mythical king called Colænus.

COLARBASIANS, a sect of Gnostics which arose in the middle of the second century. They were originated by Colarbasus, a scholar of Valentine (see VALENTINIANS). They held that Christ sprang from the thirty ÆONS (which see); that Jesus and Christ were two distinct persons; and that the life and generations of all men, with all human affairs, depended on the seven planets. Their views were, therefore, a strange compound of Christianity, Judaism, and Paganism.

COLIAS, a surname of APHRODITE (which see), derived from the Attic promontory of Colias, on which the goddess had a statue.

COLLATINES, an order of monks in Italy, called also Oblates, the members of which reside in a monastery, but make no vows except a promise of obedience. They can go abroad freely, inherit property, and are placed under few restrictions. Some abbeys of this description are said to be filled with ladies of rank.

COLLATION, a term used where a bishop gives a benefice, which either he had as patron, or which came to him by lapse.

COLLATION, the name given in the Romish church to the spare meal taken on days of abstinence, consisting chiefly of bread, vegetables, or fruits, but without animal food.

COLLECT, the name applied in the early Christian church to the invocation, which was called collecta or collect, because it was a collection or repetition of all the prayers of the people. Bingham gives it as the form runs in the Constitutions, thus:

"O Lord Almighty and most High, thou that dwellest in the highest, thou Holy One that restest in thy saints, (or holy places,) that art without original, the great Monarch of the world; who by thy Christ hast caused thy knowledge to be preached unto us, to the acknowledgment of thy glory and name, which he hath manifested to our understandings: look down now by him upon this thy flock, and deliver it from all ignorance and wicked works. Grant that it may fear thee, and love thee, and tremble before the face of thy glory. Be merciful and propitious unto them, and hearken to their prayers; and keep them unchangeable, unblameable, and without rebuke: that they may be holy both in body and soul, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that they may be perfect, and none among them deficient or wanting in any respect. O thou their Defender, thou Almighty, that regardest not persons, be thou the help of this thy people, whom thou hast redeemed with the precious blood of thy Christ. Be thou their defence and succour, their refuge and keeper, their impregnable wall, their bulwark and safety. For no one can pluck them out of thy hand. There is no other God like thee: in thee is our hope and strong consolation. Sanctify them by thy truth; for thy word is truth. Thou that dost nothing out of partiality and favour thou that canst not be deceived, deliver them from sickness and infirmity, from sin, from all injury and fraud, and from the fear of the enemy, from the arrow that flieth by day, and the danger that walketh in darkness; and vouchsafe to bring them to eternal life, which is in Christ thy only begotten Son, our God and Saviour; by whom be glory and worship unto thee in the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, world without end. Amen."

The collects among the Latins then were the same sort of prayers which the Greeks called invocations and commendations, with which the bishop concluded the prayers of the deacon and people in each distinct part of Divine service. The custom of repeating collects at the end of the service is of great antiquity in the Church of England, being known to have prevailed before the Norman Conquest, and the very collects now in use formed part of the devotional services of the church long before the Reformation.

COLLEGE, a union of persons for a common purpose, a community. Among the ancient Romans, a college must, in order to be legal, consist at least of three persons, who were considered as forming a corporate body, entitled to privileges somewhat similar to corporations among ourselves, such as holding common property, having a common purse, and being treated in law as a legal unity. A collegium was sometimes called also a universitas. The phrase is sometimes used, "a college of bishops," which is regarded in England as necessary to the consecration of a new bishop, and the college must, as in Roman law, consist of not less than three prelates.

COLLEGE OF AUGURS, the institution of soothsayers among the ancient heathens. It is traced as far back as the very commencement of the Roman history, Romulus having appointed a college of three, to which he afterwards added two.* By the Ogulnian law passed B. C. 300, the number of augurs was increased to nine, of whom five were chosen by the plebs. The dictator Sulla increased them to fifteen, a number which continued till the time of Augustus, when the power of electing augurs being vested in the Emperor himself, the number of the college was regulated solely by the imperial will. The college of augurs possessed far greater power in the earlier than in the later period of the Roman history. Thus, though the election of the college was at first intrusted to the comitia curiata, or assembly of the patricians, the augurs themselves were regularly consulted before the election was considered complete. At length, as their influence became greater, they obtained the power of self-election, which they continued to exercise until B. C. 103, when, by the Domitian law, it was decreed that any vacancy in the college of augurs should be filled up by the votes of a minority of the tribes chosen by lot. This law underwent various changes, having been repealed by Sulla, and restored during the consulship of Cicero, B. C. 63; repealed a second time by Antony, and again revived at an after period. The introduction of Christianity proved in the highest degree unfavourable to the art of divination, and though the utmost efforts were made by the augurs themselves to maintain their influence, the college was finally abolished by the Emperor Theodosius. See AUGURS.

COLLEGE DE PROPAGANDA FIDE, a college instituted at Rome by Pope Urban VIII. in 1627. In this seminary young men from all nations are educated as Romish missionaries, with the view of diffusing the doctrines of the Roman Church in foreign nations. The college owed its institution to John Baptist Viles, or as some allege, Vives, a Spaniard residing at Rome. He surrendered all his possessions and property, including his very elegant mansion, into the hands of the pontiff, and by this munificent gift he founded the College de Propaganda Fide, establishing as the commencement of the undertaking ten scholarships for youth from foreign lands. Cardinal Barberini, the Pope's brother, in 1637 and 1638, added thirty-one more scholarships for Georgians, Persians, Nestorians, Jacobites, Melchites, Copts, Abyssinians, and Indians; and in defect of these, for Armenians from Poland, Russia, and Constantinople. The condition on which Barberini gave this splendid endowment was, that the scholars who should partake of his bounty, should pledge themselves to become missionaries among their own countrymen, or to go wherever the Congregation de Propaganda Fide should order them. The College was at first placed under the authority of three canons of the three patriarchal churches at Rome, but since the year 1641 it has been under the control to which we have just referred, and which had

COLLEGES OF PIETY, a name given to meetings for the revival of religion in Germany, which were set up by Philip James Spener at Frankfort in 1670, first in his own house, and afterwards also in the church. The special object of these meetings was to bring about more cordial friendship among those who were seeking to edify their souls, and at the same time to render the public preaching of God's word more profitable, by explaining the sermons delivered by catechising, by lectures on the Holy Scriptures, with prayer and singing. The appellation Colleges of Piety was derived from Holland, where there was a party who, from their meetings for worship which they called collegia, were denominated collegiants. The Frankfort meetings, though originated from the best of motives, and attended with benefit to many, were not long in being imitated by others, who, wanting the prudence of Spener, conducted matters so unwisely as to lead to great abuses. On some occasions no minister was present to regulate the proceedings, and, accordingly, the utmost irregularity prevailed. At other times every one was allowed to speak, and, as a natural consequence, heretical opinions were often broached, and enthusiasm took the place of sobriety and sincere devotion. In small villages the meetings were generally conducted with great propriety, but in large towns, as in Hamburg for example, there were frequent commotions. The most unseemly disturbances also took place at Erfurth, Dantzic, Wolfenbüttel, Gotha, and even at Halle in Saxony. Finding that unexpected results had followed from the institution of his Colleges of Piety, Spener suppressed those which he himself had set up. Others followed his example, but in some cases the meetings were continued, and people began to frequent them to the entire neglect of public worship and thus the good which Spener sought to do was evil spoken of, and his benevolent attempts to introduce a higher tone of piety among his countrymen were perverted into means of injuring the holy cause which he had so warmly at heart. See PRETISTIC CONTROVERSY.

COLLEGIANTS, a Christian sect which arose in Holland in 1619, when the Arminian dispute was at its height. It was originated by three brothers, John James, Hadrian, and Gisbert Koddeus or Van der Kodde, humble, but pious men, holding Arminian principles. Joined by one Anthony Cornelius, they held meetings which they called collegia, and hence the sect acquired the name of Collegiants. The only test of admission to the society was a belief in the Bible as inspired of God, and an earnest desire and endeavour to live conformably to its precepts, whatever might be their opinions on the various doctrines of the Christian religion. The brethren are accustomed to assemble twice a-week, on Sabbath and Wednesday, for religious exercises. On these occasions they commence the service with singing a hymn and offering up a prayer, after which a passage of Scripture is read and explained, two persons having been appointed to expound it, and then any male person in the assembly is freely permitted to offer his thoughts to the brethren. Thus a controversy often arises at their meetings. They have printed lists of the texts which are to be discussed at their meetings, so that the brethren have it in their power to give their opinions after careful previous preparation. At Rheinsberg they have large buildings destined for the education of orphan children, and for the reception of strangers, and in that place the brethren assemble twice a-year, spending four days successively in meetings for mutual encouragement and edification, as well as for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. On these occasions, also, the ordinance of baptism is administered to those who wish it; but the ceremony is invariably performed by total immersion. The Collegiants in Friesland assemble once a-year at Leeuwarden for the same purposes as their brethren who meet at Rheinsberg. From the lax terms of admission among the Collegiants, they are drawn from all sects, and consist of men of the most widely opposite opinions. They account no man a heretic on account of his opinions, but solely on account of vicious and immoral conduct.

When the sect of Collegiants was first instituted Arminianism was at a low ebb in Holland, having been formally condemned by the synod of Dort, and the ministers who held its tenets being prohibited from promulgating them. The brothers Van der Kodde, accordingly, opened private meetings or clubs called collegia. The first was held at the village of Warmand, where one of the brothers lived, and after a short time the meetings were transferred to Rheinsberg, a small village near Leyden, from which the Collegiants received the name of Rheinsbergers. Similar meetings were instituted at other places in Holland, and the sect rapidly increased until it became a large body. They professed to tolerate all opinions, however extravagant and openly opposed to the plainest declarations of Scripture. Yet, notwithstanding the tolerant spirit by which they were avowedly actuated, a controversy arose in 1672 in the sect of the Collegiants, which raged with the utmost bitterness for a considerable time. The parties were on the one side, John and Paul Bredenburg, merchants of Rotterdam, and on the other side, Abraham Lemmermann and Francis Cuiper, merchants of Amsterdam. The brothers Bredenburg openly taught the doctrine of Spinoza, and demonstrated its accordant with reason mathematically. With strange inconsistency they avowed their belief in Christianity as being of Divine origin, recommending and defending it in the meetings of the Collegiants. To reconcile such opposite and contradictory systems as Spinozism and Christianity, they maintained that reason is opposed to religion, but that we ought, nevertheless, to believe in the religion contained in the New Testament Scriptures against the most evident and the most conclusive mathematical demonstrations. It is plain, then, that the brothers Bredenburg must have held, that what is false in theology may be true in philosophy, and vice versa, what is a religious truth may be a philosophical error, and even a mathematical absurdity. This strange, contradictory system of opinion was opposed by Francis Cuiper, a book seller of Amsterdam, in a work entitled 'Arcana Atheismi Detecta,' or the Secrets of Atheism Detected. The controversy waxed warm on both sides; other minor contests arose about the same time; and the result of the whole was, that the Collegiants, in 1686, were divided into two opposing sects, which held their assemblies in separate buildings at Rheinsberg. In the beginning, however, of the eighteenth century, when the heads of the opposing factions had disappeared from the scene, the schism began to heal, and the Collegiants returned to their former harmony. They continue to this day to observe the same modes of worship, and though far from being so numerous as they once were, still hold their meetings without any fixed pastors, and practise baptism by immersion.

COLLEGIATI. See COPIATÆ.

COLLEGIUM ÆSCULAPII ET HYGEIÆ.

The college of Æsculapius and of Hygeia was among the ancient Romans a congregation of sixty persons, who, at certain days in the year, met at an appointed place to offer sacrifices in behalf of those who were willing to implore the help of the god and goddess of health.

COLLEGIUM DENDROPHORIUM, the college of the Dendrophori. It is difficult to ascertain with certainty who these people were. The word is derived from two Greek words, dendron, a tree, and phero, to carry. Hence Salmasius thinks, that, by the Dendrophori were meant those men who, in the processions made in honour of the gods, carried branches of trees. From the following passage in the Theodosian code, however, it would appear that they were a class of heathens: "It is just that all the places which the Dendrophori and other heathens have possessed, and were appointed for keeping of feasts and distribution of money, be applied to the revenues of our house, having beforehand banished the error which had first given birth to them."

COLLOCATIO, a custom which existed among the ancient Greeks and Romans, on the death of any individual, of laying out the corpse on a bed with a pillow for supporting the head and back. It was placed at one time outside the house, but afterwards at the threshold, the design being, as Plato alleged, to give ocular proof that the person was really dead, or, as is more likely to have been the reason, to show that the death had been natural, not caused by violence. By the side of the corpse was laid a honey-cake, which was said to be meant as a gift to Cerberus. Beside the bed were arranged painted earthen vessels, which were buried with the corpse. The colloctio continued for two days, and on the third the body was carried out for burial.

COLLUTHIANS, a heretical sect which arose in the fourth century, founded by Colluthus, a presbyter of Alexandria. He seems to have approached in his opinions to the tenets of the Manicheans, holding that God did not create the wicked, and that he was not the author of the evils that befall men. Colluthus was deposed by the council of Alexandria, A. D. 324, and died before A. D. 340. The sect existed but for a short time.

COLLOBIUM (Gr. kolobos, short), a garment which some ancient authors affirm was worn by bishops and presbyters in the primitive ages of the Christian church. It was a short tunic or coat without long sleeves, thus differing from the dalmatica, which was the long coat with sleeves. Both these vestments were used by the Romans, though the collobium was the more common, ancient and honourable garment, which was afterwards permitted, by the laws of Theodosius the Great, to be worn by senators within the walls of Constantinople. It is probable, therefore, that when a bishop or a presbyter is said to wear a collobium, it means nothing more than that he wore a common Roman garment.

COLLYRIDES (Gr. cakes), a species of cakes of kneaded dough, which, from very ancient times, were offered to the gods as sacred gifts from the notion which the heathen in all ages have entertained, that what was gratifying to the sons of men, must be pleasing and acceptable to the gods. Besides, it has been imagined, by the ignorant in every age, that the inhabitants of heaven stood in need of food and drink like those of earth. The Hebrews offered cakes in the temple made with wheat or barley, kneaded with oil, and sometimes with honey. The Egyptians made offerings of cakes to their deities in behalf of deceased relatives. Cecrops directed cakes to be offered to Zeus at Athens. Herodotus informs us, that the Persians offered consecrated cakes to their gods. The immolation or consecration of a victim among the ancient Romans consisted partly in casting of corn and frankincense, together with the salsa mola made with bran or meal mixed with salt, upon the head of the beast. Cakes were specially used in the worship of certain deities, as in that of Apollo. They were either simple cakes of flour, sometimes also of wax, or they were made in the shape of some animal, and were then offered as symbolical sacrifices in the place of real animals, either because they could not easily be procured, or were too expensive for the sacrifices. On the second day of the festival called Thesmophoria, celebrated in various parts of Greece in honour of Demeter, the women sat on the ground around the statue of the goddess, and took no other food than cakes made of sesame and honey. In Jer. vii. 17, we read of the Israelites kneading their dough "to make cakes to the queen of heaven," which appears to have been from early times an idolatrous practice. The Collyrides of the Pagans having been transferred, in the fourth century, to the worship of the Virgin Mary, gave name to a small sect in Arabia. See next Article.

COLLYRIDIANS, a sect which arose towards the end of the fourth century, maintaining that the Virgin Mary ought to be worshipped and appeased with libations, sacrifices, and offerings of collyrides or cakes. They appear to have been a sect of women, who came from Thrace and settled in Arabia, looking upon themselves as priestesses of Mary. On a set day, consecrated to her as a festival, they carried about in chariots, similar to those which the Pagans used in their religious processions, cakes or wafers dedicated to Mary, which they first presented to her as sacred offerings, and then ate them. Neander considers this ceremony to have been derived from the Pagan worship of Ceres, and that the customary bread-offerings at the Thesmophoria or heathen feast of the harvest, in honour of Ceres, had been changed for such offerings in honour of Mary. Mosheim, also, supposes the Collyridians to have been heathen converts, who, while they were mere Pagans, had been accustomed to bake, and present to the goddess Venus or Astarte, certain cakes which were called collyrides, and now that they had become Christians they thought this honour might be best shown to Mary. The Collyridians were opposed by the ANTIDICOMARIANITES (which see), who, instead of regarding Mary as a goddess, held that she was not always virgin, but had other children after the birth of Jesus. See MARIOLATRY.

COLLYVA, an oblation used in the Greek church in commemoration of the resurrection of the dead. It forms a portion of the funeral solemnities of the modern Greeks. The latest account of the Collyva has been given by Mr. Henry M. Baird, an intelligent traveller, in his recent work, entitled 'Modern Greece.' We quote the passage. "In modern Greece several successive Fridays are set apart as especially devoted to the dead. The bell of the little church of St. Nicholas Rangaves, situated at the very base of the Acropolis, attracted my attention on one of these occasions. Upon entering the church—a small edifice scarce exceeding in size an ordinary room—I found a few persons waiting for the commencement of the services; the men and boys standing near the altar, while the women as usual remained somewhat further off. Ever and anon some person would come in carrying a small dish covered with a napkin, and, after devoutly crossing himself, placed the dish upon the floor in front of the screen of the hieron or holy place. These plates contained a peculiar sort of cake, which is called Collyva. It is, in fact, an offering made to the manes of the dead, and can certainly claim a Pagan rather than a Christian origin. It is carefully made, the principal ingredients being boiled wheat and currants. The surface of the top is ornamented with various degrees of neatness, by means of the eatable red grains of the pomegranates or almonds, or anything of the kind. These cakes were sent by the relatives of those who had died within a year or two, and if handsome, were allowed to remain before the chancel. If more commonly prepared, the contents were thrown together into a basket. In every plate of collyva, and in every basket, were stuck a number of little lighted waxen tapers, which burned during the service. The notion of the common people respecting this usage, was expressed to me by a person whom I asked to explain its purport. 'The soul of the deceased,' said he, 'for whom the collyva is offered, comes down during the service, and eats a single grain of the wheat.'" This observance of the Greeks is probably of Pagan origin. It is well known that among the ancient Romans there was a festival called Feralia, which was held in the latter end of the month of February, when food was wont to be carried to the sepulchres for the use of the dead. The Inferiæ and Parentalia were of the same description, showing that among the ancient heathens, as among several modern nations, the manes of the dead are thought to be able to partake of the enjoyments of the living. The Chinese (See ANCESTORS, WORSHIP OF), present offerings to the dead, and hold imaginary intercourse with them. See FUNERAL RITES.

COLORITES, a congregation of Augustinian monks, founded in the sixteenth century by Bernard of Rogliano in Calabria. The name of this order is said to have been drawn from Colorito, a hill in the Neapolitan territory on which there is a church dedicated to the holy Virgin. The order was not fully established till 1591, and a few years after they avowed submission to the general of the Augustin hermits. Their habit consisted of a dark-coloured gown, and a mantle which reached only to their knees.

COLPIA, in the cosmogony of the ancient Phœnicians, as explained by Sanchoniathon, the name of the wind, from which, as well as from his wife, Baau or Night, arose Life or Æon, and the First Bera or creation. The meaning of this myth, according to Rougemont, is, that the voice or Spirit of God (Colpia), in moving over the formless and empty earth (Baau), has given rise, in the first place, to life in material things.

COMBADAXUS, a deity worshipped in Japan. He was a honze or priest, of whom the following strange story is told. When he was about eighty years old, he ordered a magnificent temple to be built, and pretending to be weary of life, he gave out that he would retire into a cavern and sleep for ten thousand millions of years; after which he would come to life again. Accordingly, he went into the cavern, the mouth of which was immediately sealed up. The Japanese believe that he is still alive, and therefore celebrate a festival in his honour, and invoke him as a god.

COMBAT (JUDICIAL). See BATTLE (TRIAL BY)
COMFORTED (THE), one of the two classes, the consolati or comforted, and the federati or confederated, into which the Manichean congregations were anciently divided. The ALBIGENSES (which see) classified their people in precisely the same way, and the "comforted" in the Albigenian church led a life of celibacy and of strict austerity.

COMMANDRIES, the name given to the houses of the knights hospitallers, an order of ecclesiastical knighthood which was instituted in the twelfth century.

COMMATRES (Lat. con, together, and mater, a mother), a term sometimes used in ancient writers to denote sponsors in baptism.

COMMEMORATION OF THE DEAD. See ANNIVERSARIES.

COMMEMORATIONS, a word used in the church of Rome to denote the combination of the service of some holyday of lesser note with the service of some Sunday or greater holyday on which the lesser holyday happens to fall. In all such cases the Breviary enjoins that the hymns, verses, and some other parts of the service of the lesser holyday should be added to those of the greater. See FESTIVALS.

COMMENDAM, an ecclesiastical term used in England to denote a living commended by the crown to the care of a clergyman until a proper pastor has been appointed to it. Such interim appointments have for some time been seldom or never granted to any but bishops, who, when their bishoprics were of small value, have, on some occasions, been allowed by special dispensation to hold their benefices, which, on their promotion, passed into the hands of the sovereign.

COMMENDATIONS, one of the names given in the Latin church to COLLECTS (which see).

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. In the early Christian church no Christian would venture to travel without taking with him letters of credence from his own bishop, if he meant to communicate with the Christian church in a foreign country. The letters, which were called commendatory, were such as were only granted to persons of quality, or else persons whose reputation had been called in question, or clergymen who had occasion to travel into foreign countries. Persons travelling without these letters might partake of the charity of the church in a foreign country, but were refused permission to sit down at the Lord's table. Dr. Sherlock says, in his treatise on Church Unity, "The ancient discipline was very severe in admitting strangers who were unknown to them, to the communion, lest they should admit heretics or schismatics, or excommunicated persons; and, therefore, if any such came who could not produce their recommendatory letters, but pretended to have lost them by the way, they were neither admitted to communion nor wholly refused, but, if occasion were, maintained by the church till such letters could be procured from the church from whence they came, which was called the communio peregrina." In the apostolical canons it was expressly provided, that if any strange bishops, presbyters, or deacons, travelled without commendatory letters, they should neither be allowed to preach nor be received to communion, but only have what was necessary to answer their present wants, that is, a charitable subsistence.

COMMENDATORY PRAYER, a name given to the morning thanksgiving, as it is called in the constitutions, which was offered by the bishop or pastor in the early Christian church towards the close of the morning service. The prayer, as given by Bingham in his 'Christian Antiquities,' is as follows: "O God, the God of spirits and of all flesh, with whom no one can compare, whom no one can approach, thou givest the sun to govern the day, and the moon and stars to govern the night; look down upon us with the eyes of thy favour, and receive our morning thanksgivings, and have mercy on us. For we have not spread forth our hands to any strange god. For there is not any new god among us, but thou, our eternal and immortal God, who hast given us our being through Christ, and our well-being through him also. Vouchsafe by him to bring us to everlasting life; with whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen." The African councils speak of prayers used at the funerals of the dead, which were also called commendatory prayers, being such as were offered when the body was committed to the ground.

COMMINATION, a public denunciation or threatening of God's vengeance upon sinners. There is an ancient office, called the Commination, in the Church of England, which is appointed to be read on the first day of Lent or Ash-Wednesday, and at other times as the ordinary shall appoint.

COMMUNISTR, the presbyters in the early Christian church who assisted in the administration of the sacraments. Subsequently they regularly administered the ordinances themselves. See ELDERS (CHRISTIAN).

COMMISSARY, an officer in the Church of England who exercises ecclesiastical jurisdiction in places of the diocese so far distant from the chief city, that the chancellor cannot summon the people to the bishop's principal consistory court without great inconvenience to them.

COMMON PRAYER (BOOK OF), the liturgy of the Church of England, to the use of which in public worship, every clergyman is bound by the Act of Uniformity to adhere; and, besides, he subscribes a declaration to the effect, "That he himself will use the form in the said Book prescribed, in public prayer and administration of the sacraments, and none other." Previous to the reign of Edward VI., when the Liturgy was first performed in English, the ritual had consisted of a collection of Latin prayers, made up partly of some ancient forms used in the primitive church, and partly of some of a later original accommodated to the Romish church. Compiled at Rome, where the Latin tongue was spoken, the prayers had remained untranslated, even though the Latin had become a dead language. In 1547 the Convocation, and afterwards the Parliament, took into their consideration the subject of the communion, the Romanists having withheld the cup from the laity ever since the council of Constance in 1414, on pretence that part of the transubstantiated wine was in danger of being spilt. A change, however, on this point, had come over the minds of Christian men in England, and an authoritative act was passed, first by the clergy, and then by the Legislature, enjoining all persons to receive the sacrament in both kinds. The reformation of the communion led immediately to other improvements. Among these, one of the most important was the appointment of a committee of the clergy to prepare "an uniform order for the communion according to the rules of Scripture, and the use of the primitive church." This having been accomplished to the satisfaction of the public generally, the same persons were empowered in 1548 by another commission to compose a new Liturgy, which was completed in a few months, and included the new office for the communion. The committee to whom this task had been intrusted, was presided over by Archbishop Cranmer, and included eleven of the most eminent clergymen of the period, including Ridley the martyr. Drawn up by a body of men so highly qualified for the task, the Liturgy was approved, confirmed, and published by the King and Parliament, and is called 'The First Book of Edward VI.'

In the course of three years after its preparation, Cranmer proposed to revise the Liturgy, and having called to his aid Martin Bucer and Peter Martyr, two eminent Continental divines, he produced a new edition, with considerable alterations, consisting chiefly of the addition of the sentences, exhortation, confession and absolution at the beginning of the morning and evening services; which in the first Common Prayer Book began with the Lord's Prayer. The other changes were the removing of some ceremonies contained in the former book; as the use of oil in baptism; the unction of the sick; prayers for souls departed; omitting the order for mixing water with the wine, and several others. The vestments also prescribed by the former book were directed to be disused, and the practice of kneeling at the sacrament was explained. In this improved form the Liturgy was again confirmed by Parliament in 1552, and thus amended, it is frequently called 'The Second Book of Edward VI.' In the following year both this and the former act were repealed, Queen Mary, who had now succeeded to the throne, being resolved to restore Romanism in England. This state of matters, however, was but of short duration, for in 1559, soon after the accession of Elizabeth, a statute passed the Legislature restoring the English service; and a other committee of learned divines was appointed to review King Edward's Liturgies, and to frame from them a Book of Common Prayer for the use of the Church of England. In the list of commissioners on this important occasion, occurs the name of Matthew Parker, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; but the chief management of the undertaking is supposed to have devolved upon Mr. Edward Guest, a very learned man, and subsequently almoner to the Queen and Bishop of Salisbury. At the outset the difficulty arose, which of the two former Liturgies ought to be received. This point occasioned considerable discussion; but at length King Edward's Second Book was adopted, and its use was accordingly authorized by Parliament; with the addition of certain Lessons to be read on every Sunday in the year, the form of the Litany altered and revised, and two sentences added in delivering the sacrament. The alteration in the Litany consisted in omitting the words, "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities," which occurred in both the books of King Edward: and the adding these words to the first petition for the Queen, "Strengthen in the true worshipping of thee in righteousness and holiness of life." The sentences inserted at the delivery of the sacrament consisted of "the body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee;" and "The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ which was shed for thee, preserve thy body and soul to everlasting life." These were adopted out of King Edward's first book, and were the whole forms then in use; though they were omitted in the second, the form of which was also adopted. A few other variations from this second book were also made. Thus an alteration was introduced into the direction concerning the chancels and proper places for reading divine service; the vestments ordered in the first book were restored; two prayers for the Queen and clergy were added to the end of the Litany; and a note at the end of the communion service explanatory of the presence was omitted. The design of this last alteration was to promote uniformity, in accordance with the Queen's wishes, and, therefore, the question as to the real presence of Christ in the sacrament was left as an indeterminate point. The Book of Common Prayer thus completed, continued in use until the first year of James I., when some forms of thanksgiving were added, and the Catechism was enlarged on the subject of the sacraments. In the reign of Charles II., the Liturgy was again slightly altered, and unanimously subscribed by both Houses of Convocation of both provinces, on the 20th December, 1661. And in the same year, the Parliament passed the Act of Uniformity in Public Worship, which is binding upon all ministers of the Church of England; and although various proposals have been made from time to time to revise the Book of Common Prayer, it remains to this day in precisely the same state in which it was left by the Second Charles.

The strictest adherence to this prescribed formulary of the Church of England is enjoined by the canons on all the clergy. Thus it is expressly declared in the fourth canon: "Whosoever shall affirm, that the form of God's worship in the Church of England, established by law, and contained in the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, is a corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful worship of God, or containeth any thing in it that is repugnant to the Scriptures; let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored but by the bishop of the place, or archbishop, after his repentance and public revocation of such his wicked errors." And again, "If any minister, after he has subscribed to the Book of Common Prayer, shall omit to use the form of prayer, or any of the orders or ceremonies prescribed in the Communion Book, let him be suspended; and if after a month he does not reform and submit himself, let him be excommunicated; and then, if he shall not submit himself within the space of another month, let him be deposed from the ministry."

The Scotch Episcopal Church, since the days of Queen Anne, have adopted the Book of Common Prayer, and use it not only in the Morning and Evening services, but also in the occasional offices, except when celebrating the eucharist, on which occasion the Scotch communion office is generally read.

The Protestant Episcopal Church of America adopted in 1789 a somewhat modified form of the Book of Common Prayer, differing in several particulars from the service book of the Church of England. 1. A shorter form of absolution is allowed to be used instead of the English one, which, however, is retained, and is most generally recited in divine service. 2. The Athanasian Creed is omitted, while the Nicene Creed is retained. 3. In the office of baptism, the sign of the cross may be dispensed with if requested. 4. The marriage service has been considerably abridged. 5. In the funeral service some expressions in the English Prayer Book, which have been considered liable to misconstruction, are altered or omitted. In addition to these alterations, a change was of course introduced into the prayers for rulers, in consequence of the peculiar form of government in the United States. There may be also a few other verbal changes of minor importance which it is unnecessary to mention.

COMMUNION. This word in its strict acceptation implies the sharing of something along with another, and in a more general sense, agreement, fellowship or friendly intercourse. Hence the word communion is used by a very natural transition to denote the Lord's Supper, which is a fellowship or participation on the part of believers in the great benefits accruing from the broken body and shed blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. In its wider and more extended signification, communion is held by the believer when at the Lord's table with the whole body of Christ's people, who are all equally interested in his death; but in its narrower and more restricted meaning, it denotes fellowship with a particular congregation or community of Christians. Accordingly the term communion is sometimes used to signify any limited sect or denomination of Christians. So strong, however, was the impression of the early Christians, that the Lord's Supper was a feast of communion with the whole of Christ's people, that they held it might be celebrated by the absent as well as the present; and, accordingly, they were in the habit of sending by the hands of the deacons portions of the sacred elements to their brethren, who from sickness or imprisonment were unable to attend.

COMMUNION (CLERICAL), an expression which sometimes occurs in early Christian writers, and is intended in opposition to Lay Communion (see COMMUNION, LAY), to denote the full exercise of all the duties of the clerical office. Hence, when a clergyman was for any offence deprived of clerical communion, he was excluded from those special honours and privileges which belong to the sacred function. This was called also ecclesiastical communion. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION (FREE). The churches and Christian communities which adhere to the practice of free, catholic, open or mixed communion, are such as hold that the evidence of Christian character is the only indispensable prerequisite to admission to the Lord's Table. About forty years since, an earnest discussion arose in England between the Baptists and Pædobaptists as to what are usually described as the terms of communion, or the special conditions of admission to the Lord's Supper. The controversy chiefly turned upon the point whether or not baptism was an essential prerequisite. The doctrine of free communion was advocated by Mr. Robert Hall, while Mr. Fuller entered the lists as the champion of strict, close, primitive, or church communion. The argument was conducted with great ability on both sides. The positions which Mr. Hall maintained in support of his view of the subject were briefly these: "1. The baptism of John was a separate institution from that appointed by Christ after his resurrection; from which it follows that the Lord's supper was anterior to Christian baptism, and that the original communicants consisted entirely of such as had not received that ordinance. 2. That there is no such connexion, either in the nature of things, or by the divine institution, between baptism and the eucharist, as renders it, under all circumstances, indispensable that the former should precede the latter. 3. That admitting this to be the prescribed order, and to be sanctioned by the uniform practice of the apostles, the case of pious Pædobaptists is a new case, calling for some peculiar treatment, in which we ought to regard rather the spirit than the letter of apostolic precedent. 4. That a schism in the church, the mystical body of Christ, is deprecating in the New Testament as the greatest evil. 5.

That a reception to church fellowship of all such as God has received, notwithstanding a diversity of opinion and practice in matters not essential to salvation, is expressly enjoined in the New Testament. Rom. xiv. 1—5; xv. 1, 5—7. 6. That to withhold the Lord's supper from those with whom we unite in other acts of Christian worship, is a palpable inconsistency. And lastly, That it is as impolitic as it is illiberal; being calculated to awaken a powerful prejudice, and place beyond the reach of conviction our Pædobaptist brethren, and to engender among the Baptists themselves a narrow and sectarian feeling, wholly opposed to the enlarged spirit of the present age."

COMMUNION (INFANT). The custom prevailed for many ages in the Christian church of administering the communion to infants; and as persons at so early an age were incapable of eating the bread, the practice was early adopted of dipping it in wine, and pressing a drop or two into the mouth of the babe. The reason which Cyprian assigned for this custom was, "that the grace of God bestowed upon the subjects of baptism was given without measure, and without any limitation as to age." Augustine strongly advocates this practice, and in its favour he adduces John vi. 53, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," a passage which was afterwards quoted with the same application by Paschasius Radbert in the ninth century. From the period of the general introduction of infant baptism, the Lord's Supper continued to be administered to all who had been baptized, whether infants or adults. The custom of infant communion prevailed for several centuries. It is mentioned in the third council of Tours, A. D. 813, and even the council of Trent, A. D. 1545, instead of discountenancing it, only declared that it should not be considered essential to salvation. It is still scrupulously observed by the Greek church.

COMMUNION (LAY). It was accounted in the primitive Christian church the highest privilege of a layman to partake of the communion; but it was a severe rebuke for any one who held the clerical office to be again degraded to the condition of a layman, and to be required to communicate as a layman at the table of the Lord. This was regarded as a kind of mitigated excommunication. The man on whom the church inflicted this punishment for any offence, was excluded from the body of the clergy, and reduced to the condition of a layman, and his partaking of the Lord's Supper was termed a lay communion. Bellarmine alleges, that such a communion was only in one kind, such being the meaning at present attached to the expression lay communion in the Church of Rome. But this is taking for granted that the practice of denying the cup to the laity existed in the early Christian church, while there is not the slightest trace of it to be found in the ancient writers. Other authors again limit the meaning of lay communion to the punishment of being compelled to communicate among laymen outside the rails of a chancel. Such a restriction of its signification, however, is wholly unwarranted, and the only adequate idea of what is involved in reducing a clergyman to lay communion, is the totally degrading him, and depriving him of his orders, that is, of his clerical office and function, and reducing him to the simple condition of a layman. In this case they were not only deprived of the order and office, the power and authority, but even of the name and title of clergymen. They were accordingly, after such a sentence, reputed and treated as private Christians, wholly divested of all their former dignity and clerical powers and privileges. Very few instances are on record of clergymen thus degraded being recalled to the clerical office again, which indeed was never done but upon some great emergency or very pressing reason.

COMMUNION SERVICE, the office in the liturgy of the Church of England, for the administration of the eucharist or sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It was extracted out of several ancient liturgies, as those of St. Basil, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory, but considerably modified by Martin Bucer, who was brought over from Germany to assist in revising the Liturgy. At one time the communion service was used in a distinct form, and at a different time from the morning prayer, and Bishop Overall attributes it to the negligence of the ministers and carelessness of the people, that they have been combined into one office. It is appointed by the rubric to be read, in part at least, on every Sunday and holiday.

The communion office of the Scottish Episcopal Church differs from the communion office of the Prayer Book of the Church of England. It maintains the doctrine of the commemorative sacrifice of the holy eucharist, and asserts that Christ is verily and indeed present in the Lord's Supper, and taken and received by the faithful. The Book of Common Prayer has been universally adopted among the Scotch Episcopalians since 1712, and has been uniformly used not only in the morning and evening services, but also in all the occasional offices excepting the celebration of the eucharist, when the Scotch communion office is generally adopted. This office, the use of which is entirely limited to the body for which it was composed, was authorized by Charles I., and is formed on the model of the office in the first Liturgy of Edward VI.

COMMUNION (STRICT). The general opinion and practice of all ages have gone to favour the principle now held in almost all Christian churches, that to entitle any person to admission to the Lord's table something more is necessary than evidence of conversion or Christian character, which is the only prerequisite according to the adherents of Free Communion. Hence the advocates of Strict Communion have always maintained that not only baptism, but soundness in the faith, and a regular, consistent walk and conversation were scriptural and indispensable terms of communion. In the keen controversy which took place a number of years ago in the Baptist churches of England, the doctrine of Strict Communion was ably supported by Mr. J. G. Fuller, in his 'Conversations on Strict and Mixed Communion.' The chief positions which he seeks to establish, in conducting the argument against Mr. Hall, are briefly these: "1. That all the arguments which are used to destroy the identity of baptism as practised by John and the apostles before the death of Christ, with that practised afterwards, amount only to proof of a circumstantial not an essential difference, and cannot therefore warrant the inferences of Mr. Hall in any one point.—2. That the commission of our Lord (Matth. xxviii. 19, 20), furnishes the same evidence that baptism is an indispensable prerequisite to external church fellowship, as that faith is an indispensable prerequisite to baptism.—3. That the uniform example of the apostles is an inspired explanation of the commission under which they acted, and a pattern intended for the instruction of the church in all succeeding ages.—4. That strict conformity to the commission of Christ, thus explained, is not schism, but the only possible mode of restoring and perpetuating Christian union.—5. That the mutual forbearance enjoined on Christians in the New Testament related to matters of real indifference, not involving the surrender of any positive institution of Christ; and is therefore inapplicable to the present case.—6. That to unite with Pædobaptist brethren in all such acts of worship and benevolent effort as do not imply an abandonment of the commission, is not an inconsistency, but the dictate of Christian charity.—And, lastly, That to whatever imputations a strict adherence to the commission of Christ may subject the Baptist churches, it is better to suffer them than to sin; and that a deviation in deference to modern error, however conscientiously maintained, is neither charity nor Christian wisdom, since 'whatever is right is wise.' Christians may cordially unite in the evangelization of the world, but they do not, nor can they without a change of sentiments, unite in the constitution of their churches."

COMMUNION (TERMS OF). Our Lord, in instituting the ordinance of the Supper, showed clearly for whom it was intended by administering it to his disciples. If we examine the corresponding ordinance under the Old Testament, which is well known to have been the Passover, we shall find that its administration was limited to the Israelites, and those who had joined themselves to them by submitting to circumcision. Thus, in regard to strangers, the law was explicit, Exod. xii. 48, "And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the Lord, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof." It is plain, therefore, that circumcision was an indispensable qualification for partaking of the passover, and from this it is argued by analogy that baptism, which has come in the place of circumcision, is equally necessary to entitle a person to sit down at the table of the Lord. On this point, as to which, up to within the last half century, there had never been a doubt, a controversy raged for some time among the English Baptists; the one party, headed by Mr. Hall, contending for the duty of free communion, or the open admission of Pædobaptists to the communion with Baptists; the other party, headed by Mr. Fuller, contending for the duty of strict communion, and, therefore, arguing in favour of baptism as an indispensable qualification for partaking of the Lord's Supper. The latter opinion is that which has almost universally been maintained in Christian churches, and, accordingly, in case of an unbaptized person applying for admission to the eucharist, it is the invariable practice to dispense the ordinance of baptism previously to the individual being allowed to take his place at the Lord's table. Baptism, however, is not the only term of communion. It is generally demanded of candidates for the Lord's table, in addition to the qualification of previous baptism, that they show a competent measure of knowledge, profess their faith in Christ, and possess a character in accordance with their profession. The English Church Catechism, in reply to the question, "What is required of them who come to the Lord's Supper?" answers, "To examine themselves whether they repent them truly of their former sins, steadfastly purposing to lead a new life; have a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ, with a thankful remembrance of his death; and be in charity with all men." To the same effect, the 29th article of the same church declares, "The wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth, as St. Augustine saith, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing." The Westminster Confession of Faith, also, which is the symbol or authoritative standard of the Presbyterian churches, is equally explicit on this point, asserting "All ignorant and ungodly persons, as they are unfit to enjoy communion with him (Christ), so are they unworthy of the Lord's table, and cannot, without great sin against Christ, while they remain such, partake of these holy mysteries, or be admitted thereunto." Such then are the individuals who, in the judgment of the church, are entitled to admission to the table of the Lord. If it be asked, however, who they are that, in the sight of God, are qualified to partake of this holy ordinance, the reply is, that believers alone have a right to this privilege. Yet even believers themselves are not always in a state of preparedness for the Lord's Supper. Their graces may be in a very low state, and their consciences wounded by sin, and, therefore, it is their duty to humble themselves in unfeigned repentance before engaging in this solemn ordinance. Hence the necessity of the apostolic exhortation, "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of this bread and drink of this cup." The duty to which the apostle thus calls all who would partake worthily of the Lord's Supper, involves a serious and searching inquiry both as to their habitual character and their present spiritual state.

COMMUNION OF STRANGERS. Travellers and strangers, in the early ages of the Christian church, unless they had testimonials certifying to their regular standing as recognized members of the church, were treated as if they were under censure, not being allowed the privileges of full communion, though permitted to receive maintenance from the funds of the church if they required it. Clergymen under censure were sometimes treated in this way. They were placed in the same relation as strangers, which was denoted by the Latin phrase communio peregrina. In these circumstances they could neither officiate nor be present at the celebration of the Lord's Supper until they had given the prescribed satisfaction.

COMMUNION TABLE, on which the elements are laid in celebrating the Lord's Supper. It was at first a plain moveable table made of wood, and covered with a white cloth. Altars, as the communion tables came to be called, were wrought from stone in the time of Constantine, and in the Western church were required by ecclesiastical authority in the beginning of the sixth century. The stone altars were no longer moveable, but fixed, and decorated with crimson cloth. This change in the construction of the communion table, and the application to it of the term altar, did not take place before Christianity had been corrupted from its original simplicity, and men began to consider the Lord's Supper in the light of a sacrifice. The custom of covering the table with white linen is of great antiquity. It is first mentioned by Optatus, and several other authors allude to the practice. There is no doubt that, at its first institution, the eucharist was celebrated by our Lord and his disciples seated around a table, and the Apostle Paul contrasts "the Lord's table" with "the table of devils." In regard to the use of a table in this ordinance, there has long been a difference of opinion between the Presbyterians and others. "In the Westminster Assembly," says Baillie, "the Independents occupied them no less than three weeks in debating the point of sitting at a communion table. The unhappy Independents would mangle that sacrament. No catechizing nor preparation before; no thanksgiving after; no sacramental doctrine nor chapters in the day of celebration; no coming up to any table, but a carrying of the elements to all in their seats athwart the church." The distribution of the elements to communicants not seated at a table, but in their ordinary pews, has more recently been adopted both in Britain and America, by many Presbyterian as well as Congregationalist churches. Episcopalians of every order avoid a table altogether, and partake of the elements kneeling before the altar, while the Romish church, believing in the transubstantiation of the bread and wine into the body, blood, soul, and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, consider the mass, as they term the eucharist, to be a sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

COMMUNICANT, one who is admitted by a Christian church to partake of the elements of bread and wine at the Lord's table. For the principles on which the admission proceeds, see COMMUNION (TERMS OF).

COMMUNICATIVE LIFE, that form of monasticism in which the individual professing to be a religious retains possession of his worldly property, and uses the proceeds of it for the advantage of the brethren. It is opposed to the RENUNCIATIVE LIFE which renounces the world.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS. It is asserted by Luke concerning the first converts to Christianity, Acts iv. 32, "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." The precise nature of this community of property has given rise to no small dispute among ecclesiastical writers. An opinion prevailed in ancient times, though not before the fourth century, that in the church of Jerusalem, of which the sacred historian is directly speaking, there was a similar community of possessions to that which existed among the ancient Essenes, and still professedly exists among modern monks. This idea, however, is altogether unwarranted by the whole tenor of the sacred narrative. The apostle Peter is introduced reproving Ananias for withholding a portion of his property from the common fund, but in Acts v. 4, he reminds the guilty man that it was in his own power either to sell or to retain his property, and that even after the sale he might contribute to the common stock what he thought proper. The crime lay, as is evident from the terms of the narrative, in his falsehood. Proceeding a little farther on in the history, we find, Acts vi., assistance given to the widows, but by no means from a common store collected for the support of the whole community. Mosheim, accordingly, may be considered as having put the matter on a proper footing when he asserts that "the declaration of Luke should not be understood as it generally has been of their possessing in common, but only of their using in common." Their minds were so completely pervaded by brotherly love, that they were led to consider their property to be at the service of their Christian brethren as they might require it. Under the influence of this spirit a common fund was established, which was at first placed under the management of the apostles, and out of which the common and necessary expenses were defrayed, and the wants of the poorer members supplied. In this view of the subject, Heumann, Mosheim, and Neander fully agree.

COMMUTATION OF PENANCE. See PENANCE.

COMPASS. Father Le Comte, in describing the superstitious practices of the Chinese, says, they paid divine adoration to the compass, burnt little odoriferous balls to its honour, and offered meats and sacrifices to it. They threw gilded paper punctually twice a-day into the sea to attract its favour, and win it to be propitious.

COMPASSIVITY, a term used in Romanist writers to express the feelings of a saint on beholding in a vision the sufferings of Christ, whereby his soul is transpierced with the sword of a compassive pain; thus literally enduring the passion of Christ. Such a vision is set before him, "that he may be premonished that he is about to be transformed entirely, not by the martyrdom of the flesh, but by the burning of the soul into the express similitude of Jesus Christ crucified."

COMPETENTES, the name given to an order of catechumens in the early Christian church, denoting the immediate candidates of baptism, or such as gave in their names, expressing their desire to be baptized at the next approaching festival. In the act of petitioning for this favour, they received the name of competentes. When their names were given in, and their petition accepted, then both they and their sponsors were registered in the books of the church, or diplychs, as they were called. The examination of the proficiency they had made in the preceding stages of their course as catechumens, followed immediately upon the enrolment of their names. Those who, on examination, were approved, received the name of electi or chosen. For twenty days before baptism they were exorcised (see EXORCISM), and required to practise abstinence and fasting. Accordingly, the fourth council of Carthage enjoins, "Let such as give in their names to be baptized be exercised a long time with abstinence from wine and flesh, and with imposition of hands, and frequent examination, and so let them receive their baptism." At this time also the competentes were taught the words of the Creed, which they were obliged to repeat at their last examination before baptism. Along with the Creed, they were taught how to make the proper responses as to their renunciation of the devil, and their engagement to serve Christ. They were required to go veiled, or with their faces covered for some days before baptism, that their minds might be fully at liberty to ponder the responsibility of their position, and that their solemn meditations might not be interrupted by the wandering of the eyes. Ancient authors inform us, that they were also subjected to the double ceremony of touching the ears, and anointing the eyes with clay, implying the opening of the ears to receive the truth, and of the eyes to behold it in its true spiritual meaning. See CATECHUMENS.

COMPITALES (LARES). See LARES.

COMPITALIA, a festival celebrated annually by the ancient Romans, at the places where two ways met, in honour of the Lares Compitales. This festival is said to have been first instituted by Tarquinius Priscus, and having fallen into disuse, it was restored by Tarquinius Superbus. In the time of Augustus it was again revived, after having been lost sight of for a time. The compitalia were observed generally in winter, in the month of January.

COMPLETORIUM, the last of the seven CANONICAL HOURS (which see), or fixed times of prayer in the ancient Christian church. The completorium was at bed-time, when the day was completed, and hence the name.

COMPLINE, another name for the last of the canonical hours. See preceding article.

COMPLUTENSIAN VERSION, an edition of the New Testament in the original Greek, which was printed at Complutum or Alcalá in Spain, in A. D. 1514, but was not published till some years after. It was prepared and published under the patronage of Cardinal Ximenes. Though the manuscripts which the editors used are lost, they are generally believed to have belonged to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, and, therefore, could not have been of great value. In the preparation of this edition, some changes are generally believed to have been introduced in conformity with the Vulgate. See BIBLE.

COMPREHENSION BILL, a measure which was introduced into the English Parliament in the reign of King Charles II. in 1667. It was designed by Sir Orlando Bridgman, to pave the way for the admission of Protestant Dissenters into the communion of the Established church. With this view it proposed to relax the rigid terms of the Act of Uniformity, and to dispense with the practice of kneeling at the sacrament, and also with the practice of making the sign of the cross in baptism. This Bill passed the House of Lords, but was lost in the Commons. Another attempt to accomplish the same object was made by Tillotson and Stillingfleet in 1674, but although the terms proposed met the wishes of the Non-conformists, the bishops refused their assent to the measure, and thus it dropped. The scheme was again revived after the Revolution in 1688, in accordance with the earnest wishes of William and Mary, but to no purpose, and the Act of Toleration was obtained. The comprehension scheme which these royal personages had so much at heart, was extended to Scotland, where, through a pliant General Assembly, the Episcopal clergy were admitted in considerable numbers into the national Presbyterian Church. "Their admission," to use the language of Dr. Hetherington, "was the most fatal event which ever occurred in the strange eventful history of that church. It infused baneful poison into her very heart, whence ere long flowed forth a lethal stream, corrupting and paralyzing her whole frame. It sowed the noxious seed, which gradually sprung up and expanded into the deadly upas-tree of Moderatism, shedding a mortal blight over the whole of her once fair and fruitful vineyard, till it withered into a lifeless wilderness." In 1692, William, being resolved to carry out his plans as far as he possibly could, conveyed to the General Assembly his pleasure, that those of the Episcopalian persuasion who were willing to sign the Confession of Faith should not only retain their churches and benefices, but also be admitted to sit and act in church judicatories; and that the Commission of Assembly should be composed one half of Presbyterians, and the other half of these admitted prelatists. The church, however, firmly refused to accede to the wishes of the king. Another act was passed on the 12th of June of the following year, having the principle of "comprehension" as its object, with the proviso, that if the General Assembly should refuse to admit to a share in the government of the church those of the prelatists who might apply for it, his Majesty would not attempt to compel the Assembly to admit them, but would secure to them the possession of their churches, manses, and stipends. For a time this act was not carried into actual operation, but in the course of a series of years its consequences became but too apparent, in the numbers of irreligious and unprincipled men who sought and found admission into the church. The combination of the indulged ministers and the prelatist incumbents, which was brought about by the "comprehension scheme" of King William, may be considered as the main source of the calamities which have so frequently overtaken the National Church of Scotland.

COMPROMISE (ELECTION BY), one of the modes in which a Pope is elected. It sometimes happens when the cardinals fail to agree as to one particular individual, that they engage by mutual compromise to refer the matter to some cardinals in whom they have confidence, binding themselves to nominate the person as Pope on whom the arbiters shall fix. This mode of election seldom requires to be resorted to. See POPE.

COMUS, in ancient Pagan mythology, the god of mirth and hilarity. He is represented as a young man full of wine, and with every appearance of being under its intoxicating influence.

CONCEPTION (IMMACULATE), a doctrine maintained both in the Romish and Greek churches, that the Virgin Mary was conceived in the womb of her mother without the slightest stain of sin, and in the same state of purity in which Christ was conceived in her womb. On this subject a public controversy arose about A. D. 1140. Long before this, Mary had been considered as sinless, but not as conceived without sin. It was reserved for the canons of Lyons in France to project this doctrine, and to institute a festival in commemoration of it. The novel tenet was no sooner propounded than it met with stout resistance from St. Bernard, and other theologians of the twelfth century. The festival sought to be introduced was pronounced an unwarranted innovation, and while it gained ground in the thirteenth century, it is not unworthy of notice, that whenever the writers of that time speak of the feast, it is described as the feast of the conception, not of the immaculate conception. Thomas Aquinas attacked the doctrine with so much logical acuteness and power, that he had almost silenced its founders, when Duns Scotus, opposing the Dominican on this as well as on other points, entered the field in defence of the original sinlessness of Mary. Thus the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, in the course of the fourteenth century, was adopted as one of the most prominent doctrines of the Franciscans, in their keen and protracted disputes with the Dominicans. For centuries they continued to argue upon the conception of Mary as a favourite dogma, and to perceive how far the opposing parties carried the bitterness of their hostility, we may simply notice the well-known tragedy of Berne, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the details of which are as follows: "A Dominican monk named Wigand Wirt, preaching at Frankfort A. D. 1507, so violently assailed the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary (the favourite doctrine of the Franciscans), that he was summoned to Rome to answer for his conduct. His brethren of the Dominican order in their convention at Wimpfen formed a plan to aid him, and to convince the world that the Franciscan doctrine of the immaculate conception was false. Berne was selected for the scene of their operations. The prior, sub-prior, preacher, and steward of the Dominican cloister at Berne undertook to get up miracles and revelations for the occasion. A simple honest rustic, by the name of John Jetzer, who had just entered upon his novitiate in the monastery, was selected as their tool. The sub-prior appeared to him one night dressed in white, and pretending to be the ghost of a friar who had been a hundred and sixty years in purgatory, he wailed and entreated of Jetzer to afford him aid. Jetzer promised to do it as far as he was able, and the next morning reported his vision to his superiors. They encouraged him to go on and to confer freely with the ghost if he appeared again. A few nights after the ghost made his appearance, attended by two devils, his tormentors, and thanked Jetzer for the relaxation of his sufferings, in consequence of Jetzer's prayers, fasting, &c. He also instructed Jetzer respecting the views entertained in the other world concerning the immaculate conception, and the detention of some pontiffs and others in purgatory for having persecuted the deniers of that doctrine; and promised Jetzer that St. Barbara should appear to him and give him farther instruction. Accordingly the sub-prior assumed a female garb on a succeeding night, and appeared to Jetzer. She revealed to him some parts of his secret history, which the preacher, his confessor, had drawn from him at his confessions. Jetzer was completely duped. St. Barbara promised that the Virgin Mary should appear to him. She, on the sub-prior personating her, did so; and assured him that she was not conceived free from original sin, though she was delivered from it three hours after her birth; that it was a grievous thing to her to see that erroneous opinion spread abroad. She blamed the Franciscans much as being the chief cause of this false belief. She also announced the destruction of the city of Berne because the people did not expel the Franciscans, and cease from receiving a pension from the French king. She appeared repeatedly, gave Jetzer much instruction, and promised to impress on him the five wounds of Christ, which she declared were never impressed on St. Francis or any other person. She accordingly seized his right hand and thrust a nail through it. This so pained him that he became restive under the operation, and she promised to impress the other wounds without giving him pain. The conspirators now gave him medicated drugs which stupified him, and then made the other wounds upon him while senseless. Hitherto the sub-prior had been the principal actor; but now the preacher undertook to personate St. Mary, and Jetzer knew his voice, and from this time began to suspect the whole to be an imposition. All attempts to hoodwink him became fruitless; he was completely undeceived. They next endeavoured to bring him to join voluntarily in the plot. He was persuaded to do so. But they imposed upon him such intolerable austerities, and were detected by him in such impious and immoral conduct, that he wished to leave the monastery. They would not let him go, and were so fearful of his betraying their secret, which was now drawing crowds to their monastery and promising them great advantage, that they determined to destroy him by poison. Jetzer, by listening at their door got knowledge of the fact, and was so on his guard that they could not succeed, though they used a consecrated host as the medium of the poison. He eloped from the monastery and divulged the whole transaction. The four conspirators were apprehended, tried for blasphemy and profaning holy ordinances, delivered over to the civil power, burned at the stake in 1509, and their ashes cast into the river near Berne."

The council of Trent, in its decree on original sin, declared, that the conception of all men in a state of sin does not include the Virgin Mary. The controversy broke out anew in the university of Paris towards the close of the sixteenth century. In 1708, Clement XI. appointed a festival to be celebrated throughout the church, in honour of the immaculate conception. From that period until recently, the doctrine of Mary's original sinlessness was held as an opinion, not as an article of faith. In 1854, however, Pius IX., the present Pope, declared this tenet to be henceforth an article of faith, binding upon the consciences of all faithful Romanists, and which dare not be disbelieved or denied under pain of final condemnation.

CONCEPTION OF ST. ANNE, a festival celebrated by the Greek church on the ninth day of December. This is one of those festivals the observance of which is obligatory on none but the monks, though it is understood to be in commemoration of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. See preceding article.

CONCEPTION OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, a festival held by the Greek church on the 23d of September.

CONCEPTION OF OUR LADY (THE ORDER OF THE), a religious order founded in the fifteenth century by Beatrix de Sylva in Spain. This lady declared that the Virgin Mary had twice appeared to her, inspiring her with the design of founding an order in honour of the immaculate conception. The order was constituted in 1484, and confirmed by Pope Innocent VIII. in 1489, who granted them permission to follow the rule of the Cistercians. The habit of the nuns consisted of a white gown and scapulary, with a blue mantle. On their scapulary they wore the image of the blessed Virgin. After the death of their foundress, Cardinal Ximenes put them under the charge of the Franciscans, as being the most zealous defenders of the doctrine of the immaculate conception. It was not until 1507 that another convent of this order was formed in Spain, and seven more speedily sprung up, one of them being at Madrid. The order soon passed into Italy, and got footing both at Milan and Rome. In the reign of Louis XIV. of France, we find a convent of the Clarisses embracing the order of the conception. The nuns of this order are accustomed, besides the grand office of the Franciscans, to recite on Sundays and holidays an office of the conception of the Holy Virgin.

CONCHULA BEMATIS. See BEMA.

CONCILIA (Lat. councils), a word which in ancient Christian writers often, or rather commonly, signifies ecclesiastical synods. (See COUNCILS.) Sometimes, however, it denotes other assemblies, and particularly the ordinary assemblies of the church for Divine service, and from the assembly, the word came also to be applied to the church or building in which the assembly was convened.

CONCLAMATIO, the cry or lamentation which the ancient Romans made over their dead. As soon as the eyes were closed in death, the relatives of the deceased who happened to be present, called upon him by name several times at intervals, repeating Ave, hail, or vale, Farewell. Hence when any affair was desperate, the phrase was frequently used in reference to this practice, conclamatum est, all is over. See DEAD (RITES CONNECTED WITH THE).

CONCLAVE, the assembly of CARDINALS (which see) convened for the election of a pope. It was in the fourteenth general council, held at Lyons in A. D.

1274, during the pontificate of Gregory X., that a decree was passed relative to the election of a new pope, by which the cardinals were required to be shut up in conclave during the election. The doors were to be carefully watched and guarded, so as to prevent all improper ingress or egress, and every thing examined that was carried in, lest it should be calculated to influence the election. If the election should not be completed in three days, the cardinals were to be allowed only one dish for dinner; and if protracted a fortnight longer, they were to be limited to bread, wine, and water. A majority of two-thirds of the cardinals was required to make a lawful election. This celebrated decree, though with some modifications, has been continued in force till the present day.

The cardinals are obliged to enter the conclave ten days after the death of the pope, but they previously assemble in the Gregorian chapel, where they hear the mass of the Holy Ghost, after which a bishop addresses them in a Latin discourse, exhorting them to make choice of a person who is worthy to fill the chair of the Prince of the Apostles. At the close of the service the cardinals walk in procession to the conclave arranged according to their rank, attended by soldiers, and a vast crowd of people, the chorus all the while singing the Veni Creator. The conclave is usually held in the Vatican, as being every way the most convenient for the purpose. The conclave, for the name is applied to the place in which the cardinals meet, as well as to the assembly itself, is a row of small cells said to be only ten feet square, made of wainscot, in which the cardinals are shut up during the election of a pope. Every cell has some small portion partitioned off for the conclavists, and it is numbered and drawn for by lot. The cells are all ranged in one line along the galleries and the hall of the Vatican, but with a small interval or space between them. Over each cell is placed the arms of the cardinal to whom it belongs. A long corridor runs between the cells and the windows to admit the light, which shines into the cells through small glass windows placed towards the corridor. The entrance to the Vatican is carefully guarded by soldiers while the cardinals are in conclave, and neither they, nor those who are shut up along with them, can be spoken to, unless at particular hours, and with a loud voice, either in the Italian or the Latin language. The scrutiny is taken twice every day, morning and afternoon, when each cardinal passes from his cell to the chapel of the scrutiny attended by his conclavists. In the chapel each of the cardinals is dressed in a crimson cloak with a long train. They are provided with printed schedules, folded beforehand in a particular manner, with blanks to be filled up by each cardinal with his own name, and that of the person for whom he votes. Ten small tables are prepared in the chapel, at which they fill up the blanks in the schedule in the presence of the rest, so that they each see the others write, but without seeing what they write. A deputation is sent to the cells of those who are unwell, and who fill up the schedules in the presence of the deputation. Each cardinal, on having completed, folded, and sealed his schedule, carries it in view of all the rest, and deposits it in a large chalice placed on the altar of the chapel. As soon as all the schedules are filled up and put into the chalice, three cardinals are chosen by lot to act as scrutineers, who count the schedules, in the first instance, to ascertain whether the number exactly corresponds with that of the cardinals in the conclave. The schedules are then each of them opened, and the names of the persons voted for proclaimed aloud, after which the number of votes for each is declared. If two-thirds of the votes are in favour of any particular individual, he is declared to be duly elected; but if not, the cardinals proceed to a second vote by ACCESSUS (which see). The last part of the process is to burn the whole of the schedules in the presence of the cardinals, and the smoke made by burning is eagerly watched by the populace outside, who, as soon as it is seen issuing from the chimney, disperse to their homes, satisfied that the election is not yet completed. The schedules are burned also when the pope is elected, but in that case so much time is spent in verifying the votes, and obtaining the consent of the newly elected pope, that before the papers are burned, the guns from the castle of St. Angelo have given notice of the election.

The ceremony of conveying provisions to the cardinals in conclave is thus described by an eye-witness: "While the conclave sat, I went repeatedly to see the dinners conveyed to the cardinals, which takes place every day about noon. Each cardinal's dinner is attended by eight or ten servants, and two or three carriages. First come two servants bearing maces, then two carrying the dinner in a wicker basket, suspended betwixt two poles, like a sedan chair. The basket is covered with cloth, having the cardinal's arms emblazoned on it. Two or three servants sometimes follow on foot, and then come the carriages containing the Dapiferus and his attendants, with two or more servants behind each.

"Each party on arriving enters the court of the palace, the Dapiferus and his attendants alight, and the dinner is carried forward to a room prepared for the purpose.

"Here is stationed a party of the guardians of the conclave, both ecclesiastical and military. The room on one side opens to the court of the palace, and on the other communicates with the conclave by means of the Ruote. The 'Ruota' is composed of two upright cylinders. The outer is fixed, and built into the wall, forming part of it, having an opening to each side. The inner revolves within it, nearly filling it, and has only one opening, extending from top to bottom, perhaps one-eighth part of its circumference in width, so that by placing anything on the shelves of the inner cylinder, and turning it round, it is conveyed to those on the other side of the wall, without the possibility of either party seeing or having any intercourse with the other.

