BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 5TH SEPTEMBER 1970

I am so glad it is such a nice morning. A beautiful sky and lovely countryside. But I am afraid this is not a weekend entertainment. What we shall talk about is quite serious, and perhaps after I have talked a little we can talk, discuss, or have a dialogue, or talk over together what we have talked about.

I don't know how you feel about what is happening in the world, in our environment, to our culture and society. It seems to me there is so much chaos, so much contradiction and so much strife and war, hatred and sorrow. And various leaders, both political and religious, try to find an answer either in some ideology, or in some belief, or in a cultivated faith. And none of these things seem to answer the problems. Our problems go on endlessly. And if we could in these four talks in this tent and the two discussions that are to take place, if we could be serious enough to go into this question of how to bring about, not only in ourselves but in society, a revolution, not physical revolution because that only leads to tyranny and the heightened control of bureaucracy, if we could very deeply find out for ourselves what to do, not depending on any authority, including that of the speaker, or on a book, on a philosophy, on any structural behavioral pattern, but actually find out irrevocably, if one can, what to do about all this confusion, this strife, this extraordinary, contradictory, hypocritical life one leads.

To me it seems to be fairly clear that to observe there must be freedom, not only the outward phenomenon, but also to observe what is going on within ourselves, to observe without any prejudice, without taking any side, but to examine very closely, freely the whole process of our thinking and our activity, our pleasures, fears, and all the things that we have built around ourselves, not only outwardly but in ourselves as a form of resistance, compulsive demands, escapes and so on. If we could do that consistently, with full intention, to discover for ourselves a way of living that is not contradictory, then perhaps these talks will be worthwhile; otherwise it will be another lecture, another entertainment, pleasurable or rather absurd, logical or illogical and so on. So if we could completely give ourselves to the examination, to observe intimately what is going on, both outwardly and inwardly.

Now the difficulty in this lies, it seems to me, the capacity to observe, to see things as they are, not as we would like them to be, or what they should be, but actually what is going on. To so observe has its own discipline, not the discipline of imitation, or compulsion, or conformity but that very observation brings its own discipline, not imposed, not conforming to any particular pattern, which implies suppression, but to observe. After all when you do observe something very closely, or listen to somebody very fully, that very listening and seeing, in that is implied attention. And where there is attention there is discipline, without being disciplined.

If that is clear, the next point is, in observing there is always the observer. The observer who, with his prejudices, with his conditionings, with his fears and guilts and all the rest of it, he is the observer, the censor, and through his eyes he looks, and therefore he is really not looking at all, he is merely coming to conclusions based upon his past experiences and knowledge. The past experiences, conclusions and knowledge prevent actually seeing. And when there is such an observer what he observes is something different, or something which he has to conquer, or change and so on; whereas if the observer is the observed - I think this is really a radical thing to understand, really the most important thing to understand if we are going to discuss anything seriously: that in us there is this division, this contradiction, the observer and the many fragments which he observes. The many fragments make up the 'me', the ego, the personality, whatever you like to call it, the many fragments. And one of the fragments becomes the observer or the censor, and that fragment looks over the various other fragments. Please do this as we are talking, not agreeing or disagreeing but observe this fact that is going on within oneself; it becomes terribly interesting and rather fun if you go at it very, very seriously.

We are made up of many fragments, each contradicting the other, both linguistically, factually and theoretically, contradictory desires, contradictory pursuits, ambitions that deny affection, love and so on - one is aware of these fragments. And who is the observer who decides what he should do, what he should think, what he should become? Surely one of the fragments. He becomes the analyzer, he assumes the authority. One fragment, among the many other fragments, becomes the censorship, and he becomes the actor, the doer, compelling other fragments to conform and therefore brings about contradiction. I don't know if we see this very clearly? Then what is one to do, knowing most of us are made up of these many fragments, which fragment is to act? Or are all the fragments to act? You are following? Or action by any one of the fragments brings about contradiction, conflict and therefore confusion. Right? Are we communicating with each other? Communication being thinking together, not only verbally but understanding together, going together, creating together. One fragment believes in god, or doesn't believe in god, and another fragment wants a security, not only physical but psychological security. One fragment is afraid, another fragment tries to dominate that fear. Seeing this extraordinary contradiction in ourselves, what is one to do? The fragments cannot be integrated, which implies there is an integrator. Right? That is, the integrator becomes another fragment. So it is not integration, it is not one fragment which assumes superior position as the higher self, or the most intellectual thing and dominates the rest; or one fragment which feels greatly emotional and tries to function along emotional lines. So seeing this very clearly, what is the action that will be total, that will not be contradictory? And who is it that is seeing the whole fragments? Is it another fragment which says, 'I observe all the many other fragments'? Are we moving together? Or there is only observation without the observer. Can we go along? You understand my question?

Is there an observation, the seeing, without the 'me' as the observer seeing? And therefore creating a duality, a division. That is really our problem, isn't it, basically? We have divided the world, the geographical world, as the British, the French, the Indian, the American, Russian and so on, and inwardly we have divided psychologically the world, those who believe and those who do not believe, my country, your country, my god, your god and all the rest of it. And this division has brought about wars; and a man who would live completely at peace, not only with himself but with the world, has to understand this division, this separation. And can thought bring about this complete total observation? I don't know if we are going together in this?

Who is responsible for this division? The Catholic, the Protestant, the Communist, the Socialist, the Muslim, the Hindu? You follow? This division that is going on within, outwardly and inwardly - who is responsible? The Pope? The Archbishop? The politicians? Who is it? Is it thought? The intellect? Can thought observe without division? Do you follow? We observe - or thought observes all the many factors of these divisions and is it not thought itself that has brought about this division, the intellect? And the intellect is one of the divisions, one of the fragmentation and that intellect has become extraordinarily important, which is thought. Right? For us thought is the most extraordinarily important thing, the intellect. And we hope to solve all the problems of our life through thought, don't we? By thinking over a problem, trying to suppress it or give free reign to it. Thought is the factor, is the instrument, which is always observing. Right?

Now that is, thought is one of the fragments. You don't live by thought, you have your feelings, your appetites, your pleasures. So if thought breeds contradiction, as yours and mine, as heaven and hell and all the rest of it, then how shall we observe, see, without the fragment which we call thought? I do not know if you have ever put this question to yourself. Thought is after all the response of the past, memories. Thought is never free, and with that thought, with that instrument, we are always looking at life, always responding to every challenge with thought? Now can we observe with eyes, with a mind which is not shaped by thought? That is, can we observe without any conclusion, without any prejudice, without being committed to any particular theory or action? Which means to observe with eyes that have learnt about these many factors, fragments, which make up the 'me'. That is, as long as there is no self-knowing, as long as I do not know myself completely, entirely, I must function in fragments. And how to observe myself, how to learn about myself, without the censor intervening in observation. Are we getting together?

Look, I want to learn about myself because I see how extraordinarily important it is if I am at all to understand the world, action and a new way of living altogether. I have to understand myself, not according to some philosopher, psychologist however learned. I want to learn about myself as actually what I am, without any distortion, without suppressing anything, what I am both consciously as well as unconsciously. I want to know myself completely. Now how shall I learn? How shall I learn about what I am? To learn there must be a certain passion, a great deal of curiosity, without any assumption, taking things for granted, to look at myself without any formula - can one do that? Otherwise you can't learn about yourself obviously. If I say, I am jealous, the very verbalization of that fact, or of that feeling, has already conditioned it. Right? Therefore I cannot see anything further in it. So there must be a learning about the usage of words, not to be caught in words, and the realization that the word, the description, is not the described or the thing.

So to look, to learn about oneself there must be freedom from all conclusion. I am ugly, I don't want to look at myself. I don't know what I shall find in myself. I am afraid to look at myself. You know all the things that we have come up with. So, can one observe without any sense of condemnation? Because if there is condemnation it is one of the fragments that has gathered, that has been conditioned by a particular society or culture in which it lives. If you are a Catholic you are conditioned - 2,000 years of propaganda has conditioned your mind, and with that mind you observe. And in that observation there is already condemnation, justification, therefore you don't learn. Right? The act of learning implies there must be freedom from the past. Obviously.

Now we are learning together here and is one free from the culture that has conditioned the mind? Being born as a Hindu or a Muslim, centuries of propaganda, don't do this, do this, believe in this, don't believe in that, has conditioned the mind, and such a mind says, I am going to learn about myself. It doesn't realize that it is conditioned, and a conditioned mind cannot possibly learn. Therefore it must be free of its conditioning. I don't know if you are following all this? Are you? You know what that implies when you say, 'Yes, we are'? Not to be an Englishman, or a Frenchman, not to belong to any religion, not to have any prejudice, not to come to any conclusion, which means freedom. And it is only such a mind that can learn about itself. Therefore one has to be aware of one's conditioning. Then the problem arises: who is to be aware of the conditioning? You follow? There is only conditioning, not, to be aware of the conditioning. I don't know if you see this? The moment I am aware of my conditioning there is a duality, isn't there? I, who am aware of my particular conditioning and hence the one who is aware wants to change his conditioning, break it down, be free from it, therefore that creates conflict. Right? All division is bound to create conflict. Right? Sirs, look, the Catholic and the Protestant, you have got a very good example. Any division is bound to bring about contradiction, conflict and strife. If I say, I will be aware of my conditioning, there is immediately a contradiction, a separation. So to be aware of one's conditioning. You see? I am going to be aware of my conditioning, is one thing. And the other is, to be aware of it. Non-verbally, because the word is not the thing, and therefore the actual perception of it. Can you do this? Not that this is a group therapy, or analysis - for god's sake none of all that stuff - but actually is one aware of this conditioning? To be aware that I am a Hindu. Awareness implies looking, being aware, without any choice. The moment you have choice it is a fragmentation.

So can you observe yourself without any image of yourself? The image of yourself is the conditioning. Right? And to observe without any image, which means I don't know what I am, I am going to find out. In that there is no assumption, conclusion, therefore the mind is free to observe, to learn. Right? But in learning the moment there is an accumulation you have stopped learning. Look, sir, suppose I have observed myself and I see I am this, as a fact, and from that observation I have learnt something about myself. Having learnt about myself is the past. Right? With that past knowledge I am going to observe, therefore I cease to observe. It is only the past that is observing. Right? So can I, can the mind observe without accumulating? You understand the problem? Just look at the problem first, not what to do. When you understand the problem very clearly action follows naturally. I observe myself and through that observation I have learnt something. After having learnt, I further observe. Having learnt more, I go on to observe, therefore the observer becomes the analyzer. Right? Right? Please do see this. Let's go along. The observer, the analyzer, is the result of many things he has learnt about himself, and with the eyes of the past, as the analyzer, as the person who has accumulated knowledge, he examines, he looks, he learns. So the past is always trying to learn of what is going on in the present. Is this clear?

So can there be a learning, that is, watching, observing, without any sense of accumulation, so that the mind is always fresh to learn? It is only such a mind that is a free mind. So can the mind be free of thought in observing, in learning? Because you see one wants to learn, naturally, seeing the transient nature of our life, the exhaustion of pleasure revived by thought, given continuity to pleasure by thought, seeing how everything comes to an end, one wants to find out if there is anything which is beyond, which is transcendental, which is something other than this daily routine, daily boredom, daily occupation, daily worry. After all that is what religions promise: seek god, love god. But to learn if there is anything that is beyond thought, beyond the intellect, beyond the routine, one must be free of all beliefs, mustn't one? Which doesn't mean you become an atheist. The atheists and the believers are both the same.

I want to find out seriously if there is something which is beyond 'what is', which means the mind must be totally free of any fear otherwise fear will project something that will give it a comfort. So I must learn all about fear, the mind must be enquiring into this whole terrible problem of fear. If the mind wants to find out anything that is beyond the imagination, the myth, the symbol, man has projected as god, the mind must be free of all that to find out. And it cannot possibly find out if there is any form of fear. And we are frightened human beings. So can the mind learn the whole nature of fear, not only the conscious fears but the deep rooted fears of which most of us are unaware?

So from that arises the question: how are the unconscious fears to be revealed, to be exposed? Are you following all this? Is it to be exposed through analysis, which means the analyzer, which means a fragment who is going to analyze. Or through dreams discover all the fears, and that is a perilous road, to find out through dreams what we are because dreams are merely the continuation of what we are during the daily life, waking hours. No? Is all this too much in one morning?

Audience: No.

K: Good. So how is the mind, which has divided in itself as the conscious and the unconscious, which again is a division, therefore contradiction, how is the mind to be aware of this whole structure and nature of consciousness? You follow? Without division. And there are hidden parts in the mind, deep down in the darkest corners of our minds, all kinds of things going on - nothing extraordinary, it is as silly as the conscious mind, the things of the conscious mind. So how is all that to be exposed? Not through analysis obviously. Right? If you really see that, the impossibility, the danger, the falseness of analysis - I hope there aren't any analysts here, bad luck if there are! - if you really see that, your mind then is free to observe without analysis. I don't know if you see that. Look sir, let's be very simple about this. Analysis implies time. Right? Analysis implies the analyzer who is different from the thing analyzed. And is the analyzer different from the thing he wants to analyze? Surely they are both the same only he, a fragment, has assumed the part, the knowledge, the assumption that he is different and he is going to analyze. And each analysis must be complete. Right? Otherwise you carry over the misunderstandings of your analysis to the next analysis. Time, division as the analyzer, each analysis must be complete, finished each time, which are all impossible. If you see the truth of that, the actual fact of it, then you are free of it, aren't you? Are you? If you are free of it then you have quite a different mind that is going to observe. You see the difference? If there is the freedom from the false, and analysis is the false, then my mind is free from the burden of that which has been false, therefore it is free to look.

Now can the mind look at the totality of consciousness without any division as the observer watching the whole structure of consciousness? I don't know if you see. Is this all becoming rather complex? If it is complex life is complex. And to learn about oneself you have to face this extraordinary complex entity called the 'me'. You have to learn about it, and that is what we are doing, we are getting educated about ourselves.

So, can the mind observe the totality of itself? Look, we are human beings - at least supposed to be - only we have divided ourselves into various nationalities, religious beliefs, and so on. When you observe, that is, when you go beyond all nationalities and religious beliefs, we are aggressive, brutal, violent, pleasure seeking people, frightened and so on, and we have to learn all about that, which is ourselves. And to learn about ourselves we see analysis has no answer at all. On the contrary analysis prevents action, denies action. So can the mind observe the totality of itself, look at itself without any division? Then there is no need for analysis or for the hidden things to be exposed, you see the whole thing. Therefore in that observation you may discover fear. Fear and pleasure are the two principal things in us, driving forces, demanding more and more and more pleasure, and warding off fear. Right? Now what do you do with pleasure? You want more of it, surely - both physical, psychological pleasure. And in looking at pleasure very closely, one asks oneself: what is pleasure? Please sirs, do discuss with me. Come together. What is pleasure to you? Physical sensation, psychological factors.

Q: For me pleasure is an escape.

K: For me, the gentleman says, pleasure is an escape. Escape from what? Am I escaping through pleasure? Escaping from fear of not having pleasure? Do look at it. Please sirs do look at yourselves and you will find out simply this thing. Most of us are pursuing pleasure, aren't we? Why? Not that we should or should not. It would be absurd to say, 'Don't have pleasure', when you look at the sky and the trees and the lovely countryside there is a delight. But why this pursuit of pleasure?

Q: I feel that I sustain myself in pursuing pleasure.

K: Sustain yourself? Who is yourself? This is much more complex than that. Do go into it a little bit. First of all let's be very clear what we mean by pleasure. Pleasure is entirely different from joy, isn't it? No? When you are joyous, when you think about it, it becomes pleasure doesn't it?

Q: Pleasure is a stimulus.

K: Obviously a stimulus. We know all how pleasure comes about. It is a stimulus. All right. Go into it please. Look at the pleasures you have. And also you have at rare moments great joy, don't you? Sudden burst of joy. Is there a difference between the two? Look, you have suddenly, as you are walking along you feel extraordinarily happy, and the moment you think about it, it has gone. No? No? At that moment of great joy there is no thinker. The thinker comes in and says, 'I wish I could have that extraordinary moment again'. So the thinker has made joy into pleasure by thinking about it. No? So there is a difference between joy and pleasure. I have had pleasure, somebody said something nice. I have had sexual pleasure. I have had pleasure in achievement, in success, in making a name for myself, and that pleasure is something entirely different from enjoyment, from joy. No?

Q: Joy is in the now.

K: Yes, joy is in the now, pleasure is something which happened yesterday and I want to repeat it today. I think about the thing which gave me pleasure yesterday and the very thinking about that pleasure sustains that thing which was called pleasurable yesterday. No? So thought sustains pleasure, doesn't it? And also thought sustains fear. No? You are uncertain about that? I might lose my job. I am not so nice looking as you, not so clever, I might die tomorrow. I am lonely, I want to be loved, I may not, be loved and so on. Thought does both, sustains both, fear as well as pleasure. No? So what are you going to do about it? Put an end to thought, knowing thought breeds and sustains and nourishes these two. And to escape from this pattern we go off. Right? We turn to meditation, we turn to Zen, we turn to - you know, become Communist, Socialist, oh, a dozen things. To escape from this pattern we become terribly religious, or terribly worldly, or revolt against the established order, which is built on this pattern. And the person who revolts creates the same pattern, the same thing in a different pattern. He is still seeking pleasure, avoiding fear. Then what is one to do? You follow? Because the whole religious structure is based on escaping from this: believe in something marvellous, think about it all the time. But the other thing goes on all the time also. So there is contradiction in wanting to be free of it, and yet be in it. I don't know if you see all this. So they say, 'Suppress thought, control thought, kill the mind'. No? Who is it that is going to suppress thought? You see the danger? So that whole process of thinking has no meaning whatever. Right? I don't know if you see all this. All escapism has no meaning, whether that escape be in social work, watching football, or attending, going to churches where there is another form of entertainment. So unless you solve this basic problem, that is, to learn all about it, then only the mind can be free from it. Which means, can the mind observe the various forms of pleasures, the stimuli and so on, and also all the fears which thought has bred in its search for security. Right? That is, the brain demands that it be completely secure otherwise it can't function properly, efficiently, logically, sanely. Right? The brain, which is the storehouse of memory, experience, knowledge, and that brain with its thought is constantly seeking safety, security, permanency. And not finding permanency in any relationship - husband/wife, you know, relationship, then it tries to escape in some form of belief, in some ideology, in some image, in nationalism, in god. You follow? Escape.

So can the mind, knowing all this, that is, learning about all this, which is being educated, educating itself, learning from itself, not from somebody else, because no book can give you all this, no teacher, only one has to learn about oneself completely, and then when one is not self-centred, then perhaps one is able to observe, or see, something which is beyond all this.

Now Sirs, shall we ask, discuss, ask questions?

Q: May I ask a question please? Could you tell me whether unselfishness is real or unreal?

K: Could you tell me whether unselfishness is real or unreal. I wonder what we mean by the word 'real'.

Q: Actual.

K: Actual. Yes. Need somebody tell me whether I am self-centred or not - the actual fact? What does that mean, selfishness, what does it mean to be self-centred, to be concerned about oneself. Right? Whether that oneself has been identified with the nation, with a belief, with a particular ideological, political system, or that self identified with the family, it is still the self. That is the actual. That is 'what is'. That is what we are doing all the time. My family. And in that too there is a division - me and my family. Me with my ambitions, with my greed, with my position. You follow? And the family pursuing also the same thing, isolating each other. Right? All this is a form of egocentricism, isn't it? That is the actual. That is what is going on in our life daily. I like those who flatter me, who give me comfort; I don't like those who say anything about my belief. You know it all becomes so absurdly childish the whole thing.

Now the question is: can the mind be free of this egocentric activity? Right? That is really the question, not whether it is so or not. Which means can the mind stand alone, uninfluenced? Alone, being alone does not mean isolation. Sir, look: what one rejects completely all the absurdities of nationality, the absurdities of propaganda, of religious propaganda, rejects conclusions of any kind, actually, not theoretically, completely put aside, has understood very deeply the question of pleasure and fear, and division - the 'me' and 'not me' - is there any form of the self at all?

So one has to be free of all this to find out what it means to live a life in which there is no fear. But you see unfortunately for most of us we have neither the time nor the inclination to pursue this right to the end. Or rather, we have plenty of time but we don't want to do this because we are afraid what might happen. You see I have my responsibilities to my family, I can't become a monk. You follow? All the excuses that one churns out, which means that we do not want to find out how to live without sorrow. And to learn about it one has to become extraordinarily, choicelessly aware of oneself.

Q: May I ask a question? If one could ever, with this choiceless awareness that you speak of, really come to know all the fragments in oneself, would the conflict of seeing these fragments disappear?

K: Would conflict disappear in every form if one became aware? Do you know what it means to be aware? Don't let's make a tremendously complex thing of it - to be aware, see. See the sky, the trees, the green grass, to see the beauty of all that, and to see the colour of your sweater, which I don't like, to be aware of my like and dislike. It is easy to be aware of things that don't affect me, like the tree, the ocean, the sea and the wind in the leaf, but to be aware of one's dislike, of one's prejudice, of one's vanity, arrogance - you try it, to be aware of it, without any choice, don't say, 'It is right' - or wrong - 'I must get rid of it', 'How absurd to be vain' - all those are rationalizations of a fact. To be aware of the fact. And in that, when you are so aware, the question arises: who is it that is aware? When you put that question you are not aware. Right? Do please see it. When you put that question, who is aware, you do not know the meaning or the significance of that word 'to be aware', because you are still thinking in terms of division - the one who is to be aware. Is that clear? Yes sir?

Q: I see the enormous need to be aware choicelessly, as you say, and yet as I observe myself this does not occur. In other words the thinker is always intruding, the thinker is always commenting, observing, evaluating. Am I just to stay with that? Otherwise I think I recognize the vital need for this not to always see through this past conditioning of the thinker, and yet the thinker continues to evaluate and judge. This does not occur, this choiceless awareness does not come into being.

K: You are saying: what is one to do with the observer, with the thinker. Right? Who is always interfering, projecting, deciding. Now what do you do? Tell me please. There is your problem. Right? You have all that problem, haven't you? What will you do with it? Don't please answer me. Look at it first. Look at the question. Be aware of this fact that one is always doing this. I want to see the world as new. I want to see every challenge as something new to which I can respond with freshness, but always the thought is interfering. Right? The observer with his condition, with his past responses, with eyes that are spotted, always interfering. Now what are you going to do? If it is actually your problem, not a theoretical problem, a passionate problem, what will you do?

Q: Find out what causes it.

K: Now wait. What causes it? Wait. Wait. Go slow. See what is implied. To say, I am going to find out what causes it, is part of the analysis, which will take time. Right? I thought you had abandoned analysis. So what will you do? By finding the cause of it, you may instantly find the cause of it, but will the discovery of the cause free the mind from the censor? Right? Will it? I know why I am angry, but I am still angry. I know the absurdity of jealousy, but I am still jealous. I have gone into the question of ambition very carefully, and discovered how absurd it is, why I am ambitious because in myself I am really nobody, a rather footling little entity and I want to be somebody great. There is the cause. But yet the drive to achieve, to be successful, is still there. So the cause does not free the mind of the thing it wants to understand and be free of. So what are you going to do? Please proceed. You'll find out. Analysis will not help. Discovery of the cause will not free the mind.

Q: So we must live it and let it be.

K: Live it and let it be. Live what?

Q: What is.

K: What is. What is, is that thought is all the time, as the censor, interfering, judging, evaluating, condemning. That is a fact. Now you see that as poison. Now what will you do? Do you actually see it, or is it just a theory?

Q: Sometimes it is. In flashes you see it and at other times you can't see it.

K: Sometimes you see it and at other times you don't. Is that so? When you see something very dangerous, that pool - you don't see it sometimes and you don't see it other times. The danger is always there, isn't it?

Q: Sometimes you are aware of it and sometimes you forget.

K: Wait. I understand that. What does it mean? You are aware of sometimes, you are unaware of it other times. Right? What will you do? Proceed and you will find out. What will you do? That sometimes you are aware that the censor is operating and therefore preventing clarity, and other times you are unaware of the censor at all, you are just quickly responding. How will you bring about a total attention? Right? How? A system? A method? Right? Will it? You are doubtful about that, aren't you? A system implies practise doesn't it? Practise day after day of being aware. Right? Which means what? It becomes mechanical doesn't it, therefore it is no longer awareness. Therefore systems of any kind will not bring about attention. So, finished. Right? See what you have learnt. No analysis. Right? No searching out the cause. No system. Right? Now is your mind free of analysis, cause, systems, is it actually free?

Q: At the moment.

K: Ah, no, no. Not, at the moment. It means you don't see the truth of it, you only see partly what you like to see.

Q: Ignore it.

K: Ignore it! Withdraw? Ignore? Ignore it. How can I? You could ignore it? Ignore what? Ignore that I am thinking absurdly?

But that is my whole life. How can I ignore my life?

Q: Your past life.

K: Your past life. Do you know what it means to live in the present?

Q: I am suggesting that you ignore your past life.

K: Sir, do you know what it means to live in the present? To ignore the past. Can I ignore the past? All my life is the past. No? I am the past. No? The past. All thought is the past. No? Because thought is the response of memory. Memory is knowledge, experience, which is all the past. Can the mind ignore all that? Because the mind is the past. All the brain cells are the result of the past. And you say, 'Ignore it and live in the present'. Do you know what it means to live in the present? Which means to have no time at all, to be free of time. Not so that you will miss the bus - I don't mean that. If you forget time you won't be able to get home. We mean by freedom from time, it implies freedom from the whole structure of the 'me', which is time, which is the past. And one has to learn about all that. You can't just say, I'll be free, or ignore it.

Q: Krishnaji, may I ask your advice? I realize I must find the answer. In this process of observing fragments of oneself there seems to come a sense of guilt of one's shortcomings compared with an established standard of values, also a sense of possible disloyalty because one anticipates having to make a break from certain obligations to responsibilities that one has undertaken. Is this another form of fear? Should one disregard it? And then continue to look with joy and awareness?

K: Yes sir. When I observe myself, the questioner says, please correct me sir if I am not putting it rightly, the questioner says, when I am aware of myself I feel very guilty, I feel various forms of fears, of being irresponsible and so on and so on. All these things arise when I observe myself. What am I to do? Disloyalty, guilt, wretchedness, feeling miserable, repentance, you know, the whole works that one goes through. Why shouldn't they all come up? Why shouldn't this feeling of guilt come up? It is there. You are following what I am saying? Let it come but the moment you say it is guilt, it is wrong, it is right, I should have done this, then begins the interference of the censor. I don't know if you are following all this. Sirs, please, be extraordinarily simple about all this. I observe myself and I find that I have done something ugly and the makes me feel guilty. I want to know why. Why am I guilty about something which I have done? I have done it.

Finished. Right? It has happened. I have told a lie. That's a fact. And no amount of my cunning deception is going to hide it. I am afraid you might find out that I lied. I don't mind. Find out. Be clear, honest about it. You follow what I am saying? I have lied and I feel guilty and I know I have done something ugly. I am going to look at it, I am not going to condemn it.

You know sir, to actually look at 'what is', without the censor, it doesn't mean that you become callous, indifferent, on the contrary, you become extraordinarily sensitive. And sensitivity is part of intelligence. But the moment you condemn it, condemn 'what is', then begins all the trouble. But just to look at it, that you have told a lie, that one has been angry, one has been afraid, just to observe. Look sir, you depend, don't you, on people psychologically. No? You depend. Why do you depend? Not that you should not, or should. Why? Because the other gives you comfort, or sustains you psychologically. Inwardly one is poor and the other gives you a feeling of well-being. One is lonely, therefore you depend on another. You can't stand alone therefore you depend. So there it is. Just to be aware that you depend and not cultivate detachment. But to be aware that you are dependant because you are lonely. And find out what it means to be lonely. Is it an acknowledgement of isolation? You understand? Loneliness is a fact of isolation, isn't it? Completely isolated from everything and one is afraid of that loneliness. Therefore you escape and therefore you depend. If you see this thing, actually see it non-verbally, the fact, because the moment you depend you are afraid, you are jealous, you become aggressive, you lose all sense of affection, love. When you see this whole thing very clearly then the mind is free from all dependency.

Q: What is the dimension and the extent of the mind in relation to space?

K: What is the time sir? I think we had better stop and continue with this tomorrow, shall we? Right sirs.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 6TH SEPTEMBER 1970

I wonder what you would like that we talk about this morning. I would like to talk about something that might be of interest. One can see very clearly that one must lay a new foundation for a different kind of living, a different way of looking at life as a whole, not fragmentarily, a way of thinking when it is absolutely necessary, most efficiently, logically, and sanely, but while the mind is not functioning in thought, for the mind to be completely quiet the rest of the time. A way of living where action is complete and not contradictory, so that one action doesn't deny or bring about corruption, or disintegration in other activities. A way of living that is of tremendous enjoyment, great delight, without the exhausting process of pleasure. And also a way of life that is completely and utterly peaceful. Now can all this be realized in our daily living? That's what I would like to talk about, if that is what you also want. Is that all right?

For this to come about easily, almost unconsciously as it were, one must understand this question of effort, conflict and this constant seeking out something. There must be effort as long as there is contradiction in our life: thinking one thing, saying another, doing something else, obviously that leads to a hypocritical - a life of great friction. Is it at all possible to live a life in which there is no effort of any kind? Because effort implies not only contradiction but various forms of suppression, various forms of escapes, imitation, conformity. And that effort brings about its own discipline, which is merely accepting a norm which is comforting and imitating that pattern. All that is implied in effort. We are talking about psychological effort. Can one live without this constant struggle inwardly? Which implies, doesn't it, to see this whole pattern of conflict and struggle and contradiction as a whole, not in fragments. Is the mind capable of looking at the whole of life, with all the problems, with all the contradictions, struggles, searching, longing, fears, pleasures, searching for something immutable, escaping from our own petty narrow lives, our own shallow thinking. See the whole of that non-fragmentarily - is that at all possible? Because the moment something is possible you have plenty of energy. It's only when psychologically we think there is no possibility then we become slack, our energy fades away. But the moment there is a possibility of something then we have abundance of energy.

So we are asking a question, which is, can the mind, your mind, the mind, see this whole existence as one unitary movement, though in it there are contradictions? Because it seems to me in that lies the understanding of effort, struggle, seeking out something, something great, noble, transcendental, and the constant movement of going to one thing after the other, church, Catholicism, Protestantism, the Hinduism, Judaism, you know, follow one after the other, endlessly shop-lifting - I think that's the right word! Because one can see where there is contradiction and conflict there must be distortion. To see that as a fact, not as a theory, not as a formula, something to be achieved, but the actual perception of that truth, of that fact, that any form of struggle, conformity, imitation, in which there is contradiction, this tendency to conform and so on is a form of distortion, to see that. We don't see it because we are caught in the trap of formulas, concepts.

Can the mind observe without formulas, without conceptual ideas, theories, but merely observe the fact that conflict distorts? And when the mind sees that very clearly, through negation you put away all the factors that bring about conflict. Are we communicating with each other? That is, sirs, negation is the most positive action. To see something false and totally deny it is the most positive response. So through negation the positive comes, not the pursuit of the positive. Say for instance, one perceives the falseness of nationalities, the falseness of organized belief, religions, rituals and a projection of what god is, which are all intellectual superficial fragmentary processes, to deny all that, not verbally but actually psychologically, in oneself, that brings freedom which is the most positive.

Are we meeting each other? Communication is really an extraordinary thing. Which means, both of us meet with the same intensity, at the same level, at the same time, and that is communication. It is really a form of communion. To see something together, that which is false, and see something real, together, both of our minds must be at the same time, with the same passion, with the same vitality, to observe, to see. And that is real communication, then words have very, very little significance. But unfortunately one has to use words, knowing the word is not the thing, the description is not the described.

You see we have lived so long in formulas, in concepts, and according to those we act, or not act, and these formulas, concepts, condition our thinking, our living. I won't use the word 'condition' our thinking, because thinking is already conditioned - our living.

So can the mind, your mind, be free of all formulas? Do investigate as we are talking, please. To be aware of one's formulas, that there is god, that there is no god, this is right, this is wrong, I am this, I am not that - you know what we mean by formulas: forms created by thought in order to be secure, in order to function according to a certain pattern, and so on. To be aware of these formulas that one has and to find out why they exist, just by observing. As we went into yesterday, trying to find out what the cause of these formulas are is a waste of time, because if you are aware of these formulas you see the cause instantly. Obviously the formulas, the concepts, the theories, the philosophies, the various ideologies exist simply because that way the mind, the brain, feels safe, feels secure. And to be aware of these formulas, and to put aside all formulas - you try it, do it as we are discussing, talking about it, you will see what happens to a mind. First to be aware of these formulas, concepts; then see actually what the implications are, and put them aside. The very seeing of that which is false is the denial of it. Because it is only a mind that is really free that come function easily, without any effort.

So: because we are talking not about theories but a way of living which has deep significance, not invented by the intellect, but significance in living itself. Unless we lay that foundation one cannot go any further. One can go imaginatively, theoretically, fancifully, deceitfully, hypocritically. Because after all our actual daily living is rather tiresome, ugly, violent, brutal, without much meaning, and in this futile existence we try to find a meaning, we try to find love, we try to find what we call god, or reality, or whatever you like to call it. And not finding it there, our mind still caught in the trap of shallowness, in all its various forms of strife and struggle, we try to escape from all this through knowledge. Knowledge becomes extraordinarily important, not wisdom but knowledge. Which means books, teachers, following, forming separate groups and all the rest of it. So we think having more knowledge about ourselves we will be able to live a different kind of life. Do please see this. Knowledge implies accumulation; accumulation is the past. Obviously. And our life is directed, guided, shaped by the past, and we cling to that because that is the safest way of living, at least we think it is. And freedom from the known, which is knowledge is the beginning of wisdom. Do go into it with me, you will see it.

The known is the 'me' - my conflicts, my struggles, my unhappiness, my sense of guilt, sorrow, despair, success, pleasure and so on. All that I know of myself is the past. My god is the invention of my thought. Because I want something totally secure, something immutable, permanent, because my life is very changeable, so I want something everlasting. The everlasting is the 'me' identified with a word called god. And that word has caused such mischief in the world. And to find out if there is something beyond all the measure of thought, beyond all the measure of one's fears and imaginations and fancies, the mind must be completely free from knowledge. I don't know if you follow all this.

Knowledge is necessary when you function, as a scientist, as a doctor, an engineer, a professional careerist, a bureaucrat, you must have plenty of knowledge otherwise you cannot function. And we think acquiring knowledge about oneself will not only enhance, get enlightenment through knowledge about ourselves, therefore through the past, and so what happens. We divide life as the past, the present and the future. I don't know if you see. And all the time the past is shaping our life - the past being the known. And we are afraid to let go the known because that's all we have. The past is the only thing we have. And to let go completely, which means a mind that is capable of learning and not accumulating.

Because if you want to learn what truth is, learn about what truth is, first you must know 'what is'. Mustn't you? Because the 'what is' is the most living thing. But if we translate 'what is' in terms of the past then 'what is' becomes static. Right? Are we meeting each other? And when 'what is' becomes sterile then the mind cannot go beyond 'what is'. But to observe 'what is' without translating in terms of the past, then the mind can go beyond 'what is'.

Look, sir: I am greedy, that's a fact. One is greedy, envious, violent, those are facts. And we look at that fact, 'what is', with eyes that condemn, justify, give reason why we should be violent. And so we see the impossibility of going beyond. Whereas if we looked at the violence, which we have in us, the 'what is', without any condemnation, without any evaluation, then the possibility of going beyond it is there. I don't think we are meeting each other. I don't think so, sorry, I don't feel you are getting it.

Look, sir, I realize I am violent, I hate, I am greedy, competitive, aggressive, easily slipping into anger, I realize that, that's a fact. And looking at it I have already a formula, an idea that I must not be because I want to live a peaceful life - god knows why, but I want to. So I have a concept that a different kind of life is possible, an ideal of non-violence. So what has the mind done? It has seen that it is violent and it has created a formula of non-violence so it brings within it a contradiction. And I fight with that contradiction. I move from violence to non-violence. Whereas if I had no formula at all but actually observed the fact of violence, I discover why I am violent. Again not seeking the cause of it, it is there. Because we love aggression, there is great pleasure in being aggressive, dominating. Our social structure, culture is based on competitiveness. All that is based on the principle of pleasure. Now if I see all that, and I can only see it if I have no conceptual idea about violence, then the mind can go beyond it, can be utterly free of violence. Have I made it clear? Clear in the sense not verbally or intellectually, but you actually see it, as you see the speaker sitting on the platform, as clearly as that: that one cannot go beyond 'what is' if you look at it with closed eyes, and the eyes are closed when you have the desire to get rid of it, to overcome it, to suppress it, to achieve a different state. Which are all the seeds of violence.

Right?

So one discovers for oneself, if you are at all serious and go into it very deeply, that one can live without a formula. After all love is without a formula, isn't it?

Q: Both aggression and love are unconscious things which rise up without a formula.

K: Oh, no, no, you have not understood what we have said. Both arise, love and aggression have no formulas. Really, that is not what we are talking about.

Look, sir, I see the necessity in myself of living a different kind of life. I am the result of the culture, the society in which I have been born. The society, the community, the culture is me, and I am that society, I am the world and the world is me. This is not a theory but an actual fact. You are born in this country, you are brought up according to its culture and society, that's a fact. And being born in another country, with their beliefs, with their dogmas, they are conditioned by that culture. Now I want to find out a different way of living because I see the way I have lived is utterly meaningless - the struggle, this everlasting boredom, the routine, the exhaustion of pleasure, the fear of living and dying, the utter emptiness in oneself, the loneliness, the lack of love. I see all that. And I want to find a way of living which is none of this. And to find that out I must deny the whole of this in myself, not in you, not kill you, not throw bombs, and all the rest of it.

So I realize that change is only possible if the mind can become - the mind being the brain and the whole business - can be made new. The entity that can make the mind new is not thought, because thought is the response of memory, knowledge, experience. The mind cannot be made new through the intellect with all its formulas, with its endless futile enquiries and with its philosophies. So that goes. So what is the factor that will make the mind totally new? You understand my question? What is it?

Q: Feeling?

K: Feeling. Listen, sir, feeling is fragmentary. Like thinking is fragmentary, the intellect is fragmentary, to be sentimental, emotional is fragmentary. We are asking - please listen to the question first - seeing all this, seeing the confusion, the misery, the conflict, the inner utter poverty, what will make the mind, the brain, the whole structure totally new so that it will be creative - not in expression, not in writing a poem, or painting a picture, that's not creative. When there is tension between two opposing desires, in that tension you can do things. So for a mind to be new, fresh, young...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Oh, my lady, you are just throwing words. Please find out, look at it, look at your life first. Your life, not how you think your life should be, but actually what it is - the frustrations, the misery, the quarrel in relationship, the images that you have about each other, the toil of going to the office, being insulted in the office by the boss. You follow, the whole of that, watch it in your life. And you see all that very clearly, the absurd beliefs based on fear, and so on, and you ask yourself, how can the mind which has produced all this, how can that mind be made totally new so that it can function differently.

Q: Possibly by understanding.

K: Possibly by understanding.

Q: And seeing 'what is' without condemnation.

K: This is not guess work! This is not a guessing game.

Q: I still say, feeling. I don't understand why feeling is not right.

K: You mean, sir, by feeling, do you, by love?

Q: No, just feeling, the instant without any thought process.

Living right now with no fear of any kind.

K: Wait sir, wait sir. Living right now without any fear.

Q: Just living right now.

K: Sir, you can't live right now with the burden of the past, can you?

Q: The past is the past, it has gone.

K: Is it so simple as all that? The past is the past, and it has gone. You know what it means? The past is in the brain, in the brain cells are the memories of the past. You don't know. And you mean to say you can get rid of all that through just feeling at this moment?

Q: Why not?

K: Not, I don't know. Sir, find out without putting into words, or trying to answer, how you with your life, which you know very well, better than anybody else, both the secret and the open, when you are by yourself, or when you are with other people you know what your life is. And you see the importance of changing all that, bringing about a different kind of mind, not throwing away knowledge, because you must have knowledge otherwise you can't get home - how can this mind be changed completely? Do, sit quietly, find out, don't answer me. I am not asking you. Sir, do you know what this means? To find out you must give your life to it. It isn't just a weekend affair. It must be your vocation, therefore dreadfully serious. So what will bring about this radical change?

Q: We must wipe out our feelings.

K: We must wipe out our feelings.

Q: Can't we just let 'what is' be and watch it?

K: Watch 'what is'. Why don't you?

Q: That's what I am saying.

K: Why don't you? Are you doing it? Do you know what silence is? When you look at anything, at a tree, at a child, your wife, or your friend, or see anything, do you look at it through silence, or through noise? When you look at your husband, do you look at him or her through an image you have, or do you look only without any movement of thought.

You know what it means to be absolutely quiet, not cultivate quietness, but being quiet. A mind that is really quiet can observe 'what is' and go beyond it. But the mind is not quiet when it is chattering that it must be changed. That is, trying to suppress it, trying to understand it, trying to find out the cause of it and so on.

You know - may I go on with this a little bit? Meditation is this. To observe completely silently. In that silence there is no observer at all. The moment there is an observer silence is not. Not only physical quietness, the physical organism being completely still but also the brain, which means thought. Then out of that silence and space the mind is made new. Not you make the mind new, as the observer. And the silence is only possible when there is an awareness of all the conditioning, of your conditioning as this or that - Christian, Muslim, Hindu, you know, communist, socialist, you know, all the rest of it. When the mind is free, is aware of its conditioning and being aware there is complete attention. I do not know if you have noticed when there is complete attention there is no observer at all, no censor. Haven't you noticed it? No? When you attend, when you listen to something, when you listen to the song of a bird - there it is! - when you listen to it completely with full attention, in which there is no control, no sense of division, in that attentive state, movement, there is no observer at all. Then in that attention there is something new, the mind is made new.

Right?

But then you say, how can such attention be maintained. Right? Which is your greed. So all that one can do is to be aware that you are inattentive. That's all. Not, how can inattention become attention - it can't. Whereas if one is aware that one is inattentive, that's sufficient. I don't know if you are meeting this.

I think that's enough this morning, so can we discuss, talk, question?

Q: Do you feel that your mind is quiet, your own personal particular mind, is it usually quiet?

K: Is your own particular mind, the speaker's mind, quiet.

Q: Do you feel that you have a quiet mind?

K: Do you feel personally that you have a quiet mind. I really don't know.

Q: What about...

K: Do listen, sir, do listen to what I am saying. If you knew that you had a quiet mind, it is not a quiet mind. If you are conscious that you are quiet, still, don't you know what it means. When you know that you are happy, is it happiness? Sir, you see, as I said, when there is complete attention, and therefore silence, in that there is no observer, the entity that is conscious that he is silent. Then there is a division between the observer and the thing he calls silence. And the struggle begins to achieve that silence. And you have the various systems, practices of achieving silence. Just think of the absurdity of that!

Q: Sir, what does the cessation of sorrow imply?

K: What do you mean by the cessation of sorrow. The ending of sorrow. We know what sorrow is, don't we. It's always with us, in different forms - death of somebody whom we think we love, the sorrow of not being something or other, the sorrow of self-pity mostly, the sorrow of realizing how shallow, empty, dull we are; and the sorrowness of the world as a whole, the poverty, the superstition, the fears of the world, not only your own sorrow but the sorrow of the world. Now can all that sorrow end?

Q: Only when fragmentation ends.

K: Only when fragmentation ends. Look, that's just a theory, isn't it. I am in sorrow, I want to find out how to end it. Because I know what sorrow does, it brings about greater concentration of self-centred activity. In sorrow there is a great deal of self-pity. Watch it in yourself, sir, please. In sorrow there is isolation, cutting yourself off from others. In sorrow there is this constant weight, burden, the seeking and the ending of it, demanding to put an end to all that - either suicide, or escape, which are both the same. Now how can this sorrow end? And I see that it must end, it is imperative because otherwise the brain, the mind, my life has no meaning, just go on, round and round in this trap of sorrow. Now how is it to end? What do you say, sir? How is it to end? How is your sorrow, not mine, or the world's sorrow, how is your sorrow to end? Obviously not through escape. And we have such a network of escapes. Do you understand? How is to end? Do find out. Will you end it through time, gradually, working at it, chiselling it away, day after day? Or it can only end instantly? Can the mind see the whole pattern of sorrow, with its self-pity, with its neurotic pursuits? And the neurotic pursuits are escaping through pleasure, through entertainment, through knowledge, through religious formulas and beliefs.

Q: It can end when you know longer desire sorrow.

K: When we no longer desire then there is an end to sorrow. Can you put an end to desire?

Q: End desire.

K: Watch it, do listen sir. Can you put an end to desire? That's what the Protestants, and the religious people, and Catholic priests have done: stamp out desire and concentrate on the saviour, on god, on your book. Have you suppressed - you see you are saying things. Can you get rid of desire, what is desire? Do look at it, sir, what is desire? I see you have got a nice shirt, and I'd like to have it. I see you have got a nice face, I wish it were mine also, and you have got a good brain, good capacity, clarity and I would like to have that. So there is perception - seeing first, visual, then contact, then sensation, then desire, and that desire is sustained by thought. No? And you mean to say you are going to suppress all that? Which means suppressing thought, therefore don't look at women, don't look at things that give pleasure, don't look at that shirt, shut your eyes. Or do you understand this whole process? The seeing, the contact, the sensation, and why can't the mind stop there, why should thought come in and say, 'I'd like to have that shirt', 'What a lovely car that is, I'd like to go in it'. You follow all this? To see that thought perpetuates pleasure as desire. To see a car, to see a good brain functioning, not say, 'I wish I could get it', to be aware when thought comes and turns it into pleasure. I don't know if you follow this. All that means watching, being aware, alert, and that requires energy.

Q: Are there any rules, none which I can see, on what is good and what is bad. Is that all created in the mind itself? Some people can think that some things are one hundred per cent good, and their next door neighbour feels exactly opposite. And I can't see that they both aren't right because they are both there. I mean to say that one has a good mind...

K: No, sir, good mind in the sense clear mind, thinking clearly.

You know, sir, a good mind, I don't have to go into it.

Q: Right. But I am saying to look into someone else's mind, you could never know if it was clear unless...

K: No, sir. I am talking - look you are asking, are you, what is good and what is bad - are there rules about it. Rules of good taste, the golden rule of proportion. Now, sir, look, there is after all good and bad, isn't there. There is - wait a minute - there is violence and there is gentleness, tenderness, care. Violence is destructive, kills. They are obvious, aren't they? Wait, look at it, don't say good and bad. Look at it first. The moment you say it is good and it is bad, you have put it into a formula and with that formula you are going to judge. That's the easiest way of living. You are Catholic, I won't have anything to do with you, communist or this or that. But to look, to observe, to understand is far more important than saying good and bad. Not that there is not violence and peace.

Q: There was a question under consideration of how the cessation of sorrow could be arrived at. We have detracted from that.

K: I am afraid so, sir. Yes, sir. How to end sorrow.

Q: Is it by accepting sorrow totally?

K: Is it by accepting sorrow totally and openly that it comes to an end. Who is it that is accepting it? You see, you are again functioning in formulas. Look, sir: you are in sorrow, aren't you. As a human being, most people are. And you see what danger it is, what a calamity it is. How will you end it? Surely by not escaping. Right. Not suppressing it, not identifying totally yourself with it. So how will you end it?

Q: By staying with that sorrow and not identifying it with thought.

K: By staying with that sorrow and not identifying thought with it. When you say, stay with it, do you mean, don't run away from it, don't judge it, don't be identified, just watch it. Is that what you mean?

Q: Yes.

K: Can you do it?

Q: Yeah.

K: Wait, sir, don't say, yeah. Don't be, if I may most respectfully suggest, don't be so quick, it is quite a complex problem, because if it as simple as that we are all free of it. How do you look at sorrow? Do you look at it with the intention of getting rid of it? With suppressing it, with overcoming it? Please listen to all this. Justifying it, escaping from it? Then, who is the entity that is doing all this? The entity that wants to escape from it, the entity that wants to suppress it, the entity that is looking for the cause of sorrow, the entity that is full of self-pity. Who is that entity that is saying all this? Is that the observer?

Q: Sorrow.

K: Sorrow.

Q: Sorrow is the entity.

K: Sorrow is the entity, and that entity says, I must get rid of it. Which means what?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. The entity has separated himself from sorrow, hasn't he, when he says, I must get rid of it. No? So as long as there is an observer who is different from the thing observed, this division, there must be sorrow. That is, as long as there is no self-knowledge there must be sorrow. So the ending of sorrow comes about when there is total self-understanding. Don't make that into a formula. See how in sorrow there is such a great deal of self-pity: I have lost, I wish it were different, the complaint about it, the blaming somebody else. So in sorrow there is a great deal of self-pity. So the understanding of the self, the 'me', is the ending of sorrow.

Q: Don't you think there is one formula that can explain the futility of existence and non-existence?

K: Don't you think there is a formula for all existence.

Q: For non-existence.

K: Or how to control it, how to shape it, how to manage it.

Q: No, just how to see it, the way it is.

K: Is there a formula to see the totality of life, as it is, a formula. The very thing that we have been saying: you cannot see the whole of life through a formula. It's so clear isn't it.

Q: It's not clear to me.

K: Sir, I have a formula, let's say, suppose I have a formula that all life is bliss, that all life is sacred, that all life is one. That's a formula, isn't it.

Q: I know that. But I think, have the feeling that it is possible in the mind to have a formula to say, all life is such and such. I think there is truth in that. It think that can be expressed in terms of a formula.

K: Sir, look, you are saying, by having a formula quietly in the mind, and that formula having a certain vitality and feeling, that formula will solve our problems.

Q: No, no. I am not saying that. I am saying that it is one and the same thing. In the mind exists a formula that recognizing this, it is possible.

K: Who creates that formula? Who sustains it? Why do you have a formula?

Q: Instinct.

K: Instinct.

Q: Does one want to show the formula to other people?

K: Look, sir, we wanted to say - we started by asking what sorrow is. We asked if it can ever come to an end, not in heaven, or at some future date, end. And we went into it. That is, as long as there is the self as separate and there is no understanding of the whole nature and the structure of that me, the self, the person, the ego, or whatever you like to call that centre, there must be the engulfing waves of sorrow. So can one understand oneself totally? And it is possible to understand oneself completely, not only the conscious self but the deep hidden self. And to understand that self there must be an awareness, a watchfulness without any sense of distortion. Then you will see if you go very deeply into it, not taking time, sorrow comes to an end.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE

8TH SEPTEMBER 1970

K: This is supposed to be a discussion, a dialogue or talking over together any of the things we would like to discuss. So what shall we start with?

Q: Could we discuss the application of these talks as a means of education, in other words, an active thing.

K: Discuss education. Application of these talks in education, could we discuss that. Do you want to discuss that or something else?

Q: Like the idea of a school for pre-adolescents.

Q: Don't you think that it is possible to have a school whereby these people would never be conditioned?

K: We will discuss that, sir, we will discuss what is conditioning, whether it is possible to bring up children without being conditioned. That's what he wants to discuss. Anything else?

Perhaps that could be discussed if we approach the question differently: how to bring about an education, or to educate a child, a student, and ourselves, not to imitate, not to conform. Could we discuss that? Would that be worthwhile? What do you say, would that be worthwhile to discuss: what are the implications of conforming and whether it is possible not to conform at all, but yet live in the society, in this world, not in a monastery, but here? Would that be worthwhile?

A: Yes.

K: If you don't want to discuss that please talk about something else that might be of interest to you. So shall we start with that?

A: Yes.

K: Right. Before we try to find out how to educate children not to conform, or to conform, shouldn't we find out for ourselves if we are conforming, the educator, which we are, the parent, the teachers, the educator, the human being, are we conforming? Are we imitating, following a certain pattern, accepting formulas and fitting life to that formula? All that implies surely, conformity, doesn't it: following, accepting authority, having a formula or a principle, or a belief according to which one lives, or rejecting the outer patterns of conformity imposed on us through culture, through education, through the impact of social influences. We may have our own patterns of conformity, inwardly, and accept those and conform to that - you see, both outwardly and inwardly. Is one aware that one is conforming?

Am I aware that I am conforming? Not that one should not, or should, but first let's begin to find out if one is conforming. What does it mean? I mean all the structure of language is a form of acceptance of a pattern of speech, of thought, conditioned by words and so on. That is, one can see one does conform there. And one does conform to outward social patterns: short hair, long hair, beard, no beard, trousers, short, mini skirts, and long skirts, and you know, all the rest of it. And inwardly is one conforming, following an image that one has built about oneself, image, a conclusion, a belief, a pattern of conduct, and following that pattern. Is one aware of all this? Not that one should or should not imitate, but is one conscious, know, aware, recognize that there is this outward and inward conformity all the time? Because if one is conforming obviously there is no freedom. And without freedom there is no intelligence.

So in enquiring within oneself, looking at oneself, quite objectively, without any sentimentality, without saying this is right, this is wrong, just to observe and find out at what depth one is conforming. At a very superficial level, or does one conform right through one's being? When one is conforming - it is really quite a complex subject this - when we have been educated to divide life as the 'me' and the 'not me', as the observer, the censor, and the thing observed as something separate. Basically that is one of the patterns of conformity, that's the way we have been brought up. When I say, I am a Hindu, it is conforming to the pattern of the particular culture and society in which this particular mind has been cultured, brought up. Is one doing that?

Please, I don't want to talk about this by myself, I can talk by myself in my room. This is really quite extraordinarily interesting if one could go into this very, very deeply. And then we can discuss how to bring about in a student, in a child - a student, let's keep it to that, a child is too small.

Q: Why?

K: Wait, sir. Don't jump to the 'why' yet. We will come to that a little later. We say first let us see how you and I conform. And as we are the educators, whether we are parents, teachers, if we don't understand what it means to conform how can we help another to be free of conformity, or to say you must conform, that's natural. We must be clear in oneself. Don't let's put the horse before the cart - or the cart before the horse!

Because I really want to find out, I want to learn about it. You see, it is really very subtle, and it has great depth if you really go into this question. Memory, the cultivation of memory, is what education is at the present, what facts and this and that technology. The path of knowledge, you follow, is to conform. I don't know if you see that. Following the past, accepting a tradition, calling oneself a German, a Russian, an Englishman, is conforming. And the revolt against that becomes another pattern of conformity. Therefore all reaction is a form of conformity. I don't know if you accept all this. I don't like the particular system, the capitalist, or the communist system, I revolt against it, because I want a different kind of system; and that different kind of system is the outcome of these two particular systems, and I prefer that and therefore I am conforming to that. I don't know if you see this.

Therefore in enquiring into this question, not how to bring up children, we will come to that very much later, one has to find out in oneself these patterns of conformity, imitation. Go on, sirs.

Q: Sir, if we do not follow these systems that exist in our society, how can we educate our children to go through examinations.

K: Yes, sir that's what we are saying. You see again, don't let's talk about the children for the moment. Let us talk about ourselves who are responsible for these poor unfortunate children, whether we are conforming. If we are, then whatever our relationship with the children be, we will always subtly or brutally bring about an educational system that will make the child or the grown-up or the adolescent conform. This is so simple. What's the difficulty? If I am blind I can't lead, I can't look, I can't help another. We are more or less blind if we don't know at what depths we are conforming.

Q: But isn't knowledge of these depths a continuous process, doesn't it become more precise?

K: It does, sir, it does become very precise. If we could please give a little attention to this. Are you conforming? Obviously when I put on trousers I am conforming. When I go to India I put on different clothes, I am conforming. When I have my hair cut short, I am conforming. When I have my hair long, or an enormous beard, I am conforming.

Q: But is it not much more this matter of the condition of looking at the world as being oneself and the outer world as two separate things?

K: No, I said that. The division as the 'me' and not 'the me' the outer and the inner, this division, is another form of conformity. Sir, let's get at the principle of it, you follow what I mean, not at the peripheral conformities, but at the root. Why does the human mind conform? And does that human mind know it is conforming. Why, and conformity. You follow? In asking that question we will find out. But not enquiring about the peripheral conformity, the borders of conformity. That's a sheer waste of time. Once the central issue is understood then we can deal with the outer, with the peripheral conformities.

Q: Sir, I am very unsure if I don't follow a certain pattern.

K: He says, if I don't follow a certain pattern, established by a particular society and culture, communist, or Finnish, or German, this or that, Catholic, I shall be thrown out. Right? Imagine what would happen in Russia, under the Soviet tyranny, though they may call it democracy of the people, all that bilge, I shall be wiped out, I shall be sent to the mental hospital and given drugs to become normal. This is all - so before we say, what shall I do in a particular culture where conformity is the pattern, before we even put that question we should find out for ourselves whether we are conforming and what it means. Why? You see you are always discussing what to do under a given structure of a society. That's not the question. The question is, is one aware, does one know that one is conforming? Is that conformity peripheral, that is very superficial, or is it very profound? Until you answer this question you won't be able to deal with the problem, whether to fit into a particular society that demands conformity.

Q: I act in a certain way, how do I know if I am conforming, or not?

K: We will have to find that out, sir, let's go into it. Let's take time and patience in finding out. And don't let us ask peripheral questions please. Is that clear? Peripheral questions, what to do.

Q: It seems possibly that like any other species we have a natural and instinctive desire to conform.

K: Yes. Why? We know this. This whole process of education, all our upbringing is to conform, why? Do look at it. The animal conforms.

Q: To preserve the species.

Q: To keep together.

Q: To preserve the group.

K: To preserve the group, to have security, to be safe. That's why we conform. Does that conformity lead to security? We say it does; does it? I mean, to call oneself an American, or an Indian, or a Japanese, or Indonesian, I am sorry to have to introduce all these words, but it doesn't matter, does seem to give a sense of security. Doesn't it? To identify oneself with a particular community appears to give security. But does it? When you call yourself a German, and I call myself a Jew, or an Englishman, this very division is one of the major causes of war, which means no security. Where there is division which comes about through identification with a particular community, hoping that community will give security, it is the very beginning of destruction of security. This is so clear.

Q: Then you feel that the idea of any community is one that would detract from...

K: No, sir, no sir. No. We are saying - look, sir, please - we are saying the desire to conform, the urge, the instinct to conform, comes about through the hope of security, wanting to be secure, safe, certain, physically. Is that a fact? Historically - not that I am a historian - historically it has shown when you call yourself a Catholic and I myself a Protestant, we have murdered each other in the name of god and all the rest of it. So the mind seeking security through conformity, denies that very security. That's clear, isn't it. So please, when that's clear we have finished with identification with a community through which we hope to be secure. That thinking, looking at it that way is finished. You follow? Once you see the poisonous nature of this division between you and the community, and you identifying with the community in the hope of security, when you see that very clearly, the truth of it, you no longer want security through community. You follow? Through nationality, through identification with a particular group.

Q: Is there not another point, the point of feeling to belong to?

K: Yes, sir. I belong to a particular group, it gives me satisfaction, it makes me feel warm inside, it makes me feel safe. Which is the same thing.

Q: It much more than to be safe, it's the feeling, a nice feeling.

K: Yes, sir, which is what? A nice feeling - I belong to this community of Brockwood. It gives me a nice feeling. What does that mean? I belong. Which is, I want to belong to something. Right? Why? Sir, let us tear all this apart and look at it. Why do I want to feel comfortable with a blasted little community? Sorry!

Q: I feel insufficient in myself.

K: What does that mean? In myself I am insufficient, I am lonely, I am a poor, unhappy, haggard, miserable entity, and I say, my god, if I could identify myself with a large community I would lose myself in that. This is so simple.

Q: We want communion.

K: With whom?

Q: With other people.

K: How do you have communion with other people when you are seeking security through other people?

Q: It is not a matter of security.

K: Sir, look, sir. I feel comfortable, happy, with a small group of people, a particular community, why? Do answer. You have to answer this question. Why do I feel comfortable with a particular group of people?

Q: Because I am frightened of the others.

K: I am not only frightened of the others, right?

Q: No.

K: No, then what? I don't like the others. I don't like their looks, their smell, their clothes, their beards, their hair. I like this group. And that group gives me a great sense of warmth.

Q: We want extension.

K: Wait, expansion of what?

Q: Extension.

K: Expanding what? What am I expanding? My loneliness, my fear, my misery, my sense of lack of certainty? When I am clear, certain, you know, vital, I don't want to identify myself with anything. I don't know why we waste time on this thing. We ought to go much deeper than this, sirs, come on. Which is, any form of identification with a group, however comfortable it is, however satisfying it is, this identification implies not only psychological well-being, the psychological well-being in division, and therefore destruction, but also it brings about a conformity of the group as against another group. Right? So our question is: why do we conform, and do I know I am conforming? Please, do stick to those two things. Do you know you are conforming? When you call yourself an Englishman, or a Frenchman, aren't you conforming? When you call yourself a Catholic, Protestant, communist, the Panthers, and all the rest, aren't you conforming? And when you are aware that you are conforming, peripherally or superficially, the next question is, why. If you say, it is to be safe, secure, then you see the dangers of that security. There is no security when you identify yourself with a group, however satisfying it is. So isn't that clear? We can push it aside, finish with it. Any form of identification with a group, however satisfactory, however comforting, does not bring security. So I will never look for security in a group. Can't we finish with that?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait. Yes, but do it!

Q: It doesn't always seem that we are identifying when we are doing it, but we are working together and then it slips over somehow.

K: Yes. The question is, we may think we are working together, not necessarily identifying together. Is co-operation imitation, conformity? Please go into it a little bit. Am I co-operating with you about something? Right? About a principle, about Utopia, about a series of ideations, or co-operating with you because you bring enlightenment, or bring an Utopian world, or have I the spirit of co-operation in which there is no conformity? I don't know if you see. If I am co-operating about something because I hope through that co-operation I will gain a personal profit, then it's not co-operation. But if I have the spirit of co-operation, the feeling...

Q: I go beyond the me.

K: Madam, that's just it. Do I have the spirit of co-operation, the feeling? So let's come back. I must come back to this thing, which is, do I know, does one know that one is conforming, why one is conforming, and what is the necessity to conform?

Q: It presents an image of sameness.

K: Yes, sir. No, look at it, sir. Are you conforming? I am sorry to push it. Are you conforming? When you take drugs - not you, I am talking generally, it's not my concern whether you take it or not, sir - isn't that conformity? When you take drinks, smoke, isn't that conformity?

Q: It seems that you can't talk about an action, saying it is a conforming action, you have to talk about the mind.

K: Sir, we did just now. Why does the mind conform?

Q: But you can say the mind conforms, but can you say that if such and such an action is conforming, that it is done by a conforming mind?

K: Do you know - please listen, sir - do you know that you are conforming through the action of conformity? You understand my question? I am doing something, and the doing of it reveals that I am conforming. Or, without action I know one is conforming. You see the difference? Do you see the difference, sirs? Do I know that I am hungry because you tell me? Or I know for myself I am hungry? Do I know I am conforming because I see the action of conformity going on? You follow? I wonder if I am making myself clear? Do please go with me.

Do I know - please, sir, just listen to my question - do I know through action that I am conforming, or do I know I am conforming not through action? The two different kinds of knowledge, the discovery that I am conforming through action leads to the correction of action. Right? You are following this, sir? I discover I am conforming through a particular act, and then I say to myself, to change, to bring about a change in conformity I must act differently. So I lay emphasis on action, not on the movement that brings about action. This is clear. Please, sirs, come on. Have you travelled too far this morning, or tired out?

So I want to be clear before I talk about action, of the nature of conformity. So I have to find out whether I am conforming. Wait. The mind that wants to conform, the principle of conformity. You understand?

Q: Sir, I don't understand how you can observe the nature of conformity without the action to reveal it.

K: That's just it. I cannot find out the nature of conformity without being aware of the action that is the result of conformity.

Right?

Q: Conformity is connected with an objective.

K: Sir, how do you know that you are conforming? Please, how do you know that you are conforming?

Q: Through observation.

K: Through observation. Do be clear. Wait a minute. Through observation, you say. The observer watching action says, I am conforming. Right? And is not the very observer the result of centuries of conformity?

Q: Yes.

K: Therefore he is watching not action, but watching himself conforming.

Q: Yes.

K: No, no. He is the source of all conformity, not what he is doing. What he is doing is the result of the flow of conformity, as the observer, as the censor, as the Englishman, as the traditionalist, and so on and so on. So when I am asking, when we are asking the question, who is conforming, what is conformity, and why does one conform, I think the answer lies to all that in the observer. The observer is the censor. Right? Now the censor becomes aware of himself condemning or justifying. And that condemnation, or justification, is the result of his conformity to the pattern of a particular culture in which he has been brought up. There is the whole thing. I don't know if you get it.

Q: Surely this has only come about through being out of the problem, but somehow that stopping, in that stopping there is the seeing of it.

K: Sir, I don't know what you quite mean, stopping. I think I get what you mean. But does that happen? Look, sir.

Q: Well it's the only time when one gets a glimpse of it.

K: Yes. You are asking me to be aware of the observer. Right? The observer is the very essence of conformity. Please, we have said a truth, once seen you will see the whole thing. The observer is the essence of imitation, conformity. Now can the observer become aware of himself as the principle of conformity? Now wait, go slow, go slow. How is this to happen? You are asking me to be aware - listen to this, sir - aware of the observer. Which is, can the observer become aware of himself as the source of conformity? You have challenged me. Right? Now what is the response of the observer to the challenge? I don't know if you follow what I am saying.

Q: Well...

K: No, please don't answer it yet, look at it, take a little time. You have challenged me, right sir? Which is, you said, look, can the observer who is the essence of conformity, can that observer become aware of itself? That's your challenge. And what is the response of the observer - listen carefully - what is the response of the observer?

Q: It goes back into memory to try and find out.

K: Which means what? His response will invariably be conforming. No, no, you are missing it, see the implications of it. You have challenged me, and the observer responds according to his conditioning which is conformity, therefore his answer is a conforming answer. Right?

Q: But...

K: Wait, sir, wait, sir, look, first look. Any response from the observer is the response of conformity - full stop!

Q: But has the observer actually an instrument that isn't contaminated?

K: We are going to find out, we are going to find out. We are so near it, let's push. You'll find out.

Q: Isn't what you are saying that the process of conformity can only be discovered in action.

K: Ah, no. No. I am saying this, sir - look sir, we have come to the point when we say the observer is the very essence of conformity. How does the observer know he is the very essence of conformity? How is he aware of himself as the instrument of conformity, as the result of conformity? Wait, no, no. Whatever his answer is conforming.

Q: Yes.

K: Therefore what have I found? What have I found?

Q: There is also something beyond conformity.

K: No, what have I found - listen sir - what has the observer found when he responds to a challenge, as you put the challenge, and finds whatever his response, whatever, at whatever depth, at whatever peripheral response, is the response born of conformity. Right? He has discovered that. What does that mean?

Q: He is the total. He is not different, he is the total.

Q: He has discovered himself.

K: No, no, please let us stick - don't let us use the word 'total'.

Q: I think that the observer can only be a non-conformist when he has no answer.

K: You see, no sir. The observer is the very essence of conformity. Right? Do you see that, not because I say so.

Q: But I see that if he has an answer he must be a conformist.

K: No. Yes, sir. So what has happened to the observer?

Q: Separated.

K: No, madam.

Q: It seems...

K: Do pay a little attention, don't find an answer. I have found something. I have found through that challenge that whatever the response the observer gives is the response from the source of all conformity. And he realizes this. What happens then?

Q: He keeps quiet.

K: No. Sir, you are just playing with words. Do find out what happens to you when you have discovered for yourself the truth - the truth, not an idea - the truth that any form of response on the part of the observer, and all our responses are on the part of the observer, then what do you find?

Q: Sir, is not our realization of that itself the result of the observer in the sense that the observer separates himself.

K: That's what you are saying. Therefore you are still separating the observer from the observed. Which means another reaction of the observer which is born of another conformity. So whatever his reactions are he is always conforming. I have discovered that. Wait. Have you discovered it? He may separate himself into a hundred parts, and say, I remain. And this division indicates that any reaction on the part of the observer comes out of this enormous weight of conformity. I have discovered the truth of that. The observer has discovered it. He hasn't separated himself as a further observer, he has seen this. Now what has happened? What takes place when the observer sees this?

Q: How can the observer discover this?

Q: Does it break the conformity?

K: You are going to find out. Doesn't it break conformity. And your question is?

Q: How can the observer see that?

K: Wait sir, I'll answer that question, you'll see it in a minute.

Q: Sir, little things keep coming in all the time, it doesn't stop.

K: Madam, that gentleman is asking a question. He says, how can the observer become aware of himself without the reaction of the observer. Right? Have you understood my question, sir? Does the observer become aware of himself through the part or the division of himself? You understand my question, sir? You haven't understood? How does the observer become aware of himself? Through the part, the fragment, which he has brought about. Look, sir, the observer has brought about his conditioning through nationality. Right? Does the observer become aware of himself as the source of conformity through this division? So he does not become aware through any division. Let's be clear. Then how does he become aware? If you reject, see the falseness that the observer becomes aware of himself through a fragment of which he is, then how will he be aware of himself? Go on sirs.

Q: If there is no fragment by which he can become aware of himself, then he is not.

K: No, you see. If the observer does not become aware through any fragment of which he is part, then how will he know that he is the source of all conformity?

Q: The question is, then the fragment is aware of the total. One fragment.

K: Right, put it that way sir. Put your question that way, let's put it: can one fragment be aware of the total. Obviously not.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, speak in French.

Q: (In French)

K: No, madam, listen. I understand that. But we are not for the moment discussing that, madam.

Let's begin, sir, in a totally different way, shall we. Are you aware of the division in yourself? Right? Division when you call yourself a communist, a socialist, a Catholic. That very naming brings about a division, doesn't it? Are you aware of that? Not in any complex way, just be aware of it. Are you aware when you look at a plant or a tree, or the sky, or a cloud, that you are looking with a division, with eyes that are always looking at everything through division?

Q: It does not touch an awareness immediately, but one is out of that division.

K: No, sir. I want to begin right at the other end, so begin anew. Now do you look at anything with eyes that are not touched by division? Do you look at your wife or husband without the image and therefore look without division?

Q: The only way to do that is by the senses. When I look at you, you are what you are, I hear you but there is no division, there is only you and what looks at you.

K: So here it is fairly simple, isn't it. Because I don't interfere with your life, I don't tell you what to do, I don't nag you, I don't bully you, I don't patronize you, flatter you, insult you, so it is fairly easy for you to look at me. Me sitting on the platform, you sitting there you can observe what is being said. But if I what I say touches you, hurts you, flatters you, then you look at me with different eyes, don't you.

Q: Only by my intellect.

K: Only intellect is good enough. You look at it with division. Right? Now, can you look at me who insults you without this division, without the image that you have created through my words of insult?

Q: Only if I can see you, the insult and the image at once.

K: Which means, no sir, you haven't asked. Look, sir, I have insulted you, or flattered you, and you have built an image about me. Next time we meet you look at me through that image. That's simple. Now can you look at me though I have insulted you, flattered you, without the image?

Q: Only again by the senses.

K: No, no, sir.

Q: It is complicated.

K: No, madam, you make it all so complicated. Keep it very simple. I have insulted you, or flattered you. You have an image of me. And the next time we meet, through that image you are looking at me. That's a simple fact.

Q: I don't know.

K: Wait madam, wait. That's a simple fact. If I am married - I am not, thank god - and if I am married and my wife bullies me and tells me this, dominates me, I have built an image about her, haven't I. And therefore our relationship is based on images. Right? It's simple. Now I want to look at you though you insult me, flatter me, nag me, without building an image. Right? Now is that possible? No?

Q: No.

K: Wait. Then it's finished. If you say it is not possible then there is no further enquiry.

Q: For me, that which comes in the way is my own reaction to what I see, not so much what people say but what happens in me when this is said, and to see that.

K: Obviously, sir. Obviously.

Q: How can you...

K: I am going to show you in a minute, listen sir. You have insulted me, or said, what a marvellous chap you are. And I have built an image on those two. Right? And I am asking myself, can I look at you without any image though you have insulted me? And when I look at you without the image our relationship is entirely different, isn't it. Then it's much more vital, much more close, much more real. So the image is the factor that divides. Right? Now is it possible to be free of the mechanism of building images?

Q: You can look at the whole.

K: No, no, don't answer me please, I am going to tell you in a minute. But I want to find out. I am terribly interested to find out, learn, if I could live a life, a way of life in which there is no formation of images at all. Don't say, no, then you are blocked. If you say, that is impossible, it can't be done, then you have shut the door on it. But I refuse to shut the door on it, I want to find out. I am going to find out. That is, I want to - no - can the mind as it is being insulted and flattered, can that mind at that moment be intensely aware and not create an image? If it is attentive at that moment there is no image forming. Right? You have got it? Which means, at the moment I insult you, or flatter you, watch it. Watch your responses, be aware of your responses. Then you have stopped image building. That's all. It's as simple as that.

Now the question is: I want - the mind wants to find out whether it can look at anything, the tree, the woman, the child, the politician, the priest, the whole world of human beings, without any image, without any formula. Not, 'Oh, have love', that means nothing. You follow? That's another escape, another series of words that have no meaning. But I want to look at the world without any image, is that possible? If I can't then I will be in battle with the world. Right? Me and my group, and you with your group, we and they. So I begin to enquire, test this out, by looking at a tree. Right? Non-subjective thing. Let's look at a tree. Can I look at a tree without the word, without the image which I have about trees? Have you ever tried it?

Q: It is not at the beginning a unitary process, but afterwards it is.

K: No, sir. This unitary process may come much later, but first I must test it out, find out. I can't imagine it is a unitary process, I want to find out, I want to learn, I want to test it. I don't want to deceive myself.

Q: If I look at you now I do not have any image, I do not have your name, I do not know you, though I just hear your voice. If I wish I can think about you.

K: Right, sir. But can you do the same with your intimate friends?

Q: Why not?

K: Not, 'why not'. Do you do it?

Q: I would answer, yes.

K: Then what happens?

Q: You are free.

K: No, sir.

Q: Because if...

K: You can, sir, if the fight doesn't injure you financially, no sir.

When your wife - not your wife - my wife runs away, looks at somebody else, when the wife doesn't get what she wants - oh, no, don't go into all this.

Look, sir, we will come back to this question of conformity but we are trying to find out whether the mind can look without division. And it's one of the most extraordinary things to find out, to learn, because then conflict comes to an end. And conflict can only come to an end when there is no machinery the forms that image, and the machinery is the observer. Right? The observer who calls himself black, white, purple, Catholic, communist, all that, or doesn't call himself anything but he is. He becomes all-important.

So this mind has discovered, has learnt that every form of division inwardly as well as outwardly must spring from the observer who must divide life. Right? Life with all its conflicts and jealousies and anxieties and all the rest of it. So in asking myself the question, at what level am I conforming, and why am I conforming, this mind has found it conforms where there is the demand for security, it conforms where one seeks certainty, either in a family, in a group, or in an idea, or in the ideation of a god, or non-god, all springing from this source as the 'me' and the 'not me'. So can this mind live in this world without any of this division? Don't say, it must be peaceful, it must be silent, it must be in a state of tremendous joy, ecstasy, love, that's all nonsense. If you haven't found that you can't talk about it at all. Because that way lies deception.

So from that one discovers the observer becomes aware of himself not through the fragment of any action but the observer within himself lights the fire that dissolves the observer. Right?

Q: Is this a gradual process, like you can spend a life time it seems?

K: No, no. Don't spend time, a life time over it; you can see it instantly and it is finished. It is like seeing instantly the precipice, you don't take a life time to look at the precipice.

Q: Isn't there a lot of chaos.

K: There is a lot of chaos, not only outside but inside, a lot of confusion, disorder, vomit of other people.

Q: It seems that you should be - not, should be - but be doing something, going to be propagating...

K: Sir, what are we doing now? What are we doing now? You are listening. I am doing all the work - the speaker is doing all the work and you are listening. If you go away with having learnt the lesson, then you will propagate, do propaganda. When you do propaganda it becomes a lie because it is not yours. If it is yours, you are building, you are creating, you are living, you are vital.

Q: But doing this you want to be in contact.

K: You are in contact, sir. You see you are in the greatest contact with the world, not through words, not through magazines, books and lectures and philosophies and beliefs, you are directly in contact with this terrible world.

K: I think that's enough, isn't it, for this morning.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 10TH SEPTEMBER 1970

K: What shall we talk over together? I am sorry it is such a rough morning.

Q: Sir, could you talk about the relationship between pleasure and pain? We regard them, I think, as opposites, you say they are the same.

K: I didn't say there were the same. Do you want to discuss the relationship between pleasure and fear?

Q: Excuse me, may I suggest something else? I have been told that you are going to speak next in Perugia to a group of writers and speakers who are very much concerned about the killing of this earth. I wonder if we can broach that subject.

K: I am going to speak in Perugia in Italy to a lot of professors and scientists and philosophers and all the long haired ones. And?

Q: I wondered if these people and others are concerned about the gradual killing of the earth.

K: Oh, I see the gradual pollution and the destruction of the earth and so on. Do you want to discuss that? Or shall we discuss, talk over together what is sanity? Shall we? I am not saying what you ask is insane, or anything of that kind, but it might be rather worthwhile to talk over together what is sanity. Shall we?

Audience: Yes.

K: Good! I wonder what is sanity. To be sane, healthy, to think clearly. What do you mean by that word, what does that word mean to you? Please go on sirs, I can go into this, I don't know if you... Would not any exaggeration of fragmentation of the mind be insanity? The exaggeration giving importance to, or putting all your thought and energy in one fragment, one fragment among many others fragments which make up the human mind, wouldn't you call that insanity, not balanced? And if you think that, are we sane in relation to that particular thing which we just now talked about, which is giving emphasis, putting all our energy in one direction, like sex, like earning money, like enjoyment, pleasure, or the pursuit of a fragment which is called god. Would you call any of that imbalance? What do you say, sirs?

Q: I think if it is putting so much tension in one fragment to the exclusion of other fragments...

K: Therefore?

Q: You become - the other parts will be unbalanced.

K: So you will consider if you give emphasis to one and not consider the rest it is obviously not a harmonious living, and therefore not sane. Now do we do this in our daily life? When one worships sex as the supreme thing in life, or taking drugs and thinking that is going to bring enlightenment, final illumination, or concentrate on earning a livelihood and the money, the prestige, the position - all those indicate a mind that is not harmonious, doesn't it. Or a mind that is concerned entirely with knowledge, or technique. What do you say? Are we in that sense balanced human beings? Obviously not. Should we be behind the bars, and an unbalanced humanity, as it is, must produce all kinds of catastrophes - wars, pollution, destruction of the earth, bringing about constant misery. If that is so, what then shall one do? I realize I am giving all my energies, thought and therefore action to - what, what would you suggest?

Q: To thought.

K: To thought. Right. That I worship thought as the supreme instrument of all culture, of all enlightenment, of all intelligence, of all action. Am I, or is one aware that one gives thought an extraordinarily important position, state, in life? And if one does realize that, what shall one do? Sir, please, this is supposed to be a discussion, not a talk by me, by the speaker. So what shall I do when I realize that my whole life is based on thought? Do I realize thought is only a fragment, a part of a whole? A segment among many other parts, do I realize that? Or do I think thought is the whole thing? What do you say, sir, please?

Q: I think one should differentiate between thought, a principle, and thought being my thought, an individual's thought.

K: He says thought as a principle and individual thought. Is there a difference between thought as a principle and individual thought? I am asking, I am not saying there is not, I am just asking if there is a difference between individual thinking and collective thinking, thinking which man has gathered through millennia, through centuries upon centuries as knowledge - scientific, technological, knowledge of nature and so on and on. Is there a difference between a particular thinking, or the peculiarity of a thinking of an individual and the collective accumulation of thought of mankind? What do you say, sirs?

Q: I don't think so. The individual is influenced by the collective.

K: Sir, you say thought is conditioned by the culture, the society, the environment in which he lives, therefore there is no division between the individual thinking and the collective thinking.

Q: The collective thinking seems to be made up of personal experiences.

K: That's what we are saying, sir.

Q: And it seems to be in touch with your individual thought, your own thought, seems to be necessary if you are going to have any self-awareness.

K: Therefore you are separating individual thought from the collective thought. You think that there is individual thinking.

Q: I am not certain.

K: I am just asking. You say that there is an individual thinking apart from the collective. Is that so?

Q: I think that's why Jung...

K: Wait, sir, we'll come to that. Don't take a particular example. Is your thinking as an individual different from the collective thinking, or my thinking? Your thinking, is it different from my thinking as an individual, or the collective thinking? Or is all thinking more or less the same?

Q: The thought process, the source of all thought is the same, but the particular thought is different.

K: The source of thought is all the same, the questioner says, though there may be modifications or slight changes in the thought in an individual. Yes, sir?

Q: If the individual reacts to society, the individual's thoughts must be exactly the society's thoughts.

K: Obviously, sir. I don't quite see the difference, the basic difference between the collective thought and the individual thought, because the individual is part of the collective.

Q: He is at the same time greater, it seems to me. May be we misunderstand each other's words, but it seems to me that the reason for all these wars, and everything, is all the bad feelings that people have about themselves. It seems to be that they are thinking for themselves, and they find that what they think is relatively different from the collectivity thinks.

K: Look, sir, is your thinking different from mine coming from India, or from Russia, is your thinking different?

Q: The things that we think about.

K: Not the things, not what you think about, your thinking process.

Q: Oh, no, that's the same.

K: So the thinking process of human beings is more or less the same. Conditioned according to their background as Catholic, Protestant, Hindu and so on and so on. Right? And there may be modifications of that thought. I might as a German think differently from you who are American because I have been conditioned by the German culture in which I live. But the process of thinking is the same, isn't it, thought I call myself a German, and you an American, the process, the mechanism - the mechanism is memory, knowledge, experience. Otherwise if you had no knowledge, no experience, no knowledge, you couldn't speak. Right. So thought is the response of memory. That memory may be conditioned, it may be a little more free, a little less dogmatic, a little less assertive, a little less aggressive, but it is still the response of memory. And is your memory so very different from mine, as the German, as a human being? Please, sir, this is quite important, go slowly in this.

Q: It depends whether it is from the conscious or the unconscious. The problem arises when different people have a different awareness.

K: We will go into that madam, I am not at all sure - I am not saying that what you say is not true - but I am not at all sure that our thinking is not more or less the same. You, conditioned by the culture in which you live, and another conditioned by his particular culture, whether that culture is superficial or deep, whether it is conscious or unconscious, it is still part of the mechanism, or the process of thinking. Isn't it? We are learning. Please, wait a minute, sir. We are learning, aren't we? I am not being assertive, dogmatic. We are trying to learn about this whole process of thinking. Right? Whether it belongs to you as an individual whose thinking is completely different from another - you follow - we are going to learn about it. Therefore don't be assertive, dogmatic, let's enquire into it. Right, sir? There is somebody else, sir, before you.

Q: We have been discussing the question of the environment conditioning the thoughts of people, and groups of people, but some people follow different lines and gain inspiration from those lines, there are great musicians. Music, for example, of the great composers is not a conditioning of the environment because it is new, though it comes from somewhere.

K: Sir, look, don't take examples of the musicians or the artists or scientists, or a religious person; but we are asking ourselves whether the process of thinking is so very different from yours and mine - thinking. The machinery of thinking, sir, not what you think about, not how you express that thinking in music, in painting, in this or that.

Q: May we say that perhaps if the process is the same, there is difference in emphasis in different capacities?

K: But thinking is the same mechanism.

Q: Yes, indeed.

K: That's all that we want to establish first.

Q: Maybe the thinking, thought/energy, the original thought/energy appears to be different in different individuals if they have different conditionings, cultural conditioning. But some people may be different from his culture, his society, and even different from his own family. They all have their own conditioning.

K: Sir, please, do let's stick. Look, sir, we are talking about the machinery of thinking, not how you or I express that thought.

Q: No, what I am saying is that thought/energy, which is all the same.

K: Stay there. Stay there a minute. The energy of all thinking is the same. That's what you say. Which may express itself according to the capacity, to the gift, to a particular tendency and so on, that might vary, but the machinery of thinking is the same. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Quite right, sir. That's right. You are saying, like the computer. We have got computer-like minds. And some are well informed, more alive, but it is a computer mind that is functioning all the time.

Q: Yes, our brains are all made of the same kind of cells.

K: Stick to that a little bit. Therefore what does that mean? Is there then, the next question, freedom in thinking? Freedom.

Q: No, sir. It is playing the same record all the time.

K: It is playing the same old record all the time with varying themes, depending on the circumstances. Therefore can thought, however capable, however efficient, however knowledgeable, can that bring freedom to man? Freedom in the sense, from fear, from anxiety, from guilt, from sorrow. You understand my question? Is sorrow different from my sorrow? Is your sense of guilt different from another? Is your sense of despair different from another, or your loneliness, your misery, your confusion? Please.

Q: Are you saying, sir, that ideally it is the same?

K: No, I am not saying that. Look, sir, the first part of the question was, can thought, which is the repetition of the computer knowledge, can that thought free the mind from all the reactions of fear and so on.

Q: It never has in the past.

K: It never has - until now?

Q: It never will.

K: It never will. How do you know?

Q: It is obvious, sir.

K: Why do you say that, sir? No, please sir, I am not saying you are right or wrong, I want to learn. Why do you say thought can never free jealousy, or anxiety?

Q: I disagree. I have found that if you understand a person's motive for doing something you can be much more tolerant, understanding, less jealous by using your understanding.

K: When you use the word 'understanding', what does that word mean?

Q: Well it has to start with thought. I have to pay attention to the fact that I am jealous. I have to think about the situation first. Then in that process you find you change your living, your thinking, your attitude, as I become clear.

K: Through thought - I'll have to repeat it.

Q: I must use my mind.

K: Wait a minute, madam, I'll have to repeat your question, statement, otherwise they can't hear it. If I mis-state it, please correct it. The questioner says, I must use my mind. I see, I am aware, or another is aware - I am aware of another's jealousy or my own jealousy. By understanding it, which is exploring, enquiring, I become tolerant, and therefore understand more of jealousy not only in myself or understand the jealousy of another.

Q: The cause of it.

K: The cause, the reactions, all the implications of jealousy. That is, you are saying, through thought, the exercise of thought, there is an understanding of jealousy and therefore freedom from it. Right? Is that so? I am not saying it is not.

Q: It seems that one comes to a less intense form of jealousy.

K: Sir, let's enquire into this particular thing. We say, by exercising thought we learn more about jealousy and are therefore free from it. To put it quickly.

Q: No, I would say that thought is just exercising thought.

K: No, sir. Don't you see? What caused jealousy?

Q: Thought.

K: Thought.

Q: No, I disagree again. Very profoundly I disagree. Jealousy is an emotion, it is a sense of loss.

K: Which is part of thought.

Q: You are making it a childish, an infantile thing. It is not. If you understand what you have got, and if it even matters that you have got it, you mature to the point that you understand it doesn't matter.

K: I understand that, madam, just go slowly. Don't say, I profoundly disagree with you, we are trying to learn about things. Thought, if you had feeling without thought would there be jealousy? Just feeling. Would you call it jealousy?

Q: I think I would feel jealous.

Q: People are usually jealous when they are unconscious. Not when they are conscious.

K: No. You are now moving away - conscious, now we will have to go into that. Conscious and unconscious jealousy. I become conscious of a feeling which I call jealousy, a feeling. The feeling of jealousy, the word of jealousy is remembered from the past jealousies. Which is, the response of memory to a particular feeling which has been recognized as jealousy. Right? Whether that response is the outcome of conscious memory or unconscious memory we will leave that for the moment. So the feeling is recognized as jealousy through a word which thought has given meaning to.

Q: The recognition is thought, the feeling comes first.

K: I am saying that. I have a feeling, then I recognize it as jealousy. How do I recognize it as jealousy? Because I have had it before. I associate the present feeling with a past feeling which I have called jealousy. So it is still within the field of thought.

Q: Thought must come from the experience.

K: Wait, I am saying that. Wait, madam. Listen, otherwise I couldn't recognize it as jealousy. I am angry, and I say, 'By Jove, I am angry, why?' Because I have had that feeling before, and recognition implies a previous knowledge, which is thought, otherwise I wouldn't know that was anger.

Q: A baby can become angry, so can an animal.

K: But isn't there an operation of thought there also going on, in a dog?

Q: It doesn't know it.

K: Therefore let us babies and dogs alone. Let's talk about ourselves.

Q: We are babies. We are, I think you are very infantile.

K: I quite agree, I quite agree. But I want to find out if being infantile, whether that childishness is the result of thought.

Q: I think it is the result of lack of thought.

K: You say it is the result of the lack of thought. Wait. Madam, go slowly. Lack of thought. Therefore what is maturity?

Q: Ability to face truth in your conscious mind.

K: Wait. Ability to face truth consciously, which means able to face facts, able to face 'what is'. And not go round it, not escape from it, not cover it up, not condemn it, not judge it, not give various evaluations about it. To face 'what is'. Right? What prevents it?

Q: Fear.

K: What is fear? Go slowly. Without recognition, a new feeling, has it any significance? I am full of antagonism today, I feel this. Before, without giving a name to it, which is the response of memory, which is the response of recognition, this feeling has no meaning at all. I just feel something. It is only when I recognize it by using a word as aggression that it has significance; and the recognition is a process of thinking. Right? So without thinking feeling has very little meaning. Go slowly.

Q: Can I say something? You started by talking about sanity. I work in a mental hospital. The psychotics do not seem to have the same thing, it is very hard to communicate with them.

K: Why?

Q: They do not have your sense of recognition, some are terrible.

K: Yes, madam, I understand all this, I know what it means - I am not psychotic, but I can see, but please stick to one thing at a time. And we will explore all this together.

I am saying to myself, asking myself, has feeling any significance apart from thought?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? Before you say, yes, let's find out. I feel a great sense of tenderness, a sense of love. Right? Can thought be related to it? Go slow, go slow. Then it becomes pleasure, doesn't it, then it must be translated in terms of recognition. Oh, my lord! Is love a product of thought?

Q: I don't think one can answer that.

K: Wait, we are going to answer it.

Q: People only seem to be able to achieve love, go beyond it, by using their minds to understand themselves.

K: Now, is that so? By understanding themselves they go beyond the travail of love? That is, love is not pleasure. Love is not desire.

Q: All of it, and pain.

K: Oh, so love is pleasure, desire, pain, sorrow, jealousy, hatred. Where do you draw the line?

Q: I think love goes beyond emotion. We get confused with our emotions and call them love and anti-love. But we have to use our minds.

K: We are using our minds now, as we are discussing. What is the thing we are trying to discuss? We are trying to find out...

Q: We are saying, can thought dissolve the problem of fear and pain.

K: Yes, can thought solve the problem of fear? And is not fear the creation of thought? No?

Q: A child on a dark night, it isn't thought, it's the feelings he has got.

Q: Unless thought sustains feeling, feeling evaporates very quickly, but thought gives it an object, gives it a drive in time, it sustains it.

K: Now sir, let's begin: you know what fear is, don't you. We all do: going in the dark, afraid of somebody and so on, death, everything. Right? We all know this fear. How does it come? How does it come about? I go out in the dark and suddenly I am afraid.

Q: Isn't it a physical reaction?

K: Which is, a physical reaction. Suddenly finding myself in the dark in a strange place, and the feeling of uncertainty, insecurity. The feeling of insecurity.

Q: That's fear by conditioning.

K: Wait, look at it slowly, sir. Please go into it slowly. I am not dogmatic, so please don't, we are trying to learn about it. There is sudden feeling of insecurity. What is that feeling of insecurity? What has brought about that feeling of insecurity?

Q: It is the thought that something might happen to one.

K: Isn't it? Something might happen to one, sudden danger, feeling of insecurity, feeling of being lost, where you might get attacked and all the rest of it. All that is the result of thinking, isn't it. It may be instant thinking. If there was no thought I wouldn't be afraid of the dark, I would walk through it. It's only the swiftness, the rapidity of thinking has brought this feeling of uncertainty. Otherwise I wouldn't be afraid of the dark.

Q: There must be a first time.

K: Wait, I am talking of a first, second, third, tenth time.

Q: I am sorry, I am stuck. The fact that the first time I was afraid I didn't know what it was.

K: Therefore what happens the second time?

Q: I wasn't thinking about being afraid.

K: No. But I said it was thought that was so rapid of which you are unaware. The next time it happens you say, well, I have had this fear, I won't be afraid so much; and the third, tenth time you have got used to it.

Q: But it takes my mind to get over it.

K: Wait. I am not talking how to get over it. The question of getting over it is quite a different matter. We are pointing out that thought has bred fear. Whether that thought is so rapid, of which one is not aware, or thought, not so rapidly thinks what is going to happen tomorrow: I might die, I have done something in the past, all that is a process of thinking whether it is instantaneous or gradual. It must be. Therefore fear is the product of thought. How to get over it is another matter. Like pleasure is the product of thought. No? I had the most extraordinary enjoyable evening yesterday in the wood, walking, looking at the sunlight, it was marvellous. And that was a delight which I would like to have repeated tomorrow. And this demand for repetition is the machinery of thought, the process of thinking. It's so simple. It's obvious.

Q: Fear is not thinking.

K: The recognition of that experience, we have said that. I looked at that sunset, it was splendid. Finished. But thought comes in and says, 'I wish I could have it, it was so enjoyable, it was a marvellous feeling, I'd like to have it again.' Stick to that simple example and you will see how this operates. Fear, I realize, is the product of thought. And pleasure is the product or the continuity of thought. After all, all sexual pleasure is thinking about it, chewing over it, going into it, and saying, how marvellous, and on and on and on. And fear is saying, my god, what is going to happen tomorrow, I might die. No?

Q: If I do not recognize my feeling as jealousy, does not there remain sorrow?

K: If I do not recognize my feeling - what is the next thing?

Q: Jealousy or fear and so on, does there not remain sorrow?

K: Ah! If I do not recognize the fear or pleasure, or guilt and so on, it has no profound affect?

Q: Sorrow remains.

K: Ah, just sorrow remains. Is that it? Does it? Sir, please. You see, when we use this word 'sorrow', what do you mean by that word? What is the content of that word? There is a tremendous quantity of self-pity in sorrow. No?

Q: Is not the question when you have the feeling like jealousy, if you don't recognize it, is that feeling painful?

K: Is that feeling not painful. Have you ever tried this? You have a feeling, can you remain - can the mind remain with that feeling without naming it? Without recognition? Then what is it? Is it pain? Is it sorrow? Look, the moment you say, it is pain, there is the process of thinking involved in it.

Q: Is not sorrow the basis of all our life?

K: Is not the sorrow the basis of our life. Is it? That's why, sir, when you use the word 'sorrow' we must go into it. Sorrow. What does that mean? Sadness, grief, the feeling of insoluble problems of life, feeling the death of someone, feeling loneliness, feeling deeply frustrated, not being able to do anything in this world and so on and on and on. Right? All that is implied in the word 'sorrow', isn't it? Right, madam? Now who is feeling all this? Feeling the loneliness, the despair, the utter misery, confusion, aggression, violence, who is it that is feeling all these things?

Q: There is sorrow and fear.

K: Who is feeling it? Answer that one question: who feels all this?

Q: I think we are, as it were, in a big psychic self.

K: Which is that? You give it a big psychic self.

Q: Most of us have two frames of being, one is our thinking self and one is unthinking.

K: All right. You think there are two superficial us - different. One is superficial and the other more profound. How does this division arise? You must answer all these questions.

Q: There is a deep self.

K: What is this deep self? And what is the superficial self?

Q: There is the conscious and the unconscious.

K: Which is what? Please, madam, go into it. Conscious and unconscious. Why do you divide it?

Q: Because only a little bit is lit, what is lit by awareness is our conscious self, and what is unlit is our unconscious self.

K: Therefore you say there is no division really.

Q: No, not really.

K: Wait, wait. Let's stick to the reality, not the superficiality of the division. So there is only a state of mind in which there is division, as the thinker and the thought. Right? As the experiencer and the experienced, as the observer and the observed. Right? The observed we say is the superficial, the observer is profound. Right?

Q: Maybe.

K: No, no, don't say, maybe. Examine it, find out, we want to learn.

Q: I think the problem is lack of awareness.

K: No, no, wait. You see awareness - who is it that is aware? Don't throw up your hands. We must learn about it, we must find out. So we realize there is a division in life, in me, in you. The you and me are many fragments. Oneself is made up of many fragments. One of the fragments is the observer and the rest of the fragments are the observed. The observer becomes conscious of the fragments, but the observer is also one of the fragments; he is not different from the rest of the fragments. Right? Therefore you have to find out what is the observer, the experiencer, the thinker. What is he made up of, how does it come about this division between the observer and the observed? The observer, we say, is one of the fragments, why has he separated himself, assumed as the analyzer, the one who is aware, the one who can control, change, suppress and all the rest of it. The observer is the censor. Right? The censor is the result of the social conditionings. Right? Social, environmental, religious, cultural conditioning. Which is, the division between culture has said, you are different from the thing you are observing. You are god and that is matter, you are the higher self and that is the lower self, you are the enlightened and that is unenlightened. Now what has given him this authority to call himself enlightened? Because he has become the censor? Right? And the censor says, this is right, this is wrong, this is good, this is bad, I must do this, I must not do that, which is, the result of his conditioning. The conditioning of the society, of the culture, of the religion, of the family, of all the race, and so on.

So the observer is the censor, conditioned according to his environment. And he has assumed the authority of the analyzer. Right? And the rest of the fragments are also assuming their authority; each fragment has its own authority, and so there is battle. Right? And so there is conflict between the observer and the observed. So to be free of this conflict one has to find out if you can look without the eyes of the censor. That is to be aware. Aware - to be aware that the eyes of the censor are the result of his conditioning. And can those eyes look with freedom, look innocently, freely? Otherwise this conflict will exist, and therefore neuroticism and all the rest of it follow from this conflict. So you have to solve this question, learn about this, whether the mind can look without any conditioning. Which means without the censor, without the observer. Because the observer is the source of all conformity. And when you are conforming there must be contradiction, and therefore conflict, which are all the result of thinking.

So the thinker is not separate from thought. So the observer is not separate from the observed. And when this is an actual reality, fact, truth, 'what is', then conflict comes to an end. I won't go into all that.

Q: Sir, the concept you talked about, if you observe it and it was so divine, then at the moment when you are not doing it, you are still observing, then...

K: It comes back.

Q: Yes.

K: Which means what? Do listen to this, sir, this is quite extraordinary if you go into it. You saw that sunset yesterday. It was a great delight. It has left a memory.

Q: You see it.

K: It has left a memory, obviously, otherwise you couldn't see that sunset. It has left a memory, left a mark, and the response through thought, is, 'I wish I could have more of it'.

Q: No, you don't say that, but you can see it.

K: The seeing of it is the same, sir. So thought breeds fear and pleasure, sustains it, gives it a continuity. This is clear, isn't it? And if I can't have my pleasure I get upset, I get neurotic. And I want to avoid - the observer wants to avoid fear. Right? Wants pleasure and avoid fear. And the observer is the result of all thinking. Obviously. Look at the game he is playing with himself: with one hand he holds, with the other hand he rejects. But he is still the same observer. And if I can't have my pleasure I get angry, I suffer, I go into tantrums, and if I cannot resolve my fear I escape through amusements, through religions, through dogmas, through nationalities, through all kinds of ugly escapes. And that's what we human beings are.

Q: Can there be thought without the observer?

K: Wait, first see what takes place, sir. Then the next inevitable question comes next. See that is the fact, whether it is conscious, or unconscious, this is the whole momentum of our conditioning.

Now the next question is: can the mind be free of all this conditioning, and this conditioning is the observer, and not what he observes. Right? I am conditioned - this mind is conditioning by a culture which has existed for five, three thousand years in India, and when it meets a different culture, the Catholic, it says, my god - you follow. The observer rejects, and therefore conflict. So the inevitable next question is: can the mind, the brain cells themselves, be free of all conditioning as the observer, as an entity that is conforming, as an entity that is conditioned by the environment, culture, family, race - you follow - conditioned. If the mind is not free from conditioning it can never be free of conflict and therefore neuroticism. Therefore we are, unless you are completely free, we are unbalanced people. And out of our unbalance we do all kinds of mischief.

So maturity is not a frame but a freedom: freedom from conditioning. And that freedom is not obviously the result of the observer, which is the very source of all memory, of all thought. So can I look with eyes that have never been touched by the past? And that is sanity. Sorry! Can you look at the cloud, the tree, your wife, your husband, your friend, without an image? To be aware that you have an image is the first thing, isn't it. To be aware that you are looking at life through a formula, through an image, through concepts, which are all distorting factors. So to be aware of it. And to be aware of it without any choice. And as long as the observer is aware of these then there is distortion. Therefore can you look - can the mind observe without the censor? Can you listen without any interpretation, without any comparison, judgement, evaluation, listen, to that breeze, to that wind, without any interference of the past?

Sorry, I have taken the show away!

Q: If I see the tree and am delighted, and thought slipping in says, 'That is an oak tree', it is just words. Can we see without the observer?

K: Yes, sir, that's right. You do it. Look at the tree - haven't you ever done all these things. Look at the tree, a tree without naming it, without the interference of the knowledge about trees, just to look. What takes place when you do so look?

Q: You become the tree.

K: You become the tree. Have you looked at a tree that way and then can you say you are the tree? Don't say this, you have never looked. No, madam, you can never say you are the tree. That is an identification with the tree. You are not the tree, are you. I hope not!

Q: The feeling, profound relationship.

K: Wait, look, madam, profound relationship implies a relationship in which there is no image. Obviously. If you have an image about me and I have an image about you, our relationship is between two images, which is built up by thought. Right? This we call profound relationship. Therefore there must be freedom from the machinery of the image. Therefore can I look at a tree without the image of the tree? Which means, can I look without the observer, without the censor? Then what takes place? You are not the tree. That's a trick of the mind so say, I identify myself with the tree, with you, with god, with this, with that. When there is no movement of identification on the part of the observer, then what takes place? Who creates the space between the tree and you? There is actual space, you understand, there is a distance, it may be a foot, it may be ten feet. The physical distance. We are not talking about the physical distance, but the psychological distance between you and the tree, who has brought this about? The thinking, the observer, the censor. No? Now when that observer, that censor doesn't exist, but only look, what takes place?

Q: The mind becomes very still.

K: The mind becomes very still. Does it? When you observe that tree without the observer, we are asking, what happens.

Q: The distance between the tree and you is not there any more.

K: Are you saying the tree disappears?

Q: No, I am saying the distance between yourself and the tree.

K: That is what? The psychological distance between you and the tree has disappeared. Right? Are you guessing this, or have you actually done this thing? One of the factors of neurosis is obviously resistance, building a wall round oneself. One has built a wall as the observer, and when you look at a tree that wall separates you from the tree, psychologically, not in actual space. Now when there is no psychological space what happens?

Q: Then the tree is part of your being.

K: Oh, no. Your being is the observer. Do listen, sir. I said when you look at a tree, or a human being, without the observer, without that censor, without that thinker who says, that is the tree, that is what I like, or don't like, I wish I had it in my garden - when you look at it without all that, what happens?

Q: There is communion.

K: There is communion between you and the tree.

Q: It doesn't seem like a question that has any answers.

K: You see you are all guessing.

Q: Is it acceptance?

K: Is it acceptance of the tree. It is there, why should I have to accept it?

Q: Yes, but you might not like it, you build your resisting wall.

K: No, madam, I am asking you - we have been through all that - I am asking, what takes place when the observer is not.

Q: There is only the object.

Q: What happens when you do it?

K: When I do it? Why do you want to know? Are you interested? Theoretically?

Q: No, actually.

K: Then you have to do it yourself, haven't you. Therefore what happens to me is totally irrelevant. No?

Q: Then that means that we are all different.

K: You asked a question: what happens to you when you look without the observer. I said what value has it to you? Are you asking it as an example to copy, to verify your own particular experience, and so on. So what is important in this, not what happens to the speaker when he looks at the tree, but what actually takes place when you look.

Q: With respect, there are several answers here, which I suspect came from their personal experience, but you don't accept it.

K: No. I am not sure they are not repeating. Look, madam, what happens when you, when one looks at another, husband, wife, or children, or the politician, without the image, what takes place?

Q: The mind turns on, lights up.

K: I give it up!

Q: When you say what takes place?

K: What happens to you when you have no image, when you look at somebody without an image?

Q: You have a...

K: If you say, I really don't know - right - then we can proceed; but when you say it is this, it is that, I am not sure if it is real.

When you say, really, I have never done it - that means tremendous discipline, not suppression, not all the rest of the nonsense with regard to discipline. This needs tremendous attention - not on the part of the observer. If the observer becomes attentive he is still separate.

So what takes place if you have really gone through this, not according to me, I am not the oracle, you will see it for yourself when the psychological space disappears there is a direct relationship. Isn't there? When you are married and you have a wife or between two people, there are images, each is building an image, and each is looking through those images at each other. Now if you have no image, what happens? Isn't that what is love? Which has nothing whatever to do with pleasure.

Q: When people are married they may carry each other's images.

K: They generally do, sir, they marry each other's images.

Q: Yes, but they may be able to...

K: Sir, you are guessing, this is all guess work please. Look, sir, either we talk very seriously to find out, to learn, not from me, to learn the nature of observing, the nature of looking, the nature of listening, so that when you do look, you look with eyes completely differently. Otherwise we play around with insanity.

And we started by asking what is sanity. There it is! A mind that is conditioned is not sane.

Q: When there is no psychological space between the tree and the observer, the experience must be the same for everyone.

K: Will the experience without the observer, will that experience be all the same or vary according to the individual.

Q: I have a feeling it will be the same.

K: Not, a feeling, you see. You have asked a question, sir, look at it, first look at the question. When you look without the observer, you are asking whether that observation, what takes place, will it vary according to the individual. If there is no observer at all, is there individuality?

Q: I see.

K: Individuality as we know it is fragmentation. Individual means indivisible. But we are divided human beings, broken up, fragmented, therefore we are not individuals.

What time is it, sir. This is the end of the discussion.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 12TH SEPTEMBER 1970

What shall we talk about this morning? A rather wet and sloppy morning.

Q: Sir, could we speak about psychological space?

K: I should have thought one of the most important things to really explore and discover for oneself the possibility of completely unconditioning the mind. I should have thought that would be the most important thing, and may I go into it?

Now before we go into that please, if I may suggest, bear in mind that the words and the descriptions are not the thing, and the described. The words are necessary as a means of communication. And descriptions, explanations are merely an indication of 'what is'. But if one doesn't actually observe and discover for oneself then mere piling up of words has very little meaning. If one is at all serious and apparently you must be serious to have travelled all this distance in a damp climate like this, it's not the South of France, or Italy, or Spain, if you are at all serious this must be one of the most fundamental questions because man, as one observes in different parts of the world with different culture and social morality, is tremendously and very deeply conditioned to think along a certain line, to act, to work, to think. And his whole background is shaped by the past in relation to the present. And he has cultivated a great deal of knowledge, he has had millions of years of experience. And all this has conditioned him - education, culture, social morality, propaganda, religion, which is an extension of propaganda, and his own reactions to all this conditioning, which is also a response to another form of conditioning.

So if we could go into this question this morning by talking over together, not that one, specially the speaker, has any authority to what one should do or not do, but in talking over together a very serious problem like this, one has to apply, one has to be sufficiently attentive to see the whole significance of this conditioning, how it divides people, not only geographically but nationally, religiously, socially, linguistically. And this division is in itself a tremendous barrier, it breeds conflict. And if one is to live completely at peace and creatively - we will go into the words 'peace' and creatively' presently - if one is to live that way one must understand this conditioning. This conditioning which is not only peripheral, superficial, but also very deep, and whether the whole structure of this conditioning can be revealed. And when one has discovered it what is one to do, how is one to go beyond it. So that is the problem.

One sees one is conditioned, superficially, and if one is attentive, enquiring, observing, one also begins to question whether this conditioning is right through one, or merely at a superficial level and a little deeper, that's all. So we have these two questions: first to be aware, know, conscious of our conditioning, whether that conditioning is superficial or profound. If it is profound how are the things that are hidden, the conditioning that is deep, to be revealed? And having observed, how is one to go beyond all this conditioning? Now can we go on from there?

One observes one is conditioned, and if one says, one can never possibly uncondition the mind the problem ends. If you start out with a formula that it can never be unconditioned, then all enquiry ceases. You have already resisted it, you have already answered it, and the problem there ends. Then you can only further decorate the conditioning. But if one went into this fairly deeply, and one becomes aware of this whole business, what is one to do? How would you answer it? If this was a very, very serious challenge and not something that you just brush aside, something that is vital, tremendously important in one's life, how would you answer it? What would be your response? Please do give a little thought to this, find out how one would react to such a challenge. Because one can see what is happening in the world. It is this division, this separative conditioning, divisive, destructive, that is creating such havoc in the world - the Panthers, you know all the rest that is going on, the wars and so on. Now what is one to do?

The first question apparently that would arise, at least for me, is the manner of one's observation. How you have discovered this conditioning. Have you discovered it, found it out for yourself, or somebody told you about it? Please, this is really quite an important question to answer for oneself. If you have been told about it, and then you say, yes, I am conditioned, then you are responding to a particular pattern. You are responding to a suggestion, someone points it out to you, it isn't real, it's only a verbal, intellectual concept which you have accepted, with which you agree, which is totally different from the discovery of it for oneself. Then it becomes tremendously vital and you then have the passion to find the way out of it. I don't know if you see the difference between the two: someone telling you, and discovering it for yourself, are two entirely different things. So which is it? Is one aware that one is conditioned because you have enquired, searched, asked, looked into. Then if you have, how have you discovered it? Who has discovered it? Please, who has discovered it? The observer? The examiner, the analyzer, who observing, examining, analyzing the whole mess and the madness that is going on in the world. And by observing he has discovered the structure of this conditioning and the result of it.

Then from that arises the question: who is the observer who has discovered that he is conditioned? You follow? Are we communicating with each other? By observing what is happening outwardly and inwardly, the conflicts, the wars, the misery, the confusion in oneself and outside of oneself - the outside is part of what one is - I have observed this very closely, all over the world, this happening. And I have discovered that I am conditioned, and I have found the consequence of this conditioning. So there is the observer who has discovered that he is conditioned. Right? The observer through analysis, through examination, through investigation, has observed that the structure in which he lives is conditioned. Right? Are we going together?

Then the question arises: is the observer different from the things which he has examined and discovered, something separate from himself? If it is separate from himself, then again there is a division, and therefore there is conflict - how to overcome this conditioning, how to free oneself from this conditioning, what to do about it. And one has to discover whether this division between the observer and the thing observed, or the analyzer and the thing analyzed, are two separate things, two separate movements. As we said, if they are separate there must be endless conflict between the two. Endless struggle to overcome, to suppress, to control, to discipline, to hold, resist, all that is born from this division. Are they separate, or, the observer is the observed? This is tremendously important to find out for oneself because then the whole way we think completely undergoes a change. And this is the most radical discovery. Then the structure of morality, the continuation of knowledge has quite a different meaning. Please, let's talk this over together and find out if you have discovered this for yourself, or have been told, whether through description you have accepted the described as a fact, or you have discovered this for yourself without any outside agency telling you, it is so. Then you are discovering it. And it releases tremendous energy which has been wasted in this division between the observer and the observed. Are we moving together in this?

The wastage of energy is the continuation of knowledge in action. We will go into that. Knowledge which has been gathered by the observer and the observer uses that knowledge in action, so action is different from knowledge, the division; and hence conflict between action and knowledge. And the entity that holds this knowledge which is essentially the conditioning is the observer. So one must discover this basic principle for oneself - principle, not something fixed, a reality which can never be questioned again.

Then what takes place? What happens to a mind that has discovered this fact, this truth that all division outward or inward induces conflict and therefore effort, struggle, and it leads to every form of distortion? Has one discovered this, this simple fact that the observer is the observed, psychologically speaking. I observe the tree but I am not the tree. I can identify myself with the tree, and that identification is part of the reaction of division. Then if I have discovered this, what takes place to the quality of the mind which has been conditioned by this division, as the higher self, the soul, the body, you know, the division, what takes place, what happens to the quality of the mind? The speaker is doing all the talking unfortunately, and asking all the questions. What happens to the mind that has been conditioned through tradition, propaganda, through education, culture and society, and the entity that is conditioned, the mind that is conditioned is part of that society, culture and so on? What takes place when this fact is unearthed and observed?

Then one asks, what is freedom. Because if this discovery doesn't lead to freedom, doesn't open the door to freedom, then it has no meaning. It is just another intellectual feat, leading nowhere. But if it is an actual discovery, an actual reality, then there must be freedom. Freedom not for what you like to do, freedom to fulfil, freedom to become, freedom to decide, freedom to think what you like and act as you wish, because all that is not freedom. Decision implies choice between this and that. And what is there need of any choice at all, does a free mind choose? Please sir, this is not a verbal statement, you have to go into it, you have to live it daily, and then you will find the beauty of it, the vigour of it, the passion, intensity of it. Choice implies decision, decision is the action of will. And who is the entity that exercises will to do this or that? Please follow this carefully. If the observer is the observed what need is there for decision at all? As we said, decision arises only when there is confusion between this and that. Whether it is politically or inwardly, outwardly or inwardly, when there is any form of decision, depending on choice, it indicates a mind that is confused. A mind that sees very clearly has no choice, there is only action. And this lack of clarity comes into being when there is this division between the observer and the observed. Right? I don't know how much you see of all this.

Q: Factually there has to be this division, doesn't there.

K: I choose between brown and pink, between brown cloth and red cloth, of course. I am talking psychologically.

Q: It is difficult to separate them.

K: No, no. If one understands the effects of choice, effects of division, decision, then the choosing becomes a very small affair. Look, sir, I am confused in this world. I have been brought up in Catholicism, or Hinduism, or whatever it is, and I am fed up with it, it doesn't satisfy me. And I jumped into another religious organization and they have chosen. But if I examine the whole conditioning of a particular religious society, religious culture it's fairly simple. It's a series of propagandas, a series of acceptances of belief through fear, through the demand for security, psychologically, because inwardly one is lonely, insufficient, miserable, unhappy, uncertain, all the rest of that business, one hopes in something that can offer security, certainty. My particular religion to which I belong doesn't and I jump into another hoping to find it there, but it is the same thing, whether it is called X or Y. So I see this, the mind observes that without freedom, which means freedom from choice, when a mind that is very clear has no choice, has no need of choice, and therefore the whole response of action according to will completely comes to an end. Will implies resistance. Right? Obviously. And any form of resistance is isolation. And a mind that is isolated is not a free mind, and a mind that is caught up in the acquisition of knowledge as a means to freedom doesn't come about with that freedom, it doesn't happen to it. So one has to go into this question of knowledge. I don't know if you are following all this?

Why has knowledge become such an extraordinarily important thing in life? Knowledge being accumulated experience, both outward experiences that thousands of people have discovered, both scientifically, psychologically and so on, and also the knowledge one has acquired for oneself through observation, through learning, through searching out. What place has knowledge in freedom? Does this interest all of you?

Audience: Yes.

K: No, no, don't be so quick in answering, yes. Because this is not a verbal exchange, intellectual play. Knowledge is always in the past. When you say, 'I know', that word implies you have known. Knowledge of every kind, scientific, personal, communal, or whatever it is, is always in the past. And as our mind lives in the past, is the result of the past, can such a mind be free at all?

Knowledge not only about facts and information and so on, but knowledge which is part of this image, the symbol. The image I have built about you, and you have built about me.

Q: What about self-knowledge?

K: What about self-knowledge. We will go into that. See first how the mind accumulates knowledge. Why it accumulates, where it is necessary, where it becomes an impediment to freedom. To do anything one must have knowledge: driving a car, speaking a language, doing a technological job, you must have abundance of knowledge, the more efficient, the more objective, the more impersonal, the better. Knowledge is necessary. But a mind that is full of this information, as knowledge, can that mind ever be free? Or must it always carry this knowledge, which is always the past? And carrying this past, this knowledge, and meeting the present with that knowledge, and hence conflict. I met you yesterday, you flattered me or insulted me, I have the image of you, which is part of this knowledge. This knowledge which is the past, with that knowledge I meet you today, which is the image I have built about you today. And therefore there is conflict between you and me, as the observer and hence there is conflict between you and me. This is simple enough. Right?

So the observer is the reservoir of knowledge. No? Please, discover this, it's more fun. The observer therefore is the past, he is the censor, the entity that has accumulated knowledge, and from that knowledge he judges, he evaluates. And he is doing exactly the same with regard to himself. He has acquired knowledge about himself through psychologists, and he has learnt what he is, or he thinks he has learnt about himself, and with that knowledge he looks at himself. He doesn't look at himself with fresh eyes, he says, I know, I have seen myself, it's rather ugly, parts of it are extraordinarily nice but the other parts are rather terrible. He has already judged, and his judgement is based on the past, which is his knowledge about himself. Therefore he never discovers anything new about himself, because the observer is different from the thing observed which he calls himself. And that's what we are doing all the time, in all relationships - mechanical relationship or human relationship, relationship with the machine, or relationship with another. It is all based on the desire to find out a place where he can be completely secure, certain, and he now has sought and found security in knowledge. And the keeper of this knowledge is the observer, the censor, the thinker, the experiencer. And the observer is always watching as being different from the thing observed. The observer analyses himself, or he is analyzed by the professional, who himself needs analyzing, and this game goes on being played.

So one asks, can one look at this whole movement of life without the burden of the past? And that's what we are all trying to do, aren't we. We want to find new expressions, if you are an artist, more objective, you know, you play with that game for ever and ever. You want to write new books, a new way of looking at life, a new way of living, revolt against the old, and fall into the trap of the new which is the reaction to the old.

So one sees that intelligence doesn't lie in the hands of the observer, and it is only when the mind is free, free to learn, and learning is not the accumulation of knowledge. On the contrary, learning is movement, and accumulation of knowledge is static, you may add to it but the core of it is static. And from this static state one functions, one lives, one paints, one writes, one does all the mischief in the world. And you call that freedom. So can the mind be free of the known? You know this is really quite an extraordinary question if you ask it, not merely intellectually but really very, very deeply, to find out whether the mind can ever be free from the known. Otherwise there is no creation - you follow - otherwise there is nothing new, there is nothing new under the sun then. It is always reformation of the reformed.

So one has to find out why this division between the observer and the observed exists, and whether the mind, the possibility of a mind going beyond this division, which means the possibility of being free from the known to function at a different dimension altogether, which is intelligence which will use knowledge when necessary and be free of knowledge. So intelligence implies freedom, not what one wants to do, which is so immature and childish. Freedom implies the cessation of all conflict, and that comes to an end only when the observer is the observed, because then there is no division. After all this exists when there is love, doesn't it. You know that word is so terribly loaded, like god, one hesitates to use that word because it is associated with pleasure, with sex, with fear, with jealousy, with dependency, with acquisitiveness and all the rest of it. A mind that is not free does not know what love means; it may know pleasure, and hence know what fear is. But fear and pleasure, fear and desire and pleasure are certainly not what is called love. And that can only come into being when there is real freedom from the past. And is that ever possible? You know man has sought this out in different ways, to be free from the transiency of knowledge. I don't know if you are following all this. And so he has always sought something beyond knowledge, beyond thought. Thought is the response of knowledge. And so he has created an image called god - all the absurdities that arise round that. But to find out if there is something that is beyond the image of thought there must be freedom from all fear.

Q: Could I ask if you are differentiating between the brain, the cells of the brain, as intellect and the mind which is something, an awareness beyond the actual intellect?

K: Are you differentiating between the brain and the mind, the mind being something beyond the brain and the activities of thought. No, I think we are not dividing it. We are using mind as the total process of thought as memory, as knowledge, including the brain cells. Obviously. One can't separate the brain cells from the rest of the mind, can one.

Q: The brain builds up intellect.

K: What is the function of the brain, what is the brain? We are not talking professionally, I don't read books about all this business, but what is the brain?

Q: Well, it is a computer.

K: A computer.

Q: Yes.

K: A most extraordinary computer, built, put together for thousands of years, it is the result of time. Time is memory. Right? Memory is experience, accumulation of thousands of years of experience to survive, to be secure, to be safe. And one has, therefore, this knowledge. Both the outer, specially much more the outer, knowledge of everything that is happening in the outer world, how to go to the moon, you know, all the rest of the knowledge, but very little about oneself.

Q: Could creation depend on memory and therefore depend on the past?

K: Does it? Now, wait a minute, sir. Creation depends on memory.

Q: Creation of a right relationship between another person need not depend on memory, but on the feeling of the moment that you have affection for that person.

Q: Surely no real creation depends on memory at all.

K: I don't know!

Q: What I was suggesting in fact was that you said earlier that there is nothing new under the sun.

K: That's what we think, sir, that there is nothing new under the sun. At least the Bible says so, Ecclesiastes says so. Now, aren't we confusing creation with expression. And does a creative person need expression? Do think it out, sir. I need expression to fulfil myself, it must be expressed, I have a feeling that I am an artist and I must put it down in paint, or a poem or whatever it is. Does creation need expression at all? And does expression indicate a mind that is free in creation? You understand? Because one writes a poem, or paints a picture, does that indicate a creative mind?

Q: Not necessarily.

K: Therefore what does creativeness mean? Not the repetition, a mechanical repetition of the past.

Q: I think creativeness does need expression.

K: Wait, we will go slowly. Creativeness does need expression. I am just asking. You say it does need it, then it is finished, there is no further enquiry. We are just learning. We are learning together please, do bear this in mind all the time, that we are learning together, that we are working together, sharing together and therefore if you say, it needs it, then it is finished, blocked the door, shut the door in my face.

Q: I didn't say it needed expression.

K: We are going to find out, madam, have patience, let's go into it slowly. What does creativeness mean? What is the feeling of it, the mind that feels creative, do you know it?

Q: When the mind is inspired, then it creates something new.

K: When the mind sees something good and beautiful, that's a creative mind?

Q: Inspired.

K: Inspired. Does a creative mind need inspiration? No.

Q: It...

K: No, sir, you see you make statements. Do enquire, let's proceed slowly into it. I don't know what it means, we are going to find out. Not verbally, but actually, you know, find out a mind that is really extraordinarily creative, what it means.

Q: It means reality.

K: You say it is reality. Is your mind creative to know that it is reality? Look, sir, please, mustn't the mind be free to be creative, free. Otherwise it is repetitive; in that repetitiveness there may be new expressions but it is still repetitive, mechanical. A mind, a life that is mechanical, can it be creative? A mind, a human being that is in conflict, in tension, neurotic, can that mind, that human being be creative, though he may write marvellous poems, marvellous plays, he might write a marvellous play after having a hang-over. Hooked to something - those are all the new phrases.

Q: You must be in the 'now'.

K: Therefore, sir, what does that mean, to be in the now? It cannot be mechanical. It cannot be burdened with all the weight of knowledge, as tradition. It means a mind that is really profoundly free of fear. That's freedom, isn't it?

Q: Surely it must seek safety still, that's a function of the brain.

K: Therefore, sir, look, you are saying, there must be security.

Q: It is the function of the brain.

K: Of course, it is the function of the brain to be secure. It can function properly, efficiently, clearly, when it is secure. Right? But is it secure when it divides itself into nationalities, into religions, into saying, it's mine, it's yours and all the rest of it. Where there is any form of division there is destruction - the Jews, the Muslims, the Arabs, you follow?

Q: It seems to me that without opposition there is no growth.

K: Oh, without opposition there is no growth. Oh my lord!
That's part of our conditioning, isn't it.

Q: No, it's part of reality.

K: Is it, is it? Let's find out, madam.

Q: Without a high there is no low.

K: Let's find out. We have lived that way, between the good and the bad, between hate and love, jealousy, between tenderness and brutality, between violence and gentleness, that's how we have lived, for millions of years, and we have accepted that because we are conditioned that it is something real. Is it, to live like this?

Q: How can one be free of this conditioning?

Q: Well I have a suggestion: to rise above these planes of good and evil into the plane of divine consciousness.

K: No, no, sir, no, sir. You see. Now we are discussing what is the mind, what is the quality of the mind that is creative. A quality of mind that wavers between hate and jealousy and love and pleasure and fear, can it know what love means? Can a mind that is always seeking expression, fulfilment, to become famous, to be recognized, to be somebody in a potty little town? And we all call that fulfilment, becoming, being, you know, all the rest of it, which is all part of the social structure, part of our conditioning, and can such a mind be creative when it is caught in the word, or the verb, to be? To be - I will be, I have been. Always becoming something, can such a mind be creative? Because in becoming there is fear - you might not become, you might not be successful. In becoming there is the fear of death, fear of the unknown, so you cling to the known, which is knowledge. Can such a mind be ever creative? Or is creation the result of stress, opposition, strain?

Q: Creativeness is joy and attention, imagination.

K: Oh, creativeness is joy, imagination. You see we are all so - I don't know what we are. Do you know what joy means? Is joy pleasure?

Q: No.

K: You say, no, but that's what you are seeking, aren't you. You have a moment of great ecstasy, great joy, and you think about it. The thinking about it has reduced it to pleasure. So, sir, please, we are all so full of conclusions, and a mind that has a number of conclusions is not a free mind. And to find out whether one can live without any conclusion, without any conclusion, to live it daily, which means to live a life without comparison. You conclude because you compare. To live a life without comparison - you do it some time and you will find out what an extraordinary thing takes place.

Isn't it time, sir? It is twelve twenty, I think we had better stop, don't you.

Q: If just the experience, and the experience is fear or anger, what happens?

K: If one is only experience, the questioner asks, and the experiencer is fear, but only lives in experience, without that experience being recorded and recognized in the future as an experience, what happens. Is that it? I think one has first to find out what we mean by that word 'experience'. Doesn't it mean to go through? Doesn't it imply recognition, otherwise you wouldn't know you had experience? Are we meeting each other? If I didn't recognize the experience, would it be experience?

Q: Can't there be just experience without the image?

K: Wouldn't you put it a little further, go a little further. Which is, why do you need experience at all? You understand my question? We all want experience. First we are bored with our life, we have made life into a mechanical affair and we are bored with it, we want wider, deeper experiences, transcendental experiences. Right? Now what does all this imply? Boredom, and the escape from this boredom, through meditation, through various forms of escapes into so-called divine, whatever that is, which are all various formulas, and experience implies a recognition. Recognition means you can only recognize if there is a memory of that thing which you have already experienced, otherwise there is no recognition. So the question is, why do we ask for experience at all? To waken us up because we are asleep? A new challenge is an experience. And we respond to that challenge according to our background, which is the known. So there is always conflict between the challenge and the response. Right?

So is it possible to live a life in which the mind is so clear, awake, a light to itself that it needs no experience? Don't say, yes. Find out! That means to live a life without conflict. That means a mind that is highly sensitive and therefore intelligent, which is a light in itself therefore it doesn't need something to challenge it, or to awaken it. Right?

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 13TH SEPTEMBER 1970

This is the last, whatever it is. I would like to, if I may, to talk about a great many things. First, as one observes what is going on right round the world, both economically and socially, and in the human being, there is really a great deal of confusion, mischief, and violence. These are obvious facts. And the politicians perhaps encourage it, and the religious people cannot do anything about it, the organized religions. They have tried in every way right throughout the world, depending on their particular religious idiosyncrasy and belief, to put an end to violence, and they haven't succeeded. They have talked a great deal about love, peace, goodness, being kind to each other and so on. And apparently this has never come about. And conquerors have tried to unite mankind, again through violence, through murder, war, torture. And again human beings, being what they are, cannot seem to unite, bring it about not only economically but socially, morally, feel for each other, whether they are brown, black, white, and pink and all the rest of it, bearded or not bearded.

So one sees the utter and complete importance of a human being living harmoniously with his environment, and also inwardly, both in relationship and as a human being, vitally alive, passionate and capable and efficient. And it seems to me that is one of the major problems, if not the problem (noise of baby) - I am afraid it is going to be a choice between the baby and the speaker! As there is no choice we will go on.

It is one of the most important questions to solve: to bring about a complete unity, a feeling of a sense of, 'not me'. It is this self-centred activity, at whatever level it be, socially, economically or religiously, this self-centred activity is the factor of division. The 'me' and the 'not me', we and they. And is it ever possible to go beyond this self-centred concern, activity. If anything is possible then one has a great deal of energy. What wastes energy is seeing that it is not possible and just drifting, as most of us do, falling, going from one trap to another. How is this possible? How is a human being, recognizing what he is, a great deal of the animal in him, aggression, violence, a great deal of stupid mischievous activity, caught in various beliefs and dogmas and separative theories and formulas, revolting against one particular system, or establishment and falling into another establishment, which he himself recognizes and doesn't call that conformity. So seeing all that, what is one to do? This has been, I think historically, as well as in every human being who is sensitive, and alive, aware of the things that are happening around him, he must inevitably ask, not intellectually, not theoretically, not posit an hypothesis, but actually find out how to live, not at few odd rare moments but throughout the day and night and years until the end, a life that is completely harmonious, without conflict in himself, and therefore with the world. And this conflict, as one observes, arises from this self-centred concern, giving such tremendous importance to its appetites, whether it be sexual, economic, or what you will.

This has been, at least to all sensitive and people who are aware and serious, this has been always the question: how to go beyond his own petty little shoddy little self. Though he may call it god and soul and atman, you know all the rest of the words that one invents, pleasant sounding words to cover up a corruption. How is one to go beyond it? And so not being capable we have invented an outside agency, which is environment. Change the environment, the social structure, the economic business and man will inevitably also change. That has proved utterly wrong and false and untrue. Though the communists insist on that theory. And the religious people have said, believe, accept, put yourself in the hands of something outside of yourself. And that too has lost its sting, its vitality, because it is not real, it is merely an intellectual invention, a verbal structure, which has no depth whatsoever. And then one has tried to identify oneself with a nation, with a larger group. That too has brought dreadful wars and misery and confusion, ever bringing about division.

Now seeing all this, what is one to do? Escape to some monastery? Run off and learn the Zen meditation? Or accept some philosophical theory and commit oneself to that? Or meditate as a means of escape and self-hypnosis? So when one sees all this, actually, not verbally or intellectually, and seeing all that as leading nowhere, doesn't one invariably throw aside all that, deny completely and totally all that, all the various forms of self-identification with something larger, expecting the environment to shape man, laws, tyranny. And also seeing the absurdity, the falseness, the superficiality of beliefs, noble or ignoble. Does one actually set aside all that? Or do we still play with all that? If one has, and that's quite a task, because that implies a mind that is completely capable of looking at things as they are, without any distortion, without any interpretation, according to one's like or dislike, seeing things actually as they are, both outwardly and inwardly. Then what takes place with the quality of the mind? The mind being not only the nervous organism, but also the whole brain with all its memories, experiences, knowledge, based on security, because the brain can only function efficiently, healthily, sanely when it is completely secure.

Now seeing all this and acting, not seeing and action, they are the same, not a division between seeing and acting. That is, when you see something very dangerous, threatening, there is immediate action. In the same way, if you see all this, that man has invented, that human beings have constructed, as a means of escape from one's own tortures and agonies, loneliness, despairs, when one sees the danger of all that there is immediate action. After all that is intelligence. Intelligence is the seeing of the danger and acting. Therefore there is no division between seeing and acting.

Observing what is actually going on both outwardly and inwardly, and the very perception of that is action, and when one doesn't act then insanity begins, then imbalance takes place. Then we say, I cannot do that, it's too difficult, what shall I do.

I hope we are communicating with each other. That is, not only verbally but actually seeing things as they are. After all, the meaning of this kind of gathering is not merely to spend a sunny morning in a rather uncomfortable seat and in a tent, but rather to listen so that we find out what is true, not according to the speaker, or according to your own particular like or dislike, or idiosyncrasy, but in talking over together, discovering for ourselves what is truth, which means giving real attention. One cannot possibly understand anything unless you give your attention, unless you hear completely. But hearing is one thing and listening is another. If you merely hear a lot of words and argue about it, and discuss intellectually, like and dislike, it has very little meaning, whereas if you listen really with your heart and mind, listen to find out, because it is a very serious thing we are involved in, this is not an entertainment. And as human beings caught in all this confusion, misery, and the appalling things that are going on in the world, for which we are responsible as human beings, we have to act, we have to do something, not in Jordan but where we are, as we are. And so one has to really understand what action is.

As we said, when there is a division in action as, idea and then action, the concept and then action follows, the formula and later on the action, in that division there must be conflict. I don't know if we see that. First we have an idea, don't we, what we should do, what we should think, a concept. And that concept comes about through our conditioning. And so there is a concept, a formula, an idea, and later on action. And therefore there is always conflict wherever there is division. I don't know if we are seeing this together. And this conflict between the idea and action is the most confusing factor in life. And is it possible to act - please do listen to this - is it possible to act without idea? The idea first and action later. Is it possible to act without the ideation taking place? Which is, the seeing and the acting together, which we do when there is great danger or a crisis, there is instant action. And is it possible to live like that? Which is, a way of life of sanity. That is, is it possible to see clearly the danger, let us take of nationalism, or the danger of religious beliefs, which separates man against man, the division between races, the Arab, the Jew, the Hindu, the Muslim, you know, all that nonsense that goes on, seeing the danger of division, the very seeing, not the believing that it is false - I don't know if I am - belief has nothing whatsoever to do with perception. On the contrary belief prevents perception. If you have a formula, or a tradition, or a prejudice that you are a Hindu, a Jew, an Arab, or a communist and so on - am I going too fast? It doesn't matter, it's up to you - that very division does breed antagonism, hate, violence. And when there is this division between the concept and action there must be conflict, and this very conflict is neurotic, insane. So can the mind see, and the very seeing is the doing? That demands attention. That requires an alertness, not only visual alertness but a quickness of the mind, a sensitivity.

One sees this, that you need to have a clear sharp, sensitive, intelligent awareness, and then one says, how am I to get it, to capture it. When you put that question there is already a division. But whereas when you see the actual fact of what is going on, and the very seeing of it is the action. I hope this is clear. Because after all, every form of conflict, inwardly or outwardly, there is no division as the outer and the inner, every form of conflict is distortion. I don't think we realize this sufficiently clearly. We are so accustomed to conflict, struggle, we feel when there is no conflict we are not growing, we are not developing, we are not creating, we are not functioning properly. We want resistance. And one doesn't see the implications of resistance, which is division. So can the mind act without resistance, without friction? Seeing that any form of friction, any form of resistance is division, and therefore action brings about a neurotic conflicting state.

So when there is perception, observation, or seeing and acting then the activity of the self-centre comes to an end. I don't know if you see that. After all the self, the 'me', the 'I', the ego, you know whatever that is that is inside, the observer, the censor, the controller, the thinker, the experiencer and so on, he is the past. The self is the past. And the past is knowledge. The self, the 'me', is the centre of all knowledge, of psychological knowledge, not the scientific knowledge, or medicine and so on. So when there is any challenge the response from the centre as the 'me' is the response of the past, and therefore there is conflict. I don't know if you see all this. Whereas the seeing, the instant seeing and the instant acting, the self doesn't enter at all. Therefore there is no division. The centre as the observer is the Hindu, the Arab, the Jew, the Christian, the communist and all that business. When he responds it is the response of the past, the response of his conditioning is the result of thousands of years of propaganda - religious, social, or whatever it is. And that which is the past when it responds, must create division, inaction, and therefore conflict. Whereas when you see something very clearly and act there is no division. Is this clear?

You know, it is a great deal of fun to go into oneself and find out all this in oneself. You can't learn this from books - thank god! You can only learn through self-knowing, observing, then it is not secondhand but it is direct. And as most of us are secondhand human beings we find it awfully difficult to act without the 'me'.

So from this arises a further question, which is: can man, realizing the transiency of all things, find something that is not of time? You understand? Because the brain is the result of time, it has been put together through thousands of years, millennia. And thought is the response of memory, knowledge, experience, and thought can never discover anything new because thought is always the old. Thought can never be free. So anything that thought builds or thinks about is within the field of time. It may invent a god, it may conceive a timeless state, but it is still within the field of time because it is the result of thought, of the intellect. You may invent a heaven, but it is still the product of thought, and therefore of time, therefore unreal. So man, if one observes, has everlastingly sought this thing, realizes the nature of time, not only the chronological time by the watch but also the psychological time in which thought has become so extraordinarily important. And man says, is there something beyond all this time structure. Are we with each other? Right, can we go on?

Man starts out to find this, then gets trapped in belief, through fear. Then fear invents marvellous gods and all the rest of that business. Or he sets out through meditation to find it. Meditation - one has to be terribly brief about all this because there is too much involved in it - any form of structural meditation based on any system or method is a repetitive affair, which makes the mind somewhat quiet but dull. You know you have heard the repetition of mantras, you have heard about that, haven't you. I am so sorry you have heard about it. It is the same as repeating Ave Maria a hundred million times. And if you repeat something endlessly, then what happens? Obviously the mind becomes extraordinarily mechanical, rather stupid, and flies off into some mystical, supernatural, transcendental something or other. That's not meditation at all. You might take a trip, psychedelic trip by taking drugs, but that is not meditation. Meditation implies a mind that is so astonishingly clear so that every form of self-deception comes to an end. Because one can deceive oneself infinitely. And generally meditation is a form of self-hypnosis: seeing visions, all this is rather absurd, shall we have to go into all that. Because you have visions according to your conditioning. It's so simple. If you are a Christian you will see your Christ, if you are a Hindu you will see your Krishna, or whatever it is, the innumerable gods one has. But meditation is none of these things. Meditation is the absolute stillness of the mind, which means also the absolute quietness of the brain. You are all listening rather intently, aren't you? I am afraid by listening to what the speaker is going to say you are not going to achieve this. There is no achievement at all, no gaining. You have to lay the foundation for meditation in daily life - how you behave, what you think, what you do. You can't be violent and meditate, it has no meaning. If there is fear of any kind, psychologically, any kind of fear, obviously meditation is a nice escape. So the mind which is the result of time, as the brain, when that operates, functions, when it begins to look or conceive then thought, which is the past, and all its activities can be so deceptive.

So meditation is the stilling of the mind, complete quietness. And this requires an extraordinary discipline. Not the discipline of suppression, conformity, following some authority. But that discipline, that learning - discipline, that word means to learn - the learning which takes places throughout the day about everything, that is, you are thinking, watching, then the mind has that quality, that religious quality of unity. And from that there can be action which is not contradictory.

All this implies a serious person, a mind that is capable of clear, sane, observation, without any distortion. And it is possible to live that way daily, not at the weekends, daily.

And also there is the question in all this: what part do dreams play? Are you interested in all this? Shall I go on? Are you having fun? Because you see, the mind is never still, there is incessant activity going on. What goes on during the day continues during the sleep - the worries, the travail, the confusion, the misery, the anxiety, the fears, the pleasures, goes on when one sleeps, only there it becomes more acute. And it is symbolized through dreams, scenes and so on. Can the mind be completely still during sleep? And it is possible only when the activities of the day are understood each minute as they are over. You follow? Not carried over. You try some time not to carry your worries, your anxieties, your ambitions, your petty little activities over. If you are insulted, or praised, finish with it as it happens so that the mind is constantly free from problems. And as you sleep, then a different kind of quality comes into being because the mind is completely at rest. You are not carrying over the business of the day, you end it with each day. I don't know if you have gone through all this, if you have ever done it.

Then you will see meditation has that quality of a mind that is completely at rest, that's completely free from all knowledge. But such a mind uses knowledge. I don't know if you see. Because it is free from knowledge, from the known, it can use the known. When it uses the known it is sane, it is objective, impersonal, not dogmatic. And so one discovers - not, 'one discovers' - it happens that the mind in this silence there is a quality which is timeless.

And as we said, the explanation, the description is not the described, or that which is explained. But most of us are satisfied with explanations and descriptions, which are words. Therefore one must be free of the word, for the word is not the thing. And when one lives that way life has quite a different beauty. In that there is great love, which is not pleasure, not desire. For pleasure and desire are related to thought. And love is not the product of thought.

Well, sirs, that's enough. Perhaps you would like to ask some questions and we can talk things over together.

Q: When I observe myself I see a very rapid movement and feeling, and I am unable to watch one thought amidst this confusion.

K: Right, I understand, sir. May I repeat it? Please correct me if I repeat something wrong. When I watch myself there is such a rapid movement of thought I can never finish one thing, there is always a chain of events going on. Right, sir? What am I to do? I really don't know. Do you? Let's find out.

You watch yourself, and as you are watching various thoughts arise. And if you think or try to understand one thought and go to its very end, as you are doing it another thought arises. So there is this going on all the time, this movement. Right? What is one to do? What will you do? Are you waiting for somebody to tell you what to do? There is your problem, that as you are watching yourselves there is the multiplication of thought, multitude of thoughts, and you cannot finish one thought to the end. What is one to do? Go on, sirs.

Q: Does it matter?

K: Does it matter. Oh, probably nothing matters in that sense.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, we are trying to finish this question first. Would you put the question differently, which is, why does the mind endlessly chatter. Would you put it that way? Why is there this soliloquy going on? What happens if it doesn't go on? Is the chattering the result of wanting to be occupied? You understand my question? Something to be occupied with.

Q: Is it an escape?

K: Madam, that's not an answer. If it is an escape, why is the mind escaping, from what? Please, go slowly, we are going to find out, don't say, it is so. Ask the question, enquire. We chatter, why?

Q: Because we are not aware at the moment.

K: That settles it.

Q: Is it because we can't bear the void of no self?

K: We are going to find out, go slowly. You want to be occupied with something, don't you. If you are not occupied, what takes place? You understand? If you are not occupied with what you are used to, if you are a housewife you are occupied with all the business, if you are a businessman you are occupied.

Occupation becomes a mania, right? And why is the mind demanding occupation, which is chattering? You follow? Why? Watch your own mind, please. This is quite amusing, and entertaining, fun, to watch it, why it chatters. And what happens if it doesn't chatter, when it isn't occupied? Is there fear behind it? Fear of what? Please, go slowly. Fear of what?

Q: Of being nothing.

K: Fear of not being. Wait, look at what you are saying. Fear of not being.

Q: Fear of the past.

K: Fear of the past, whatever it is, fear. Fear about what? Fear exists in relation to something, fear doesn't exist by itself.

Q: Is it...

K: Find out, madam, don't ask me, find out. Fear of what? Of being empty, of being lonely, becoming aware of all this turmoil about you, in yourself, therefore be occupied with something. Like the monk, he is occupied with the book, with his ideas, with his gods, with his saviours, with his prayers, because the moment he stops he is just like anybody else: there is fear. So we want to be occupied. And this occupation implies a fear of finding out what we are. Right? Fear of our loneliness, of our ugliness, fear of whatever it is. Until you solve that problem of fear you will chatter. Right?

Q: As I watch myself the fear increases.

K: As I watch myself fear increases. Naturally. So the question is not, how to stop the increase of fear, but rather, can fear end. You follow? What is fear? Please, don't reply. Let's learn, find out. What is fear? You may not feel fear now, because you are sitting here, you don't feel fear now so you may not be able to take that and examine it and learn from it. But you can take immediately and immediately perceive that you depend, don't you. Right? Depend on your friend, on your book, on your ideas, on your husband, you know, psychological dependence, that is there constantly. Why do you depend? Because it gives you comfort, a sense of security, sense of well-being, companionship? And when that dependency is disturbed you become jealous, angry, and all the rest of it follows, or try to cultivate freedom from dependency, independent. Why does the mind do all this? Because in itself it is very empty, dull, stupid, shallow, so through dependence it feels more.

Now, in the same way, fear. What is fear? That is, why does the mind endlessly chatter? It chatters because it has to be occupied with something or other. And this occupation you separate as the highest occupation of the religious man, or the lowest occupation of the soldier, and so on, this division. We are not talking about the various forms of noble, or ignoble occupations, but occupation. Because it is obviously frightened that if it wasn't occupied it might discover, it might - you follow - it might see something of which it is afraid, which it may not be able to solve. So one has to find out what this fear means. Learn about it, not how to end it, not how to suppress it, or escape from it, but learn about it. What is fear in relation to something? Something I have done in the past, or something that might happen in the future: the past incident, and the future accident; the past illness, and the future pain of it. Right? Now what creates this fear? Thinking about the past, and thinking about the future, doesn't it. So thought breeds fear. Right? Are we going together. Thought breeds fear, as thought sustains, nourishes, pleasure. No? I have had marvellous food last night, and I would like to have it again. I had an extraordinary experience, a vision, or whatever it is, I want it again. So thought breeds both fear and pleasure, sustains both fear and pleasure, gives it a continuity. Right?

Then can thought - please listen - can thought end, come to an end so that it doesn't sustain, give a continuity, nourishment to fear, or to pleasure? You see we want pleasure, we want pleasure to continue but fear, let's put it away. But we never see the two go together. And thought is responsible. The machinery of thinking.

So then one asks oneself, can this stop - the machinery which sustains, gives nourishment, continuity to pleasure or to fear. That when you see a sunset, the beauty of it, the colours, the extraordinary quality of that light, see it and end it, not say, I must have it. You follow? To see it, and end it is action. Whereas if you see it, and enjoy it and want its repetition, it's inaction. I don't know if you see that. And as most of us live in inaction therefore this inaction becomes chattering. I don't know if you follow all this.

What time is it, sir? It's quarter past twelve. Do you want to go on with this?

Audience: Yes.

K: I hope you are also working as much as the speaker.

Q: In fact when the chattering does go on, do you just observe it?

K: When the chattering goes on, do you just observe it. That is, become aware of this chattering, without choice. Which means don't try to suppress, it, don't say, it's wrong, right, it must be - as you watch chattering you discover why it is chattering. You discover all the thing which you have just now described. And when you learn about chattering it is finished, there is no resistance to chattering. That is, through negation you have the positive action.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 16TH JULY 1970

I see all the old familiar faces are here again.

Perhaps after I have talked a little while you may like to ask questions, and so if that is all right with you I will talk first and see how things go along.

In a world that is so utterly confused, violent, revolutionary, every form of revolt and a thousand explanations for these revolts, confusions and violence, in which it is hoped there will be social reformation, change of bureaucracy, different set of values, different realities and greater, wider freedom for man. This is asked in every country, under every clime, under the banner of peace there is violence, in the name of truth there is exploitation, misery; there are all the starving millions in the world, suppressed, under great tyrannies in the name of ideologies, whether those ideologies be religious or political, there is such social injustice, different races against one another, every form of revolt and revolution and hatred. And there is war, conscription and the evasion of conscription, draft and so on. There is really great confusion, terrible violence, hatred is justified and every form of escapism is accepted as the norm of life. When one is aware of all this, not only outwardly, but also in oneself, there is uncertainty, oneself is confused what to do, what to think, what part to play in all this variety of confusion and demands - what is one to do. Join the activists, or escape from all that into some kind of inward isolation, or go back to old religious ideas, or start a new sect and carry on with one's own prejudices, inclinations and tendencies.

Seeing all this, one naturally wants to know for oneself what to do, what to think, how to live a different kind of life. And I think, if we can during these talks and discussions, find out for ourselves, amidst this clamour of action, this destruction of hatred and violence and brutality, if we can find out for ourselves, a light in ourselves, a way of living in which there is no violence whatsoever, a way of life which is utterly religious and therefore no fear, a life that is completely stable inwardly, which cannot possibly be touched by outward events, then I think it will be eminently worth while if we could, all of us, together, give complete and sensitive attention to what we are going to discuss, what we are going to talk over together, because we are working together, we are co-operating together to find out. It isn't that the speaker tells you what to do, what to think, he has no authority, he is not going to tell you what to think and what to do, he has no philosophy. But together we are going to find out for ourselves, not dependent on anyone, including the speaker, find out for ourselves how to live in this mad confusion, how to live peacefully, and that peace can only come about if there is a light in ourselves which can never be destroyed by another, by any environment, by any accident, by an experience. If we could do that - and we must - during these days that we come together here, if we could quietly, patiently, with real interest and seriousness, go into this, I am quite sure we will be able to find out for ourselves; only unfortunately the difficulty is that our brain functions in the old habits, like a gramophone record playing the same tune over and over and over again. And while that tune is going on, the noise of that music, of that habit, one is not capable of listening to anything new, because after all we have been conditioned, the brain has been conditioned to think in a certain way, to act in a certain way, to respond according to our culture, to our background, to our tradition, to our education and that very same brain tries to listen to something new, to a new quality of meaning, to a new tone, and it is not capable of it, and that is where our difficulty is going to lie. You know if you talk on a tape you can wipe it out and begin again, but unfortunately the tape the brain has, which has been so long cultivated and conditioned, it is very difficult for that tape to be wiped out and begin again. And we repeat that same pattern, the same ideas, the same physical habits over and over again. And so we never catch anything fresh, new.

So, listen so that the brain puts aside the old tape, the old way of thinking, feeling, reacting, the innumerable habits that one has, to put all that aside - and one can do it, I assure you you can do it if you listen, if you give attention, if the thing you are listening to is deadly serious, tremendously important, then you are bound to listen, and that the very act of listening will wipe out the old. Do try it - or rather do do it, not try it. You are really deeply interested otherwise you wouldn't be here, you are taking life very seriously, otherwise you wouldn't take all the trouble to come and sit here with the fresh snow on the hills, uncomfortably, away from the things that you are used to. So one assumes that you are serious, because you have to be serious confronted with the extraordinary chaos in the world, uncertainty, war, destruction, every value has been thrown away, it is a completely permissive society, sexually, economically, in every way. There is no morality, no religion, everything is being thrown away and one has to be utterly, deeply serious; and that very seriousness, if you have that in your heart, you will listen. And in that very act of listening the old memories, the hold habits, the accumulated tradition, all that will be wiped away. So it depends on you, not on the speaker, whether you are sufficiently serious to listen, to find out for yourself, so completely, a light that can never be put out, a way of living that doesn't depend on any idea, on any circumstance, a way of life that is always fresh, new, young, vital.

So if you are serious and not completely self-centred, just have that quality of mind that wants to find out at any price, then you and I, you and the speaker, can co-operate, can work together and discover, or come upon this strange thing that will solve all our problems - whether it be the problems of daily monotonous life or the problems of the highest quality.

Now how do we go about it? You know I feel there is only one way, that is, through negation to come to the positive, through understanding what it is not, to find out what it is. To see what one actually is and go beyond it, to start looking, not only at the world and all the event of the world, the things that are going on, and our relation to that, either separatively or without the separation between you and the world. You have understood I hope? One can look at the world's events as though it didn't concern you, you as an individual, looking at all that, trying to understand it, trying to shape it, trying to do something about it, you as an individual separate from that thing, from the thing called the world and the events that are taking place in the world, so there is a division between you and the world, you can look at it that way. You, the individual, with your experiences, with your knowledge, with your particular idiosyncrasies, your prejudices and so on, with those, look at the world, and therefore separate yourself from the world. You as an Englishman, or a German, or whatever it is, you look at the world from your prejudice, from your particular little sectarian culture.

So one has to find out how you look, whether you are looking at all the things that are happening outside of you as well as inside of you, from a particular point of view and therefore from a particular prejudice, from a particular belief, a conclusion. Please do this as we are talking. And so when you look at it that way there is a separation between you and the world and the events of the world, and therefore when there is a division between you and the world then you try to do something about the world. And hence there is a conflict between you and the world. Right?

Or, you can look at this whole process of living, in which there is you and the world, as a unitary process, as a total movement, not a separate movement, you as the individual and the community, you and the nation, you and the Vietnamese war, and so on and so on, you as the Arab, or the Jew and so on. So it depends on how you look, whether you look at the world from a particular point of view, from a particular conclusion, from a particular culture, you taking a stand verbally, ideologically, or committed to a particular action and therefore isolate yourself from the rest, and then there is a contradiction and conflict. Either you look that way, or you look at this whole phenomenon, the whole phenomenon, as a living, moving process, a movement, a total movement of which you are a part and therefore no division. Because you are after all the society, what you are is the result of the culture, the society, the religion, the education, the climate, the food, the propaganda, that is what you are - you are the world and the world is you. And to see the totality of this, not what to do about it, we will come to that later, to have this feeling of the whole of mankind, not as a Hebrew, or a Hindu or some - I won't use strong language. Can you do this, not identify yourself with the world because you are the world; the war is the result of you, the violence, the prejudices, the division, the appalling brutality that is going on, it is part of you.

So it depends then on how you look at this phenomenon that is going on both within and without, and how serious you are. If you are really serious then you will listen and the old momentum comes to an end, the old pattern, the repetition of the old pattern, the old habits, the ancient ways of thinking, living, acting.

So we come back to the question of whether you are really serious, not with a long face and without a smile and laughter, but inwardly really serious to find out, find out a way of life in which all this turmoil, this misery, the sorrow doesn't exist. So for most of us that is where the difficulty lies: to be free of the old, the old habits, not only physical habits but the habits of thought, the crudest form of it - I am something, I want to fulfil, I want to become, I believe, these are my opinions, this is the way, I belong to this particular sect, whether it is the Roman Catholic sect or the Protestant sect. So the moment you take a stand you have already separated yourself and are therefore incapable of looking at this total process. You see what is happening in the world, as well as in oneself, there is the scientist, the artist, the businessman, the philosopher, the Pope, the priest, the businessman - division, fragmentation of life, and each one of these people offer an explanation, each says, 'This is the way', the historian, the Communist, the Socialist, have their particular way, they don't look at the whole fragmentation of man and one fragment is explaining away the other fragments. I hope you are listening to all this. And one fragment is trying to unify the rest of the fragments, which is what you are doing. One fragment in you says, 'I must control the rest of the fragments, I am the censor, I am the moralist, I know what is right'. So every fragment has its devotee, its teacher, its philosopher, its scientist, its businessman, and they are all at war with each other. That is so - you can look it objectively.

The other day on the television - need I go into all this? - a high dignitary of the Church of England was being interviewed and the interviewer asked him what about other religions - Buddhism, Hinduism, oh a dozen of them, what about them. 'Oh', he said, 'they have got truth in them, some of them, but we are unique because we have Jesus with us'. You know in this age, the 20th century, a man can say that: which means he is so conditioned by his own repetition, by the culture in which he has been brought up, that he can't see anything new, and yet he is the highest dignitary, and he tells people the beauty of god. And there are those philosophers, the intellectuals, trotting out their own particular ideologies, writing clever, marvellous books. So there is this fragmentation, this division in life, and as long as there is this fragmentation both outwardly and inwardly, there must be confusion and war. Do please see this with your heart. Look at the war that is going on in the Middle East, Near East. So you know all this; and there are volumes written explaining it all, and we are caught by the explanation. As though any explanation, it doesn't matter which explanation, written by the cleverest man, is ever going to solve anything.

So the first thing is to realize not to be caught in explanations, it doesn't matter who gives it, but to see actually 'what is'. When you see 'what is' it does not demand explanations; it is only the man who doesn't see 'what is' is lost in explanations. Please do see this, understand this so fundamentally that one isn't caught by words.

In India it is the fashion there to take their sacred book called the Gita, and explain everything according to that book, and there are everlasting meetings about it, thousands upon thousands listen to it, the explanations, how you should live, what you should do, how god is this - you know - and they listen, enchanted, and carry on with their life. So explanations are deadly things, they blind you because they prevent you from seeing actually what is, and through explanations you can never see 'what is'.

So to look at 'what is', and how you look at it, is of the highest importance. That is the only thing that matters. Either you look at it from a particular point of view, with your particular vested interest, economically or ideologically, your vested interest in them, either you look at them from a particular conclusion, from a particular prejudice, from a particular experience, and so there is a division between you and the thing which is. Is this clear? And when there is a division there must be inevitably conflict. And the explanation of the conflict has no value. What has value is to see how you look, to be aware of your prejudice which is preventing you from looking. So if you listen to this really seriously, the old pattern is wiped away, you will never again look from a fragment, because we are concerned with the whole of life - the whole of life, the physical, the economic, the social relationship, enjoyment, pleasure, the reality - if there is any reality - to find out something beyond all thought, all imagination, what is death, what is love, what is fear, and to see if the mind can go beyond all this. We are concerned with the whole movement of life, not one segment of it. And when there are revolutions, physical revolutions, they are only concerned with a part of it; and when there are revolutions you are bound to end up with dictatorship, with a tyranny, and battle again begins to be free of the tyranny.

So it is vitally, immensely important, to find out for yourself how you look at all this problem of existence - from a conclusion, from an explanation, from a particular point of view. Or do you look at it non-fragmentarily? Do find out. Spend an hour. Go out for a walk by yourself and find out, or in your room, put your heart in finding out how you look at all this phenomena. Then we can begin to talk together. Then we can begin to communicate together. The word 'communication' means that - to work together, to look together, to examine together, to create together. But if you don't take part in it but merely hear certain ideas, concerned with your particular little problem whether you are sexually satisfied or not, whether you are fulfilling or not, whether you are happy or not, we can deal with all that afterwards. Then we can work out all the details together, and we will go into the most infinite details to find out, to understand, but before we do that you must be very clear that you are free from fragmentation, that you are no longer an Englishman, an American, a Jew - you follow? - black, white, pink, purple - all that rubbish. Or you have your particular conditioning in a particular religion or a culture, which tethers you, holds you, and according to that you have your experiences, which only strengthen your further conditioning.

So to be aware of all this, whether you are hurt because you don't get something that you want - you know - all the tricks that one plays upon oneself. To look at this whole movement of life as one thing, there is a great beauty in that, immense possibility, then action is extraordinarily complete, and it is only then there is freedom. And a mind must be free to find out what reality is, not invent a reality, not imagine what reality is. There must be this total freedom in which there is no fragmentation. And that can happen only if you are really completely serious, not according to somebody who says, 'this is to be serious' - throw them all away, don't listen to it. But find out for yourself if you are completely serious to find out. It doesn't matter whether you are old or young. Then you will listen, and that very act of listening will wipe out the old repetitious habits and conclusions, and all the absurdities that we have accumulated.

Now would you like to ask questions about what we have been talking about this morning? You know before you ask - just a minute sir - before you ask let us see why you are asking and whom are you asking the question. Why you ask and from whom do you expect the answer? And in asking, are you satisfied with the explanation which will be the answer? Or are you asking the question in order to expose, because that very questioning is a process of enquiry. So it is no good your asking a question and waiting for the speaker to answer it. Your questioning is taking part, sharing in the answer. Is that clear? So it is a thing together. If one asks a question, and one must ask always about everything, if one asks a question, you are asking it because in that very asking you are beginning to enquire and therefore share together, move together, experience together, create together. It doesn't matter what question it is - if it is the most silly question, you will find out it's silly and in finding out it is silly we are both together sharing it. If the speaker answers that question he discovers how silly he is himself. So if that is more or less clear, and it doesn't mean the speaker is preventing you from asking questions, then let's go. Just a minute sir.

Q: In this world with wars and conflicts, if there is someone, say a madman, loose, and he is killing people, and it is within someone's power to stop him by killing him, what should one do?

K: If there is a madman in the world who is killing others, if you stop him and kill him, doesn't the problem end? That's right sir? That was your question wasn't it? I am just asking you to correct if the question that was repeated is what you asked. That's all.

So let us kill all the Presidents, all the rulers, all the tyrants, all the neighbours, and yourself. (Laughter) No, no, don't laugh. We are part of all this, we have contributed by our own violence the state the world is in. We don't see this clearly. We think by getting rid of a few people, by pushing aside the establishment, as it's called, revolt against the establishment, you are going to solve the whole problem. You know every revolution, physical revolution, has said this, historically, the French, the Russian, the communist and so on and they ended up in bureaucracy, in tyranny. So my friends, to bring about a different way of living, living not for others but for oneself, because the other is oneself, there is no 'we' and 'they', there is only ourselves. If you really see this, not verbally, not intellectually, but with your heart, then you will see there can be a total action which would have a completely different kind of result, there will be a new social structure, not the throwing out of one establishment and creating another. That means one must have patience to enquire, and young people don't have patience, they want instant result - instant coffee, instant tea, instant meditation - which means they have never understood the whole process of living. If you understand the totality of the living there is an action which is instant, which is quite different from the instant action of impatience. Please do listen to all this, not because the speaker says so, it is so.

Look, sir, you see what is going on in America, the racial riots, the poverty, the ghettos, the black and the white, the utter meaninglessness of education as it is, look at the condition in Europe, the division, and how long it takes to bring about a Federated Europe, each politician driving his own particular little nail, and look at what is happening in India, Asia, in Russia, in China. And when you look at all that and the various divisions of religions, there is only one answer, one action, total action, not a partial action or a fragmentary action, and the total action is not to kill another but to see this division that has brought about this destruction of man. And when you really seriously, sensitively, see that you will have quite a different action.

Q: There are about 15 people here who have no place to sleep and no money, and I wonder whether together we can solve this problem immediately.

K: The gentleman asks: there are about 15 or 20 of us who have no money, no place to sleep. And he asks whether this can't be solved together. I don't know sir, you had better find out.

Q: Excuse me, it is impossible to do anything together here because everyone makes references to you as the only source of authority.

K: Ah! Look, look. Let me repeat this, something very clearly. Whatever takes place in this tent, we are responsible. What you do outside we are not responsible. There is great difficulty here in this country. You know what Switzerland is, they don't want you to come here without money, they don't like hippies, there is trouble, they have written to us. And whatever happens outside, we are not responsible. And when we said tapes, please kindly refrain from taking your own particular recording, it isn't that we are preventing you, using our authority and all the rest of that nonsense, but people have written and said, 'for goodness sake, everyone putting out a microphone and listening, disturbs us, do stop it' - and that is why we are stopping.

Now with regard to this problem that few of us have no money and are here, no place to sleep, please talk it over and arrange it, it is not dependent on me.

Q: Excuse me, I am not asking the question of you, I am asking it of all of them.

K: Oh!

Q: We have a room for three.

K: Sir, you arrange it afterwards, sir, arranging it afterwards. Meet together and arrange it afterwards.

Yes, sir?

Q: For someone who has been born under total and complete tyranny so that he has total and complete suppression, so that he has no other opportunity of doing anything himself, and I feel most people here cannot imagine it, we are treated just like animals.

Now he is born in this situation, his parents were born..

K: Yes, sir, I know.

Q: So living under those conditions, and supposing he takes to drugs and so forth and all kinds of things. Now what contribution has such a person...

K: I have got the question, sir. I have got the question. Born in a country, in a race, in a family, where you are completely suppressed, where there is no opportunity, economically, socially or in any other way, to express themselves, completely submerged, what is one to do? Can one bring about a change in the world or within oneself? Is that the question sir?

Q: A little like that but what contribution has such a person - what has he done to create this world?

K: I see. What has such a person done to create this monstrous world? The man - please listen carefully - the man who is born in a race that is completely suppressed by another race, this has happened in all the colonial places, it happens in Russia though they doesn't call it colonial, it happens in China, it happens in India, everywhere this is going on, this suppression. What has such a person who has been suppressed for so long, or a race, what has it done to contribute to this horror? Right?

Probably it has not done anything. What has that poor man living in the wilds of India, or in a small village, or in Africa, or in some happy little valley, not knowing anything that is happening in the rest of the world, what has he done, in what way has he contributed to this monstrous structure? Probably he has not done anything, poor fellow. What can he do? You know, in India, as well as in other parts of the world, the so-called higher group who are more educated have kept the others down, and there is revolt - you know all this - going on all the time, boiling, boiling, boiling. And one particular race that has been suppressed, naturally give it an opportunity to flower it will probably do exactly what the other races have done, throttle other people. You know, this is the eternal game of history.

You were asking a question up there sir, weren't you?

Q: About seriousness.

K: What does it mean to be serious?

Q: I have the feeling that I am not serious.

K: What does it mean to be serious? I don't know. (Laughter)

What does it mean? Do find out. Let's find out together. What does it mean to be serious? Completely dedicated to something, to some vocation, that you want to go right to the end of it. Right?

Q: Dedication is experience.

K: Wait, sir, wait. Just a minute. I am going to enlarge it. I am going to go into a little bit. Let's go into it. We are going together. Now please I am not defining it and you accept this definition, or that definition, this word or that word - we'll change the definition, we will change the word, we'll change the whole context of it in a few minutes. But let's start.

I want to find out how to live quite a different kind of life. A life in which there is no violence, where there is freedom, complete and absolute and inward freedom, I want to find out, and I am going to spend my time, days, energy, thought, everything to find out. I would call such a person a serious person. He is not put off, he may amuse himself - you follow - but his course is set, which doesn't mean he is dogmatic, which doesn't mean he is obstinate, which doesn't mean he doesn't adjust. He will listen to others, consider, examine, observe, listen. In his seriousness he may become self-centred and therefore that very self-centredness will prevent him from examination, therefore he has got to listen to others, he has got constantly to examine, question, which means highly sensitive, and to find out how he listens, whether he listens because he feels serious therefore the other is not serious and therefore he will not listen to him, but to listen whether to a person who is serious, not serious, who is flippant, listen. So he is all the time listening and yet pursuing, enquiring and that very act of listening is the enquiry. So a serious person is highly sensitive. You are discovering, not only physically but sensitive brain, sensitive mind, a sensitive heart - they are not four separate things, the totality, the sensitivity of all that.

So I would say, find out if the body is sensitive, aware of the gestures, of its peculiar habits. You can't be sensitive physically if you are stuffing yourself with a lot of food, or become sensitive through starvation or fasting. Sir this requires enormous intelligence and it is only when that intelligence is that you are sensitive, highly sensitive. Therefore one has to find out what you eat, what are the things to eat, and to watch yourself, your peculiar habits of scratching or whatever it is. Then to have a brain that is sensitive, that means a brain that is not functioning in a habit, pursuing its own particular little pleasures, sexual or otherwise. Therefore a mind that is so completely sensitive and therefore free, such a person is a serious person. And I hope you are.

Is that enough? What time is it? Is that enough for this morning?

Q: You have told us not to listen to explanations. What is the difference between your talks and explanations?

K: What is the difference between your talks and explanations? Let me think for a minute. Am I explaining? The question is: what is the difference between your talks and the innumerable explanations that are dished out? What do you think is the difference? Is there any difference?

Q: I think you are seeking the reality.

K: Wait, wait. Go into it sir, examine it. Is there any difference or it's the same verbiage going on repeating, explaining? Is there any difference? What do you think? What do you think? Come on sirs.

Q: Words are words.

K: The gentleman says, words are words. Whether you say it or somebody else says it. Now, wait a minute. We are asking explanations, to explain. You know what I mean, explain; the cause, the effect, the description of the cause, saying many has lived for so long, inherited, brutality from the animal, and so on, explaining, explaining, explaining. And the other points out and in the very pointing out you act, you cease to be violent. Now is there a difference between the two? You think it out sirs, it is not for me. Action is what is demanded. Will action come about through explanations, through words? Total action. Or does this total action come about when you are sensitive enough to observe the total movement of life, the whole of it? Here what are we trying to do? Give explanations of why and the cause of why? Or, are we together trying to find out, live, so that our life is not based on words but actually on the discovery of 'what is', which is not dependent on words. So there is a vast difference between the two, even though I point it out. It is like a man who is hungry. You can explain to him the nature and the taste of good food, explain it, show him the menu, show him through the window the display of food, but what he wants is food and explanations don't give him food. That is the difference.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 19TH JULY 1970

There are a lot of people, aren't there? And I suppose you think it is worthwhile to come and listen. So may we continue with what we were talking about the last time we met here. There are several things to talk over, like fear, the desperate loneliness of life, and the boredom, the many gratifications, dependencies and pleasure, the pain and the sorrow, and also we should talk over together love and death, and what is meditation. There are these many things to talk over together, not only in generalities, but go into detail, not only verbally but also, if one can, go beyond the meaning of mere verbal statements and explanations. These are the many things we have to talk over, but before we go into all that, first, it seems to me, one has to very deeply consider what is freedom. Because without freedom, not only outwardly, but specially inwardly, without deeply and seriously understanding it, not verbally or intellectually, but actually feel it, whatever we talk about will have very little meaning unless this is first thoroughly and completely understood.

As we were saying the other day, what is important in all this is the quality of mind that is really serious. We considered what is seriousness, what is the nature of a mind that is completely and utterly serious. Because it is only the serious mind that lives, and enjoys life - not the mind that is seeking entertainment, not the mind that is merely seeking some kind of particular gratification in some form of fulfilment, because actually there is no such thing as fulfilment. So to understand what is freedom, and all these things that are connected with it, and all the things that we are going to discuss together, talk over, one must obviously understand what it means to be free. You know first of all, freedom implies the total abnegation, the denial, negation of all authority. One has to understand this very, very carefully because the younger generation thinks freedom is to spit on the face of the policeman, to do whatever they want. The denial of outward authority does not necessarily mean the complete freedom from all inward authority, and when we understand the inward authority, and a mind and a heart that is wholly, completely, integrally free from authority, then we'll be able to understand the action of freedom outwardly.

The outward freedom of action depends entirely and wholly on the mind that is free from authority inwardly. And this requires a great deal of patience and enquiry and deliberation, to find out what it means to be free from inward authority. And if you do not mind that is what we are going to discuss this morning, because I feel that it is of primary importance, and then when we discuss various other things which are involved with regard to life, the daily living, then we will approach them with quite a different quality of mind. So if you don't mind we will go together, share together, work together to find out what it means to be free from all inward authority. Is that all right?

The word 'authority' according to the meaning of the dictionary, is the 'one who starts an original idea', 'the author of something', 'the author of an idea, of something entirely new'. Then he sets a pattern, a mode, a system, or an ideal, an ideation, and the rest seek, finding some gratification in it, or in them, follow it. So there is that way authority set out. First, the original human being who has discovered something new, something original, perhaps he puts it into words, or into a picture, or a poem, or a religious life. That becomes the pattern, the mould, the system which others follow, whether it be Lenin, Mao, or others politically and economically, or religiously, then the rest blindly, or cleverly, intellectually follow. Please if I may suggest, do observe this in your own life, because that is what we are doing - you are not merely listening to a series of talks, or discussions, or explanations of certain facts, but you are actually by listening to the speaker listening to yourself, observing yourself. Otherwise what is said has no value whatsoever. Right? So there are pattern of ways of life, conduct, politically or psychologically. Outwardly, or inwardly, and the easiest thing for the mind, which is generally very lazy, indolent, is to follow what somebody else has said. The follower then accepting authority as a means to what he wants to achieve, or what is promised through that particular system of philosophy or ideation, or a particular system of thought, follows it, clings to it, depends on it, and thereby makes it into authority. Right? You are merely a follower then, a secondhand human being, and most people are completely secondhand. They may think they have some original ideal with regard to painting, writing poems, but essentially because they are conditioned to follow, to imitate, to conform, they become secondhand, absurd human beings. That's one quality of the destructive nature of authority.

Now do we listening - do we belong to that kind of category. Do you? Don't answer me please. Find out. Following somebody, or some belief, or some instruction according to some book or to a person who promises a reward, an enlightenment, a thing to be achieved at the end, through a particular means - and the means and the giver of that means become the authority. As human beings do we do this? Do you do this? Follow somebody, psychologically? We are talking not of the outward following, the outward obedience, of following a law, denying a law and so on, we are not discussing that, - but inwardly, psychologically do you as a human being follow? If you do then you are essentially a secondhand, worthless human being. You may do good works, you may have a very good life, you may have a lovely house and all the rest of it, but it has very little meaning. Then there is another kind of authority, the authority of tradition. The meaning of that word 'tradition', means to hand over from the past to the present. The Christian tradition, the Catholic tradition, the family tradition, the racial tradition, and the tradition also implies not only that which had been handed down but also the tradition of memory. You understand - this becomes much more difficult. I hope we are going along together in this - are we? Yes?

Because if you follow tradition one can see at certain levels it has value, and at other levels it has no value at all. Good manners, politeness, consideration, thoughtfulness, the alertness of the mind that is watching, which can gradually become a tradition, and the pattern having been set the mind then just repeats it, gets up, opens the door, is punctual for meals, polite and all the rest of it. But it has become a tradition, it is not born out of consideration, alertness, sharpness and clearness.

Then there is the tradition of a mind which has cultivated memory, the functions like a computer, every action, repeating, over and over again, so that it can never receive anything new, it can never listen to anything totally different. As we said the other day, our brains are like tape recorders, certain memories have been cultivated through centuries and we repeat that, over and over and over again. Through the noise of that repetition, we try to listen to something new. And therefore we don't listen at all. Then we say, what am I to do? How am I to get rid of the old machinery, the old tape and listen to the new tape? The new thing can be heard only when the old tape is silent. And the old tape becomes completely silent without any effort if you are serious to listen, to find out, to give your attention.

So then there is the authority of another, and the dependence on another; there is the authority of tradition, there is the authority of the past as memory, as experience, as knowledge. And there is the authority of an experience which is the immediate. Are you following all this? You have had an experience, and that becomes the authority. And that experience is based on your past, accumulated knowledge - otherwise if you don't recognise it as experience, as something new, it is not an experience. Are you following all this? Am I talking too much and too fast? You are following all this, which is following yourself, not me, not the speaker. Right? So there are these various categories of authority. And how can a mind, a brain which is so conditioned by authority, imitation, conformity, adjustment - how can such a mind and heart listen to anything completely new? How can it listen to the beauty of a day? - when the mind, and the heart and the brain are clouded by the past as the authority. So if you see that, not verbally, not intellectually but actually perceive the fact, the actual what is, - that is, a mind that is burdened by the past, conditioned by various forms of authority is not free and therefore cannot see completely, if you actually see that then the past is set aside without effort.

Right?

So freedom implies the complete cessation of all authority inwardly. And from that quality of mind that is free, an outward freedom comes, takes place which is entirely different from the reaction of an opposing, or resisting factor. Are you following all this? Are you also working as hard as the speaker? Or are you merely just hearing! What we are saying is really quite simple and it is because of its very simplicity that you will miss it. Our minds, our brains are conditioned through the authority, through imitation and conformity - that is a fact. And therefore freedom cannot exist to such a mind. It can talk endlessly about freedom, and revolt against certain outward forms of restrictions, but is not a free mind. The mind that is actually free has no inward authority whatsoever, and we have explained very carefully what authority means. Have you, as a human being, any form of authority on which you depend. And if you do, you cannot have freedom. And it is only the free mind that knows what it means to love and meditate.

So in understanding freedom, one has to understand also what is discipline. This may be rather contrary to all that you think, because we generally think freedom means freedom from all discipline. So let us find out what it means, find out together - I am not laying down, I am not telling what you should do, or should not do. We are trying to find out - not trying - we are finding out what it means to discipline. What is the quality of mind that is highly disciplined. Because freedom cannot exist without discipline. Which doesn't mean that you must first be disciplined, and then you will have freedom. But freedom and discipline go together, they are not two separate things. So what does discipline mean. According to the dictionary - I'm sorry to talk about dictionary and the meaning of the word so much, I have recently looked it up, at least not this morning - the Latin - the meaning of that word means to learn. Not the mind that confirms, not the mind that has been drilling itself into a certain pattern of action, please see this. Not the mind that confirms to a goal, according to an ideology, according to a belief, according to Marx, Engels, or Stalin, Lenin, Mao, this or that! A mind that is capable of learning, which is entirely different from a mind which is capable of conforming. A mind that confirms cannot possibly learn. It is only a mind that is learning, that is observing, that sees actually what is, and not interpret 'what is' according to its own desires, its own conditioning, its own particular pleasure. You understand?

Discipline means not suppression, not control - please listen to all this - not conformity, not control, not suppression, nor adjustment to a pattern or an ideology, but a mind that sees 'what is', and learns from 'what is'. Such a mind has to be extraordinarily alert, aware. So that's what it means to have discipline. You understand - in the ordinary sense of that work, to discipline oneself, implies there is the entity that is disciplining itself according to something. So there is a dualistic process. You are following this? I say to myself, I must get up early in the morning because I am lazy, or I must not be angry, or I should do this or that. In that there is a dualistic process involved, there is the observer and the thing observed. Right? There is the one who with his will controls what he should do, or denies what he should not do. Right? In that dualistic state there is conflict, isn't there? Right? So discipline as it is accepted is a process of constant conflict. Right? The discipline laid down by the parents, but society, by religious organizations, by the church, by what the Buddha, the Jesus, and so on have said. (Band music in background - laughter.) There is a discipline there! For us discipline means conformity, and there is a revolt against conformity, the parents wanting you to do certain things, and you revolting against it, and so on and on and on. Now our life is based on obedience, conformity the opposite of it, to deny conformity, to do what one likes. A revolt against the pattern, and this is what is going on throughout the world.

So we are going to find out what is the quality of the mind that doesn't conform, doesn't imitate, doesn't follow, doesn't obey but has a quality in itself which is highly disciplined - discipline in the sense, a quality that is constantly learning, a quality of mind that is learning, not conforming. Conformity implies comparison, doesn't it? Comparing myself with another, comparing means measuring, measuring myself, what I am, or what I should be according to somebody else, the hero, the saint, the Mao, the Lenin, the Marx - or if you don't like them, Jesus, you know, the other side.

So where there is conformity there must be comparison. Please see this. And to find out whether you can live, not verbally but actually live daily without comparison, which means not conforming. You know you do compare yourselves, don't you? That is our conditioning from childhood - 'Oh, you must be like your brother', or your great aunt; you must be like the saint, or follow Mao, he's the latest, what he says. So we are always comparing, our education is that in schools, which means all this giving marks and passing examinations. Oh, you don't know what it means to live without comparison, therefore without competition, and therefore non-aggressively, non-competitively, non-violently. The moment you compare yourself with another it is a form of aggression and therefore it is a form of violence. Violence isn't merely going and killing or hitting somebody, it is this comparative spirit - I must be like somebody else, or I must perfect myself; self-improvement is the antithesis of freedom and learning. Are you listening, are you doing all this? So can you find out for yourself, to live a life without comparing and you will see what an extraordinary thing happens to you if you really become aware, choicelessly, what it means to live without comparison, never using the word 'better', never using the word 'I will be'. Do listen to all this because we are slaves to the word 'to be', 'esse', which is I will be somebody sometime in the future.

So comparison, conformity, go together and that does only breeds a suppression, conflict and endless pain. To find a way of living - not a way - a daily living in which there is no comparison. Do it sometime and you will see what an extraordinary thing it is. It frees you from so many burdens. And to be aware of that, that very awareness brings about that quality of mind that is highly sensitive and therefore highly disciplined, because it is constantly learning, not what it wants to learn, or what is pleasurable to learn, what is gratifying to learn, but learning.

So can you become aware of the authority, the following, the obedience, the conformity to a pattern, to tradition, to propaganda, to what other people have said - it doesn't matter who it is - and the tradition, the accumulated experience of your own or of another, of the race or of the family. All that becomes the authority. And where there is authority the mind can never be free to discover whatever there is to be discovered, something entirely timelessly new.

Then, the nature of a mind that is sensitive; a mind that is sensitive has no pattern, it is constantly moving, it is like a river, flowing, and that flow there is no suppression, no conformity, no desire to fulfil and all that rubbish. It is only the mind that is static that says, 'I must fulfil', 'I must become'. Right? Now if this is not clearly, deeply and seriously understood, the nature of a mind that is free and therefore truly religious, freedom from all dependency inwardly, because dependency on something, on a people, on a friend, or on a husband, wife or on some ideation, authority and so on, breeds fear, which we will discuss presently. But it is very important to understand this before we go into all the complicated things of life; that a mind must be completely free from all authority, inwardly, because there is the source of fear. If I depend on you for my comfort, if I depend upon you because you applaud me when I speak, if I depend on you as an escape from my own loneliness, ugliness, stupidity, my own shallowness, pettiness, shoddiness, then depending on you breeds fear, depending on any form of subjective imagination, fantasy, experience, knowledge, does destroy freedom.

Now, after saying all that, I want to find out, don't you, if ones does depend. Because a mind that depends on something is not alone, clean healthy, sane. If the mind depends on Mao on one side, Mao, Lenin and all the people you know on that side, if you depend on them, what kind of mind is yours? Only you have thrown away the old and taken on the new, but the quality of the mind is the same. And on the other side, the opposite unfortunately, is all the religious leaders, from the infinite past to the present, and if you depend on them, look what you are doing to yourself, you are depending on somebody else's authority on what they think is true. And what they think is the truth is not the truth. So you are lost, you are confused. And so out of that confusion we do a great many things, we join this or that, we become activists or meditative, run away to Japan to sit in some Zen school, or India, or this or that.

So when you are aware of all this, please do it, when you are aware of all this, both the left and the right, and the centre, when you are aware of it you are learning, you see what it all implies, a dependency inwardly and therefore there is no freedom, therefore there is fear. And it is only a confused mind that depends, not a clear mind. So being confused you say, 'I must depend', and then you say, 'How am I to be free from dependency?' - which becomes another conflict. Whereas if you observed that a mind that depends must be confused, if you know the truth of that, a mind that depends inwardly on any authority, whether the authority is the word, a symbol, and ideology, a person, when you realize dependency creates confusion, not how to be free of confusion, when you see that very clearly, the truth of that, then you will cease to depend. So your mind becomes extraordinarily sensitive and therefore capable of learning. It is like a child that learns, he is very curious, he wants to find out. And that very sensitivity is the quality of a mind that is constantly learning, therefore disciplining itself without any form of compulsion, conformity. Right!

Is this all somewhat clear? Clarity means not verbally but actually. I can imagine, or think I am very clear. I see very clearly but that clarity is very short living, that quality of clarity, clear perception, comes only when there is no dependency, and therefore there is no confusion, and confusion arises only when there is fear. Can you honestly, seriously, say to yourself, find out whether you are free from authority? That needs tremendous enquiry into yourself, great awareness - doesn't it? And from that clarity there is a totally different kind of action; action that is not fragmentary, that is not divided into political, religious, left or right or centre, Mao or whatever it is. It is a total action.

Well sirs, would you like to ask questions and discuss what we have talked about this morning?

Q: From what you said, it seems to me the same action at one point which can be thought a reaction to some kind of an outward authority; at another point or at the same time by another individual, that same action can be a total action.

K: Quite right sir. Look, sir, intellectually we can spin along, verbally we can beat each other, or explain each other, either way, but that doesn't mean a thing. What to you may be a complete action may appear to me as incomplete action. That is not the point. The point is whether your mind, as a human being, because a human being is the world - you understand? - is not an individual - again that word 'individual', do you know what it means?

'Individual' means indivisible. An individual is one who is undivided in himself, who is non-fragmentary, not broken up, he is whole - 'whole' means sanity, healthy and also 'whole' means holy, H O I Y. You are not that. When you talk about 'I am an individual', you are nothing of the kind.

So to live a life, sir, of no authority, of no comparison, do it and you will find out what an extraordinary thing it is. You are alive, you have tremendous energy, when you are not competing, not comparing, you are not suppressing, you are living and therefore you are sane, whole, and therefore sacred.

Yes sir?

Q: What you are saying is not very clear to me all the time. What can I do?

K: What you say is not very clear all the time. What can I do? I don't know. (Laughter) No, no, don't laugh. Either what is said is not very clear in itself, or you may not understand English properly, or you are not sustaining attention all the time. You know it is very difficult to sustain attention for an hour and ten minutes, sustained, not pick it up occasionally. There are those moments when you are not giving complete attention and then you say, 'By Jove, I haven't quite understood what you are talking about'. Or you don't know English properly. Or what is being said by the speaker is not clear. Now which is it? If you say what you are saying is not clear, we will go over it, we'll explain it ten different ways to make it clear - the speaker can do that. And on your side find out whether you are sustaining attention, maintaining attention all the time, watching, listening; or you go off wandering, you know, vagabonding. Which is it?

Q: Do you think it is possible to learn all the time?

K: Do you think it is possible to learn all the time? You understand the question? Do you understand the question? I want to learn, is it possible to learn all the time? Now when you ask that question you have already made it difficult for yourself. Right? So can I learn all the time - it is impossible. You see by putting a question of that kind you are preventing yourself from learning - right sir, you see the point? Look, you have not understood. Look sir, I am not concerned whether I am going to learn all the time, Ill find out. What I am concerned with, is am I learning? Right? If I am learning I am not concerned with if it is all the time. I don't know if you see this. Then I don't make a problem of it. Then you say, 'My god how am I to give my whole attention all the time?' It is impossible. But if you say, 'Look, I am learning, I am not going to be concerned with whether I am going to learn all the time, all day and all night, but I am learning'. A mind that is learning never puts that question. I don't know if you see this? Then that question becomes irrelevant. If I am learning, I am learning all the time. You don't see it.

Q: You can learn from anything.

K: You can learn from anything. That is, if you are aware you are learning. Look sir, this is very complex, may I go into it a little bit? If you aren't tired, are you?

Can I learn all the time? - which is important here, learning, or all the time? Which is important do you think? Learning. Now, when I am learning I am not concerned with the rest of the time, the time interval, time period. Right? I am only concerned with what I am learning, what I am learning. Right? Now mind goes off, naturally, it gets tired, then it becomes inattentive. Right? Are you following all this? Being inattentive it does all kinds of stupid things. So it is not a question of how to make the mind which is inattentive, to make it become attentive. What is important is for the inattentive mind to become aware that it is inattentive. Have you got it? You don't see it. You understand sir? Look, I am aware, watching everything, watching the movement of the tree, the water, the flow of a mountain, watching myself, watching not correcting, not saying this should be or this should not be, just watching.

Naturally the mind that is watching gets tired. When it gets tired it is inattentive, being inattentive it suddenly becomes aware that it is inattentive, therefore it tries to force itself to become attentive.

Right? Are you following all this? So there is a conflict between inattention and attention. Right? Right? I say, don't do that, but become aware that you are inattentive - that's all. You understand? No.

Q: Could you describe it, when you are aware that you are inattentive?

K: Sir, no, no, no. I am learning. Look, I am learning about myself. Right? I am learning not according to some psychologist or specialist, I am learning, I am watching, and I see something in myself, I don't condemn it, I don't judge it, I don't push it aside, I just watch it. I watch that I am proud - let's take that as an example. I don't say, 'I must put it aside, how ugly to be proud', but I just watch it. As I am watching I am learning. Watching means learning what pride involves, how it has come into being, how stupid it is, I watch it. I can't watch it more than say five or six minutes - if you can, that is a great deal - the next moment it becomes inattentive. Right? Now having been attentive and then knowing what inattention is you struggle to make inattention attentive. Right? Don't you? Don't you do all these things? I said don't do that but watch inattention, become aware that you are inattentive. That's all. Stop there. Don't say you must spend all you time being attentive, but just watch when you are inattentive. Full stop. I don't want to go any further into this because it is really quite complex. Because there is a quality of mind that is all the time awake, all the time watching, and therefore merely watching there is nothing to learn. And that means sir a mind that is extraordinarily quiet. Extraordinarily silent. What has a silent clear mind to learn? I won't go into all that. Yes sir?

Q: Communicating through words, through ideas, couldn't that sometimes become a habit and add to confusion?

K: Couldn't communicating with words, ideas become a habit?

Q: A tradition?

K: A tradition, a repetition. They only become a habit, a tradition, only when words become terribly important. You know there is communion and communication. There must be communication verbally which is to share together whatever we are looking at together, like fear, there must be verbal communication, which means you and the speaker are both at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity observing, co-operating, sharing. That brings about a non-verbal communion, which is not habit. Is that good enough?

Q: How is it possible if you are a total individual to love another individual?

K: How is it possible if you are a total, whole, sane individual, not divided, fragmented, indivisible, how can such a whole human being love another? The other human being is fragmented, is broken up, how can a whole human being love a fragmented human being? Right sir?

Q: How can a whole individual love also a whole individual?

K: How can two whole human beings love each other?

(Laughter). You cannot be whole if you don't know what love is.

Then if you are whole, in the sense we are talking about, undivided in himself, then there is no question of loving another. Sir, have you ever watched a flower by the roadside? It exists, it lives there, it is in the sun, in the wind, in the beauty of light and colour, it doesn't say to you, 'Come and smell me, enjoy me, look at me' - it lives and its very action of living is love.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 21ST JULY 1970

Shall we go on with what we were talking about the other day when we met here? As we were saying it is really quite important to understand this whole business of living. From the moment we are born till we die, we are always in conflict, there is always a struggle, a battle, not only within ourselves, but outwardly, in all our relationships there is strain, there is a strife, there is constant division and a sense of separate individual existence in opposition to the community, in opposition to the most intimate relationships, each one is seeking his own pleasure, secretly or openly pursuing his own ambitions, fulfilment and thereby frustrations, this whole turmoil of what we call existence, living. In this turmoil we try to be creative, if you are gifted you write a book or a poem, compose a picture and so on. All within the pattern of strife, grief and despair, and this is what is considered creative living, going to the moon, if you must, or live under the sea, have wars, this constant bitter strife against man and man, this is what our life is.

It seems to me that we should understand very deeply this question of strife, this struggle, this contradiction, this conflict. I hope you are serious this morning, even though it is bad weather. We want to go into this matter very, very seriously, very deeply if we can, and feel our way into a quality of mind where there is no strife whatsoever, both at the conscious level and also below in the layers that lie under the conscious. After all beauty is not the result of conflict. When you see the beauty of a mountain, or the beauty of a face and the swift running water in that close immediate perception of great beauty, there is never a sense of striving. And our lives are not very beautiful because it's a battle going and coming, and to find out this quality of mind that is essentially beautiful, clear, a mind that has never been touched by strife, seems to me is very important, because in the understanding of that, not verbally, not merely intellectually, but actually live it in our daily life, then perhaps we shall have some kind of peace in the world, and also within ourselves.

So if we could this morning hesitantly and with sensitive watchfulness, perhaps we shall be able to understand this battle and be free of it. What is the root cause of this conflict and contradiction? Please do ask this question of yourself? Don't try to put it into words, give it an explanation, but merely enquire non-verbally, if you can, what is this basis of this contradiction, this division, this strife, this conflict. Either you enquire analytically or you perceive immediately the root of it. Either analytically you unravel bit by bit and come upon the nature and the structure and the cause, and therefore the effect, of this strife between ourselves, between you and the state, between you and the community, between us and they. Either you analytically examine or you perceive the cause of it instantly. I don't know how you are going to discover the cause of it. Now we are going to examine both, the analytical process and the immediate perception. Right? Are we communicating with each other? Yes, may we go on? That is, we want to find out, not only verbally, but factually the root, the basis, the cause of all this contradiction, this conflict, this division. That is what we are going to enquire into. And either that enquiry is intellectual, which is analytical, or perceive the truth of it instantly. (I am glad that train is going by.)

Now let us find out what it means to analyse and thereby perhaps intellectually discover, which is verbally, what is the cause of this conflict? Because once you understand this whole analytical process and see the truth of it or the falseness of it, then you will completely be free of it, for ever, so that your eyes, your mind and your hearth can perceive immediately the truth of it. I don't know if you are following all this? Now, can I go on? We are used to being conditioned to the analytical process, not only in the recent philosophical, psychological research of various specialists and psychologists. The analytical process has become a habit and we are conditioned to live and try to understand this whole complex process of living analytically, intellectually, which doesn't mean we must become its opposite, sentimentally, emotionally, gushing and all the rest of it. But if one understands very clearly the nature and the structure of the analytical process and see the validity or the falseness of it, then we shall have quite a different outlook. Then we shall be able to give the energy which we have given to the analysis, that same energy can be directed in a totally different direction. Right? Are we meeting each other? Can we go on? I really don't know.

What does analysis mean? In that very verbal statement analysis implies a division. Right? There is the analyser and the thing to be analysed, whether you analyse it yourself or if it is done by a profession. In that very structure of analysis there is division, and therefore there is already the beginning of conflict. Please, you really must put your teeth into this? Because we can do tremendous things only when there is great passion. The inward revolution doesn't come about through analysis, the inward revolution demands great passion, great energy, and it is only this passion that can create, bring about a totally different kind of life, in ourselves and in the world, and that is why it is very important to understand this analysis in which the human mind for centuries has been caught. Analysis implies a division between the analyser and the analysed, and in that division there is already the root of conflict. The thing that is to be analysed, which is a fragment of the many other fragments of which we are, one of those fragments assumes the authority of analysis, as the analyser. Right? Please will you do this as we go along? Not just merely listen. As we are explaining, please do it, see what is involved in analysis? As we are explaining, please do it, see what is involved in analysis? As we said, analysis implies division between the analyser and analysed. The analyser is one of the fragments of the many fragments which make up the whole structure of a human being. That analyser, who is a fragment of the many fragments, assumes the authority to analyse. He becomes the censor, he becomes the accumulated knowledge with which he evaluates the good and the bad, what is right and what is wrong, what should be suppressed or what should not be suppressed, and so on, he has assumed the authority of the censor. Right? Are we in touch with each other?

And the second thing is the analyser, when he analyses every analysis must be totally complete, otherwise his evaluation will be partial and therefore his conclusion will also be partial. Right? Then the analyser must examine every thought, every thing which he thinks should be analysed, and that will take time. Right? You may spend, as they do, a whole lifetime analysing, if you have the money, if you have the inclination, if you can find an analyst with whom you are in love and all the rest of it. you can spend you days analysing. At the end of it you are where you were, more things to be analysed. So, in analysis there is the division between the analyser and the analysed. The analyser must analyse so accurately, so completely, otherwise his conclusion will impede the next analysis. Right? And the analytical process takes an infinite time, and during the interval of that time many other things happen. so, when you see the whole structure of analysis then you see it is an actual denial, negation of action. Analysis, the whole nature of analysing is the negation of action. Is there anybody here who is going to object to all this? Probably you will when we question.

Now when you see the whole structure of this analytical process, see what is involved in it, there is the negation of all action, complete action, isn't there? Are you doubting that?

Q: I don't understand what you mean by action?

K: Oh my Lord! All right sir, what does action mean? Action according to an idea, action according to an ideology, action according to one's experience, or knowledge. So there is a division between action and idea, action and ideology, action and knowledge, so action is always approximating itself to the ideal, to the prototype. You are following all this? So action is never complete. And analysis is the negation of action, total action. So if you see the truth or the falseness of this whole process of analysis you will never again analyse. Right? When the mind has seen the futility, the meaninglessness of analysis with all its problems involved, then you will never touch it, the mind will never seek to understand true analysis. Right? That is obvious isn't it? Oh Lord!

Just a minute sir, let me go on, you can ask questions afterwards. So what has happened to the mind that has looked into the process of analysis? It has become very sharp, hasn't it, alive, sensitive, because it has rejected that which we have considered as the way and means of understanding anything? Right?

You know what communication means, sharing together, investigating together - together, moving together, creating together. And are we doing that? Or, are you merely listening, hearing a few set of words, conclusions and agreeing or disagreeing? Which is it, that you are doing? If you very clearly see for yourself, not direct it, not forced, or compelled by argument, reason of another, but actually see for yourself the falseness or the truth of analysis, then your mind is free to look in another direction. Right? You have energy to look somewhere else. But if you are looking in the direction of analysis you will not be able to look in another direction - is that clear?

So what is the other direction? That is to perceive immediately and therefore the immediacy of perception is total action. Now we are going to examine that, we are going to go into that. As we said, analyser and the thing analysed, in that there is division. Right? And we said that any form of division at any level brings about a contradiction and therefore conflict. When I separate myself as a Hindu and you separate yourself as a Catholic, or a Buddhist or a Communist, or whatever it is, this very division breeds conflict. Right? So the division between the observer and thing observed is the root cause of conflict - right? No, sirs, come on. Let's go into it.

When you observe you are always observing from a centre, from a background, from experience, from knowledge. The 'me' observing, the 'me', the Catholic, the Protestant, the Hindu, the Communist, the educated, the specialist and so on, he is observing. So there is a division between himself and the thing observed. Right? You can see this, it doesn't require a great deal of understanding, it is an obvious fact. When you look at a tree there is this division, when you look at your husband, wife, your girl friend, boy friend, there is this division. There is this division between yourself and the community, between yourself and the society. So there is this observer and the thing observed. When there is that division there will inevitably be conflict. Right? That is the root of all conflict, of all strife, of all contradiction. Right?

Now, can you observe without division? If that is the root cause of conflict, then the next question is: can you observe without the censor, without the 'me', without all the experiences, the miseries, the conflicts, the brutalities, the vanities, the pride, the despair, which is the you, can you observe without all that? Are you following all this? Which means, can you observe without the past? The past memories, remembrances, conclusions, hopes, all the background, can you observe without that background, because that background divides - right? - as the observer and the observed. So the question then is: can you observe without the background? Have you ever done it? Do it now please. Play with it. To look at the tree, the mountain, outwardly, objectively, the outward things, the colours, listen to the noise of the river, look at the lines of the mountains, the beauty of it, the clarity of it. That is fairly easy to do without the past, without the 'me' observing. But can you look at yourself inwardly, without the observer? Do it please. Look at yourself, your conditioning, your education, your way of thinking, your conclusions, your prejudices, to look at it, or to look at them without any kind of condemnation or explanation or justification, just to observe. When you so observe there is no observer and therefore no conflict.

That way of living is entirely, totally, different from the other. It is not the opposite of the other. It is not the reaction of the other, but entirely different. And in this there is tremendous freedom, and therefore there is an abundance of energy and passion. And this total observation, which is not partial, is complete action. You know it is like looking at a map, the total map, not where you want to go, but first observing the total movement of the map. And when you have completely understood the map, looked at it completely, then your action will always be clear.

So one finds out for oneself as a human being that it is completely possible to live without any kind of conflict. You know, sir, this implies an enormous revolution in oneself. And that is the only revolution. Every form of physical revolution, political, economic, social, outward revolution, always ends up on dictatorship, either the dictatorship of the bureaucrats or the dictatorships of the idealists, the Utopian people, or some conqueror. Whereas when you have this inward, complete, total revolution, which is the outcome of understanding all conflict, which is the understanding of division between the observer and the observed, then there is a totally different kind of living.

Now please let us go into it further, if you will, by asking questions about it.

Q: How can you divorce yourself from problems when you live in a world full of problems?

K: Wait, wait, How can you divorce yourself from the world which is full of conflict, how can you separate yourself from the world which is full of conflict? Is that it?

Q: Yes.

K: Let's find out. Are you different from the world? You are the world aren't you?

Q: I am a person who lives in the world.

K: I don't understand, sir.

Q: I am just a person who lives in the world.

K: Oh, just a person who lives in the world, disassociated, unrelated to all the events that are taking place in the world?

Q: No, I am part of that. The thing is how can I divorce myself from it?

K: You cannot. You cannot possibly divorce yourself from the world, you are the world. If you live in Christendom, you are conditioned by the culture, by the religion, by the education, by the industrialization, by all the conflicts of wars - you are that. You cannot possibly separate yourself from the world. They have tried to, withdraw from the world, the monks, enclose themselves in a monastery, but they are the result of the culture in which they live, and they want to escape from that culture by withdrawing from it, by devoting themselves to what they consider the truth, to the ideal of Jesus and so on and so on. How can you separate yourself from the world when you are the world, you have made the world?

Q: How can I observe these things with all these worries on my mind, because I've got other things on my mind, getting my house, making money on my mind - how can I look into myself. I have to do other things and how can I look into myself?

K: Sir, sir, look, you are talking with your head down. I can't possibly hear what you are saying, would you make it brief?

Q: How can I look into myself with all these worried on my mind, with making money, with other things on my mind?

K: How can i look into myself when I have to make money, when I have to have a house, when I have to have this and that. Is that it? How can I, living in this world, living in this world implies earning a livelihood, getting a house, a flat or living some place, married, children, job, all that - how can I with all that going on round me and in me look at myself? Is that right? Is that the question sir?

Q: Yes.

K: How do you look at your job, getting a job, how do you consider it?

Q: I consider it as a means to survive in the world.

K: Survival in the world. So you say at any price I must survive. Right?

Q: Not that. But I must have a job.

K: Wait sir, wait. I must have a job in order to survive. I must have a livelihood in order to survive. And the whole structure of society, whether here, or in Russia, etc., is based on this - survival at any price, doing something which society has set up. Right? Right, sir?

Q: Yes

K: So you are concerned with survival, and all of us are. Now how can one survive completely, safely, lastingly, when there is division between ourselves? When you are European and I am an Asiatic, when you are German - you understand - when there is division between ourselves, each one competing to be secure, to survive and therefore battling with each other, not only individually but collectively, nationally, how can there be survival? There is a survival temporarily. Right? Oh, for god's sake, come on!

So our question is, not survival, but whether it is possible to live in this world without division, when there is no division we shall survive completely, without fear.. Sir, look! There have been religious wars. Right? The Catholic against the Protestant. And at that time, and there have been appalling wars between the two, they were saying 'We must survive'. They never said to themselves, 'Look, how absurd this division is between the Catholic and the Protestant' - which is a matter of conditioning, you believe this and I believe that. So if we could put our whole energy, our thinking, our feeling, our passion into finding out whether it is possible to live without this division, then we shall live completely, in complete security. But you are not interested in all that. You just want to survive. You don't - your survival is in spite of non-survival. Oh, sirs, this is so simple! Look, sir. Governments, sovereign governments are separate, each with its own army, navy, airforce, they have divided the world this way, and each at each other's throat, prestige and all the rest of it - economic survival.

Now computers, without the politicians, in the hands of good men, can alter this whole structure of the world, without the politicians, without the divisions. But we are not interested in all that. You are really not interested in the unity of mankind. And that's the only problem politically. And that can only be brought about when there is no politician at all, when there are no sovereign governments at all, when there are no different, separate religious sects and you, who are listening to this, you are the people to do it.

Q: Does it not need conscious analysis to arrive at that conclusion?

K: Wait. Is it a conclusion? Is it an analysis? You have just observed this fact. You have just observed. Look at it, how the world is divided into coloured men, into sovereign governments, Hinduism, Buddhism, Catholics, communists - this division - is that analysis? You can see it.

Q: Don't you think that in order to change all that we also need an outward revolution?

K: Don't you see - or don't you realize to change all that, there must not only be inward revolution but also outward revolution. What do you say sirs?

Q: No.

K: Please, don't say no.

Q: Aren't they the same thing?

K: Wait, wait. Listen to the question. Inward revolution and at the same time outward revolution. At the same time. Not one first and then the other. That is inward revolution first and outward revolution afterwards; or outward revolution first and the inward revolution. Right? It must be simultaneous. It must be instant. Right? How can that take place? Both inward revolution and outward revolution, without emphasizing this or that, how can that take place? That can only take place instantly when you, who are listening, see the complete truth that the inward revolution is the outward revolution. That inward revolution is the outer, and the outer is the result of the inner. They are not two separate. When you see that then it takes place and so - wait a minute sir - so do you see that? - Not see intellectually, verbally, ideally, but is there, in you, complete inward revolution? If there is not and you want outer revolution then you are going to bring chaos in the world, and there is chaos in the world. Yes sir, just a minute.

Q: You always speak of governments or churches and nationalism and all these people have what we consider as the power.

K: Sir, power. The politician wants power, the priest wants power, the commissar wants power.

Q: They have it.

K: The bureaucrats want power and they have it. And in their power lies education. Wait, sir, listen to all this. And each one of us wants power. Right? Don't you want power? Over your wife or your husband, your conclusion, you think this is right and you want - do you follow? - every human being wants some kind of power. So first don't attack the power that is invested in others but be free of the power in yourself and then you will act totally different. I know we want to attack the power outwardly, the outward power, tear that power away from the hands of those who have it and give it to somebody else. We don't say to ourselves, let us be free of all idea, feeling of dominance, possession - you follow? - you don't say that. If you did actually apply your whole mind to be free of every kind of power, which means position, prestige, function without status, then you will bring about quite a different society.

Yes sir?

Q: If you are hungry you can't even begin to deal with these questions.

K: If you are hungry you cannot possibly deal with any of these questions.

Q: Because survival depends on....

K: I understand sir, we have been through that. If you are hungry you can't deal with these questions. If you are really hungry you wouldn't be here. (Laughter)

Q: We are very small...

K: Wait. Now wait a minute. We are not hungry and therefore we have time to listen, time to observe and you say we are a small group of people, what can we do, a small - like a drop in the bucket. Right? What can we do? Is that the right question? Is that the valid question when you are confronted with this enormous complex problem of the world in which we live. What can I, as a human being, one individual, one - you know - who have understood, what can I do? Is that the right question? Will you ever put that question if you are really confronted with the problem, the world and you, you are living entirely differently, would you put that question? Then you will not be concerned, you will be just working. You understand sir? It is only when you say: what can I do? There is already a note of despair in that.

Q: Not really, we are talking about solutions. Solutions, there are a lot of people hungry and if they are hungry they have got to take immediate means to survive.

K: Right. So a lot of people who are hungry, they have got to take immediate means to survive.

Q: What does all this mean to them?

K: What does it all mean to them? To them who are hungry.

Nothing. When I am hungry sir, I want food. Right? All this has very little meaning. Right? So what is your question?

Q: My question is: we are a minority here, a favoured minority.

K: Yes sir. We are the minority. A small group and the vast majority in India, in Asia, in every part of Europe, England, America, are really hungry. How can we, or what we are saying here, affect all these people. Right? It depends on you. No?

Q: That's right.

K: It depends on you, what you do. Even the small minority, a small minority have created an enormous revolution in the world because the minority in themselves have changed. You are concerned with the world and the misery of the world, the poverty, the degradation, the starvation that is going on in the world, and you say, what can I do? Either you will thoughtlessly join an outward revolution, try to break it all up and create a new kind of social structure and in the process of that you will again establish the same pattern in a different way, whereas what we are saying is, consider total revolution, total, not partial, not physical, a total revolution which is both the inward structure of the psyche, and which will act entirely different in relationship on which society is based. Right?

Q: You speak as though inward revolution happens suddenly, and it doesn't really take place that way at all?

K: You speak as though inward revolution happens suddenly, like instant coffee, and it doesn't really take place that way at all. That's the question. Do you think the inward revolution is a matter of time? Gradually change inwardly. Please sir, be careful, this is a very complex question. We have accepted and it is our conditioning that through gradual revolution, inwardly there will be a change. And we are going to examine, does revolution inwardly take place gradually, step by step, which is analytical. You understand? Or does it take place instantly when you see the truth of this? So when you see a danger, instant danger, there is instant action isn't there? You don't say, is my action gradual, revolutionary, analytical, this or that, there is immediate action when there is danger. Now, we are pointing out all the dangers, the danger of analysis, the danger of time, the danger of postponement, the danger of division. Now when you see the real danger of it, not verbally, actually, physically, psychologically, see the danger of it as you would see the danger of meeting a wild animal, there is instant action, and we are talking about that instant revolution, when you see danger, and to see that danger you need a sensitive, alert, watchful mind. Then you will say, how am I to have a watchful mind, a sensitive mind, again you will be caught in the gradualness of it. But when you say, it is a necessity in front of danger, and society is danger, you are danger, all the things involved in you is dangerous. When you realize that, there is a total action.

Q: How can you solve any complex problems without analysis, I mean for instance, research in cancer?

K: Now wait sir, look. How can you solve any physical problem like cancer without analysis - you can't. They are spending millions and millions all over the world trying to find out what is the cause of cancer, and trying to find a means to stop it. Right? That needs time, examination, analysis, all kinds of brutalities towards animals and so on. Is that what we are talking about? We are talking about a mind that perceives danger instantly, because we have this habit this conclusion, this tradition of analysis which is postponement of action, inwardly.

Q: Isn't it possible to analyse without approving or condemning?

K: Is it not possible to analyse without condemning or justifying.

Q: Just looking.

K: If you don't condemn or justify or analyse but just look, you have done it.

Q: Is it possible to achieve a state of oneness knowing that there is starvation and cruelty in the world?

K: We have gone back to the same question, haven't we sir? Oneness is not something to be achieved, when you say achieve it implies time. Right? Look at it sir - achievement implies time. I am going to achieve that, I am going to achieve unity, which involves time doesn't it? The very idea of achievement involves time, and we say the very danger of that, see the danger of that, and therefore there is no sense of achievement, but seeing the facts, seeing 'what is', and when you see 'what is' then you have the energy, the passion to change, to bring about a different world.

Is that enough?

Q: In order to live you have to eat and as long as you are aware of this involvement you are going to eat, you are dividing yourself from others, you are thinking of yourself.

K: That's right.

Q: How can you cope with this division?

K: How can you cope with this division in yourself when you are looking at others from a particular point of view, we explained this madam just now. Will you do something which is very simple but requires considerable attention and sensitivity, to look at something, a tree, your friend, without this division, just to observe, which means care, which means affection, which means love? Do it.

Q: We can't observe all the time.

K: I said observe, I said observe without the observer. We are always observing, but our observation is based on our conclusion, on our memories, on our censorship, judgement and we are saying be alive to the danger of this censorship. To be alive to the danger is not a matter of time.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 23RD JULY 1970

Aren't you all very hot? I suppose we cannot have the side open?
All right. If we may we will go on with what we were talking about last Tuesday when we met here? We are inclined when we face all the many innumerable problems to solve each problem, or at least try to, by itself. If it is a sexual problem treat it as though it were something totally unrelated to all other problem. Or when there is the problem of starvation right throughout the world we try politically or economically or socially to solve that problem of starvation, or a problem of violence by itself. I wonder why we do this, why we try to solve each problem by itself? There is violence and this violence is spreading throughout the world, in various forms and the powers that be, the politician, the priest, the established order, try to solve, or individually, that problem by itself, as though violence was something apart from the rest of life. We do not consider the problem as a whole, every problem is related to other problems, it is not isolated. Violence as one can see in oneself, is part of that animal inheritance in all of us, we are animals, a great deal of us, part of us, and without understanding the whole structure of the human being, to merely try to solve violence by itself only leads to further violence. I think this must be clearly understood by each of us that no problem, and there are thousands of problems, at least appear to be all separate different problems, and we never seem to see that they are all interrelated, you cannot possibly solve one problem in isolation by itself. When you go into the question of violence, to try to end violence, through will, through war, through various forms of compulsion, you breed other forms of aggression. And we have to deal with life which has so many inter - related problems, not separate, not isolated, but a continuous movement of many, many, many problems, many crises, small or big. Right?

Please let us go into this very carefully, because unless we understand this, when we are going to discuss and talk over together the question fear, love, death, meditation and reality and all that, unless you understand how all this is interrelated, death, love, reality, the beauty of life, the ecstasy, the thing that is immeasurable, so extraordinarily vast, that is not separate from our daily problems. So if you say, I am only concerned with meditation, and with truth, you will never find it, but if you understand how each problem is interrelated and that each problem cannot possibly be solved by itself, like starvation, it cannot be stopped by itself, it is a problem, political, economic, social, religious, psychological, the division between man and man, nationality against nationality, and so on, when that is all understood there will be no problem of starvation. So if we could go into this very, very carefully why human minds, that is our minds, your mind, tries to solve each problem by itself. I am sure you have many problems, economic, social, personal relationship, problem of suffering, not only physical, but psychological, problems of intense sorrow, not only personal sorrow but the sorrow of the world, the misery the confusion, and if you try to resolve each problem and try to find an answer to a particular problem, then you are only bringing about further division, further conflict, further misery.

Now why do we do this? Why does the mind try to solve each problem as though it was unrelated to other problems? The other day somebody asked, what about starvation, as though by itself, it is the result of human relationship, of human condition, of human education, of this constant division between people, both economic, social, personal. So to understand this very, very deeply and so completely, we must ask, why do we do this? I do not know if you have asked that question, ever. And if you do, if you are at all serious you must have asked it, if you are mature, not in age, maturity does not mean age, you can be mature when you are twenty both psychologically, inwardly, so any person who is serious and mature, must have asked this question: why the human mind, the brain always divides, me and mine, you and yours, we and they, on one side, god, religion and politics, on the other side, and so on, this constant division, and trying to solve each problem by itself, isolated why? No don't answer me please, because I don't want to break it up, you can ask at the end of the talk if have the patience, and if you don't mind allowing me to talk for twenty or thirty or forty minutes, first, I hope you don't mind.

In asking that question we have to also find out, what is the function of thought? What is the meaning, substance, structure of thought, because it may be thought that divides, and to find an answer through thought, through reason, obviously must separate each problem and try to find an answer for itself. We are asking why the human brain and mind, the totality of one's being why we are always inclined to solve our issues separately, as though it was unrelated. They want a physical revolution to upset the social order in order to bring about a better order and they forget all the implications of physical revolution. Dictatorship, either of a group or bureaucracy and so on and they forget the whole psychological nature of man. So one has to ask this question, why? And in asking the question, what is the response? Is it the response of thought or is it the response of understanding the totality of this immense, vast, structure of human life? Am I making my question clear, if not I will go into it?

I want to find out why this division exists. We went into it the other day as the observer and the observed, let us forget that, put that aside and approach it differently. Does thought create this division, and if we find thought does, and thought tries to find an answer to a particular problem, it is still a problem separated from other problems. Are we going together? No, don't please agree with me, it is not a question of agreement, it is a question of seeing for yourself the truth of it, or the falseness of it, not accepting - and if I may add here under no circumstances accept what the speaker says at any time, with regard to what we are talking about, not with regard to you doing something or other outside the tent. There is no authority, at least when we are talking together about these matters, with me, neither you have the authority nor the speaker, we are both of us investigating, observing, looking, learning, therefore there is no question of agreement or disagreement.

One has to find out, if thought by its very nature and structure does not divide life into many, many, many problems, and if we try to find an answer through thought it is still an isolated answer, and therefore breeding further confusion, further misery. So first of all, one has to find out for oneself, freely without any bias, without any conclusion, if thought operates this way. Because you see, most of us try to find an answer intellectually or emotionally, or try to say intuitively. When one used the word 'intuition' one must be terribly careful of that word, because in that word lies great deception, because one can have intuition dictated by one's own hopes, fears, bitterness, longing, wishes, therefore one has to beware of that word, and never use it. So we try to find an answer intellectually or emotionally, as though the intellect was something separate from the emotion and the emotion something separate from the physical response and so on. And as our whole education and culture is based on this intellectual approach to life, all our philosophies are based on the intellectual concepts, which is rubbish. All our social structure is based on this division and our morality is too, so if thought divides, how does it divide? You are following all this, please do it as we are talking and not just play with me. Actually observe it in yourself, it is much more fun, and you will see that an extraordinary thing you will discover for yourself. You will be a light to yourself, you will be an integrated human being, not looking to somebody else to tell you what to do, what to think, and how to think.

So, does thought divide? And what is thought? Thought can be extraordinarily reasonable, reason consecutively, and it must logically, objectively, sanely, because it must function perfectly, like a computer ticking over without any hindrance, without any conflict. Reason is necessary, sanity is part of that reasoning, capacity. And what is this thinking, what is thought?

Can thought be ever new, fresh, because every problem is new, fresh, because every problem is new, fresh? Every human problem, not the mechanical, scientific, every human problem is always new. And the life being new, thought tries to understand it, tries to alter it, tries to translate it, tries to do something about it. So one must find out for oneself, what is thought? And why does thought divide? If we really deeply felt, loved each other, not verbally but really, and that can only take place where there is no conditioning, when there is no centre as the 'me' and the 'you', then all this division comes to an end. But thought apparently, which is the activity of the intellect, the brain, cannot possibly love. It can reason, logically, objectively, efficiently. To go the moon thought must have operated in the most extraordinary way, but whether going to the moon is worthwhile or not, that is a different point, whether it is insanity, or logical conclusion of technology. So thought has to be understood. And we asked whether thought can see anything new, or is there new thought, or is thought always old? And when it faces a problem of life which is always new, and it cannot see the newness of it, because thought observes it first, and therefore tries to translate the thing which it has observed in terms of its own conditioning. Are we getting along together? Are we? Right sir? May I go on?

So thought is necessary, it must function, logically, sanely, healthily, objectively, non-emotionally, non-personally, and yet that very thought divides as the 'me' and not the 'me', and tries to solve the problem of violence by itself, as though unrelated to all other problems of existence. So thought, which is the past - thought is always the past, if we had no tape recorder as the brain, which has accumulated all kinds of information, experience, personal collective and so on, if you hadn't that brain you would not be able to think, you would not be able to respond, and so thought is the past. Right? Do we see that, not verbally but actually? So the past meeting the new, the new issue must translate in terms of the past, and therefore division. You are following? Have you got it?

You are asking why thought divides, why thought interprets? If thought is the result of the past, and thought is the result of yesterday, with all the information, knowledge, experience, memory and so on, thought operates on a problem, and divides that problem as though it was something separate from the rest of the other problems. Right? You are not quite sure. I am going to make you quite sure, not because I want to assert myself, which is silly, or my argument is better than yours, which is equally silly, but we are trying to find out the truth of it, actually 'what is'. Now leave everything aside for the moment and observe your thinking. Thought is the response of the past. Right? If you had no past, there would be no thought, there would be a state of amnesia. Right? The past is the thought and therefore the past will inevitably divide life as the present and the future. Right? As long as there is the past as thought that very past must divide life into time as the past and present and the future. Right?

Q: (In Italian).

K: Just follow this, I am going to go into it step by step, don't jump ahead of me. You are not pursuing it you are going ahead of your problem. I have a problem of violence, I want to understand it completely, totally, so that the mind is entirely free from violence altogether, completely, and it can only understand it by understanding what is the structure of thought. It is thought that is breeding violence, my house, my property, my wife, my husband, my country, my god, my belief, which is utter nonsense. Who is doing this? This everlasting me opposed to the rest. Right? Who is doing it? Education, society, the establishment, the church? Wait, wait, don't say no, they are all doing it, because I am part of all that. Right? You see, you don't proceed, you don't see this. And thought which is matter, thought which is the result of memory, memory is in the very structure and the very cell of the brain, which is the past, which is of time, and so when the brain operates, whether psychologically, socially, economically or religiously, it must invariably operate in terms of time, the past according to its conditioning. Right? You are following all this? Please do.

So I am asking myself, thought is essential, it must function absolutely logically, completely objectively, impersonally, and yet I see how thought divides. Right? Psychologically as well as in time. Right? I am not urging you, pushing you to agree, do you see this? So thought must inevitably divide. Look what has happened. Thought says nationalism is pretty rotten, it has led to all kinds of war and mischief, let us have brotherhood, let us all be united, thought. Right? Thought finds a league of nations or united nations or this or that, thought is still operating, separating, but maintaining the separation in total: you who are an Italian, you keep your Italian, Sovereignty and so on and so on. Right? Talks about brotherhood and yet keeps separate, which is hypocrisy, that is the function of thought itself to play double games with itself. Are you following all this?

So thought is not the way out, which doesn't mean kill the mind. Right? So, then what is it that sees every problem as it arises as a total problem. Right? You are meeting me? If one has a sexual problem it is a total problem, related to culture, to character, to various other forms of issues of life, not by itself. Now what is the mind that sees each problem as a whole problem, not a fragment of a total problem? Are you getting all this, my question? Am I making myself clear? It's very hot isn't it?

The churches, the various religions have tried it, they say, 'Seek god and everything will be solved'. As though god, according to them, is separate from life. So there has been this constant division, and I say to myself, observing this, I don't read books or anything but if you just observe life and you will learn more than from any book, both outwardly and inwardly, if you know how to look - then what is it that looks at life as a whole? Right? You have got it? Are we proceeding? Right sir? What is it? Knowing the breadth, the efficiency, the vastness of thought, and knowing, observing that thought does inevitably divide as the 'me' and the 'not me', and the brain, which is the result of time, and therefore the past, and when all that structure of thought is in operation it cannot possibly see the whole, so what is it that sees life as a whole, not broken up into fragments? You have got my question clear?

Q: (In Italian) There still remains a question.

K: We have understood but there remains a question - still there is a question. Right? Now who is putting the question? Thought? Inevitably. You are caught sir. Please sir let me finish and you can ask all the questions you want, afterwards. When you say - please listen to this - I have understood but yet there remains a question, is that possible? When you have understood what thought does, completely, at every level, at the highest level, at the lowest level, when you see what thought does and you say, 'I have understood that very well', then what is it when you say there is a question more, then who is it that is asking that question? There is only one question, which is: this brain, the whole nervous system, the mind which covers all of that, it says, 'I have understood the nature of thought'. The next step is not a question - the next step is: can this mind look at life, with all its vastness, complexity, with its apparently unending sorrow, can the mind see this thing as an entire whole? That is the only question. And thought is not putting that question, mind is putting that question because it has observed the whole structure of thought, and knows the relative value of thought and therefore is able to say: can the mind look with an eye that is never spotted by the past?

Now we are going to go into that. Can the mind, the brain, which is the result of time, experience, a thousand forms of influence, accumulated knowledge, all that has been collected through time as the past, can that mind, that brain be completely still to observe life which may have problems? You understand now my question? Are you all tired in this heat? Please don't go to sleep, this is really a very serious question we are asking, this is not just an amusement, an entertainment. One must give one's energy, capacity, vitality, passion, life to this, to find out, not just sit there and ask me questions. You have to give your life to this to find out, because this is the only response, the only way out of this terrible brutality, violence, sorrow, degradation, everything that is corrupt. Can the mind, the brain, which is itself corrupt through time, can all that be quiet so that it can see life as a whole and therefore no problem? Right? When you see something as a whole, how can there be a problem? A problem only arises when you see life fragmentarily. Do see the beauty of that. When you see life as a whole then there is no problem whatsoever. It is only a mind and a heart and a brain that are broken up as fragments, they create the problems. The centre of this fragment is the 'me', the 'me' is brought about through thought, which has no reality by itself. The 'me', 'my' house, 'my' furniture, 'my' bitterness, 'my' disappointment, 'my' desire to become somebody, the 'me' is the product of thought - 'my' sexual appetites, 'my' bitterness 'my' anxiety, 'my' guilt - the 'me', which is the product of thought, divides. And can the mind look without the 'me'? Right? You are following this? Not being able to do this, to look at life without the 'me', that very 'me' says: 'I will dedicate myself to Jesus' - to Buddha, to this, to that - you understand? I will become the communist who will be concerned with the whole of the world. The 'me' identifying itself with what it considers to be the greater is still part of the 'me'. Right?

So the question arises: can the mind, the brain, the heart and whole being observe without the 'me'. The 'me' which is the result of thought, the 'me' is the past, there is no 'me' in the present. The present is not of time. So can the mind be free of the 'me' to look at the whole vastness of life? It can, completely and utterly. Only it can when you have really, fundamentally, with your heart, with all your being, have understood the nature of thinking. If you haven't given your mind, your attention, everything you have, to find out what is thought, the way of thinking, you will never be able to find out, you will never be able to observe without the 'me'. And therefore if you cannot observe without the 'me' the problems will go on. One problem opposing another problem. Look what they are doing in the world. If you let loose a madman, a neurotic, he couldn't make things as bad as they are now. And these politicians, these religious groups, these economists and all the rest of them, they are creating this madness: the west against the east, you know what is happening. And all these problems will come to an end, I assure you, when man lives a different life altogether, when the mind can look at the world as a total movement.

Now sir, let's proceed. Take a minute, take a minute. There is time, patience! You must have a minute and I must also have a minute. Right? Right sir?

Q: You were asking in the beginning of the talk what made us try to solve problems separately and isn't urgency one of the reasons which make us try to solve problems separately. For instance, if the house burns I have to get out of the house. If in the world things are so urgent...

K: We want to solve the problems right away, urgently. As the house burns we act immediately. As we said, if you see the danger you act. In that action there is no impatience, there is not a question of urgency, you act. Please watch it sir! The urgency and the demand for action immediately can take place only when you see the danger, the danger of the 'me' as thought, dividing the world into this mess. When you see the total danger of it, and the seeing is the urgency and the action. Look sir, if you really saw starvation - we have been brought up in starvation, not you people, we in India, we know what it means, having very little food to eat - and see how the starvation has been brought about - callousness of people, governments, the inefficiency of the politicians, they must always be inefficient because they are concerned with their party, with which they identify their own petty little arrogance. And this is happening all over the world. And you see the nature of it, and when you see the nature of it, what do you do? Tackle one starvation by itself? Or, do you say, look this whole thing is a psychological issue, which is centred in the 'me', brought about by thought? Unless that is completely, totally understood, starvation in different forms, not only physical starvation but the human starvation of having no love, not seeking love, you will then find the right action. The very urgency of change is change, not the change that will come about through urgency. I don't know if you see that.

Q: You seem to say that thought has to function and then you say at the same time it can't.

K: You seem to say thought must function logically, non-personally and yet thought must be quiet. How can these two take place? Is that the question?

Sir, do you actually see or understand the nature of thinking? Not according to me or to a specialist, but do you yourself see how thought works? Look sir, when you are asked a question which is utterly familiar to you, your response is immediate, isn't it? Your name, and you reply quickly, because you are quite familiar with that. Ask a little more complicated question and you take a little more time. Right? Please, do it - don't you? Naturally. Ask a question to which the brain has not found an answer, after having searched all the memories and the books and all the rest of it, it says, 'I don't know'. Right? It has used thought to say 'I don't know'. I don't know if you are following all this? You are following this? Have you got the answer? Oh, no! When you say, 'I don't know', your mind is not seeking, not waiting, not expecting, I don't know. That is entirely different from the mind which operates with knowledge. I wonder if you are following all this. So can the mind remain completely free of the known, and yet operate functionally in the field of the known? Do you understand what I am saying? The two are not divided. Oh, Lord, you have never done these things. Sir, look, when you want to discover something new, as the man who wanted to discover the jet propulsion, he had tremendous technological knowledge of the piston. Right? - internal combustion machinery, tremendous acquaintance with it. He had to put that knowledge aside to find something entirely new. If he carried on with the old memories he couldn't have found the new. So seeing the new can take place only when there is freedom from the known, and that freedom can be maintained constantly, from the known. You have never done these things therefore you are just open mouthed and listening! Just a minute, sir. Which means sir, for the mind to live in complete silence and in nothingness, and that complete nothingness and silence is so vast, and out of that silence it can use knowledge, technically work things out, and so also it can observe the whole of life out of that silence, without the 'me'.