"In the middle of the room is a long table, on which the servants place the various dishes contained in the baskets. The guardians of the conclave examine each dish separately, and finding in it nothing but food, it is placed in one of the ruote, which is then turned round, and the dishes taken out by the servants inside the conclave, and conveyed to their respective owners.

"I was repeatedly present at this ceremony; the examination is no farce, for every dish was carefully inspected, though I never saw any actually cut in pieces as is said to be sometimes done."

When the provisions are carried into the conclave, one of the pope's footmen, who stands by in his purple robe, and with a silver mace in his hand, shuts the door, when the assistant prelate takes care that all is fast, and seals the lock with his coat-of-arms. The masters of the ceremonies do the same within.

CONCLAVISTS, the attendants on cardinals when met in conclave for the election of a Pope. They are seldom more in number than two to each cardinal, one of them being an ecclesiastic. If the cardinals be princes, or old or infirm, they are sometimes allowed to have three. They are shut up as strictly as the cardinals themselves, and though the situation of a conclavist is far from being comfortable, it is much coveted. A conclavist may assign the pensions which he has out of benefices for a particular sum, which is determined by the privilege which the Pope elect grants to him who makes the assignment. This office also gives a man the privilege of being a citizen in any town within the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; besides which, he receives a sum of money from the Pope after his election. Each conclavist, before entering upon his office, takes an oath that he will not reveal the secrets of the conclave. These attendants on the cardinals are sometimes the hired tools of foreign governments, to procure the election of a particular individual to the Papal chair. The author of the 'Idea of the Conclave,' a work published in 1676, thus describes the special duties of a conclavist: "He must be shut up in a little corner of his master's cell, and do every menial office for him. He must fetch him his victuals and drink, which that cardinal's officers give him in from without, through an inlet that communicates to all his quarter,—twice every day. He is to wait on his master at table, to keep every thing very clean, and when he has done, to serve himself; not to mention the other inconveniences of a very severe confinement, where no light is received but at windows half walled up; and where the air, when it is hot weather, may at length break the strongest constitutions."

CONCOMITANCE, a doctrine which was first employed by the schoolmen of the thirteenth century, in defence of the withdrawal of the cup from the laity in the Lord's Supper—the doctrine that under each species the whole of Christ was contained by concomitance, therefore, under the body, the blood; so that he who partook of but one species lost nothing. See CHALICE.

CONCORD (FORM OF), a famous document drawn up in 1579, with a view to heal the divisions of the Lutheran church, and as a preservative against the opinions of the Reformed churches. This treatise was prepared by Andreas, professor at Tubingen, and his associates at Torgau, hence it is frequently called the Book of Torgau. It was sent by the Elector of Saxony to almost all the Lutheran princes, that it might be approved by the doctors of the church, and authoritatively enforced by the secular power. So many objections, however, were started against the book, that its compilers felt it to be necessary to revise and amend it. Thus corrected, it was submitted to a convocation of six divines, who met at Berg, a Benedictine monastery near Magdeburg, where was produced a work of no small note in ecclesiastical history—the Form of Concord. This document consists of two parts, the first consisting of the dogmas propounded by Andreas and his colleagues; and the second ruthlessly excommunicating all who should refuse to subscribe to these dogmas, and declaring them to be heretics deserving of the vengeance of the secular arm. The manner in which this document was received by the different churches, both Lutheran and Reformed, is thus described by Mr. Conder:

“The authority of the Elector secured the adoption of this new Confession by the Saxon churches; and their example was slowly followed in other parts of Germany. By several of the most eminent churches of the Lutheran communion, it was, however, firmly and indignantly rejected; among others, by those of Nuremberg, Brunswick, Hesse, Pomerania, Silesia, Holstein, and Denmark. Frederic II. of Denmark, on receiving a copy of this formula, threw it in the fire. A warm and affectionate veneration for the memory of Melancthon contributed to produce this general dissatisfaction with a document in which his opinions were so rudely and intolerantly denounced. Its uncharitable exclusion of the Calvinists from the communion of the Lutheran church, naturally excited still warmer indignation against its authors on the part of the Reformed churches. The Helvetic doctors, with Hospinian at their head, the Belgic divines, those of the Palatinate, together with the principalities of Anhalt and Baden, declared open war against this misnamed Form of Concord. Even in Saxony, many who were compelled to subscribe to it, held it in aversion; and on the death of Augustus, the moderate Lutherans and secret Calvinists, favoured by Crellius, the prime-minister of the new Elector, resumed their courage and their influence. Their designs were, however, suddenly frustrated by the unexpected death of the Elector Christian I. in 1591, which was followed by the disgrace and imprisonment of the doctors who had been concerned in the unsuccessful project of reform, while Crellius, their chief patron, suffered death in 1601, as the punishment of his temerity. The Bergensic formula might with more propriety be denominated the Form of Discord. It has never been universally received by the Lutheran churches, although it is still ranked by some among the standards of the orthodox faith.”

The doctrines to which this Confession wished to bind the churches, respected chiefly the majesty and omnipresence of Christ's body, and the real manducation of his flesh and blood in the eucharist. Another controversy on the subject of the Form of Concord arose in Switzerland in 1718, when the magistrates of Berne published an edict enjoining the adoption of this Confession as a rule of faith. A keen dispute was carried on for some time arising out of this edict, and the result was in the highest degree injurious to the authority and influence of the Book of Torgau.

CONCORDAT, a convention or treaty between the Pope of Rome in his spiritual character as head of the Roman Catholic Church, and any secular government with a view to arrange ecclesiastical relations. The term concordat is never applied to those treaties into which the Pope enters as a temporal sovereign. Among the earliest of those conventions which are entitled to the name of concordats, may be mentioned that which closed the long and bitter controversy on the subject of investiture. The treaty to which we now refer was brought about after repeated negotiations in A. D. 1122, between Pope Calixtus II. and the Emperor Henry V., which being concluded at Worms, and confirmed at the Lateran council in 1123, was designated by the title of the Concordat of Worms. By the arrangement thus effected, the conflict between church and state, which had lasted for more than forty years, was brought to an end; the Pope conceding to the Emperor the right to bestow on bishops and abbots chosen in his presence, without violence or simony, the investiture with regalia. This concordat was received with universal joy, and is held to this day as regulating to a great extent the relations between the See of Rome and the civil powers in Germany. In the history of concordats it is found, that most of them, especially those which tend even in the slightest degree to curtail the power of the clergy, have been reluctantly extorted from the Popes by the sovereigns of different countries. In very many cases, however, the Popes have contrived so to frame concordats as to advance the interests of the church at the expense of the civil power. One of the most remarkable instances of this kind occurred in 1516, when a concordat was formed between Francis I. of France, and Pope Leo X., to abolish the pragmatic sanction, which had existed for nearly a century, and whereby part of the clergy, without consulting with the people or the archbishops, or other bishops of provinces, chose their bishops, leaving the king the privilege of consenting to and confirming the election if he chose. This arrangement by no means met the views of Leo X., and, accordingly, a concordat was framed, whereby it was repealed, and the king was granted the power of nominating such as he thought fit for bishops, while the Pope had the power of accepting or rejecting them at his pleasure. One of the most celebrated of concordats was that which Buonaparte, when first consul of the French republic, concluded with Pope Pius VII. in 1801. By this agreement the Roman Catholic church was re-established in France, the government received the power of appointing the clergy, the metropolitan and episcopal sees were reduced to sixty, the Pope resigned the right of restoring the spiritual orders, but retained the privilege of the canonical investiture of bishops, and the revenues connected with it. In 1817, however, Louis XVIII. concluded with the same Pope another concordat, abolishing that of 1801, and restoring the arrangements agreed upon in 1516, while the nation was subjected to an enormous tax for the endowment of forty-two new metropolitan and episcopal sees, with their chapters and seminaries. This concordat was received with so much disapprobation and discontent by the people of France, that the ministry withdrew their proposition. In Naples, Bavaria, and recently in Austria, the Romish church has obtained a firm footing by means of concordats, and has succeeded in rendering the ecclesiastical to a great extent independent of the civil power in these countries.

CONCORDIA, an ancient Roman divinity, being the personification of the virtue of concord or harmony. Several temples to this goddess were built at Rome. She is generally represented as a matron either sitting or standing, and holding in her left hand a cornucopia, and in her right an olive branch or a patera.

CONCUBINE, a word which is understood to signify a woman who, although she may not have been married to a man, yet lives with him as his wife. Among the ancient Hebrews, however, the word was applied to a secondary wife, or one of an inferior grade. Such wives were customary in the patriarchal and subsequent ages. They were regarded as real wives, the connection being sanctioned by law, and the inferiority was marked by the absence of certain solemnities and contracts of dowry. The children of such wives were not entitled to inherit the property of their father, which both by law and usage belonged to the children of the principal wife or wives. But the offspring of the secondary wives were usually provided for during the father's lifetime. Thus we find Abraham providing for the children of Hagar and Keturah. Matters are still conducted in the East much in the same way, and besides being sanctioned by long usage, they are also legalized by Mohammedan law, which allows a man four principal wives, and an unrestricted number of slaves. Should a female slave become an inferior wife of her master, she still retains her condition as a slave, just as Hagar continued to be a bond woman after she had borne Ishmael to Abraham, and she still recognized Sarah as her mistress. This appears to have been the case also with the ancient Greeks, a female slave acquiring no improvement of her social position by being the concubine of her master. Among the Greeks the legality of a marriage depended entirely on the circumstance, whether or not a dowry had been given. If no dowry had been given, the woman could lay no claim to conjugal rights, and the child of such an union was illegitimate.

CONDEMNATION. See JUDGMENT (GENERAL).

CONDIGNITY, a term used by the schoolmen in the middle ages, to convey their views of human merit. The followers of Thomas Aquinas, commonly called the THOMISTS (which see), speak frequently in their writings of the merit of condignity, by which they mean that by the assistance of God, man is capable of so living as to prove himself worthy (condignus) of eternal life in the sight of God,—a doctrine completely opposed to the plainest statements of the Word of God.

CONDITORIUM, a burial-place among the ancient Greeks and Romans, in which dead bodies were deposited in their entire state, as distinguished from those sepulchres which contained only the bones and ashes. The word conditorium is also used to denote the coffin in which a dead body was placed when consigned to the tomb.

CONFALON, a confraternity of seculars in the Church of Rome, called penitents, established first of all by a body of Roman citizens. Henry III. commenced one at Paris in 1583, and assumed himself the habit of a penitent at a religious procession.

CONFARREATIO, one of the modes in which a legal marriage among the ancient Romans was effected. This, which was the most solemn form of marriage, was accomplished when the parties were joined in marriage by the Pontifex Maximus or Flamen Dialis, in presence of at least ten witnesses, by a set form of words, and by tasting a cake made of salt, water, and flour, called Far or Panis Farreus; which was offered with a sheep in sacrifice to the gods. A marriage effected in this way brought the woman into the possession or power of her husband by the sacred laws. She thus became partner of all his substance and sacred rites, those of the penates as well as of the lares. If he died intestate and without children, she inherited his whole fortune. If he died leaving children, she had an equal share with them. If she committed any fault, the husband judged of it along with her relations, and punished her at pleasure. The children of this kind of marriage were called patrimi and matrimi. Certain priests were chosen only from among them; as the Flamen of Jupiter and the Vestal virgins. If only the father was alive, the children were called patri-mi; if only the mother, matrimi. This mode of celebrating marriage in later times fell much into disuse. See MARRIAGE.

CONFERENCE (HAMPTON COURT), a conference appointed by James I. of England, to be held in January 1604, between the Episcopalians and the Puritans, with a view to settle their controversies. The Episcopalians were represented by nine bishops, and about as many deans of the church; the Puritans by four English divines, and one from Scotland, all of whom were selected by the king himself. On the first day of the conference the Episcopalians alone were admitted into the presence of the sovereign, who proposed several objections to the ritual and discipline of the Church of England, some of which the bishops attempted to defend, and others they consented to modify. The Puritans were permitted on the second day to have an audience of the king, but they were treated in the harshest and most uncivil manner. By this one-sided mode of conducting the controversy, the Episcopalians were allowed to triumph over their opponents, and Bishop Bancroft, falling on his knees, said, "I protest my heart melteth for joy that Almighty God of his singular mercy has given us such a king, as since Christ's time has not been." On the third day the bishops and deans were first called in, that an agreement might be come to with the king as to the alterations which should be made in the regulations of the church. After this the Puritans were admitted, not to discuss the matters in dispute, but simply to hear what arrangements had been made by the king with the bishops. Thus ended this strange conference, which only showed the decided preference which James entertained for the Episcopal Church, now that he was seated on the throne of England. The next month, accordingly, a proclamation was issued, giving an account of the Conference, and requiring conformity to the liturgy and ceremonies. See PURITANS.

CONFERENCE (WESLEYAN METHODIST), the supreme ecclesiastical court of the Wesleyan Methodist body. It was formally constituted by a Deed of Declaration, dated the 28th of February 1784, and enrolled in the Court of Chancery. This "Conference of the people called Methodists," is therefore a body duly recognized in law. It is generally held in London, Leeds, Bristol, Manchester, Liverpool, and Sheffield in rotation, every year, about the latter end of July. The constitution of this court, which was devised by John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, is of a peculiar kind, being purely ministerial, without the slightest infusion of the lay element. By the original deed of appointment it consists only of a hundred of the senior travelling preachers. This is its distinct legal constitution, which, however, has been so widely departed from, that all ministers, in full connexion, may attend the conference, take part in its deliberations, and even tender their votes while the legal "hundred" confirm the decisions thus arrived at. The conference is allowed to sit not less than five days, nor more than three weeks, and their deliberations involve such points as are of the greatest importance to the interests of the body. Every preacher's character undergoes on these occasions the strictest investigation, and if any thing injurious to his fair reputation is proved against him, he is dealt with accordingly. The conference appoints the stations which the preachers are to occupy, reviews the proceedings of the subordinate meetings, and takes into consideration the state of the body generally. This being the supreme court of the whole connexion, it is also the court of ultimate resort, from whose decisions there is no appeal. The discussions of the conference are strictly and exclusively confined to the spiritual interests of the body; its financial and secular affairs being managed by wholly different parties, over whose actions the conference exercises no control. Disputes have from time to time arisen, and secessions have occurred, on the ground of the non-admission of laymen into the conference. This peculiar constitution of the supreme court of the body, however, is vindicated by some of the leading ministers as being on the whole the best adapted to exercise strict discipline, and thus secure the purity of the ministerial office. During the interval between one meeting of conference and another, the president and secretary remain in office, and the former possesses to a great extent a discretionary power. He supplies any vacancies which may occur from the death of preachers, by appointing individuals from a list of reserve with which he is furnished by the conference. Any change of preachers, also, which it may be necessary to make, he must sanction. He is empowered, if requested, to visit any district, and inquire into its religious condition, in so far as the interest of Methodism is concerned, with a view to devise such measures as may appear to him, on consulting with the district committee, to be most likely to advance the good cause. It rests chiefly with the president to name the place where the next conference is to be held, and during the sittings he has the power and the privilege of two members in virtue of his office.

The appointment of ministers to officiate in all the chapels of the connexion, and to remove them, if they see cause, is vested absolutely in the conference; but the term of appointment can in no case extend beyond three years successively. The admission of preachers into the body, and their expulsion from it, rests also with the conference, by absolute and unqualified right. And yet the rights of an accused party are defended with the utmost jealousy. The charges preferred against him must be made known to him verbally or in writing. These must be carefully examined in a district meeting, and then the case is heard and deliberately decided on in conference. Should the accused, however, venture to seek redress in a civil court for any injury which he may imagine himself to have sustained by a district meeting, or any inferior court, he forfeits all right of appeal to the conference, and is regarded as having violated the laws of the society, as well as the laws of Christ. The strictest authority is maintained by the conference over every minister of the Wesleyan connexion, and an annual examination is instituted with the utmost impartiality into the ministerial qualifications, character, and fidelity of all among them who are invested with the sacred office.

The Wesleyan Methodist New Connexion, which is the oldest of a number of independent Methodist churches in England, is founded on the principle that the conference ought to be composed partly of laymen. The nature of the change which this body has introduced is thus stated by Mr. Marsden, in his 'History of the Christian Churches and Sects:' "Their conference is constituted upon the representative system. Each circuit elects at the previous quarterly meeting one preacher and one layman, its representatives; or, should the circuit be too poor to bear the expenses of two representatives, then a preacher and a layman alternately. Connexional office-bearers are also members of conference; namely, the treasurers of the various funds, the secretary and treasurer of the missions, and the steward and treasurer of the book-room. The trustees of chapels are allowed a representative when their legal rights are concerned. From the representatives thus chosen the conference appoints its guardian representatives; of whom the presence of six is necessary to render the constitution legally complete. Thus the conference consists of ministers, lay representatives, and guardian representatives. The last conference, held at Sheffield in 1855, consisted of sixty-nine representatives, lay and clerical, five treasurers and secretaries, ten guardian representatives, and two delegates from the Irish conference."

In the United States of North America, where the Methodists have become a very strong and influential body, the first general conference was held in 1792. It is appointed to be held once in four years, to be composed of all the travelling elders in full connexion, to whom should be committed the entire authority of making rules for the regulation of the church. Methodism had first been transplanted to America in 1766, and it was not till 1768 that the small band of Wesley's followers were able to build a meeting-house in New York. During the revolutionary contest, the Methodist missionaries were exposed to great persecution; but, in 1784, after the independence of the United States had been achieved, Mr. Wesley, who had, from the beginning, watched with the most tender and anxious care the growth of the infant society in America, set himself to remedy the grievances of the body in that remote part of the world. Hitherto the Methodist preachers had been considered merely as lay-preachers, and, of course, without authority to administer the ordinances. Accordingly, the members of the societies had been dependent upon other ministers for the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. This was felt to be so serious an inconvenience, and so calculated to injure the Methodist cause, that some of the preachers in the Southern States had actually ordained each other, and begun to form a party to whom they administered the ordinances. Mr. Wesley had always been unwilling to disturb the established order of things in the Church of England, and, therefore, had declined to ordain preachers over his own societies; but feeling that the Church of England had now no jurisdiction in America, he thought himself called upon to ordain persons, who might lawfully administer the ordinances to the Transatlantic Methodists. This was accordingly done, and Dr. Thomas Coke arrived in the United States as an ordained presbyter in the Church of England, and a superintendent of the Methodist societies, with authority to form the whole into a separate and independent church. Hence arose the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (which see) of America, which, as has been already noticed, held its first general conference in 1792. The body went on gradually increasing, and at length, such was the increase of members and preachers, that it was found quite inconvenient for even all the elders to assemble in general conference quadrennially; and, therefore, in 1808, measures were adopted to form a delegated general conference, to be composed of not less than one for every seven of the members of the annual conferences, nor more than one for every five, to be chosen either by ballot or by seniority; at the same time, the power of this delegated conference was limited by constitutional restrictions. The first delegated conference met in New York in the year 1812.

The following are the regulations and restrictions under which the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church of North America is empowered to act: "The general conference assembles quadrennially, and is composed of a certain number of delegates elected by the annual conferences. It has power to revise any part of the Discipline, or to introduce any new regulation, not prohibited by the following limitations and restrictions:

"The general conference shall not revoke, alter, or change our articles of religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine.

"They shall not allow of more than one representative for every fourteen members of the annual conference, nor allow of a less number than one for every thirty: provided, nevertheless, that when there shall be in any annual conference a fraction of two-thirds the number which shall be fixed for the ratio of representation, such annual conference shall be entitled to an additional delegate for such fraction : and provided also, that no annual conference shall be denied the privilege of two delegates.

"They shall not change nor alter any part or rule of our government, so as to do away episcopacy, or destroy the plan of our itinerant general superintendency.

"They shall not revoke or change the General Rules of the United Societies.

"They shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers of trial by a committee, and of an appeal; neither shall they do away the privileges of our members of trial before the society, or by a committee, and of an appeal.

"They shall not appropriate the produce of the Book Concern, nor of the Charter Fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the travelling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children. Provided, nevertheless, that upon the concurrent recommendation of three-fourths of all the members of the several annual conferences, who shall be present and vote on such recommendation, then a majority of two-thirds of the general conference succeeding shall suffice to alter any of the above restrictions, except the first article; and also, whenever such alteration or alterations shall have been recommended by two-thirds of the general conference, as soon as three-fourths of the members of all the annual conferences shall have concurred as aforesaid, such alteration or alterations shall take place.

"Under these limitations, the general conference has full power to alter or modify any part of the discipline, or to introduce any new regulation which the exigencies of the times may require; to elect the book-stewards, editors, corresponding secretary or secretaries of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and also the bishops; to hear and decide on appeals of preachers from the decisions of annual conferences; to review the acts of those conferences generally; to examine into the general administration of the bishops for the four preceding years; and, if accused, to try, censure, acquit, or condemn a bishop. The general conference is the highest judicatory of the church."

A very important secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church of America took place in 1830, grounded on the two great principles of lay representation and a parity in the ministry. These, accordingly, constitute the leading characteristics of the seceding body under the name of the Methodist Protestant Church. The general conference of this section of the Wesleyan body assembles every fourth year, and consists of an equal number of ministers and laymen. The ratio of representation from each annual conference district is one minister and one layman for every thousand persons in full communion. This body, when assembled, possesses power under certain restrictions to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the laws of Christ; to fix the compensation and duties of the itinerant ministers and preachers, and the allowance of their wives, widows, and children; to devise ways and means for raising funds, and to define and regulate the boundaries of the respective annual conference districts. Besides the general quadrennial conference, there are annual and even quarterly conferences.

Another secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church of America arose in 1814, founded on an objection to the Episcopal mode of church government. Thus originated the Reformed Methodist Church, who have adopted a system of church government essentially congregational in its character, all power being in the churches, and delegated from time to time with a rigid accountability to the bodies by whom it is conferred. Like the other Methodist churches they have annual conferences in the different districts. The general conference is composed of delegates from the annual conferences proportioned in numbers to the respective numbers of their church members. Its duties are thus defined: "The general conference has power to revise the Discipline under certain limitations. It can pass no rule giving to preachers power over the people, except such as belongs to them as ministers of the word. The alterations in Discipline must, before they go into effect, first be recommended by three-fourths of the annual conferences, or after the general conference has passed upon them, receive their ratification. General conferences are held at the call of annual conferences, not periodically, and the delegates to them are chosen at the session of the annual conferences next preceding the general conference."

Still another secession, styling itself the True Wesleyan Methodist Church, took place in 1828, from the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. The fundamental principles on which this body is constituted, are opposition to the Episcopal form of church government as it exists in America among the Methodists, a determined opposition to slavery as is found in America, and also to intemperance. In 1844, this church had six annual conferences, but no general conference.

Conferences, however, are found in other branches of the Christian Church in America besides the Methodists. Thus, among others, the Mennonites have regular annual conferences for the arrangement of their ecclesiastical affairs.

It is a remarkable fact, that every secession which has taken place from Wesleyan Methodism has organized a system of lay representation in its conference. And this remark applies not less to the secessions in Europe than to those in America.

CONFERENTIE PARTY, an important party in the Dutch Reformed Church in the United States of North America, in the early period of its history in that country. The party arose out of the peculiar circumstances of the time. It so happened that the Dutch West India Company were the first who carried the ministers of the gospel from Holland to America. The members of that company being citizens of Amsterdam, the classis or presbytery of that city chiefly undertook the duty of supplying and ordaining ministers for the people belonging to their communion who had settled in America. The ministers thus provided were sent out by that classis with the consent and approbation of the synod of North Holland. In course of time the American churches increased in number and importance, but the classis and synod, to which we have now referred, claimed the exclusive right of selecting, ordaining, and sending ministers to these churches. They went further, they claimed the exclusive power of deciding all ecclesiastical controversies and difficulties which might arise in all the Dutch churches in the provinces. The Conferentie party, in the American churches, were the strong supporters of this claim. Being themselves natives of Holland, they were in favour of this dependence on Holland, and of the vassalage of the churches to the classis of Amsterdam. These men carried their principles to the most extravagant length, maintaining almost the infallibility of the fathers in Amsterdam. Some of them even ventured to maintain, that they were the only legitimate source of ministerial power and authority, and insinuated that no ordination was valid unless it had been performed by the classis of Amsterdam, or had at least its solemn approval and sanction. Such were the strong views of the Conferentie party, and they were maintained by them in the face of but a very feeble opposition till 1737. The opponents of these sentiments, who afterwards received the name of the Coetus party, advocated the necessity of a home education, a home license, and a home ordination, which they held were equally good for them, and equally valid for every purpose as those in fatherland. The quarrel which ensued is thus described by Dr. Brownlee of the Dutch Reformed Church in America :

"In 1737, the first movement was made by five prominent ministers, Messrs. G. Dubois, Haeghoort, B. Freeman, Van Santford, and Curtenius. They did not venture to adopt the bold measure of renouncing the abject dependence on the parent classis. They merely proposed to form an assembly for counsel and free internal intercourse, and any ecclesiastical business, not inconsistent with this dependence on Holland. This they called a coetus. A plan was adopted, and rules formed for its regulation; and it was sent down to the churches for their concurrence. On the 27th of April, 1738, the day appointed by the five ministers to receive the reports from the churches, a convocation of ministers and elders met in New York.

"The several reports of the churches induced the convention to adopt the plan without opposition; and it was sent to the classis of Amsterdam for their ratification. This, they presumed they should promptly obtain. For there was nothing in the projected coetus which did, in fact, really curtail any of the power of that classis. Yet it was not until ten years after this that they received an answer, by the Rev. Mr. Van Sinderin, from Holland; for it was in the month of May, 1747, that the convention was summoned to receive the answer of the classis, which, though after a long delay, gave its entire approbation and concurrence. On the appointed day only six ministers were present. These having received the act of the classis, did nothing more than issue their call of the first meeting of the coetus, on the second Tuesday of September, 1747, in the city of New York.

"On the day appointed the representatives of the churches met in coetus; and, although the plan had received the full approbation of the mother church, still there was a most decided opposition to it. This opposition was made by Dominie Boel, of the church of New York, and by Mr. Mancius of Kingston, Mr. Freyemoet, and Mr. Martselius. Mr. Frelinghuyzen could not prevail with his church to accede to the coetus; but it received his own decided support. And it was soon ascertained that those who opposed the whole of this narrow and inefficient scheme, were correct; whatever may have been their avowed motives. It effected no good purpose which could not have been done without it. It was a meeting merely for fraternal intercourse and advice. This could have been attained without a formal coetus. It gave the pastors no powers: they could not meet as bishops, who had each their church; they had no power to ordain ministers; they could try no cases requiring ecclesiastical investigation; they could not even settle ecclesiastical disputes, without the usual consent of the classis of Amsterdam. Its utter unfitness to promote the interests of the church be aine apparent to all, except those in the slavish interests of fatherland. Nothing but an independent classis could do this. They must have power to ordain they must have their own court to try cases. The church was suffering exceedingly, said those who had got a coetus, but wished a coetus clothed with the power of a classis. But this met with a renewed, fierce opposition. 'Shall we throw off the care and paternal supervision of the classis of Amsterdam? Shall we venture to ordain ministers? Shall we set up ourselves as judges? Where can we get such learned ministers as those from Holland? And can any of us judge of their fitness, and learning, and piety?' Such was the feeling and declamation of the Conferentie party.

"On the contrary, the coetus party appealed to their brethren on the necessity of having youth trained here for the ministry. 'We must have academies and a college. The English language is advancing on us: we must have a ministry to preach in English, or our youth will abandon us in a body. And the expense of sending for ministers is becoming oppressive; not to speak of the great expense and privation sustained by us who are parents, in sending our sons to Holland to be educated, so as to be able to preach in Dutch. And you all know,' they added, 'how many years have sometimes elapsed between the time of a call sent to fatherland, and the coming of a pastor; and sometimes churches have been disappointed entirely. None have responded to their call. And even, in certain cases, some ministers have come out who were not only unpopular, but absolutely disagreeable. Is it not unendurable, that the churches should have no choice of their pastor? Men, accustomed to a national church and its high-handed measures, have come among us, who have, of course, views and habits entirely different from those of our fellow-citizens and Christians in Holland. Need we remind you of the distractions and divisions caused by these obstinate men, who, instead of harmonizing with the people, and winning their confidence, have imprudently opposed them, and rendered their ministry odious and unsuccessful? Besides, is it not humiliating and degrading to these churches, and to us all, that we should be deprived of the power of ordaining ministers? And we must send abroad for ministers, as if none here were fit to minister in holy things! It is an imputation on our sons; it is an imputation on us, in the ministry here; as if they were unfit for the holy work, and as if we had only half of the ministerial office! We declare this bondage to be no longer tolerable, and it ought no longer to be endured.

"Such was the bold language now used by the cœtus party, both ministers and laymen. And as a goodly number had, by the permission of the classis of Amsterdam, been ordained, by special favour, all these, to a man, took a bold stand against this dependence on Holland. They never felt that attachment to the classis, which bound down, in slavish attachment, those whom it had sent out hither. They had no prejudices; they saw the painful grievances under which their fathers smarted; and they felt the power of the arguments and appeals, so urgently pressed by all, to seek an independent ecclesiastical jurisdiction of their own. They spoke out with warmth on the subject. They even ventured to charge the church of their forefathers with injustice to the ministry here, and actual tyranny over them. They withheld what Christ, the King of Zion, never authorized them to withhold from the true ministry. They demanded of her to do them and herself justice, by conveying to them all the powers of the ministry, which she had received, as it respected doctrine, and sacraments, and discipline.

"All these appeals made a most powerful impression on the people. Many churches came over to their measures; and even a few of the European ministers candidly acceded. And they no longer concealed their fixed determination to commence a system of measures to withdraw these American churches from this abject subordination to the classis of Amsterdam and the synod of North Holland.

"This plan was matured in 1754. In the cœtus

of the preceding year a motion had been entertained to amend the plan of the cœtus, by converting it into a regular classis, with all its proper powers. A plan was drafted for this purpose; adopted with great unanimity by those present; and formally transmitted to the churches for their concurrence.

"Upon this there commenced a scene of animosity, division, and actual violence, compared to which, all the former wranglings were utterly nothing. It was the beginning of a war waged for fifteen years with unmitigated fury! The Conferentie party met and organized themselves into a firm body of opposition in 1755. They were the following:—Dominies Ritzma and Deronde, of the church of New York; Curtenius, Haeghoort, Vanderlinde, Van Sinderin, Schuyler, Rubel, Kock, Kerr, Rysdyck, and Freyenmoet. The Cœtus party embraced all the rest. These formed two hostile bodies resolutely pitted against each other, and apparently resolved never to yield. The peace of neighbourhoods was disturbed; families were divided; churches torn by factions. Houses of worship were locked up by one faction against the other. Tumults and disgraceful scenes frequently occurred on the holy Sabbath, and at the doors of churches. Ministers were occasionally assaulted in the very pulpit; and sometimes the solemn worship of God was disturbed and actually terminated by mob-violence. In these scenes the Conferentie party were usually noted as the most violent and outrageous. But, on both sides, a furious zeal prompted many to shameful excesses, and a most painful disgrace of the Christian name."

The Conferentie party now sought the assistance of the parent church in Holland. They addressed a letter on the subject to the classis of Amsterdam in 1755, following it up by a similar communication in each of the three immediately succeeding years. The replies to these appeals were by no means calculated to promote conciliation and concord. The two parties were at this time nearly equal in numbers. The Cœtus party had formed the project of establishing a seminary for the education of the future ministry in America, so as to be independent of the parent church. They had even communicated their intention to the classis of Amsterdam. Dr. Livingston, who was then studying at Holland, directed his attention to the plan of an independent ecclesiastical constitution for the church in America. He returned home in 1770, and the following year having summoned a convention, he procured the appointment of a committee, before which he laid a plan which he had brought with him from Holland. The scheme embraced three important objects: 1. The internal arrangements, church government, and all the usual powers of a classis. 2. The measures best calculated to heal all animosities and divisions. 3. The conducting of a correspondence with the parent church of Holland. The plan was cordially accepted by the committee, and afterwards by the convention. It was next submitted to the classis of Amsterdam, which gave its most perfect approbation of the union, and of all the measures adopted. The convention having thus received the consent of the parent church, adopted the plan, and it was signed with the utmost cordiality by every member of the meeting. Thus happily came to an end, one of those melancholy contentions which are so often found to disturb the peace of almost all the sections of the church of Christ in this fallen world. See DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA.

CONFEDERATED, one of the two classes into which the congregations of the CATHARI (which see) were divided. The confederated or associated, as they were also called, except observing a few rules, lived in the manner of other people; but they entered into a covenant (hence their name federati or confederated) by which they bound themselves, that before they died, or at least in their last sickness, they would enter farther into the church, and receive the consolation which was their term for initiation. The congregations of the MANICHEANS (which see) were divided in the same way.

CONFESSIO, a name sometimes applied in the early ages of Christianity to a church which was built over the grave of any martyr, or called by his name, to preserve the memory of him.

CONFESSION (AUGSBURG). See AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

CONFESSION (AURICULAR), the practice of private and secret confession of sin into the ear of a priest, with the view of receiving absolution. This is enforced by the Church of Rome as a solemn duty, which every man ought to perform, and, accordingly, the council of Trent decreed on this point, "Whosoever shall deny that sacramental confession was instituted by Divine command, or that it is necessary to salvation, or shall affirm that the practice of secretly confessing to the priest alone, as it has been ever observed from the beginning by the Catholic church, and is still observed, is foreign to the institution and command of Christ, and is a human invention; let him be accursed." The duty of auricular confession is regarded by the Romish church as so important, that it is ranked by Dr. Butler, in his Roman Catholic Catechism, as one of the six commandments of the church, binding upon all her children, "To confess their sins at least once a-year." The mode in which a Romish penitent confesses is as follows: He must kneel down at the side of his ghostly father, and make the sign of the cross, saying, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. He then repeats the CONFITEOR (which see), embodying in the heart of it his own special sins. After confession the penitent is directed to say, "For these, and all other my sins, which I cannot at this present call to my remembrance, I am heartily sorry, purpose amendment for the future, and most humbly ask pardon of God, and penance and absolution of you, my ghostly father."

The duty of confession is admitted both by Protestants and Roman Catholics, but they differ widely as to the party to whom confession ought to be made; Romanists confessing to the priest, while Protestants confess to God. The latter support their views by adducing numerous passages from both the Old and New Testaments, in which confession of sin is made to God only. Thus Josh. vii. 19, "And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me." Ezra x. 10, 11, "And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass of Israel. Now therefore make confession unto the Lord God of your fathers, and do his pleasure: and separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the strange wives." Ps. xxxii. 5, "I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." 1 John i. 8, 9, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The passage which Romanists adduce from Jam. v. 16, "Confess your faults one to another," is explained by Protestants as referring not to auricular confession, but to the mutual confession of faults on the part of Christians. Two other passages are sometimes quoted in vindication of the practice of confession to a priest, viz. Mat. iii. 18, "They were baptized of him (John the Baptist) in Jordan, confessing their sins," and Acts xix. 18, "Many that believed came and confessed their sins." But these passages Protestants regard as referring not to secret confession to a priest, an office which was never held at all events by John the Baptist, who was neither a Jewish nor a Christian priest, but to an open and public acknowledgment of the sins of their past lives. In the writings of Roman Catholic authors, it is often argued, that even although no direct passage bearing upon the subject of auricular confession may be found in the Bible, still the doctrine must be regarded as founded on Scripture, inasmuch as it is a natural and necessary accompaniment of the power of forgiving sins, which they suppose to have been vested in the apostles, Mat. xviii. 18; xvi. 19. John xx. 23.

Though Romish controversialists are accustomed frequently to adduce the authority of the fathers in favour of auricular confession, the more candid among them readily acknowledge that the confession of which the fathers speak, is to be made only to God, and not by any means to man, whether the whole church or individual ministers. It is true, that at an early period, as we are informed by Socrates and Sozomen, penitentiary presbyters, as they were called, were appointed to hear confessions preparatory to public penance. The private or auric lar confession of later centuries, however, is quite different from the confession made to those penitentiary presbyters. Confession was not made to them with a view of obtaining forgiveness from God, but in order to procure restoration to the former privileges of the offended church.

The regular establishment of the system of private confession and absolution is usually ascribed to Leo the Great. That pontiff, however, left the confession of sins to every man's private conscience, nor was the priest declared to possess in himself the power either inherent or delegated of forgiving sins. Even long subsequent to the time of Leo, it was still optional with every man either to make confession to a priest or to God alone. Nor was it till the thirteenth century that any definite law was laid down by the church on the subject of private confession. In the year 1215, however, under the pontificate of Innocent III., the practice of auricular confession was authoritatively enjoined by the fourth council of Lateran, upon the faithful of both sexes, at least once a-year. Fleury the Romish historian says, "This is the first canon, so far as I know, which imposes the general obligation of sacramental confession." From that time down to the present day, it has been considered a positive divine ordinance, that every one should enumerate and confess his sins to a priest; and few if any dogmas of the Church of Rome have tended more to increase the power and influence of the priesthood on the one hand, and to injure the morality of the people on the other. Confession is practised also in the Greek and Coptic churches. The former church indeed prescribes it to all her members four times a-year; but the laity commonly confess only once in the year, to which in Russia they are obliged by the laws of the land; and it is usual in that country to confess in the great fast before Easter.

CONFESSION (PSALM OF), a name applied in the ancient Christian church to the fifty-first psalm, as being peculiarly appropriate to the case of an individual who is confessing his sins. This title is given to it by Athanasius.

CONFESSION (WESTMINSTER). See WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY.

CONFESSIOAL, a seat or cell in Roman Catholic churches, in which the priest sits to hear confessions. It is usually a small wooden erection within the church, and divided into three cells or niches, the centre one being for the priest, and the side ones for penitents. There is a small grated aperture in each of the partitions, between the priest and the side cells, through which the penitent makes his confession to the priest or confessor.

CONFESSIONS OF FAITH. See CREED.

CONFESSOR, a priest in the Romish church, who has power to hear the confession of penitents in the sacrament of penance, and to give them absolution. The Rubric is very particular as to the duties of the confessor. He is enjoined to regard himself as occupying the position at once of a judge and a physician. And, therefore, he ought to acquire as great knowledge and prudence as possible, as well by constant prayer to God, as from approved authors, especially the Roman Catechism, that is, as we understand it, the Catechism of the council of Trent. In the exercise of his office, the confessor is bound to be minute and circumstantial in his interrogatories. Finally, the Rubric regards it as indispensable that he keep the seal of secret confession under an exact and perpetual silence; and, therefore, he shall never say or do anything which may directly or indirectly tend to reveal any sin or defect known to him by confession alone. Every Romish priest is not a confessor, but in addition to the power of orders, the priest who confesses must have a spiritual jurisdiction over the persons who apply to him in this sacrament. The duty of confession, at least once a-year, being binding, as we have already found (see CONFESSION), on every faithful Romanist, it is incalculable what an extent of influence over her votaries Rome thus acquires.

CONFITEOR (Lat. I confess), the form of confession prescribed by the Romish church to be used by every penitent at the confessional. It runs thus, "I confess to Almighty God, to the blessed Mary ever Virgin, to blessed Michael the Archangel, to blessed John Baptist, to the holy apostles Peter and Paul, to all the saints, and to you, father, that I have sinned exceedingly in thought, word, and deed, through my fault, through my fault, through my most grievous fault. (At this point the person specifies his several sins in their details, and thus concludes.) Therefore, I beseech the blessed Mary ever Virgin, the blessed Michael the Archangel, blessed John Baptist, the holy apostles, Peter and Paul, and all the saints; and you, father, to pray to our Lord God for me." When the confession is made in this form, it is said to be under the seal of confession, and must not be disclosed by the priest, but if made without this form, the priest is not bound to keep it secret. Every Romanist, therefore, is taught from his earliest days to repeat the confiteor and thus, as many suppose, they secure the perpetual secrecy of their confession.

CONFIRMATION (Lat. confirmare, to strengthen), a rite in Episcopal churches, whereby a young person, when arrived at years of understanding, takes upon himself the vows which had been taken for him at his baptism by his godfather and godmother. The Roman Catholic church regards it as one of the seven sacraments which they hold. Among the Oriental churches it is also a sacrament under the name of CHRISM (which see). A controversy has been carried on between Romish and Protestant writers as to the origin of confirmation, the point in dispute being whether such a rite existed in the time of the apostles, or whether it belongs to a later date. The fact is admitted on both sides, that imposition of hands was practised by the apostles only upon baptized persons, as in the case of the converted Samaritans, Acts viii. 12--17, and the disciples of Ephesus, Acts xix. 5 and 6. On examining these passages, however, it appears plain, that, by the laying on of hands, was understood to be communicated the gifts of the Holy Ghost. But various cases of baptism are recorded in Scripture, such as the baptism of the three thousand on the day of Pentecost, of Lydia, of the jailor of Philippi and others, in not one of which is there the slightest reference to the laying on of hands. No authentic reference, besides, to the rite of confirmation is to be found in the earliest ecclesiastical writers. Some of them, as for example, Eusebius, speak of "the seal of the Lord," an expression, however, which refers to baptism rather than to confirmation. The first who mentions the custom of anointing with oil the newly baptized, is Tertullian, and in the time of Cyprian it appears already to have constituted an essential part of the rite of baptism. There is no doubt that at a still earlier period the laying on of hands with prayer formed a part of the baptismal ceremony.

The origin of the rite of confirmation in the ancient church, and the circumstances which led to its introduction, are thus sketched by Neander: "The sign of the imposition of hands was the common token of religious consecration, borrowed from the Jews, and employed on various occasions, either to denote consecration to the Christian calling in general, or to the particular branches of it. The apostles, or presiding officers of the church, laying their hands on the head of the baptized individual, called upon the Lord to bestow his blessing on the holy transaction now completed, to cause to be fulfilled in him whatever was implied in it, to consecrate him with his Spirit for the Christian calling, and to pour out his Spirit upon him. This closing rite was inseparably connected with the whole act of baptism. All, indeed, had reference here to the same principal thing, without which no one could be a Christian,—the birth to a new life from God, the baptism of the Spirit, which was symbolically represented by the baptism of water. Tertullian still considers this transaction and baptism as one whole, combined together; although he distinguishes in it the two separate moments, the negative and the positive, the forgiveness of sin and cleansing from sin which was mediated by baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the importation of the Holy Spirit following thereupon, upon the individual now restored to the original state of innocence, to which importation the imposition of hands refers.

"But now, since the idea had sprung up of a spiritual character belonging exclusively to the bishops, or successors of the apostles, and communicated to them by ordination; on which character the propagation of the Holy Spirit in the church was dependent; it was considered as their prerogative to seal, by this consecration of the imposition of hands, the whole act of baptism; (hence this rite was called signaculum, a seal.) It was supposed that a good and valid reason for this rite could be drawn from the fact that the Samaritans, baptized by a deacon, were first endowed with spiritual gifts by the imposition of the hands of the apostles, which was added afterwards (Acts xix.), as this passage was then understood. So now the presbyters, and in case of necessity, even the deacons, were empowered to baptize, but the bishops only were authorised to consummate that second holy act. This notion had been formed so early as the middle of the third century. The bishops were under the necessity, therefore, of occasionally going through their dioceses, in order to administer to those who had been baptized by their subordinates, the country presbyters, the rite which was afterwards denominated confirmation. In ordinary cases, where the bishop himself administered the baptism, both were still united together as one whole, and thus constituted the complete act of baptism." After the general introduction of infant baptism, confirmation immediately succeeded the dispensation of the ordinance. In the Oriental churches, baptism, confirmation, and the Lord's Supper are administered in immediate succession, and this, in all probability, was the ancient custom. It was not probably before the thirteenth century that confirmation came to be regarded as an entirely separate ordinance from that of baptism. The council of Trent pronounces a solemn anathema upon all who deny confirmation to be "a true and proper sacrament."

So much importance and solemnity were attached, in the ancient Christian church, to the rite of confirmation, that the privilege of performing it was limited to the bishop, on the ground, as both Chrysostom and Augustine argue, that the Samaritan converts, though baptized by Philip the evangelist, received the imposition of hands from an apostle. Though, in the ancient Christian church, as in the Greek and African churches, confirmation immediately followed baptism, seven years are allowed to pass after infant baptism, before a party is confirmed in the Western churches at present, and in the English church young people are not usually confirmed until they are fifteen or sixteen years old. Since 1660, it has been customary for the English bishops to require at confirmation a renewal of the covenant made in infant baptism.

In administering confirmation four principal ceremonies were employed in former times, imposition of hands, unction with the chrism, the sign of the cross, and prayer. Other formalities were the salutation, "Peace be with you;" a slight blow upon the cheek; unbinding of the band upon the forehead; prayer and singing; the benediction of the bishop, together with a short exhortation from him. In the Roman Pontifical the arrangements to be made, and the ceremonies performed in the sacrament of confirmation, are thus minutely laid down: "The pontiff about to confirm infants, children, or other baptized persons, having put on his vestments, goes to a faldstool prepared for him in front of the altar, and sitting thereon, with his pastoral staff in his left hand, and his mitre on, admonishes the people, who stand up in his presence :

“That no one but a bishop only, is the ordinary minister of confirmation.

“That no one that has been confirmed, ought to be confirmed again.

“That no one that has not been confirmed can be a sponsor in confirmation ; neither can a father, nor mother, nor husband, nor wife.

“That no one that is excommunicate, or under an interdict, or convicted of any of the more grievous offences ; or not well instructed in the rudiments of the Christian faith, thrust himself forward to receive this sacrament, or to be sponsor for one about to be confirmed.

“That adults are bound first to confess their sins ; or at least to be grieved for the sins which they have committed, and then to be confirmed.

“By this sacrament is contracted a spiritual kinship, hindering the contracting of matrimony, and breaking it off if already contracted ; which kinship takes place between the confirmer and the confirmed, and between the father and mother, and the sponsor of the same, but goes no further.

“Let no sponsor present more than one or two.

“Those that are about to be confirmed, must be keeping fast.

“The forehead of every one that is confirmed must be tied up, and remain so, until the chrism be dried up, or wiped off.

“Wherefore let every one going to be confirmed carry a clean linen fillet, wherewith to tie up his head.

“Let infants be held by the sponsors on their right arms, before the pontiff confirming them. But adults and other more grown persons, must lay each his foot on the right foot of his sponsor, and therefore neither ought males to be godfathers to females, nor females godmothers to males.

“All being arranged in order before him, the pontiff still sitting, washes his hands ; then having put off his mitre, he rises, and, with his face turned to the persons to be confirmed, kneeling before him, with their hands before their breast, he says :

“The Holy Ghost come down into you, and the power of the Most High keep you from sin. R. Amen.

“Then signing himself with the sign of the cross from the forehead to the breast with his right hand, he says · V. Our help is in the name of the Lord, &c.

“And then, with his hands stretched out towards those to be confirmed, he says :

“Almighty and everlasting God, who didst vouchsafe to regenerate these thy servants of water and the Holy Ghost, and who hast given them the remission of all their sins ; send forth into them the sevenfold Spirit thy holy paraclete from heaven. R. Amen.

“The Spirit of wisdom and of understanding. R. Amen.

“The Spirit of counsel and of fortitude. R. Amen.

“The Spirit of knowledge and of piety. R. Amen.

“Fill them with the Spirit of thy fear and seal them with the sign of the Cro+ss of Christ, being made propitious (to them) unto life eternal. Through the same our Lord, &c.

“Then the pontiff sitting on the aforesaid faldstool, or, if the multitude of those that are to be confirmed requires it, standing, with his mitre on, confirms them row after row. And he inquires the name of each one individually, as the godfather or godmother, on bended knees, presents each to him ; and, having dipped the extremity of his right hand thumb in the chrism, he says :

“N. I sign thee with the sign of the + cross. While he says this he draws with his thumb the sign of the cross on the forehead of that one : and proceeds—

“And confirm thee with the chrism of salvation. In the name of the Fa+ther, and of the + Son, and of the Holy + Ghost.

“Then he gives him a gentle slap (box) on the cheek, saying, ‘Peace be with thee.’

“All being confirmed, the pontiff wipes his thumb and hand with a bit of bread, and washes them over a basin. Which done, let the water of ablution be poured into the piscina of the sacrarium.

“Afterwards, joining his hands, and all the confirmed devoutly kneeling, he says :

“O God, who didst give the Holy Ghost to thy apostles, and didst will that by them and their successors the same should be delivered to the rest of the faithful : look propitiously upon the service of our humility ; and grant, that the same Holy Ghost, coming down upon those whose foreheads we have anointed with the sacred chrism, and signed with the sign of the cross, may make the hearts of the same a perfect temple of his own glory, by vouchsafing to dwell therein. Who with the Father and the same Holy Ghost, livest, &c.

“Next he says :

“Lo! thus shall every one be blessed who feareth the Lord.

“And turning to the confirmed, and making the sign of the cross upon them, he says :

“The Lord bl+ess you out of Sion, that you may see the good things of Jerusalem all the days of your life, and have eternal life. R. Amen.

“The confirmation concluded, the pontiff, taking his mitre, sits down, and admonishes the godfathers and godmothers to instruct their children in good manners, to eschew evil, and to do good, and to teach them the Creed, the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria, since to this they are obliged.”

The chrism of the Eastern church, which corresponds to the confirmation of the Western, is practised as an appendix to baptism, following immediately after it, and considered as forming, in one sense, a part of it. The ceremony is performed with sacred ointment or CHRISM (which see), by which the forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet are signed with the cross, the priest saying each time, "The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost." In the Constantinopolitan and Antiochian forms, this is unaccompanied by any imposition of hands. The entire ceremony is not complete till the child is brought again, after the lapse of seven days, to the priest, who, having washed it, cuts off some of its hair crosswise, that is, in four places on the crown of the head.

In Lutheran churches confirmation is universally practised, though not considered as being an ordinance of divine institution. It is not confined to the bishops, but performed by every pastor of a congregation, who, after instructing the young in the great leading doctrines of Christianity, confirms them when they have reached the age of fourteen or fifteen, by the imposition of hands, after which they are admitted to the Lord's Supper.

Many Protestant churches deny the practice of confirmation to have any scriptural warrant, or to have been at all known in apostolic times, and, therefore, decline to observe it.

CONFIRMATION OF A BISHOP. On the death, removal, or resignation of a bishop in the Church of England, the dean and chapter of the cathedral in which the vacant diocese is situated, make application for the royal license to elect a successor. The crown then issues a license, and along with it sends letters-missive containing the name of the individual recommended to fill the vacant bishopric, who is thereupon elected, and the crown issues letters-patent to the archbishop of the province, requiring him to proceed with the confirmation and consecration. On the day being fixed for the confirmation, notice is publicly given, and all who object to the election of the party proposed, are invited to appear. One or more persons delegated by the dean and chapter present the bishop-elect to the archbishop, or to his representative, the vicar-general. Proof is now given of the election of the bishop, and of the royal assent; after which the bishop takes the usual oaths of allegiance, of supremacy, of simony, and of obedience to the archbishop. Then follows "The definitive sentence, or the act of confirmation, by which the judge commits to the bishop elected the care, government, and administration of the spiritual affairs of said bishopric, and then decrees him to be installed and enthronized."

CONFORMISTS, the name given to those persons in England who conformed to the Liturgy or Common Prayer-Book in the reign of Charles II. On the 24th August 1662, all that did not conform were deprived of all ecclesiastical benefices. The consequence was, that nearly two thousand ministers of the Church of England were on that day thrown into the ranks of dissent, the Act of Uniformity having come into operation. The terms of conformity were, 1. Re-ordination, if they had not been episcopally ordained, Presbyterian orders having thus been declared invalid. 2. A declaration of unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything prescribed and contained in the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments. 3. The oath of canonical obedience. 4. Abjuration of the Solemn League and Covenant. 5. Abjuration of the lawfulness of taking arms against the king, or any commissioned by him, on any pretence whatsoever. The term Conformists is still in use as applied to those who adhere to the doctrine, worship, and discipline of the Established Church of England, in contrast to the NON-CONFORMISTS (which see), who dissent from it. See UNIFORMITY (ACT OF).

CONFORMITY (DECLARATION OF). Every clergyman belonging to the Church of England, on being either licensed to a curacy, or instituted to a benefice, signs what is termed the Declaration of Conformity, which is in these words, "I, A. B., do declare, that I will conform to the Liturgy of the United Church of England and Ireland, as it is now by law established." This is subscribed in the presence of the bishop, or of some other person appointed by the bishop as his commissary. See ENGLAND (CHURCH OF).

CONFUCIUS, an eminent Chinese philosopher whose writings have exercised so powerful an influence over the minds of his countrymen, that his religious, or rather moral system is adopted at this day by the literary men of China. He was born B. C. 551, in the principality of Loo, which is now the province of Shan-tung. He was descended from a very respectable family, which traced its pedigree to the ancient emperors. At a very early age he lost his father, but through the kind indulgence of his mother, he enjoyed every advantage in the attainment of as liberal an education as the time could command. Being naturally of a studious turn of mind, he spent his days and nights in reading and meditation, and formed to himself the high design of accomplishing a reform in the opinions and manners of his countrymen. Gradually he attracted around him a goodly number of admiring disciples, whom he carefully instructed in the art of good government; thus raising up virtuous, impartial, and equitable rulers, who, recommending themselves by their wisdom and efficiency to the Emperor, succeeded in obtaining high offices in the state, which they filled with honour to themselves, and the greatest benefit to their country. Confucius himself entertained the idea that he had discovered the infallible mode of rendering a nation at once virtuous, peaceful, and happy. Travelling from one part of the vast Chinese empire to another, he endeavoured to diffuse his moral and political principles, obtaining office for the sole purpose of exhibiting his theory in practical operation. Throughout a long life he continued to wander from place to place, visiting courts and palaces with a numerous train of disciples, until disgusted with the small success which attended his labours as a moral and political reformer, he retired into private life, resolved to devote the remainder of his days to the perfecting of his philosophical system. He remodelled the book of rites—Le-ke, one of the Woo-king or classics; completed the Pa-kwa or symbols of Tuh-he; and thus produced the Yih-king, a work which is said to have been composed by the most celebrated philosophers of antiquity, but finished by Confucius. His disciples, after his death, prepared the Sze-shoo, four books on classics, which Gutzlaff, the learned Chinese missionary, declares to be “the most popular work in the world, and read by greater numbers of people than any other human production.” The closing work of Confucius was a history of his own times, in which he descanted with the utmost freedom on the rulers of his time, denouncing the oppression and injustice of their government with so unsparing a hand, that he made sycophants and tyrants tremble. This was the last production of his powerful pen, for shortly after its completion, his countrymen are said to have discovered an unicorn in the woods, which Confucius declared to be an indication that his death was at hand, and wiping away the tears, he exclaimed, “My teaching is at an end.” His prediction was too soon fulfilled, for almost immediately after he expired, B. C. 479, in the seventy-third year of his age. Thus died one of those few illustrious men who have left behind them traces of their existence, which, while the world lasts, can never be effaced. Held in the highest admiration while he lived, Confucius was venerated as a god after his death, and at this day his principles are held as axioms by the most intelligent and learned among the Chinese, not in one district of the country only, but throughout the whole empire. No philosopher of any nation, not even Aristotle himself, has exercised for so long a time a commanding influence over the opinions and manners of such countless multitudes of men. Huc, the Romish missionary, informs us that a tablet to his memory is found in every school; that both the masters and the pupils prostrate themselves before the venerated name of Confucius, at the beginning and end of each class; that his image is found in all academies, places of literary resort, and examination halls. All the towns have temples erected to his honour, and more than 300,000,000 of men with one voice proclaim him saint. The descendants of Confucius, who still exist in great numbers, share in the extraordinary honours which the whole Chinese nation pays to their illustrious ancestor, for these constitute the sole hereditary nobility of the empire, and enjoy certain privileges which belong to them alone. See next article.

CONFUCIANS, the followers of Confucius, whom the Chinese regard as the most eminent of sages.

The sect venerate the memory of the man, and implicitly adopt his opinions. His system was more properly a theory of ethical and political philosophy than a religion. The Confucians, accordingly, are chiefly the learned men of China, who, in the spirit of their master, seem to abjure all things spiritual and divine. The political system of the Chinese sage is of a very peculiar character, and well fitted to uphold the despotic government of the Celestial Empire. The law of the family is, according to this theory, the universal law. Filial piety is the root of all the virtues, and the source of all instruction. This supremely important virtue is divided into three vast spheres. (1.) The care and respect due to parents. (2.) All that relates to the service of prince and country. (3.) The acquisition of the virtues, and of that which constitutes our perfection. The five cardinal virtues, according to this school, are benevolence, righteousness, politeness or propriety, wisdom, and truth, and at the foundation of these lies filial piety. Not only in youth are parents to be revered, but even at the latest period they are to be treated with honour, and after death they are to be raised to the rank of gods. The relations of father and son give the first idea of prince and subject. It is filial piety which inclines to obedience to our superiors, and those who hold authority in the state. But while Confucius thus inculcated reverence to parents and obedience to rulers, he strangely overlooked the subjection due to the Father of our spirits. Not that he is altogether silent as to the existence of a Supreme Being, but no such principle, however obviously adapted to operate upon the human mind, is to be found pervading this extraordinary system. On this theory of political government, Mr. Gutzlaff remarks: “The endearing idea of the father of a family, under which he represents the sovereign of a country, has something very pleasing in it. But the rights he allots to a father over his child, are far greater than those which we should be inclined to acknowledge as due. The theory, however, is as excellent as the practice is difficult. It is the most perfect despotism that has ever been established. As it suited the interests of the rulers to enforce these principles, and to honour their author, they have been upheld with a strong arm. The works of Confucius have become the primers of schools, and the text-books of academies during many ages. The school-boy learns them by heart, the literati make them the theme of their writings, and the doctor seeks his highest glory in publishing an elegant commentary on them. It is, therefore, no wonder, that all the public institutions, and the national spirit of the Chinese, are deeply tinged with the Confucian doctrines. The stability of the Chinese empire has thus been insured, and as long as the government can maintain the same spiritual control, its power will not be shaken. One despotism may succeed another; but there will be no change of measures, the country as well as the people will remain stationary. To retain the people in a state of civilization, equally remote from barbarism and enlightened principles, is the most important secret of Chinese despotism; and no theory like the Confucian is so well calculated to promote this great end; it teaches the people their duties, but never mentions their rights."

The theory of Confucius, as to the origin of the world, admits an universal chaos to have existed before the separation of the heaven from the earth; and that the two energies of nature were gradually distinguished, and the yin and yang, or the male and female principles, established. The purer influences ascended and formed the heavens, while the grosser particles subsided, constituting the subjacent earth. The combination of these two gave origin to nature, heaven being the father, and earth the mother of all things. Mr. Medhurst, who, from his long residence in China, had ample opportunities of becoming acquainted with this curious system of cosmogony, thus describes it: "The principle of the Chinese cosmogony seems to be founded on a sexual system of the universe. That which Linnæus found to exist in plants, the Chinese conceive, pervades universal nature. Heaven and earth, being the grandest objects cognizable to human senses, have been considered by them as the parents of all things, or the superior and inferior principles of being. These they trace to an extreme limit, which possessed in itself the two powers combined. They say, that one produced two, two begat four, and four increased to eight; and thus, by spontaneous multiplication, the production of all things followed. To all these existences, whether animate or inanimate, they attach the idea of sex; thus everything superior presiding, luminous, hard, and unyielding, is of the masculine; while everything of an opposite quality is ascribed to the feminine gender. Numerals are thus divided, and every odd number is arranged under the former, and every even number under the latter sex. This theory of the sexes was adopted by the ancient Egyptians, and appears in some of the fragments ascribed to Orpheus; while the doctrine of numbers taught by the Confucian school, resembles in some degree the monad and duad of Pythagoras, of which some have spoken as the archetype of the world."

The Confucian cosmogony is intimately connected with their scheme of diagrams. These diagrams consist of a magic square, in which the figures are so arranged that the sums of each row, both diagonally and laterally, shall be equal. The form may be thus represented:—

In this square every odd number represents heaven or the superior principle, and every even number, earth or the inferior principle. The odd numbers, when summed up, amount to 25, and the even numbers with the decade amount to 30, and by these 55 numbers the Confucians believe that all transformations are perfected, and the spirits act.

Another portion of the Confucian theory of the structure of the universe is equally curious. Heaven, earth, and man are considered as the primary agents, each of them being described by three lines, some of which are entire, others broken, so that they can form eight different combinations. This multiplied by itself gives 64; and increased to twenty-four lines placed over each other, they make 16,777,216 changes. By these numbers they imagine that the properties of every being, its motion, rest, and reciprocal operation are described. Hence the belief of the Confucians in "intelligible numbers" as the foundation of their cosmogony; and the use of these numbers by Chinese fortune-tellers to calculate the destinies of men. The whole is evidently a system of materialism, and its origin, as well as its continued operation, is to be resolved in their view into a principle of order. They believe in a sort of material trinity, called heaven, earth, and man; by man in this case being meant the sages only. Heaven and earth, they say, produced human beings, and the sages, by giving instruction, assist nature in the management of the world. Of these sages the most exalted is Confucius himself, who is placed on a level with the powers of nature, and in fact converted into a god. They even pay him divine honours, there being upwards of 1,560 temples dedicated to his worship; and at the spring and autumnal sacrifices there are offered to him six bullocks, 27,000 pigs, 5,800 sheep, 2,800 deer, and 27,000 rabbits; making a total of 62,606 animals, immolated every year to the manes of Confucius, besides 27,600 pieces of silk; all provided by the government. This of course is exclusive of the numerous offerings of private individuals.

The followers of Confucius in China believe in demons and spirits, to each of which is assigned the care and guardianship of some particular dynasty or kingdom, some particular element or province of nature; while the four corners of the house, with the shop, parlour, and kitchen, are thought to be under the influence of some tutelary divinity. And in reference to the doctrine of retribution, they hold that virtue meets with its reward, and vice with its punishment, only in the present world, and if not received during life, the good or evil consequences will result to a man's children or grandchildren. In this way they evade altogether the necessity of a future state of retribution. Two great elements are thus found to be wanting in the moral system of the Chinese sage, the existence of a God, and the doctrine of a future life beyond the grave.

The teaching of Confucius being thoroughly earthly in its character, it was so framed as to attach the highest importance to a series of external regulations, which were deemed necessary to secure the decorum and good order of society. To carry out this object, Confucius composed or compiled the Le-ke, a work on rites in six volumes. It is the most extensive work he has bequeathed to posterity, and points out etiquette, rites and ceremonies under all circumstances, and for all stations of life. In so high estimation was this production held, that forty-three celebrated writers published commentaries and explanatory treatises on the Le-ke; and that no rites might be omitted, the Chow-le, another work on the same subject, consisting of thirty volumes, was added. "From all the books," says Gutzlaff, "which treat of rites, one might collect a very large library, and thus acquire the invaluable knowledge of eating, drinking, sleeping, mourning, standing, weeping, and laughing, according to rule, and thus become a perfect Confucian automaton."