Q: You were kind of admitting in the beginning of the talk that to want to change things from the outside would kind of lead us to a dictatorship, a group, or person. Don't you think we are now living under the dictatorship of money, industry?

K: Sure, understood. When you implied that if there is a change, a physical revolution - (noise of trains) thank the Lord for the trains! - you implied if there is physical revolution we will end up in a dictatorship, either in a group, or a person, or a bureaucracy, but aren't we now living in the dictatorship of businessmen, the politicians, the priests and so on? Of course. Where there is authority, there is dictatorship. And to bring about a social, religious, a human change, there must be first understanding of this whole structure of thought as the 'me' which is seeking power, whether it is me or the other who is seeking power. Can the mind live without seeking power? Go on, answer this sir.

Q: Isn't it natural to seek power?

K: Is it natural to seek power? Of course it is so-called natural, so is the dog seeking power over other dogs. It is all right there, poor thing it probably doesn't know any better. But we are supposed to be cultured, educated, intelligent. And we apparently, after these millennia, have not learnt to live without power.

Q: I wonder whether the mind can put a question to itself that it doesn't already know.

K: Can the mind put a question to itself, and the answer does it not know already? Of course. When the mind, as the 'me', or as the separate thought, puts a question about itself, not about the moon and technological things, already it has found the answer because it is talking about itself; it is ringing the same bell with a different hammer, a wooden hammer or a steel hammer, but it is the same bell.

Is that enough for today?

Q: Can we act without a 'me', or do we then live in contemplation?

K: Can we act without a 'me' and does that mean living in contemplation? Can you live in contemplation? Who is going to give you your food? Who is going to give you your clothes? Who is going to nourish you? Can you live in isolation, in contemplation? You know, the monks and the various tricksters of religions have done all this. There are people in India who say, 'I live in contemplation, feed me, clothe me, bathe me, I am so disconnected'. That's all so utterly immature. You cannot possibly isolate yourself. You are always in relationship with the past, or with the things around you. And to live in isolation, calling, it contemplation, is mere escape, self-deception. Right sirs, that's enough.

SAANEN 1ST DIALOGUE WITH YOUNG PEOPLE 21ST JULY 1970

This is supposed to be a young people's meeting. And they are supposed to sit in front and the older people, like us, sit back!

So what shall we - I am asking the younger people, not of my age, but less, what they would like to talk about this morning, to talk over together.

Q: Does complete awareness imply a total indifference to all the things about us, except to that with which we are immediately confronted?

K: Does complete awareness imply total indifference to all the things about us.

Q: No, to all the things with which we are not confronted immediately.

K: Does total awareness mean a complete indifference to all other things except to that with which we are immediately confronted? Is that what you want to talk about? It doesn't matter, let's ask half a dozen questions and then we will see what comes out of it.

Q: I think that a lot of us are concerned with social problems, not only the problem of starvation but there are lots of problems which are urgent, like people accumulating bombs to destroy the other ones, like the attitude of man towards business and industry. And all these problems need, I think, urgent solutions. Can we really wait until everybody has passed his personal revolution to make another kind of revolution?

K: There needs to be a great many social changes. People accumulating bombs to destroy others, the business world which is so corrupt and so on, social injustice, and the various problems of society, must they wait until the individual, you, are free himself from his own limitations, miseries, suffering. Any other questions?

Q: Well, do totally different individuals, that is completely integrated individuals, perceive the same fact in the same way, or are they different?

K: If each individual freed himself, would each individual be different from the other, or in his actions, different. Any other?

Q: There is a problem which several of us are concerned with: what to do with our lives.

K: Several of us are concerned with what to do with our lives. We are young, just beginning to be aware of all the difficulties, the corruption, the various struggles that are going on in the world. What is one to do? Yes sir?

Q: You talk about closing the gap between us and the world so that we no longer have the distinction of the observer and the observed, or thought which by its nature divides. And you have always talked in terms of vision, which I find to be the most distancing of the senses. You are much closer to something if you can touch it, or smell it, or taste it, than if you see it. And I am wondering if you can also close the gap, except in action when you are really working in the world rather than draw back in a way to look at it - to look always draws you back.

K: Correct me if I repeat your question wrong wrongly. Please correct it. To close the gap between the observer and the observed, does it not mean a certain amount of withdrawal from the world. And it is much easier, more acute, definite when there is action which brings us face to face with this division. And one can observe, visually it is more difficult, but would it not be easier to bridge this gap between the observer and the observed when there is direct contact, direct touch, direct action. That's right, sir, isn't it. Any other question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I didn't quite catch it sir.

Q: Isn't there a danger of the cessation of thought, etc., could you discuss it from the point of view of the biological functioning?

K: Could you discuss the cessation of thought, and the activities of thought and so on in relation to the biological functioning, the actual physical existence. Right?

Q: Sometimes when I feel I have got awareness I find social relationships almost meaningless. (Inaudible)

K: I haven't understood that question, sir. Sorry.

Q: I'll simplify it.

K: Make it simple.

Q: Sometimes when I find myself being aware I find all social interreactions and relationships rather meaningless.

K: Now, when I am aware, he is saying all his social interactions, social relationships rather meaningless. Now is that enough?

Q: The question of bliss - what is it? I want to know in this world of complete brutality, if it is possible for a person to live in that state of consciousness all the time?

K: Can a person live in this world with all its brutality, violence, contradiction, social upheaval and so on, in complete bliss. Right?

Now may we begin with that question first, and then bring all the other things into it. What are we going to do with our life. May we begin with that and gradually bring all the other questions into it, which I will try to do as we go along.

Q: Can we also talk about relationship?

K: Ah, he wants to talk about relationship, between human beings, between nature and himself. Let's begin.

What am I going to do if I am young with my life. Seeing what the world is, I have to earn a livelihood, I can't go around begging - perhaps in India you could, if you put on a sannyasi, a monk robe, it is the tradition in India you can go from village to village to village and they will feed you, clothe you and look after you.

Q: Why can't you go round begging?

K: Why can't you go round begging. All right, if you like it! There's nothing to prohibit you, or prevent you from begging. Except perhaps in certain countries law, vagrancy and so on, will not allow it. But that's up to you. There is neither right or wrong: in India it is the common tradition to go from house to house begging. And nobody thinks the worst, quite the contrary. That's partly religious tradition there.

Q: What about here?

K: Ah, talking about it here in this country, in Switzerland, try it!

Q: I have been living for four years begging.

K: All right. Perfect!

Q: Why don't you do it?

K: Wait a minute. The question is, why don't I do it. Why don't I go round begging. How do you know I don't? (Laughter) One moment. Look sir, don't make it a laughing matter. It is quite funny. I have no money of my own, people give it to me, clothes or whatever it is. And I have lived like that for forty five years, or more - what are we talking about, sixty years. So that's that. Now let's get going.

What am I to do, being young, alive, fairly active physically, and half intelligent, what am I to do in this world? You know this question is being asked right through the world: shall I become a businessman, a lawyer, a doctor, take some kind of profession, and that profession depending on the demands of society. Society demands so many engineers, so many doctors, so many businessman, so many politicians, so many crooks, so many this and that. Society demands it. So shall I fit into any of these categories? So that's the question. What am I to do with my life? Right? Right, sir? Now you know what vocation means? A call, Latin, vocare, to call out, like when a man says, 'I have had a divine call to join the church', that's a vocation. Not that you should join the church. The urge to do something with your life right to the end of it, to do something that is true, that is completely worthwhile, that is completely meaningful, that will never bring about bitterness, frustration, anxiety, something that you will do, your vocation. That will be your whole life. Right.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, I understand, sir. Do please follow this carefully because in answering this question you will answer all the rest of the questions that have been put this morning. You will see in a minute how it is all related. One need not have a definite vocation, it doesn't mean necessarily drifting, but doing something from moment to moment, some occupation; be a gardener one year, next year something or other, and so on, get little money but keep going. Now which is it you think is important: a life of vocation - you understand the meaning of that word, a call, not necessarily the call of a church, or a business, but the feeling that one has to do this with one's life, and nothing else matters. When one feels that way there is no question of frustration, there is no question of tomorrow, you are doing the thing that is complete, that is what you want to do, that is your call. Do you understand? One's call. Probably you have not thought about it that way. Probably you haven't gone into this question of what to do in life. And it is very important to put that question and find an answer, otherwise one wastes one's life. As you observe, there is such wastage of human life, not only on the battlefield but in the daily living. So one has to find out, at least it seems to me, what is your vocation, what is your - there is a marvellous Sanskrit word, which I daren't use because it has been so misused, the word called dharma, to do something which is true, which is your vocation, your life, you know, job. And therefore being your duty, your responsibility, your vocation, from that you never deviate. You may do something but it is always in that direction. If you are an artist, in the sense paint pictures and so on, if you are an artist, that's your vocation, a true artist is not concerned if he is going to get a lot of money out of it and so on. It is his, you know, his life, nothing will distract him from that. And therefore there is no frustration, there is no bitterness, there is no cynicism, there is no failure. I think this is very important to understand.

So what is your vocation? Are you going to become engineers, beggars, a religious person, not belonging to any church, any group, any sect, in the sense a really religious person, and spend the rest of your life teaching others, not battling with others? So in answering that question you will find what is your relationship with other human beings. So I am answering your question, relationship. What is your relationship - please listen to this - when you are following your vocation, which is not dependent on the demands of society, when you are following your vocation, what is your relationship with other human beings when you are following that? Go on answer it, sirs, answer it.

Q: How can you speak of a vocation which is not thrust upon you by society.

K: How can you speak of a vocation which is not thrust upon you by society.

Q: How do you know it is your vocation?

K: Look, how do you know this is your calling, this is your vocation. How do you know it? It may be imposed unconsciously by society and you think that it is your vocation, your calling. Or you may deceive yourself, saying this is my line, my direction, my vocation, and I am going to follow it to the end, and you may be deceiving yourself. At the end of ten years you say, 'My god, what a mistake I have made. I ought to have been a butcher. I ought to have been a soldier, I ought to have joined the church.' So look, look, please investigate that question. He says, how do I know that I am following my vocation, which is true, which is not imposed by society, or responding to my unconscious conditioning? So you have to be alive, sensitive enough, free enough, to investigate, search your own structure, and find out if what you call your vocation may be thrust upon you by the society, or your own personal inclination which you call vocation. So you have to investigate. And you say, 'I have no time'. On the contrary you have plenty of time. You can investigate, search out, if you are really serious and honest, to find out what your line is in a day if you give your whole mind to it. Observe all your conditioning, all the influences that have been imposed upon you, your own desires, your own inclinations. Observe all that. It's only the serious person can find out his vocation, not just the man who drifts about and says, 'Well, I'll do this and that'.

Q: I wonder if it is a real serious problem because I am not a butcher, or an artist, or a politician, I am a man. All these things are just restrictions.

K: No, wait. You are a man - you are not a butcher, you are not this or that. You are a man. But you have to do something in life.

Q: Why?

K: Why? Wait a minute, sir. Why should you do anything in life? Just live? Wait. What does that mean? Live according to the edicts of society, live according to your own inclination, according to your own pleasure, according to your own changing moods, fancies, imaginations, and suppositions and formulations?

Q: Why not?

K: Why not. Wait. Why not. What are you at the end of it? Just a driftwood, aren't you?

Q: How do you know?

K: How do I know? I'll show it to you. I am not trying to convince you. Let's be clear on that point. I am not trying to persuade you to accept what I say. A man who says, 'I don't care what happens, I'll live a life from day to day, casually.' What's going to happen to me? It may be all right when he is very young, go on, have a good time. When he gets a little bit older it will begin to tell. Doesn't it? His teeth begin to fall out. Go into it, sir. Look, most people are living this way, drifting - they get caught in a job and when that job doesn't suit them they change to something else. Most people are drifting in life.

Q: Are you drifting?

K: I say so sir. The gentleman asks, are you drifting.

Q: I mean it seriously: are you drifting?

K: Why do you ask that question, sir?

Q: Perhaps there is no difference.

K: Between what?

Q: Between me or any other person.

K: I don't know anything about you, sir. We are talking of a person, human beings who are drifting. Their life is very shallow. Right? They are unhappy people, divorce, remarry and divorce, and remarry, children, responsibility, alimony, god knows what else. And that's most people are doing, and they are thoroughly frustrated, unhappy, bitter human beings.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, sir, look at it. Then what will I do, what will you do?

Q: Can we decide such a thing now?

K: Can you decide such a thing now. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Not decide. There is no decision. You see.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Not at all sir. Not at all sir.

Q: All right. Is there a vocation apart from the human life?

K: I don't think you have listened to what I have been saying, sir. Forgive me for saying so.

Q: You don't take my question.

K: I get your question, but it has already been answered.

Q: What I said was that perhaps all people are drifting, and what you are doing is introducing some sort of discipline, like, if I do not drift, then I have to impose a discipline upon myself.

K: Not at all. I think you have completely misunderstood what I have been saying. Sir, it is no good keep on repeating this over and over again. We have explained very carefully the whole nature of discipline, the other day. What is involved in it. We are not going to go back into it now.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, but sir we must go ahead, we can't go back to something that we have discussed ten times. Now let's go back.

What is one to do? What will you do? You say, I am too young, must I decide now. It's not that you must decide, one must be aware of what is going on in the world, and your role in the world, your responsibility in the world. You must be aware of you and your relationship to the world, your relationship to other people. Right? Now what is your relationship with other people? Actually what is it? Has one a relationship with others? And if you have, what does that word 'relationship' mean? Go into it, sir, please. You are related to your wife, you are related to your girl, or boy friend, or whatever it is. What does that mean to you, actually, not theoretically, but actually what does that relationship mean between you and another? Is it based on pleasure? Is it based on your feeling of loneliness? And therefore a demand for companionship. A feeling of frustration, and therefore you depend on another for fulfilment? You may have a conclusion, and act according to that conclusion in relationship. Or you may have an image about yourself and the other, and act, feel through that image. All that is involved in relationship, isn't it? Right? Now which is it? Relationship means to be related, to be in contact, to be not only blood relationship, but physical, intimate, in contact, minds working together, feeling together, creating together, working together. Which means a constant communication between each other, not one person isolated and in his isolation trying to establish a relationship with another.

So one has to find out for oneself when you ask, what is relationship, whether you are isolating yourself in your activities. Do you follow? If you are ambitious to reach a certain goal, position, prestige, your relationship is really non-existent, because your whole purpose is to get in one direction. A person who is ambitious, competitive, cannot possibly have relationships, he may get married, have children, all the rest of it, but that is merely a social convention.

So when you talk about relationship all this is involved. This seeking for love, because you yourself have no love, seeking companionship because you cannot stand alone, finding a fulfilment in another, because in yourself you do not know how to live completely, wholly. So all these things are implied when you talk about relationship. So are you related to the world, or to another? Bearing in mind relationship means no barrier, intellectual, emotional, no barrier, no wall, no separation, no division: you with your problems, and ambitions and worries, and despairs, and she, or he with hers. Then only you have a relationship. You see how difficult it is, sir. Therefore that being very difficult we are satisfied with superficial relationship which leads to a great deal of misery. Yes sir?

Q: In an occupation, a vocation, we seem to be caught in a kind of conflict, and one part says, first liberate yourself and then do what you want to do, and the other part says, do what you will do and in that way you will liberate yourself.

K: There are two parts in me, one says liberate yourself first and then do, and the other part says, the very doing is the way of liberation. Now listen to the question. First liberate yourself from all the chaos, mess, confusion within yourself; and the other, in the very understanding of the confusion, misery, strife, struggle, despair, in the very understanding of it is liberation. The very understanding of that is liberation. Why do you divide the two?

Q: The understanding is the action.

K: I have understood that. Look, why do you divide it? Is this action, which is, first liberate yourself, is there any action in that at all? Because you are only concerned about yourself.

Q: But action is not only understanding.

K: Which means what? I can only understand in relationship, not in isolation. I can't go to the mountain top, sit cross-legged, and understand myself. I understand myself in action, in relationship, in movement, I then observe my reactions. Right? I observe the way I think, feel, act. So isolation, or saying to myself, first I must liberate myself, is out because that way leads to isolation, and therefore exclusion. And in isolation, exclusion you cannot possibly understand relationship, or understand yourself. You understand yourself by watching your reactions. Your reactions produce certain actions, and you watch those actions. So it is a constant watching of the movement of the brain and the mind, which is thought. Watching your feelings, and in that way, that is the only way to free the mind from its own conditioning. That is liberation. Right.

Now what is your relationship? Please, sir this is very important, because in putting this question you become aware. You follow? You become aware of what you are doing, what your state is, what your mind is playing with.

Q: About this problem of relationship, I think it is of all time. There was the structure of the family, there was the structure of the village, there was the structure the tribe, but nowadays society gets anonymous, the cities are too big. And that's a pity also, we lose a certain quality of relationship. We should find a new society and recreate this.

K: Sir, we'll go back. There was a time when the family was important, the tribe, the nation, the group. Then - what was it sir?

Q: The cities got big.

K: Then the cities get bigger and the individual becomes anonymous, he is squashed out. And so one has to find a way of living which is not tribal, which is not anonymous, which is not suppressed by society, anonymous, one has to find a way of living which is neither.

Q: A new society.

K: First, you see you are more concerned with the new society. The new society only comes when you have found right relationship with another. Society is relationship. Now it is based on isolation, contradiction, each one's despair, purposes, the ambitions, strife and so on. Therefore the society which exists now is corrupt. And to create a new society you must find out for yourself the right relationship between you and another, and out of that comes a new society. Right? Which is not bureaucratic, and all the rest of it.

So in asking this question, look at what it is leading up to, first you asked the question, what am I to do. I suggested what is your vocation, find out, not drift, enquire into it, spend time, give your thought, your energy, your vitality, your passion to find out, which doesn't mean you discipline yourself - you become something else. Uncover, awaken. Now from that you realize one has to be aware of one's relationship, therefore you become aware. So you are finding out what it means to be aware, not only in your relationships but aware the way you behave, the way you think, the way you are escaping, and so on. You are beginning to understand yourself in relationship and through relationship. Right? So awareness is not a matter of practice, following a particular system in order to be aware, but aware in what you are doing: when you cut bread, when you are looking at yourself in the mirror, to be aware during the day, watch your face, your gestures, your movement of thought, just watch it, not correct it, so that this awareness becomes extraordinarily potent. Right?

Now the next question from that: can one live in this world with this awareness? That was one of the questions asked. Which is, can one have this strange sense of bliss - one has to go into the whole question of pleasure and bliss.

Q: Just go away from bliss.

K: Can one live with this quality of awareness in this world. Now who will tell you whether you can or cannot? Now who will tell you? I say one can. I say that it is perhaps possible for another to live this way, but won't you have to find out for yourself?

Q: Yes, but not trying to see if you can do it, at the same time not desensitising yourself from all others. Like, supposing you say you are completely different, and that's why you are trying to see something you are not.

K: Then what shall I do, sir? Look, what shall I do with the war that is going on in the Middle East, in Vietnam and other wars, what shall I do, as a human being, who is aware, who is sensitive, who has watched this phenomena of butchery, of the last two dreadful wars, what shall I do? Tell me!

Q: What have you done during the last war?

K: What did you do during the last great war, daddy! I will tell you, sir - if that interests you. As usual we were travelling all over the world, going from place to place. And the war came and we were in California. And being a foreigner I was called up before the Board, or what is it, who were investigating people who were worthwhile to fight, and they saw I was a poor unfortunate heathen, who couldn't even lift a gun, didn't know what it all meant to kill another. They said, please go home. And so I - does all that interest you?

Audience: Yes.

K: I milked a cow, two cows, looked after chickens, did gardening, and all the rest of it, until I could get away from California, and then started the journey all over again. Washed dishes, washed floors.

Now sir, just a minute. You see where we have landed ourselves. We are asking what is it to be aware. And with this quality of awareness, with this quality of attention, which in itself is a great bliss, because it means freedom, and can such a human being free, aware, he may make a mistake, but corrects it, there's no regret, then say, 'My god, I have done terrible things, what am I to do?' You move. You follow? The mistakes are wiped out, corrected, if you can, but you keep on. So we are asking with this awareness, with this attention, with this quality of bliss, can one live in this world. Yes, sir, I tell you, you can. But that's not an answer for you. What's the good of a man, another man saying, you can have food when you are hungry. You need food. It is no good taking you to a restaurant and showing you the food, when you have no - you follow. It is your vocation - there we are - it is your vocation to find out how to live in this world with this alert awareness.

Q: That is very encouraging.

K: The gentleman says that is very encouraging. Don't be encouraged by another. Because then another can also disappoint you. But if you see what is possible then it releases tremendous energy. You understand, sir. Possible.

So from this quality of awareness, which is not following a method, a system, a discipline, but watching - watching how you sit, watching the restlessness of your body, becoming aware of the fidgeting of your fingers. Right? There is the biological enquiry, watching the body - you understand sir - watching it, not directing it, not saying it should or should not, but watching it, when you watch so alertly the body you will see the body becomes very quiet.

Q: But sir, it is only possible, mainly, if you live among a religious group.

K: It is only possible if you live among a religious group.

Q: Not only, but mainly, it is very difficult if you have to live in society.

K: It is very difficult if you have to live in society, so corrupt, so irreligious, to do this. Sir, everything is difficult.

Q: No, sir, I have practised it many a time.

K: Sir, I am telling you sir, don't practise it, sir, I beg of you, don't practise anything. No, do listen to what I am saying. Don't practise anything. If you practise your mind becomes mechanical.

Q: I am just using a word, I don't mean it like that. Words are very limiting.

K: I know that sir.

Q: If you are confused by the very structure of society, you go on and try.

K: Sir, look, I know, we all know the tremendous weight of society. The society is your father, your mother, your neighbour, your politician, the society. I know the dangers of that, we are all well aware of it, the criminality of it all. And I say to myself what am I to do in this society? Run away from it? Join some religious group? Escape into some fantasy, or become a communist, a socialist, you know all the rest of it? So I have explained all this.

Q: Why do you identify changing society with becoming a communist?

K: I don't sir. I don't identify the change of society with the communists, or with the Catholics, or with the Labour party, or with this or that. When you identify yourself with a group you cannot change society. Full stop. If you belong to a religious group you cannot change society. The other day somebody came to see me - I don't know why - and he said, 'At last I am free. And being free I have joined the Catholic church.' Yes, sir! Because to them freedom means freedom of choice. Follow this. Go into it sir. Freedom of choice. Right? When do you choose? When you are confused, when you are uncertain, you say, 'I'll choose this'. Right? But when you see very clearly there is no choice. It's only when the mind is confused it chooses, when the mind is very clear there is no choice. Now go into it.

So you are asking, can one live in this world so clearly, without any choice, with that full awareness. Right? Do it sir, do it. And you will see the immense possibility. And it's only when you think you have to change according to a certain pattern, according to a certain goal, according to a certain principle, then you are lost. But if you watch yourself, you know, play with it, when you are talking, when you are driving, how you drive, with your mouth open, you know, watch it. When you are talking, whether you are gossiping. You know that is one of the favourite means of wasting one's time by gossiping about somebody or other. Watch it, so that your mind becomes astonishingly sensitive. It is that sensitive intelligence that is going to act. Yes sir?

Q: Are thinking and being aware compatible?

K: Thinking and being aware, are they compatible. Are you aware that you are thinking? Please put this question. I am putting you this question. Are you aware when you are thinking? No, don't answer me, enquire, this is really quite an interesting question, go into it. (I am so sorry. Take her out please, she is bored sitting here.

Q: She doesn't want to go out either.

K: She doesn't want to go out either! Ask her to come and sit here, I'll hold her hand.)

The question was: are thinking and awareness compatible. Now my question is: are you aware that you are thinking? Awareness being watching without any distortion, without any effort, without any correction, justification, just watching.

Q: For a moment.

K: Don't, not one moment or the next. Look at it sir. Are you aware that you are thinking? Or is thinking immediate, you know, you think? I ask you something and there is immediate response. Now if you go into it a little bit you will see something very interesting. The old brain, which is full of memories, knowledge, experience, the old brain responds instantly to any challenge. Right? I say, you are ugly, you say, no. You follow? The response is instant, the response which is of the old brain. Right? Now if you are aware there is a hiatus, there is a gap between the response of the old and because there is a gap perhaps a new response will take place. You are following what I am saying? You are following all this? No. All right.

Look sir, you can watch all this in yourself, if you watch yourself, it is better than any book ever written by any man, including the Bible or the Gita, or any other book. If you watch yourself you will see that there is a quality in the brain which is always the old, the old tradition, the old conditioning, and any challenge which is always new, it must be otherwise it is not a challenge, the old brain responds quickly. Right? I am a Christian - battle. You follow? I am a communist, this or that, according to its old conditioning it responds. Now if you are aware you will see that the old brain need not necessarily respond immediately. There is a gap, an interval. In that interval the new mind will respond. You try it out, do it, and you will see. You understand what I am saying? Are you all getting too tired? This is really quite important if you go into it. It's marvellous. Because our old brain, which is at the back, and so on, I am not conversant with all that, the old brain responds all the time according to pleasure, according to pain, and so on and so on. As that is responding all the time there is no new response. Right? The new response can only take place when the old brain is sufficiently quiet. Right? For this quietness to be there must be an awareness in which there is no justification, condemnation, identification. You follow? An awareness. In that awareness the old brain becomes a little more dormant, and therefore the new brain can act. You go into it.

And that's why the whole question of sleep and dream and all that is part of this. Perhaps we shall go into it another time, not now.

Q: I was wondering if you could paint a verbal picture of what the world would be like if everyone was a total individual.

K: He would like to have a verbal design of what the world would be like if all the human beings were totally individual. I am afraid I am not the person to give you a verbal picture because that is a waste of time. What will be is not important, 'what is' is important.

Q: As soon as I become aware of myself, I try to escape. As soon as I become aware of my thinking, whatever, I change it. As soon as I become aware of it, I change it.

K: The moment I become aware I want to change, whether it is my facial expression or a particular way of thinking, the moment I become aware there is an instant response of change - or the demand for change. That's what I am saying. The instant response for change is part of the old brain because it says, this isn't right, this should be that way. To quieten the old brain is to be aware without any choice. To be aware of the trees, sirs. Look, you are aware of those mountains, can you do anything about it? Can you? There they are, the line, the height, the beauty, the valleys, you are just aware of it. In the same way, to be aware of yourself, not wanting to change it. Then the response of the new brain brings about quite a different quality of change, something totally new.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madame, the moment there is a division between the old brain and the new brain - oh, lord, I can't go into all this. Please, just look at it, sir. There is a division between you and another, between you and the tree, between you and the mountain, between you and your husband, wife, children, and all the rest of it, there is this division. This division exists because there is always the censor - the censor, you know, who says, this is right, this is wrong, this should be, this should not be, that is part of our conditioning, is part of our structure, is part of our society, our culture, to judge immediately. Right? Now to be aware of this judgement, if you are aware of it without any choice, in that awareness there is no division at all.

Q: The very speculation of this...

K: There is no speculation, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We said that too, sir. If you are intellectually approaching this whole problem then it becomes a nightmare. But if you also approach it emotionally it is also another form of nightmare. But if you approach it, sir, if you approach it as it is. Look, if you approach it as it is, which means you have been conditioned by the culture in which you live. Right? That is a fact, isn't it.

Q: When I experience freedom it comes about not in watching, it doesn't come about if I urge it, if I force myself. (Inaudible)

K: Ah, that's just...

Q: Well, it is happening to most of the people all the time.

K: Sir, I don't know what is happening to most of the people all the time. But I am saying as one human being we are so conditioned in the pattern of achievement, whether in business, in religion, in any way, we are conditioned to achieve. Now in becoming aware of this conditioning, then you will find in that awareness if you are choosing, if you are saying, 'I must not try to achieve', then you are blocking yourself, then greater conflict arises.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I know sir. If one is aware of that very definite process, that very awareness changes the pattern. I can't tell you any more. Repeat the old thing over and over again. It's now ten to twelve.

Q: Could you say something on the cessation of time, and the flame of discontent at the same time?

K: Look, it is now quarter to twelve. Wait a minute. Do we have another meeting for young people? Do you want it?

Audience: Yes.

K: You know how much I am working?

Q: Do you feel like it?

K: Do I feel like it? If you want it, and you are asking me, you want it, and you are asking me if I feel like it. Right? I feel like it if you are really serious.

Q: Are we serious?

K: That's up to you! If you are really serious, if you want to really deeply go into all this, I will spend all my day at it. You understand sir? So we will have next Friday at ten thirty.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 26TH JULY 1970

We were talking the last time we met here about the whole structure of thought and its activities, how thought does divide, and thereby bring about a great deal of conflict in human relationship. I think this morning we should consider, not intellectually or verbally, what is the nature of pleasure, fear and sorrow. Whether it is at all possible to be totally free of sorrow. And in enquiring into that, again non-verbally, non-intellectually, one has to consider going into, examine very carefully the whole question of time.

You know it is one of the most difficult things to convey something which not only demands the accuracy of words, but also the accuracy of perception that lies beyond the word, a feeling, a sense of intimate contact with a reality. And if you, listening to the speaker, merely interpret the word according to your personal like and dislike, without being aware of your own tendencies for interpretation, then the word becomes a terrible nuisance, then the word becomes a prison, in which most of are unfortunately caught. But if one is aware of the meaning of the word and what lies behind the word, then communication becomes extraordinarily interesting. Communication implies, as we were saying the other day, not only a verbal comprehension, understanding the meaning of words, but also going together, examining together, sharing together, creating together. And this is very important specially when we are talking about sorrow, time, the nature of pleasure and fear. This is a very complex question, and every human problem is quite complex. It needs a certain austerity, simplicity of perception. When we use the word 'austere', we don't mean the harshness that is involved in the meaning of that word, a sense of dryness, a sense of discipline, control, following a particular dry course; we are using that word 'austere' stripped of all the meaning of harshness, but there must be the austere simplicity in the examination, in the understanding of what we are going to talk about. One's mind must be very sensitive because sensitivity implies intelligence, and intelligence is beyond the interpretation of the intellect, or emotional enthusiastic action. And in examining, in looking, in listening, in learning, about time, pleasure, fear and sorrow one has to have this quality of sensitivity of perception, of immediate seeing something as true; which is not possible if, as we explained the other day, intellect with its activity of thought divides, interprets. I don't know if you were all here the last time we talked about thought, and the nature of thought and how it divides human relationship, though thought is necessary as reason, sanity, clarity, objective clear thinking is absolutely necessary, but thought also becomes a dangerous implement when one is not analysing but looking. I hope we understood when we talked about the nature and the structure of thought.

So we are going to find out this morning whether the mind can totally be free of fear. And this is a very important question to understand, again non-verbally. Because for most of us fear is a constant companion, conscious or unconscious, whether you are aware of it or you are not, it is there, hidden in some dark recesses of one's own mind. Please, as we said, we are sharing this together, so you have to be aware of your own fear, and not try to escape from it, because in looking into this question of fear we are asking whether it is at all possible for the mind to be completely and totally free of this burden. You are asking this question. Perhaps the speaker may suggest it, but it is your problem, your question, therefore you have to be sufficiently persistent, sufficiently simple, to see what it is, and to pursue it to the very end, so that the mind, when you leave this tent this morning, is literally free of fear.

Perhaps that's asking a great deal, but it can be done. For a mind that has been conditioned in the culture of fear, with all the neurotic complicated sequences in action, for such a mind to even put the question, the possibility, of being completely, entirely, absolutely, free of fear, is itself a problem, not fear, but the question itself. Do you understand? To put to oneself the question, whether it is at all possible, itself becomes a problem. A problem exists only when it is not soluble, when you cannot go through with it, when it keeps on recurring, you think you have solved this question of fear, but it keeps on repeating in different forms.

So first one has to see very clearly the possibility of it, and not say it is impossible. Do you understand? By saying that it is not possible, you have already blocked yourself. So one has to be very careful not to block oneself, not to prevent oneself from this question of fear and its complete resolution. Right? Because when there is any sense of fear it does all kinds of mischievous activity, not only psychologically, neurotically, but outwardly this whole problem of security comes into being - not only physical security, but psychological security. Please do follow all this because we are going to go into something that requires your attention, not your agreement, not your interpretation but your perception, your seeing the thing as it is.

You know you don't need any interpreters, no one need interpret anything for you. Volumes are being written by people who want to interpret what we are talking about - don't. Don't allow yourself to be interpreted to. Examine for yourself, find out for yourself.

So we are asking for the mind to examine itself and perceive the sequence of fear, its activities, its dangers. So we are going to examine not only physical fears, but also the very, very complex fears that lie deeply below the conscious mind. Most of us have had physical fears, either fear of past illness, with all its pain and anxiety and the boredom of pain, physical; or you have faced physical danger. And is facing a danger and its immediate action - you understand? - when you face danger of any kind, physically, is there fear? Please enquire, don't say, yes, there is fear - find out. When you meet, as it often happens when you are walking, perhaps not in these civilized countries, but when you are walking perhaps in India, or in Africa, and wild parts of America, you come across a bear, or a snake, or a tiger - as it has happened to us, several times. There is immediate action. Right? Isn't there? When you meet a snake there is immediate action, it is not conscious, deliberate action, there is instinctual action. Are you following all this? Now is that fear? Or is that intelligence? Because we are trying to find out action which is intelligence and action which is born of fear. When you meet a snake there is a physical response, instantly. You run away, you sweat, you try to do something about it. That response is a conditioned response because you have been told for generations, be careful of snakes, be careful of wild animals. It is a conditioned response, so the brain, the nerves respond instinctually to protect itself. Protecting itself is a natural, intelligent response. You are following all this. Right? To protect the physical organism is necessary and a snake is a danger, and to respond to it in the sense of protection is an intelligent action. Right?

Now look at the other, which is, a physical pain. You have had pain last year, or yesterday, and you are afraid that it might return. The fear there is caused by thought. Thinking about something which has happened a year ago, or yesterday, and might happen again tomorrow is fear brought about by thought. Right? Isn't that so? Go into, please, we are sharing it together. Which means you are watching your own responses, what your own activities have been. There fear is the product of conscious, or unconscious thought - thought being time. Right? Time, not chronological time by the watch, but time as thought thinking about the thing that happened yesterday, or some time ago, and the fear of it happening again. So thought is time. Right? So thought produces fear: I might die tomorrow, and I am all a quiver. I might be exposed about something I have done in the past, thinking about that thought breeds fear. Right? Now, are you doing it? You understand? You have had pain, you have done something in the past which you don't want to be exposed, or you want to fulfil, or do something in the future and you may not be able to, which is all the product of thought and time. Are you doing this? Right? Most people are doing this, including yourself.

Now, can this movement of thought which breeds fear in time, and as time, can that come to an end? You are following? You have understood my question? Yes? There is the intelligent action of protection, self-preservation, physical necessity to survive, which is a natural intelligent response. The other, thought thinking about something, and projecting the possibility of it not happening, or it might occur again, breeds fear. Right? So the question is: whether thought, this movement of thought, so instinctual, so immediate, so insistent, so persuasive, can that movement naturally come to an end, not through opposition. If you oppose it, it is still the product of thought, if you exercise your will to stop it, it is still the product of thought - you say, I will not allow myself to think that way, who is the entity that says, 'I will not' - it is still thought because by stopping that movement it hopes to achieve something else, which is still the product of thought. Therefore thought may project it and therefore may not be able to achieve it, and therefore there is fear involved in it. I don't know if you are following all this.

So we are asking whether thought which has produced this psychological fear, not just one fear but many, many fears, whether that whole activity can naturally, easily without any effort, come to an end. Because if you make an effort it is still thought and therefore productive of fear, therefore it is still caught within the field of time. Right? So one has to find a way or understand, or learn about a way that it will naturally come to an end, thought will not create fear. You have got it? Are we communicating with each other, please, are we? I don't know! When we are talking about communication, not verbally, perhaps you have seen the idea clearly, the division clearly, that's not it. We are talking not merely verbally but being involved in it, it's your fear, it's your daily life, and that's what we are talking about, your life, not the description of your life. Because that which is described, that which is being described is not the described; the description is not the described, the explanation is not the explained. Right? The word is not the thing. So it's your life, your fear, which is not exposed by the speaker; by listening you have learnt to expose what is fear, how thought creates the fear. Right?

So we are asking whether thought, the activity thought, which engenders, which breeds, which sustains, which nourishes fear, can naturally, happily, easily, come to an end, without any determination, without any resistance, without any activity of the will.

Now before we can complete that question by discovering the true answer, we also have to enquire into the pursuit, conscious or unconscious, the pursuit of pleasure, because it is thought again that sustains pleasure. You have had a lovely moment when you have looked at the sunset yesterday; you said, what a marvellous sunset, you took a great delight in it. Then thought steps in and says, 'How nice it was, I would like to have that experience repeated again tomorrow'. Whether it is a sunset, or whether it is somebody who flatters you, or whether it is sexual experience, or you have achieved something which you must maintain which gives you pleasure - pleasure isn't merely just sexual pleasure, there is a pleasure which you derive through achievement, through being somebody, the pleasure of success, the pleasure of fulfilment, the pleasure of what you are going to do tomorrow, the pleasure of something which you have experienced, sexually or artistically, or in different ways, wanting that repeated. All that is pleasure. And our social morality is based on pleasure. No? You are rather silent about that. Social morality is based on pleasure, and therefore it is no morality at all, it is immoral. The social morality is immorality. You are going to find that out, which doesn't mean by revolting against the social morality you are going to become very moral, doing what you like, sleeping with whom you like. Play with all this, you will find out.

So one has to understand, if you are going to understand and be free of fear, one must also understand pleasure because they are both interrelated. Which doesn't mean you must give up pleasure. We are going to go into it. You know all religions, organized religions, and they have been the bane of civilization, all organized religions have said, you must have no pleasure. Right? No sex, god won't allow you, you must approach god a tortured human being. Right? So you mustn't look at a woman, you mustn't look at a tree, you mustn't look at the beauty of the sky, you mustn't look at the lovely lines of a hill, which might remind you of sex and women and all the rest of it. So you must not have pleasure, which means you must not have desire. Right? So pick up your bible when the desire arises, lose yourself in that - or the Gita, or repeat some words, all that nonsense.

So to understand fear one must also examine the nature of pleasure. Right? If you don't have pleasure tomorrow you are going to be afraid. Right? You are going to be frustrated. You have had pleasure yesterday, sexually or otherwise, and if you cannot have it tomorrow you get angry, you get upset, your nerves - you become hysterical, which is a form of fear. So fear and pleasure are the two sides of a coin; you cannot be free of one and not be free of the other also. Right? I know this is rather - you want to have pleasure all your life and be free of fear, that's all you are concerned about. But you don't see that if you have no pleasure tomorrow you feel frustrated. Right? You feel unfulfilled, you feel angry, anxious, guilty and all the psychological miseries arise. So you have got to look at both.

And in understanding pleasure you have also to understand what is joy. Is pleasure joy? Is pleasure enjoyment? Is pleasure something totally different from the full delight of existence? We are going to find out all this. First we are asking whether thought with all its activities, which breeds fear and sustains fear, conscious or unconscious, whether that can come naturally to an end, without effort. Right? There are conscious fears as well as unconscious fears of which you are not aware. The fears of which one is not aware play much greater part in one's life than the fears that you are aware of. Now how are you going to uncover the unconscious fears? You are following? How are you going to expose them to the light of whatever it is - how? By analysis? Who is then to analyse? You are following all this? If you say, through analysis I will expose them - we have gone into the question of analysis the other day, but we will briefly go into it now. If you say, I will analyse my fears, who is the analyser? Part of the fragment of fear. Therefore analysis of his own fears has no value at all. Right? I don't know if you see this. Or if you go to an analyst to have your fears analysed the analyst is also like you, conditioned by the specialist, by Freud, Jung and Adler and X Y Z. He analyses according to his conditioning. Right? Therefore it doesn't help you to be free of fear. As we said, all analysis is a negation of action. We have been through that, I won't go into all that.

So how are you going to uncover the unconscious fears, knowing analysis has no value? Right? You are rather uncertain about it. I can't go into it now, I have explained it before. If you say

I will look into my dreams, I will examine my dreams. Again the same problem arises: who is the entity who is going to examine the dreams? One of the fragments of the many fragments. Right? So you ask a question, quite differently, which is, why do you dream at all? You are following all this? Dreams are merely the continuation of your daily activity. I do not know if you have not noticed in your dreams there is always action going on of some kind or another - jumping over the cliff, or hitting somebody, or a dozen forms of daily activity repeated while you are asleep. Now can that activity be understood and come to an end? That is, can the mind during the day time be so alertly watching all its motivations, all its urges, all its complexities, its pride, its ambitions, you know the things that are going on during the day, the frustrations, the demand to fulfilment, the urge to be somebody. You know. The movement of thought during the day, can those be watched without the observer? You are following all this? Because if there is the observer who is watching, the observer then is part of thought which has separated itself from the rest of the thoughts and has assumed the authority to observe.

So can you observe during the day the whole movement of your activities, thoughts, feelings without interpretation, watching? Then you will see dreams have very little meaning, you will hardly ever dream. Therefore during the day time if you are awake, not half asleep, if you are not caught by your beliefs, by your prejudices, by your absurd little vanities, and pride, your petty little knowledge, but merely observe the whole movement of your conscious mind and unconscious mind in action during the day, you will see there will not only be the end to dreams but also thought begins to subside, no longer seeking or sustaining pleasure or avoiding fear. Right? I wonder if you have caught all this.

Then thought is also producing pleasure, continuing, nourishing that which has been pleasurable. Right? You have had some experience, physical or psychological or otherwise, and you want that repeated. The demand for the repetition of that pleasure, that experience is the product of thought. Right? So thought not only sustains, gives birth to pleasure but also to fear. Right?

So being caught in fear and in pleasure, which produce sorrow, how can all this come to an end? You follow? How can all this movement of pleasure and fear, which is the product of thought, how can that machinery of thought naturally come to an end? Now that's your problem, isn't it. Right? Is that your problem? Now what will you do with it? Give it up? Go on as you have been living, caught in pleasure and pain? Which is the very nature of the bourgeois, though you may have long hair, sleep on the bridge, do all kinds of silly things, revolt, throw bombs, avoid one war and have your favourite war, do what you will, the very nature of the bourgeois mind is this, a mind that is caught in fear and pleasure. Face it!

Now if it is your problem, what are you going to do with it? How will you resolve it? And you must resolve it if you want a totally different kind of society, a different kind of morality, a different kind of life, you must solve this problem. If you are young you may say, 'Well, it is not important, I will have instant pleasure, instant fear, but that doesn't matter'. But it builds up and then you will find yourself caught in it. So it's your problem. And no authority can solve this. Right? You have had authorities - the priest authority, the Jungian psychological authorities, and they have not been able to solve it. Right? They have given you escapes, like drugs, beliefs, rituals, all the circus that goes on in the name of religion, they have offer all this, but the basic question of fear and pleasure you have never solved. And you have got to solve it. How? What are you going to do? Please, sir, put your mind to this. Knowing nobody is going to solve it for you; the realization that nobody is going to solve it for you is already the beginning to be free of the bourgeois world. Right? Neither your governments, nor your Mao's, nobody. Then what will you do, sirs? Unless you solve this sorrow is inevitable. Right? Not only your personal sorrows but the sorrow of the world. Do you know what the sorrow of the world is? You know what is happening in the world, not outwardly, all the wars, all the mischief of the politicians, and all that, but inwardly the enormous loneliness of man, the deep frustrations of man, the ache of loneliness, the utter lack of love, this vast uncompassionate callous world.

So unless you resolve this problem sorrow is inevitable, and time will not solve it. Right? You can say, well, I will think about it tomorrow, I'll have my instant pleasure and if fear comes out of it I will put up with it - time will not solve this problem. Right? So what will you do? Who is going to answer you? After raising this question, seeing all the complexities of it, seeing that nobody on earth, or some divine force - we have relied on all that before - is going to resolve this essential problem. What are you going to do, how do you respond to it? No answer? What do you say, sirs? All right, if you have no answer, I mean, not say, 'You will tell us', but really you have no answer, have you, if you are really honest, not playing the hypocrite, or trying to avoid it, not trying to side step it, when you are faced with this problem, which is the crucial problem because we have translated love as pleasure, which we will go into another time.

So how are you going to find out naturally for it to come to an end? No method, obviously. Right? Method implies time. Somebody gives you the method, the system, you practise that method, that system, it will make your mind more and more mechanical, conflict with 'what is' and the system. Right? You are following all this? The system promises you one thing but the fact is you are afraid. And by practising the system you are further and further moving away from 'what is', and so conflict increases, consciously or unconsciously. Right? So what will you do?

Now what has happened to the mind - please listen carefully, follow this - what has happened to the mind, to the brain, that has listened to all this - listened, not merely heard a few words, but actually listened, shared, communicated, learnt, what has happened to that mind? You have listened to my question? What has happened to your mind that has listened, not verbally, superficially, but actually with tremendous attention, awareness of your own fears, that has listened to the explanation, listened to the problem, listened to the complexity of it, seen how thought breeds fear as well as pleasure, and sustains it, what has happened to the quality of the mind that has so listened, that is to your mind, to your heart?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Don't answer, it sir. We will answer this question afterwards, question it. But now what has happened to your mind? Examine it, find out. Is it different entirely from the moment when we began this morning and now, or is it the same repetitive mind caught in pleasure and fear? Is there a new quality, or a mind that is learning? You follow? Not saying it must put an end to fear or to pleasure but a mind that by observing has learnt, is learning, and therefore what has happened to such a mind? Please.

Q: It becomes totally silent.

K: It becomes totally silent. Wait, sir, look what you have said. It has become totally silent, which is what? Shocked? Shocked by all this? No, sir, look what has happened to your mind and heart that has observed all this, this morning by listening, discussing, enquiring, learning, being curious, see how thought breeds fear and pleasure and all the consequences of its activities, what has happened to your mind?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Hasn't your mind become a little more sensitive? Hasn't it? Before you just walked, carrying this burden of fear and pleasure. By learning the weight of the burden, haven't you slightly put it aside, haven't you dropped it, and therefore walking very carefully? One moment, let me finish, because I have not finished with this. So your mind, if you have really followed this, listened to it, shared it together, learnt together, your mind by observing, not through determination, not through effort, but merely observing it has become sensitive and therefore very intelligent. Right? Don't, please, don't agree, if it is not sensitive it is not sensitive - don't play the game.

So next time fear arises, as it will, intelligence will respond to it, not in terms of pleasure, in terms of suppressing or escaping. You follow? This intelligent, sensitive mind, which has come about by putting aside, and by examining, learning, looking at this burden, it has put it aside and therefore it has become astonishingly alive, sensitive. Then it can ask quite a different question, which is: if pleasure is not the way of life, as it has been for most people, for most of us, then is life barren? Do you understand? Is life dry? Or what is the difference between pleasure and joy? Does it mean I can never enjoy life? Please don't agree, find out. You enjoyed life before in terms of pleasure and fear. The instant pleasure, sex, drink, killing an animal, eating food, stuffing yourself with dead animals, and all the rest of it. The instant pleasure. And that's been your way of life. And you suddenly discover by examining, looking that pleasure isn't the way at all, because it leads to fear, to frustration, to misery, to sorrow, to other great sociological as well as personal disturbances and so on. So you ask quite a different question now. You say, what is joy.

Is there joy which is untouched by thought and pleasure? Because if it is touched by thought it again becomes pleasure, and therefore fear. Right? So is there a way of living daily, having understood pleasure and fear, a way of life which is joyous, which is enjoyment, not the carrying over of pleasure from day to day, and the fear? You have understood my question? Are you all getting tired?

Look, sir: you know what enjoyment is? To look at those mountains, with the beauty of the valley, the light on the hills, and the trees, and the flowing river, to enjoy it. And when do you enjoy it? When you say, how marvellous it is - when the mind, when thought is not using that as a means of pleasure. Right? You are following? Look: you can look at that mountain, or the face of a woman or a man, the lines of a valley, the movement of a tree, and take tremendous delight in it. When you have done that it is finished; but if you carry it over then pain and pleasure begins. Are you understanding all this? Can you look and finish with it? Be careful of this, be very watchful of this. That is, can you look at that mountain, and not be absorbed by the beauty of the mountain, like a child with a toy being absorbed by the toy, and return to your mischief again, but to look at that beauty and the very look is enough, the delight in it, but not to carry it over, wishing for it tomorrow. Which means - see the danger - that is, the instant pleasure, sexual or otherwise, you can also play that trick, can't you. Oh, Lord, no? You see it, do you? You can have some great pleasure and say, it is over. But is it over? Is not the mind consciously or unconsciously building, chewing over it, thinking about it, wishing it to happen again soon? Thought has nothing whatsoever to do with joy. Please, all this is tremendous discovery for yourself, not being told, not write about it, interpret it for somebody to read.

So there is a vast difference between delight, enjoyment, joy, bliss and pleasure. I do not know if you have not noticed, all the religious pictures in the western world avoid any kind of sensuous pleasure taking place. Have you noticed it? I won't go into all that, sorry.

Q: Why not?

K: Because it is so obvious. If you saw early pictures, before all the pictures, you will notice, there is no scenery at all. Right? Only the human body, tortured, or the Virgin Mary and so on and so on. There is no landscape because that distracted you, that was pleasure, therefore be concerned with the figure, the symbol of that figure, what it implied - all that stuff. Only much later this thing came on, the introduction of the scenery, whereas in China and India it was part of life. You are understanding all this? This is not a school, please. I am not a professor.

So you can observe all this and find out the beauty of living, and there is, in which there is no effort but living with great ecstasy in which pleasure and thought and fear doesn't enter at all. Right, sir.

Now you can ask me questions. Just a minute, sir, let me take a breath, and you also take a breath.

Q: About dreams: I understood that the daily activities and so forth in dreams come to an end, but what about a dream like I dreamt that I see you coming to this meeting, leaving that coat there, at that same place - they all come true.

K: That is, you are saying - I have understood your question, sir, let me take a breather. You are saying, when I am asleep I see something that is happening in the future which is accurate. Is that it? You saw in your sleep the speaker come on the platform, put the brown coat there, and the microphone, this, very definitely in your dream what was going to happen in the future, the next morning. Are you all waiting for me to answer this! Oh, Lord, look at all your faces, you ought to see them. I wish you would pay as much attention to what was being said before rather than listen to this question so attentively and waiting for an answer. You have understood the question, sir? The questioner says, he saw last night in his sleep what actually took place when the speaker came into the tent, put the brown coat - it was a brown coat - and exactly what clothes he had on and so on and so on. How do you account for that? How do you account for it?

First of all, why do you give such tremendous importance to what is going to happen in the future, and seeing the reality of the future, why do you give such colossal importance to it? You know, astrologers, the fortune tellers, the palmists, you know, tell you what marvellous things are going to happen to you, why are you so concerned? Why aren't you concerned - I am going to answer your question - why aren't you concerned with the actual daily living, which contains all the treasures? Oh, you don't see it. Wait, sir, I haven't answered this question, please. You know when the mind becomes somewhat sensitive, and because you have been listening here, it has become somewhat sensitive, I don't say completely sensitive, but somewhat sensitive, naturally it observes more, whether tomorrow or today. It's like going up on an aeroplane and looking down, two boats coming from the opposite direction on the same river and they are going to meet at a certain point, and that's the future. Right? Right? The mind being a bit more sensitive becomes aware of certain things which may happen tomorrow, and also which is happening now. And most of us give much more importance to what is going to happen tomorrow, and not what is actually happening now. And you will find, if you go into this very, very deeply, nothing happens at all. Any happening is part of the experience of living, of life, why do you want experience at all? A mind that is sensitive, alive, full of clarity, what does it need to have experience at all? You answer that question yourself. Yes, sir?

Q: You suggest that we should observe the actions in our daily life, but what is the entity that decides what to observe and when?

K: What is the entity that observes and when to observe during all the activities of life, daily life. Right? Is that the question, sir? What is the entity that observes?

Q: Does the entity take a decision to go and observe? Does one decide if one should?

K: Ah! Who decides that you should observe. Is there any decision involved in this? Do you decide to observe? Or do you observe merely? Please find out, sir. Do you decide to observe, do you decide and say, 'I am going to observe and learn'? Then there is the question, who is the decider. Is it will that says, 'I must', and when it doesn't it chastises itself further and says, 'I must, must, must', therefore when you decide to observe, in that there is conflict, and therefore in that state of mind which has decided to observe there is no observation at all. Sir, look, you are walking down the road, somebody passes you by, you observe, and you say, 'How ugly he is, how he smells, I wish he wouldn't do this', which is, you are aware of your responses to that passer-by, you are aware that you are judging, condemning, or justifying, you are aware, observing. You don't say, 'I must not judge, I must not justify', which means be aware why you are justifying, why you are condemning, just be aware of your responses. Right, sir? In that there is no decision at all. You are following this? You see somebody who has insulted you yesterday, immediately all your cockles are beginning to get nervous, or anxious, or you begin to dislike. Be aware of your dislike, why, be aware of all that. Don't decide to be aware. Somebody passes by who has flattered you, says, what a marvellous bird you are - and you will feel delighted.

Watch that sense, watch it.

So you will see in that observation there is no observer, only observation taking place. The observer exists only when through observation you accumulate - when you say, 'He is my friend because he flattered me, and he is not my friend because he said something ugly, or something true which I don't like.' Which is accumulating through observation, that accumulation is the observer. But when you observe without accumulation then there is no judgement, you observe. And you can do this all the time. And in this observation there are certain definite decisions made, naturally. You follow? But those decisions are a natural result, not decisions made by the observer who has accumulated. Clear? Do you see something of this? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand the question. The questioner asks - I must stop after this, it's twelve o'clock. We have talked for an hour and a half, isn't that enough? This is the last question. And the questioner asks, you said at the beginning the instinctual response of self-protection against a wild animal is intelligence and not fear. And thought which breeds fear is entirely different from the other. Right? Aren't they different? Aren't they different, don't you observe the difference? Thought which breeds and sustains fear, and intelligence which says, be careful - isn't there a difference there? But thought - see the intricacies of this - thought has created say, for example, nationalism, racial prejudice, the acceptance of certain moral values, has accepted it, but thought doesn't see the danger of it, doesn't see the danger of nationalism. Right? If it saw it then it would be the response of not fear but of intelligence, which would be the same as meeting the snake. I don't know if you are meeting this? Meeting the snake is a natural self-protective, intelligent response. Meeting nationalism, which is the product of thought, which divides people, breeds war, thought doesn't see the danger of it. If it saw the danger for the human self-protection, they would both be the same. Do you understand this?

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 28TH JULY 1970

There is a lovely story of a teacher who used to give a sermon every morning to his disciples, and one day he was just getting on to the rostrum and about to begin when a bird came on the window-sill and sat there singing, and the teacher became quiet, and when the bird flew off he said, 'Now the sermon is over'. I wish we could do the same!

Q: Why can't you?

K: We are doing it! This is our song. So you can listen.

We were talking the other day of the importance and the total unimportance of thought, where thought has a great deal of action, and within its own field a limited freedom, and a state of mind that is totally unconditioned. So if we can this morning go into this question of conditioning, not only the superficial cultural conditioning but also why conditioning takes place, and what is the quality of mind that is not conditioned, that has gone beyond it, because we have to go into this matter fairly deeply to find out what love is. And in understanding what love is perhaps we shall be able to comprehend the full significance of death.

So first we will, if you will also go with the speaker, take a voyage together into this question of conditioning and find out for oneself whether the mind can ever be totally and completely free of this conditioning. One can see, and it is fairly obvious, how superficially we are conditioned by the culture, the society, the propaganda around us. The conditioning of nationality, the conditioning of a particular religion or sect, the conditioning through education, through environmental influence, one can observe that fairly clearly and be aware of it. I think that is fairly clear and fairly simple, how most human beings in whatever country or race they belong to, or any particular culture or religious propaganda, they are conditioned, shaped, moulded, held within that particular pattern. One can see that in oneself. And one can fairly easily put those conditionings aside.

There are deeper conditionings, such as this aggressive attitude towards life. Aggression implies also a sense of dominance, seeking power, position, prestige, and that's much more difficult, and one has to go into it very, very deeply to be completely free of it because it is very subtle, it takes different forms. One may think one is not aggressive, but when one has a conclusion, an opinion, an evaluation, verbally and non-verbally, there is a sense of assertion which gradually becomes aggressive and violent. One can see this in oneself.

May I here say, please don't take notes. Not only it disturbs others round you, but also while you are taking notes you cannot possibly listen and observe yourself. It isn't a thing that you are going to think over when you go back to your room, what we are doing is observing as we go along now, at this minute. So as one cannot possibly compel you to do that, we request you kindly not to take notes because it disturbs, and for your own sake. And also please don't take recordings, putting out a microphone, it also disturbs other.

To be aware of this conditioning of aggression: the very word that one uses, you may say it very gently but there is a kick behind it, there is an assertive, dominant, compulsive action, which becomes very crude when it becomes violent. Now that is our conditioning. That conditioning of aggression, whether one has derived it from the animal or one has, in one's own self assertive pleasure, become aggressive. That one has to discover because that is part of our conditioning. Is one aggressive in that total sense of that word? Aggressive, that word means stepping forth.

And one of our conditionings is comparison, comparing, not only with what you think is noble, or a hero, or a memory, comparing secretly within yourself with what you would like to be, and what you are. The comparative, assertive pursuit is also our conditioning. And again this is extraordinarily subtle. I compare myself to somebody who is a little more bright, a little more intelligent, a little more physically beautiful, regular features and all the rest of it - secretly or openly. This constant comparative enquiry, soliloquy, talking to oneself. Because where there is comparison - please observe this in yourself - where there is comparison there is not only assertion, a form of aggression but also the feeling of achievement, and therefore in that there is a frustration. When you can't achieve there is a sense of frustration, and a feeling of inferiority. I hope you are doing this as we go along. There is not only the aggressive conditioning, but also from childhood all our education, all our educational system is based on this: compare, getting more marks, examinations, comparing yourself with somebody who is much clever, the battle goes on. And in that comparison there is envy, jealousy, and all the conflict involved in that.

Comparison implies measurement: I am measuring myself with what I think I am, with something that I think is better, or bigger, or nobler. Right? Please let us work at this thing together, not you listen and I talk, let us, both of us, move together, flow together in the comprehension of this. Because you will see our conditioning is so extraordinarily deep, and so very subtle. And one asks, can the mind be ever free of this conditioning? Then there is the conditioning of society, the culture, always measuring. As long as the mind has a measure it must compare, whether the measurement, the rule, the tape with which you measure is self created or given to you by the society, the culture that is around you. Do please go into this with me, you will see how extraordinary, fascinating this is.

Then there is the conditioning, not only of fear, but of pleasure. On that reward and punishment, on that the whole moral and religious structure is based, and by that we are conditioned, and so on. Now why is it that we are conditioned? You see we see outwardly the various influences that have conditioned us, and the inward voluntary demand to be conditioned - the acceptance of conditioning. Why? Why does the mind have to be conditioned, why has it allowed itself to be conditioned? What is the factor behind these conditionings? You are following all this? Why? Why am I born in a certain country and culture, calling myself a Hindu, with all the superstition, tradition, and all the rest of it, which is fairly obvious, imposed by the family, by the society, by the ritual, by the constant repetition of a particular Brahmin class which says, do this, don't do that - repetition, constantly drilled in, which also takes place in the west, even though now a permissive society - a permissive society has its own conditioning - long hair, short hair, this kind of dress, that kind of dress, square, not square, the bourgeois, you follow? Now one asks, why does the mind and the heart, the whole activity of this, why does it accept conditioning? Not only outward influence, but also the inward demand to be shaped? What is the urge that lies behind this? You are understanding? What do you think it is? Please don't answer me, we will discuss it a little later. What do you think is the factor that is constantly demanding and acquiescing, yielding and resisting, this conditioning? The obvious reason is, one can see, one wants to be safe, secure, in a community which is doing certain things, which is following a certain pattern. If you don't follow that pattern you may lose your job, you may not have money, you might be regarded as a respectable human being, and all the rest of it. So there is a revolt against that, and that revolt forms its own conditioning - which all the young people are going through now. So what is the urge - please do listen to this, and go together into this - why are we doing this? What is the factor? You must find this out. Unless you discover it for yourself you will always be conditioned one way or the other, positively or negatively.

From childhood, from the moment we are born until we die, this process goes on. You may revolt against it, you might try to escape into another conditioning, withdrawing yourself into a monastery, or joining the activists, or the people who devote their life to contemplation, to philosophy, you follow, it is the same movement, right through life - why? What is the machinery that is in constant movement to adjust itself to various forms of conditioning? Right?

May I go on now, you have got the question clear? Have I made the question quite clear? Thought must always be conditioned, though in the field of thought there might be a certain freedom. Thought is always everlastingly conditioned because thought is the response of the past, thought is the response of memory. And so where thought is functioning, adjusting, active, thought becomes mechanical, thought is always mechanical, and conditioning is always mechanical. Because it is very easy to fall into a pattern, into a groove, and then you think you are living, being tremendously active running around that groove - whether it is the communist groove, the activists groove, the groove of the Catholic, this, or that, because it is the easiest thing, the most mechanical thing to do. And we think we are living. Though thought has a certain amount in its field, a limited freedom, everything it does is mechanical. After all to go to the moon is quite mechanical; you have all the accumulated knowledge of centuries, and thinking about it you can pursue it, make it more and more and more, technical, mechanical, and you end up in the moon, or under the sea, and so on. The mind wants to follow a groove, wants to be mechanical, and that way there is safety, security, there is no disturbance: I have decided to do this, and I pursue that; I think this is right, and I pursue that; this is what I feel, and again. So the mind and the brain demand a mechanical functioning, a repetitive activity, in that there is safety. Right? Look at yourself, how many habits we have, both physical and psychological and intellectual habits, emotional habits we have. And it's one of the most difficult things to break away from, because to live mechanically is not only encouraged by society but also by each one of us, because that is the easiest way to live.

So thought being mechanical, repetitive, pursues and accepts any form of conditioning, which guarantees it a mechanical activity. A philosopher comes along, invents a new theory, economic, or social, or mathematical, or this or that, and we poor silly human beings accept that groove and follow it. Our society, our culture, our religious promptings, everything is to function, is the encouragement of a mind that wants to function mechanically. In that mechanism there is a certain sense of stimulation. When you go to the Mass there is a certain elan, a certain excitement, emotionalism. And that becomes the pattern of life. I don't know if you have ever tried - do it once and you will see the fun of it - take a piece of stick, or a stone, any old piece, with a little shape to it, put it on the mantelpiece and give it every morning a flower. Put a flower beside it every morning, and within a month you will say that it has become the habit, that has become the religious symbol, you have identified yourself with that, with that piece of stick, with that piece of stone, with that piece of statue, or some other symbol.

So thought - please see the beauty of this and you will see what takes place when you see this - thought is always conditioned and therefore thought is always mechanical. Thought being the response of memory, response of the past, and that response is within certain variations, is mechanical. One has been taught engineering as a profession and you keep on adding, taking away a little bit, but you are set on that line-if you are a doctor, and so on and so on. So thought - please see this - thought within a certain field is still somewhat free, it can invent, but it is still within the field of the mechanics, technology. So when you see that, not only verbally, intellectually, but actually feel it - you understand what I mean. Look, when you hear that train, your whole body is aware of it, you are listening to it with your ears, with your mind, with your brain, with everything you are listening to it - or resisting it. And from childhood we have been conditioned, and thought follows that conditioning, it is so easy, so mechanical.

Now can the mind free itself from its conditioning? Not only the habits it has cultivated, certain intellectual, emotional, opinions, judgements, you follow, the attitudes, the values, can the mind free itself of all this conditioning? Which means, can the mind be completely free of thought? Go easy, don't jump on me. Because if this is not completely understood the next thing which I am going to talk about will have no meaning. The understanding of this leads to the next question, which is inevitable, if you go into it.

If thought is mechanical, if thought will inevitably make the mind conform, and therefore be conditioned, then what is love? You are following? Is love the product of thought? Is love conditioned by the society, the culture, the religion in which one is born, the state? You are following all this? That is the inevitable question after asking oneself if thought is actually conditioned, is mechanical, is the factor of conditioning. Then as we are investigating, enquiring, looking into this question of what is love - is love thought? Is love nurtured by thought, cultivated by thought, dependent on thought? Right?

Now what is love? Bearing in mind, the description is not the described, the word is not the thing. Can the mind be free of the mechanical activity of thought so as to find out what is love? For most of us love is associated or equated with sex. That's one form of conditioning. When you are enquiring into this really very complex and intricate and extraordinarily beautiful thing, one must find out how that word has conditioned the mind. Right? We won't kill, go to Vietnam, or some other place, to kill, but we don't mind killing animals, we don't mind saying brutal things about another, gossip, ugly, about another, and yet we talk about love. You know, if you had to kill the animal which you eat, go out yourself to the farm, kill it, or see the ugliness of it, would you eat that food, that animal? I doubt it very much. But you don't mind the butcher killing and eating it, and in that there is a great deal of hypocrisy.

So one asks, not only what love is, what is compassion. In the whole Christian culture the animals have no soul, they are put on earth by god for you to eat them; and you go to some parts of India where to kill is wrong, whether the fly, the animal, or anything, so you kill the least thing, and they go to the other extreme exaggeration of it. Again part of this conditioning. You see people who are anti-vivisection and yet wear marvellous furs. You know the double, the hypocrisy that goes on. Now to find out what is compassion, to be compassionate, not only find out verbally, but actually with passion be compassionate, what does it mean? Is compassion a matter of habit, a matter of thought, a matter of mechanical repetition of being kind, polite, gentle, tender? You follow? So what is compassion? Can the mind - listen to this please-can the mind which is caught in the activity of thought with its conditioning, and mechanical repetition, measurement, can such a mind be compassionate at all? It can talk about it, it can do social reform, social activities, be kind to the poor heathen down there and so on - is that compassion? When thought dictates, when thought is active, can there be any place for compassion? - compassion being action without motive, without self-interest, without any sense of fear, without any sense of pleasure. So one asks: is love pleasure? Go on, sirs, answer it.

Q: Yes.

K: You see! You say, yes. Yes, sir, sex is pleasure, of course.

Q: Not sex, love.

K: Wait sir, wait, sir.

Q: Don't talk about sex all the time.

K: I don't talk about sex all the time.

Q: All the time you talk about sex, sex, sex.

K: Sir, sir, wait, wait.

Q: Love is a whore. That's what you think all the time, a whore, sex. You talk against killing animals, aren't those leather shoes you are wearing?

K: Sir, we went into that. Please sir, just a minute sir.

Q: Ah, you talk all the time, you never let me talk.

K: Of course not.

Q: Shut up. These are discussions, right, let me talk.

K: We take pleasure in violence, we take pleasure in achievement, we take pleasure in assertion, we take pleasure in aggression, in every form of violence. And also we take pleasure in being somebody. All the product of thought, the product of measurement - I was that, and I will be that. Thought thinking about something, which has given it pleasure, wants it repeated. Now all that, is it love? Is pleasure, in that sense which we are talking about, the repetition of an experience, the repetition and the pursuit of achievement, the aggressive attitude, assertion, and its opposite which is fear, is all that love? Then how is a mind, which is caught in certain habits, with its associations, measurement, comparison, which produces all our conditioning, how can such a mind know what love is? Right? I may - one may say, love is this, that, that, which are all the product, the result of thought. And that's our life. A life of constant battle, and aggression, killing for satisfaction and for duty and for pleasure, that's what we call living, with its fear, punishment, pain, sorrow, all that is living. And we cling to that, and in that field circumscribed by thought we try to escape or find another field which is more productive, more creative, and so on, again created by thought. Please see what we are doing, not that we are imposing anything on each other, but observe what is actually going on.

Then from that question, from that observation, arises a question: what is death. What does it mean to die? It must be a most marvellous experience. We are not saying this for sadistic reasons, or because one wants instinctively to commit suicide, but it must be something that has completely come to an end. You understand? A movement that has been set going, a movement of strife, struggle, turmoil, sorrow, and all the anxious despairs, frustrations, which you call living, suddenly coming to an end. The man who is trying to become famous, assertive, violent, brutal, you know, cut off. I do not know if you have noticed, anything that continues psychologically becomes mechanical, repetitive, it's only when that which psychologically has a continuance comes to an end there is something totally new. You can see this in oneself. Creation is not the continuation of 'what is', or what was, but the ending of that. You have understood? If I, if a human being repeats he is a Brahmin, he is a Christian, he is a Buddhist, he is a communist, he is a socialist, you know, various forms of absurdities, he can never find anything new. It's only when all that momentum has come to an end there is something new.

So psychologically, can one die? You understand my question? Die to the known, die to what has been, not in order to become what you will be - the ending, the freedom from the known. After all that is what is death: the physical organism will die, naturally, poor thing, it has been abused, kicked around, vaccinated, frustrated, eaten all kinds of things, depending on the taste, drunk, you know, how you live, and you go on that way until you die. And the body through accident, through old age, through some disease, through the strain of this constant emotional battle within and without, makes the body twisted, ugly, die. And there is not only self-pity in this dying - please observe it - and also there is self-pity when somebody else dies, the thing that we call sorrow when somebody dies whom you consider you love, isn't there in that sorrow a great deal of fear, because you are left alone, you are exposed to yourself, you have nobody to rely on, nobody that can give you comfort, so there is in that there is a great deal of self-pity, not only for the person that has died but for yourself.

So our sorrow is tinged with this self-pity, and with fear. And naturally when there is this fear, self-pity, uncertainty, one accepts strangely every form of belief. You know the whole of Asia believes in reincarnation. You know what that means? Being reborn next life. Now when you enquire into that, what is it that is going to be reborn next life, you come against difficulties. What is it? Yourself? What are you? A lot of words, a lot of opinions, attachments to your furniture, to your shoes, to your opinions, to your conditioning, all that is going to be born next life, which you call the soul. And incarnation implies also that what you are today you will be again next life, therefore behave. You understand?

Behave, not tomorrow but today, because what you are today you are going to pay for it next life. Incarnate today, afresh, not next life. And those people who believe in this thing don't bother about behaviour at all, it is just a matter of belief, which has no value, because what you do today, what you are today, your activity, your conditioning, what you actually are, not what you think you should be - if you believe in that you will be, modified. So if that is going to be the next life, change it now, completely change, change with great passion, let the mind strip itself of everything, of every conditioning, every knowledge, everything we think is right, empty it. Then you will know what dying means.

So only when you understand means then you will know what love is. So love is not something of the past, of thought, of culture, it is not a pleasure. Therefore a mind that has understood the whole movement of thought becomes extraordinarily quiet, absolutely silent. This silence is the beginning of the new.

Right sir. Just a minute, you take a breath, and I'll take a breath.

Q: Can love have an object?

K: Can love have an object. Can I love you, you the object? Has love an object? Now please just listen to this. Who is asking the question? Thought?

Q: Love.

K: Love. Love is not asking this question. When you love, you love, you don't say, object, or no object, personal or impersonal. Oh, you don't know what it means, the beauty of it, sirs. Look at it. Our love as it is, is such a trial. Our love in our relationship with each other, is such a conflict. Our love is based on your image of me, and my image of you. The relationship of these two images - look at it very carefully - the relationship between these two isolated images call or say to each other, we love. The images are the product of the past, of our memories, memories of what you said to me and I said to you. And this relationship between the two images must inevitably be an isolating process. And that's what we call relationship. To be related means to be in contact, not merely physically but to be in contact, which is not possible when there is an image, or when there is a self-isolating process of thought, which is the 'me' and the 'you'. Then we say, has love an object, is not love divine, or is love profane. You follow? Sir, when you love you are not giving or receiving.

Q: What goes behind or beyond the word love, and also the beauty in the feeling of the sunset, is there actually a difference between beauty and that which has been named as love?

K: When you go behind the words beauty and love, do not all these divisions disappear. Right, that's the question, sir? You know, sir, have you ever sat very quietly, not day-dreaming, sat very quietly, completely aware, in that awareness there is no verbalization, no choice, no restraint, or direction, when the body is completely relaxed, have you noticed, have you ever done it, and be - not 'be' - when that silence comes into being, have you? We will talk about that the day after tomorrow when we meet, because that requires a great deal of exploration, a great deal of, you know, investigation. Because you see our minds are never still, they are endlessly chattering, and therefore dividing, therefore make life into fragments, the living into fragments - the doctor, the pacifist, and so on, divide, divide, divide. And so we divide beauty and love, art, the artist and the businessman. Can all this fragmentation come to an end? And knowing thought has divided this, thought is responsible for this division, because thought in its very nature is the past. Thought is time, thought divides the 'you' and the 'me', the fear and pleasure, escape from fear, pursue pleasure. So can thought be completely silent, and respond when it is necessary, without violence, objectively, sanely, rationally respond, and let this silence pervade? That's the only way to find out for oneself this quality of the mind that has no fragments, that is not broken up as the 'you' and the 'me'.

Q: Is killing a fly the same as killing a human being and an animal?

K: Is killing a fly the same as killing a human being and an animal. You know, where will you begin the comprehension of killing? Please listen to my question. With the fly, with the shoe, or with the mind, the heart, that has accepted killing? Where will you begin? You won't go to war, kill a human being - you may, I don't know whether you will or will not, it's up to you - but you don't mind taking sides - your group and my group. You don't mind believing in one thing, and standing by what you believe. You don't mind killing people with a word, with a gesture, and you'd be awfully careful not to kill a fly. You know, once I was, some years ago - the speaker was in a country where Buddhism is the accepted religion. In Buddhism it is one of the accepted actions of behaviour not to kill, if you are a practising Buddhist. So a couple came to see the speaker and he said, 'We have a problem. We don't want to kill, so we change the butcher every week.' Listen, listen, don't laugh, just listen. 'And that's not our problem.' They were ardent Buddhists who had been brought up not to kill. 'But our problem is we like eggs, and we don't want to kill life, the fertile egg, so what are we do?' You understand the question? Unless inwardly you are very clear, both verbally and actually, what killing implies, not only through a gun, by a word, by a gesture, by division, by saying, my country, your country, my god, your god, my belief, and your belief - as long as there is this division there will inevitably be killing in some form. And don't make a lot of ado about killing a fly and going and killing your neighbour with a word.

Look, sirs, the speaker has never eaten meat in his life, he doesn't know what it tastes like even. And yet he puts on shoes. And one has to live - I don't know why - one has to live, and so because in your heart you don't want to kill anything, hurt anybody, really you mean it - you understand, not to hurt anybody - then you have to kill the vegetable you eat, the tomatoes you eat. And if you don't eat vegetables, and you don't eat anything then I am afraid you will come very quickly to an end. So one has to find out for oneself very clearly, without any choice, without any prejudice, which means to be so highly sensitive and intelligent, then let that intelligence act, not you say, 'Well, I won't kill flies, but I will say something brutal about my husband.'

Yes sir?

Q: What is the difference between the mind and the brain?

K: Ah, what is the difference between the mind and the brain.

Q: Have they any function?

K: Please sir, we will go into it. Do you want to go into it now? What is the difference between the mind and the brain, and what are their functions? Do you want to go into it now? Haven't you had enough for this morning?

Q: Yes.

K: Thank you. We will meet again so we will talk about it.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC TALK 30TH JULY 1970

This is the last talk, but there will be discussions beginning on Sunday morning. And I hope you can stand this heat, at least for an hour and twenty minutes or so.

We have been talking, communicating with each other about many things concerning our daily existence. And I think this morning we should talk over together the problem of religion. I know most people don't like that word, they think it is rather old fashioned and has very little meaning in the modern world. There are the weekend religions, turn up on a Sunday morning, well dressed, and do all the mischief you can during the week, and so on. When we use the word 'religion' we are not in any way concerned with organized propagandist religions, churches, dogmatism, rituals and the authority of the saviours and representatives of god, and all the rest of that stuff. We are talking about something quite different. I am sure most human beings, both in the past and in the present, have always asked if there is something more, much more transcendental, real, than the everyday existence with all its tiresome routine, with its violence and despairs and sorrows, if there is something more. And not being able to find it, they have begun to invent, imagine, worship a stone, a tree, or an image, giving to that symbol a great significance. And it was all, it appears and seems, based on fear and thought.

Now to find out if there is anything really true, sacred - I am using that word rather hesitantly - something that is not put together by one's own desires and hopes and fears and longings, something that is not dependent on environment, culture, on education, but something that thought has never touched, something that is totally incomprehensibly new. And to find that out perhaps this morning we could spend an hour or so in enquiring into that, trying to find out whether there is a vastness, an ecstasy, a light that is unquenchable. Because without finding that life, however virtuous one is, however orderly, however non-violent one is, in itself has very little meaning. And the meaning of religion in the sense we are using, in which there is no kind of fear or belief, is the quality that makes for a life in which there is no fragmentation whatsoever. And if we are going to enquire into that, one must not only be free of all beliefs, but also one must be very clear of the distorting factor of all effort, direction and purpose.

Please do see the importance of this, because we are talking over together, sharing together, understanding together. And if you are at all serious in this matter it is very important to understand how any form of effort does distort a direct perception. Any form of suppression obviously distorts. Or any form of direction, direction born of choice, established purpose, an end, created by one's own desire, will, does make the mind not only distorted, utterly incapable of seeing things as they are. So we are enquiring into this question of what is truth, if there is such a thing as enlightenment, if there is such a thing as something that is not of time at all, if there is a reality that is not dependent on one's own demands.

Now in trying to find that out there must not only be freedom but also a certain quality of order. We generally associate order with discipline - discipline being conformity, imitation, adjustment, suppression and so on, drilling the mind to follow a certain course, a certain pattern, what it considers to be moral. That is generally understood as discipline. And that is diametrically opposite to order. Order has nothing whatsoever to do with discipline. Please do follow this a little while, give your attention, we are sharing together, so I don't have to repeat, 'Please do pay attention to this'.

As we were saying, order is not discipline. Order comes about naturally and inevitably when we understand all the disturbing factors, when we understand the disorders, the conflicts, the battles that are going on within ourselves, and outwardly, when we are aware of all this - the disorder, the mischief, the hate, the violence, the ambitions, the comparative pursuit and so on, which all creates not only social disorder but inward disorder, when we understand this disorder, look at it, become aware of it, then out of that awareness comes order, which is nothing whatsoever to do with discipline. But you must have order, because after all order is virtue. Yes, sir, you may not like that word 'virtue', after all virtue is not something to be cultivated. If it is a thing of thought, will, suppression, it is no longer virtue. But if one understands the disorder of our life, the confusion in which one lives, the utter meaningless of our existence, when we see all that very clearly, not only intellectually and verbally, but actually see the utter futility of all that, not condemning it, not running away from it, but observing it in our life, then out of that awareness and observation comes naturally order, which is virtue. This virtue is entirely different from the virtue of society with its respectability, the sanctions of society, of churches and religions with their hypocrisy, it is entirely different from one's own self imposed discipline. But this order in our enquiry must exist, otherwise you cannot proceed - proceed to find out if there is, or if there is not, without any assumption, a reality that is not of time, that is incorruptible, that doesn't depend on anything.

Now to find that out, if you are at all serious, really serious in the sense that it is a part of life, it is as important as earning a livelihood, as important as eating, seeking pleasure, you know, it is a vital tremendously important thing to find out. And this can only be found out through meditation. That word 'meditation' implies, the dictionary meaning of that word, is to ponder over, to think over, to enquire, to have a mind that is capable of looking, a mind that is intelligent, a mind that is sane, not perverted, not neurotic, not wishing something, for something. That is the generally understood meaning of meditation if you look into the etymology of that word, and so on.

Now we are going to together enquire into this: what is meditation, and if there is any method, any system, any path which you can pursue and come to the understanding, or perception of reality. You are following all this? You know unfortunately people come from the east with their bag of tricks. Their bag of tricks consists of systems, authorities, they say, do this, and don't do that and you will find enlightenment; practise Zen. Some of you have done all these tricks? Or go to India, or Japan, and spend your years studying, disciplining yourself, trying to become aware of your toe, your nose and your eyes and all the rest of it, day after day, practise endlessly. Or repeat certain words, the Sanskrit word for that is mantra, repeat certain words and you will calm the mind and in that calmness there will be perception of something beyond thought. You know all those tricks can be practised by a very stupid mind. A stupid mind, a dull mind - I am using the word 'stupid' as stupefied, the word 'stupid' means a mind that is made dull, stupefied. A mind that is stupefied - you may not like stupid, so I will be more polite by calling it a stupefied mind - a stupefied mind can practise any of these things, study Zen, practise it, repeat words, and specially if they are Sanskrit they have a certain tonality, and do all these tricks of control, suppression, imitation, follow a certain authority. A dull mind can do this, and it will remain dull. Naturally. Because when you do all these things, practise, the mind becomes more and more mechanical. Please, you may not be interested in all this but you have to find out. Because after you have listened very carefully you may go out in the world and teach people, that may be your vocation - and I hope it is - and so if you are going to point out these things you have to know the whole substance, the meaning, the fullness, the beauty, the ecstasy of all this.

So a dull mind, a mind that has been stupefied by practice cannot possibly under any circumstances whatsoever understand what is reality. So one must be completely, totally, everlastingly free of all this. Because you need a mind that is not distorted, that is very clear, that is not blunted, that is no longer pursuing a direction, a purpose, then only is it possible for such a mind to see 'what is'. In this state of mind there is no experiencing at all. Experience implies there is an entity who is experiencing, isn't there. An entity that is going through a certain experience, and therefore there is a duality - the experiencer and the thing to be experienced. Right? There is the observer and the thing to be observed. That is, most of us want some kind of deep abiding marvellous mystical experience, because our own daily experiences are so trivial, so banal, so superficial, we want something mysterious, something that is electrifying. Now in that desire for a marvellous experience there is this duality of the experiencer and the experience. Right? As long as this duality exists there must always be a distortion because the experiencer is the accumulated past, with all his experiences, his knowledge, his memory. Being dissatisfied with all that he wants something much greater, and therefore he either projects it, or finds it, but in that still there is a duality, therefore there is a distortion. Are you following all this? Truth is not something to be experienced. Truth is not something that you can seek out and find it. That which is beyond time, thought cannot possibly enquire, search it out and grasp it.

So one must understand very deeply this question of experience and wanting experience. So please understand this. Do please see this tremendously important thing. Any form of effort, wanting, direction, seeking out truth, and the demand for experience, in that there is a duality, the observer wanting something transcendental, and therefore making effort, and therefore making the mind not clear, not pristine or non-mechanical. And a mind that is seeking an experience, however marvellous, mysterious, in that very search there is a duality, the 'me' that is seeking it. The 'me' is the past, with all the frustrations, miseries, hopes, disgusts, you know, all that is seeking, therefore in that there is a distortion.

Then there is the whole business of the brain. After all the brain, you can observe this in yourself, I haven't read books, so we are not discussing from any special point of view - you can observe yourself, for yourself, how the brain operates. The brain is the result of the past, of time, of experience, it is the storehouse of memory. And memory is the past. And this memory responds, all the time responding, of like and dislike, justifying, condemning and so on, responding all the time, according to its conditioning, according to the culture, religion, education it is brought up with. That storehouse of memory, from which thought arises guides most of our life. Right? You are following all this? Are we going together? Don't look so worried, please. If you don't quite understand it now we will go into it a little later, afterwards, so relax and take it easy, because this is really quite an immense thing if you can grasp it.

And that brain, which is the storehouse of the past, is directed, is shaping our life, every day, and every minute, conscious or unconscious. And that's one of the distorting factors, which is thought, which is the response of the past - the past being knowledge, experience, and so on, the 'me', which is the very essence of the word and thought. Now can that old brain be completely quiet, only awoken when it is necessary to operate, to function, to speak, to do, act? But the rest of the time completely still. Have you ever tried to do this? No, you haven't. You all smoke very easily, you do things without deep thought, it doesn't matter, that's your affair.

Meditation implies, not the orthodox meditation, not the Zen meditation, not the meditation through repetition, all that is stupefied, mechanical, has no meaning. The real meditation is to find out whether the brain with all its activities, with all its experiences, can be absolutely quiet, not forced, because the moment you force it there is again duality. The entity that says, 'By Jove, I'd like to have a marvellous experience, therefore I must force my brain to be quiet, will it' - you will never do it. But if you begin to enquire, watch, observe, listen to all the movements of thought, its conditioning, its pursuits, its fears, its pleasures, how the brain operates, then you will see the brain becomes extraordinarily quiet. And the quietness is not dormancy, sleep, but tremendously active and therefore quiet. You understand? A machine, a big dynamo that is working perfectly, ticking over, well oiled, hardly makes any sound, it is only when there is friction, there is noise. So the brain and therefore the body, must be completely quiet.

So one has to find out whether your body can completely sit still, or lie still, without any movement - again, not force it. Because the body, the brain are interrelated, psychosomatically they function, not separately. Shall we go on, we are meeting each other? We are communication with each other?

There are various practices to make the body still. Again these practices imply suppression: the body wants to get up and go away, walk, and it says, 'No, I must sit quietly', and the battle begins, wanting to go out and wanting to sit still. And in this there is this whole thing called yoga - you have heard about it? You are rather - I suppose you know the whole world is upside down, when one is concerned only with social activities, social reform, revolution, all the other things escape, or are put aside. But if you want to understand the whole business of life, you have to understand everything that is contained in it, human life, psychologically. The word 'yoga', you will find dozens of books all over the world, written by all the specialists, means to join together. The very words 'join together' is wrong, which implies duality. You understand? Therefore it has quite a different meaning, which we won't go into now. Probably it was invented, this particular series of exercises and breathing many thousands of years ago. It is to keep the glands and the nerves and the whole system functioning very healthily, without medicine, and keep it highly sensitive. And the body needs to be sensitive otherwise you can't have a very clear brain. You know, if you stuff yourself with wine, meat and all the rest of it, how can your brain function clearly? Your smoking, drugs and all the rest of it, becomes such superficial immediate satisfactions without any understanding of what is beyond it.

Now yoga is a certain kind of practice, exercise, not something mysterious through exercise, one has to do it to keep the body supple. You understand? The brain has to have all the blood it needs, and therefore right breathing. You understand all these things? If I may be a little personal, we do it every day for two hours, regularly. Not the regularity of machinery - I won't go into all that, it doesn't matter.

So one has to have very good healthy, sane body, and therefore a brain that is capable of thinking rationally, healthily, objectively, non-personally, therefore efficiently, and a brain that is absolutely quiet - not mechanically made quiet. Now you can see the truth of it, can't you, the simple fact of it, that one needs to have a very good healthy, sensitive, alert body, a brain that functions very clearly, non-emotionally, non-personally, and such a brain to be absolutely quiet. You can see the fact of that, the simple logical fact of it. Now how is this to be brought about? You understand what I mean? How can the brain, which is so tremendously active, not only during the day time but when you have gone to sleep, how can this brain be so completely relaxed, or completely quiet? You understand my question? No method will do it, obviously. Please follow all this. No method. Right? Do you see that? Because method implies mechanical repetition, which stupefies the brain, and therefore makes the brain dull, and in that dullness you think you have a marvellous experience. So how is this brain, which is so tremendously active, which is never still, because it is always chattering, to itself or with others, judging, evaluating, liking, disliking, you know, turning over all the time, how can that brain be completely still? Do you understand the importance of a brain being still, the importance, not what the speaker says is important, for yourself do you see the real importance, the extraordinary importance that this brain should be completely quiet? Because the moment it acts it can only act in response of the past. It can only act in terms of thought, and therefore again the operation of the past. And it's only such a brain that is completely still that can observe. Right?

One can observe a cloud, a tree, a flowing river, with a fairly quiet brain. Right? You can see those mountains, the extraordinary light on those mountains, and the brain can be completely still. You have noticed this, haven't you. Now how has that happened? How does the mind, facing something of extraordinary magnitude, like a very, very, very, complex machinery, like a marvellous computer, or a magnificent sunset or a mountain, how does it become completely quiet, for even a split second? Have you noticed when you give a child a good toy, how the toy absorbs the child? Then the child is concerned with it, is playing with it, and doesn't - you know - he is absorbed by the toy. In the same way the mountain, the beauty of a tree, the flowing waters, absorb the mind and makes the mind by its greatness still. Right? That is, the brain is made still by something. Now can the brain be quiet without an outside factor entering into it? You are following all this? And because they haven't found a way, therefore they say, grace of god, prayers - right - faith, absorption in Jesus, in this or in that. And we see all that, this absorption by something outside, a dull, a stupefied mind can do this.

We are trying to find out, can this happen, this quiet, free brain that is completely quiet, without any interference. Right? You have understood the question? If it is not quiet one of the factors is dreams. You are following all this? Is this too much? Tant pis, if you don't understand, it's up to you. The brain is active all day, endlessly, the moment it wakes up till it goes to sleep it is on the move. And when you go to bed and go to sleep, the activity of the brain is still going on. Right? The activity of the brain are dreams. Right? The same movement of the day is carried on during sleep. And therefore the brain has never a rest, never a moment to say, 'I've finished, it's over', because it is carrying on the problems which it has accumulated into sleep, and when you wake up those problems go on. It is a vicious circle. So a brain that is to be quiet must have no dreams at all. Because when the mind is quiet during the sleep - the brain quiet during sleep there is a totally different quality entering into the brain, into the mind. We will go into that a little later, if you are interested.

So we are asking how does it happen that the brain, which is so tremendously, eagerly and enthusiastically active, can naturally, easily, without any effort or suppression, be quiet? I'll show it to you. As we said, during the day it is active endlessly, the moment you wake up, you look out of the window and say, 'Oh, awful rain', or, 'It's a marvellous, lovely morning, but too hot'. You have started. At that moment when you look out of the window not to say a word, not suppressing words, to realize that by saying, what a lovely morning, what horrible rain, this or that, the brain has started. But if you watch out of the window and not say a word, which doesn't mean you suppress the word, just to observe without all the memory of the past, just to observe. Right? So there you have the clue, there you have the key. To observe without the old brain responding. Therefore when the old brain doesn't respond there is a quality of the new brain coming into being. Are you getting all this?

You can observe the hills, the mountains, the river, the valleys, the shadows, the lovely trees, and the marvellous cloud full of light and glory beyond the mountains, to look at it without a word, without comparing. But it becomes much more difficult when you look at your neighbour, at your wife, your husband, another person. There you have already got the images established and it becomes much more difficult to observe your wife, your husband, your neighbour, your politician, your priest, or whatever it is, absolutely without an image. Just to observe, and you will see when you so observe, so clearly see, the action becomes extraordinary vital, therefore it becomes a complete action which is not carried over the next minute. You are meeting this? You understand? One has problems, not sleeping well, quarrelling with the wife, you know, problems, deeply, superficially, and we carry these problems from day to day - dreams are the repetition of these problems, the repetition of fear, pleasure, problems, over and over and over again. That obviously stupefies the mind, makes the mind dull, the brain too. Now is it possible to end the problem as it arises? You understand? Not carry it over. I have a problem, somebody has insulted me - I am taking the most silly problem. At that moment the old brain responds instantly. Right? Saying, you are also. Now before the old brain responds, to be aware of what the man or woman has said, something which is unpleasant, to have an interval between what he has said and the response of the old brain, to have a gap. You understand this? So that the old brain is responding slowly, doesn't immediately jump into the battle. So if you watch during the day the movement of thought in action - thought is action, and if you watch that and you realize that it is breeding problems, and problems are something which are incomplete, which have to be carried over - but if you watch that with a brain that is fairly quiet, then you will see action becomes instantaneous, so there is no carrying over of a problem. You have got this? No carrying over the insult or the praise, or something, you know, problems, carrying over to the next minute, it is finished.

So when you go to bed, when there is sleep, the brain is no longer carrying on the old activities of the day, it has complete rest. Right? And therefore the brain then being quiet in sleep, there takes place not only the rejuvenation of the whole structure in itself but a quality of innocency comes into being. Because only the innocent mind can see what is true. Right? Not the complicated mind, not the philosopher, not the priest, not the brain that is constantly repetitive, mechanical. The innocent mind is the brain as well as the body, the mind, the whole entity, the whole being - not even the being, it is the whole thing in which the body, the heart, the brain, the whole of that, if there is this alertness, watchfulness during the day, and when there is sleep there is a certain quality of innocency that happens. And it is only this innocent mind which has never been touched by thought, it is only such an innocent mind that can see what is truth, what is reality, if there is something beyond measure. That is meditation, not all the phoney stuff.

Therefore to come upon this extraordinary beauty of truth with its ecstasy, you must lay the foundation. The foundation is the understanding of thought which breeds fear and sustains pleasure. The understanding of order and therefore virtue, and therefore the freedom from all conflict and aggression and brutality, violence. That is the foundation, without that you can play tricks. And what you will have are the tricks of the conjurer. If one has laid this foundation on freedom, then there is this sensitivity which is supreme intelligence, and from that the whole life one leads becomes entirely different.

Would you would like to ask any questions about all this? Yes sir?

Q: Sir, during you talk you started to make a personal reference and then stopped. I think understanding you is very important to our understanding of what you said. I was surprised to hear what you said about yoga and how you practise it regularly for two hours every day. To me this sounds like a strong form of discipline. More than that though, it is the general question, you were speaking of innocence of mind, I am interested in the innocence of your mind.

K: The questioner says, it may be a personal thing but I would like to ask you, is your practice of yoga, doing two hours a day, regularly, a form of discipline, driving the body to do two hours a day, whether it likes it or not regularly. And also the questioner says, perhaps in answering this question I would like to see the innocency of your mind. To see the innocency of a mind, whether it is yours or mine, you must first be innocent. I am not turning the tables onto you, sir. And to see the innocency of this mind you need to be free, you need to have no fear, and a quality of brain that is functioning without any effort. And if you do yoga regularly every day, two hours, is that not a form of discipline. You know the body tells you when it is tired, the body tells you, don't do it this morning. So when we have abused the body, driving it to do all kinds of things, spoiling it, spoiling its own intelligence, which it has, by particular food you like, smoke, drink, and all the rest of it, the body becomes insensitive, then thought says, I must drive it, I must force it. Then such driving the body, or forcing it, compelling it, becomes a discipline. Whereas when you do these things regularly, easily, without any effort - yoga means skill in action, it isn't just doing certain things - the skill in action implies no effort. When you do the exercises any form of effort involved, that is not yoga. Therefore you do it easily, and the regularity of it depends on the sensitivity of the body. You do it one day, and the next day the body may be tired and you say, all right, I won't do it.

It is not a mechanical regularity. Right sir?

All this requires a great deal of intelligence, not only the intelligence of the body, but the mind, the whole thing called mind in which is the brain, and all that, when that is intelligent it will tell you, it will react, tell you what to do, what not to do. Yes sir?

Q: You want our minds to be quiet, but we have sometimes to take decisions. It is awfully difficult to know if we are going to take this or this decision, and this is what carries on problems.

K: Right. I understand sir. A mind that is quiet must decide sometimes. If it cannot decide clearly then problems arise, even the very decision is a problem. Isn't it? That is the question, isn't it, sir? Decision. When do you decide? You understand the question? When do you decide - decision between this and that? Right? To do this, or to do that, which means choice. Right? When there is choice and out of that choice decision, then there is conflict, then from that arises problems. But when you see very clearly there is no choice, and therefore there is no decision. You are meeting this? I know the way very well from here to where one happens to live. There is no choice, you follow the road, because it is very clear. Watch it, watch it, go slowly. Because you have been on that road a hundred times, there is no question, you may find a short cut, and if there is a short cut you take it next time. That becomes mechanical, in that there is no problem. The brain wants the same thing to happen, to function automatically, mechanically, so it doesn't create a problem. Right? Do you see that? The brain demands that. Which is, please let me operate mechanically, therefore it says, I will discipline myself to function mechanically. I must have a belief, a purpose, a direction, so that I can set a path to it and follow it, which all becomes mechanical. It follows in a groove. Right? Therefore what happens? Life won't allow that because there are all kinds of things happening. And so thought resists, builds a wall of belief, it resists. And this very resistance creates problems. So when you have to decide, and you decide between this and that, that means there is confusion between this and that, otherwise there is no decision. Right sir? Should I, or should I not do this? Right? That question I put to myself only when I am confused, when I don't see clearly what is to be done. Please see this. Out of confusion we choose, not out of clarity. The moment you are clear your action is complete.

Q: But it cannot be always clear.

K: Wait. He says it cannot always be that way. Why not?

Q: If it's a complex choice then you cannot reach a decision quickly, you have to look at it, it takes time to look at it.

K: Yes, sir, take time, patience, to look at it.

Q: You have to compare.

K: Wait, sir. Look at it sir. You have to compare, compare what with what? Compare two stuffs, blue and white, compare it. Right? Whether you like this colour or that colour, whether you go up this hill or that hill, and you decide I prefer to go to that hill today and tomorrow I will go there - there is no choice, because you are going up there the next day. The problem arises when it is dealing with the psyche, what to do within oneself, this or that. Now I say - we say, watch it. First watch what decision implies, to decide to do this or that, what is that decision based on? On choice, obviously. Should I do this, or should I do that. And I realize when there is choice there is confusion, because I have to choose. So confusion must exist when there is choice. No?

Q: I pass.

K: Wait, wait. First, I see the truth of this, the truth, the fact, the 'what is', which is where there is choice there must be confusion. Now why am I confused? Go step by step. Why am I confused? Because I don't know, or I know but I prefer that, as opposed to this. That's more pleasant, it may produce greater results, greater fortune, or whatever it is, so I choose that. But in following that I realize also there are frustrations, which is, pain. Right? So I am caught again between fear and pleasure. No? So I say, now, I am caught in this, can I act without choice? That means I have to be aware of all the implications of confusion, all the implications - listen to this carefully, please - all the implications of confusion, all the implications of decision, the decider and the thing decided upon, which is duality, and therefore conflict, and therefore perpetuation of confusion, to be aware of all this - all that will take time, you say. You follow? It will take time, won't it - to be aware of my confusion, to know I am confused, what is involved in this confusion, to be aware out of that confusion I choose, and in choice there is decision, which means duality, which means conflict. Now to be aware of all the intricacies of this movement will naturally take time. Right? Now will it take time? Or can you see it instantly? And therefore instant action. You see the difference? Oh, come on sirs.

Look: I have to decide between this and that, and in that decision there is conflict. And if I pursue one decision, the thing which I choose, there is a duality, and that inevitably breeds conflict. So I am back again with the problem. So I am asking myself, all this enquiry, observation, apparently, generally takes time, that's what you said just now, there. It takes time, patience, enquiry. I say, does it?

Q: Otherwise you will dream of it.

K: No, no. Do watch it, sir. It only takes time when I am not aware of it. That is, my brain being conditioned in the old, says, I must decide, look what the brain does, because that is its habit, I must decide what is right and what is wrong, what is beauty, what is responsibility, what is love - right? - decide, decide, decide according to the past, which is the old brain. So the decision of the old brain breeds more conflict, which is what the politicians throughout the world are doing. Right? The Israelites against the Arabs, and the English, you know. Now can that brain, the old brain be quiet so that it sees the problem of confusion instantly and acts because it is clear? Therefore there is no decision at all. If you saw that once, you will see what happens.

Q: Sir, if I perceive something my brain instantly becomes worse. It is natural, yes.

K: I explained that sir. I explained just now, we explained just now. Because our brain, as we said, is all the time active, responding. And we are saying this response of the old brain must inevitably lead to confusion, to decision, to operate and act according to the old pattern. But when you see the fact - please see this - when you see the fact that any decision must be born out of confusion and therefore increased problems, then your concern is not decision but whether the mind can be free of confusion.

Q: How?

K: I am showing it to you. The mind is in confusion, the brain is in confusion because it is responding all the time according to the old pattern. Be aware, see the truth that it is acting according to the old pattern. See the truth of it, not your intellectual seeing, see the fact of it. The seeing of that fact is the liberating factor. Like when I see danger there is instant action, there is no choice. Wait. In the same way when I see the danger of decision born out of confusion, see the danger of it, then that very danger frees the mind from the old, and therefore there is an action which is complete which is not based on decision.

Q: Can we learn from experience?

K: Can we learn from experience. I don't think so.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, wait, let me finish. Can you learn from experience - certainly not. Learning implies - learning, curiosity, enquiry, freedom. Are you following all this? When you are learning something, a new language, when a child learns something it is free, he is curious, he wants to know, he is learning, it is a momentum - not a momentum of having acquired and moving from that acquisition. We have experiences, innumerable, we have had five thousand years of war, we haven't learnt a thing from it, except to invent more deadly machinery, to kill each other. We have had many experiences with our friends, with our wives, with our husbands, with nationality - we haven't learnt. Learning can only take place when there is freedom from experience. Sir, when you discover something new your mind must be free of the old. Obviously. That's why meditation is the emptying of the mind of the known, because truth is not something that you invent, it is something totally new. Not in terms of the old and new, its newness is not the opposite of the old, it is something incredibly new. And therefore a mind that comes to it with experience cannot see what truth is.

Q: To operate in the world of thought, are you saying that the paradox of thought is thinking of no thought, something like that?

K: No, not something like that at all. We operate daily with thought, and that's why there is so much mischief in the world, the 'me' and the not 'me', my country, your country, my god, my race, my belief, you know, thought. To operate entirely differently, not the opposite of it, is to find out the whole nature and the structure of thought, which is the past. And to find out whether that past which is necessary when I have to operate mechanically, when the mind has to operate technologically, it has to have all that knowledge, but to meet this whole extraordinary problem of living the mind must be new, fresh, innocent. No? If it meets always with the past pattern it creates more and more problems, and therefore more and more confusion. So to see the truth of this, not analyse it, dissect it, agree with it, but see the truth of this simple fact. If you really see it you are out of it.

We meet tomorrow, don't we, there's a young people's meeting tomorrow at ten thirty.

SAANEN 2ND DIALOGUE WITH YOUNG PEOPLE 31ST JULY 1970

K: What shall we talk over together this morning? This is supposed to be the younger generation who are going to ask questions, and perhaps as the speaker belongs to the older generation they will forgive me for being up here. So what shall we talk over together? You know it would be very interesting and worthwhile if we could take one subject that is of vital importance to all of us and explore it together, uncovering every detail, if we can, not coming to any conclusion because that would be terrible. But expose everything contained in that one issue so that we will see for ourselves all the implications involved in it. And when we see the whole thing, all the intricacies, all the issues, then there is no question of choice or decision, it is there. You either do it, or don't do it, there is not, saying to oneself, shall I, or shall I not, that brings about a decision. Whereas if you see the thing very clearly you can say to yourself, I am not going to do it, it doesn't interest me. But if it is of vital meaning to you then you can't help doing it, it is part of one's life. It's like saying I won't use my right arm.

So what shall we talk over together this evening - this morning that would not only expose the intricacies of the problem but also in understanding the problem expose ourselves to it. An issue can be something outside, verbally, which has very little meaning, but if we could get involved in it, be part of it, and thereby expose ourselves, not to another but to ourselves. Then I think it might be worthwhile if we could easily and happily enquire into a problem that might be of general and vital interest.

Q: We communicate by words and symbols, and also by clothes and our way of being. And these symbols, and even the way we communicate with our clothes, stands in the way of true communication. Can we go into communication?

K: The questioner says, can we talk over communication. We use words, gestures, symbols and often periods of quietness, but somehow it doesn't seem quite appropriate or significant or give the full meaning of what one wants to say. Is that right, sir?

Q: Right. And the actual symbols, we are conditioned by our symbols, we have conditioned ourselves to symbols.

K: We are conditioned by our symbols, and we have conditioned those symbols according to our conditioning. We know all that. Now, do you want to discuss that? Yes sir?

Q: We said yesterday that we had difficulties to take decisions, which shows we are in confusion. So I would like to know how did we get into that confusion, and how can we get out of it?

K: Yesterday you said that decision means a choice, choice implies confusion, how did we get into this confusion originally.

Q: And how can we get out of it?

K: And how can we get out of it. Yes sir?

Q: Can freedom, non-dualism, and bliss be sustained by human beings, or are we meant to oscillate up and down?

K: Freedom, bliss and non-duality, can we remain at that level all the time, or must we oscillate up and down.

Q: You said yesterday the brain must be quiet. I would like to know can the brain be quiet when it has to work?

K: You said yesterday the brain must be quiet, can it be quiet when it has to work, when it has to think. Yes sir?

Q: Could we discuss our demand for security?

K: Can we talk over together our demand for security.

Q: Can we discuss the tyranny of the mind?

K: The tyranny of the mind.

Q: From the question of communication, you said - I am now asking a question - of how one can get a person who is living in all kinds of ways that has made this person completely insensitive, so that the yoga you talk about is completely down, how can you get to this person?

K: How can you communicate with somebody who is completely down, who is insensitive, who is not interested in what you are talking about, how can you communicate with such a person. You can't!

Now just a minute, sir. What shall we do? There are now so many questions. Now which of those - please find out for yourself - which of those shall we take and go right through to the end of it so that you are very clear, so that you have no problems about it, so that you don't have to ask afterwards, 'I would like to ask another question about it'? Right? Now can we take one of these which will be really worthwhile and significant and go to the very end of it?

Q: The tyranny of the mind.

K: The tyranny of the mind?

Q: This question of confusion, it seems to go on from yesterday. Everything seems to relate to this question.

K: So shall we discuss confusion?

Audience: Yes.

K: Good! Now please, sir, we are talking as two friends. I am sorry I have to sit on a platform, which gives one a certain authority, but I have no authority, it is just for convenience I am sitting up here. I must just as well be sitting on the ground and talking over together. That's what we do in India. It is only sitting on a platform, as I do when there are 8,000 people, one has to because otherwise... So, please, we are talking over together as two friends really concerned with this problem, not partially concerned, or just go off and you are not interest in it, you are involved in it, you live it. You want to find out how this confusion arises, and whether it is at all possible to be free of it. Right.

When we talk about confusion, what do we mean by that word? What do you mean by that word? Not only according to the dictionary meaning, but to yourself, non-verbally - you understand? Bearing in the mind the word is not the thing, the description is not the described, the explanation is not the explained, how do you consider, or how do you feel for yourself that you are confused?

Q: Not knowing what to do, what you are.

K: Not knowing what to do, what you are, what your relationship to society is, what commitment you should undertake. When there is so much confusion, misery, injustice, neuroticism in the world, among the politicians, the priests and your friends around you, what is one to do? Right? Now what does this word 'confusion' - how do you know you are confused?

Q: Possibly because you are unable to take decisions.

K: No, no. Don't - no, my question is something entirely different. We will come to that, first begin slowly. How do you know you are confused? Is it in relation to something, because you want to do something, and you say, 'I don't know', and therefore you discover you are confused. Please go very, very slowly over this, it is very important to understand this. You want to do something and you discover you are confused. So you know your confusion in relation to something. Wait! If the thing you are related to is happy, you knew what to do, would there be confusion? You are understanding my question? I am happy, I have money, I have everything I want, and I go about, do everything as I like. I say, 'What are you talking about confusion, I am not confused'. But such a person is confused. Now see the difference. It is not in relation to something. We will come to that presently. But how do you know you are confused without action taking place, asking, what should one do. You see the difference? I wonder if you do.

Q: Isn't it that we always see we are confused in action?

K: No, sir. Go slowly, first. Go into this so deeply, and to go into it very, very deeply you must go millimetre by millimetre, or centimetre by centimetre, you can't jump to any conclusion. Now how do I know I am confused? How do I know I am hungry? Wait, wait, listen carefully a minute. How do you know you are hungry? Not because of the food I am going to have which stimulates hunger, but there is hunger. Then I want certain kind of food. Then I say, shall I eat this, that, or the other. First there is the feeling of hunger. Right? In the same way, do you know you are confused? Or you only know in relation to something? Like a man who has everything he wants - position, prestige, etc. - he says, what are you talking about confusion, I am not confused at all. But below that strata, layer, he is terribly confused. Now to such a person confusion is non-existent, to you who want to do something and find yourself confused, you say, I am confused. See the difference? And there is another thing: do you know you are confused, per se, for itself? Do you see the difference of these three categories?

Q: I would say you know it, to a certain extent, but you really touch it when you have to act, because then you have to choose.

K: You only know that you are really confused when you have to act, then you have to choose. Right? And according to your action, what to do reveals your confusion. Right? But if the action is very satisfactory what will you do? You will say, it's all right, I am not confused. I don't know if you see this? Do we see this, please, let's go further in this.

Do you only know that you are confused because you don't know what to do? Or - let me put it this way - or you see what is happening in the world - the political confusion, the nationalistic confusion, the economic confusion, the social injustice, the prejudices of black, white, pink, at each other, and the corruption that exists in society in the individual, in the human being, this constant turmoil, war - all that indicates confusion, doesn't it? Wait, all that indicates confusion, doesn't it? So do you realize in your relationship to that general vast confusion that you are also confused, not action, not what to do about that? I don't know if you see this.

Q: Whether to adjust myself to confusion, or not.

K: No, no my darling sir, just listen. I am sorry. Look, there is confusion in the world, and in observing the general confusion I am aware I am also confused. It's not a question of action yet. Right? I am confused because the world is confused, but the moment I say, I have to do something about that, and realize I am confused, then my confusion is a result of wanting to find out what to do. You see the difference? I wonder if you do.

Sir, look, you are hungry, nobody needs to tell you that you are hungry, you don't have to watch the world, see the restaurants, or the menus and so on, you are hungry. Now in the same way do you know you are confused?

Q: Sometimes I do.

K: Then you will see that if it is confusion unrelated to the general problem, then your action is entirely different. Look, sir, let's go slowly. I am confused - the world is confused, as a human being, living in this world, I find I am confused. I don't say, 'What am I to do about the confusion that exists in the world', but I say, 'I am also confused' - not in relation to any action, I am just confused. Your question is: I only know confusion when I have to do something, which is entirely different from knowing that you are confused. I wonder, have I explained this enough? Don't get bored with this.

Q: I also want to know how did I get in this confusion.

K: I am coming to that.

Q: I mean, psychoanalysts, am I confused because I have got countless...

K: No, no, forget the analysts.

Q: How did I get into confusion?

K: Be patient, we are going to find out how we got into this, but first see the difference, please see the actual verbal, intellectual and otherwise, a difference between the confusion with regard to action, and confusion for itself, per se. Right? Do you see the difference between that? Then I say to myself, not, what I am going to do about society, but how did this confusion arise in me, as a human being. That is the question, not what to do about society. If there is no confusion in me I will act, and therefore affect rightly the social structure. Right? No, no, but see the difference. If you see the difference, then how have I got into this confusion?

Q: We are dealing with the confusion of years, so is our present problem...

K: Wait, sir, I am coming to that. How did I, a human being, get into this terrible confusion? That's what you are asking. How does it happen that I am confused?

Q: Is it not a complex...

K: Wait. I don't accept - we will go into that presently, whether it is the complex, or the Jungian complex, or Adlerian, or Freudian complex or the latest analyst complex, we will come to that a little later. I realize I am confused. I realize it not in relationship to any action. Therefore my question is: how have I, a human being living in this world, got into this state? Is it the fault of the society? Is it the fault of education? The economic structure? The religious beliefs, fears and all that? Is it the inherited, accumulated confusion of man from the beginning? Follow all these questions, you can't just brush all this aside. So when I say, is it the result of society - right? I am taking that first - is it the result of society, society being education, religion, the general culture, the general absurdities, superstitions, inequalities, social injustice, the prejudices, the nationalities, the false education, all that we can put in one word - society. Right? Don't bring up another. So is it that society has produced this in me? - which means I am different from society: I am an innocent, or a malleable entity, soft, and society has shaped me, and in the very shaping of me it has brought confusion. Which means I am different from society. So I cannot blame society.

Right? See, you cannot blame the environment, you cannot blame the food I eat. You follow? So I am asking if it is not the fault of society, because I am society, I created it and I am caught in it - didn't I create it? Wait, let's be clear about it.

Q: No.

K: You say, no. Didn't you create it through ambition?

Q: It was there.

K: It was there. You say, it was there, created by other human beings - arriere. My great-great-great-grandfathers, they created that society for which I am not responsible - listen very carefully - for which I am not responsible. And I being very clear - right? - I am very clear therefore I am not confused. If my great-grandfathers, the past generations, have brought about this awful mess, and it is their fault, and therefore I have nothing whatsoever to do with it, then I am not confused. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: But I am confused!

Q: Because I have been marked.

K: Wait! Therefore - we are coming to that - therefore you say, I have been marked, I have been shaped by society. I have been marked, I have been shaped, I have been pushed into a corner by society. Right? Are you? Are you?