Shortly after its promulgation, the politico-moral system of the Chinese philosopher, though warmly supported by those who had embraced it, was productive of so little benefit to the community, that it was in danger of completely losing its credit. In the course of two centuries, however, after the death of its founder, Confucianism rose into renewed vigour through the active exertions of Mang-tze or Mencius, who travelled from one end of the empire to the other, preaching the doctrines of his revered master. Nor was he without considerable success. He was followed by a numerous host of disciples, and though he added little to the doctrines of Confucius, he placed them in a new light, and explained and applied them with ability and power. The system defective, though it undoubtedly is in some most essential particulars, whether viewed as a system of ethical or of political philosophy, has kept its ground in China to this day. Its adherents are generally regarded as materialists and atheists, yet the greater number of them are found to conform to the popular idolatry.

CONGE D'ELIRE (Fr. leave to choose), the writ or license given by the Sovereign in England to the dean and chapter of the cathedral of a vacant diocese, authorizing them to elect a bishop. Along with the congè d'elire are sent letters missive containing the name of the individual recommended by the Crown to fill the vacant office, and from the time of Henry VIII. it has been the law, that the dean and chapter are liable to the penalties of a pre-nunire if they refuse to elect the person nominated by the Crown. See BISHOP.

CONGO (RELIGION OF). See FETISH-WORSHIP.

CONGREGATION. This word, like the term CHURCH (which see), is sometimes used in a more extended and at other times in a more restricted sense. In its widest acceptation, it includes the whole body of the Christian people. It is thus employed by the Psalmist when he says, "Let the congregation of saints praise Him." But the word more frequently implies an association of professing Christians, who regularly assemble for divine worship in one place under a stated pastor. In order to constitute a congregation in this latter sense of the term, among the Jews at least ten men are required, who have passed the thirteenth year of their age. In every place in which this number of Jews can be stately assembled, they procure a synagogue. Among Christians, on the other hand, no such precise regulation is found, our Lord himself having declared, "Wherever two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Guided by such intimations of the will of Christ, Christian sects of all kinds are in the habit of organising congregations though the number composing them may be much smaller than that fixed by the Jewish Rabbies.

CONGREGATIONS (ROMISH), assemblies of cardinals appointed to arrange some one department of the affairs of the Church of Rome. Each congregation has its chief or president, and also its secretary, who records the proceedings and conducts the correspondence. The instruments which are despatched, and the letters which are written in the name of the congregation, must be signed by the president, and have his seal stamped upon it.

CONGREGATION (CONSISTORIAL), instituted by Pope Sixtus V., for the preparation of the more difficult beneficiary matters which are afterwards to be discussed in the CONSISTORY (which see), in the Pope's presence. The cardinal-deacon, when he resides at Rome, is president of this congregation, and in his absence the Pope may appoint any member of the Apostolical College to act as interim president. This congregation is composed of several cardinals and of some prelates and divines elected by the Pope; and the affairs which usually come before them, regard such matters as the erection of new archbishoprics and cathedral churches, reunions, suppressions, and resignations of bishoprics, coadjutorships, and the taxes and annates of all benefices to which the Pope collates.

CONGREGATION OF THE APOSTOLICAL VISITATION. The pope, besides laying claim to the office of universal bishop, is invested also with the special office of archbishop of the city of Rome, and in that quality is bound to make the pastoral visitation of six bishoprics, which are suffragans to this metropolis of his patrimony. But in consequence of his manifold engagements, this congregation has been instituted to relieve him from some of his more special duties, by nominating commissioners to visit churches and monasteries both in city and country, and report the state of matters to the congregation. This congregation is composed of the same cardinals and prelates which constitute the congregation for suppressing monasteries, but in addition to these, it contains also the Pope's vicar-general and the cardinal vicerent, whose consent is indispensable to the appointment of commissioners for visiting either churches or monasteries.

CONGREGATION OF BISHOPS AND REGULARS. Sixtus V., in the beginning of his pontificate, united two congregations under this name. It is composed of a certain number of cardinals fixed by the Pope, and of a prelate who acts as secretary, and has six writers under him. This congregation has authority to settle all disputes that may arise among bishops and the regulars of all monastic orders. The cardinals of this assembly are bound to give their opinion when necessary to all bishops, abbots, prelates, and superiors of churches or monasteries, who make application to them. The writers and secretary of this congregation are maintained at the expense of the apostolical chamber, the counsel and opinion being afforded in all cases without fee.

CONGREGATION FOR THE EXAMINATION OF BISHOPS, instituted by Gregory XIV., for the purpose of examining those churchmen who were nominated to bishoprics. It is composed of eight cardinals, six prelates, ten divines of different orders, both secular and regular, some of whom must be doctors of the canon law. These examiners are chosen by the Pope, who assembles them in his palace when occasion requires. All Italian bishops are obliged to submit to this examination before they are consecrated, and for this purpose they present themselves before his holiness kneeling on a cushion at his feet, while the examiners stand round proposing such questions as they think proper, on theology and the canon law, to all of which the candidates are expected to give suitable answers. If the examination has proved satisfactory, the Pope authorises their names to be given in to the secretary, who inserts them in a register, and an extract is handed to each of the candidates that he may make use of it in case of his translation to another see, or his elevation to a higher dignity in the church, no further examination being ever after required from him. Such as are raised to the cardinalate before they are created bishops, are exempted from this examination to qualify them for taking possession of a bishop's see or patriarchate, or even to be raised to the pontificate. All cardinal-nephews are likewise exempt.

CONGREGATION ON THE MORALS OF BISHOPS, instituted by Innocent XI. to secure that churchmen, who are raised to the episcopal or any other dignity in the church, should be men of virtuous and regular lives. This congregation is composed of three cardinals, two bishops, four prelates, and a secretary, who is the pope's auditor. Their province is to examine very carefully the certificates of the life and manners of every candidate for a bishop's see, and to take care that his whole deportment be without reproach.

CONGREGATION FOR THE RESIDENCE OF BISHOPS. This congregation, of which the Pope's vicar-general is president, is empowered to take cognizance of all bishops and abbots in Italy in the matter of residence, either compelling or dispensing with their residence in their several dioceses or communities as circumstances may seem to require. In this congregation there are three cardinals, three prelates, and a secretary. They assemble at the palace of the vicar-general on the few occasions on which meetings are necessary. Every bishop or abbot, who wishes to obtain leave of absence for any cause whatever, must apply to this congregation. If any bishop or abbot infringes their order he is deprived of all his benefices as long as he absents himself; and if he refuse to return on the order of this congregation, they have it in their power to suspend him from all his functions, when he can only be restored by his holiness or vicar-general, with the consent of the deputies of this congregation.

CONGREGATION FOR BUILDING OF CHURCHES, instituted by Clement VIII., principally to superintend the building of St. Peter's church at Rome. They have often, however, employed themselves in building other churches in Rome. This congregation consists of eight cardinals and four prelates, assisted by the auditor and treasurer of the apostolic chamber, an auditor of the rota, a steward, a fiscal, a secretary, and some attorneys. Meetings are held twice every month at the palace of the senior cardinal of the congregation. Besides superintending repairs or improvements on St. Peter's, they have the power of inquiring into the wills of those who have bequeathed sums for pious uses.

CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY OFFICE, instituted by Pope Paul III. for the purpose of taking cognizance of heresies, and such new opinions as might be contrary to the doctrines of the Romish church; as also of apostasy, witchcraft, magic, and other kinds of incantation, the abuse of the sacraments, and the condemnation of pernicious books. Paul IV. enlarged the privileges of this congregation, and Sixtus V. passed various statutes, which rendered the holy office so powerful and formidable, that the Italians of the time declared "Pope Sixtus would not pardon Christ himself." This congregation consists of twelve or more cardinals, along with a considerable number of prelates and divines of various orders, both secular and regular, who are called consulters of the holy office. There is, besides, a fiscal with his assessor, whose business it is to make a report of the cases which come before the congregation. A meeting is held once, and sometimes twice a-week, the Pope being generally present and presiding, while the senior cardinal of the holy office acts as secretary, and keeps the seal of the congregation in his custody. The whole proceedings of this body are conducted in private, and a seal of secrecy is imposed on all its members. All persons accused or suspected of heresy or other crimes of which this tribunal takes cognizance, are imprisoned in the palace of the holy office until the prosecution is ended. If found not guilty, they are set at liberty, but if proved to be guilty, they are delivered over to the secular authorities to be punished accordingly. See INQUISITION.

CONGREGATION OF IMMUNITIES, instituted by Urban VIII., with the design of preventing the disputes which frequently arose between the civil and ecclesiastical powers in regard to the trial of churchmen for delinquencies. This congregation is composed of several cardinals nominated by the Pope. They have also an auditor of the rota, a clerk of the chamber, and several prelates, referendaries, one of which is the secretary of the congregation. This court takes cognizance of all ecclesiastical immunities and exemptions. It is held at the palace of the cardinal-dean once a week. Before Urban VIII. instituted this congregation, the cognizance of ecclesiastical immunities belonged to the CONGREGATION OF BISHOPS AND REGULARS (which see).

CONGREGATION OF THE INDEX, instituted by Pope Pius V., for the purpose of examining and prohibiting the perusal of all such books as contain in their view pernicious doctrines. The council of Trent, in the pontificate of Pius IV., pronounced anathema upon all who should read prohibited books, or read them without leave asked and given. To carry out this decree of the council, this congregation was formed, and their deputies have the power to grant permission to read prohibited books to all members of the Romish church in any part of the world. Their power differs from that of the holy office, which prohibits only books written against the faith, whereas this congregation has power to condemn any books which they may regard as objectionable, of whatever kind they may be. Hence it frequently happens, that works which have not the remotest bearing on religious doctrine or practice, are to be found in the Index Prohibitus, to which additions are made from time to time as the congregation may see fit. In addition to the cardinals and secretary which compose the congregation, there are several divines attached to it under the name of consulters, whose office it is to examine books and report, while they have no voice in the meetings of the congregation, which are only held as often as occasion requires.

CONGREGATION OF INDULGENCES, instituted for the purpose of dispensing indulgences in the Pope's name to all whom the congregation, with the full consent of his holiness, regard as worthy of such favours. The number of the cardinals and prelates, composing this congregation, is not fixed, but dependent entirely on the pleasure of the Pope. See INDULGENCE.

CONGREGATION DE PROPAGANDA FIDE, instituted by Gregory XV. in 1622, for the support and propagation of the Romish religion in all parts of the world. It consisted originally of thirteen cardinals, two priests, and one monk, together with a secretary. The number of cardinals which compose it was afterwards increased to eighteen, to which were added a few other officers, including one papal secretary, one apostolical prothonotary, one referendary, and one of the assessors or scribes of the holy office. This congregation meets in the presence of the Pope, the first Monday of every month, besides holding several ordinary meetings every week, for the purpose of consulting as to the best modes of advancing the cause of Romanism throughout the whole world. See COLLEGE DE PROPAGANDA FIDE.

CONGREGATION OF RELICS, instituted for the superintendence of relics of ancient martyrs, which are frequently found in catacombs and other subterraneous places in and around Rome. This congregation is composed of six cardinals and four prelates, among whom are the cardinal-vicar and the prefect of the Pope's sacristy. There are certain marks by which real are said to be distinguished from spurious relics, and after careful deliberation on all the circumstances of the case, the votes of the congregation are taken, and if the marks of the relics are, by a majority, declared to be genuine, the president declares the relic in question to be worthy of the veneration of the faithful, and gives it such a name as he thinks right; handing over the relic to the vicar and the Pope's sacristan, who distributes portions of the precious treasure to those of the faithful who may wish to be possessed of them. See RELICS.

CONGREGATION OF RITES OR CEREMONIES, instituted by Sixtus V., to regulate the ceremonies and rites of the new offices of saints, which are added from time to time to the Roman calendar. This congregation has authority to explain the rubrics of the Mass-Book and Breviary when any difficulties are started, or any one desires information on such topics. It has also the power of pronouncing sentence, from which there is no appeal, on all disputes relating to the precedence of churches. It is composed of eight cardinals and a secretary, who is one of the college of the prelates referendaries. Two masters of the ceremonies in the Pope's household are also admitted into the congregation. Its meetings are held once a month, or oftener as occasion requires. When a saint is about to be canonized, the three senior auditors of the rota are present in this assembly as persons supposed to be versed in the canon law, along with an assistant apostolical prothonotary, and the proctor of the faith, who is generally the fiscal advocate of the apostolical chamber. Several consulters also are admitted, who are divines and monks professed of different orders, among whom is the master of the sacred palace, and the prefect of the Pope's sacristy. All these judges' assistants, together with the deputies in ordinary of this congregation, examine the claims to canonization, which are alleged in favour of an individual

These proofs are martyrdom, undisputed miracles, testimonies of a virtuous life, and heroic virtues. See BEATIFICATION, CANONIZATION.

CONGREGATION FOR SUPPRESSING MONASTERIES, instituted by Innocent X. for the purpose of inquiring into the state of monasteries, and either suppressing altogether those which are likely to prove burdensome to the public, or uniting them to other monasteries which might happen to have more wealth than they required. This congregation is composed of eight cardinals and a number of friars belonging to all the orders. The rebuilding, as well as the suppression, of monasteries comes within the cognizance of this congregation.

CONGREGATION ON THE TRIDENTINE DECREES. At the close of the proceedings of the council of Trent in the sixteenth century, Pope Pius IV. appointed certain cardinals, who had been present and assisted in its deliberations, to superintend the execution of its decrees, strictly enjoining that these decrees should be observed in their literal sense, and prohibiting all glosses by way of interpreting them. Sixtus V. established this congregation, empowering it to interpret all points of discipline, but not of doctrine. It meets once a-week at the palace of the senior cardinal, under the presidency of a cardinal appointed by the Pope, and who along with the office receives a large pension. To be a member of this congregation is regarded as a high honour, and therefore eagerly coveted.

CONGREGATIONALISTS, a large and flourishing body of professing Christians in Britain and America, whose great distinctive principle concerns the scriptural constitution of a Christian church. This denomination, also termed Independents, object equally to the Episcopal and Presbyterian forms of church government. In their view every particular society of visible professors, who agree to walk together in the faith and order of the gospel, is a complete church, having the power of government and discipline within itself, and independent of all other congregations, being responsible for all its actings only to the great Head of the church. Another distinctive principle, which may be considered as arising out of that which we have just noticed, is, that the whole power of government is vested in the assembly of the faithful. On these two principles, if indeed they can be considered as distinct from each other, rests the whole system of Congregationalism or Independency. The terms Church and Congregation, then, this body of Christians consider as synonymous. Accordingly, Church, when used in Scripture, is regarded by Congregationalists as in no case applicable to an aggregate of individual assemblies, but that whenever more than one such assembly is referred to, the plural "churches" is invariably employed. The church they believe to be composed of true believers, hence the utmost strictness is exercised in the admission of church members, evidence being required sufficient to satisfy the church, not simply of a credible profession of Christianity, as in Episcopal and Presbyterian churches, but of a saving operation of Divine grace in the soul. Every church thus constituted has the power to choose its own office-bearers, to admit, reject, or excommunicate its own members, and to raise and administer its own funds. In all matters which come under the consideration of the church, every member has a voice, that is, every male member, although in some Congregationalist churches, female members are regarded as on an equal footing with males in this respect. All authority is vested in the entire membership of the church, the office-bearers and members being on an equality in right of government; and from the decision of each individual church there is no appeal.

The Congregationalists maintain, that Scripture warrants no more than two kinds of church office-bearers, bishops or pastors, to care for the spiritual, and deacons to manage the temporal affairs of the church. It is left wholly to the discretion of each church to elect one or more pastors, no fixed rule being laid down, as they conceive, in the New Testament, to regulate the number of pastors. All that is required, in their view, to constitute a valid call to the ministry, is simply an invitation issued by any individual church to take the pastorate over them, and the mere acceptance of such an invitation gives full authority to preach and administer the sacraments. But after this election and invitation given and accepted, an ordination of the newly chosen pastor takes place, conducted by the ministers of the neighbouring churches. The precise nature of this service among the Congregationalists is thus laid down in a tract issued by the Congregational Union of England: "In the ordination of a Congregational pastor, there is no assumption of anything resembling hierarchical authority. By this proceeding it is not professed that office is conferred, character imparted, gifts bestowed, or authority conveyed. It is an affair of order and no more. It declares and assures the due observance of godly order in all the preceding steps by which the ordained pastor has entered on his work. It completes and solemnizes his actual entrance on all pastoral engagements. Ordination among Congregationalists stands in the same relation to the sacred office that inaugural solemnities hold in respect to civil offices. Coronation does not make a king. It solemnizes the entrance on kingly dignities and functions of him who is already king, by laws and rights which coronation does not impart, or even confirm, but only recognizes, celebrates, and publishes." From this statement, which may be regarded as authoritative, it is plain that the authority of a pastor flows exclusively from the election by a church, and that election is not restricted to any particular class of men; any person being eligible to the office of pastor whom the particular church thinks fitted to edify them by his gifts and qualifications. While such is the abstract theory of Congregationalism, an educated ministry is viewed by this body as of high importance, and, accordingly, almost all their ministers have been trained at the Theological Academies and Colleges which have been founded specially for this purpose. And yet while they believe in the scriptural authority of the pastoral office, they maintain that not the pastors only, but any others of the church-members, who may be possessed of the requisite gifts, may, with the utmost propriety, be allowed to exhort the brethren.

From the very nature of the theory of Congregationalism, it is obvious that the existence of Established churches is inconsistent with it, as interfering with the self-government of churches, and superseding, by the endowments of the state, the spontaneous exertions of Christians to maintain and propagate the truth. On the members of each individual church rests the responsibility not only of supporting ordinances among themselves, but of doing their uttermost for the propagation of Christianity throughout the world. At first sight it might appear likely that the independency of the churches might prevent them from co-operating with each other in the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom both at home and abroad. Practically, however, it is far otherwise. The power of self-control rests in each individual church; neither are the churches connected together by subscription to any human creeds, articles, or confessions, and yet the most pleasing uniformity is observed among Congregationalist churches, both in doctrine and practice. This may possibly have arisen from the voluntary associations for brotherly intercourse and advice, which are held among the pastors of the churches usually of each county. Such associations, synods, or assemblies, the Congregationalists do not consider unlawful, if they be not "intrusted," to use the language of the Savoy Conference, "with any church power properly so called, or with any jurisdiction over the churches themselves, to exercise any censures, or to impose their determination on the churches or officers." Such was the principle held by the Independents so far back as 1658; and in the same spirit the Congregational Union of England and Wales was established in 1831. Thus Christian sympathy and co-operation among the churches are secured, they believe, without the evils and disadvantages arising from a forced conformity. The following principles of church order and discipline are maintained by the Congregationalists of England and Wales, as set forth in a 'Declaration of Faith, Order, and Discipline' issued by the Congregational Union in 1833:

"I. The Congregational churches hold it to be the will of Christ that true believers should voluntarily assemble together to observe religious ordinances, to promote mutual edification and holiness, to perpetuate and propagate the Gospel in the world, and to advance the glory and worship of God through Jesus Christ; and that each society of believers, having these objects in view in its formation, is properly a Christian church.

"II. They believe that the New Testament contains, either in the form of express statute, or in the example and practice of apostles and apostolic churches, all the articles of faith necessary to be believed, and all the principles of order and discipline requisite for constituting and governing Christian societies; and that human traditions, fathers and councils, canons and creeds, possess no authority over the faith and practice of Christians.

"III. They acknowledge Christ as the only Head of the church, and the officers of each church under Him, as ordained to administer His laws impartially to all; and their only appeal, in all questions touching their religious faith and practice, is to the Sacred Scriptures.

"IV. They believe that the New Testament authorizes every Christian church to elect its own officers, to manage all its own affairs, and to stand independent of, and irresponsible to, all authority, saving that only of the Supreme and Divine Head of the church, the Lord Jesus Christ.

"V. They believe that the only officers placed by the apostles over individual churches, are the bishops or pastors, and the deacons; the number of these being dependent upon the numbers of the church; and that to these, as the officers of the church, is committed respectively the administration of its spiritual and temporal concerns, subject, however, to the approbation of the church.

"VI. They believe that no persons should be received as members of Christian churches, but such as make a credible profession of Christianity, are living according to its precepts, and attest a willingness to be subject to its discipline; and that none should be excluded from the fellowship of the church, but such as deny the faith of Christ, violate his laws, or refuse to submit themselves to the discipline which the word of God enforces.

"VII. The power of admission into any Christian church, and rejection from it, they believe to be vested in the church itself, and to be exercised only through the medium of its own officers.

"VIII. They believe that Christian churches should statedly meet for the celebration of public worship, for the observance of the Lord's Supper, and for the sanctification of the first day of the week.

"IX. They believe that the power of a Christian church is purely spiritual, and should in no way be corrupted by union with temporal or civil power.

"X. They believe that it is the duty of Christian churches to hold communion with each other, to entertain an enlarged affection for each other, as members of the same body, and to co-operate for the promotion of the Christian cause; but that no church, nor union of churches, has any right or power to interfere with the faith or discipline of any other church, further than to separate from such as, in faith or practice, depart from the Gospel of Christ.

"XI. They believe that it is the privilege and duty of every church to call forth such of its members as may appear to be qualified, by the Holy Spirit, to sustain the office of the ministry; and that Christian churches unitedly ought to consider the maintenance of the Christian ministry in an adequate degree of learning, as one of its especial cares; that the cause of the Gospel may be both honourably sustained and constantly promoted.

"XII. They believe that church officers, whether bishops or deacons, should be chosen by the free voice of the church; but that their dedication to the duties of their office should take place with special prayer, and by solemn designation, to which most of the churches add the imposition of hands by those already in office.

"XIII. They believe that the fellowship of every Christian church should be so liberal as to admit to communion in the Lord's Supper all whose faith and godliness are, on the whole, undoubted, though conscientiously differing in points of minor importance; and that this outward sign of fraternity in Christ should be co-extensive with the fraternity itself, though without involving any compliances which conscience would deem to be sinful."

The originator of the Congregationalist body is generally said to be Robert Brown, the founder of the sect of BROWNISTS (which see), who organized a church in England in 1583. It is not unlikely, however, that at a still earlier period churches on the Congregationalist principles existed in England, and it is worthy of note, that in Cranmer's Bible, the word ecclesia, which is now translated "church," is uniformly rendered "congregation." Brown, along with the other Congregationalist principles which he held, denied the supremacy of the Queen over the church, and declared the Establishment to be an unscriptural church. With the view of propagating his opinions the more extensively, he published a series of tracts explanatory of his principles. These were scattered far and wide to the great annoyance of the government, who put to death several individuals, for what was in their eyes an unpardonable crime, denying the Queen's supremacy. Persecuted in England, a number who held Independent principles took refuge in Holland, where they planted Congregationalist churches in Amsterdam, Leyden, and other cities, which continued to flourish for more than a hundred years. Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1592, estimated the number of Brownists in England at twenty thousand. In the time of the Commonwealth they took the name of Independents, probably from the peculiarity which distinguished their churches from all Established churches, that they were independent of all external interference or control. The Assembly of Divines, which met at Westminster in 1643, numbered five leading Independent ministers among its members. Though men of weight and influence in their own body, these five "dissenting brethren," as they were called, were unable to resist the overwhelming numbers of the Presbyterians, and were obliged, therefore, to content themselves with drawing up a protest under the name of 'Apologetic Narration,' which was presented to the House of Commons in 1644. The tide of opinion ran strong against them, both in the Assembly and in Parliament. The divine authority of the Presbyterian form of church government was maintained with such keenness and determination, that the Independents were contented to plead for simple toleration and indulgence. It was at this period that Milton produced his 'Areopagitica,' which was principally instrumental in changing the whole course of public opinion. The Presbyterian party now rapidly declined in influence and favour. The plan which had been formed of establishing Presbytery all over England was defeated. Through the influence of Cromwell, who favoured the Independents, that party rose into favour with all classes of the people, and with John Owen at their head, they rapidly gained the confidence of the country, rising to the highest places in the government, and becoming a strong political faction.

Nor were the Independents less influential as a religious body in England. They were both numerous and powerful, but, notwithstanding the advantages which they now possessed, they felt their influence over the community to be not a little diminished in consequence of the indefinite character of their doctrinal opinions. A regularly drawn up confession of faith seemed in these circumstances to be imperatively called for, and in order to prepare and publish such a document, a conference or synod of the body was held in 1658 at the Savoy, in the Strand, London. This memorable assembly consisted of ministers and lay delegates, representing the various Independent churches throughout England, and after careful examination, they sent forth a "Declaration of the Faith and Order owned and practised in the Congregational Churches in England," which was simply a republication of the Westminster Confession, with the omission of such passages as favoured Presbyterianism, and the addition of an entire chapter supporting Independency.

The decline of the Congregationalists in political importance commenced with the Restoration in 1660, and when the Act of Uniformity passed in 1662, they, in common with other Non-conformists, were subjected to much suffering. But amid all the persecution to which they were exposed, they increased in numbers to such an extent, that they seem to have actually outnumbered the Presbyterians. The passing of the Act of Toleration in 1689, brought relief to the Independents as well as other Dissenters. They now began to be more reconciled to the Presbyterians, and at length, in 1691, heads of agreement were drawn up with a view to bring about an accommodation between the two parties. The great dissenting bodies now made common cause with one another, and the Baptists, Presbyterians, and Independents, first in 1696. and afterwards in 1730, formed themselves into a united body under the name of the Three Denominations, who still enjoy the privilege of approaching the throne as one body, and consult together from time to time for the general interest of Dissenters. From the reign of Queen Anne, in the first part of the eighteenth century, Presbyterianism gradually lost footing in England, while the Congregationalists were yearly growing in numbers and importance. This progressive improvement of the latter denomination has been sustained down to the present day, when, of all the various bodies of Dissenters in England, they are beyond all doubt the most numerous and influential. Whatever opinions may be entertained as to the scriptural authority of the Congregational system, its success in England cannot for a moment be questioned. Some of the brightest names in theological literature, such as Watts, and Henry, and Doddridge, adorn the pages of its history. From its academies, under the tutorship of such men as Pye Smith, Burder, and Harris, have come forth a host of men of ability, piety, scholarship, and zeal, such as would do honour to any church in any country under heaven. The London Missionary Society, which was mainly founded, and continues to be mainly supported, by Congregationalist ministers and laymen, forms a standing evidence of the Christian energy, and efficiency, and zeal of this highly respected and respectable denomination of English Dissenters. By the last census in 1851, the number of Congregationalist churches in England and Wales was reported as amounting to 3,244, with accommodation for 1,063,136 persons.

CONGREGATIONALISTS (AMERICAN). The father of Congregationalism in America seems to have been a worthy Non-conformist minister named John Robinson. Little is known of the early history of this individual. We first hear of him as pastor of a dissenting church in the north of England, somewhere about the commencement of the seventeenth century. His congregation was formed in troublous times, and both he and they were subjected to so much annoyance in consequence of their Non-conformist principles, that they formed the resolution of leaving England in a body, and taking refuge in Holland, which at that period was the asylum of the persecuted. It was not so easy to accomplish their object, however, as they had at first anticipated. Their first attempt to escape was defeated, and the whole company were lodged in prison. A second attempt was more successful, for a part of the church reached Amsterdam in safety. Mr. Robinson and the remainder of the church, in the spring of 1608, made another effort to escape and join their friends in Holland. Their plans were laid in the utmost secrecy. The company assembled on a barren heath in Lincolnshire, and embarked on board a vessel under cloud of darkness. The night was stormy, and while some of the party were still waiting on the shore the return of a boat which had conveyed some of their companions to the ship, a company of horsemen appeared in pursuit, and apprehended a number of the weeping women and children. After some little delay, however, they were set at liberty, and the whole company of emigrants, with Robinson at their head, set sail for the shores of Holland. On their arrival they joined the church at Amsterdam, but in the course of a year, owing to the dissensions which had broken out among its members, they removed to Leyden, where they founded a church on Independent principles. Their numbers were speedily increased by the arrival of additional immigrants from England, and in a short time the church numbered three hundred communicants. For ten years Mr. Robinson continued to labour in Leyden, where his talents were so highly appreciated, that, at the request of the Calvinistic professors in the university of that place, he engaged in a public dispute with Episcopius, the champion of the Arminians, whom he signally vanquished. The principles of the church at Leyden were of a strictly Congregationalist character, as appears from the following summary of them contained in Belknap's Life of Robinson :

"1. That no church ought to consist of more members than can conveniently meet together for worship and discipline.

"2. That any church of Christ is to consist only of such as appear to believe in, and obey him.

"3. That any competent number of such have a right, when conscience obliges them, to form themselves into a distinct church.

"4. That this incorporation is by some contract or covenant, express or implied.

"5. That, being thus incorporated, they have a right to choose their own officers.

"6. That these officers are pastors or teaching elders, ruling elders, and deacons.

"7. That elders being chosen, and ordained, have no power to rule the church, but by consent of the brethren.

"8. That all elders, and all churches, are equal in respect of powers and privileges.

"9. With respect to ordinances, they hold that baptism is to be administered to visible believers and their infant children; but they admitted only the children of communicants to baptism. That the Lord's Supper is to be received sitting at the table. (Whilst they were in Holland they received it every Lord's day.) That ecclesiastical censures were wholly spiritual, and not to be accompanied with temporal penalties.

"10. They admitted no holy days but the Christian Sabbath, though they had occasionally days of fasting and thanksgiving; and finally, they renounced all right of human invention or imposition in religious matters."

In the year 1617, Mr. Robinson and his church began to think of emigrating to America, partly from a wish that their children might be preserved from the immorality and licentiousness which at that time unhappily prevailed in Holland, and partly from a desire to found on the far distant Transatlantic shores a purely Christian colony. Having fully considered the matter, they fixed upon Virginia as the place of their settlement, and having sent two of their number to make all necessary arrangements, they succeeded in 1619 in procuring a patent, and by a contract with some merchants in London, they obtained sufficient money to enable the entire church to cross the Atlantic. The vessels provided, however, were found not to be large enough to contain the whole company, and, accordingly, a portion set sail headed by Elder Brewster, leaving Mr. Robinson and the majority of the church still at Leyden. On reaching America the exiles settled at Plymouth in New England, where the first Congregationalist church ever formed in America, was organized in 1620. For ten years it stood alone, the new settlers being called to encounter many difficulties, and to endure many privations, but persevering with unflinching courage in maintaining their principles, amid all opposition. In 1629, a new settlement was formed at Salem, consisting chiefly of Puritans, who had emigrated from England, but the church was organized on a strictly Congregational footing. For several years Elder Brewster officiated as pastor of the church at Plymouth, with the single exception of administering the sacraments. In 1625, Mr. Robinson, who had remained at Leyden, died there, and the church after his death was broken up, a part of the members going to Amsterdam, and a part afterwards joining their friends across the Atlantic.

Churches now began to be formed in various parts of New England on the model of that at Plymouth. It was not, however, till 1633, that, on the arrival of Mr. Colton, some general plans were introduced embracing all the churches which from that time took the name of Congregational. As colonies were planted by the pilgrims, churches were organized, but religious and political institutions were strangely blended in one confused mass. The principles of enlightened toleration seem to have been as yet neither known nor recognized. Thus we find Roger Williams banished beyond the jurisdiction of Massachusetts for asserting the principle of unlimited toleration of all distinctions and shades of religious opinions.

In 1637 commenced the famous controversy respecting Antinomianism. (See ANTINOMIANS.) The facts were shortly these: "Mrs. Hutchinson, the promulgator and chief defender of Antinomian tenets, seems to have maintained, according to the summary of her opinions in Neal, 'that believers in Christ are personally united with the Spirit of God; that commands to work out salvation with fear and trembling belong to none but such as are under the covenant of works; that sanctification is not sufficient evidence of a good state; and that immediate revelations about future events are to be believed as equally infallible with the Scriptures.' These opinions soon became the absorbing topics of discussion, and divided the whole colony into two parties, such as were for a covenant of works, and such as were for a covenant of grace. As the quarrel continued to rage with constantly increasing violence, a synod was called, which met at Newtown. This was the first synod convened in New England. It was composed of the ministers and messengers or delegates of the several churches. There were also present certain magistrates 'who were allowed not only to hear, but to speak if they had a mind.' The synod unanimously condemned Mrs. Hutchinson's opinions. But she and her followers, not being satisfied with this decision, and continuing to promulgate, with new zeal, their sentiments, recourse was had to the civil power, and she was banished to Rhode Island. She subsequently retired to the territory of New Amsterdam, where she perished by the hands of the Indians. Mr. Wheelwright, a clergyman of Boston who had embraced her opinions, subsequently renounced them, and her party, at least in name, became extinct."

The churches had now become numerous and strong, and the importance of a native educated ministry began to be felt. Harvard College was, therefore, founded in 1638. Much attention began to be directed to the education of the young, and, as early as 1646, common schools were established by law, and provision was made for their support in all the towns within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts. No public provision was made for schools in Plymouth till some years after, but the children were taught by teachers employed by the parents. Each church being, according to the principles of Congregationalism, independent of every other, the question arose, what were the duties which churches owed to one another. The matter was discussed in a synod held about this time for mutual consultation and advice, and the duties of churches to one another were thus laid down in what was called the Cambridge Platform, adopted in 1648, and again sanctioned in the synod held at Boston in 1662:—

1. Hearty care and prayer one for another.
2. By way of relief in case of want, either temporal or spiritual.
3. By giving an account one to another of their public actions when it is orderly desired, and in upholding each other, in inflicting censure and other acts of church government.
4. Seeking and giving help to each other in case of divisions, contentions, difficult questions, errors and scandals, and also in ordination, translation, and deposition of ministers.
5. Giving aid to another church in cases of error, scandal, &c., even though they should so far neglect their duty as not to seek such aid.
6. Admonishing one another when there is need and cause for it, and after due means with patience used, withdrawing from a church or peccant party therein, which obstinately persists in error or scandal. These rules are carried into effect by means of either temporary or standing councils of the churches.

Previous to this synod the churches of New England had never agreed upon any uniform scheme of discipline. Soon after the dissolution of this synod, the Anabaptists appeared in Massachusetts, followed by the Quakers, but both were treated with the utmost barbarity, many of them being banished beyond the bounds of the state, some whipped, some fined and imprisoned, and a few even put to death. About the same time a controversy arose among the churches as to the proper subjects of baptism, and, in particular, whether the grandchildren of church members had a right to the ordinance. The point was discussed in a council called in 1657, by the colonies of Massachusetts and Connecticut contrary to the advice of the colony of New Haven. By this council it was decided that those who, being grown up to years of discretion, and who being of blameless life, understanding the grounds of religion, should own the covenant made with their parents, by entering therein in their proper persons, should have the ordinance of baptism administered to their children. This decision was not regarded as satisfactory, and the controversy raged more keenly than ever. Another council, therefore, was summoned at Boston, and the decision was in substance the same, that all baptized persons were to be considered members of the church, and if not openly dissolute, admitted to all its privileges, except partaking of the Lord's Supper. This decision, which went by the name of the Half-way Covenant, was violently opposed by Increase Mather of Boston, and several of the most distinguished ministers in the colonies. The Half-way Covenant system continued in operation for many years, and, as the natural consequence, the churches came to consist, in many places, of unregenerate persons, of those who regarded themselves, and were regarded by others, as unregenerate. Finding that such was the almost invariable result of the system, it was laid aside after some years' painful experience in all the orthodox Congregational churches.

The Savoy Confession of Faith, which, as was mentioned in the preceding article, was adopted in 1658 by the English Congregational churches, and which was in effect the same as the Westminster Confession of Faith, was approved by a synod convened at Boston in 1680, and is to this day considered in America as a correct exposition of the opinions of the Congregationalists. New articles of discipline were adopted by the churches of Connecticut at an assembly of ministers and delegates held at Saybrook in 1708. The "Saybrook Platform," as it is generally called, was evidently a compromise between the Presbyterian and the Congregational principle. It differs from the "Cambridge Platform" chiefly in the provision that it makes respecting councils and associations.

In course of time, towards 1750, Unitarian principles became extensively diffused in the Congregational churches of the United States. Some years elapsed, however, before an open separation took place between the Trinitarian and Unitarian churches. At length, in 1785, several churches in Boston formally declared their renunciation of the Confessions of Faith, and their example was followed by many others, all of which, however, still retained the Congregational form of church government. Harvard College became decidedly Unitarian.

The American Revolution put an end to the connection which existed between the Congregational system of church polity and the civil power. In none of the new constitutions was there any provision made for the support of a particular form of worship by law. Though no longer supported, or even countenanced, by the law, Congregationalism continued to make rapid progress in the United States. In 1801, a plan of union was adopted between the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church and the General Association of Connecticut, with a view to promote union and harmony in those new settlements which were composed of inhabitants from those bodies. By this plan a Congregational church, if they settled a Presbyterian minister, might still conduct their discipline according to Congregational principles; and, on the other hand, a Presbyterian Church, with a Congregational minister, retained its peculiar discipline. Under these regulations, many new churches were formed, which, after a time, came under the jurisdiction of the General Assembly. In 1837 this plan of union was abrogated by that body as unconstitutional, and several synods, which had been attached to it in consequence of the plan, were declared to be out of the ecclesiastical connexion. In the following year (1838) a General Assembly was formed under the name of the Constitutional Presbyterian Church, which recognizes this compromise between the Presbyterian and Congregationalist principles. "Congregationalism," Dr. Schaff tells us, "is the ruling sect of the six North-eastern States, and has exerted, and still exerts, a powerful influence upon the religious, social, and political life of the whole nation." By the most recent accounts, there are 2,449 churches in the different States, consisting of 207,608 members.

CONGREGATIONALISTS (SCOTTISH). The first appearance of Congregationalist principles in Scotland is probably to be traced as far back as the time of the Commonwealth. At that stirring period, when Independency had obtained favour and influence among multitudes of all classes in England, the soldiers of Oliver Cromwell carried with them into Scotland their peculiar religious opinions, and are said to have formed a Congregationalist Church in the metropolis, which, after their return to England, gradually dwindled away, and in a short time was dissolved. With this exception the sentiments of the Congregationalists, though they had taken deep root south of the Tweed, seem to have been altogether unrecognized in Scotland for a long period. At length, in 1729, Mr. John Glas, a minister of the Church of Scotland, separated from the communion of that church, and published a work entitled 'The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning his kingdom,' in which he openly avowed opinions in common with the English Independents, more especially as developed in the writings of Dr. John Owen. In consequence of his numerous publications in explanation and defence of his views, Mr. Glas succeeded in gaining over many converts, and several churches were organized in different parts of Scotland on strictly Independent principles, of which a few still exist under the name of GLASSITES (which see). About the year 1755, Mr. Robert Sandeman published a series of letters addressed to Mr. Hervey on the appearance of his 'Theron and Aspasio,' and in the course of his animadversions, the author maintains the principles of Scottish Independency. In consequence of the prominent part which Mr. Sandeman took in the diffusion of Congregationalist views, in connexion, however, with peculiar opinions on the subject of saving faith, his followers received the name of SANDEMANIANS (which see). In addition to the Glassites and Sandemanians, various Baptist churches were formed in different parts of Scotland, all of them arranged on the footing of Congregationalism. (See BAPTISTS, SCOTTISH.) About the same period, Mr. David Dale of New Lanark, and his friends, zealous in the cause of Independency, established several churches, which have been often termed The Old Scots Independents. (See DALEITES.) These churches, though differing from each other on various points, were all of them Congregational.

It is from the end of last century, however, that the denomination of Scottish Congregationalists properly takes its origin. Religion, as a spiritual, living, energetic principle, had for many years been palpably on the decline in Scotland. Coldness, indifference, and even infidelity prevailed to a lamentable extent. It pleased God, however, at length to raise up a few godly men, who, not contented with sighing and praying in secret over the darkness which covered the land, resolved to bestir themselves to active exertion in arousing the careless, and turning some at least from the bondage of Satan to the service of the true God. "It was at this juncture," says Mr. Kinniburgh in his Historical Survey of Congregationalism in Scotland, "that village preaching and extensive itinerancies were entered upon by Messrs. James Haldane and John Aikman. Their first attempt was made at the collier village of Gilmerton. Mr. Rate, a preacher from Dr. Bogue's academy at Gosport, at the request of Mr. John Campbell, preached at the village for two Sabbath evenings; but he being obliged to leave Edinburgh for a time, there was no one to supply Gilmerton on the third Sabbath evening. In this dilemma Mr. James Haldane urged Mr. Aikman to preach. At first he would not consent. However, he was afterwards gained over by Mr. Haldane telling him, that, if he would officiate on the first Sabbath evening, Mr. Haldane would engage to do so upon the following one. This offer touched the right chord in Mr. Aikman's warm heart, and constrained him to comply. Mr. Haldane accordingly preached on the Sabbath evening thereafter. They continued to supply the village regularly in rotation for several Sabbath evenings, as well as on a week-day evening; and after the return of Mr. Rate to town, the three took their regular turns in preaching at the village. By and by Messrs. Haldane and Aikman began to think of extending their sphere of usefulness, and undertook a preaching tour to the north. These brethren were laymen; and laymen preaching like ministers was a novel thing in those days. More marvellous still, they were members of the Church of Scotland, visiting every parish that lay in their way, and preaching in the market-place or on the streets. The correctness of their views of the plan of salvation, and the earnestness of their addresses, gained for them attention, and secured to them large audiences. They had been taught by the religious discussions excited by several publications, and particularly by the 'Missionary Magazine,'—then conducted by Mr. Ewing, while a minister of the Church of Scotland,—the propriety of engaging in itinerating labours, and preaching the Gospel as they might have opportunity. In that miscellany the opinion was ably maintained, that it was the right, nay the duty, of every Christian man, who knew the Gospel and felt its power and who could state it with perspicuity, to declare it to his fellow sinners; an assertion which, notwithstanding the opposition it met with, has never yet received a satisfactory confutation. The discussion of this question created a very great sensation at the time."

The labours of these godly men constituted a new era in the religious history of Scotland. Symptoms of revival began to manifest themselves in various parts of the country; a spirit of earnest inquiry developed itself in many minds; dead souls were quickened, and not a few, who had all their lives been strangers to God and godliness, gladly heard the word, and even received it in the love of it. In the autumn of 1797, Messrs. James Haldane and Aikman set out on a preaching tour to the northern counties, and travelling as far as the Orkney Islands, they proclaimed their Master's message with such simplicity and power, that it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to bring great numbers to the saving knowledge of the truth. The report which the brethren brought of the low state of religion in the Highlands and Islands, turned the thoughts of many zealous Christians towards devising plans for the supply of the religious destitution which prevailed so extensively in the northern counties. Mr. Robert Haldane, in particular, who had recently been converted to the faith of Christ, having been disappointed in his anxious wish to found an establishment in the East Indies for propagating the gospel, turned his attention to the state of religion in his native land, and resolved to employ his fortune, which was large, in diffusing the gospel through the benighted districts of Scotland. By means of his zealous endeavours, and those of some pious individuals, a society was formed, having for its object the dissemination of religious knowledge at home. To accomplish this truly benevolent design, pious young men were employed as catechists, whose duty it was to plant and superintend evening schools in villages, for the instruction of the young in the elements of religious truth; while several ministers of known character in England joined with their like-minded Scottish brethren in itinerating throughout the towns and villages, carrying the glad news of salvation through the blood of the Lamb to multitudes who, though in a professedly Christian country, were, nevertheless, sitting in darkness, and in the region of the shadow of death.

The centre point of this zealous Christian movement was Edinburgh, and while pious men were thus devising plans for the extension of the gospel in the benighted portions of the land, they were not unmindful of the religious destitution of the metropolis itself. It was resolved to open an additional place of worship in the city, where preaching should be kept up by a succession of devoted evangelical ministers of all denominations. Accordingly, in the summer of 1798, the Circus was opened by Mr. Rowland Hill. The experiment was so successful, that it was determined to erect a large place of worship, to be called "The Tabernacle." A suitable site was obtained at the head of Leith Walk, where a church was built capable of containing upwards of three thousand persons, which, for several years, was nearly filled every Sabbath with a most attentive congregation, and was very often densely crowded. The whole expense of this large structure, all the sittings of which were free, was defrayed by Mr. Robert Haldane. Thus the utmost energy and activity characterized the movements of these disinterested Christian philanthropists, who, both in the city and throughout the country, were unwearied in their endeavours to win souls to Christ. It was not to be expected, however, that their efforts should pass without reproach on the part of such as were unable to appreciate the pure and lofty motives by which they were actuated. But how painful was it for them to find, that not a few, both of the Presbyterian Dissenters and Established clergy, were loud in denouncing them. Nor was this opposition manifested by individuals alone, but even by entire bodies of professing Christians. Thus the Relief synod, at their meeting in 1798, passed a decree to the effect, "That no minister belonging to this body shall give or allow his pulpit to be given to any person who has not attended a regular course of philosophy and divinity in some of the universities of the nation; and who has not been regularly licensed to preach the gospel." This decree was obviously levelled against the itinerant preachers, and it is to be regretted, that, for a number of years, this decision remained in force until, as Dr. Struthers remarks, "this illiberal act was, in 1811, allowed to drop out of their code of regulations as something of which they were ashamed." In the same spirit the General Associate or Antiburgher synod, "agreed unanimously in declaring, that as lay preaching has no warrant in the Word of God, and as the synod has always considered it their duty to testify against promiscuous communion, no person, under the inspection of the synod, can consistently with their principles attend upon, or give countenance to, public preaching by any who are not of our communion. And if any do so, they ought to be dealt with by the judicatories of the church, to bring them to a sense of their offensive conduct." These violent denunciations, on the part of the Dissenting bodies, were even surpassed by those which were given forth by the Established Church of Scotland, which, in the famous Pastoral Admonition of the General Assembly of 1799, accused the itinerant preachers of being "artful and designing men, disaffected to the civil constitution of the country, holding secret meetings, and abusing the name of liberty as a cover for secret democracy and anarchy." Such unwarranted attacks upon men who were undeniably zealously affected in a good cause, only aroused public sympathy all the more in their favour. It was a quaint but just remark which fell from Rowland Hill at the time: "We will shine all the brighter for the scrubbing we have got from the General Assembly."

In the midst of this desperate and determined opposition, which on all hands assailed the promoters of itinerant preaching, the first Congregational church was formed, a small number of pious persons, amounting to no more than twelve or fourteen, having met in a private house in George Street, Edinburgh, in December 1798, and constituted themselves into a church for Christian fellowship. This was the commencement of the Circus church, of which Mr. James Haldane was chosen the pastor. Mr. Aikman, who was one of the small number present on that occasion, gave the following account some years afterwards of the principles on which that church was founded: "The chief principle which influenced the minds of the brethren, who I believe constituted the majority of the small company first associated for observing divine ordinances in the Circus, was the indispensable necessity of the people of God being separated in religious fellowship from all such societies as permitted visible unbelievers to continue in their communion. This was a yoke under which we had long groaned; and we hailed with gratitude to God, the arrival of that happy day when we first enjoyed the so much wished for privilege of separating from an impure communion, and of uniting exclusively with those whom it was meet and fit that we should judge to be all the children of God. Some of our dearest brethren, however, did not unite with us on this principle. They were attached indeed to the fellowship of the saints, and would by no means consent to the admission of any amongst us who did not appear to be such; yet they were not then convinced of the absolute unlawfulness of their continuing in connexion with societies confessedly impure. Our brethren were well aware of our decided difference of sentiment, not only respecting the great inconsistency, but also unlawfulness of any persons connected with us continuing to go back to the fellowship of those societies from which they had professed to separate, and they knew that our forbearance did not imply any approbation of this conduct. Persuaded, however, that they did not intend by this to countenance any thing they judged to be contrary to the mind of Christ, we deemed it our duty to forbear, in the hope that that Saviour whom we trusted it was their supreme desire to serve and to please, would grant us the happiness of being like him led in this, as in our other views of promoting the honour of his adored name."

The Circus church, thus constituted, observed the Lord's Supper regularly once a-month, until the year 1802, when it adopted weekly communion. Churches on the same footing were about that time formed in Glasgow, Paisley, and Aberdeen. It is an interesting fact, that a number of the Congregational churches which arose in different parts of the country had their origin in prayer and fellowship meetings; while others were chiefly composed of those who had been brought to the knowledge of the truth by the labours of itinerant preachers. Before the close of the year 1800, nine other churches had been formed in different parts of the country, making in all fourteen.

The Society, from which under God all this Christian activity and zeal had originated, continued to prosecute its useful labours until 1807, when, having accomplished to a large extent the object of its formation, it dissolved. While it existed, this association was instrumental in doing much to promote the cause of God in Scotland. No means were left untried by which God might be glorified, and his kingdom advanced. Village preaching was actively prosecuted by the Society; those individuals in the larger churches whose piety and gifts were likely to render them useful, were encouraged to go on Sabbath evenings to the neighbouring villages and preach the gospel to the people. Ministers were sent out to itinerate in all directions, and there being some difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of labourers in this department, seminaries were established for educating pious young men to do the work of evangelists. It was in the early days of Congregationalism that Sabbath evening schools began in Scotland, and their most active and zealous promoters were Congregationalists. Animated by the most disinterested motives, and by an earnest love to the souls of men, the labours of the itinerants were so successful, that in the interval between 1798 and 1807, no fewer than eighty-five churches were formed, and had pastors ordained over them. And it was a pleasing feature in the character of these churches, that from their very commencement they appear to have been actuated by a missionary spirit, not only seeking to advance the cause of Christ among their own countrymen at home, but also among the heathen abroad. This zeal, however, in behalf of foreign missions, received a check in 1807, and from that year till 1812 the exertions of the churches in the same good cause were feeble, and since this latter period the Scottish Congregationalists have confined their labours in this department to an active support of Missionary Societies. For nine years from the date of the first formation of a Congregationalist church in Scotland, the cause made the most rapid and satisfactory progress. But in 1807, seeds of dissension were unhappily sown in some of the churches, which gave rise to the keenest controversy on church principles, rights, and privileges. The circumstance which thus led to a state of things so much to be deplored, was the circulation among the churches of Ballantyne's Treatise on the Elder's Office. The churches, though still in their infancy, were now embarrassed and weakened. "The new order of things," says Mr. Kinniburgh, "recommended for the adoption of the churches, spread rapidly among them. Bitter contentions, strife of words, jealousies, and divisions followed, of which none but such as passed through the painful scenes of those days can have an adequate idea. Inexperienced rashness adopted the new views. Anarchy prevailed in the churches, and in some cases a beautiful fabric became a shattered ruin. The pious of other bodies, who were inclined to favour our system, shrank with sorrow and alarm, from what appeared to them so disastrous an experiment of Congregational principles. Thus many stumbling-blocks were laid in the way, both of Christians and unbelievers."

The consequences of this unhappy commotion, at so early a stage in the history of Scottish Congregationalism, could not fail seriously to damage the cause. Many of the churches were poor, and had no small difficulty in supporting their pastors, but now that the members were divided in sentiment, their pecuniary resources were thereby so much diminished, that some of the pastors were under the necessity of retiring from the work, while others who remained were subjected to the most distressing privations. The seminary which had been established for the supply of preachers was broken up. This loss, however, was in course of time repaired, by the formation in 1811 of the Glasgow Theological Academy, which has done much to advance the prosperity of the body to which it belongs. To assist the churches in supporting their pastors, the Congregational Union was formed in 1812, which has sustained and invigorated to no small extent the energies of churches which might otherwise have dwindled and died away. The Congregational

Union is in fact a Home Missionary Society. The churches of the body have now increased to nearly two hundred, but of these a large number require and receive aid from the Union. The number of sittings in the churches of the Congregationalist body in Scotland, amount, according to the returns of the last census in 1851, to 76,342, and the number of churches to 192.

CONGREGATIONAL UNION, a delegated conference of ministers and members of Congregational churches in England and Wales, formed in 1831, which meets twice a-year for consultation on the state and prospects of the body, and for such measures of co-operation as can be safely adopted without violating the principles of Independency. In its very constitution, indeed, provision is expressly made that the Union "shall not in any case assume a legislative authority, or become a court of appeal." The objects of this Union are fully set forth in its constitution, as revised by the twenty-second Annual Assembly 1852, and are described in these terms :

"1. To promote evangelical religion in connexion with the Congregational Denomination.

"2. To cultivate brotherly affection and sincere co-operation in everything relating to the interests of the associated Churches.

"3. To establish fraternal correspondence with Congregational Churches, and other bodies of Christians, throughout the world.

"4. To address, as occasion may require, a letter to the associated Churches, accompanied with such information as may be deemed necessary.

"5. To obtain accurate statistical information relative to the Congregational churches throughout the kingdom, and the world at large.

"6. To inquire into the present methods of collecting funds for the erection of places of worship, and to consider the practicability of introducing any improved plan.

"7. To assist in maintaining and enlarging the civil rights of Protestant Dissenters."

Among the Scottish Congregationalists, a Union was formed so far back as 1812, which directs its efforts chiefly to the support of weak churches, aiding them with its funds, as well as encouraging with its advice when required. But in Scotland, as in England, the Union conducts its operations in such a way as to infringe in no respect on the principle of Independency, which forms the characteristic feature of the Congregationalist body. All such Unions, both in Britain and America, are merely advisory bodies, composed of delegates from the various churches within certain local limits. As an American writer remarks, "They are, so to speak, a kind of congress, where the representatives of independent churches meet to consult with each other respecting matters of general interest. But they become parties to no articles of union which make the decisions of their representatives thus convened of binding authority. Each church is at liberty to accept or reject their decisions. As the judgments of impartial, wise, and good men, they will deservedly have great influence with all who are unprejudiced; but they are merely recommendations, not laws." Among the Congregational churches in the United States, councils are of different kinds, sometimes mutual, sometimes ex parte, and sometimes standing or permanent. A mutual council, as the term denotes, is one called by the consent of both parties, while an ex parte council is one which either party in the dispute may call without the concurrence of the other. These councils are usually composed of the pastor, and a lay delegate from each of the neighbouring churches; the disputing parties, by letters missive, designating the churches whose counsel they desire, and each of the churches thus addressed electing its own delegate. Standing or permanent councils are almost entirely confined to Connecticut. By the "Saybrook Platform," agreed to in 1708, all the churches are associated for mutual assistance in their ecclesiastical concerns. The pastors and churches of a county usually meet in an association; and all cases requiring counsel and advice are brought before this body. Though a question has sometimes been started as to the finality of the decisions of these associations or unions, the American churches practically regard them as such. If a church should refuse to follow the advice of a council thus convened, and the state of the church should be such as to warrant it, the other churches would withdraw their fellowship from it. A step so strong, however, is only taken when the offences of a church are so aggravated as to prevent it from being any longer recognized as a Christian church. So recently as 1854, a Congregational Union for the whole body of Congregationalist churches in the United States of America has been formed, which is rapidly acquiring the confidence of the churches, and is likely greatly to advance the interests of Congregationalism in the land of the Pilgrim Fathers.

The Evangelical churches of France, which are formed on independent and voluntary principles, formed a Synod or Union in 1849, which consists already of twenty-five associated churches, consisting of upwards of 1,800 members. It is a fundamental article of their constitution, that no church shall be received into the Union that receives State pay or control. The objects of the Union are to promote mutual encouragement and co-operation in all matters relating to the interests of their churches, the promotion of religious liberty, and the extension of religion throughout the empire. The Union raises funds for assisting the poorer churches to support their pastors, and has besides a specific Committee of Evangelization for the purpose of disseminating the gospel in districts where ministers cannot be sustained. In all, there are believed to be about one hundred churches in France, with as many pastors that repudiate in principle or in practice all dependence on the State, and hence are called Independent churches. The Union of the Evangelical Churches of France resembles more nearly in principle and object the Congregational Union of Scotland than that of England and Wales.

CONGRUITY, a term used to express the opinion of the SCOTISTS (which see), or followers of Duns Scotus, one of the most eminent of the schoolmen, on the subject of human merit. They held that it is possible for man in his natural state so to live as to deserve the grace of God, by which he may be enabled to obtain salvation; this natural fitness for grace, or congruity, as they were wont to term it, being such as to oblige the Deity to grant it. Thus the Scotists were wont to speak of the merit of congruity in opposition to the Thomists, who spoke of the merit of CONDIGNITY (which see).

CONISALUS, an ancient Pagan deity adored by the Athenians. He seems to have been of an inferior order of demons in the train of Priapus, with which god he is sometimes confounded.

CONIUS, a surname of Zeus, as the god who raises dust, under which name he had an uncovered temple in the citadel of Megara.

CONONITES, a Christian sect of the sixth century, deriving its name from its leader, Conon, bishop of Tarsus. It was properly an offshoot from the sect of the PHILOPONISTS (which see), with which it agreed in regard to the constitution of the Godhead, but differed from it respecting the explanation of the doctrine concerning the resurrection of the body. The Cononites on this latter point held that the matter only, and not the form, of bodies was corruptible, and to be resuscitated.

CONSECRATION, the act of solemnly dedicating or setting apart any person or thing for a religious purpose.

CONSECRATION OF A BISHOP. See BISHOP.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES. See DEDICATION OF CHURCHES.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHYARDS. See CEMETERY.

CONSECRATION OF CHRISM. See CHRISM.
CONSECRATION OF ELEMENTS. See LORD'S SUPPER.

CONSECRATION OF THE TEMPLE. See TEMPLE.

CONSENSUS OF SANDOMIR, a union of the three great Protestant bodies in Poland in the sixteenth century. Many both of the nobles and common people wishing to remove the scandal caused by the dissensions among the Protestants, which were very injurious to their cause, proposed a meeting of the principal churches, the Bohemian Brethren, the Lutherans, and the Swiss. The town of Sandomir was chosen for the assembly of a synod, destined to accomplish the great work of the union it met accordingly in 1570. This synod was composed of several influential noblemen belonging to the different Protestant confessions, and the leading ministers of those confessions. After much debate, the union was finally concluded and signed on the 14th April 1570. The terms of the confederation were comprehended in a confession, which is usually called the Agreement of Sandomir. This compromise, which was expressed in intentionally vague language, was not long after opposed by many of the Lutherans, and in the next century was entirely abrogated.

CONSENTES DII, the twelve Etruscan divinities, who were said to form the council of Jupiter. Six of them were male, and six female. The Etruscan mythology recognized them as governing the world and time, but destined only to be of temporary duration. They received also the name of Complices, and were called Consentientes, because they had the privilege of giving their consent to the deliberations of the gods. They were regarded as presiding each of them over a separate month of the year. It is not likely that these deities were identical with the twelve Dii Majores, or great gods of the ancient Romans.

CONSESSUS CLERI, a name given by Cyprian to the altar-part of the ancient Christian churches within the rails, where none but the clergy were allowed to enter. See BEMA.

CONSESSUS PRESBYTERORUM, the seats of the presbyters in the ancient Christian churches, which were ranged in a semicircle on either side of the bishop. See CHURCHES.

CONSISTENTES (Lat. co-standers), an order of penitents in the early Christian church, who derived their name from being allowed to stay and hear the prayers of the church after the catechumens and other penitents were dismissed, but they were not allowed to make their oblations, nor partake of the eucharist with them. It is uncertain whether they were permitted to remain as spectators of the sacramental service. Penitents remained in this class for the space of two years. See PENITENTS.

CONSISTORIES, civil courts of judicature among the ancient Jews, inferior to the SANHEDRIM (which see). There was a consistory of twenty-three judges appointed in almost every city of any note, who sat in judgment upon the lives and fortunes of the people, and decided causes of nearly all kinds. There were two of these lesser courts in Jerusalem, the one in the gate of Shushan, and the other in the gate of Nicanor. A consistory of twenty-three was appointed wherever there were a hundred and twenty men in the city qualified to bear office. The members of the sanhedrim were taken from these inferior courts. These consistories always sat in the gates of the cities. Their sessions began after morning prayers, and continued till the end of the sixth hour, that is, till twelve o'clock of our time. The authority of these courts was exerted in many towns of Palestine after Jerusalem was destroyed. Josephus speaks of a court of judicature in every city, consisting of seven judges, each of whom had two of the tribe of Levi to assist him; who, with a president and deputy, made up the number of twenty-three. There was a still lower consistory, consisting of three judges, set up in small villages which did not contain a hundred and twenty householders. Their office was to determine about matters which concerned money, rights of inheritance, and division of lands, borrowing, stealing, damages, restitution, and other matters of lesser importance. They had no authority in capital cases, but they had the power of scourging, and inflicting other penalties as the case required. All Jews were under the jurisdiction of these courts, and the proselytes of righteousness had the privilege of being judged by them.

CONSISTORY, an ecclesiastical court in many Protestant churches, identical with a Kirk-Session, a court comprising the minister or ministers and elders, in some cases also the deacons. It has the charge of all that relates to public worship, Christian instruction, and the superintendence of the members of the congregation. In the Lutheran churches in Germany, there is a court called a consistory, which consists of the general superintendent or inspecting clergyman, several other clergymen, and one or more laymen. One of the laymen usually presides, who represents the sovereign, and who is versed in the knowledge both of civil and ecclesiastical law, as appointed by the statutes of the realm to govern and direct the affairs of the church. If the district be so large that one consistory is not sufficient for the direction of its ecclesiastical affairs, there are several established in different parts of the country, either immediately under the control of the sovereign, or dependent on the supreme consistory of the capital. All important decrees of every consistory must be communicated to the sovereign, to be ratified by him, and to be issued under his name. In Sweden there are twelve regular diocesan consistories, a court consistory, a consistory for each of the two universities, and another, which is a privilege of the city of Holm. In the Reformed church of Geneva, the consistory is composed of all the pastors of the republic and twelve laymen. The pastors are perpetual members of this court, but the laymen are chosen only for six years. In the Church of England every bishop has his consistory court, which is held before his chancellor or commissary in his cathedral church, or other convenient place in his diocese for ecclesiastical causes. The bishop's chancellor is the judge of this court, supposed to be skilled in the civil and canon law; and in places of the diocese far remote from the bishop's consistory, the bishop appoints a commissary to judge in all causes within a certain district, and a register to enter his decrees, &c. Consistory at Rome, denotes the college of cardinals, or the pope's senate and council, before whom judiciary causes are pleaded, and all political affairs of importance, the election of bishops, archbishops, &c. are transacted. There is the ordinary consistory, which the pope assembles every week in the papal palace, and the extraordinary, or secret consistories, called together on special and important occasions.