Q: Not put in a corner, but marked, yes.

K: Marked. Therefore what does it mean? You are marked, you are caught, you are shaped. So whom are you going to blame? Can you blame anybody?

Q: No.

K: Right. That's all. You have allowed yourself to be marked. Before you knew anything about it, as a child, as a boy, as a girl, as you grew up, the imprint of society - so you can't blame society. Right?

Q: Right.

K: You blame nothing. Right? You don't blame your grandfather, your grandmother, your parents. Please see the importance of this. So it is no good revolting against your parents!

Q: Can we continue?

K: Wait, I am going to. So you say, there is nobody against whom I can revolt, there is nobody, no society, which I can blame. I am marked. I am confused. Right? Not, what has produced confusion. The fact is I am confused. You can give explanations for this confusion by saying it is my grandfather, the present society - those are all explanations, but the fact is you are confused. Can we proceed now? Nobody to blame, no good saying, how has it come about, not the complexes, it is there. Right? Our position now is entirely different. Right? Before I blamed people.

Q: I don't blame them but I can revolt.

K: You can revolt, which is a form of blaming.

Q: No.

K: When you revolt you reject that.

Q: I don't want it.

K: You don't want it. Just let's go slowly, sir. But when you don't want it, and you act, you are acting out of your confusion, therefore you are increasing your confusion. We are now concerned not with action for the moment but the realization that you are confused and no one is to be blamed. Right? It happens. I happen to be born in India, I can't blame all the Indians for being born there because I am not the fashionable colour, a little brighter colour, but it's no good my blaming anybody, it's a fact. Now let's proceed from there. Right?

Now I realize that I am confused, and it is not the fault or the result of any outward confusion. It is a fact. Now what am I to do? Right? Now see how we have progressed, how we have gone into this: what am I to do. I know I am confused, what am I to do?

Q: We have to see we won't try to get out of it.

K: We are going into it, sir, slowly, sir, go with me. What am I to do? Now I say to myself, who is putting this question? Right? I am confused and I say I must do something about it - who is putting this question? Is this question being put by somebody who is not confused? Please answer this question, find out. Is this question being put by a fragment outside this confusion? Right? Then who is putting the question?

Q: Confusion itself.

K: Yourself?

Q: No, confusion itself.

K: Now if you say it is the confusion itself - see what you are saying - it is the confusion itself. How can it put such a question? How am I to get out, what am I to do about it? See the importance, go into this, see the importance of this. I realize I am confused. If there is one part of me that says, I must get out, I must clear this confusion - what is that part? Is it still a part of confusion, or something unrelated to confusion? Some outside agency, higher, lower, an outside agency, or am I - no, listen carefully, sir - or, is there part of me which is confused which says, for god's sake, let's get out of this to a better level?

Q: The same part.

K: Right. So it is confusion asking this question. No? No, sirs? I am confused, I realize that very clearly. Then the question arises: I must be free of this confusion. I say to myself, who is putting that question? Is it part of the confusion, or is it some entity outside the confusion - god, whatever it is? And if it is a part of the confusion that is putting this question then that question is irrelevant, it has no value. Wait. Right? Please follow this carefully. If it is an entity which is putting the question, then there is an outside factor or an agency that is driving you to put this question.

Q: Couldn't we say it is a healthy part of ourselves which is putting the question?

K: Therefore, whether you call it healthy - therefore you are suggesting that there is a part of us that is not confused. Right?

Q: The same part.

K: There is part of us that is not confused and therefore that part is putting the question. Now wait a minute, look what you are saying. A part of us that is not confused, and that's what all the religions have said. You are caught in this. All the religions have said, god, an outside agency, the higher self, the atman.

Q: Not outside.

K: Which is in us.

Q: Yes.

K: Which is the same thing. It is in us but it is not touched by confusion. You see, the clever trick we play upon ourselves. You realize, sir, that we have played a trick upon ourselves by saying, there is a part of us which is untouched, and that part is putting the question. And I say, by Jove, look what I have done. That's what all the religions have maintained, which means a duality, which means a conflict between the part that is untouched and the rest of the confusion. So I say that's nonsense.

Q: But...

K: Wait, wait. That's nonsense. I drop that. I won't put a question at all.

Q: So I can't get out?

K: Wait, wait. I am going to show it to you, sir, go slowly. You are all too impatient.

Q: Interruptions are confusing.

K: No, there should be interruptions, there should be questions, but follow it step by step and you will put the right questions. Go easy, sir. Look: I am confused, I don't blame anybody. Right? I am marked, and this mark is not the imprint of anybody, of any society, of any culture. And the next thing is: how am I to get out? And I say to myself, who is putting this question? Is it an outside agency, or a part of me which is not outside agency, part of me which is not confused? Is there a part of me which is not confused? If there is a part of you which is not confused then that part will act, and therefore you have no choice to make. And if there is a part of you which is not confused then there is duality. That means one part against the other part; the higher self against the lower self, god against - you are back again, the devil and you know. So I say that approach, that questioning is totally wrong. It leads to a wrong conclusion, a wrong end, so I won't put a question. I am confused.

Now what do you do when you are confused in a wood, when you have lost your way? And there is nobody to ask where is the right road. What do you do, what is the first thing you do?

Q: Stop.

K: Stop, don't you? Wait, look, go slowly. Now I am confused, I have put every question, I have said this, I have said that, I have taken this path, that path, the other path - you follow - and I see before I do anything there must be stopping of action with regard to confusion. Right? You are following all this? The mind says, I won't go this way or that way, I must first stop. Are you doing this? You are confused and there is no way out - right? - and you have thought of many ways out, and you say, how absurd because in myself I am confused, therefore every act I do is confusion, therefore I won't act, I won't do anything - stop. Have you stopped?

Q: Part of me has.

K: No, not part of you has. You see, you have actually tried the road going north, you have tried north-east, south, west, east, you have done all these paths. Wait, sir. Out of your confusion you have done all these. And you say, by Jove, I am still where I am, I am still confused. So you say, the first thing I must stop going in any direction.

Q: Stop is outside action.

K: No. Have you stopped?

Q: Most of us wait, there is no more fuel.

K: No, sir. Do see this, there is plenty of fuel. Do please see this. When you are lost in a wood, in a forest, and you have tried every other way, every way to get out of it, and come back to the point where you started, you say, for god's sake, let me stop first and see what happens. Right? You stop. Have you? Have you stopped searching a way to clear up the confusion?

Q: When you stop there is no confusion.

K: Stop, sir. You are going to discover something else. I wish you would actually do it. Which means the mind, being confused, realizes that whatever it does leads to further confusion, the mind sees the truth of that and stops. The mind doesn't wander out, or wander in. It says, any movement from me, any movement of the mind to seek a way out is to increase confusion, sees the fact of it. Right? As I see the fact that the sun rises every day, I see the fact of it, and therefore it stops. Have you done it? Stopping without any conflict, because, you follow, you see that road doesn't lead anywhere, you stop. My lord, what are you all hesitating about?

Q: Do you mean stopping to act, or stopping to search a road out of confusion?

K: Both: act, a way out. Because to act out of confusion is to increase more confusion, seeking a way out of confusion implies an entity which is not confused and therefore duality, and so on. So all the movement stops.

Q: Sir, I have a question: you, Krishnamurti, you are confused, now are you going to hold a private soliloquy as you are doing now with yourself, or are you just going to recognize the fact that you are going to stop and change direction, look at 'what is' and just go on?

K: I am not confused. I see very simply and very clearly that a human being who is confused has first to stop.

Q: Is stopping not another action?

K: No. You see you are all verbalizing, you are not doing it.

Q: Isn't it an act for you?

K: No, no action at all. Look sir, I have been wandering around, trying this way and that way, and I see the futility of it, therefore I stop.

Q: To self-understand eliminates confusion.

K: No, no, you don't have to self-understand, we are doing that now as we go along, this is self-understanding, this is self-knowledge, how the mind plays a trick upon itself, by saying, I am confused, I must get out of it and so on. Sir, a blind man seeking a way out, he has tried several ways, hurt himself against this furniture and that furniture, so he realizes I won't move. First let me take my bearings, stop and then I will feel my way around, not rush into things. Right? We are blind, we are confused. I say, look, stop a minute and feel around. You understand sir? Don't say, I must do this, I must not do that, I must revolt.

Q: But some people stop their whole lives.

K: That's equally stupifying. Some people say, I don't know what to do and just stop and they are dead. But a man who says, look, there must be a way out, I am going to find it, I don't know what it is, I am going to find it, I have tried this, this, this, it doesn't work, therefore before I do anything I won't move. Are you like that? If you are not like that, the next question or next enquiry has no meaning.

Q: How does a confused mind know there is a way out?

K: I am showing you sir. How does a confused mind know its way out.

Q: No, know there is a way out.

K: Therefore first stop. You'll find out! Lordy, you don't do it.

Q: I still feel there is an separate entity that is not confused.

K: You can't get away from this feeling that there is a separate entity that is not confused. That means separate entity which is clear, which is unpolluted, which is untouched, unmarked. Now, listen to this, please listen to this, once you understand this you will never again put that question. Now when you have a feeling that there is a separate entity, how do you know that there is a separate entity? Is it a feeling? Is it the result of your thought, your wish, your desire that there must be some way out and therefore thought invents a separate entity who is not marked? If you know a way out you wouldn't have a separate entity. Right? Right? Because we don't know a way out we invent a separate entity. Come on, sirs! I am sorry you are bored and yawning.

Q: I'm not.

Q: Would you say that the trials of many attempts before coming to a stop was a necessary prerequisite?

K: I understand. Was it necessary to go through all these various attempts to come to the point that you must stop. Must one go through all this? Now just a minute, listen. Must you go and get drunk to know sobriety? Must you go and take drugs to know the uselessness of it? Or you know it, you see it?

Q: I think that is a little more obvious. But the case of a person joining a society, or a church, or this sect and so on, was that a necessary prerequisite?

K: Look sir, I have said that, the human being tries these things, he doesn't stick to one of them, he tries it, and he realizes one try is good enough, one part is similar to the rest of the parts, so he says, out.

Q: You said firstly to stop - and afterwards?

K: I have asked the question sir, have you stopped?

Q: Sometimes, yes.

K: Have you stopped asking the question, or seeking the way out of this confusion? Now this next question is really very important if you have done it. If you don't do it then you are playing with words. I have stopped because I have sought different ways and I see the futility of going to one thing after another, so I have stopped. Now the next step: how do you know you have stopped? How are you aware - please listen carefully, sirs, this is a really important question - who is aware that he has stopped?

Q: Because you are watching the senses become quiet since you stopped.

K: Yes, sir. I am asking, sir. I understand sir. Look, how do you know you have stopped?

Q: You only know you haven't stopped, if you see yourself in relationship then you know you haven't stopped.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: The mind becomes quiet.

K: Yes, sir. Look, listen carefully, find out, don't be so quick in saying, the mind becomes quiet. There is a great deal involved in this question.

Q: I can say, I don't mind being confused all the time

K: Well you can say, I don't mind being confused all the time - all right, sir, there is no problem. Like the man who says, what are you talking about confusion when I have everything I want. You are a similar person who says, I am confused all the time, I don't mind - you have no problem.

Q: Sir, you are talking about confusion, going step by step. Is there a pattern in your mind that you are trying to give to us which we should follow?

K: No.

Q: Because it seems so long and so abstract.

K: It is not long, it is not abstract, it's like going up the hill - I have to go step by step, I can't suddenly find myself at the top of the hill. I must put foot after foot. It may sound, or it may appear long, but it is not, because you have come to a point when you have put away all the things which man has invented in order to escape from confusion - his gods, his societies, his culture, his analysis, everything you have put away. That's a tremendous thing. Then you say, how do I know - please listen - how do I know I have stopped? Is the stoppage right through my being? You understand? Right through, or only superficial? Because the stopping superficially is an intellectual conclusion, and therefore you are back again. But if it is both at the conscious level, at all the deeper layers, there is complete cessation of any movement, both neurologically, emotionally, verbally, in thought, there is a complete cessation of any movement that is born out of confusion.

Q: By stopping I don't believe you can relieve the state of confusion.

K: You are going to find out.

Q: That argues from the fact there is a choice, one way or the other.

K: No, sir, we went through that. We said confusion - when there is choice you are confused. Sir, if I don't know which road to take, I am confused. But if I know which road to take I am not confused. Let me finish with that. You are going back to the old thing, which is: choice exists, and decision exists as long as there is confusion. Full stop. We have been through that yesterday, you might not have been here yesterday.

Q: Stopping all movement within myself, does it mean also stopping action?

K: Find out!

Q: It seems illogical to say that I control myself and stop...

K: Wait, sir. No, you have realized that any movement out of confusion leads to more confusion. Right? And therefore you say, let me stop, because I can't go way, there is no way out, I have tried that way, that way, that way, there is no way out.

Q: Probably I don't recognize it as stopping.

K: I am going to go into it, sir.

Q: How is one to stop? One sees this body has been deformed since childhood, and one finds it difficult to breathe, and all types of psychosomatic...

K: Then I am afraid sir. The question is, how can one who is psychosomatically damaged stop from being confused. Wait. Has the psychosomatic activity produced this confusion? I can be ill and yet realize the confusion is not the result of my illness. That is fairly simple, isn't it? I can have violent, deep pain and yet realize that my confusion is going on. So illness, disease, any form of psychosomatic warping can be disassociated from confusion. This is fairly clear.

So let's proceed: I realize I am confused, and out of that confusion any choice is furthering that confusion. So there is no decision. I am confused therefore I have tried this, this, this, and I realize the futility of it. The realization of the futility of any movement of confusion, that very fact makes the whole movement stop. Now has it stopped with you? Has it stopped with you? No? Why not? Wait. Somebody says to you, this is a microphone - you say, I don't see it, I think that is a tree. Right? In the same way, we have spent nearly an hour seeing the whole implication of confusion, that it is not the fault of anybody, it happens to be there, and we are concerned whether the mind can be free of it. In its attempt to be free of it - do it, watch yourself, sir, - attempt to be free of it, it has tried this, this, this, and it says, by Jove, it's no good, and stops. If you have not stopped I mean I can't go on repeating it ten times. That means you are not associated, you are not involved in the thing that is being said, you are just looking from outside.

Now has the mind realized that it has stopped right through, not superficially? Not verbally, not experimentally - I will try this and see what happens, but the realization that any movement out of confusion only breeds more confusion, therefore seeing the fact itself brings an end to the movement. Right? Have you done this, right through? Right? If you have done it, are you confused? You understand this? It is only when you are moving in various directions out of confusion you know you are confused. But when you see the fact, the futility of this movement, that very fact frees the mind from any movement, and therefore the mind is not confused. Oh, you don't see it.

Q: We come back to sensitivity.

K: No, it is not confused. Not comes back. You have discovered something, sir. It's not, I am discovering it for you, you are discovering it for yourself, it's your food. You are free then. And from that non-confused mind you act. If there is a mistake, you alter it. Wait, sir. Right? You think you are perfectly clear, out of that clarity you act. That action is not fragmentary action, it is a total action - please listen - it is a total action, therefore not under the pressure of any culture, any society, any belief, or your personal wish, it's a total action, therefore it is complete, non-fragmentary, non-contradictory action. Right? And therefore there is freedom. But you may make a mistake because it is something new you have discovered, and you have done it. But that mistake is altered instantly because you see it as a mistake. You follow? There is constant watchfulness. You understand? Constant watchfulness, if there is a mistake it is altered, you don't carry it over into a problem. So there is an action when a mind has completely stopped because it has realized any movement out of confusion is more confused, therefore in that very stopping there is clarity. And therefore such action is totally complete, and therefore action doesn't produce more confusion. Look, sir, what is happening in the world, they are trying to bring the Arabs and the Israelis together, the Russians have their own vested interest in Egypt, and the Egyptians, and the Israelis have their own interests. So it is a frightful mess that is going on, they are going to breed more confusion. Obviously. You see that, but you don't see in yourself that you are doing exactly the same thing. Wait, sir. You are trying to oppose this confusion by another entity that says, stop it, let's clear out of this. It is the same thing that they are doing in the Middle East.

So you realize any action out of this confusion is furthering confusion. Therefore you ask quite a different question, which is: life is action. Life, not life and action. Living is action. In that living there is confusion, and out of that living action brings confusion. So you ask the question now: can there be an action which is always complete, which is not contradictory, which doesn't breed more problems. We say, there is, only when you realize that any action out of confusion is more confused, therefore the mind completely totally realizes. And out of that tremendous realization of this simple fact there is a total action. Yes, sir, wait a minute.

Q: Does not fear play a part in this?

K: Of course. Fear, does not fear play a part in confusion. Fear is confusion. Right? It doesn't play a part, fear has produced confusion: I am afraid what you might say, you might say I am a damn fool, and I think I am a great man, I don't want to be contradicted, therefore I am afraid, therefore I am producing confusion in myself and also in you. Right, sir? So fear, confusion all go together, it is not that fear is something different from confusion, confusion different from pleasure, confusion - you follow, it is all interrelated.

Q: I think I have understood, I see what you have said for myself, but you just spoke of people fighting against each other, I mean this is something we really have to stop.

K: Of course.

Q: It is dangerous.

K: Of course. They are trying to stop it. But, sir, look: we are, students and young people are impatient, they want quick results, and so they say by throwing a bomb we will upset, and therefore violence produces more violence, violence produces repression, which is taking place - the police are getting stronger to subjugate the others. And this battle is going on. And also there is a strange battle, a strange thing happening in America, which is, a group of people who are called 'Jesus freaks' - you have understood? Freaks who are dedicated to Jesus, which is the opposite of the Hippies - see what is happening - who don't grow long hair, who are not promiscuous, who don't drink, who don't take drugs, who don't smoke, and opposite to the Hippies, and trying to convert the Hippies to them and so on. You follow?

Q: But aren't we in an emergency situation?

K: Of course we are. Wait, wait. Aren't we in emergency always? Of course, sir. Aren't we? Only we are awake when the emergency is observable, when the bomb hits the house, or your bank, then you say, my god! But the bombs are exploding all the time around us, of which you are not aware. The church is a bomb! The organized religions are bombs. Nationalities are bombs because they divide people, prejudice against this or that is a bomb. You don't realize these things, you only realize when an actual bomb is thrown. Therefore one has to be aware - I won't go into all this.

Q: Sir, what is the roots of our emotions and feelings in our every day life?

K: Wait, sir. Have we finished with this? No.

Q: Who will see the confusion?

K: Sir, the question is: who will see the confusion. Nobody. Wait, sir, go slowly, this is quite an important question, look at it.

Before you said, I am confused, I, different from confusion, I want to do something about confusion, I want to get rid of it, I want to go beyond it, I am satisfied as I am with the confusion, and I have everything I want I am not confused. It's the same thing. So when you say, I am confused, in that there is a duality. Wait. That very duality, that very division is confusion. No, you are missing it. That very division is a product of confusion. The mind realizes that division is poisonous, is a bomb.

Q: What is the mind?

K: What is the mind? What is the brain? Sir, the brain has said, I am confused, thought. And thought says, I must do something about it. Therefore there is a division. Right? That division is a tremendous atomic bomb. Right? That division is the most dangerous division. Realize that, see that. How do you see it? Verbally, intellectually, or do you see it as I see this microphone, touch it, be in contact with it, smell it? You follow? You don't do all this, therefore you say, my god - you bring up the same question - who is there to realize I am confused.

What time is it?

Q: Twenty past.

K: We had better stop. There are going to be discussions from Sunday, next Sunday there are going to be dialogues. Now for how many days is it? Will somebody kindly tell me?

Q: Nine days.

K: Nine? No, no. Now you see, watch it, that's confusion! Either you don't know, or you do know. If you know there is no confusion. Which is it?

Q: Sunday to Sunday.

K: Sunday to Sunday? That means eight discussions, dialogues. Now would you like during those dialogues of eight days, one or two completely for the young? What do you say sirs?

Q: Yes, yes.

K: Good!

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 2ND AUGUST 1970

So many people have asked to have interviews with me. I am afraid it is not possible to give all the interviews everybody wants. I am awfully sorry there isn't time and also one has to do a great many other things than talk here, but those who have already got appointments, those will be continued.

We are going to have seven discussions, or dialogues, here - or is it eight?

Audience: Eight.

K: Oh, my Lord! (Laughter) Eight discussions, that is dialogues, conversations, where each one of us shares what we are talking about. It is not merely hearing a few words from each other, holding on to our opinions and judgements, but rather, in discussing, in talking over together, we will begin to find out for ourselves how we think, from what point of view we look at life, how formulas, conclusions, sway or control our minds. And if we could, during these eight talks, eight discussions, go into this, into the many problems, taking one morning, or each morning a particular subject, and going into it as completely and as thoroughly as possible so that both of us understand it entirely, not only verbally, intellectually which is of course not understanding, but go beyond it. So this morning what shall we take?

Q: How about the roots and origin of thought?

K: About the roots and origin of thought. Yes sir?

Q: The difference between the mind and the brain.

K: The difference between the mind, the brain. Just a minute sir.

That gentleman.

Q: The system of meditation - is it in oneself or is it?

K: He would like to discuss - if I understood it rightly - the system of meditation in oneself or following a particular method or a system outwardly. Is that it?

Q: Can one make a system out of anything?

K: Can one make any system out of anything? What were you going to say sir?

Q: Do we make the right use of our personal faculty, capacities? Do we use them in the right way?

K: How to use our personal capacities?

Q: And faculties.

K: And faculties. Any other questions? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: How do we get out of the love in which we are caught?

Q: Could we discuss the letting go and giving up of all the conditioning?

K: Could we discuss letting go or putting aside all the burdens and conditioning one has. What sir?

Q: What is enlightenment?

K: What is enlightenment? Can one get into it. How that is enough. Yes sir?

Q: Why is it so difficult for us to attain a state of beauty?

K: Why is it so difficult for us to remain in a state of beauty, naturally, easily and freely - is that it?

Q: And to attain it.

K: And obtain it.

Q: Why is it difficult for us to do that?

K: Why is it difficult for us to do that? Now can we put all these questions together? And I think if we could discuss or talk over together what is self-knowledge - wouldn't all these questions be answered? Which is: what is meditation, is it a system outwardly or inwardly, what is the difference between the mind and the brain; why is it so difficult to arrive or understand what is enlightenment; why is it that most of us have to, in various forms, struggle and so on. Could we take self-knowing in which all this would be included? Would that be all right? You are quite sure. I am not imposing this on you. That is you are trying to find out how to understand oneself, because if I understand myself completely, as much as possible, then perhaps all these questions will be answered. Would you agree to that? Yes sir? Which means (sound of band) - Oh, Lord! (Laughter). I am afraid there is too much competition. ( Laughter) (Sound of band continues). I hope it is a reveille! Well, let's get on.

Would that be worth while to discuss? Is there a method by which one can know oneself? Is there a system? Is there a way of finding out for oneself all the human questions that we have put this morning, for oneself, not ask anybody? And that is possible only if I know for myself the mechanism of thought, how the brain works for myself, how the mind, the brain is caught in a conditioning, how it is attached, how it wants to free itself, the constant struggle within oneself and therefore outwardly, and is it possible to meditate and so on. So to answer all the questions that one puts to oneself, and also the problems that exist outwardly, is it not important to understand oneself? Right? Could we discuss this? Yes? You have asked the questions. I am asking you. I am not trying to impose it on you. May we go into this?

Q: Yes.

Now first of all how I examine, observe, myself? That is what is involved first. Do I look at myself according to what the authorities, specialists, psychologies have said, which obviously has conditioned my mind? I may not like Freud, Jung, Adler and all the recent psychologists and analysts but because of their very statements that have penetrated into my mind, and I am looking at myself with that, with those eyes. Right? And can I look at myself objectively, without any emotional reaction, just to see what I am? And to see what I am is analysis necessary? All these questions are involved when I ask myself that I must know myself, because without knowing myself completely I have no basis for any action. Because if I don't know myself and therefore am confused, whatever action I take must lead to further confusion. So I must know myself. I must profoundly find out the structure of my nature. I have to see the scaffolds of my activities, the patterns in which I function, the line which I follow, the directions which I have established for myself, or the society. And understand this drive, which makes me do things, contradictory or consistent, or occasionally contradictorily. I hope you understand. Right? Too understand all these problems whether there is god, whether there is truth, what is meditation, what is the meditator, is much more important than meditation, I must know completely myself. Right? You see the importance of it? The importance that you know for yourself what you are. Because without knowing yourself whatever you do will be done in ignorance, therefore in illusion, therefore in contradiction, therefore confusion, sorrow and all the rest of it. Is that clear? One must know oneself, not only at the conscious level but at the deep layers of oneself. Right? Is this clear? Not what I say, that you must know yourself.

Now, how shall I know myself? What is the procedure? Shall I follow the authorities, the specialist, who apparently have investigated, who apparently have come to certain conclusions, which they may alter, which later analysts, psychologists, philosophers, may alter, may strengthen - shall I follow the authorities, the specialists? Wait, wait, don't say 'No'. If I don't how shall I understand myself? Because whatever they have said, not only in the recent years but in the past - the philosophers, the analysts have existed before all the specialists in the western world, the Indian mind has gone into this at extraordinary great depth, and all the investigations of the past philosophers, teachers, and the moderns, is imprinted on my mind, consciously or unconsciously. You follow? I certainly have not read Freud but people talk about it, about their conditioning, their sex - you know all the rest of the Freudian jargon - and one is familiar with all that. So shall I follow, because they have gone ahead of me, because I am just beginning, shall I follow what they have said and go further than what they have said - you are following all this? - or I won't follow anybody but look at myself. Because if I can look at myself as 'what is', I am looking at myself who is the result of all these philosophers, sayings, teachers, saviours, all the rest of it. You are following this? Therefore I don't have to follow anybody. Is this clear? Do see this please. Do see this, please, don't come back to this later. My mind is the result of all the philosophers, consciously or unconsciously accepted what they have said, not only accepted, it has flowed, come in, like on a wave all these things come in, not only in the present but also the great many teachers of the past. I am the result of all that. And also all the latest philosophers, teachers, saviours and all that. So I say as I am the result of all that, consciously or unconsciously, there is no need to follow them. All that I have to do is to observe myself. Right? Is to read myself, read the book which is myself.

Now, how am I to read, how am I to observe, how am I to observe so clearly that there is no impediment? I may have coloured glasses. I may have certain prejudices, certain conclusions which will prevent me from looking at myself. Right? See all what is implied in looking at myself. So what shall I do? I cannot look at myself freely, that is, I cannot, as I am conditioned, look at myself in complete freedom. Right? Therefore I must be aware of my conditioning. Are you following all this? So I have to ask: what is it to be aware?

Right, now let's proceed. You understand my question? As I cannot look at myself wholly in freedom, because I am not free, my mind isn't free, I have a dozen opinions, so many conclusions, infinite number of experiences, the education which I have been through, all that is my conditioning and therefore I must be aware of these conditioning, which is part of me. Are you following all this? So first I must know, I must understand what it means to be aware. Right? What does it mean to be aware? I am not talking alone, please share together. What does it mean to you too to be aware? The other day the speaker said 'Don't take notes please' - you heard that and you went on taking notes - several people did: now is that to be aware? Please sir, let us stick to one thing. What does it mean to be aware?

Q: I know already that I can be only for two minutes, for a very short moment and then it becomes disorder.

K: Wait sir, we will come to that. We will come to whether this awareness can be extended. Or is it just for a very, very short period. But before we answer that question let's find out what it means to be aware.

Am I aware of the noise of that stream? Am I aware of all the different colours men and women have in this tent? Am I aware of the structure of the tent? The shape of it? How it sits on the ground? Am I aware of the tent - please follow this - and the space round it, the hills, the trees - you follow - the clouds, the heat, am I aware objectively, outwardly, of all these things? Are you aware? Now wait a minute. How are you aware?

Q: We are aware inwardly and outwardly at the same time.

K: No, madam. Look: we are not talking of inward awareness. Please go step by step. We'll come to all this. Are you aware of this tent, of the various colours within the tent of the people's dresses, are you aware of the hills, the trees, the meadows, the sound of the stream, the clouds, are you aware - wait - aware in the sense, are you conscious of it? You are, aren't you?

Q: When I put my attention on it I am aware of it.

K: Wait. When you put your attention of it you are aware, therefore you are not aware when you are inattentive. Right? You are following this? So only when you pay attention, then you are aware. Please follow this closely.

Q: When I pay attention to one thing, all the other things around me, I can't pay attention to them, then I become absorbed.

K: You become absorbed in one particular thing and the rest rather fade away. Are you aware when you are looking at the tent, the trees, the mountains, are you aware that when you look attentively even that you are shaping into words what you see? You say, 'That's a tree, that's a cloud, that's a tent, I like that colour, I don't like that colour'. Right? Please take a little trouble over this. Don't get bored. Because if you go into this very, very deeply when you leave the tent you will see something for yourself. So when you are aware, when you watch, aware, are you aware of your reactions?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking something and you reply to something else. I am aware. Look I am aware of that dress. My reaction says, 'How nice', or 'How ugly'. I am asking are you aware when you look at that red, your reactions?

Q: Sometimes.

Q: You have got to be aware to meditate at all.

K: Sir, go slowly into what I am asking. Are you aware when you see that red dress, of your reactions, not of a dozen reactions, but that particular reaction when you see a red colour? Why not? Isn't that part of awareness?

Q: When you put a name on a thing you are not aware.

K: I am going to find out sir, what it means. Look, may I talk a little? You don't bite into this.

I want to be aware and I know I am not aware. Occasionally I am attentive, but most of the time I am half asleep, half inattentive, I am thinking about something else while I am looking at a tree, or that colour. So, as I have said, I want to know myself completely because I see if I don't know myself I have no raison d'être to do anything. So I must know myself. Now, how do I know myself? How do I become - how do I observe myself? In observing I shall learn. Right? So learning is part of awareness. Right? No? Am I going to learn about myself according to anybody, according to the philosophers, the teachers, the saviours, the priests? Then it is not learning, is it? I give it up. If I learn according to what others have said, or follow what others have said I have stopped learning about myself, haven't I? So the first thing is I have to learn about myself. Now what does this learning about myself mean? Investigate it sir. Go into it, find out, what does it mean to learn about myself?

Q: To observe myself.

K: No, madam, I don't mean that - too learn - what does that mean - to learn?

Q: (In Italian)

K: Are you really interested in all this?

A: Yes.

K: Wait sir. The questioner in Italian says, we see the reason for knowing ourselves, we are desperate to find ourselves but we want out of this desperation a system, a method because we don't know what to do with ourselves. So we want a method, somebody to tell us, 'Do these things and you will know yourself' - more or less. Now sir, please, do listen to me. Here I am. I am the result of the society, the culture in which I live, the religions, the business world, the economic world, the climate, the food, I am all that, the result of all that, of the infinite past and the present. Right? I want to know myself, that is I want to learn about myself - learn - right? Now what does that word mean, to learn. See the difficulty in this.

Please see the difficulty. I don't know German, which means I have to learn it - learn the meanings of words, memorize the verbs, the irregular verbs. You follow? And all the syntax and I have to learn. That is, I have to accumulate knowledge of words, how to put the words together and all the rest of it, I have to accumulate knowledge. And then I may be able to speak German. I accumulate and then act, verbally or in any other way. There learning meant accumulation. Right? Are you following? Accumulation. Now what happens if I learn about myself, I see something about myself and I say I have learnt that. I have seen that, that is so, I have learnt about it. Now that has left a residue of knowledge - hasn't it? Now with that knowledge I examine the next incident. Right? And that becomes again further accumulation. So the more I observe myself and learn about myself, the more I am accumulating knowledge about myself. Right? Right? It is simple sir. Wait.

Q: I am changing.

K: I am accumulating knowledge and in the process I am changing, but I am accumulating knowledge, experience by observing. Now what happens? With that knowledge I look at myself. So the knowledge is preventing me, is preventing observation, fresh observation. I don't know if you see this?

Q: (In Italian)

K: He says: there is a next step to that, which is, write down your thoughts, put down on a piece of paper what you are thinking, what you have accumulated, and having put that on the paper you are forced to look. You are not following, this is really quite complex. Do go slowly.

Look sir. You have hurt me, you have said something to hurt me. That is my knowledge. Next time I meet you that knowledge of hurt comes forward to meet you. The past comes to meet the present. So knowledge is the past and with the eyes of the past I am looking at the present - you have got it? Now to learn about myself there must be freedom from the past, from the knowledge, to look at myself, which is the learning about myself must be constantly fresh. You see the difficulty?

Q: I'd say there are constants in life and if they are constant they don't change.

K: We'll come to change sir, later. We are not discussing change. We are watching, I want to learn about myself. I can only learn about myself - myself is movement, myself isn't just static, it's living, active, going in different direction. So if I learn about myself with the mind and the brain that is the past, that prevents me from learning about myself. If you see that once then the next question is: how is the mind to free itself from the past so as to learn about itself, which is constantly new. You have understood this? See the beauty of it, please sirs. The excitement of it! I want to learn about myself and myself is a living thing, it is not a dead thing. I think this one day, I think the next the other day, I want something - you know, this is a constant living, moving thing. And to learn about it, the mind, to observe, to learn about it, must also be free to observe, therefore it cannot observe if it is burdened with the past. Right? So what is it to do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, yes, sir, that is what we mean: being an effect of the past. That is what we mean. Now, what shall i do? I see this, this happens. Right? I see that red and I say 'I don't like it'. Right?

Which is, the past responds, the past acts immediately, therefore stops learning. So what is one to do? Go on sirs, it is your problem.

(Various inaudible comments)

K: How to think?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What do you say madame?

Q: Not to have thought.

K: Not to have thoughts. You see you are not even following what I am saying. You have come to a conclusion when you say, not to have thoughts. You are not really learning.

Q: We have to empty ourselves.

K: We have to empty ourselves. That is another conclusion. Then how do you empty yourself? Who is the entity that is going to empty the mind?

Q: You have to empty that too. Everything you empty.

K: Who? Who is going to empty it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You see sir, you are not listening to what is being said - if you will forgive my saying so. I said I want to learn about myself. I cannot learn about myself if the past interferes. Learning implies the active present of the word to learn - learning means acting in the present. And that is not possible when the mind, the brain, is burdened with all the past. Right? Now tell me what to do, tell me what to do.

Q: Attention.

K: You see! How am I to be attentive?

Q: Live in the present.

K: How am I to live in the present when my whole past is burdening me?

Q: Be aware of the process that is taking place.

K: Be aware of the present.

Q: Be aware of the process that is taking place.

K: Be aware of the process that is taking place. All right. Which means what? Aware that the past is interfering and therefore preventing the brain to learn. Right? Be aware of this movement: the past interfering and stopping learning. Right? Be aware of this. Go slowly sir. Be aware of this movement. Are you aware of it as we are talking? Then if you are aware of this movement as we are talking, what takes place? Don't guess! Don't say 'should be', 'should not be' - that has no meaning. What is actually taking place when you are aware of this movement, which is the past interfering with the present and therefore preventing learning in the sense we are using that word, when you are aware of this whole process going on what takes place then?

Q: You see yourself as the effect of the past.

K: You see yourself as the effect of the past. We see that, that is a fact. We have said what is the outcome, what happens when you are aware that you are the effect of the past and that effect is preventing you from learning in the present? Now when you are aware of this movement, what takes place? What actually takes place? Don't guess. What takes place in you, when you are of this process?

Q: The movement stops.

Q: There is no more thought.

K: There is no more thought. Yes sir?

Q: There is fear.

K: There is fear. One says there is no more thought, one says there is silence, another says there is fear. Just a minute sir. Yes sir?

Q: There seems to be nothing by the present.

K: You see there is nothing but the present. Now which of these statements is true? Now wait. Which of these statements is true? Silence, cessation of thought, one lives in the present - what is the truth of it?

Q: We are confused.

K: That's right sir. We are confused. Now look. What madam?

Q: I am afraid.

K: You are afraid.

Q: You are aware.

Q: You learn.

K: You learn. I give it up!

Q: I feel that there is a contradiction which has to be destroyed by direct action.

K: I feel there is a contradiction which has to be destroyed by direct action. Look sirs, don't come to any conclusion, I beg of you, because conclusions will prevent you from learning. And if you say direct action must happen, that is a conclusion. We are learning. So, look! I see that I am the result, I am the effect of the past, the past may be yesterday or the past second. That has left a mark as knowledge, that knowledge which is the past is preventing learning in the present - it is a momentum, it is happening all the time. Now when I am aware of it, this movement, aware of it, what takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, no. What takes place sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You see you are not doing it. You are just guessing. And hoping some one statement will be right. I don't want to think that way, I want to find out, I don't want your conclusions. If I accept your conclusions you will be the new philosopher. I don't want any new philosophers! I want to learn, therefore I have to see what actually takes place, actually, when the brain is aware of this movement. Can the brain be aware of this movement? You are following? Or is it frightened to be aware of something new?

Q: The movement stops.

K: The movement stops. Then what? Have I learnt? Is there a learning?

Q: If I am quiet enough I think I can see what I perceive and what comes out from my own.

K: Yes sir. Look, please do observe this. I want to learn about this movement - learn - and I say now to learn I must have curiosity. Then if my curiosity is merely to come to a conclusion my curiosity stops. So there must be curiosity - right? - to learn. There must be passion to learn - right - and there must be energy to learn. Without this I can't learn. Right? If I have fear I have no passion. So I have to leave that alone and say, 'Why am I frightened?'. Why am I frightened to learn something about something that may be new? Why am I frightened? So I have to investigate fear. You are following? Now I have left this momentum of the past and I have now to learn about fear. Right? Are you following all this? Now why am I frightened?

Q: We are afraid to loose the image of ourselves.

K: We are afraid to loose the image of ourselves - the image which I have built about myself as being full of knowledge, a dead entity. No, sir.

I am frightened. Don't give me the explanation. I realize I am frightened - why? Is it because I see that I am dead? Because I am living in the past and I don't know what it means to observe and learn in the present, therefore it is something totally new. Right? And I am frightened to do anything new. Which means what? That my brain and my mind have followed the old pattern, the old method, the old way of thinking, living, working. So anything I am frightened. Right? And to learn, the mind must be free from the past - we have established that as the truth. Now, look what has happened. I have established the fact as truth, that there is no learning if the past interferes - that is a fact. And also I realize I am frightened. So there is the contradiction between the realization of the fact that to learn the mind must be free of the past, and at the same time I am frightened. So there is a duality in this: I see and I am afraid to see. Right?

Q: Are we always afraid to see new things?

K: Are we afraid to see new things? Aren't we? Aren't we afraid to change?

Q: The new thing is the unknown. We are afraid of the unknown.

K: The new thing is the unknown and so we cling to the old. And clinging to the old will inevitably breed fear because life is changing, there is social upheaval, there is rioting going on, there are wars. So fear is there. Now how am I to learn about fear? You understand? We have moved away from learning about the other movement. We want to learn about the movement of fear. Right?

Now, what is the movement of fear? Are you aware that you are afraid? Are you aware that you have fears?

Q: Not always.

K: Now, not always. Do you know now, are you aware now of your fears?

You can resuscitate them, bring them out and say, 'Well I am afraid of what people might say about me' - or something or other. So are you aware that you are frightened? That you have fear? Are you? About death, about losing money, about losing your wife, or god knows what! Are you aware of those fears? Physical fears that you might have pain tomorrow and so on. If you are aware of it what is the movement in it? You follow? What takes place? What takes place when you are aware that you are afraid? You are aware when you become aware that you are frightened, you try to get rid of it. Now watch it. When you try to get rid of it, what takes place?

Q: You repress it.

K: Either you repress it, or escape from it, or - not or - and there is a conflict between wanting to get rid of it and fear - isn't there? So there is either repression, escape and in trying to get rid of it there is conflict, which only increases fear. Right?

(Noise of band playing). I wonder why bands were invented - don't you? You say - (noise of dog barking - laughter). Let no other dog bark!

You say the brain itself is so frightened to let go, and the brain itself is the cause of fear. Are you trying to say that? Now you see, look sir, I want to find out, I want to learn about fear, learn. That means I must be curious, I must be passionate. I must be curious first and I cannot be curious if I have a conclusion. Right? So I have to learn - wait, wait madam - have to learn. I have to learn about fear. I am going to learn - watch it, sir, please do listen, I am going to learn, which means I mustn't be distracted by running away from it. I mustn't - there mustn't be a movement of repression, which means again a distraction from fear. There mustn't be the feeling I must get rid of it. Right? If I have these feelings I cannot learn. Now, have I these feelings? Escape, trying to get rid of it, trying to suppress it and so on - have I these feelings when I see there is fear? I am learning, I am not saying you shouldn't have these feelings, they are there. Am I aware of these feelings? If I am aware of these feelings what shall I do? I want to escape. My fear is so strong that I want to run away from it. And the very movement away from it breeds more fear. You are following all this? Do I see the truth and the fact that moving away from the fear increases fear? Therefore there is no movement away from it. Right? Yes sir?

Q: I don't understand it, because I feel that if I have a fear and I move away from it, I move towards something that is going to end that fear.

K: No.

Q Towards something that will see me through it.

K: I don't understand, the questioner says, that when I move away from fear, in that movement there is a desire to escape from it, suppress it, avoid it and therefore increases fear. I don't understand that at all - he says. But that is a fact, isn't it? I am afraid - what? - I am afraid - I don't know what, I am not afraid, but what am I afraid of - what are you afraid of?

Q: Money

K: You are afraid off losing money, losing money, not money. The more the merrier! But you are afraid of losing it. Right? Now there is a fear of it, therefore what do you do? You make quite sure that your money is well placed. Right? But the fear continues. It may not be in the changing world, they might be throwing bombs, the bank will go up and so on and so on. So there is fear even though you have plenty of money there is always this fear. Right? Now running away from that fear doesn't solve it. Right sir? Suppressing, saying I won't think about it. But the moment you say 'I will not think about it' the next second is thinking about it. Right? So running away from it, suppressing it, avoiding it, doing anything about it, continues fear. Right? That is a fact. Now we have established two facts. That to learn there must be curiosity, to learn there must be no pressure of the past. And to learn about fear there must be no running away from fear. That is a fact. That is the truth. Therefore don't run away. Right? Now when I don't run away from it what takes place?

Q: I stop being identified with it.

K: I stop being identified with fear. Is that what is learning? You have stopped.

Q: I don't know what you mean.

K: Therefore you have to learn. Stopping is not learning. Because you have a desire you mustn't have fear, you want to escape from it. Just see the subtlety of it. I am afraid and I want to learn about it. I don't know what is going to happen. You follow? I want to learn the movement of fear. So what takes place? I am not running away, I am not suppressing, I am not avoiding it and I want to learn about it.

Q: I think about how to get rid of it.

K: Ah, you want to get rid of it! If you want to get rid of it - I have just explained - who is the person who is going to get rid of it, and if you want to get rid of it, which means you resist it, and therefore fear increases. If you don't see the fact of that I am sorry I can't help you.

Q: Accept fear.

K: I don't accept fear - who is the entity who is accepting fear?

Q: I accept there is no fear.

K: I have just said sir, you don't listen. To escape from it, to avoid it, to pick up a novel and read what other people are doing, look at the television, go to the temple, church, is still avoidance of fear, and any avoidance of fear only increases and strengthens fear. That is a fact. Now after establishing that fact I won't run away. I won't suppress - therefore what takes place when there is an awareness of fear? I am learning. You follow? Now what takes place? Not running away.

Q: Understanding of the process of fear.

K: We are doing it. I am understanding the process, I am watching it, I am learning it. What takes place? I am afraid and I am not running away from it - what takes place?

Q: You are face to face with fear.

K: You are face to face with fear. What takes place then?

(Several inaudible comments)

K: Don't you ask this question? Please just listen to me for two minutes. I am not running away. I am not suppressing, I am not avoiding, I am not resisting. There it is. Now, I am watching it.

Right? The natural question out of that is: who is watching it? Isn't it? Who is watching this fear? Look, don't guess, please don't guess. When you say, I am watching fear, learning about fear, who is the entity who is watching it?

Q: Fear itself.

K: Is fear itself watching itself? Please don't guess. Don't come to any conclusion. Find out. The mind isn't escaping from fear, not building a wall against fear through courage - you know, all the rest of it. What takes place when I watch? I ask myself naturally, who is watching? Right? Who is watching the thing called fear? Don't answer me please. I have raised the question, not you. Who is watching? Another fragment of me? Listen sir, find out who is watching this fear.

Q: Watching cannot be the result of the past, it must be fresh.

K: Sir, I am not talking about whether the watching is the past or this, you are watching. I am aware of fear. I am aware that I am frightened of losing money, of becoming ill, of my wife leaving me and god knows what else - I am frightened, and I want to learn about it, therefore I am watching and my natural question is: who is watching this fear?

Q: Myself.

K: I give it up! You don't really look at it, learn, you are just making a statement. Learn. Who is watching? Wait. When you say who is watching - just a minute sir, I will ask you - when I ask the question: who is watching, what takes place - in the very word itself? There is a division, isn't there? The very question, who is watching it, implies a division. Right? Madam, for the love of Pete listen to me! It means a division.

Q: It's impossible.

K: Wait. It means that, the moment I ask that question: who is watching? That very question implies a division - wait - that's a fact. When I say: who is watching, it means the thing is there and I am watching, therefore there is a division. Now why is there a division? You answer me this. Sir, a moment, don't guess, don't repeat what somebody else said, including myself. Find out why this division exists when the moment you ask the question: who is watching - it implies a division. Right? Why is there division? Find out.

Q: There is a desire on my part to watch.

K: There is a desire on my part to watch. Listen to that question: there is a desire on my part to watch. Which means the desire says watch in order to escape. You follow? Before you have said I have understood, I mustn't escape, and now you find that desire is making you escape subtly, therefore you are still watching fear as an outsider. See the importance of this. You are watching with an intention to get rid of fear. And we said, a few minutes ago, to get rid of fear means censoring fear. So your watching implies that trying to get rid of fear, therefore there is a division, which only strengthens fear. Right? So I am again asking the question: who is watching fear?

Q: Sir, isn't there also another point, who is asking the question who is watching fear?

K: I am asking that question sir.

Q: But who is asking the question?

K: The same thing, sir. Same thing, only you push it further back, it is the same thing. Now please, this is the most practical way of going at it. You will see if you follow this very carefully, the mind will be free of fear. But you are not doing it. I am frightened of losing money - thank god I haven't got any money to be frightened of! I am frightened of losing money and therefore what do I do? I escape from it. I avoid it, I avoid to think about it. So I realize how silly of me to avoid it because the moment I resist it, more fear. Then there arises I am watching it, I say, who is watching it? Is it the desire that wants to get rid of it or go beyond it, to be free of it, does that watch it? It is. And I know desire, watching it that way, only divides and therefore strengthens fear. So I see the truth of that, therefore desire has gone. You follow? Desire to get rid of it has gone. It's like seeing a poisonous snake and the desire to touch it is finished. Right? The desire to take a drug, when I see the real danger of it, is finished, I won't touch it. As long as I don't see the danger of it I'll go on. In the same way, as long as I don't see that running away from fear is the strengthening of fear, I'll go on running away, doing every kind of thing. The moment I see it I won't run. Then what happens?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am telling you sir. I am pointing out to you. The moment you are scared of looking at fear, then you won't learn about fear, and if you won't learn about fear, scared, full stop. It is as simple as that. If I don't know how to swim I won't plunge into the river. If I know that fear cannot possibly be ended, if I am afraid to look, and if I really want to look, I say 'I don't care, I'll look'.

Q: Sir, he says it is his desire to get away from fear that constantly breeds more fear. But when I am afraid I do want to get away from it so what I have to do, is what I always do, is to let fear well up in me so that I can identify with it, so that I can unify myself.

K: You see that! It is all these tricks that we are playing on ourselves. Do listen sir. Who is saying all this? You make an effort to identify yourself with fear.

Q: I am that fear.

K: Ah! Wait. Wait, wait, wait. If you are that fear, as you say you are, then what happens?

Q: When I come to terms with it, it begins to...

K: Ah, no, no, not, terms. When you say that you are fear, fear is not something separate from you, just a minute sir, what takes place? Sir, I am brown. I am afraid to be brown because it is not - you know all the rest of it. But I say yes, I am brown and that's the end of it, isn't it? I am not running away from it. What takes place then?

Q: Accept.

K: Accept? On the contrary, I forget about it. I forget that I am brown. You don't even know all this. You are just guessing. Sir, look, it's time to stop, I'll stop. We'll continue with this tomorrow. I want to learn about myself. I must know myself completely, passionately because this is the foundation of all action, without that I'll lead a life of utter confusion. So I must learn about myself. To learn about myself I cannot follow anybody. If I follow anybody I am not learning. Learning implies the past doesn't interfere because myself is something so extraordinarily vital, moving, dynamic, so I must look at it afresh with a new mind. There is no new mind if there is the past that is always operating. That's a fact. I see that. Then in seeing that I realize I am frightened. I don't know what will happen. So fear - I want to learn about fear - you follow. I am moving all the time in the movement of learning. I want to know about myself and I realize something, a profound truth, and also in learning about fear I am going to learn, which means I mustn't run away from it at any price. I mustn't have a subtle form of desire to run away from it.

So what happens to a mind that is capable of looking at it without division? The division being, getting rid of it, subtle form of escape, suppression and so on - what happens to the mind when it is confronted with fear and there is no question of running away from it? Please I have to stop. We will go on from where we leave off today, tomorrow. Please in the meantime find out, give your mind to it.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 3RD AUGUST 1970

Shall we go on from where we left off yesterday? We were talking about fear and the necessity of knowing oneself. I don't know if one sees the utter importance of understanding the nature and the structure of oneself. As we said, if there is no comprehension, not intellectual or verbal, but actually understanding what one is, and the possibility of going beyond it, we must inevitably bring about confusion, contradiction in ourselves, activities that will lead to a great deal of mischief and sorrow. So it behoves and it is absolutely essential that one should understand, not only the superficial layers of oneself, but the total entity, all the hidden parts. And I hope in communicating with each other, that is, in understanding together this whole problem we shall be able actually, not theoretically, see if through self-knowledge the mind can go beyond its own conditioning, its own habits, its own prejudices and so on.

And we were talking yesterday about learning, learning about oneself; learning implies a non-accumulative movement. There is no movement if it is accumulation. If the river is flowing and it ends up in a lake there is no movement. There is a movement only when there is a constant movement, a constant flow, a strong current. And learning implies that. Learning not only about outward things, scientific facts, but also learning about oneself, because oneself is a constant, changing dynamic, volatile being. And to learn about it the past experiences in no way help, on the contrary the past impedes learning, puts an end to learning and therefore to a complete action. I hope when we discussed this point yesterday we saw this very clearly; that we are dealing with a constant living movement of life, the movement which is the 'me'. And to understand that 'me', to learn about that 'me', which is so very subtle, there needs to be an intense curiosity, a persistent awareness, a sense of non-accumulative comprehension. I hope we were able to communicate this with each other yesterday, this whole question of learning. And that is where our trouble is going to be, because our mind likes to function in grooves, in patterns, from a fixed conclusion, or prejudice, or knowledge. It is tethered to a particular belief and from there it tries to understand this extraordinary movement of the 'me'. And therefore there is a contradiction between the 'me' and the observer.

And we were talking yesterday about fear, which is part of this movement, part of this total movement of the 'me', the 'me' which breaks up life as a movement, the 'me' that separates as the 'you' and the 'me'. And we said, what is fear? And we are going to learn non-accumulatively about fear. The very word fear prevents coming into contact with that feeling of danger which we call fear.

Look sirs, maturity implies a total, natural development of a human being; a total, natural development of a human being - natural in the sense non-contradictory, harmonious, which has nothing to do with age. And the factor of fear prevents this natural, total development of the mind. I'll go on a little and then we will discuss about all this.

When one is afraid, not only of physical things, but also of psychological factors, then in that fear what takes place? You understand? There is fear: I am afraid, not only of physically falling ill, dying - you know physical fears that one has - darkness, you know the innumerable fears one has both biologically as well as psychologically. Now what does that fear do to the mind, the mind which has created these fears? You understand my question? Please, don't immediately answer me yet, let's look at ourselves - I have fear. What is the effect of that on the mind, on one's whole life, living? Or we are so used to fear, we have accustomed ourselves to fear which has become a habit, we are unaware of its effect. If I am accustomed to the dogma, to the beliefs, to the national feeling of the Hindu, I am totally unaware, enclosed in this conditioning, of what the effects of it are. I only see what that nationalism, that calling myself a Hindu, that feeling that arouses in me and I am satisfied with that. I identify myself with the country, with the belief and so on and so on, and all the rest of it. But we don't see the effect of such a conditioning all around. In the same way, we don't see what fear does, both psychologically as well as biologically, physically, psychosomatically. What does it do?

Sirs, this is a discussion. This is a discussion. You have to take part in it.

Q: I become involved in trying to stop this happening.

K: It stops or immobilizes action. Or is one aware of that? No sir, are you? Don't generalize. We are discussing this morning and all these discussions, in order to see what is actually happening within us because otherwise these dialogues, talking over together, has no meaning. In talking over what fear does and becoming conscious of it, aware of it, it might be possible to go beyond it. So I must, if I am at all serious, see the effects of fear. And do I know the effects of it? Or do I know it verbally? Or do I know it as something which has happened - please listen to this - something which has happened in the past, which remains as a memory, and that memory says, these are the effects of it, and therefore the memory sees the effects of it, but the mind doesn't see the actual effect of it. I don't know if you see that? Do you see the importance of this? I have said something which is really quite - eh?

Q: Could you say it again?

K: Could I say it again? (Laughter) Wait a minute sir. What did I say? (Laughter).

Q: You said the mind saw the effects of fear - the memory saw it but the mind didn't.

K: When I say, I know the effects off fear, what does that mean? Either I know it verbally, that is, intellectually, or I know it as a memory, as something that has happened in the past and I say, yes this did happen. From the past I see the effects. Right? So the past tells me what the effects are. Don't disturb me please. But I don't actually, actually, at the moment see the effects of it. The past tells me the effects of it therefore it is something remembered and something of the past and therefore not real. Whereas knowing implies non-accumulative recognition or seeing - not recognition - seeing the fact. Have I conveyed this?

Look, how do I, when I say I am hungry, is it a remembrance of a hunger of yesterday which tells me I am hungry, the remembrance, or the actual fact of hunger now? The two are entirely different. Right? The actual awareness that I am hungry is entirely different from the response of a memory which has told me I have been hungry, therefore you are hungry now. So which is it? Is the past telling you the effects of fear, or are you aware of the actual fact, actual happening of the effects of fear? I have got it. You see the difference? Which is it? The action of the two are entirely different - aren't they? The one, of being completely aware of the effect of fear, and that acts instantly. Right? But if the effects of fear of the past and that memory tells me, yes the effects are these, then that action is entirely different. Right? Have I made myself clear? Right, now which is it?

Q: Can you distinguish between the feeling about a particular fear and actually being aware of the effects of fear as such, as apart from remembering the effects of fear? I think that was the distinction that was made.

K: That's what I was trying to explain, wasn't it? Wasn't I? Have I misunderstood your question sir?

Q: I thought when you made that remark, you wouldn't remember, it was distinguishing the remembering the effects of a particular fear and seeing what fear does to one.

K: All right, I've got it. Yes. The questioner says - must I repeat all this? Can't somebody repeat what the questioner says. I want to go on!

Q: Go on. Go on!

K: The action of the two are entirely different - do we see that? Please, be careful, if you don't see it don't say yes, don't let's play games with each other, it is very important to understand this. Is the past telling, saying the effects of fear, or there is a direct perception or awareness of the effects of fear now? If the past is saying the effects of fear the action is incomplete, therefore contradictory, therefore it brings conflict. But whereas if one is aware completely of the fear, the effects of fear now, the action is total.

Q: As one is sitting here I have no fear because I am listening to what you are saying.

K: Yes. As I am sitting in the tent now I have no fear because I am listening to what you are talking about, naturally I am not afraid. But this fear may come up as I leave the tent. But can't you sitting here in this rather hot tent see your fear, which you may have had yesterday, see it, invoke it, invite it.

Q: It may be right fear.

K: Wait. Whatever the fear be - daily life of fear, losing money, afraid of your husband, wife, afraid of losing your job, afraid of darkness, afraid of people - afraid - afraid of death, afraid of not becoming famous, fulfilling, wanting to be recognized - you know, fears. Need you go back and say, 'Well, I have no fear now, but when I go outside I'll have them' - it is there.

Q: You can invoke it, as you say. You can remember it. But at this point you bring memory, the thought of what is should be.

K: Sir, I am asking sir - do find out sir. Need I wait until I leave the tent to find out what my fears are, or sitting here be aware of them?

Q: If the unawareness of fear itself...

K: Sir, look. I am not afraid at this moment what my brother might say to me. But when I meet the man he is going to say things that will frighten me. Right? Can't I see the actual fact of that now? No?

Q: Well if you do that you do a practise already.

K: No, it is not a practice. You are so afraid of doing anything which might become a practice. I am not saying - sir, aren't you afraid of losing your job? Aren't you afraid of death? Aren't you afraid of not being able to fulfil? Aren't you afraid of not being able to fulfil? Aren't you afraid of being lonely? Aren't you afraid of not being loved? Aren't you? Some form of fear? What your son, your husband - something aren't you?

Q: Only if there is a challenge.

K: No, but I am challenging you. Not 'if there is a challenge'. I can't understand this mentality.

Q: If there is an impulse you act, you have to do something.

K: No. You see you are making it so complicated. It is as natural as hearing that train roar by. Either you can remember the noise of that train, or listen actually to that noise. Don't complicate it, please.

Q: Aren't you in a way complicating it by talking about invoking fear? I don't have to invoke any of my fears - just by being here I can see my reactions.

K: That's all. That's all. That's all I am saying.

Q: In order to live we must know the difference between the brain and the mind?

K: Oh, I've been through that sir. I have been through that. We have discussed that before. We are now discussing, trying to find out - I'll go on - we are now trying to find out what fear is, to learn about it. Is the mind free to learn about fear - learn? Learning being watching the movement of fear, watching it. And you can only watch it, the movement of fear, when you are not remembering the past fears and those memories watching. You see the difference? I can watch, I can learn. I can watch the movement of fear with a background of memories of previous fears, or I can watch the movement, the responses of fear, without the past. Now which is it that you are doing? Don't complicate it, it is so very simple. Which is it you are doing? Watching it with a memory of the past? Are you watching it without that memory, watching, learning about what is actually taking place when there is fear?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am watching. I am boiling with fear all the time. I don't seem to be able to get rid of it.

Q: Unfortunately we have no actual fears at this moment.

K: All right sir. You may not have fear now but you have had fears, haven't you? Yes? What happened when you had those fears? What was the effect of those fears around you and in you? You have understood my question? When you have had fears in the past and when you are aware of those fears in the past, what effect those fears had on you and your environment - what happened? Weren't you cut off from others? Weren't the effect of those fears isolating you?

Q: It crippled me.

K: It crippled you, isolated you, cut off. It made you feel desperate, you didn't know what to do. Right? Now, when there was this isolation what happened to action?

Q: It is fragmentary.

K: Which is fragmentary, isn't it? Do listen to this carefully please. I have had fears in the past, about something or other, that's irrelevant, and the effects of those fears was to isolate me, was to separate me, to cripple me, to make me feel anxious, desperate, a feeling of running away, seeking comfort from something or other

- all that we'll call for the moment isolating myself from all relationships. Right? The effect of that isolation in action is to bring about fragmentation. Right?

Q: Sir.

K: Wait, wait, wait. One moment sir. Do get this point. Didn't this happen to you? When you are frightened, you didn't know what to do, you ran away from it, or tried to suppress it? Reason it away? And when you had to act you were acting from a fear which in itself is isolating? No? So action born out of that fear must be fragmentary. Right? Fragmentary being contradictory, therefore in that there was a great deal of struggle, pain, anxiety - no?

Q: Sir, as a crippled person walks on crutches, so a person who is humbled, crippled by fear uses various kinds of crutches.

K: Right sir. That's what we are saying. That's right. That's exactly - he says that a person on crutches can't walk fully and so on.

Now, you are very clear what that action of effects of past fears does. Right? It produces fragmentary actions. Now what is the difference between that and the action of fear without the response of memory? You have got my question? Look sir, when you meet danger, physical danger what takes place?

Q: Spontaneous action.

K: Spontaneous action it is called. Is it spontaneous? No, please do enquire, we are trying to find out something. You go along in the woods by yourself, perhaps not in Switzerland, but you go in wild parts of India, or certain parts of America, and you go along and suddenly round the corner you come upon a bear with cubs - what happens then? Knowing the bear is a dangerous animal, with cubs especially - what happens to you?

Q: There is a chemical change in you, the adrenaline rises.

K: Yes sir adrenaline and all the rest of it. Now what is the action that takes place?

(Various responses - inaudible)

K: No, sirs, what happens to you - of course if you are afraid you transmit it to the bear and the bear gets more frightened and attacks you. (Laughter) This is all very simple - do please - you are missing the whole point. Please sirs.

Q: What happens in that situation if you are fear?

K: Have you ever faced a bear in the woods? No?

Q: There is someone here who has.

K: I have. We have. That gentlemen and I happen to have many of these happenings during certain years but that is irrelevant.

What takes place? Don't imagine. There is a bear in front of you, a few feet away from you, all the bodily reactions, the adrenaline and so on and so on and so on, there is instant stopping, isn't there, and you turn away and run, leave. What has happened there? What was the response? A conditioned response, wasn't it? People have told you generation after generation 'Be careful of wild animals' If you get frightened you will transmit that fear to the animal and then he will attack you. The whole thing is through instantly. Now is that fear functioning or intelligence? Don't answer me, please listen to this. You understand sir. Which is operating, fear or intelligence? Fear of what - the fear that has been aroused by the repetition - 'Be careful of the wild animals' - that has been your conditioning from childhood - be careful - is that operating? Or is intelligence operating? You have never faced wild animals have you? No. So see the difference: the conditioned response to that animal and the action of that conditioned response is one thing, and the operation of intelligence and the action of intelligence is entirely different, the two are entirely different. Are you meeting this thing? The bus is rushing by, a bus, you don't throw yourself in front of it, your intelligence says, don't do it. It is not fear, unless you are slightly neurotic or have taken a series of drugs. Your intelligence says, don't be - you know, intelligence prevents you. It is not fear.

Q: Sir, when you meet a wild animal don't you have to have intelligence and conditioned response?

K: No sir. See it. The moment it is a conditioned response there is fear involved in it and that is transmitted to the animal; but if it is intelligence - must I go into it, personally it's not important. I have faced a tiger - well never mind - leave all that alone. So you find out for yourself what is operating. If it is fear then its action is incomplete and therefore there is a danger from the animal, but the action of intelligence is entirely different. There is no fear at all.

Q: (In Italian)

K: If I watch that bear then will I be killed - if I watch that bear intelligently, will I be intelligently killed? (laughter)

Q: Without fear.

K: Oh, yes, without fear.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Oh Lord! Oh Lord! You are all talking with such complications. It is so simple this. Now leave the animals, poor things, alone. Let us start with ourselves, who are part animals too.

The action of fear and the effects of fear and its action, based on past memories, such actions are destructive, contradictory, paralysing. Right? Do we see that? Not verbally but actually see that? That when you are afraid you are completely isolated and any action that took place from that isolation must be fragmentary and therefore contradictory, therefore there was struggle, pain and all the rest of it? Now an action of awareness of fear without all the responses of memory is a complete action. You try it! Do it.

Become aware, as you are walking along, going home, your old fears will come up. Then watch, watch, be aware, whether those fears are actually fears or projected by thought as memory. You see that? If those fears are the projection of thought as the response of memory, then your action will be incomplete and therefore painful. Right? But as you walk along and a fear arises watch it, whether you are watching from the response of thought or merely watching. Right, is that clear? If it isn't clear go and jump in that lake!

(Laughter). Don't do it though!

So, what we are talking is action, because life is action, not saying one part of life is action only, the whole of living is action. And that action is broken up, and this breaking up of action is this process of memory with its thoughts and isolation. Right? Is that clear?

Q: You mean the idea is totally experienced, every split second, without memory entering?

K: Sir, when you put a question like that, you have to investigate the question of memory. You have to have memory, the more clear, the more definite the better, if you are to function technologically, or if you want to go home, you have to have memory. Right? You can't say, 'Well I have no memory' - you have to have memory. But thought, as response of memory and projecting fear out of that memory, such action is entirely different.

Now what is fear? What is fear? How does it happen that there is fear? You have had it. You have had yesterday certain fears. How does it happen? How do these fears take place? Would you tell me please? We are talking over together. Can't you say?

Q: In me it is the attachment to the past.

K: In me it is the attachment to the past. Now let's take that, one thing. Attachment to the past. What do you mean by that word 'attachment'?

Q: My mind is holding on to something.

K: That is, he says, the mind is holding on to some memory. When I was young, how lovely - you know. Or holding on to something that might happen, for which I have definitely cultivated a belief which will protect me - attachment. I am attached to a memory. I am attached to a piece of furniture. I am attached to what I am writing because through writing I become very famous. I am attached, attached to a name, to a family, to a house, to a belief, to various memories and so on and so on - attached, bound, identified myself with that. Now why does this attachment take place?

Q: I think because fear is the very basis of our civilization?

K: No sir, don't - why are you attached? What does that word attachment signify? Depending on - right sir?

Q: Security.

K: Now please you are all too quick. I am depending upon something. I am depending on you all attending so that I can talk to you. I am depending on you, and therefore I am attached to you, because through that attachment I feel I gain certain energy, certain elan, and all the rest of that rubbish. So I am attached, which means what? I am dependent on you. I am dependent on the furniture, in being attached to the furniture, to the belief, to the book, to the family, to the wife. I am depending. Right? To give me comfort, to give me prestige, to give me social position, to give me this and that. So dependence is a form of attachment. Right? Now why do I depend on you, on the furniture, on my books - you follow? - why, why do I depend? Don't answer me, look at it in yourself. You depend on something, don't you? On your country, on your gods, on your beliefs, on the drugs you take, drink, good Lord!

Q: It is part of social conditioning.

K: Is it social conditioning that makes you depend? Which means you are part of society, society is not independent of you. You have made society, the society which is corrupt, you have put together; and in that cage you are caught, you are part of it. So don't blame society. Do you see the implications of dependency? What is involved? Why are you depending?

Q: So as not to feel lonely.

K: Wait, wait. Look, listen quietly. Somebody says, 'I depend on something because I am lonely'. I depend on something because that something fills my emptiness. I depend on knowledge, books, because that covers my emptiness, my shallowness, my stupidity - so knowledge becomes extraordinarily important. I talk about pictures and the beauty of pictures because in myself I depend on that. So dependence indicates my emptiness, my loneliness, my insufficiency and that makes me depend on you. Right? That is a fact isn't it? Don't theorize, don't argue. It is so. If I am not empty, if I am not insufficient, I wouldn't care what you said, do. I wouldn't depend on anything. Because I am empty, lonely, I don't know what to do with my life. I write a stupid book and that fills my vanity. I go back and write about ancient Sanskrit rot, and I say 'By Jove'. So I depend, which means I am afraid of being lonely. Right? I am afraid of my emptiness. Therefore I fill it with cloth, or with ideas, or with persons. Now wait - aren't you afraid of uncovering your loneliness? Right? Have you uncovered your loneliness, your insufficiency, your emptiness? And that is taking place now isn't it? Right? Therefore you are afraid now. Right? You are afraid of that emptiness now. Now what are you going to do? What is taking place? Before you were attached to people, to ideas, to all kinds of stuff and you see you are depending and that dependence is covering your emptiness, your shallowness, your petty little shoddy little minds, though you may write clever books. And when you see that you are free - aren't you? Aren't you? No? Now what is the response? Is that fear the response of memory? Or is that fear actual, you see it?

Gosh, I work hard for you don't I? You know there was a cartoon yesterday morning - you have heard of Peanuts? A little boy says to the other boy, he says, 'When I grow up I am going to be a great prophet', and he says - the next drawing is - 'I am going to speak of profound truths but nobody will listen' (Laughter!) Wait, wait, wait. And the other little boy says, 'Then why do you talk if nobody is going to listen?' 'Ah' he said 'Us prophets are very obstinate' (Laughter).

So now sir, you have uncovered your fear now, uncovered through attachment, which is dependency, under dependency, when you look into it you see your emptiness, your shallowness, your pettiness - you know all, the rest of it - and you are frightened of it. Right? Which means what takes place then? Proceed, sirs.

What takes place?

Q: Try to escape.

K: You try to escape, which is trying to escape through attachment, through dependency. Therefore you are back again in the old pattern. But if you see the truth, the fact that attachment, dependency, emptiness, if you see that fact, you won't escape will you? IF you don't see the fact of that you are bound to run away, you will do all kinds of things. You try to fill that emptiness in other ways, before you filled it with drugs, now you will fill it with sex or you will fill it with something else. So when you see the fact of that what has happened? Proceed sirs, go on with it. I have been attached to the house, to the wife, to the books, to my writing and becoming famous - you know the people who want to be famous ought to be kicked in the pants - so I see fear arises because I don't know what to do with my emptiness. You understand? Therefore I depend, therefore I am attached, on that which I depend on. Now what do I do when I get this feeling of great emptiness in me?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: It is fear - you follow? I discover I am frightened, therefore I am attached. Please go slowly. Now is that fear the response of memory, or is that fear of actual discovery? You see the difference between the two? Discovery is something entirely different from the response of the past. Right? Now which is it with you? Is it the actual discovery? Or the response of the past? Don't answer me. Find out, sir, dig into yourself.

Q: Sir, in that emptiness surely there is loneliness.

K: No, no. I am asking something different. Please I don't have to repeat the question again. I am asking something entirely different. The fear of attachment, the fear which emptiness, loneliness and all that insufficiency, which you haven't been able to understand sufficiently to go through with it and finish it, has brought about fear. Now is it your discovery now, now, being here in the tent, is it your discovery? Or is it the recognition of the past? I don't have to repeat it again, have I? Which is it? Have you discovered that you are attached because you depend, and you depend because of fear of emptiness. Are you aware of your emptiness and the process of what that emptiness does? Are you aware of it? Right? Which means becoming aware of that emptiness is there fear involved in it? Or you are you merely empty? Merely see the fact that you are lonely.

Q: If you can see that you are not alone any more.

K: Just a minute sir. We'll go step by step sir, if you don't mind. Do you see that? Or are you going back to the old stuff? Dependency, attachment - you follow? The regular pattern being repeated over and over and over again. Which is it - what is going to take place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, unfortunately we are not dogs.

Q: Pardon?

K: Unfortunately we are not dogs, not animals. We are partly animals. I wish we were entirely animals and it would be quite a different problem. We are partly animals. So please sir I am asking something which you don't answer. Have you discovered for yourself the fear that takes place when you discover for yourself your emptiness, your shallowness, your isolation? Or discovering, you are going to run away, get attached to microphones?

So then what takes place, if you don't run away through dependency and attachment, then what takes place when there is this emptiness?

Q: Freedom.

K: You see sir, do look at it. It's quite a complex problem, don't say it is freedom. Before I was attached and I covered up my fear. Now by asking that question I discover it was an escape, this attachment, escape from fear which came into being when I was aware for a split second of my emptiness. Now I won't run away any more because I have finished with running away - then what takes place?

Q: There is no time. We are nothing.

K: What takes place madame? Be simple, don't say 'no time'.

Q: Can it be passion?

K: No sir. Just listen for two minutes. Just listen. Just a minute. What were you going to say?

Q: I was going to say that after that split second there is another escape.

K: After that split second there is another escape, which means you don't see the futility of escapes. Right? Therefore, don't see it, keep on escaping. But if you do see, are aware of your emptiness, what takes place? If you are watching very careful, what generally takes place is, who is aware of this emptiness. Right? No? Who is aware of this emptiness?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I have stopped escaping. I no longer depend or attach, that is finished. Then I am empty. Who is aware of this emptiness?

Q: The mind.

K: Go slowly, please sir, please. Please don't jump into it. Go step by step. Who is aware of it? The mind? Who is aware of it? A part of the mind - please listen - a part of the mind aware of another part which is lonely? You see my question? I am lonely - I have suddenly become aware that I am lonely. And who is aware of this loneliness? One part, a fragment of my mind, which says I am lonely? In that there is a division. Right? Therefore as long as there is a division there is an escape. You don't see this.

Q: What happens when you experience the emptiness then? Experience this loneliness - you are no longer aware of it.

K: Sir, look sir. You need here a persistent, sustained observation, not a conclusion - please listen to it for two minutes. You need here a persistent observation, not an observation from any conclusion, or from anything that you think should be, but observation, that is, I am aware of my emptiness, before I have covered it up, not it has been stripped and I am aware. Who is aware of this emptiness? A part of my mind? A separate segment of my mind? If it is, then there is a division between emptiness and the thing that is aware that it is empty, then what takes place in that emptiness - in that division? I can't do anything about it. I want to do something about it. Right? And I say I must bring it together, I must experience this emptiness, I must act. So as long as there is a division between the observer and the observed there is a contradiction and therefore there is a conflict. Is that what you are doing? A separate segment of the mind watching an emptiness which is not part of itself? Which is it? Please sirs you have to answer this, I can't answer for it. Then if it is a part that is watching what is that part?

Q: Is it the intelligence of energy?

K: I don't understand it sir. Is it the intelligence of energy? What does that mean, I don't quite understand?

Q: Born out of energy.

K: Born out of energy. Sir I didn't talk about energy. Don't complicate it sir, it is complex enough. Don't bring in other words.

Q: It is universal.

K: Look sir, my question is very simple. I asked, when you are aware of this emptiness, from which you have escaped through attachment and you are no longer running away from it, when you say you are aware of the emptiness, who is aware? It is for you to find out. Who is aware?

Q: It is another escape, this awareness, and you see you are nothing else but all these things put together.

K: When you say, 'I am aware of my emptiness' it is another form of escape. And we are caught in a network of escapes. And that's our life. Let me finish. So if you realize that it is an escape, as attachment is an escape, then you drop that escape. Right? Are you going - please listen - are you going from one escape after another? Or do you see one factor of escape and therefore you have understood all the factors of escape?

Isn't it time? I think I had better stop as it is ten to twelve. Look sirs, you cannot possibly sustain a continuous watchfulness for more than ten minutes and we have talked for an hour and forty minutes, and hour and fifty minutes. So we had better stop. We will continue the same thing tomorrow, until it becomes real to you, not because I say so, real to you, it's your life.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 4TH AUGUST 1970

May we go on with what we were talking about yesterday morning? We were talking about dependency, its attachments and the fear of loss. I think this may be rather an important subject, rather an important issue in our life, that we should really go into it rather deeply. After all, one can see that freedom cannot possibly exist when there is any form of dependency. There is physiological dependency and psychological, the dependency biologically on food, clothes and shelter which is a natural dependency. But the attachment that arises through the biological necessity, as having a house to which one is psychologically attached, or attached to certain form of food, or compulsive eating, because the other factors of fear which have not been discovered, and so on. So there are physical dependencies of which one can be fairly aware of, like wanting to, depending on smoke, on smoking, on drugs, on various forms of drink, various forms of physical stimulation, on which psychologically one depends.

Then there is the psychological dependencies - really one has to watch this very, very carefully, because they flow into each other, they are interrelated. The dependency on a person or a belief, on a continuous established relationship, on psychological habits of thought. I think one can be aware of all this fairly easily. And because, as we said yesterday, there is a dependency on something, and the attachment to that something, both physical or psychological, and that dependency and the fear of losing that to which one is attached, brings about or affects or breeds fear. I think that is where we went yesterday. I wonder if you have thought any more about it, gone into it yourself, since we last talked, on how deeply one depends - we are talking psychologically. One may depend on belief or an experience or on a conclusion, attached to a particular form of prejudice.

And how deeply does this attachment go. I do not know if you have observed it in yourself. We were watching it yesterday, all throughout the day, to find out if there is any form of attachment - coming here regularly, living in a particular chalet, following or going to one country after another, talking, addressing people, being looked up to, criticized, exposed. If you have watched throughout the day, one discovers naturally how deeply one is attached to something or another or not at all. If there is any form of attachment, it doesn't matter what it is, to a book, to a particular diet, to a particular pattern of thought, activity, committed to certain social responsibility - such attachment invariably breeds fear. And a mind that is frightened, though it may not know it because it is attached, obviously is not free and therefore must live in a constant state of conflict.

One may have a particular gift, capacity, like a musician, tremendously attached to his instrument or to the cultivation of his voice. And when the instrument or the voice fails, he is completely lost, his days are ended, he may insure his hands or his fiddle, or become a conductor, but he knows, through attachment, the inevitable darkness of fear is waiting.

I wonder if each one of us, if we are at all serious, have gone into this question, because freedom means freedom from all attachment, and therefore all dependency. A mind that is attached is not objective, is not clear, cannot think sanely, observe directly.

And there are the superficial, psychological attachments and there are deep layers in which there may be some form of attachment. How do you discover those? Please, this is not a talk by me - we are communicating with each other, sharing with each other the examination, which is not an analysis.

So how does the mind, which may consciously observe its many attachments, and realize the nature of those attachment and see the truth and the implications of that truth, but yet it may have other forms of hidden attachments. How are you going to uncover those concealed, secret attachments, bearing in mind, a mind that is attached goes through the conflict of detachment, realizing it must be detached, otherwise it has pain, and then gets attached to something else, and so on. This is our life. I find I am attached to my wife - fortunately I am not married - I am attached to my wife. And I may see all the consequences of it. And being attached to her I realize there must be inevitably fear involved in it. Therefore there is the conflict of detachment, and the trial in relationship, the conflict in relationship.

That is fairly easy to observe and expose to oneself, very clearly. Our question is, how deeply, in the hidden recesses of one's mind, is one attached to some form of tradition, modern or ancient, short hair, long hair, whatever it is. The tradition of a particular culture - please follow all this, because you will see freedom implies complete freedom from all this. Otherwise there must be fear. And a mind that is burdened with fear is incapable, do what it will, of understanding, seeing things as they are and going beyond them.

How does one observe the hidden attachments. I may be stubborn, thinking I am not attached, I am not depending on anything - I may have come to that conclusion, and the conclusion makes for stubbornness. But if one is learning, seeking, watching, then in that act of learning there is no conclusion.

And most of us are attached to some form of conclusion. And according to that conclusion we function. And can the mind be free all the time, not occasionally, all the time from forming conclusions, and therefore being attached to those conclusions. That is one problem, which is, can the mind not form any conclusion at all. I like and I don't like - I like long hair, I don't like long hair, I like this, I don't like that, I believe - conclusions, intellectually or through some experience you have come to a way of thinking, whether it is the bourgeois way of thinking or the non-bourgeois, whatever it is. Can the mind act without conclusion? That is one point.

Second - I am going to stop because you are going to, we are all going to discuss presently. Second, can the mind reveal to itself the hidden attachments, patterns and dependencies. And three, can the mind, seeing the nature and structure of attachment, can the mind be completely, or sustain move within, move with a way of life which is not isolating but highly active and yet no fixation at any point. I don't know if you are following all this. We will go into it.

First of all, are we aware that we are psychologically attached, first of all, biologically, physically attached. Are you aware of it? We are going to discuss, please. I'm not going to make a long speech - you and I are going to share this thing together. Are you aware that you are attached physically to things? And being aware of that, are you aware also of the implications of those attachments. If you are attached to smoking, see how extraordinarily difficult it is to give it up. The battles that one goes through, because I've watched people - personally I've never smoked, I don't know what it means - once I tried it and I was sick and I put it aside. But the people who smoke, it has become a habit, find it incredibly difficult, not only acts as stimulation and all the rest of it, social habit and all that, but the attachment to it - the attachment to drink, to drugs, to various forms of stimuli - is one aware of all this? If you are, can you drop it instantly.

Come on, sirs, please. I am aware that I am attached to whisky. I am not, but suppose I am. And it has become a tremendous habit, the body demands it. See what is involved in this. The body has got used to it, it can't do without it. And you have come to the conclusion that you mustn't drink, it is bad for you, it gives you various forms of physical disturbances, the doctors have said, don't, cut it down. But the body, the mind, have fallen into the habit of it. I am only taking that as an instance. Can the mind, watching this habit, can it completely, immediately drop it. See what is involved in it - the body demands it, because it has got into a habit, it acts as a stimulus or whatever it is, and the mind has said, oh, I must give it up. So there is a battle between the body, the bodily demands and the decision of the mind. Right?

Now what are you going to do. Instead of whisky, put your own habits which you have - perhaps you don't drink whisky and it is not particularly a habit, but you have other physiological habits, frowning, watching with your mouth open, fiddling with your fingers - what will you do? Please, sirs, let's discuss this, don't let me - the body's attached to drink and the mind says, I must be free of it.

And also you realize, conflict between the body and the mind is not very good, doesn't help, it becomes a problem, a struggle. What will you do? Please, sirs, come on. You must be extraordinarily free of all habits, if you can't discuss this.

Q: Either you stop it or you go on drinking.

K: You either stop it or go on drinking. What do you do, actually? Please don't play with this, because if you once understand this, which we are going to go into, you will see how extraordinarily vital it becomes or how important it becomes to act, to be without any form of effort, which means without any distortion. Which we'll go into, presently. Yes, sir?

Q: I realize that I am my habit.

K: Yes. Then what will you do - I realize I am my habit, my habit is me.

Q: Must we not go to the roots of these habits?

K: Must we not go into the roots of these habits?

Q: Begin by stopping resistance to it.

K: Stop, begin by stopping resistance to the habits. Sir, may I say something - don't let theorize, don't let's speculate. Just a minute, sir. Don't tell me what to do but let's find out or let us learn how to look, let us learn not only how to look but from that very looking action takes place. Seeing is acting, that is what we are concerned with. I have a particular habit of scratching my head, fiddling with my fingers, watching things with my mouth open, a very physical thing. Now how do I bring it to an end without the least effort, because we are discussing habits to which we are attached, conscious or unconscious. I am taking the most trivial habit. You understand my question? I've got a habit, scratching my head or pulling my ears or fiddling with my fingers. How do, how does, the mind stop it without any kind of effort, knowing that effort implies duality, implies a resistance, implies a condemnation, implies a desire to go beyond it, and therefore either suppress or escape, verbally or non-verbally. So bearing all that in mind, understanding those facts, how do I stop a physical habit, without effort.

Q: Observer it in its entirety.

K: You observe it in its entirety. Wait, sir - let's answer, that statement may answer all our questions. You observe in its entirety - what does that mean. The entire habit, the entire, not just one habit, as scratch, fiddling with your fingers, but the whole mechanism of habits - the whole of it, not a fragment of it. Now, how does the mind watch the whole of the habit in which it lives? Please sir, you made a statement.

Q: Passive awareness or passive observation.

K: You are quoting the speaker. I'm afraid that won't do. Don't quote anybody, sir, including Peanuts - Charlie Brown!

Q: Is the mind part of the...

K: Do look, sir, watch - that question is really quite important, if you go into it. Can the mind watch, not only the particular little habit, which is, a particular little habit, but be aware of this whole mechanism of forming habits. Please don't say yes - we are trying to learn about it, don't come to any conclusions. Look what is implied in this question, they are not only a very small habit, like fiddling with ones fingers, keeping ones mouth open, but also other habits, sexual habits, habits, patterns of thought, activities, I think this, I conclude this, and that has become a habit, I have lived with it, you follow - I live in habits, my whole life is a form of, a structure of habits.

Now how am I, how is the mind to be aware of the entire habit mechanism?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The questioner says, I find myself wandering away from actually what is taking place, escaping, day-dreaming, moving away, thinking about - I never watch 'what is', the thing that is most important right in front of me, I never come directly in contact with it, I move away. Wait, that is not for the moment the question. Look, one has thousand and one habits, the way you brush your teeth, comb your hair, the way you read, the way you walk, the way you - you follow? Dozens and dozens of habits. One of the habits is wanting to become famous, wanting to become important. Now, how is the mind to become aware of all these habits? Is it to be aware - listen please - aware of one habit after another. Do you know how long that would take? I could spend the rest of my days watching each habit and yet not solving it.

So I am asking, is it possible for the mind - I'm going to learn about it, I'm going to find out, I'm not going to leave it - for the mind to see the whole network of habits - how is it to do it? Don't guess, don't come to a conclusion, don't offer an explanation, I'm not interested, it doesn't mean a thing to say, go and do something, it doesn't mean a thing. But I want to learn about it, now. What do I do, what does the mind do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Can one be aware of the wastefulness of energy in pursuing a particular pattern of habit or many patterns.

Q: And thereby liberating oneself from habits.

K: Thereby liberating oneself from habit. That is, one habit after another, liberating from one habit after another. Please - I've come to you, all of you, and say, please help me, help me to find this out, I'm hungry, don't give me a menu but give me food, I am asking, what will you do.

Q: If you can see one habit, totally, possibly one could discard all habits.

K: See one habit totally, and then you will see all other habits. Now how do I, watch it, how do I watch one habit which is twiddling my fingers, and see all the other habits? Is that possible, with such a small affair, this. I know why I do it - I do it because out of tension, I couldn't get on with my wife, probably, and say, well, develop this peculiar habit or I do it because I am nervous, shy or this or that. And there it is. But I want to learn about the whole network of habits - am I to do it bit by bit, or - listen, please listen - or is there a way of looking at this whole network, instantly?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes. Does this network of habits through one out from being aware of the one thing you are concerned. Obviously. Please answer me. How am I, how is the mind to look at this totality of habit.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Habit consists of two parts, the habit that exists and the observer who is concerned with those habits. And the observer is also a habit. So both are habits. You understand? I fiddle with my fingers and I observe the observation also is from an entity which is the result of habits. Obviously. So it is all habits. Please, sir, listen to me for two minutes. How will you help me, teach me, help me to learn about it?

Q: Me and my habits, my whole life is habit, my mind is a habit.

K: Yes, sir - what am I to do?

Q: It is a state of my mind.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: I must change my structure.

K: Wait - I must change the structure of my mind. Who is the I that is going to change, the I is also a habit, the I is a series of words, and memories and knowledge, which is the past, which is a habit.

Q: As we are all caught in habits, we all obviously don't know.

K: Therefore why don't you say, I don't know, instead of throwing in a lot of words. If you don't know, if you don't know, then let's learn together. Right?

Q: We didn't understand.

K: If you don't know, then let us both of us learn together. But first be clear that you don't know - don't quote anybody. Are we in that position, saying, I really don't know?

Q: But why do we have to have it?

K: Why? It's fairly simple - habit, to have habits of many kinds doesn't need much thinking. If I have a dozen habits - get up every morning at eight o'clock, go to the office every morning, be there at nine o'clock, come back home at six o'clock - you follow - take drink, I don't have to think very much, be alive very much.

Therefore mind likes to function in grooves, in habits. I am a Hindu - that finishes it. I am a Communist according to Lenin, and you are Communist according to Trotsky - you've finished - or a Catholic or this or that. So the mind likes to function and the brain likes to function because it is safe, secure, to function in habits - that's simple, that doesn't need a great deal of explanation. Now how is the mind to observe this whole network of habits?

Q: May be can pay attention every moment, as far as our energies allow.

K: Maybe we can pay attention every moment as far as our energy allows. You see, that is just an idea - I am not interested, please sir.

Q: I have a habit, I see some kind of attachment always connected to habit, and I think it must be because the brain functions in habits.

K: No, sir, my question is this - please, you made a statement, I am following that statement, which is, can the mind see the whole structure and nature and the mechanism of habit. And when it sees the totality, there may be a different action. That's what we are enquiring into. Now may I go into it now? Since you don't know - not that I am Delphic Oracle, we are going to find out together. How is the mind, including the brain, to see something totally? Not only habit - to see anything totally. (Noise of plane) To see anything totally there - don't you like the sound, the deep sound of that aeroplane? We see things fragmentarily, don't we, don't we? We see things in fragments - business, family, community, individual, my opinion and your opinion, my god, your god, your social act - we see everything in fragments. Isn't that a fact? Are you aware that you see things in fragments? If the seeing is fragmentary, then you cannot see the totality. If I see life in fragments, because my mind is conditioned as this or that, then obviously it cannot see the totality of the human being. If I separate myself through my ambition, through my particular prejudices, I cannot see the whole. Now am I aware that I am looking at life partially, in fragments - 'me' and the 'not-me', we and they. Do I look at life that way? If I do then obviously I can't see anything totally.

Then arises my question then, how is the mind, which is so caught up in this habit of fragmentary outlook, fragmentary activity, how is such a mind to see the whole? Obviously it can't. If I am concerned with my particular fulfilment, ambition, competition and my desire to achieve, I can't see the whole of mankind. So what am I to do? That is a habit, wanting to fulfil, wanting to be somebody, wanting to achieve something - that is a habit, a social habit as well as a habit that gives me great pleasure, to say, well, as I go down the street people look at me, say, there he goes. That gives me great pleasure.

Now as long as that mind is operating in that field of fragmentation obviously it can't see the whole. Now my question is, how is the mind, which functions in fragments - please listen to this - realizing that it cannot possibly see the whole, what is it to do? Is it to break down every fragment, understand every fragment - again, that would take a long time. Or what is it to do? Are you waiting for an answer from me, from the speaker?

Q: Silence.

K: Oh my Lord - he is quoting somebody.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand, madam. Actually, right now, I feel happy?

Q: Habits, our actions are not in the future, habits, if we can see our habits now actually at this very moment.

K: I am doing that, aren't we? I am actually caught in a habit. Oh Lord, you don't go any further, you go back over and over again. I am caught in a habit, now, I fiddle with my fingers, I listen to what is being said with my mouth open, and I see that it is a habit, and my question is, can I understand this whole machinery habit now. You don't pay attention. Look, sir - a mind that is in fragments cannot possibly see the whole, full stop. And I take one habit and through learning about that one habit, a serious habit, by observing that one habit I see the whole mechanism of all habits. I take one habit - what shall I take?

Q: Smoking.

K: Please take the habit of smoking. All right, sir. Now wait a minute, I am not analysing, you understand the difference between analysis and observation. Do you? How am I to do it? All right, I'll explain. There is a difference between analysis and observation, seeing. Analysis implies the one who analyses and the thing to be analysed. The thing to be analysed is smoking and to analyse that there must be an analyser. And the difference between that, which is analysis, and observation is this: observation is seeking directly without analysis. Seeing without the observer, seeing the dress, red, pink, black as it is without saying, I don't like, like, it is so - you follow. Seeing things as they are, without analysing - listen, two minutes, I am going to explain. Seeing, in seeing there is no observer. I see the colour red, visually, the vibrations and all the rest of it, are translated in the brain as red. And there is no like or dislike, there is observation. Analysis implies I don't like red because my mother who quarrelled with my father - you know, go back to my stupid childhood and say, my mother - my god, must I go through all that. So analysis implies an analyser - please realize that - a division between the analyser and the thing analysed. In observation there is no division. I observe, there is observation without the censor, without saying, I like, I don't like, this is beautiful, this is not beautiful, this is mine, this is not mine - just observe without any division. You have to do this, not just theorize about it, you have to do it and then you'll find out.

As I said, we are not analysing we are merely observing the habit of smoking.

Now, in observing, what does it reveal? What does it reveal, not your interpretation of what it shows - you see the difference? There is no interpretation, there is no translation, no justification, no condemnation. What does the habit of smoking reveal?

Q: It reveals that you are putting into your lungs a lot of nasty smoke.

K: It reveals that you are drawing into your lung - I won't use the word 'nasty' - a lot of smoke. One fact. Second, what does it reveal, not you, what it tells, what it tells you, not what you are telling it - please listen, sir. It is going to tell you the history of smoking, if you don't interpret, if you don't - you follow. The picture is going to tell you all it wants, if you can listen to that picture, if you can watch smoking, you have understood that. So don't say it is nasty, it is pleasant - it is going to tell you.

Now what does it tell you, that you are drawing a lot of smoke into your lung. What else?

Q: That you are dependent.

K: It shows that you are dependent on a weed.

Q: That inside...

K: That is your translation. What does it tell you?

Q: I see that it is a very mechanical thing, I don't think about it - I just do it.

K: It tells you that you are doing something mechanically, it tells you that when you first smoked it made you sick. It was not pleasant, but other people did it round you, so you did it. Now it has become a habit.

Q: Does it tell you that it tranquillises you to a certain extent?

K: It tells you that it puts you to sleep, helps to drug you, you know, quieten your nerves, cuts your appetite, you don't get fat.

Q: It tells you, you are bored with life.

K: It tells you, you are bored with life. It tells you that you, because when you meet others and you feel nervous by taking a cigarette it makes you kind of, you know - it has told you a lot.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That is your translating, that you are inattentive - it is not telling you that you are inattentive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, it helps you, I understand - it is telling you all this. Right. And why are you doing it? Just listen, sir - don't quickly answer me, please. Why are we doing this - it has revealed to you, and why are you accepting all that? Television tells you what to do, what kind of soap to buy and all the rest of it - you've seen all that, commercial. It is telling you all the time - why do you accept it. It tells you, the sacred books, what you should do, what you should not - why do you accept it? Do watch it.

Q: It's easier.

K: Do watch it. Please. Why do you accept the propaganda of churches, religious, priests, the politicians, why, why?

Q: Because it is easier to follow a system.

K: You say it is easy to follow a system. I don't believe it but I follow it.

Q: No, I don't follow that, but I said it is easier.

K: We explained this - why do you follow it, is it because, for the sake of security, to feel companionship with others, not to be out of the run, to be like the rest of the people? Which means, you are frightened not to be like the rest of the people. You want to be like everybody else, because in that there is perfect safety. In a Catholic country, if you are non-Catholic you find it pretty difficult. If you are in a Communist country, if you don't follow all the line, you'll find it difficult. And so on and on and on.

Now look what it has revealed to me. What the picture of that weed has revealed and why I am caught in the habit. It is interrelationship between the cigarette and me. And this is the habit, this is the way my whole mind is working. I do something because it is safe. I get into a habit, small, trivial or great habit, because I don't have to think about it any more.

So my mind feels that it is safe to function in habits, cigarette or Church, believe in god or non-believe in god. So I see the whole mechanism of this habit formation. Are we getting together? No? Through one habit of smoking a cigarette, of smoking, I have discovered all the pattern, I've discovered all the way, I have discovered the machinery that is producing habits. No?

Q: Yes.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Though we are living in habits, both physically and psychologically, accepting those habits, can we live fully, freely, happily, ecstatically.

Q: Yes.

K: Yes?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, we've been - I did not say that. I never said good habits and bad habits. We are examining the machinery of habits. We are not condemning it. The lady asked, having all these habits, can one live happily. One can live happily blind, if you call blind living happy, it's up to you.

Now through one habit you can discover, if you listen to the whole habit - listen to the whole habit, you can find out the machinery that breeds habits.

Q: I didn't understand perfectly how you can see through one habit, the whole mechanism of habit.

K: I've shown it to you, sir. Habit implies functioning mechanically, through smoking - you follow, we took that - and we see how it has become mechanical. And from that observation of mechanical habit of smoking, I see how the mind functions in habits.

Q: But are all habits mechanical?

K: Wait. Must be - moment you use the word habit, it must be mechanical.

Q: Aren't there more deep dependencies as just mechanical habits.

K: The moment we use the word 'habit', it implies mechanical, repetition, establishing a good habit, which means doing the same thing over and over again. The doing over and over again is called good, because one is caught in the doing of the bad thing, so there is no good habit and bad habit, only habit, we are concerned.

Q: If I have a habit of power or the habit of comfort, for instance, or the habit of property, it isn't something more deep, it is just mechanical.

K: Wait - I am going into it, I did it just now. The habit of power, the demand for power, position, domination, aggression, violence - all that is implied in the desire for power. To do what one wants to do, like a child or like a grown up man. That has become a habit.

Q: Or security also.

K: I said that, it gives you security, safety and so on. In examining that one habit I've traced all the other habits are based on that. Look at it. Habits being mechanical, repetitive, and once they may have been the freedom, to say, I would like to be a great man, then I become caught in that habit because in that habit I find security and so on. And I pursue that. Deep down all habits - we are not discussion the good or the bad habits, only habit - deep down all habits are mechanical.

Q: Are they really?

K: Look at it, sir - don't say, are they really, really - look at it. Anything that I do repetitively, which is doing something from yesterday to today, to tomorrow, must be mechanical. They may be in that mechanical, repetitive action, little more polished, function a little more smoothly, but it is still habit, still repetitive - that's obvious.

Q: Would you say that certain creative efforts are habits?

K: Would you say that certain creative efforts are habits?

Would you? Let's answer that question, sir. Would you say creativeness is a habit?

Q: Creativity implies freshness.

K: Creativity implies newness, freshness.

Q: You don't make an effort to be creative.

K: If I make effort I can't be creative. Are you saying all this because you are creative or are you just guessing at it. Therefore one has to ask what you mean by creativeness. Please, sir, this is a tremendous question - you brush it aside. You paint a picture, either you do it because you love painting, or it brings you money, or you want to find some original way of painting and so on. So what do you mean by creativeness, what does it mean to be creative? A man who writes a poem because he can't get on with his wife or with society, is he creative? The man who is attached to his violin and makes a lot of money out of it, is he creative? And the man who is in great tension, in himself, and out of that tension he produces a play, which the world say, how marvellous. Would you call that creative? The man who drinks, soaked, and out of that writes a marvellous rhythmic, you know, full of rhythm - is he creative?

Q: How can you judge?

K: I am not judging.

Q: But that is the question you pose. If I say someone is or isn't creative, I am judging.

K: I am not judging, sir, I am asking, I am learning, I look at all this in front of me, the people who write books, the people who write poems, who write plays, who fiddle, the Church - I see this in front of me, I don't say this is right, this is wrong, this is good, this is bad - I say, what is creativeness. The moment I say this is right, I am finished, then I can't learn. And I want to learn, I want to find out what it means to be creative.

Q: Perhaps it is to have an innocent universality.

K: Again, I don't know, perhaps - I want to find out, I want to learn. I go to a museum and see all those pictures, admire them, compare them - one, or this modern, non-objective and, you know, all the rest of it - watch them. And I say, what marvellously creative people they are. So I want to find out, learn what it is to be creative. Must I write a poem, paint a picture, write a play, to be creative? Which means, does creativeness demand expression? Please listen carefully. The woman who bakes a bread in a hot kitchen, is she creative?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: All these activities, we generally call them creative, I know. I'm questioning it. I don't say they are not, I don't know, I am questioning it, I want to learn.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are saying, the man who is creative doesn't know he is creative.

Q: Yes.

Q: He can feel he is creative.

K: He can feel he is creative - you see, sir, look. Are you creative?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking you, sir, what is creativeness.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no. What is it from observing what man has called creativeness, all these things, I ask myself, what is creativeness, what is it to be creative. Must it have an expression, which is baking a bread, painting a picture, play, making money - being creative, does it demand expression. Please, sir, this is one of the most colossally important things, don't say...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The lady says, at this moment you are creative, you are creating - that is not my point. My point is, whether you are creative, or merely listening to somebody who points out all this.

Q: I think you create when you observe uncritically.

K: Not 'I think' - you see, sir. I want, I'm passionate, I want to find out I want to learn.

Q: The moment you see you and act is the very moment of creation.

K: The very moment you see that you see and act, that is the moment of creation. Therefore you are saying, seeing is acting and at that moment is creation. That is a definition. Wait, wait.

Q: Is not creativity one's harmony with nature?

K: Is not creativity one's harmony with nature - are you? I want to learn - you miss the point - I want to find out, I am hungry, I have observed all the great painters, I have seen all the great, listened to all the great plays and so on - I say, what is creation, what is it to be creative? No definition, I want to, you understand.

Q: Doing something new.

K: To discover something new? Doing something new? Wait a minute, listen quietly. To discover something new, doing something new - what does that mean - new, fresh, not a decision, something totally new, that means, the past must end. Has it ended with you? Or are we just talking about creation as you talk about a book, gossip about a book. Are we doing that? If you are, I don't want to play a part in it. I want to learn, I am passionate, I want to shed tears over it, because one can, one may live creatively, without doing any of these things, neither baking a brick, bread, painting a picture, writing a poem - that means, you can only do that when the mind is non-fragmentary, when there is no fear, when the mind is free of all the implications of the past, when the mind is free of the known.

Q: For me, creativity isn't a thing.

K: Not for you, sir, or for me - you are all making it personal - it is not an opinion. You go to a writer, he says, this is my creativity, it is mine - I am not interested in yours or his or Michelangelo or somebody else, I am interested to find out, I am hungry and you feed me with a lot of words. Which means, you are not hungry. You know, sir, yesterday, after talking about attachment, I was watching it, the mind was watching it all day, whether it was attached to anything, to sitting on a platform, talking, wanting to tell people, writing something or other, attached, person, ideas, chair - one has to find out. And in finding out one discovers enormous things, the beauty of freedom and the love that comes out of that freedom. And we were talking of creation, it is that, a mind that has no aggression. So too find out, sirs, the machinery of habit, the network of habit, one has to be aware, go into it, let it flow through you, you follow, like the river, moving, moving, moving. Let this enquiry, the learning, carry you all day, and you will discover enormous things.

That's enough for today, isn't it.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 5TH AUGUST 1970

Shall we go on with what we were talking about yesterday morning? We were talking, if I remember rightly, about attachment, detachment which inevitably leads - attachment leads to fear. And the various forms of fear, both the conscious and the unconscious fears that one has. And whether one can see the whole network of fears and escapes without analysis but observe, in which there is no analytical process at all. That is what we were discussing, more or less, weren't we? And I think we ought to go into this matter very deeply because a mind that is really not free from fear and the escape from that fear, in different forms, will inevitably cripple the mind, make the mind unintelligent. It may do all kinds of meditations and all the rest of it, follow various systems of meditation and all that, which is so utterly childish and immature, as long as there is not complete freedom from fear, obviously.

So could we go into it much more deeply and find out and learn whether the mind, not only the superficial layers but also the deep, hidden layers of the mind in which there are fears. Could we go into this. And we said, as most people are attached to something or another, that attachment indicates an escape from one's own loneliness, one's own frustrations, emptiness, shallowness and so on. Now when one is aware of this whole movement of fear, which is a movement away from the fact of emptiness, can one see this total process as a whole and not partially? That is what we were talking about.

To see something whole, the fragmentary process must come to an end. The fragmentary process of the mind that seeks success - I do not know if you follow. I want to be free from fear in order to achieve something else. I will follow certain systems of meditation in order to arrive at enlightenment. I will discipline, control, shape myself in order to see something most extraordinary. Such ways of thinking, living and acting is fragmentary. I don't know if we shall see all that clearly.

Can we look at the network of fear and the various escapes and the various escape from which our whole being runs away, can we see this complicated, very subtle form of escape which is the very nature of fear. Can we see that? Can we see that to act from any form of conclusion is fragmentary, because it stops further learning - you may have started to learn but the moment there is a conclusion from that learning, it becomes fragmentary.

Now what makes for fragmentation. We have discussed fear, when we find ourselves being attached to something, and the cultivation of detachment from that attachment, in order to overcome fear, that is fragmentary thinking. Now what is it that makes for fragmentation in our life? We are going to discuss this. Now, please sirs, would you kindly listen - don't draw any conclusions from what you hear - would you kindly listen. I really want to communicate with you to tell you that one can be completely, totally and utterly free of fear, not only the biological fears, physical fears, but deep, psychological fears. And fear is a form of fragmentation, attachment is a form of fragmentation. And seeing attachment, the attempt to be detached is a movement in fragmentation. I am first attached to my family, then I discover that family causes pain or pleasure, if it is painful I want to detach myself from it, and fight attachment. So it is fragmentation, a movement in fragmentation, and therefore there is no resolution in that fragmentation. Right? Is that clear?

Now what is the basis, the mechanism of this fragmentation in life, not only inwardly but outwardly - the German, the Dutch, the French, the English - you follow - this breaking up - your religion, my religion, Catholic, Protestant, the Zen Buddhism, the Zen Meditation, the practice of Indian meditation, the practice of certain mantras - all fragmentation. Through one of these fragmentations one hopes to arrive at a synthesis, at a completeness, enlightenment, what you like. Is that possible. That is through a fragmentation you hope to achieve a non-fragmentary mind. And is that possible? Though all the yogis, rishis, you know, promise all these things.

So one has to find out why fragmentation comes into being, what is the mechanism, not conclude in words or intellectually, the mechanical process of it, but actually see the non-analytically the whole mechanism of it. I don't know if I am conveying this to you. If I am not, please stop and let's discuss that.

Q: Sir, but aren't these rishis enlightened men. These wise men, these rishis as you call them, aren't they enlightened men?

K: The maharishis and the rishis and the yogis and people, are they enlightened? What do you think? You are asking my opinion? Are you, sir? Only the fools give opinions. Now, how do you know, you, know who is enlightened? You never ask that. I may sit up on the platform and say, I am the most wise, most enlightened, most divine human being - how do you know. Don't laugh. This is what is happening in the world - a man comes and asserts these things - do these things, you will have enlightenment, I've got it, I'll give it to you. How do you know he is enlightened, why do you bother about it, why do you bother who is enlightened or who is not enlightened?

Q: You can experience yourself, if you observe. You have a method too in a way, I think.

K: No, sir, there is no method, if you have observed, listened, we are not showing you a method at all, we are learning - learning is not a method, you can learn through a method, but learning through a method is only conditioning the mind to that particular system. But if you are learning you observe. If you observe that one system conditions the mind, makes the mind mechanical, then all systems are the same - that is, you learn. You learn what a system does - through a system you have most extraordinary experiences but it is still very limited experience. This is so obvious, I don't know why we keep on.

Q: If you have this system, wouldn't it be that, I don't know if you are enlightened, I don't know if anybody is, you might be up there some place, I might be down there. Now couldn't it be that to start of with you could use the system, just to get an idea of the fragmentary state, and then from there to get the whole and watch oneself and all that.

K: Wouldn't it be helpful to have a system to begin with, and then after a little while throw it off. Begin with the crutches and later on throw it off - hang on to your mother's strings or the guru's strings, or the rishi's strings, and then let go later on. Our question is, why do you hold on to any string when you can observe, learn, from watching yourself, the whole phenomenon of existence and go beyond it. Sir, you want to be helped and that is the first thing, if I may point out most respectfully, that is the greatest impediment. That is, you have the idea somebody can teach you, therefore you begin right off with a fragmentation of this division - this division is a fragmentation - you and the teacher, you and the enlightened being. Obviously there is a division.

Q: But aren't you teaching?

K: But aren't you teaching - am I? He says, look, from the beginning he has said there is no teacher and no disciple. From, probably the first time, or first few years, he has been, you have heard this. He has been saying this for 45 years, not out of foolishness or reaction but one has perceived the truth that nobody can teach enlightenment to another, through no system, through no meditation, through no discipline, one sees that, one saw that 45 years ago. And you ask whether you are a teacher or not - I've shown it to you. Teacher implies one who has accumulated knowledge and transmits to another, who is a professor, professor and a student. We are not in that relationship here at all. We are learning together, we have made that very, very clear - all communication means learning together, creating together, watching together, learning together. If that is understood then our communication is entirely different. But if you have a feeling that because he sits on the platform he knows better, he is the enlightened one, I say, please don't attribute things to the person who is sitting here - you know nothing about enlightenment. Right? If you knew it or if you understood it, lived it, you wouldn't be here. And it is one of the most extraordinary things to find out, to find out, to learn about it, not to be taught - you don't pay 100 dollars or 100 francs to be taught this. My god, to think of it - pay money to learn truth? What are you all doing?

So, sirs, we are trying to find out, learn, what is implied in fragmentation. The teacher and the disciple - that is fragmentation. The higher self and the lower self, the soul and the body, this constant division, this constant fragmentation.

Q: Thought is only capable of giving attention to one thing.

K: Thought is only capable of giving attention to one thing at a time. Then are you saying that thought is the cause of fragmentation? If I can only give - thought can only give attention to that, and discard all the rest, then thought must breed fragmentation, must, the very process of thinking is fragmentation. We are going to learn about it - please don't draw a conclusion. I am asking why we live in fragmentation. How does it happen, and what is behind the demand for this fragmentation? Let's take a very simple fact. You are the teacher and the disciple. Now, why is there this division between you and me - you the teacher and I the disciple - why? I want to learn. Do I want to learn or do I want to follow? I want to follow the authority which you represent, which you have invested in yourself. You say you know, you say you are enlightened. And I, I want to find, I want to have that, I'm greedy, I'm greedy, I want something that will give me happiness, that will give me something or other. So I follow you. You the teacher, I the disciple, fragmentation exists when I follow you. I have never asked why I follow you, what is the reason, what is the basis of accepting you as my authority. You may be a cuckoo, a neurotic, you may have one or two little experiences which you have blown up, as a tremendous thing, and I look at you and I am incapable of judging because you fascinate me by your beard or eyes or whatever it is, and I just follow. Whereas I want to learn, I won't accept you as authority, because the moment you become the authority, you already brought about fragmentation.

Please do see that. It doesn't matter, if it is the spiritual authority or the political authority, or the authority of the military, or the authority of the priest - moment there is the assumption of authority, the assumption that you know and I don't know, there is fragmentation. And that will inevitably lead to conflict between you the teacher and me. Right? Is this clear, please? So that means, I will never follow anybody.

Q: If he does good to you, sir. If you do something and you experience yourself, and it is good for you, why shouldn't you do it? I mean, it's still fragmentary but isn't it better to have something fragmentary than nothing?

K: The teacher tells me something and I do it and in the doing of it I have great delight, great pleasure, great, I have understood. What is implied in that? My craving for experience, my craving to understand - not myself but what that bird is saying, what the guru is saying, not understand myself. If the guru said, look, understand yourself, that is far more important than anything else, don't try to understand me, but understand yourself, then you are stuck, you'd rather follow than understand yourself.

So why is there is fragmentation - please let's go on.

Q: Because we are made from fragmentary processes.

K: We have fragmentary faculties, we have faculties and in themselves they are fragmentary.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You have a faculty for engineering or I don't know what else - faculty. Why should from that faculty arise fragmentation? I have a faculty, playing the piano - why should that bring about fragmentation. Aren't you putting the cart before the horse, or the horse, whatever it is. Is it the faculty that is bringing about fragmentation or the mind is broken up and using one of the fragments, one of the faculties, and therefore further strengthening the division. You understand what I am saying? I want to learn about this fragmentation, if I could once solve that, I will have a difference action altogether, a non-fragmentary action, so I must find out. I must learn about fragmentation, why it comes into being. I am not going to come to any conclusion or start with any conclusion.

There is fragmentation - the teacher and the disciple, the authority, the follower, the man who says he's enlightened, the man who say's, I don't know, teach me - the Communist, the Socialist, you follow - fragmentation. Why? How does it happen? If I could really understand it, learn all about it, I've finished with it. Then my relationship with another will be entirely different, then my activities will not be fragmentary, it will be total each time. I don't know if you follow all this. So I must learn about it. Please, sir, go with me.

Now I am asking, why does it happen. What do you say, sirs?

Q: Is there an expectation?

K: We live in expectation and that very expectation is a form of fragmentation. We expect. What are you expecting, is that the real reason, real truth for fragmentation, expectation? That is one of the effects of fragmentation, like wanting success, that wanting success is the effect of my fragmentation - me, that is tremendously important, I want success - through painting, writing, this or that. So what is the basis of this fragmentation?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, I've understood.

Q: My view is limited.

K: My view is the one direction, I have not eyes behind my head - if I had eyes behind my head I would see the whole thing. Is that what we are discussing, having eyes behind the head? And saying my view is limited? Of course my physical view is limited, I can't see the whole alpine range - perhaps I could if I went on top, in an aeroplane. But surely that is not what we are discussing, are we?

Q: Our senses are fragmentary.

K: Our senses are also fragmentary, the taste, the smell, the seeing, the listening, all the rest of it, it is all fragmentary. Is that what we are discussing? That is part of it - that is part of this fragmentation, we are discussing why the mind, the brain, divides.

Q: It is not possible to think about the whole at once.

K: It is not possible to think of all the world at once. So you are saying, fragmentation exists as long as thought, which cannot think about the whole thing at once, that is the cause of fragmentation - are you?

Q: Yes, communication to other people is also fragmentary, now we are thinking about self-knowledge and not about mountain climbing. You can't put everything together.

K: Now let's be clear, what we are talking about, not climbing the mountain, as you point out, sir, or having eyes behind the head. But we are talking of a mind, of our ways of thinking, looking, listening, coming to conclusions. Why is there this process which inevitably brings about fragmentation - that is what we are discussing.

Q: But discussing only this already prevents you.

K: So discussing this very issue is a fragmentation. But we are asking, we are asking why this fragmentation exists, why can't I communicate with you completely. And you convey to me completely. So let's find out, let's go into this slowly - what is the process, the mechanism, the cause of this fragmentation.

Q: Because we cling to the idea of ourselves.

K: Yes, we cling to a conclusion, we cling to a conclusion and that is the reason of fragmentation. Why do we cling, to a fragmentation?

Q: I still think it is a communication, for instance, at school, you have lessons in English, in French and geography, it is fragmentary from the beginning.

K: You are saying, our education, Geography, History, Mathematics, Science, is all fragmentary, and therefore our mind is already, from childhood, is conditioned by this fragmentation.

Q: The very process of thinking, is to form conclusions, you can't think without forming a conclusion.

K: We cannot think without forming, without bringing about fragmentation. So you are all saying, in more or less different words, that thought is the source of all fragmentation.

Q: We are saying it is the process of thought.

K: Yes, thought, which is thinking, is fragmentary. Is a fragment of ourselves.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right, sir, you are saying, all the results of our thinking, which is a fragment of ourselves, must result in further cleavages, further breaking up. So you are saying to me, who am learning, as you are learning, that thought is the source of all fragmentation. No? Find out, don't say no. Thought is the result or the response of memory. And memory is the past. And that memory of the past, which is memory, the past is always divided. Obviously, the past, the today and the tomorrow - the past experience, the present experience and the future. The past that says, I haven't learnt, I don't know, and I am going to learn from you. Isn't that the major cause of fragmentation? What do you say, sirs? Isn't that the major cause of fragmentation?

Q: Sir, you have already said so. I would think talking about time, because time is, the awareness of time is taking our attention away from the present.

K: Time divides - what is time? What is time?

Q: Thought.

K: What is time? Find out, sir - thought he says. There is chronological time, by the watch - I have to go to the station, to catch a train, it goes by a certain time, and there is time as achievement, as success, as you know, I don't know, I'm going to learn. All that involves psychological time. Which is, thought says, I don't know but you know, and I am going to learn, step by step. There are seven steps or four steps or ten steps and I'm going to gradually climb them and eventually come to that marvellous state. Which is, thought that says, I don't know but you know and you tell me that I will know if I do follow these steps and so there is a division created by thought, which wants success. The success being not money this time - enlightenment or faith. Are you saying that thought is the mechanism that brings about this fragmentation, the thought that has said, you are a Hindu, the thought that said, you are a Catholic, the thought that said, you are brown and you are black, you are white, you are pink - thought has conditioned the values of a particular society and culture and that says, everybody who does not belong to that culture is a barbarian. This is all clear, isn't it?

If thought is responsible for this fragmentation, what are you going to do about it? What do you say? I have to earn a livelihood - I don't know why but I have to, to live. I have to do something, I have a family, I have a job - a doctor, professor, mathematician, whatever it is - and I have a family, my son, my wife, my daughter. And also there is me, with my problems, with my ambitions, with my successes. So there is livelihood, there is the family, there is the function and the desire to derive a status from that functioning, and the me - all fragmentary. Now what am I to do - and I see, thought is responsible for all this. Is that so or not? We are learning - if the speaker is wrong, tell him, find out.

Q: But we are thinking all the time. We are thinking at this very moment.

K: Wait, we are going to find out - that is the whole point. We are thinking and we say, I have to earn a livelihood, a family enjoyment, success, wanting to find out enlightenment, the guru, authority, all that. And there is me, muddling through all this. And also you tell me, after discussion, I am learning, that thought is responsible for this - thought which has brought about a certain culture and that culture has conditioned me, saying, you are a Brahman, you are a Hindu, Muslim, Christian, this or that. So thought has done this, and thought also has to earn a livelihood - thought says you have to go out and earn a livelihood. You must earn money for your family, for your children. So thought is responsible for it. Are you sure you are right - don't afterwards say, look, it is not like that - be quite sure, learn.

Q: One has the feeling that there is something even behind thought.

K: We'll come to that. First see what we are dealing with, not what is behind it yet. We will come to that. But you can't come to that without understanding the whole machinery of thought, otherwise you'll be merely escaping from thought. Now if you are absolutely, if that is the truth, not your truth or my truth, it is not my personal opinion or your opinion, it is the truth, it is the fact, that thought divides - thought divides the living, now, and the dying, tomorrow. I will die tomorrow. But thought says you'll die, I'll get frightened. Thought says, that was a marvellous pleasure, I must have more of it. And thought says, that I have done, I am frightened of that thing. Thought says, you have done something which wasn't right a few years ago, be careful, don't let it occur again, don't let it be discovered. So thought is breeding fear, pain, pleasure.

So thought is dividing. That is the truth, whether you see it or not, it is so. Now then what are you to do with it. I have to earn a livelihood, I have to leave this tent to go home, which is all activity of thought. I have to tell my friends where I have been, and that is the activity of thought and so on. Knowing thought brings about fragmentation, conclusions, and therefore sustains division, fragmentation - what are you going to do?

Q: Is it the thought itself that divides?

K: Is it thought itself that divides or is it the way we use thought that divides - who is the we? Who is the 'I' that uses thought which divides.

Q: The action of the thought.

K: That makes three - the 'I', the thought and action of that thought. So you've got more complicated. See, sir, first listen to it, listen. Don't come to any conclusion, first listen to what the speaker is saying. I have to earn a livelihood, a livelihood has to be earned, therefore thought must be employed there. I come back home and thought says, my family, my responsibility. You follow. Thought says, I have great pleasure in sex, great pain, my wife - thought is in operation all the time, all the time breeding fragmentation, breaking up - the guru, the teacher, the disciple, the success. What are you going to do? And knowing that thought brings about fragmentation and fragmentation means fear, fragmentation means conflict, fragmentation means that there will be no peace whatsoever. You may talk about peace, join the organizations that promise peace, wave flags that promise peace, but there will be no peace as long as there is fragmentation by thought. So faced with that fact, what is going to happen?

Q: Identify myself with the thought.

K: Identify myself with the thought. Who is the 'I' who identifies itself with thought. Has not thought created the 'I'? The 'I' being, my experiences, my knowledge, my success, which is all the product of thought. And if you say, no, it is the higher self, god, it is still thought, that has thought about god. So what will you do - please, sir.

Q: Thought must end.

K: Thought must end - how is it to end - but listen, sir. Thought must operate when you go and do something mechanical, even to drive - you follow? When you say, thought must end, then thought must end altogether. Then you can't earn a livelihood, you can't go home, you won't be able to speak. Sir, watch yourself, find out. Learn about this. There must be the usage of thought and also thought sees that it does breed fragmentation. So what is thought to do?

Q: It seems that we come to this point in almost every discussion - my question is, is that a question that can be answered.

K: We come to this point in almost every discussion - can this ever be answered. We're going to find out.

Q: I become afraid because I see a deadlock.

K: I'll become afraid - I am afraid because I see a deadlock, an impasse, I don't know what to do. Now will you, knowing that you don't know what to do, will you learn? Will you learn, sir?

Q: If it is possible.

K: Why do you say, if it is possible. No, my question is not whether it is possible or not, but I said, will you learn about this. Wait.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait. To learn, what does it imply. Curiosity, doesn't it. No? Wait. Are you curious to learn? Don't be so casual. Are you eager to learn, passionate to learn about this? Because this may solve all our problems, therefore you must be intense, curious, passionate to find out. Are you, or are you going to say, I am going to wait, I will, so far I have functioned with conclusions, I'll form another conclusion and act from that.

So if you want to learn, these three things are absolutely necessary - curiosity, eagerness, you must have energy, and that energy gives you passion to find out, learn. Have you these things, or you just want to learn, casually talk about this.

Q: Is it one pointedness?

K: Is it one pointedness. Learning is not one-pointed learning. Learning means learning, you know, sir, the mind that wants to learn, that wants to find out is like a child that says, I want to know what the mountain is made of, whether the moon is cheese or what is it - I want to find out.

Q: I need to be detached to learn.

K: Detached to learn - sir, why do you translate into your own words what one has said. I said one must have great deal of energy, one must be curious to find out, and to find out you must be persistent, not just one minute full of curiosity, next say, please, sorry, I'm too tired, I'm bored, I want to go out and smoke. Then you can't learn.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Gentlemen says, does learning guarantee me certainty. Listen to that question - I will learn if it guarantees me complete certainty for the rest of my life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Si signor, perhaps you could talk a little bit in Spanish, sir, slowly, I can understand it - slowly.

Q: (In Spanish)

K: This fragmentation gives me a sense of security and I cling to that security. And you come along and say, look what you are doing, you are disturbing my security, I am therefore frightened, I don't want to learn. This is what you are all doing. I have found great delight in my writing a book and I know I function from fragmentation but that book gives me fame, money, position and for god's sake keep out. Don't talk to me, don't disturb me. The house is burning but don't disturb me.

Let's proceed from this otherwise we are going only four more days, you understand, I want to get on with this thing.

If thought is the source of all fragmentation and yet thought has to be used, what is to take place, how is thought not to function and yet to function? You follow the question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is the feeling of insecurity, as that gentleman pointed out, that we get frightened about it.

Q: We get frightened.

K: I know, I answered that question - that gentleman didn't hear - you hear what you want to hear and you don't listen to other people. That question has been answered, sir - that gentleman asked in Spanish, I cling to one of the fragmentations of activities because I feel secure, and you come along and disturbed that security, therefore guarantee me security at the end of learning. Give me a certificate that I've learned and through which I'll get a job. Please, sir, let's go.

If thought is responsible for this fragmentation and all conclusions are fragmentations - please see that - all conclusions: I must be secure, I am frightened of uncertainty. But there may be a way of living which will give you physical security, which is what you want, but freedom psychologically. And that freedom will bring about complete physical security. But you don't see this, so we are going to learn.

If thought is responsible for this fragmentation and yet thought must function to survive, then what is one to do? Then what is thought to do? You understand my question? If you don't understand it, please let's go into this question itself. I must go from here to where I live - I must use thought. To earn, to go tomorrow to my job and function there properly, I must use thought. And yet thought sees itself that it is the cause of fragmentation and therefore conflict. Thought sees it must function, and thought sees itself bringing about fragmentation.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, we said, sir, it is not a linkage, you cannot put fragments together and make it whole. Many spokes of the wheel doesn't make the wheel - it's how you put the spokes that makes the wheel.

Q: As we have to use thought, we don't want to come to fragmentation, can we just become conscious of the tendency of thought to produce this fragmentation - if you are conscious of that it doesn't...

K: Now, who is it, if you are conscious, if you are conscious that thought fragments and brings about fragmentation, and yet thought must function - that very consciousness of this whole process brings about a different quality altogether. Is that what you are saying? Now is that what is happening to you? Be careful, sir, go very slowly into this. Thought must be exercised, thought must exercise, and thoughts also realizes that it breeds fragmentation and therefore conflict and therefore fear and all the misery in the world. And yet thought itself, you are suggesting, must be conscious of this whole process. Now see what happens. We said, thought is the basis of fragmentation, therefore when thought becomes conscious of itself and how it breeds fragmentation, how it must, therefore, thought itself divides itself into this, into that, into that.

Q: Just to be conscious of something which is happening.

K: Therefore what do you mean by being conscious. Go into this slowly - what do you mean by that word, conscious.

Q: To see.

K: To see. Go slowly, now what do you mean by seeing? Do you see this process mechanically, because you've heard the words, you have intellectually understood, and you see with the intention to apply these words and the intellectual conclusion to seeing? Be careful, don't say, no. Are you seeing with a conclusion or are you merely seeing.

Q: At the point where you were asking this question, were you yourself actually asking the question, because it seems to me that if there is a question at this point, it is again fragmentary.

K: No, I am not asking. The lady suggests, if you are asking the question, then you are dealing again fragmentation.

Q: And if so, what has this whole investigation been, what validity has it had?

K: What has this whole investigation been, what is the point of all this investigation, if thought is asking that question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I'll explain to you, you come to this point and ask the question. And the lady says, who is asking this question, is it thought that is asking the question? If it is, then it is again - I am asking it because you are not learning.

Q: But then...

K: Wait. I am not asking this question.

Q: At this point I don't mind, it is presumptuous to say so, but may be you would not, but I do ask this question, at whatever point along the line...

K: Yes, I am going to point out. Go a little bit slowly with me. I have this picture, the mind sees this match. How thought has fragmented, thought must function and sees this. If you really see this, completely, there is no more question. Wait. You can only see this if there is no conclusion here, no desire to solve it, to go beyond it; only when you see this whole mechanism of thought, how it operates, how it functions, what is behind, etc., when you see this completely the problem is solved. Then you are functioning all the time non-fragmentarily, even though you go to the office, it is non-fragmentary action - if you see the whole of it. If you don't then you divide the office, the family, the you, the me. Now do you see the whole of it?

Q: Sir, are you suggesting it is possible to carry on a non-dualistic life and still function in society?

K: I am showing it to you, sir. If you see this whole mechanism of thought, not just one part of it, the whole of it, the whole nature and the structure and the movement of this.

Q: How can you learn it quicker?

K: How can you learn it quicker - by listening now. (Laughter)
You see, aga in the desire to achieve. That means you are not listening at all, your eyes, your ears, are fixed on getting somewhere. So, sir, my question then is, as a friend, asking, do you see this whole thing. And the friend says, for god's sake, you must see it, otherwise you're going to live a terrible, miserable existence, you'll have wars, you'll have such misery and sorrow, for god's sake see this. And why don't you? What is preventing you - your ambition, your laziness, your innumerable conclusion that you have? Now, who is going to answer it?

Q: Why answer it?

K: Why answer it? He says, why answer this?

Q: Just do it.

K: Just do it.

Q: (In Spanish)

K: I know I have conclusions, I know it, I have them, but I can't get rid of them, they go on.

Q: (In Spanish)

K: It is the same old question - tell me how to secure, that is the everlasting question of man.

Q: May be it is better to become a little more aware that we are living now and not yesterday or last year.

K: It may be better to be aware that we are living now than live in the past or in the future.

Q: Because a lot of our attention, I don't know how much percentage is taken away, when we live in the past or dreaming of the future.

K: Can you live in the present? Which means living a life that has no time.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking you, sir, can one live in the present - to live in the present there must be no time, no past, no future, no success, no ambition. Can you do it?

Q: Just a bit. (laughter) The very process to build something, let's say a house, supposes a programme.

K: Of course, sir - look at it. To build a house you must have an architect. And architect makes a design, a plan and according to that plan the contractor builds. In the same way, we want a plan. You are the architect, give me the plan and I will function according to that plan.

Q: I wasn't saying this, we want to build a house which is concrete thing, we must plan certain things.

K: So you use thought.

Q: So we cannot live only in the present.

K: I never said that, sir. When you look at this question really, carefully, you will never ask the question, how am I to live in the present, to build a plan, if you see this very clearly, you will find that, if this is very clear, the nature and the structure of thought, then you will find that you can function from a state of mind that is always free from all thought and yet use thought. That is real meditation, sir, not all the phoney stuff. That is, the mind that is so crowded now with the known, which is the product of thought, the mind which is filled with the past, knowledge, experience, memory, which is part of the brain, the whole of that is filled with the known. I may translate the known in terms of the future or in terms of the present but it is always from the known. It is this known that divides: knowing the past, I don't know, I shall know. This past, with all its reservoir of memory says, do this, don't do that, this will give you certainty, that will give you uncertainty.

So when this whole mind, including the brain, is empty of the known, then you will use the known when it is necessary, but functioning always from the unknown, from the mind that is free of the known. Sir, this happens, sir, its not so difficult as it sounds. You have a problem, you think about it for a day or two, you go over it, you mull, you chew over it and get tired if it, you don't know what to do, you go to sleep. The next morning if you are sensitive you have found the answer. See, that is, you have tried to answer this problem in terms of the known, in terms of what is beneficial, what is successful, what will bring you certainty, what will keep you going - in terms of the known, which is thought. And when after using all the exercising thought, thought says, for god's sake, I'm tired. And next morning you've found the answer. That is you have exercised the mind, thought to its fullest extent, and dropped it. Then you see something totally new. But if you keep on exercising thought all the time, conclusion after conclusion, which is the known, then obviously you never see anything new.

And this demands a tremendous inward awareness, inward sense of order, not disorder, order. If you haven't got that you can whistle all day long.

Q: Is it not a method of procedure?

K: Is it not a matter of procedure, is it not a method of procedure? Look sir, - I get up, walk few steps, take a few steps and go down the steps, is that a method of procedure? I just get up and do it naturally, I don't invent first a method and follow it, I see it. Oh Lord, you can't reduce everything into method.

Q: Can you ever empty the storehouse of impressions which you have had?

K: Can you ever empty the mind of all the known, which is the past. You've put a wrong question, it is a wrong question, because you say, can you ever - who is the 'you' and what do you mean by 'ever'? Which means, is it possible. Sirs, look, we never put the impossible question - we are always putting the question, what is possible. If you put an impossible question your mind then has to find the answer in terms of the impossible, not what is possible. All the great discoveries, scientific discoveries, are based on this, the impossible. It was impossible to go to the moon. Or if you say, it is possible, then you drop it. Because it was impossible, therefore they put their mind to it and 300,000 people worked at it, co-operating, working night and day, competing with each other, Russia-they put their mind to it, and went to the moon. But we never put the impossible question - the impossible question is this, can the mind empty itself of the known - itself, not you empty the mind. That is an impossible question. If you put it with tremendous earnestness, seriousness, with passion, you'll find out. But if you say, oh, it is possible then you are stuck.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH AUGUST 1970

Do you think a special meeting, or gathering like this, is necessary for the young people?

Audience: Yes.

K: I said fortunately, or unfortunately, that we would have a couple of discussions in which the young people could take the greater share. Aren't they now taking the greater share in the discussions than the older generation like us? So do you think you need a special one? A special one - you know what that means? Younger people sitting in front and the older ones behind, that's all. Let's see how things go along and then we will decide. We have got Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, four more discussions and we'll see.

Shall we go on with what we were talking about yesterday? Or shall we approach this whole problem again from a totally different angle?

Could we talk over together, I know you may not like the word 'discipline', but order, substitute the word order instead of discipline, could we discuss this? Do you think it would be worthwhile? I know the young people don't like discipline, neither do I. But I think we should be able to discuss that and see where it will lead us. Shall we?

A: Yes

Q: Is discipline constraint?

K: Yes we are going to go into all that. First, do we want to discuss that, talk over together?

Q: Didn't you say somewhere, you once mentioned in one of the lectures, that we are doing two hours of exercises or something like that - is that for the body or for the awareness?

K: Wait. We are going into all that sir. First let us see, do you want to go into this question of order?

Q: Aren't there more important things?

K: Aren't there more important things? Such as what? Social activity?

Q: For instance.

K: For instance what? Social activity?

Q: Death.

K: Death. All right, you have your way. Death, social activity and what else?

Q: Boredom.

K: Boredom.

Q: What about responsibility?

K: Responsibility.

Q: Education.

K: Education. What do you think we have been doing during the last ten talks, but education? Now which do you want to take up - boredom, social service?

Q: Discipline.

K: Discipline, order. What sir?

Q: Prayer.

K: Prayer.

Q: Consciousness.

K: Consciousness.

Q: Death

K: Death

Q: Loneliness.

K: Loneliness. Now what shall we take among all those things that you have suggested that you think will be sufficiently important and will cover all the rest? Right? Social activity - shall we take that?

Q: No.

K: Oh!

Q: Boredom.

K: Because I tell you, if you take up one thing, like social service, social action, and somebody said responsibility, and if we go into it sufficiently thoroughly I think we will cover everything, every problem is interrelated with other problems. You cannot separate one problem and say, 'Let's discuss that'. They are all interrelated, aren't they? One is not more important than the other. It may appear to some social service, a revolution, a social activity, activists and so on, this or that, may seem important to one or two, but they look at it, I am afraid, as though it were an isolated problem by itself, not interrelated with every other problem. So please listen, there is not important problem first, every problem is important.

Q: I have the impression that we are always talking about the inward revolution, and we think a lot about that, and it seems to me awfully difficult to do any inward revolution, if you still remain in the same society.

K: Let's talk over that. If you remain in the same society, inward revolution seems terribly difficult, or practically impossible. Shall we discuss that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Right.

I think most of us want to change society, the structure, I think most intelligent people are aware of this fact. Right? We all agree to that, young and old and deaf and dumb and all the rest? All of us see the importance of a social revolution - a social - we may not use that word revolution, it may be too drastic, therefore we will use the word social change. Now how is this to be brought about? By physical revolution? Upsetting society as it is and creating a new society? Let us talk it over. See what is involved in it.

Q: I have the impression it is property and it is already violent. So changing society, even if it implies some violence will never be so violent as private property.

K: Private property, to the questioner, seems the very essence of violence. Without changing that, any form of change must be another revolution. He is saying physical property is the cause, is the real change, the changing of physical possessive property, real estate, earth, if you can change that then everything will be solved. All right sir, then how do you propose to do it? Give it all into the hands off the government? Let governments own it? Who will own it? A few people? Or many people? Or socialise it? Everybody owns it? All these experiments throughout history have been tried. Even in India there was a period, I was told, when everybody owned the land. How do you propose when you have property, a house, a piece of land, and I have mine, how do you propose to change it? I like to own my land.

Q: You should have the right to use it but not to possess it and sell it.

K: You should have the right to use it, not possess it and sell it.
How are you going to prevent this?

Q: Detachment.

K: Sir do consider it. I feel, having a house, a piece of land, my own, I feel safe, I identify myself with that - to me that is very important. To me that is life and death, it is something to own - wait sir, go slowly. I am not for or against. We are trying to find out what to do given certain things, what to do. How will you take it away from me? By law? By revolution? And if you do, we all of us land owners will get together and fight you. This has been going on for a million years - you follow sir?

Q: Yes sir. For instance in Russia they have a tremendous bureaucracy and it doesn't mean that no system could be invented, no natural system exists, it just means that this isn't that experience.

K: Yes sir.

Q: I'd like to quote someone, it's my father. And I think this is really a propos. He has always said that as long as there are group of people in the world there is always going to be the crafty people and the slow people. To him and it appears that way to me, that the crafty people are always going to want to take from the slow people.

K: How will you change this sir?

Q: There will obviously have to be a change in the people themselves.

Q: How will an inner revolution change this?

K: How will inner revolution change the outer structure of society? How will the inner revolution change the structure of outward structure? What do you think? To me owning property, or not owning property, is of very little importance. The riches are not in the house or in the land but somewhere else. I don't care. I am a beggar. I don't mind. What will you do if you are not a beggar, if you are attached to property, what will you do? You see we are discussing theoretically all this. No? What madame?

Q: I may be speaking for myself, but I can't help it, I resent this young man and the way he keeps leading us back to the social revolution. I feel you have something to tell us if only we would allow you to do it.

K: It is not a question of somebody interfering in what you want to hear from the speaker, but we are talking about this. Look - I see the world as it is, property, possessiveness, domination, power, bureaucracy reaching a state where they want to control everything, as is being done in Russia, and so on and so on. I see wars, I see everything around me, the division of people through religion, politics, through nationalism and so on and so on and so on. What shall I do? I see the necessity of a change. Right? There must be. I see this. I see that it is tremendously importance that human beings should change. Now where shall I begin, there or here? Or is it a combination of both? Not there first, or here first, but a movement that answers both questions, both the outer and the inner, so there is no division as the inner revolution and the outer revolution. It is a movement of constant change. Right? Of constantly freeing the mind from its own conditioning, from its own possessive demands, from its own self-centred activities, from its own pursuit of pleasure and pain and division and so on. Right? Now where shall I begin, inner or outer?

Q: Inner.

K: Now wait. Don't you see? When you say 'inner', you feel that the inner is disassociated from the outer. The inner is the result of the outer and the outer is the result of the inner. We have created this society. We have created through our ambition, through our greed, through our competitiveness, through our comparing, and so on and so on, demanding for power, position, prestige - we have created this society.

Q: We had established in another talk that we had been conditioned by the society, marked in our childhood. Isn't this necessary to make it so that other ones are not conditioned because otherwise...

K: Right. That means you have to begin helping the child, to educate the child in such a way that he is not conditioned from the very beginning, which means special schools.

Q: If he was still in the society, which means violence, he will be conditioned.

K: How will you change the society? Yes sir?

Q: Is it not possible to set up a commune?

K: Is it not possible to set up a commune - where a lot of people get together, pool their money, pool their children and educate them unconditionally? Is that it?

Q: Too fragmentary.

K: You see! You object to that.

Q: How can any kind of education not be conditioning?

K: How can education not be conditioning? Sir, look. Do you know what it means to be conditioned, what are the factors that go into being conditioned?

Q: You don't think any more of yourself if you are free of your conditioning.

Q: We are robots.

K: We are robots. We are so conditioned we think according to some authority and so on. Please sirs, do listen to this for two minutes before coming to any conclusion. Any intelligent man sees what is happening in the world, and he says to himself, what am I to do, I am a responsible human being, serious, what am I to do? Am I to join the outward revolutionists, the physical revolutionists - I am not talking about the Communists because they are driven by an idea, by bureaucracy, by a theory and all the rest of it, like the church people, the same thing repeated in a different pattern - what shall I do? Shall I join a revolutionary society, or shall I withdraw from the world, withdraw completely, and bring about a revolution in myself and thereby perhaps affect the outer? Right? Now what shall I do? There are these two alternatives: one to join in, and the other to withdraw. And perhaps in withdrawing I shall be able to understand more myself and help others to understand themselves and thereby perhaps bring about a physical revolution eventually. Now what shall I do? Is it so clear cut as that? Begin there, or being here? Or is it a total movement with which we are concerned. That and this moving together. You understand? Both the outer and inner moving together. Right sir. So there is no division as the inner and outer. Right? Because we have seen when you emphasize the outer it becomes bureaucratic, it becomes mechanical, it becomes inhuman, it becomes entirely materialistic. If you emphasize the other, which is the inner, then you withdraw completely.

Q: Also we must be very careful because for instance preferring the inward revolution could be also because we are very attached to the past and we like to keep our private property.

K: That's right. The inward revolution may imply that you are sticking on to your property, to your bank account, etc., etc., but talking about inward revolution. That's a cheap trick.

So let's begin. Let's start with this. Will you begin there or there. Or you see the effects of both and so you see that life is a unitary process, not a thing to be divided - the commissar and the yogi. It is a question of bringing the two together. Now can I do this? Can a human being do this? You and I, can we do this? - not emphasizing on that or this but moving, as the river does, taking all life together - all life being the outer and the inner? Now - right? Is that our problem?

Q: Yes

K: Now, don't say yes. If that is our problem, that we are trying - not trying - actively concerned in bringing about a harmonious action in which the outer and the inner is involved, in which the outer and the inner are completely together, not separate, so I will never talk about the inner and the outer, it is a movement. Right? Now, to do that, to live a harmonious life in which the two are operative together. Right sirs? Now can I, a human being, conditioned to property, conditioned to patriotism, conditioned to self-centred activity, so what shall I do? You answer me sirs, answer. Let's talk it over together. What shall I do? I am conditioned, in a culture, in a society which I and my great, great, great grandfathers created - what shall I do? Knowing that I am conditioned by the society, the culture, the religion in which I live, which we all together have created it, therefore society is me and me is society. Right? Right? Do you dispute that? I am the society - my great grandfather and all the rest of it created this and it has caught me, I am trapped in it, I am trapped in it as it has trapped me. So I am both that and this. So I can't separate myself from society and say 'I must change society' - I don't know if you see?

Q: Sir, say a man who is communist, he is living in a capitalist society, can he say also, 'I am the society'?

K: He can't. He can't

Q: In which case it is not true that he is the society.

K: No but sir, how will he change? Our concern is not that a man who is a communist living in a capitalist society, he cannot identify himself with the capitalist society, but look what has happened. He has identified himself with the communist society - wait sir, right? - and therefore he is acting in fragmentation - no?

Q: I would suggest if it is possible, not using the word 'Communist' because it's putting something in a category like saying black, or red.

K: Quite right sir. Let's leave all that. Let's leave the words communism, socialism - put it all out. Here is a simple fact that society is me and me is the society, there is not a division between me and society. After all if you are born in India you would all be thinking in a certain way, you would all be worshipping Krishna or some other bird and here you worship somebody else because you have been conditioned that way, that's all. So we are the result of the society in which we live, and that society has been brought about by us. Right? No?

Q: Not completely. It was there before we came.

K: You have been through this before. You have been through - now watch it sir. The society existed before I was born, my great etc., etc., created that society, I was born in it - I don't know why but I was born in it, instead of being born in this culture I was born in that culture - and what happens? I was educated in that culture, I accepted the conditioning of that culture knowingly or not knowingly. As I grew up I said 'How stupid every culture is, to be shaped by any culture', so you reject the whole thing. Do you?

Q: Yes

K: No, no. Don't so easily say, yes, madam. It sounds so silly.

Q: Sir to reject your own culture you make your own little culture.

K: No. No. You see you don't understand me. I see the human mind is shaped by the environment in which it lives - the Eskimo, the Pacific Islander, the Christian and so on, each one is conditioned by the environment in which he lives, the environment is all the rest of it - you know Catholic and all that. So a child being born in this culture is conditioned and he says, 'I am not responsible for this, I am conditioned by the culture in which I have lived'. His responsibility is to free himself from the culture in which he has been brought up.

Q: That has just been created by man, so change man.

K: Obviously. If I am born in a culture called the Hindu, and I see very definitely as I grow up, an educator, or uneducated as it happens with the person speaking, sees how he is conditioned by the various cultures and so on. He sees this whole structure of thinking, living, is conditioned and seeing how it is conditioned he puts it aside. So he is free of conditioning. Right?

Q: He has to be evolve.

K: No, no. You see you are bringing something in. He has to evolve. Evolve. He has to evolve. What does that mean? Take time?

Q: No, no.

K: Then?

Q: Free himself from certain beliefs which are not true.

K: Which means? Oh, be careful what you are saying. Free yourself from certain beliefs which are not true. We are talking about being free from all beliefs, not just true and false beliefs. No. You see you have not gone into this. You just make that statements, please listen.

Being born, educated for which one is not responsible, but you become responsible the moment you become aware that you are conditioned, and becoming aware that you are conditioned you finish it. Which means you are never conditioned.

Q: But you are free.

K: But you are free from all conditioning, you are awake. That is quite a different matter.

Q: There is still the past.

K: No sir. Now look. You are being brought up in a certain culture, and you observe the various other cultures throughout the world, each divided. Now you become aware of your conditioning - have you? And becoming aware of your conditioning it is your complete responsibility to see that you are free of it, otherwise you can't help society, otherwise you can't bring about a change. Are you doing that? Are you aware that you are conditioned, by the church, by wealth, by poverty, by the climate, by the food, by the clothes - you follow - you are conditioned. And you are aware and you become utterly responsible, which means that you have got to free yourself from it, otherwise you are not a human being, you are a fragment of this whole structure.

Q: I see my conditioning now, and I make a statement about that, I speak out about it. And then other people...

K: Wait sir. Look at it sir. First, are you aware, please watch it, this is really important, related to the question, what am I to do given all these facts - all the facts, not just your fact and my fact, all the facts that are observed - what am I to do? I have been conditioned as a child, I can't help it, by the parent, by the society, by the grandmother - you know, conditioned. And I don't know that I am conditioned, I grow up and I realize, watching all this around me, that I am conditioned; and my feeling is that I must change society. I can only change both the outer and the inner when I become utterly responsible for my conditioning and be free of it. Are you? Unless you are you cannot possibly help society - full stop. Don't let us talk about helping society.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: How can you bring about a revolution?

Q: How can you free them if they don't want to be freed?

K: I am not talking about the people who don't want to be free, who want to change society in a particular way, or change society in a communist way, or socialist or capitalist - I am not talking of such people at all. I am talking of those people who are here in this tent after ten days. I say to you, look if you really deeply fundamentally are earnest about bringing about a change in society you can only do it if you are aware that you are conditioned and you are free of that conditioning, otherwise don't talk about altering society. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, wait. I explained that sir. It is not your society - we are back.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do listen sir. I can't possibly change Mr Who.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No sir, it is not a slow process. Not a process of evolution.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look sir, I am not talking quickly, slowly at all. I am talking about something. I see this world as it is, and I am born in that society, and as I grow up I realize I am conditioned, and my responsibility is to completely free the mind from conditioning, and then only can I do something about society. Till that takes place I won't discuss, talk about changing society, it is meaningless.

So wait sir. I want to do this - you follow? I realize I am conditioned and I must change it completely, alter it, free the mind from it, the mind must free itself from it. Now the first question is - please follow it if you will - will it take time? That is slow, evolutionary process.

Q: The idea of time is part of my conditioning.

K: No sir. That's what I am pointing out to you. Part of your conditioning is to say it will take time.

Q: How can we determine that it is going to take time or not if we don't know what it is going to be?

K: I am going to show it too you sir. I ask myself, will it take time, I am conditioned, the mind must be free, the mind says it is conditioned, it must free itself - will it take time? Or, saying that it will take long, it will gradually be done, is part of my conditioning. Right? So I have to find out the truth of this matter, whether it is a matter of slow, gradual process or instant process.

Q: How can we know?

K: I am going to find out, I am going to learn. I am going to learn, sir, I don't know. Right?

Q: Is it possible to know if it is...

K: I am going to find out. You see you don't even look sir. I want to find out whether this conditioning of the mind, the mind having been conditioned, to free itself from that conditioning, will it take time, I want to learn, I want to find the truth of it. Right? Now what does that mean? Am I approaching this problem of freedom with a mind that is conditioned to time? Are you answering my question? Is your mind conditioned by time, that is, gradually I will do it? If it is conditioned to time, then become aware of it, aware of that conditioning and put it aside for the moment and find it. That is, listen sir, the mind is conditioned to time, that is, it is conditioned now and eventually, there, it will be unconditioned. The time, the interval between now and then is time. Right? No? Oh Lord, don't go to sleep, please sirs. This is not complicated. To reach from this seat to go to the other end takes time. Right? Many steps and so on. Now I am conditioned, the mind is conditioned, and to be free of that conditioning, will it take time? Time being freedom is over there and conditioned mind is here. Right? And it must do certain things in order to arrive there. Right? Now what happens? It is conditioned and it will be unconditioned then. What happens between the interval, between now and then? What takes place?

Q: Further conditioning.

K: Right. Further conditioning, further factors entering in, which distorts it, pulls you in that direction and then you are pulled back and go on. And so on. There is a constant movement, which is pushing you in different directions. This is so obvious. So that is involved. If you admit time that is involved. Right sir? Are you following all this? And if you admit time, which means division between now and then, who has created this division? I must find this out. Who has created this division?

Q: It's what you call the input and output.

K: No. No madam.

Q: The spirit against the matter.

K: There is not such thing as spirit and matter, both are one.

Q: For me there is.

K: Oh well that finishes it.

Q: It is the entity which wants the unconditioned state.

K: Of course sir. Psychosomatic, that is the interrelationship between the mind and the body is so well established, it is not good saying matter and spirit - we won't go into that. So the moment mind admits time, time becomes a danger - no? In that there is laziness, postponement, in that there is a division between here and there, and all that implies an entity which wants to reject this and get that. No? Right sir? So as long as this division in thought exists time must exist.

Q: But aren't we getting away from our original question?

K: Oh no, no. I haven't moved away from it at all. I am saying, I realize I am conditioned and my responsibility first is to unconditioned, because if I cannot uncondition, but act according to my conditioning, I make society more horrible than it is - which the politicians all over the world are doing. So I say my responsibility as a human being is to free the mind from conditioning. Now will it take time? I have not moved away from it. Will it take time? Or is it possible to change it instantly?

Q: Can you demonstrate what you do not understand?

K: I don't know what you mean.

Q: It needs time.

K: Sorry. Is this the first time you are listening to this madam? Is this the first time you are here?

Q: Yes.

K: I am so sorry. You see we are both of us using different language. so - we have spent ten days or more, or perhaps five years learning about each other, so please if you don't mind, most respectfully and politely, listen first and get into it and you may understand it.

Q: Sir until this morning I thought it must take time but now at the moment I think it can be done instantly and as a result of that I think your relationships change immediately with all those around you instantly, and then the world changes from a nucleus.

K: That's right. We must find out the truth of this matter - you follow? Whether time is necessary, or time is a danger. Or time is an impediment. We are conditioned by the society which says time is necessary. Right? Gradually old boy, not quickly! Right? And I say that may be wrong altogether, that may be my conditioning, therefore I must investigate, learn about it. And I see the moment time is allowed the enormous danger that exists in the interval between now and then, so seeing that I reject time - not reject, it has no meaning. So freedom may be there only I don't know how to look at it. I am going to find out how to look, I am going to learn. And I can only learn if I am not concerned with time - I don't know if you see this? If I don't say from here to there, which means this must be changed to that and therefore division, therefore time, therefore conflict. I have been through all that. You see sir unless you really understand the interrelationship of all this you will be lost.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, do you mean to say the generals, the admirals, politicians all over the world, are going to change by listening to you and me? Certainly not. What we are talking about is, if you are serious, if there is the real deep understanding that society must change, not according to any pattern, break away from the Judaism, the Christianity, calling yourself a Jew or Hindu, wiping away all that and therefore we are concerned with the unity of man. The unity of man is not through organizations - that may help later to organize - but in understanding how this conditioning divides people. There we are. Can you change, you, brought up in a particular culture, change your conditioning? Unless you change, please don't talk about changing society. It is a blasphemy. They all talk about changing society according to their pattern and therefore divide, divide, divide. That is what is happening - according to Marx, according to Jesus, according to somebody else. What we are concerned is to see that man, you and I who have been brought up in a conditioning, to be free of it, is this to be done instantly, or will it take time? For me, for this person speaking on this platform, change implies - look at the subtlety of it - change implies - a change comes about only when there is no motive. The moment you have a motive you are conditioned. If you can understand that! The moment you have a motive - make somebody happy, change society, bring about enlightenment, or seek enlightenment - the moment you have a motive, that very motive is the conditioning factor.

Q: Is it a motive to be responsible?

K: Is there a motive in responsibility? Are you saying that? Is there a motive in responsibility? If I feel I am responsible to you because I feel you should change, change according to my pattern, my philosophy, my understanding. Which is, I feel responsible then I have a motive.

Q: When I see I am conditioned you say I am responsible.

K: No. Responsible to be free of your conditioning. Not for somebody else's freedom. So I have to find out if I have a motive. Go on sirs, work with me and don't let me work by myself. Have I a motive in wanting to change society, in wanting to change myself? Obviously I have a motive, because I want to be free, I want to achieve enlightenment, I want to be - I want to impress others. God knows, a thousand reasons.

Q: Sir, because I can't be separated it is a very important problem because it is the only problem which is not fragmentary.

K: That's what I am showing to you.

Q: When you say you want to be free that implies a motive.

K: No I only use that - when I want to be free - as a way of talking - 'I want to be free' means again time. I am not talking - oh Lord, don't pick up a few words and throw it at me please. We are talking about the whole business of freedom and conditioning. It is not - I give it up!

Sirs, can we go on from there? That is, have you got a motive which is the factor of your conditioning? I have a motive and that motive says, change. And that motive is going to dictate what kind of change it must be, obviously. Look sir, I am ambitious and I have tried this, that, the other, hoping through that to achieve my ambition. And I have got on to one line and I say I am going to fulfil that, that's my motive. And according to that motive and that line I change, and I think I am being freed from my conditioning. I am not. Oh Lord, isn't that clear?

Q: Is there not a motive in unconditioning?

K: No sir. Is there not a motive in unconditioning? Is there? Look sir. Just let me answer that. You observe the sorrow, the misery of the world, what is going on - right? - not observe intellectually, verbally but actually see it. There is starvation, there are wars, the division between spirit and matter, you see all these divisions. Right? See it, feel it, you are involved in it. Right? And you realize that there must be a change, naturally. When I have got a tooth ache I can't keep on, I must go to the doctor to remove it, do something about it. There is a motive in that in an obvious sense, but I am talking of a deeper motive.

Q: Are you and I without motive in being here? Are we talking about motive and just being here?

K: Are we here without motive. I don't know, I can't tell you. Right madam?

Q: Can you start out thinking about a motive and as you think the motive becomes obvious or disappears?

K: Can you start out thinking about a motive.

Q: No, thinking about this question of motive.

K: Thinking about this question of motive, as you observe the motive becomes obvious or disappears. Sir, look, we are talking about not some other motive, but have you got a motive that says, change society. Right? Have you got a motive?

Q: Obviously.

K: Wait. Find out sir what that motive is.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You have a motive. All right. What is the motive?

Q: Is there any way of living at all by certain rules - why don't you change?

Q: It is obvious.

K: Are you acting according to the dictates of a motive? Sir, do go into this question a little bit. Are you acting according to the dictates of your motive? Or are you free from motive?

Q: I see the rules are wrong and I want to change them.

K: You see the rules are wrong. You want to change them. You, who are conditioned and therefore your changing those rules will bring about another set of rules according to your conditioning.

Q: I don't think it is so obvious. For instance, let's say there is traffic in the town and it isn't satisfactory, then the rules are wrong, so let's change them.

K: They are changing them sir.

Q: That's a practical problem.

K: Yes, that is a totally different problem. Aren't we going round and round in circles? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Of course not sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, please sir, could we stick to one thing and work it out together. Please just stick to one thing, which is this: you see the world as it is, you are part of the world, this chaos in the world has been brought about by human beings. Right sirs? And you are part of that human society. You realize this misery and confusion has been brought about by you as well as by another. Right? By your conditioning. Now how am I to change that conditioning? With that only we are discussing, nothing else. Now is it possible to change it instantly? Or will it take time? Now, just a minute, just a minute. Look at it this way. If you see the danger of any danger you act instantly, don't you - no? Don't you act instantly when you see some danger? Now do you see the danger, please listen, the danger of being conditioned? Do you really see the danger of being conditioned? If you see the danger as dangerous as meeting a wild animal, you will change instantly. But you refuse to see the danger.

Q: Excuse me for going back one step. But are there not some kind of social environments that make unconditioning more possible than others?

K: May be. But a future society may come into being which you are trying to help now, which will help your grandchildren to be less conditioned, but we are taking things as they are now, not a society in the future. Look sir. If you see your conditioning is a danger, a real danger not philosophical danger, a theoretical danger, intellectual danger, but a positive, direct danger to human well being, you are bound to change instantly. Now you don't see that. Why don't you? Right? Why don't you see the danger as you see the danger of an animal, wild animal, or house on fire, and equally see the danger of being conditioned?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, why don't you see? Don't explain. I'll tell you why you don't see it, why you don't see the danger, I'll give you ten explanations.

Q: If you saw it you wouldn't be conditioned.

K: Why don't you see it?

Q: I am afraid of something new.

K: No. Sir, are you afraid of something new when you meet a tiger? You act.

Q: The condition of conditioning is that it is unconscious.

K: Therefore find out. Are you conditioned, consciously, superficially conditioned or conditioned right through? You don't even enquire. Or you merely want to change society, the rules, this and that, you go back. Sir, please, go together.

Q: I am blind to the danger of conditioning.

K: You are blind to the danger of conditioning. Are you blind? Are you blind when your house is on fire?

Q: She means blindness to the conditioning is part of the conditioning.

K: Blindness is part of this conditioning. Blindness is part of this conditioning. Then what are you going to do? You can't have everything. You want to change society and you say I am blind to my conditioning, I don't know what to do and so you keep on repeating. It is just a theory.

Q: It is what is happening.

K: That's exactly my point. You talk about change of society, which you really don't mean at all. If you really mean change in society you have to go very deeply into this question of conditioning. Whether it is superficial conditioning or deep, conscious or hidden conditioning, you have to enquire, you have to learn, you don't apply, you don't pursue, what am I to do?

Q: Isn't the desire to change society an escape from ourselves?

K: Is not this desire to change society an escape from ourselves? How can it be an escape when you are part of the society? When you separate yourself from the society then you can say, 'I am escaping'. But if you realize you are part of it then there is no escape. Sir, look: one is conditioned. I want to find out if it is a superficial conditioning or a deep conditioning because as long as the mind is conditioned any enquiry into change has no meaning whatsoever. If we agree on that, see the truth of that, then we can proceed. Which is, I want to find out whether it's superficial conditioning or deep conditioning. Now what is the instrument - please listen quietly - what is the instrument which you are going to use to enquire? You understand? If it is the old instrument of analysis it has no value. Right? We have been through that. So are you enquiring through the old instrument of analysis? Are you? Or, are you looking without analysis? Which is it you are doing? Are you looking with analytical eyes, or are you looking, merely observing? You must find this out because part of our conditioning is the analytical process, and if you proceed with the analytical process your enquiry will be conditioned enquiry. If it is not then you are merely observing without the analyser therefore it is totally different perception.

Q: Sir, as soon as I ask myself a question that implies analysis, doesn't it?

K: No, no, sir. Move from there. Analysis - we explained what analysis means. There is an analyser and the thing to be analysed.

Q: As soon as I ask a question there is a division between...

K: No, no I ask a question. Sir, I ask a question not from an intellectual point of view, not from a verbal point of view, the mind says it is wanting to find out the truth of something, it is not an intellectual enquiry, it is not an analytical thing. I hope you are as hot as I am!

Q: But there is a division, isn't there?

K; No. Sir, I ask. That is why I said to you, what is the motive in your asking. If there is a motive in your asking then that motive is going to dictate your observation, analytically or non-analytically.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I am not - one is not responsible for anything except one's conditioning. As long as you are not aware of your conditioning and try to be responsible for another then it becomes a monstrous fight, a conflict, a possessive demand, a dominance and all the rest of it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: So you are saying, you don't see the danger of conditioning because it is not immediate. Is that it sir? You are saying you don't see the danger of conditioning because it is not immediate, it is not active, it is not something that really disturbs you.

Q: It is not right here.

K: Yes, that's what we are saying. Why isn't it?

Q: Sir, isn't also that people want to change their conditioning because they have notions of security.

K: Yes sir, therefore I have to find out what security means. Is there security for a man who is conditioned? Find out sir. Look, I am conditioned as a Jew, is there security for me?

Q: You mean whether he is privileged or not?

K: No, no. Born as a Hindu, live in that cage, think traditionally, I say 'I must have security' therefore I fight the Muslim.

So as long as I am conditioned in nationalism, or any other division, fragmentation, security is not possible. Look you have had two wars.

Q: Yes, sir, that's true. But it's not the problem because people feel secure in nationality, feel secure in their private property, feel secure in their...

K: Do you, who have been listening here, sitting here, hour after hour for ten days, feel secure in nationality?

Q: I don't say we do.

K: Do you? I am asking you. Secure in your belief, in your conclusion, in your hope, in your aggression? Do you? Don't talk about others. You started out this morning wanting to help society, change society, and you see you really don't mean it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. It repeats itself because we are conditioned by a new conditioning. Before it was Capitalism, then later on Marx, Lenin and so on, we are conditioned by this or that, and we are talking about all conditioning.

Q: It is not possible.

K: Look, if you say it is not possible for a human mind to be free from conditioning, then we can deal with that in a different manner; but the moment you admit the possibility of it, which means a tremendous thing, then you are altogether thinking differently. If you say it is not possible then let us decorate the cages we live in - right? - hang up pictures of this or that, make lovely things of our cages, our traps. If that is all you want I am afraid I won't play that game with you.

Q: I am puzzled by your approach to motive. Is motive and attachment the same thing?

K: Yes sir.

Q: Sir, you asked the question: why don't you see the danger as really as a physical danger. What makes one really ask such a question?

K: I am asking it. I am asking. Apparently you don't face it. Apparently it is not a danger to you. It is not a danger to the young or to the old.

Q: But if we see there is no security in nationalism, people think there is security there...

K: But sir, nationality is such superficial rubbish. You can put that aside very quickly but there are much depending conditioning like conformity. Go into it sir. Find out how you conform. Therefore find out whether you are conforming and you will find out only when conformity becomes a tremendous danger. And that makes you conform to the society in which you live, or change that society in order to conform to another pattern of society. Therefore the enquiry into conditioning implies not only superficial conditioning as nationalism, but the most fundamental conditioning like acquisitiveness, like competitiveness, comparison, conformity, find out. Put your teeth into it and find out. If you have that - conforming, acquisitive, wanting to dominate, changing this society, to something else, has no meaning.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You may say what you like sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, we are asking: are you aware of your conditioning? - Not somebody else's. Don't give me explanations, theories. Are you aware that you are conditioned? Are you aware that you are conditioned as a Dutchman? As a Jew? As a Hindu? And if you do something as a Hindu your action will be conditioned, therefore destructive. If you do something as a Dutchman, it will be equally destructive, or a Jew. You may write about all the goodness of the world but if you are at heart a Jew, conditioned, your action will be destructive and bringing misery.

Q: But if you just have god and nothing else, no creed, and nothing else, just god, you take away god and what do you give for that?

K: If you take away god what do you put in its place? Freedom from fear.

Q: What do you give back in return?

K: I am telling you madam. Freedom from fear needs no belief. We have our gods as yours and the Hindus, the Muslims and the communists, have their gods because they are all frightened.

Q: Don't you believe in spiritual powers?

K: Don't you believe in spiritual powers. Sirs this becomes... Sirs, life - please do listen - the mysteries that we invent are rather silly but there are tremendous mysteries if we can free the mind from its conditioning. You will find out the greatest mystery, and the beauty of that mystery.

Q: Can one be aware of conditioning as long as they are subconscious?

K: Right, right. How can one be aware of the unconscious conditioning? Do you really want to go into this?

Q: Yes.

K: Now sir, just a minute. Do you really want to go into this so deeply that it means that you will completely expose all your unconscious beliefs, dogmas, traditions, dreams, hopes. Right?

Q: Yes.

Q: It is better to ask why we can't see the danger.

K: All right I am going to go into it. What is the time? We had better stop. Shall we pick it up tomorrow?

(Various comments from the audience)

K: I will do it tomorrow, sir.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 7TH AUGUST 1970

We are going to talk over together this morning what lies below the conscious. I do not know if you have thought about it at all, or enquired into it, or have merely accepted what the analysts and the psychologists have said, but if you have gone into it fairly deeply, and I hope we shall this morning, one or two major fundamental questions have to be asked, not according to what others have said, but for oneself. One has to discover, explore, learn for oneself, the whole content of consciousness. Why one divides the unconscious and the conscious at all. Why there is this division. Is it an artificial division brought about by the analysts, the psychologists, the philosophers, or is there a division at all? And if one is to enquire into the whole structure and the nature of consciousness, who is it that is going to enquire? A fragment of the many fragments? Or is there an entity, an agency, that is beyond all this consciousness which looks into consciousness? And can the conscious mind, the daily operative mind, can that mind observe into the contents of the unconscious, or deeper layers? And what are the frontiers of consciousness? What are the limits? I hope you'll remember these questions - I have forgotten them already! Please do remember it and tell me afterwards as we go along.

You know this is a very, very serious subject. In the understanding of which I think most human problems will be resolved. It isn't a thing that you pick up, take as a hobby, spend a few hours or a couple of weeks and just study superficially and drop it and go on with your daily whatever life that is. If one is to go into this very deeply, it is a way of life, it is not that you understand that and leave it there. You can only understand the whole content of consciousness and the limits of consciousness if it is a daily concern. It isn't a thing you kind of play with. It must be your whole life, your whole calling, your vocation, because we are enquiring into the very depths of the human mind, not according to your opinion, or the speaker's opinion, but learning the fullness of it and see what lies beyond it, not just scratch on the surface and think you have understood it. It isn't a thing that you learn from a book, or from another. Please do let us realize this: it isn't a thing that you acquire as knowledge from books and then apply it. Then if you do, it will have no value, it will be secondhand. And if you merely treat it as a form of entertainment, intellectual, spiritual, emotional, it will equally have no effect at all in your life. And we are concerned with the fundamental revolution of the mind, of the whole structure of oneself, the freeing - for the mind to free itself of all its conditioning, so that we are mature human beings, not educated, sophisticated human beings but real human, mature, deep human beings.

So, we are going to learn together this morning if we can, what is below the conscious, the layers, and seeing the many layers or one layer, or many layers, then to discover for oneself the content of consciousness, whether that content makes up the conscious or the conscious with its frontier contains 'what is'. You are understanding this? Does the content of the consciousness make up consciousness - the content? You follow? Or, in the content all these things exist? See the difference? I am just investigating, you follow? I am moving slowly so please let us travel together. Don't ask me afterwards 'please repeat what you said' - I can't. So first: why is there this division between the conscious and the so-called unconscious or the deeper layers, why is there this division? Are you aware of this division? Or does this division exist because we have got so many divisions in our life? Which is it? Is it a separate movement, conscious movement and the deeper layers with their own movement? Or this whole thing a movement, undivided? Please sirs this is very important for us to find out because we have trained the conscious mind, we have drilled it, educated it, forced it, shaped it, according to the demands of society, or according to our own impulses, our own aggression and so on. And are the deeper layers uneducated? You follow? We have educated the superficial layers and are we educating the deeper layer? Are you following all this? Or the deeper layers are utterly untouched and only we have cultivated the superficial layer? What do you say? Please this is not a talk by me. What do you say? Because in the deeper layers may be the source of finding out new things, because the superficial layers have become mechanical, are conditioned, repetitive, imitative and there you can't - it is so mechanical there is nothing. It is not free to find out, to move, to fly - you follow? Take to the wing. And the deeper not being educated, unsophisticated, therefore extraordinarily primitive, primitive, not savage, primitive, there may be the source of all new things. Please is this all too difficult?

I do not know what you feel, what you have discovered. Is the superficial mind so heavily conditioned that it has become mechanical? If I am a Hindu I function as a Hindu, or a Jew, or a Christian, whatever it is, the superficial is so heavily laden - I function on that line, And below that layer which education hasn't touched, or has it touched, and therefore the whole content of consciousness is mechanical - you are following? Conditioned, heavily burdened by all the past, by all the etc., etc. Now sir, I'll keep quiet and you proceed.

Q: Sir, how can we know about our unconscious?

K: How can we know about the unconscious? All right sir, let's begin.

When we use the word 'know', what do we mean by that? No please I am not being merely verbal or superficial - you follow? We must move into this very, very carefully. What do you mean when you say 'I want to know'?

Q: I haven't any experience.

K: Keep to that one word, go into it, don't introduce other words. What do you mean by that word 'know'? When you use that word 'I know', what does that mean, 'I know'? 'I know something that has happened yesterday'. All knowledge is the past - isn't it? Don't agree please, just see. I know you because I met you yesterday. I didn't meet the whole of you, I only met you when you said something, therefore knowing implies a time, time - in the period of time. Right? So knowledge implies always the past, when I say 'I know that is an aeroplane flying' - you follow? - though the flying is at the moment the knowledge that it is an aeroplane is the past. So how can I not know - how can this mind, the superficial mind, learn about the deeper layer. Right? Are we moving together? Now how can you know? How can that superficial mind learn about the other?

Q: Keep the superficial mind still then it can learn about the deeper levels.

K: When the superficial mind is still then only you learn, there is a learning of the deeper layers. And what is there to learn in the deeper layers? You assume there is something to learn - wait, wait. Please go slowly. Sir, are you actually aware of the operations of the conscious mind? Are you? How it is ticking over? What are its responses? Please do listen to all this. Do you - is there an awareness of the conscious mind? Find out how extraordinarily difficult this is, not difficult, you have to watch this thing so very closely, the mind has to watch this entire movement very, very closely. Why you say there is the unconscious and there are many things in it. Right? That's what all the professionals say, the specialists - are there? The moment you divide the conscious and the deeper layers then the question arises: how is this superficial mind to enquire into the other? Right? Are you following this? And if there is no division at all it is a total movement, a total movement of which one is only aware of a fragmentary movement. And this fragmentary movement asks: what are the contents of the unconsciousness? You are following all this? If it is a total movement you won't ask this question. Is the speaker making this clear? Be quite sure. Not verbally but actually. The moment you divide consciousness into fragments, one fragment says, what is the rest of the fragment, what are the rest of the fragments. But if it is a total movement then there is no fragmentation, therefore the question doesn't arise. This is really important to find out, then you go beyond all the specialists.

Now do you see consciousness as a whole, or do you see with one fragment examining the other fragments? This requires - you follow sir? What do you do? Do you see it partially or wholly, as a total movement, like a river that is moving? You can dig a ditch on the bank and call it the river, it isn't, it is a whole movement, the river. Right. Then what is this movement? How is one to observe this movement without a fragmentation?

Q: May I say something please? You speak about an unconsciousness mind, but please you cannot speak about something which is not, but how can you speak about something which is not conscious. We can speak about the conscious. Please define unconscious and conscious.

K: Look sir.

Q: The question is: are do we know the unconscious?

K: We asked this question earlier: are we aware of the frontiers of consciousness? Or, are we aware of the many fragments that compose the conscious? One fragment becoming aware of the many other fragments? Or are you aware of the total movement of consciousness without any division?

Q: Both ways are conscious. Intellectually I answer, why divide them?

K: What sir? What sir?

Q: Intellectually.

K: Please, we are not analysing. We have gone into that very carefully. We are not analysing. When there is analysis there is the analyser and the thing analysed. One fragment assuming the authority of analysis and examining the other parts. And in this division arises the conscious and the unconscious, then we put the question: can the conscious mind examine the unconscious? - which implies that the conscious mind is separate from the rest.

And we say from that false question you can answer this through dreams, through various forms of intimation, hints - all arising from a false assumption that the superficial mind is separate from the other, which means we have never seen or felt or learnt about the whole movement of consciousness as a whole. If you do, this question doesn't arise at all. I don't know if you see this?

Q: Obviously some people are suffering from neurosis without knowing the origin of their neurosis - isn't that the unconscious?

K: Some people suffer from neurosis, isn't that the outcome from the unconscious? Do you suffer from any neurosis? Do you? Does it mean that you are all free from all neurosis? Please this is not a silly question. Are you aware that you are neurotic in some form or another?

Q: Who is deciding if one is neurotic?

K: Who is to decide if one is neurotic? Don't you know when you are neurotic? Has somebody to tell you that you are neurotic? Do please listen to this. When there is any exaggeration of any fragment, of any fragment, then neurosis takes place. Right? When you are highly intellectual, that is a form of neurosis, though the highly intellectual is highly regarded. The person who holds on to certain beliefs - Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, Communist, this or that, any attachment to any belief is a form of neurosis. Wait sir, look at it, look at it. Go slowly. Wait, hold on to your question. Any fear is a form of neurosis, any conformity is a form of neurosis - you follow? And any form of comparing yourself with something else is neurosis. Aren't you doing all this?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes sir. Therefore you are neurotic. (Laughter) No, no, please sir, this is very serious.

So, any fragment - please we have learned something from this - any exaggeration of any fragment of which the whole consciousness as we see it, which contains many fragments, any emphasis on any fragment is a form of neurosis. Wait sir, get it into your hearts, feel it. Move, take time, apply it sir, get involved in it, apply it to yourself and you will see for yourself the next question. As we are, as we have accepted, we have divided consciousness. In this division there are many, many fragmentations, the intellectual, psycho-neurotics - you follow? - many, many divisions and any division, an emphasis on that division is neurotic, which means that a mind emphasizing a fragment cannot see clearly. Therefore the emphasis of a fragment brings about confusion. Get all this sir. Please sir, one moment, please just a minute sir. I am going to ask you, please go with this. See yourself whether in you there is not a fragmentation, and that fragmentation laying emphasis on one, on its issue, on its problem, and disregarding the rest of the other fragments, leads not only to conflict, but to great confusion because each demands an expression, each demands an emphasis and when you emphasize the one the others are clamouring. And this clamour is confusion and out of that confusion every form of desire to fulfil, to become, to achieve, all are neurotic impulses.

Yes sir?

Q: But also, for instance, neurosis can also be to suffer from something and you don't know really what you are suffering from. For instance, somebody doesn't dare to go through a Square and it is obviously not the Square that he is frightened of but something in the unconscious.

K: Sir, I understand. I don't know what this lady is troubled about - what are you troubled about madam?

Q: It was forbidden to take photographs.

K: I don't know. For god's sake! Listen!

Look this is terribly serious stuff. One is aware that one is neurotic. You are afraid to cross the Square, you are afraid to let go your past, you are afraid to be non-Hindu, non-Jew, non-Christian, this or that, and how are you to know that you are neurotic? Is that the question sir?

Q: Not really.

K: Then what is the question sir?

Q: Sometimes you suffer from something, obviously the thing you suffer from is not the real reason. For instance, you don't dare to go through a Square or you don't dare to be alone, it is not the fact itself but it is something, they say, in the unconscious itself which gives you the fear.

K: Yes. Now wait a minute. The neurosis is only a symptom, the cause is in the unconscious.

Q: Could be.

K: Could be. Obviously could be and probably is. Then what is the question?

Q: It's neurosis.

K: Sir you are not following the whole. Then when we have understood this whole structure then we can go to the particular, but to start with the particular we'll end nowhere. Please see that sir. Do you see that any emphasis on the fragment is a form of neurosis? - intellectual, emotional, devotional, physical, psychosomatic, you follow? And as most of us have laid stress on one aspect of the many fragments, naturally out of that exaggeration, out of that disharmony, other factors of disharmony arise, which is: 'I can't cross a street, or a Square in the dark, I am frightened', and the explanation of that is my childhood, my past, my mother didn't treat me properly. Now our question is, not why I can't cross the Square - which I will answer without going to the analyst. If I understand the fragmentation of consciousness, the moment I have understood that then the problem of crossing the Square doesn't exist at all. Right? Are we meeting each other? When we see the totality, the immensity, the greater, the lesser disappears. But if we keep on emphasizing the little, then the little brings about its own little problem. Right?

Q: But when you talk about seeing the totality of consciousness, what does the 'see' mean because I am thinking sometimes I know something and I know how I resent this, when you know something you don't know how you know it.

K: No sir, just look. Do you listen to that movement of that river totally? Just do it sir. Don't speculate. Listen to that river, stream, and find out if you are listening completely, without any movement in any direction, only there. Then what do you say, when having listened, what do you say?

Q: I...

K: You see you are all too ready with the answers.

Q: Recognition plays no part in it.

K: That's right sir. Recognition plays no part in it, you don't say, 'That is the stream to which I am listening' or you as an entity listening to the stream, there is only the listening to the sound. You don't say, 'I know it is a river'.

So let's go back. I want to go into this so much, please let's move together.

Q: Isn't the emphasis on fragmentation the essence of neurosis, or is it the symptoms of neurosis?

K: No it is the very essence and the symptoms.

Q: Being intellectual is the essence as well as the symptom?

K: Isn't it? Look sir. I emphasize my intellectual capacity. Right? I think it is marvellous, I can beat everybody at argument, I have read so much, I can correlate all that I have read, and write marvellously clever, intellectual books - isn't that the very cause and the symptom of my neurosis?

Q: It seems to be a symptom of our...

K: Wait. Is it? Or is it, you are saying that is a symptom not the cause, I say, let's look. Is the mind, the whole stuff, undivided and therefore the cause and the effect are the same?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no sir. Don't translate yet sir. See it. Look sir. Cause and effect: what was the cause becomes the effect, and the effect becomes the cause of the next movement, there is no definite demarcation or line between cause and effect, what was cause yesterday has become the effect, the effect of today becomes the cause of tomorrow. It is a movement, it is a chain.

Q: But isn't it essential to see this whole process rather than just...

K: That's what we are doing and that is not possible if you emphasize the intellectual, the emotional, the physical, the psychosomatic, the spiritual, god, no-god and so on and so on. Right?

So my question is, which was the first question: why is it that we have divided? Is it artificial, necessary, or just the invention of the specialist, to which we have become a slave, which we have accepted, as we accept most things so easily, we say, 'All right, great people say this and I swallow it and I repeat it'. But when we see the fragmentation and the emphasis on the fragmentation and we see out of that arises the whole casual/effect chain, and that is a form of neurosis, when we see all that then the mind sees the totality of the movement without division. Well sir, do you see it? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, if you identify yourself - the questioner says no identification - if you identify yourself with any one of the fragments obviously it is the same process, which is the process of being identified with the one and disregarding the rest, is a form of neurosis, contradiction. Can you - no, put the next question sir. Can you identify yourself with the rest of the fragments? You, another fragment, identify with the many other fragments. You see the trick we are playing, this question of identification? You understand what I am talking about?

Q: No.

K: Oh my Lord!

Q: You can only say that identification with one fragment because you feel that you are incomplete so that...

K: That's right. You feel you are incomplete therefore you try to identify yourself with many other fragments. Now who is the entity that is trying to identify itself with the many? It is one of the fragments, therefore it is a trick - you follow? And we are doing this. I must identify myself.

Q: Isn't it better to identify yourself with more fragments than with one.

K: Not better. No, not better. Look sir. Look, first let me explain again once. There are many fragments - right? - of which I am. One of the fragments says, it brings about confusion when I identify myself with one fragment therefore I'll identify myself with the many other fragments. Right? And it makes a tremendous effort in identifying itself with the many fragments, with the Christians, with the Hindu, with the Buddhist, with the Communist, you follow? Who is this entity that tries to identify itself with the other fragments? It is also a fragment isn't it? Therefore it is a game it is playing by itself. It is simple.

Now let's proceed, there is so much in this, you are just remaining on the very surface of all this.

Now we see there is not actual division at all. Right? Non-verbally, see it, feel it, that the observer is a fragment which separates itself from the rest of the fragments and is observing. In that observation as the observer and observed there is a division, there is conflict, there is confusion. Now if when the mind realizes this fragmentation and the futility of its separating, then it sees the movement as a whole. Now do you do this? If you cannot do this you cannot possibly put the next question, which is: what is beyond the conscious? What is below, above, side, it doesn't matter. So we have to find out, if you are serious, what is consciousness and when are you aware that you are conscious. When are you aware that you are conscious? You understand my question? We are asking - I am doing all the work, too bad! Sir look, you have to learn about all this and when you learn you help others to learn - you follow? So learn now for god's sake - you follow? That is your vocation.

So we are looking into the unconscious, we are asking what is this thing called consciousness? And when am I, when is the mind aware that it is conscious - you follow? When do you say, 'I am conscious'?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Come nearer.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What do you mean, let's come closer? Begin nearer. You begin too far away from me.

Q: In meditation.

K: Sir, just listen. When are you at all aware that you are conscious? Wait sir. What? Is this so difficult as all that?

Q: When there is pain.

K: The lady suggests you are conscious when there is pain, when there is conflict, when you have a problem. Right? When you are resisting, otherwise if you are flowing smoothly, evenly, harmoniously living without any contradiction, are you conscious at all? Are you conscious sir when you are supremely happy?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes?

Q: What does that word mean, being conscious?

K: Wait, you'll find out. You don't have to ask me you'll find out. The moment you are conscious that you are happy, is happiness there? The moment you say, 'My god how joyous I am' - can you ever say that? If you say it, it has already moved away from you.

Q: Well you are then conscious of that.

K: Which is the past. So you are only conscious of something that has happened, or actually conscious when there is some conflict, pain, when there is actually awareness that you are confused. Right? So any disturbance in this movement is to be conscious. And all our life is a disturbance against which we are resisting.

Q: Sir when there is a feeling of loneliness and when the mind does not interfere, isn't the mind whole in that state?

K: No, no madame, no please do listen to what I am saying. Do please listen, don't take a particular example just now. We are talking over together what it means to be conscious, to be aware, to be apprehensive in the sense, I apprehend, I see. If there is no discord at all in life would you say, 'I am conscious'? When you are walking - you follow sir? - moving, living without any friction, without any resistance, without any battle, there is no - you are not saying 'I am'. Right? It is only when you are saying, 'I will become' or 'I am being', then you are conscious.

Q: Well the being never comes.

K: No, no. Do take a little time sir, you are too quick. Move into this very slowly, you will find out something extraordinary, you go into it.

Q: Isn't this state that you are talking about still a process of identification, say, of the tree, of the...

K: No, no, no. You see you are - I explained sir, identification. Of course when I see a tree, I see a tree I don't mistake it for a woman, or for the church, it is a tree, which doesn't mean identification. Look sir, we have discovered something, we have learned something, there is consciousness only when there is becoming, or trying to be. Becoming implies conflict, 'I will be', which means conflict exists as long as the mind is caught in the verb 'to be' - please see that. And our whole culture is based on that word 'to be'. 'I will be a success', 'I am a failure', 'I must achieve', 'This book is mine, it is going to change the world'. You follow? So as long as there is a movement of becoming, in that there is conflict and that conflict makes the mind aware that it is conscious. Or the mind that says, 'I must be', be good, not I will be good, be good. Then also it is a form of resistance, being good being and becoming are the same. My golly!

Q: Can one be conscious of conflict?

K: Of course sir, otherwise you wouldn't be conscious.

Q: Can't you be so caught up in conflict that you don't see that you are in conflict?

K: Of course, it is a form of neurosis.

Q: Well I can't see how...

K: Sir, look. Have you ever been to a mental hospital, any of you? I wasn't there as a patient, I was there, taken by an analyst, and every patient from the top floor down to the lowest, the top floor where they are the most violent, caged in, down to the lowest where they are more or less peaceful, are all in conflict, all of them are in conflict, which was exaggerated conflict - you understand? One person was thinking that he was something or other, fighting everybody, only they are inside the building and we are outside. That's all. (Laughter)

Q: I don't see how we can...

K: No, no. You don't listen, you hold on to your particular question and don't listen to the whole. Let go yours sir, come. We'll answer. What is your question sir?

Q: I am trying to distinguish between consciousness and awareness.

K: Both the same. Being aware implies aware of division, to be aware without division and choice is to be not caught in the movement of becoming or being - got it?

I don't know what I said, don't ask me to repeat it. Have you got it? Sir, Look! The whole movement of consciousness is becoming and being. Right? Right? No, don't say you don't understand. The whole movement of consciousness is either to become, or to be. Becoming famous, becoming a social worker, helping the world - you know - becoming, or to be. That is, after looking at this whole fragmentation, after looking at this movement as a whole as consciousness, you find that this whole movement is based on that, too become, or to be. Right? You have learned it sir, not agreeing with me. Then you ask a totally different question, which is: what is beyond this movement of becoming and to be? You are not asking the question, I am asking unfortunately. You understand my question sir? I have realized in looking at all this business of consciousness both from the analytical point of view, from the analyst and psychologist and philosopher, and from the point of view of the religious man with his god and non-god, the believer and the non-believer, the atheist and the believer, looking at all this fragmentation of life, the Hindu, the Buddhist, the black, the white, the pink and the whatever - follow? - division, division, division - that division has been created through becoming, or to be. Right? I want to be a Hindu because it promises me not only physical success but spiritual achievements. If I reject that I say to myself, I must be, - I must be, I don't know what! but I am going to be, myself, identify myself with myself - again the same process. Right? So I see, observe, this total movement of consciousness is this movement to be, or to become, or not to be, or not to become. Right? Now how do I see this? Do I see it as something outside myself, or do I see it without the centre as the 'me' that is observing the becoming and the not becoming? You have understood my question? No I don't think so.

I realize, I am using the word 'I', realize that all consciousness is this movement. Right? I realize it. When I say 'I realize it' am I realizing it as something I have seen outside of me, looking at a picture outside of me hanging on the wall, spread out before me, or do I see this movement as part of me? Is the very essence of me? Do I see this movement from a centre - you are following all this? - or do I see it without the centre? If I see it as the centre, from a centre, that centre is the self, is the 'me', who is the very essence of fragmentation, and therefore when there is an observation from the centre I am only observing this movement as a fragment, as something outside of me, which I must understand, which I must try to grasp, which I must struggle with and all the rest. But if there is no centre, which means there is no me but merely observing this whole movement, then that observation will lead to the next question. So which is it you are doing?

Please this is not a group therapy, this is not a weekend entertainment, this isn't a thing you go to, to learn from somebody how to become sensitive, how to learn creative living - put all that bilge aside. This is hard work, this requires deep enquiry, learning. Now how are you observing? Because if you don't understand this, life becomes a torture, a battlefield. In that battlefield you want to improve the cannons, you want to bring about brotherhood and keep your isolation to yourself - we have played this game for so long, therefore you have to answer this question if you are really profoundly serious. Are you watching this whole movement of consciousness, as we have seen it, as an outsider watching, unrelated to that which he is watching, or, there is not centre at all from which you are watching? And when you do watch that way what takes place?

May we side step a little? I don't know what time it is. What time is it sir?

Q: Twenty to twelve.

K: Gosh how time goes! You see, all of you dream a great deal, don't you? Have you ever asked why? Not what dreams tell you, how to interpret dreams, that is a irrelevant question which we'll answer presently. But have you ever asked a relevant question, which is: why you dream at all?

Q: Because we are in conflict?

K: No, sir. Don't be so quick. Look at it. Why do you dream? The next question is: is there a sleep without any dream at all? Don't say 'Yes' sir. First of all you all dream, what are those dreams, why do you dream? Dreams as we said the other day, are the continuing movement of the daily activity, symbolized, put it into various categories, and it is the same movement. Isn't that so? Don't agree or disagree. Find out. Obviously, it is so obvious. Now, what happens then, if dreams are a continuous movement of the daily action, then what happens to the brain, if there is constant movement, constant activity, constant chattering, what happens to the brain that is constantly...

Q: It never rests.

K: What happens to it?

Q: It is exhausted.

K: Exhausted - which means what?

Q: It wears out.

K: It wears itself out, there is not rest, there is nothing new, there is nothing new seen. The brain doesn't make itself young because of its movement - you follow? All these things are implied when there is a continuous movement of daily activity which goes on in the brain when it sleeps. Right? You may foretell what may happen in the future, in that daily activity because while you sleep there is a little more sensitivity, more perception and so on, but it is the same movement. Oh my Lord!

Now, can this movement during the day, end with the day? Not carry it over when you sleep - you have understood my question? Can this movement, which goes on during the day, end with the day? That is, when you go to bed the whole thing is ended? Wait, don't answer my question yet. We are going to go into it for you. Doesn't it happen to you when you go to bed, that you take stock of what you have done during the day - don't you take stock? Or you just flop into bed and go to sleep? Don't you review the day? Say, look this, this, this should have been done, this should not have been done - you know, you are taking stock? And which means what? - follow this very carefully - which means what? You are bringing order. Right? Right? And the brain demands order because otherwise it can't function. If you dream, if the movement of the daily activity goes on in your sleep there is no order. And the brain demands order, therefore the brain instinctively while you are asleep brings about order. You wake up a little more fresh because you have a little more order. The brain demands order otherwise it cannot function efficiently. It cannot function efficiently if there is any form of conflict, any form of disorder.

Q: Aren't there other kinds of dreams in which...

K: I am going sir, I am going. Listen. First listen to this. Get order. This movement of the daily life continues through sleep because in this daily movement through sleep there is contradiction, there is disorder, disharmony. And the brain during sleep, through dreams, through various forms of non-dreams, tries to bring order in itself, in its own chaos. And if you put order during the day, the brain does not necessarily need, when it sleeps, to put things in order. See the importance of this. Therefore the brain becomes rested, quiet, alive, fresh. I do not know if you have not noticed if you have a problem and you go on thinking it out during the day, during the night it is still going on, worrying about it and you wake up the next morning weary of the problem and you still during the day worry about that problem, like a dog biting a bone, at it all day, and when you go to bed again until the brain is exhausted, then perhaps in that exhaustion you see something fresh. Now what we are saying is something entirely different. Which is: to end the problem as it arises, not carry it over during the day or the next minute, end it. Somebody has insulted you, hurt you, end it. Somebody has deceived you, somebody has said unkind things about you, look at it, don't carry it over, don't bear it as burden, end it. End it as it is being said, not after.

So the mind demanding order, disorder is a neurotic state of the brain and ends up in a mental case. So order implies the ending the problem as it arises, and therefore the movement of the daytime through the night ends and therefore no dreams, the body may move and all the rest of it, no dreams, because you have solved everything as you are moving. I don't know if you see the importance of this. Then you can ask the question, which is: what is beyond all this? We will deal with it tomorrow.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 8TH AUGUST 1970

We'll go on, I think, don't you, where we left off yesterday. We were considering the nature and the structure of what consciousness is. Because one can see that if there is to be a radical change in the human mind, and therefore in society, we have to consider this question, we have to delve deeply into it to find out whether there is a possibility of this consciousness undergoing a metamorphosis, a complete change in itself. Because one can see, all our actions, superficial or profound, serious or flippant, are the outcome, or born out of this consciousness. And we were saying yesterday, within this consciousness are many fragments, each fragment assuming dominance at one time or another. And without understanding these many fragments - it's all right, sir, somebody's fainted, it's all right, madam, sit down, somebody's fainted. You can't all get up and look, he has just fainted. (pause)

Would you consider it rather rude on my part if I suggest that those who want to leave, leave now, not in the middle, because it disturbs many people. Either you sit quietly and go to the very end, the bitter end of this, or, just leave quietly when you must. Because several people have complained that when everybody's moving about, it is rather difficult to pay complete attention. So would you please, if you want to leave, leave quietly. Because we are discussing, talking over together rather a difficult problem, and you need all your attention.

As we were saying, that without understanding the content of consciousness, and perhaps going beyond it, any action, however significant it may be, without understanding the fragmentary nature of our consciousness, whatever our action, however significant it may be, must produce confusion. I think this must be very clear. It's like giving a great deal of attention to one fragment, like the intellect, or the body, and so on, or belief.

And these fragmentations, which compose our consciousness, from which all action takes place, must inevitably bring about contradiction, confusion and misery. Is this, verbally at least, clear? And to say to oneself, all these fragments must be put together or integrated has no meaning, because then the problem arises, who is to integrate it. And the effort of integration. So there must be a way of looking at this whole fragmentation with a mind that is not fragmented. And that is what we are going to discuss a little bit this morning.

I realize that my mind, my consciousness, including the brain, all the physiological nervous responses, the whole of that, consciousness, is fragmentary, is broken up, conditioned by the culture in which one lives. That culture has been created by the past generation and the coming generation. And any action, any action, or the emphasis of one fragment over the others, will inevitably bring about immense confusion. Do we see this? Giving emphasis to social activity, giving emphasis to a religious belief or intellectual concept or Utopia, must inevitably contradict and therefore bring about confusion. Do we see this together?

So one asks the question, which is, is there an action which is not fragmentary and which does not contradict another action which is going to take place next minute.

And we see in this consciousness, thought plays an extraordinary part, thought being, not only the response of the past, but all our feelings, all our neurological responses, the future hopes, fears, pleasures, despairs, sorrow - all are in this. So does the content of consciousness make for the structure of consciousness, or is consciousness free from its content? Are you following all this?

If the content of consciousness, which is, my despair, my anxiety, fears, pleasures, the innumerable hopes, guilts, and the vast experience of the past, if that makes up the consciousness, that is consciousness, then any action springing from that consciousness can never free the consciousness from its limitation. Got it? No, please don't agree with this, it isn't just schoolboy stuff. I have been brought up in a particular culture - we are communicating, do share it with me - which means work, observe in yourself and then we can proceed further - I'm just talking as an introduction. My consciousness is the result of the culture in which I have lived. That culture has encouraged and discouraged various forms of activities, various forms of pursuits of pleasure, fears, hopes and beliefs. That consciousness is the 'me'.

Now, any action springing from that consciousness, which is conditioned, must inevitably be fragmentary and therefore contradictory, confusing. Are we communicating with each other, are we sharing together this? If you are born in a Communist or a Socialist or a Catholic world, or Protestant and so on, the culture in which that particular mind, brain, is born, is conditioned by this culture, by the society, by the standards, the values, the aspirations of that society. And any action born from this consciousness must inevitably be fragmentary. Is that clear? No? Lord, don't tell me not. Watch it, sir, don't ask a question, just watch yourself. If I may suggest, first listen to what the speaker has to say, don't bring in your question, or your thought, but first listen, listen first to what he has to say. Then after having listened very quietly, then you can begin to put questions. Then you can say, you are wrong, you are right, this is so, why is this, and so on. If that is going on in your mind, the questioning, then you are not listening. And therefore our communication comes to an end. We are not sharing together. And as this is a very complex, subtle problem, the thing into which we are enquiring, you have first to listen.

You see we are trying to find out what is consciousness. Is it made up of the many things that it contains, or is it something free of its content? You must find this out, you must learn about it. If it is free of its content then the action of that freedom is not dictated by the content. If it is not free then the content dictates all action. Right? That is simple. Now we are going to find out. You see I realize, watching in myself, that I am the result of all this, the past, the present, the future hope, the whole throbbing quality of consciousness is this, with all its fragmentations. And any action born of this content must inevitably be not only fragmentary but through that there is no freedom whatsoever.

So can this consciousness empty itself and find out if there is a consciousness which is free from which a totally different kind of action take place. Are you getting what I'm talking about? Somebody tell me, yes or no. What I am talking about, what I am trying to explain, not what you think about it - am I conveying it to you, am I explaining it to you?

All the content of consciousness is like a muddy little pool, very shallow and a little frog is making an awful noise in it. And that little frog says, 'I'm going to find out'. And that little frog is trying to go beyond itself. But it is till a frog, it is still in the muddy pool. So can this muddy pool, however shallow, deep, empty the content of all itself, of all itself. My little muddy pool is the culture in which I have lived. And the little me, the frog, is battling against the culture, and saying it must get out. But even if it gets out, it is a little frog. And whatever it gets out into is still the muddy pool which it will create.

So what is one then to do? Please don't answer it. The mind realizes all the activity it indulges in or is forced to do, all its activity is the movement within the consciousness with its content. And realizing this, what is the mind to do? Can it ever go beyond this limited consciousness?

Now that is one point. Second point is, this little pool with the little frog - it is a good simile - may extend, expand and widen the pool. The space it creates is still within the borders of a certain dimension. Does this all interest you? I'm asking this - that little frog can accumulate, or a little monkey, better monkey - that little monkey in the little pool can acquire great deal of knowledge, information and all the rest of it, experience. And this knowledge and experience may give it a certain space to expand. And that space has always in it the little monkey at its centre. Right? Are you following this?

So the space in consciousness is always limited by the centre. If you have a centre, the circumference of consciousness, or the frontiers of consciousness is always limited, however it may expand. That little monkey may meditate, may follow many systems, rejecting one, taking on another. And that little monkey will always remain. And therefore the space round it and the space it will create for itself is always limited and shallow. Right? So that is the second question.

The third is, what is space without centre. We're going to find this out. What was the first question?

Q: The limitations of the consciousness and can the mind go beyond consciousness.

K: Let the rain have a chance! (pause)

Can this consciousness with its limitations, at whose centre is this everlasting mischievous monkey, can it go beyond itself? (pause) Can the monkey - if you don't mind, I'll stick to that word - can that monkey, with all its intentions, with its aspirations, with its vitality, free itself from its conditioning and so go beyond the frontiers of consciousness which it has created?

To put it differently, can this monkey, which is the 'me' - can the 'me', which is the monkey, by doing all kinds of things - meditating, suppressing, conforming or not conforming, being everlastingly active, to be or not to be, can its movement take it beyond itself? Which is, does the content of consciousness make the 'me', the monkey, and therefore the attempt on the part of the monkey, the 'me', to free itself, is still within the limitation of the pool. So my question is, can the monkey be completely quiet, to see its own frontiers, to be aware of the extent of its frontiers, and whether it is at all possible to go beyond it. Am I conveying it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Oh Lord - sir, do you notice for yourselves, that you are always acting from a centre? Do you notice this? No? The centre may be a motive, the centre may be fear, the centre may be ambition - you are always acting from a centre, aren't you? I love you - I hate you - I want to be powerful - all action as far as we know now, is from a centre, whether that centre identifies with the community or with a philosophy, it is still the centre which has identified and therefore the identified thing with becomes the centre. Get it? Are you aware of this action going on, always? No? Or are there moments when the centre is not active? It happens, suddenly you are looking, living, feeling without a centre. And that is a totally different dimension. And thought begins to say, what a marvellous thing that was and I'd like to continue with it. Then that becomes the centre. The remembrance of something which happened a few seconds ago becomes the centre through thought. Are we aware of this? And are we aware of the space that centre creates round itself, isolation, resistance, escape - space? As long as there is a centre there is the space which the centre has created round itself.

And this space we want to expand because we feel the expansion of space is necessary to live extensively. But in that expansive consciousness there is always the centre, therefore the space is always limited, however expanded. Observe it in yourself, sir, don't listen to me, watch it in yourself, you will discover these things very simply. And the battle in relationship is this, between two centres, each centre wanting to expand, assert, dominate - the monkeys at work.

And so I want to learn, the mind says, I see that very clearly, I've learnt that. And I am learning, mind is learning how that centre comes into being - is it the result of this society, the culture, or is it a divine centre - I'm using that word, forgive me for using that word 'divine' - is it a divine centre which has always been covered up. Covered up by the society, by the culture - outwardly, its been covered up. The Hindus and others call it the Atman, the Great Thing inside which is always being smothered. And therefore you have to free the mind from the smothering, so that the real thing can come out, the real monkey can come out.

Obviously the centre is created by the culture one lives in. And one's own conditioned memories, experiences, the fragmentation of oneself. So it is not only the society that creates the centre but also the centre itself is propelling itself. Right? So, can this centre go beyond the frontiers which it has created for itself - that is one question. Can it? By silencing itself, by controlling itself, by meditating, by - you know" following - can that centre explode and go beyond. Obviously it can't the more it conforms to the pattern, the stronger it gets, though it imagines that it is becoming free.

Enlightenment, surely is that state of mind that quality of mind in which the monkey is never operating. So how is that monkey to end its activities, not through imitation, not through conformity, not through saying, somebody has attained enlightenment, I'll go and learn from him - all those are monkey tricks.

Now does the monkey see this, does the monkey see the tricks it is playing upon itself, and saying, I've got it, I'm ready to help society, alter society, I am completely concerned with the social values and righteous behaviour and social justice. I'm - you follow? Or is it a trick that is being played upon itself. You answer this, sir. No? You don't think it is a trick that is being played upon itself? It is so clear, there is no question about it. You are not sure? If you're not sure, sir, please let's discuss, let's talk it over.

Q: You say sometimes to help society, to do social service, as if helping society or doing social service was doing something for somebody else. But I have the feeling that I'm not different from society, so working is a social thing, it is working in myself, it's all the same thing - I don't make a distinction.

K: But if you don't make the distinction - I'm not being personal, sir - I'm asking, we're asking, does the centre remain.

Q: It should not.

K: Not 'should not'. Then we enter into quite a different field - should, should not, must, must not - then it becomes theoretical. The actual fact is, though I recognise the 'me' and society are one, etc., etc., is there the centre still operating, the 'me' still operating, the 'me', the monkey that says, I'm - you follow? My question is, I see as long as there is any movement on the part of the monkey, that movement must lead to some kind of fragmentation, illusion and chaos. Put it round, much more, very simply - that centre is the self, is the selfishness that is always operating, whether I am godly, whether I am concerned completely with society and say, I am society - that centre, is it operating. If it is, then it is meaningless.

Then the next question is, how is that centre to fade away. Through determination, through will, through practice, through various forms of compulsive neurosis, compulsive - you know - dedication, identification? And all such movement is still part of the monkey. Right? Therefore consciousness is within the reach of the monkey. And the space within that consciousness is still within the arm's length of the monkey. And therefore no freedom.

So the mind says, I see this very clearly, seeing in the sense, either as a perception, like seeing the microphone, without any condemnation, it just sees it. then what takes place. To see, to listen, to anything, there must be complete attention, mustn't there. If I want to understand what you are saying, I must give all my attention to it. In that attention, is the monkey operative, operating? Please find out. I want to listen to you. You are saying something important or unimportant - I want to find out. And to find out what you are saying, I must give my attention, which means my mind, my heart, my body, nerves, everything must be in harmony to attend. The mind not separate from the body, the heart not separate from the mind and so on - it must be a complete harmonious whole that is attentive, that is attention. Do I attend so - does the mind attend so completely with complete attention to the activity of the monkey, watching it, not condemning it, not saying it's right or wrong, this or that, just watching the monkey, tricks of the monkey.

And in this watching there is no analysis. This is really important, sirs, go into it, sirs, put your teeth into it. The moment it analyses one of the fragments of the monkey is in operation. So does the mind watch with such complete attention to all the movements of the monkey - we won't say all the movements - then you'll say, can it - to the movements of the monkey, and what takes place when there is such complete attention. You get the point? Are you doing it?

You know what it means to attend - when you are listening to that rain, completely, there is no resistance to the rain - you don't say, I wish it would go away, I want to find out, I want to learn - there is no impatience, there is no resistance against it, there is no - you are completely listening. Now when you are so listening, is there a centre which the monkey is operating? You find out sir, don't wait for me to tell you - find out. It's raining now - all right. Are you listening to the speaker? Listening, which means complete attention. Are you? Which means you are not interpreting what he is saying, you are not agreeing or disagreeing, you are not comparing or translating what he is saying to suit your own particular mind. When all such activity takes place there is no attention. To completely attend means a mind that is completely still to listen. Are you doing that? Are you listening to the speaker now, just now, with that attention. If you are, is there a centre there?

Q: I feel passive.

K: I don't care whether you are passive, active - I said, sir, look don't - look, are you listening, listening being attentive. And in that attention is the monkey working. Don't say yes or no - find, learn about it. Is there? And what is the quality of that attention in which there is no centre, in which the monkey isn't playing tricks, the quality of it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't know, sir, don't put into words thoughtless, empty - find out, learn, which means, sustained attention, not a fleeting attention, a sustained attention to find out the quality of the mind that is so completely attentive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir - when you say it is not there to tell me, to communicate through words, then the mind, the memory is there. But I am asking, when you are so completely attentive, is there a centre. Surely this is simple. Sir, when you are watching something that really is quite amusing, makes you laugh, is there a centre - something that interest you, you know, watching, not taking sides - when you are watching football, if you do, and if you are not taking the side of this or that, just watching - in that watching is there a centre which is the monkey? I can't answer any more. If there is no centre, then the question is, can this attention flow, move, not one moment, you follow, and then inattention. Can this attention flow, naturally, easily, without effort - effort implies the monkey comes into being. You are following all this?

The monkey has to come in if it has to do some functional work. But that operation on the part of the monkey, does it spring from attention, comes out of attention, or is that monkey separate from attention. I go - one goes to the office - going to the office and working in the office, is it a movement of attention or it is the movement of the monkey, which has taken over. The monkey that says, I must be better than - you know, I must get more money, I must work harder, I must compete, I must become the manager, foreman, whatever it is. I'll become the archbishop or the commissar - which is it in our life. Go into it, sir, which is it in your life, a movement of attention, and therefore much more efficient, much more alive; or is it the monkey that is taking over? Answer it, sir for yourself. And if the monkey takes over and makes some kind of mischief, you know, and monkeys do make a mischief - and can that mischief be wiped away and not leave a mark. Go on, sirs, you don't see all the beauty of all this.

Somebody said something to me yesterday - listen to this, follow it little bit - which was not true. Did the monkey come into operation and want so say, look you're a liar? Or the movement of that attention in which the monkey is not operating and listens to something which is not true, that statement which is not true doesn't leave a mark. Get this, sir, for god's sake. When the monkey response then it leaves a mark.

So I am asking, can this attention flow, not how can I have continuous attention, because then it's the monkey that is asking. But is there a movement of attention all the time, I just follow it, the mind just moves with it. No, you must answer this really extraordinarily important question. We only know the movement of the monkey. And we only have occasionally this attention in which the monkey doesn't appear at all. Then the monkey says, I want that attention. Then it goes through - goes to Japan to meditate or India to sit some ugly feet and so on.

So we are asking, does this movement of attention, is it totally unrelated to consciousness, as we know it? Obviously it is - can you hear me? (noise of rain) All right, I'll wait.

We are asking whether this attention, as a movement, can flow, as all movements must flow. And when the monkey becomes active, can the monkey itself become aware that it is active and so not interfere with the flow of attention. Somebody insulted, yesterday. And the monkey was awake, to reply, and because it has become aware of itself and all the implications of the monkey tricks, it subsides and lets the attention flow. Not how to maintain the flow - this is really important. The moment you say, I must maintain it, it is the activity of the monkey. So the monkey know when it is active and the sensitivity of its awareness immediately makes it quiet.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I haven't understood it, sir, I can't hear.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, attention means energy, the height of energy, isn't it? In attention all energy is there, non-fragmented. The moment it is fragmented and action takes place, then the monkey is at work. And when the monkey - and the monkey is also learning - has become sensitive, has become aware, and it realizes the waste of energy and therefore, naturally. It is not the monkey and attention. It is not division between the monkey and attention. If there is a division the attention then becomes the higher self, the, you know, all the tricks the monkeys have invented. But it is a total movement, attention. And unfortunately the monkey also has its own life, wakes up, its a total action not opposed to attention. I wonder if you get all this. Well, it's up to you, sir.

Now when there is no centre, when there is the complete apogee of attention, you know, the height of attention. In that height of attention there is - will you tell me what there is, what has happened to the mind that is so highly attentive, all the energy there, not a breath of it wasted. What takes place, what has happened? Oh, come on sirs, I am talking all the time.

Q: There is silence.

K: Oh no.

Q: There is no self-identification.

K: No, monkey tricks. What has happened, not only to the intellect, to the brain, but to the body? I have to talk - you don't learn. If the speaker doesn't come any more, dies, anything happens, what is going to happen, how are you going to learn.

Learn from another yogi? No, sir, therefore, learn now - learn.

What has happened to a mind that has become so highly attentive, in which all energy - what has happened to the quality of the intellect?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, you don't know - please don't guess.

Q: It becomes quieter.

K: Look sir - the brain which has been operating, working, which has invented the monkey - the brain. Please don't guess. Doesn't the brain become extraordinarily sensitive? And does your body - sir, when you have got such tremendous energy, unspoilt, unwasted, what has happened to the whole organism, what has happened to the brain, to the whole structure of the human being - that is what I am asking.

Q: It wakes up and it becomes alive. It learns.

K: No. Sir, it has become alive to learn, otherwise you can't learn. If you're asleep and say, well, I believe in this, my prejudice, I like my prejudice, it is marvellous, my conditioning - then you're asleep, you are not awake. But the moment you question, begin to learn you are alive, you are beginning to be alive. That is not my question. What has happened to the body, to the brain.

Q: Complete interaction.

K: I think I'll go home. (laughter)

Sir, have you noticed a very simple fact, that if you are not wasting energy, fiddling, if you are not wasting energy, what has happened? What has happened to the machinery of the brain, which is a purely mechanical thing, the brain - what has happened to that machinery?

Q: It's alive.

K: Tomorrow, sir! Please, do watch yourself, pay attention to something so completely, with your heart, with your body, with your mind, everything in you, every particle, every cell - attend to something, see what takes place.

Q: The centre is gone.

K: Yes, sir, but what has happened to the brain, I agree the centre doesn't exist but the body is there, the brain is there - what has happened to the brain?

Q: It rests.

K: Look, what is the function of the brain.

Q: Order.

K: No. Don't repeat after me, for god's sake. What is the brain - it has evolved in time, it is the storehouse of memory, it is matter, it is highly active, recognising, protecting, resisting, thinking, not thinking, frightened, seeking security and yet being uncertain - it is that brain with all its memories, not just yesterday's memories, centuries of memories, the racial memories, family memory, the tradition - all that, that is the content is there. Now what has happened to that brain when there is this extraordinary attention?

Q: It is new.

K; I don't want to be rude, but is your brain new? Or is it just a word you are saying.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please, what has happened to this brain that has become so mechanical - don't say it's become not mechanical, that is mechanical, the brain is purely mechanical, responding to conditioning, responding according to its conditioning, background, fears, etc., pleasure and so on, this mechanical brain, what has happened to it when there is no waste of energy at all?

Q: It is getting creative.

K: We'll leave it till tomorrow.

SAANEN 8TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 9TH AUGUST 1970

This is the last discussion and if we may, shall we go on with where we left off yesterday. During the last four weeks that we have met here, four, five weeks, I forgot what, we have been discussing, talking over together the many problems that touch our lives, the many problems that we create for ourselves, and the society that creates for us.

And we also saw that the society and us are not two different entities - they are interrelated movement. And any person seriously concerned with the change of society, its patterns, its values, its morality, if he is not aware of his own conditioning, then if he is anxious, desirous, actively involved in social change, then this conditioning makes for fragmentation in action and therefore more conflict, more misery, more confusion. We went into that pretty thoroughly.

And we were discussing also what is fear and whether the mind can ever be free of this burden, completely and utterly, both superficially and deeply; and the nature of pleasure, which is entirely and wholly different from joy, from great delight. And also we went into the question of these many fragmentations which make up our structure, our being. And we saw in our discussion or learnt about it, not from me, not from the speaker, learnt in observing ourselves - that these fragmentations divide and keep separate all human relationship, and that one fragment assumes the authority and becomes the analyser, the censor over other fragments.

And yesterday we were talking over together the nature of consciousness. And in talking about it, we went into the question of attention, what is attention. And we said, this quality of attention is a state of mind in which all energy is there, highly concentrated, and in that attention there is no observer, there is not centre as the 'me' who is aware, attentive. We went into that.

Now we are going to, this morning, find out, learn together, what happens to a mind and to the brain - the brain, the mind, the whole being, that is the psychosomatic, both the body, the brain, the heart, the mind, the whole thing - what takes place when a mind is tremendously attentive. Now to understand that very clearly or find out, learn about it for oneself, one must first see that the description is not the described. One can describe the tent, this tent, with all the holes and everything involved, the tent. But the description is not the tent, the word is not the thing, and of that we must be absolutely clear from the beginning, that the explanation is not the explained, and to caught in description, in explanation, is the most childish form of living, which I'm afraid most of us do - we are satisfied with the description, with explanation, with saying, that is the cause and just float along. But whereas what we are going to do this morning is to find out for ourselves the quality of a mind, or what has happened to the mind - mind being the brain as well as the whole psychosomatic structure - what happens to the mind when there is this extraordinary attention, when there is no centre as this observer or as the censor.

To understand that, to really learn about it, not merely satisfied with the speaker's explanation of it, one has to find out, one has to begin with the understanding of 'what is', 'what is', not 'what should be' or 'what has been', but 'what is'. Please go with me - let's travel together - it is great fun if we move together, in learning. Because obviously there must be tremendous changes in the world and in ourselves. Obviously the ways of our thought and our action have become so utterly immature, so contradictory, so diabolical, if one can say so. You invent a machine to kill and then there is an anti-machine to kill that machine - anti, anti, anti - that's what they are doing in the world, not only socially but also mechanically.

And a mind that is really concerned, involved in the seriousness of psychological as well as outward change, must go into this problem of the human being with his consciousness, with his despair, with his appalling fears, with his ambitions, with his anxieties, with his desire to fulfil in some form or another. So to understand all this, and we cannot go back to begin all over again, because we have been through it, we must begin with seeing 'what is'. 'What is', is not only what is in front of you but what is beyond. To see what is in front of you, you must have a very clear perception, uncontaminated, not prejudiced, not involved in the desire to go beyond it, but just to observe it, not only to observe 'what is' but 'what has been', which is also 'what is'. The 'what is', is the past, is the present and is the future. Do see that thing. So the 'what is' is not static, it's a movement. And to keep with that movement, with the movement of 'what is', you need to have a very clear mind, you need to have unprejudiced, not distorted mind.

That means, there is distortion the moment there is an effort. I can't see 'what is' and go beyond it, the mind can't see it, if the mind is in any way concerned with the change of 'what is', or trying to go beyond it, or trying to suppress it.

And to observe 'what is' you need energy. To observe attentively to anything you need energy. To listen to what you are saying, I need energy - that is, I need energy when I really, desperately want to understand what you are saying. But if I am not interested but casually listen, you know - that is a very slight energy that soon dissipates. So to understand 'what is' you need energy. Now, these fragmentations of which we are, are the division of these energies. I and the not I, anger and the not anger, violence and the not violence, they are all fragmentations of energy. And when one fragment assumes the authority over the other fragments, it is an energy that functions in fragments. Are we meeting each other - are we communicating? That means, communication means, learning together, working together, creating together, seeing together, understanding together, not just, I speak and you listen, and say, well, intellectually I grasp it, that is not understanding. The whole thing is a movement in learning, and therefore in action.

So the mind sees that all fragmentations, as nation, not nation, my god, your god, my belief and your belief, is fragmentation of energy - there is only energy and fragmentation. This energy is fragmented by thought. And thought is the way of conditioning, which we have gone into and won't go into now, because we must move further.

So consciousness is the totality of these fragmentations of energy. And we said, this fragmentation of energy, one of that fragmentations is the observer, is the 'me', is the monkey, that is incessantly active. Bearing in mind, the description is not the described, that you are watching yourself, watching yourself through the words of the speaker. But the words are not the thing. Therefore the speaker becomes of very little importance. What becomes important is your observation of yourself, how this energy has been fragmented - jealousy, non jealousy, hate - you know.

Now to see that, which is 'what is', can you see that without the, without the fragment, as the observer? Can the mind see these many fragmentations which make up the whole of consciousness, and these fragmentations are the fragmentations of energy - energy - can the mind see this without an observer who is part of the many fragments. Because this is important to understand this: when we are talking of attention, if the mind cannot see the many fragments without, or through the eyes of another fragment, then you will never understand what is attention. Are we meeting each other? Do say please, are we meeting each other?

I see, the mind sees what fragmentation does, outwardly and inwardly: outwardly, sovereign governments, with arms and all the rest of it; outwardly the division of nationalities, beliefs, religious dogmas, division, my god, your god, my belief - outwardly. In social action, division, political action, division, the Labour Party, the Conservative, the Communist, non Communist, Socialist, the Capitalist - all created with the desire of thought which says, I must be secure. Thought thinks it will be secure through fragmentation, and so creates more fragmentations. Do you see this, not verbally, not actually, as a fact - the young the old, the rich - this constant division, death and living - do you see this movement of fragmentation by thought which is caught in the conditioning of these fragmentations - does the mind see this whole movement of fragmentation, without a centre which says, I see them? Because the moment you have a centre, that centre becomes the factor of division. Me and not me, which is you - please. And thought has put together this me. Through the desire or through the impulse to find security, safety. And in its desire to find safety it has divided energy as the 'me' and the not 'me'. And therefore bringing to itself insecurity.

Now can the mind see this as a whole? And it cannot see it as a whole if there is a fragmentation which observes. We are asking, what is the quality of the mind that is highly attentive, in which there is no fragmentation. That is what we left off yesterday, where we left off. What is the quality of the mind. I don't know if you have gone through it, enquired, or learned from yesterday, and the speaker is not a professor teaching you or giving you information. But to find that out, there must be no fragmentation, obviously, which means no effort - effort means distortion, and a mind, as most of our minds are distorted, you cannot possibly understand what it is to be completely attentive and find out what has happened to a mind that is so utterly aware, utterly attentive.

There is a difference between security and stability. It is the monkey, which we said yesterday, which is the everlasting me with its thoughts, with its problems, with its anxieties, fears and so on, this restless thought, monkey, is always seeking security, because it is afraid to be uncertain, uncertain in its activity, in its thoughts, in its relationship - it wants everything mechanical, which is, security. So it translates security in terms of mechanical certainty. I don't know if you follow all this.

Now, is stability different, not opposite, entirely different, different dimension from security? We have to understand this. A mind that is restless, and seeking in that restlessness security, can never find stability, to be stable. Firm - firm is not the word - to be, you know, unshakeable, immovable, and yet it has the quality of great mobility. And the mind that is seeking security cannot be, cannot be stable in the sense, mobile, swift and yet immensely immovable. You see the difference? Now which is it you are doing, you, not the speaker - which is it you are doing in your life, in your everyday life - is thought the monkey, seeking in its restlessness, security and not finding it in one direction, it goes off in another direction, which is the movement of restlessness. And in this restlessness, it wants to find security. You see the point of this? Therefore it can never find it. It can say, well, there is god which is still the invention of thought, the image of thought, the image brought about through centuries of conditioning, of propaganda as thought, conditioned, in the Communist world says, there is not such thing, don't be absurd. Which is equally conditioning.

So what is it that you are doing? Seeking security in your restlessness? You know, security is one of the most curious things, the desire to be secure. And that security must be recognized by the world. You understand - I don't know if you see this. I write a book and I find in the book my security. But that book must be recognized by the world, otherwise there is no security. So look what I've done. My security lies in the opinion of the world. Oh, my books sell by the thousand. And I have created the value of the world. I am really, in seeking security through a book, through whatever it is, depending on the world, the world which I have created, which means I am deceiving myself constantly. Right? Oh, if you saw this.

Q: Yes.

K: So the desire for thought to be secure is the way of uncertainty, is the way of insecurity. Now, when the mind is completely attentive, in which there is no centre, what has happened to the mind that is so intensely aware - is there in it security? You understand my question? In it, is there any sense of restlessness - no, don't please agree - this is a tremendous thing to find out, because we want to go beyond this. You see, sir, most of us are seeking a solution for the misery of the world, a solution for the social morality, which is immoral, we are trying to find out a way of organizing society in which there will be no social injustice, where man has sought god, truth, whatever it is, through centuries, and never coming upon it, but believing in it - and when you believe in it you naturally have experiences of your belief, which are false. I don't know if you are following all this.

So man in his restlessness, in his desire for safety, security, to feel at ease, has all these imaginary securities, invented, projected by thought. Now when you become aware of all this fragmentation of energy, therefore no fragmentation at all of energy, what has taken place in the mind that has sought security, because it was restless, it was moving from one fear to another? You have understood my question? Please, have I made the question clear? No?

Q: Yes.

K: Is it verbally clear even, intellectually? Then what do you do, what is your answer?

Q: It is no longer isolated, there is no fear.

K: The gentleman says, it is not isolated, there is no fear - sir, look, we've been through all this - sir, your question, unless it is so with you, don't say anything, because it has no meaning. You can invent, you can say, I feel this - but if you are really serious, you want to learn about it, then you have to go into it, it is your vocation, it is your life - not just this morning. You know, as we were coming down, going through the village, all the people were going to the church - weekend religion. And this is not a weekend religion. This is a way of life, a way of living, a way of living in which this energy is not broken up - if you once understood this thing, you'll have an extraordinary sense of action.

Now let's go on.

Q: Sir, do you say, what do you do with the monkey within us.

K: No, sir, I did not say that - I said, where are you.

Q: Right. If you want to solve the question...

K: No, I am only putting the question, sir, don't pick me up over words - I am only putting that question to see where you are.

Q; (Inaudible)

K: Yes. So there is one of the fragments, that is actually 'what is', one of the fragments of this broken up energy, knowing, being aware - no, I won't use the word aware or knowing - one of these fragments, restlessly seeking security - that is what we are all doing. And that restlessness and this constant search, constant enquiry, constant putting this away, taking that up, going joining this society, then taking that society, you know, the monkey goes on endlessly, all that indicates a mind that is pursuing a way of life in which it is only concerned with security.

Now when that is seen very clearly, then what is the mind - what has happened to the mind that is no longer concerned with security? I'm putting the question differently. What has happened to it? Obviously it has no fear - that's a very trivial matter - it becomes very trivial when you see how thought has fragmented the energy, or fragmented itself, and because of this fragmentation there is fear. And when you see the activity of thought in its fragmentation, then fear, you meet it, you act. So we are asking, what has happened to the mind that has become extraordinarily attentive. Is there any movement of search at all. Please, find out.

Q: Mechanical activity stops completely.

K: Mechanical activity stops completely. You understand what I'm saying, my question? When you are so attentive, is the mind still seeking? Seeking experience, seeking to understand itself, seeking to go beyond itself, seeking to find out right action, wrong action, seeking a permanency on which it can depend, permanency in relationship, or in belief or in some conclusion, is that still going on when you are so completely aware?

Q: The mind does not seek anything any longer.

K: The mind does not seek anything any longer. You know what that means, when you make a statement of that kind, so easily - do listen to this. Not seeking anything, which means what?

Q: It is ready to receive something new.

K: It is ready to receive something new.

Q: That it cannot imagine.

K: That it cannot imagine. No, madam, you have not understood. No, no, my question is this - you don't know what you are all saying - my question is: the mind has seen the activity of the monkey in its restlessness. This activity, which is still energy, thought has broken it up, in its desire to find a permanency, security, a certainty, a safety. And so it has divided the world, as the 'me' and the not 'me', 'we' and 'they', seeking truth as a way of security. And the mind, one has observed all this and is the mind any more seeking anything at all? You understand, seeking implies restlessness - I haven't found it here and I go there and I haven't found it there and I go there.

Q: The mind without a centre is not concerned with searching.

K: A mind which is without a centre is not concerned with search. But is it taking place, with you.

Q: At the moment you are attentive, it is taking place.

K: No, sir.

Q: What happens to the mind when it stops striving?

K: Have you ever known, walking or sitting quietly, what it means to be completely empty, not isolated, not withdraw, not building a wall around yourself and finding yourself, have no relationship with anything - I don't mean that. When the mind is completely empty, not that it has no memory, the memories are there, because you are walking to your house, or going to your office - memory. But the emptiness of a mind that has finished with all the movement of search.

Q: All is and I am.

K: All is and I am. What is 'I am'? Who is 'I am'? Who is this I that says 'am'?

Q: Monkey.

K: Monkey? That somebody suggest. What is the I - do look at it - what am I? Don't repeat what the propagandists have said, what the religions have said, what the psychologists have said - what am I? What are you? Who says, I am - the Italian, the French, the Russian, the beliefs, the dogma, the fears, the past, the seeker, and the one who seeks, finds, identified with the house, with the husband, with the money, with the name, the family, which is all what? Words. No? No, you don't see this. But sir, if you see this, that you are a bundle of memories and words, the restless monkey comes to an end.

Q: Why, if your mind is completely empty when you are walking to the office, are you walking to the office?

K: No, sir.

Q: Well, why are you still doing this?

K: You have to earn a livelihood, you have to go to your home, you're going out of this tent.

Q: Forget about going to your office, maybe.

K: You may give it up, I'm not - don't bring in the office.

Q: Surely the question is, how can I be empty if the memory is there operating - this is the question.

K: Sir...

Q: It is split, part of the mind is empty and another part not.

K: No, not at all.

Q: The mind becomes energy.

K: I give it up - I'll go home if you're not careful.

Q: No, no, stay here.

K: Now look, sir, because I want to convey something to you, I want to communicate something to you, about something, and you are throwing words at me - I want to tell you a very simple thing: there is no such thing as security, this restless demand for security is the part of the observer, the centre, the monkey. And this restless monkey, which is thought, has broken up this world and has made a frightful mess of this world, it has brought such misery, such agony. And, thought cannot solve this, however intelligent, however, clever, however erudite, however capable of efficient thinking, it cannot, thought cannot possibly bring order out of this chaos. There must be a way out of it, which is not thought" that's what I want to convey to you, which is, in that state of attention, in that movement of attention, all sense of security has gone because there is stability. That stability has nothing whatsoever to do with security - when thought seeks security it makes it into something permanent, immovable, and therefore it becomes mechanical. Thought seeks security in relationship, in relationship. Thought creates in that relationship an image. And that image becomes the permanent. And that image breaks up relationship, you have your image and I have mine. In that image thought has established identified itself as the permanent thing.

And outwardly this is what we have done. Your country, my country - god - all that silly stuff. Now when the mind has left all that, left it in the sense it has seen it, has seen the utter futility, the mischief, use any word, it has finished with it. Then what takes place in the mind which is so completely finished with the whole concept of security, what happens to that mind which is so attentive? I'm pointing out to you, description is not the described - that it is completely stable.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What madame?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The others have disappeared? What are you saying, madame, I can't understand?

Q: (In French)

K: It is finished, madame, there is nothing more to say. I am asking you - if you say that is so, then that there is nothing more to be said. I am asking myself, and therefore you are asking yourself, when the mind, when thought is no longer seeking security in any form, and sees that there is no such thing as the permanent, the mind - see the importance of this, sir - the brain evolving, growing, remembering, with the idea of being completely secure. All right? You are following this? The mind, the brain wants security, otherwise it can't function, it will function illogically, neurotically, inefficiently, therefore the brain is always wanting order. And it has translated having order in terms of security. And if that brain is still functioning, it is still seeking order through security. So when there is attention, is the brain still seeking security. Don't answer me.

Q: Sir, there is only the present.

K: He says, there is only the present. Sir, I am trying to convey something to you. I may be totally wrong. I may be talking complete nonsense but you have to find out for yourself if I am talking nonsense.

Q: I get the sensation that at the moment I am attentive, I am not seeking. But attention may cease, then I am seeking again.

K: Never - that's the whole point. If thought sees that there is no such thing as permanency, sees it, thought will never seek it again. Which is, the brain, with its memories of security, with its cultivation in society, depending on security, all its ideas based on security, its morality based on security, that brain, has it become so completely empty of all movements towards security. Don't answer me.