CONSOLAMENTUM, a term used by the CATHARISTS (which see) in the twelfth century, to designate the spiritual baptism by which a believer entered into fellowship with the Spirit. This baptism of the Spirit, or true baptism, they held should be performed by the imposition of hands in connection with prayer. The consolamentum appears to have been twofold, (1.) The rite of initiation, by which an individual was received into the communion of the sect, and adopted into the number of believers. (2.) The rite by which he was received into the circle of the fully initiated. The term consolamentum was also applied to the rite among the Catharists, by which a man who had hitherto belonged to the believers, was on his death-bed received into the more limited circle of the sect, so as to be prepared to enter at death into the heavenly world. The consolamentum is said by Neander to have been performed in the following manner: "They assembled in a room dark and closed on all sides, but illuminated by a large number of lights affixed to the walls. Then the new candidate was placed in the centre, where the presiding officer of the sect laid a book, probably the Gospel of St. John, on his head, and gave him the imposition of hands, at the same time reciting the Lord's Prayer." They ascribed a magical efficacy to the consolamentum, and viewed it as absolutely indispensable to a due preparation for the fellowship of heaven.

CONSOLATI, a name applied among the Cathari, in the twelfth century, to those who had received the CONSOLAMENTUM (which see), and who, being admitted among the fully initiated, were considered as perfect.

CONSTANTINE (FESTIVAL OF ST.), held by the Greek church in honour of Constantine the Great and the Empress Helena, on the 20th May.

CONSTITUTION, a decree of the Pope in matters of doctrine. In France this name has been applied by way of eminence to the famous BULL UNIGENITUS (which see).

CONSUBSTANTIAL (Lat. con, together, and substantia, substance), a word denoting of the same essence or substance with another. It answers to the Greek word Homoousion, which was so frequently used in the Arian controversy, and which so long and so keenly agitated the Christian church in the fourth century. The word, both in its Greek and Latin form, was employed to signify that the Son was of the same substance or essence with the Father. See ARIANS, HOMOOUSSION.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, a term used to signify the doctrine held by the Lutheran church, that the substance of the body and blood of Christ is present in, with, or under the substance of the elements in the Lord's Supper. It differs widely from the doctrine of the Church of Rome, known by the name of transubstantiation. Romanists allege that when the officiating priest utters the words, "This is my body," at that moment the substance of the bread and wine is annihilated, and only the accidents remain. Lutherans, on the other hand, declare that the nature of the elements remains unchanged, but that in some mysterious way the human nature of Christ is conjoined with them. In first propounding this doctrine, Luther endeavoured to support it by referring to the Scriptural statement, that Christ is at the right hand of God, and he argued that the right hand of God being everywhere, the human nature of Christ might readily be believed to be present in and with the consecrated elements in the eucharist. This argument the Reformer afterwards abandoned as untenable. Some of Luther's followers, however, maintained the ubiquity of the human nature of Christ, supporting it by an appeal to the Almighty power of God, which, as it could accomplish anything, could of course impart omnipresence to the body of the Redeemer. But the answer to such an appeal is obvious. It is no derogation from the fulness and completeness of the Divine power to say that it cannot do what is in itself a contradiction. It is of the very nature of body to occupy a definite limited space, and if God therefore were to make the body of Christ omnipresent, its very essential nature would be destroyed; it would cease to be a body. Some of the Lutherans feeling that this objection to their doctrine is insuperable, endeavour to escape from the difficulty by assigning to the body of Christ a double presence, the one circumscribed and local, the other heavenly, supernatural, and divine. But no such distinction is warranted by the Word of God, and has been obviously devised merely to serve a purpose. If the human nature of Christ have a local presence, it cannot be ubiquitous, and if it have ubiquity, it cannot be confined to a place. The two are contradictory and mutually destructive. The doctrine which Scripture teaches on this mysterious subject obviously is, that the two natures of Christ, though hypostatically united, continue distinct; that each of the natures retains its peculiar qualities or attributes; that omnipresence, as well as omnipotence and omniscience, belong to him only as God, and are attributes of his Divine nature exclusively, no Divine attributes being predicable of the human nature, without confounding the Creator with the creature, God with man.

On this distinctive tenet of the Lutheran church,

Dr. Dick, in his Theological Lectures, remarks. "Consubstantiation is liable to many of the same objections which may be advanced against transubstantiation. It supposes the body of Christ to be at the same time in heaven and on earth, in Europe and in America; it supposes it to be in a state of glory, and in a state of humiliation; it supposes it to be present, and yet to be imperceptible to any of our senses, and therefore to be present after the manner of a spirit; it supposes it to be taken into the mouths of the communicants, and chewed, and swallowed, and digested; it supposes that at the last supper, Christ sat at table with his disciples, and was at the same time in the bread; that he held himself in his hand, and then transferred himself from his own hand into the hands of the Apostles; and that while they saw him at some distance from them, he was in their mouths. How strong is the power of prejudice, which can make any man believe, or imagine that he believes such absurdities! After this, there is nothing so monstrous and incredible which he might not be prevailed upon to acknowledge, if he were first persuaded that it is taught in the Scriptures.

"That consubstantiation is not taught in the Scriptures, might be proved by all the arguments which have been adduced to show, that the literal interpretation of the words, 'This is my body,' 'This is my blood,' is false. It deserves attention, that the interpretation of the Lutheran church is more forced and unnatural than that of the Romish church. The Papist, suspecting no figure in the case, with childish simplicity takes the words as they stand, 'this bread is my body,' and believes that the one is miraculously changed into the other. The Lutheran employs some thought, and exercises a little ingenuity, and finds that the words signify, not 'This bread is my body,' but 'This bread contains my body.' By what law does he deviate from the strict interpretation? Where does he find, that the verb of existence is, signifies in, with, or under? Not in any of the canons of criticism, but in the necessity of his system, which cannot be supported without this explanation. Hence it is evident, that the Papist has the advantage of the Lutheran; and that, if the words are to be literally understood, they favour transubstantiation, and consubstantiation is founded on a perversion of them. Both doctrines are contrary to Scripture, as well as to reason and common sense; but that of Lutherans offers more direct violence to the words of inspiration."

The doctrine of consubstantiation was held by some divines long before the time of Luther. Thus in the eleventh century, it seems to have been maintained by Berengarius and his followers (see BERENGARIANS). But when Luther assailed the corruptions of the Romish church in the sixteenth century, while he had no hesitation in declaring the doctrine of transubstantiation to be unscriptural and absurd, he could not r'd himself altogether of the idea of a real bodily presence in the eucharist. The tenth article of the Augsburg Confession, accordingly, which was adopted as a standard of faith by the whole body of Lutheran Protestants, was made to run in these terms: "That the real body and blood of Christ are truly present in the eucharist, under the elements of the bread and wine, and are distributed and received." These words mildly, yet explicitly, declared the doctrine of consubstantiation, and accordingly, the Zuinglians or Reformed found themselves unable to subscribe the Augsburg Confession. Hence the imperial cities of Strasburg, Constance, Lindau, and Memmingen, substituted for it a separate confession, known by the name of the Confessio Tetrapolitana, or Confession of the Four Cities, which differed from the Augsburg Confession only on the point of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, which they maintained to be spiritual, not corporeal. This confession of the Four Cities was drawn up by Martin Bucer, but the adherence to it was only temporary, for the Four Cities, after a time, subscribed the Augsburg Confession, and became a part of the Lutheran church.

CONSUS, an ancient Roman deity, often alleged to belong to the infernal gods. Romulus is said to have found an altar of Consus buried in the earth, and in his anxiety to obtain wives for his subjects, to have vowed that he would establish a festival in honour of this unknown divinity, and that he would offer sacrifices to him if he should succeed in obtaining wives. Hence the consualia (see next article) was established.

CONSUALIA, a festival with games, celebrated by the ancient Romans, in honour of Consus, the god of secret deliberations. It was observed annually, and on the occasion a symbolical ceremony was gone through in the circus, in which an altar buried in the earth, was uncovered. The festival of the consualia was kept on the 21st April, with horse and chariot races, and libations poured into the flames which consumed the sacrifices. It was during the first celebration of this festival that the Sabine women are said to have been carried off. Virgil alleges that this event took place during the Circensian games, which may possibly have superseded the ancient consualia.

CONSULTER WITH FAMILIAR SPIRITS, a kind of soothsayers among the ancient Hebrews. It is rendered by the Septuagint one who speaks out of his belly, or as it is termed in modern times, a ventriloquist. Such a person was imagined to have immediate and direct communication with the devil. The word used in the original Hebrew signifies a bottle, or hollow vessel, sorcerers and wizards being accustomed to speak as if from within a hollow space. So the witch of Endor is called literally in 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, the mistress of the bottle. In one passage indeed, the Septuagint translate the word by the phrase "speaking out of the earth," still referring to the hollow sound. This practice seems to have prevailed for a long period, as we find a Pytho-ness spoken of in the Acts of the Apostles.

CONTACIUM, a name given to the ritual of the Greek church.

CONTINENTES, equivalent to ASCETICS (which see).

CONTRACTS. The mode of ratifying bargains and contracts differs among different nations. Among the ancient Hebrews the simple form was followed of joining hands. Thus the prophet Ezekiel, xvii. 18, speaking of Pharaoh king of Egypt, says, "Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when, lo, he had given his hand, and hath done all these things, he shall not escape." A similar custom still prevails in some parts of the East. Thus the Hindus confirm an engagement by one person laying his right hand upon that of the other. In the Old Testament, we find it recorded, that in early times a contract was established by erecting a heap of stones, to which a particular name was given. Sometimes this was done, as in the case of the covenant between Abraham and Abimelech, king of Gerar, by the oath of both parties. On the same occasion also a gift was presented by Abraham to the king, and a name was given to the well which had occasioned the transaction. We are informed besides that Isaac and Abimelech celebrated festivities on concluding their covenant. A practice of this kind appears to have been followed in some heathen nations. The Scythians are said to have first poured wine into an earthen vessel, and then the contracting parties cutting their arms with a knife, let some of the blood run into the wine, with which they stained their armour; after which the parties, along with the other persons present, drank of the mixture, uttering the most dreadful curses upon the person who should violate the treaty. Another mode of ratifying a contract is referred to in 1 Sam. xviii. 4, "And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." In Num. xviii. 19, a covenant or engagement is mentioned by the name of a "covenant of salt." Now salt being a symbol of perpetuity, the expression obviously denotes an enduring, a perpetual covenant, being borrowed from the practice of ratifying federal engagements by salt. It is well known, that at this day, the Asiatics consider eating together as a symbol of perpetual friendship, and salt being a common article with them at all meals, it is not improbable that from this circumstance may be derived the expression "a covenant of salt," the contracting parties, by eating in company, being thus bound together in a league of solemn and indissoluble friendship.

From very ancient times contracts have been usually made, and all bargains of importance effected, at the gate of the city, as the chief place of public concourse, and in some mercantile transactions it was customary to pluck off the shoe at the gate of the city, in the presence of the elders and other wis nesses, and to hand it over to the purchaser. A case of the disposal and transfer of property in remote antiquity occurs in Jer. xxxii. 10—15, "And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and that which was open: and I gave the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison. And I charged Baruch before them, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land." From these words it is evident that the documents were buried in an earthen vessel, that they might be kept in safe preservation, to be produced at any future time as an evidence of purchase. We have no precise information as to the manner in which written engagements were cancelled. It has sometimes been alleged, that this was effected by blotting them out, or by drawing a line across them, or by striking them through with a nail.

CONTRA - REMONSTRANTS. See CALVINISTS.

CONTRITION, a necessary part of true repentance. It consists of a deep conviction of, and humiliation for, sin, a pungent sorrow for sin, an ingenuous confession of it, and earnest prayer for deliverance from it. Among the Roman Catholics it constitutes one of the three parts of PENANCE (which see) in the matter of the sacrament.

CONVENT. See ABBEY, MONASTERY.

CONVENTICLE, a private assembly or meeting for religious purposes. It is used by some ancient Christian writers, for example, Lactantius and Arnobius, to signify a church. It was first applied as a term of reproach to the assemblies held by the followers of Wycliffe in England, and afterwards to the meetings of the Non-conformists generally.

CONVENTICLE ACT, an act which passed the Parliament of England in 1663, according to which any meeting for religious worship in a private house, at which five persons beside the family were present, was declared a conventicle, and every person above sixteen years of age who was present, was pronounced liable to a fine of five pounds, or three months' imprisonment for the first offence; six months, or twenty pounds for the second; and for the third, transportation for life to any plantation except New England, or to pay a hundred pounds. The same act was also carried through the Scottish Parliament by a large majority. This act, which was followed by another of the same kind in 1670, led to severe persecution of the Non-conformists in both ends of the island.

CONVENTION (GENERAL), an assembly of clerical and lay deputies belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, which meets regularly for the discussion of its ecclesiastical concerns. The first meeting of this body was held in Philadelphia in 1785. It met in the following year, but after that triennially. In 1789, the convention was distributed into two houses, the house of bishops, and the house of clerical and lay deputies, who were to vote by orders when required. It was at this meeting that the constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church was arranged. Besides the general convention, every state or diocese has a convention of its own to regulate its local concerns. The house of bishops has a right to originate measures for the concurrence of the house of delegates, composed of clergy and laity; and when any proposed act passes the house of delegates, it is transmitted to the house of bishops, who have a negative on the same. The church is governed by canons framed by this assembly, regulating the election of bishops, declaring the qualifications necessary for obtaining the orders of deacon or priest, appointing the studies to be previously pursued, the examinations which are to be made, and the age which it is necessary for candidates to attain before they can be admitted to the three grades of the ministry, bishops, priests, and deacons. The triennial meetings of the general convention are held in one of the larger cities of the Union, for the most part in New York and Philadelphia, alternately. The house of bishops numbers rather more than thirty. It sits with closed doors, and is presided over by the senior bishop. The house of clerical and lay deputies is composed of an equal number of presbyters and lay delegates from all the dioceses, none being allowed to send more than four of each order. This house holds its deliberations in open church, the public being freely admitted. The concurrence of both houses is necessary to the enactment of a law. The vote is counted by dioceses, and the house of bishops has a veto upon the acts of the lower house. See EPISCOPAL (PROTESTANT) CHURCH OF AMERICA.

CONVENTUAL BRETHERN, one of the two large divisions into which the Franciscan order of the Romish church was split in the fourteenth century. It includes those who have deviated most from the literal sense of the rule of the founder, and who adopt the interpretation of it by the pontiffs. Clement XIV., in his bull for suppressing the order of Jesuits, mentions the congregation of the Reformed Conventual Brethren, which Sixtus V. approved, but which Urban VIII. abolished in 1626, because "they did not yield spiritual fruits to the church of God." Constant quarrels had arisen between the Reformed and the Unreformed Conventual Brethren; and the Pope allowed them to go over to the Capuchin Brethren of St. Francis, or to the Observant Franciscans.

CONVERTED BRETHERN. See GRANDIMONTANS (ORDER OF).

CONVOCAATION, an assembly of the bishops and clergy of the Church of England, to consult upon matters ecclesiastical. It consists of two separate houses, the upper house composed of the archbishops and bishops, and the lower house in which all the other clergy are represented by their deputies. At the meeting of Parliament the Crown issues a writ summoning the convocation to assemble in the provinces of Canterbury and York. The clergymen composing the lower house, who are usually called proctors, are chosen by the votes of the parochial clergy, to represent them in the deliberations of this ecclesiastical parliament. The proceedings of convocation are opened by the archbishop of the province, after which a prolocutor is chosen to act as president. The convocation in the province of York assembles in York cathedral, while that of the province of Canterbury meets in St. Paul's cathedral, or in the Jerusalem chamber adjoining Westminster Abbey. The two convocations are quite independent of one another, though they have sometimes been found to act in concert. Since the Reformation, the most important ecclesiastical matters have been left in the hands of the convocation of Canterbury, while that of York has very rarely originated any measure of importance.

The mode of electing the proctors of the clergy to attend the meetings of convocation varies in different places throughout England. Only rectors, vicars, and perpetual curates are allowed to vote for them. A few of the varieties which prevail in the election of these representatives of the clergy, are thus noticed by Mr. Marsden: "In the diocese of London, each archdeaconry chooses two, and from the whole number so chosen, the bishop selects two to attend the convocation. In Sarum, the three archdeacons choose six, and the six make a selection of two of their own number; and the same method is adopted in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. In Bath and Wells, all the incumbents choose their proctors jointly. In Lincoln, the clergy of the six archdeaconries send commissioners to Stamford, who make the necessary choice of two persons. In Norwich, the two archdeaconries of Norwich and Norfolk meet and choose one, and the archdeaconries of Suffolk and Sudbury choose the other. The same is the case in Chichester. In ancient times the clergy were represented in convocation by the archdeacons. Such is the mode of choosing proctors in the province of Canterbury. In the province of York two proctors are returned by each archdeaconry. Were it not so, the numbers would be too small for the transaction of business."

The royal license is indispensable to the meeting of convocation. Were the archbishop to summon an assembly without the command of the sovereign, he would be liable to a præmunire, and the proceedings of the assembly thus illegally summoned would be completely void. An enactment to this effect, commonly called the Act of Submission, was passed in the reign of Henry VIII. It runs in these terms: "Whereas the king's humble and obedient subjects, the clergy of this realm of England, have not only acknowledged according to the truth, that the convocation of the same clergy is, always hath been, and ought to be assembled only by the king's writ; but also submitting themselves to the king's majesty, have promised in verbo sacerdotii that they will never from henceforth presume to attempt, allege, claim, or put in use, enact, promulge, or execute any new canons, constitutions, ordinances, provincial, or other, or by whatsoever name they shall be called, in the convocation, unless the king's most royal assent and license may to them be had, to make, promulge, and execute the same, and that his majesty do give his most royal assent and authority in that behalf: it is therefore enacted, according to the said submission, that they, nor any of them, shall presume to attempt, allege, claim, or put in use any constitutions or ordinances provincial, by whatsoever name or names they may be called, in their convocations in time coming (which shall always be assembled by authority of the king's writ); unless the same clergy may have the king's most royal assent and license, to make, promulge, and execute such canons, constitutions and ordinances provincial or synodal; upon pain of every one of the said clergy doing contrary to this act, and being thereof convict, to suffer imprisonment, and make fine at the king's will."

Upon this statute various regulations followed, which were designed to restrict the operations of convocation within certain limits. These, as stated by Dr. Hook, were as follows: "1. That a convocation cannot assemble at their convocation, without the assent of the king. 2. That after their assembly they cannot confer, to constitute any canons without licence of the king. 3. When they upon conference conclude any canons, yet they cannot execute any of their canons without the royal assent. 4. That they cannot execute any after the royal assent, but with these four limitations:—(1.) that they be not against the prerogative of the king; nor (2.) against the common law; nor (3.) against the statute law; nor (4.) against any custom of the realm."

The powers of convocation are extensive. They may correct and depose offenders; examine and censure heretical works; and with the royal license they can make and publish canons, alter the liturgy, and in short, their powers extend to all ecclesiastical matters whatever. While convocation is sitting its members are protected from arrest. This clerical assembly has ceased since 1717 to possess the powers of a synod, in consequence of the royal license being withheld. Though an ecclesiastical court, it is so completely under the control of the sovereign.

that it cannot hold its meetings without a writ from the crown, it cannot decree canons without a license from the crown, nor publish them until they receive the royal confirmation. The writ is regularly issued along with the writ for the summoning of parliament, but the royal license not being given, the meetings of convocation are little more than an empty form. But while it cannot pass canons without the license of the sovereign, it has the power of refusing its assent to measures proposed by the crown. The Act of Submission passed in the reign of Henry VIII., was repealed in the reign of Philip and Mary, and restored by the parliament of Elizabeth, since which time it has continued in force down to the present day. While, therefore, the convocation assembles in both provinces regularly at the same time with the meeting of parliament, its business is limited to the voting an address to the crown, without having the power of passing a single act, however beneficial to the church which it represents. Nay, so completely fettered is this ecclesiastical assembly, that they have not even the power of adjournment, so that should their deliberations be protracted beyond the first day, the archbishop not being able to adjourn the meeting, prorogues it. The question has even been started, whether the law sanctions the archbishop in proroguing the convocation, or whether such an authority does not belong legally to the bishops of the province. But whatever doubts some may entertain upon the subject, the archbishops continue to claim and exercise the right on receiving a writ from the crown, which is regularly issued at the prorogation of parliament; and during its deliberations, the archbishop, by his own authority, prorogues the convocation from time to time, until the address to the crown has been adopted by both houses. Motions may be made, committees may be appointed for the consideration of special points, but all such steps are of no force so long as the Crown withholds its license. The High Church party of the Church of England have for some time past been earnest in their endeavours to procure from the Crown the restoration of the power of synodical action to the convocation, but it appears highly probable that this power will remain in abeyance for a long time to come. If ever restored, the introduction of the lay element will be absolutely necessary, and even the clerical franchise, if we may so speak, must be extended, that the proctors may represent the whole body of the clergy. But even with these amendments in the constitution of the convocation, the danger of reviving its dormant powers would be, that in the course of legislation occasional collisions of a very serious kind with the civil government of the country would be almost inevitable, leading to results the most disastrous both to the church and to the commonwealth. See ENGLAND (CHURCH OF).

CONVULSIONISTS, a party of fanatics belonging to the Romish church in France, who professed to be thrown into convulsive fits, from which, as they alleged, they were miraculously cured at the tomb of the Abbe Paris, a celebrated zealot among the Jansenists in the early part of the eighteenth century. The name came to be applied to those who among the French Romanists wrought themselves up to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, their bodies becoming agitated and convulsed, throwing themselves into the most violent contortions of body, rolling about on the ground, and at length falling into a swoon, during which they received visions and revelations of the most wonderful kind. Such scenes occasionally present themselves at this day in the rural districts of France, where they are too often rendered subservient to the interests of a blind superstition.

COPE, a clerical vestment. It was at first a common dress, being a coat without sleeves, but was afterwards used as an ecclesiastical habit. It reaches from the neck nearly to the feet, and is open in front, except at the top where it is united by a band or clasp. According to the canons of the Church of England, the clergy ought to wear this garment at the communion service or other great solemnities, but it has gradually fallen into disuse, being scarcely ever worn unless on very special occasions. The Greeks pretend it was first used in memory of the mock robe put upon our Saviour.

COPIATÆ, inferior officers of the ancient Christian church, who performed the duties of undertakers, grave-diggers, sextons. These were intrusted with the care of funerals, and the burial of the dead. They are said to have been first instituted at Constantinople by Constantine the Great, and to have been further organized and established by the Emperor Anastasius. They have sometimes been termed fossarii, from digging of graves, and in Justinian's Novels they are called Lecticarii, from carrying the corpse or bier at funerals. They are frequently mentioned by ancient authors as ecclesiastical office-bearers. When Constantine first instituted the office, he incorporated a body of men to the number of eleven hundred in Constantinople, to whom he gave the name of Copiatæ, and who, besides seeing that all persons had a decent and honourable interment, were especially required gratuitously to perform this last office to the poor. This class of officers was partly supported out of the common stock of the church.

COPINISTS, a sect of UNIVERSALISTS (which see) who denied the resurrection of the body.

COPTIC CHURCH, the ancient Christian church of Egypt. They hold the Monophysite doctrine, that Christ was not possessed of two distinct natures, but of only one, the human nature being amalgamated with, and absorbed in, the Divine. A controversy on this subject violently distracted the Christian church in Egypt during the fifth and sixth centuries, and at that period the Eutychian or Monophysite tenets, which were condemned by the general council of Chalcedon, were embraced by the whole Coptic nation, as well as by the Abyssinians and Nubians, the sect receiving the general appellation of Jacobites. So keen was the enmity which arose between those who adhered to the Monophysite tenets, and the Christians of the Greek orthodox church, that they never intermarried, and to rid themselves of their opponents, the Copts favoured the invasion of Egypt by the Moslem Arabs, and united with them in expelling the Greeks. The change of rulers, however, far from delivering them from persecution, only brought upon them still more severe and protracted troubles. Worn out with harassing oppressions of various kinds, they rose at length against their Moslem tyrants, but were speedily subdued, and many of them slain. For many successive centuries the Copts were treated with the utmost cruelty, and subjected to the most painful degradation. In the ninth century, they were compelled to wear garments and turbans of a deep colour, and to carry a wooden cross of the weight of five pounds suspended from the neck. In the thirteenth century, another severe persecution took place, in which all their principal churches throughout Egypt were destroyed, and they were ordered to wear a blue turban, as they generally do at present. Ground to the dust by cruel oppression, many of them apostatized from the Christian faith, and embraced the religion of the Koran, their churches being converted into mosques. The consequence is, that the numbers of the Copts are now greatly reduced, for while the Arabic historian Makrizis estimates their number at about two millions at the time of the invasion of Egypt by the Arabs, Dr. Bowring mentions that a few years ago the Patriarch informed him, that he calculated the number of the Copts at 150,000, and although this is probably below the mark, they cannot be said to amount to more than 200,000. That they were at one period much more numerous than they are at present, is evident from the fact, that a vast number of ruined Coptic churches and convents are still to be found in various parts of the country. Ever since the conquest of Egypt by the Arabs, the Coptic language has been gradually falling into disuse, until it has almost become a dead language, understood by very few. It is not, however, entirely lost, being still used in their liturgy, and several of their religious books; and as the litany and liturgy are repeated without a book, many even of the priests can neither read, write, speak, nor understand it, while few or none of the hearers are able to comprehend a single word of the service. Accordingly, to use the language of Dr. Duff, "In all heathenism there is not a form more absolutely profitless and meaningless. Of all real life it is as destitute as any of the mouldering mummies of the catacombs." To such a melancholy state of degradation is the once flourishing and far-famed church of Alexandria and Egypt reduced.

The present religious system of the Coptic church is a heterogeneous mass of false doctrines, idolatrous rites, and superstitious ceremonies. They practise both circumcision and baptism; they believe in baptismal regeneration, in justification by the observance of the eucharist and other pious deeds, especially fastings and pilgrimages, in transubstantiation, confession to a priest, absolution, the invocation of saints, extreme unction, and prayers for the dead. Besides the Bible, which they still regard as the standard of faith and practice, they hold in high estimation 'The Sayings of the Fathers,' 'The Liturgy of Basil,' 'The Liturgy of Gregory,' 'The Liturgy of Cyril,' and 'The Apostolical Constitutions.' All these liturgies are found in the Coptic language. The Copts hold seven sacraments, baptism, the eucharist, confirmation, confession, ordination, matrimony, and extreme unction. Their clergy are supported by voluntary contributions and presents, besides fees on the occasion of births, marriages, and deaths. The ordinance of baptism is dispensed to boys at the age of forty days, and to girls at the age of eighty days, unless in case of dangerous sickness, when it may be administered sooner. This rite is performed by dipping the body three times in water, to which the sacred oil has been added, and over which the sign of the cross has been made. Confirmation follows immediately after baptism, and is performed with meirún or the holy oil. The sacrament of confession is followed immediately by absolution, and sometimes penance is prescribed. Extreme unction is administered not only to the sick and dying, but also to the healthy after the commission of great sins. Circumcision, as we have already mentioned, is practised, but Dr. Wilson mentions that he was informed by the patriarch, it was more a civil than a religious custom. It is done privately, without any fixed age for its performance. The religious fasts of the Copts are numerous and severe, and the patriarch, in particular, is remarkable for the austerities which he practises. It is said that he is awaked from his sleep every quarter of an hour during the night that he may call on the name of God. Dr. Wilson, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' gives a minute and very interesting account of a visit which he paid while in Cairo to a Coptic church, and of the various ceremonies which he witnessed on that occasion. The lively picture which the Doctor gives of the public worship of the Copts cannot fail to interest the reader:

"It commenced as soon as it was light on the Lord's-day morning; and it was well attended both by young and old, who, on account of the smallness of the church,—the largest, however, belonging to the Copts of the place,—were much crowded together, to their great discomfort, increased by the want of ventilation, and the burning of numerous candles. The construction of the church much resembled a Jewish synagogue. It was divided into four compartments. The hethel, or chancel, forms the chief compartment at the eastern end; and it is separated from the rest of the church by wooden panel-work. Before it is suspended a curtain with a large cross wrought upon it, having a door in the centre as an entrance. The compartment adjoining to this, separated by a fence of lattice-work from the other parts of the church, was occupied by the officiating priests and their assistants, by the patriarch, who was sitting on an antique seat called the chair of St. Mark, and by the more respectable portions of the congregation. Into this compartment we were allowed to enter. The inferior members of the congregation occupied the next apartment; and the most remote was appropriated to the women, who were nearly completely screened from our view by another partition of lattice-work. I observed no images; but a few glaring pictures were here and there suspended from the walls. The worshipper, on entering the church, laid aside his shoes, but agreeably to the universal custom of the Eastern Churches, kept on his turban. His first act of devotion was that of prostrating himself before the chancel immediately in front of the suspended cross, kissing the hem of the curtain, and then before the patriarch, who extended to him his blessing on his rising, and lastly before some of the pictures of the saints. The entrance of great numbers after the service had begun, who went through these ceremonies, added much to the confusion, which was now and then increased by the tinkling of bells and cymbals, and some of the priests moving up and down and waving censers with incense rising from them, and making demands on the patriarch for a new supply of combustibles when their stock was exhausted. Many of the older men were leaning on crutches, about four or five feet high, during most of the time of the service, evidently obtaining some relief from the use of them, in the lack of all pews, during the three or four lengthened hours of their meeting. They were frequently talking to one another and exchanging jokes. Some of the priests were hunting after the boys, who were seeking their amusement, evidently anxious to improve their behaviour in our presence. Their prayers were almost all in the dead Coptic, and, of course, were perfectly unintelligible by the people, who seemed to take little interest in them, though, led by others, they gave the responses. The reading of the gospels and epistles was in Arabic; but it was performed in a most irreverent and unimpressive manner by mere boys, who seemed to be highly amused with their occupation. The bread and wine used in the Lord's Supper were particularly inspected by the patriarch and priests before their consecration. The bread was in the form of small round cakes, with the figure of the cross, I believe, stamped upon them; and the wine was contained in a small glass vessel. The bread was dipped in the wine before it was given to the people, only a small portion of whom partook of it; and the priests alone drunk of the cup. The patriarch concluded the service by reading some exhortations in Arabic, and pronouncing benedictions. Except in so far as his part of the business was concerned, the whole seemed rather a mockery of sacred things, than the worship of the omnipresent and omniscient God."

The Copts believe St. Mark to be the apostle of Egypt and the founder of their church, while the patriarch of Alexandria, whom they recognize as their supreme head, invested with the power of an absolute Pope, is regarded by them as Mark's lineal successor. Not that they attach much importance to the idea of apostolical succession, but they believe that apostolic gifts and graces are conveyed through the meirun or holy oil, which, as they allege, was blessed by St. Mark, still preserves the properties imparted to it, a new stock of oil being always added to the old before it is exhausted. A patriarch is sometimes chosen by his predecessor, but generally appointed by lot, and always from among the monks of the convent of St. Anthony. Under the patriarch are the bishops titular and real, the presbyters who administer the mass to the people, but never preach, the archdeacons, deacons, subdeacons, lectors, cantors, and exorcists, who are mere boyish assistants in church ceremonies. The mode of electing both priests and patriarch is thus noticed by Dr. Duff: "When a priest is to be chosen (one of whose indispensable qualifications always is, that he be not unmarried), some of the former occupants of the sacred office fix on a friend, without asking his consent. He may be, and usually is, some illiterate artizan. 'Voluntary humility' having now become the established rule and hereditary custom, he is expected, and therefore must, in the first instance, decline the intended honour, and expatiate on his utter unworthiness. To the entreaties of his friends he must continue deaf as an adder; and must, in consequence, resist, till, after being dragged by main force into the presence of the patriarch, his benediction has been pronounced, amid protestations and remonstrances. The doom of the reclaiming and intruded man is now sealed. He is then hurried away from the patriarchal presence into a church, for a month or two, to be initiated into the ceremonial part of the priestly functions; and to learn, by rote, those portions of the litany which he may have publicly to recite. Such is usually the entire course of scholastic and theological training that is deemed requisite for a Coptic priest! From the body of the priesthood the bishops are chosen. Their attainments, except in the addition of years to their span of life, generally do not rise higher than the dead flat mass whence they have been severed. Nor need the qualifications of the patriarch himself be of a much higher order. Contrary to the essential prerequisite for the ordinary priesthood and episcopate, he must be an unmarried man. For this end, the bishops and priests apply to the most ancient of all convents (that founded by the famous St. Anthony, in the desert of the Red Sea) for a genuine monk to fill the patriarchal chair. The superior's duty then is, to nominate nine or ten of the brotherhood of celibacy. Of these, one is chosen by lot, to occupy a see which is believed to have been founded by St. Mark, transmitted by Athanasius and other eminent fathers, and perpetuated in unbroken succession to the present occupant. The patriarch-elect is always expected, like the ordinary priest, to express an unconquerable reluctance to assume an office of such dignity and responsibility. The usual remedy is, to apply to the acting governor of Egypt, even though a Turk, to coerce the recalcitrant into compliance by the strong arm of civil and military authority. The present patriarch, who exults in being accounted the lineal successor of St. Mark, as much as the present Pope in being regarded the lineal successor of St. Peter, was actually conveyed from the convent to the chair of the evangelist by the soldiery of Mohammed Ali !”

When the eucharist is administered, each man comes to receive it at the door of the chancel ; the bread, which is in the form of small cakes, is moistened with the wine, the priests alone being permitted to drink the wine. The priests administer the eucharist separately to the women in their compartment of the church. The chancel is in general brilliantly lighted by lamps during the performance of Divine worship. There is seldom any preaching except during Lent. The people are enjoined by their church to pray in private seven times in the twenty-four hours. They recite in their prayers portions of the Psalms in Arabic, and of a chapter of one of the gospels ; after which they say in Coptic or Arabic, “ O my Lord, have mercy,” forty-one times, some using a string of forty-one beads, others counting by their fingers. At the close they add a short prayer in Coptic, or repeat the Lord’s Prayer. But while the Coptic church thus enjoins the faithful performance of private devotion, many of the people may be seen repeating their prayers when walking, riding, or engaged in their ordinary business, muttering them rapidly over without the slightest appearance of inward feeling. Some of the stricter classes wash their hands and feet before public worship, and pray with their faces to the east.

The following rapid sketch of some of the most important manners and customs of the Copts is extracted from the ‘ Journal of a Deputation to the East :’ “ They fast every Wednesday and Friday, eating only fish, vegetables, and oil. They keep also four long and strict fasts in the year ; one of which, at Easter, lasts fifty-five days. They abstain during these fasts from every kind of animal food, such as flesh, meat, eggs, milk, butter, and cheese. Each fast is followed by a festival, and the festivals exceed the fasts by three. Besides attending church services on these occasions, they feast and give alms. They abstain from eating swine’s flesh, on account, they say, of the filthiness of the animal. The Copts consider a pilgrimage to Jerusalem incumbent upon all. They join in large caravans for the journey, keep the Passion Week at Jerusalem, and then proceed to bathe in the Jordan. Circumcision is very generally practised at the ages of two, seven, or eight years, and sometimes twenty or more ; it is considered rather a civil than a religious custom.

“ The Copt women, as well as those of the other Christian sects, veil their faces in public, in imitation of the Moslem women ; and they never uncover their faces in the house in the presence of men, excepting that of their near relations. The Copts pursue, also, the same course as the Moslems in contracting marriages : viz. women are employed as professional match-makers, who bring a description of the personal appearance of each party to the other, and negotiate all the private conditions of the union, the man having scarcely ever obtained a sight of the face of his intended wife, until after the wedding. The choice is sometimes made by the female relatives. Girls marry as young as twelve or thirteen, sometimes even at ten, and few remain unmarried after sixteen years of age ; they are often betrothed much younger. The marriage festivities, among the middle and higher classes, usually last seven or eight days. On the evening of the last day, the bride is accompanied by her relations and friends in a procession, followed by musicians and persons carrying lights, to the house of the bridegroom. They proceed from thence to church, in two separate parties, and return after the ceremony, to partake of a concluding festivity. The following part of the marriage ceremony, adopted also by some of the other oriental Christian Churches, is deserving of notice. After having blessed and returned the wedding rings, the priest places a crown of gold upon the heads of the bride and bridegroom, and a sash over the shoulder of the latter, which ceremony is called the crowning ; the crowns belong to the church, and are taken off when the parties leave, but the bridegroom wears the sash until his return home, where it is taken off by the priest. The bestowal of a ‘ crown of life,’ ‘ of righteousness,’ and ‘ of glory’ upon the believer, is frequently alluded to in the Scriptures, as forming a part of the final completion in heaven of the spiritual union or espousal of his soul with his Saviour at the marriage supper of the Lamb. New-married couples among the Jews wore crowns upon their wedding-day, and in Cantic. iii. 11, the spouse invites her companions to see King Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him on the day of his espousals.

“ The funeral ceremonies of the Copts have likewise much resemblance to those of the Moslems. The corpse is carried in a coffin, followed by wailing-women ; and these are hired for three days, to continue their lamentations in the house of the deceased. The Copts of both sexes visit the tombs of their relatives three times a-year. They pass the night in houses in the burying-ground, the women in the upper, and the men in the lower rooms ; and in the morning, they kill a buffalo or a sheep, and give its flesh with bread to the poor. This has all the appearance of an expiatory sacrifice, perpetuated, probably, from heathen times; but they do not distinctly admit this interpretation of the ceremony."

The ABYSSINIAN CHURCH (which see) is a branch of the ancient Coptic church in Egypt, their ABUNA (which see) or patriarch being consecrated by the patriarch of Alexandria, and in a certain sense subject to him.

COPTIC MONKS. Monasticism had its origin in Egypt, and it continues to be held in estimation in that country. The Copts who follow this mode of life practise great austerities, living in deserts, sleeping in their clothes on the ground, and every evening prostrating themselves one hundred and fifty times with their face and breast on the earth. These monks are sprung from the lowest class of the people, and live on alms. The regular convents are reduced to seven; two, those of St. Anthony and St. Paul, in the eastern desert near the Red Sea; four, including that of St. Macarius, in the Natron valley; and one at Jebel Koskam in Upper Egypt. In these institutions a rigid system of discipline is in force. The Copts have also a number of secondary monasteries, into which, the priests being seculars, women are admitted as well as men. From among the monks residing at one or other of these convents, the patriarch or Batrik, as he is called, is uniformly chosen. A period of severe probation is required of all persons applying for admission into the monastic order. Besides making a vow of celibacy, they must perform, in some sequestered convent in the desert, such menial services as fetching wood and water, sweeping the rooms, or waiting upon the monks. The number of monks and nuns is considerable. They subsist chiefly on lentils, and eat meat only on feast-days. They are in general very poor, superstitious, and ignorant.

COPTIC VERSION, a very ancient version of the New Testament in the Coptic, which is said to be a mixture of the Old Egyptian and the Greek. This version was used from time immemorial by the Egyptians, and though, since the conquest of Egypt by the Saracens, the Arabic has been generally spoken, and the Coptic little understood, yet this version is still read among the Copts, in the public service, in connexion with an Arabic translation.

CORBAN, a gift or oblation among the ancient Hebrews, something devoted to God. Whatever became the subject of this vow, whether money, lands, or houses, became the property of the tabernacle or temple. The Pharisees, who had the charge of the sacred treasury, were wont to inculcate upon the people, that as soon as any person had pronounced to his father or mother this form of consecration, "Be it Corban, whatever of mine shall profit thee;" from that moment all that he had spoken of in his vow became consecrated to God, and could not be given to his parents even to save them from starvation. Our Lord, accordingly, Mark vii 9; x. 13, reproaches them with setting at nought the Divine law by their traditions. The express form of the Corban is to be found in the Talmud. See PHARISEES.

CORD (INVESTITURE WITH THE). In the seventh or ninth year of his age a Hindu Brahman is introduced into the sacred caste by a special ceremony, which is usually termed his investiture with the cord. Before this time he is regarded as no better than a Sudra; he has no privilege, no rank. By the laws of Menu, a Brahman is to be distinguished from individuals of the secular classes by a cord, termed in Bengali paita, which is worn hanging from the left shoulder, and resting on the right side, below the loins. It consists of three thick twists of cotton, each formed of numerous smaller threads. These three separate twists, which on marriage are increased to three times three, are considered as emblematical of the three Persons in the Hindu Trinity, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. The cotton from which the cord is made must be gathered from the plant by the hands of Brahmans only, and the thread must be spun and twisted by persons of the same caste. When the cord has been properly manufactured, the father of the young candidate for sacred honours endeavours to discover by the rules of astrology, the month, the week, the day, the hour, the minute which will be most favourable for his son's investiture with the cord. The ceremony and the entertainment occupy four days, and at the close of each, the guests are presented with numerous gifts. The sacred ceremonies observed on the occasion are thus described, chiefly founded on the narrative of Dubois, in an interesting work published some years ago under the title of 'The Hindoos:' "The guest first invited is the Purohita, or priest. On the day appointed he comes, bringing along with him the paita, or cord, with a quantity of mango leaves, the sacred herb darbha, or kusa, and an antelope's skin to sit upon. The guests being all assembled, the Purohita begins by invoking the household god; the house itself having been previously purified, by the floor and interior of the walls being rubbed with cow-dung diluted with water, while the exterior is decorated, like the old houses of France and Italy, with broad perpendicular stripes in red earth. Most of the rites are performed under a temporary shed, erected with many ceremonies in the court before the house. While the priest is chaunting his mantras, or prayers, the statue of Vighnêswara, the 'God of Obstacles,' is placed under the shed. Instead of the image they in many cases merely set up a small cone of cow-dung, or mud, which the charms of the priest are supposed to transform into a god. To propitiate this deity, whose wrath is peculiarly dreaded, a sacrifice of incense, burning lamps, and grains of rice tinged with red, is then offered up before the statue or cone.

"Next all the married women present, widow being excluded from all scenes of this kind, as their presence would be ominous of misfortune, remove from the assembly, and purify themselves with bathing. Some then proceed to prepare the feast, while others return to the pandal, where, having caused the young Brahmachâri to sit down on a small stool, and anointed him with oil, they bathe and dress him in a new garment. They next adorn him with several trinkets, put round his neck a string of coral beads, and bracelets of the same material on his arms. Lastly, they stain the edges of his eyelids with black.

"The novice's father and mother now cause him to sit down between them, in the midst of the assembly, and the women perform on him the ceremony of the ARATI (which see). They then chaunt in chorus the praises of the gods, with prayers for the young man's happiness. A sacrifice, consisting of betel, rice, and other kinds of food, is next offered up to the household god. The feast now commences. All the guests being seated in several rows, the women apart, and with their backs turned towards the men, the ladies of the house wait themselves upon the guests, and with their delicate fingers, spoons and forks being unknown, serve out the rice and other dishes. The plates are nothing but leaves of the banana or other trees, sewed together, and never used a second time.

"Next day the invitations are renewed, and the company assembles as before. The father of the youth waits in person on each of his guests, bearing in his hand a cup filled with akshata, or stained rice, of which they take up a few of the grains, and stick them on their foreheads as an ornament. 'The assembly being formed, the Brahmachâri with his father and mother all ascend the pile of earth thrown up beneath the shed, and seat themselves on three little stools. In the mean time the young man is bathed in the same manner as on the former day; they deck his brows with sandal and akshata, and gird his loins with a pure cloth, that is to say a cloth not handled since it was washed. All these ceremonies are accompanied with the songs of the women, the same as on the preceding day.'

"These ceremonies concluded, the priest enters, bearing fire in an earthen vase, which he places upon the pile. Several mantras are then recited. After which the father of the novice advances, and offers up a sacrifice to Fire and the Nine Planets. The former, which is called the homa, the Brahmins alone have the privilege of performing. It is simply a fire, kindled with a kind of consecrated wood, into the flames of which they cast a little boiled rice, sprinkled with melted butter. 'The fire, thus consecrated, is afterwards carried into a particular apartment of the house, and kept up day and night with great care until the ceremony is ended. It would be considered a very inauspicious event, if for want of attention, or by any accident, it should happen to go out.'

"The women now come again upon the scene:— 'Having procured a large copper vessel, well whitened over with lime, they go with it to draw water, accompanied with instruments of music. Having filled the vessel, they place in it perpendicularly some leaves of mango, and fasten a new cloth round the whole, made yellow with saffron water. On the neck of the vessel, which is narrow, they put a coconut stained with the same colour as the cloth. In this trim they carry it into the interior of the house, and set it on the floor upon a little heap of rice. There it is still farther ornamented with women's trinkets, after which the necessary ceremonies are performed to invite the god, and to fix him there. This perhaps is not the same as the god of the house, or rather it is the apotheosis of the vessel itself that is made in this case, for it actually becomes a divinity, receiving offerings of incense, flowers, betel, and other articles used in the sacrifices of the Brahmins. Upon this occasion only, women act and perform the deification; and it appears that the divinity resident in the vessel is female. But however this may be, the mother of the Brahmachâri, taking up in her hands this new divinity, goes out of the house, accompanied by the other Brahmin women, visits the festival, preceded by musical instruments, and makes the circuit of the village, walking under a sort of canopy which is supported over the head. Upon returning home she sets the vessel god, which she has in her hands, where it was formerly stationed under the shed, and with the assistance of some of the other women, she fixes in honour of the god two new cloths on the pillars of the alcove near which it is placed.'

"Having accomplished this ceremony, the women, who are fully employed and highly amused on those occasions, once more leave the house in search of mould from a nest of kearias, or 'white ants.' With this they fill five small earthen vases, in which they sow nine sorts of grain, and moisten the whole with milk and water. These five vases are then converted by the mantras of the Brahmins into so many gods. The Pantheon being thus enriched with five new divinities, sacrifices of incense, rice, and betel are made to them, and the whole assembly bow down before the vases in adoration. The manes of their ancestors are then invoked to be present at the feast. Then turning to the Brahmachâri, they bind on his arm a piece of bastard saffron with a yellow cord, the barber shaves his head, he is bathed, his brows are crowned with a wreath of sandal leaves, and his loins are girt with a pure cloth.

"A feast is now given to the young Brahmins, which is immediately succeeded by the most imposing ceremony which takes place during the investiture. 'The father of the new Brahmin, having made the company retire to some distance, whilst he and his son are concealed behind a curtain, sits down upon the ground with his face turned towards the west, and making his son sit down beside him with nis face towards the east, he whispers a deep secret in his ear, out of the mantras, and gives him other instructions analogous to his present situation. The whole is in a style which probably is little comprehended by the listener. Among other precepts, I am informed the father on one occasion delivered the following: 'Be mindful, my son, that there is one God only, the master, sovereign, and origin of all things. Him ought every Brahmin in secret to adore. But remember also, that this is one of the truths that must never be revealed to the vulgar herd. If thou dost reveal it, great evil will befall thee.'

"In the evening, the sacred fire which had been kindled on the first day, and preserved with superstitious care, is brought forth from the house, and placed beside the youth under the pandal, with songs and rejoicing. Mantras are recited, the women chaunt new songs, and the discordant sound of various instruments rends the air. Betel and presents are then distributed, and the rites are concluded, though the entertainments usually continue during two days more."

CORDACA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see) in Elis, derived from an indecent dance, called cordax, which the companions of Pelops are said to have performed in honour of the goddess after a victory which they had gained.

CORDELIERS, monks of the order of St. Francis. They wear a coarse grey cloak, with a little cowl, and a rope girdle with three knots. It is from this girdle that they derive their name. They are identical with the MINORITES.

CORDICOLES (Lat. cor, the heart, and colo, to worship), a sect of Romish devotees which arose in France about the middle of the eighteenth century. They professed to worship the sacred heart of Jesus and the heart of Mary his virgin mother. Various works appeared on the subject in French and Italian, and the sect spread rapidly in Naples, Sardinia, and Spain. Hymns were composed in honour of the sacred heart of Jesus, and Cordicoles abound in all Roman Catholic countries.

CORNARISTS, the followers of Theodore Coornhart, an enthusiastic secretary of the states of Holland, in the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries, who wrote at the same time against Romanists, Lutherans, and Calvinists. He published a number of tracts in Dutch, in which he assailed the doctrine of absolute decrees. ARMINIUS (which see), while a minister in Amsterdam, being directed by the consistory to refute the writings of Coornhart, was converted to his doctrines by the perusal of his writings, and, accordingly, defended them against the reformed. Coornhart had some strange views, more especially in regard to the different sects into which Christians were divided. He held that they were all of them deeply defective, and that no one had a right to reform them unless he could attest the authority of his mission by miracles. He maintained, also, that a man might be a good Christian without attaching himself to any sect whatever.

CORNELIANS, a name given to the ancient orthodox Christians by the Novatian party, because they held communion with Cornelius, bishop of Rome, rather than with Novatian his autagonist. See NOVATIANS.

CORONA CLERICALIS, the clerical crown, a name given to the ancient tonsure, which was made in a circular figure, by cutting away the hair a little from the crown of the head, and leaving a round or circle hanging downwards. This practice, from which the clergy were sometimes called coronati or crowned, was strongly condemned by many of the Fathers as being forbidden in the law of God, and a heathenish ceremony derived from the Egyptian priests of Isis and Serapis. The corona was first adopted by the Donatists and other heretics, from whom it gradually passed into the Christian Church, like several other profane and heathenish usages. Isidore, who died A. D. 636, says, that "all clerks wore the tonsure, and had the crown of their head all shaved, having only a little circle of hair round about the crown." Hence the name corona. This was one of the points of contention between Austin and the old British clergy who refused to wear the tonsure. Bingham supposes that the term coronati may have been applied to the clergy in ancient times, not from the tonsure, but from respect to their office and character, the word being often used to denote honour and dignity in a figurative sense. See CROWN.

CORONIS, a heathen goddess mentioned by Pansanias as having been worshipped at Sicynia. She had no temple erected to her, but sacrifices were offered to her in the temple of ATHENA (which see).

CORPORAL, a fair linen cloth appointed by the canons of the Church of England to be thrown over the consecrated elements at the celebration of the eucharist. In the Greek church it is a square veil, which the celebrant spreads over the elements, after the reading of the gospel. On this corporal the Greeks lay not only the sacred elements, but also the relics of their saints.

CORPUS CHRISTI (Lat. body of Christ), FESTIVAL OF, a feast held in the Romish church on the Thursday after Trinity-Sunday, in which the consecrated wafer is carried about in procession in all popish countries, for the adoration of the multitude. This festival was established in A. D. 1264, by Pope Urban IV., and afterwards confirmed in A. D. 1311, by Clement V. The cause of its first establishment is thus stated by Mr. Dowling, in his 'History of Romanism:': "A certain fanatical woman named Juliana, declared that as often as she addressed herself to God, or to the saints in prayer, she saw the full moon with a small defect or breach in it; and that, having long studied to find out the signification of this strange appearance, she was inwardly informed by the Spirit, that the moon signified the church, and that the defect or breach was the want of an annual festival in honour of the holy sacrament. Few gave attention or credit to this pretended vision, whose circumstances were extremely equivocal and absurd, and which would have come to nothing, had it not been supported by Robert, bishop of Liege, who, in the year 1246, published an order for the celebration of this festival throughout the whole province, notwithstanding the opposition he knew would be made to a proposal founded only on an idle dream. After the death of Juliana, one of her friends and companions, whose name was Eve, took up her name with uncommon zeal, and had credit enough with Urban IV. to engage him to publish, in the year 1267, a solemn edict, by which the festival in question was imposed upon all the Christian churches, without exception. Diestemus, a prior of the Benedictine monks, relates a miracle, as one cause of the establishment of this senseless, idolatrous festival. He tells us that a certain priest having some doubts of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, blood flowed from the consecrated wafer into the cup or chalice, and also upon the corporal or linen cloth upon which the host and the chalice are placed. The corporal, having been brought, all bloody as it was, to Urban, the prior tells us that the Pope was convinced of the miracle, and thereupon appointed the solemnity of Corpus Christi, to be annually celebrated."

This well-known festival is observed with great solemnity and pomp in all Roman Catholic countries. An American gentleman thus describes the procession as he himself witnessed it at Rome: "I was a stranger in Rome, and recovering from the debility of a slight fever; I was walking for air and gentle exercise in the Corso, on the day of the celebration of the Corpus Domini. From the houses on each side of the street were hung rich tapestries and gold-embroidered damasks, and toward me slowly advanced a long procession, decked out with all the heathenish paraphernalia of this self-styled church. In a part of the procession a lofty baldichino, or canopy, borne by men, was held above the idol, the host, before which, as it passed, all heads were uncovered, and every knee bent but mine. Ignorant of the customs of heathenism, I turned my back to the procession, and close to the side of the houses in the crowd (as I supposed unobserved), I was noting in my tablets the order of the assemblage. I was suddenly aroused from my occupation, and staggered by a blow upon the head from the gun and bayonet of a soldier, which struck off my hat far into the crowd. Upon recovering from the shock, the soldier, with the expression of a demon, and his mouth pouring forth a torrent of Italian oaths, in which il diavolo had a prominent place, stood with his bayonet against my breast. I could make no resistance; I could only ask him why he struck me, and receive in answer his fresh volley of unintelligible imprecations, which having delivered, he resumed his place in the guard of honour, by the side of the officiating cardinal." See HOST (ADORATION OF THE).

CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN, a ceremony performed annually at Rome, in which the Pope himself takes a conspicuous part. An image of the Virgin Mary is arrayed in velvet or satin, adorned with silver and gold, and trimmed with the most costly lace. It is gorgeously decked with necklaces and earrings, and bracelets of precious stones. This image is placed at an appointed time on the altar, in a church hung round with tapestry, and brilliantly lighted up with hundreds of candles. Immense crowds flock to witness the ceremony, when a service is performed, after which the priests approach the image and crown it. In the course of these ceremonies the priests burn incense before the image, bow down before it, and mutter prayers to the Virgin. Mr. Seymour, in his 'Pilgrimage to Rome,' translates the following account of this ceremony from an Italian work published a few years ago.

"Clement VIII. gave a crown of gems to the miraculous image of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which they venerate in the church and patriarchal Basilica of S. Mary the greater, (Maria Maggiore) that is, in the sumptuous chapel Borghese. But the crown with which Clement VIII. crowned the fore-mentioned image, and also the crowns with which it was afterwards crowned by other Popes, have been lost through the wickedness of the times, and since then two crowns of silver adorn her image and that of her divine child.

"The present Pope Gregory XVI. grateful for the powerful patronage of the Blessed Virgin experienced in 1837, during the destructive Asiatic disease called the cholera, resolved to present with his own hands a gemmed crown of gold to the Most Holy Virgin, and also her divine infant, on that day on which paradise beheld her crowned the queen of angels and of saints. To this purpose he directed that, wholly at his expence, two crowns should be executed in gold rich with gems, in order to offer them on the morning of the feast of the Assumption, Aug. 15, at the accustomed papal chapel.

"The pontifical altar of the said free Patriarchal Basilica was prepared with pomp for so sacred an office. The sacred picture taken from the Pauline or Borghese chapel, was placed on high under the tribune. Two flights of steps handsomely adorned, rendered on both sides the approach to the upper platform commodious, when the august ceremony was to be performed. Not only the whole tribune itself, but also the apsis and a portion of the principal nave of the church, was resplendent with lights arranged in beautiful symmetry. The chief Pontiff, about the hour of 8, A.M. went with his usual train to the church, and celebrated privately the first mass, and with his own hand distributed the eucharistic bread to the faithful, among whom were found persons of the highest rank. After mass he went to the apartment of Cardinal Odescalchi, arch-priest, and gathering together the sacred college and the various colleges of prelates in the Society, the Holy Father assumed the pontifical robes, and directed the Sedia Gestatoria with the usual procession to the chapel of St. Catherine, where he adored the most holy sacrament exposed there. From thence he went before the high altar, and after kneeling and venerating the sacred picture, ascends the throne and is seated. Then, taking off the mitre, he rises and blesses with the prescribed rite the two crowns, which two salvers support, borne by two clergymen of the chamber, saying,

"Under thy protection we fly, &c.

"Pope—Our help is in the name of the Lord.

"Response—Who made heaven and earth.

"Pope—The Lord be with you.

"Response—And with thy Spirit.

'Let us pray.

"Omnipotent and eternal God, by whose most beneficent arrangement all things were created of nothing, we suppliants pray thy Majesty to deign to bless, + and to sanctify + these crowns, made to adorn the sacred pictures of thy only-begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ, and his Mother the Most Blessed Virgin Mary, through the same Christ, &c. Amen.'

"Then the Pope turned to his seat, placed the incense in the censer, and after blessing it, arose, sprinkled the crowns with holy water and incensed them. Afterwards he descends from the throne and kneels before the altar at the kneeling-stool, chanting the Antifona, 'Queen of Heaven!' which the singers follow out with modulated voices. The chant being ended, the crowns were committed to the Prelates Pentini and Maciotti, canons of the church, robed in the cotta and rochetta, and acting as deacon and subdeacon to the Pope. Then the Pontiff, rising, took his mitre, and preceded by the two canons, and accompanied by two cardinal deacons assisting in Cappe rosse, and by two auditors of the Rota, also in Cappa, ascends by the stairs at the Epistle side to the upper level where the sacred picture was placed. They remove the mitre, and then the Pope taking the crown which was designed for the head of the picture of Jesus, said in the act of placing it there—

"As by our hands Thou art crowned on earth, so may we deserve to be crowned by Thee with glory and honour in the heavens.'

"Having then taken the other crown, he placed it on the head of the picture of the Blessed Virgin, and said—

"As by our hands Thou art crowned on earth, so may we deserve to be crowned through Thee, by Jesus Christ thy Son, with glory and honour in the heavens.'

"After the solemn crowning of the sacred images, amidst the rejoicing and universal commotion of the immense assemblage, the Pope descends the other stairs at the side of the gospel, lays aside the mitre, blesses the incense, places it in the censer, and incensing three times the sacred pictures, said, Pope—"A golden crown upon her head.

Response—"The express sign of sanctity, the glory of honour, and the work of might.

Pope—"Thou hast crowned her, O Lord.

Response—"And made her have dominion over the works of thine hands."

"Let us pray.

"Grant, O merciful Lord, by the crowning of the mother, &c."

This detail cannot fail to remind the classical reader of the ceremonies followed by the ancient Romans when crowning the images of their heathen gods See MARIOLATRY.

CORRESPONDENCES (DOCTRINE OF), one of the important points which Emanuel Swedenborg believed himself commissioned to reveal, namely, that there are certain links of harmony and correspondence between the seen and the unseen worlds, so that every object ought to suggest to the mind of man its own appropriate divine truth. The grand idea which this imaginative enthusiast appeared to regard as the fundamental truth of his system was, that matter and spirit are associated together, and connected by an eternal law. Wherever an analogy seemed to present itself, it was converted in the mind of Swedenborg into a predetermined correspondence. Thus, Mr. Vaughan, in his 'Hours with the Mystics, well describes this doctrine: "The Divine Humanity is at once the Lord and pattern of all creation. The innumerable worlds of space are arranged after the human form. The universe is a kind of constellation Homo. Every spirit belongs to some province in Swedenborg's 'Grand Man,' and affects the correspondent part of the human body. A spirit dwelling in those parts of the universe which answer to the heart or the liver, makes his influx felt in the cardiac or hepatic regions of Swedenborg's frame before he becomes visible to the eye. Evil spirits, again, produced their correspondent maladies on his system, during the time of his intercourse with them. Hypocrites gave him a pain in the teeth, because hypocrisy is spiritual toothache. The inhabitants of Mercury correspond to a province of memory in the 'grand man:': the Lunarians to the ensiform cartilage at the bottom of the breast-bone. With Swedenborg likeness is proximity: space and time are states of love and thought. Hence his journeys from world to world;—passing through states being equivalent to travelling over spaces. Thus it took him ten hours to reach one planet, while at another he arrived in two, because a longer time was required to approximate the state of his mind to that of the inhabitants of the former."

CORSNED-BREAD, or morsel of execration, a species of ordeal among the Saxons. It consisted of a piece of bread weighing about an ounce, being given to the accused person, after a form of execration to this effect, "We beseech thee, O Lord, that whoever is guilty of this theft, when the execrated bread is offered to him, in order to discover the truth, his jaws may be shut, his throat so narrow that he cannot swallow, and that he may cast it out of his mouth, and not eat it." It is supposed that this ceremony was invented in the early ages of Christianity, from a presumptuous use of the consecrated elements of communion, and that the Saxon corsned was actually the sacramental bread. This species of ordeal has been asserted to be specially limited to the clergy; but the sudden and fatal appeal to it by Godwin, Earl of Kent, in A. D. 1053, when accused of the murder of Ælfred, the brother of Edward the Confessor, is well known as one of the most remarkable traditions of English history. "This custom," says Sir William Blackstone, "has been long since gradually abolished, though the remembrance of it still exists in certain phrases of abjuration retained among the humbler classes of society, such as 'I will take the sacrament upon it.' 'May this morsel be my last.'" See ORDEAL.

CORYBANTES, priests of the goddess CYBELE (which see) who danced at the sacrifices and beat time on cymbals. They had their residence on Mount Ida in the island of Crete, where they nourished the infant Zeus. Some think that the Corybantes were the sons of CHRONOS (which see), others that they were the sons of Zeus and Calliope, that they went to Samothrace, where they are said to have dwelt, and to have been the same beings as were there called CABEIRI (which see). The Corybantes are alleged by some to have been nine in number.

CORYBANTICA, a festival and mysteries celebrated anciently at Cnossus in Crete in commemoration, as some say, of one Corybas, who brought up Zeus, concealing him from his father Chronos, who wished to kill him. Others suppose that this festival was held in honour of the CORYBANTES (see preceding article), who performed the same friendly offices to Zeus. When any one was to be initiated into the mysteries, he was placed upon a throne, and those who engaged in the ceremony formed a circle and danced around him.

CORYDUS, a surname of APOLLO (which see), under which he was worshipped at Corone, where there was a temple erected in his honour.

CORYPHÆA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), as the goddess who inhabited the tops of the mountains. Under this name she was worshipped on Mount Coryphæon, near Epidaurus in Greece. Zeus sometimes receives the epithet of Coryphæus.

CORYPHASIA, a surname of ATHENA (which see), under which she was worshipped, and had a temple at Coryphasion.

CORYTHALLA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which COTBAT, the discourse with which the Imâm among the Saracens was wont to commence the public prayers on Friday. It consisted of expressions of praise to God and to Mohammed. In ancient times the caliph, dressed in white, used to pronounce the Cotbat in person, a ceremony which was considered as a mark of sovereignty. This ceremony, which was generally concluded with a prayer for the caliph, fell into disuse on the extinction of the caliphate. Mohammed was the first who introduced the custom of delivering the Cotbat.

COTYS, or COTYTTO, a Thracian goddess who presided over all wantonness and indecency. She was worshipped first among the Greeks, and afterwards among the Romans. (See next article.)

COTYTTIA, a festival celebrated originally in Thrace in honour of Cotys or Cotytto, the goddess of wantonness. From Thrace it passed to Corinth and Athens, as well as other cities of Greece. It was celebrated during the night amid dissoluteness and debauchery of the most revolting description. A festival bearing the same name was celebrated in Sicily, but there is no evidence that it was disgraced by the observance of the licentious practices which prevailed in the Thracian festival. The priests of the goddess who presided at the festival were anciently called BAPTÆ (which see).