K: Sir, have you ever gone into this question of meditation, any of you? Meditation is not concerned with meditation but with the meditator - you see the difference. Most of you are concerned about meditation, what to do about meditation, how to meditate, step by step and all the rest of it - that is not the question at all. Meditator is the meditation. To understand the meditator is meditation.

Now if you have gone into this question of meditation, the meditator must come to an end, obviously, by understanding, not by suppressing, not by killing the thought - by understanding, which is, understanding himself is to understand the movement of thought, thought being the movement of the brain, with all its memories. And the movement of thought seeking security and all the rest of it.

Now the meditator is asking, can this brain become completely quiet, which is thought be completely still, and yet out of this stillness thought operates and not as an end in itself. Probably it's all too terribly complicated to you - it's really quite simple.

So, the mind that is highly attentive, has no fragmentation of energy - please see that, there is no fragmentation of energy, it is complete energy. And that energy operates when you go to the office without fragmentation. Right?

Q: May be a real understanding could be realized without the help of the word, it's a kind of direct contact with the thing you are trying to understand.

K: You can understand without the word by getting directly into contact.

Q: And consequently there is no need for words which are an escape.

K: That's it. Can you communicate without words.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait. (laughter) Without words because words hinder. Look sir, can I communicate with you without the word, of the quality of the mind that is so extraordinarily attentive and yet function in the world without breaking the energy into fragments? You've understood my question?

Q: Yes.

K: Now, can I communicate that to you without the word? Can I?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? I can? How do you know I can? What are you all talking about?

Q: I think you can.

K: Look, I have talked for nearly three weeks, explained everything, gone into it in detail, poured one's heart into it - have you understood it? Verbally, even. And you want to understand something non-verbally. Which means - it can be done, if your mind is in contact with the speaker with the same intensity, with the same passion, at the same time, at the same level, you will communicate. Are you? Now listen to that train, listen to it. Now without the word, communication has been established, because we are both of us listening to the rattle of that train, at the same moment, with the same intensity, with the same passion.

Now, only then there is direct communion. Right? Are you intense about this, at the same time as the speaker, you know, all the rest of it - are you? Of course not. Sir, when you hold a hand of another, you can hold it out of habit or of custom. Or you can hold it and communication can take place without a word, because both are at the given moment intense, communication has taken place, without a word. But we are not intense, passionate, concerned.

Q: Not all the time.

K: Not all the time - don't say that, even for a minute.

Q: How do you know?

K: I don't know. If you are, then you will know what it means to be aware, attentive, and therefore no longer seeking security, therefore no longer acting or thinking in terms of fragmentation. So, sir, look what has happened to a mind that has gone through all the things we have been talking about, all the discussions, exchange of words, what has happened to the mind that has really listened to this?

First of all, it has become sensitive, not only mentally but physically - given up smoking, drinking, drugs, down that drain that goes by, which is called a river. And when we have discussed, talked over this question of attention, you will see that the mind is no longer seeking anything at all, or asserting anything. And such a mind is completely mobile and yet wholly stable.

Now out of that stability and sensitivity it can act, without creating, without breaking up life into fragments, or energy into fragments. Now, such a mind - what does it find, apart from action, apart from stability and all the rest, what is there? You understand? Man has always sought what he considered god, truth, always striven after it, out of fear out of his hopelessness, out of his despair, disaster, death, he has sought it. And thought he found it.

And the discovery of that he began to organize. And, you remember that famous story - the devil and his friend were walking one day down the street and they saw a man in front of them pick up something very shiny. And the man looked at it in great delight, ecstasy. And the friend of the devil asked, what was that, what did he pick up. Oh, he said, the devil said, oh, it is part of the truth. And the friend says, then it's a very bad business for you, if a man has found truth on a pavement, it's very bad business, you will have no place. He said, not at all my friend, I'm going to help him to organize it. Right?

So sir, that which is stable, highly mobile, sensitive, is not asking, it sees something which has never been found, which means, time for such a mind doesn't exist at all - which doesn't mean he's going to miss the train. Therefore there is a state which is timeless and therefore incredibly vast.

Now, sir, I can go into it, which is something really most marvellous if you come upon it, but the description is not the described. It's for you to learn all this by looking at yourself - no book, no teacher can teach you about all this - don't depend on anyone, don't join anything, spiritual organizations, you understand, not physical organizations.

So one has to learn all this out of oneself. And in there the mind will discover things that are incredible. But for that there must be no fragmentation, and therefore immense stability, swiftness, mobility. And to that mind there is no time and therefore this whole concept of death and living have quite a different meaning.

Q: Would it be of any use for such a mind to make an attempt to communicate? It's impossible, even for a minute.

K: Finished, we have finished talking. It is time - what is the time, sir?

Q: Quarter to one.

K: I hope you'll have a nice journey.

Q: Thank you.

SAN DIEGO STATE COLLEGE, CALIFORNIA
1ST PUBLIC TALK 5TH APRIL, 1970 'THE HUMAN CONDITION'

May I also take my coat off - thank you so much. I would like to talk about so many things, because wherever one goes, Europe, India, Australia or America, one finds more or less the same human problems. Most human beings in the world are so confused and living a contradictory life; they are thoroughly unhappy, utterly miserable and in a great deal of sorrow. And one's life seems to be a battlefield, from the moment you're born till you die. One finds, right through the world, division, nationalistic, linguistic, religious differences, one sect opposed to another, one way against another, each saying its way is the best and the only one and so on. There is division, conflict and war. There is division as the business world, the spiritual world, the religious world, the scientific world, or the professorial, college world.

Seeing all this division, this utter chaos, and a great deal of misery, one wonders - and I'm sure you do too - what is one to do, what course of action to be followed, the left, the centre or the right. Or is it a course of action dictated by some ideology, some belief, some authoritarian dictum; or must one follow a course of action that doesn't depend on any authority whatsoever, neither the left, the centre, nor the right, nor any guru, any teacher, any priest, or for any organized religion, Catholic, Protestant, what you will, but follow one's own inclination, tendency; or follow one's own experience and knowledge, self-reliant, confident and purposeful.

There is so much contradiction, not only outwardly but also inwardly. And what is one to do? I'm sure you must have asked this question many times - the more serious one is the more earnest, not seeking entertainment, one must really deeply ask this question, confront it, by a world that is so chaotic, contradictory, divided, knowing very well that one has lost faith, having no trust in anybody, no teacher, no professor, no priest or authoritarian Utopia.

If you are at all serious, and I hope you are at least for this afternoon, you must have not only asked such a question of yourself, but also have found a responding answer to the challenge: what is one to do, not having faith in another, not be dependent on some saviour, some teacher, some authority, then where are you to look for light, for an understanding? And if one's action, and life is inevitably a continuous movement of action, the very living, what is one to do?

This meeting, and the subsequent ones are not a philosophical entertainment, nor a religious amusement, and in no way a philosophical examination of life. We're not here - at least I am not - to be entertained by you or by my own particular ideas. What we are trying to do is to find out for ourselves, confronted with this extraordinary problem of living, with all its contradictions and complexities, what is the course of action which will not be contradictory, which will be whole, complete, which will not produce more agonies, more mischief, more confusion.

And to find that out is our problem - and I think that is the only problem in life: an action that is not broken up, that is not contradictory, that is continuous, whole, complete and total, so that it doesn't bring more sorrow, more confusion. And if you will, we will go together into this question, bearing in mind that the speaker has no authority whatsoever, because both of us are going to examine, observe, this phenomenon called life, living. And find out the truth of the matter, if there is an action, a way of living, not at odd moments or in a great crisis but every day, every minute, a way of living in which there is joy, there is no violence, no brutality, no contradiction, and obviously no imitation and dependency.

Unless we find such a way of living, not an abstract idea, a philosophical concept, a theory, but rather an actual way of living, whether there can be an action so complete, so whole, so completely non-contradictory. And I feel to live that way is the only religious way, none other. We are using the word religious not in the accepted sense of that word, which is to believe in something, believe in God or no God, or believe in some conceptual ideation - we are using that word as a way of life in which every action is whole, complete and full of ecstasy. We're going to go into that.

First of all, to understand all this, we must establish right relationship between us, between you and the speaker. He is not teaching you, in the ordinary sense of that word, telling you what to do. The word teach is to give information, to make one understand, to point out, to inform. And one can teach mathematics, give you some scientific information. But here there is no teacher, and we really mean it, because each one of us has to be his own teacher and his own disciple. And this is a very serious matter. So that you are listening with quite a different attitude, you're listening to the speaker, to the words he is using, and understanding those words, watching through those words all your own reactions and responses and conditioning, so that you yourself, through your own observation, learn, so the speaker becomes a mirror in which you are observing yourself.

So our relationship, between you and the speaker, is of a basic communication, communication being sharing together, understanding together, working together - that is what the word 'communication' means, to commune. Please do bear that in mind right through the talks or whatever the thing is called that's going to take place the next four days here, that we are sharing together, which means you are working as much as the speaker, you're observing, listening. And to observe and to listen needs no agreement or disagreement, because we are not dealing with theories and ideas, but listening to discover, to understand ourselves. For we are the world, whether you live in this marvellous country, lovely sunshine, hills and the beauty of the land, prosperous, brutal, violent, belonging to this group or that group. with one teacher or a dozen teachers, so-called spiritual teachers, you are like anybody else in Europe or America, or in India, we are human beings, not labels. The problems that they have in India, where there is an explosion of population which is quite incredible, poverty is something unimaginable, the decay, the violence, the brutality, the beauty of the land, the light - the people there are the same as here with the same agonizing problems, with the sorrows that seem to have no end.

So we are dealing, not with an Asiatic philosophy or exotic religion, or inventing some significance, giving a meaning to life, we can leave all that to the intellectuals - they can invent all the significance and meaning to life because they themselves see the utter meaninglessness of this living. So, seeing all that, not as a theory, not something that is extraneous to you, but actually, that is your life, your daily contradiction, your daily battle, your daily irritations, anger, hatred, brutality.

And to see if all that can end, so that we can live quite a different kind of life, a life that is free, a life that doesn't bring through action, misery, a life that is really, completely, totally peaceful. So one asks, observing all this, what is one to do, knowing that you are the society, and the society is you - you are the world and the world is you, which is not just an idea but a fact. You have created this world, by your greed, anger, ambition, competition, violence, inwardly you are that; and outwardly your wars, all these divisions, the black and the white and the pink and the blue and all the rest of it - prejudice, antagonism, brutality. We know this. Either you know it as an idea or you know it actually. You know it through a magazine, through a newspaper, or somebody has told you. Or you have observed it in yourself, you have seen it in yourself, completely, and therefore there is no need for another to tell you what the world is like, you don't have to read a single newspaper, a magazine or listen to any talk, if you know for yourself what you are.

Realizing what you are, then the question is entirely different, the question what to do, because one realizes what one is - one is confused, as the world is, one lives in contradiction, in division, as the world is. And without understanding oneself, not only at the conscious level but also very deeply, very profoundly, unless there is this understanding, not according to some analyst, Freud, Jung, or your own particular pet analyst, but to understand yourself as you are. And in the understanding of that the question of what you are to do becomes entirely different, because now you are putting the question in relation to the world as though it were something outside of you: to what political party you should join, to what group, the pacifist and so on, to what group, what section.

So you are putting the world as something outside of you. But when one realizes, not verbally, not as an idea, but actually - when one realizes that one is the world, and one's responsibility to the world is the responsibility of understanding yourself so completely. And then your question what to do has quite a different meaning. So the question is, how to observe, how to observe oneself, oneself being the total human being. You are not an American, though you may have the label as the American. And a man coming from India may call himself an Indian, with his particular label, with his particular superstitions and beliefs. But when you scratch or push aside all that, these are ordinary human beings like you and me, like dozens of others.

So the question is, how do you observe yourself, because without knowing yourself, who is the world, not an individual - the word 'individual' means a total entity, indivisible. And individual means a human being in whom there is no contradiction, no division, no separation, is a total unit, harmonious unit. That is, that word the individual means that, indivisible. So you are not individuals, you are all broken up, contradictory in yourself.

So, how are you to look at yourself - please do listen to this, it is quite absorbing. It demands a great deal of intelligence, it is great fun, much more fun than any book, than any religious entertainment, than any philosophy. As we are broken up human beings in ourselves, contradictory desires, feeling inferior or superior, being afraid, having no love, feeling lonely, fragmented, not only superficially but deeply - how are you to observe? One fragment observes the rest of the fragments? One becoming the censor, the examiner, the observer, watching over the rest of the fragments? And what gives him the authority over the other fragments? I hope the speaker is making himself clear; unless you understand this really, what we are going to discuss during the rest of the talks you won't be able to follow at all.

So the question is, who is the observer and who is the censor that says, this I will do, this I won't do, this is right and this is wrong, this path I will take and I won't tread that path, I'll be a pacifist with regard to this war but I've other favourite wars, I will follow this leader and not that leader, I believe in this and not in that, I will hold this prejudice and reject that, knowing, if you have observed yourself, that you are a fragmented human being? And therefore, being fragmented, contradictory, living in constant conflict, and knowing this conflict, one fragment of this many, many fragments, takes charge, becomes the authority, the censor, and his observation must inevitably be contradictory. I hope you're following all this. If one fragment, one part of you assumes the authority of the analyser over the other fragments, why has he assumed that authority, and can he, one fragment, analyse the rest of the other fragments? You are following all this?

See how dreadfully complex it has all become. Whether you are analysed by a professional or you analyse yourself, it is still the same pattern. So it is very important to find out how to observe, how to observe all these many contradictions which make up our life, how to observe the whole of those fragments without another fragment taking place. Is this question clear? Do please find out. Perhaps at the end of this afternoon's talk, you can ask questions. But this is very important to find out, because as long as there is contradiction, division, in oneself, there must be conflict, there must be violence, which expresses itself in the world outside, in society. And as long as this fragmentation exists within one, there can be no peace. And a man who really, deeply wants to understand and live a peaceful life, a life of love, must understand this question completely. Therefore it is a very serious matter, not just an afternoon's listening to a few words - we are dealing with the whole problem of existence. And it is only the mind that can give serious attention to this, that is able to resolve it. So it is very important, imperative that one understands this question.

How do you observe? Do you observe yourself as an outsider, as a censor, saying, this is right, this is wrong, justifying, condemning, approving, storing up? And if you do, there is contradiction and therefore conflict and therefore violence.

So how do you observe? How do you observe, not only yourself but the world about you? How do you observe the birds, the trees, the animals, the flowers - how do you look at them? Are you, the observer, separate from the thing you observe? Do please go into this with the speaker, take a little time, give some attention, because you will see if we can communicate together, which is share together, understand together, then you will see, at the end of these talks, that your whole outlook on life will be entirely different, if you understand this one fundamental question.

How do you observe? Do you observe through an image? When you observe a tree, do you observe with knowledge of that tree, the knowledge that separates you from that tree, divides you, brings about a space between you and the tree? How do you observe? How do you observe your wife and your husband or your girl or boy, how do you observe them? Watch yourself, sir, please do it as we are talking, don't make notes, don't fiddle around with a tape-recorder, but watch it. How do you look at another? Don't you look at another through the image you have built about the other, the image that you have been building for many years or perhaps two days? And the image becomes the observer. So the image, or through the image you look. So the censor, the observer, is one of the fragments and that censor has an image of what is right and what is wrong, what should be done and what should not be done, because he is still functioning as a fragment.

So the question from this arises, whether one can observe without any fragment, to see you, see oneself, see the world, without fragmentation at all. And what brings about fragmentation? Not only in oneself but also in the world of which one is - what brings it about, why is one fragmented, why are there contradictory desires? Right?

Now, why is one violent, which is part of contradiction? There may be causes why human beings are violent - lack of physical space; human beings were evolved from the animal and the animals are very aggressive; and people love being aggressive - feeling inferior and they want to be superior and so on. There are many causes. And most of us spend our time discussing the causes, explaining the causes; each professor, each specialist, each writer, according to his conditioning, explains the causes - volumes are written why human beings are violent. But at the end of the volumes human beings still remain violent.

So the description is not the described, and therefore is of very little value. You know why you are violent very well, you haven't got to spend years trying to find out the cause of your violence, which is such a waste of time. But to observe violence as it is, without the censor, who then separates himself from the fact that he is violent. Are we meeting each other? Are we communicating with each other? I am not sure.

Look, sirs, this is very, very important to understand. So let's go into it a little more. Let's suppose I am violent - anger, jealousy, brutality, driving ambition that brings about competition. And I'm always measuring myself against somebody else. And this comparison makes me feel I'm inferior to you who are superior. So there is a battle, violence, and all that. Then I say to myself, I must get rid of this, I want to live at peace, though I've lived for thousands and thousands of years as a human being, there must be a change, there must be change in society, however rotten it is, and it is. So I'll plunge into social work and therefore forget myself. And the social work and the society is me. So I am escaping from myself. And realizing all the tricks the mind plays upon itself, now, I look at myself, I am violent.

And how do I look at that violence? As a censor who condemns violence? Or justifies violence? Or one who is not capable of dealing with that violence, therefore escapes from it? How do I look at myself, how do I look at that violence? Please do it. Are you looking at it as an observer who is different from violence?

The observer who is separate, who condemns, justifies and says, this is right, and so on. The observer looks at the violence, separates himself from violence and condemns it. Or is the observer the observed? You are following? The observer recognizes violence and separates himself in order to do something about it. But the separation is one of the tricks of thought. So the observer is the observed, is the violence. So long as there is a division between the observer and the observed there must be violence. Right?

So when I realize that, not verbally, realize with my heart, with my mind, with my whole being, then what takes place? You understand my question? You know, when you observe anything, there is always not only physical separation, distance, space, there is also the desire to identify yourself with that which is beautiful, noble, and not identify yourself with that which is not. So identification is part of the trick of a mind that has separated itself as the censor, and is now trying to identify. But whereas when the observer becomes aware that he is part of the observed, and he is, and therefore no image between the observer and the observed, then you will find that conflict completely comes to an end.

This is real meditation, this is not just a trick. Therefore it is very important, imperative, that one understands oneself, deeply, understands all the responses, the conditioning, the various temperaments, characteristics, tendencies - just to watch, without the observer. We are meeting now? To observe without the observer. And that is the act of learning. And so that is the act, that is the action.

Now there is a difficulty in this. One is observing oneself. One wants to learn about oneself - the more you discover, the more you understand, the greater the freedom. I am using the word 'more' purposely for the moment - 'the more' is a comparative evaluation. I want to understand myself, learn about myself. In observing myself - please do this as the speaker is going into it, do it actually, don't take it home and think about it, do it now. This is not a group therapy or a confessional or all that nonsense, but watch yourself as we are working together.

I want to learn about myself. And myself is a living movement - each desire contradicts the other, they are living, moving, they're vital. And I observe and through that observation I've learnt. With what I have learnt I am going to look next minute. Right? You follow this? I am going to look, observe with the knowledge which I have gathered through previous observation. Am I learning, is there learning then? Because when the mind observes with an accumulated knowledge of its examination from its examination, that knowledge is preventing perception, that knowledge is preventing the freedom to look. See the difficulty.

So can the mind observe without accumulation? And the accumulation is the observer, is the censor, is the conditioned entity. Therefore, to look without accumulation, that is, sir, look: someone flatters you, says how nice you are, how beautiful you are, how very intelligent. or how stupid you are. Now can you listen to what he is saying, that you are stupid or very clever or very this or very that, can you listen without accumulation? That is, without accumulating the insult or the flattery, because if you listen with accumulation then he becomes your enemy, or your friend, therefore that listening and how you listen creates the image. And that image separates, and that image is the cause of conflict - the image that you have about the Communist and the bourgeois, the image you have about the Catholic, if you are a Protestant. And a Catholic has the image about the Protestant. The image you have about your husband or your wife or your boy, whatever it is. You believe, another does not believe, so there is contradiction.

So can you observe without separation? Can you observe at the moment of violence, at the moment of your anger, without the censor? See how difficult it becomes if you are not aware at that moment. If you are not aware at that moment you already created the image.

So to observe the clouds, the beauty of it, the light of it, to observe the lovely hills in this country, to observe the light on the water - just to observe without naming it, because that, the naming, the knowledge, the experience prevents you, prevents the mind from observing totally. So when the mind can look without the observer, all fragments come to an end in oneself. And this is really very important to grasp, to understand. And this cannot be taught by another, it comes through your observation of yourself, watching all the time. You know, it's great fun if you don't condemn or justify but watch 'what is', not only what is politically - all the chicanery of the politician - what is of all the religious dogmas, structure and the superstitions, just watch it, in yourself and outside of yourself. Such a mind that watches it becomes extraordinarily sensitive, alive, because it is not breeding conflict.

Then we can go into the question of fear - fear, what love is, what death is. But without understanding this fundamental thing, mere enquiry, exploration of fear remains unsolved.

So I will stop. Perhaps now you will ask, if you are willing questions on what we have talked about. And one of the things about questioning is that you must ask the right question. And to ask the right question is quite difficult. But we must ask, not only of ourselves but of everybody who can think, ask. But we must have doubt, be sceptical. And also know when we should not be sceptical. It is like a dog on a leash, you must know when to let it go and also when to hold it. But most of us are even afraid to ask questions of ourselves primarily, and of another, because in that very asking the question, we expose ourselves to ourselves. And we would rather not be exposed to ourselves. So that is one of the causes of fear.

All this doesn't indicate that the speaker is preventing you from asking questions.

Q: When the observed becomes the observer, how do you remove the contradiction or the conflict?

K: The question is, when the observer becomes the observed - please listen to the question - when the observer becomes the observed, how does contradiction disappear? We never said that the observer becomes the observed. The observer observing the tree doesn't become the tree - God forbid! But when the observer understands the structure and nature of himself, then he observes without division, then there is observation without the observer. Is that clear?

Sir, look, the moment I try to identify with something, there is division already, otherwise I wouldn't identify myself with something. Because there is division, because there is space, because there is contradiction, and quarrels, hatred, I try to overcome that by identifying. Which means, I have already admitted division and try to overcome that division, through identification. Whereas what we are saying is, the observer is the cause of division, the observer is the division. Look, sir, there is violence right through the world, increasing more and more every day. And as a human being one is violent. And realizing that, one has cultivated an ideal called non-violence, an ideal. Please follow this a little bit, if you care to. So there is the fact, the 'what is', which is violence, the actual violence of life. And there is the idea of non-violence - the 'what is' and 'what should be'. Right? So there is contradiction. The man who is violent has the ideal of non-violence and so he is all the time pretending to be non-violent, pretending, hypocritical. But the actual fact is, he is violent, he hopes through the ideal to remove violence. And look: there is space and time between 'what is' and 'what should be'. Please follow this. See the absurdity of it. And he is trying to always become that. So he is spending energy, vitality in becoming something which he is not, which is, but what actually is, is.

Now when the mind is free from the ideal altogether, and all ideals are idiotic anyhow, then you face, then the mind can face 'what is', which is violence. Then how do you observe violence? Do you observe it with an image you have, which is that you must not be violent, or does the mind observe without the observer, which means, not identifying yourself, mind identify itself with violence, but be free to look? And therefore end conflict between the observer and the observed. And the ending of conflict is the ending of violence.

Q: Are you saying we should observe without the observer?

K: I know. The lady asks, are you saying to observe without the observer. Try it, do it. Can you observe a flower, a bird, the waters, the beauty of the land, your wife, your husband, without the observer, which means without the image you have about your wife. Do it, sir, and you will find how extraordinarily attentive you have to be, not only now but when the image is being built, so that your mind is free to look. Have you ever looked at anybody? Not at a stranger because that is not important, have you looked at anybody whom you so-called like? Or love? Have you? You have looked at the person through the image you have about her or about him. And the relationship is between these two images. And that's why there is so much antagonism. And that is why there is no relationship at all. Which brings about a question, what is love? Perhaps this is not the moment to talk about it but we will. But when one says "I love you", what is it you are loving? Do look at it - when you say to another "I love you", what is it your are loving? The image that you have about her or him, which thought has put together? And is love the cultivation of thought? When you say "I love music", what is the thing you love? Your pleasure?

So relationship becomes extraordinarily important to understand, because all life is relationship, living is relationship. And we have made of this relationship such a horror. And that horror we call love, because in that there is occasional tenderness perhaps when you're sexual or when you see something pitiful. So one has to find out what is relationship, not from the dictionary, not from the professor, not from the analyst, not from the religious organizations, small or big, but find out in yourself, find out for yourself in yourself. Then you will see in yourself the whole world is, you don't have to read a thing, because you are the whole of humanity. Until one understands that deeply, love doesn't exist - pleasure exists.

Q: How does one go about freeing oneself from this accumulated knowledge so that one can observe?

K: How does one set about freeing oneself from the accumulated knowledge? Look: if you had no accumulated knowledge you wouldn't be able to go home. You wouldn't be able to recognize your wife or your friend or your husband. Please see the difficulty of this. You need to have accumulated knowledge to function in your job. You must have it; you must have it in order to speak, English, Italian, whatever it is; to go home. But also see that in relationship how knowledge destroys relationship, knowledge being the image you have built about the other through years of living together, or even for a day - the nagging, the hurt, the brutality, the irritations, the pleasures, the companionship, the comfort. That image, which is knowledge, is preventing the right relationship. So you need knowledge to function in your office, in the laboratory, in mathematics and so on. But also be aware of the danger of that very knowledge, the accumulating and the building of the image, in relationship. And to be aware of this, where knowledge is essential and the danger, is to have a very good, intelligent mind. One has to be extraordinarily alert.

Q: In trying to observe very intelligently, look at things very clearly, I find it to be very painful and the pain is very distracting, it destroys the observation.

K: I don't quite understand why it should be painful. One observes - look, sir, I observe myself and see that I am stupid. Why should it be painful? Because I am comparing myself with somebody who is very intelligent and therefore that comparison gives me pain, because I find myself inferior?

Q: This may be true, but it is painful.

K: I'm going to go into it, sir - just see it. Is it painful because I have compared myself with somebody else, comparison? Why do I compare at all, with 'what is', or with 'what should be'. Why do I compare? In comparison I find I am inferior and that gives me pain. And therefore I say, I won't examine, I won't look, I'll just go on. I'll escape. So the question is, why do I compare at all? Now I have said to myself "I am dull". How do I know I am dull if I don't compare? Are you following? I only know I am dull because I have compared myself with you who are clever. So comparison brings me pain and the conflict and all the rest of it. So is there dullness if I don't compare at all? And can I live without comparison?

Comparison, psychologically, I have to compare between two colours, between many things, but inwardly, psychologically, what is the need of comparison between 'what is' and 'what should be'? Why should there be comparison? Is not comparison one of the distractions from 'what is' and therefore preventing understanding of 'what is'?

So to live - do it, sir, you'll find out - to live without comparison, which doesn't mean smugness, satisfaction - on the contrary. And your whole mind is watching everything. We think we understand only through comparison. Do you understand anything through comparison? Do you understand your second son because you compare him with the first son? When you do compare A with B, don't you destroy A? Don't you want him to conform to B? And that is the whole structure of our education, be like somebody else - the hero, even though you destroy, negate the hero, you imitate somebody, which is always comparing. Do experiment. That is, experiment means, the word, is to try, to test, to test it out in life. To live without any comparison, psychologically, see what happens to you.

Q: In an authoritarian society, how can you do that?

K: In an authoritarian society, how can you do that. We said, the society is you, you have created the society. You worship authority. So again one has to go into this question of authority; the authority of the law, which is to keep to the left side of the road, pay tax and so on, and the freedom from psychological authority on which you depend. You know, we are strange human beings. We deny outward authority, politically, or unfortunately in this country you spit on someone's face called a policeman, which is terrible to spit on anybody's face - and yet you cling to your own particular authority inwardly. Again there is a contradiction. Why do we always begin by spitting on the outer authority - why don't you begin spitting on your own inward authority - if you must spit! Why don't we begin there, because probably here, inwardly, you don't have to join any group, you have to be alone, there is nobody to demonstrate with you, walk down the street - you have to be alone. And probably to live in this kind of deep, inward beauty of aloneness, you are frightened. Therefore you begin by eschewing authority and the outer. We always do this, we all want to live a simple life and we begin at that end - one meal a day and so on - show, exhibitionism, circus. But to live a very simple life inwardly, that is very difficult. And it is only a deep, simple life, in the sense of no fear, no ambition, it is only such a mind that is very simple, that can observe and love.

SAN DIEGO STATE COLLEGE, CALIFORNIA 4TH PUBLIC TALK 9TH APRIL, 1970 'WHAT IS IT WE ARE SEEKING?'

We were going to talk over together this evening - what is meditation? But before we go into that, which is really quite a complex and intricate problem, we ought to be, it seems to me, very clear what it is we are after. We are always seeking something, especially those who are religiously minded, and even the scientist, seeking has become quite an issue - seeking. What are we seeking? I think this must be very clearly and definitely understood before we go into this, into what is meditation and why one should meditate at all. And what is the use of meditation, where does it get you?

Before we go into that, we must be clear what it is that we are seeking, each one of us. And the word search, seek, run after, search out, implies, doesn't it, that we already know more or less what we are after. When we say we are seeking truth or we are seeking God, if we are religiously minded, or we are seeking a perfect life and so on, we must already have in our mind a pattern or an image or an idea of what it is. And to find it after seeking it we must already know its contours, its colour, its substance.

So in seeking, is there not implied in that word, that we have lost something and we are going to find it. And when we find it we shall be able to recognize it, which means you've already known it - all that you have to do is to go after, search out. And so, the first thing to realize is not to seek, because what you seek is predetermined, what you wish; if you are unhappy, lonely, in despair, you'll search out, hope, companionship, something to sustain you, and you'll find it, inevitably.

So in meditation, every form of search must come to an end. And, as we said when we last met here, that one must lay the foundation, the foundation of order, which is righteousness, not respectability, the social morality is no morality at all. But morality, order, virtue that comes out of understanding what is disorder, is quite a different thing. And we said, disorder must exist as long as there is conflict, both outwardly and inwardly.

And to bring about order is to understand disorder. And therefore, order is not according to a blueprint, according to some authority, or your own particular experience. And how this order comes about must obviously be without effort, because effort distorts.

Are we communicating with each other? Because we are talking about something very, very difficult, how to bring about order without control. And that order can only exist when we say we understand disorder - the origin, how this disorder comes into being, which is conflict, which is in ourselves, to understand it, not to overcome it, not to throttle it, not to suppress it, but to observe it. And to observe without any distortion, without any choice, without any compulsive, directive impulse, is quite an arduous task.

Therefore order, which is virtue, comes about without any effort when there is the understanding of disorder. And control implies either suppression or rejection, exclusion, and a division between a controller and the thing to be controlled, and therefore conflict. So if one understands this whole business, control and choice come totally to an end. As we explained, control implies division, by the one who controls and the thing that is to be controlled. And in this division there is conflict, there is distortion. And when you really understand this, that the controller is the controlled, then conflict and control in every form comes to an end, which is the ending of division and therefore comprehension, understanding. When there is understanding of 'what is', then there is no need for control.

So there are these two essential things that must be completely understood if we are to go into the question of what is meditation - order, with the understanding of what is disorder, and control, with all its implications, of its duality, contradictory, contradiction, and, as we explained, the other day, the observer is the observed, the one who is angry and tries to get rid of anger, is anger itself. And when he divides himself from anger or from jealousy or from despair or from the desire to fulfil there must be contradiction and therefore conflict and therefore distortion. Right?

This is the foundation. And without this really you cannot possibly know what meditation is. Don't fool yourself by all the books they write about meditation, all the people that come to tell you how to meditate, or the groups that are formed in order to meditate. Because you see, if there is no virtue, which is order, there must be distortion, the mind must live in contradiction, in effort. And how can such a mind know or be aware of the whole implication of what meditation is.

And, as we said the day before yesterday, we must also, not intellectually, with one's whole being, come upon this strange thing called love, and therefore no fear. Without love - you know what we mean by love - love that is not touched by pleasure, by desire, by jealousy, love that knows no competition, that does not divide my love and your love. There must be that. All this is necessary because then the mind, including the brain, the emotions are in complete harmony, must be, otherwise meditation becomes self-hypnosis. Right?

You know, sirs - don't go to sleep over this. Because as we said, we are communicating with each other, which means we are sharing together, we are journeying together, you are not left behind for someone else to go ahead, either we are going together or not at all, which means you must have worked during this week, very hard, to find out your own activities of the mind, how it functions, your self-centred activities, the 'me' and the 'not me', you must have been quite familiar with yourself and all the tricks that the mind plays upon itself, the illusions and the delusions, the image, and the imagination that one has. And the romantic ideas, with a mind that is capable of sentimentality is incapable of love, because sentiment breeds cruelty, brutality, violence, not love.

So if you have, and I hope for your own sake, not because of me, of the speaker, you have more or less deeply established this in yourself. Which is quite an arduous, demanding, tremendous inward discipline, discipline being learning, not learning from another, but learning by observing what is going on in yourself. And that observation is not possible if there is any form of prejudice, conclusion, a formula according to which you are observing. If you are observing according to some psychologist, you really are not observing yourself, you are observing what the psychologist has said to you, and through that you are observing. Therefore there is no self-knowing.

And this implies an awareness. You know, there are many schools in Asia and I believe they are creeping into this country too, where you are being taught how to be aware, or how to be attentive. The first thing is, if I may point out, don't join anything, don't join any group, any organization - I hope there is nobody here who is the head of organizations, or group leaders. Don't, because you need a mind that is capable of standing completely alone, not be burdened by the propaganda of others or the experiences of others. Enlightenment doesn't come through a leader, through a teacher, it comes through understanding of 'what is', which is in yourself, not running away from yourself. So don't, if I may most respectfully, suggest, don't join anything, especially the religious kind where they promise you Nirvana or God for five dollars, or give you some kind of talisman in the shape of words - we'll go into that presently; because the mind has to understand actually what is going on in the psychological field, in its own field, and therefore it must be aware of what is going on, aware without any distortion, without any choice, without any resentment, bitterness, explanation or justification, just to observe.

Now if this is laid happily, easily, with great joy, not compulsively but with ease, with felicity, without any hope of reaching anything, because if you have hope you are moving away from despair, therefore one has to understand despair, not search out hope - despair comes only when there is no understanding of 'what is' - out of despair you have bitterness. In the understanding of 'what is' there is neither despair nor hope.

All this is asking too much of the human mind, isn't it? Unless you ask the impossible you fall into the trap of: what is possible. And that trap is very easy, one has to ask the utmost of the mind, the mind has to ask and the heart, the greatest demand, otherwise we will slip into the easiest, the possible, the convenient, the comfortable.

Now we are all together still? Verbally probably you are but the word is not the thing. What we have done is to describe, the description is not the described. So if you are taking a journey with the speaker you are taking the journey actually, not theoretically, not as an idea, but something that you yourself are actually observing, and therefore not experiencing. There is a difference between observation and exploration and experience. May I go on into all this? I don't know how you stand all this. (Laughter) Because you see this is the life of the speaker - therefore he can go on, endlessly, because there is the everlasting fountain. But you, the other, the listener, unless you also have travelled deeply inwardly, it will have very little meaning.

So we are asking, what is meditation? And why we should meditate at all, why all this fuss about this word? Probably for some of you or many of you, this is the first time you hear that word. Or you already have a concept of it or already have been told by some wandering monk from India that you should meditate and gives you a formula. And you, unfortunately out of your greed and it is greed and nothing else, follow it. Here we are not offering you a thing - please understand that, because any formula, any method, any system, soon becomes repetitive and mechanical, it doesn't matter who gives that formula or that system, if you practise it you become what the method offers, and what the method offers is not truth, because truth is a living thing, method is mechanical. And if you practise it, in the practice, watching yourself, there is the one who practises and the thing to be practiced, therefore division, therefore conflict, therefore distortion, therefore disorder. Is that clear? Therefore don't accept any system from anybody.

Yes, sirs, which means you have to observe without any support, without any encouragement. Observation is entirely different from exploration in which is involved analysis. In analysis there is always the analyser and the thing to be analysed. Exploring - there must be an entity who explores, so that is, exploration is different from observation. Observation is a continuous learning, not continuous accumulation. I hope you see the difference. Learning is different from learning in order to accumulate and from that accumulation, act, or think. Whereas in exploration you are accumulating, there the mind is acquiring; and from that acquisition, adds things and so on.

So enquiry may be logical, must be logical, sane, rational but observation is entirely different - to observe without the observer. We went into it so I won't go into it now, there won't be time. Then the whole question of experience. I wonder why we want experience? Have you ever thought about it? We have thousands of experience all the time, of which you are cognizant or ignorant. Experiences are happening. But we want deeper, wider experiences - why? Don't you all want marvellous experiences? Mystical, mysterious, profound, transcendental, godly, spiritual - you want them, don't you? Why? Isn't it because one's own life is so shoddy, so miserable, so small, so petty. No? And therefore you want to forget those and move into another dimension altogether. How can a petty little mind, worried, fearful, occupied with the furniture, with the cook, with the 'what is', you know, problem after problem, how can such a mind experience anything other than its own projection and activity?

And to demand greater experience is to escape from 'what is'. And it is only through 'what is', is the most mysterious thing in life. So: and in experience also is involved the whole process of recognition, otherwise you wouldn't know you had an experience, you must recognize it as pleasant or transcendental or noble or beautiful, happy, this or that. Otherwise you won't know it is an experience.

So when you recognize it means you have already known. So your experiences generally, vastly, is out of the past, therefore there is nothing new in it. So there is a difference between observation, seeing, exploring, critically, rationally, sanely, and this craving for experience.

Now if that is clear, clear not verbally or intellectually but clear in the sense that you have put all that aside completely, including the method, purpose, search. You know, all this is extraordinarily subtle, demands great attention inwardly; then we can go and ask, what is meditation, what is all this noise they make about meditation? Volumes have been written, there are great - I don't know if they are great - yogis who come and teach you how to meditate. Now the first thing is, you really don't know anything about it, do you, actually, unless you are told? Do let's be a little bit honest. But the whole of Asia talks about meditation, that's one of their habits, as one of their habits to believe in God or something else. They sit for ten minutes a day in a quiet room and meditate, concentrate, fix their mind on an image - that image is created by themselves or somebody else has offered through propaganda that image. And during those ten minutes they try to control their mind and battle with the control, where the mind wants to go off, and battle, pull it back and forth you know, that game they play everlastingly. And that is what they call meditation. Right?

Then what is meditation? First of all, the mind, this mind that chatters, that projects ideas, that has contradiction, that lives in constant conflict and comparison, that mind must obviously be very quiet, mustn't it? To observe that mind must be extraordinarily quiet. If I am to listen to what you are saying I must give attention to what you are saying, I can't be chattering, I can't be thinking about something else. I mustn't compare what you are saying with what I already know, I must actually, completely listen to you. That means, the mind must be attentive, must be silent, must be quiet, mustn't it? Therefore, seeing the necessity that to observe clearly the mind must be quiet. To see clearly the mind must be quiet.

And because it is imperative to see clearly the whole structure of violence, and therefore to look at it, the mind must be completely still. Therefore you have a still mind. I don't know if you follow this. You don't have to cultivate a still mind. Right sir? Because to cultivate a still mind implies the one who cultivates in the field of time, that which he hopes to achieve. See what I have just now said, see the difficulty. Because all the people who try to teach meditation, they say, control your mind, your mind must be absolutely quiet. And you try to control it, and so everlastingly battle with it and spend forty years controlling it, which is completely silly, because any schoolboy can concentrate, control. We are not saying that at all, we are saying, on the contrary, the mind that observes - please do listen to this, that observes - doesn't analyse, is not seeking experience, merely observes, must be free from all noise. And therefore the mind becomes completely quiet. If I am to listen to you I must listen to you, not translate what you are saying or interpret what you are saying to suit myself, or condemn you or to judge it, must listen.

So that very act of listening is attention, which means, not to practise at all. If you practise it you have already become inattentive. Are you following all this?

So when you are attentive and your mind wanders off, which indicates it is inattentive, let it wander off and know that it is inattentive, and the very awareness of that inattention is attention. Don't battle with inattention, don't try and say, I must be attentive - it's childish. Know that you are inattentive, be aware, choicelessly, that you are inattentive. What of it? But the moment in that inattention there is action, be aware of that action?

Silence of the mind is the beauty in itself. To listen to the bird, to the voice of a human being, to the politician, to the priest, to all the noise of propaganda that goes on, to listen completely silently. And then you will hear much more, you will see much more.

Now, that silence is not possible if your body, the organism, is not also completely still. Do you understand? If your body, the organ, with all its nervous responses, all the fidgeting, the ceaseless movement of fingers, the eyes, you know, the restlessness of the body - that must be completely still. Have you ever tried sitting completely still, without a single movement of the body, including the eyes? Do it some time and you'll see. You may do it for five minutes or two minutes, that's good enough - don't say, how am I to keep it for ten minutes, for an hour - don't, that's greed! Do it for two minutes is enough. In that two minutes the whole of the thing is revealed, if you know how to look.

So the body must be still, because then the flow of the blood to the head becomes more. If you sit crouched, sloppy, then it is more difficult for the blood to go to the head. Which means, the body has its own intelligence, which the mind has spoiled, thought has destroyed. Thought seeks pleasure, therefore tasty foods, you follow, overeating, indulging, sexually, all the ways, compelling the body to do certain things - if it's lazy, force it not to be lazy, or take a pill to keep awake. That way we are destroying the innate intelligence of the organism. And when you do that, the organism becomes insensitive. And so you need great sensitivity, therefore one has to watch what one eats - I won't go into all that business, it's up to you. Because if you overeat, you know what happens, you know all the ugliness of all that. So we need a body that is highly sensitive, greatly intelligent. And therefore love, which doesn't become pleasure, love then is enjoyment, it is joy, pleasure has always a motive, joy has none, it is timeless. You can't say, I am joyous, the moment you've said it, it's gone. Or if you seek the cause of that joy you want it repeated and therefore it is no longer joy.

So there are these three things essential: the intelligence of the body, the capacity, the fullness of love, without the distortions of pleasure, which doesn't mean there are no pleasures, but which doesn't distort the mind. Look, you know, most of us have pain, physical pain in some form or another. And that pain generally distorts the mind, doesn't it? I wish I hadn't it, I wish I were better - you know, spends years, days, thinking about it. So when the body has pain, to watch it, to observe it and not let it interfere with the mind. You are following all this? Do it, sirs.

So the body, the mind including the brain, and the heart, which is supposed to be love, all that must be in total harmony. Now what is the point of all this, what is the point of this kind of life, this kind of harmony, what good is it in this world, where everybody is suffering and one or two people have this ecstatic life - what is the point of it? I wonder who is asking this question? If you are asking this question, what is the point of it, it has none whatsoever. But if you have this extraordinary thing going in your life, then it is everything, then you'll become the teacher, the disciple, the neighbour, the beauty of the cloud, you are all that. And that is love.

Then comes another point in meditation - do you want to go into all this? You know, the waking mind, the mind that is awake during the day, functioning along the lines in which it has been trained, the conscious mind, with all its daily activities, continues during sleep, the same activities - have you noticed it? In most of the dreams there is action going on, some kind or other, some happening, which is the same as the daily living. So your sleep is a continuation of the waking hours. Are you following all this?

Are you getting tired at the end of the talk? I'm surprised you are not tired - you must have had a hard day and this is not an entertainment, this is real work, work that you have never done before, therefore it must be exhausting.

So sleep is a continuation of the waking hours. And we give a lot of mysterious hocus-pocus to dreams. And then these dreams need to be interpreted and you have all the professionals interpreting the dreams for you, which you can yourself observe very simply if you watch your own life, your own life during the daytime. So the question is, why should there be dreams at all, though the psychologists say, from what they have told us, that you must have dreams, otherwise you'll go insane. But when you have observed very closely your waking hours and all your activities, the self-centred, the fearful, the anxious, the guilty, you know, watching it, attentive all day, then you will see that when you go to sleep, you sleep, you have no dreams, because during the day you have watched every movement of thought, the mind has been watching, attentive to every word. You work it out you will see the beauty of it, not the boredom of watching, but the beauty of watching.

So when the mind is attentive during the day, then there is attention in sleep. It doesn't matter whether you understand or not, I'll go on, because somebody, some day, will understand this. And it is important to understand it because, you see, conscious mind, the mind that is daily attentive, watching itself, cannot possibly touch something entirely different. So in sleep it is attentive and that is why meditation, the thing that we have talked about during this hour, becomes extraordinary important and worthwhile, full of dignity and grace and beauty, when you understand attention, not only during waking hours but also during sleep, Then the whole of the mind is totally awake. And beyond that every form of description is not the described, therefore don't talk about it. All that one can do is point to the door. And if you are willing to go, take a journey to that door, it's for you to walk - beyond that, nobody can describe the thing that is not nameable, whether that nameable is nothing or everything, doesn't matter. Anybody who describes it doesn't know. And one who says he knows, does not know.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 5TH SEPTEMBER 1971

Shall we go on with what we were talking about yesterday? We were saying yesterday that thought with its extraordinary capacity has created a world objectively and subjectively, a world of confusion, strife, constant battle both within and without, a wonderful world of technology; and at the same time thought has divided people into nationalities, religious beliefs, dogmas, rituals, and thought also in relationship with one another has emphasized the particular against the many and so on. And we said thought, though it has a very important place, is also an instrument of danger. Thought builds a great many images, both inwardly and outwardly, in all our relationships and hence there is a division in relationship which invariably brings about conflict and separation. Now that is more or less what we talked about yesterday, though I'm afraid I can't repeat all that was said, so if we may go on from there.

We said thought is image, measurable, and thought as image becomes the authority. I have an image about myself and I act according to that image, and there is a difference between that image and action. We are discussing this together, I am not giving a series of talks, I don't like that kind of thing, I rather we discussed it, shared it together and went into this very, very deeply, because if we could, this morning, go into the question of this whole structure of image, images that we have about ourselves and about others, and how it arises, whether it has importance or not importance, whether it is relevant or irrelevant, and where there is freedom and the interference of images as authority in freedom.

Right?

Life is action, living is action, whether you sit quietly attempting to meditate - I don't know whatever that may mean to you, that is an action. Everything is action - living is action and in that action there is contradiction. In that action there is incomplete and complete action. When the action is complete there is no regret, there is no looking back, or suffering - it is over, finished. But most of our actions are not, in our relationships, and this inaction in relationship is it not caused by the authority of the image which we have about ourselves or about another? Please investigate it together so that we understand something of this because I want to go deeply if we can this morning, into the question of freedom and fear.

And whether these images that one has - you know what I mean by images - you have images about yourself, haven't you, dozens of them? And these images become the authority in action. Right? And when we have say, for instance, communes, they are being formed all over the world, little groups, for those communes to function easily, efficiently, without any conflict between each other in the commune, if I belong to that commune, a particular commune, have any image what that commune should be, that image becomes the authority. Though I reject authority of the establishment - I am glad you are following. So I'm still slave to authority, though outwardly I reject the authority of the older generation and their whole set of ideas, beliefs, dogmas, their way of life, I am still conforming to the pattern of an authority. And that authority exerts itself when another image comes into conflict with it and we soon find a commune is broken up, as in society, as in every established order. So is it possible to act without the image as the authority? Because otherwise our relationship in co-operation, in living together becomes a contradiction, becomes a conflict - one authority imposing on another authority. I come here expecting the people to behave in a certain way, the people who live here - that's my authority and I assert that authority over others and then there is conflict between me and the people who are here. Right.

So I am asking myself, and you too I hope, whether we can have a relationship and therefore co-operation without any authority of the image? Because more and more as one observes in the world, whether in Europe, in America, in Asia, or in India, this problem is becoming more and more important: how to live together without any conflict. How to work together, co-operate together, bring about a decent society in which every form of conflict, inwardly, when extended becomes war, can we live together without this conflict? Which means can I live in this world with many or with few without any sense of authority as the image which I have established for myself as the pattern of behaviour. Go on sirs, let's work together at this.

Q: When people share an experience there seems to be an image created when people try to relate to each other about the experience they have shared. Those that haven't had the experience can't share in the image.

K: So experience then becomes the image which becomes the authority. I know, and you don't know, I have experienced Nirvana, god, whatever it is, and you haven't, you are a poor unfortunate heathen and I'm not. The whole thing becomes absurd. So please this is really a very serious question. It isn't just a thing you casually answer or assert but it requires a great deal of examination and exploration: whether the human mind which has built for its own security, in its relationship with other human beings, a series of images as knowledge, and if these images remain then there must be separation and therefore conflict in relationship. And these images are built by thought, and can there be a relationship based on thought without the image, and if there is no image is that love? Please follow? So can there be an action without any sense of authority?

Q: Yes.

K: No, don't say 'yes', or 'no', please. Please enquire into it.

In my life, in my daily life, in contact with so many people, much more intelligent, more clever, more beautiful, sensitive, can I live with them without any form of friction, without any image, and yet be in relationship in which co-operation is possible? So I have to find out why these images exist and whether these images can be dissolved - how to dissolve them after having built them - then I can perhaps have a decent relationship with another - which means never building images - you see the problem.

Q: How can you order millions of people without having images of how they should be ordered?

K: How can you have order over a million people without creating an image? But I don't want to order a million people. I don't want to assert any authority over anybody. Because I don't place myself as a guru, as a teacher, as an authority of any kind. No, no. Sir, let's take oneself, begin with oneself and then extend it.

Then we may be able to find a way of dealing with others in a totally different way.

Q: Sir...

K: Sir, first just listen to what I have to say - not that I am preventing you from asking questions. First let us see the extraordinary complexity of the problem. And because it is complex one has to approach it very simply.

Q: By saying you have to dissolve images, doesn't that mean that you are putting a separation between the image and yourself?

K: No sir, is not the image that you have about yourself part of yourself? Can you divide yourself from the image - you are the images, the many images that you have about yourself - you are that. You are the furniture because you have identified yourself with the furniture. You are the house, the wife, the husband, the girl, the boy, the various experiences, knowledge, hopes, fears, angers, jealousies, you are all that - all those are the images you have.

Q: If you cultivated universal love you could cure that, you could dissolve all that conflict.

K: If you could cultivate universal love all these images would come to an end - that's the question. Can you cultivate love? Like you cultivate a tomato? No, I am not being sarcastic, please - can I cultivate humility, can I cultivate love? And if it is cultivated, is it love? Is it not the product of thought?

Q: You must see the point of view of another as well as your own point of view, and then you relate to each other.

K: You are making it all so complex. I'd rather be very simple about this.

First I realize, as most of us do, that we have a great many images about others and about ourselves. These images are put together by thought - thought being knowledge. I have lived with you, and in that relationship I have built various forms of images, because you and I have quarrelled, you and I have been angry - do you follow - the whole thing, sex, image after image. And these images with their knowledge, become my authority. That's simple enough.

So the next thing is: how am I, with all these images, conscious as well as deeply unconscious, how am I to be free of them, how is the mind not to create more and to dissolve what has already been created? Do you follow? Now how will you set about it? First of all let us deal with the unconscious images that one has, of which one may not be aware. Right? Let's begin not with the superficial things but the very, very deep-rooted images. How am I consciously to examine all the images which lie hidden in the cave, in the depth, in the hidden recesses of my mind? Would you do it through analysis, which is the fashion. You follow? The fashion is not only now but it has been always, throughout all cultures, analysis. Would analysis expose the images in the recesses of one's mind? Please let's examine together.

Q: How can one analyse if one is changing all the time?

K: How can one analyse if one is changing all the time. Is analysis possible if one is changing all the time? Is one changing all the time, or changing the images all the time? The images about myself changing, I don't like that image, I like that image and so there is constant movement from one image to another. That's not change. Change implies a total cessation of image-forming.

So please let's stick to one thing.

Q: What is the basis of the image?

K: What is the basis of image? That's what we are going to find out. You will see it in a minute, we'll go into it. All right, let's examine, what is the basis of images? You say something to me - you call me a fool - and I react to that - I react to it because I have an image about myself as not being a fool. And I react according to the image I have about myself, obviously. Because I have established this this image, now what is the basis of that image? Why do I have an image about myself at all? Is it not part of our education? Which is comparative. You must be as clever as that boy or girl. Right? Does it begin in education that way, giving me marks, giving examinations, the whole process of education is comparative. And there is the beginning of the basis of image-building. That's one. Then there is the image-building through propaganda - my country, your country, my god, your god. The division between the scientist, the artist, the businessman, the woman in the kitchen - you follow - the division. The more sensitive one is, the greater the burden of images.

Now, how am I or you to examine the unconscious, deeply hidden images that one has? Is it possible through analysis? Analysis implies the analyser. The analyser has his image. Right? And with his image he is analysing. His image is his knowledge - I don't know if you are following all this - and in the process of analysing with an image the other images, is there not an assertion of authority of one image over others? Right? And analysis implies a duration, a time, a length of time. And every analysis must be complete, otherwise the next analysis is carried over by the misunderstandings of what you have examined or analysed. Right? So for me analysis is totally false. I won't touch analysis. To me, that prevents action, because I keep on analysing till I die, and I don't act. A very clever way of avoiding any kind of complete commitment and action.

Q: What do you mean by analysing?

K: Examining, finding the cause and going further behind the cause, you know step by step, analysing, examining.

Q: Isn't that thought?

K: That is thought, obviously.

Q: There is the image.

K: Therefore I say to myself, through analysis the image will continue in different forms. There is no ending to the image through analysis. Right? So I must find a different way of understanding and dissolving the images, and preventing the images from coming into being - so I see analysis doesn't resolve, doesn't end the image formation. Then there are these images in me, in you, deeply? How is the mind to dissolve them? Because analysis is finished. I don't know if you see it. It is false.

Q: I was thinking that although every image is itself the same person, distorted, perhaps one image can be less distorted than another, if somebody is in real trouble analysis may remove the severely distorted images, necessarily replacing them by other images less distorted...

K: Less distorted.

Q: ...which will place him in a position to begin to remove all images.

K: I understand. Therefore the less distorted image replaced by a little less distorted image and so on and so on and on. I've no time for that, life is much too short. I want to find out a way of ending all images, not the less distorted and so on. I don't know if you follow, if I am making myself clear?

My question is: how am I, how is the mind to explore and expose the hidden images? And I see analysis replacing one image by another image has no value, to me it is utterly futile, irrelevant. Therefore I must find a different way, because logically I see the truth and the falseness of analysis. I don't know if you do because that's one of our conditionings - introspection, analysis, trying to become better - the whole thing. So I am asking, is there a way of exposing all the images both conscious as well as the hidden?

Now have dreams any significance in this examination? Most of us have innumerable dreams, and some of them are relevant and others are irrelevant. And some can be understood as the dreaming is going on and the explanation is going on - have you noticed it? Can I go on with this? Are we meeting each other? I hope so. So what are dreams, why should I dream at all? I know some of the people - professionals - who have said you must dream otherwise you will go crazy. It is part of your life to dream. And I question it: I don't want to dream. I want to find out why I dream. Because sleep may have a totally different significance than merely carrying on with dreams endlessly. What are dreams? Why does the mind dream at all? Are dreams an attempt to bring order in life? You understand? If I have an orderly life - we'll go into what is order - if I have an orderly life, would I dream at all? I do not know if you have noticed that before you go to sleep, don't you go over the day's happenings? Don't you? Recall everything that's happened, say, I should not have done this, I should have done that, this was better done, and that was better said, I wish I hadn't - you follow - don't you do this - why?

Q: Yes.

K: Why do you do it? Isn't it to put order - no? Come on.

Q: Yes.

K: Obviously. To try to bring about order, and if you don't do it, the brain does it while you are asleep, because the brain can only function in order, efficiently, when it has complete order - no? The neurotic person cannot function orderly. It is only the mind, the brain, that has established order within itself that can function logically, healthily, sanely. No?

So the brain is always attempting to establish order within itself, and dreams may be the expression of trying to bring order. So if I can during the day - please follow this - during the day, the waking hours, bring order, complete order, then there'll be no necessity for dreams at all, then something totally different takes place - which we will go into if we understand what order is. May we go on now?

Q: That depends on your image of what order should be.

K: I am coming to that sir. I have no image.

Q: There are times when you say we have bad dreams, are they trying to bring order or disorder?

K: Obviously, it is disorder. Bad dreams - you may have overeaten, god knows what and then there are nightmares and all that. But sir, look at it, look at it very simply do, this is a very complex problem therefore we must approach it very simply. One realizes without reading books and all that - personally I don't read any of these books - one realizes the brain can only function in order and in security properly. It will find security in disorder and then that becomes neurosis. It will find security in a belief and think that is order - that becomes another form of neurosis. It finds security in nationalism - you follow - see all the complications, and that security in nationalism brings disorder because it separates whole nations.

So the brain trying to find order at the same time creates disorder. Am I working or are you also working?

Q: Well, if the mind is in a state of disorder, what can it do?

K: We are going to find out. So I say to myself, dreams may be an expression or a way of bringing about order while I am asleep, while the body is asleep. And why can't I, during the waking hours, establish order? So I have to find out what order is. Right? Is that order based on my image of what order should be? Then it is not order. So I have to find out what is disorder, not order. Right? Because through disorder I shall find out what is order; it will naturally happen, through negation come to the positive, not assertion of the positive. I don't know if you follow? Can we move along together?

So what is disorder in my life - in your life - what it is, not what you think is disorder. Because the moment thought says, this is disorder, then thought has a pattern of order. You see - you follow? And therefore it imposes what thought thinks is order on disorder, in which there is contradiction and a discipline, a suppression - you follow - all that follows. All right? So I must find out what is disorder, what causes disorder, what is the nature of disorder. What do you think is disorder?

Q: Thought.

K: Thought is disorder, he says.

Q: When you are not permanently absorbed in what you are doing there is disorder.

K: When you are not absorbed totally in what you are doing, then there is disorder. Look at the varieties of opinions we are going to have. Listen to it, listen, when you have varieties of opinions, that is the very nature of disorder: so opinion is disorder. No?

Q: But that is an opinion.

K: Wait, wait, no, it is not an opinion, it is not another opinion. I see you have an opinion and another has an opinion and so on - why should I have an opinion about anything? Either it is, or it is not - why should I have an opinion? Then you don't see.

Q: Once one uses language the very words bring disorder.

K: I have to use language - and we use language and say, look, I am using a word hesitatingly - look, don't attach too much importance to that word - let's change the word if it isn't representative of the meaning I want to give to that word and so on. That's all settled and established but I want to go much deeper. Which is, I see factually the moment there are opinions, that is one of the causes of disorder. Why should I have an opinion about that microphone? Or about how you behave - why should I have it? Or you have an opinion of how I should behave. Why?

Q: Interesting.

K: Opinion is interesting, is it? No, please.

Q: Would you say that disorder is that which opposes the flow of evolution?

K: No, no, I don't want to enlarge it. Would you say opposing evolution is disorder? Now what is evolution?

Q: A process of becoming.

K: What is becoming, who is becoming?

Q: Everyone.

K: Please, please look at it - who is becoming? The 'me' that is becoming?

Q: Either one is, or one is becoming.

K: That's right. Now look, I see that I am dull, that is a fact. Now how do I know I'm dull? Because I've compared myself with you who are not dull. So I have in comparing myself with you, in measuring myself with you, I have made myself dull. No? Am I dull if I don't compare? Please look at it. So any form of comparison is disorder. You follow, we are collecting what makes for disorder - opinion, comparison. Right? And when there is a contradiction in myself - I want this and I don't want that, I must fulfil, I must be great - do you follow - contradiction in myself, fragmentation in myself. So fragmentation, comparison, opinion are some of the causes of disorder. Right? And identifying myself with a particular image and rejecting other images is one of the factors of disorder; whereas order is the rejection totally of all images, living a life without comparison. Are you following?

So I see there is disorder where there is this constant indulgence in opinions, so I say to myself, have I opinions? Why should I have opinions? It is such an irrelevant waste of time, isn't it? It is a form of gossip - it is so stupid, it has no meaning. And am I living a life of comparison, always comparing myself with you or with somebody who is more clever, more intelligent, more bright, nicer looking - oh, this battle that goes on. And is there in me any form of image imposing one image over the other, you know? Or do I see that any form of image in myself brings disorder? So I have discovered many sources of disorder. And when these sources dry up there is naturally order. Then there will be no dreaming at night. Do you follow? Because I have established during the day complete order and that means the mind must be completely aware all the time - no, I won't use 'all the time' - the mind must be aware during the waking hours so that when you go to sleep the mind is quiet.

Q: Surely the only way to establish perfect order is for either you yourself or the group of people in their life is to live completely by themselves and to relate to nobody else. That is the only way you can make a perfect plan for fitting in everything that you need for your particular way of life.

K: I understand sir, I understand. No, I will put the question differently. Can you live with any group, with any individual, with any community, having order in yourself? Obviously if you have order in yourself you can live with anybody, with the most neurotic person.

Q: That is what I meant by becoming, the fact a neurotic person must have some means to establish that order in himself.

K: He has to...

Q: How does the ordinary man become aware in his sleep all the time?

K: I am going to show you. Not the ordinary man who is not here. We are the ordinary people and if we lived differently we'd be extraordinary people.

So I see, it is observable, you can experiment with this if you are serious enough, that a mind which has order during the day - we said order is the understanding of the processes of disorder, not imposing what it thinks is order on disorder, but seeing what is disorder actually in daily life, as opinion, comparison, image and so on, then during the waking hours you are aware of all the disorders and therefore bringing order in your life, the brain then when it sleeps, is quiet because it has order. Now what happens when the brain is totally quiet, except it is recording but it is recording superficially, very, very little, you understand? I don't know whether you have done this experiment with your sleep a little bit - oh Lord, am I talking Greek? Because you see, sir, this is part of meditation, of which you don't know.

Q: What will a group of people with such a mind create?

K: Sir, what such a mind, a group of such people will create is irrelevant. First what is relevant, have you such a mind? Are you working for such a mind so that such a mind will make a better world. Do you follow? Not, is that mind an anarchistic mind. That is just a theory. What we are concerned with here is, you sitting there and we sitting together to find out what it is to have an orderly mind, which means a mind that is orderly can live in any society, with any group, create a new kind of society.

So we see the unconscious images can be dissolved totally if there is an awareness of your activities and motives and movements of thought during the waking hours. Are we meeting each other? So that I don't have to examine my unconscious because the unconscious is as stupid and as trivial as the conscious. Because consciousness is the content, without the content what is consciousness? We won't go into that for the moment as that leads somewhere else.

So now the question from that arises: how am I to prevent image-forming? I know how to dissolve them. You understand? By becoming tremendously aware, as I pointed out, during the day, attentive to what you are doing, how you move your arm as you walk, your speech - you follow - the movement of your eyes - and that is why in meditation they say, "Keep your eyes closed" - we won't go into all that for the moment, into meditation. So if one is aware of all that during the day, attentive, you can dissolve the images that one has. Now how is one to prevent image-forming? You understand my next question? Are you interested in all this?

A: Yes.

K: Ah, of course!

What is an image? Obviously it is put together by thought - thought being the response of various accumulations of memories. Right? If I had no memories there is no thinking. Right? Very simply, I ask you where you live and your response is immediate. I ask you your name and your response is immediate - because you don't have to think about it - you have thought about it, repeated it, it is instant response. If a more complicated question arises you have a time interval between the question and the answer. In that process you are thinking, thinking according to your memories, experiences, knowledge. Right? And if you are asked a question about something about which you know nothing, your memory can't operate because you know nothing. But if you say, "Well, do you believe in God" - you say, 'Yes' because - you follow - or not, according to your conditioning, which is your knowledge, the result of 2,000 years of propaganda, or 10,000 years of propaganda.

So thought is the response of memory, knowledge, which is the past. Now I am asking myself, I know thought puts together the images - you call me a fool and I have already built an image about you and about myself. You insult me, you praise me - image - you follow? Any incident, happening, image immediately is formed. I am asking myself and you, whether such images need be formed at all. And I see the danger of images, the absurdity, the irrelevancy of images, and I see the necessity of putting an end to them. How is this to happen? Go on sirs.

Q: Don't you begin to end them when you see that they are images?

K: Yes, but how do you prevent it? You call me a fool, how am I to prevent myself from forming an image about you, which says, she is absurd, she is my enemy, I don't like her?

Q: What is wrong with not liking somebody?

K: No, no, you are missing my point.

Q: Has questioning got anything to do with this?

K: Sir, I am asking you - we see images are formed, how quickly, consciously or unconsciously, they are formed all the time - now how is the mind to prevent that?

Q: Not only if you call me a fool, if you call me anything.

K: Yes, sir. You follow, if I flatter you, I say what a lovely man you are, you will purr like a cat. It is so obvious. So how is this image-making to stop? Please enquire into it.

Q: By not identifying with the body.

K: That means who is it who is going to make the attempt not to identify?

Q: If I wanted to stop making an image of you - why want to stop?

K: No, I see the danger of images. Right? I have been brought up from the age of eight or nine or less in India with a tremendous conditioning - I won't go into all that. And there I was conditioned. And I meet a Catholic later and say, how absurd he is with his dogma, his belief and his saviours, his images and all the rest of it - which is my image against another image. And I see this division invariably brings about conflict. And I want to live in peace. You follow? Peace, not just an idea of peace, be peaceful, completely, so that there is not a flutter of violence in me. And that can only end when the image-forming comes to an end.

Q: What do you do when you meet evil?

K: Now wait a minute, what do you call evil?

Q: Cruelty.

K: Cruelty. Now wait a minute - cruelty, cruelty to animals?

Q: Children.

K: Now wait, wait, wait a minute, we'll go slowly. Cruelty to animals - I'm sure the majority of you are meat eaters. Face it, sirs. Cruelty - you see you accept cruelty in one direction and not in another. You don't want to be cruel to children and yet you are cruel to animals. And if you say, I must not be cruel to children, aren't you cruel to children when you compare one child with another? Please sir, killing another human being by a word, by a gesture or with a gun, it is the same - and we indulge in that, don't we? Oh, he is a stupid man - finished. Or he doesn't belong to that class - you know?

So please let's get back. How do you prevent image-forming so that the mind has never an image, whatever you do? No, please, sir, just look at it first, look at the problem first. Whatever you do - run away with my wife, do anything you like, cheat me, everything you like, and yet no formation of any kind.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are too quick in answering these things.

Q: Can't we all stop thinking long enough to listen to Krishnamurti, which is why apparently we have all come here. Couldn't we please just listen to the man and then go away and think.

K: Sir, don't go away and then think, but do it now, because it is now you are here; when you go away you will dissipate it. While you are here work at it. Which is, I am asking: how am I, how are you, to prevent any kind of formation of image, whatever another does? You know it is one of the most difficult things, you understand? You run away with my wife, you know what happens - hate, jealousy, anxiety, fear. You cheat me, you do all kinds of things, say things against me. So can the mind never create an image? I will show you how it is done. If you do it, if you are serious about it, if you play with it you won't do it.

As we said, if during the day you are aware - aware, attentive of everything that is happening inside you - and you can pay complete attention to what you do, your gestures, your words, your ideas, your motives, just, you know - attentive, not correcting, just watching - in the same way if when you are called a fool you are completely attentive, then there is no formation of image. It is only when the mind is inattentive, not attentive, the image is formed.

When I listen to you completely, with real attention - we'll go into what is attention - real attention, there is no me to get hurt. I don't know if you have been so completely attentive so that there is no centre, only attention. In that attention the observer is the entity that creates and reacts to images. When there is no observer in that attention there is no image-forming at all. So what is attention? Now, attention means listening, seeing, without any distortion, doesn't it? Which means no opinion, no comparison, you follow, all that. No disorder, so when the mind listens completely, attends at the moment when you call me a fool, completely attends, there is no image, there is no time or energy to create images because all your energy is taken in complete attention. I don't know if you feel all this?

Q: How would you deal with personal sorrow?

K: We will deal with that next Tuesday or when we are going to discuss - perhaps next Saturday. But take just this one thing for the moment: that is, when the mind is completely attentive, and it cannot be completely attentive if - attention means harmony, doesn't it, harmony between the body, the mind and the heart, complete harmony, not established by an idea of what harmony should be, then it is thought imposing an image of what harmony is upon the disorder of the body, mind and heart, which is just like continuing or strengthening or perpetuating disorder - so when the body, the heart and the mind are completely attentive, which means the whole being is attentive, then there is no image-making at all. Right? Do it, not tomorrow, now as you are listening. I think we had better stop, don't you?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE

7TH SEPTEMBER 1971

K: What shall we talk over together?

Q: The difference between analysis and immediate examination of one's reactions? Why in spite of such examinations the responses continue?

Q: Can I change my fears, my continuous anxiety, uncertainty and is it possible to change radically?

Q: Sir, if you give full attention to 'what is' I need abundant energy. How am I to have this energy if I have to do a repetitive job every day of the week?

Q: There is a increasing sense of mental illness, imbalance, what should one do about it?

K: Now which of these shall we discuss?

Q: The first one.

Q: Any of them.

Q: One that will answer all of them.

K: Could we take one that would cover all the others?

Q: The last one.

K: The last one and the first. The first one was: what is the difference between analysis and examination of one's reactions, one's immediate reactions, and yet in spite of that examination these reactions continue? And the other is: I am full of fears, deep rooted uncertainties, how am I to be completely free of them? Right, shall we discuss these two? Really? All right? It's a lovely morning, I don't know why we are doing this, but it doesn't matter.

You know there are a great many theories - and I was listening to one of them on the television last night for a few minutes - about human behaviour, and how to change it. There are hundreds of explanations for the cause of this human behaviour, the misery and all the rest of it, and various theories what to do about them.

Analysis implies, doesn't it, a division between the observer and the thing to be analysed. Right? Let's be clear on that point. When I analyse myself and my reactions, or observe my behaviour, there is the act and the actor. Isn't there? There is a division between the two generally. And this division not only creates conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be', which is introduced by the observer. Please, this is not a talk by me, we are discussing. I am angry, or jealous, or frightened and I want to get rid of that fear, that jealousy, I want to overcome it, so when I observe this whole phenomenon I see there is fear and the entity who is separate from that fear who says, "I must get rid of that fear". Right? Then he begins to analyse that fear, tries to find out the cause of that fear, tries to control it, discipline it, you know the whole conflict that goes on. Is there this separation at all? Please, we must discuss this before we answer your question, sir, we are answering your question.

Is there this division between the observer and the thing he calls anxiety, fear, guilt and so on?

Q: I would say there is at that point of awareness.

K: No, just observe it in oneself, sir. Is there such division? There is, isn't there?

Q: If there is a division there must also be a unity.

K: No. Let us actually see what takes place. I am angry, or jealous, or frightened, and I want to get rid of it. No? Let's be simple about this.

Q: When I am afraid the fear seems to be me.

K: Wait. At the moment of actual fear there is no division. Hold on to that. Watch it. At the moment of actual reaction there is no division, a few minutes later, or a second later, the division takes place, doesn't it? We are talking of that division, not at the moment of actual reaction of fear, or jealousy, whatever it is. Is there such a division?

Q: No.

K: No, this is very important, because you can't just say there isn't. If there is no division between 'what is' and 'what should be', the observer and the observed, then what will you do? Come on sirs.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madame, let's examine it for the moment, please. I experience at this moment - what? - fear. At the moment, at this actual moment there is no observer or division between fear and myself, there is only fear.

Q: As soon as you become aware of it.

K: Then begins a moving away from that actual moment of fear, then the division takes place. Why does this division take place?

Q: Because if you are only aware...

K: Don't say, 'if'.

Q: Well, once you are aware...

K: No, not - please stick to what actually goes on. Who is it - we don't like it?

Q: The observer, the I.

K: Therefore you must go into this a little more slowly please.

At the moment of actual experiencing of any human reactions, at that moment there is no division. That is a fact. A second, or a minute later, the division takes place. First of all why?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Why does the mind do it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just observe it in yourself, sir, before you answer it. I am angry, at the moment of anger there is no division. A second or so later there is division. Why does this division take place?

Q: It is part of the ego, which is me.

Q: The observer establishes 'what should be'.

K: Why does this go on? You understand? At the moment I see a sunset, very beautiful, there is no sense of remembering. A moment later I want to remember it, store it up, and tomorrow I want to repeat it, I want to have the same experience. Why does this take place?

Q: Because the experience leaves a mark on the brain as experience and therefore there is memory of it, and this memory divides.

K: Sir, how do you find out the truth of the matter, not your opinion, my opinion, or the expert's opinion, how do you find the truth of this thing? I want to find the truth of it, not my opinion, or your opinion, or somebody else's conclusion, I want to know the actual truth of it. How do I do that?

Q: The experience of one is the same as the experience of another.

K: We are not discussing that, sir, please.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, obviously not.

Q: Is it the memory of fear that divides?

K: Therefore fear itself is different from the memory of that fear. Does the division take place because of memory? Now wait, watch it. Somebody says something and there are ten different opinions, conclusions, expressions. Now what is one to do? Which is the right thing - your opinion, my opinion, your experience or my experience, how do we find out the truth of any matter?

Q: We desire to experience again the old experience.

K: You're not meeting my point. Now look, sir, at the moment of fear there is no division. That's clear. At the moment of actually experiencing anything there is no division. A second later division takes place. I want to find out why. Now how do I find out?

Q: What you were saying.

K: Which means what? I want to find out the truth which is irrevocable, which will be truth, how do I find that out, about why this division takes place? How do I find out?

Q: I don't see how you can do anything to find out.

K: I'll show it to you in a minute, sir. You see you are all so full of opinions, conclusions, judgements, you haven't time even to say, let's look.

Q: You have to be a realized man.

K: I don't know anything about realized man, but I want to be quite clear why this division exists. The question was, at the beginning: analysis is one thing, and immediate perception of one's reactions is another. Analysis does not necessarily dissolve the pain, the anxiety, and immediate perception appears, for the moment at least, to dissolve it. But it again recurs. Right? That was the question we are discussing.

We are saying, what do we mean by analysis? Let's go back to it. What do we mean by analysis? Analysis implies examination, doesn't it, investigation. In that investigation there is the examiner and the examined. No? And I say why does this division take place? Or is it because our usual habit is to divide everything?

Is it my conditioning that brings about this division, because all my life I have been trained that I must conquer, control, suppress, discipline, I am different from the body, the body is different from the spirit, the spirit is different - you know, divide, divide, fragmented, is that one of the reasons why there is this division?

Q: Where does the conditioning come from?

K: My grandmothers did it, my great-great-great grandmothers, the past generations have done this, and I have been brought up in that culture. And they have said, control.

Q: When did it start? Why did it start?

K: Because that is the only way they could think of, there is no other way.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, we are examining this thing, please. Is it my conditioning that brings about this division? I divide the whole of my life - the artist, the scientist, the bureaucrat, the professional, the politician, the bank, you follow, my whole life is fragmented. No?

Q: I don't call that conditioning.

K: Sir, let's leave the word conditioning. My whole life is fragmented. Right?

Q: The whole world is fragmented.

K: Wait, the world is me, I am the world. So there is this fragmentation. Right? And that's one of the reasons why I have divided myself from my reaction. No?

Q: It might happen the other way round.

K: Which is the other way round?

Q: The egg or the chicken?

K: Then we are lost.

Q: We are.

Q: Well is it not that there is fragmentation of one's life.

K: Wait, just go slowly, see what takes place. We must go slowly. Your life and one's life is fragmented. That's a fact. And at the moment of experience all fragmentation ceases. Right? At the moment you call me a fool there is no fragmentation, a second later it begins. Right? So my question is, how am I - how is the mind to observe the whole phenomenon of existence without fragmentation?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I said that. Therefore, sir, what will you do?

Q: How am I to live at that moment and continue every experience without fragmentation?

Q: Why is it so bad?

K: I don't say it is bad or good. The fact is one is fragmented. Right? And how is one to be non-fragmented? That is the real question, isn't it?

Q: You must think from the whole.

K: Sir, how am I to think from the whole? What does the whole mean?

Q: You are experiencing all the time.

K: Sir, we are not talking about experiencing all the time. We are asking...

Q: We are doing now with you exactly what we do with ourselves, we try to analyse thought and we are utterly fragmented. I try to see the irony of it - a thousand and one points of view about experience.

K: Sir, look, I see in the world - and the world is myself, and myself is the world, that's a fact - I see fragmentation everywhere, nationalities, the Muslim, the Hindu, the Christian, the Buddhist, fragmented - the artist, the writer, the thinker, the philosopher, the scientist, you know, division after division, fragmentation. And my life is fragmented and I look at everything from that point of view. I look at fear, not at the moment I experience it, but later, and I must get rid of it, I must conquer it, I must develop courage, which is another fragmentation. Right? No?

Q: But surely we are only fearful when somebody wants to...

K: Yes, yes, we said that. But there are other forms of fear.

Q: Are we not fragmented inside?

K: Yes, sir, that's the whole problem.

Q: You say we are acting in unity when we have some critical experience, but I don't seem to have any of these things inside. My brain is limited and any fragmentation, as you used that word, is between my state of mind now and the next second and the next second.

K: That's right. I know this. All that is implied in fragmentation.

Q: At any one time.

K: Yes, sir, I understand that. So I am asking how is it possible to look at life non-fragmentarily?

Q: Is not the practical problem - and we all have the same - how to join our many mental concepts from the moment of birth to the moment now into an harmonious whole.

K: That's all I am saying, exactly the same thing, sir. How am I to live harmoniously - and harmony means non-division between the mind, the heart and the body, if you can for the moment put it that way - a complete sense of harmony in which there is no division, no breaking up, no fragmentation, no conflict. How is that possible?

Q: I need a lot of luck, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are not answering my question at all.

Q: Sir, it seems people don't care because everybody is quite happy with this fragmentation.

K: All right, be that.

Q: Unless one sees the necessity of change one can talk about endlessly.

K: I agree, sir. I quite agree.

Q: And you need energy to see there is a desperate urgency to change.

K: Look sir, there is a war going on between Israel and the Arabs, that is the result of fragmentation, isn't it? And if I want to live in a world that is so destructive peacefully, how are you to do it? You must be non-fragmented mustn't you. You must be neither an Israelite or an Arab, a Hindu or a Muslim. Right? Are you?

Q: No.

K: Why not? When you see the importance of living peacefully, why do you accept fragmentation like that, which leads to war?

Q: Why should one be fragmented?

K: But you are. Oh, you don't even listen.

Q: Because we still separate ourselves from the other person.

K: That's right sir. I agree sir, these are all the various reasons.

But I want to find out how to live a life in which there is no fragmentation, and therefore no conflict, and therefore live a life that is completely harmonious and peaceful. How an I to do it?

Q: You need a lot of experience and help.

K: You are really not interested in it, are you?

Q: I am, I am.

Q: He can't tell us how to do it, can he?

K: Wait a minute, sir, you see you have opinions already.

Q: Sir, it seems easy to see outwardly what fragmentation does in K: I am coming to that, sir. Outwardly we see the fragmentations and what they do in the world, and there is also inward fragmentation. We are broken up inside. How is all this to end?

Q: By not having images.

K: Are you telling me theoretically? Have you no images? You have no images?

Q: Yes I have.

K: Therefore why talk about it? Get rid of it and then you can tell me what to do.

Q: Experience it.

K: My lord!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, do listen for a few minutes, would you. There is outward fragmentation, as nationality, scientist, housekeeper, you know, fragmentation outwardly, and there is fragmentation when one is divided in oneself. Inwardly and outwardly. And inwardly there is the thinker and the thought, the experience and the future experiencer, there is a division all the time. And I see such a division both outwardly and inwardly creates great disharmony. Right? And that disharmony prevents one from seeing things very clearly, living a very clear, simple, direct life. Now how am I to be free of all these fragments, outwardly and inwardly? Is it at all possible, and if it is not possible then let's give it up. If it is possible let's find out.

Q: Is there something else possible because when I have an experience which I accept, and don't resist, the accepted one doesn't seem to be so divided as the one that I resist.

K: Why should you accept any experience, or reject any?

Q: Because it is there.

K: No. Acceptance means holding, and the other means resistance. So you are resisting anything which you don't like and keeping those which you like - which means a division.

Q: If you don't hold on to anything then you are reborn every minute.

K: That's a supposition. If you don't hold on to anything then you are reborn every minute. But I do hold on to my.... please do give a little attention to what is being said. Don't carry on with your own thoughts, with your own ideas, with your own conclusions, you are here to listen to somebody, aren't you? Not only to me, to each other. But you don't, you are carrying on with your own ideas.

There is fragmentation both outwardly and inwardly, this division. Division invariably creates conflict, and I want to live a life that is completely without conflict, which is to live a life of non-violence. Now how am to do this?

Q: Conflict is essential to the world.

K: Then fight.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, please, I am talking of conflict inwardly, not on the roof. Wait a minute - the wars, not the shadow on the canvas, wars, the hatred between people, the quarrels between husband and wife, the brutality. No?

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: You are talking about your conflict. Why don't you listen?

K: I want to find out how to live a life of harmony. How do you do this? Please tell me how to set about to live a life of harmony, in which the division as the 'me' and the 'not me', we and they come to an end.

Q: First of all we have got to accept that there is such a thing as harmony.

K: Why should I accept that there is such a thing as harmony. All that I know is that we are in discord. I want to find out a way of ending that discord.

Q: You have to examine discord.

K: All right, I have examined it. I am brought up as a Hindu for the last fifty years and you are brought up as a Muslim - or if you are a Hindu I'll be a Muslim - I have been brought up as a Muslim for fifty years and you have been brought up as a Hindu for fifty years - and the cause is my conditioning.

Q: Why are they two things?

K: My darling sir!

Q: What causes it?

K: A group of people believed that Mohammed was the only prophet, and the people round him made a propaganda and converted others with swords, war and all the rest of it. And the others, in the beginning there was a group of Hindus who said we are all Hindus, different. There it is. Need we go into all these obvious reasons?

You see we have nearly spent twenty, thirty minutes, discussing the most obvious things.

Q: Is it possible to record and not do something about it?

K: Now how do you, sir, that's the whole point.

Q: We don't know how to do it.

K: If you say, I really don't know what to do, then we can discuss. But if you say, yes, what is the reason we are divided, let's go into what is the cause - you follow? If you really say, I really don't know how to live a life totally harmonious, then we have a point of contact.

Q: Would it be useful if you investigated the fragmentation more and more deeply, would that bring about non-fragmentation?

Q: Surely we must concentrate only on fragmentation of the mind. We are born of different colours and in different parts of the world, that is obvious. So let's concentrate on the fragmentation of the mind.

K: Sir, that's what we are doing.

Q: Even if we get rid of Hindus and...

K: ...communists, Catholics and Irish and non-Irish... yes, sir, yes sir.

Q: We still have disagreements on those subjects, we are still going to have Africans and Europeans.

K: Sir, that is not what we are talking about.

Look, I have a problem: my problem is I come to you all and say, look, I want to live really a life of deep harmony in which I have no conflict, but I have good relationship with people, in which there are no quarrels, battles, and anxiety. I want to live a completely harmonious life. Now wait a minute, don't answer me. I come to you because I am very serious. I want to live that way. I'll give up everything to live that way, including my house, my property, my gods, I want to live that way. I come to you. What is your answer?

Q: I don't know.

K: Right, you don't know, do you. Therefore let's find out how to do it. You don't know and I don't know. Right? Then let's find out how - starting from not knowing let's find out, shall we? Not knowing, and you mean not knowing, don't invent afterwards this, that, you follow? You really don't know. If you knew it you would live it wouldn't you? So since you don't know it, let us start from not knowing. Right? Now if you don't know you are living harmoniously. Do please pay attention to what I am saying, for god's sake. If you say, "I really don't know what to do", then what will you do? Oh, do listen sir, please listen. If you really don't know then you will assert nothing, will you? You won't say, I will accept, I won't accept, I will resist, I won't resist, what is the cause of it - you follow? You say, "I really don't know". So your mind then is in a state of non-fragmentation, isn't it. No? When you actually say, "I don't know". Can you ever say, "I don't know"?

Q: I don't see why you cannot say it.

K: That's all I am saying, sir.

Q: We are frightened of not knowing.

K: So you are frightened of not knowing. Right? You want to live an harmonious life and you may not. I want to live an harmonious life and I never say to myself, I don't know how to do it. I say, I must live an harmonious life, this is what I must do, this is what I must not - you follow? I come to answer it through my conclusions, therefore that's not an answer. Right? Please. So can I honestly say to myself, I really don't know how to live an harmonious life?

Then from not knowing I am going to find out. You follow? I am going to find out, not come with a conclusion to find out. Can we move from there? At least with some of you who say, "I really don't know. I am dreadfully serious, honest, when I say, I really don't know" - which means I have no conclusions, no images, no concepts, I really don't know. Can some of you say that? If you do then let's begin, at last.

Now I don't know. You know when I say, I don't know - please go slowly with me, have patience with me - what do I mean when I say, I don't know? Is that state of mind, when I say, I don't know, is it waiting to be informed? Please listen to this carefully. Is it waiting to be informed, is it waiting to be told, or is it waiting to find knowledge which will then bring about an harmonious life? You follow? I must answer that question when I say, I don't know. Am I waiting for an answer when I say, I don't know?

Q: Surely is one accepts receptivity...

K: I don't know, we are talking about not knowing.

Q: You can never know.

K: Please stick to one word, otherwise receptivity means who is receiving. Just stick to what we generally have agreed to, which is, I don't know, you don't know. Now what does that mean, not knowing? Does it mean that the mind is waiting to be told, expecting an answer, looking to somebody to say, "This is right", or nobody can say it, "This is right, this is wrong". It doesn't know. Which is your mind?

Q: If you really don't know and somebody tells me then I still won't know.

K: That's the whole point. Now when you say, I don't know, what takes place? Go slowly. What takes place within the mind?

Q: The mind is quiet, still.

K: What takes place when I say I am not looking for an answer. I am not expecting a thing, what goes on in the mind, sir? Watch it.

Q: You discard everything.

K: You have discarded whatever you have when you say, "I don't know".

Q: Sir, when I say, I don't know, I find ideas.

K: Which means what?

Q: It seems to be the habit of conditioning for ideas to come, so I still don't know.

K: So your mind can never say, I don't know, because you are all full of ideas. Right?

Q: I don't know, but perhaps I do know a little bit.

K: Yes. You are all playing games.

You know it is one of the most difficult things to say, I don't know. If you are really a great scientist you examine everything for the first time as though you didn't know, therefore you begin to discover. You follow? But if you come saying, I know a little bit, I don't know, you follow, then you discover nothing. Can you say, I really don't know how to live a life that is harmonious? That means that you become extraordinarily humble, don't you - no? Therefore a mind that does not know is enquiring into what is harmony. Right? So what takes place in the mind that is completely not knowing?

Q: Go on.

K: I can go on, by myself, I can go on in my room, with all these questions and find out, but with you we don't travel together; how am I to help you to travel together? Because you are full of ideas, aren't you?

Q: When I say, I don't know, I wonder.

K: Why should you wonder? What is there to wonder?

Q: Nothing.

K: That's just it. Can you stay, stay, and say, I really don't know and stay there?

Q: I do not know in the sense that...

K: No, sir, don't translate it into something else. Keep to one series of words. We said, what does it mean to know. First of all, what does it mean to know? I know you. Wait, sir, listen. How impatient you people are. I say, I know you, what does that word 'to know' mean? I know you because I met you yesterday. There is the recollection of meeting you, and your name, your face, that is recorded. I know. I know my wife. What does that mean, know? Can I know anybody? So I can never say, I know somebody. But we do: I know my wife.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, no, do listen to what I am saying. When I see the danger of that word, "I know", can I know my wife, I have slept with her, I have had children, sex, irritation, all the rest of it, and the image of her remains. And I say, "I know her", I mean by that that I know the image about her, which I have, I don't know her. Right? So see what takes place - how dangerous that word is, to know. The word, "I know". In the meantime she might have changed but I have this image of her that remains static, fixed. So when I say, I know, it is the past. Right? So can my mind, when it says, "I don't know" be free of the past?

Q: Sir, to come to that point where I realize that, and yet thought...

K: Wait, wait, first see the dangers, see what it means, sir. When I say, I know, knowledge is the past, and I must have knowledge - to go from here to the house, to talk, there must be knowledge; and yet I see the danger of knowledge. Right? Knowledge is the past, and with that I say, "Can my mind ever be free of the past?" - which means the past image, past impressions, past memories, past hurts, conclusions, ideas, the whole of that. It is only then I can say, I don't know.

Q: I don't know you, I don't know other people.

K: What do you mean you don't know other people?

Q: I don't even know me. So I have to say again that I don't know.

K: When you say, I don't know, does it mean that you are free from knowing as the past? So sir, look, our difficulty is that we live in the past, all our activities spring from the past, and we project that past into the future into the present. No? This is so obvious. Now, that is part of our fragmentation. So can I ever say that I don't know? And to say it honestly is to find the beauty of not knowing. You understand? Do you know what love is?

Q: I don't know.

K: Wait, wait. Do you know what love is? Do you know what love is? Why are you silent?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no. Don't you say to your friend, or to your husband, wife, girl, or boy, I love you? Don't you? No? Oh, you are all so quiet.

Q: It seems that when I am in a state of not knowing...

K: Madam, I am asking you a question.

Q: Then I'll answer it when I don't know.

K: When you don't know, but do you know what it means not to know?

Q: I think so, but I don't know if I know.

K: Do you believe in god? How silent, you see. When you touch the real things you become quiet because you are frightened. So I want to find out, the mind says, what is love, they talk about it so much - love god, love humanity, I love my wife, I love my country - what does it mean, I want to find out. Don't you? To find out I must have energy, mustn't I? So how do I have that energy? By not asserting, or introducing something which I am familiar with - they say love is god, love is sex, love is happiness, love is beauty, you follow, all those are distractions, wastage of energy, aren't they? Can I put all that aside?

I want to find out if there is such a thing as god. I don't know.

Millions of people, the propagandists, the priests, the books, the everyday politician, everybody talks about god, except perhaps the communists but they have their own gods. I want to find out, how do I find out? I am burning with it, not just sitting there and I want to find out - you understand? I want to find out if there is something real, and for that I must have tremendous energy. So I must first gather this energy, so I must find out how I waste energy. You follow? I obviously waste energy when I believe in god. Right? Or when I don't believe in god it is a wastage of energy. Right? To believe or not to believe, or to say, yes, there is god, look at nature without god - you follow, all that tommy rot. I want to find out - to find out there must be freedom of energy, and that's why I say, I don't know. And when I say, I don't know, that gives you tremendous energy. I don't know what god is. I am not an atheist, I don't believe or disbelieve, I don't know. That means is my mind free of fear? You follow? Because when I say, I don't know, there is a tremendous sense of uncertainty, nothing you can rely on. God was a marvellous refuge in which I took shelter. When I say, I don't know, I refuse that shelter. You are following? Do you? So I have no saviour, no guru, no teacher, I must find out.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, we are not talking about that, sorry. We have been through that. I consciously see the falseness of taking refuge in an idea, in an image. I see that, I am sane, rational, not neurotic, I have no mental shocks, electric shocks, nothing. I see this. Therefore I am quite balanced. And when I say, I want to find out, I must put aside all man's inventions about god. Right? Will you do it? That means you must be in a state where you have no sense of security. Physically, yes, we must have it, you understand?

Q: Nobody..

K: We must have it. To have it we must get rid of nationalities, divisions, wars.

Q: Sir, if I get rid of this in myself then I begin to question my very existence in a society which is as it is, I don't have that security. I can't be in that society.

K: Why do you say that? The moment you reject security, you do something. You don't say, I must leave the society, I must form a different kind of commune and so on and so on. You will do something.

Q: I don't know what to do because everybody seems to be...

K: So what happens, sir. Look, sir: I want to find out what god is - I am taking god the same as love, or beauty. If you are interested in beauty. I want to find out what beauty is. Not in the building, not in an architectural expression, not in some imaginative idea of space, or in a painting, or in a statue, or in a woman, or a man, I want to find out what beauty is. To find out what beauty is there must be passion, mustn't there. I must be passionate to find out, mustn't I?

Q: Isn't that the answer to physical security, that passion to find out.

K: Obviously. Somehow you know - to talk about myself - I never sought security, and I am here still.

Q: In order to find out I must want to terribly.

K: Of course, sir. Otherwise what kind of life does one lead? A shoddy bourgeois life?

Q: I really can't understand how you want to find out about beauty, or what love is.

K: Don't you want to find out, or you just live like a leaf driven and accepting what the propagandists say? Don't you really want to find out how to end fear?

Q: Is not the life of the leaf fearless?

K: Sir, that was only a simile. I understand, sir, of course sir, it is.

Q: When the end of a leaf comes and it gets burnt or some other fate, it has not looked ahead to the event, so it does not have any fear about it.

K: No, but we have thought, we have minds. I don't want to die, I want to live. My living is, I must have security, physical, psychological, environmental, you know, I must have security. That is one of my deep demands that I must have security in order to live. I see the security physically is essential - I must have two meals a day, or one meal a day, I must have shelter, and not only I but everybody in the world. And that is not possible if you are an Englishman and I am a blasted Indian. When we divide the world that is not possible.

Q: But we know we need have no fear and stay alive, we all know we are going to die.

K: Therefore that's a different question. How to understand what death is, that's a different question. And if you say, now I want to find out what it means to die, you must have passion to find out.

Q: But we all know already about it.

K: Do you?

Q: Well we know enough in our daily life.

K: You are frightened by it. Therefore to find out about god, love, if there is such a thing as security, total security, to find out what death is, I must have energy. You follow, sir? I must have passion, I must have immense intensity. I can't just say, well I will sit back and say, well, I'll find out and go on with my smoking and drinking and enjoying my poor shoddy little life.

Q: But most people do just that. The only people I know who are not afraid of death - or shall we say if there is any friend that I have met, it is that young people are more afraid of death and older people tend to be less afraid.

K: They are a little bit older, that's all. No, sir, please.

Q: They may have more understanding.

K: Or they are bored with life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, the word 'seek' implies what? When you find it how do you know you have found it? I have lost you, and I have lost you and I can find you, and I look for you, and then I recognize you because I have met you before. In my search for truth, for god, for beauty, for love and for the understanding of death, in my search for it how do I know that I shall find it? And when I do find it, is it the truth? No, sir, this is too... So I have to begin by saying, do I really want to find out? Or is it just a game I am playing with myself because I am bored with life, with my wife, my children, going to the office, you know, I am bored, therefore I would like to have some other thing?

So my question is: I want to end fear, every form of fear, physical fear, as well as psychological fears. I want to end them because I see freedom can never exist where there is fear. That's obvious. So I have to investigate, find out, give my life to find out, not just a couple of hours, find out if I can live without fear, fear physically as well as psychologically. Physically I know what to do. Right? I have had pain, I have had disease, I have had various forms of ailments - I haven't had, but you know - and I am afraid, what is that fear? I have had pain a month ago, and that has left a mark on my mind, memory, and the memory says, for god's sake be careful, don't have that pain again. Right? No? So fear begins when it says, I mustn't have it again. Right? So thought creates the future fear. No? So I say, my concern then is not fear at all but thought, to understand the whole structure of thinking. Why does thought sustain the pain which happened a month ago now, why does it carry on? Is it possible when I had the pain a month ago to say, finished, I won't even think about it, finished. Because thinking about it is going to create fear of tomorrow. No? Do it, sir. The same thing with pleasure, which is much more difficult.

So I have to go into this question of thought. Can thought see that when there is pain it does the right thing - go to the doctor, or drugs, whatever it is, not drugs, not LSD and marijuana and all the rest of that business, but heal itself - fasting, dieting, you know a dozen things you can do. And thought sees to it that it does things properly and end it there, and not carry it over to the next day. So can the mind, physically understand, be free of fear of tomorrow, of the past, of death? To find out there must be freedom, freedom means passion, fire, intensity, urgency, and that's why analysis destroys urgency. Right? Urgency means revolution - not physical revolution, throwing a bomb, that's too stupid. But when you have urgency then there is immediate action.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE

9TH SEPTEMBER 1971

K: What shall we talk about this morning? If we do choose a subject let us go to the very end of it, deeply and very honestly so that we really do understand something at the end of it. So what shall we discuss?

Q: Decision.

Q: What's the difference between superficial awareness and total awareness?

Q: Does responsibility necessarily kill the sense of enquiry?

Q: Is there such a thing as decision or we let things happen?

K: Now which of these shall we discuss, talk over together. The first one, which one, please.

Q: Decision.

Q: Awareness.

K: I think in talking over together this question of decision, perhaps we can also go into the question of awareness.

What is involved in decision? Choice, isn't it? Let us go into this completely, and not your opinion against my opinion or your judgement against mine, but let us enquire into this completely and go into thoroughly, shall we, so that we shall find out at the end, whether there is such a thing as decision at all, and so on. Let's go into it.

When we decide, we decide between two things, which implies choice, doesn't it? Right? Why do we choose at all? The choice between two houses, two motor cars, two materials, apart from that, what is the necessity for choice?

Q: When there is a desire, afterwards there's choice.

Q: The process begins when desire arises.

K: We're asking aren't we, why do I have to choose, and therefore a decision has to be made? Because I have conflicting desires, opposing desires, contradictory desires, therefore there is choice, is that it?

Q: Because of a lack of clear vision.

K: Lack of clear vision. You choose, don't you? Do you choose - what to do, what to think. You do choose between two different roads, one is longer, one is shorter; one aeroplane journey's quicker than the other and so on, there is that kind of choice, inevitably, and decision. You understand? Is there any other kind of decision, and if there is decision, decision implies choice. Right? Now why does choice exist at all? Look at it, sir, let's take time.

Q: Because I am divided.

K: Because you are divided, that is, you have different desires, different objectives, different passions, different interests, therefore you choose between this and that, discriminate between this, what you call right, and that, what you call wrong, the essential and the unessential, so there's always this choice between the two. I am asking myself before I choose, or decide, or make a decision, which implies will, why do I have to choose at all, what does choice imply? If I see something very clearly, there's no choice, is there? If I know the road from here to some place and I have investigated one or two ways and have found the shortest, there's no question of choice, it is there.

Q: Not if we don't see clearly.

K: Therefore when we don't see clearly, then the conflict of choice arises. Is that it? Right? Let us go together with this. I don't see clearly what I should do. I have various roads or choices to make, because I don't see clearly, that I should do this, that or the other - I am confused, and out of that confusion I have to make a choice - or because I am confused, I choose.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't know whether I should be an engineer or a biologist, or an artist - I am not very clear, I'm still very young, I don't know what to do. Society wants me to do that, my parents want me to do something else, and I want to do some other thing. Right? And I say, I am limited, I can't choose, I'm too young or I'm too old or too gaga, or whatever it is, so what is one to do? Let us discuss it.

I want to find out why I choose at all, why there is such a thing as choice. Does choice exist when I see something very clearly? It is only when there is uncertainty, no clarity, no perception, then I am forced to choose. But if I see something very, very clearly it is finished, there's no choice. I have to go to London and I want to do something here, there's no choice. And I want to be an engineer but somebody else wants me to be an artist.

Q: I may want both things.

K: I want to be an artist as well as a businessman - what is the decision there? Go on sirs, please. Is that your problem? Is this your problem? That you want to be an engineer, a businessman or an artist, better - and somebody tells you, you must be a businessman. Are you faced with that problem - any of you? Or is it just a theoretical problem?

Q: I don't know what I really want to do.

K: How will you find out?

Q: I have an image of myself as an artist and I have to go out and earn money.

K: So what will you do? I have any image of myself as an artist and I have to go out and earn money because my mother is ill - so what am I to do? Do you do all these things, actually go through all this or you just yield to circumstances? It is so impossible to discuss.

So let's go back. What does decision imply? I decide - what does that imply, decision? I decide not to be a drunk, I decide not to smoke any more because last night the doctor found that it is dangerous to the heart and brain and all the rest of it. So I decide not to smoke - which means what? No, please, you smoke, some of you smoke - I don't smoke, but suppose I smoke and I say, "I must stop". I decide from today not to smoke any more. I decide. What is involved in that decision?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I'm just asking one question, sir. What is involved in decision?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Not only that, but also what? Resist smoking. I'm in the habit of smoking - I've decided not to smoke and I resist the desire to smoke. I've made up my mind to resist smoking. So, there's a battle going on. Right? Between the decision and the habit - the habit of the body which is used to this smoke and it demands more and more, it has to have it. And so intellectually, listen to the doctors, fear. From that I have decided not to smoke. So there is not only resistance, fear is involved in it and I'm in a constant battle - wanting to smoke and resisting it all the time - action of will over a long habit. I've taken a decision, so what happens? I create a new problem, don't I? Before I smoked, now I've decided not to smoke, and then that decision brings another problem - and so I keep problems going all the time. Is there a way of completely dropping without decision - decision being resistance, fear - all that's involved in decision when I say I must not smoke - is there a way of stopping smoking without any of that?

Q: Well, there is...

K: Wait, wait. Look what I've said. I smoke or I take various forms of drugs. I am an alcoholic or god knows what else, and I decide to give up. I take a vow, you know, chastity, poverty and all the rest of it. I take a vow. What happens? I am always in a battle, am I not?

Q: There is a certain negation.

K: Now is there a way of understanding which is not based on decision, will or resistance, and yet not smoke - you follow - break a habit without resistance, and so no choice whatsoever. So how do I end a habit without resistance, without saying "I must not - I must control - I must resist?"

Q: (In French - mostly inaudible)

K: If you don't understand French - bad luck. I am not going to translate it.

Look, I am asking something very - please let's stick to one thing. I know the way of resisting - I drink or smoke or am attached to something, and I know the way, the traditional way of resisting, deciding not to do. And I see in that a great deal of conflict is involved, not only physical conflict but intellectual, emotional conflict, the whole problem of resistance arises. I want to find a way in which all that doesn't exist, and yet drop smoking, drink, or whatever it is, a long established habit. Come on, sirs.

Q: When...

K: No, please listen to my question first before you - don't jump into it yet. Because I know the old way which has been practised.

Q: You have to change yourself.

K: What am I to do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You have habits haven't you, no? Scratching your head, or twiddling your fingers or you know, walking in a certain way, the habit of chattering, gossiping, a dozen habits. Now, how will you end one of those habits without any resistance? Wait, wait, sir. Please do listen? Because resistance implies choice - and choice implies conflict, wanting, not wanting. And therefore choice invariably arises when there is uncertainty, no clarity, confusion. So what am I to do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, I am taking one thing. I am taking the habit of drink, or smoking, or - take one habit that you have, actually - don't invent a habit - actually you have a habit - scratching your nose or picking your nose or sitting in a peculiar way, insisting on a particular chair, whatever you have - habit.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. I understand that. But take one habit now, and see if it can end without any form of the old traditional approach to a particular formed habit. Please, sir, I have stated it, now you discuss.

Q: One must...

K: Don't say must, then you are lost. I want to end a habit without any resistance - I explained resistance implies decision, conflict, choosing. Decision implies between this and that, should and should not, all that is implied. I don't want to enter into that chaotic activity. I want to end it, and I want to end it without any conflict. Now you sit with it for a minute and work it out.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No - let us put it differently. Habit must be ended, or that habit must disappear - I don't know how to put it.

Q: You must have total attention.

K: Oh no, sir. Don't tell me, I don't know what you mean by total attention. I don't know what you mean by total attention. You heard the man talk about total attention and you repeat it. I have got a problem, don't tell me I must be totally attentive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: All right. Is it possible to see the whole mechanism of habit? What is habit - repetition? Doing the same thing over and over and over again. Right? Habit. Do you want to go into this? Conscious habits.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's just it. Take one thing and go right through it. Don't substitute one word for another word, for then we get lost. I have habits. I have been brought up in a communist world and I have that peculiar habit of thinking on those lines. I have been brought up in a world of Islam, and I do that. So, habit is established, very deeply, from childhood - habit of thinking that I must do this or I must not do that. Right? Consciously I know; and unconsciously there are all the racial habits. Right? No? Am I talking to myself?

Unconsciously there is the whole habit of a culture. So my whole consciousness may be the result of habits. No?

Q: Yes.

K: You're saying 'yes'? Now I am aware - there is an awareness of this - the mechanical habits of thinking as an Englishman, Frenchman and so on, as a communist, socialist, labour, believing in god, not believing in god, I'm a Catholic, you are a Protestant, I am this - you follow. It is all habit, habit, habit, propaganda. Now, I am aware of it, aware this thing exists as a cloud in which my whole mind is caught - not only the habit of getting up regularly in the morning at six o'clock. If I don't get up at six o'clock I feel upset. You know, all that business. I'm aware of all that - the mechanical process of habits. Now, how is the mind to break from that and not fall into another habit?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't know anything about it, sir, tell me what to do - I'm caught in this.

Q: You cannot think about it.

K: You are saying you cannot think about it. So thought may be a habit.

Q: You have an awakening.

K: An awakening - how am I to be awakened.

Q: When you say 'I', do you mean mind?

K: My mind, sir, quick to get on.

Q: Is the mind anything else?

K: I realize that the mind, the body, all our feelings are caught in habits - and my habit is to drink - I somehow got into the habit of drinking - slightly getting tipsy all the time. What am I to do?

How am I to end it without any form of resistance.

Q: Sir, I had never smoked, but after the war we got lots of cigarettes in Geneva, and I suddenly felt my hand go in my pocket. But when I saw it, without any resistance...

K: You dropped it?

Q: Yes.

K: But that was a very short habit. (Laughter) Oh, lordy, come on sirs. I've a long habit of drinking. I used to know a friend in California, he had to drive home every night, always a little stoned, and he didn't know quite which side of the white line he was driving on, and he survived. But I wouldn't. So, I'm in that position - I drink an awful lot, quietly in my room or so on. What am I to do?

Q: I had been smoking for sixteen years, and three years ago I dropped it, but I don't know how.

K: The gentleman says he doesn't know how he stopped - he'd been smoking for sixteen years, three years ago he dropped it, he has now stopped. That doesn't solve my problem. I want to know, how to end my drinking without any resistance. Work at it, sir, you just answer. Please, it's my problem, help me. Don't throw words at me.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, have you a problem of habit? Have any of you a problem of habit? All right, take it up, look at it, and see how you will be able to resolve it totally.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madam, take a habit that you have, which you feel is not pleasant and you want to end it. And you want to end it so that your mind doesn't go through tortures, so that you come out of it clean, healthily, happily. Drop it. Now, will you investigate the cause of that habit? You can trace it, can't you?

Q: It will take time.

K: It doesn't matter - it may take time. Don't quote me, please, look at it? You can trace it. At school as a boy it was the habit to smoke, and gradually fall into it, it tasted filthy but I keep it. Now, I know the cause. And I see merely investigation and trying to find the cause of it doesn't end it. Right? And mere decision - I must not - makes for more conflict. My hand goes to my pocket - all the things I go through - I torture myself. And I say I don't want to - and yet I want to be free of this terrible thing - this thing which is my habit. How am I to do it?

Q: (Inaudible).

K: That's right, sir - not ending it totally. Now, I'll show you something. Shall we go ahead together. Right? I want to end it - 'I' means, you know it must be ended, don't quibble over 'I' for the moment. I want to end it. And I want to end it so that at the end of it I have much more vitality, much more energy. You understand? And I won't lose that energy or that vitality in fighting a habit. So at the end when I have dropped it, it is like a new - you follow - not just a dissipated old man who has wasted his energy fighting. So I said I must approach it differently. Now what is the approach? I must begin not with the problem, but somewhere else. Right? I am going to go into it. Because the more I pay attention to the problem the stronger the problem becomes. Are you following this? I am in the habit of smoking, or drinking, whatever it is, the more I give attention to it, say, "I must", "must not", I am giving all my energy to something that is very trivial. Right? It may be a tremendous problem to me but it is a trivial problem. Are we meeting each other?

So I must begin somewhere else in which the little problem is absorbed, devoured. I don't know if you... Are we meeting? I must find energy which will not be dissipated by the little problem which I have. If I give attention to that little problem I am wasting energy. So I must find a greater energy which will in its action dissolve the little problem. Have we understood that, intellectually even, please are we meeting each other?

So where am I to begin? Where I have energy, and when I come to the little problem, the little problem with its triviality is dissolved instantly. I must begin somewhere else. Am I making myself clear? Now where shall I begin? You understand? They used to say, the older generation, "Begin with God". You follow? You understand? "Put your faith in God, put your faith in something higher". Again that is useless. So I must find a way of never wasting energy because resistance is a wastage of energy, conflict is a wastage of energy, decision is a wastage of energy. I don't know if you are following this? So I must find a way of awakening this total energy.

Now, shall we go into that, if you have understood my problem, if I have made the problem clear. I am going to begin by being aware, not practising awareness. The moment I decide to practise awareness it is a wastage of energy. I don't know if you see that. Right? So there must be an awareness without my deciding I must be aware. Right? There must be an awareness without my deciding that I must be aware. See the importance of just that fact. Shall we move from there?

An awareness at the core, at the centre, not at the periphery - not at my habit, what I am doing, my gestures, the way I sit, but an awareness at the very core, the very centre of my being. Don't say, what is the your being. At the very heart of my existence. But I have been accustomed to be aware of everything happening around me - watching the trees, watching the people, of watching what they are saying, watching my bodily movement, my twitching, my opening my mouth, putting my tongue out, all kinds of awareness outwardly, at the peripheral awareness. And I say that doesn't solve, that doesn't enter into the core of it. You understand? So I must begin at the very core of it. Are you doing this with me? Now what does that mean? I move the whole emphasis from the outer, and not to the inner, but to a different dimension. I don't know if you follow this. Am I making myself clear? No, you are as clear as mud!

Q: Could you give an example?

K: No, I can't do it. Just take this first. Look, sir, I'll say it, just look at it, listen to it. I said, one begins to be aware on the periphery. Right? Periphery means watching the trees, the birds, the people's dresses, one's own habit. A very superficial awareness. And then one turns to an awareness inwardly. From there I shall be aware. Right? Now I am saying, don't do either but have an awareness at an altogether different level. Is that making any sense? No, please it must be logical, otherwise it has no meaning. Because if I am aware of outward things, then from the outer I move to the inner, then there is a division between the outer and the inner, and a time interval between the outer and the inner, a space between the outer and the inner, and from the inner I move to somewhere else again, which again involves time, space. I don't know if you are following this?

Do I see this, see this? Intellectually, do I see this first. Begin intellectually, that is verbally, that is with my thought using logic, using capacity to think very clearly. Do I see what is involved from moving from the outer to the inner and then trying to go somewhere else?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: In all this there is division, you follow, and therefore conflict, and therefore resistance, therefore division.

So there is an awareness in a different dimension. Now with that I approach my habit. You understand what I am saying? You get what I am saying? Am I making myself clear?

Q: No.

K: No, no, don't say no, don't say yes or no, do it! I see in decision there is fear involved in it, a motive, saying, "By Jove, if I smoke I will get lung cancer, it is terrible for the heart, doctors have said it, it is appalling, and other people say, smoke old boy, it doesn't matter, after all if you have ten more years or five more years less, have a good time in the meantime", and so on. And I don't want to enter into all that, it is a waste of time and a wastage of energy. And also I see any form of division implies resistance. This is all part of an awareness of the outer as well as the inner. I am giving you an example, sir. Are you following all this? Am I moving too fast?

Q: Yes.

K: I am sorry I can't, I'll go on. I see in decision, in giving up smoking, giving up a particular habit, however good, however bad - bad and good, they are just terms - I see what is involved in it, logically, I see it very clearly. Which is the awareness of the outer as well as the inner. Right? Which is the outer habit of smoking, and the inner habit of fear, resistance, saying. "I must get rid of it, I must fight it, I must..." and I get caught in that. So I see the outer as well as the inner movement of resistance and habit. Right? And I see that doesn't solve it. So there must be an action in which there is neither resistance, nor decision, nor fear, nor a motive. Is this giving you a headache?

A: No.

K: I hope it is!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, do look at it, do look at which I have said. The outer and the inner, the awareness of the outer is the awareness of my habit, just the smoking, drinking, and the inner action of that habit is to fight it, resist it, decide not to, force myself, control myself, find a substitute for smoking or for drinking - chewing, or whatever it is. I see - there is a motive behind that, and trying to conform to that motive, therefore failing in that motive, saying, "I can't do it; I must", fighting - all that, saying, "I have no strength, I am a weak man" - all that nonsense that goes on. Right, are you following all this?

I see very clearly all that is involved in it - the outer awareness and the inner movement of it, and I don't want to touch it at all because that has no meaning. So when I see the thing very clearly I have already entered into a different dimension. I don't know if you follow this.

Q: I...

K: Not 'I', please.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't quite understand, madam.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Ah, no, no, no. Do you see clearly what is involved in habit and the decision to get rid of it, do you see that very clearly, what is totally involved in it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, don't give me examples.

Q: If you want to stop smoking...

K: No, no. I am not interested in stopping smoking. I am much more interested in something else. And when that operates smoking may have lost its meaning.

Q: I don't want to give it up.