COUNCIL, a term used in several passages of the New Testament, for example, Matt. v. 22; Luke xxii. 66; Acts vi. 12, to denote the SANHEDRIM (which see), or supreme civil court over which the high priest presided, and which took cognizance of all offences which were of a somewhat important and aggravated description. Besides the Sanhedrim, the Talmudists assert, that there were two other smaller councils, each consisting of twenty-three persons, to hear and determine in the case of minor offences. These petty courts were established in every town or village where there were one hundred and twenty inhabitants; and if the population was smaller, a tribunal was set up of three judges, one chosen by the accuser, another by the accused, and a third by both parties.

COUNCIL (ECCLESIASTICAL), an assembly of ecclesiastical persons met for the purpose of consultation on ecclesiastical matters. The first council of this kind is supposed by many writers, Protestant as well as Romanist, to have been that which was composed of the apostles and elders of Jerusalem, and of which we have an account in Acts xv. From such a narrative being contained in Scripture, it has been sometimes argued that councils, according to this model, are of Divine authority. Hence arose the Romish idea of infallible councils, who accordingly adopted the prefatory language of the decree of the council of Jerusalem, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." But such pretensions were altogether unwarranted, and only tended to foster the pride and arrogance of an ambitious priesthood. Such an extravagant idea as that of the divine authority of the ecclesiastical councils, which have from time to time met and issued decrees which claimed obedience from the whole Christian world, is opposed alike by the testimony of antiquity and the opinions of the earliest writers who refer to the councils of the church. Tertullian speaks of the ecclesiastical assemblies of the Greeks as purely a human institution; and Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea, in a letter to Cyprian, written about the middle of the third century, refers to such assemblies as nothing more than a convenient arrangement. Ecclesiastical councils had their origin among the Greeks, who had been accustomed from the very nature of their civil government to attach the utmost importance to public assemblies in matters of legislation in the state; and it was natural for them, when the circumstances of the church required it, to resort to such assemblies for legislation in matters which concerned the church. The first ecclesiastical councils were held against the MONTANISTS (which see), towards the middle of the second century, in Asia Minor and Thrace.

COUNCILS (CONSISTORIAL), meetings of the presbyters or elders in consistory with the bishop, thus forming a court for ecclesiastical purposes corresponding to the Kirk-Session, as it is termed in Scotland. These courts belonged to individual churches. Thus when Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, proceeded against Andronicus, the impious and blaspheming prefect of Pentapolis, he summoned a meeting of the consistory of his own church, which solemnly excommunicated Andronicus, and in his account of the matter, Synesius says, "The church of Ptolemais gave notice of this excommunication to all her sister churches throughout the world, requiring them to hold Andronicus excommunicated, and not to despise her act as being only that of a poor church in a small city."

COUNCILS (GENERAL), or ŒCUMENICAL, assemblies which have been supposed to represent the whole body of the Christian church. "Men being accustomed already," says Neander, "to regard the provincial synods as the highest legislative and judicial tribunals for the churches of the several provinces, it was natural, when disputes arose which occupied the largest portion of the Christendom of the Roman empire, that the thought should occur of forming, after some analogous manner, a like tribunal for the Christendom of the whole Roman empire; and this was soon transferred, generally, to the entire church universal. The provincial synods then being customarily regarded as organs of the Holy Spirit for the guidance of the churches of a certain district, this idea was applied to the relation of universal councils to the whole church. These universal councils had a two-fold aim; to decide disputes concerning doctrines, and to determine the constitution, the forms of worship and the discipline of the church; to which latter, the canons of these assemblies had reference."

The number of general or œcumenical councils is reckoned variously by different churches. The orthodox Greek church enumerates only seven, and refuses to acknowledge the authority of those which followed. The first seven now referred to are as follows: The first council of Nice, A. D. 325. The first council of Constantinople, A. D. 381. The council of Ephesus, A. D. 431. The council of Chalcedon A. D. 451. The second council of Constantinople, A. D. 553. The third council of Constantinople, A. D. 680. The second council of Nice, A. D. 787.

Most of the writers of the church of Rome hold that there have been eighteen œcumenical and infallible councils, but they differ among themselves as to what particular councils are entitled to this character. Sixtus V. caused a list of the eighteen generally recognized councils to be put up in the Vatican. These, in addition to the first seven already enumerated, consist of the following: The fourth council of Constantinople, A. D. 869. The first Lateran council, A. D. 1122. The second Lateran council, A. D. 1139. The third Lateran council, A. D. 1179. The fourth Lateran council, A. D. 1215. The first council of Lyons, A. D. 1245. The second council of Lyons, A. D. 1274. The council of Vienne, A. D. 1311. The council of Florence, A. D. 1439. The fifth Lateran council, A. D. 1512. The council of Trent, A. D. 1545

The French divines in general maintain that the councils of Pisa A. D. 1400, Constance A. D. 1414, and Basle A. D. 1431, were also œcumenical, while the Italian clergy deny this, and ascribe, instead of these, infallibility to the councils of Lyons, Florence, and the fifth Lateran. The Popes have never given any formal decision on this disputed point; so that it is still doubtful whether the Church of Rome acknowledges the eighteen infallible councils according to the French or the Italian list. The Protestant churches are unanimous in rejecting the authority of all these councils, and the twenty-first article of the Church of England declares that such councils may err, and sometimes have erred, and that things ordained by them as necessary to salvation, "have neither strength nor authority unless it may be declared that they be taken out of Holy Scripture."

The eighteen general or œcumenical councils may be divided into two classes, the Eastern and the Western, the former consisting of eight, all of which were called by the Emperors, and the latter consisting of ten, all of which were called by the Popes. The history of the whole of these councils, both Eastern and Western, reveals scenes of carnal strife and party passion, which have too often been unfavourable, rather than otherwise, to the cause of true Christianity. Gregory Nazianzen expresses himself with great plainness in speaking of his own experience of all such councils. "I am so constituted," he says, "that, to speak the truth, I dread every assembly of bishops; for I have never yet seen a good end of any one,—never been at a synod which did more for the suppression than it did for the increase of evils; for an indescribable thirst for contention and for rule prevails in them, and a man will be far more likely to draw upon himself the reproach of wishing to set himself up as a judge of other men's wickedness, than he will be to succeed in any attempts of his to remove it." Some of them, according to the testimony of eye-witnesses, resembled a disorderly rabble, more than an assembly of grave and learned divines. At best they were a collection of frail, fallible mortals, whose passions were often stronger than their judgment, and therefore their decisions must be received with the utmost caution, and only adopted in so far as they are in accordance with the Word of God, which by every enlightened Protestant is regarded as the only infallible rule of faith and obedience. See INFALLIBILITY (DOCTRINE OF).

COUNCILS (OCCASIONAL), ecclesiastical assemblies convened for special purposes in a particular locality or district, but making no pretensions to represent the whole Christian church. Such councils have been very numerous. A few of the most important may be noticed. At Aix-la-Chapelle, A. D. 816, a council was held for regulating the canons of cathedral churches. The council of Savonnières, in 859, was the first which gave the title of Most Christian King to the king of France; but it did not become the peculiar appellation of that sovereign till 1469. The council of Troyes, in 887, decides the disputes about the imperial dignity. The second council of Troyes, 1107, restrains the clergy from marrying. The council of Clermont, in 1095. The first crusade was determined in this council. The bishops had yet the precedence of cardinals. In this assembly the name of Pope was for the first time given to the head of the church, exclusively of the bishops, who used to assume that title. Here, also, Hugh, archbishop of Lyons, obtained of the Pope a confirmation of the primacy of his see over that of Sens. The council of Rheims, summoned by Eugenius III. in 1148, in which patrons of churches are prohibited from taking more than ancient fees, upon pain of deprivation and ecclesiastical burial. Bishops, deacons, sub-deacons, monks, and nuns, are restrained from marrying. In this council the doctrine of the Trinity was decided; but upon separation the Pope called a congregation, in which the cardinals pretended they had no right to judge of doctrinal points; that this was the privilege peculiar to the Pope. The council of Sutrium, in 1046, wherein three Popes who had assumed the chair were deposed. The council of Clarendon in England, against Becket, held in 1164. The council of Lombez, in the country of Albigeois, in 1200, occasioned by some disturbances on account of the Albigenes; a crusade was formed on this account, and an army sent to extirpate them. Innocent III. spirited up this barbarous war. Dominic was the apostle, the count of Toulouse the victim, and Simon, count of Montfort, the conductor or chief. The council of Paris in 1210, in which Aristotle's metaphysics was condemned to the flames, lest the refinements of that philosopher should have a bad tendency on men's minds, by applying those subjects to religion. The council of Pisa, begun March the 2d, 1409, in which Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. were deposed. Another council, sometimes called general, held at Pisa, in 1505. Louis XII. of France, assembled a national council at Tours (being highly disgusted with the Pope,) 1510, where was present the cardinal De Gurce, deputed by the emperor; and it was then agreed to convene a general council at Pisa.

COUNCILS (PROVINCIAL), assemblies of the bishops and presbyters of all the churches in a province, corresponding to the PRESBYTERY (which see) of modern times. Several Romish writers deny that presbyters were allowed a seat in these councils. Bellarmine only goes so far as to deny them a decisive voice in such assemblies. But all unprejudiced writers, both Protestant and Romish, agree, that even from the first origin of such councils presbyters had liberty to sit and deliberate with bishops in all ecclesiastical matters referring to the province.

COURT OF HIGH COMMISSION. This court took its rise from a remarkable clause in the Act of Supremacy, passed in 1558-59, by which Queen Elizabeth and her successors were "empowered to choose persons to exercise under her all manner of jurisdiction, privileges, and pre-eminences, touching any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the realms of England and Ireland; as also to visit, reform, redress, order, correct, and amend all errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, contempts, offences, enormities, whatsoever; provided, that they have no power to determine anything to be heresy but what has been adjudged to be so by the authority of the canonical Scripture, or by the first four general councils, or any of them, or by any other general council, wherein the same was declared heresy by the express and plain words of canonical Scripture, or such as shall hereafter be declared to be heresy by the High Court of Parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation." In conformity with this clause, the Queen appointed a certain number of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes. The court thus formed was called the High Commission Court, because it claimed a more extensive jurisdiction and higher powers than the ordinary Courts of the Bishops. Its jurisdiction, in fact, reached over the whole kingdom. These commissioners were empowered to make inquiry, not only by the legal methods of juries and witnesses, but by all other ways and means which they could devise, that is, by rack, torture, inquisition, and imprisonment. They were vested with a right to examine such persons as they suspected, by administering to them an oath, by which they were obliged to answer all questions, and thereby might be obliged to accuse themselves or their most intimate friends. The fines they imposed were merely discretionary; the imprisonment to which they condemned was limited by no rule but their own pleasure; they imposed when they thought proper new articles of faith on the clergy, and practised all the iniquities and cruelties of a real inquisition. This court suspended and deprived ministers of their livings, by the canon law, on the solemn determination of three commissioners.

The appointment of Courts of High Commission was not limited to the reign of Elizabeth; we find James instituting such courts in Scotland when he was endeavouring to introduce Prelacy into that part of his kingdom. In 1610 a commission was given under the great seal to the two archbishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, to hold two Courts of High Commission, which were afterwards united in 1615. Dr. Hetherington, in his History of the Church of Scotland, thus describes the nature of courts of this kind: "Never was a more tyrannical court instituted than that of High Commission. It was regulated by no fixed laws or forms of justice, and was armed with the united terrors of civil and ecclesiastical despotism. It had the power of receiving appeals from any ecclesiastical judicatory; of calling before it all persons accused of immorality, heresy, sedition, or any imaginary offence; of finding them guilty upon evidence which no court of justice would have sustained; and of inflicting any punishment, either civil or ecclesiastical, or both, which it thought proper. As it exalted the bishops far above any prelate that ever was in Scotland, so it put the King in possession of what he had long desired, namely, the royal prerogative and absolute power to use the bodies and goods of his subjects at his pleasure, without form or process of law: so that our bishops were fit instruments of the overthrow of the freedom and liberty both of the Church and realm of Scotland."

A High Commission Court was re-erected in Scotland on the 16th January 1664, and was, if possible, more arbitrary in its proceedings than its predecessor had been. This court consisted of nine prelates and thirty-five laymen, five being a quorum, of which one must be a prelate. They were empowered to summon before them, and to punish, all the deposed ministers who presumed to preach, all who attended conventi-

cles, all who kept meetings at fasts, and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and all who write, speak, preach or print against Prelacy. They were empowered to inflict censures of suspension and deposition; to levy fines and imprison; to employ magistrates and military force for the apprehension of their victims; and finally, to do and execute what they shall find necessary and convenient for his Majesty's service. "The proceedings of the Court of High Commission," says Dr. Hetherington, "were such as were to be expected from its spirit and construction. It at once assumed the power of both the swords, and acted equally as an ecclesiastical and as a civil court. Holding the most intimate intercourse with the curates, who formed an organized espionage co-extensive with the nation, the Court of High Commission obtained information respecting every sincere Presbyterian throughout the kingdom, summoned every one whom it was their pleasure to oppress, and, without the formalities of citing witnesses and hearing evidence, either passed sentence upon the bare accusation, or required the oath of supremacy to be taken, and, upon its being refused, inflicted whatever sentence they thought proper, short of death. Some were reduced to utter poverty by fines; some were imprisoned till they contracted fatal diseases; some were banished to the remotest and most unhealthy and inhospitable parts of the kingdom; and some were actually sold for slaves. Of the great numbers summoned to appear before this terrible court of inquisition, not one is recorded to have escaped without suffering punishment, and often to an extreme degree of severity."

COURTS (CHURCH), a term used in Presbyterian churches to denote the various ecclesiastical courts composed of ministers and elders, in which all matters affecting the doctrines, government, and discipline of the church are duly considered. These courts consist of kirk-sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the General Assembly, which form a regular gradation from the inferior up to the supreme court, where all matters purely ecclesiastical take end. The lowest court or kirk-session takes cognizance of persons and matters within its bounds; but there is a right of appeal from its decision to the next higher court, the presbytery, then to the synod, and last of all to the General Assembly, from whose decisions, unless affecting temporal interests, there is no appeal. The Church of Scotland, in common with all Presbyterian churches, claims the right of meeting in all its courts, by its own appointment; but it also recognizes the right of the supreme magistrate to call synods, and to be present at them. This latter right is denied by those Presbyterian bodies who hold the Voluntary principle. Only two instances are on record in which the Lord High Commissioner, in opposition to the mind of the judicatory, dissolved the Assembly without fixing a time for the meeting of another; and on both these occasions the Assembly continued its sittings, and by its own intrinsic power appointed the day when the next Assembly should be held.

COURTS (SPIRITUAL), those courts belonging to the Church of England to which the consideration of ecclesiastical matters belongs. For a long period the court for ecclesiastical and temporal matters was one and the same. It was called the county court, where the bishop and the earl, or, in his absence, the sheriffs or their representatives, sat jointly for the administration of justice—the first in matters ecclesiastical by the laws of the church—the second in matters temporal by the laws of the state. In the days of William the Conqueror, however, a separation took place between the temporal and the spiritual jurisdictions, and ecclesiastical courts were set up, to which all ecclesiastical matters were referred. These courts have continued down to the present day, and are six in number, namely, the Archdeacon's Court, the Consistory courts, the Pre-rogative and the Arches Court; the Court of Pecuniars, and the Court of Delegates. For an account of the different courts, see articles under the words here marked in italics. But though still in existence, these courts are far from having the extent of authority which they could formerly claim, the law of Henry VII. for the punishment of priests having been superseded by an "Act for better enforcing church discipline," passed in the reign of the present Queen.

COVENANTS, a term which in ordinary language is identical with CONTRACTS (which see), and which have been wont to be ratified in a variety of different ways. The word occurs very frequently in Sacred Scripture, both in the Old and New Testaments. Dr. Russell, in his able work on the 'Old and New Covenants,' makes some judicious remarks on the original meaning of the term: "The word, which in the Old Testament Scriptures is rendered covenant, is accordingly derived from a root, which signifies to purify, and hence it is sometimes used to signify soap, Jer. ii. 22; Mal. iii. 2. The word itself, which is rendered covenant, signifies a purifier, a purification, or a purification sacrifice; and the phrase for making a covenant, literally signifies to cut a purifier, or to cut off a purifying victim. The ancient manner of confirming a covenant, was by the slaying of an animal in sacrifice, and then dividing it into pieces, between which the party making the engagement or promise, solemnly passed. After Abraham had divided certain victims, God, under the symbol of a burning lamp, passed between the pieces; and thus, 'In that same day, the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, saying, unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.' Gen. xv. 7—18. This was by no means a covenant of mutual stipulation, but of free promise on the part of the Almighty alone; and, therefore, the Divine glory alone passed between the pieces. It deserves our attention, that though many of the promises to Abraham are recorded in the xii. and xiii. chapters of the book of Genesis, they are not termed a covenant, till an account is given in chap. xv. of their being ratified by sacrifices. This solemn mode of confirmation prefigured the great sacrifice of the Son of God, in right of whom Abraham and his seed were to inherit the blessing. It is easy to see how promises made in behalf of sinful and polluted men, came to be confirmed by means of a sacrifice; for as it is by means of an atonement that guilt is purged away, and that sinners, as thus purified from it, have access into the presence and family of God; so it was proper, that whatever promises of blessing were made to such, should be ratified in a way which should exhibit the great means by which purification from sin and reconciliation to God should be effected. To this mode of confirming the covenant there is a reference in Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19, where God denounces a curse on the different classes in Judah and Jerusalem; who, on a particular occasion, had made a covenant before him, in regard to their servants, by cutting a calf in twain, and passing between the parts of it, as a ratification of the promised liberty of their enslaved brethren. In allusion to this character of our Lord as a purifier, the redeemed are represented as arrayed in robes made white in the blood of the Lamb, Rev. vii. 14. Now, garments cannot literally be made white by being washed in blood; but sins being represented as the pollution of the soul, and so excluding men as spiritually defiled from the presence of God, it is easy to see how that state of acceptance into which men are brought, through the application of the atonement of Christ, is signified by their appearing in robes made white by being washed in his blood.

"When men saw that God confirmed his promise by a sacrifice, they learned to confirm their own engagements by the same means, though not with the same views. The custom appears to have arisen from regard to the great sacrifice, which was to redeem mankind; and those who in this way symbolically confirmed their engagements, would be considered as having staked their hope of salvation, through the great sacrifice, on their faithful fulfilment. Now, as the engagements of men were generally mutual stipulations between the parties concerned, the word covenant came to denote a mutual compact so ratified, and, at last, whether thus ratified or not. But when applied to God, it denotes nothing of this kind, but, as has just been stated, his own free and gracious promises in behalf of the guilty and unworthy, ratified by a sacrifice; or else a gracious constitution of things, or an institution, or a system of institutions, founded upon and illustrative of his promises."

In accordance with this extensive view of the word covenant, it may be applied to all the various dispensations under which, in the course of ages, God was pleased to reveal to men his plan of mercy through a Redeemer. In this view we can with propriety speak of the covenant as revealed to our first parents, and then to Noah; of the covenant established with Abraham, and afterwards with Israel at Sinai; last of all we can speak of the covenant ratified by Christ. But the Bible sets before us two primary covenants or dispensations, which it terms the first and the second, or the Old and the New. The one had a reference to the Jewish nation only; the other to believers of all ages and nations. The one was a typical, the other an antitypical covenant. The one was temporary, the other eternal. The one could only secure an earthly, the other a heavenly inheritance.

Systematic divines are accustomed to speak of two covenants as referred to in the Word of God, the covenant of works and the covenant of grace. The former denotes the federal transaction between God and Adam, in which he promised eternal life to our first parents upon the condition of obedience, not only to the moral law written on their heart, but to the positive precept respecting the tree of knowledge. This agreement is also termed the covenant of nature, because it was entered into with man while he was in his natural state of innocence; and also the covenant of life, because life was promised as the reward of obedience. The covenant of grace, on the other hand, which is fitly so termed, as bestowing its reward not upon him who works, but upon him who believes, denotes the agreement relative to the salvation of sinners into which God the Father entered with Christ the Son, from all eternity, in behalf of his elect people. The conditions of the covenant were fulfilled by Christ, and all the promises and blessings of the covenant are imparted in the first instance to Christ, and then to his people in Him.

The covenant of grace has been administered by Christ under two distinct economies, the one before, and the other after, the coming of Christ. The great design in both cases is to impart its benefits to those for whom they were intended; and this design is accomplished by the preaching of the gospel, in which salvation is offered to sinners; and by the power of the Spirit, who works faith in the hearts of those who were chosen in Christ to eternal life. It is only by faith that we can obtain an interest in the covenant, and hence the solemn declaration, "He that believeth shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." All that were descended from Adam are involved in the covenant made with him; and all who are born in Christ are involved in the covenant made with Him.

COVENANT (THE FIRST), subscribed at Edinburgh on the 3d of December 1557, by the adherents of the Reformation in Scotland, binding them to mutual support of each other and of the gospel. This covenant, which we give in its entire form, runs in these words: "We, perceiving how Satan, in his members the antichrists of our time, cruelly doth rage, seeking to downthrow and destroy the evangel of Christ and his congregation, ought according to our bounden duty, to strive in our Master's cause, even unto the death, being certain of the victory in Him: the which, our duty being well considered, we do promise before the Majesty of God and his congregation, That we, by his grace, shall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the most blessed Word of God, and his congregation; and shall labour at our possibility to have faithful ministers, purely and truly to minister Christ's evangel and sacraments to his people. We shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, at our whole powers and wairing [expending] of our lives against Satan and all wicked power that does intend tyranny and trouble against the foresaid congregation. Unto the which holy word and congregation we do join us; and also do renounce and forsake the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitions, abominations, and idolatry thereof. And moreover shall declare ourselves manifestly enemies thereto, by this our faithful promise before God, testified to his congregation, by our subscription at these presents. At Edinburgh the third day of December 1557 years. God called to witness.'" This bond or covenant was solemnly sworn to and subscribed by the lords and chief gentry who were devoted to the reformed interests, and who, from the frequent recurrence of the word congregation in the document, received the name of the Lords of the Congregation, and their followers were called the Congregation.

COVENANT (THE SECOND), another bond subscribed by the Lords of the Congregation in Scotland a short time after the above. It was subscribed on the 31st of May 1559, in the name of the whole congregation, pledging them to mutual support and defence in the cause of religion, or any cause dependent thereupon, by whatsoever pretext it might be concealed.

COVENANT (THE FIRST NATIONAL, OF SCOTLAND), the name given to a Confession of Faith drawn up by John Craig, one of the ministers of Edinburgh at the Reformation. It forms the first part of every subsequent national covenant entered into by the Church and people of Scotland. The occasion of its being framed and subscribed at this time, was the jealousy entertained by the nation of the Duke of Lennox and other nobles, who either openly avowed their adherence to the Church of Rome, or were suspected of attachment to the Romish creed. This covenant was subscribed by the king himself, his household, and the greater part of the nobility and gentry throughout the kingdom. It was ratified by the General Assembly, and the signing of it zealously promoted by the ministers in every part of the country. The National Covenant was renewed in 1638, with an addition drawn up by Johnston of Warriston, which contained the Acts of Parliament condemning Popery, and confirming and ratifying the acts of the General Assembly. The latter part of the document, which was the production of Henderson, contained a special application of the whole to present circumstances. From the subscription of this covenant arose the name of Covenanters.

The following graphic account of the subscribing of this covenant is given by Dr. Hetherington in his History of the Church of Scotland: "At length the important day, the 28th of February, dawned, in which Scotland was to resume her solemn covenant union with her God. All were fully aware, that on the great transaction of this day, and on the blessing of God upon it, would depend the welfare or the wo of the Church and kingdom for generations to come. By daybreak all the commissioners were met; and the Covenant being now written out, it was read over, and its leading propositions, deliberately examined, all being invited to express their opinions freely, and every objection patiently heard and answered. From time to time there appeared some slightly-doubtful symptoms, indicative of possible disunion; but these gradually gave way before the rising tide of sacred emotion with which almost every heart was heaving. Finally, it was agreed that all the commissioners who were in town, with as many of their friends as could attend, should meet at the Greyfriars Church in the afternoon, to sign the bond of union with each other, and of covenant with God.

"As the hour drew near, people from all quarters flocked to the spot; and before the commissioners appeared, the church and churchyard were densely filled with the gravest, the wisest, and the best of Scotland's pious sons and daughters. With the hour approached the men: Rothes, Loudon, Henderson, Dickson, and Johnston appeared, bearing a copy of the Covenant ready for signature. The meeting was then constituted by Henderson, in a prayer of very remarkable power, earnestness, and spirituality of tone and feeling. The dense multitude listened with breathless reverence and awe, as if each man felt himself alone in the presence of the Hearer of prayer. When he concluded, the Earl of Loudon stood forth, addressed the meeting, and stated, explained, and vindicated the object for which they were assembled. He very judiciously directed their attention to the covenants of other days, when their venerated fathers had publicly joined themselves to the Lord, and had obtained support under their trials, and deliverance from every danger; pointed out the similarity of their position, and the consequent propriety and duty of fleeing to the same high tower of Almighty strength; and concluded by an appeal to the Searcher of hearts, that nothing disloyal or treasonable was meant. Johnston then unrolled the vast sheet of parchment, and in a clear and steady voice read the Covenant aloud. He finished, and stood silent. A solemn stillness followed, deep, unbroken, sacred. Men felt the near presence of that dread Majesty to whom they were about to vow allegiance; and bowed their souls before Him, in the breathless awe of silent spiritual adoration.

"Rothes at length, with subdued tone, broke the silence, stating, that if any had still objections to offer, they should repair, if from the south or west parts of the kingdom to the west door of the church, where their doubts would be heard and resolved by Loudon and Dickson; if from the north and east, to the east door, where the same would be done by Henderson and himself. 'Few came, proposed but few doubts, and these were soon resolved.' Again a deep and solemn pause ensued; not the pause of irresolution, but of modest diffidence, each thinking every other more worthy than himself to place the first name upon this sacred bond. An aged nobleman, the venerable Earl of Sutherland, at last stepped slowly and reverentially forward, and with throbbing heart and trembling hand subscribed Scotland's Covenant with God. All hesitation in a moment disappeared. Name followed name in swift succession, till all within the Church had given their signatures. It was then removed into the churchyard, and spread out on a level grave-stone, to obtain the subscription of the assembled multitude. Here the scene became, if possible, still more impressive. The intense emotions of many became irrepressible. Some wept aloud; some burst into a shout of exultation; some after their names added the words till death; and some, opening a vein, subscribed with their own warm blood. As the space became filled, they wrote their names in a contracted form, limiting them at last to the initial letters, till not a spot remained on which another letter could be inscribed. There was another pause. The nation had framed a Covenant in former days, and had violated its engagements: hence the calamities in which it had been and was involved. If they too should break this sacred bond, how deep would be their guilt! Such seem to have been their thoughts during this period of silent communing with their own hearts; for, as if moved by one spirit,—and doubtless they were moved by the One Eternal Spirit,—with low heart-wrung groans, and faces bathed in tears, they lifted up their right hands to heaven, avowing, by this sublime appeal, that they had now 'joined themselves to the Lord in an everlasting Covenant, that shall not be forgotten.'" This covenant was renewed by the COVENANTERS (which see) at Lanark in 1666.

COVENANT (THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND), one of the most important documents connected with the religious history of Scotland. It was framed as a bond of union between England, Ireland, and Scotland. The first intention of some of the English at least was to form a civil league between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, but after due consideration it was resolved that there should be also a religious union between the three kingdoms, cemented by their entering into a Solemn League and Covenant. A draught of the document was drawn up by Alexander Henderson, one of the most eminent ministers of the time, which, after a few unimportant amendments, was adopted by all parties concerned, at a meeting in the Scottish capital. On the 25th of September 1643, both Houses of Parliament, with the Assembly of Divines, and the Scottish Commissioners, assembled in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, to take this important Covenant into serious consideration. Divine service having been performed, the Solemn League was read, article by article, from a parchment roll, the whole assembly standing uncovered, and swearing to it with their hands lifted up to heaven. The document being thus adopted by the English Parliament, was retransmitted to Scotland, with orders that it should be subscribed throughout the kingdom.

The Solemn League and Covenant was framed with the view of accomplishing several most important objects affecting deeply the interests of the church and the nation. These objects are thus briefly summed up by Dr. M'Crie: "In this Covenant our fathers bound themselves and their posterity, first, To endeavour the preservation of the Reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, the reformation of religion in England and Ireland, 'according to the Word of God and the example of the best Reformed Churches,' and the bringing of the three Churches to the nearest possible conjunction and uniformity in religion; secondly, To the extirpation of Popery and Prelacy; thirdly, To the preservation of the rights of Parliament, of the liberties of the kingdoms, and of his majesty's person and authority; and, lastly, they pledge themselves to personal reformation, and a holy life."

The great body of the people of all ranks entered with their whole heart into this solemn pledge, and thus the three kingdoms bound themselves to maintain the holy cause of the Reformation against all who might oppose it: "There can be no doubt," says Dr. Hetherington, "in the mind of any intelligent and thoughtful man, that on it mainly rests under Providence the noble structure of the British Constitution. But for it, so far as man may judge, these kingdoms would have been placed beneath the deadening bondage of absolute despotism; and in the fate of Britain the liberty and civilization of the world would have sustained a fatal paralyzing shock." Whatever may be thought of this strong view of the subject, there can be little diversity of opinion as to the peculiar importance and suitableness of such a transaction at the critical period in which it took place. Great principles were embodied in the Solemn League and Covenant, which no nation nor even a single individual could subscribe without involving himself in very solemn responsibilities. But it is a question on which serious doubts are entertained by many sincere Christians, whether in any human transaction the generation existing at any period of a nation's history can possibly involve their posterity in obligations of a moral character additional to those which God hath imposed upon all Christians of all ages and nations. Dr. M'Crie, however, who seems to hold the perpetual obligation of the covenants, alleges, in opposition to such scruples as we have now referred to, that "the Solemn League, as well as the National Covenant of Scotland, were properly national and public deeds, binding, indeed, to the external support of a certain profession of religion, but not necessarily implying spiritual qualifications in those who entered into them. Vowing is, in its own nature, not a religious but a moral duty, competent to nations as well as individuals; and our covenants may be vindicated on the same principle as the oaths which Britain still considers herself entitled to exact from those who hold the highest official stations in the country." To all this it is usually replied, that the vows or covenants into which nations may enter, are quite competent for them in the existing circumstances, but no possible state of circumstances can be of so universal a character as to require a covenant which would be of universal obligation. Should the covenant be of so general a nature as to apply to the nation in every succeeding age, and under every variety of circumstances, even then its obligation does not arise from the fact of its being the covenant of this nation, but because it embodies principles which are binding upon all nations and in all circumstances.

Charles I. was earnestly pressed by the Scottish commissioners to subscribe the Solemn League, but to all their entreaties, even on their bended knees, he lent a deaf ear, alleging that he was bound by his coronation oath to defend the prelacy and the ceremonies of the English church, and that rather than wrong his conscience by violating that oath, he would forfeit his crown and his life. In 1650, however, Charles II. declared his approbation both of this and the National Covenant by a solemn oath; and in the course of the same year he made a further declaration to the same purpose at Dunfermline, renewing it in the following year at Scone. Throughout the whole of these transactions Charles was wholly hypocritical and insincere, being actuated by no other motive than a desire to secure at all hazards the support of the Scottish Presbyterians. Accordingly, before this unprincipled monarch landed from Holland, he agreed to swear and subscribe the Covenant, and yet the discovery was afterwards made that while on the Continent he had embraced Popery, the only religion in which he could be said to have continued till his death. Profligate and faithless, he had no regard for obligations of any kind, but much less those which were connected with sacred things. When he had succeeded in 1662 in thrusting Episcopacy upon the Scottish people, the Parliament of Scotland passed a declaration which was ordered to be subscribed by all persons in public trust, and which was to the following effect: "I do sincerely affirm and declare that I judge it unlawful for subjects, under pretext of reformation, or any other pretext whatsoever, to enter into Leagues and Covenants, or to take up arms against the king, or those commissioned by him, and all those gatherings, petitions, &c., that were used in the beginning, and carrying on of the late troubles, were unlawful and seditious. And particularly, that these oaths, whereof the one was commonly called the National Covenant (as it was sworn and subscribed in the year 1638, and thereafter), and the other entitled a Solemn League and Covenant, were and are in themselves unlawful oaths, and that there lieth no obligation upon me, or any of the subjects, from the said oaths, to endeavour any alteration of the government in Church or State, as it is now established by the laws of the kingdom." Not only were the Covenants thus required to be formally renounced, but they were torn in pieces at the Cross of Edinburgh by the public hangman. Some other provincial towns exceeded the capital in showing indignity to these sacred bonds. Thus in the town of Linlithgow, on the 29th May 1662, being the anniversary of the king's restoration, and ordered to be kept as a public holiday, the following event occurred which we narrate in the graphic language of the younger M'Crie: "After divine service the streets were filled with bonfires, and the fountain in the centre of the town was made to flow with wine. At the Cross was erected an arch upon four pillars, on one side of which appeared the figure of an old hag with the Covenant in her hand, and the inscription, 'A glorious Reformation.' On the top was another figure representing the devil, with this label in his mouth, —'Stand to the cause.' On the king's health being drunk, fire was applied to the frame, and the whole was reduced to ashes, amidst the shouts of a mob inflamed with liquor. This solemn burning of the Covenants was got up by the provost and minister of the place, both of whom had been Covenanters. By the more respectable class of the inhabitants it was witnessed with grief and horror, as a profane and daring affront offered to the God of heaven."

COVENANTERS, a term used to describe those who adhered to the National Covenant of Scotland, which was framed in 1581. This solemn deed was an abjuration of Popery, and a solemn engagement to support the Protestant religion. It originated in a very general, and not altogether unfounded impression which prevailed at the time, and for a considerable period afterwards, that Popery might be again introduced into the country. Attempts were well known to have been made to persuade the then reigning monarch, James VI., to embrace the Roman Catholic faith. This was an object which the Pope had all the more warmly at heart, as the young king was nearest heir to the throne of England. It was at the suggestion of the king, therefore, that John Craig drew up the National Covenant, which James and his household were the first to swear and subscribe on the 28th January 1581, and which at first received the name of "the King's Confession." Having thus been signed by the king, it was cheerfully and extensively subscribed by persons of all ranks throughout the kingdom. Those who appended their subscriptions to this important deed swore to adhere to and defend the Reformed doctrine and discipline of the Reformed Church of Scotland.

In consequence of a visible and lamentable declension of piety in the church and country, it was agreed to in the General Assembly, that there should be a public renewal of the National Covenant. This accordingly took place at Edinburgh, on Tuesday, 30th March, 1596. The transaction is thus briefly described by Dr. M'Crie: "On this solemn occasion Davidson, who was chosen to preside, preached so much to the conviction of his hearers, and, in their name, offered up a confession of their sins to heaven with such sincere and fervent emotion, that the whole assembled ministers melted into tears before him; and rising from their seats at his desire, and lifting up their right hands, they renewed their covenant with God, 'protesting to walk more warily in their ways, and to be more diligent in their charges.' This scene, which continued during three hours, was deeply affecting beyond any thing that the oldest person present had ever witnessed. As the greater part of the ministers were not present to join in the sacred action, the Assembly ordained that it should be repeated in the different synods and presbyteries, and afterwards extended to congregations; and the ordinance was obeyed with an alacrity and fervour which spread from presbytery to presbytery, and from parish to parish, till all Scotland, like Judah of old, 'rejoiced at the oath.'"

It was quite plain, that, however plausibly the king had acted for some time, his principles were widely opposed to those of the conscientious Presbyterians of Scotland. At heart he was a warm Episcopalian, and resolved to embrace the earliest opportunity of supplanting Presbytery by Prelacy. And yet strenuously though he aimed at the accomplishment of his favourite design, his plans were for a long time incessantly thwarted. At length having succeeded to the throne of England, on the death of Elizabeth in 1603, he set himself with redoubled ardour to the task of reducing the Church of Scotland to the model of the English church. Before leaving his northern dominions, he had succeeded in establishing bishops, but he had found a difficulty in reconciling the church to these dignitaries, and he had not even procured a recognition of them by the Supreme Ecclesiastical Court. Enraged at the constant opposition to his royal will, he had prorogued and altered the time of Assemblies at his pleasure, and waxing more confident in consequence of his elevation to the English throne, he caused the Assembly, which should have met at Aberdeen in 1605, to be prorogued without fixing any time for its next meeting. This was felt to be an arbitrary and high handed attempt to interfere with the ecclesiastical liberties of the Presbyterian church. It was resolved, accordingly, to assert and maintain the right of the church to convene and constitute her own assemblies. A few faithful and zealous ministers therefore assembled at Aberdeen, determined at least to constitute the Assembly, and appoint another meeting. The king, meanwhile, had received early intelligence of the project, and had given orders to Straiton of Laurieston, the royal commissioner, to dissolve the meeting, simply because it had not been called by royal authority. The brethren met on the day agreed upon, and having been constituted, the king's letter was in course of being read, when a messenger-at-arms arrived, and in the king's name commanded them to dissolve on pain of rebellion. The Assembly expressed their willingness to dissolve, provided the royal commissioner would, in the regular way, appoint a time and place for the next meeting. This proposal was rejected by the commissioner, whereupon the Moderator, at the request of the brethren, appointed the Assembly to meet at the same place, on the last Tuesday of September, and dissolved the meeting.

The ministers who composed the Assembly at Aberdeen were forthwith put on trial for high treason, and banished from the kingdom. Shortly before, a few of the more zealous brethren had been invited to London on pretence of holding consultation with the king, and once there they were prevented from returning to Scotland. The king now finding himself in more favourable circumstances, proceeded to carry forward his design of establishing prelacy in his native country. With this view he took another step in advance, by appointing the bishops to be constant moderators, or, in other words, that they should have power, in virtue of their office, constantly to preside in all meetings of Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies. This act of royal aggression on the liberties of the church met with violent resistance on the part of the church courts, giving rise to many unseemly and disgraceful scenes. But the king was not to be deterred from the attainment of his favourite object. In an Assembly held at Glasgow in 1610, he succeeded, by bribery and intimidation, in obtaining the consent of the church to receive the bishops as moderators of diocesan synods, and to confer on them "the power of excommunicating and absolving offenders, of ordaining and deposing ministers, and visiting the churches within their respective dioceses." The Assembly which thus sanctioned Episcopacy in a Presbyterian church and country, has been uniformly regarded by Scottish ecclesiastical historians as neither a free nor legal Assembly, and hence all its acts were pronounced by the Assembly of 1638 to be null and void. A number of the ministers who voted in favour of the bishops being constant moderators did so unwittingly, and without being fully aware of the real design of the proposal. The king, however, was delighted with the success of his schemes; and the Scottish bishops, quite cognizant of the royal purposes, hastened to avail themselves of the advantage they had gained. Three of them immediately set out for London, and having obtained episcopal ordination, returned to confer consecration upon the rest, without obtaining, or even asking, the sanction of Presbytery, Synod, or Assembly. This, in their view, was enough to give them full and independent authority over their brethren. Without hesitation they took the chair at all meetings of church courts, and pretended to exercise the uncontrolled power of diocesan bishops. The people, however, treated the king's bishops with the utmost contempt, and the ministers preached from the pulpit against them as intruders, while they refused to acknowledge their usurped authority. The king, finding that his prelates were held in little estimation, endeavoured to give them a factitious importance by constituting High Commission Courts, which were designed to enable them to rule independently altogether of the regular Presbyterian ecclesiastical courts. But the bishops, knowing the temper of the people among whom they dwelt, forbore from exercising the authority which it was the royal pleasure they should assume. Thus matters went on quietly for a time, and, notwithstanding the existence of prelates in the Scottish church, its usual presbyterial machinery continued in undisturbed operation.

The apparent calmness and contentment which prevailed throughout Scotland deceived King James as to the real state of popular feeling towards the bishops. Persuading himself that the ministers and their people were quite submissive to his wishes on the point of church order, he resolved to try still further whether they would submit with equal readiness to the ceremonies of the English church. The innovations, however, which he introduced met with the most determined resistance from all classes. But the king succeeded in overcoming opposition so far as to get a majority of the General Assembly to agree to the five articles of conformity to the English church, well known by the name of the FIVE ARTICLES OF PERTH (which see). These obnoxious ceremonies which James sought to thrust upon his Scottish subjects had no sooner passed the Assembly, which was packed for the purpose, than they were ratified by the privy council, and in July 1621 they received the sanction of Parliament. But though the new rites had become the law of the land, they were far from being generally adopted by the Scottish Presbyterians. During the remainder of his reign, James took no further steps to interfere with the church and people of Scotland. He had effected what he had long wished, the establishment of prelacy. But the bishops were detested by the people, and their churches were almost wholly deserted. Vital godliness, however, was not yet utterly a stranger in the land. Many faithful minsters, notwithstanding the discouragement which they received from the bishops, continued to preach the gospel with earnestness and power. Nor were they left without visible tokens of the approval of their heavenly Master; for amid the spiritual darkness which so extensively covered the land, the hearts of God's people were cheered by the occurrence of two remarkable revivals of religion, the one at Stewarton in 1625, and the other at the Kirk of Shotts in 1630.

Meanwhile James had been succeeded by his son Charles I., who, naturally of a haughty and imperious temper, and strongly attached to prelacy, and even popery, set himself from the commencement of his reign to enforce the observance in Scotland of the whole ritual and ceremonies of the English church. Though more than one attempt had been made to introduce the English liturgy into use among the Presbyterians north of the Tweed, it had hitherto been rejected. Now, however, Laud, the semi-popish Archbishop of Canterbury, had drawn up a liturgy of his own, which nearly resembled the Romish breviary, and, particularly in the communion service, was wholly founded on the mass-book. This most objectionable service-book Charles commanded to be used in all the Scottish churches. Every minister was enjoined to procure two copies under pain of deprivation, and an order was issued by the king in council that it should be read in all the churches. The day on which this Anglo-popish liturgy was first to be brought into use was the 23d July 1637, a day long to be remembered as the first outbreak of a religious commotion which agitated Scotland for a long period. The scene which took place in Edinburgh on that fatal day is thus described by Dr. M'Crie: "On the morning of this Sabbath, one Henderson, a reader in the High Church of St. Giles, who was a great favourite with the people, read the usual prayers about eight o'clock; and when he had ended, he said, with tears in his eyes, 'Adieu, good people, for I think this is the last time of my reading prayers in this place.' The dean of Edinburgh was appointed to perform the service, after the form of the obnoxious liturgy. An immense crowd, attracted by curiosity, had assembled. At the stated hour, the dean was seen issuing out of the vestry, clad in his surplice, and passed through the crowd to the reading-desk, the people gazing as they would at a show. No sooner, however, had he begun to read, than his voice was drowned in a tumultuous shout, chiefly from persons of the lower classes, denouncing the innovation. An old woman, named Janet Geddes, who kept a green-stall in the High Street, no longer able to conceal her indignation, cried out 'Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug!' and, with these words, launched at the dean's head the stool on which she had been sitting. Others followed her example, and the confusion soon became universal. The service was interrupted, and the women, whose zeal on this occasion was most conspicuous, rushed to the desk in wild disorder. The dean threw off his surplice and fled, to avoid being torn in pieces. The bishop of Edinburgh then ascended the pulpit, and endeavoured to allay the ferment; but his address only inflamed them the more. He was answered by a volley of sticks, stones, and other missiles, with cries of 'A Pope! a Pope!—Antichrist!—pull him down!—stone him!' and on returning in his coach, had he not been protected by the magistrates, he might have fallen a victim to the fury of the mob—a martyr to the new liturgy!"

Alarmed at the critical aspect which affairs had assumed, not only in the metropolis, but throughout the whole of Scotland, a number of noblemen and gentlemen hastily forwarded an earnest supplication to the king for the suppression of the service-book. This, however, he positively refused, and issued a new proclamation commanding implicit submission to the canons, and immediate reception of the service-book. The suppliants, as they called themselves, finding that all their entreaties and remonstrances were treated with disdain, proceeded in a body to Stirling, and there lodged a solemn protest against the royal proclamation, with the Scottish privy council, which met at Stirling. The utmost distraction prevailed, and it was extensively felt that in the present state of the church and country, the time was peculiarly appropriate for a renewal of the National Covenant, with such additions and modifications as the circumstances seemed to require. The solemn transaction, accordingly, took place in the Greyfriars' church at Edinburgh, on the 1st of March 1638. Charles and his Scottish subjects were now completely at variance. The Covenant became the watchword. Men of all classes applied for permission to subscribe their names to the holy bond, and though threats and intimidations were used in many cases to deter the people from signing, some wrote their names to the document with their own blood. Some of the most eminent of the Scottish nobles enthusiastically espoused the cause of the Covenant, and the Covenanters, as they came to be called, became a powerful body, animated with holy zeal in defence of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Charles now saw that he had roused a spirit which it would be difficult for him to lay. At first he craftily assumed an apparently conciliatory aspect, sending the Marquis of Hamilton as his Commissioner to Scotland, with strict injunctions, by kindness and courtesy, to endeavour to prevail upon the Scots to renounce the Covenant which they had so solemnly sworn. Such measures were of course utterly fruitless. But with that duplicity which formed a prominent feature of his character, Charles was in the meantime secretly planning and making preparations for an invasion of Scotland. Finding that Hamilton, though aided by the bishops, could neither weaken nor divide the firm phalanx of the Covenanters, the king saw that it was absolutely necessary to make some concessions to the wishes of the Scottish people. He summoned, accordingly, a free General Assembly, to meet at Glasgow, and appointed the Marquis of Hamilton to attend as the royal commissioner. This remarkable Assembly met on the 21st November 1638, with Alexander Henderson in the Moderator's chair. The instructions of the king to his commissioner were, that he should use all his endeavours to excite jealousy between the clerical and lay members, and failing in this, he was to protest against the whole proceedings, and by no means to allow the bishops to be censured. The conduct of this memorable Assembly was characterized by the utmost decorum and dignity. Hamilton exerted himself to accomplish the royal will, and to prevent the censure of the bishops. All his efforts were unavailing, and perceiving that the members were determined to proceed to the business for which they had met, he rose, and in the name of the king, as the head of the church, dissolved the Assembly. Such an event as this had been anticipated, and a solemn protestation had been previously drawn up, which was read as the commissioner was in the act of retiring, and after a suitable address from the Moderator, followed by similar addresses from some of the other members, the Assembly proceeded to business. Their first act was to declare null and void the six so-called Assemblies, which had been held from the time that James ascended the throne of England, including the Assemblies from 1606 to 1618. This part of the proceedings was followed by another equally important, the censure of the Scottish bishops, whom they charged with various delinquencies. On that occasion the Moderator, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, pronounced sentence of excommunication upon two archbishops and six bishops, of deposition upon four, and of suspension upon two. Thus was Episcopacy abolished in Scotland, and the national Presbyterian Church once more set free from the thralldom in which for many years it had been held. Well may the Assembly of 1638 be regarded, to use the language of Dr. M'Crie, "as one of the noblest efforts ever made by the church to assert her intrinsic independence, and the sole headship of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The determination with which the Glasgow Assembly had acted, roused the indignation of Charles, and sensitively jealous of the royal prerogative, he resolved to commence hostilities without delay. Scotland rose as one man, and preparations were immediately made to encounter the king's army, which was on its way to attempt the subjugation of the rebellious Scots. A large force was levied, which was put under the command of General Leslie, and all the fortified places in Scotland were occupied by the Covenanters, who, to show that this war was forced upon them, and not engaged in from choice, published a vindication of their conduct in taking up arms.

The threatened invasion at length took place. A fleet of twenty-eight ships of war, carrying from five to six thousand English troops, made its appearance in the Firth of Forth. Not a soldier, however, was allowed to land, but Hamilton, who accompanied the fleet, judged it most expedient that it should retire as quickly as possible. Part of the English forces had been routed at Kelso, with the loss of three hundred men. Baillie, who was with the Scots army when encamped at Dunse Law, gives the following lively description of a regiment of the Covenanters: "Our regiment lay on the sides of the hill almost round about. Every company had, fleeing at the captain's tent door, a brave new colour, stamped with the Scottish arms, and this motto, For Christ's Crown and Covenant, in golden letters. Our soldiers were all lusty and full of courage; the most of them stout young plowmen; great cheerfulness in the face of all. They were clothed in olive or grey plaiden, with bonnets having knots of blue ribands. The captains, who were barons or country gentlemen, were distinguished by blue ribands worn scarf-wise across the body. None of our gentlemen were any thing the worse of lying some weeks together in their cloaks and boots on the ground. Our meanest soldiers were always served in wheat bread, and a goat would have got them a lamb-leg, which was a dainty word to the most of them. We were much obliged to the town of Edinburgh for money: Mr. Harry Pollok, by his sermons, moved them to shake out their purses. Every one encouraged another. The sight of the nobles and their beloved pastors daily raised their hearts. The good sermons and prayers, morning and evening, under the roof of heaven, to which their drums did call them instead of bells, also Leslie's skill, prudence, and fortune, made them as resolute for battle as could be wished. We feared that emulation among our nobles might have done harm; but such was the wisdom and authority of that old little crooked soldier (General Leslie), that all, with an incredible submission, gave over themselves to be guided by him, as if he had been the great Solyman. Had you lent your ear in the morning, and especially at even, and heard in the tents the sound of some singing psalms, some praying, and some reading the Scripture, ye would have been refreshed. True, there was swearing and cursing and brawling in some quarters, whereat we were grieved; but we hoped, if our camp had been a little settled, to have gotten some way for these misorders. For myself I never found myself in better temper than I was all that time till my head was again homeward; for I was as a man who had taken my leave from the world, and was resolved to die in that service, without return."

Though Charles was at great pains to represent the Covenanters as a set of lawless rebels, they felt and constantly proclaimed that the war in which they were engaged was essentially a religious war. Animated by a noble zeal in behalf of the rights of conscience and of truth, they made a determined stand against the English invaders, and Charles, discouraged by the ill success of his own forces, was compelled to propose a negotiation for peace, whereupon a treaty was signed on both sides, though somewhat general and vague in its nature. The fact seemed to be that the king had no intention at heart to abide by his engagements. Some suspicion of this kind seems to have been entertained by the Covenanters, who, while they disbanded their soldiers, still kept their officers in pay, and ready for actual service. Carrying on his crafty schemes, Charles sanctioned a meeting of the General Assembly to be held at Edinburgh in August 1639. The Earl of Traquair was appointed to attend as King's Commissioner, and in obedience to his master's instructions, he endeavoured to prevail upon the members to declare all that was done against the bishops at the Glasgow Assembly null and void. Finding that the Assembly remained firm, he changed his tactics, and professed to concede all the demands of the Covenanters, assuring them that he would do his utmost to get the parliament to ratify the abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland, and of all the innovations which had been condemned by the Glasgow Assembly. The artifice was but too successful. The Covenanters imagined in their simplicity that the king had relented, and was now about to restore peace to their troubled church and people. Still further to quiet the suspicions of the Presbyterians, both the Commissioner and the Scottish privy council gave their sanction with apparent readiness to the National Covenant, in the form in which it had been signed the preceding year, and on this understanding it was ordered to be subscribed by all classes throughout the land.

Charles professed to feel indignant at the conduct of his Commissioner, who, he alleged, had exceeded his instructions in agreeing to the abolition of Prelacy, and the renewal of the Covenant. The expectations of the Covenanters were accordingly doomed to bitter disappointment, and when the Scottish Parliament met to ratify the acts of the recent Assembly, it was prorogued by royal mandate, till June of the following year. And when the members of parliament sent the Earl of Loudoun, with other deputies, to London, to remonstrate with the king on such an arbitrary proceeding, Loudoun was sent to the Tower, accused of high treason, and it is said, would have been privately murdered had not the Marquis of Hamilton pointed out the danger of such a step. The infatuated monarch, undeterred by the misfortunes which had attended his former attempted invasion of Scotland, planned another expedition of a similar kind. The Covenanters, however, no sooner received intelligence of the royal design, than, without waiting for the approach of the English army, they crossed the borders, and entered England, encountering and defeating the enemy in a decisive engagement. The success which they had once more gained led to the formation of another treaty.

A civil war now broke out in England, Charles having quarrelled with the parliament. The Scots used every effort to reconcile the two contending parties to each other, but all their attempts having proved ineffectual, they joined the parliament in defending the liberties of the country against a rash and hot-headed monarch. In 1643 the Solemn League and Covenant was formed, uniting in a bond of peace and amity the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. (See COVENANT, SOLEMN LEAGUE AND). The same year was convened the famous WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (which see), in which, after a debate of thirty days, the divine right of Presbytery was carried by an overwhelming majority. Several commissioners from Scotland attended, and took an active part in the deliberations of this body. To the labours of the Westminster Assembly are due the Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which form the recognized standards of all the Presbyterian Churches, both in Britain and America. From the sitting of that body, indeed, onward until the Restoration, Presbytery was the established form of religion, not only in Scotland, but also in England and Ireland. In the course of the civil war, sects of different kinds, and bearing a variety of names, arose in England, and the whole country was distracted with religious contentions in a thousand different forms. But amid all this endless variety of sentiment, it was only with the Papists and the Prelatists that the Scots Presbyterians were called to contend. The sectaries, however, joined with the Independents in opposing the Presbyterians, chiefly on the question of toleration, and ultimately the covenanted cause was entirely overthrown in England.

One of the most violent opponents of the Covenanters in Scotland was Montrose, who, though at an earlier period one of the keenest supporters of the Covenant, deserted the standard of the Scottish Presbyterians, and became an active and enthusiastic leader of the Royalist army. Taking advantage of the absence of the main body of the Covenanters' forces, which were engaged in England under General Leslie, Montrose attacked a detachment in the neighbourhood of Perth, and gained an easy victory. He now advanced northward, taking possession first of Perth, then of Aberdeen, giving up the inhabitants to cruelty, rapine, and the sword. He now penetrated into Argyleshire, carrying destruction and devastation before him, burning the houses and the corn, killing the cattle, and massacring in cold blood all the males that were fit to bear arms.

Scotland was at this period in a most miserable condition. To war were added its frequent attendants, famine and pestilence. The whole country was in a state of alarm, almost bordering on despair. The Covenanters gave themselves to prayer and fasting, and their hearts were speedily released from painful anxiety, by the welcome intelligence that the king's forces had been defeated by General Leslie and his troops at Naseby in England. The regular body of the Covenanters' army being now set free, returned to Scotland, and succeeded in routing the Marquis of Montrose at Philiphaugh, near Selkirk.

In the spring of 1646, an event occurred which perplexed the Covenanters not a little. They had taken part with the English Parliament against Charles, but to their astonishment the king, after his defeat by Cromwell, made his appearance in the midst of the Scots army, throwing himself upon their sympathy and protection. They were thrown into complete embarrassment. They treated the monarch with the respect which was due to his rank, and readily engaged to support him, provided he would dismiss his evil counsellors, and sign the Solemn League. These conditions they implored him to accept, but in vain. The king declared that he would rather die than break his coronation oath, which, as he alleged, bound him to support the English Church and all its ceremonies. He professed his willingness to consent to the establishment of Presbytery in Scotland, but the Scots knew well that he was secretly bent on destroying the cause of the Reformation in England. What then was to be done with Charles now that he was in the hands of the Covenanters? Were they to give him up unconditionally into the hands of the Parliament party, as the English wished, or were they to stipulate as the condition of his being surrendered, that he should be allowed to return to some one of his royal palaces with honour, safety, and freedom? Months were spent in negotiations on the subject, and at length the person of the king was confided to the hands of the English, on the express understanding that there should be "no harm, prejudice, injury, or violence done to his royal person." Yet in three years from the date of his surrender he was tried, condemned, and beheaded.

On the day after the execution of Charles I. was known at Edinburgh, his son, Charles II., was proclaimed king at the public Cross by the Committee of Estates, with this proviso, however, that "before being admitted to the exercise of his royal power, he shall give satisfaction to this kingdom in the things that concern the security of religion, according to the National Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant." This stipulation was laid before Charles at the Hague. But at first he refused to accede to it. In the following year, however, the Covenanters were more successful, and setting sail along with the commissioners, he reached the shores of Scotland on the 23d of June 1650. Before landing, he consented to subscribe the Covenant, and accordingly the test was administered. On the August following, this profligate monarch repeated an engagement to support the Covenant. All the while he was secretly plotting the subver-

The arrival of the new monarch was hailed by all classes of the Scottish people, but their joy was suddenly interrupted by the arrival of Cromwell with a large army, who defeated the Covenanters at Dunbar, when no fewer than three thousand of the Scots fell on the field of battle. Charles, who at heart hated the adherents of the Covenant, was by no means dissatisfied with the defeat which they had sustained. In the midst of the distractions which agitated the country, the monarch was crowned at Scone on the 1st January 1651, and at the close of Divine service the National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant were produced and read, and the king solemnly swore them. He also took oath to support and defend the Church of Scotland. The imposing ceremonial, however, did not succeed in removing the suspicion which many of the Covenanters entertained, that Charles was simply acting a part to deceive his Scottish subjects. One of his first steps, and one which showed his insincerity, was to get himself surrounded in his court by the enemies of the Reformation. By their advice he took an expedition into England, and his army being defeated at Worcester, he left his kingdom to the mercy of Cromwell, and took refuge in France.

The restoration of Charles to his throne, which took place in 1660, was a calamitous event for the Scottish Covenanters. No sooner did he find himself once more in the seat of government than he directed his efforts towards the subversion of the civil and religious liberties of Scotland. To accomplish this object his first step was to get the Parliament to pass an act recognizing the royal supremacy in all matters temporal and spiritual, a principle which he caused to be formally embodied in the Oath of Allegiance. This act was opposed to the conscientious views of a large body of the ministers and members of the Church of Scotland, who had always contended for the sole headship of Christ. "At last," says Dr. M'Crie, "tired of annulling acts of Parliament passed during the previous period of reformation, the Scottish counsellors of Charles, in the same year, passed a sweeping measure, annulling the Parliaments themselves. By this measure, which was called the Act Rescissory, all the proceedings for reformation between 1638 and 1650 were declared rebellious and treasonable; the National Covenant and Solemn League were condemned as unlawful oaths; the Glasgow Assembly of 1638 denounced as an unlawful and seditious meeting; and the ordering of the government of the church was declared to be an inherent right of the Crown. In short, all that had been done for the reformation of the church, during the second reforming period, was by this act completely annulled."

Not contented with procuring legal enactments hostile to the cause of God and the Covenant, Charles entered upon the work of persecution, putting to death some of the leading noblemen who had cast in their lot with the Covenanters. The first victim was the Marquis of Argyle, one of the most distinguished Christian and patriotic noblemen of whom Scotland can boast. He had long taken a leading part in supporting the cause of the Covenants; and by the sagacity of his counsels, as well as by the purity of his principles and the ardour of his zeal, he was one of the most effective agents in carrying forward the work of the second Reformation. Argyle was followed to the scaffold by James Guthrie of Stirling, one of the most active high-principled and devoted ministers of his time. These acts of cruelty, which were perpetrated with the royal sanction, were designed to intimidate the friends of the Covenants, and thus to facilitate the re-establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland. This was forthwith done on the simple fiat of Charles. A royal proclamation was issued restoring the bishops, prohibiting all meetings of synods and assemblies, and forbidding the ministers to preach against the change on pain of imprisonment. To this despotic act of the king the country submitted with far more readiness than was anticipated. Prelacy was re-introduced into the Scottish church; diocesan courts were established, in which the bishops ruled with a high hand; the covenants were declared to be illegal, and not only renounced by many, but in some places publicly burnt. Nay, to secure the authority of the bishops, which not a few of the ministers were disposed to disown, an act of Parliament was passed depriving all those ministers of their charges who had been admitted since 1649, when patronage was abolished, unless they obtained a presentation from the lawful patron and collation from the bishop of the diocese before the 1st of November. The consequence was, that nearly four hundred ministers chose rather to be ejected from their parishes than to comply with the severe requirements of the act. Thus, in one day, were almost the whole of the west, and a great part of the south, of Scotland, deprived of their pastors. This measure was one of the most effectual which could have been devised to rouse the indignation of the people against the bishops, and excite a rooted hatred of prelacy. Nor were these feelings abated, but, on the contrary, they were rendered much more intense by the careless manner in which the vacant charges were filled, the new ministers being weak and worthless.

The iron heel of the oppressor was now fairly planted upon the neck of enslaved and degraded Scotland. Darkness covered the land, and the hearts of the godly began to fail and be discouraged. But still there were some faithful men who boldly lifted their voices against the defections of the times, and the tyranny of the ruling powers. Persecution was again commenced against these friends of the covenant. Many of the ministers were thrown into prison, and others could only find safety in flight. In 1663 the people commenced holding field-meettings or conventicles, as they were called by their enemies, at which, in some solitary sequestered spot, they secretly but eagerly received the Word of Life from the mouths of their beloved pastors. On these occasions multitudes assembled from all quarters to worship God as their consciences dictated, while the churches of the curates were almost wholly deserted. This enraged the bishops, who forthwith procured an act declaring that all who preached without their permission should be punished as seditious persons, and at the same time enforcing the attendance of the people on their parish churches under heavy penalties. This was the commencement of a series of oppressive measures which set all Scotland once more in a flame. The military were employed in hunting down the Covenanters with the most fierce and unrelenting cruelty. The soldiers scoured the country, particularly in the west and south, subjecting the unoffending peasantry to the most intolerable oppressions. Long and patiently was this cruel treatment endured. At length, however, the Covenanters rose in the west, and renewing the covenant, solemnly pledged themselves to its defence. Now commenced a bloody and protracted war, in which the followers of Cargill fought manfully in defence of their country's civil and religious liberties. Few in number though they were, and feeble in physical power compared with their enemies, they fought and fell in the cause of truth and righteousness. The firmness and unflinching determination of the persecuted remnant exasperated their enemies beyond all measure; and while the emissaries of Charles inflicted cruel tortures on the most obscure individuals who were bold enough to avow their attachment to the covenant, nobles even of the highest rank did not escape their resentment.

Severity seemed to have no effect in diminishing the zeal of the Covenanters. The king perceiving this, tried conciliatory measures, issuing in 1669 an Act of Indulgence granting relief on certain conditions to those who could not conscientiously conform to Episcopacy. This had the effect of dividing the ranks of the Presbyterian ministers, some being persuaded to avail themselves of this opportunity of resuming their pastoral labours, a step which only led to a more bitter persecution of those brethren who refused to accept of the Indulgence. Attempts were also made, in which Archbishop Leighton took an active part, to unite the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, but these were wholly unsuccessful. The field meetings were now more numerous than ever, and the Lord's Supper was often administered in the open air. Mr. Blackader mentions that on one occasion of this kind there were sixteen tables in all, so that about 3,200 communicated that day. These field-meetings the enemy were anxious to put down, and to oppress still more those who attended them, all such persons were not only subjected to severe penalties, but a heavy tax, called the cess, was imposed upon them expressly for the purpose of maintaining the army which was employed in hunting them down. Yet the greater part of the Covenanters submitted to pay, contenting themselves with protesting against the use to which the money was put. Such oppressive exactions only increased the number of those who attended the field-conventicles. Charles and the enemies of the covenants became all the more enraged. Claverhouse and his dragoons were despatched to the west of Scotland, and the battles of Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge showed the courage and unflinching determination which the Covenanters maintained against those whom they conscientiously regarded as the enemies of Christ and his cause in Scotland.

One party of the Covenanters, headed by Cargill and Cameron, adopted extreme opinions, which separated them from their brethren. They maintained that Charles had forfeited all right to the civil obedience of his subjects by violating the oath which he had taken at his coronation; and that all the friends of true religion, and the supporters of the covenanted work of reformation, were fully warranted in taking up arms against a royal traitor and persecutor. These principles were openly avowed by the Society people or Cameronians, as they were called after Richard Cameron, one of their leaders, and the profession of such sentiments roused the government to acts of greater cruelty and oppression. Though the great mass of the Covenanters vindicated their appearance in arms on very different grounds, and entertained no design to overturn the throne, but only to reduce its prerogatives within reasonable limits, yet their determined resistance to the Erastian interference of the king with the sole Headship of Christ over his church, brought down upon them the merciless vengeance of a tyrannical government. Many of the best and bravest of the Covenanters were persecuted even to the death, calmly yielding their lives in the cause of Christ and the covenants.

At length, in the beginning of the year 1685, Charles II. died, and the Covenanters might now have expected to enjoy a respite from the fierce persecutions with which for a long time they had been visited. A few months, however, had only elapsed, when James VII., who succeeded his brother Charles, declared it to be his determination to extirpate Presbyterianism from the land. Against this popish and arbitrary monarch, the extreme or Cameronian party issued a solemn declaration. A few days before the publication of this document, the Earl of Argyle, with the consent of a number of exiled noblemen, set sail for Scotland with an expedition, intending, if possible, to overturn the government of James. It was fully expected by the earl and his adherents, that their enterprise would be gladly hailed by the Covenanters. In this, however, they were disappointed. Mr. Renwick, in the name of the party, declined all interference, chiefly on the ground that the expedition "was not concerted according to the ancient plea of the Scottish Covenanters, in defence of our reformation expressly according to our Covenants, National and Solemn League." The persecuted remnant in Scotland still continued to maintain their ground on their own principles, and in their own way. Instead of diminishing, they were every day on the increase; and it soon became apparent to the Council, that unless decisive steps were taken, they would become a very powerful body. The most strenuous efforts, accordingly, were made to crush the good cause, and, as one of the most effectual means of doing so, the military not merely dragged to prison, or cruelly murdered, all the Covenanters who fell in their way, but they redoubled their exertions to secure the person of Mr. Renwick, whom they considered as the leader of the party. Still he and his followers assembled, as often as they conveniently could, for the worship of the God of their fathers. And not only so, but they held stated meetings to concert measures for their own defence. At one of these meetings a paper was drawn up, entitled the 'Informatory Vindication,' which having been revised by Mr. Renwick, was printed in Holland, and circulated throughout the kingdom. In that paper they avowed it to be their determination to maintain and contend for the principles of the Reformation. A declaration of this nature only enraged the government the more against them. James, accordingly, under the mask of tolerating "moderate" Presbyterians, issued three different proclamations, threatening vengeance against the more resolute of the party. Some individuals, not being aware of the hidden purpose which the crafty monarch had in view, to support Popery, accepted the indulgence held out to them. Mr. Renwick and his adherents, however, decidedly refused to avail themselves of the offer made, declaring that "nothing can be more vile than when the true religion is tolerated under the notion of a crime, and when the exercise of it is allowed only under heavy restrictions." At the early age of twenty-six, this faithful servant of God, one of the most upright and consistent ministers of the period, was apprehended, tried for treason, and sentenced to be executed in the Grassmarket, Edinburgh. "I am this day to lay down my life," he said at the place of execution, "for these three things: First, For disowning the usurpation and tyranny of James, Duke of York. Second, For preaching that it was unlawful to pay the cess expressly exacted for bearing down the gospel. Third, For teaching that it was lawful for people to carry arms in defence of their meetings for their persecuted gospel ordinances. I think a testimony for these is worth many lives; and if I had ten thousand I would think it little enough to lay them all down for the same." Renwick met death at the hands of his persecutors with a heroism and unflinching fortitude worthy of the last of that noble band of martyrs who sealed with their blood their devoted attachment to the covenanted work of Reformation in Scotland.

The reign of James was destined to be short. He had been an ill-concealed papist from the commencement of his reign, and all his efforts had been secretly directed to the establishment of popery in the land. For a time his object was not apparent, but at length the eyes of the clergy of England were opened, and the alarm was given from a thousand pulpits, that if immediate steps were not taken to avert the threatened danger, popery would ere long become the established religion of England. In vain did James endeavour to intimidate the clergy by imprisoning some of the bishops in the Tower. This only hastened matters to a crisis. The infatuated monarch was driven from his throne, and compelled to seek a refuge on a foreign shore. William, Prince of Orange, at the invitation of the people of England, ascended the throne, and after having patiently endured the most intolerable oppression and sufferings for twenty-eight long years, the Covenanters found in the peaceful Revolution of 1688, the sword of persecution finally sheathed, Presbytery restored to their long-tried but beloved church, and both their civil and religious privileges secured on a firm and satisfactory basis. COW (SACRIFICE OF). See HELFER (SACRIFICE OF).

COW-WORSHIP. The vast utility of the cow, as affording valuable nourishment to man, has made that animal be accounted among many heathen nations as a fit emblem of the earth. In Egypt, in Syria, and in Greece, Isis, the Egyptian goddess, is represented as bearing the head of a cow; Astarte, the Syrian goddess, as wearing the horns of the cow; and the Grecian Juno as having a cow's eyes. Venus is sometimes figured as a cow giving milk to her calf. To be changed into a cow is also an emblem of the earth. The cow of Minos, which on each day was white, red, and black, has been explained as referring to the three different aspects which the earth presents in the bright blaze of noon, in the purple tinge of the evening or morning, and in the dark shades of night. In the fables of Brahmanism, the earth takes the form of a cow named Kamadhouka, which gives its worshippers all that they desire. In the festival which is observed in China in honour of the cultivation of the soil, (see AGRICULTURE, FESTIVAL OF,) a cow is marched in procession through the streets of Pekin, to denote the fertility of the earth. Among the Adighe, a race of Circasians, a cow is offered in sacrifice to ACHIN (which see), the god of horned cattle. According to the cosmogony of the Scandinavian Edda, before the heavens and the earth were created, the cow Audhumbla was produced in the place where the southern fires of the Muspelheim melted the ice of the Niflheim. This cow denotes the cosmogonic earth, the earth without form and void. The representation of a cow giving suck to its calf, is seen in the Egyptian monuments, in the Assyrian sculptures taken from the ruins of Nineveh, in the Lycian bas-reliefs, and on an Etrurian vase. There is a remarkable symbolical representation among the Hindus, consisting of a serpent with a lion's head and a bull's horns, and in its open throat is a cow from which a large cluster of bees are issuing. Müller thus explains the symbol. The serpent signifies the Eternal, who has made light, indicated by the lion; while by his productive power, denoted by the bull, he has given origin to the earth, figured as usual by a cow; and the earth has undergone a destruction, and a re-construction, indicated by the bees. Kæmpfer tells us, that in Japan there is seen in a cavern an idol which is called by the Japanese the great representation of the sun, and which is seated upon a cow denoting the earth. In the Hindu Rig-Vedas, clouds are sometimes symbolized by cows. One of the Asouras is said to have stolen the heavenly cows. It was Pani the merchant, or among the Greeks Hermes, who took away the cows of the sun. This robbery of the cow-clouds is one of the favourite myths of the Greeks. It is found in the history of the son of Mercury, Autolykus, of Bias and Melampus, of Pirithous and Theseus, and in the story of Cacus. In the Rig-Veda, the serpent Ahi has stolen the cows or clouds of Indra, and shut them up in a cavern. Mercury, the god of the harmonies of the world, discovers and delivers these cows. The cow-cloud is the wife, or at least the concubine of Indra, and in this capacity Indra is called Vrichabha, which signifies, "he who gives rain," and also "the bull." When Ahi then, or the serpent, causes the clouds to disappear from the sky, he has stolen from the great god Indra, his spouse, and the cows were pregnant by Ahi, when the lord of thunder delivered them. Among the Hindus the cow is held in the greatest veneration, but particularly the species called the Brahman or sacred cow, and by many families a cow is kept for the mere purpose of worshipping it. See ANIMAL-WORSHIP.

COWL, a kind of monkish habit worn by the Bernardines and Benedictines. Some have distinguished two forms of cowls, the one a gown reaching to the feet, having sleeves and a capuche used in ceremonies; the other a kind of hood to work in, called also a scapular, because it only covers the head and shoulders.

CRANÆA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), supposed to have been derived from a temple on the summit of a hill in Phocis, in which young men officiated as priests, who enjoyed the office for the space of five years.

CRATOS (Gr. strength), the son of Uranus and Ge, one of the ancient Pagan deities of an inferior order.

CREATICOLÆ (Lat. creature worshippers), a Christian sect which arose in the sixth century, headed by Severus of Antioch, who maintained that the body of Christ was corruptible, but in consequence of the Godhead dwelling in it was never corrupted. The controversy in reference to the body of Christ was keenly agitated in the reign of Justinian, who favoured the party of the APHTHARTODOCITES (which see).

CREATION. The systems of cosmogony or theories in reference to the creation of the world have been numerous and varied. It may be interesting, and not uninteresting to describe some of the most important views which have been entertained on this subject.

In ancient times, the opinion was held by some philosophers in Greece, that the world is eternal both in form and duration. Among the most eminent of the advocates of this theory, Aristotle may be ranked. He taught that the universe having been the offspring of an eternal cause, must have been itself eternal. It was not so much in his view a creation, as an emanation of the Deity. The universe, according to Plato, is the eternal representation of the unchangeable idea which was from eternity united with changeable matter. The Neo-Platonists of Alexandria in the sixth century, maintained that God and the universe were co-eternal. Xenophanes, Parmenides, and some other philosophers of ancient Greece, held that God and the universe was the same. This Pantheistic system has been revived in Germany in modern times.

The greater number of the ancient Pagan philosophers, however, taught that the matter or substance of the universe was eternal, while in its present form it had its origin in time. The materia prima, or original condition of the universe, was a state of chaos. The chaos of Hesiod was the parent of Erebus and Night, and from the union of these sprung Air and Day. The Epicurean system of creation was an atomic theory, according to which a fortuitous concurrence of atoms gave rise to the present organization of bodies. In the opinion of the Stoics there were two original principles, God and Matter,—the first active, and the second passive,—and from the operation of the one upon the other the universe was created.

The Scripture doctrine of creation is to be found in the book of Genesis, from which it appears that God created all things out of nothing, by the word of his power. "He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast." The universe was not constructed out of an elementary matter, which existed previously to the work of creation, but matter itself was created or called into existence by the fiat of the Almighty. To assure us of this important truth, Moses expressly tells us, Gen. ii. 3, that "God rested from all his works which he created and made," or as it is in the original, "created to make." The materials from which the heavens and the earth were made, were in a state of chaotic confusion, or as it is expressed in the Mosaic record, were "without form and void." The first element separated from chaos was light, not in its present form, concentrated in a common receptacle, but diffused throughout the universe. The next event in this great work of creation was the formation of the firmament, and a division of the chaotic mass into two great parts, one beneath, and one above the firmament. This was followed by the separation of the land from the waters; then by the creation of grass and herbs, of shrubs and trees; after which were formed the lights of heaven, particularly the sun and moon, in the former of which the light hitherto diffused was collected into a receptacle. The earth being thus prepared to be the habitation of living creatures, God said, "Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven." The earth was next replenished with fourfooted beasts and creeping things. Last of all man was created, and the language in which this crowning act of creating power is described, shows that the highest importance was attached to it by the Deity himself: "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." Man, the highest in the scale of created being, appears last, and it is not a little remarkable that no species or family of existences is created after him. On this subject the late lamented Mr. Hugh Miller forcibly remarks: "With the introduction of man into the scene of existence, creation seems to have ceased. What is it that now takes its place, and performs its work? During the previous dynasties, all elevation in the scale was an effect simply of creation. Nature lay dead in a waste theatre of rock, vapour, and sea, in which the insensate laws, chemical, mechanical, and electric, carried on their blind, unintelligent processes: the creative fiat went forth; and, amid waters that straightway teemed with life in its lower forms, vegetable and animal, the dynasty of the fish was introduced. Many ages passed, during which there took place no farther elevation: on the contrary, in not a few of the newly introduced species of the reigning class there occurred for the first time examples of an asymmetrical misplacement of parts, and, in at least one family of fishes, instances of defect of parts: there was the manifestation of a downward tendency towards the degradation of monstrosity, when the elevatory fiat again went forth, and, through an act of creation, the dynasty of the reptile began. Again many ages passed by, marked, apparently, by the introduction of a warm-blooded oviparous animal, the bird, and of a few marsupial quadrupeds, but in which the prevailing class reigned undeposed, though at least unelevated. Yet again however, the elevatory fiat went forth, and through an act of creation the dynasty of the mammiferous quadruped began. And after the further lapse of ages, the elevatory fiat went forth yet once more in an act of creation; and with the human, heaven-aspiring dynasty, the moral government of God, in its connection with at least the world which we inhabit, 'took beginning.' And then creation ceased. Why? Simply because God's moral government had begun,—because in necessary conformity with the institution of that government, there was to be a thorough identity maintained between the glorified and immortal beings of the terminal dynasty, and the dying magnates of the dynasty which now is; and because, in consequence of the maintenance of this identity as an essential condition of this moral government, mere acts of creation could no longer carry on the elevatory process. The work analogous in its end and object to those acts of creation which gave to our planet its successive dynasties of higher and yet higher existences, is the work of Redemption. It is the elevatory process of the present time,—the only possible provision for that final act of recreation 'to everlasting life,' which shall usher in the terminal dynasty."

The doctrine, that all things were created by God out of nothing, was a stone of stumbling to the Gnostics in the early Christian church, and to all who still cleaved to the cosmoplastic theories of antiquity. Accordingly we find Hermogenes, who lived near the close of the second and the beginning of the third century, reviving the doctrine of the Greek philosophy concerning the Hyle, and he accounted for the existence of the imperfection and evil which are found in the world, by maintaining that "God's creation is conditioned by an inorganic matter which has existed from eternity." Origen, on the other hand, denied the doctrine of a pre-existent matter, and declared his belief in the existing world as having had a specific beginning, but he maintained the idea, to use the language of Neander, "of a continual becoming of this spiritual creation—a relation of cause and effect without temporal beginning—the Platonic idea of an endless becoming, symbolizing the eternity of the divine existence."

Among the modern Jews, there has been a considerable diversity of opinion regarding the creation of the world. Some of them, entertaining the idea that every world must continue seven thousand years, corresponding to the seven days of the week, believe and maintain that there was a world previous to the creation of the present. Others suppose that the world existed from all eternity, and others still, that all creation is an emanation from God. In the twelfth century a dispute arose concerning the antiquity of the universe, and it was argued by a Jewish writer, that "God never existed without matter, as matter never existed without God," an absurd idea, which was ably refuted by Maimonides, who framed the modern Jewish Confession of Faith. A Jew of the name of Sarza was actually burnt alive through the influence of the Rabbies of Spain, for no other crime than maintaining that the world was not produced out of nothing, but that it was created by a successive generation of several days. The doctrine was maintained by a celebrated Rabbi, that God created seven things before the universe,—the throne of God—the sanctuary—the name of the Messiah—paradise—hell—the law—and repentance. Without these he alleged the world could not be supported. He also taught that the heavens were created by the light of the garment of God, as it is written in Scripture, "He covereth himself with light as with a garment, and stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain." The same writer broached the strange idea that the earth was formed out of the snow which was under the throne of the glory of God. On the subject of creation a dispute arose between two celebrated Jewish schools, which is thus noticed by a writer on the history of the Modern Jews: "The one contended that the heavens were created before the earth, because it was necessary that the throne should be made before the footstool. These supported their opinion by these words, 'The heaven is his throne and the earth is his footstool.' The other maintained that the earth was first created, because 'The floor must be laid before the roof can be put on.' In addition to these opinions, the learned Maimonides, the great oracle of the modern Jews, taught that 'All things were created at once, and were afterwards successively separated and arranged in the order related by Moses.' He illustrates his meaning, by comparing the process of creation to that of a husbandman who sows various seeds into the ground at once: some of which are to spring out of the soil in one day, others after two, and others not until three or more days. Thus God made all things in a moment; but in the space of six days formed and arranged them in order."

The doctrine of the Jewish Cabbala in regard to creation is, that the whole universe is an emanation from God, and thus that the universe is God manifested, or an evolution and expansion of the Deity, who is concealed in his own essence, but revealed and visible in the universe. According to the nearness of the different worlds to the Great First Cause, is the degree of splendour with which the revelation of Divinity takes place. The last and remotest production of emanative energy is matter, which is rather a privation of perfection than a distinct essence. The first emanation, called in the Cabbalistic philosophy ADAM KADMON (which see), was a great fountain or channel through which all other emanations might be produced. From this firstborn of the Infinite went forth ten luminous streams termed Sephiroth. "Through these luminous channels," says Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism,' "all things have proceeded from the first emanation of Deity;—things celestial and immanent in emanation; spiritual, and produced without pre-existent matter; angelic, and created in substance and subject; and material, which depend on matter for their being, subsistence, powers, and operations.—These constitute four worlds. Aziluth, or the world of emanation; proceeding from the primordial light, through the medium of the firstborn of Infinity; and comprehending all the excellencies of the inferior worlds, without any of their imperfections. Bria, or the world of creation; containing those spiritual beings which derive their existence immediately from the Aziluthic world. Jetsira, or the formative world; containing those spiritual substances which derive their immediate origin from the Briatic world. Ashia, or the material and visible world; including all those substances which are capable of composition, motion, division, generation, and corruption: this world consists of the very dregs of emanation, and is the residence of evil spirits.”

The theory of the creation, as laid down by the ancient Egyptians, was, that an illimitable darkness, called Athor or mother-night, and regarded as the primeval element of mundane existence, covered the abyss; while water and a subtle spirit resided through divine power in chaos. A holy light now shone, the elements condensed, or were precipitated beneath the sand from the humid parts of rudimentary creation, and nature thus fecundated, the gods diffused through space all the objects animated and inanimate which are found in the universe.

According to the cosmogony of the Hindus, as given by M. Polier, in his ‘Mythologie des Indous,’ we learn that “In the primordial state of the creation, the rudimental universe submerged in water reposed in the bosom of the Eternal. Brahm, the architect of the world, poised on a lotus-leaf, floated upon the waters, and all that he was able to discern was water and darkness.” Such was the original condition of things when Brahm resolved to produce a huge seed or egg which should contain within itself the elementary principles of universal nature. This is the mundane egg of the Hindus, thus described by Dr. Duff: “The producing of such an egg implies a new exercise of divine power. But even divine power, according to the mythologist, cannot be immediately exercised—directly manifested—by pure immaterial spirit. For action, corporeal form is absolutely indispensable. Hence it is that, for the production of the intended egg, Brahm is represented as having assumed a new and peculiar form; and, in that form, is usually named Purush or the primeval male. His divine energy, already separated from his essence, is also supposed to be personified under a female form, Prakriti or Nature. On Purush and Prakriti was devolved the task of giving existence to the celebrated Mundane egg. Having once finished their task, these peculiar and specific manifestations of Brahm and his energy seem to have vanished from the stage of action, to give way afterwards to other distinct manifestations for the accomplishment of purposes alike specific.

“All the primary atoms, qualities, and principles—the seeds of future worlds—that had been evolved from the substance of Brahm, were now collected together, and deposited in the newly produced egg. And into it, along with them, entered the self-existent himself, under the assumed form of Brahma; and there sat, vivifying, expanding, and combining the elements, a whole year of the creation—a thousand yugs—or four thousand three hundred millions of solar years! During this amazing period, the wondrous egg floated ‘like a bubble on an abyss’ of primeval waters—rather, perhaps, chaos of the grosser elements, in a state of fusion and commixion,—increasing in size, and blazing refulgent as a thousand suns. At length, the Supreme, who dwelt therein, burst the shell of the stupendous egg, and issued forth under a new form, with a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, and a thousand arms!

“Along with him there sprang forth another form, huge and measureless! What could that be? All the elementary principles having now been matured, and disposed into an endless variety of orderly collocations, and combined into one harmonious whole, they darted into visible manifestation, under the form of the present glorious universe;—a universe now finished and readymade, with its entire apparatus of earth, sun, moon, and stars! What, then, is this multiform universe? It is but an harmoniously arranged expansion of primordial principles and qualities. And whence are these?—Educed or evolved from the divine substance of Brahm. Hence it is, that the universe is so constantly spoken of, even by the mythologists, as a manifested form of Brahm himself, the supreme invisible spirit. Hence, too, under the notion that it is the manifestation of a being who may assume every variety of corporeal form, is the universe often personified; or described as if its different parts were only the different members of a person of prodigious magnitude, in human form. In reference to this more than gigantic being, viewed as a personification of the universe, it is declared that the hairs of his body are the plants and trees of the forest; of his head, the clouds; of his beard, the lightning;—that his breath is the circling atmosphere; his voice, the thunder; his eyes, the sun and moon; his veins, the rivers; his nails, the rocks; his bones, the lofty mountains!”

In the ancient Scandinavian poem, ‘The Völuspa or Song of the Prophetess,’ the primeval state of the material creation is described as having been a vast void abyss, called Ginnunga-Gap, the cup or gulf or delusion. The northern nebulous and dark region of this abyss was called Nilfheim or Mist-Home, a dismal place of night, and mist, and ice, where is situated Huegelmir or the spring of hot water, from which issue twelve rivers. The southern part of the abyss was illuminated by rays emanating from the sphere or abode of light, named Muspelheim. From this torrid zone of the infant universe blew a scorching wind which melted the frozen waters of the Elivágar, from which was produced the giant Ymir in the likeness of man. At the same time was created the cow Audhumbla, from whose capacious udder flowed four streams of milk which gave healthful nourishment to Ymir. By licking the stones which were covered with salt and hoar-frost, she produced in three days a superior being called Bur or Buri, in the shape of a man. Bör, the son of Buri, married a Joten or giant-woman, from which union sprang the three gods, Odin, Vili, and Ve, who combined in killing Ymir, and dragging his remains into the midst of Ginnunga-Gap. At this point begins the work of creation. "Of the flesh of Ymir," as we are told, "they made the earth; of his blood, the ocean and the rivers; of his huge bones, the mountains; of his teeth, his jaw-bones, and the splinters of some of his broken bones, the rocks and the cliffs; of his hair, the trees; of his brain, the clouds; and of his eye-brows, Midgard—the abode of man. Besides, of his ample skull, they constructed the vault of heaven, and poised it upon the four remotest pillars of the earth, placing under each pillar a dwarf, the name of each respectively corresponding to one of the cardinal points of the horizon. The sparks and cinders, which were wafted into the abyss from the tropical region of Muspelheim, they fixed in the centre of the celestial concave, above and below Ginnunga-Gap, to supply it and the earth with light and heat." The Scandinavian account of the creation of man, as given in the 'Völuspá,' is curious. Three mighty and beneficent Aesir or gods, while walking on the sea-shore, found two trees, or, as some assert, two sticks, floating upon the water, powerless and without destiny. Odin gave them breath and life; Hömir, souls and motion; and Lodur, speech, beauty, sight, and hearing. They named the man Askr, the ash, and the woman, Embla, the alder; and from this first pair have sprung mankind destined to reside in Midgard, the habitable globe.

According to the doctrine of the early Persian or Iranite Magi, the first living being was the ox Abudad, which was slain by Ahriman; but Ormuzd formed from its body the different species of beasts, birds, fishes, trees, plants, and other productions. When the ox died, a being called Kajomorz sprang from its right leg, and this being having been killed by the Devs, the elementary particles which entered into the composition of his body were purified by being exposed to the light of the sun during forty years, and became the germ of the Ribas tree, out of which Ormuzd made the first man and woman, Meshia and Meshiana, infusing into them the breath of life. He thus completed the work of creation in six periods, holding the festival Gahanbar at the end of each of them.

Thus have we endeavoured to exhibit some of the most important traditions which have prevailed in heathen nations on the subject of the creation of the world, and in taking a review of the whole, we cannot fail to be struck with the distinct traces which are to be found in them of the Mosaic narrative having been the original foundation of the whole. Tradition, in this as in almost every other case, is truth perverted from its original purity, and so distorted in the course of generations as to bear only a faint resemblance to the statements of the ancient inspired record. See CHAOS, EGG (MUNDANE).

CREDENCE TABLE, a table near the altar on which, in some churches, the bread and wine to be used in the eucharist are placed before being consecrated. In various Episcopalian churches in England, such tables are found, though not perhaps sanctioned by the ecclesiastical canons.

CREED, a condensed view of Christian doctrine adopted by many churches as the subordinate standard or test by which the right of admission into their communion is tried. The main standard of all Protestant churches is the Word of God, but the great majority of them have adopted, besides the Sacred Scriptures, what have been called subordinate standards—creeds, articles, and confessions. It has sometimes been argued by those churches, for example, the Congregationalist, which disown all subordinate standards, that creeds and confessions of all kinds, being mere human compositions, are unwarrantable additions to the Divine Word, and proceed upon a virtual denial of the perfection and permanent authority of that Word. The usual reply, however, to such objections is, that the creeds used by the churches of Christendom, but especially the Protestant churches, profess to contain only Scriptural doctrines, not the opinions of men. But if so, it may be said, what is the necessity for creeds at all, since all the truths which they contain are already to be found in the Bible? To this objection the reply is obvious. It may sometimes be necessary to set forth particular scriptural truths, with special prominence, in consequence of heresies and errors which have arisen in the Christian church. Both the heretic and the orthodox profess high respect for the Bible, and both alike appeal to it in support of their respective opinions, which may be even diametrically opposed to each other. To distinguish, therefore, the orthodox from the heretic, a test must be applied, and what other test is called for in the circumstances, but the plain statement in human language of the disputed doctrine, expressed so as to exclude the opposite error. Hence the origin of creeds and confessions. They are found to be specially called for, in consequence of a diversity of opinion existing among Christians in reference to some doctrine or statement of the Divine Word.

The churches who use creeds do not allege that these creeds have any authority in themselves, or that they ought to be considered as in the least degree infringing upon the supreme authority of the Bible; but all that such churches affirm is, that creeds contain in a simple and condensed form what they believe to be the teaching of the Bible on certain points which happen to be disputed. In this way harmony and uniformity are obtained, not only in the public ministrations of the clergy, but in the general belief of the private members of the church. Accordingly, such symbols were introduced at an early period of the church, when her orthodoxy, peace, and unity were seriously threatened to be disturbed by the propagation of heresy and error. Hence the APOSTLES' CREED (which see), as it is termed; the NICENE CREED (which see); the ATHANASIAN CREED (which see); the JEWISH CREED; and among Roman Catholics, the Creed of Pope Pius IV. (see PIUS IV. CREED OF POPE). In the same way, and for similar reasons, modern churches have given fuller and more expanded views of their belief in the form of Confessions. Hence we have the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (which see), and the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION in addition to several others which have been adopted in virtue of the dogmatic power which the church claims as the depositary of the Scriptures, and appointed to interpret them. But if creeds and confessions are to be maintained, it is of the utmost importance that the precise position which they occupy be fully understood. Their whole authority, it must never be forgotten, is derived solely from the Bible. To that test every individual member of the church has a right to bring them, and they are binding upon the conscience of no man, except in so far as it can be shown that their statements are in conformity with Bible truth. If not agreeable to the supreme standard, the Word of God, they ought to be rejected without the slightest hesitation or reserve. The Bible, and the Bible alone, as Chillingworth remarks, is the religion of Protestants.

CRES, a son of Zeus, born to him by a nymph of Mount Ida. From Cres is believed to have been derived the name of the island of Crete.

CRESCENT, the sign of the Mohammedans, by which they distinguish themselves from Christians or followers of the cross. Some Mohammedan doctors allege that the crescent was adopted as a distinctive mark by the Moslems, in consequence of the Hegira, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina having taken place at the time of the new moon, when it appears in the form of a crescent. Other writers, however, allege that the use of the crescent arose from the circumstance, that the ancient Arabians worshipped the moon.

CRESIUS, a surname of DIONYSUS (which see), under which he was worshipped at Argos.

CRESELLE, a wooden instrument used instead of bells among the Romanists, in various parts, to summon the people to Divine service during Passion week. Such a mode of summoning to worship is said to have been derived from the primitive Christians, who are by some writers said to have used an instrument of this kind before bells were invented, to call the brethren secretly to prayer in times of persecution. The Cresselle is supposed to represent Christ praying upon the cross, and inviting all nations to embrace his doctrine. Wooden instruments of the same kind are still in use both among the orthodox and heretics in the Turkish dominions, in consequence of the strong prejudices which the Turks entertain against the sound of bells.

CREUSA, a Naiad among the ancient Greeks, the daughter of Oceanus and Ge.

CRINITI FRATRES (Lat. Long-haired Brethren), a name under which Augustine censures the Mesopotamian monks for wearing long hair against the rule of the Roman Catholic church.

CRISPITES, the followers of Dr. Tobias Crisp, who taught a species of Antinomian doctrine in the seventeenth century in England. Messrs. Bogue and Bennett, in their 'History of Dissenters,' call him "one of the first patrons of Calvinism run mad." The writings of Crisp were ably answered by Dr. Daniel Williams, in a work entitled 'Gospel Truth Stated and Vindicated,' who plainly shows that his views, on some of the most important and peculiar doctrines of Christianity, were extreme and erroneous in their character. Thus, for instance, he taught that the sins of the elect were so imputed to Christ as to be actually his; and the righteousness of Christ was so imputed to them as that they are no longer sinners, but righteous as Christ was righteous. According to the scheme of the Crispites, God sees no sin in believers, nor does he punish them because of sin. He is not displeased with the believer on account of his sin, nor pleased with him on account of his obedience, so that the child of God is neither the worse for his sins, nor the better for his obedience. Sin does the believer no hurt, and righteousness does him no good, nor must he pursue it to this end. Repentance and confession of sin, in the view of Dr. Crisp, are not necessary to forgiveness, but a believer may certainly conclude before confession, yea, as soon as he hath committed sin, his interest in Christ, and the love of Christ embracing him. In regard to the time of justification, Dr. Crisp says, "He did it from eternity in respect of obligation; but in respect of execution, he did it when Christ was on the cross; and, in respect of application, he doth it while children are yet unborn." Crisp was the great Antinomian opponent of Baxter, Bates, and Howe, and when his works were reprinted in 1692, such was the ability and power with which they were exposed by Bishop Bull and Dr. Williams, that the Antinomians were reduced in England to a very small number. The controversy, however, was again revived by Dr. Gill, who republished Dr. Crisp's sermons in 1745, with notes, in which he justified some of his peculiar expressions, and apologized for others. The Antinomian doctrines then promulgated were diffused to a great extent among the Particular Baptists in England. See ANTINOMIANS.

CRITHOMANCY (Gr. crithos, barley, and mantia, divination), a species of divination, founded on the appearance which the dough of the barley-meal cakes, which were used in sacrifice, assumed, when it was kneaded into cakes.

CRIOUS, one of the Titans of the ancient Greeks, a son of Uranus and Ge, and the father of Astræus, Pallas and Perses.

CROCEATAS, a surname of Zeus, derived from Croceæ in Laconia.

CROCEFISSO SANTISSIMO (Ital. most holy crucifix), a wooden crucifix at Naples, which is remarkable for having thanked Thomas Aquinas for his beautiful and salutary writings. It belonged to the church of St. Dominic the Great.

CROCE, SANTA DI GERUSALEMME (Ital. the holy cross of Jerusalem), one of the seven great Basilicas of Rome. It is particularly remarkable for the immense number of relics which it contains, all of which are exhibited on a particular day for the reverence and adoration of the devotees of the Romish church. The fourth Sunday in Lent is the most remarkable day in the year at the Basilica of Santa Croce di Gerusalemme. All who attend the services at that church on that day are entitled to certain indulgences; and all who have share in the masses celebrated are entitled to the release of one soul from purgatory. The great attraction of the festival is the exhibition of the relics of this church, which are noted among the wonders of Rome. The scene is thus described by Mr. Seymour, who was himself an eye-witness of it. "At one end of the church there is a small gallery, capable of holding three or four persons. In this appeared the bishop in full canonicals, with mitre and alb. On either hand stood a priest; on these three every eye in the vast assembly was fixed; one priest rung a bell, then the other handed one of the relics to the bishop; and he, reverently receiving it, exhibited it to the assembled multitude, the priest announcing with a loud voice—

"The finger of St. Thomas, the Apostle and Martyr of our Lord Jesus Christ."

"The bishop then presented the relic, said to be the very finger with which the unbelieving Thomas touched our Lord's side! He held it, according to the invariable custom in exhibiting relics, right before him, then turning it to those on the right, then to those on the left, then again to those immediately before him. He then kissed the glass case which contained the finger, and returned it to the priest.

"Another relic was then produced and placed in the hands of the bishop, and the priest as before announced—

"Two thorns from the crown of thorns of our Lord Jesus Christ."

"The bishop exhibited this as before, and it was easy to see in the glass case the two thorns set and standing erect, each thorn being about three inches long. He then kissed the case and returned it to the priest.

"A third relic was next produced, it was presented reverently by the priest, and was received as reverently by the bishop, the priest announcing—

"The tablet with the inscription over the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

"The bishop exhibited this relic as the others; the characters in Greek and Hebrew and Latin, though very dark and large, were very far from being easily legible, and the tablet itself seemed rather small for the occasion. It was about nine or ten inches in length, and about five in depth;—the bishop also kissed this relic and returned it to the priest.

"A fourth relic was next placed in the hands of the bishop, and as he exhibited it, the priest exclaimed—

"One of the nails that fastened to the cross our Lord Jesus Christ."

"This relic was a very shewy affair, being enclosed in a very pretty glass and gold case. In the centre was a black thing said to be the nail, with two angels made of gold, kneeling and worshipping it! It was exhibited, kissed, and then returned to the priest.

"Another relic was produced—the fifth and last. As the priest presented it to the bishop, the bishop seemed to start under a sense of awe, and to gaze on it with devout wonder. Before he would touch the holy thing he must uncover. His mitre, which had been worn while exhibiting the other relics, was immediately removed. He could not with covered head look upon the sacred thing, he bowed profoundly to it, and then taking a large glass cross from the priest, the priest announced—

"Three pieces of the most holy wood of the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

"In an instant the whole assembly as if by magic was prostrate, even the monks removed their little skull-caps, and every individual present except the few English there, prostrated himself as in the act of the highest adoration, in precisely the same way as when adoring at the elevation of the host. The silence was deep and profound throughout that vast assembly: some seemed to hold their breath impressed with awe; some seemed in deep devotion to breathe prayer in secret; some gazed intently on the relic, and moved their lips as if addressing it, while the bishop held it before them. It was a cross of glass, set at the ends in rich chased gold; it was hollow, and there appeared within it three small pieces of wood; they varied from two to four inches in length, and were about half or three quarters of an inch in breadth. After the bishop had duly exhibited this—after the people had worshipped it—after he had returned it to the priest, the bishop and priest retired, and the congregation dispersed."

CROCIARY. See CROSS-BEARER.

CROCOTA, a dress worn by women among the ancient Greeks and Romans. It was more especially worn at the festival of the Diomysia, and also by the priestesses of Cybele.

CROMCRUACH, the principal god of the ancient Irish. The image was carved of gold and silver, and surrounded by twelve other smaller images, all of brass. According to a legend, on the arrival of St. Patrick, the idol Cromcruach fell to the ground, like Dagon of old before the ark, and the lesser brazen images sunk into the ground, up to the neck.

CROMLECH (Celt. crom, crooked or bent, and leach, a stone), an ancient Druidical altar, of which there are many specimens still found in different parts of Britain and Ireland. The cromlechs are formed of rude stones, set in different forms and situations, supposed to have been dedicated to particular deities. The most usual form is that of an immense mass of stone of an oblong shape, with one end resting on the ground, and the other extremity supported by two large upright stones. Sometimes smaller cromlechs are seen of a triangular shape, and like the larger supported by two upright stones in an inclined position. It is supposed that the lesser may have been used for the purposes of ordinary sacrifice, while the greater may have been reserved for occasions of extraordinary solemnity. The incumbent stone or slab of the cromlechs is sustained in some cases by rows of upright pillars; in other instances the table is supported by two or more large cone-shaped rocks, but on none of the stones used in the construction of these altars can the mark of any tool be discovered. A variety of opinion exists as to the origin of the name cromlech. Some suppose the term to have been applied to these rude altars from their inclining position; others from the respect paid by the Druidical worshippers to these stones by bowing before them; while by others still the idea has been broached, that they derived their name from being the stones on which sacrifices were offered to a god called Crom. An ingenious conjecture has been advanced, that they were placed in an inclined position to allow the blood of the victims slain upon them to run off freely.

CRONIA, a festival celebrated among the ancient Greeks at Athens, in honour of CHRONOS (which see), whom Cecrops had introduced as an object of worship into Attica. The name Cronia is given by the Greek writers to the Roman Saturnalia. A festival in honour of Chronos was also observed among the people of Rhodes, at which human sacrifices are said to have been offered.

CRONUS. See CHRONOS, SATURN.

CROSIER, the pastoral staff, so called from its likeness to a cross, which the archbishops formerly bore as the common-ensign of their office. When an archbishop was invested with the episcopal dignity, he was formally installed by the delivery of a crosier into his hands. Sometimes a straight staff was presented instead of a crosier or crook. The staff of the archbishop had usually a single, and that of the patriarch a double cross piece. According to Montfaucon, the staff of the Greek archbishop had a cross-piece resembling the letter T. According to Goari, it was curved upwards in this form Y. Dr. Murdoch alleges that the crosier or bishop's staff was exactly of the form of the lituus, the chief ensign of the ancient Augurs. The crosier of an archbishop is to be distinguished from the pastoral staff of a bishop, the former always terminating in a cross, while the latter terminated in an ornamented crook.

CROSS. Our blessed Lord having suffered crucifixion, the figure of the cross, as being the instrument of the Redeemer's death, came to be held in high respect at a very early period in the history of the Christian church. Nay, it even came to be regarded as the mark of a Christian, the sign of the cross being used in baptism. Towards the middle of the fourth century, however, veneration for the cross was carried still farther. During the reign of Constantine the Great, his mother Helena having set out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, pretended that she had found there the real cross on which our Lord was suspended. On her return Constantine, who professed a warm attachment to the Christian cause, caused the figure of the cross to be stamped upon his coins, displayed upon his standards, and painted on his shields, helmets, and crown. Christians seem to have soon after begun to wear the cross as an official badge or token of their adherence to the faith. It was specially worn by Christian bishops or pastors on the neck or breast, and carried in public processions. The cross worn upon the person was made of wood or gold, or some sacred relic, which was called by the Greeks periamma, and was regarded as an amulet or phylactery. The cross was used not only in the Greek, but in the Latin church. The cross which was carried before the bishops in processions, received the name of crux gestatoria or carrying cross. For a long time the bishops of Rome claimed the right of having the cross carried before them as exclusively their own. In the twelfth century it was granted to metropolitans and patriarchs, and in the time of Gregory IX. to archbishops. The patriarchs of the Greek church did not so frequently carry the cross, but instead of it they substituted lamps and lighted candles. Towards the end of the seventh century, the council of Constantinople decreed that Jesus Christ should be painted in a human form, hanging upon the cross, that Christians might bear in mind their obligations to the sufferings and death of Christ. In the sixth century, a festival was instituted by Pope Gregory the Great in commemoration of the Empress Helena having found what was alleged to be the true cross. This festival is observed in all Roman Catholic countries on the 3d of May. Another festival in honour of the cross is observed by the Romish church on the 14th of September. The circumstances which led to the institution of this latter festival, are briefly these, as stated by Hurd in his History of Religious Rites and Ceremonies: "In the reign of Heraclitus the Greek emperor, Chosroes, king of Persia, plundered Jerusalem, and took away that part of the cross which Helena had left there, but which Heraclitus having recovered, it was carried by him in great solemnity to Mount Calvary, whence it had been taken. Many miracles were said to have been wrought on this occasion; and the festival in memory of it is called the Exaltation of the Cross." Both in the Greek and Roman churches, crosses are used both in public and in private, as the insignia in their view of the Christian faith. Among the Greeks the cross is equi-limbed, but among the Romanists it is elongated. A Romish prelate wears a single cross, a patriarch a double cross, and the Pope a triple cross on his arms.

CROSS (ADORATION OF THE), a ceremony of the Romish church observed on Good Friday. It is termed the Unveiling and Adoration of the Cross, and is conducted with great pomp. Mr. Seymour, in his Pilgrimage to Rome, describes it from actual observation: "A cross made of wood stands upon the altar. It is enveloped in a black veil. The deacon hands it to the officiating cardinal. He, standing with his back to the altar and his face to the people, holds the cross before the eyes of the congregation. Then loosening the black veil which envelops it, he uncovers one arm of the cross—pauses—holds it conspicuously before the congregation, and exclaims with a loud voice—

"Behold the wood of the cross!"

"And the response hurst from the choir—

"Come, let us adore it!"

"And immediately the Pope, the cardinals, and all present kneel and adore it, and then resume their seats.

"Again the officiating cardinal uncovers the second arm of the cross—pauses—exclaims as before—

"Behold the wood of the cross!"

"And the response again bursts from the choir—

"Come, let us adore it!"

"And as before, the Pope, the cardinals, and all present kneel and adore it, and then resume their seats.

"Again, the officiating cardinal uncovers the whole cross—pauses—and exclaims as before—

"Behold the wood of the cross!"

"And the response again hurst from the choir—

"Come, let us adore it!"

"And immediately the Pope, the cardinals, and all present kneel and adore it a third time.

"All this was painful enough to me, yet it proved only 'the beginning of sorrows.' There was a solemnity—a silence, a stillness in all, which, combined with the appearance of the chapel, made it very impressive; and this very impressiveness it was that made all so painful.

"And here the ceremony commenced indeed. Two or three cardinals approached the Pope, they stripped off his splendid robes, they removed his glittering mitre, they took off his embroidered shoes, they laid aside his spangled gloves, till he stood before his throne without one emblem of his royal or papal office. There stood the old man, bareheaded and barefooted, and stripped till he seemed to retain little else than a loose white dressing-gown, the dress of a monk of Camaldoli. There he stood, not alone, as if the act were a voluntary humiliation, but in the hands of the cardinals, who, intending to help him and uphold him, seemed to be his guards to force and compel him. There the old man, no longer looking like a Pope, descended from the throne and seemed like one led away to be punished, or to do penance. I could not help thinking that the old man was, in a great measure, an unwilling actor in this scene; there was much uneasiness in his manner; there was dissatisfaction in his face; and his whole appearance was that of a man who was obliged to act against his conscience, in complying with a custom of the church.

"Having conducted the Pope to the end of the chapel; they turned and faced the cross, which lay on the floor near the step of the altar. There they made him kneel and adore it. They raised him, and conducting him some two or three paces nearer, they again made him kneel a second time and adore the cross. Then again they raised him, and leading him nearer still, they again the third time made him kneel and adore the cross. Here at the cross they raised him, and then again he knelt, then rose again and then knelt again. Prostrate before it—on knees and hands, he kissed it, and, according to custom, left an hundred scudi of gold as an offering beside it. He was afterwards conducted to his throne and robed, while the most exquisite music from the choir accompanied the whole ceremony.

"When this is completed by the Pope, the same act is performed by each of the cardinals, all without shoes, adoring and kissing the cross. These are followed by the bishops, heads of orders, &c., all adoring it in like manner, and all making to it an offer of money.

"The deacons then spread the cloth on the altar, light the candles, and reverently place the cross, no longer on the floor, but on the altar amidst the candlesticks.

"Such is—the adoration of the cross:—An act of worship that moved me intensely, infinitely more than anything I had witnessed at Rome. It was an act the most solemn and impressive, that bore every characteristic of idolatry." The doctrine of the church of Rome is, that the cross is to be worshipped with the same supreme adoration (Latria) as that which is due to Christ himself.

CROSS-ALPHABETS. In the ceremony observed in the Romish church in the DEDICATION OF CHURCHES (which see), according to the arrangements laid down in the Roman Pontifical, a pot of ashes is provided, which, in the course of the cere mony, is strewed in two broad lines in the form of a cross, transversely from angle to angle of the church; each line about a span in breadth. While the Benedictus is being chanted, the Pontiff scores with the point of his pastoral staff on one of the broad lines or ashes, the Greek alphabet, and then on the other, the Latin alphabet. These are called Cross-Alphabets.

CROSS-BEARER, an officer in the Roman Catholic church, who bears a cross before an archbishop or primate in processions or special solemnities. This office is usually conferred upon the chaplain of the dignitary. The Pope has the cross borne before him everywhere; a patriarch anywhere out of Rome; and primates, metropolitans, and archbishops throughout their respective jurisdictions. Gregory XI. forbade all patriarchs and prelates to have the cross before them in the presence of cardinals.

CROSS (INCENSING THE). All crosses intended to be erected in Roman Catholic countries, in the public places, high roads, and cross-ways, as well as on the tops of Romish chapels, undergo the process of consecrating by incense, which is conducted with much ceremony. Candles are first lighted at the foot of the cross, after which the celebrant, having dressed himself in his pontifical robes, sits down before the cross and delivers a discourse to the people upon its manifold virtues and excellences. Then he sprinkles the cross with holy water, and afterwards with incense, and at the close of this ceremony candles are set upon the top of each arm of the cross.

CROSS (ORDEAL OF THE), a mode of trial which was practised among the Anglo-Saxons, probably the most ancient, and the soonest laid aside. The form of it was intimately connected with the wager of law; for the accused person having brought eleven compurgators to swear to his innocence, chose one of two pieces of covered wood, on one of which the cross was delineated: when, if he selected that which had the emblem upon it, he was acquitted, and if otherwise, condemned. This species of ordeal was abolished by the Emperor Louis the Devout, about A. D. 820, as too commonly exposing the sacred symbol.

CROSS (SIGN OF THE), a practice which arose in the early ages of the Christian church from the lively faith of Christians in the great doctrine of salvation through the cross of Christ. Nowhere in the Sacred Writings do we find the slightest allusion to such a custom, but the most ancient of the fathers speak of it as having been a venerable practice in their days, and, indeed, the frequent use of the sign of the cross is declared to have been a characteristic feature of the manners of the primitive Christians. On this subject Dr. Jamieson gives some valuable information: "The cross was used by the primitive Christians as an epitome of all that is interesting and important in their faith; and its sign, where the word could not be conveniently nor safely uttered, represented their reliance on that event which is at once the most ignominious and the most glorious part of Christianity. It was used by them at all times, and to consecrate the most common actions of life—when rising out of bed, or retiring to rest—when sitting at table, lighting a lamp, or dressing themselves—on every occasion, as they wished the influence of religion to pervade the whole course of their life, they made the sign of the cross the visible emblem of their faith. The mode in which this was done was various: the most common was by drawing the hand rapidly across the forehead, or by merely tracing the sign in air; in some cases, it was worn close to the bosom, in gold, silver, or bronze medals, suspended by a concealed chain from the neck; in others, it was engraven on the arms or some other part of the body by a coloured drawing, made by pricking the skin with a needle, and borne as a perpetual memorial of the love of Christ. In times of persecution, it served as the watchword of the Christian party. Hastily described by the finger, it was the secret but well-known signal by which Christians recognized each other in the presence of their heathen enemies; by which the persecuted sought an asylum, or strangers threw themselves on the hospitality of their brethren; and nothing appeared to the Pagan observer more strange and inexplicable, than the ready and open-hearted manner in which, by this concerted means, foreign Christians were received by those whom they had never previously seen or heard of,—were welcomed into their homes, and entertained with the kindness usually bestowed only on relations and friends. Moreover, to the sacred form of the cross were ascribed peculiar powers of protecting from evil; and hence it was frequently resorted to as a secret talisman, to disarm the vengeance of a frowning magistrate, or counteract the odious presence and example of an offerer of sacrifice. It was the only outward means of defending themselves, which the martyrs were wont to employ, when summoned to the Roman tribunals on account of their faith. It was by signing himself with the cross, that Origen, when compelled to stand at the threshold of the temple of Serapis, and give palm-branches, as the Egyptian priests were in the habit of doing, to them that went to perform the sacred rites of the idol, fortified his courage, and stood uncontaminated amid the concourse of profane idolaters. But, perhaps, the most remarkable instance on record of the use of this sign by the primitive Christians, and of the sense they entertained of its potent virtues, occurs in the reign of Diocletian, when that timorous and superstitious prince, in his anxiety to ascertain the events of his Eastern campaign, slew a number of victims, that, from their livers, the augurs might prognosticate the fortunes of the war. During the course of the sacrifice, some Christian officers, who were officially present, put the immortal sign on their foreheads, and forthwith, as the historian relates, the rites were disturbed. The priests, ignorant of the cause, searched in vain for the usual marks on the entrails of the beasts. Once and again the sacrifice was repeated with a similar result, when at length, the chief of the soothsayers observing a Christian signing himself with the cross, exclaimed, 'It is the presence of profane persons that has interrupted the rites.' Thus common was the use, and thus high the reputed efficacy of this sign among the primitive Christians. But it was not in the outward form, but solely in the divine qualities of Him whose name and merits it symbolized, that the believers of the first ages conceived its charm and its virtues to reside. It was used by them 'merely as a mode of expressing, by means perceptible to the senses, the purely Christian idea, that all the actions of Christians, as well as the whole course of their life, must be sanctified by faith in the crucified Redeemer, and by dependence upon him, and that this faith is the most powerful means of conquering all evil, and preserving oneself against it. It was not till after times, that men began to confound the idea and the token which represented it, and that they attributed the effects of faith in the crucified Redeemer, to the outward signs to which they ascribed a supernatural and preservative power.'"

To make the sign of the cross is regarded in Romish countries as a charm against evil spirits or evil influences of any kind. The bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses of the Roman Catholic church wear a small golden cross. When a benediction is pronounced upon anything whatever, it is done by making the sign of the cross over it. Among the adherents of the Greek church, it not only forms a frequently repeated practice in the course of the services of the church, but it occurs almost constantly in the ordinary transactions of life. The servant asking directions from her mistress, or the beggar humbly asking alms, devoutly makes the sign of the cross, and that too in the truly orthodox manner, with the thumb, first and middle fingers bent together, first on the forehead, then on the breast, then on the right shoulder, and then on the left. In Russia the population are in the habit of using the sign of the cross on occasions of almost every kind.

CROUCHED FRIARS, an order of religious, called also Croisiers or Cross-Bearers, founded in honour of the invention or discovery of the cross by the Empress Helena, in the fourth century. Matthew Paris says this order came into England A. D. 1244, and that they carried in their hand a staff, on the top of which was a cross. Dugdale mentions two of their monasteries, one in London, and the other at Ryegate. They had likewise a monastery at Oxford, where they were received in A. D. 1349. This order was dispersed throughout various countries of Europe.

CROUCHED-MAS-DAY, the festival in the Greek church in honour of the erection of the cross. From this feast, which occurred on the 14th Sep-

CROWN, an ornament frequently mentioned in Sacred Scripture, and commonly used among the Hebrews. We find the holy crown in Exod. xxix. 6, directed to be put upon the mitre of the high-priest. The word in the Hebrew is nezor, separation, probably because it was a badge of the wearer being separated from his brethren. It is difficult, however, to say what was the precise nature of the crown. Perhaps, as Professor Jahn thinks, it was simply a fillet two inches broad, bound round the head, so as to press the forehead and temples, and tied behind. The crown was not improbably worn even by private priests, for we learn that the prophet Ezekiel (xxiv. 17, 23) was commanded by God not to take off his crown, nor to assume the marks of mourning. Newly married couples from early times were accustomed to wear crowns. (See CROWNS, NUPTIAL). Crowns of flowers were often worn also on festive occasions. The crown was given among ancient nations as a token of victory or triumph. Thus, in the Grecian games, chaplets or crowns of olive, myrtle, parsley, and similar materials, were wreathed round the brow of the successful competitors. Crowns of different kinds were bestowed upon gods, kings, and princes, as ensigns of dignity and authority. Pausanias says that the Magi wore a species of tiara when they entered into a temple. Among the Romans crowns were often given as rewards, and the highest honour which a soldier could receive was the civic crown composed of oak leaves, which was conferred upon any one who had saved the life of a Roman citizen in battle. When a Roman army was shut up within a besieged city, the general who succeeded in raising the siege received from the liberated soldiers a crown of honour, which was composed of grass or weeds or wild flowers. It was customary among the Romans to present a golden crown to any soldier who had specially distinguished himself on the field of battle. The same practice prevailed also among the ancient Greeks.

CROWN (FUNERAL), a crown of leaves and flowers, and among the Greeks generally, of parsley, which was usually wreathed around the head of a dead person before interment. Floral wreaths were often placed upon the bier, or scattered on the road along which the funeral procession was to pass, or twisted round the urn in which the ashes were contained, or the tomb in which the remains were laid.

CROWN (MURAL), a golden crown, adorned with turrets, which was anciently bestowed by the Romans on the soldier who first succeeded in scaling the wall of a besieged city. The goddess CYBELE (which see) is always represented with a mural crown upon her head.

CROWN (NATAL). It was customary in ancient times, both at Athens and at Rome, to suspend a crown at the threshold of a house in which a child was born. The natal crown used at Athens when the child was a boy, was composed of olive; when a girl, of wool. Crowns of laurel, ivy, or parsley were used on such occasions at Rome.

CROWN (NUPTIAL). Newly married persons of both sexes among the Hebrews wore crowns upon their wedding-day, Cant. iii. 11, and it is probably in allusion to this custom that God is said, when he entered into a covenant with the Jewish nation, to have put a beautiful crown upon their head, Ezek. xvi. 12. Among the Greeks, also, bridal wreaths were worn made of flowers plucked by the bride herself; but the crowns of Roman brides were made of verbena. The bridegroom also wore a chaplet, and on the occasion of a marriage, the entrance to the house, as well as the nuptial couch, was ornamented with wreaths of flowers. Among the early Christians the act of crowning the parties was the commencing part of the marriage ceremony. After the 128th Psalm had been sung, with the responses and doxologies, and an appropriate discourse had been delivered, and after some preliminary rites, the priest lifted the nuptial crowns which had been laid upon the altar, and placing one upon the head of the bridegroom, and the other upon the head of the bride, he pronounced these words, "This servant of the Lord hereby crowns this handmaid of the Lord in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen." This ceremony was followed by prayers, doxologies, and the reading of the Scriptures, particularly Eph. v. 20—33, and John ii. 1—11, at the close of which the Assembly repeated the Lord's Prayer, with the customary responses, and the usual form of benediction. On the eighth day the married pair presented themselves again in the church, when the minister, after an appropriate prayer, took off the nuptial crown, and dismissed them with his solemn benediction. This ceremony, however, was not uniformly observed. The ceremonies of coronation and dissolving of the crowns, are still observed in the Greek church. The crowns used in Greece are of olive branches twined with white and purple ribbon. In Russia they are of gold and silver, or in country places, of tin, and are preserved as the property of the church. At this part of the service the couple are made to join hands, and to drink wine out of a common cup. The ceremony of dissolving the crowns takes place, as among the primitive Christians, on the eighth day, after which the bride is conducted to the bridegroom's house, and enters upon the duties of the household.

The custom of nuptial coronation continued among the Jews for many centuries, and, indeed, we learn from the Mishna, that it was not until the commencement of the war under Vespasian that the practice of crowning the bridegroom was abolished, and that it was not until Jerusalem was besieged by Titus that the practice of crowning the bride was discontinued. Crowns of roses, myrtle, and ivy are still used in Jewish marriages in many places.

CROWN (RADIATED), a crown made with rays apparently emanating from it. A crown of this kind was put by the ancient Romans upon the images of gods or deified heroes.

CROWN (SACERDOTAL), worn by the priests or Sacerdotes among the ancient Romans when engaged in offering sacrifice. Neither the high-priest nor his attendant, however, bore this ornament. It was formed of different materials, sometimes of olive, and at other times of gold. The most ancient sacrificial garland used by the Romans was made of ears of corn. The victim was also wont to be adorned with a fillet or wreath of flowers when it was led to the altar.

CROWN (SUTILE), a crown made of any kind of flowers sewed together, and used by the SALII (which see) at their festivals.

CROWNS, a name, in Hebrew Thagin, given to points or horns with which certain letters in the manuscripts used in the Jewish synagogues are decorated, and which distinguish them from the manuscripts in ordinary use. The Rabbins affirm that God gave them to Moses on Mount Sinai, and that he taught him how to make them. In the Talmud mysteries are alleged to be attached to these marks.

CRUCIFIX, a figure of the cross with a carved image of Christ fastened upon it. It is much used in the devotions of Roman Catholics, both in public and in private. The origin of crucifixes is generally traced to the council held at Constantinople towards the close of the seventh century, which decreed that Jesus Christ should be painted in a human form upon the cross, in order to represent, in the most lively manner, the death and sufferings of our blessed Saviour. From that period down to the present day crucifixes form an essential part of Romish worship. On all sacred solemnities the Pope has a crucifix carried before him, a practice which some Romish writers allege was introduced by Clement, Bishop of Rome, about seventy years after the time of the Apostle Peter. The most probable opinion, however, which has been stated, as to the origin of this custom, is, that it commenced at the period when the Popes became ambitious to display their supreme authority, and that it was meant to be a mark of pontifical dignity, as the Roman fasces carried before consuls or magistrates of any kind showed their power and authority. An old Italian writer, Father Bonanni, thus describes the custom; "The cross is carried on the end of a pike about ten palms or spans long. The image of our Saviour is turned towards the Pope, and the chaplain who carries it walks bareheaded when his Holiness goes in public, or is carried on men's shoulders; but when he goes in a coach or a chair the chairman carries the crucifix on horseback, bareheaded, with a glove on his right hand, and with the left he manages his horse. In all solemn and religious ceremonies at which the Pope assists in his sacred robes, an auditor of the Rota carries the crucifix at the solemn procession on horseback, dressed in a rochet or capuche, purple-coloured; but there are three days in Passion-week on which he and the Sacred College go to chapel in mourning without the cross being borne before him."

The ceremony of kissing the crucifix is observed at Rome on the Thursday of Passion-week, usually called Maundy Thursday. It is thus described by an eye-witness: "On the evening a wooden crucifix of about two feet and a half in length was placed upon the steps of the altar. This devout people immediately began to welcome it by kissing its feet and forehead. The next day, Good Friday, a crucifix of four feet was offered to the fervency of the multitude, and the kisses were redoubled. But the day after there was a crucifix of nearly six feet; then the pious frenzy of the women was carried to its greatest height; from every part of this immense church, they rushed towards this image, rudely carved and more rudely painted; they threw themselves on this piece of wood, as though they would have devoured it; they kissed it with the most furious ardour from head to foot. They succeeded each other four at a time in this pious exercise: those who were waiting for their turn showed as much impatience as a pack of hungry hounds would, if they were withheld from the prey in their sight. There was near the crucifix a small porringer to receive the offerings. The greater part of them preferred giving kisses to money; but those who left their mite thought they had a just claim to redouble their caresses. Although I remained more than an hour in the church, I did not see the end of this fantastical exhibition, and I left these devout kissers in full activity."

CRUSADE, a holy war, or an expedition against infidels and heretics; but more particularly applied to the holy wars of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. The Crusades were eight in number. The feelings which actuated the first originators of these expeditions were a superstitious veneration for those places which were the scene of our Lord's ministry while on earth, and an earnest desire to rescue them from the infidel Mohammedans, into whose hands they had fallen. Multitudes of pilgrims had been accustomed to flock to Jerusalem, and account it their highest privilege to perform their devotions at the Holy Sepulchre. But ever since Jerusalem had been taken, and Palestine conquered by the Saracen Omar, the Christian pilgrims had been prevented from the accomplishment of what they considered a pious design, unless they purchased the privilege by paying a small tribute to the Saracen caliphs. In A. D. 1064 the Turks took Jerusalem from the Saracens, and from that time pilgrims were exposed to persecution, and while they had begun largely to increase in numbers, the ill-treatment which they experienced at the hands of the Turks roused a spirit of indignation throughout the Christian world. One man in particular, Peter the Hermit, fired with fanatical zeal for the extermination of the infidel Turks, travelled through Europe, bareheaded and barefooted, for the purpose of exhorting princes to join in a holy war against the Mohammedan possessors of the sacred places. Yielding to the persuasions of this wild enthusiast, Pope Urban II. summoned two councils in A. D. 1095, the one at Placentia, and the other at Clermont, and laid before them the magnificent project of arming all Christendom in one holy war against the infidels. This was a design which the Popes had long entertained, and now that they had obtained a suitable instrument for its accomplishment in Peter the Hermit, an immense army was raised, and headed by this remarkable monk. They set out on their march towards the East, but having been met, in the plain of Nicea, by Solyman the Turkish Sultan of Iconium, the army of the Hermit was cut to pieces. A new host in the meantime appeared, led by several distinguished Christian princes and nobles, and amounting, as it did, to hundreds of thousands, the Turks were twice defeated. The crusaders now advanced to Jerusalem, and after a siege of six weeks made themselves masters of the holy city, putting to death without mercy the whole of its Mohammedan and Jewish inhabitants. Godfrey of Bouillon, one of the commanders of the crusading army, was proclaimed king of Jerusalem, but soon afterwards he was obliged to surrender his authority into the hands of the Pope's legate. Syria and Palestine being now won from the infidels, were divided by the crusaders into four states, a step far from conducive to the strengthening of their power.

Soon after the successful termination of the first crusade, the Turks began to rally and recover somewhat of their former vigour. The Asiatic Christians, accordingly, found it necessary to apply to the princes of Europe for assistance, and the second crusade was commenced in A. D. 1146, with an army of 200,000 men, composed chiefly of French, Germans, and Italians. This enormous host, led by Hugh, brother of Philip I. of France, was equally unsuccessful with the army of Peter the Hermit, having either been destroyed by the enemy, or perished by the treachery of the Greek emperor. The garrison of Jerusalem, though held by the Christians, was so feebly defended that it became necessary to institute the Knights Templars and Hospitallers as an enrolled military corps to protect the Holy City. The crusading army having been almost wholly cut off, the Pope, Eugenius III., chiefly through the exertions of St. Bernard, raised another army of 300,000 men, which, however, was totally defeated and dispersed by the Turks, while its commanders, Louis VII. of France and Conrad III. of Germany, were compelled to return home humbled and disgraced. Not contented with these successes, the infidels were resolved to retake Jerusalem from the Christians, and Saladin, nephew of the Sultan of Egypt, pushing forward his army to the walls of the Holy City, besieged it and took its monarch prisoner.