K: If you don't want to give it up, don't give it up. For the love of Pete, let's get on with this. If you want to smoke, smoke. That's much better than fighting it. Get to the grave as quickly as possible. Enjoy it. I am talking about a man who says, "Look, I have got this habit, drinking, smoking, you know a great many habits which are most destructive, whether they are good or bad. And do I after listening to you, do I see this thing completely, see it, understand it, intellectually, verbally, with my heart, with my mind, do I see this thing clearly as I see the microphone, clearly?" And see the futility of it, what is involved, conflict, you know the pain, the agony that one goes through in giving up something.

Q: How does one get into the other dimension?

K: Madam, I don't know what the other dimension is, you can't get into it. It will only happen if I have understood the whole complex intricate problem of habit, resistance, fear, motive, all that is involved in it, decision. When I have seen that very, very clearly with my heart and my mind, then the other - then I have finished with it.

You see sirs, the man who has got a belief, very strong, deep rooted belief, he is attached to it, consciously or unconsciously, he can't give it up, it is part of him. And so that belief divides people, divides him, his family, his wife - you follow, divides. And he says, "I begin to see the importance, or the danger of such a habit", and he begins to see the whole pattern of it, the whole nature and structure of belief - fear, the desire to find security in an idea. He has physical security perhaps, but he demands psychological security which is much more urgent, much deeper. And so he is attached to it, he can't break away. And as he begins to explore, enquire, he sees the whole structure, the nature of it, the division between you and me as believing in this, and you believing in that. So he sees that very, very clearly. When he sees very clearly there is no choice in it. He doesn't say, "I have to give it up". I don't know if you are following. When he sees clearly the habit of belief is gone, he will never be caught in it again.

So do we see very clearly, see, not visually, of course you can't see this visually, perceive, understand, this whole structure of habit, resistance, motive, fear, decision, choice?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, do you see it?

Q: Yes.

K: Ah! What is it?

Q: What is important is awareness. Is awareness a simple act of perception? And if awareness is there the whole pattern is revealed.

K: Is awareness, the simple act of perception, and if awareness is there this whole pattern is revealed? Is that what you are asking?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: In awareness there is, the gentleman says, the decision to be aware, and also in awareness there is the act of perception. Right?

Q: There is that which is perceived.

K: Yes, perception, the perceiver and the perceived.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, just a minute, would you please listen. Do you know what listening means? When I listen to you I have no other thought. I listen to you. I have not my conclusions, my opinions, my understanding, is this right, is that wrong, should it be this way or that way, I listen to you. Right? And listening to that man sitting on the platform, and he says, are you aware of this whole - you are listening - he is asking, are you listening to what I am saying. Which is, are you aware that you have got a habit, and because you have a habit and because you are aware of it, in that awareness there is the movement of decision, resistance, fear, achievement, all the rest of it - are you are listening to what is being said, he tells you. Am I listening? Or am I saying, no I can't, I understand a little bit, I don't quite understand all of it, does he mean this, does he mean that. You follow? An act of listening is to listen from the beginning to the end, not just take one sentence, or one verb and say, does he mean - listening from the beginning, going through the whole of it to the end. Have you such capacity to listen? Capacity in the sense, are you listening that way? Or are you saying, "I began with him there, and I lost him there, now I will pick him up a little later, and I have learnt now the conclusion". Or is it one continuous movement?

I listen to that man sitting on the platform, and I have listened to him from the beginning of the word until the end, I haven't projected any of my opinions, any of my conclusions, I understand, I have listened. I am going to listen to him. He says, decision - from the beginning, he put that question, he said what is involved in decision, why do we decided - decision implies choice, choice implies between the two, and we do choose between that car and that car, between that material and so on, but we don't choose when we say, "I love that woman" - do you? You don't. It doesn't matter. And he says, resistance implies not only division but conflict. I decide to give up smoking. It is a partial act, not a total act, the decision - listen carefully to what the man is saying - the decision is partial because it is an intellectual conclusion that I must give up smoking because it is bad for you, the doctors says it will hurt your heart, your life will be in danger, therefore there is fear, therefore I have decided to give it up. That decision is partial, not total, and therefore there is conflict between an intellectual decision and the fact that I must give it up. Right? And in that decision there is conflict because there is a motive involved in it, because there is an end towards which I am working to give up.

So I say, that we know very well, that is our traditional, everyday, cultural habit, to say that is the only way to achieve something. And the man says I want to be a revolutionary, not just a traditionalist, and I want to wipe the whole thing out, look at it totally differently. So he says, be aware of this whole thing - aware of your habit. In that there is no choice because the moment you choose you have decided. Just be aware of the outward habit, and then see what is involved in that habit - the fear, the motive, the decisions, the urgency, the saying, "I must", "I must not", putting the body through torture, all that is a wastage of energy, which does not solve the problem. It will still go on, there is still the hankering for whisky, or whatever you drink, or to smoke.

So have you listened from the beginning to the end? Listening means seeing this whole thing very, very clearly. And when you see the thing absolutely, not relatively, absolutely clearly then there is a different state of energy with which you can then come back and say, "Now, what shall I do with this particular problem?", and you will know how to deal with it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, I explained it. I have just explained it, madam.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's your affair, sir, I said, listen.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Call it what you like, the total tent, or anything you like. The whole means the whole, I said that. You know the word 'whole' means also holy.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You see you are still... I give it up! Sir, you go to a museum, and you see a picture. And first you say, who painted it, if it is Rembrandt, if it is Picasso, if it is Botticelli, then you say, 'By Jove', and you look at it. And then you compare it with this, Michelangelo painted it but he was a homosexual therefore he put all those men naked and therefore and so on and so on and so on.

So you begin to compare. And what are you doing? You are not looking at the picture. You are thinking about Michelangelo and all his peculiarities - Leonardo and his peculiarities. You are comparing, judging, evaluating, you are never looking. And the painter has his peculiarities and he wants you to look at his name first too. So you never look. And that's what we are doing here. This man sitting on a platform, unfortunately he has to sit on a platform, I don't know why, for convenience, he sits there and describes the whole picture in detail, and you say...

And you want to know about god, don't you, whether god created the universe, and all this stuff, but to find out, you have to work, haven't you, not just accept what the Hindus, the ancient Hindus, or the Hebrews, or the Arabs, or the Christian mythologists said, you want to find out. And to find out you have to have a free mind and a free heart.

So, sir, where are we now? What time is it? When did I begin? Now where are we? In the future, tomorrow, am I going to make a decision about anything? Apart from clothes, house, cars, you know between this brush and that brush, and this toothpaste, apart from that am I going to decide, am I going to take a decision? Am I going to, when I have seen what is involved in it in this tent, am I now going outside again saying, "By Jove, I must..." - you follow? Are you going to do it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, that's what we do sir. I am not creating it, I have finished, in my life I have never decided.

Q: Not even about toothpaste?

K: Toothpaste, yes. About any other thing I have never decided.

That's the beauty of it. Like I have never controlled. That's a different matter.

So in listening here this morning, you might say, well I have really understood it, perhaps verbally, intellectually, I see the whole logic, and the reason and the practicality of it. But when you go outside, are you going to fall into the trap of the old tradition? If you do, then you haven't listened at all.

So there is an action in which decision is not involved at all. See the beauty of it, sir. And one's life has been built on choice and decision, and therefore continuous battles. I think that is enough, isn't it?

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 11TH SEPTEMBER 1971

K: What shall we talk about this morning? Have you any suggestions?

Q: Meditation.

Q: Love.

K: Do you want to discuss love and death and meditation.

Q: New schools.

Q: Loneliness.

Q: Consciousness of other human existences.

K: Now what shall we do? May I talk for a little while, then we can ask questions afterwards? There are several problems we really should talk over together, one of them is meditation, love, death - one of them - and also what it is that each human being is seeking. There is so much discontent in the world, so much hypocrisy, lies, and there are all the various tricks of propaganda, both religious, economic, political, social and so on. Amidst this vast confusion, contradiction, dishonesty, from the highest to the lowest kind of human existence, what is it that we, as human beings gathered together under this tent, what is it we are trying to find out?

Each one of us has many problems, or perhaps one major problem, and without bringing about order in our life we want to escape from that disorderliness and mess and chaos and all the misery of it, into something fantastic, something mysterious. I wonder what it is if you are asked directly and if one can answer it simply and honestly, what is it that each one of us is wanting to find out, what it is each one of us longs for, is seeking or striving hard, honestly to find out? And can we ever bring a kind of order in our lives, order in our relationships, order environmentally, order in the chaos of our thinking? I mean by order not just a blue print, a pursuit of a direction, and forcing everything to conform to a particular pattern invented by each one of us or imposed on us by others, but order that comes out of the investigation of the whole disorder of our life, and therefore order becomes something real, alive, and not conforming and conflicting.

So when we talk about love, death, consciousness, meditation, is that what we really want to find out honestly? Meditate, what meditation means, what love means, what death means, is that really do we want to find that out, or is it an escape because we are so tortured, uncertain, life is such an awful mess, and not being able to resolve this we run away from it. So where shall we begin? Because if we begin with meditation and not knowing exactly what it is, except what others have told us and all the racket that goes with those who have groups of meditation, and gurus that teach you mantras - you know all the business of it. I don't see how you can meditate without bringing about a really honest, simple, direct life. So shall we go into the question of wanting to find out, and giving our attention, passion and deep interest, find out what love is, shall we discuss that?

You know, to find out anything humanly, one must begin with a certain quality of freedom, mustn't one, because if you are to investigate such a complex problem as love, one must come to that investigation with a freedom from all our particular prejudices, idiosyncrasies and tendencies, our wishes of what love should be, either Victorian or modern. We should put aside all that, if we can, in order to investigate. Otherwise we'll be distracted, we'll waste our energy in affirming or contradicting according to our particular little conditioning. So can we, in discussing, in talking over together this question of what love is, see the importance that to really find out the full significance and the meaning and the depth of what that word conveys, or doesn't convey, shouldn't we first see if we could free the mind from the various conclusions that it has about that word? And is it possible to liberate the mind, to free the mind, from the deep-rooted prejudices, biases, conclusions?

Because when we are going to talk over together this question of what love is, it seems to me that before one can plunge into that, one has to have a mind that is very perceptive, and one cannot have such a good, clear mind if one has opinions, judgements, and say this is what love should be or, should not be. Can we start with that, or is that too difficult a thing to ask? To start to investigate, to examine the mind, our whole enquiry must begin with the sense of freedom, not freedom from something, but the quality of freedom that is capable of looking, observing, seeing what truth is.

So let us begin. Taking it for granted, I'm afraid granted is rather impossible really - whether this freedom can be sustained in enquiry - you can go back to your prejudices, your particular vanities and all the rest of the conclusions later, but this morning, sitting here, could we put aside all that for the moment and go into this? First of all there are several things involved in it, aren't there - sex, jealousy, loneliness, the sense of attachment, companionship, a great deal of pleasure, and thereby also fear - all that is involved, isn't it, in that one word, isn't that so?

So we should, if we could, begin with this question of pleasure, because that plays an important part in love and most religions have denied - call it original sin or what you like - altogether sex, because they said, man who is caught in sensory pleasures cannot possibly understand what truth is, what God is, what love is, what the supreme, immeasurable thing is. So in Christianity they had this extraordinary, fantastic idea of the Virgin Mary, son of God without man or woman relation sexually; and also that exists in India and also in Buddhism and so on: this is a prevalent religious conditioning. Right? And we, when we are going to look into this question of what love is, we have to be aware of our traditional, inherited conditioning which brings about various forms of suppression, Victorian and modern, or permissive enjoyment of sex. So pleasure plays an extraordinary part in our life, and if you have talked to any of the so-called highly disciplined, intellectual, religious people - I wouldn't call them religious, but they are called religious - this is one of their immense problems, chastity. You may think all this is totally irrelevant, chastity has no place in the modern world, and brush it aside. I think that would be a pity because that is one of the problems: what is chastity? So one has to in going into this question of what love is, one has to have a wide, deep mind to find out, not just a verbal assertion.

So - I don't know where to begin - why does pleasure play such an important part in our lives? I'm not saying it is right or wrong - please - do you understand? We are now enquiring - there is no assertion - sex should be, should not be, pleasure should be, should not be and all that - we are just enquiring. Why does pleasure in every way, in every activity of our life, play such an immense role? And therefore why sex has such an important part in our life, though it is one of our primary urges, why has it assumed, I don't know, such fantastic magnitude, not only in the Western world where it is so blatant - you don't mind me using that word - where it is so vulgar, but also in the East and in Asia, it is one of our major problems - why? And the religions, so-called religion, the priests have decried it. If you would seek god, they said, you must take a vow of celibacy, you know all the rest of it. I know a monk in India, a very, very serious man, scholarly, intellectual - at the age of fifteen or sixteen he gave up the world and took a vow of celibacy. And as he grew older - I met him when he was about forty - he gave up those vows and married and he had a hell of a time - sorry to use that word. Because Indian culture says it is appalling for a man who has taken a vow to go back. He was ostracized, he went through really a very bad time. And that is our mentality, most people's mentality. And I am asking why it has assumed - sex - such fantastic importance?

And there is this whole problem of pornography, allowing every freedom, complete freedom to read, to print, show anything you like, therefore emphasizing or giving freedom from suppression. You know all that business going on in the world - and what has love to do with it? And what does it mean, all this - love, sex, pleasure and chastity? Because please don't forget that word or the meaning of that word for which man has given such great importance - to lead a life of chastity. So there it is. Let's find out why man throughout the ages has given sex such a prominent place in life? And all the resistance against it also. Right? I don't know how you are going to answer it.

Is it not one of the factors that in that, sexual activity, in that there is total freedom? No? Please, let me talk it over first.

Intellectually we are imitative, intellectually we are not creative, intellectually we are secondhand or third-hand, we repeat, repeat what others have said, our little thoughts, you know. There we are not active, creative, alive, free. And emotionally we have no passion, we have no deep interests. We may be enthusiastic, but that soon fades, there isn't a sustained passion, and our life is more or less mechanical - the office, the daily routine. So a mechanical life, intellectually, technologically, and more or less emotionally repetitive reactions, which are all mechanical, which is our life, and therefore this one activity which becomes extraordinarily important - naturally. No? And if there were freedom intellectually and deeply one had passion, fire, then sex has its own place and becomes quite - you know - unimportant - one doesn't give such tremendous meaning to it, trying to find through sex Nirvana, thinking through sex you are going to have complete unity with mankind - you know all the things that we hope to find through something.

So can our mind find freedom? Can our mind be tremendously alive and clear, perceptive - not the perception which we have gathered from others, from the philosophers, psychologists and the so-called spiritual teachers, who are not spiritual at all? So when there is that quality of deep, passionate freedom, then sex has its own place. Then what is chastity, has chastity any place in our life at all? What is the meaning of that word, not the dictionary meaning only, 'chaste' but the deep meaning of it, what does it mean to have a mind that is completely chaste? I think we ought to enquire into that. Perhaps that is much more important.

If you have observed your mind, not as an observer and the thing observed - do you understand what I mean - in which there is no division as the observer watching the mind and therefore bringing about a conflict between the observer and the observed - if one is aware of the whole activity of the mind, doesn't one see in that the constant shaping of images, and remembrances of various pleasures, misfortunes and accidents, insults, and all the various impressions and influences, and pressures. And these crowd our mind. If there was a sexual act, thought thinks about it - pictures, imagines, sustains evocative emotions, gets excited. Such a mind is not a chaste mind. It is a mind that has no picture at all, no image, that is a chaste mind. Then the mind is always innocent. The word 'innocency' means a mind that does not hurt or receives hurts, is incapable of hurting and also incapable of being hurt, but yet is totally vulnerable. Such a mind is a chaste mind. But those people who have taken vows of chastity, they are not chaste at all, they are battling with themselves everlastingly. I know various monks, both here in the West and in the East, what tortures they have gone through, all to find god. Their minds are twisted, tortured.

So one has to enquire into what is pleasure, because all this is involved in pleasure, with pleasure. Where is pleasure in relationship with love - what is the relationship between the pursuit of pleasure and love? And apparently both seem to go together. Our virtues are based on pleasure, our morality is based on pleasure. You may come to it through sacrifice which gives you pleasure, resistance which might give you pleasure in order to achieve.

So where is the line, if there is such a thing, as between pleasure and love? Can the two go together, interwoven? Or are they always separate? Because man has said, "Love god, and that love has nothing whatsoever to do with the other profane love". You know this has been not just for centuries, historically, right from the beginning of time, this has been a problem. So where is the line that divides the two, or is there no line at all? One is not the other, and if we are pursuing pleasure, as most of us are in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of social reform, everything, then what place has love in this pursuit? So one has to go into the question: what is pleasure and what is enjoyment and what is joy? Is bliss related to pleasure? Don't please say, no or yes, let us find out. Look at a beautiful tree, a cloud, a light on the water or the beautiful face of a man or a woman or a child, the delight of seeing something really beautiful; in that there is great enjoyment, a real sense of appreciation of something extraordinary, noble, clear, lovely. When you see a sunset, a vast immense sky, and when you deny pleasure, you deny the whole perception of beauty. And religions have denied it. Because it is only quite recently, I've been told, that landscape painting came into religious paintings in the Western world, though in China and the East, painting of the landscape and the tree was considered noble and religious.

So, why does the mind pursue pleasure, not is it right or wrong - why? And what is the mechanism of this pleasure principle? Please find out, you understand, not repeat what the speaker is saying, but find out in discussing, that's what we're doing. Because if you say, I agree with you, or disagree with you because I prefer some philosopher, or some other teacher, then we are lost, but if we actually together find out, as we are sitting here now, what is the principle, the mechanism of this whole movement of pleasure, then perhaps we shall understand what is real enjoyment, then what is joy and bliss, in which is involved ecstasy. Is ecstasy related to pleasure and can joy ever become pleasure?

So what is the mechanism of pleasure, why does the mind pursue it so constantly? You cannot prevent perception, seeing visually a beautiful house, the lovely green lawn and the sunshine on it, or the vast desert without a single blade of grass, and the expanse of the sky. You can't prevent seeing it, and the very seeing is pleasure, isn't it, is a delight. When you see a lovely face, not just a symmetrical face but depth in it, beauty, quality behind it, intelligence, vitally - to see such a face is a marvel and in that perception there is a delight. Now when does that delight become pleasure, do you follow? You see a lovely statue by Michelangelo, and you look at it, it is the most extraordinary thing - not the subject, I don't know about that, but the quality of that. And in the perception of it, there is great pleasure, great delight. You go away and the mind thinks about it, thought begins. You say, what a lovely thing that was. In seeing there was great feeling, a quality of perception, of something marvellous, then thought recollects it, remembers it, and the remembering and the pursuing of that pleasure that you had when you saw that statue. Thought then creates that pleasure, it gives vitality, continuity to that event which took place when you saw that statue. Right? So thought is responsible for the pursuing of pleasure. Right? Please, it is not my invention, you can watch it. You see a lovely sunset and you say, "I wish I could go back there and see it again". At the moment of seeing that sunset there was no pleasure, you saw something extraordinary, full of light and colour and depth. When you go away and go back to your shoddy little life, or active life, whatever it is, your mind says what a marvellous thing that was, I wish that I could have it repeated again. So thought perpetuates that thing as pleasure. Is that the mechanism? Then what takes place? You never again see the sunset, never, because the remembrance of that original sunset remains, and you always compare with that, and therefore you never again see something totally new.

So one asks: can you see that sunset, or the beautiful face, or your sexual experience, or whatever it be, see it and finish it, not carry it over, whether that thing was great beauty or great sorrow or great pain, physical, psychological, whatever it be. To see the beauty of it and finished, completely finished, not take it over for the next day, the next month, or the future, store it up. If you do store it up, then thought plays with it. Thought is the storing up of that incident or that pain or that suffering or that thing that gave delight. So how is one to - not prevent - to be aware of this whole process and not let thought come into operation at all? Have you understood my question, am I making myself clear, or am I just going on by myself?

I want to see the sunset, I want to look at the trees, full of the beauty of the earth. It is not my earth or your earth, it is ours - not the Englishman's earth or the Russian or the Indian, it is our earth to live on - without all the frontiers, without all the ugly, beastly wars, and mischief of man. I want to look at all this, the palm trees on a solitary hill - have you ever seen it, what a marvellous thing it is? Or a single tree in a field? I want to look at it, I want to enjoy it, but I don't want to reduce it into an ugly little pleasure, and thought will reduce it. So how can thought function when necessary and not function at all in other directions? You follow my question? And it is possible only when there is real awareness, awareness of the whole mechanism - mechanism of thought, the structure and the nature of thought, where it must function absolutely logically, healthily, not neurotically or personally, and where it has no place at all. So what is beauty and thought? Can the intellect ever perceive beauty? It may describe, it may imitate, it may copy, it may do all kinds of things but the description is not the described. We could go on and on into this infinitely.

So when one understands this nature of pleasure and the principle of pleasure, then what is love? Is love jealousy, is love possessiveness, is love domination, attachment - you know what one does in life - the woman dominates the man or the man dominates the woman, you know all that business that goes on. The man does something because he wants to do it, pursues it. He is ambitious, greedy, envious, he wants a position, prestige, and the wife says, "For god's sake stop all that tommy-rot, lead a different kind of life," and so there is a division between the two. They may sleep together. So can there be love when there is ambition, when each one is pursuing his own particular private pleasures.

So what is love? Obviously it can only happen, when there are no longer all the things that are not love, like ambition, competition, wanting to be somebody, becoming somebody and that - you follow - that is our life; we want to be somebody famous, fulfil, you know, become, a writer, artist, bigger - all that is what we want. And can such a man or woman know what love is?

Which means can there be love for a man who is working for himself, not only in a little way but in identifying himself with the State, with God, with social activity, with the country, with a series of beliefs? Obviously not. And yet that is the trap in which we are caught. And can we be aware of that trap, really aware, not because somebody describes it, be aware of the trap in which we are caught and break the trap? And that's where the revolution is, the real revolution, not the folly of revolution of bombs and social changes - though the social changes are necessary, not the bombs.

So one discovers or one comes upon unknowingly, without inviting it, this thing called love when the other thing is not. When we have really understood the nature of pleasure, how thought destroys the thing that was a great joy, because joy cannot possibly be made into pleasure, joy comes naturally, it happens, like happiness, it comes. But the moment you are aware, "Oh I am very happy", you are no longer happy.

Then what is love in human relationship? Do you understand all these questions? What is the place of such love in human relationship? Has it any place at all? And yet we have to live together, we have to co-operate together, we have to have children together, and the man who loves, can his son be sent to war? It is your problem, sirs - you have children, and your education is preparing the children for war, to kill. You find out. So what is that love, and what is its relationship in our human existence? I think that question can only be answered, not verbally or intellectually, it can only have the true answer when the whole principle of pleasure, and thought, and this becoming, is understood, then you will find it a totally different kind of relationship.

Now what has love to do with living, the daily living, and what has that to do with death? Right? We are introducing a lot of things - is that all right? And what is meditation in all this? You know yoga has become a fashion in the West, everybody is doing it and it is the thing to do because one says, through yoga we'll have a quiet mind, and through right pranayama - that is breathing - you'll make the mind very still. Any stupid ass can do that, make his mind very still. Right? By breathing, sitting very quietly but having a shoddy little mind, the size of a peanut, and in that and through that you hope to find god. Right? Do you know what that word 'yoga' means, the meaning of that word. I am not saying it is wrong - yoga - I do it every day for two hours. I have been doing it for forty years or more. Therefore, please don't do it! Do you know what the word 'yoga' means? The real meaning of that word is unitive perception - unitive, to see totally, to comprehend life as a whole, not just stand on your head for a couple of hours. And the history of yoga, I was told by a man who seemed to know a great deal about it, is that three thousand years ago in ancient India, the kings and the rulers and the prime ministers chewed a certain leaf from the Himalayas which kept their brain very alive, very active, clear, some kind of marijuana of those days - probably it wasn't marijuana but some kind of stuff. And that plant died, and so they had to invent a series of exercises which would keep the glands of the human system active, alive and functioning properly; and the various exercises in yoga used to keep the glands functioning healthily, that is all, to keep the body healthy, not to bring all kinds of racket. So I brought that in because meditation has nothing whatsoever to do with yoga, the yoga which is practised. We will go into, perhaps tomorrow, what meditation is.

So what is death and love and living? They must be interrelated, all of them - living, love and death. We can't separate them as we do, push death far away, hide it under lock and key, never think about it - something unfortunate, something one is afraid of, something to be avoided at any price, don't talk about it. So what is our living, the living of our daily life, what is it? As we know it actually, not pretending, our life is a struggle, a misery, a conflict, a sorrow, with flashes of joy, appreciation of great beauty and occasional sense of love which is not pleasure. Our life is a process, a series of events, interspersed with pain, sorrow, anxiety, guilt, agony, loneliness and the seeking of some reality which becomes such a fantastic myth and illusion. That is our life. No? A routine sexually - our virtues are a mere matter of practising, imposing, controlling, suppressing - that is our life which we try to cover up through drink, through drugs, through marijuana, - you know all the rest of it.

And we want to find through this chaotic, sorrowful life, god, truth. We can't find it, obviously, because to find something one must have a life that is completely orderly, a life that must be not mechanical virtue, but really virtuous, a life that has in the very living meaning, not give meaning to living, and that life we are afraid to let go. This life which is really quite intricately miserable and confusing and shoddy, this we are afraid to let go - let go all the things with which we have been identified - the house, the furniture, the books, the experiences, the quarrels, the images - you know, all that we are afraid to let go because that means death. No? So the brain says I can't change this living, therefore there must be a future life, in different forms, reincarnation, or incarnate in a different way, you know, dozens of ways of escaping from this inevitable thing called living which you can't solve apparently. So we are afraid of living, and we are afraid of dying because we have divided the whole thing - living, love, god, death. You follow?

So can living the life we do, can there be a radical revolution in that? Not a verbal revolution, not the revolution of some philosopher, or psychologist, or some bearded guru, but a revolution psychologically so that our human mind is totally different, so that there is no control - we went into all that - no decision, but a living in which there is no pain at all. There is, if one goes into it very, very deeply; which is to be totally attentive of all the content of consciousness. May I be a little bit difficult here? May I go into it a little bit?

The content of consciousness is consciousness. Without the content is there consciousness? This is not an intellectual, or philosophical or rhetorical question, but a genuine, a valid question. The content of consciousness, of me, is my furniture, my goods, my behaviour, my thoughts, my anxieties, my pursuits of sexual delights. You know? The content of my consciousness are all the things collected in it - verbal, non-verbal, ancient-tradition, the result of the race, the family - do you follow - the whole of that is my consciousness. I am not different from my consciousness because my consciousness, the 'me', is the content. Remove the content - there is no me. Remove my knowledge, the name, the thought, all the remembrances of the hurts, the anxiety, the sorrows of death and pleasure - empty all that, what is consciousness then? Is there me in that emptiness? No, please don't agree or disagree, you don't know what it means. Is there a 'me' which is my vanity, my jealousies, my extraordinary sense of loneliness, bitterness, cynicism, vanity, that is my consciousness, that is my life, living, my gods, my shoddy little beliefs and opinions; take away all that - and death means that, physically, you understand, death, the organism dies because it is used and misused, you know, driven and tortured - old age, disease, eating too much, you know how you eat - have you watched yourself? All that is me, that is the content of me. I am a Catholic, I am a Hindu, I'm a Buddhist, I'm a Communist, I am an atheist, I don't believe in anything - all that is mine, the consciousness. The content is consciousness.

Now that is my life, my daily life of going to the office, being insulted, trying to be superior, all that. And the ending of that is death and I am frightened. I who have worked for so many years, I want to finish that book, that painting, that experiment, that research, I have a responsibility for my children to send them to war, to educate them, to condition them, to destroy them by comparing them with somebody else. All that is me and I don't like to think that me is so small, so I invent a super-me, the higher me, the soul, the Atman - you know, the game that one plays. All that is still within the field of consciousness, and that is the content of consciousness. So when I realize that, do you follow, when the mind realizes that, not just verbally, not accept a description, which is silly, or the explanation of the description, but sees that, the whole of it, non-fragmentarily but it is totally attentive of all that, then in that attention the mind is empty of all that and that is death. Therefore there is something totally new, of totally different dimension. But you can't come to it through prayer, through following some shoddy guru - you can't ever come to that. One can only come when you yourself are actively attentive totally, totally perceive the unitary movement of life, the living, the love, death, all the agonies, miseries that one goes through as a whole movement, unitive perception. Then the mind empties itself of all its content. It is not afraid to be anything or to be nothing, then it hasn't got to invent a future life, then it is incarnating each minute. Is that enough for this morning? You want to discuss any more? Right? We have finished.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 6TH JANUARY 1971

With so many people I wonder what we can talk about. First of all I would like to say how important it is to find out for oneself what learning is. Because apparently all of you have come here to learn, or to find out, what somebody else has to say. And to find out one must obviously listen. And it is one of the most difficult things to listen, it is quite an art, because most of us have our own opinions, conclusions, points of view, dogmatic beliefs and assertions, our own peculiar little experiences, our knowledge, which will prevent, obviously, from listening actually to another, because all these will crowd in, all the information, opinions, judgements will hinder the act of listening. And can one listen without any conclusions, without any comparison and judgement, just to listen as you would listen to music, to something which you really feel that you love. Then you not only listen with your mind, with your intellect, but also you listen with your heart, not sentimentally, which is rather terrible, or emotionally, but listen with care, objectively, sanely, listen with attention to find out. You know what you think, you have your own experiences, your own conclusions, your own knowledge. For the moment at least put them aside, and that's going to be rather difficult because we live on formulas, on words, on speculative assumptions, and when we are trying to find out, enquire really very seriously into this whole problem of existence one has obviously to prevent or put aside any projection of our own particular little idiosyncrasies, temperaments, conclusions and formulas, otherwise you can't obviously investigate, obviously learn together.

And we are going to learn together, because after all the word `communication' means to have something in common with which we can co-operate, think over together, share together, create together, understand together. That's what really communication means, to have something in common over which we can think together, understand it together: together, not the speaker explains and you merely listen, but rather together understand this whole question of what is truth, what is living, this complex problem of daily activity. All that we are going to go into.

And to really investigate, learn together implies that there is no authority, the speaker because he is sitting on a platform has no authority, he is sitting on a platform merely for convenience, but that doesn't give him any authority whatsoever. Please let's understand this very clearly, that we are examining together, learning together. And the implication of together is surely that we both must be serious, we must both be at the same level, with the same intensity, with the same passion, otherwise we will not meet each other. If you are deeply interested in a problem, and if another is not, there is no communication at all. There is a verbal understanding and verbal explanation is never the thing. So the description is never the described.

And as we are going to together to find out, one must be serious because this is not an entertainment, it is not something over which you can discuss, argue, opposing one opinion against another. Opinions have no value, what has value, what has significance is to observe actually `what is', not only `what is' outwardly but inwardly. To see exactly what is actually taking place, together and therefore no interpretation, no conclusion, but to merely observe. And that's what we are going to do. To observe what is actually going on both outwardly in the world and also inwardly. When one perceives `what is' actually then you can do something about it, but if you observe `what is' with a series of conclusions, a series of opinions, judgements, formulas, one will never understand `what is'. That's clear, isn't it. If you observe the world as a Hindu, or a Muslim, or a Christian, or any of that nonsense, then obviously you cannot possibly see clearly. And we have to see together very, very clearly, objectively, sanely.

So if one can observe very clearly, which in itself is a form of discipline. We are using that word `discipline' not in the orthodox sense of that word but the very meaning of that word is to learn. The meaning of that word, the root of that word means to learn, not to conform, not to control, not to suppress but to learn. And to see very clearly what is happening inwardly and what is happening outwardly, and to see that this is a unitary movement, not a separate movement. To see it as a whole, not divide it. Right?

What is actually happening outwardly, not only in this country but all over the world, what actually is taking place? Not the interpretation or the explanation or the causation of what is taking place, but what is actually happening. If a madman were to arrange the affairs of the world he couldn't do better. Right? That is a simple, obvious fact. Sociologically, economically, culturally there is disintegration. Politicians have not been able to solve any problem, on the contrary, they are increasing them. Countries are divided, the affluent society and the undeveloped, so-called undeveloped countries, poverty, wars, conflicts of every kind, no social morality, because what is social morality is immorality, therefore that's gone too. There is no morality, all the religious organizations with their beliefs, with their rituals, with their dogmas, are really separating people, which you can see obviously. If you are a Hindu and I am a Muslim, we must be against each other; we may tolerate each other for a few days but basically, inwardly we are against each other. So where there is division there must be conflict. Right? Not only outwardly but inwardly. You can see exactly what is going on in this unfortunate world, the extraordinary development of technology, social changes, permissiveness, all that is going on. And inwardly we are a mass of contradictions.

Please, as I said, do observe yourself, watch yourself, not what the speaker is saying, listen to what the speaker is saying as a way of observing yourself. Look at yourself as though you are looking at yourself in a mirror. Observe what actually is going on, not what you would like it to be, actually, and you will see that there is great confusion, contradiction, conflict, great amount of sorrow and the pursuit of pleasure, ideologically as well as sensuously. There is sorrow, confusion, conflict and an occasional flash of joy and so on, that is actually what is taking place.

So our problem is: can all this be radically changed? Can there be an inward and therefore outward psychological revolution? Because we cannot possibly go on with our old habits, with our old traditions, with our old capacities of thinking, our very structure of thought must change, our very brains cells themselves must undergo transformation to bring about order, not only within ourselves but outwardly. Now that we, you and the speaker, are going to share together, learn together to find out if a mind that has been put together through time - please do listen to this - the brain cells which have evolved through millennia, centuries upon centuries, put together, which have acquired tremendous knowledge, experience, which have collected a great deal of scientific objective knowledge, can these brain cells which are the result of time, which have produced this monstrous world, this world of war, injustice, poverty, wars, the appalling misery that is going on in the world, the division of people, racially, culturally, religiously. And all this has been produced by the intellect, by thought. And any reconstruction by thought is still within the same field. I don't know if you see that.

First of all thought has produced this division among people, for economic, social, cultural reasons, both linguistically and ideologically. Right? Do follow this. This is not very complex, this is very simple. Because of its very simplicity you will discard it. But if you observe you will see for yourself very clearly that the intellect with all its cunning reason, both objective and non-objective, this thought has brought about this condition, this state both inwardly and outwardly. Right? Do we see this together? Your thought, the way you think, the way another thinks, the way you think as a Hindu, as a Buddhist, as a Christian, as a Muslim and communist, god knows what else, you are conditioned by the past, and you think along those lines, and that very same thought tries to find a way out of this confusion. Right? And that confusion has been created by thought. Is this clear? It is not what I say, what the speaker says, it is what you have discovered for yourself, which is together. Right? Are you going to sleep? Or are you listening with passion to find out? Because we have got to change, we can't go on as we are, lazily, satisfied with little things, accepting certain doctrines as truth, believing in something about which you know absolutely nothing, following somebody hoping that it will lead you to enlightenment, the various gurus with their concentration camps. Don't laugh, do listen to this. This is so dreadfully serious.

And all this has been produced by thought. And thought is the response of memory. Right? Otherwise if you had no memory you couldn't think. Memory is knowledge, gathered experience, and thought is the response of the past. Obviously. And we are trying to solve an immense complex problem of human relationship in terms of the past, which is thought. Right? Do you get this? Are we moving together, or are you still a Hindu? Or god knows what else. All that childishness.

So our question is, if you are at all serious because it is only the serious person that lives, it is only the serious person that can understand totally this whole significance, not the man who just casually takes interest for a few days and drops it. We are concerned with changing your daily life, not substituting one belief by another belief. We must negate everything that thought has put together, otherwise you cannot possibly find a new dimension. Are we going together, are we? Please, don't agree, it is not a matter of agreement or disagreement, it is a matter of perception, seeing actually what is going on.

So the question is: thought which has brought about this culture, whether the Hindu, Christian, communist, what you will, and that thought which is the response of memory, which is knowledge, and that thought which has created such confusion, misery, sorrow in the world, how can those very brain cells themselves which contain the memory undergo radical mutation? You have understood my question?

Look sir, knowledge is necessary - just listen quietly, first listen - knowledge is necessary, otherwise you can't go home, otherwise you couldn't write a letter, we couldn't speak in English together, understand each other. Scientific knowledge, technological knowledge is absolutely necessary to function. We see that, that is, if you want to communicate in Italian you must learn Italian, gather, study the meaning of words, the verbs, how to put the sentences together and so on, accumulate knowledge in Italian in order to communicate in Italian. You must have knowledge. Which is again the product of thought. Right? Which is, cultivating memory in the language of Italian and then speaking that language. Which is, having knowledge of the Italian words. Right? One must have knowledge, which is the accumulation and the product of thought. Are you following all this? God, knows, I don't.

And one sees also thought has created division between people through their religious absurdities, through their nationalism, linguistically, culturally, you know, all the division between you and another, between you and your wife, between you and your children. Thought has divided and yet thought has produced extraordinary technological knowledge which you must have. You are seeing the problem? Are we meeting each other over the question? Please. Thought has brought about great confusion, misery, wars, and thought also has produced extraordinary knowledge, accumulated technological knowledge, which you must have. So there is a contradiction in the very functioning of thought. Right? On one side it divides, separates, psychologically as well as outwardly, and thought has gathered extraordinary knowledge, created knowledge, and thought uses that knowledge to sustain the separateness of people.

Now, so the question is - what is the question? You see the speaker is putting the question, you are not. The question is, can thought, though it must function within the field of knowledge, can that very thought cease to create separation? You follow? You have understood my question? Because really that is the problem, basically, fundamentally that's the problem. Thought is old because memory is of yesterday, so thought is never free because it can only function within the field of knowledge. And this thought which is the response of memory, and that memory is within the very structure of the brain cells, and is there - not a way, a system, a method, those are all mechanical and absurd, they lead nowhere - is there a perception, that's right, is there a perception which the very seeing is the acting? You have understood my question? Am I battling with you? Are we going together? Please, do say, yes or no. Don't so quickly agree because that's too childish. I don't want your encouragement. Please. You see you are not used to investigating, you are not used to observing yourself; you are accustomed to read what other people say and repeat, whether it be Sankara, Buddha, or whoever it is. You know it would be marvellous if you never said a word that is not your own discovery, never say anything that you yourself don't know. Which means you will put away all your gurus, your books, sacred books, religious books, theories, what the philosophers have said. But of course you will have to keep your scientific, technological books, that's all.

But to never say anything that you do not understand, that you have not discovered yourself. And you will see then your whole activity of the mind undergoes a tremendous change. Because now we are second-hand human beings, or thirteen-hand human beings. We are trying to find out a way of living which is really timeless. You understand? Because thought is time. Right? Because time is putting things together, a process, a process implies time. Right? To get from here to there requires time because you have to cover space. Thought thinks in term of time. Right? Thinks of life as a process, getting from here to there. Now we are asking, a way of living in which time doesn't exist at all, except chronologically, in numbers. Right, you have understood my question? Because what we are concerned with is change, a revolution, a total mutation of the very structure of the brain cells. You understand? Otherwise you cannot produce a new culture, a new way of living, live at a different dimension altogether. Right? So we are asking, how is - the word `how' is not right - is there a way - oh, lord, not, a way - is there an action of perception - that's it - is there an action of perception in which thought doesn't enter except technologically? You have understood my question now? Are we meeting each other? Look, sir, put it very simply: one has lived in the same old pattern, in a corner of this vast field of life, in a small corner, and in that corner there is extraordinary division, that very corner creates division. Right? And we are living in that state. One observes this, not through books, not through newspapers, not through what somebody else says, one actually observes this fact. And one asks, can this be radically changed? We think change in terms of time. Right? I will be different tomorrow. Right? We are caught in the verb, to be. Right? I have been, I am, I shall be. That is, caught in the trap of that verb, to be. The verb, to be, is time. Right? Oh, for god's sake! And one asks, if one is serious, meditative, deeply enquiring, time doesn't seem to bring about radical change. I will be tomorrow what I have been. Right? Modified, slightly different but it is the same movement of what has been, and that is the process in time. And in that there is no mutation, there is no transformation. Right?

And how is this mutation to take place from which there will be a different way of living, a different culture, a different creation altogether? That is the question, you understand? To perceive and act, not perception and later on act, which is the function of thought. Oh, lord! Please, this isn't intellectual, this isn't verbal, this is really simple. Look, let's begin again.

I see in myself, which is yourself, I see in myself a great deal of suffering, a great deal of confusion, ambition, anger, brutality, violence, all the things that man has put together is in me, is in you. Right? The sexual pleasures, the ideological pleasures, the fears, the agonies, the competitive drive, aggression, violence, you know all that. That's what you are, what we are. Can that be changed instantly? We know, or we think there is a way of bringing about a radical change in that through time; gradually I will evolve, gradually I will get rid of my anger, you know, all the rest of it. That means time. Right? And one sees time doesn't change at all. Right? You may modify but radically it doesn't change because you perceive yourself as you are and you say, I will be that, I should be that - in that interval between what you are, 'what is' and 'what should be' is space, is time. Right? And when you are moving from 'what is' to what you should be there are other factors coming in. And therefore you never come to 'what should be'.

Right?

Look: I am violent and I say to myself, I must not be violent. The 'must not be violent' implies time, doesn't it? Please, doesn't it? I will be not violent in a week's time - therefore that involves time. And between now and next week I am sowing the seeds of violence therefore I haven't stopped being violent. Right, do you follow this? Therefore I ask myself: is there a way - I am using 'way', it doesn't matter - is there a perception which is freed from time and therefore instant action? You have understood my question now? Is there perception of violence which will end that violence not in a week's time but instantly? You have understood my question? Isn't that clear? Right? Are you listening? For god's sake. Are we communicating with each other? That is, I want to see if violence can end instantly and not gradually, because when you say, gradually, it will never end. Right? Do you see that? Therefore is it possible to perceive and that very perception is action? Shall I go on from there? Shall we go on from there?

Now what prevents this perception? You understand my question? To perceive perception is action, as when you see a snake you act instantly, there is no saying 'Well, I will act next week', there is immediate response because there is danger. Now what prevents the mind, and therefore the brain, from this instant action of perception? You understand what I am talking about? You have got my question? Right? What do you think prevents it? Let's talk about it a little. What do you think prevents it? Why don't you see that time is a barrier, time doesn't bring freedom because time is thought? Right? Time is putting things horizontally or vertically together. And time will not bring about a different perception of life on a different dimension. Right? So what is it that prevents perception? Right? You understand my question? What do you think prevents perception? Why don't you see things clearly and act instantly? Why don't you see that division, psychological division, as you a Parsi, a Hindu, a communist, a socialist, a Muslim, a Buddhist, that division creates tremendous conflict. You see that, don't you? How do you see it? Verbally? Or as an actual fact of danger? Do you understand? Do you see that as long as I am a Hindu, a communist, that very fact must bring about division and division is conflict? Intellectually I recognize that. Right? Intellectually say, 'Yes, that is so'. There I stop. But action doesn't come from it, I don't completely cease to be a Hindu, which means all the tradition, all the conditioning, the culture, you follow, that doesn't cease because I am intellectually hearing the words without relating to perception as danger. Right?

Why is there no perception as when there is danger you perceive and act instantly? You understand? Why don't you? Because you see, you know what is happening in the world, the black against the white, the communist against the capitalist, the labour against somebody, and so on, division, division, the Catholic against the Protestant though they both worship what they call Jesus Christ, and all the rest of it. Here too there is division, linguistic, national, cultural, you know, this country is ridden with division. Right? You have your guru and I have my blasted little guru. I have my guru's system to nirvana, to heaven, and you have yours. Right? So there is division, there is conflict, and out of this conflict there is war both inwardly and outwardly. And a man who is really serious wants to find a way of living where there is no conflict at all, at the very root of his being, no conflict, he has to find out, not merely intellectually, not verbally, but actually find out for himself if there is an action which is not of time. Right? Now I will go into it.

When the speaker is going into it, don't follow him because then you become his stupid disciple. We are enquiring together therefore you are sharing the thing together. When the speaker is going into it, explaining, don't be caught by the words, by explanations because the explanation is not the explained. You may be very hungry, and if I tell you what lovely food there is, that won't satisfy you. You have to share it, eat it.

Now we'll begin at the very objective level. Whether you can see anything without an image. Just listen to it, please, just listen to it. To see a tree without the image, without the knowledge, without thought coming in between the observer and the observed and saying, that is a mango tree. Just to observe. Have you ever done it? You have always observed, haven't you, through an image? Right? Haven't you? Because that is, you see without the verbalization, the verbalization is the process of thinking. Now can you observe a tree, your neighbour, your wife or your boy or girl friend without the image? Can you? You can't, can you? Can you observe your wife, which is a little more difficult than observing a tree, can you observe your wife - how easily you laugh, don't you, you want to be entertained, too bad - you can observe a tree fairly easily without the image, without the word, without thought, just to observe. When you observe the tree without the whole mechanism of thought coming into operation - just listen - then the space between you and the tree, which is time, disappears, which doesn't mean you become the tree, or you identify yourself with the tree. You see the tree completely, not partially, then there is only the tree without the observer. Right? You understand this? You have never done it, do it. Not, try to do it, do it! That is, to observe a flower, a cloud, the bird, the light on the water, the movement of the breeze among the leaves, just to watch it without any image, then you will see there is a relationship which has never existed before between that which is observed and the observer, because then the observer comes totally to an end. We will go into that, let's leave that for the moment.

Now observe, observe, do it, your wife or your friend without the image. You know how difficult it is? You have the image of your wife, haven't you, or the husband, or somebody. That image has been built through time. Right? You have lived with her, sexually, lived with her for comfort, you know, she has nagged you, you have bullied her and all the things that happen in this terrible family life - which we will go into later - there you have built up through years an image about her, and she about you. And you look at each other through these images, don't you? Right? Don't you? Oh, do be honest for a change. You are so frightened to be honest. You have an image. Now that image separates people. Right? The image as you as a Hindu, and the Muslim as a Muslim, which is an image, that image divides. Right? And if I have an image about my wife, that image, which she has and I have, obviously must divide. Right? Now how is this image to come to an end? The image as a Hindu, as a Muslim, as a communist, as a socialist, you follow, the image that one has built about oneself and the image that one has built about another, how is that to come to an end? Right? If that image disappears then there is a totally different kind of relationship. You understand? Because the image is the past, the image is the memory, the memory is the various markings on the brain cells which have taken place through a number of years. You are following? Which is the conditioning of the brain cells as a Hindu, and that image remains.

Now the question is: can that image come to an end? Right? Not through time, not gradually but instantly. You have followed my question? Now to answer that question one has to go into what is the machinery that builds image? Right? Are you also working? Are we together or are you merely learning from the speaker? Don't learn from the speaker, because the speaker has nothing to teach you. You understand? He has absolutely nothing to teach you because he doesn't accept the position as a teacher and disciple, because that breeds authority. And where there is authority there is division, the one who knows and the one who does not know. And the man who says he knows, he does not know. So you are not learning from me, from the speaker; you are learning by observing yourself. Right? By observing, by watching, therefore you are free to learn. Therefore freedom is absolutely necessary to learn. And if you are merely following, accepting authority, whether of somebody or that of the speaker, specially of the speaker, then you are lost, as you are lost now.

So learn from observing. And you are observing yourself, you are observing that you have your own image about another, that you have an image of yourself as a Hindu, as a Buddhist, communist, Christian, Protestant, as a hippie and so on and on and on. You see that image in yourself. Now you ask yourself, I know how that image has come into being because I have been brought up as a Christian, as a Hindu, as a Muslim, I was born into that and conditioned, and that image remains, and that image divides people. Where there is division there must be conflict, outwardly and inwardly. Then you are learning from your own observation. You are asking yourself, can this image come to an end. When you ask that question you are also asking the question, what is the machinery that builds this image. Right? And we are learning together to find out what this machinery is, therefore you are not learning from the speaker, it's yours.

It's twenty to seven, shall I go on? Yes? You aren't tired? Why not? Can you still go on with this? You are asking yourself, not me asking you. You are asking yourself, can this image come to an end, not through time because the image has been put together through time. Time is thought, thought has bred this image: I have been insulted, I have been nagged, I must dominate, you follow, thought has bred this image. Now what is the machinery, you are asking, that puts together this image? Right? What is the machinery? Just observe it, just observe it, don't try to translate it and act upon it, just observe what the speaker is saying, listen to it and observe its action, the action of observation, perception on yourself. Just observe it. You tell me I am a fool. The word with its associations is seated in the memory, in the brain cells, the word `fool' has its association which is the memory. Right? Which is the old brain. The old brain says, `You are another'. Right? You call me a fool, I call you another. Right? So the response is the response of the old memory. Right? You see this? Now the machinery is, as you observe, when the wife or the husband nags, at the moment of nagging there is no attention; when there is attention at the moment of nagging there is no operation of the machine. Do you see it? Do you see this? You call me an idiot, if I am completely aware at that moment then the machinery has no fuel to act. Right? Do you see this? Oh, no. Is this difficult? Have you got this, please? Can I go on?

At the moment of inattention, when there is no attention then the machinery is in operation. Right? At the moment of attention you can say what you like, the machinery doesn't function. Right? You can see this for yourself. When you call yourself a Hindu, and do all the tricks of Hinduism, at that moment when you are completely aware when you call yourself a Hindu, you see all the significance, all the meaning of it, division, conflict, battle, separation, when you see all that, which is to see, and that perception takes place only when you are completely attentive, at that moment the machinery of the Hinduism which is the conditioning comes to an end. You have got it? Have you got it, please? Have you learnt it by observing yourself?

Then the next question arises: how can this mind keep so attentive all the time? Right? Is that the question you are asking? Because you see when at a moment of attention all the conditioning disappears, all the image building comes to an end, it's only when you are not attentive then the whole thing begins, you are a Hindu, Muslim, Christian, you know, communist and all the absurdities. And then the next question is: can this attention be sustained? Which means this attention continue. You follow?

Please follow this carefully. Can this attention continue all the time? Right? Which means can this attention endure, which involves time, doesn't it? See that. Therefore you are putting a wrong question - right? - when you say, can this attention endure, can I keep this attention all the time, tell me how to keep this attention going all the time, what is the method, what is the system to sustain this attention. The moment you say, 'how is it to continue', you are inviting time, therefore time is inattention. Got it? Oh, you don't see it. Time is inattention. When you are completely attentive there is no time.

And when there is this attention and you have perceived and acted, forget it, it is over. Don't say, 'I must carry it with me'. You understand? You follow this? That is, at that moment of attention, you have seen and acted. Right? Perception, action. But thought says, how extraordinary, I wish I could continue that attention all the time because I see a way of acting without all this conflict. And so thought wants to cultivate attention. Any form of cultivation implies time. Right? So attention cannot be cultivated through time. Therefore perceive, action, and end there, forget it, begin again. You follow? So that the mind, the brain cells are fresh each time, not burdened with yesterday's perception. You have got it?

So the mind then is always fresh and young and innocent, not carrying all the burdens of yesterday. And the word 'innocence' means a mind that can never be hurt. You understand? A mind that has no markings of ever being hurt. That is real innocence. And most of us are hurt from childhood, we are beaten, we are crippled, we are tortured, we have scars on the brain. And we are struggling through the scars to find some state of mind in which there is no hurt. And an innocent mind is a mind that has never been hurt.

That means a mind that never carries the hurt over to the next day.

So there is no forgiveness or remembrance.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC DISCUSSION 12TH JANUARY 1971

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk over together this morning?

Questioner: Can we dispense with memory altogether in our human relationships?

K: Can we - I'll repeat the question - can we dispense altogether with memory in our human relationship? Shall we talk that over together? Is that what you want to discuss?

Q: What is creation?

Q: Why should we hold on to scientific memories?

Q: You said the other day that we must die to the past, unless we die every moment of our life we can't live anew, how is this to be done?

K: You said the other day that we must die every day to live anew, to have a clear perceptive mind, and how is this to be done. Anything else you would like to discuss?

Q: What is wisdom?

Q: Concentration?

K: Just throw in any old word, you know, see what comes out of it. Yes, sir?

Q: Can you speak about your experiences of ...

K: I don't quite follow the question, sir.

Q: I mean we are trying to bring people by their own understanding of what they can do. Now I feel it is possible, I don't know what percentage, but I assure you that not all the people here are capable of living life at the moment and ...

K: The questioner says, if I understood rightly, please correct me if I am repeating it wrongly: only a few of us can understand what you are talking about, what about the rest, and if you personally went into your own experience perhaps that might help. Is that it?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Now which of these shall we discuss, talk over, or shall we put them all together? I think we can put them all together. What is the place of memory; and what is the place of knowledge in our daily life; and is it possible to live without the burden of the past and so live anew every day; and such a way of life can only be understood by the few, what about the rest? I think that more or less covers all our questions, doesn't it?

What is the place of knowledge in life? We'll begin very slowly and step by step go into this. Both the scientific knowledge and the accumulated racial knowledge as tradition, and one's own particular experiences, memories, knowledge, what place has all that in our daily life? Are we aware of all this? Is one aware, are you aware of the immense racial, cultural memories which are traditions, how your mind, one's mind functions in that particular pattern, is one aware, are you aware of it? Sir, this is a talking over together, this is not a talk by me, so we are supposed to talk things over together. Are you aware of this? You know, this is rather a complex problem because there is not only the conscious technological memories acquired recently but also the deep inherited memories - racial, religious, cultural, sociological, sociological, environmental - they are deeply rooted. One may be conscious or aware of the superficial memories. Now what place - the question is: what place have these superficial memories in life, in relationship, and what is the relationship of the deep hidden memories that affect our daily relationship? Right?

Look: one has collected recently a great deal of technological knowledge, a great deal of memories with regard to science, law, you know, all that one reads, the education that one has had, the linguistic, the superficial accretions of the culture in which we live - the technological, the tradition and so on. Is one aware of it? Aware in the sense, does one know how one uses memory? I happen to speak French and Italian and Spanish because I have accumulated knowledge about those languages. Those are recent acquisitions. And I use them when I travel and all the rest of it. And also one has a great many other memories, memories of hurt, memories of insults, memories of various kinds of experiences - you follow? - one is not aware of them, one is using them. And there are all the hidden memories, hidden knowledge, deep in the dark corners of one's own mind. All memory, isn't it, is in the past.

I don't know how to discuss with you, you don't seem to take a share in this. You just listen, nod your head or agree. All memory, all knowledge, is in the past, isn't it?

Q: What do you mean by the past?

K: He asked, what do you mean by the past. It's in your mind, it's in the brain cells, the very structure of the brain cells holds all the memories. An experience you pass through and that leaves a mark; the mark, the knowledge, the information is there in the brain cells but it is already over. Isn't it? It is finished. I have experienced an insult yesterday, that has been registered in the mind, in the brain cells, that has left a memory and that memory was of yesterday's insult. That's what I mean, the past. And most of our memories are in the past in that sense.

Yes, sir? (Noise of aeroplane) Just a minute, sir, let the aeroplane have its voice! Yes, sir?

Q: Is every memory in the past?

K: Is every memory in the past. Are there memories that are actually taking place now? Is that what you mean, sir? Can there be?

Q: Yes.

K: There cannot be.

Q: Some of the memories are.

K: I am exploring. I am asking. And these memories, modified in the present, project `what should be` in the future. So the movement of memory from the past, through the present to the future, but the whole movement has its source in the past. Right? Please, don't agree with me, just observe it in yourself. So what is that relationship, what is the relationship of this movement to the present? Right?

Q: It is creative.

K: Sir, don't jump to creative - you don't even know what it is, let's go step by step into it, sir.

What is the relationship of this movement, what is the action of this movement with the movement of life, the living? Sir, what is memory? You can see if you learn a language you accumulate all the verbs, the words and how to put the words together and so on and so on, that is a linguistic memory, memory composed of many, many words, verbs, irregular verbs and the usage of that. That's one type of memory. Then there are the whole scientific, technological memories. Right? Which we acquired through so-called education, the cultivation of memory through technological information.

There are all the psychological memories, the memories that come about through human relationship. Right? My wife, my neighbour, my children, my husband, psychological relationship. Then there are all the racial memories, the racial memories being the memories of the culture in which I have lived. Right? Then there are all the ideological memories. I don't know if you see. So my mind is full of these memories: linguistic, technological, scientific, engineering and all the rest of it, psychological memories which I have accumulated during the last twenty years, or thirty years, or fifty years, or eight years, and there are all the racial memories, and so on. My mind, this mind is composed of all this. Right? The consciousness is the content of all this memory.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Oh, good lord, we are talking about memory, sir. We haven't even finished it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just let us go into this, it is fairly complicated, sir. I won't go into consciousness because that leads to all kinds of things.

So the brain cells contain all this, all in contradiction. Right? Please, see this, observe it in yourself. All in contradiction: the scientific knowledge and the racial knowledge, the personal knowledge, they are all opposing each other, all moving in different directions from each other. And the content of the brain cells is this vast collective memories, and from that memory, consciously or unconsciously we act. So knowledge as memory, as experience, is always in the past - always in the past, it must be - and respond to the present from the past, so there is a contradiction.

Right?

Q: What do you mean by the past?

K: I'll show it to you. Sir, they agree immediately, they shake their heads.

Q: I don't.

K: Not you, sir, just a minute. I didn't say you, sir.

Q: I acquire more.

K: Yes, you acquire - that's what I am saying - accumulate, accumulate.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Of course, sir, but it's all there. Now I was saying that the past with all the memories is in contradiction with the present. You say, what do you mean by that. And some say, I don't agree with you. Now what do we mean, what do I mean by that - the past is in contradiction with the present? Right, sir? What do I mean by that? I have been insulted yesterday, you insulted me, or flattered me. That has left a mark on my mind, an image of you who have insulted or flattered, and I meet you the next day. That image, that memory projects, interferes in the observation of you now. You might have changed, you might have - are bound to - had a tremendous lot of changes, and I come with a past memory and meet you with that image of that insult, so there is a contradiction. If I can meet you without that insult with its memories I meet you afresh. In that there is no contradiction, though you may not have changed, or you might have changed. I approach you with a mind that is freed from yesterday's insult, in that there is no contradiction. There is nothing to agree of disagree about this matter.

So the past has its own movement. Right? Accumulating, discarding, modifying, adjusting, it has its own movement. That is, if one is a doctor there are so many new investigations, examinations, information, diagnosis, and this is accumulation of knowledge which is also a movement. I don't know if you are following that? And life has also its movement. No?

Q: What do you mean by life has its own movement?

K: What do I mean by, life has its own movement. All right. We see knowledge as a movement from the past through the present to the future, adding, taking away, modifying and so on. That's a movement, isn't it? It is not a dead static thing. Right? And do I realize that the past is interfering in a relationship which is also a movement?

Q: How do I make use of past memory?

K: I am going to show it to you in a minute, I am just looking at it, sir. Look at it first. That is, the past is a movement, it is not a dead thing, because there are experiences being added to it all the time, modified, changed, adjusted, it's a movement. At one level it is very, very superficial, and at other levels it's very, very deep, so between the superficial and the depth there is a contradiction, there is a variation. I am technologically terribly advanced but I am still a narrow bigoted Christian or a Catholic or a Hindu. So there is a variation, there is a contradiction. Unless this contradiction ceases there must be conflict in my relationship. Isn't it?

Q: The movement of the past can be in harmony with the present.

K: Now wait a minute, what is the present? Tell me, sirs, what is the present? Do you know what the present means?

Q: Now.

K: Wait, before you answer, please, I haven't finished the question. What is the present? The present is now, while you are sitting, is that the present?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, enquire, enquire, please. Is that the present, being here? You are physically here but your thoughts may be ... Or you might say, I am listening to what is being said, I am comparing it with what somebody else has said. So what is the present? Is it a chronological time as the present, the number is ten past, whatever it is, is that the present, by the watch? Is there such a thing as present? So to understand really deeply what it means, the present, one must understand this whole movement of the past. And you say, well, don't bother about that, let's live in the present. That has no meaning. And there are a great many philosophies founded on this idea, let's live in the present, forget, it doesn't matter what has happened, let's make the best of this awful life, now.

So to understand the movement of the present, and it must be a movement otherwise it is not a present, one must go into this whole question of the past as memory, which is time. Right? I must understand time to find out what is the present. And time is memory, time is something that has been put together, either vertically or horizontally. And that is the memory which each of us has - linguistic, technological, psychological, traditional and so on, it's a vast accumulation, both conscious and hidden. Right? Now let's find out how to observe or learn or be aware of the deeper layers of memories. You follow? Please, does this interest you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Quite right.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I have been insulted yesterday and I have the memory of that insult and when I meet you I meet you with the image of that insult. So my relationship with you is through the image of that memory, through that recollection, so there is no actual relationship between you and me, only the memory of that insult. That's fairly simple, we can't stick to that example, I am sorry.

Q: Suppose it repeats itself day after day.

K: You live with that image. Your next question is, how am I to be free of that image. Right? Is that we are discussing?

Q: Should I be free of it at all?

K: You have insulted me, you have robbed me, you have flattered me, and that has left a mark as memory. Memory is an image, as you the central figure in that image. And should I wipe away the memory of that insult, or that flattery? Or you have robbed me, should I forget it, and be robbed next time by the same person? What should I do? What should I do? I am very simple, you can rob me, I have nothing very much except a few clothes. So that is not a problem to me. But if you have a lot of things and you are robbed then you will think about it twice. How to deal with a person who has hurt me. It is so complex really. How to deal with a person who has hurt you, both physically and psychologically. Physically in the sense, taken away your things, or hurt you physically, wounded you, or wounded you inwardly. Now how to be free of this hurt - that's what I am coming to if you would go with me a little bit.

Which is - let's go back - we were asking, there is this vast collection of complex memories, inter-related memories and contradicting each other. The conscious memories, knowledge, are necessary, technologically. If I don't remember where I live I can't get home, I won't be able to speak the language, I won't be able to recognize you. So technological knowledge is necessary and I classify all the recognition, the information, the knowledge, scientific, biological, law, all that as superficial knowledge. Now there are deeper layers of memory. Now how shall I, how shall you examine all that because they are constantly interfering? They are constantly modifying, or changing the superficial. Right? So there must be an awareness, a recognition, or an understanding of the hidden. Now how is that to be done? How is it to be done? Go on, sirs.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's all. That's quite right. Only you enquire into the hidden when there is trouble, when there is suffering, when there is pain.

Q: A mistake.

K: The same thing. A mistake and all the rest of it. And we live with a great many mistakes, a great many worries, a great many problems, both superficially and so on and so on. I am asking you a question, which is: how am I, how is this conscious mind with all the information it has, which is also conditioned, how can that mind enquire into the deeper layers, into the very dark recesses of one's own brain, memories, how do you propose to do it?

Q: By wilful forgetfulness.

K: Go slowly. Let me answer the gentleman. By wilfully forgetting it. Can you do it, say, 'I won't look behind the garden', and the filth is collected there. Can you wilfully deny this? So that is not all right, we can brush that aside. The action of will, which is to say, 'I must look into it', will not answer it, or wilfully saying, 'I will forget it' - it is there. Then what will you do?

Q: By being constantly aware.

K: By being constantly aware of what?

Q: Of it.

K: Listen to the gentleman's question. He says, by being constantly aware of it. What is the 'it'?

Q: Past memories.

K: Past memories, hidden. How will you know it? So just watch it, sir. Will you know it through analysis? Which is what all the world is doing. Please, don't deny it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking, sir, that's just it. Will you find out through conscious analysis the content of the hidden memories? Right? Will you use analysis? Do you know what is implied in analysis? There is the analyser and the analysed. Right? Who is the analyser that is going to analyse? Is the analyser different from the thing analysed? You don't know about all this. And if you do analyse it will take time, won't it? No? Day after day, day after day, analysing, which you are doing, unconsciously or consciously you are always analysing. And one hasn't enquired into the whole structure of analysis, what it means - oh, just analyse. I am pointing out to you when you analyse there is always the analyser and the thing to be analysed. There is a division in that, the analyser is the censor. Right? Has assumed a position of authority because he says, 'I know more, I have learnt more, I can analyse the thing which I am going to' - so he separates himself from the analysed and begins to analyse, to examine. In the examination, unless the analyser is completely free of the past, his analysis will be entirely wrong or partially wrong, therefore valueless.

And analysis implies time, because I have so many memories and I have to examine each memory. Do you know what it means? It will take all my life time and by the time I am dead. And when there is time between the completion of analysis other factors come into being, so there is no end to this process, therefore it is totally wrong. You are stuck, aren't you?

Q: No, sir. All you are saying is the analyser is equal to the conditioning of the past.

K: That's right.

Q: He is trying to analyse the conditioning by the conditioning.

K: That's right, that's right, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, I am going to show it to you, don't come to any conclusion. Don't come to any conclusion, always examine, look. So I have this problem.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, we are trying to find out. Sir, please. Wilful discarding of memory, hidden memories, doesn't work, deliberately saying to myself 'I will forget the whole thing and start anew', you can't do it. Nor will analysis free the mind from the past, the past hidden as well as the insults which have left a mark. I can't analyse, through analysis get rid of it. Because I have explained what analysis implies - the observer and the analyser, and so on and so on. Then what shall I do?

Q: Become conscious of it.

K: You become conscious of it - conscious of what?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Therefore, that is the past insult, I was insulted yesterday, that interferes with my relationship with you today who have insulted me. So can I, can the mind - listen to this quietly, please - can the mind forget that insult? Can the mind analyse that insult and discard it? Right? Or both those ways take time and all that, or is there a different way altogether? You are following, you have understood my question?

Q: Ignore it.

K: Whether you ignore it or forget it, it is still there. I can ignore my tummy ache but the tummy ache is still there, or try to forget it. So, sir, just listen to the question, see the complexity of it first. Understand the question first. You insulted me yesterday, I reacted to it, that reaction is from the past, with the collection of many hurts and I respond. So how am I to completely wipe away that insult?

Q: Is it possible to do that?

K: I am going to show it to you. Don't say it is possible or not possible, let's find out, otherwise I am a bundle of hurts, I am a bundle of excruciating pain because people have insulted me, trodden on me, bullied me. You follow? So I am asking, is it possible not to record - please listen - not to record any insult? Is it possible, not after having recorded how to wipe it out, but how not to record at all? Right? You have understood my question? Please, investigate it with me. You insult me and that has left a mark, and from that memory, that memory is going to meet you tomorrow.

And it cannot be wiped away by will, by analysis. So that's gone. Then what shall I do, what shall the mind do not to record insults? Never. Let's let the past go, we will deal with that presently, past insults, but no more recording of any insult, how is this to be done?

Q: Switch off the current.

K: Wait. Switch off the current - who is going to switch it off? What kind of inanity this is, please, sir, really.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right, sir, but how are you going to not record his insult?

Q: I don't take it seriously.

K: All right, I don't take it seriously, he calls me an ass, or whatever he does, what shall I do? Insults my wife or my husband or my children, hurts them, I can't help recording, the mind records.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, I understand, sir, but I'll show you something much simpler than all this.

Q: Analysis is introspection.

K: Who is the person introspecting?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Of course, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, I know, you gradually modify your reactions, gradually, then you are dead and other things happen. This is so simple. The question is - please do pay a little attention to this - the question is: how am I, how is this mind not to record, not only insults but pleasures, experiences, pleasurable, painful, not to record so the mind is always fresh? You follow? That is the question, how is it to be done.

Q: Don't consider it as hurt.

K: He has hurt me, sir. Hit me in the face - not consider that as a hurt? Apparently you haven't gone into this. You can't forget it, you can't say, it is a temporary reaction, it will pass, or gradually it will wither away. I haven't time to allow it to gradually wither away because other factors are happening in the mean time. So my question is: how is the mind, the brain cells, not to record at all, the insults, the flatteries, the yesterday's pain, physical pain as a toothache - please follow this - and not say, 'It will happen again tomorrow, I must be careful' and there is fear, all that is recording of pain, pleasure, fear. How are the brain cells not to record but yet observe, yet look? Not just withdraw completely into blindness. How is this to be done?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, yes I understand, but I hurt you physically, I slap you in the face, or you slap me in the face, what happens? You record it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, that's partly it, I said that. We react according to our conditioning.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, now the point is this sir, look: I have been hurt, physically, psychologically, I have had pain last week and that mustn't happen again next week, and therefore there is fear of recurring pain, there is fear of recurring incidents which have happened before. Those are all memories repeating themselves. Now how is it possible for the mind, which is the brain cells, not to record these psychological memories but retain the factual memories? You have understood? Retain scientific, technological, linguistic, directional memories. Right? You have understood my question? Not that there is a division between the two, but the one interferes in all relationships, so I must first understand why I record at all. I record, the mind records because it strengthens the past, and the past gives me a sense of security, both linguistically, I said, 'I have been angry, and I am angry', the very recognition of anger in terms of the past, which is verbal, strengthens that memory. That's one side of it. And also I respond because it is a tradition, it is the habit, it is the conditioning. That's also another. I say, can all this be prevented so that there is no recording at all? Have you got my question? How will you answer this? If you are given this problem, how will you respond to it, what is your answer? Will you turn to your yogis, Veda, Gita, Upanishads and all the rest of it, what's your answer? What will you do?

Q: Recording is a biological response.

K: I understand that, sir, we said that. Recording is a biological process, like language is recorded, but I am asking. Sir, you hurt me very deeply, not by word only, by what you have done, you have hurt me very, very deeply.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, please. I have been hurt very deeply, as most people are, from childhood, beaten, frightened, nervous, anxious, avoiding, you know, all those bring hurt, and I am accumulating more and more and more hurts, and I end up when I die a withered human being. So I say to myself, how is it possible not to record the psychological memories? Please, I'll show you something very simple. When you insult, at that moment give complete attention. It is only inattention that records.

Q: Complete attention to what?

K: Wait, please. You see, you are all too clever. Complete attention to what, the gentleman asks. To your slapping me in the face, to your calling me an ass, when you are violent to me, or when I am violent to you, at that moment to be completely aware of your word, your gesture, your attitude. You know what that means, to be attentive? Have you ever tried this?

Q: To be one with the aggressor.

K: Oh, no. To be one, which is identify yourself with the aggressor. Look what a bothersome thing that is. You don't even listen, you go on with your own ideas. Incredible!

Look, sir: you call me a fool, and to be attentive at that moment. At that moment, you understand? Attentive means, give full attention with your mind, with your heart, with your body, with your eyes, with your ears, to be fully attentive at that moment when you call me an ass, because in that attention there is no recorder, there is no me who is recording the insult. Why are you all so silent? Look, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right. That is complete attention. Seeing the whole picture, not just the word.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir, no, sir, no, sir. Let's approach it differently. What is it to be aware? What does it mean to be aware? I am aware of you sitting there, I am aware of the tent, or what you call this, I am aware of those flowers, the bright sunlight on the flowers, I am aware, the colours of the sweaters, the dresses, the saris, the people's faces, I am aware. In that awareness I say, 'What a lovely flower that is', by saying, 'what a lovely flower that is' the response is from the past. Can I be aware of that flower without the response of the past? Just to observe without naming it as a bougainvillea, then in that attention there is no past at all. Right? Do see this, please, it is a very simple thing if you do it. I see that sari, that dress: visual response, conditioned response which says, 'I don't like that colour', which means I look at it with a prejudice, therefore I am not aware at all, I am aware of my prejudice responding. Now can I look at that sari, or that coat, that colour, without the reaction of like or dislike, just to observe, which doesn't mean I am indifferent, I've gone to sleep, but to actively observe. When you observe there is no centre of observation, there is no centre which is observing. The centre is the memory, is the past, which says, 'I don't like that colour', or 'I do like that colour'. Right?

Now when you are insulted, to observe completely, without any response. Try it, do it. I say you are a silly man - see what are all the responses that come into being. Which is, all the responses of the memories of the past. Now when I say you are a silly man, can you listen to it without any response of the past? But listen, not say, 'I don't care what you say, you are a perfect idiot also' and forget it. But just to listen. Then will there be any recording at all? Then you find out that you record only when you are inattentive, when there is not this complete attention then there is recording.

Then the question is: how is one to sustain this attention all the time? You have understood my question? I see that there is no recording at the moment of insult when there is complete, total attention. Which is, in which there is no response of the old brain. I am introducing a new word, I hope you don't mind - old brain being the conditioned brain with all its memories of insults, pain, to attend without all the response of the past. You can do it, one does it. When there is a tremendous crisis in life you do it. At that time it happens automatically. See what is involved in that. In a moment of crisis, real crisis, what takes place? The crisis is so enormous it knocks out the observer. Right? It knocks out the recorder because the thing is so great. Haven't you noticed it, when somebody dies -not yours, my son dies - at that moment, at that second or may be a few minutes I am in a state of complete shock, there is no recording. The incident of death has knocked out all my memories for the time being. Haven't you noticed this? Then the old habit comes in, then the recording takes place: he is my son, what shall I do, my loneliness, my self-pity, you know, all the circle begins.

Now to observe that insult and many other forms of recording, with complete attention at the moment it is given. Then you will say, how is the brain to maintain this attention all the time. Right? That's a wrong question. Because you say, I have learnt a trick and I want to continue keeping that trick. That is, pay attention completely to that insult and forget it, let it go. Next time be completely attentive. You follow what takes place? Each time you are completely attentive there is no recording. But if you say, I must continue that attention, you are just continuing the memory of that attention. Right? Therefore be completely attentive at the moment of insult. Finished. Then an interval, something else happens, and at that moment be also completely attentive so that the mind is attentive to every incident, not it must maintain a continuous attention. Got it? If you haven't got it, it's up to you.

Q: How are you to be attentive?

K: Is there a way, a system, a method which will help you to be attentive. Is that the question? A method, a system, is a practice, a repetition. A repetition is the contrary of attention. Therefore there is no method, full stop. Oh, you don't see the beauty of this. You see, sir, it all implies freedom, freedom means freedom from the past, freedom from recording, so that the mind is free.

Q: Does that mean only the free mind can attend?

K: I didn't say that. Please listen. At the moment of pain - look: I had pain last week, physical pain, very bad toothache - I didn't have it - very bad toothache, what do I do? I go to the dentist and he does something and that physical pain has left a mark, which is the memory of that pain. And the memory, which is thought, says, 'I hope I shan't have it next week, I must be careful', therefore I am nervous, therefore I am frightened because I have a recollection of the pain of the toothache a week ago. Now can I have pain, the toothache and finish with it, not carry it over to next week? You understand? It's time to stop.

Look, sir, first of all, you see most of you I am afraid are used to reading books and trying to find out how to live according to the books. Right? According to what somebody has said, and therefore you never find out for yourself what is actually going on. You know, which means never to repeat what somebody has said, never. Never to say something that you yourself actually do not know, you yourself have not actually experienced. You know what would happen if you said that, never to repeat what somebody has said, never to say something that you yourself do not know, never to assert that there is or that there is not, you know what would happen to your mind? Then you would begin to observe for yourself, then you would find out for yourself, not live on the past memories, which are dead anyhow, and that's why you are so dead, you have no energy in all this.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 13TH JANUARY 1971

As we have talked about so many other things like fear, pleasure, and the ending of sorrow, I think we ought to talk over together the question of meditation. Of course that word is loaded, specially in the East. One has all kinds of ideas of what meditation is, what systems to follow, what methods, what practices, what disciplines. And I think we ought to consider this because it is part of life, like death, love, and the sense of great beauty, meditation also is not only a part but perhaps covers the whole field of life.

I don't quite know how to begin about it because it is rather a complex thing and we ought to begin, I think, that one must change radically, totally one's way of living, not only outwardly in our relationships, in our attitudes and activities but also inwardly, most profoundly. There must be a really marvellous change so that our minds, our very structure is entirely different. And as man, centuries upon centuries, has sought a way of life that is not worldly and so he has escaped from life, he has denied living and created his own idea of what a religious life is. And if you are going to go into this question of meditation and what is a religious life, what is a religious mind, one must turn one's back upon everything that man has thought about what meditation is, or what a religious life is. We have to totally abnegate, deny all that. And I'll show you why.

First, reason is excellent, the capacity to reason logically, sanely, healthily, objectively, is essential, not to get emotional, but to clearly use the capacity of the intellect. The intellect which is a part, not the whole of man, must be capable to observe clearly, reason objectively, efficiently, sanely, not neurotically and realize that the intellect is only a part and cannot possibly solve all our problems.

And one asks, if one is at all serious, and I hope you are, how to bring about in ourselves and therefore in the world because the world is ourselves, we are the world and the world is us because we are conditioned by the culture in which we have been brought up, and that culture is created, put together by man, by you, therefore there is no difference between you and the world about you. You are the world and the world is you, and if you really seriously, profoundly see the necessity of change then one must ask, can this whole structure, the structure of the brain, the mind, undergo a total change. Now that is what we are going to find out. And that is the beginning of meditation. Not how to sit straight, to breath deeply, to do some various kinds of tricks and hope thereby to achieve some kind of marvellous enlightenment.

So we will begin by seeing what it is not, what is not meditation, and through negation come to the positive. But you must negate, not merely verbally or intellectually, theoretically but actually, negate everything that man has said, it doesn't matter who it is, what meditation is because one has to find out for oneself, because truth is something not to be bought through another, it's not something fixed, something that you can repeatedly add to in order to discover it. We will go into all that. But first please do realize that if one is really serious one must totally negate all the propaganda, for religion is a continuous propaganda - you are told what to do, what to think, either for five thousand years or two thousand years. So one must if you are serious totally put aside all that and find out for oneself what truth is, if there is such a thing.

So it is important to understand oneself, not what others say about yourself, the psychologists, the analysts, the religious teachers and the religious books because if you follow what they say what you are, if you follow others, what they say you are, you are not discovering yourself, you are discovering what others say. Right? Is that simple and clear? That is, if I follow a psychologist or a philosopher or an analytical, intellectual person or one of the ancient teachers, however ancient, respected and all the rest of it, you are merely following what they are telling you about yourself. Therefore you have to deny all that because then you begin to find out what you are. And meditation is part of this, because without knowing yourself, not only superficially but at the very depths of one's being, you have no basis for any action, you have no foundation whatsoever on which you can build, the mind can build a house that is stable, orderly. So it is absolutely necessary if you would really take this extraordinary journey, and that's what we are going to do, journey together into this enormous complex problem of understanding oneself. And please see the absolute essential necessity of it, that nobody can teach you about yourself except yourself, so you have to be the guru, the disciple yourself, the teacher yourself and learn from yourself. What you learn from another is not truth. So you have to find out for yourself what you are and to learn how to observe yourself.

You know it is one of the most arduous tasks to go into this. It's like taking a journey together. You know when you walk together you must be friends, you must love walking together, you must love. And that is one of the most difficult things. And we are going to find out. To learn about oneself is not to accumulate knowledge about oneself. Please follow this. I want to learn about myself, so I have to observe myself. If I learn about myself through the accumulation of knowledge I do not learn about myself. Right? Sirs, would you please be quiet?

Look: I want to learn about myself. There are two ways of learning: to learn in order to accumulate knowledge, and from knowledge observe, observe through the screen of the past; I learn about myself, observe myself, having experiences and accumulating knowledge from those experiences, and looking at myself through those experiences. That is, looking at myself through the past, for knowledge is the past. Right? That's one way of looking at oneself. The other is to observe and watch the movement of all the thought, of all the motives and never accumulate, therefore learning is a constant process. I see it needs further explanation, let's go into it.

I see myself being violent, and I have condemned it or justified it, and I have learnt from it that there should be no violence. I have learned from it. The next time I observe myself being violent I respond according to my knowledge of what I have learnt. Right? Do you see this? And therefore there is no fresh observation. I am looking at the new experience of violence with old eyes, with previous knowledge, therefore I am not learning. Learning implies a constant movement, not from the past, movement from moment to moment so that there is no accumulation. Because we are the result of thousands of accumulations, we are accumulating, and if you would understand that accumulation you have to learn about it and not further accumulate. Right? Do you see this? So there must be an observation which is a constant learning without accumulation? Accumulation is the centre, is the 'me', the ego, and to learn about it one must be free of accumulation, and not accumulate at another level in a different direction. You are understanding all this?

So there must be learning about oneself by watching, not condemning, not justifying, but just watching, the way you talk, the way you walk, the words you use, the motives, the purposes, the intentions, to be totally aware without any choice. And awareness is not a matter of accumulation, learning, be aware from moment to moment. When you are not aware don't bother, begin again so that your mind is always fresh. Therefore the learning about oneself is not only at the conscious level, superficial level, but also the deeper levels, the so-called unconscious, the hidden. How are you going to learn about something that is very deeply rooted, hidden, not open? Right? We are, our whole consciousness is superficial and hidden, and one has to learn the content of all that consciousness because the content makes up the consciousness. Right? The two are not separate, the content is consciousness. Therefore to understand the content there must be an observation without the observer. Right? I don't know if you understand this, we'll go along. You know it's one of the most fascinating things in life, to find out how to look anew at life.

To observe the hidden one has to have eyes that are not conditioned by the past, as a Hindu, Christian and all the rest of it, one must look at oneself as though for the first time, and look at it for the first time each time, and therefore never accumulate. If you can so observe yourself in action, in the office, with the family, with the children, when you are sexual, when you are greedy, ambitious, you know, all the rest of it, observe without condemning it, without justifying it, just to observe, then you will see that in that observation there is no conflict whatsoever. And a mind that comes with a torture, with a distorted mind, can never possibly find out what truth is. And most of our minds are distorted, tortured, made small by control, by discipline, by fear.

And there is another factor, which is, the psychologists say, not that I have read their books or anything of that kind, but people have talked to the speaker about their special subjects, professionals, that you must dream otherwise you go mad, there must be when you sleep, there must take place dreams. Please be interested in this because you dream in life, every night when you sleep some kind of dream activity goes on. And they say that it is essential for human sanity that you must dream. Now we are going to question it, we are going to find out whether it is absolutely necessary to dream at all. So we have to discard the professionals and find out for ourselves. So we have to ask, what are dreams? Are not dreams the continuation of the activity of daily life - right? - only in symbolic form? Right? Please don't agree or disagree, we are enquiring together, taking the journey together therefore there is no agreement, or disagreement. We are both of us observing. We are asking, is it necessary to dream at all? And what are dreams? Are they not the movement of daily life, the daily observation, the daily wrangles, you know all the misfortunes, violence, bitterness, anger, a movement of that continuing while you are asleep, only taking a symbolic, a ritual, or a verbal scene. You find out.

So if you have observed also you will see that the brain needs order otherwise it can't function rationally. Right? You are following all this? Have you noticed before you go to sleep that you review the day and you say to yourself, 'I should have said that differently', 'I should have done that in a different way', 'I shouldn't have said that', 'I wish it hadn't happened, I must correct it tomorrow' - haven't you noticed it, that you review the day, just before you go off to sleep. Why? Because if you don't do it consciously while you are asleep the mind is spending its energy to bring order within itself. Are you following all this? I am afraid you are not.

Look: order is necessary in daily life, not only when you are asleep, the brain demands that you have an orderly, sane life, otherwise it can't function efficiently. And order is virtue because if you are not virtuous, if you are disorderly, how can the brain which can only operate excellently when it is secure, when it has order within itself, haven't you noticed all these things? Look: if you lead a disorderly life, as most of us do, a contradictory, stupid, shallow life, you can have a superficial order; but the superficial order becomes disorder when there is a relationship with other human beings. So order is necessary. We will come back to that.

So while you are asleep, while the body is asleep, the brain is bringing about order in itself because the next day it has to face disorder again therefore it must have some capacity of order to bring out of disorder. Right? And the bringing about order is a form of dream, but if you in the waking hours established order then the brain while the physical body is asleep then the brain can enquire, live a totally different kind of life. We will go into that also. Is this all Greek to you? Are we talking Chinese? Look, sir, this is part of meditation. A mind that has no order, that is disorderly, doing one thing, saying another, thinking, acting in another way, as we do, such a mind cannot possibly understand what meditation is. There must be order. Now how do you establish - how does the mind, the brain establish order during the day? Order being virtue, not the social morality. Social morality is immorality. We are not talking of social order, social morality, we are talking of a virtue that is orderly. Now the order is not a blue-print established by the Gita, the Bible, by the teacher, order is a living thing, it has no blue- print. If you have a blue-print then there is disorder between what you are and what you should be. You are following all this? Therefore in that there is contradiction, therefore there is conflict. Conflict indicates disorder.

So you can only find out what order is when you observe, learn about what is disorder. In the understanding of what is disorder you have order. Right? And our daily life, as we live, is disorderly, isn't it? Would you say your life, if you are honest to yourself, is very orderly, very sane, balanced, harmonious? Obviously not. If it was you wouldn't be sitting here. You would be free human beings, marvellous human beings, establishing a different kind of society, but we are disorderly human beings, contradictory. So observe without denying, justifying, just observe your disorder, how contradictory you are, how frightened you are, how envious you are, seeking prestige, position, bullied by your wife or husband, a slave to what your neighbour thinks of you, a constant conflict, struggle. Observe that without justifying, condemning, learn all about that disorder, and you will see out of that comes an extraordinarily sweet order with a movement, with a life, with vigour.

Then you will see that because during the day you have established complete order in your life, a mathematical precise order - and to understand that you have to understand fear, you have to understand pleasure, which we went into briefly the other day. I am not going into all that. All the egotistic activities, the vanities, the agonies, the despairs, all that is disorder, and by being aware of that, choicelessly, you will see that when you go to sleep your mind then has no dreams at all. Therefore such a mind, such a brain is made fresh during sleep, renews itself and therefore the next morning you will find the brain has an extraordinary capacity. And that's part of understanding oneself. And one has to give time to it, you must love this, you know. Oh, lord! You must give your life to this because it's your life, you must give your life to understand your life. Because you are the world and the world is you, if you change you change the world. This is not a mere intellectual idea, you must burn with this, you must have passion, and meditation is the release of tremendous energy. Now we are going to go into that some more.

You know to change the environment there must be a system, a method - method, system is to act efficiently. Just follow this. If you want to change the environment round here there must be planning, what to do. If you want to build a house you have to plan. And when you establish a system, what takes place? Outwardly, what takes place? There must be a few who will be capable of running that system. Then what happens to them, the people who run the system? They become much more important than the system or the consideration of changing the environment. Haven't you noticed all this? No? They are the bosses, they are the people who use the system in order to become important themselves, like the politicians the world over. Haven't you noticed this? Please follow this. To bring about an environmental change there needs to be an efficient group of people with a system, but the efficient people are human beings, they are angry, jealous, envious, wanting position - you have seen all this, haven't you. And therefore they use the system and forget the whole business. Right?

Now we want a system to meditate. You are following this? See the relationship between the two. We think we can be efficient in our meditation, in our thinking, in our enquiry if there was a system. Now what does a system imply? Please bear in mind very clearly the distinction between the two: if you want to change the physical environment there must be a group of people who are efficient to carry out that system, they must be impersonal, not egotistic, not lining their own pockets, you know, metaphorically and physically. And therefore human beings matter more than the systems. You see the importance of this? So we say the same thing about changing, bringing about a change in ourselves, that only through a system we can change, only through a system we can learn what meditation is, because that appears to offer efficiency. Does it? You know, every potty little guru in India, and elsewhere, has a system of meditation - mass, come together, meditate together, do this, don't do that, you know, all the racket that goes on in the name of meditation.

Now systems imply a repetition, practice, following a method. If you follow a method, a system, do practice, it becomes a routine.

Right? And when the mind becomes a mechanical thing then you have conflict, then there is an escape through sex, or through different forms. You are understanding all this? Therefore at all costs avoid any system of meditation because a mechanical mind can never possibly find out what truth is. The mechanical mind can become very disciplined, orderly; but that orderliness is contradiction to the order which we were talking about. Because in that orderliness, which is co-called repetition, there is contradiction between what you are and what you should be, the ideal, the perfect, and all the rest of that business. So there is contradiction in that. And where there is contradiction there is distortion, and therefore a mind tortured. And a tortured mind can never find out anything. So don't belong to any system, don't follow any guru. You know once a very famous guru came to see us. It was rather an amusing incident. Some of us were sitting on a little mattress as big as this, and out of politeness we got up and we asked the important man to sit on the mattress. He sat, he had a stick, he put the stick in front of him, sat very dignified, and he became the guru because he was on a little mattress. You have understood? He was telling us all what we should do, because out of politeness we offered the little seat which was an inch higher. Vanity and the demand for power, position, and people to be followers, such people will never find what truth is; they will find what they want which is their own gratification. So there is no system. But if you understand there is no system then your mind becomes alive, sharp to find out.

Now what is it that you are going to find out? We want, most of us, to experience something other than the daily experiences, we want to experience a transcendental state, an experience of enlightenment. The word 'experience' means to go through. And when you demand to have greater experiences, that indicates that you are bored with living. Right? All the people who take drugs, they think through drugs they will have extraordinary experiences, and they do take a trip. Their trip, their experiences are the expression of their own conditioning. It gives them certain vitality, certain clarity, but that has nothing whatsoever to do with enlightenment. So through drugs you cannot possibly come upon it.

So what is it that we are seeking? You are following? What is it man wants? He sees what his life is, a boredom, a routine, a battlefield, a fight, this constant struggle, never a moment of peace, except perhaps occasionally, sexually or otherwise. So he says, 'Life is transient, life is changing, there must be something extraordinarily permanent' and he wants that permanency, something other than mere physical daily routine and experience. And he calls that god. So he believes in god, and all the images, rituals are based on beliefs. Belief is the outcome of fear. If there is no fear you can see the leaf, the tree, the beautiful sky, the light and the birds and a face, there is beauty. And where there is beauty there is goodness. Where there is goodness there is truth.

So one must understand the daily living. One must understand why our lives have become mechanical, why we follow others, why we are so childish, believing, not believing, fighting, violent, you know what is going on in daily life. And we want to escape from it, therefore we want wider, deeper experiences. And books, gurus, teachers, promise that enlightenment, that extraordinary thing. And systems offer you that. That is, do these things and you will get there, follow this path and you will find yourself there. As though truth is like a station fixed, and all the roads leading to it. The same idiotic idea that there is a station, or a road, it doesn't matter what road you take you will all come there, therefore be tolerant of other paths. There is no road, no path, and no fixed truth. Therefore there is no path, therefore you must have a mind that is extraordinarily alive, working, learning.

And there is this whole question of concentration. You see, I don't know who tells you these things, that you must concentrate, learn to control thought, you must suppress desires, you must be this, you must never look at a woman, never look at a man, you know all that business. I don't know why you listen to any of this. You know, have you ever concentrated? That is, focusing your intention on something, have you done it? Like a school boy when he wants to look out of the window and see the movement of the tree or the bird or the passer-by, and the teacher says, 'Look at your book, don't look out of the window'. That is concentration. That is, give, focus your intention and build a wall round yourself so that you are not disturbed. Concentration becomes exclusion, a resistance. Right, do you see this? And in that concentration there is a battle. You want to concentrate and your mind goes off, your thought chases something or other, so there is conflict. Whereas if you gave attention - please listen to this - if you were attentive, not at the moment you want to be attentive but attentive during the day. For a few minutes at a time, completely attentive, give your mind, your body, your heart, your eyes, your ears, your brain, completely, totally attentive, then you will see there is no border to attention, there is not a resistance, in that state of attention there is no contradiction. And you can only be attentive not by learning to be attentive, the method, the system, the practice, by looking at your toe, you know, but be attentive and then forget it, begin again. Pick it up each time so that this attention is fresh each time. And then you will know when you are not attentive. Then in that state of non-attention is conflict. Then observe that conflict, be aware of that conflict, give your total attention to that conflict so that the mind becomes extraordinarily alive, non-mechanical. That's part of meditation.

Then you have been told that you must have a quiet, silent mind, haven't you? Even the speaker has told you that! Forget what the speaker has said, but see for yourself why your mind must be quiet, must be silent, see it for yourself, not what anybody says, including the speaker. You know, to see anything clearly your mind mustn't chatter; if I want to listen to what you are saying the mind must be quiet, mustn't it? I want to understand you, what you are talking about, why you say this, I must listen to you. Right? And when I listen to you if I am thinking about something else I can't listen. You see the point? That is, to listen, to observe, the mind must be peaceful, must be quiet. That's all. Now you say, how is the mind to be quiet when it is chattering all the time about something or other. You understand my question? Not how to stop chattering, then that becomes a conflict, doesn't it - you are following this? The mind has got into the habit of chattering, talking to itself, or talking with somebody else, endlessly, using words, words, words. And if you try to stop it by the action of will then that's a contradiction, isn't it? You are chattering and you say,

'I must stop it', so you have battle again. You understand this? Therefore find out why your mind chatters. Enquire into it, understand it. And does it matter very much if it chatters? Why does it chatter? Because it must be occupied with something. You know people say, you must be committed to something, to some activity, you must be totally involved, and the mind is totally involved in chattering. And why does it chatter? Because it has to be occupied. Why does it demand to be occupied? Observe it yourself, ask the question. I am asking it for you but find out. What would happen if it didn't chatter, if it wasn't occupied? Have you asked that? If your mind is not occupied what would happen? It would face emptiness, wouldn't it? No? Suddenly stop the habit and you feel lost. And this emptiness is a fear of your own loneliness. And you try to escape from this loneliness, from this fear, from this emptiness by chattering, or by being occupied with this or that. So if you went deep, into the very depth of this loneliness, not try to suppress it, escape from it, but just to observe it, and you can only observe it if your mind is quiet. You are following all this? Because the moment you condemn it, the moment you say, I must not chatter, then you have conflict and all the ugly things begin. But if you merely observe your own loneliness, then you will find that your mind facing this emptiness becomes completely alone.

You know there is a difference between loneliness and aloneness. Loneliness is isolation, total isolation, which is what we are during the daily life. You are following? During the daily activity you are isolating yourself; you may be married, you may sleep with your wife or not, or whoever you sleep with, but what takes place? You have your own ambitions, your own greeds, your own problems, and she has her own problems, and you are trying to establish a relationship between various problems. So the self-centred activity is loneliness. You are following all this? The self-centred activity is isolating and therefore there is this sense of appalling, frightening loneliness. And when you understand this you have that aloneness which comes when the mind and the brain cells have understood this whole problem. Which is, the denial of all authority, all spiritual authority, not legal authority. If you do not pay tax you will be taken to prison. One has, unfortunately, to obey laws, but to change laws which you have made you have to change yourself. Right? See the logic of it. By throwing a bomb, a physical revolution, you are not going to change the human mind. When you bring about physical revolution you are bound to have dictatorship, bureaucratic dictatorship or the dictatorship of the few. But what we are talking about, authority, the authority of another or the authority of your own accumulated knowledge as experience, which is the past. When you discard totally in yourself all authority, when you are no longer following any system, and when you have understood fear, pleasure, and in the understanding of fear and pleasure there is joy. And joy has nothing whatsoever to do with pleasure. You may have a moment of great joy but thinking about it reduces it to pleasure.

And you have to understand yourself, which is all this. Not the higher self, there is no higher self. The higher self is part of yourself only thought has built it a little higher. The atman is still thought but only a little guru sitting on a little mattress. And you think he is going to guide all your life, which is sheer nonsense because then you have conflict between the lower and the higher and all that childish stuff.

Then you have understood order, which comes with the understanding of disorder, that is, your life. Order is not a blueprint, virtue is a living thing, like humility. You cannot cultivate humility. So when all this is done the mind becomes extraordinarily clear, unconfused and therefore it is alone because the other minds are confused, other minds are in sorrow.

So out of this aloneness there is a quality of silence, which is not the result of practice, it is not the opposite of noise. That silence is without cause, and therefore it has no beginning and no end. And such a mind is absolutely orderly and therefore completely alone, and therefore innocent, which means that it can never be hurt. And out of this comes a marvellous silence. And what happens in that silence there are no words to describe it, there are no words. If you describe what happens then those words are not the thing. What is described, the description is not the described, therefore truth, that blessedness, that extraordinary silence and the movement of that silence has no words. And if you have gone that far then you are enlightened, you don't seek anything, you don't want any experience. Then you are a light, and that is the beginning and the ending of all meditation.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC DISCUSSION 15TH JANUARY 1971

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk over together this morning?

Questioner: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, not a long question, please, I have to repeat it so make it, please, brief.

Q: Is it possible to have mental order?

K: All right, sir.

Q: Is it possible to live in this world without exploiting morally and physically?

K: That question is enough, sir. How can we live in this world without exploiting morally and physically.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, that's what we said.

Q: What do you mean by awareness without the observer?

K: What do you mean by awareness without the observer? Any more? Sir, sir, you have already asked a question. Yes, sir, I know, but let the others have a chance.

Q: What is conceptual life?

K: God knows.

Q: For the last twenty years I am behind you because I can't understand how to have a true mind.

K: Sit down, sir, please, sir. Right, sir.

Q: Why should God incarnate in a human body?

K: I don't know why but we'll see. What kind of questions are these, sirs? You see all these indicate, don't they, I am just asking, sir, that we are really not concerned with changing our own life, our daily, every day battle. We want theories, or say, what do you mean by this or that. We don't seem to apply what one has heard or observed to oneself. So shall we discuss this question, which is, that gentleman raised: what do you mean by awareness? Shall we discuss that? Would that be worthwhile?

Q: What is the role of effort?

K: Yes, sir, yes, what is the role of effort. Shall we discuss, talk over together this question of awareness? Yes? Would that be of interest? Sir, just a minute.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We are going to go into all those things, sir. Shall we discuss this, what it means to be aware? Shall we? Does that interest you, please, not as a theory, not as a speculative formula, but actually find out what it means to be aware in our daily life. Shall we?

Sir, aren't you aware of the things about you? When you come into this tent, or whatever it is called, aren't you aware of all the surroundings here? Are you?

Q: Yes.

K: Be quite sure, sir, be quite sure.

Q: We are terribly sure about that, sir.

K: Yes, that's what I am saying. Are you aware when you came in of the pillars, posts, how this tent is built, what that mango tree looks like, you know, to be aware, physically aware of your surroundings? Is one aware of it? Or one walks in with blind eyes, just making your way, not observing anything. Isn't awareness, doesn't it begin by being aware of the things about you, environmentally, being aware of the environment? What do you say, sirs? This is a discussion, it is not a talk by me.

Q: It is difficult to be aware of different things at the same time.

K: I said, sir - this is just an argument. Is one aware, are you aware, not of everything but just the colours of the plant, the creepers, are you aware of it?

Q: Any normal being is aware of that.

K: First of all he says, any normal being is aware of that - are we normal? Sir, do find out, don't just make statements. Let's find out what it means to be aware, let us explore it, dig into it. Once you begin to enquire into it you are going to discover an awful lot. But if you just listen speculatively you won't find out. So let's begin by being aware, if one is, of the environment in which one lives - the squalor, the dirt, the pollution. You understand, what is taking place around you. Now if you are aware of it, how are you aware of it? Sensorially, with the senses? Or with a conclusion in your mind about the environment? You understand my question? Are you aware of the environment as it is, or are you aware of it through a series of ideas? You understand my question? Which is it?

Q: A series of ideas.

K: So, you look at the environment through a series of concepts, images, ideas. Don't you? That it is beautiful, that it is not beautiful, that it is ugly, that house shouldn't - you follow. You have got concepts, conclusions, and through those conclusions you observe. Right? Are you aware of this fact? Are you aware that you look at the environment through your own concepts, your own images, or the images or concepts of tradition? You understand my question?

Q: We are aware primarily of different things. For example, when I came in here I was seeing some things.

K: Quite. Yes, therefore you are not aware of the whole thing, of the environment. So just please go slowly, we will find out a great deal. Do we observe, aware, are we aware through ideas, concepts, images, or are we merely aware without any directive, without any motive, without any conclusion? You understand? You have understood my question? Which is it, which is it you do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right, sir. So you are aware of your environment through a series of conclusions. Just a minute, sir, go slowly. What do you say?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just to observe, sir, with your eyes. Do you see the flowers, the trees, the cars, people, actually see them, or do you see them with your images, with your conclusions, with your fears? You understand, sir, this is a simple question.

Q: I see them through images.

K: So you see things through your ideas, is that it? Through your conclusions. Right? Would that be right?

Q: How can one see without one's mind?

K: How could you see without your mind - we haven't even talked about the mind. I am just asking you, sir, first listen, sir. Do you look at me, the speaker - just listen - with ideas, concepts, or do you just observe him? He is part of your environment, how do you look at him? Obviously you look at him with certain conclusions, don't you. Now these conclusions, these ideas prevent you from looking, don't they. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, therefore you don't observe totally. That's all.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, be simple about this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, do listen, sir. Do you look at your neighbour, who is part of the environment, without a conclusion that you have about him? Or do you look at him through a conclusion, through a prejudice? And if you do look at him through a prejudice, through a conclusion, you don't see him entirely. That's all, just a simple point, sir. Right? If I want to see you, I mustn't say to myself, you are a Brahmin, non- Brahmin, you are a lawyer, you don't look nice, you haven't washed - I must look at you, mustn't I?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We will come to that, sir. Slowly. So I am asking myself, and I am therefore asking you, how you observe, how are you aware. Are you aware totally or partially? Partially being to look at somebody, or the environment, the trees, the flowers and so on, through a series of conclusions, ideas. You have to know this, sir, find out. Now when one does that you can't neglect the conclusions, you can't neglect the ideas you have about him and the prejudices and so on. You put that aside for the moment and you observe, don't you? No?

Q: We do look but afterwards we make a conclusion.

K: I give it up! Sir, look: do you, the questioner, observe with ideas or having ideas and conclusions and prejudices, look, putting those aside for the moment?

Q: I can do it when I look at a stranger.

K: I know, of course not, when you look at a poor stranger of course you have no ideas, but the moment he says something you begin to have your conclusions. You see you are not even ...

Q: Sir, then we have an animal life.

K: Sir, do try it on yourself, don't talk about the animal. Do it yourself, find out.

Q: You will reduce yourself to the level of an animal.

K: Find out, sir, don't say you will reduce yourself to a state of animal before you have tried it. Which means you have to understand before you put aside your ideas and conclusions why you have formed them, haven't you? Why they have become so extraordinarily important.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You observe a flower without a conclusion, then you form a conclusion then you say 'I like that flower', or you don't like that flower. First you observe, then you like or dislike enters into that field. No?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, why should you have a concept, observe first. Why should I have a concept about you, first I must observe, mustn't I? I must look at you.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You just throw up a lot of words, you don't see how and why these conclusions arise.

Q: If you don't have a concept you won't know how to reply.

K: I give it up! I really do. You are not experimenting, you are not digging into yourself, you are just throwing up ideas. First, sir, look, may I talk a little? I know you are used to being talked to but let me talk a little.

You see we want to find out what it means to be aware, whether it is possible to be aware with a prejudice, with conclusions, with a series of ideas and if you have them will they prevent awareness, and what does it mean to be totally aware. That is what we are discussing. That is, what does it mean to be totally aware, and is it possible to be aware without any conclusions, and what does it mean to be partially aware even? You see. Now let's begin: what does it mean to be partially aware? I come into this tent because I want to find the best place. Right? And I rush in and sit in the best place. I am not aware of all the people around me, of the environment. I am concerned with having the best seat in the place. So that is a partial awareness, isn't it? Right? No? Because I have a motive, because I want the best place, therefore that prevents me from observing the whole thing. That's simple, isn't it? No? So can I come in - listen to it, listen to it first - without a motive, observe everything around me and sit where I can? That observation is entirely different from the awareness of coming in, wanting the best place and sitting down. You see the difference? Do you see the difference?

Q: Yes, sir. How would it be possible ...

K: Wait, sir, wait, sir, a moment. So what happens? I come rushing in, wanting a place, sit down, I am not aware what is going on around me. And there is another who says, 'I'll find a place where I can but I am awfully interested to see all those flowers, what marvellous colours they are, lovely with the light on it, how beautiful they are', and I find a place. I am observing the environment, watching everything, and find a place. But the place is irrelevant; I'll find the best place I can, that is not relevant. What is relevant is to observe. You are listening to all this? So the partial awareness is when I am concerned with having the best place in the tent, and an awareness which observes everything and finds a place where it can. You see the difference? So the mind that is watching everything may find a best place. You follow? But that is irrelevant. So the mind observes, but it is incapable of observing all round if there is a motive. That's clear? Now have you a motive when you look around? Find out, sir. When you look at somebody, have you a motive, have you a prejudice? If you are a Muslim will you look at a Hindu without a prejudice? If you have prejudice then you look partially. Right? If you have no prejudice then you can look. Find out whether you have a prejudice.

So from that we begin to find out that it is possible to be aware without a motive. Right? Right? Aware, observe, without saying, 'I must have the best place' and forget everything and get a best place. Whereas if you were aware of all this you may find a best place but that becomes irrelevant. So the mind can observe without motive. Right? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, yes, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What happens then? You see what that gentleman said? First time I come here I observe, I take in everything, I make a picture of it, record it in my mind and there they are, the flowers are there on the right hand side, or on the left hand side and all the rest of it. Then the second time I don't observe so clearly, the third time I take it for granted. You see what has happened? Just see what has happened. I have formed a habit which prevents me from observing. Right? So conclusions become habits. Right? Ideas. The first time I observe all this, how nice, or not nice, I observe, then the second time I observe a little less, the third time I take it for granted, which is a habit. So habits prevent observation. Right, sir? So have I habits? Find out, sir. Have you habits, which are conclusions, which are prejudices, which are a series of ideas? And these habits prevent you from observing. So a person who is burdened with habits is not capable of being aware. Full stop. Have you got that? If I think in terms of a Hindu, or as a professor, or as a scientist, and that's my habit, then I observe very casually everything around me. Right? So have I and you a series of habits which prevent you or me from observing? I have to find out, haven't I? So be aware of the habits. Forget the environment for the moment, be aware of your habits. Are you aware of your habits? Not merely physical habits.

Q: If I am angry, if I am aware of my anger, the anger doesn't dissolve.

K: Wait, sir.

Q: It gets suppressed. After some time the anger comes again. I am aware again it is suppressed. As long as the anger is suppressed it cannot be released or it cannot be dissolved.

K: Sir, we are coming to that. Sit down sir, we haven't come to that point yet. We will come to it, sir. The gentleman says, anger can only be emptied in the mind when you yield to anger completely. We will come to that presently if there is time.

We see that there is no awareness as long as there is a series of well established habits. Have you established habits? We have, haven't we? We are bound to have.

So the next question is - just go slowly: to be aware of those habits and can those habits be dissolved, put aside? You understand? I have a habit, if I have, of - what?

Q: Of getting irritated.

K: I have a habit of getting irritated. Right. Now is it irritation? I don't accept first of all, when you say I am irritated, I don't accept it, I want to find out. I don't say I am not, or I am, I want to find out. Am I irritated? When you ask the same question over and over and over again, not listening, and somebody asks an irrelevant question, am I irritated? Or I say, look, please stop, we are sticking to this point? So suppose if I am irritated, can I observe that irritation - please listen to this carefully - can I observe that irritation without any conclusion? You understand? Without saying, I must get rid of it, I must not get rid of it. Can I observe that irritation?

Q: You cannot.

K: Wait, sir. Find out, don't say, we cannot. You see, would that be called an irritation? I said, please wait, we asked you a second time, you follow? How you translate and I translate. What appears to you as an irritation I don't consider as a irritation. So I am - suppose I am irritated. First of all I am aware of it, I say, 'By Jove, yes, I was angry, I was irritated, they are too stupid, they can't think clearly, I am irritated'. Then I say, 'Why am I irritated?' I don't want to be free of irritation, I don't know why. Is it that I didn't have proper sleep? Go into it, sir. Proper sleep, lack of food, not enough rest? You follow? All these are contributory factors to irritation. Are you following all this?

Q: Or do you not examine this irritation with the knowledge about irritation?

K: I have to go through the analytical process just to show, but I don't analyse. You see. So what happens? Then I say to myself, 'How is it possible for me to be free of this irritation?' Right? I have found out I am irritated, not because you tell me, I want to know. You understand? I want to know why I am irritated. I have found out why I am irritated and I say to myself, now is it possible to be free of irritation altogether? Right? You understand my question? Now, how? I am aware that I am irritated or angry or envious, being aware of that fact, my next question is: is it possible to be free of that fact?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir. If you thought by slapping me, it is necessary by slapping me you can get your material wants. Q: Maybe.

K: Maybe. Don't speculate, sir. By hitting me you think you will gain your material want, but then I call the policeman, if there is one nearby.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You see, now we are off. I just want to know, sir - please just listen - don't call it capitalist or communist, these terms are the most dangerous terms. We are talking of the necessity of not getting angry. Right? I realize I am angry or irritable or envious and I say to myself, I am aware of it, I know I am irritated, angry, jealous, envious, or ambitious, or stupid, and how am I to be not these things? Don't you ask that question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't, sir. Will anger produce - first find out - will anger produce your necessary wants, physical wants.

Q: Sometimes it does.

K: So you are saying, anger, two people angry with each other ...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir, why? Isn't yours also a very hypothetical case?

Q: Anger is necessary to live in a complicated society.

K: You assert that anger is necessary to live in this society.

Q: In a complicated society.

K: In a complicated society. No, wait, I have understood it. Anger is not necessary in a communist society! Do you know, sir, how angry people are in the communist world?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's it, now we are back, you see! You are had, sir! Sorry. Look what you are saying, sir, you are not observing the facts, what is actually going on.

Q: Sir, you want some facts?

K: Wait, sir. When you say, anger is necessary ...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, no. Sir, sir, please. Sir, we talked about the other day that society needs changing, and society is a structure created by human beings, by you and me, we are part of the world, whether the communist world or the capitalist world, or a world that is supposed to come, a Utopian world, we create all these patterns ourselves. And we are saying, as human beings living in this world, is it possible to change so as to bring about a different society altogether, not a communist society or the capitalist society, quite a different kind of society? So to find that out I have to enquire as a human being, myself who is part of the world and the world is me, not as an idea but an actuality, is it possible for me to change. And is it possible for me to change radically? Is it possible for me to change my habits, as a Hindu, as a Muslim, as a communist, as a capitalist, as a Catholic and so on and so on, is it possible radically to change?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand all this, please we have been through all this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir, no please sir. This is the well known pattern repeated all over the world: first establish the perfect world around you, materially arrange everything, then human beings change. Right? That is the good old communist or dialectical concept of life: change the environment and everything will come in order. Now who is going to change the environment? The bosses? The politburo? The theoretician of a particular theory? And you see what has happened throughout the world, they don't change, on the contrary they suppress, they deny freedom. So to change the world you have to change yourself, not apart from the world because you are the world. So you have to change yourself. So you have to observe yourself, you have to empty your mind of habits, as a Christian, as a Hindu, as a Buddhist, you follow, or as a communist, because that is necessary. That's why we are saying, is it possible becoming aware of my envy - let's take envy, because all our society whether in the communist world or in this world is based on envy, different degrees of success. Now is it possible being envious to free the mind of envy? Because if I have envy I am going to create the same kind of society, a hierarchical society, a society of authoritarianism - more and less, the man who is a great artist gets everything he wants, and the poor labourer doesn't get it, even in the most communist world.

So is it possible for the mind, becoming aware that it is envious, to be free of that envy? Right, sir? Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's what I mean.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am going into that sir, I am coming to that. One has many, many, many habits, not only envy but physical habits, not only physical habits but habits of fear, sexual habits, you know, habits, dozens and dozens of them. Unless the mind is free from these habits you cannot possibly create a new society. Full stop.

Obviously. So is it possible for the mind to be free of habits, not just one habit but the entire gamut of habits? You understand? My habit is to consider myself as a Muslim, or as a communist, that's my habit, with all the other habits involved in it, and as long as I have that habit I will regard the rest of the world as infidels or god knows what else. So I'll fight, I'll be angry because I am going to defend my habit.

So if one is really deeply serious about this matter then one asks: is it possible, being aware of these habits, to empty the mind totally of all habit? Go on, sirs. Habit being a repetition, saying, I am, I am not, I am, I am not, you know, repeating, repeating, repeating. Now can the mind be empty of it?

Q: A child has no habit.

K: But it soon gets a habit. Sir, do watch yourself, you have habits, haven't you? Now how you will free the mind of the habits? You understand, sir, how difficult this question is? If I consider myself as a capitalist or a communist or a religious person, or this or that, I have established and I live in that habit, that habit is me. And that becomes an enormous weight on the mind, I can't see clearly. Therefore I am asking, is it possible for the mind to put aside this habit? Now how is this to be done? Right? That's the next question. Not form another habit, you follow: drop capitalism and become a communist then become a Mao, then become - I don't know - Mao, Mao, Mao, and so on and so on. Don't laugh, please, this is what is happening in the world. I move from one theory to another, hoping thereby to create a different environment, establishing a Utopia in the distance and working for it. It's all in the same pattern.