The conquest of Jerusalem by the infidels excited the strongest indignation and alarm throughout all Christendom. A third crusade was planned by Pope Clement III., and armies marched towards the East in A. D. 1188, from France, England, and Germany, headed by the sovereigns of these countries. The German forces which Frederick Barbarossa commanded, were defeated in several engagements, and still more discouraged by the death of their leader, gradually melted away. The other two armies, the English and French, besieged and took Ptolemais, but the two sovereigns having quarrelled, Philip Augustus returned to his country, leaving the English monarch to carry on the war. Richard, though left alone, prosecuted the contest with the utmost energy. Nor was he unsuccessful, having defeated Saladin near Ascalon. But his army, reduced by famine and fatigue, was unable to follow up the success they had gained, and accordingly, having concluded a peace, he was glad to retire from Palestine, though with only a single ship. A few years subsequent to this somewhat unfortunate crusade, Saladin died in A. D. 1195.

The fourth crusade, which had in view, not so much the deliverance of the Holy Land from the dominion of the infidels, as the destruction of the empire of the East, was fitted out by the Emperor Henry VI. the same year on which Saladin died. This expedition was attended with considerable success, several battles having been gained by the crusaders, and a number of towns having been taken. In the midst of these successes, however, the Emperor died, and the army was under the necessity of quitting Palestine, and returning to Germany.

The fifth crusade commenced in A. D. 1198, only three years after the preceding. It was planned by Pope Innocent III., and although several years were spent in unsuccessful attempts to wrest the Holy Land out of the hands of the infidels, a new impulse was given to the crusading army by the formation of an additional force in A. D. 1202, under Baldwin, Count of Flanders. This new expedition, which was directed against the Mohammedans, was crowned with remarkable success, the crusading army having taken possession of Constantinople, and put their chief, Baldwin, upon the throne—a position, however, which he had only occupied a few months, when he was dethroned and murdered. The imperial dominions were now shared among the crusading leaders, and at this time Alexius Comnenus founded a new empire in Asia, that of Trebizond.

Another crusade, the sixth, was proclaimed in A. D. 1228, when the Christians succeeded in taking the town of Damietta, which, however, they were unable to retain. Peace was concluded with the Sultan of Egypt, and by treaty the Holy City was given over to the emperor Frederick. About this time a great revolution took place in Asia. The Tartars, under Zinghis-Khan, had poured down from the north into the countries of Persia and Syria, and ruthlessly massacred Turks, Jews, and Christians.

These hordes of powerful barbarians overran Judea, and compelled the Christians to surrender Jerusalem into their hands.

The two last crusades, the seventh and eighth, were headed by Louis XI., King of France, who is commonly known by the name of St. Louis. This enthusiastic prince believed that he was summoned by heaven to undertake the recovery of the Holy Land. After four years' preparation, accordingly, he set out on this expedition in 1249, accompanied by his queen, his three brothers, and all the knights of France. He commenced the enterprize by an attack on Egypt, and took Damietta, but after a few more successes was at length defeated, and along with two of his brothers fell into the hands of the enemy. He purchased his liberty at a large ransom, and having obtained a truce for ten years, he returned to France. For many years Louis continued to be haunted with the idea that it was still his duty to make another effort for the fulfilment of the great mission with which he believed himself to have been intrusted by heaven. At length, in A. D. 1270, he entered upon the eighth crusade against the Moors in Africa. But no sooner had he landed his army, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Carthage, than his army was almost wholly destroyed by a pestilence, and he himself fell a victim to the same disease in the fifty-fifth year of his age. Not many years after this the Christians were driven entirely out of Syria, and these holy wars, in which no fewer than two millions of Europeans perished, came to a final termination. "This," as has been well remarked, "the only common enterprize in which the European nations ever engaged, and which they all undertook with equal ardour, remains a singular monument of human folly."

The feeling in which these crusades had their origin, was, as we have said, a superstitious veneration for the sacred places in the East, combined, no doubt, with a bitter hatred of the Mohammedans, and a high admiration for that spirit of chivalry which prevailed so extensively in the tenth and eleventh centuries. But the wars which originated in these causes were afterwards encouraged by the Popes, who found by experience the advantages which attended them. The Popes claimed the privilege of disposing of kingdoms, and exempted both the persons and the estates of the crusaders from all civil jurisdiction. By the sole authority of the Holy See, money was raised for carrying on these holy wars, tenths were exacted from the clergy, kings were commanded to take up the cross, and thus the foundation was laid for that unlimited power which the Popes afterwards exercised over the princes of Europe.

But whatever may have been the evils which accrued from the holy wars, it is undeniable that these were to a great extent counterbalanced by numerous advantages. By means of the crusades a pathway of commerce and correspondence was opened between the countries of the East and those of the West; arts and manufactures were transplanted into Europe, as well as comforts and conveniences unknown there before. The Europeans, on the other hand, taught the Asiatics their industry and commerce, though it must be confessed, that along with these were communicated many of their vices and cruelties. "It was not possible," says Dr. Robertson, "for the crusaders to travel through so many countries, and to behold their various customs and institutions, without acquiring information and improvement. Their views enlarged; their prejudices wore off; new ideas crowded into their minds; and they must have been sensible, on many occasions, of the rusticity of their own manners, when compared with those of a more polished people. These impressions were not so slight as to be effaced upon their return to their native countries. A close intercourse subsisted between the East and West during two centuries; new armies were continually marching from Europe to Asia, while former adventurers returned home and imported many of the customs to which they had been familiarized by a long residence abroad. Accordingly, we discover, soon after the commencement of the crusades, greater splendour in the courts of princes, greater pomp in public ceremonies, a more refined taste in pleasure and amusements, together with a more romantic spirit of enterprise spreading gradually over Europe; and to these wild expeditions, the effect of superstition or folly, we owe the first gleams of light which tended to dispel barbarism and ignorance." But however strong the opinion which the learned historian had formed of the advantages arising from the crusades, authors since the time of Dr. Robertson have been much divided in sentiment on the subject. And yet those who have made the most careful and minute investigations on the point, have been the most ready to admit that the liberty, civilization, and literature of Europe are not a little indebted to the influence of the crusades.

CULDEES, the members of a very ancient religious fraternity in Scotland, whose principal seat was Iona, one of the Western Islands. Some profess to trace back the Culdee system to the primitive ages of Christianity, while others ascribe its institution to Columba, about the middle of the sixth century. The truth appears to be, that, while individuals were no doubt found who preserved the apostolic doctrine uncontaminated amid prevailing ignorance and superstition, there was no distinct body, associated together as one society, holding doctrines, and adhering to the simple worship and practices of the Culdees, before the time of Columba. The origin of the Culdee fraternity, therefore, is in all probability due to this eminent Christian missionary, who had come over from Ireland for the purpose of proclaiming the pure doctrines of the gospel in Scotland. The religion of Rome, with all its gross superstition and idolatrous rites, had obtained at this period a firm footing in almost all the countries of Europe, but its ascendancy in Scotland was for a long time checked by the firm intrepidity of the Culdees. The followers of Columba, accordingly, were exposed to the hatred and persecution of the emissaries of Rome.

Before Columba, the "Apostle of the Highlands," as he has been termed, first landed on the western shores of Scotland, only a few faint and feeble efforts had been made to disseminate the truth of Christianity among the inhabitants of that bleak northern country, plunged in heathen darkness and idolatry. The spot on which the devoted Irish missionary first set his foot, was the island of Iona, on the west of Mull, midway between the territories of the Picts and the Caledonians. On this small sequestered islet, Columba planted his religious establishment of Culdees or Colidei, worshippers of God, as the name is sometimes explained; and from this highly favoured spot, the missionaries of a pure gospel issued forth to convey living spiritual religion throughout the whole of the northern districts of Scotland. The enterprise in which Columba was engaged was beset with difficulties. The rulers, the priests, and the people were alike opposed to Christianity, and the wild savage character of the country was not more unfavourable to the progress of the missionary from district to district, than were the fierce, barbarous manners of the people unfavourable to the reception of the message which he brought. Undiscouraged by the difficulties, however, and undismayed by the dangers of his noble undertaking, the devoted servant of Christ went forward in faith, praying that, if it were his Master's will, he might be permitted to live and labour for thirty years in this apparently barren and unpropitious part of the vineyard.

And not only was Columba faithful and zealous in his missionary life, but the singular purity of his Christian character formed a most impressive commentary upon the doctrines which he preached. He not only taught, but he lived Christianity, and thus was the truth commended to the hearts and the consciences of many, whom mere oral teaching would have failed to convince. Besides, having acquired some knowledge of the medical art, he succeeded in effecting cures in the most simple and unostentatious way, thus earning among the ignorant people a reputation for working miracles, which led them to regard him with superstitious veneration. His sagacity also in foreseeing what was likely to happen, clothed him in their eyes with the garb of a prophet. In short, the vast superiority which this man possessed, both in intellectual power and in moral purity, when compared with all around him, impressed the people with feelings of awe and veneration, as if in the presence of some supernatural being. Thus it was that the labours of Columba were, by the blessing of God, attended with the most marked success. His sermons were listened to by the heathen with profound respect, and came home to their hearts and consciences with the most thrilling effect. The consequence was, that this eminent apostle of the truth had not laboured long in Scotland before Paganism began to give way, and multitudes both of the Picts and Caledonians openly embraced the religion of Christ, while monasteries founded on the Culdee system were established by him throughout almost every district of the country.

If Columba was not himself the founder of the Culdee establishments, he must be considered at all events as having matured both their doctrine and discipline. The first and parent institution of the Culdees was at Iona, and on it as a model were founded the religious establishments which were formed at Dunkeld, Abernethy, St. Andrews, Abercorn, Govan, and other places, both on the mainland and the Western Islands of Scotland. Over all the monasteries, numerous and widely scattered, which Columba had erected, amounting, it is said, to no fewer than three hundred, he maintained order and discipline, extending to each of them the most anxious and careful superintendence. These institutions partook more of the character of religious seminaries than of monastic foundations. The education of the young, and their careful training, were objects which this worthy missionary of the cross kept mainly in view, and more especially was he strict in examining into the character and habits, the talents and acquirements of those who looked forward to the sacred profession. "He would even inquire," we are told, "if the mother who had the first moulding of the soul in the cradle was herself religious and holy." Such a statement is of itself enough to show how earnest this man was, that only holy men should minister in holy things.

The prayer of Columba, to which we have already referred, was granted; he was privileged to labour in Scotland for upwards of thirty years, and the fruit of his prayerful and painstaking exertions in the cause of Christ was seen after his death, in the rising up of a band of faithful and holy men, who maintained the truth of God in purity amid all the corruptions in doctrine and practice of the Church of Rome. The Culdees were the lights of Scotland in a dark and superstitious age. They held fast by the Word of God as the only infallible directory and guide. Even Bede, the monkish historian, in candour admits that "Columba and his disciples would receive those things only which are contained in the writings of the prophets, evangelists, and apostles; diligently observing the works of piety and virtue." The false unscriptural doctrines of Rome they openly rejected, refusing to acknowledge such innovations as the doctrine of the real presence, the idolatrous worship of saints, prayers for the dead, the doctrine of the merit of good works as opposed to gratuitous justification by faith, the infallibility of the Pope, and other Romish tenets. And not only did the Culdees differ with Rome in doctrinal points, but also in matters of discipline. The supremacy of the Pope they spurned from them as a groundless and absurd pretension. They were united in one common brotherhood, not however for the purpose of yielding obedience to a monastic rule, and selfishly confining their regards within the walls of a monastery, but that they might go forth proclaiming the gospel of Christ, animated by one common spirit, and prompted by one common aim. Theirs were missionary rather than monastic institutions, making no vows but to serve God and advance his cause in the world.

The question has often been discussed, what precise mode of ecclesiastical government prevailed among the Culdees. Both the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians alike claim them as supporting their respective systems. It cannot be denied that the term bishop is often applied to the heads of the Culdee colleges, but that they were not diocesan bishops, limited in their jurisdiction to a particular district, is manifest from the circumstance that the head of the college of Iona was always a presbyter-abbot, who exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all the Culdee churches throughout Scotland, and even the Culdee colleges in England acknowledged the authority of the parent institution in Iona, receiving their directions, not however from the Presbyter-Abbot as an individual head, but as representing the whole council of the college, consisting of the presbyters, with the abbot as their president. The right of ordination, also, was vested not in the Presbyter-

Abbot alone, but in the council, and, accordingly, we find one of their number stating, that the principles which he held were "received from his elders, who sent him thither as a bishop."

For centuries the Culdees continued to maintain their ground in Scotland, notwithstanding all the efforts put forth by the Church of Rome to crush, and if possible exterminate them. Monasteries under their direction were built in every part of the country, and not contented with diffusing the light of the gospel throughout their own land, we find them, in the beginning of the seventh century, despatching a mission into England. About this time the celebrated abbey of Lindisfarne was first established under the auspices of Oswald, king of Northumbria, who had been himself educated by the Culdees, and, therefore, applied for, and obtained, for his new monastery, a superior from the establishment at Iona. From that time Lindisfarne became a valuable training institution for the purpose of rearing missionaries for the Christianization of England. The marked success, however, of the Culdees in England was not long in attracting the notice and awakening the jealousy of the Romish church. Every effort was now put forth to bring the native clergy under subjection to the see of Rome, but with the most inflexible determination the Culdees resisted the encroachments of Papal supremacy. Rather than surrender their independence, almost all the Culdee clergy in England resigned their livings and returned to Scotland. Some of them were afterwards excommunicated by the Papal power, and some even committed to the flames.

Not contented with banishing the Culdees from England, the Romish church pursued them with its bitter hatred even into Scotland. At first an attempt was made to seduce some of them from the primitive faith. In this, however, they were only very partially successful, the only conspicuous instance of perversion from the Culdee church being that of Adomna, who was at one time abbot of Iona, but who, having paid a visit to England A. D. 702, was won over to the faith of Rome. This ecclesiastic, on his return to Iona, used all his influence with his brethren to induce them to follow his example, but without success. A few rare cases afterwards occurred of leading Culdee ecclesiastics who joined the Church of Rome, but such was the rooted attachment of the native clergy to the pure faith of the gospel, that David I., who was a keen supporter of the Papacy, found it necessary to fill up the vacant benefices with foreigners. The leading object of David, indeed, from the day that he ascended the throne of Scotland, was to abolish the Culdee form of worship, and to substitute Romanism as the religion of the country. To accomplish this cherished design, he favoured the Popish ecclesiastics in every possible way, and enriched the Popish monasteries with immense tracts of land in the most fertile districts; he gradually dislodged the Culdee abbots from their monasteries, putting in their place ecclesiastics favourable to Rome. To such an extent indeed, was this policy pursued, that great numbers of the Culdee clergy not only resigned their charges, but retired altogether from the clerical profession.

But although the efforts of the Papacy to acquire ascendancy in Scotland were earnest and persevering, the Culdees, for a long period, had influence enough to prevent the authority of Rome being acknowledged, or her interference being asked, even where disputes arose among the clergy themselves. No instance, indeed, of an appeal from the clergy of Scotland to the see of Rome seems to have occurred until the question arose as to the claim of the Archbishop of York to be metropolitan of Scotland. Even then it was with the greatest reluctance that the Pope was selected as arbiter. But from that time appeals to Rome became more frequent, and at length the Culdees themselves are found referring the settlement of a dispute to the same quarter. This, however, in the case of the Culdees, was only too sure a symptom of approaching dissolution. Weakened in energies, and diminished in numbers, they gradually lost their own spiritual life and their salutary influence on those around them.

Their struggles against the oppression, and their protest against the errors of Rome, daily became more and more feeble, until, about the close of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth centuries, they entirely disappear from the scene. But though the Culdees as a body cease to be mentioned in the page of history, there were, doubtless, a goodly number of faithful men in Scotland, even then, who professed the doctrines of the Culdees without their name, and who were ready, when occasion offered, to testify publicly against the corruptions of Romanism. Accordingly, when, after a short period, the Reformation came, and its light began to dawn on the land of the Culdees, the spirit which had animated these early missionaries of the faith revived in all its strength, and a noble band of heroes and martyrs arose, avowing the same scriptural principles which Columba and his disciples had held, and protesting like them against the errors and abominations of the apostate Church of Rome.

CULTER, a knife used by the ancient Pagans in slaughtering victims at the altars of the gods. It was usually provided with one edge, a sharp point and a curved back.

CULTRARIUS (from Lat. culter, a knife), the person who killed the victims which were sacrificed to the gods by the heathens of ancient times. The priest who presided at a sacrifice never slaughtered the victim with his own hand, but appointed one of his ministers or attendants to perform that duty instead of him.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS, a denomination of Christians which arose near the end of the last century in the western part of the United States of North America. It sprung out of a re-revival of religion which took place in Kentucky in 1797 in Gaspar River congregation, under the ministry of the Rev. James M'Gready. Soon after the commencement of his pastoral labours in that part of the country, he was deeply impressed with the low state of vital religion among his people, and being anxious that the work of God should prosper among them, he set before them a preamble and covenant, in which they bound themselves to observe the third Saturday of each month for a year as a day of fasting and prayer for the conversion of sinners in Logan county and throughout the world. They pledged themselves also to spend half an hour every Saturday evening, and half an hour every Sabbath morning at the rising of the sun, in pleading with God to revive his work.

This document was signed, accordingly, by the pastor and the chief members of his congregation, and having engaged in this solemn transaction, they gave themselves to earnest prayer that the Lord would revive his work in the midst of them. Their prayers were heard, for in a few months symptoms of a revival began to manifest themselves. In the following year the work went forward with increasing interest and power, and extending itself throughout the surrounding neighbourhood, it appeared in 1800, in what was then called the Cumberland country, particularly in Shiloh congregation, under the pastoral care of the Rev. William Hodge. So ardently desirous were the people now to hear the Word preached, that large meetings were held in different parts of the district. On these occasions multitudes attended who had come from great distances, and for greater convenience, families, in many cases, came in waggons bringing provisions with them, and encamped on the spot where the services were conducted. This, it is generally supposed, was the origin of camp meetings, which are so frequently mentioned in the accounts of American revivals.

The revival of religion which had thus taken place in Kentucky and Tennessee had originated with, and been chiefly fostered by, Presbyterians, and the increased thirst for ordinances which had arisen led to a demand for a greater number of Presbyterian ministers. The calls for ministerial labour were constant and multiplying, far beyond, indeed, what could be met by a supply of regularly ordained pastors. In these circumstances it was suggested that men of piety and promise might be selected from the lay members of the congregations, who might be encouraged to prepare for immediate ministerial work, without passing through a lengthened college curriculum. Three men, accordingly, who were regarded as well fitted to be invested without delay with the pastoral office, were requested to prepare written discourses, and to read them before the next meeting of presbytery. The individuals thus invited came forward, but strong opposition was made to the proposal, in present circumstances, to ordain them. They were authorized, however, to catechize and exhort meanwhile in the vacant congregations. At a subsequent meeting one was admitted as a candidate for the ministry, and the other two were, for the present, rejected, but continued in the office of catechists and exhorters. In the fall of 1802 they were all licensed as probationers for the holy ministry, declaring their adherence to all the doctrines of the Confession of the Presbyterian Church of America, with the exception of the doctrines of election and reprobation.

The Kentucky synod, which met in October 1802, agreed to a division of the Transylvania presbytery, and the formation of the Cumberland presbytery, including the Green river and Cumberland countries. It was this latter presbytery which was considered as having chiefly violated the rules of Presbyterian Church order, by admitting laymen without a regular education into the office of the holy ministry. A complaint against them on this ground was laid before the Kentucky synod in 1804. No action was taken in the matter until the following year, when it was resolved "that the commission of synod do proceed to examine those persons irregularly licensed, and those irregularly ordained by the Cumberland Presbytery, and judge of their qualifications for the gospel ministry." To this decision the presbytery refused to submit, alleging, "that they had the exclusive right to examine and license their own candidates, and that the synod had no right to take them out of their hands." In vain did the synod assert their authority and jurisdiction as a superior court over all the doings of the inferior judicatory; the members of presbytery still refused to yield. The young men, also, whom the synod proposed to examine, declined to submit to a re-examination, laying before them as their reasons for such a step, "That they considered the Cumberland Presbytery a regular church judicatory, and competent to judge of the faith and ability of its candidates; that they themselves had not been charged with heresy or immorality, and if they had, the presbytery would have been the proper judicature to call them to account." Finding that the young men thus joined with the presbytery in resisting their authority, the synod passed a resolution prohibiting them from exercising any of the functions of the ministry until they submitted to the jurisdiction of the commission of synod, and underwent the requisite examination. This resolution was considered unconstitutional, and therefore null and void.

The members of the Cumberland Presbytery still continued to discharge all their pastoral duties as formerly, and held occasional meetings for conference, but transacted no presbyterial business. Year after year proposals were made in the synod to compromise the matter, but in vain. At length in 1810, three ministers, who had always been favourable to the revival, and to the so-called irregular steps which had followed upon it, formed themselves into a pres bytery, under the designation of the Cumberland Presbytery, from which has gradually grown the large and increasing denomination now known in the United States, as the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The record of their constitution was in these terms: "In Dickson county, state of Tennessee, at the Rev. Samuel M'Adam's, this 4th day of February, 1810:

"We, Samuel M'Adam, Finis Ewing, and Samuel King, regularly ordained ministers of the Presbyterian Church, against whom no charge either of immorality or heresy has ever been exhibited before any judicature of the church, having waited in vain more than four years, in the meantime petitioning the General Assembly, for a redress of grievances, and a restoration of our violated rights, have and do hereby agree and determine, to constitute ourselves into a presbytery, known by the name of the Cumberland Presbytery, on the following conditions:

"All candidates for the ministry, who may hereafter be licensed by this presbytery, and all the licentiates or probationers who may hereafter be ordained by this presbytery, shall be required, before such licensure and ordination, to receive and accept the Confession of Faith and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church, except the idea of fatality that seems to be taught under the mysterious doctrine of predestination. It is to be understood, however, that such as can clearly receive the Confession of Faith without an exception, will not be required to make any. Moreover, all licentiates, before they are set apart to the whole work of the ministry, or ordained, shall be required to undergo an examination in English Grammar, Geography, Astronomy, Natural and Moral Philosophy, and Church History. It will not be understood that examinations in Experimental Religion and Theology will be omitted. The presbytery may also require an examination on any part, or all, of the above branches of knowledge before licensure, if they deem it expedient."

In the course of three years from the date of its first constitution, the number of the ministers and congregations of this church had increased to such an extent, that it was necessary to divide the body into three presbyteries, and a synod was formed which held its first meeting in October 1813. At this first meeting of the Cumberland Synod, a committee was appointed to prepare a Confession of Faith, Catechism, and Form of church government. The Confession of Faith is a modification of the Westminster Confession. Dr. Beard, the president of Cumberland College, Princeton, Kentucky, gives the following summary of the doctrines of this denomination of Christians: "That the scriptures are the only infallible rule of faith and practice; that God is an infinite, eternal, and unchangeable Spirit, existing mysteriously in three persons, the three being equal in power and glory; that God is the Creator and Preserver of all things; that the decrees of God extend only to what is for his glory; that he has not decreed the existence of sin, because it is neither for his glory nor the good of his creatures; that man was created upright, in the image of God; but, that by the transgression of the federal head, he has become totally depraved, so much so that he can do no good thing without the aid of Divine grace. That Jesus Christ is the Mediator between God and man; and that he is both God and man in one person; that he obeyed the law perfectly, and died on the cross to make satisfaction for sin; and that, in the expressive language of the apostle, he tasted death for every man. That the Holy Spirit is the efficient agent in our conviction, regeneration, and sanctification; that repentance and faith are necessary in order to acceptance, and that both are inseparable from a change of heart; that justification is by faith alone; that sanctification is a progressive work, and not completed till death; that those who believe in Christ, and are regenerated by his Spirit, will never fall away and be lost; that there will be a general resurrection and judgment; and that the righteous will be received to everlasting happiness, and the wicked consigned to everlasting misery."

This church admits of infant baptism, and administers the ordinance by affusion, and, when preferred, by immersion. The form of church government is strictly Presbyterian, including kirk-sessions, presbyteries, synods, and since 1829 a General Assembly. At the annual meeting of the Assembly in 1853, a resolution was formed to establish two Foreign Missions. The people attached to this denomination are, a large number of them at least, wealthy; a new Theological Seminary has been instituted, and they have six colleges in active operation. The body has grown much of late, and, according to the most recent accounts, consists of about 900 ministers, 1,250 churches, and nearly 100,000 members.

CUP (EUCCHARISTIC), the vessel which is handed round to communicants in the distribution of the elements in the Lord's Supper. No description is given in the New Testament of the cup which our blessed Lord used at the institution of the ordinance, but in all probability it was simply the ordinary cup used by the Jews on festive occasions. Among the primitive Christians, the eucharistic cup was of no uniform shape or material. It was made of wood, horn, glass or marble, according to circumstances. In course of time, as external show and splendour came to be prized in the church, the cup which was intended to contain the sacramental wine, was wrought with the greatest care, and of costly materials, such as silver and gold, set with precious stones, and sometimes adorned with inscriptions and pictorial representations. In the seventh century, it was laid down as imperative upon each church to have at least one cup and plate of silver. Two cups with handles came at length to be in general use; one for the clergy alone; and the other, larger in size, for the laity. When the doctrine of the real presence came to be believed, a superstitious dread began to be felt lest a single drop of the wine should be spilt, and in consequence the cups were made in some cases with a pipe attached to them, like the spout of a tea-pot, and the wine was drawn from the cup not by drinking, but by suction. Some Lutheran churches still retain cups of this description. In England, as Bingham informs us, the synod of Calcuth, A. D. 787, forbade the use of horn cups in the celebration of the eucharist,—a decree which shows that such vessels had been commonly employed before that time.

CUP (DENIAL OF, TO THE LAITY). See CHALICE.

CUP OF BLESSING, a cup which was blessed among the Jews in entertainments of ceremony, or on solemn occasions. The expression is employed by the apostle Paul, 1 Cor. x. 16, to describe the wine used in the Lord's Supper.

CUP OF SALVATION. In 2 Macc. vi. 27, we are informed that the Jews of Egypt, in their festivals for deliverance, offered cups of salvation. Some think that the "cup of salvation" was a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses. The modern Jews have cups of thanksgiving, which are blessed on the occasion of marriage feasts, and feasts which are held at the circumcision of children.

CUPELLOMANCY, divination by cups. The use of cups seems to have been resorted to in very early times for purposes of divination or soothsaying. Thus we find the question asked in regard to the cup of Joseph which he had commanded to be put in the mouth of Benjamin's sack, Gen. xlv. 5, "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? ye have done evil in so doing." It is not at all probable that Joseph made the least pretence to divination, but this imputation is ignorantly put upon him by the Egyptian steward, perhaps on account of his superior wisdom. At all events, it is clear, that the custom of divining by cups is of great antiquity in the East, and accordingly, in early Persian authors, we find mention made of the cup of JEMSHID (which see), which was believed to display all that happened on the face of the globe. Jamblichus also, in his work on Egyptian mysteries, speaks of the practice of divining by cups. That this superstitious custom is still known in Egypt, is evident from a remarkable passage in Norden's Travels. When the author with his companions had arrived at the most remote extremity of Egypt, where they were exposed to great danger in consequence of their being taken for spies, they sent one of their company to a malicious and powerful Arab, to threaten him if he should attempt to do them injury. He answered them in these words, "I know what sort of people you are. I have consulted my cup, and found in it that you are from a people of whom one of our prophets has said: There will come Franks under every kind of pretence to spy out the land. They will bring hither with them a great multitude of their countrymen to conquer the country and destroy the people." This mode of divination is still in use even in this country. In the rural districts, both of England and Scotland, the humbler classes are not unfrequently found to follow the superstitious practice of "reading cups," pretending thereby to foretell what is to happen. Instead of cupellomancy, another mode of divination has been sometimes practised, in which, after certain ceremonies, the required information was obtained by inspecting a consecrated beryl. This is termed beryllomancy. A similar mode of predicting the future is still occasionally in use in the north of England. See DIVINATION.

CUPID, the god of love among the ancient Romans, corresponding to the EROS (which see) of the Greeks.

CURATES, the name given to unbeneficed clergymen in the Church of England, who are engaged by the rector or vicar of a parish, or by the incumbent of a church or chapel, either to assist him in his duties if too laborious for him, or to undertake the charge of the parish in case of his absence. A curate then has no permanent charge, in which case he is called a stipendiary curate, and is liable to lose his curacy when his services are no longer needed. By law, however, he has it in his power to demand six months' notice before being dismissed, while he, on the other hand, must give three months' notice to the bishop before he can leave a curacy to which he has been licensed. All curates in England are not in this uncertain and insecure position, there being a number of what are called perpetual curates, who cannot be dismissed at the pleasure of the patron, but are as much incumbents as any other beneficed clergymen. This occurs where there is in a parish neither rector nor vicar, but a clergyman is employed to officiate there by the impropiator, who is bound to maintain him. By the canons of the church, "no curate can be permitted to serve in any place without examination and admission of the bishop of the diocese, or ordinary of the place, having episcopal jurisdiction, under his hand and seal." A curate who has not received a license can be removed at pleasure, but should he be licensed, the consent of the bishop is necessary to his removal. Bishops may either refuse or withdraw a license from a curate at their own pleasure.

CURCHUS, a false god worshipped among the ancient Prussians, as presiding over eating and drinking. The people offered to him the first-fruits of their harvest. They also kept a fire continually burning in honour of him, and built a new statue to him every year, breaking the former one in pieces.

CURE (Lat. cura, care), the care of souls, a term used in the Church of England to denote the spiritual charge of a parish, and sometimes used for the parish itself. The cure is given to a presentee on being instituted by the bishop, when he says, "I institute or appoint thee rector of such a church with the cure of souls." He is not, however, complete incumbent of the benefice until he has been inducted, or has received what the canon law terms "corporal possession," on which he is entitled to the tithes and other ecclesiastical profits arising within that parish, and has the cure of souls living and residing there.

CUREOTIS, the third day of the festival APATURIA (which see), celebrated at Athens. On this day the children of both sexes were admitted into their phratriæ or tribes. The ceremony consisted in offering the sacrifice of a sheep or goat for each child, and if any one opposed the reception of the child into the phratría, he stated the case, and at the same time led away the victim from the altar. If no objections were offered, the father or guardian was bound to show on oath that the child was the offspring of free-born parents, who were themselves citizens of Athens. The reception or rejection of the child was decided by the votes of the phratores. If the result was favourable, the names of both the father and the child were entered in the register of the phratría. At the close of the ceremony the wine and the flesh of the victim were distributed, every phrator receiving his share.

CURETES, priests of RHEA (which see). They are connected with the story of the birth and concealment of the infant ZETUS (which see), who was intrusted to their care. They are sometimes considered as identical with the CORYBANTES (which see).

CURIA (ROMISH), a collective appellation of all the authorities in Rome which exercise the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Pope as first bishop, superintendent, and pastor of the Roman Catholic church. See CONGREGATIONS (ROMISH).

CURIÆ. In the early ages of the history of Rome, it would appear that the citizens proper were divided into three tribes, each of which consisted of ten curiæ or wards, thus rendering the whole number of the curiæ thirty. Each of these curiæ had a president called a Curio, whose office it was to officiate as a priest. The thirty curiones or priests were presided over by a Curio Maximus or chief priest.

CURSE. See ANATHEMA.

CURSORES ECCLESIAE (Lat. couriers of the church), messengers, as Baronius supposes, employed in the early Christian church, to give private notice to every member, when and where meetings for Divine worship were to be held. Ignatius uses the term, but in a very different meaning, to denote messengers sent from one country to another upon the important affairs of the church.

CURSUS (Lat. courses), the original name of the BREVIARY (which see) in the Romish church, and the same term was used to denote the Gallican Liturgy, which was used in the British churches for a long period, until the Roman Liturgy came to be employed.

CUSTODES ARCHIVORUM (Lat. keepers of the records), identical with the CEIMELIARCHIS (which see).

CUSTOS ECCLESIAE (Lat. keeper of the church), a name sometimes given in the fourth and fifth centuries to the OSTIARI (which see), or doorkeepers in Christian churches.

CUTHEANS. See SAMARITANS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, a mode of expressing intense sorrow for the loss by death of dear relatives, which obviously must have been frequently practised in very ancient times. Hence we find distinct prohibition of such a custom in the law of Moses. Thus Lev. xix. 28, "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you." The very existence of such a command is an irrefragable proof that this practice, absurd and revolting though it be, must have been known among the Israelites, and in all probability, therefore, among the Egyptians also, with whom they had so long dwelt. It was customary among ancient idolaters to inflict such cuttings upon their own bodies. Thus it is said of the priests of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 28, "And they cried aloud, and cut themselves after their manner with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them." The prophet Jeremiah also refers to the same custom, xlvi. 37, "For every head shall be bald, and every beard clipped: upon all the hands shall be cuttings, and upon the loins sackcloth;" and xvi. 6, "Both the great and the small shall die in this land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them." Among the ancient Romans these cuttings appear to have been practised. Thus, as Plutarch informs us, the BELLONARI (which see) offered sacrifices to the goddess of war, mingling them with their own blood. Nor is the barbarous custom yet abolished, for we find idolatrous nations, for example, the Hindus, inflicting voluntary self-mutilations, imagining thereby to appease their bloodthirsty deities. Morier, in his travels in Persia, tells us, that when the anniversary of the death of Hossein is celebrated, the most violent of the followers of Ali, the father of Hossein, walk about the streets almost naked, with only their loins covered, and their bodies streaming with blood, by the voluntary cuts which they have given themselves, either as acts of love, anguish, or mortification. Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, in her description of Mohammedanism in India, referring to the same fast of the Mohurum, says, "I have even witnessed blood issuing from the breasts of sturdy men, who beat themselves simultaneously as they ejaculated the names 'Hassan!' 'Hossein!' for ten minutes, and occasionally for a longer period in that part of the service called Mortem."

The same barbarous custom is found among the aborigines of Australia. A correspondent of the Melbourne Argus thus describes a scene of this kind which he himself recently witnessed in the case of a dying man: "His wife, the bereaved one, gave evidence of uncontrollable and maddening grief. With her nails she tore the skin off her cheeks from the eyes downwards. This action she continued on the lacerated flesh until it became horrible to witness. Anon she would seize a tomahawk and dash it with both hands against her legs. At last she threw herself forward as if to catch the last breath of her dying husband. The frantic excitement of every one increases; the self-inflicted wounds are redoubled. The man is dead. The body is stretched out before the fire. Instantaneously each man ran to where he had been placed, and began stabbing himself in the legs. The howlings, the yellings, and wailings of agonizing grief, which accompanied this display, formed certainly the most imposing death-dirge that fancy could ever have imagined. Throughout the whole of three nights the entire bush resounded with their wailings." See MOURNING.

CYAMITES, a mysterious being mentioned by Pausanias, who was considered by the ancient Greeks as the hero of beans, and was worshipped in a small temple on the road between Athens and Eleusis.

CYANE, a nymph of Sicily in ancient times, who was believed to have been changed through grief into a well, and on the spot an annual festival was held by the Syracusans, in the course of which a bull was sunk into the well as a sacrifice.

CYBELE. See RHEA.

CYCLOPES (Gr. cyelos, a circle, and ops, an eye), fabulous in ancient Greek mythology. They were three in number, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, each of them having only one eye in his forehead. They were sons of Uranus and Ge, and were ranked among the Titans who were cast down into Tartarus by their father Zeus, in his war with Cronus, and the Titans delivered the Cyclopes from Tartarus, who, in return for his kindness, became the ministers of Zeus, and supplied him with thunderbolts and lightning, but were afterwards killed by Apollo. The Cyclopes, as mentioned in the Odyssey of Homer, were shepherds of gigantic stature, and of cannibal propensities, who inhabited caves in Sicily, the chief of them being Polyphemus, who had only one eye situated on his forehead. According to the later writers, the Cyclopes were assistants of Hephestus or Vulcan, who dwelt under Mount Ætna in Sicily, where they employed themselves in busily forging armour for gods and heroes. Some accounts treat them as skilful architects, and accordingly, we find Cyclopean walls spoken of to describe various gigantic mural structures, which are still found in several parts of Greece and Italy. It is difficult to ascertain what is the precise mythical meaning of the Cyclopes. Plato regards them as intended to represent men in their savage uncultivated state, but it is far more likely that they were types of certain powers or energies of nature, indicated by volcanoes and earthquakes.

CYCNUS, a son of Apollo by Thyria, who was along with his mother changed into a swan. Another mythical personage of this name is mentioned in the ancient classical writers, as having been the son of Poseidon or Neptune, and a third as the son of Ares or Mars, and Pelopia.

CYDONIA, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Phrixia in Elis.

CYLLENIUS, a surname of Hermes, derived from Mount Cyllene in Arcadia, where he was worshipped and had a temple.

CYNICS, a school of ancient philosophy among the Greeks. It was founded by Antisthenes about the year B. C. 380. The characteristic principle held by the Cynics was, that virtue consisted of a proud independence of all outward things. Diogenes was a fit representative of this principle. Worldly pleasures and honours of every kind were utterly despised, and even the ordinary civilities of life were set at naught. Hence, probably, the name Cynics, from the Greek cyon, cygnos, a dog, as their rude, uncivil deportment was fitted to remind one of the snarling of a dog. The views inculcated by this school were a caricature of the ethical opinions of Socrates, who taught that the end of man was to live virtuously, while the Cynics, carrying out the principle to the most absurd extravagance, wished that man should set nothing else before him but naked virtue, trampling under foot all the subordinate feelings and proprieties which go to form the essential drapery, if not the essence, of virtue.

CYNOCEPHALUS (Gr. cyon, a dog, and cephalos, a head), a name sometimes given to the ancient Egyptian deity ANUBIS (which see), as being represented in the shape of a man with a dog's head.

CYNOSURA, a nymph of Mount Ida, and one of the nurses of the infant Zeus, who afterwards rewarded her services by placing her among the stars.

CYNTHIA, a surname of Artemis, derived from Mount Cynthus, in the island of Delos, where she was born.

CYNTHIUS, a surname of Apollo, from Cynthus in Delos, which was his birth-place.

CYRENAICS, one of the schools of ancient Greek philosophy. It was founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, who flourished about B. C. 380. The Socratic doctrine, which formed the starting point of this school, was, that all philosophy is of a practical character, and has as its ultimate object the happiness of man. It rejected all idea of duty, or what ought to be done from its abstract rightness, and regarded virtue as enjoyment, or what ought to be done because it contributes to our immediate satisfaction or happiness. Virtue, therefore, was to be valued, in the estimation of Aristippus and his school, as being productive of pleasure, which was the chief object at which man ought to aim. Happiness is with him not different from pleasure, but is merely the sum of pleasures, past, present, and future. Every thing was to be prized according to the amount of enjoyment which it gives. The basest pleasures, therefore, were, in the view of the Cyrenaics, on a footing with the most honourable, provided they imparted an equal amount of enjoyment. Such doctrines were felt even among Pagans to be dangerous. One of the most noted teachers of this school, Hegesias, was prohibited from lecturing, lest imbibing his sentiments they should put an end to their existence by their own hands, in order to escape from the pleasures of a life so greatly overbalanced by pains.

CYRENE, a mythical person beloved by Apollo, who carried her from Mount Pelion to Libya, where she gave name to Cyrene.

CYRIL (ST., LITURGY OF), one of the twelve Liturgies contained in the Missal of the MARONITES (which see), printed at Rome in 1592.

CYRILLIANS, a name applied by the NESTORIANS (which see), in the fifth century, to the orthodox Christians, in consequence of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, being the chief opponent of the doctrines of Nestorius.

CYTHERA, a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Cythera in Crete, or from the island of Cythera in the Ægean Sea, where she had a celebrated temple.

DABAIBA, an idol formerly worshipped at Panama in South America, to which slaves were sacrificed. This goddess was considered as having at one time been a native of earth, who, on account of her virtues, was exalted to heaven at her death, and received the name of the mother of God. Thunder and lightning were regarded as an expression of her anger.

DABIS, a deity among the Japanese, of whom there is an immense statue, made of brass, to whom they offer licentious and indecent worship once every month. He is thought to be the same with DAIBOTH (which see).

DACTYLI IDÆI, fabulous beings who dwelt on Mount Ida in Phrygia, who were concerned in the worship of Rhea. Sometimes they are confounded with the Cabeiri, Curetes, and Corybantes. They were believed to have discovered iron and the art of working it. The utmost difference of opinion existed as to their number, some reckoning them three, others five, ten, and even as high as a hundred. Their name is supposed by some to have been derived from daktulos, a finger, there being ten of them, corresponding to the number of fingers on the hand. Their habitation is placed by some writers on Ida in Crete, and they are even regarded as the earliest inhabitants of that island, where they discovered iron on Mount Berecynthus. The Dactyls seem, indeed, to be mythical representatives of the first discoverers of iron, and of the art of smelting it by means of fire.

DACTYLOMANCY (Gr. dactulon, a ring, and manteia, divination), a kind of divination which had its origin among the ancient Greeks, and was afterwards adopted by the Romans. It was performed by suspending a ring from a fine thread over a round table, on the edge of which were marked the letters of the alphabet. When the vibration of the ring had ceased, the letters over which the ring happened to hang, when joined together, gave the answer. We read also in ancient story of Gyges, whose enchanted ring, when he turned it towards the palm of his hand, possessed the power of rendering him invisible. See DIVINATION.

DADU PANT'HIS, one of the Vaishnava sects in Hindustan. It had its origin from Dadu, a cotton-cleaner by profession, who, having been admonished by a voice from heaven to devote himself to a religious life, retired with that view to Baherana mountain, where, after some time, he disappeared, and no traces of him could be found. His followers believed him to have been absorbed into the Deity. He is supposed to have flourished about A. D. 1600. The followers of Dadu wear no peculiar mark on the forehead, but carry a rosary, and are further distinguished by a round white cap according to some, but, according to others, one with four corners, and a flap hanging down behind. This cap each man is required to manufacture for himself.

The Dadu Pant'his are divided into three classes: 1. the Viraktas, religious characters who go bare-headed, and have but one garment and one water-pot. 2. The Nagas, who carry arms, which they are ready to use for hire; and amongst the Hindu princes they have been considered as good soldiers. 3. The Bister Dharis, who follow the usual occupations of ordinary life. This last class is further subdivided, and the chief branches form fifty-two divisions, the peculiarities of which have not been ascertained. The Dadu Pant'his are accustomed to burn their dead at early dawn, but in some cases the bodies are exposed in an open field or desert place, to be devoured by beasts and birds of prey, lest insect life might be destroyed, which is liable to happen when the body is laid on a funeral pile. This sect, in its three above-noted classes, is said to be very numerous in Marwar and Ajmeer. Their chief place of worship is at Naraiva, where the be^l of Dadu and the collection of the texts of the sect are preserved and worshipped, while a small building on the hill Baherana marks the place of his disappearance. A mela or fair is held annually from the day of new moon to that of full moon, in February and March, at Naraina. The sect maintain a friendly intercourse with the KABIR PANTHIS (which see), and are frequent visitors at the Chaura at Benares.

DADUCHI, the torch-bearers in the Eleusinian mysteries, whose duty it was, in conjunction with the Hierophant, to offer prayers and sing hymns to Ceres and Proserpine. They wore diadems, and are considered generally to represent mythically the sun. They passed the lighted torch from hand to hand, in commemoration of Ceres searching for her daughter Proserpine by the light of a torch, which she had kindled at the fires of Ætna.

DÆDALA, two festivals in honour of Hera, celebrated in Boeotia. Pausanias describes their origin as having been derived from the following circumstances. A quarrel having arisen between Zeus and Hera, the latter fled to Eubœa, whence she could not be persuaded to return, until her husband adopted the expedient of procuring a wooden statue, which he dressed and placed in a chariot, pretending that it was a young virgin whom he was about to marry. The scheme was successful, for Hera's jealousy being excited, she hastily found her way to the home of her husband, and on learning the nature and design of the device, she became reconciled to Zeus. The Platæans, accordingly, instituted a greater and a lesser festival, both of which were called Dædala, a name given in ancient times to statues and other works of human ingenuity and skill. The lesser festival was celebrated by the Platæans alone at Alalcomene, the largest oak-grove in Boeotia. In this forest they exposed to the air pieces of boiled meat, which attracted crows, and the people watching on what trees the birds perched, these were forthwith cut down, and converted into wooden statues or dædala. The greater festival, on the other hand, which was by far the more important of the two, and brought together a larger number of people, was celebrated every sixty years. The ceremony was not observed by the inhabitants of Platæa alone, or even of Boeotia, but by people drawn from all the cities of Greece. On this occasion, also, the festival was of a peculiarly popular description. The ceremony commenced with the erection of an altar on Mount Cithæron, constructed of square pieces of wood. A statue of a female, designed to represent Hera, was then mounted on a chariot, and led forward in procession, a young woman leading the way, who was attired like a bride, and the Boeotians following in an order regulated by lot. On their arrival at the sacred spot, a quantity of wood was piled upon the altar, and each city, as well as wealthy individuals, offered a heifer to Hera, and a bull to Zeus.

The people of more limited means contented themselves with sacrificing sheep. Wine and incense in great abundance were placed upon the altar along with the victims, and twelve wooden statues were, at the same time, laid upon the smoking pile, which was allowed to burn until both victims and altar were wholly consumed. It is difficult to give a satisfactory explanation of these Grecian festivals, but Plutarch, who wrote a work upon the subject, considers the whole ceremonies as a mythical representation of physical disturbances in the elements to which Boeotia had at one time been subject, although, in course of time, it had been delivered from them.

DÆDALUS, a mythical person among the ancient Greeks, said by some to be of Athenian, by others of Cretan, origin. He seems to have excelled in sculpture, and his sister's son, Perdix, to whom he had given lessons in the art, having risen to higher reputation than himself, he killed him through envy. For this crime Dædalus was sentenced to death by the Areiopagus, and to escape punishment he fled to Crete. Here he soon acquired great fame as a sculptor, having constructed a wooden cow for Pasiphæa, and the labyrinth at Cnossus in which the Minotaur was kept. Minos, the king of Crete, being displeased with the conduct of Dædalus, imprisoned him; but he was set at liberty by Pasiphæa, and finding no other means of escaping from Crete, he procured wings for himself and his son Icarus, which were fastened on their bodies with wax. By this means Dædalus succeeded in crossing the Ægean Sea, but Icarus, having taken a loftier flight than his father, went so near the sun that the wax melted, and he fell into that part of the Ægean which, from this circumstance, received the name of the Icarian Sea. Meanwhile Dædalus took refuge in Sicily, where, under the protection of Cocalus, king of the Sicani, he prosecuted his favourite art with remarkable success. He seems afterwards to have resided in Sardinia, and Diodorus Siculus mentions him as having executed works in Egypt, and acquired so great renown that he was worshipped in that country as a god. The mythical meaning of this strange story is probably to be found in the invention and progress of the fine arts, particularly the arts of sculpture and architecture, and the order in which they passed from one country to another. The material of which Dædalus wrought the greater part, if not the whole, of his works, was not stone but wood. It is somewhat remarkable, that the earliest works of art which were attributed to the gods, received the name of dædala, and it is probable that the earliest carved images would be of wood wrought into some shape or other designed to represent a god.

DAEIRA (Gr. the knowing), a female divinity connected with the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see). She is described by Pausanias as the daughter of Oceanus, and mother of Eleusis. Some have regarded her as identical with Aphrodite, Demeter, or Hera.

DÆMONS. See DEMONS.

DA'GOBA, a conical erection surmounting relics among the Budhists. The name is said by Mr. Hardy to be derived from dá, dátu, or dhátu, an osseous relic, and geba or garbha, the womb. These buildings are sometimes of immense height, of circular form, and composed of stone or brick, faced with stone or stucco. They are built upon a platform, which again rests upon a natural or artificial elevation, which is usually reached by a flight of steps. The utmost respect is felt for dagobas among the Budhists, chiefly because they contain relics of different kinds. Professor Wilson, in his 'Ariana Antiqua,' thus describes the ordinary contents of a dagoba: "The most conspicuous objects are, in general, vessels of stone or metal; they are of various shapes and sizes; some of them have been fabricated on a lathe. They commonly contain a silver box or casket, and within that, or sometimes by itself, a casket of gold. This is sometimes curiously wrought. One found by Mr. Masson at Deh Bimaran is chased with a double series of four figures, representing Gautama in the act of preaching; a mendicant is on his right, a lay-follower on his left, and behind the latter a female disciple; they stand under arched niches resting on pillars, and between the arches is a bird; a row of rubies is set round the upper and lower edge of the vessel, and the bottom is also chased with the leaves of the lotus: the vase had no cover. Within these vessels, or sometimes in the cell in which they are placed, are found small pearls, gold buttons, gold ornaments and rings, beads, pieces of white and coloured glass and crystal, pieces of clay or stone with impressions of figures, bits of bone, and teeth of animals of the ass and goat species, pieces of cloth, and folds of the Tuz or Bhurj leaf, or rather the bark of a kind of birch on which the Hindus formerly wrote; and these pieces bear sometimes characters which may be termed Bactrian; but they are in too fragile and decayed a state to admit of being unfolded or read. Similar characters are also found superficially scratched upon the stone, or dotted upon the metal vessels. In one instance they were found traced upon the stone with ink. Within some of the vessels was also found a liquid, which upon exposure rapidly evaporated, leaving a brown sediment, which was analysed by Mr. Prinsep, and offered some traces of animal and vegetable matters."

The principal dagobas in Ceylon, as we learn from Mr. Hardy, are at Anurádhapura, and it would appear that it was accounted a ceremony of great importance among the ancient ascetics to walk round one of these sacred structures. It is regarded by the Hindu Brahmans as a most meritorious walk to circumambulate a temple, raising the person who performs this pious act to a place in the heaven of the god or goddess to whom the temple belongs. The Nepaulese also account it one of the most devout employments in which a Buddhist can be engaged to march round a dagoba, repeating mental prayers, and holding in his right hand a small cylinder fixed upon the upper end of a short staff or handle, which he keeps in perpetual revolution. The reverence in which these structures are held is thus noticed by Mr. Hardy, in his deeply interesting and valuable work, entitled 'Eastern Monachism:': "Any mark of disrespect to the dagoba is regarded as being highly criminal, whilst a contrary course is equally deserving of reward. When Elaro, one of the Malabar sovereigns, who reigned in Ceylon B. C. 205, was one day riding in his chariot, the yoke-bar accidentally struck one of these edifices, and displaced some of the stones. The priests in attendance reproached him for the act; but the monarch immediately descended to the ground, and prostrating himself in the street, said that they might take off his head with the wheel of his carriage. But the priests replied, 'Great king! our divine teacher delights not in torture; repair the dagoba.' For the purpose of replacing the fifteen stones that had been dislodged, Elaro bestowed 15,000 of the silver coins called kahapana. Two women who had worked for hire at the erection of the great dagoba by Dutugami were for this meritorious act born in Tawutisa. The legend informs us that on a subsequent occasion they went to worship at the same place, when the radiance emanating from their persons was so great that it filled the whole of Ceylon."

The ground on which a dagoba is held in so high estimation is simply because it contains relics which have from remote times been worshipped by the Budhists. As far back as the fourth century, Fa Hian, a Chinese traveller, mentions such a practice as then prevailing. "The bones of Gotama, the garments he used, the utensils he used, and the ladder by which he visited heaven, were worshipped by numbers of devout pilgrims; and happy did the country consider itself that retained one of these precious remains." The most celebrated relic which is still to be found among the worshippers of Gotama Budha is the DALADA' (which see). To make a present or offering to a dagoba is viewed as an act of the highest virtue, which will be rewarded both in this world and the next, and will lead to the attainment of Nirvana or annihilation. Budha himself declared while on earth, "Though neither flowers nor anything else should be offered, yet if any one will look with a pleasant mind at a dagoba or the court of the bó-tree, he will undoubtedly be born in a DE'WA-LOKA (which see); it is unnecessary to say that he who sweeps these sacred places, or makes offerings to them, will have an equal reward; furthermore, should any one die on his way to make an offering to a dagoba, he also will receive the blessedness of the Déwa-lokas." Some dagobas are alleged to have the power of working miracles, but this privilege is almost exclusively confined to those which have been built in honour of the rahats, or beings who are free from all evil desire, and possess supernatural powers.

DAGON, a great god of the Philistines mentioned in the Bible. He is represented in 1 Sam. v. 4, as having the face and arms of a man, and the body of a fish. The temple of Dagon at Gaza is described in Judg. xvi. 27, as having been so magnificent and large that on the roof of it stood about 3,000 men and women. This deity must have had worship offered him till a late period, as we find a Beth-Dagon, or temple of Dagon, mentioned in the First Book of Maccabees. Sanchoniathon interprets the word to mean bread-corn, and alleges him to have been the son of Uranus, and the inventor of bread-corn and the plough. Some regard Noah, who was a husbandman, as represented by Dagon. Great difference of opinion has existed among authors as to the god, or, the word being also feminine, the goddess indicated by the Philistine idol. Sometimes it received the name of Derceto, and at other times of Atergatis. Herodotus compares Dagon to the goddess Venus. It is not unlikely that the Jews, from their vicinity to the country of the Philistines, may have fallen into the worship of this idol. Selden conjectures that the god Oannes worshipped by the Babylonians was identical with the Dagon of the Phœnicians. Berosus, quoted by Eusebius, says, that this Oannes had the body of a fish, and below the head placed upon the body, another head of a man which came out from under the head of the fish. He had likewise a man's feet coming from under the tail of the fish, and a human voice. This monster, the same ancient author says, came every morning out of the sea, went to Babylon, and taught men arts and sciences, returning every evening to its ocean-home.

It has been supposed that Dagon was a male god at Ashdod, but a female at Ascalon, where she had a magnificent temple, and was called Derceto or Dirce, being identical also with Atergatis the Syrian goddess. The Jewish writers generally agree in deriving the word Dagon from dag, the Hebrew word for a fish, and that, like the Tritons, the idol was half man, half fish. Abarbanel and Jarchi, however, seem to hint that the whole statue of Dagon was the figure of a fish, except his hands and feet, which had a human shape. It is remarkable that Layard, in his recent researches in the ruins of Nineveh, discovered in the course of his excavations a statue evidently of a deity, the upper portion being in human shape, and the lower in the shape of a fish, thus confirming the idea that the same gods were worshipped among the Assyrians and Chaldeans as among the Phœnicians. Jurieu, in his ingenious and learned 'History of the Doctrines and Worships of the Church,' endeavours to prove that Dagon was no other than the Phœnician Neptune. The arguments in support of this opinion he thus briefly states: "His shape of a fish is a demonstration of it; for I see no reason why they should give the figure of a fish to a celestial god. The name of Dagon, that signifies a fish, is another proof of it; for fishes are the chief subjects of Neptune, and his borrowing his name from them is no wonder. In short, as it is rational to presume that the Phœnicians had a Neptune, as well as a Saturn, Jupiter, and Pluto, so we can find him by no other name than that of Dagon. It is true, there were other marine gods, which might be represented in the same manner. But this Dagon seems to be the king of them all; for we find by the history of Samson, that he was looked upon by the Philistines as the great god, who had delivered up Samson unto them. Accordingly, in the history of the ark and Dagon, he is absolutely called the god of the Philistines, 'Dagon our god.' Had he been of the inferior gods, it is not like they would have done so much homage to him." Bochart supposes Dagon to have been Japhet, the son of Noah, and that the government of the sea was bestowed upon him, because his allotment and that of his posterity was in the islands, peninsulas, and lands beyond the sea, that is, in Europe.

DAHOMÉY (RELIGION OF). The country whose religion falls to be sketched in this article, forms a kingdom of considerable extent in the interior of Western Africa, behind the Slave Coast. One grand point which may be regarded as the centre of the whole religious, and indeed political system of the people of Dahomey is superstitious veneration for the person of their monarch, whom they look upon as a superior being, nay, almost a divinity. So much is this idolatrous feeling encouraged by the government, that it is accounted criminal to believe that the king of Dahomey eats, drinks, and sleeps like ordinary mortals. His meals are always taken to a secret place, and any man that has the misfortune or the temerity to cast his eyes upon him in the act, is put to death. If the king drinks in public, which is done on some extraordinary occasions, his person is concealed by having a curtain held up before him, during which time the people prostrate themselves, and afterwards shout and cheer at the very top of their voices. The consequence is, that the orders of the sovereign, however tyrannical and unjust, are obeyed with the most implicit submission, no one daring to resist the will of a ruler whom they believe to be invested with almost Divine attributes.

In this, as in all the other parts of Western Africa, FETISH WORSHIP (which see) prevails, the fetish or imaginary god of Dahomey being the leopard, which is accounted so sacred, that if any person should kill one of these animals, he is instantly offered up in sacrifice to the offended deity. The leopard is regarded as representing the Supreme, invisible god "Seh," and worshipped with great reverence by the people. Another object of worship is "Soh," the deity of thunder and lightning. Sacrifices are offered of different kinds. The ceremonies practised in the sacrifice of a bullock, are thus detailed by Mr. Forbes in his 'Dahomey and the Dahomans:': "The priests and priestesses (the highest of the land, for the Dahoman proverb has it that the poor are never priests) assemble within a ring, in a public square; a band of discordant music attends; and after arranging the emblems of their religion, and the articles carried in religious processions, such as banners, spears, tripods, and vessels holding bones, skulls, congealed blood, and other barbarous trophies, they dance, sing, and drink until sufficiently excited. The animals are next produced, and decapitated by the male priests, with large chopper-knives. The altars are washed with the blood caught in basins; the rest is taken round by the priests and priestesses, who, as Moses commanded the elders of Israel (B. C. 1491), 'strike the lintel and two side posts' of all the houses of the devotees, 'with the blood that is in the basin.' The turkey buzzards swarm in the neighbourhood, and with the familiarity of their nature gorge on the mangled carcase as it is cut in pieces. The meat is next cooked, and distributed among the priests; portions being set aside to feed the spirits of the departed and the fetishes. After the sacrifice the priesthood again commence dancing, singing, and drinking; men, women, and children, grovelling in the dirt, every now and then receiving the touch and blessing of these enthusiasts."

As appears from this quotation, the Dahoman priesthood is taken chiefly from the higher classes, and indeed in the sacred order are to be found some of the royal wives and children. To reveal the sacred mysteries and incantations, the knowledge of which is limited to the priestly office, is visited with capital punishment. Private sacrifices of fowls, ducks, and even goats, are common, and are performed with ceremonies similar to those observed in the public sacrifices. In cases of sickness, for instance, it is customary to endeavour to propitiate the gods with sacrifices of different kinds, commencing with the simple offering of palm-oil food, and if this fail, owls, ducks, goats, and bullocks are sacrificed. Should the sick man be wealthy or of high rank, he asks the king to allow him to sacrifice one or more slaves, for each of whom he pays a certain sum into the royal treasury. If he recovers from his sickness, he expresses his gratitude by liberating one or more slaves, bullocks, goats, fowls, or other objects which had been destined for sacrifice, but which are now given up to the fetish, and therefore cared for by the fetishmen. If, on the other hand, he dies, the latest and most earnest request of the dying man is that his principal wives should consent to accompany him into the next world—a request which is almost invariably granted. At the burial, accordingly, of a Dahoman chief, a number of his wives and favourite slaves are sacrificed on the tomb, as has been already noticed in the case of another of the tribes of Western Africa. Nay, even it is not uncommon for his wives to fall upon each other with knives, and lacerate themselves in the most cruel and barbarous manner; and this work of butchery is continued until they are forcibly restrained.

"There is no place," says Mr. Leighton Wilson in his 'Western Africa,' "where there is more intense heathenism; and to mention no other feature in their superstitious practices, the worship of snakes at this place fully illustrates this remark. A house in the middle of the town is provided for the exclusive use of these reptiles, and they may be seen here at any time in very great numbers. They are fed, and more care is taken of them than of the human inhabitants of the place. If they are seen straying away they must be brought back; and at the sight of them the people prostrate themselves on the ground, and do them all possible reverence. To kill or injure one of them is to incur the penalty of death. On certain occasions they are taken out by the priests or doctors, and paraded about the streets, the bearers allowing them to coil themselves around their arms, necks, and bodies. They are also employed to detect persons who have been guilty of witchcraft. If in the hands of the priest they bite the suspected person, it is sure evidence of his guilt, and no doubt the serpent is trained to do the will of his keeper in all such cases. Images, usually called greegrees, of the most uncouth shape and form, may be seen in all parts of the town, and are worshipped by all classes of persons. Perhaps there is no place where idolatry is more openly practised, or where the people have sunk into deeper pagan darkness." See ASHANTEES (RELIGION OF THE).

Circumcision is practised among the natives of Dahomey, as among many other tribes throughout the whole African continent, with the exception of those on the Grain Coast, and the neglect of this ceremony exposes a man to the heaviest reproach and ridicule. Nor is this the only case in which the Dahomans have adopted Jewish practices. The door-posts, for example, of their houses are sprinkled with the blood of animals offered in sacrifice; they have also their stated oblations and purifications, and as an expression of mourning they shave their heads, and dress themselves in the meanest and most abject garments. But far more nearly does this superstitious people approach in their religious rites to the idolatry of Paganism. They venerate all large animals, such as the elephant, and hold them in a species of religious awe. Should a lion be killed, the skull and bones are a welcome offering to the fetish, and gain for the donor some special privileges. So highly do they venerate their own fetish, the leopard, that should a man fall a victim to this sacred animal, he is gone in the belief of the Dahoman to the land of good spirits; and instead of revenging his death by the murder of his devonrer, his relations will even feed the animal. The temples in Dahomey are very numerous, and in each of them there is an altar of clay. No worship, however, seems to be conducted in these temples, but small offerings are daily given by the devotees, and removed by the priests. There is no recognition of the Divine Being by any stated form of worship. The only approach to it is that which is offered to the spirits of the dead, and usually denominated DEMON

WORSHIP (which see). The presence of some spirits is courted eagerly, while that of others is much dreaded. Demoniacal possession is thought to be not unfrequent among the people of Dahomey, and certain ceremonies are gone through by the priests to effect the expulsion of the demons.

The "customs," as they are called, in honour of the dead, are observed at Dahomey, as well as at Ashantee. Human beings are sacrificed on these occasions to the manes of the dead, under an idea that those who have passed away from this world are still capable of being gratified by a large train of slaves and attendants, such as afforded them pleasure when on earth. At these customs for the dead, not only are human beings offered up in sacrifice, but music, dancing, and mirth of every kind accompany the horrid rites. Twice every year these "customs" are repeated, receiving the name of the great and little customs. Mr. Forbes was present on one of these occasions, on the last day of May 1849, when the king of Dahomey offered human sacrifices as gifts to his people. The description is painfully interesting: "In the centre of the marketplace, a platform was erected twelve feet in height, enclosed by a parapet breast high. The whole was covered with cloths of all colours, and surmounted by tents, gaudy umbrellas, and banners of varied hues and devices, among which, as usual, were several union jacks. On the west front of the Ah-toh, which must have been at least 100 feet square, was a barrier of the prickly acacia, and within this the victims for the day's sacrifice lashed in baskets and canoes. A dense naked mob occupied the area, whilst a guard of soldiers prevented them from bearing down the barrier. Beyond in all directions were groups of people collected round the banners and umbrellas of the different ministers and caboccers. The king insisted on our viewing the place of sacrifice. Immediately under the royal stand, within the brake of acacia bushes, stood seven or eight fell ruffians, some armed with clubs, others with scimitars, grinning horribly. As we approached the mob yelled fearfully, and called upon the king to 'feed them, they were hungry.' The victims were held high above the heads of their bearers, and the naked ruffians thus acknowledged the munificence of their prince. Silence again ruled, and the king made a speech, stating that of his prisoners he gave a portion to his soldiers, as his father and grandfather had done before. Having called their names, the one nearest was divested of his clothes, the foot of the basket placed on the parapet, when the king gave the upper part an impetus, and the victim fell at once into the pit beneath. A fall of upwards of twelve feet might have stunned him, and before sense could return the head was cut off, and the body thrown to the mob, who, now armed with clubs and branches, brutally mutilated, and dragged it to a distant pit, where it was left as food for the beasts and birds of prey. After the third victim had thus been sacrificed, the king retired, and the chiefs and slave-dealers completed the deed which the monarch blushed to finish. As we descended the ladder, we came on another scene of this tragedy. Each in the basket in which the victim had sat a few moments before, lay the grizzly bleeding heads, five on one side, six on the other." How impressively may such a narrative show, that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of horrid cruelty." With the exception of a short visit of a Wesleyan Missionary to the country, the natives have never had till recently an opportunity of listening to the Word of Life. A mission station, however, has been established by the Wesleyans at Badagry, and there is a prospect of two more being commenced, one at Whydah, and another at Abomey, the capital of Dahomey, but the population of that kingdom, amounting to 200,000 souls, are at this hour sitting in darkness and in the region of the shadow of death.

DAI-BOTH, one of the principal deities of Japan. The word is said to mean the Great God, and therefore it is not improbable that he may be the same with AMIDAS (which see), considered under some of his peculiar attributes, or rather it may be the Great Budha himself. But whether this be the case or not, a splendid temple exists at Miaco, which is dedicated to the worship of Dai-Both. A lively description of this temple is given by an old Dutch writer: "Before you come to the temple itself," says he, "you pass through a kind of a gate, on each side whereof are erected two monstrous figures, with several arms, fraught with arrows, swords, and other offensive weapons. These two monsters stand in a posture of defence, and seem prepared to combat each other. From this gate you proceed to a large quadrangle, with galleries on each side of it, which are supported by pillars of freestone. After you have crossed this square, you come to another gate, embellished with two large lions made of stone, and then you go directly into the pagod, in the centre whereof the idol Dai-Both is seated, after the Oriental fashion, on an altar-table, which is raised some small matter above the ground. This idol, notwithstanding you see him seated like the great Jove of old, is of a monstrous height; for his head touches the very roof of his temple. The attitude of Jupiter was justified by the symbolical intention of it, which intimated, says a celebrated ancient author, that the power of the deity was firm and unalterable. The Japanese and Indians, in all probability, entertain the very same idea. The colossus of Dai-Both, though composed of wood, is plastered and covered over that with gilded brass. This idol has the breast and face of a woman; his black locks are woolly, and curled like a negro's. One may form some idea of the prodigious bulk of this colossus by his hands, which are bigger than the whole body of any man of a moderate stature. He is encircled on all sides with gilded rays, in which there are placed abundance of images, representing some of the CAMIS (which see) and demi-gods of Japan. There are several others in a standing posture, both on his right hand and on his left, all crowned with rays, like our Christian saints. The table of the altar, whereon the idol is sitting, is furnished with a large quantity of lighted lamps."

Kaempfer declares the temple of Dai-Both to be the most magnificent building in the whole kingdom of Japan, and much more lofty than any other edifice in Miaco. The idol itself, which is seated in the heart of flowers, is gilt all over. Its ears are very large, and its hair is curled. There is a crown upon its head, and a large speck or stain upon its forehead. The arms and breast are naked. The right hand is extended, and points to the hollow of the left, which rests upon the belly. A circle of rays is placed behind the idol, and is so large that it takes up the circumference of four pillars. The pillars are at a considerable distance from one another, and the statue of Dai-Both, which is of great size, touches only two of them with its shoulders. Within the oval which contains the statue, and all round it, are small idols in human forms, and seated on flowers. See JAPAN (RELIGION OF).

DAIKOKU, a Japanese deity, to whom the inhabitants of that island consider themselves as indebted for all the riches they enjoy. This idol, which is in fact the Plutus of Japan, is represented sitting on a bale or sack of rice, and with an uplifted hammer, which he is wielding above his head ready to strike any object, and wherever the stroke falls it carries with it universal plenty. A bag of rice is, in the estimation of this singular people, an emblem of wealth.

DAIRI, the spiritual head or supreme pontiff of the religion of the SINTOS (which see), the native religion of Japan. At one time he combined in his own person the offices of secular and ecclesiastical ruler of the country. His temporal, however, was separated from his spiritual, power about the middle of the twelfth century, but it was not until 1585 that the Cubo or temporal sovereign of the island began to rule with an unlimited authority. The Dairi is thus considerably restricted in both wealth and influence, but he is recognized as the pope, or highest spiritual governor to whom all veneration and respect is due. He resides at Miaco, and appropriates to himself the whole revenue of that city and its rich adjoining territory. To enable him to maintain suitable rank a liberal allowance is due to him out of the public treasury, besides large sums which he receives from the privilege he enjoys of conferring titles of honour. The grant which ought to be paid out of the imperial funds for the support of the Dairi is far from being regularly paid, the Cubo for one excuse or another frequently withholding it. In consequence of this, the attendants of the pontiff are many of them obliged to work for their own maintenance, and he finds it difficult to sustain the dignity and splendour which he regards as befitting his office. The descendants of the royal family, who now amount to a large number, all of them belong to the court of the Dairi, and the sacred treasury being quite inadequate to the support of so many dependents, they are compelled to employ themselves in the most humble occupations to keep up their outward dignity. The utmost exertions are put forth by all connected with the Dairi to enable the court to present the most imposing aspect of magnificence. The supreme pontiff himself is raised, in the estimation of the Sintos, above all mortal imperfection, being viewed as invested with almost superhuman attributes. His foot is never to be profaned by touching the ground, and he is never to be moved from one place to another unless upon men's shoulders. It is considered unlawful for him to cut his hair or nails; and such processes, accordingly, being sometimes necessary, are performed when he is asleep. On his death the next heir succeeds, whether male or female, at whatever age. In fact, he is regarded as a god on earth who never dies, but who, from time to time, renovates his soul. An illustration of this truth has recently occurred. On the 1st July 1856, the Dairi was taken ill; on the 3d he became worse, and immediately the priests spread abroad the report, that the Dairi had placed himself in communication with the great god of heaven, and was about to renew his soul in the bosom of Ten-Sio Dai-Tsin, the highest of all their divinities. The crowd hastened to the palace, where the Dairi was lying on an immense bed of state with his robes on, and the gauze veil covering his face. The priests remained praying in turns in the midst of burning perfumes and performing various ceremonies of their religion. On the 5th July the Dairi expired, and immediately after the supreme pontiff had breathed his last, the chief priest announced that the soul had gone to pay a visit to the gods, and would speedily return. A dead silence followed this announcement, and in the space of about ten minutes the chief priest, surrounded by the whole sacred college, threw a large linen cloth over the dead body, and the moment after, withdrawing the cloth, discovered to the eyes of the wondering multitude another form altogether similar to that of the late Dairi, but full of life and health. This new head of the church at once sat up in bed, then rose altogether, proceeded to an altar placed at one side of the apartment, ascended it, and gave his benediction to the multitude, at the close of which shouts of joy hailed the appearance of the new Dairi. The explanation of this transaction is not difficult to discover. By a stratagem easily managed, the priests had substituted for the deceased Dairi the person of his son, his natural heir. A trap-door had let down the dead body, and raised the living, without the people being able to perceive the deception practised upon them, amid the numberless prostrations and other ceremonies called for by their peculiar form of worship.

Formerly, when the Dairi, along with his spiritual office, combined that of Emperor of Japan, he was accustomed to present himself every morning to public view for hours together. On these occasions he appeared seated upon his throne, with his crown upon his head, and his whole body remaining fixed and immoveable like a statue. The slightest motion, the least cast of his eye to the right hand or to the left, portended some fatal disaster, and if he looked steadily on one particular side, it infallibly prognosticated war, fire, or famine. But ever since he was divested of his temporal authority, the Dairi has been entirely exempted from passing through so painful a ceremony. He is uniformly treated with the most superstitious veneration. Every dish or vessel presented to his table must be new, and no sooner has it been once used by his Holiness than it is forthwith destroyed, lest some unhappy person making use of it, should be visited with sickness in punishment of his sacrilege. The Dairi has twelve wives. She who is the mother of the heir apparent is regarded as superior to all the rest.

The Dairi is distinguished both from his own court and from the rest of the community, by the peculiar dress which he wears, being usually attired in a black tunic under a scarlet robe, with a large veil over it, the fringes of which are made to fall over his hands. Upon his head he wears a cap embellished with various tufts and tassels. The whole sacred order may be known by their dress from the laity, and differing as they do among themselves in rank and office, this difference is chiefly marked by the fashion of their cap, some wearing it with a crape band either twisted or hanging loosely down; others with a piece of silk, which hangs over their eyes. They likewise wear a scarf over their shoulders, which is either longer or shorter according to their rank.

All titles of honour are conferred by the Dairi. Of these there are six classes or degrees, the most honourable of which conveys a more than common sanctity and grandeur. The soul of the man who has received this high distinction, whenever it takes its flight, is infallibly transformed, in the opinion of the Japanese, into some illustrious CAMI (which see). A title corresponding to the expression "celestial people," is conferred upon the chief persons of the ecclesiastical body; and the emperor, with the consent of the Dairi, bestows titles of honour on the princes and ministers of his court.

It is the special province of the Dairi to canonize the saints, or, in other words, to raise persons who have distinguished themselves on earth to the enjoyment of divine honours after death. He himself is considered to be of such exalted spiritual rank in virtue of his sacred office, that it is a received opinion among the Japanese that all the gods condescend to pay him a formal visit once a-year, namely, in their tenth month, which, as the whole divine hierarchy are supposed to be absent from their celetial abodes, is called "the month without a god;" and, accordingly, no one thinks it necessary to adore them. There are certain qualifications necessary for obtaining canonization, such as the power of working miracles, the enjoyment of a communication with the saints above, and even of familiar intercourse with the gods themselves. The strange idea is entertained that there are some souls which occasionally return from the other world, and this return secures their investiture with divine rank. All the honours due to their exalted position are by degrees paid to them. First of all, an illustrious title is conferred upon them by the Dairi; then a mia or temple is built in honour of them by the voluntary contributions of their devotees, and this being accomplished, supplications, prayers, and vows are made to them. If any of his worshippers should happen to meet with sudden good fortune, or to escape from some impending calamity, the reputation of the new saint is immediately established, crowds of additional devotees flock to him from all quarters, and new temples are built for his worship. Before an act of canonization, however, can be valid, even though formally passed by the Dairi, it must be confirmed by the Curo or secular monarch; and till this takes place, no one can freely or safely pay the new saint an act of worship.

So sacred is the person of the Dairi, in the estimation of the Japanese, that the gods are supposed to keep watch around his bed by night, and if his sleep happen from any cause to be disturbed, an idol is subjected to the bastinado for neglect of duty, and it is banished from the court for a hundred days. The very water in which the Dairi washes his feet is looked upon as sacred. It is stored up with the utmost care, and no person is allowed to profane it by using it for any purpose whatever.

DAJAL, the name which Mohammed gave to the Antichrist or false Christ, whose appearance he regarded as one of the ten signs which should precede the resurrection. The Arabian prophet thus describes the personal appearance of Dajal: "Verily, he is of low stature, although hulk; and has splay feet, and is blind, with his flesh even on one side of his face, without the mark of an eye, and his other eye is neither full nor sunk into his head. Then, if you should have a doubt about Dajal, know that your cherisher (God) is not blind." The manner in which the Antichrist will conduct himself after his appearance is also explained by Mohammed. "Dajal," says he, "will come to a tribe, and call them to him, and they will believe in him; and Dajal will order the sky, and rain will fall; and he will order the earth, and it will produce verdure; and in the evening their cattle will come to them with higher lumps upon their backs than they went out in the morning, and their udders will be large, and their flanks shall be full. After that Dajal will go to another tribe, and call them, and they will refuse, and he will withhold rain from their verdure and cultivation; and they will suffer a famine, and possess nothing. . . . And whilst Dajal will be about these things, on a sudden God will send Jesus, son of Mary, and he will come down on a white tower, on the east of Damascus; clothed in robes coloured with red flowers, resting the palms of his hands upon the wings of two angels; and every infidel will die, who shall be breathed upon by the Messiah, and the breath of Jesus will reach as far as eye can see. And Jesus will seek for Dajal until he finds him at a door in a village called Lúd (in Palestine), and will kill him. Then a tribe will come to Jesus whom God shall have preserved from the evils of Dajal, and he will comfort them, and will inform them of the degrees of eminence they will meet with in Paradise."

DAKSHINAS, or right hand form of worship among the Hindus, that is, when the worship of any goddess is performed in a public manner, and agreeably to the Vedas or Puranas. The only ceremony which can be supposed to form an exception to the general character of this mode is the Bali, an offering of blood, in which rite a number of animals, usually kids, are annually decapitated. In some cases life is offered without shedding blood, when the more barbarous practice is adopted of pummelling the poor animal to death with the fists; at other times, blood only is offered without injury to life. These practices, however, are not considered as orthodox. Animal victims are also offered to Devi, in her terrific forms only as Kali or Durga. The worship is almost confined to a few districts, and perhaps is carried to no great extent.

DALADA, the left canine tooth of Budha, the most highly venerated relic among the Budhists, particularly in Ceylon. To preserve this, the only portion which remains of the body of the holy sage, a temple has been erected, in which it is deposited, being placed in a small chamber, enshrined in six cases, the largest of them being upwards of five feet in height and formed of silver. All the cases are constructed in the conical shape of a dágoba, and two of them are inlaid with rubies and precious stones. The outer case is ornamented with gold and jewels, which have been offered by devotees. Mr. Hardy describes the relic itself as "a piece of discoloured ivory or bone, slightly curved, nearly two inches in length, and one in diameter at the base; and from thence to the other extremity, which is rounded and blunt, it considerably decreases in size." The wihára or temple which contains the sanctuary of this relic, is attached to the palace of the former kings of Kandy. From a work composed on the subject of Budha's tooth, dating as far back as A. D. 310, it is said that one of the disciples of the sage procured his left canine tooth when his relics were distributed. This much valued treasure he conveyed to Dantapura, the chief city of Kalinga, where it remained for 800 years. Its subsequent history we quote from Mr. Hardy's 'Eastern Monachism': "The Brahmans informed Pándu, the lord paramount of India, who resided at Pátaliputra, that his vassal, Gúhasiwa worshipped a piece of bone. The monarch, enraged at this intelligence, sent an army to arrest the king of Kálinga, and secure the bone he worshipped. This commission was executed, but the general and all his army were converted to the faith of Budhism. Pándu commanded the relic to be thrown into a furnace of burning charcoal, but a lotus arose from the flame, and the tooth appeared on the surface of the flower. An attempt was then made to crush it upon an anvil, but it remained embedded in the iron, resisting all the means employed to take it therefrom, until Subaddha, a Budhist, succeeded in its extraction. It was next thrown into the common sewer; but in an instant this receptacle of filth became sweet as a celestial garden, and was mantled with flowers. Other wonders were performed, by which Pándu also became a convert to Budhism. The relic was returned to Dantapura; but an attempt being made by the princes of Sewet to take it away by force, it was brought to Ceylon, and deposited in the city of Anurádhapura. In the fourteenth century it was again taken to the continent, but was rescued by Prákrama Báhu IV. The Portuguese say that it was captured by Constantine de Braganza, in 1560, and destroyed; but the native authorities assert that it was concealed at this time at a village in Saffragam. In 1815, it came into the possession of the British government; and although surreptitiously taken away in the rebellion of 1818, it was subsequently found in the possession of a priest, and restored to its former sanctuary. From this time the keys of the shrine in which it was deposited were kept in the custody of the British agent for the Kandian provinces, and at night a soldier belonging to the Ceylon Rifle Regiment mounted guard in the temple, there being from time to time public exhibitions of the pretended tooth, under the sanction of the British authorities, by which the cause of heathenism was greatly strengthened and the minds of sincere Christians were much grieved; but in 1839 a pamphlet was published, entitled, 'The British Government and Idolatry,' in which these untoward proceedings were exposed, and the relic has since been returned to the native chiefs and priests, by a decree from the Secretary of State for the colonies."

The Daladá is worshipped with great reverence by all Budhists, but the inhabitants of Kandy more especially attach the highest importance to the possession of this sacred relic, regarding it as in fact the very glory and security of their country.

DALAI-LAMA, the great high-priest of the inhabitants of Tartary and Thibet. He is venerated as immaculate, immortal, and omnipresent, the vicegerent of God upon earth, and the mediator between mortals and the Supreme Being. He resides at Lha-Ssa, or the land of spirits, and presides over the whole Lamas or priests, who amount to an immense number. He is supposed to be wholly absorbed in spiritual matters, and to take no concern in temporal affairs, unless to employ himself in deeds of charity and benevolence. He is the head not only of the Lamas, but of the whole gradations of the priesthood, including the gyllongs, tobha, and tuppa; and he is also the source and the centre of all civil power. He very seldom goes abroad, but is closely confined to a temple, where he is waited upon with the most profound veneration by a large number of Lamas. All possible means are adopted to impress the minds of the people with solemn awe and reverence for the person of this Supreme Pontiff. He is believed to be incapable of suffering death like ordinary mortals, and accordingly, whenever he is overtaken by death, the priesthood substitute another Lama without delay, taking care to select one who shall resemble the former Grand Lama as much as possible. To find access to the presence of the Dalai-Lama is eagerly courted by devotees, who crowd accordingly to the Great Lamasery that they may receive his benediction, and be permitted to pay their adorations to him. He is supposed to have descended by transmigration from Buddha himself. All the eastern regions of Tartary acknowledge the supremacy of the Grand Lama, and hold the doctrines of SHAMANISM (which see), or in other words, a modified species of Budhism. The worshippers of the Grand Lama are divided into two sects, which though formerly entertaining the utmost hatred of one another, now live, according to the testimony of M. Huc, in perfect harmony. The priests of the one sect are dressed in long yellow robes, with high conical caps, which are also yellow. The priests of the other sect are dressed in red; and the tribes are known as belonging to the red or the yellow cap. The latter is the more orthodox and influential, numbering among its votaries the Emperor of China. The Dalai-Lama is called by M. Huc, in his 'Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China,' by the name of Talé-Lama, and he thus describes the residence of that august personage as he himself had seen it. "The palace of the Talé-Lama merits, in every respect, the celebrity which it enjoys throughout the world. North of the town, at the distance of about a mile, there rises a rugged mountain, of slight elevation and of conical form, which, amid the plain, resembles an islet on the bosom of a lake. This mountain is entitled Buddha-La (mountain of Buddha, divine mountain), and upon this grand pedestal, the work of nature, the adorers of the Talé-Lama have raised the magnificent palace wherein their Living Divinity resides in the flesh. This palace is an aggregation of several temples, of various size and decoration; that which occupies the centre is four stories high, and overlooks all the rest; it terminates in a dome, entirely covered with plates of gold, and surrounded with a peristyle, the columns of which are, in like manner, all covered with gold. It is here that the Talé-Lama has set up his abode. From the summit of this lofty sanctuary he can contemplate, at the great solemnities, his innumerable adorers advancing along the plain or prostrate at the foot of the divine mountain. The secondary palaces, grouped round the great temple, serve as residences for numerous Lamas, of every order, whose continual occupation it is to serve and do honour to the Living Buddha. Two fine avenues of magnificent trees lead from Lha-Ssa to the Buddha-La, and there you always find crowds of foreign pilgrims, telling the beads of their long Buddhist chaplets, and Lamas of the court, attired in rich costume, and mounted or horses splendidly caparisoned. Around the Buddha-La there is constant motion; but there is, at the same time, almost uninterrupted silence, religious meditations appearing to occupy all men's minds."

The Dalai-Lama is the religious and political sovereign of the Thibetians, and also their visible deity. As a token of the high respect in which he is held, they call him Kian-Ngan-Remboutchi, which in their language denotes the expressive designation of "sovereign treasure."

DALEITES, a small Christian sect which arose in Scotland last century, deriving its name from its founder, Mr. David Dale, an excellent and devout man, who, while he followed the occupation of a manufacturer, was also pastor of a Congregationalist church in Glasgow. Born of pious parents, he had been carefully trained in the fear of the Lord, and his character throughout life was that of a godly, consistent man. For a time he continued to worship in the communion of the Established Church, but happening to peruse the treatise written by Mr. Glas or Tealing, entitled, 'The Testimony of the King or Martyrs,' he was so convinced by the reasonings of the author, that he resolved to leave the Establishment, and to join the recently formed body of the Glasites. His connection with that sect, however, was but of very short duration, if it was ever fully formed; as his views on some points differed slightly from those of Mr. Glas and his adherents. Mr. Dale therefore worshipped along with a few friends of kindred sentiments, who formed themselves after a short time into a congregation under his pastoral superintendence. Small churches holding the same principles were soon formed in different parts of the country, particularly at Edinburgh, Perth, and Kirkcaldy.

In their general opinions on doctrinal points the Daleites differed little from the GLASITES (which see). Both in preaching and prayer, while the doctrines of free grace were prominently held forth by both sects, they were generally regarded as being exhibited in a more limited aspect among the Daleites, the members of the church being addressed and prayed for as believers who had already passed from death unto life, and not as still to be invited to enter within the fold of Christ. In some of their practices also the two sects differed from each other. The Daleites did not consider a plurality of elders essential to the right dispensation of the Lord's Supper as the Glasites did. Mr. Dale and his followers held that the apostolic expression, "the husband of one wife," was to be understood as simply prohibiting the having of two wives at one time; whereas Mr. Glas and those who adhered to him, maintained that the doctrine which the apostle meant to teach was, that if an elder married a second time, even although his first wife was dead, he thereby became disqualified for office. The Daleites did not refuse to hold ordinary social intercourse with excommunicated persons by sitting with them at meat. The Glassites considered such conduct as inconsistent with true Christian character and conduct.

The sect of the Daleites has long since disappeared, not a single congregation of the body being known to exist in Scotland. See INGHAMITES, GLASITES, SANDEMANIANS.

DALMATICA, a long coat with sleeves down to the hands, which was occasionally, though but seldom, worn by the ancient Romans. It has been sometimes alleged that this piece of dress was worn in the early Christian church, both by bishops and deacons, but the evidence on which such a statement rests is by no means conclusive. The dalmatica was worn formerly by the deacon in the Church of England in the administration of the eucharist. It is a robe reaching down to the knees, and open on each side. In the Roman Catholic church the dalmatica is marked on the back with two narrow stripes. This garment is called in the Greek church COLLOBIUM (which see), and is covered with a multitude of small crosses. The name dalmatica is derived from its being the royal vest of Dalmatia. Pope Sylvester is said to have been the first who ordered it to be worn by deacons. Pope Eutychianus decreed that the bodies of the martyrs should be wrapped up in this robe.

DAMASCENUS (ST. JOHN), FESTIVAL OF, a festival celebrated by both the Greek and Roman churches in memory of John of Damascus, a distinguished theological writer in the first half of the eighth century. The Greek church holds the festival on the 4th of December, and the Latin church on the 6th of May.

DAMIANISTS, a sect of Christians which arose in the sixth century, deriving their name from Damianus, the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria. The Damianists rejected the idea of a mere specific unity in God, and not a numerical unity. Approaching the views of the Sabellians, they maintained that the Three Persons in the Trinity had a common nature in the same sense that any two human beings may be said to have a common nature. Thus this sect tried to discriminate between the Divine essence and the Three Persons of the Godhead. They denied that each Person by himself and in nature was God, but maintained that the Three Persons had a common Godhead or divinity by an undivided participation of which each one was God. The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, they called Hypostases or Persons, and what was common to them they called God, substance or nature. It is not improbable that by such a mode of explanation they intended to reject the Athanasian doctrines of the eternal generation of the Son, and the procession of the Holy Ghost. Their opinions, indeed, somewhat resembled those of the ANGELITES (which see).

DAMIEN (ST.), HERMITS OF. See CELESTINES.

DANA, a gift, the term used by the Budhists of Ceylon to denote alms. They attach great importance to the duty of almsgiving, which is, according to their system of belief, highly meritorious. But to the right performance of this cardinal virtue they regard it as absolutely indispensable that the intention of the giver be pure, that he be perfectly willing to part with the gift before bestowing it, and that he have no feeling of regret after it has been bestowed. Alms given to priests are restricted to four articles only—robes, food, a pallet to lie upon, and medicine or sick diet. Almsgiving is the first of virtues among the Budhists, and superior to the observance of all the precepts. It brings a greatly increased reward in a future birth, including, if the duty be properly discharged, both wealth and attendants.

DANACE, a name given to the obolos or coin which the ancient Greeks were wont to place in the mouth of the dead to pay Charon, for carrying them in his boat across the Styx to Hades. It seems to have received the name of damace, either from being given tois danois, to the dead, or from damos, a price.

DANAIDES, the fifty daughters of Danans, who were betrothed to the fifty sons of Ægyptus, whom they killed by the persuasion of their father, and having committed the dead bodies to the tomb, were purified from the guilt of their bloody deed by Hermes and Athena, with the sanction of Zeus. Ovid, Horace, however, and other later poets, state that the Danaides were punished for their crime in Hades by being doomed to pour water eternally into a vessel full of holes. Hypermnestra was the only one of the Danaides who is said to have saved her husband Lynceus alive, and hence Pausanias says, that he saw at Delphi three statues dedicated to Danaus, Hypermnestra, and Lynceus.

DANCERS, a sect which arose in the Low Countries in the fourteenth century. They originated in A. D. 1373 at Aix-la-Chapelle, from which they spread through other parts of Belgium. They were accustomed, both in public and in their private houses, all of a sudden to fall a-dancing; and holding each other by the hand, they continued in this, which they considered a sacred exercise, until, being almost worn out with the extraordinary violence of their employment, they fell down breathless and exhausted. During these intervals of vehement agitation, they alleged that they were favoured with wonderful visions. Like the Flagellants, they roved from place to place, begging their victuals, holding their secret assemblies, and treating the priesthood and worship of the church with the utmost contempt. The ignorant priests of that age believed these enthusiasts to be possessed with the devil; and they went so far as to pretend to cast him out by the singing of hymns, and the application of fumigations of incense.

DANCING (RELIGIOUS). From an early period the custom of dancing as a part of religious worship seems to have existed. The dance seems to have formed a part of the most ancient popular rites of the Egyptians. Herodotus accordingly, in describing their annual journey to Bubastis, says, "Throughout the whole journey, some of the women strike the cymbal, whilst men play the flute, and the rest of the women and men sing and clap their hands; and when in their journey they come near a town, they bring the boat near the shore, and conduct themselves thus: some of the women do as I have already described, and some dance." In the Egyptian monuments also there are frequent representations of choral dances and festal processions. In all probability, therefore, the Israelites had brought from Egypt the custom of religious dances, such as that which formed a part of the worship of the golden calf, in the account of which Moses tells us in Exod. xxxii. 19, that "he saw the calf and the dancing." These sacred dances among the Hebrews were accompanied with instrumental music. Thus David says, Ps. cl. 4, "Praise Him with the timbrel and dance." The Hebrew word used to denote this dance means properly a circular dance, which would seem to indicate the form or figure in which it was conducted. Both men and women appear to have joined in these religious festivals, for we find in Ps. lxxviii. 25, a distinct reference to this fact: "The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels." Men of rank did not count it beneath their dignity to engage in religious dancing. Hence David, though a king, is not ashamed to express his feelings of holy gratitude and joy in a sacred dance; and while Michal his wife reproaches him for it, the ground of her ridicule is to be found not in his actually employing himself in the sacred exercise, but in his dancing in company with the rest of the people, thus putting himself on a level with the meanest of his subjects.

The sacred circular dance was not confined to the worshippers of the true God, but was practised also by the heathen, as in the case of the Amalekites after they had spoiled Ziklag, as recorded in 1 Sam. xxx. 16. When the heathen worship the demon gods, they dance in circles round the sacrifices, and throw themselves into the most violent contortions, so that the arms, hands, and legs appear as if they were in convulsions. They throw themselves suddenly on the ground, then jump up, and again join in the circular dance. The dithyramb or old Bacchic song of the ancient Greeks, was danced round a blazing altar, by a chorus of fifty men or boys. Circular dances were performed by the Druids in the oak-groves and forests of the ancient Gauls and Britons, in honour of the sacred oak and its indwelling deity. To this day, in almost all heathen nations, instrumental music and the dance are considered necessary parts of religious worship.

In ancient Rome the priests of Mars received their name of Salii (Lat. salio, to leap), from the leaping dance which they performed, as they carried the sacred shields in joyful procession through the city. In such respect did the ancient heathens hold this sacred employment, that not only did they dance round the statues and the altars of their gods, but their poets have no hesitation in making the gods themselves sometimes engage in the dance. Pan, in particular, excels all the gods in dancing. And among modern heathens, the principal part of divine worship, particularly in savage tribes, consists in dances. Among the Mohammedans there is a special class of monks, who, from the peculiarity of their mode of worship, as consisting in rapid circular motions, are called Dancing Dervishes. Among the North American Indians there is a sacred exercise which is called the Calumet Dance. See CALUMET.

All promiscuous and immodest dancing of men and women together was forbidden among the early Christians. The council of Laodicea expressly prohibits it, having in view, as is generally believed, wanton dancing at marriage feasts, against which there are several other canons of the ancient councils, and severe invectives of the Fathers. Chrysostom declaims against promiscuous dancing as one of those pomps of Satan which men renounced in their baptism. Among some modern sects of Christians, all dancing of men and women in company, even though neither immodest nor lascivious in its character, is declared to be improper and unbecoming the gravity and decorum which ought to belong to the true Christian.

DANDIS, one of the Vaishnava sects among the Hindus, and a legitimate representative of the fourth Asrama or mendicant life, into which the Hindu is believed to enter after passing through the previous stages of student, householder, and hermit. A Brahman, however, does not require to pass through the previous stages, but is allowed to enter at once into the fourth order. The Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small dand or wand, with several projections from it, and a piece of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahmanical cord is supposed to be enshrined, attached to it; he shaves his hair and beard, wears only a cloth around the loins, and subsists upon food obtained ready-dressed from the houses of the Brahmans once a-day only, which he deposits in the small clay pot that he always carries with him. He should live alone, and near to, but not within a city; but this rule is rarely observed, and, in general, the Dandis are found in cities, collected like other mendicants in Mathas. The Dandi has no particular time or mode of worship, but employs himself chiefly in meditation and in the study of the Vedanta works. He reverences Shiva and his incarnations in preference to the other members of the Hindu Triad, and hence the Dandis are reckoned among the Vaishnavas. They bear the Shiva mark upon the forehead, smearing it with the Tri-pundra, that is, a triple transverse line formed with the ashes of fire made with burnt cow-dung. This mark, beginning between the eye-brows and carrying it to their extremity, is made with the thumb reverted between the middle and third fingers. The genuine Dandi, however, is not necessarily of the Shiva or any other sect, and in their establishments they are usually found to adore Nirguna or Niranjana, the deity devoid of attribute or passion. The Dandis have usually great influence and authority among the Shiva Brahmans of the North of India, and they are the Sanyasis or monastic portion of the Smartal sect of Brahmans in the South.

It is not so much the speculative as the practical Dandis that are worshippers of Shiva, and the form in which they adore him is that of Bhairav (which see), or Lord of terror. In the case of those who thus worship Shiva, part of the ceremony of initiation consists in inflicting a small incision on the inner part of the knee, and drawing the blood of the novice as an acceptable offering to the god. The Dandis of every description differ from the great mass of Hindus in their treatment of the dead, as they put them into coffins and bury them, or when practicable cast them into some sacred stream. Hindus of all castes are occasionally found assuming the life and emblems of the order of Dandis. There are even Brahmans who, without connecting themselves with any community, take upon them the character of this class of mendicants. There is, however, a sect of Dandis termed Dasnamis (which see), which admit none but Brahmans into their order.

DANIEL (FESTIVAL OF), a festival celebrated by the Greek church on the 17th December, in memory of the prophet Daniel, and the three young Hebrews who were cast into the fiery furnace.

DAOLO, the god worshipped by the natives of Tonquin, as being the guardian of travellers.

DAPHNÆA, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see), derived from Gr. daphne, a laurel, perhaps because her statue was made of laurel-wood.

DAPHNÆUS, a surname of APOLLO (which see), because the laurel was sacred to this god.

DAPHNE, said by Pausanias to have been an ancient priestess of the Delphic oracle, to which office she had been appointed by Ge. There is an ancient tradition that having been remarkably beautiful, Daphne was loved by Apollo, who pursued after her, and when she attempted to flee from him, the god changed her into a laurel-tree, which accordingly was called by her name.

DAPHNEPHORIA, a festival celebrated at Thebes in honour of Apollo, which seems to have derived its name from the circumstance, that laurel branches were carried in the procession. The festival was kept every ninth year. The mode of observance was as follows: A piece of olive-wood was ornamented with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and on its top was a globe of brass representing the sun, with another globe under it which denoted the moon, with smaller globes hanging from it indicating the stars. The middle part of the wood was festooned with purple garlands, while the lower part was surrounded with a crocus-coloured covering. The whole number of the garlands was three hundred and sixty-five, being the number of days in the year. The olive-bough thus adorned, was carried in procession by a youth of great beauty and of noble descent, splendidly dressed, with his hair dishevelled, and on his head a crown of gold. He was invested with the office of a priest, and bore the title of DAPHNEPHOROS (which see), or laurel-bearer. Before him walked one of his nearest relations carrying a rod festooned with garlands, and immediately after him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order they marched to the temple of Apollo, surnamed Ismenius or Galaxius, where they sang supplicatory hymns to the god.

The Delphians also observed a solemnity of a similar kind, in which they sent every ninth year a sacred youth to Tempe, who, going along the sacred road, returned home as laurel-bearer amid songs and rejoicings. This ceremony is said to have been intended to commemorate the purification of Apollo at the altar in Tempe, to which he had fled on killing the Python. A festival of somewhat the same description was celebrated by the Athenians, who dedicated every seventh day to the worship of Apollo, carrying laurel-boughs in their hands, adorning the sacred basket with garlands, and singing hymns in honour of the god.

DAPHNEPHOROS, a priest of Apollo, who, according to Pausanias, was chosen to the office every year. He required to be young, handsome, and vigorous. This priest was taken from one of the most distinguished families of Thebes. The same name Daphnephoros was given to the laurel-bearer in a similar rite observed by the inhabitants of Delphi.

DARANIANS, a heretical sect among the Mohammedans, who derived their name from Darani their founder. This impostor, who had come from Persia into Egypt, endeavoured to persuade the people that HAKEM, the wise, in whose caliphate he lived, was God; but although Darani was a favourite with the caliph, the people, indignant at his blasphemy, put him to death. This sect prevailed much on the sea-coast of Syria, and in the district of Lebanon.

DASA-BALA, ten powers or modes of wisdom possessed by BUDHA (which see). Mr. Spence Hardy, to whose excellent works we are indebted for our information on the principles and rites of the BUDHISTS (which see), thus enumerates the Dasa-Bala, in his 'Manual of Buddhism:' "1. The wisdom that understands what knowledge is necessary for the right fulfilment of any particular duty, in whatsoever situation. 2. That which knows the result or consequences of karma, or moral action. 3. That which knows the way to the attainment of nirwana or annihilation. 4. That which sees the various sakwalas or systems of worlds. 5. That which knows the thoughts of other beings. 6. That which knows that the organs of sense are not the self. 7. That which knows the purity produced by the exercise of the dhyanas or abstract meditation. 8. That which knows where any one was born in all his former births. 9. That which knows where any one will be born in all future births. 10. That which knows now the results proceeding from karma, or moral action, may be overcome."

DASA-DANDU, ten prohibitions which are enjoined upon the Buddhist monks to be studied during their noviciate. Mr. Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism,' thus describes them: "1. The eating of food after mid-day. 2. The seeing of dances or the hearing of music or singing. 3. The use of ornaments or perfumes. 4. The use of a seat or couch more than a cubit high. 5. The receiving of gold, silver, or money. 6. Practising some deception to prevent another priest from receiving that to which he is entitled. 7. Practising some deception to injure another priest, or bring him into danger. 8. Practising some deception in order to cause another priest to be expelled from the community. 9. Speaking evil of another priest. 10. Uttering slanders, in order to excite dissension among the priests of the same community. The first five of these crimes may be forgiven, if the priest bring sand and sprinkle it in the court-yard of the wihara, and the second five may be forgiven after temporary expulsion."

DASAHARA. See DURGA PUJAH.

DASA-SIL, ten obligations which must be repeated and meditated upon by the Buddhist priest in his noviciate for three hours every day. They are as follows: "1. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the taking of life. 2. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the taking of that which has not been given. 3. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids sexual intercourse. 4. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the saying of that which is not true. 5. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the use of intoxicating drinks, that leads to indifference towards religion. 6. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the eating of food after mid-day. 7. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids attendance upon dancing, singing, music, and masks. 8. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the adorning the body with flowers, and the use of perfumes and unguents. 9. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the use of high or honourable seats or couches. 10. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the receiving of gold or silver."

DASNAMI DANDIS, the primitive members of the order of DANDIS (which see). They are said to refer their origin to SANKARA ACHA'RYA, a remarkable individual who acted a conspicuous part in the religious history of Hindustan. The word Dasnami means ten-named, there being ten classes of mendicants descended from this remarkable man, only three of them, however, having so far retained their purity as to entitle them to be called Sankara's Dandis. These are numerous, especially in and about Benares. The chief Vedanti writers belong to this sect. The most sturdy beggars, as we learn from Professor Horace Wilson, are members of this order, although their contributions are levied particularly upon the Brahmanical class, as whenever a feast is given to the Brahmans, the Dandis of this description present themselves, though unbidden guests, and can only be got rid of by bestowing upon them a share of the viands. Many of them practise the YOGA (which see), and profess to work miracles. The author of the 'Dabistan' speaks of one who could keep his breath suspended for three hours, bring milk from his veins, cut bones with hair, and put eggs into a narrow-mouthed bottle without breaking them.

The remaining members of the Dasnami class, though they have degenerated from the purity of the practice necessary to the original Dandis, are still religious characters, only they have given up the staff or wand, the use of clothes, money, and ornaments; they prepare their own food, and admit members from any order of Hindus. These Atits, as they are often called, are frequently collected in Maths, as well as the Dandis, but they mix freely in the business of the world; they carry on trade, and often accumulate property, and some of them even enter into the married state, when they receive the name of Samyogi.

DATARY, an officer in the courts of the Pope, whose duty it is to receive petitions presented to him in regard to the provision of benefices. He is always a prelate, and sometimes a cardinal. In virtue of his office, the Datary, without consulting his Holiness, may grant at pleasure all benefices which do not yield more than twenty-four ducats of yearly income. When the benefices are of more value, the written approbation and signature of the Pope must be obtained. The salary attached to the office is two thousand crowns, exclusive of perquisites; and he has a sub-datary to assist him in his duties, who receives a yearly allowance of a thousand crowns. The Pope's bull granting a benefice is despatched by the datary, and passes through the officials of fifteen different offices, who have all of them their stated fees.

DATTA, or DATTATREYA, an incarnation of a portion of Vishnu, and therefore venerated by the Vaishnavas. He was also eminent for his practice of the Yoga, and hence he is held in high estimation by the YOGIS (which see.)

DAUGHTER OF THE VOICE. See BATH-KOL.

DAVIDISTS, a name given to the AMALRICIANS (which see), from David of Dinanto, who was a pupil of Amalric of Bena, and afterwards an able expositor of his system.

DAY, a regular portion of time equal to twenty-four hours. There have been different computations of their days among different nations. The Hebrews reckoned their day from evening to evening, and in the Mosaic account of the creation, the evening is mentioned as preceding the morning. Tacitus says, that the ancient Germans counted their times not by the number of days, but of nights. Such was also the mode of calculation adopted by the ancient Gauls, and there are still remnants of the same mode in some of the expressions still in use in our own country, such as "a fortnight ago." The ancient Babylonians commenced the day at sunrise.

The ancient Hebrews, as well as the Greeks, divided the day into morning, noon, and night. These are the only parts of a day mentioned in the Old Testament. They began their day at sunset, and ended it at the same time on the following day. When the Jews came under the dominion of the Romans, they learned from their conquerors a new mode of calculating. The day was thenceforth divided into four parts, thus, from six o'clock till nine in the morning, which was the hour of the morning sacrifice; from nine till twelve; from twelve till three, and from three o'clock, which was the time of the evening sacrifice, till six, which concluded the one day, and commenced another.

The Hebrews, besides their natural day, had also an artificial day, consisting of twelve hours, which began in the morning at sun-rising, and ended at sun-setting. Still another kind of day existed among them, called prophetic, because it is only mentioned by the prophets. This kind of day is taken for a year in the Scriptures. They had likewise prophetic weeks, which consisted of seven years; prophetic months, which make thirty years; and prophetic years, which they reckoned for three hundred and sixty years.

A curious account of day and night is given in the Prose Edda of the ancient Scandinavians: "A giant called Njörvi, who dwelt in Jötunheim, had a daughter called Night (Nött) who, like all her race, was of a dark and swarthy complexion. She was first wedded to a man called Naglfari, and had by him a son named Aud, and afterwards to another man called Annar, by whom she had a daughter called Earth (Jörd). She then espoused Delling, of the Æsir race, and their son was Day (Dagr) a child light and beautiful like his father. Then took All-father, Night, and Day, her son, and gave them two horses and two cars, and set them up in the heavens that they might drive successively one after the other, each in twelve hours' time round the world. Night rides first on her horse called Hrimfaxi, that every morn, as he ends his course, bedews the earth with the foam that falls from his bit. The horse made use of by Day is named Skinfaxi, from whose mane is shed light over the earth and the heavens."

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See ATONEMENT, (DAY OF).

DAYS (HOLY). See FESTIVALS.

DAYS (LUCKY AND UNLUCKY). The ancient heathens entertained the idea that there were particular days which were fortunate, and others unfortunate; that, according to their astrological notions, some days were certainly connected with success, while others were attended with an almost sure fatality. This superstitious notion may be traced as far back as the poet Hesiod. Neither was it confined to the ignorant multitude. Suetonius tells us, that the Emperor Augustus Cæsar never went abroad upon the day after the Nundinæ, nor began any serious undertaking on the Nones. St. Ambrose says that the first converts from heathenism to Christianity were much addicted to such superstitious ideas and practices. Lucian gives a minute account of an unlucky day. "On which," says he, "neither do the magistrates meet to consult about public affairs, neither are lawsuits decided in the hall, nor sacrifices offered, nor, in fine, any sort of business undertaken wherein a man would wish himself fortunate. Such sorts of days as he goes on have been instituted by different nations on different accounts." And in another place the same author informs us, that Lycurgus, the Lacedemonian lawgiver, had made it a fundamental institution of government never to enter upon any warlike expedition but when the moon was at the full. It is probably to the notion of lucky and unlucky days, that Moses alludes in the prohibition laid upon the ancient Hebrews in Lev. xix. 26, against observing times. Manasseh is also accused of being an observer of times. The Hebrew word is Leonenu, which seems to be derived from onah, denoting time.

Throughout modern heathendom, the notion of lucky and unlucky days extensively prevails. Thus Kämpfer says, in his 'Account of the Japanese customs,' "It may not be amiss to observe, that it is not an indifferent matter to travellers in this country what day they set out on their journey; for they must choose for their departure a fortunate day, for which purpose they make use of a particular table printed in all their road-books, which they say hath been observed to hold true by a continued experience of many ages, and wherein are set down all the unfortunate days of every month."

DEACONS, a class of office-bearers in the Christian church. That there existed officers bearing this name from the earliest period in the history of the New Testament church is admitted universally. They are explicitly mentioned in various passages of the epistles of Paul, and in the writings of the Christian Fathers. They are frequently associated in Scripture with other recognized office-bearers of the church. Thus Phil. i. 1, "Paul and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." The character and qualifications of a deacon are plainly laid down in 1 Tim. iii. 8—13, "Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then let them use the office of a deacon, being found blameless. Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things. Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well. For they that have used the office of a deacon well purchase to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Jesus Christ."

But while the existence of this class of office-bearers is denied by no portion of the Christian Church, considerable diversity of opinion exists as to the precise duties which belonged to their office. The Greek word diakonos, a deacon, and its corresponding verb, have an extensive general application, denoting every kind of service. But in its more restricted signification, as relating to an office in the church, the word deacon implies one whose duty it is to receive the charities of the church, and to distribute their alms. In this view of the meaning of the name, the origin of the office is by many supposed to be described in Acts vi. 1—6, "And in those days, when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration. Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. And the saying pleased the whole multitude: and they chose Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch: whom they set before the apostles; and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them." This passage, however, is by no means universally believed to refer to the deacons of whom Paul speaks, but some suppose that the office which Luke describes, in the passage now quoted, was of a local and temporary character, arising out of a peculiar emergency which had arisen in the church of Jerusalem. But besides that the passage is so expressed as rather to point to a permanent than a mere temporary office, the whole early church is unanimous in believing that the seven mentioned by Luke were deacons, holding an office identical with that referred to by Paul. And the number of writers who assert the contrary form a small minority of those who have discussed the subject. On this point Dr. Miller, in his work on the 'Office of the Ruling Elder,' observes, "The current opinion of all the most learned and judicious Christian divines of all denominations, for several centuries past, is decisively in favour of considering the passage in Acts vi. as recording the first appointment of the New Testament deacons. Among all classes of theologians, Catholic and Protestant, Lutheran and Calvinistic, Presbyterian and Episcopal, this concurrence of opinion approaches so near to unanimity, that we may, without injustice to any other opinion, consider it as the deliberate and harmonious judgment of the Christian church."

The Church of Rome and the Church of England agree in regarding the deaconship as the lowest order in the priesthood, while some of the Congregationalists consider the term deacon as synonymous with presbyter; and, therefore, so far spiritual in its nature. Presbyterians, on the other hand, view the office of a deacon as exclusively connected with the ecclesiastico-secular interests of the Christian church. In England deacons are permitted to baptize, to read in the church, and to assist in the celebration of the eucharist; but their duty in this matter is limited to the administration of the wine. They are not eligible to ecclesiastical promotion, but they may be chaplains to families, curates to beneficed clergymen, or lecturers to parish churches. The oversight of the poor is no longer committed to them, but to churchwardens chosen by the vestry for that purpose every year. Besides deacons, the Church of England has ARCHDEACONS (which see), and SUB-DEACONS (which see). In the German Protestant churches the assistant ministers are generally called deacons. Among Roman Catholics, the deacons are removed as far as possible from the original design of their institution. The deacon with them is an officer whose duty it is to perfume with incense the officiating clergyman and the choir; to lay the corporal or white cloth on the altar; to transfer the patten or cup from the sub-deacon to the officiating prelate; and the pix from the officiating prelate to the sub-deacon; and to perform various other duties of a similar kind. In the Church of Scotland, at one time, deacons were recognized as standing office-bearers in the church, but for many years they have fallen into abeyance. The Second Book of Discipline, however, declares the office of deacon to be "an ordinary and perpetual function in the Kirk of Christ." The Free Church of Scotland has revived this order of office-bearers, probably in consequence of the peculiar position of that church as no longer endowed by the State, and deriving its whole emoluments from the voluntary contributions of the people. In almost every other Presbyterian church, whether in Britain or America, deacons are dispensed with, and their office merged in that of elders. Congregationalist churches have deacons, but their duties are both of a temporal and spiritual character. Accordingly, Dr. Henderson, when speaking of these officers, says that "the deacons, besides attending to the temporal concerns of the church, assist the minister with their advice; take the lead at prayer-meetings when he is absent; and preach occasionally to small congregations in the contiguous villages."

Thus has the office of deacon been either modified or lost sight of in almost all sections of the church of Christ. The most ancient authorities, indeed, speak of them as assisting the bishops and presbyters in their religious services and other official duties. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions say, "Let the deacon be the ear, the eye, the mouth, the heart, the soul of the bishop." It devolved on this class of office-bearers to recite the prayers of the church, and to give the signal for the commencement of each of the different portions of divine service. In the Western churches, the gospels, as containing the words spoken more immediately by our Lord himself, were appointed to be read, not like the other portions of Scripture by the prelector, but by the deacon. For a time it was thought necessary that the number of deacons in any single church should be seven, in order to correspond with the number belonging to the church of Jerusalem, as mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. At a later period the original number was greatly exceeded, and in the sixth century the principal church in Constantinople had no fewer than a hundred deacons.

From their intimate connection with the bishops as their assistants and confidential agents, the deacons began gradually to assume an authority in the church to which their office did not entitle them. Arrogating to themselves a superiority to the presbyters, it became necessary for the synod to admonish them on this subject. Thus the council of Nice enjoins, "Let the deacons observe their proper place, knowing that they are indeed the assistants of the bishops, but that they are inferior to the presbyters." The presumption, which was in such plain terms corrected by the councils, was particularly chargeable upon the archdeacons, who stood at the head of the order, and from their position obtained a predominating influence which in some cases they abused.

In the Romish church, deacons are often called Levites, a name which in some of the councils of the Western church is applied to presbyters and deacons indiscriminately. Minute directions are given in the Roman Pontifical for the ordination of this class of ecclesiastical office-bearers, and in token of investiture with their office, they receive the book of the Gospels, which they touch with their right hand, while the officiating Pontiff says, "Receive ye power to read the gospel in God's church, as well for the living as for the dead." The ordination address, which compares their office to that of Levi of old, is thus given in the Pontifical: "Dearly beloved sons, about to be promoted to the order of Levites, think seriously to how great a degree you ascend. For it behoveth a deacon to minister at the altar; to baptize; to preach. Now in the old law, of the twelve tribes one was chosen; that of Levi, that by special consecration it might serve perpetually the tabernacle, and its sacrifices; and of so great a dignity was it, that none could rise to that divine ministry and office, but of that stock. Insomuch that by a certain high prerogative of heritage, it deserved both to be, and to be called, the tribe of the Lord. Of these you, my dearly beloved sons, hold this day the name and the office, because you are set apart in the Levitical office for the service of the tabernacle of testimony, that is, the church of God: the which ever with her armour on, fights against her enemies in incessant combat. Hence, says the apostle: 'We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.' This church of God you ought to bear, as they did the tabernacle, and fortify with a holy garniture, with divine preaching, and a perfect example. For Levi signifies, added or adopted: and you, dearly beloved sons, who receive your name from the paternal inheritance, be ye adopted from carnal desires, from earthly concupiscences which war against the soul; be ye comely, clean, pure, chaste, as becomes the ministers of Christ, and the stewards of the mysteries of God. And, because you are the co-ministers and co-makers of the Lord's body and blood; be ye strangers to all allurements of the flesh, as Scripture saith: 'Be ye clean who carry the vessels of the Lord.' Think of blessed Stephen elected to this office by the apostles for the merit of his pre-eminent chastity.—Take care that to whom you announce the gospel with the mouth, you expound it to the same by your living works, that of you it may be said: 'Blessed are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, that bring glad tidings of good.' Have your feet shod with the examples of the saints in the preparation of the gospel of peace. The which the Lord grant you through his grace."

There was another class of persons which arose in the ancient church under the name of SUBDEACONS (which see). These officers are still continued in the Roman Catholic church, and after serving for a time in this subordinate capacity, they are promoted to the more honourable degree of deacons.

DEACONS' COURTS, courts instituted by the Free Church of Scotland for the management of the ecclesiastical funds and temporal concerns generally of each congregation. Each deacons' court consists of the elders and deacons of the congregation, presided over by the pastor, and meets generally once a month, or as often as occasion requires. In most of the other Scottish dissenting churches secular matters are under the charge of the elders and a secular body chosen by the members of the congregation under the name of managers.

DEACONESSES, a class of female officebearers in the early Christian church, who were helpers and assistants in the performance of various services, particularly in reference to the female portion of the communities. The term deaconess does not occur in the Sacred Scriptures, but the office appears to be distinctly referred to in Rom. xvi. 1, "I commend unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea." The precise origin of this class of ecclesiastical persons has never been satisfactorily explained, but their existence is mentioned both by the ancient Fathers, and by several Pagan writers, particularly Pliny, Lucian of Samosata, and Libanius. Grotius thinks that, as in Judea, the deacons could administer freely to the female sex, the office of a deaconess must have been unknown to the Jews. He therefore supposes that deaconesses were first appointed in the churches of the Gentile Christians. From the second to the fourth century, the office was known in many churches in various countries, though it was never universally adopted. By means of deaconesses the gospel could be introduced into the bosom of families where, owing to the customs of the East, no man could find admittance. They were also bound, as Christian wives and mothers of tried experience in all the relations of their sex, to assist the younger women of the communities with their counsel and encouragements, besides fulfilling the office of private catechists to female catechumens.

It has been argued by some that those females were deaconesses of whom Paul speaks in 1 Tim. v. 3—10, as having been maintained by the church. This opinion is objected to by Neander, and with no small reason, when we take into account the advanced age, sixty years and upwards, on which the apostle fixes as the proper time of entering into the number of approved Christian widows—an age altogether incompatible with the active duties which belonged to the office of deaconesses. Some ancient Fathers, however, believed that the apostle had deaconesses in view. According to some councils, the age at which females were eligible to this office was forty, and even some were chosen at the early age of twenty. Their age probably varied, as Coleman thinks, with the particular duties to which they were appointed, matrons venerable for age and piety being selected for religious teachers, and young women for almsgiving, the care of the sick and other similar duties. Widows were generally preferred for deaconesses, and Tertullian directs that each should be the widow of one man, having children.

The mode of ordaining deaconesses was, as in the case of other church officers, by prayer and imposition of hands. This is plainly asserted in the Apostolical Constitutions, and the ordinary prayer of the bishop on such occasions is declared to run thus: "Eternal God. Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Creator of man and of woman; thou who didst fill with thy Spirit, Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, and Huldah; thou who didst vouchsafe to a woman the birth of thy only begotten Son; thou who didst in the tabernacle and the temple place female keepers of thy holy gates;—look down now also upon this thy handmaid, and bestow on her the Holy Ghost, that she may worthily perform the work committed to her, to thy honour, and to the glory of Christ." The Nicene council seems to have recognized and approved the employment of deaconesses in the usual manner. "But when exaggerated notions," says Neander, "about the magical effects of ordination and the dignity of the clerical order became continually more predominant, men began to conceive something offensive in the practice of ordaining deaconesses, and associating them with the clerus—which practice was, perhaps, already forbidden by the council of Laodicea in their eleventh canon. The Western church, in particular, declared very strongly against this custom. Western synods of the fifth and sixth centuries forbade generally the appointment of deaconesses. Where ordained deaconesses were still to be found, it was ordered that they should receive in future the blessing of the bishop along with the laity;—another proof that before this they were reckoned as belonging to the clergy. Those prohibitions came, however, only from French synods; and it cannot be inferred from them that the appointment of deaconesses in the Western church ceased at once, and in all the districts alike. In the East, the deaconesses maintained a certain kind of authority for a longer period. We find among them widows possessed of property, who devoted their substance to pious works and institutions, like Olympias, known on account of her connection with Chrysostom. They there had it in charge also, by private instruction, to prepare the women in the country for baptism, and to be present at their baptism. It was considered the privilege of the wives of bishops, who, by common understanding, separated from their husbands after the latter had bound themselves to a life of celibacy, that, if found worthy, they might be consecrated as deaconesses; and thus the female church-office continued to be preserved in the East down into the twelfth century."

DEAD (BEATING THE). The modern Jews believe that when one of their number is buried, an angel immediately comes and knocks upon the coffin, saying in Hebrew, Wicked! wicked! what is thy Pasuk? This question refers to a custom which prevails of naming every Jew after a fanciful allusion to some passage of Scripture; such as, if a child is named Abraham, his Pasuk is, "Thou art the Lord the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees, and gavest him the name of Abraham." This Posuk, in Hebrew, is taught the child as soon as he can speak, and he is to repeat it every morning and evening, that he may be able to answer the angel when he comes to the grave. If he is not able to repeat his Posuk after his burial, the angel, it is said, beats him with a hot iron until he breaks his bones. See CHIBBUT HAKKEFER.

DEAD (BURIAL OF THE). See FUNERAL RITES.

DEAD (BURNING OF THE). Though the burial of the dead is in all probability the most ancient practice, it cannot be denied that the custom of burning the dead can be traced back to a remote antiquity. Lucian tells us, that the Greeks burned, and the Persians buried their dead, but this statement in reference to the Greeks is by no means borne out by the records of antiquity, which seem rather to show that both burning and burial were practised among that people. In the former case the body was placed on the top of a pile of wood, and fire being applied, it was consumed to ashes. From Homer it would appear that animals, and even captives or slaves, were buried along with their dead bodies in some instances, where honour was designed to be shown to the deceased. When the pile was burnt down, the fire was quenched by throwing wine upon it, after which the bones were carefully collected by the relatives, washed with wine and oil, and deposited in urns, which were sometimes made of gold, but most generally of marble, alabaster, or baked clay. Among the Romans it was customary to burn the bodies of the dead before burying them. When the place appointed for burning the body happened to be very near the place of burial, it was called BUSTUM (which see). The bustum of the family of Augustus was discovered last century at Rome, bearing the inscription hic crematus est, here he was burned. If the body was burnt at a distance from the place of interment, it was called ustrinum. When a general or emperor's body was burnt, the soldiers marched three times round the funeral pile. The practice of burning does not appear to have been adopted generally among the Romans, until the later times of the republic, but under the empire it was the universal mode of disposing of the dead. The introduction of Christianity led to its speedy disappearance, so that in the fourth century it had fallen into complete disuse.

In ancient Scandinavia, Odin is said to have introduced the custom of burning the dead, but whoever was the first to propose it, we know with certainty that burning the dead on funeral piles seems to have prevailed in the North at a very early period, and to have been superseded by burial, which may perhaps have been but the revival of a former custom. Be this as it may, when the body was burnt, the ashes were generally collected in an urn or small stone chest, over which a low mound not above a yard high was raised. The Ynglinga Saga, on which, however, antiquarians place no great confidence,

In modern times the practice of burning the bodies of the dead is still found in various heathen countries. In India, the Hindu sects generally prefer burning to burial, and until lately the widows were allowed, and even encouraged, to undergo voluntary cremations on the funeral piles of their husbands. The wives of Brahmins were compelled formerly by Hindu law to give themselves up to be burned alive along with the dead bodies of their husbands. This practice, called the SUTTEE (which see), has been prohibited by the British government, and if cases of the kind still occur, the utmost privacy is maintained. It is one peculiarity indeed which distinguishes the later Hindu or Aryan races from the earlier or non-Aryan races, that the former burn their dead, while the latter bury them. Among the Buddhists also in different countries, the cremation of their dead is frequently preferred.

DEAD (BURNINGS FOR THE). It was a custom among the ancient Hebrews to make burnings for their kings on the occasion of their death; kindling a large fire in which were collected all kinds of aromatics, along with the clothes, armour, and other things which belonged to the deceased. Thus it is said of king Asa, whose dead body they laid in his own sepulchre, that, 2 Chron. xvi. 14, they made a very great burning for him. At the funeral of Zedekiah, as we find in Jer. xxxiv. 5, spices were burnt over him. The Rabbis allege that a custom was handed down to them from their ancestors, of burning the beds and other articles of furniture belonging to the dead.

DEAD (DRIVING THE DEVIL FROM THE). Among some heathen nations the notion is entertained that the dead bodies of their relatives are liable to fall into the hands of the Devil, and various ceremonies are gone through with the view of expelling the evil spirits. A very interesting instance of this has been furnished to us in a private letter from a correspondent in Nepal, who was himself an eye-witness of the ceremony he describes, which is practised by the Hill-men of that country, who seem to be partly Buddhists, partly Hindus. The communication, which is dated 10th June 1856, we insert entire: "Figure to yourself a large hill, about 8,000 feet above the level of the sea, and on its summit a few houses similar to our own cottages. On a small plot outside one of them, and immediately behind an abrupt rise in the ground, some matting was erected on poles, within which the friends and priest were to sit. Exactly in front of them was placed a stage, which struck me as exactly resembling a perambulating Punch's opera. Inside of these were placed some trifles made of pastry, and a brass image of Budha—the sides of the stage being likewise covered with paintings of Budha-Demons, &c. Beneath, and on the ground, was a flooring of sand, on the top of which a few coppers were placed. The performers were a priest and his two sons. The old man had a heavy, stolid, yet not unpleasant face; the two young men had high cheek-bones, and flat Mongolian features. They were all clad in white cloth gowns tied at the waist.

"The performances commenced by the old priest sitting down in front of the stage, with some books before him. These books had all separate leaves confined by two loose wooden boards, and painted by hand in the Sanscrit character. He then blew a shrill blast from a trumpet, made of—what? why, a man's thigh-bone, and called by them the trumpet bone; they cut off the head of the bone by the trochanter, and perforate the condyles.

"A little boy also beside him commenced blowing into a huge shell with a hole in it. The two sons then commenced operations, the one playing on a pair of cymbals, the other on a tambourine. The latter also put on a head-dress of Chinese paper, with hieroglyphics upon it. He then commenced dancing round the stage very gracefully, always whirling round about, giving a hop and thumping his drum which he carried in his hand, the drumstick being made of a piece of bamboo twisted in this manner, &c. After a while the old man took up his book, and recited a verse or two, then the three went to the front of the stage, singing each in parts most beautifully, and bowing occasionally to the image. The dancing again commenced as before. At last the crowning scene approached, two baskets were brought containing the clothes of the deceased and his kukrie, a kind of dagger worn by every body here. Two little faded flags were put in each basket. The ceremony now consisted, it was said, in driving the devil away. The three now sat down before the baskets, the old fellow blowing away on his trumpet and another on the shell. They then commenced a very sweet and plaintive melody, one of the sons having a bell, and a piece of brass consisting of two crowns joined together, and called a thunderbolt. This he kept moving to and fro over his left shoulder, while with his other hand he kept ringing the bell. The old man then took the deceased's kukrie, and danced several times round the stage, flourishing it about. Now sounds of wailing are heard at a distance, and two females presently appear sobbing bitterly, and each carrying in her hand a bowl of spirits made from rice. They then seat themselves before the clothes of the deceased. One was an old crone, the step-mother of the deceased, the other a girl of fifteen, his daughter.