So the next question is, I am asking: is it possible for the mind to free itself? Now having put the question let's investigate it. Right? First of all, if there is an action of will against habit it breeds conflict, doesn't it? If I say, I will have no habits - you follow, that's impossible. You understand, sir? That is, if I exercise will against habit, habit doesn't end. Haven't you noticed it? Right? Therefore you say, now I won't exercise will, I will put it aside because will is not the answer. Right? So have I really put any action of will altogether away from me? Find out, sir. Because I know will will not answer this question. We have tried it. Will implies suppression, conflict, denial, running away from it, every form of escape through the action of will. Right? So there will be no exercise of will at all. That's one point.

Then analytically will not solve the problem either. You understand analytically, what is implied? Need I go into that? You know what one is saying, analytically? That is, examine it, the cause, why the habits have existed, trace it, go very, very deeply into the cause and the effect. Right, you follow? Cause and effect. Now watch it, watch it carefully. We think cause is fixed and the effect is also fixed. Isn't it? The cause is one thing and the effect is habit, and we think these two are fixed, unchangeable. But if you observe, cause becomes effect. Right? And the effect becomes the cause for a future effect.

Q: With modifications.

K: With modifications. So there is a chain process, it is not a fixed thing, it is a movement, cause, effect, effect becoming cause and so on and on and on. In that we are caught. You follow? So there is no way out of that either. Right? So analysis is not the way out. Will is not the way out. Are you following all this? Then what is the way out?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking purposely, sir. I am not so dumb as you think I look. Please, let us go into this. Please, don't laugh, sirs, please. Please, just let's look into this. I see examination, analysis of the cause which takes time does not solve this question of freeing the mind from habit; nor will. Right? Because will implies resistance. Where there is resistance there must be conflict, and where there is a conflict it becomes a habit. You have accepted conflict as a habit, haven't you? You say, that's part of life. I question whether it is a part of life.

So, then I want to find out is there another way of looking at it where habit can be freed without any effort at all. You understand? Because I see if there is an effort there must be will, there must be resistance, there must be conflict. Right? Which means, when there is the analysis or the action of will there must be duality. Do you understand? There must be duality: the analyser, the introspector, and the thing analysed and looked at - those are two things. And when you resist there are also two, duality. Now is there a way of looking non-dualistically? You are following all this? Is there a way, I am asking, I don't know yet, I am going to find out. I can only find out if I have discarded these two. You are following this? I must put these aside completely and never go back to them again because they are false, they don't help man. So I am asking: is there a way of looking without duality at habit? Right?

Now what has happened to my mind when I have put away these two: analysis and resistance, which is will? When I put those two away what is the quality of the mind now when it has discarded those two? What is the quality of your mind when you say, 'No, I won't any more exercise will, I won't analyse any more', what is the state of your mind?

Q: It becomes simple.

K: It becomes simple. Right. What else? Go on, sir, explore.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, don't use that. Go into it, sir, find out what is the quality of your mind when it has put aside that which has no validity.

Q: It is a pure mind.

K: You are guessing, sir, just guessing. You see what that gentleman said, just listen, listen: he said, it is waiting for an answer. You have understood what he has said? He has discarded those two, will and introspection or analysis, and now the mind says, 'I have finished with those, now I am waiting to see if there is another way'. Right? Waiting. Listen to it, just listen to it. Waiting.

Why should it wait? If it is waiting it is hoping, then you are caught. You understand? The moment you say there is a hope that I will get rid of it, then you are had because that hope becomes the motive. That motive then prevents you from observing, as when you came into the hall, into the tent, you wanted a seat and rushed in and sat down and never observed. So in the same way when you have a motive there is no way out.

So you have found one thing: motive, will, introspection. If you have got rid of those three then what is the quality of your mind, the quality?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Too bad!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's it. Throw out a lot of words, you are not observing yourself, sir. You haven't done these things, that's why you are saying things which are totally irrelevant.

Q: The mind is free of those things.

K: That's it. Is your mind free of those, sir?

Q: Free of those three things at moments.

K: At what moment?

Q: At the moment when get angry or have a habit, and when those two are not duality, it is in abeyance, it becomes free.

Q: It is not so easy.

K: You see, sir, it is not so easy as he points out to put aside these three things. And that's why you have no answer. You are just guessing, you are just throwing out words. So we have to go back and find out why you exercise will to get rid of anything. Because will means resistance. I resist communism, I resist capitalism, I resist Catholicism, resist, fight, fight, fight. Because I have an idea, I think there is a perfect Utopia in the world, I belong to it and everything else I am going to push in that direction, and so I fight. Until I resolve that problem, that question of will, all its implication, I shan't move to the next thing. So I must really go into this question of will which man has accepted as a habit: I will do this, I won't do that, I will become that. Which means - please just listen - which means we are slaves to the verb 'to be'. Please listen. We are slaves to the word 'to be', in which is involved becoming, or having become. You follow? We are caught by that word.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, sir, wait. Just listen first. The word. The word creates the idea, the verb, with its active present, with its past and future: I will be, I have been, I am - we won't go into all this. So we are slaves to habit and because it is the easiest, we think that is the easiest way to function most efficiently. If I say, 'I will not have habit, I will not be angry' we think we have solved the problem. We haven't. It has gone down, hidden, suppressed, and it is going to come out another time. So I have to go into this question of habit and find out its true worth. And we don't do this. Whether it is in the communist world, socialist world or in the capitalist world, this has become one of our habits: I will be the great man, I will be the dictator, I will be this or that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The opposite. Yes, much more obvious there. So is it possible to function without will? Well, sir? Where are you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Ah, no. Is it possible, it may not be possible. You don't have to accept the possibility or the impossibility; all that you have to do is to examine, explore. I don't know whether you can live without will. And that means a tremendous intelligence because we have always functioned in habits. Which is, the habit of will: I want, I don't want. So for the man who has really understood habit and will, the whole structure of analysis, which implies motive, such a mind - you see, I am asking what is the quality of such a mind, you will never find out unless you have done this. If you haven't found out you will create another society which will be equally rotten as this one is, whether you call it communist, Mao, or super, whatever it is, because this is a central human problem. And you think by changing the environment you are going to change the human quality of the mind. The very brain cells themselves are caught in this.

Therefore - listen, sir, I'll stop now - you know the brain cells are the result of time, they have evolved, they have been put together through experience, through knowledge, through various incidents, millennia, thousands of years, and these brain cells have retained the memory of all that. You can observe it in yourself, you don't have to read books. Now if the brain cells themselves are functioning in habit - listen to my question - if the brain themselves are caught in habit how is it possible to be free of habit? You follow? Because intellect is part of this habit of the brain cells, it says, the intellect will solve my problems. So how is it possible for the old brain - you understand, that is the old brain, which has lived for millennia upon millennia, seventy-five thousand or a million years, or more - how is that old brain which has accumulated such extraordinary information, memories, remembrances, knowledge, which is necessary at one field, at one level, and how is that brain to be free of all the unnecessary habits, like nationality, like ambition, like envy and so on? I am asking the question because unless there is a mutation in the brain cells themselves you will not create a new society. So the important thing is to find out whether that thing can be changed. I will show you it can be changed if you will just listen. What is the good of telling you to listen because you will repeat it. And that's all. You have read so much, that's why. Ton mieux.

Now you know when there is a challenge - and challenge is always new, isn't it, otherwise it is not a challenge - when you have a challenge like death, like an earthquake, like insult, challenge, the old brain instinctively responds. Haven't you noticed it? Have you noticed this simple fact? The old brain with all its habits responds instantly to a challenge. Now if the old brain could retard, hold back, and not immediately respond there is an interval between the old and something new taking place. You get it? Are you following this? Look, sir, just look: you know, look at the progress, from the bullock cart to the jet. You know what the jet is, the jet aeroplane. Now, the man who invented the jet was very, very familiar with the internal combustion machine, engine, he constructed it, he was part of that, he knew all about the internal combustion machinery. And that same man discovered the jet. You follow? How did he discover it? There was an interval between knowledge of the old where he said, 'I must find out a new way of functioning, of producing engines', he waited, he didn't let the old brain come into operation, he waited, watched and suddenly came upon it. You follow? I have been told this by a friend who is an engineer. He says, there was an interval between knowledge, which is old, and the new. The new can only take place in that interval when the old brain is completely quiet. Right? You get the point? No.

Now can you with your response of the old brain all the time - you are a Hindu, you are a Christian, you are a communist, you are this, you are that, you follow? - can that old brain remain quiet for a while, not all the time. Don't ask, all the time, which is silly. Can that old brain, when there is a challenge, be quiet? And that is meditation. You understand? To understand the whole structure and the nature of the past, which is the brain, which has been put together in time. So can the old brain which is the repository of all habits - you understand - of all memories, which is the past, can that old brain hold back, quieten down, so that when a challenge comes there is a totally different kind of response? Not a Hindu response, Muslim response, communist response, but a totally different kind. Therefore you have to understand the whole nature and the structure of the past. You understand? After all the past is the repetition of memory, the past is the result of thousands of years of propaganda that you are a Hindu. Right? Thousands of years. And you say at the end of ten thousand years, you say, 'I am a Hindu'. So repetition, repetition, propaganda, that is the function of the old brain.

So if you want to discover something new, a different way of living, therefore a different environment, therefore a different government, therefore a different relationship between human beings, you have to retard the old brain from jumping into the arena.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 9TH SEPTEMBER 1972

Q: Could we talk about violence sir?

K: Something about violence - that is just what I was going to talk about!

I wonder why human beings have become so extraordinarily aggressive and violent, not only in their personal relationships but also in their relationship with the world and with each other in the world. I think it has to do a great deal with ideologies, with lies and the search for power and position. Of course one can understand how ideologies, whether the communist, or Mao or any religious ideals have inevitably produced terrible violence. Politicians throughout the world have said so many lies and they have produced violence. And one of the major causes of violence is this division between man and man, as national, religious, sectarian divisions. I think those are the main causes of this violence that we indulge in. And one can give many, many explanations, a thousand explanations depending on one's reading, cunning thought and psychological analytical explanations. But at the end of these explanations violence still remains. And what is a human being to do? Here we are gathered here and going to talk about violence, the violence that has recently been going on, murdering people, every form of violence throughout the world between the rich and the poor, the people who live in slums and all the rest of it, the violence which we exert on the animals, killing animals for our pleasure, for our food and so on.

To really go into this matter very, very deeply and therefore seriously, is to learn all about thought. Learning is not memorizing; learning is immediate. Whereas memorizing takes time. To learn a language needs time, or any kind of technique, a piano, painting and so on, but learning is instant perception and action - right? Can we go on with that? You know, if I may point out, this is not a weekend entertainment. This is a very, very serious matter, at least I consider it so. When I have spent many, many years as a human being investigating all this, one doesn't come to any conclusion, because conclusions are ideologies in a different form. Whereas if one is constantly learning, not memorizing, then one has to go into this question of thought.

Can there be complete freedom of thought? And being free of thought then thought can be used intelligently, efficiently, objectively. Because it is thought that has created this violence, thought with its ideologies, with its conclusions, with its separative beliefs, ideals, and when one observes thought it is the very basis of fragmentation. All right? Are we communicating with each other. That is, we are sharing together something about which we have to learn. Sharing means learning and therefore in learning there is a possibility of communication, to commune together, to learn together, to share together. It isn't the speaker sitting on a platform and giving information, but rather together, and I mean together, and that is the beauty of it, and I think in that there is love. The sharing together of this problem of not only violence, but the whole human existence, whether it is possible to live totally differently, with a totally different kind of consciousness, at a different dimension, in which there is no violence, no fear, no sense of anxiety, uncertainty. So if we could during these talks here and discussions, go into this question: what is the position, the place of thought in human existence, and whether the mind can ever be free totally of all the things that thought has created - the myths, the teachers, the saviours, the whole religious structure, which is a bondage. All the national egocentric divisions are all the result of thought. And until we learn about it, what place has thought, merely discussing or explaining what is violence, how we should avoid it or get rid of it, or become peaceful, seems to me rather trivial. Not that there is not violence, not that there is not action which will put an end to violence, but to discuss violence is to go a peripheral awareness of something that demands much deeper penetration. So may we go on?

One can see for oneself if one has observed, how thought, however subtle, has bred this extraordinary human structure of relationship, of social behaviour, of division, and where there is division there must be conflict, there must be violence, whether it is a linguistic difference, a class difference or the difference brought about by ideologies, difference brought about by systems, whether the communist system, socialist system or the American system or the Mao system, whatever it is, such divisions invariably must create violence. And until one learns very deeply how this violence has come about, not merely the cause of violence but to go far beyond that, much farther beyond the causation we shall never, at least it seems to me, be free of this extraordinary misery, confusion and violence that is going on in the world.

So I am asking myself and we will ask each other: what is freedom in relation to thought, and human behaviour? Because it is the human behaviour in our daily life that is bringing about this chaos in the world. So can there be complete freedom, freedom from thought? And if there is freedom from thought then what place has thought? Please, this is not intellectual philosophy. Philosophy means the love of truth, not speculative opinion, theoretical conclusion, or theoretical perception. But it means actually the love of truth in our daily life, in our daily behaviour. And to go into this very seriously - and I hope you will also go into this very, very seriously - one has to enquire, learn and not memorize - memorize something which we think is true, or about which we have come to a conclusion - because we are not going to come to any conclusion. On the contrary. Truth isn't a conclusion. A conclusion takes place only when thought with its opinions, with its dialectical truths, with its conclusion, then thought becomes a means of separation.

So what we ought to do this morning and the other mornings that we are going to be here, is to find out for ourselves and therefore learn, what is thinking. And whether thinking however rational, however logical, sane, objective, can bring about a psychological revolution in our behaviour - right? Thought is always conditioned - right? Because thought is the response of memory. Memory is experience, knowledge, accumulation and all that. And from that conditioning thought springs, and therefore thought can never bring about right behaviour. Do we see this? Because I have met a great many psychologists who throughout the world are saying, seeing what human beings are actually, how dreadful they are, what their behaviour is, how contradictory, what unhappy miserable beings there are, what we ought to do is to reward them and thereby condition them in a different way - you understand? Right? That is, instead of punishing them for their bad behaviour, reward them for good behaviour. Forget their bad behaviour but reward them for their good behaviour. So from childhood you are conditioned to behave rightly, or what they think is rightly, not antisocially, through rewarding and therefore condition them that way - right? So they are still living with thought. To them thought is tremendously important. And like the communists, like the others, they say, thought must be shaped, thought must be conditioned in a different way, and from that different structure there will be a different behaviour. So they are still living within the pattern of thinking.

This has been tried in ancient India, among the Buddhists and every religion has tried this. And human behaviour with all its contradictions, with its fragmentations, is the result of thought. And if we would change that human behaviour radically, not at the peripheral, at the outer edges of our human existence, but at the very core of our being, then we must go into this question of thought - right? You must see this, not I. You must see the truth of this, that thought must be understood, one must learn all about it. To you it must be tremendously important, not because the speaker says so. The speaker has no value whatsoever. What has value is what you are learning, and not memorizing. If you merely repeat what the speaker says, either accepting or denying, then you haven't really gone into the problem at all. But whereas if you really want to solve this human problem, how to live in peace with love, without fear, without violence, one must go into this.

So how is one to learn what freedom is? Not freedom from oppression, freedom from fear, freedom from all the little things which we worry about, but freedom from the very cause of fear, from the very cause of our antagonism, from the very root of our being in which there is this appalling contradiction, this frightening pursuit of pleasure, and all the gods we have created, with all their churches and priests - you know all the rest of the business. So one has to ask oneself, it seems to me, whether you want freedom at the periphery, or at the very core of your being. And if you want to learn what freedom is at the very source of all existence then you have to learn about thought. If that question is clear, not the verbal explanation, not the idea that you gather from the explanation, but if that is what you feel is the real absolute necessity, then we can travel together. Because if we could understand this then all our questions will be answered.

So one has to find out what is learning. I want to learn whether there is freedom from thought, first. Not how to use thought, that is the next question. But can the mind ever be free from thought? What does this freedom mean? We only know freedom from something - freedom from fear, freedom from this or that, from anxiety, from a dozen things. And is there a freedom which is not from anything but freedom per se, in itself? And in asking that question is the reply dependent on thought? Or freedom is the non-existence of thought? You understand? And learning means instant perception, therefore learning does not require time. I don't know if you see this. Please this is really fascinatingly important - sorry!

Q: Could you repeat that?

K: I don't know what I said sir, I'll go on, we'll talk about it.

To learn implies time - learn a language, a technique, a method, acquiring certain information, knowledge about mechanics and so on - that requires time, several months, several years - learning a piano, violin, language. That is really memorizing, practising, acquiring knowledge, which can be translated into action, and that is all we are concerned with - all human beings are only concerned with that, because that gives them power, position, a means of livelihood and so on. And I say to myself, learning must be instantaneous, learning is the seeing and the acting, in which there is no seeing and a gap and then acting. That is, time is required to learn a language. Is time required to learn freedom? You understand? Is time required for the mind to see that as long as it functions within the pattern of thought there is no freedom, however expanded, however worthwhile, marvellous the expansion, the content of that expansion is, to see that, does it require time to learn about the truth that freedom is not within that pattern - right? That is, are you going to take time to see the truth of that? You have understood my question? Look, you have explained to me what thought has done in the world, you explained it to me that a new kind of pattern still made by thought, will help to bring about a different behaviour. And your explanation and my acceptance of that explanation, the logical process of it, the verbal communication, the reference to all the words that you have used which are so familiar to me, all that takes time - right? And at the end of that the mind is still not free, is still within that pattern. Are we following each other? And you tell me to learn what freedom is, is instantaneous, it doesn't require time, time is thought and don't use thought to understand freedom at all. So I say to myself, what are you talking about? I don't understand because I have only one instrument, which is thinking. And I have used wrongly, rightly, mischievously or nobly, but that is the only instrument I have. And you tell me, put that instrument aside. Learn not about the activities of thought, which you already know, but learn, which is instantaneous, how to look - learn what freedom is without time. Are we following each other or am I talking Greek? There are some Greeks here, so sorry!

You understand my question? That is, perception is learning and perception doesn't require time, and time is basically the movement of thought, and through thought you cannot learn what freedom is. And to learn about freedom, thought must be completely silent.

Q: How can it be silent?

K: Listen. Not how - do you see? The moment you say 'how' then you want a method, a practice, which is still within the pattern of thought.

So I have this problem from you: thought has its right place otherwise you and I couldn't communicate with each other. But to learn about communication I have to learn the language, and since you and I both know English we can communicate together, and to learn English takes time. Insight into freedom doesn't take time, and you cannot have insight into freedom if there is the operation of thought, or the movement of thought which says, "I must understand what freedom is" - right? So there is this problem then: how am I, who am used to thinking, which is the only instrument I have, and I have been educated, brought up to think, all my conditioning, all my existence is based on that, all my relationship is based on the image which thought has created. And you come along and tell me, "Don't use that instrument, but look, perceive, learn, have an insight". And then you say, "How am I to have an insight if my mind is so heavily conditioned, so burdened with all the things of thought, how am I to be free of that in order to see the other?" Right? You have put the wrong question. If you say, "I must be free of this" - which is the mechanical process of thinking, you have stated a wrong question because you are not learning about the new. You still are concerned with the old and where you are concerned with the old you will remain with the old. I wonder if you get all this?

So the real question is: can the mind, knowing, knowing the whole content of the old, not be concerned with it now, because we are enquiring into something in a totally different dimension? And this enquiry demands freedom, not that you should understand the old and bring the old over, or control the old, or subjugate the old, or suppress the old, but move away completely from the old and learn about the new which doesn't take time. Right, have you got it? It all sounds contradictory and absurd - it isn't.

Q: Surely thought must precede perception? We can't stop thinking.

K: That is just it. You can't stop thinking.

Q: It isn't something that falls out of the sky onto a blank.

K: I understand this. If you want to see something new what do you do? You are inventing, you are an inventor. You know all the old business, you want to find something new, totally new. What do you do? Keep on with the old? The old with which you are familiar, you know what the old is, the whole mechanism of the old. And if you carry that over you can't find anything new. So what do you do? You must leave the old. There must be a gap between the old and something new that may come into being. There must be a gap. And that gap takes place when you see the whole significance of the old - that the old cannot possibly give birth to the new. So we all want the new because we are fed up with the old, bored, you know what the old is, and wanting the new we don't know how to break the chain. So there are gurus, teachers and all the absurd people who say, "I'll teach you how to break the chain". And their breaking the chain is still within the pattern of thought - right? They say, "Do this, don't do that, follow this, think of that" - they are still caught within the system of thought. Now if you see that, if you have an insight into that, to have an insight into that doesn't require time. I don't know if you see that. You see that instantly, how absurd this whole religious structure is, all the organization around it, the popes, the bishops - you follow - the absurdity of all that. Grown up people playing with childish things. If you have an insight into that it is finished. Then you ask; how am I to have an insight? Which means you haven't actually listened. You are still holding on to your old skirts of the churches, beliefs and ideologies, and you say, "I can't let go because I am afraid". "What will my neighbour think?" "I will lose my job". So you don't want to listen, so that is the problem. Not how to acquire perception, not how to come by insight but rather that you don't listen to the danger of the whole thing which thought has built. And to have the insight you have to listen, you have to let go and listen. If you listen to that pigeon, which means to listen without naming, without condemning, to really listen, then when you listen you have the insight - right?

So freedom, absolute freedom, not relative freedom, absolute freedom is only possible when the mind understands thought and its place and the freedom of thought - right? Now where are we after saying all this, this morning? Because after all, you and I are learning together. You have spent time to come here, energy and money and all the rest of it, and are you learning or merely memorizing? If you are merely memorizing then you repeat what others have said, therefore you become secondhand human beings. Instead of repeating Lao-Tse, the Buddha, Marx, or whatever, now you'll repeat what K is talking about, but you will still be secondhand, but whereas if you learn you will be out of that class altogether, away from all that rubbish.

So where are we? Is there an insight into freedom, insight into freedom from thought? And when there is that insight into freedom from thought then in that freedom thought can function logically, sanely, objectively, non-personally. So how am I, who are so heavily conditioned, who have used thought from the morning until the evening, during my sleep, dreaming, waking, all the time the mind is employed with thought, how is that mind to have an insight into the freedom in which there is no thought - right? Please put that question to yourself. And when you have put that question to yourself is thought answering that question? If thought is answering that question then there is no freedom, but when you put that question, really seriously, intensely, passionately, you want to find out, then you will see there is freedom which you have not sought. The seeking is the movement of thought.

Is that enough for this morning? Can we discuss this?

Q: Feeling is another way of thinking. You have not mentioned feeling once.

K. You didn't mention feeling. Do you feel very much?

Q. I am, therefore I feel.

K. You are, therefore you feel. You are quoting Descartes, aren't you? What is feeling? Nervous response? You put a pin into me, I feel pain. The response of the brain which recognizes that pain and says that is pain - feeling. What is that feeling? I am an Indian, I feel very strongly about my country. Or I believe in something, in my salvation, in my resurrection, in my continuity, I feel very strongly. That is still part of my thought operating according to a conclusion. I feel very strongly about my wife. I love my wife and is that love, is that feeling part of my thought? Answer it please. No?

Q. Part of your very being.

K. Part of your very being. What is your very being? Please go slowly. What is my very being? My very being is a physical entity with all its conclusions, beliefs, dogmas, theories, insights, casual insights, opinions, judgements, fears, pleasures, all that is me. That is my whole conditioning as a human being according to the culture, race, tradition I have been brought up in, that is my being, which is my words-no? Will you stop? All those are words, aren't they? Go step by step, please see it. I have been brought up in a culture - Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, whatever the culture is, Communist - and that culture has shaped my mind with all its symbols, words, tradition, pictures, ideals, all words, and those words give me a certain feeling. When I say, "I am a Catholic" - the word, the picture, the image, creates a certain feeling in me, neurologically. And that is my being. And that is the whole structure of thought. When I say, "I love my wife" - or my country, my god, my whatever it is, when I say, "I love my wife" the image I have about my wife - no? The image which thought has built year after year, the pleasure, the pain, the insults, the nagging, the companionship, the sex, the whole of that picture is put together by thought and that picture evokes certain feeling. Those images create certain reactions. To me thought is feeling. There is no difference between the two. And it is fragmentation to think feeling is different from thinking.

Q. Surely emotional feeling like love is something which somebody feels but you can't say that eating and sleeping are part of thought. The need to love and be loved is essential to us as it is to eat and to sleep.

K. It is essential for us to love and to be loved. Do we love? Or do we love the image which we have created?

Q. Yes but whether it is an image...

K. Wait, wait, madame. Just go slowly. If it is an image which we love then we don't love the person, whatever that person is. We love the image which we have created about that person. Therefore one has to go into the question, what is love? Is it related to thought? Is it the product of thought, emotion, sentiment, pleasure, is love pleasure? Is love desire? Is love sex? And if it is, then it is within the field of thought, and is love thought? Therefore to find out what love is there must be freedom from thought. See sir, it all ties together.

Q. But the need to love is not thought.

K. The moment I need - I need your love - why should I need your love? Please look at it. I need your love, I need your companionship, I need your sex, I need your whatever it is. And you need me. That means we are dependent psychologically on each other.

Q. Needing love is love of self.

K. I know but we don't like to think that. So I am asking: why is there this extraordinary dependence - psychological dependence? I depend on the railway, on the postman, on the milkman, and so on, but why this dependence psychologically on each other? If we depend on each other to co-operate, that I can understand. Because then we can co-operate, to do things together, work together, to think together, to learn together. But if I need you to learn - you understand - then I am back in the old pattern again. That means I can't learn by myself, I need somebody to tell me what to learn. So why do we psychologically depend? I need to be loved. What a terrible thing to say! For myself I feel sacrilege when I say, "I need to be loved". Why do I need to be loved? Because I don't love. Something beautiful doesn't say, 'I need' - it is beautiful, like a flower, like a cloud in the sky, like a perfect human action. The moment we need it, is the whole movement of thought which says, "I am lacking", "I am insufficient", "I can't stand by myself" - which are all the activities of thought.

So what is the relationship between love and thought? Can they ever meet at all? Or they are unparallel always and therefore there must be harmony between the two. You understand all this? For god's sake!

Q. Whenever I pose a question you answer it yourself.

Everyone sometimes has this moment of perception but when you try to keep it or show it, it is gone.

K. Surely perception, we said, comes when time is not involved.

When there is a demand for the continuance of a perception you are introducing time, which is the activity of thought. I have an insight into religious organizations - let us take that for the moment - I have an insight into this, I see the fallacy of it. And I use that insight to see other structures. So I have memorized the insight - you understand? - it has become a memory and therefore it has lost its insight. I don't know if you understand this? Surely insight is always fresh, new, it isn't the old insight brought into the present.

Let us go into this question of insight. The word theory, the root meaning of that word theory, means insight. And having an insight means, generally, coming to a conclusion. Scientists, philosophers, and others, human beings, have an insight - from that insight they conclude. And their conclusions become much more important than the insight. And the conclusions become the means of not only satisfaction but stability, certainty, a feeling making me secure. And if I collect a lot of conclusions I have lost insight. So to have an insight and not draw a conclusion - you understand?

Q. I don't know anything about your teachings. This is my first time and I haven't read any of your books.

K. Don't bother sir, it doesn't matter.

Q. But I'd like to think that I was in tune with what you are feeling, saying and thinking. Personally I have found... (inaudible)

K. Yes, I understand the question. I think I understand it. May I explain further? I have to meet the world, I am an ordinary man, I have to meet the world - the world being the environment, the job, the culture, the various relationships socially, morally and so on - the world, with wars, with the Olympic games, everything that is going on in the world, I have to meet it. I meet it intellectually, pragmatically, according to my temperament, idiosyncrasy. That temperament, that idiosyncrasy, is the response of my conditioning - of course. Do you want me to go into that? And that conditioning is what the society has placed on me, the culture, the environment, so I am the society, the world is me, I am the world. The two are not separate. This is a basic, this is not pragmatic, it is the truth. I am born in a country, in a culture, in a tradition, family, nationally, racial, and all that is me. And I like to think I am separate from the world because I feel I am totally different, I am an extraordinary human being, I am not the mass, I am an individual, and when I look at the word and go into that word there is no individuality at all. I am a repetitive human being. If I am born in this country or a Christian world I repeat everything that has been told to me from childhood - about Jesus, the myth of Jesus and all the rest of it. Or in the Communist world I belong - you know all that. So the world is absolutely me and I am the world. And to change the world I have to change myself, break away from my conditioning. Not a particle of that conditioning must remain to bring something new. And not knowing that I am conditioned, not knowing how to deal with this conditioning, I just go on; change my conditioning a little bit here and there, you know.

So to really basically, radically go into this thing, one has to watch, learn and that is why I began by asking: what place has thought and what place in existence has freedom from thought? Unless these two questions are answered and thereby find harmony between the two - they are not two separate watertight things - then I will know a dimension which is entirely different.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH SEPTEMBER 1972

I hope you don't feel as nervous as I do! Shall we go on with what we were talking about yesterday morning, if we may? We were saying that thought brings about fragmentation. Thought has its right place but it is misused, it becomes mischievous when there is not the freedom from thought. And that freedom has to be learnt; it is not an idea, a speculative theory - theory being insight - nor is it an ideal. And to learn about it there must be curiosity - like a child that learns mathematics, not knowing anything about it, he begins to learn. But learning mathematics or a language needs time; whereas insight into the freedom from thought needs no time at all. That is what we were more or less saying yesterday.

And if we may go on with what we were saying: one observes, doesn't one, in one's own life a series of fragmentations, a life that is broken up, contradictory - the business life, the family life, the religious life, the scientific life, the artistic life and so on and so on and so on. This constant fragmentation has its own activity, its own action and the more one enquires into it, goes into this question of fragmentation, one tries to integrate these many fragments together, the integrator is still thought who is responsible for the fragmentation - right? We have broken up life into the family life, the individual life, the religious life, the national life, politics and so on. And this division exists and when one becomes aware of it, conscious of it, sees the full significance of these fragmentations, one hopes through the cunning, clever process of thought to bring all these fragments together. I do not know if you have noticed it.

But the entity that tries to bring these fragments together is still a superior perception of thought, is still thought. And how is one to bring about a harmony - not between the fragments which is impossible - but a harmony or perception which sees the whole, not as fragments. I wonder if I am making this clear?

Can one perceive these various fragments and not try to bring them together, integrate them, but look at them from a total point of view, from a totality, from a perception in which there is no fragmentation? Are we meeting this? There is the religious life with all its beliefs, rituals, superstitions, and we play with it, which is totally different from our daily life, with all its conflicts, loneliness, boredom, pleasures, fears, anxieties, and there is the life of earning a livelihood, all totally separate, and therefore contradictory. And we live and accept this fragmentation. I think that is fairly clear. The national, religious, spiritual, you know all these terrible divisions that exist outside as well as inside.

One has to find out, hasn't one, whether it is possible to learn, which is not to cultivate memory, but learn to look at the whole of life from a level which is comprehensive, which has no fragmentation at all in it, and being non-fragmentary act from there, therefore a total action. What is the energy which perceives the total and doesn't live in fragmentation? You know this is a very difficult thing to convey in words - a dimension in which fragmentation doesn't exist at all. Religions throughout the world, apart from their absurdities, superstitions, beliefs, rituals, gurus and all that nonsense, apart from that, religions have maintained that there is a god, a reality, which if you enter into that reality only then you can see life as a whole, in which there is no division as you and me, we and they and all the rest of it. Divisions exist only where there is measurement - right? Measurement is comparison and comparison is the movement of thought. So thought is measurable, comparative - the more, the less, the better and so on. And it is only a mind that is free from measurement that can see life as a whole. I wonder if I am conveying this? Right sir? How is one then to be free of measurement and yet use measurement, it is necessary - measurement being knowledge, experience, the vast accumulation of memory, conscious as well as unconscious, all that is measurement, because it is the product of thought. And where there is measurement there is fragmentation. That is, I am not happy but I will be happy. I am ugly but I will be beautiful. This constant comparison, this constant measurement makes one feel superior or inferior, or lonely, or expansive ideological unity. And can the mind - which is so heavily conditioned in measurement, because after all the whole of science, mathematics, the way we live, is based on measurement - learn to live without measurement so that the mind never compares because comparison brings about fear and pleasure - right?

Are we meeting each other? Because sirs, as we said yesterday, we are learning together because the speaker happens to sit on a platform, a little higher than you are sitting, which is only for convenience, it doesn't make him into an authority, doesn't make him something special. What we are trying to do together is to learn, to learn about a mind that is free from measurement and therefore free from fear. Free, and therefore free from this constant struggle to be, or to become something. And it is this measurement, which is thought, that brings about fragmentation. I see that, not as an idea, not as a theory, but as an actuality in my life, in one's living. I haven't learnt it from somebody else. If I learn it from somebody else it is his learning not mine. And when I learn it, it is neither yours, nor mine, it is a state of learning. And therefore all authority ceases, then our relationship is entirely different. Then we are walking on the same road, with the same intensity, with the same vitality, with the same passion to learn. If we could establish that between the man sitting on the platform and you, then our relationship in communication and learning is entirely different, because all our conditioning is one of the factors of authority - you know, I don't know, you are enlightened, I am not, you are my guru and I am your disciple, tell me, teach me, I will learn from you, I will put you on a pedestal, worship you because I think you know, I don't know what you know but I think you know. This is very important because what is happening in the world is that more and more gurus are springing up. Before it was the church with their priests, with their rigmaroles, and now it is these gurus coming in replacing them, which is again a factor of division - your guru and my guru. Your guru knows much more than my guru does!

So when we are learning together there is no division and therefore there is no authority. That is a marvellous thing if one really sees that. Because then we teach each other, we learn from each other and there is no 'you' who is the teacher and 'me' as the disciple. And in that learning there is great beauty because in that there is real companionship and therefore there is real love. You understand all this?

So what we are trying to learn - not trying - what we are learning is whether the mind can learn to love totally, which means it has no quality of measurement at all. I am only putting the thing differently from yesterday. Yesterday we said, thought has its right place and that thought can be used only efficiently, sanely, reasonably, logically and healthily when there is freedom from thought. And thought, we are saying this morning differently, is measurement and all western civilization is based on measurement, and they have tried to escape from that by or through religious concepts, which again is the product of measurement - right? What we are doing is, trying to find out, learning whether the mind can be free altogether from fragmentation and therefore look at life, act as a whole healthy human entity, without any fragmentation. Because that requires, if I may use the word 'religion' in the right sense of that word - it is what religions have tried to do, not organized religions, not with their priests and all that hierarchical rubbish, but the real religious mind has tried to do this. Which is, it says absolute freedom is only possible when there is no movement of thought. The movement of thought is fragmentation, and the movement of thought is necessary but not when the mind is in a state in which there is no measurement at all, which means the immeasurable - right? I wonder if I am conveying something?

How do you learn this? You understand my question? I see my life fragmented. That is a fact. And I see the futility of integrating the fragments. I see contradiction in these fragments, conscious as well as unconscious. And I have tried various methods, means, systems to bring about a unity in all that. And I can play that game endlessly until I die. And I haven't learnt a thing because basically thought is in operation in all this - yes? I want to find out, I want to learn, the mind wants to find out and learn a dimension in which the immeasurable, the state of mind which has no measurement at all, and therefore no 'me', which is measurement. The moment I have the 'me', there is a 'you'! The 'me' is the product of thought, the 'me' as an idea gives security. And thought is seeking all the time security. And seeking security in a belief, in dogma, in any form of neuroticism gives it security - right? It is neurotic to believe in god - all right, I'll plunge into it! Because you know nothing about god, you only know, or you think you know, because you are conditioned. The communist doesn't believe in god, he says, 'What are you talking about?' And god can be approached through a process of time, through perfection, through this ideal of always becoming more and more and more perfect, and you have established a pattern, a ladder on which you are always climbing. And all that structure is the product of thought, obviously. Now if one has an insight into that, now as you are sitting there, if you have an insight into this, not induced by the speaker, but see it for yourself, then you are out of time. Because time is part of thinking and thought has said, "I will find gradually the state where there will be non-fragmentation". So thought seeking security all the time, physical as well as psychological, conscious or unconscious, has established for itself various beliefs, dogmas, superstitions, neurotic activities, and is caught in that, it has become a habit. Now can one break that habit without effort, because the moment you make an effort you are back again, there is contradiction in that, there is duality in that, the one that sees that it must be broken and makes an effort, but one who sees it must be broken is the thinker, the thinker is thought - there is no thinker without thought. To have an insight into that now, instantly, is to break it, is to break the chain of habit, to be aware of all this, the whole movement of thought. And one can be aware of it only when you don't condemn it, then you observe. And to observe without the observer, because the observer is the entity who says, "This I will keep, this I won't keep, this is right, this is wrong, this should be, this should not be" - he is always comparing. The observer is the entity that measures - right?

So I have only one problem - not many problems because all problems, our human problems are interrelated. The problem of death is related to love, love is related to everyday living, everyday living is related to our ways of behaviour, our behaviour is conditioned according to the culture in which we live - the society, the economic conditions and so on. So they are all tied together. And by understanding one issue completely you have resolved the whole. But what we do is: politics is one thing and keep it there, religion is something else, business is something else, family life is something else, our personal pleasure, like, dislike. So in understanding the one issue we understand the total movement of problems.

And one of our great problems is fear, in our daily life, fear. And we try in every way to overcome it, or run away from it, or find a substitute, as courage, for it. Now how does a mind learn about fear - learn, have an insight, not memorize various formulas, how to be rid of fear? There is the fear of death, fear of loneliness, fear of mechanical behaviour, fear of not being loved, fear of so many kinds. And in the resolution of fear you have solved the whole problem. Now how is that fear, conscious as well as unconscious, to be completely set aside, because if we do not, we shall never find out what is meditation, we shall never find out if there is such a thing as the immeasurable. So it is absolutely essential, it behoves us to learn completely about fear, conscious as well as unconscious fears. Conscious fears one can more or less deal with. If I am afraid of my neighbour, what he thinks about me, I can deal with it, it doesn't much matter. But the unconscious fears are much more difficult and most of us are unaware of it, and being unaware of it, it brings about neurotic actions. Violence is one of the factors of fear. As we said yesterday, violence is brought about through ideologies, through lies, whether it is brought about by the politicians, by the priests, by ourselves doesn't matter. And fear if it is not completely understood or learnt about plays havoc with our lives. I think that is fairly clear. There are unconscious fears of which one is not aware. Now what do you do about it? We are learning, I am not telling you about it. We are walking together, communicating together, learning together about fear. How am I or you, who are unconscious of your fears, to bring them to the surface and wipe them away completely? Not gradually, that will take time, that means again contradiction, division which is the product of thought - you are following all this? How is the mind, which has deep rooted fears of which it is not aware, how are those fears to be exposed to the light of intelligence? Because intelligence is not measurement, where there is intelligence there is no measurement, it is not yours nor mine, there is intelligence. You know meditation is the awakening of this intelligence - which we will discuss when we come to meditation.

So our question is: can the mind learn instantly all the content of the unconscious in which there are deep secret fears? Please listen to this carefully - will it learn through analysis? Analysis implies time, there must be the analyser and the analysed - the division. The analyser is the analysed. And the analyser, if he is not capable of complete analysis, takes over what he has not understood and that will become the means of further examination which is misunderstood. I don't know if you are following all this? So I see very clearly analysis is not the way. I have learnt about it because analysis implies time, implies division, whether it is a professional analysis or you do it yourself, and when you analyse, unless you analyse everything completely, in that incompleteness you examine the next incident, and therefore continue the incompleteness all the time - right? You are following all this? For god's sake follow it, learn about this. So one learns analysis is out, which is our conditioning. Confession, analysis, self-introspection are all the forms of analysis. Analysis, the very meaning of that word, means to break up, and thought has broken it up. So analysis implies time, a separate entity which is the thinker, which is essentially the past, who examines the thing he is going to analyse, and he doesn't recognize the analyser is the analysed, and that it takes infinite time. I can go on analysing myself until I die. So analysis doesn't teach anything. I hope we see this.

Then will dreams teach? We are asking this question because we are trying to expose the unconscious, bring it all out, the content, because the content makes the consciousness - right? The house is what it contains. And it contains so much, so many contradictions, so much information, it is a jumble, and therefore utterly confused. Will dreams clear the basic fear of existence, basic fear of not being, not becoming, not fulfilling, not trying to achieve? And what are dreams? One has to learn all about all this, please, not from me. You dream - why do you dream - pleasant or unpleasant dreams, nightmares and so on? Why do you dream at all. The experts say you must dream otherwise you will go insane - probably that is true because dreams try to bring about order - right? Indicate that there is disorder - we'll put it that way, that's better. Dreams indicate that there is disorder and during the day you are unconscious of your disorders because you are caught up in so much activity, chattering, talking, going to the office and quarrelling and bullying, and all the rest of it that goes on. During the day you are caught in a routine which breeds disorder and one is not aware of this. And during the night, when you sleep, dreams are the continuation of that disorder in which the mind is trying to bring order - right? I do not know if you have noticed that if you bring order out of disorder, that is, understand disorder, not superimpose upon disorder what you think is order, but if you understand disorder out of that comes order. And the brain needs order, then it can function well, it is protected, and order gives it tremendous security, then it can function beautifully. So in dreams the mind is trying to bring about order; but if during the day you are aware of the disorder and because you are aware there is order, then you will find that sleep becomes quite a different thing. Then the mind is quiet, the brain is quiet, it is not everlastingly working, working, working - you are following all this? Please learn. So the brain is quiet, refreshed, young and therefore clear, and it can meet the day afresh because it has established order out of disorder - right?

So in understanding fear, fear exists only when there is disorder, when you see something very clearly there is no fear; it is only the mind that is confused, uncertain, disorderly, such a mind is caught in fear. So when you learn about the unconscious, that is the content of it, the content of consciousness is consciousness, consciousness is not something separate from its content - right? You have understood? If I am a Hindu, with all its content, with all the superstitions, social rules, morality and all that, that makes consciousness. And if there is no content in consciousness then consciousness is something entirely different. And that is what meditation is, the emptying of the mind of its content. Oh you don't know all this! You learn. Don't learn from somebody else for god's sake!

So can the mind be free of fear? That is, the mind that has had physical pain last week is afraid that it might recur again next week, the fear of the repetition of pain. If you have observed physical pain, when it is ended by a doctor, or whatever it is, the mind doesn't leave it there, thought doesn't leave it there, it carries it on, it is watching, waiting, fearful, hoping it won't happen again. So thought is creating fear. I don't know if you follow? There is measurement - fear of pain last week, it mustn't happen again next week, I'll watch it, waiting, hoping, there is measurement, which is thought. Similarly psychologically we have various forms of hurts. We have been hurt from childhood, it is a terrible thing this being hurt. Aren't we all being hurt? And against being hurt further, we build walls of resistance, and that means isolation, and isolation means further fear. And to escape from that fear we take to drugs or go to church, or believe in something, or pick up a book - you know the various forms of escapes. Now when you are aware of this completely, when you have an insight into the fear, then you will see psychologically there is not a flash of fear; and when there is physical pain you will know how to deal with it, thought will not carry it on - right?

And one of the fragments of our life is the pursuit of pleasure opposed to fear, opposed to pain, something contradictory, away from all the miseries, suffering, pain. And that is what we are doing, pursuing pleasure, in the name of god, in the name of whatever it is. Again thought plays a tremendous part in it - doesn't it? We don't have to go into all that, that is fairly obvious. An incident giving a delight, thought pursues it, and therefore the next day, and on and on and on. So thought is responsible for the continuity and the nourishment of fear and the pursuit of pleasure. Pleasure has nothing to do with joy, with ecstasy. When there is joy there is no pleasure, you are unaware of it, but thought comes along presently and says, "What a marvellous, lovely thing that was" and then pursues it and that becomes pleasure.

So what we are learning together is, a mind that is aware of all this, aware of the significance of thought and that has learnt the absolute necessity of thought as measurement coming totally to an end. You see pleasure is not love. If pleasure is love then it is the product of thought, then love is something separate. I love you but I hate everybody else, or I tolerate everybody else. So one begins to learn that love is not pleasure, that is a marvellous thing to learn and there is great depth of beauty in that.

Now we can discuss something together, ask questions?

Q: What is the place of will, decision, in life, if thought is an impediment?

K: That is right sir? We do not say thought is an impediment. Thought is necessary: to communicate with you in English thought is necessary. I have learnt English, there is the memory of it and I use that memory to convey what I am thinking. So thought as knowledge is absolutely essential, otherwise you couldn't function. Therefore we do not say thought is detrimental: on the contrary thought has its right place but that right place is misused when there is no freedom from thought. The two must go together harmoniously. That is all.

Now what is the place of will, decision, in life? When you see something very clearly is there action of will? It is only a mind that is confused, uncertain, unclear that uses the will as a means of action. We all do this. We exercise our will only when we are confused, when we are not clear. When the mind is clear what is the need of will? I wonder if you see this?

You know we substitute our will to the national will, or to the will of the community, will of the society, will of the priest or will of the idea of god - 'Thy will be done'. Please see the implication of all this. Whereas a mind that is not confused, what is the necessity of will at all? If you see something clearly you act, there is not an interval between perception and action, there is no lag of time between seeing and acting. There is the lag of time, space in time, only when you are not sure, when you are not clear, when you are confused, then action. Then in that gap will is necessary, will being the desire to act in a certain way. If I see something very clearly it is finished. If I see a poisonous snake, I act, there is no will involved in it. And the same thing with decision, which means choice, doesn't it? Decide between this and that. Why do you have to choose? I choose between two materials, cloths, or two houses or this or that, but psychologically why do you choose at all? Is there such a thing as choice psychologically? And there is choice only when psychologically, inwardly I am not clear. When I am not clear then there is choice. Please I am not laying this down, we are learning together. So there is no need for decision at all. There is only action, not choice in action.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Are you different from thought? You can use thought? If you are different from thought then you can use thought, but are you different? Or you think you are different and therefore when you think you are different you are still...! You know, in Asia they have invented through thought a thing called Atman, the superior self, the supreme self, as you have invented the soul. And they say, allow that superior entity to act, it can only act when all the debris is thrown away. So all that you have to do is to allow that superior entity to come in and work. I am putting it very crudely and quickly, all the subtleties I am leaving out. Which is again the invention of thought. Because thought sees itself insecure, uncertain, easily changeable and as thought requires, demands security in every form, it has invented the superior entity, in that it takes security, but it is still the invention of time, of thought, which is time. So there is no 'me' who is using thought, the 'me' is thought.

Q: May I ask a question please? You said if we see a poisonous snake there is instant action, but what happens if you see a snake which is enclosed where you can't get away from it?

K: What do you do with a snake in a room - right sir? What do you do with a snake in a room? You can't run away - it all depends what kind of snake it is! Whether it is a human snake or a real snake! If it is a real snake, what do you do? I have been in one, what do you do? You watch it, don't you. No sirs, no, you are laughing too easily. You watch it and when you watch it you are not afraid. I have been with a rattler in a room and I have watched it. And it watched me. And gradually it found some place to hide and I opened the door and it went out later. You watch it and you establish a communication with animals, then there is no fear.

Q: When a snake is in a room with an eagle.

K: When a snake is in a room with an eagle? A snake in a room with an eagle and you are there? I don't know what you are talking about.

Q: Fear, the known and the unknown.

K: I see.

Q: I can grasp the known fears, the conscious fears and face them and dispose of them, but the unknown ones, I just can't grasp this. How do you discover them?

K: All right. How do you discover them, how to meet them? The gentleman asks: I can deal with the known fears - I wonder if you can?

Q: I didn't say that.

K: I know sir, you didn't say that, but I have introduced that factor. It is the unknown fears that I am concerned with, the question is. If I know how to deal with the known fears I shall also know how to deal with the unknown fears. When the unknown fears come I know what to do because I have already learnt with the known fears. Then there is no problem with the unknown fears because I know, I have learnt about the fears I know. I have an insight into them, which means I have the capacity of insight - you understand? It is insight that matters. And when the unknown fears come tomorrow because there is this insight, that insight will answer the unknown fears. But if I have no insight into the known fears I shall not have an insight into the unknown. And there is no division between the known and the unknown. You see fear is the known always, fear of the unknown is the product of thought. I am afraid of what might happen tomorrow and if I have understood the whole movement of thought, the tomorrow is no fear. You understand? Look sir, tomorrow psychologically, does it exist at all? I would like it to exist because tomorrow is going to be a happy day, I am looking forward to meeting you, I am looking forward to learning something tomorrow.

Q: But the unknown fear I was referring to - the unconscious, the subconscious fears - how do you discover these?

K: I have explained this sir. Conscious fears you say you can understand, the unconscious fears maybe one or may be many, it is like a tree that has many branches, many leaves but the root is deeply established in the earth. Our fears are deeply established in the unconscious and we are always trimming the branches. And to get at the root of fear means learning about not being - you understand? Learning about not becoming, because we are always wanting to become something, which is part of measurement, which is the movement of thought. Or to be, most people say nowadays, "I want to be myself", not society, not all that has been imposed on me but I want to be myself - what is yourself? Yourself is the result of the society in which you live, or your reaction to that society in which you live, the established order.

So to be free of the root of fear, the root, not just the branches, one has to go very deeply into this question of becoming and being, because in that there is security. If I become something, in that there is security, or if I say I am - in that also there is security - right? So the mind is constantly seeking security - please see the importance of this. In my relationship I am seeking security, in my job I am seeking security, in my ethical, moral, social values I am seeking security, in everything the mind is seeking security, because in security it can function, because you must have security. So the mind seeks security in things that are not secure - right? In belief there is no security but yet it holds to belief. In an ideology there is no security but yet we are all idealists. We seek security in family, in my wife, in my husband, in companionship and in that there is no security. So please see this, learn this, that the mind seeks security and there is security only in the intelligence that comes out of the realization of the things that are insecure, therefore security is in intelligence, not in the things that thought has invented. I wonder if you get all this? Then there is no fear, then you have cut at the root of fear.

Q: What about guilt?

K: What about guilt? Do you all feel very guilty? About what? One has done something, or not done something and you feel you should have done it and you feel guilty.

Q: I am concerned that you felt nervous this morning.

K: Oh madame, I was only partly joking.

Now let us finish this sir. Guilt, anxiety, guilt. Do I feel guilty because the psychologists say this is one of the problems of human beings? The psychologists, the philosophers, have said human beings feel, guilty. Is that why you feel guilty? Or do I feel guilty not because somebody else said so, but I feel guilty, I feel guilty as I feel hunger. I have not learnt from others about guilt - please follow all this. I have not learnt from others about guilt, as I have not learnt about hunger from others, it is an actual fact - right? It is an actual fact that one feels guilty, that is 'what is' - right? That is 'what is'. Now how do you meet that, 'what is'? Please you understand, we are learning together, put your mind into this. I feel guilty, I haven't learnt that thing from anybody. And I feel guilty and that is a fact, that is 'what is'. Now how does the mind meet 'what is'? Does it resist it? Does it want to go beyond it? Or does it feel ashamed that it should feel guilty? When it feels ashamed, that it wants to go beyond it, that it wants to suppress it, that says, "I must understand it", it is actually not meeting 'what is'? Right? You understand? When I want to go beyond it I am not confronted with 'what is'. When I want to suppress it I am not with it. So I must find out how I meet it, how the mind, which feels guilty, meets what is called guilty. Can you meet it without any reservation, without wanting, condemning it, wanting to go beyond it, just to meet it as it is? Now is guilt a word? And when you say, "I feel guilty" you are establishing or strengthening by the use of that word, and relating it to the past in which you have felt guilty. You follow all this? We are meeting each other? I feel guilty and I use the word 'guilt'. When I have used that word 'guilt' I have strengthened the memory which has had the feeling of guilt before, by naming it I have strengthened it. Can I look at it without the word? Go on please. Then is there guilt?

So what we do is meet guilt, which we feel, according to the old pattern, the mind that has had guilt meets guilt, therefore it doesn't meet it afresh, it meets it with the old habits and therefore it cannot go beyond it - you have understood?

Q: I'd like to ask, at the beginning of your talk you spoke of fragmentation that exists in society...

K: And in us.

Q: ...and in us, in ourselves, yes. And you said that you tried to resolve this fragmentation but finally you have to rise above these and see them as one.

K: No. Not see them as one. I said there is this fragmentation, and this fragmentation is created by thought - right? You must be clear on that.

Q: But the point is that you found you were not able to reconcile them in a material way but you had to, through a change in perspective.

K: Change in consciousness, change in dimension.

Q: Yes. Well I am wondering to what extent are these things - well let's say how different are the aims of religions, of the family, of science and education? I think probably they are aiming at the same goal and I am wondering in the future how this can work itself out in the material realm. It will of course require a change in consciousness of many individuals. But how possible is it, what change would come about in each of these institutions? Would they be necessary any longer?

K: Sir, you are asking about the future. We are talking of the present, now. If you, who are listening, who are learning, if you don't change your consciousness now, you don't change radically, how can you expect what the future will be? It will go on what it has been. And if you, as a human being, change the whole content of your consciousness you may create a totally different kind of culture.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 12TH SEPTEMBER 1972

K: This morning, if we may, we are going to have a conversation, talk over things together in a form of dialogue, to discuss, not opinions, not some kind of conclusions that you have come to, but rather go into the problems that one has, whether they are superficial or deep, and really see if we cannot radically bring about a psychological revolution in ourselves. I think it would be worth while and it would be also both interesting and quite fun if we could do this together. So what shall we begin with? What shall we talk over together, like two friends, who have got the same common problem, using the same common words without any distortion of words, without any ulterior motive, if we could so talk over things together, I think it would be worth while.

Q: Could we hear more of the nature of awareness? The way you speak of it almost seems to be so pointed and direct that it is like a concentration exercise. I am sure that is wrong.

K: Would you like to discuss that? Would you like to talk over this question of awareness?

Q: Mr Krishnamurti, may I briefly ask you something which is a very, very common problem. A woman I know well, she is in her fifties, her husband has died of cancer, very, very painful to have cancer, very unhappy about. She keeps on ringing up and saying, "Oh I am so unhappy."

K: Yes, so you want to discuss...

Q: Can you say something, I want to say something to cheer her up.

K: Oh. Then go to a cinema. I am sorry I cannot possibly discuss these things to cheer people up, to give them comfort, to give them a sedative. But let us...

Q: But you see you talk about this view, the problem outside you, so can you explain...

K: We will go into that perhaps. If we could talk over together this question of awareness. Is that what you want to discuss?

Q: Awareness - most people are afraid of being aware.

K: So do you want to talk over that? Right.

The meaning of that word 'aware', as far as I can make out from the dictionary, as well as from one's own interpretation of that word, is to be conscious, is to be cognizant of the things about you, and also to be aware of the movement of your own feelings and thoughts inwardly, to be aware, to be conscious, to be alert, to be in contact with, to be in relationship with the thing that you are observing, of which you are aware. I think that is the general meaning of that word - right? Do we all agree to the meaning of that word? Conscious of what one feels, what one thinks, conscious of the environment in which one lives, being aware of the beauty of nature, the clouds, the sky, the water, the various colours and so on and on. Awareness is not a limitation, I am not just aware of this microphone - please listen to this, it is very interesting - I am aware of this microphone in the space which this tent holds. The microphone has its own space, it creates its own space in the space of the tent. And the outer space is beyond - to be aware of this space - right? To be conscious of it, to see the quality of space.

Now shall we discuss, we will go into it. We are generally, as the lady pointed out earlier, afraid to be aware, afraid to be aware of our environment, if we are aware from that awareness we come to a conclusion, and that conclusion puts an end to further awareness. I am not giving a talk please, we are discussing, we are exchanging, we are exposing. So when we say we are aware, we are aware of things very, very superficially. I am aware that you have long hair, or short hair, I am aware of the colour that you are wearing. And I react to the short hair, or the long hair, calling you a hippy, non hippy, square and you know all the rest of it. I react to it and my reaction is the response of my conditioning. The other day I saw a rather good cartoon in the New York, I think I saw it. There was a boy and a girl standing at the window looking out on the street, and some hippies were walking down the street, and the boy says to the girl, "There goes the Establishment." Got it? We react to any form of stimuli, that is an obvious fact. And I am aware of that reaction but I don't penetrate further into that reaction. I am not aware what is the source of that reaction. I am aware of the reaction - like, dislike, pleasure, jealousy, hate, whatever it is - but that awareness brings a conclusion that I am angry, I like and dislike, but we don't allow that awareness to penetrate further. Right?

Now let us experiment, learn what it means to be aware of the things outwardly, that is, the tent, the various poles, the colour of the jerseys people are wearing, you know, aware outwardly. And then move from that awareness inwardly and see what our reactions are to that which we have visually perceived. And our reactions depend on our temperament and idiosyncrasies - right. If my temperament is artistic, whatever that word may mean for the moment, I react or I see something much more than the man who is not an artist, in a tree, in a cloud, in the curve of a branch. And my temperament, idiosyncrasy, is the response of my conditioning also - right? When we say, "It is my temperament; I think it is a marvellous thing to say that", but the temperament is the reaction of my conditioning, obviously. Right sirs, are we meeting each other? I don't want to talk all by myself. So see what happens. I am aware of the cloud, the beauty of the cloud, the light in it, the shape of it, the glory of that extraordinary cloud, being an artist, which is my temperament, I want to express it and I pursue that expression, more and more and more. And I separate myself by my temperament from you, who are not an artist - right? And if I pursue that further inwardly, my conditioning is what is bringing about a temperament, a characteristic, a tendency, an idiosyncrasy. Now I want to find out further if the mind can be free from that conditioning, from all conditioning - you follow? And this is not analysis - right?

Q: You mean, since we tend to be creatures of habit, we must have the ability to break straight through the habit.

K: That's right sir.

Q: To be instantaneous.

K: That's right. After all I am moving steadily from the outer to the inner. I don't disregard the outer, or neglect the outer; there is poverty, starvation, I am fully aware of it, I have to act upon it. I can't just say I am aware of it and just sit back. I have to act. And I see this starvation, the poverty, the degradation, the horror of all poverty. And I want to go into it, not say, "Well, let's organize and feed the poor" - I want to go to the very root of all this. So I move from the obvious to the not so obvious. To me this whole process is to be aware, and I can't move to the root of it if there is any form of prejudice along the line. I don't know if you see? If I have any bias, an opinion, a conclusion, I can't go to the root of it. So my concern is then, have I opinions - you follow sir? Have I any form of conclusions about Nixon, Heath - about anybody? Because if I have a conclusion an opinion, a dogmatic assertive attitude I can't penetrate, obviously. The mind cannot proceed further. So my awareness reveals that I have a prejudice, that I have a conclusion from which I act. So I then pick up that opinion, in that awareness and say, "Why have I an opinion about something?" - you follow sirs? It is a marvellous movement of releasing energy. I don't know if you see the point. A conclusion prevents the flow of energy - get that point sir, get that point. I am just looking at it, I am getting excited about it.

Q: You mean a conclusion is...

K: That's right. If I say, "There is god" - finished! Or I say, "Communists are terrible", or "The Capitalists are the most marvellous group" and so on and so on. So in this awareness I discover, the mind discovers that any form of conclusion, opinion, prevents the free flow of energy. Then my problem is: how to be free of conclusions and opinions. I am talking by myself, won't you join me?

Q: Can't you be unattached to opinions, like there are opinions but you don't take them seriously. I can't exactly explain it.

K: Why should I have opinions?

Q: I see that it is absurd to have opinions, then it doesn't matter whether one says something or says nothing. The two are just equally...

K: Ah, no, no, no. Look sir: opinion is a form of conclusion, isn't it?

Q: Yes, but you are aware that that conclusion does exist in the world.

K: Yes. I am aware that my friend has an opinion, and therefore I realize that opinion blocks him; and I have opinions also about somebody or other, or about something, that prevents further enquiry. So see what I have discovered.

Q: Well how do you not have opinions? We have got millions of them.

K: How do you not have opinions. How can you be free of opinions when you have got so many of them? You tell me.

Q: I don't know.

K: Wait. That is right. Start from there, please start from there. I have hundreds of opinions about everything and I say, "I don't know why I have them, and I don't know how to be free of them" - right? So you start with not knowing - right? Then you are able to learn. You get it? If you begin to say, "I must have a few opinions, the good opinions, I'll discard the bad opinions, I'll keep those which are comforting, which are fashionable, which are satisfactory, which gratify", then you are still playing with opinions - right? So I don't know how I have acquired them, I don't know what to do about them. So my mind doesn't know - right? See the beauty, come on. Now it is capable of learning. That is, I don't know Russian, therefore I want to learn. So my mind now is capable of learning, and learning then becomes a passionate thing, not why I should have opinions, or why you should not have opinions, but not knowing I want to learn, and that gives me tremendous vitality.

Q: It gives me tremendous weariness.

K: Because you want to solve it, you want to get rid of them. You want to conquer them, you want to go beyond them, you want to be free of them. I don't. I know nothing about it, I don't know how I have got it, I don't know how to get rid of them, therefore I am willing to learn.

Q: If you start from that knowing then you can put the question rightly for yourself, which brings interest.

K: Yes, that is right. Now are we doing this together? Please sirs, it is fun, you know.

Q: Isn't there some residue of knowledge?

K: Wait a minute. So you are saying: what is the difference between knowledge and learning. Is that right sir? In learning - let us put it round the other way - in learning do you acquire knowledge and use that knowledge as a means of getting rid of the opinions?

Q: When you look at the world you tend to see things like say, Mr. Heath, if you see politicians working, you realize this kind of energy creates problems, it doesn't solve them and this remains in the mind as knowledge. I mean one isn't just a blank state when you see this.

K: What do you mean by the word 'knowledge' sir?

Q: I think when you see external things...

K: Yes sir, let us go very simply at it sir. Let's begin very simply. What do you mean by that word 'knowledge'? To know? I know you because I met you yesterday, I know your name, I have seen your face, so I say, "I know you". Right? I know your name and where you live because we have been introduced, we have talked about it. So what is that? That is a stored up memory of yesterday's meeting and that is part of my knowledge. So knowledge is always in the past - right?

Q: There is always more to learn about anything.

K: I am adding to it, there is the adding process going on. That is, knowledge is the residue of experience, of accumulated knowledge of the race, of society, of the scientist, all that, all the accumulation of human endeavour as experience scientifically or personally, is knowledge, to which you are adding or taking away. Knowledge which has no basis, knowledge which has basis - right?

Q: Are you saying that knowledge and memory are the same?

K: Yes, obviously, obviously. If I have no memory I have no knowledge.

Q: This doesn't mean they are the same if you have no memory you have no knowledge. Knowledge can be a qualification of memory.

K: Let's look at it. Look at it. You have flattered me or insulted me. I react to that. And that remains a memory, it has become my memory, your insult. And the brain retains that memory. I meet a snake or whatever it is, that is again an experience which has been transmitted to me by generations past that it is a dangerous snake, which is knowledge. Or I experience something totally new and remember it, the remembrance is stored in the brain and that is my memory. So knowledge is either in the books, written down by others, or by myself, and the knowledge which I have kept for myself. This is simple enough sir.

Now is there a difference between acquiring knowledge and learning? Go on. Enquire. This is fun.

Q: Is there a structure for knowledge, a function of knowledge and the transcendence of knowledge?

K: Yes sir, that is right. Let's use knowledge as functional, because if I don't know how to write, I don't know how to speak, I don't know how to do a job, knowledge is necessary. To function knowledge is necessary. And is learning different from the acquisition of knowledge?

Q: It must be.

K: We are going to find out, we are going to learn.

Q: Don't you ask questions out of knowledge. You have certain preoccupations and then you ask your question. Then you ask your question not of the past.

K: Sir wait. I have no preoccupation now. All that I am concerned with now is to find out if there is a difference between knowledge and learning. It is not a preoccupation, I want to find out.

Q: The meaning of the word 'know' is not to acquire knowledge, there is knowing. Like the words 'Know yourself', it is not acquiring knowledge, it is something all the time.

K: Ah wait sir, wait, wait. When you use the words 'Know yourself', see how complex it is. To know myself - right? It has been said, 'Know yourself'. To know myself, what does that mean? I must know myself, knowing myself means I must know myself as I am, or as I will be, or as I have been - right?

Q: It could mean I have organized my memory so that I can predict what I might do in the future.

K: Yes, all that is implied.

Q: I mean in the sense that it is fairly obvious that oneself is not an idea of oneself, so that when there is no idea of oneself, oneself is there.

K: If there is no idea of oneself, is there oneself? Don't let's enter into this. I want to stick to one thing at a time, which is: what is the difference, is there a difference between knowledge and learning?

Q: It seems that learning is only perception, when perception moves to conclusion then it has function which makes it knowledge.

K: That's all. That is - he has said it! Need I say more. I see the importance of learning. I don't know why I have prejudices, I don't know how to be free of them, so I start with not knowing, therefore my mind is capable of learning. Now I must find out the difference between knowledge and learning. Will learning bring knowledge, how to be free from opinions - you follow? - or will learning, which will be constant, in this constant movement no opinion can be formed. I don't know if you see the difference.

Q: You'd say that learning is something vital and in the present, whereas knowledge is always dead, in the past.

K: Always in the past - yes, that is right. First see this sir. I have caught on to something!

Knowledge I can have, knowledge how to get rid of opinions, I must struggle against them, I must control them, I must say, "I must not have opinions", and keep on repeating, repeating, mechanically. So I say that will not free the mind from opinions. So learning implies never accumulating knowledge, never coming to a conclusion, therefore in the movement of learning how can the mind form a conclusion, an opinion?

Q: Are you saying...

K: Wait. I don't know what I am saying, I am just capturing it.

Q: Where does necessary knowledge stop?

K: Sir, just play with this a little. I am moving - learning implies movement, constant movement and that which is moving can never accumulate, and when you accumulate it becomes knowledge, which is necessary to function. But in learning which is a constant movement, no opinion, no conclusion can ever be formed. I have got it! Right?

Now are we together learning? Can you honestly and without any sense of distortion say, "I really don't know how to get rid of opinions", and you are beginning to learn. In learning you are asking, "Am I accumulating"? I know accumulation is necessary - to speak a language, to function - but in the movement of learning is the mind acquiring knowledge in order to be free of opinions? But I say you have put a wrong question because in the movement of learning there can be no accumulation - right? Now are we doing that together now? So that you, in the movement of learning, have banished opinions, put away opinions? But if you say, "I must get rid of opinions", you are acting from a conclusion, which is your knowledge which you have acquired in learning and therefore you have stopped. Therefore you are collecting barnacles, which are opinions. I don't know if you see - right?

Q: Each time I look intensely, the idea of not seeing it as a leaf - when I am seeing a leaf now I find that when I am looking, in this state of intensive looking I seem to not be able to see myself. It's as if I can just see the intensity of the colours and I'm not there. There are moments when I see...

K: Yes sir, and that of course. So what is the question sir?

Q: I am just amazed!

K: Ah! I understand sir.

Q: How does one change the direction in which one learns. In learning one first chooses a direction...

K: Ah, no. No sir, I am not choosing a direction. Just look what has happened! We said we are going to discuss awareness - just follow this sir, put your mind to it a little bit - we said we were going to talk over together, awareness. I said, we are aware from the outside movement to the inner. In seeing that blue colour I say, "How terrible that colour is" - which is the response of my conditioning, my temperament, my etc. etc. And we never go beyond a conclusion. If we go beyond a conclusion I discover there are a thousand opinions I have, then having them I justify them, rationalize them, say these are good opinions, these are bad opinions, the bad opinions I must get rid of and I'll keep the good opinions. There are no good or bad opinions, there are only opinions, which are conclusions.

Q: They are like the currency of psychological life, you just play around with them like cigarette cards.

K: Quite right sir. Quite right, you play with them.

Q: Squirm with them.

K: Squirm with them, bite with them, whatever it is. And you go further. Say, "How have I got these opinions?" - culture, society, the family, tradition, the mother saying, "Do this, don't do that", the father saying, "That is good" - you follow? - society, the culture has given me those opinions, these conclusions and now I am faced with them I say, I don't know how to get rid of them. So I don't know how to get rid of them, there is only one factor, I don't know.

Q: I am lazy.

K: No, no wait, I don't know. Then it may be I am lazy. I am lazy and decide I don't know and I remain there because I am indolent, my brain is sluggish, so I say, "I don't know, it is very nice" but I remain. The brain is active, I am not going to let my stupid brain become lazy - you understand? The new brain itself now is enquiring. Now I don't know and then I ask: what is the difference between knowledge and learning? We have explained that. Learning is a constant movement - at no time can it collect which becomes knowledge, which is essential for functioning. But learning goes on and therefore in the movement of learning nothing can be collected, except as a function. As a function if you introduce opinions, the function becomes non-functional - right? That's all.

So I have discovered all this in awareness, which is, I see all this instantly. It takes time to explain but the perception is instantaneous and therefore doesn't require analysis.

Q: Does it require effort to keep the movement going?

K: Ah, does it require effort to keep learning going? What do you say?

Q: No effort at all.

K: Why do you say that?

Q: Chapter 1 verse 6 - no effort required!

Q: What happens when some great clot sticks a gun in your face, what happens when the balloon goes up?

K: I don't know them.

Q: No, nor do I.

K: Then why do you put the question?

Q: Well, because, because, because.

K: No.

Q: It creates its own energy.

K: Obviously. Are we learning or are we just waiting to be fed?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: How does one slow down the movement of thought so that you can observe one thought? Is that it?

Now how does one slow down thought so as to observe the movement of thought? Because thought is like a chain, going on so quickly through association, through the habit of association, thought is constantly moving and to observe it, it must slow down - right? And you say, "I can't slow down, I don't know what to do". Now we are going to learn about it - right sir? Learn, not form an opinion or a conclusion - right? How do I slow down, how does the mind slow down thought so as to observe it closely? Are you waiting for me? Wait, do listen quietly, we'll stick to this thing. Are you waiting for me to tell you?

Q: What do you want to slow down thought for?

K: What do you want to slow down thought for?

Q: Mine crawls at snail's pace, I'd like to speed it up.

K: The gentleman, sir, asked, the speed of my thoughts are so rapid, so related, so sequential, logical or illogical, that I can't follow them. That is his question. Your question may be: I would like to speed it up. That is quite a different matter.

Q: But sir when I observe myself, many times I am in control, I am controlling my thoughts and I know exactly what I am doing. But when I observe myself, when I am learning about myself I see that I am the thought and I see that...

K: That's right sir.

Q: What observes the thought? Is that thought as well?

K: Of course.

Q: It is just thought observing thought - how are you going to slow down thought?

K: I am going to show - we are going to learn about it. You don't give a chance to learn. How can thought be slowed down?

Q: If you can see that thought is observing thought and the perception is instantaneous, it will work itself.

K: Is this a fact to you or are you just offering an opinion?

Q: That would be awareness.

K: I don't want to be rude madame, but I am just asking, or being personal: are you aware of the rapidity of your thoughts, and being aware of the rapidity of your thoughts you say, "Now, is it possible to slow them down so that I can look, taste one thought completely?" - you understand? To see the significance of one thought, all its content, its beauty or its ugliness, its depth or its shallowness - you follow?

Q: Who is it that is tasting?

K: That is just a phrase which I use to see the content of a thought, that is all?

Q: Is that thought turned back on itself?

K: We are going to discover it sir, we are going to learn about it. Now first of all why do I want to slow it down? Wait, watch it sir. I am asking, don't answer, wait. Why do I want to slow it down? You say, "I want to slow it down in order to look more closely at it" - right? Who is the entity that is going to look at it more closely? It is still thought, the observer.

Q: It is still opinion, sir.

K: Still an opinion. The observer says, "I must slow it down in order to observe it more closely". Watch this sir, watch this. The observer is saying that. Is the observer different from the thing which he is observing? Is that a fact, not just an idea, but a fact?

Q: Quite different from somebody who is threatening to beat me up.

K: That is a different matter sir.

Q: It will be yes and no. The observer and the thought would be identified as one and yet they are different.

K: I want to slow it down, my thinking, hoping thereby to observe the machinery of thinking, to observe one thought so clearly, understand it so fully that other thoughts are included in that one thought. And I say, "Who is the person who is observing? Is he the product of thought?" And if it is the product of thought it is the past, so the past says, "I must watch this rapid movement of thought" - the past being inactive, thought which is the response being active. I wonder is you are getting all this?

Q: Living - going back to the original awareness as knowledge - living for everyone is instantaneous. The awareness immediately becomes the past and you can examine that and then...

K: No, madame.

Q: And the forward looking is conditioned by your memory, education etc. and your knowledge and you are preoccupied with what is going to happen, but you yourself, the ego, the personality, can only be aware of a second at a time. The rest is memory and speculation.

K: You are saying, are you madame, that you, the ego, the person, is only capable for a second to be aware?

Q: Of your life. You don't know, I don't know that you might drop down dead or I might drop down dead in a second. I can only know a second minutely at a time.

K: Madame, is that a fact? Is that a theory, an idea, a conclusion, a hope? But actually is that a fact in my life, that I am only living for one second?

Q: Aware for a second.

K: Ah, wait. I don't know. You see you are coming to a conclusion. You have made a statement that you can only be aware for one second. I say, "How do you know this?" It may not be.

Q: Eternity is in one second.

K: You see you are using the word 'eternity', that is, to be out of time. Do you know what it means to be out of time? - actually, not just theoretically, from a book, from somebody saying eternity, god, or the church saying eternity.

Q: For a second, once or twice in my life I have had this feeling of being out of time when my thoughts actually stood still but that was never by any kind of conscious effort, this was from some outside stimulus, fear or something of this sort.

K: That's right sir. When there is a crisis, when there is a tremendous shock, either the shock of beauty or a shock of pain, or a shock of deep challenge, thought is driven out. At that moment you feel, by Jove what an extraordinary state of intensity! Which is dependent on an external stimuli, and knowing that state, or having had an experience, you want to reach it again, then begins the whole problem. The observer is different from the observed and wants to pursue the observed, which becomes pleasure and he is pursuing pleasure and not the actual moment of that extraordinary state.

Q: There is no understanding of that type of experience. You can ask a question of that experience, you are seeking that experience but ask a question of that experience. Therefore what you are left with is a question.

K: Sir, please, you have asked a question, which is quite important and essential, which is; thought is in constant movement, can that thought which is constantly revolving from one thing to another, can there be a gap between two thoughts and observe what takes place in that gap? You are asking that question, aren't you sir? Because in that gap you may see things which you have never seen before. You may, I don't say you will, you may. So we have to find out, we have to learn, see the movement of thought, the rapid movement of thought, and to slow it down - is that possible?

Q: That is why one aspect of my life will always hold my interest, and in that intense interest thought is observable or slows down. If I find that I have opinions and in being intensely concerned about opinion, thought, the nature of thought will be observed too.

K: Yes sir but we are asking something different from that. We are asking: is there a gap between two thoughts? And if there is a gap, in that gap is it possible to observe the coming of thought and the going away of thought? You understand? Then I have slowed it down, thought has slowed. I don't know if you follow this sir.

Q: But in the gap...

K: Wait, wait. We are just learning.

Q: Thought doesn't slow down by any effort.

K: Now wait a minute. Effort implies division, doesn't it?

Right? Effort basically implies conflict, struggle between two countries, division, between two people, division, between two beliefs, division, between two conclusions a division and conflict. So where there is division there must be conflict. That is a fact. It is not my invention or yours, that is a fact. Now if I try through effort to slow down thought then it becomes conflict, I am battling. In that battle I never discover anything. So to see the truth that division is conflict, to see it, to perceive it, is to end division. You understand sir? As a Hindu, if I am still a Hindu, meeting a Pakistani that is a division, that is a quarrel, a war and all the beastly business of it. If I see the truth of it I am no longer a Hindu, or a Muslim - you follow? I see the truth of it and therefore it goes, it is finished. The seeing is the learning, which has nothing to do with a conclusion. Right.

Now, I am asking, can thought be slowed down? Not controlled slowed down, not thought made to go slowly by concentration, by effort, by struggle - I am asking if it can be naturally slowed down.

Q: Talking about is it possible to have a gap between thoughts, or whether thought can be slowed down - are we agreed what thought is? As far as we can.

K: I thought we went into that. All right, what is thought? Again no conclusions, we are going to learn. What is thought? I ask you a question - do listen to this - I ask you a question: what is your name, and your response is instantaneous, isn't it, because you are familiar with it, you have repeated it a thousand times and you say, "My name is so and so". There is no interval between the question and the answer; but there is an interval between the question and the answer when the question is a little more complex, with which you are not familiar. I ask you something and you are not familiar, then what takes place? Thought is searching in its memory for the answer, if it cannot find it it looks into books, if it cannot find it in the books, it will ask somebody else. So the interval is longer between the question and the answer. Follow all this sir. And if I ask you something of which you don't know, you say, "I don't know" - right? Because "I don't know" is an instant response of truth, about which you say, "I don't know".

So thought is the response of memory, memory being experience that has been accumulated in the brain cells through generations and generations and generations, tradition, culture, all that is stored up in the brain.

Q: I wonder if we can say that thought is conclusion.

K: Yes, obviously. Don't jump, I want to learn. So I know what thought is. And I am asking whether that thought can be quiet, slowed down and in that slowing down is it capable of being observed without the observer? The observer is the past, and the thought is the response of the past. So if the observer observes thought as an outsider he is still playing the part in the past. See that. So how is thought to slow down?

Q: Well one way is to have an intensive experience, like a shot.

K: If you have a shot, oh, take a drug, take LSD or whatever it is. Now let us go into that.

Q: I have found that when I am thinking a lot that if my thought subsides, I find there is a certain amount of pain within myself.

When I am thinking I am not experiencing the pain.

K: I see what you are saying: you are saying thought is a means of escape from my suffering or from my misery, or from my frustration, so I think.

Q: And it is not being able to resist the pain which I have that one keeps thinking.

K: But we are not asking thought as a means of escape from pain. We are examining thought itself.

Q: It is easier to see the gap between thought than to see how to slow thought down.

K: Is your thought sir, sitting there, discussing, talking things over, have you discovered that you can slow down thought? Don't theorize.

Q: I can experience the state between thoughts.

K: Wait, wait. Can you? If you can, what is that space?

Q: Thinking of it.

Q: Attention.

K: Then if it is still thinking of it - no, no. Do please find this out, because I'll tell you why it is important. Meditation is the emptying of the mind of its content, that is the real meditation, not all the phoney business that is going on. Emptying consciousness of its content. Its content being the furniture, the house, the memories, the images, the various conditionings - you follow? - the whole content is consciousness, and to meditate outside that consciousness, or to go beyond that consciousness is illusion; until you empty the consciousness of its content meditation becomes merely the means of further distortion.

Q: When you say emptying consciousness of its content are you implying consciousness is...?

K: I said madame, consciousness is its content. The content of my consciousness and your consciousness is made up of all your memories, not only conscious and unconscious memories but also all the remembrances, the hurts, the agonies, the pain, the physical pain, the psychological hurts, your attachments and your fears, your pleasures, the accumulation that you have gathered is the content which is your consciousness. The understanding of the content and the emptying of that content is the process of meditation. The process of meditation is to empty consciousness otherwise you are still a prisoner in it. You may invent, you may think, well I have seen Christ, I have seen Krishna, I have seen Buddha, but it is all within that, therefore no reality - right? And thinking is the basic content of consciousness, which is the response of my conditioning. If I am a Communist, a hard boiled Communist, I have been indoctrinated by Marx, Lenin and all the rest of it, and that is my conditioning and I think from that. If I am a devout practising Catholic, my conditioning is such and I think from that - or a business man or whatever it is. And to meditate, having this content, being conditioned, is like playing a childish game. So in asking this question, can thought be slowed down, I am enquiring into the whole content of my consciousness - you follow sir? Not just, thought can be slowed down, that is fairly easy. But in asking the question I am asking a much deeper question, which is: can the mind with its content empty itself without the least effort?

Q: Earlier on you were going to talk about the effect of certain drugs, LSD.

K: Would you please go on about LSD and various other forms of drugs slowing down the mind. I have never taken any kind of drugs. Your LSD, marijuana, pot, grass, hash, hard drugs of any kinds, but I have seen and talked to a great many people who have taken it, serious people who have - scientists, experimenters who have gone into this. First of all why do we take drugs at all, including tobacco - you follow?

Q: Escape.

K: Go into it, I want to learn, I am not going just to say 'escape', I want to learn why I smoke.

Q: We are looking for something we think we don't have.

K: You want to experience something which you don't know, is that right? But do you know all experiences in living before you ask that question, something I don't know? Which means you are bored with the present living and you want to experience something more.

Q: Mr. Krishnamurti, what about people who are suffering from severe mental illness?

K: Suffering from severe mental illness - you are suffering from severe mental illness.

Q: I want to help them.

K: Wait, madame.

Q: Not dangerous drugs like this mescaline and hashish.

K: I don't know they are dangerous, they say they are not, some of them say they are perfectly healthy, marvellous.

Q: They are. They work wonders.

K: Good! Please madame. Look, first of all I am asking myself, why do I take drugs, alcohol, smoke, why?

Q: For a breakthrough from your limited consciousness.

K: So you are saying, chemically, listen to it sir, chemically - through chemical processes I will break through the limitation of my consciousness - right? I will fast, not eat food for many days and that sharpens the mind and that will help me to break through - right? I will practise certain systems and that in the practise of it I will strengthen my mind and that will be a breakthrough. It is all implied in this. My intention is I want to break through my petty little consciousness - Christian, Hindu, whatever it is. And drugs, systems, anything that will help me to break through I will accept - right?

Q: It is a matter of experiencing, not accepting. There is no acceptance until you have experienced.

K: Yes, that is what I mean. You will take drugs, you accept it and then take it because you want to break through. Go at it sanely sir, step by step. Now I am asking: can you break through, or you break through, or you expand your consciousness and you call that breaking through?

Q: No but on the acceptance - you accept that you don't know the experience. You just take the drugs and then have the experience. You don't accept the drug as being that which will break consciousness, you accept the drug that will give you an experience.

K: Yes sir, that is what I mean. You accept the drug because somebody has said if you take this drug you will have an extraordinary experience.

Q: Well the matter of it being extraordinary is up to your own judgement.

K: Yes sir, that is what I am saying. Don't quibble over words. You will have an experience. I accept you as my authority because you have taken it and you say, "Take this old boy and you will have a breakthrough". And I say to myself, why do I take it, is it a break through at all? Or the breakthrough is the extension of my conditioning, which I think is a breakthrough. Look sirs. Have you ever observed a tree closely? - without the image of the tree, without a conclusion of the tree, actually observe it so that there is no gap between you and the tree, no distance, so that you observe this extraordinary phenomenon called the tree. If you can observe it without the word, without the image, without the knowledge, there is a tremendous contact with that tree - not that you become the tree, that would be absurd, but you have direct relationship with it. You see things that you have never seen before. Now that is a break through.

Q: What about the grass under your feet while you are looking at the tree?

K: Oh, for goodness sake, I am talking of the tree sir. Then you can look at the grass too.

Q: It would be a heightened awareness.

K: I said sir, it is not identification, I can't identify. I am too alive to identify with a tree. I am not the tree.

Q: In resonance then.

K: No. I explained it sir. Look sir, you have an image about me and I have an image about you, haven't you? You have an image about your girl-friend, your husband, your wife. You have an image. The images have relationship - right? I have an image about my wife and she has an image about me, this image has been created through years, and our relationship is between these two images. I don't know her and she doesn't know me actually, but I think I know her through the images which I have about her. Now if there was no image at all, then my relationship with my wife is entirely different - my wife or friend or whatever it is. Similarly when I watch a tree, or cloud, or bird, without this screen of words, knowledge, conclusion, then there is direct relationship with it. Now the content of my consciousness cannot be broken through any chemical. If it is as simple as that, by taking a drug, it is all finished. That would be marvellous. Then why aren't we all happy human beings - you follow? Those who have taken drugs.

Q: Mate, it is not a drug, it is the experience that comes from it.

K: I explained sir. Experience. Now why do you want experience? Why this craving for experience?

Q: To be satisfied

K: That is not an answer, is it.

Q: I am bored.

K: Which is, you are bored with all the experiences you have had, right? That is right sir. You are bored with all the experiences you have had and you want to experience something more. You have had sex, you have had every kind of silly and good experience and you say, "For goodness sake these are all rather trivial and I want something more".

Q: For myself anyway, it wasn't a case of wanting something more, it was a correlating factor, to tie everything together, the experiences in my life.

K: That is the same thing, all right. Co-relating all the factors of experiences so that you are made a whole. Watch it sir. Correlate all the experiences one has accumulated, there are different kinds of experiences, sexual, mental, you know dozens and dozens of separated experiences. And you hope by taking a drug they will all join, or see the experience as a total. Which is: asking further experience, which is the same thing - you understand sir? I ask the experience what happens if I take a drug, perhaps I will break through, whatever that word 'breakthrough' is to my consciousness, and you say, "I want to experience that state of mind when the fragmentation of experiences don't exist". It is exactly the same thing, only you put it in one way and I put it in another way, but we both want experience. I say, why? We need experience, as when there is a challenge you respond, that is an experience, and that challenge keeps you awake, if there wasn't the Communists, the Capitalists would be further Capitalists, if there wasn't somebody - you follow? Challenge is necessary to keep us awake. Now you say the drug will act as a challenge to further response which will be beyond - right? So you are looking for a challenge which is the drug. Right? And I say, why do you want a challenge at all? You say, "My friend I want it because I am asleep" - right? "I am asleep, I don't know how to keep awake so that I see the whole thing." So you are dependent on a drug to keep you awake - right? Be clear, don't accept what I am saying.

Q: I suppose we are bored.

K: Yes, you are bored, we said that.

Q: It is better to be awake on something than asleep on nothing, isn't it?

K: Why aren't you awake? Much more important than saying that drugs will keep me awake. Why aren't you awake, what is wrong?

Q: Well a lot of people I know have said that in taking LSD that it has shown them what and how they are normally - they weren't aware of really how thorough enlightened was until they took the drug,

K: Yes sir, that is right. The drug gave you a sense of awareness and then you began to live and see what you were doing.

Q: You can see how you live, how squalid you are, how you squirm, you portray it out, and you terrorize yourself with the way you usually are.

K: Yes sir, I understand that.

Q: If you get something beyond that, well then that is a bit of good luck.

K: Yes I understand that. That is by taking a drug...

Q: It is no easy matter, not really.

K: I know it is not an easy matter, nothing is an easy matter except the drug.

Q: It is easy to do that, it is easy to roll up a cigarette.

K: That's right sir, you want the easiest way out.

Q: I don't want the easiest way out, and don't want the hardest way out, just a way out.

K: You want a way out, way out of our misery, out of our problems, financial, emotional, intellectual problems, our suffering, our pettiness - you follow? - we want a way out of all that. And I say, "Why do you take the longest method to do it"?

Q: Because of suffering.

K: Wait sir. Why do you take the most complicated, the most unrealistic, impractical way to live differently? You follow sir? Why have you become so impractical? By taking drugs you are not any more happier at the end of it, you are not much more alive, active, creative.

Q: Mr. Krishnamurti, may I very politely point out if you are really ill you just take drugs to get back to normal...

K: Madame, look, when the dentist gives me a novacocaine, or whatever it is, that is a sedative, isn't it, it prevents the pain and he can extract or whatever he wants to do, that is natural, isn't it. But to say I'll take drugs in order to - that is what we are talking about.

Q: Sir, that lady is talking about psychological medicine...

K: Sir, do you know how we began this - do you know how we began this discussion? We said, what is thinking, can the mind investigate, learn, the whole machinery of thinking and in the very act of learning there is the slowing down of thinking. That is all that we are discussing. Not how to break through, not which are the beneficial drugs, what the effects of drugs are. The effects of the drugs you can see, those people who have taken them for a long time, their brain deteriorates.

Q: There are exceptions.

K: Of course there are exceptions. You may be the exception! But generally, as I have seen many of them, it is terrible what goes on with drugs. That is an irrelevant question.

The question is: in learning about thought, the machinery of thought, the necessary function of thought, in learning about it, the slowing takes place without control, without subjugation, without effort. And to learn about thinking one has to watch the machinery of thinking, be aware of it, how you think, what makes you think.

Prejudice? A conclusion? A conditioning? All in the past. So thought can never be free because it has its roots in the past, so thought can never be new. What is new is when thought comes to an end and there is a new...

Q: Didn't you say we have to keep on thinking to learn?

K: You keep on thinking to learn, no. I didn't say that. What does it mean to learn? Does it mean thinking? Learning a language needs thinking, which is accumulation of words and their meanings, in Italian or in French or whatever it is. There I have to exercise thought and relate each word and so on and so on. Now I am saying, does learning require thinking, or only a perception and the continuing of that perception, which is learning?

I'll begin again. I am aware of the necessity and the functional value of knowledge. And has knowledge any relationship with learning? I see learning is constant movement, in that I have to function and knowledge is necessary but it is a constant movement. And that movement is not thought but constant awareness, perception, insight. The moment that insight makes a conclusion then it becomes knowledge and an impediment to further enquiry. That is all.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 14TH SEPTEMBER 1972

K: What shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: The very posing of the question is a moving away from 'what is' - if I understood you rightly. So one asks: are questions necessary at all if we have understood you rightly in the first place?

K: Are questions necessary if we see things very clearly - obviously not. So what shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: Could we talk about what happens when you put the question: why aren't you sufficiently interested to see the division between the observer and the observed?

K: Right. Do you want to discuss that? Why is it that we are not sufficiently interested, or sufficiently aware, or see the futility of division in ourselves outwardly, which causes conflict and misery? That is the question isn't it? Shall we discuss that? I wonder what you want to discuss. Please let us talk over something which is really a problem to each one of us.

Q: What about the ending of thought?

K: Ending of thought. Is that a problem to you? No.

Q: What is emotion?

K: I thought we went into that the other day.

Q: The desire to be certain about anything.

K: Can we be certain about anything.

Q: Sir, sometimes I am watching my thought processes, or not watching them, I become aware of what I am doing and I see quite clearly but then I turn away from them. There is a moment of clarity and then again there is confusion. I do not understand how clarity becomes confusion. Why it begins at all.

K: Well sirs, there are half a dozen things, what do you want to discuss, talk over: love, education, responsibility, ending of thought, all the machinery of thinking, why is it that we don't see the danger, the damage, the conflict, the wars that come about when there is division, both inwardly and outwardly. I wonder which is the best thing to take out of this and go at it.

Q: I think that question about the division between the observer and the observed.

K: Yes, I think so too. Shall we discuss, talk over this question of the observer and the observed - shall we? And then perhaps we can come to the question of the ending of thought, love, education and all the rest of it.

Why is there this division between the perceiver and the perceived? I perceive the tree, the cloud, the person, all the politicians, and I see I perceive both visually, psychologically, having an insight, that division as the perceiver and the perceived does bring conflict invariably, that is obvious. The perceiver is a Muslim, a Christian, a Communist and he separates himself from the non-Communist, non-Catholic, non-something else and where there is division there must be conflict, both outwardly and inwardly, that is clear. Right? And inwardly there is the division as the perceiver and the perceived. The perceiver sees he is angry, anger is something which he perceives, not at the moment of anger. When the anger is over then the perceiver says, "I have been angry", so he creates the division between himself and the state of anger - right? And from that division arises control, suppression, justification and all the rest in order to justify or to deny anger - right? And in this there is conflict - no?

Q: It is surely anger that created the division.

K: At the moment of anger, sir, is there any division?

Q: Not right at the moment, sir.

K: That's all. A second later the thinker comes into operation, he says, "I have been angry", and when he says, "I have been angry", he knows from past experience that he has been angry, and therefore he identifies from past memories the anger which is now, which is in the present. Haven't you noticed this? At the moment of jealousy, the intense feeling of jealousy, there is no separation is there? Or at the moment of great happiness you don't say, "I have been happy" - in that state there is no division. It is only when a moment later, or a second later the division takes place - right? Shall we go on from there?

Now why does this division take place? I am jealous, at the moment of jealousy, at that second there is no division; at the moment of hate, at the moment of anger, at the moment of envy, there is no separation. A second later separation takes place - why?

Q: Because of the memory.

K: No please, don't answer me. Find out for yourself why the separation takes place in each one of us.

Q: Because we have been educated not to be angry.

K: That's right, which is, not to be angry or to justify anger.

Q: Sometimes.

K: Yes, sometimes. Or justify jealousy. So the perceiver comes and says, "My habit is not to be angry, I must not be angry" - right? No? So separation takes place when the past comes into action - no?

Q: Not only the past but because of your imbalance.

K: Put it any way you like - yes, all right. Imbalance takes place when the past with all its memories, with all its activities, with its experiences comes into operation and says, "I must not be angry". No?

Q: Or justifies.

K: That is the same thing. Again you may say, "My anger is justified".

Q: It may not only be the past that is concerned with the person who has been angry, he may be concerned with what the consequences of his anger are going to be in the future.

K: Yes, which is still from the past.

Q: But isn't it something from the past that created that moment of non-separation.

K: Sir, look at it in yourself. At the moment of jealousy, or of anger, or of envy, or of hate, whatever it be, happiness, at that second there is no division is there?

Q: No, but if the thought, "She doesn't love me", created that non-division, then it was something out of the past that created that non-separation.

K: Yes, sir - I don't know if you are saying the same thing.

Q: Yes but if someone is yelling and shrieking at you, really having a go at you, they get very angry at you, they are bawling at you - right? They are throwing things all over the place.

K: What has that to do with what we are talking about sir?

Q: Well the thing is when I leave here I won't be sitting in a nice, neat, tidy tent.

K: We are trying to find out, sir, aren't we, why there is this division in human beings. And how does this division come about? Why there are so many fragments in us - anger, jealousy, competition, contradiction - those are all various fragments of which we are made up. And I am asking, how do these fragments come into being? Not that somebody shouts at me, but I want to find out for myself why these fragments exist. Is it education, the culture in which you have been brought up, the whole religious concept of god, the devil, the sinner, you know all that?

Q: You were asking the other day how you could see without this fragmentation?

K: That's right sir, that's right. First of all to find out how to observe, how to have a mind that is not fragmented so that it can look without fragmentation, at the fragmentation as it takes place - right? That's what we are trying to find out. Don't we know we are fragmented? Let's begin from there. Are we aware that we are fragmented? - the family, the nation, the ideals and 'what is', the suppressions, the controls, the business man, the artist, the military, you follow, the church and so on, division - outwardly the nationalities, linguistically, and inwardly all the broken up entities that we are - are we aware of it, first? Come on sirs.

Q: Yes, I see this.

K: You see it. Now just a minute. How do you see it? Let's go into - please, if you are serious, let's go into it step by step. When you say, "I see it" - what do you mean by that word 'seeing'? Is it an intellectual concept?

Q: No.

K: Go slowly sir. I am not saying - we are enquiring. Is it an intellectual concept, an idea which you accept and you say, "I see the idea, I see the concept", "I understand verbally what you mean", which is intellectually, but that is not seeing, that is only accepting the words. When you say, "I see", it must be actual, it must be as actual as I see you sitting there and me sitting here, otherwise it is just an idea and therefore of no value. So when you say, "I see I am fragmented", we must be very careful in the usage of that word. When I am hungry, I don't see I am hungry, I am hungry. So in the same way, am I aware that I am fragmented?

Q: Only in the moment of a challenge.

K: All right, only in the moment of a challenge. We are challenging now. If the challenge is strong enough, if the challenge is important enough and if the challenge is urgent, a shock to you, then do you see it? Not as an idea, not as a concept, not as something somebody has told you, but actually you see it.

Q: The moment that you are seeing it, it does not exist.

K: Wait sir, wait, we'll come to it, go step by step. Please this is really quite important - if you would give a little attention without answering me immediately. Which is, I have heard you say I am fragmented. What you say sounds reasonable, sounds true and I apply that to myself because I see the truth of what you are saying so I say, "Yes, I am fragmented", but I don't see it myself - right? So is it a discovery for myself that I am fragmented? A discovery - you understand? Something that I have found, or I have found it because you have told me, then it becomes an idea.

Q: I don't quite understand the word 'fragmented'. Could you express it another way?

K: Broken up, contradictory, I say one thing and mean something else, I have an ideal and act the opposite, I say, "I must be peaceful" and I am boiling with violence. I say, "I must be charitable" and I am tight-fisted - whatever you like. So am I aware that I am contradictory in myself?

Q: No, but you are aware of a kind of an alienation in oneself, that is all.

K: Yes, that is the same thing.

Sir, take an ideal which most people have, which is not 'what is', is it? 'What is', is entirely different from the ideal - right? Isn't that so?

Q: Do we call them ideals when we cannot see?

K: No madame. Look, I have an ideal that eventually we will all be brotherly, and in the meantime I am hating you. The ideal is over there, the fact is, I dislike, I hate - right? So what is important the ideal or 'what is'? Come on sirs. Obviously 'what is'. So why do we have ideals?

Q: I have given them up.

K: Good! Please sir, it is one of the most difficult things to face actually 'what is' without any distortion of the ideal: either the ideal which I have experienced in the past, which has established itself in my brain as memory, which says, "I must not", and therefore I am not facing the fact. No, this is really a very complex problem if you want to go into it very seriously. Which is, the division between the ideal and 'what is'. The ideal may be in the future, or the ideal has been in the past, which I have forgotten, which has established itself in my unconscious and acts, or prevents the perception of 'what is'. So when you understand this, this contradiction, and you say, "How is the mind to be free of contradiction totally" - that is the real issue, not the observer and the observed, which we will come to later, or the perceiver and the perceived, but this quality of the mind in which there is contradiction. So I ask myself why does contradiction exist? One of the factors is ideals, obviously. The other factor is measurement.

Q: If I am experiencing pain and I say, "I don't like this"...

K: Quite, the same thing sir. We said, ideals, which is "I don't like it", "I must not", "I must be", or comparison - right? Which is measurement. As long as I am measuring myself, comparing myself with you who are more intelligent, bright and all the rest of it, there must be contradiction, from 'what is' and 'what I should be' - no? Oh, come on sirs. So can the mind be free of all comparison?

Q: Isn't that an ideal?

K: No sir, no. I have explained. We asked why does this division exist in the human mind? We say one of the factors for its existence is an ideal, either in the future, or deeply embedded in the unconscious. And one of the factors of this contradiction is comparison, measurement. When I compare myself with you, you are important, not what is a fact - right? When you compare in a school one boy against another boy, you are sacrificing, you are destroying B who is not so clever as A - right? These are all simple factors. So that is one of the reasons why this division exists. This division exists also because we are educated in this. You are always comparing, in the business world, in the artistic world, in the world of psychology and in the world of religious organizations, there is the priest, the archbishop, bishop, you know, the racket of it all! Right?

So does this contradiction exist in me? Because as long as there is contradiction I am in conflict. Contradiction means division, division between the perceiver and the perceived. Now having heard this, is it a fact to you? Which means can you put aside completely every form of ideal - both conscious ideals of which you are aware, and the unconscious, so that you are only facing every minute 'what is'? This is an extremely serious thing to do, because then you have no illusion, then you are tremendously honest - right? Because you admit only the fact. If I lie, I lie - you follow? If I am jealous, that is a fact. Not rationalize, condemn it, or justify it. So when we see the fact you have tremendous energy to go beyond it? I wonder if you see this?

Q: The thing is how we can see the fact.

K: Yes sir. You can't see the fact.

Q: The way you put the question for example, immediately my mind...

K: I understand sir. It is not what I am saying. As I said sir, it is not important what the speaker is saying. What is important is to use the speaker to find out if what he is saying is false or real, if what he is saying is actual, which is yourself, what is actually going on within you.

Q: So we use you as a mirror.

K: Right, as a mirror, reflection, look at it.

Q: Is it only when we stop striving to become...

K: No madame, that is a different question, please listen to what I have said. Are you aware that in you there is this contradiction brought about by ideals, by comparison, by wanting to be something, are you aware of this, as something actual, as you are aware of pain? If you are not, why?

Q: No, I am not aware of this as a fact.

K: No, do please listen. The gentleman says, "No, I am not aware of this as a fact" - don't you hear? Is it you are not paying attention? Is it because you don't see the danger of it?

Q: You are afraid of the effect.

K: You are afraid what would happen if you stop comparing yourself with somebody else?

Q: We don't see the danger.

K: Look, why don't you see the danger?

Q: Could it be that we are dull?

K: Wait, wait. Now you say, could it be that we are dull? Now just look at it, just listen to this. How do you know you are dull? No. How do you know you are dull? You only know you are dull because you are comparing yourself with somebody else.

Q: No, because I can't understand you.

K: Wait. Therefore say, "I am not dull", don't say, "I am dull", only "I don't understand". Which is entirely different. When you say, "I am dull", you say it because you compare yourself with somebody who is clever, who is bright, who is intelligent and you say, "How dull I am". We are not talking about dullness, we are talking about a mind that says, "I don't see the danger, I don't understand why contradiction isn't all right, I have lived with it for the last fifty, twenty, ten, years and what is wrong with it".

Q: Part of the difficulty is that at one level it is all right, and it is very difficult to switch that off when one is looking at something at a deeper level.

K: Yes. At one level, you say, comparison, measurement is necessary, obviously. When I am buying a house I must compare, when I am choosing between two cars I have to compare, and so on. And this process of comparison is carried over psychologically to a deeper level. So the question is, why don't we carry this through, why don't we see where it is necessary and there end it? Why carry it further? You understand my question?

Q: Doesn't it help if we see that our psychological reactions which constitute 'what is' are mechanical?

K: Ah, no sir. Look, look, they are not mechanical. May I go on with this? I compare myself with somebody and in this comparison, measurement, inevitably contradiction comes - right? Because I don't know what I am, but I am comparing myself with you, which means I must be like you, or go beyond you. So I have created a contradiction in me. That is a fact. So I say to myself, "Why do I compare, let me see if I can put aside comparison" - measurement is necessary at one level - right? We are not discussing that level. Let me see if I can put aside comparison. Why do I want to put it aside? What is the motive behind my desire not to compare? Is it to be myself? Right? Am I prepared to face myself, whatever it is - you are following all this? Which means I take facts only, whatever is me I am going to take it - facts. Therefore - listen to this - in comparing myself with you who are cleverer, brighter, nobler, I am wasting the energy - right? Now I have energy because I don't waste it through comparison, I have energy to observe 'what is', whatever that is. Now what am I? I am one of the habits which is comparison. I don't know if you see this? Do you see this? I have removed one habit, which is comparison, and I have also put aside ideals, conscious as well as unconscious. So I have energy now to face whatever it is, which is me. Are you following all this? Are we meeting with each other?

Q: I am not clear about the levels, material and psychological.

K: No, we have said that sir. I have to choose, measure, compare between two materials when I buy a pair of trousers, I have to compare, measure when I am buying a house; I have to compare, measure when I am buying a car. Now the same habit I carry through psychologically. In the field of psychology, which is myself, I say I am measuring myself with you who are bright, and I say to myself, 'Why do I do this? Is this a habit, is it a part of my education, part of the culture, the society I live in?' If it is, it is rubbish, I won't measure myself. I want to find out. Oh, come on sir. Is that clear so far?

So I have got energy now. You understand sir? I wasted that energy in comparing.

Q: Well I don't know what I am unless I compare myself with somebody.

K: I am going to find out sir, what am I? If I don't compare myself with you, who are a saint, who are the chief executive, the archbishop or whatever it is, a saint, a guru, or whatever, if I don't compare myself with you, what am I? I don't know - right? Isn't that a fact? I only knew myself in comparison with you - right? In comparing myself with you I have said how dreadfully dull I am. Right? If I don't compare with you, am I dull? I don't know. Come on sirs.

Q: Are you saying that if we go into comparison carefully without comparison, we shall get rid of one of the fragments of our fragmentation?

K: That's right sir. Wait, wait careful now. Are you going to get rid of fragments one by one? That will take a long time, won't it?

Q: I don't know.

K: Right, right. You don't know. I have got many fragments, I am jealous, envious, ambitious, greedy, violent, occasionally happy, suffering, believe in god, or not believe in god - these are various fragments. Am I going to put them away one by one?

Q: That would take too long.

K: Therefore there must be a different way of looking at all this.

Q: It seems that when we look we see the habit of comparison. I say that I see that I am comparing myself with another, perhaps that comparison will come to an end and I don't know what I am and I look. But it seems that there is some difficulty, in the act of looking there is a distortion.

K: That's right.

Q: At that moment it seems as if one fragment of the mind is looking at the rest of the mind...

K: That's right?

Q: ...so the fragment that looks is a loaded fragment, it is senseless, it cannot see that that fragment is more important than the other fragment.

K: Why does the mind give to one fragment greater importance than to the other fragments? You have understood? You have understood my question sir? Oh my Lord! Are we travelling together, or are we going somewhere else? The mind has given to one fragment greater importance, it is the judge - why? Why has that fragment assumed greater importance over other fragments, although it is also a fragment - you understand? - why? You are all so puzzled aren't you?

Q: It gives oneself a sense of permanence.

K: Which is what? Go ahead sir.

Q: Well I am here now so I must be here tomorrow.

K: Which is what he is saying, it gives a permanency. Wait, wait. One fragment has assumed greater permanency than the other fragments. That fragment has a greater sense of security, greater sense of certainty, greater sense of clarity - why?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do look at it before you answer it sir. Take the question in first.

Q: It has a greater emotional power behind it.

K: A greater emotional power at that moment to hold that thing as permanent.

Q: We always want to feel that the entity that looks is something, and we are not prepared to face the possibility that is nothing.

K: You are going to find out in a minute sir.

Q: It begins to measure again.

K: Yes sir. So look at it.

Q: Without the observer sir.

K: That's right. It is a marvellous thing, sir, if you go step by step, you will see it yourself. That brings total freedom from fragmentation, you will see it in a minute. Why does one fragment assume the power or prestige over the other fragments? Is it part of our education? Because intellectually we are terribly cultivated. To us the intellect is extraordinarily important and we say, "Oh, well he is not so bright you know, he is rather dull". But the man who is very bright we say, "What an extraordinary brain he has got". Have you noticed this? The intellectual capacity has been cultivated. To us the intellect has become a tremendous thing. And the intellect is different from emotion, the intellect has power to argue, to discuss, to create, to build, and the emotion becomes rather sentimental, vague, unreal, therefore words become extraordinarily important, which is part of the intellectual play things.

So is it - go step by step - is it that we are educated to give to one fragment the Soul - you understand? - or the body - greater importance? We are educated in this. To us the artist has greater value than the business man, the musician is much more important than the cook. Is it that our whole education emphasizes one fragment?

Q: I think sir that you talk about education as if it were something out there, that was imposed upon us. But whereas I really feel that we are willing to be educated in this particular way. There is a sort of social contract among all the selves that this part of us will be pre-eminent.

K: Yes sir. So you are saying our education is not over there, it is here. And part of our education is to find out now how to learn to look at things differently.

Q: But we can't because we are not educated, we are indoctrinated.

K: That's right sir, that's perfectly right. We are indoctrinated by the church, by the society, by the culture we live in. And one of the indoctrinations is, that there is an entity which is far superior than the other fragments, which is will. Right? A man of character, a man of will, he will stand up against anything - you follow? - the hero.

So can the mind be without the perceiver, who is the superior entity - right, you understand this? - who is the past, can the mind observe 'what is' without the superior entity? The superior entity is the image which society has built, the Establishment - right? So can the mind observe without the observer, the perceiver, which is the past? And when it is observing with the eyes of the past then it is wasting energy, therefore it cannot face 'what is'. Got it? So where there is no comparison, no ideal, no superior entity which guides, which dominates, which has will to say, 'I will' and 'I will not', which are all factors of division and therefore conflict. When you see this as you feel pain. When you feel this intensely everything drops. Now does this take place as we are sitting here and listening? Or you are not completely paying attention, you are only half listening and therefore half learning and therefore not learning at all. Come on sirs.

Q: There is nothing left to do.

K: There is nothing left to do?

Q: 'I will' and 'I will not' - if you abandon that there is nothing left to do.

K: No madame, I don't abandon it. I see the truth of all this and therefore when I see something as true, then the false goes?

Q: It can be so much more subtle though than the sort of description of will which says 'I see' or 'I don't see'.

K: Of course, much more subtle.

Q: What I want to ask you is: is it true to say that as long as there is any conception of looking, or watching, one is still caught in this fragmentation.

K: Of course. As long as there any conceptual observation...

Q: ...that I am looking.

K: Yes. Any conceptual, verbal, intellectual perception - there is fragmentation obviously.

Q: Even the shadow.

Q: Don't we now come to face the problem of fear in this question of will?

K: We don't listen or learn because of fear? You know why do we take so long to learn about something like this which is so clear, which is so simple, which gives you such a tremendous practical way of life and gives you tremendous energy? Why do you refuse all this?

Q: It's because I'm used to that kind of thinking.

K: But I'm saying, sir, that kind of thinking is all right at one level but at the other psychological level it has no value at all. Why don't you learn that? Why do you keep on repeating? Why don't you say, "Yes, let me learn, I don't know this, I am going to learn a new language, a new way of looking, let me learn" - you don't do that.

Q: Isn't that a fragmentation?

K: Of course sir, that is the what we are saying, it is part of fragmentation.

Q: But I mean separating the material life and the...

K: No. Sir, I am not separating. You see it is not separation. The two must go together. I have to choose between two materials, I have to choose between two cars, between two houses, between the kind of pen I will use; and also at the same time can the mind be free of comparison, the two moving together?

Q: In other words what you are saying is that at different times...

K: Ah, no, no. Not one time you compare and another time you do not compare. Oh Lord! Sir please it is not a question of time. When you choose a tie you compare don't you? And when you see comparison breeds conflict within you and outside of you, what will you do? Keep them in watertight compartments? Or let both of them live together harmoniously? You have got it?

Q: In choosing between two cars I am bound to end up in some sort of fragmentation.

K: No, no necessarily. He says when I compare two cars I am bound to be psychologically comparing. First get the idea, get the feeling that you are always comparing - right? And see the fact that comparison is a distorting factor in life - right? See that fact, only that. Then we will discuss when comparison should exist and all the rest. Come on sirs.

Q: It is rather like searching for truth in a lot of nonsense really.

Q: Your concept is so obvious and so simple.

K: Your concept is so obvious and so simple - is it a concept? I have no concept. For god's sake let's move away from that. I have a horror of concepts because it has done so much mischief in the world - the Arab concept - you understand sir? - the whole of the Arabian world is anti everything else, anti Israel and all the Jews and so on. And the Hindus have a concept, which is an idea, a Hindu is a concept, is against Muslim - you know. So can the mind live without concepts? Therefore free to live. When you have concepts you are not living, you are living in an idea. Oh come on sirs, this so simple.

Q: So we mustn't get a concept of what you mean?

K: No sir. Learning is not a concept. To learn about the ending of thought is not a concept, you are learning.

Q: I didn't imply that.

K: Oh, I beg your pardon.

Q: I said that to live without a concept, one has a concept of living without a concept.

K: Then you are playing with words.

Q: Could you continue with what you mentioned before: that we are only half listening.

K: Yes. Sir, look, I want to learn a language. What is necessary to learn a language? First of all I don't know the meaning of the foreign words, French words, or Latin or Russian words. So I am curious, I must give time to it, I must be patient, I must have the ear to listen to the sound as it is pronounced by the native of that language. I must listen and I must look at the word printed on a page - right? I must give attention to it. If I say, well I'm tired today I won't listen but I must listen - there is conflict - you understand? Whereas if you say, I want to listen, I want to find out, I want to learn, that requires attention, that requires passion, that requires energy. If you haven't got it you say, "Well, I'm not interested; I don't want to learn". Why do you sit here then, it is such a waste of time?

Q: In learning there is no sense of extension...

K: That's right sir. In learning there is no extension of the 'me'. I learn, how can you bring the 'me' into it?

So let's come back. Which is: we began by asking why the human mind is fragmented? Is it the culture, the society, the religion, the various beliefs, dogmas, ideals that have brought about this division in ourselves, which is education? Is it that we are always comparing ourselves with somebody? He has got a beautiful face, he has got a lovely sense of beauty, he has got very great intellectual capacity. We are always comparing, comparing, therefore we destroy ourselves and put the other on a pedestal, which brings about a fragmentation. Can the mind live without comparison? Just try it sir, learn about it, and not make it a formula.

Q: It's all fragments until you put out the ideals, then you see the violence in yourself.

K: If you see the violence in yourself.

Q: It is frightening to live without ideals.

K: Now wait a minute. You see violence in yourself and to have no ideal is very frightening. Which means, the ideal is an escape from your violence - right? Then you are not frightened if you can escape from violence through an ideal, you are not frightened. So ideals act as an escape from 'what is'.

Q: To be vulnerable.

K: That's vulnerable. Now I want to find out - please listen to this - I want to find out whether I can face violence as it is without any ideal. I want to learn. I see I have learnt what ideals do, they offer an escape from the fact of violence, so I say, "I want to resolve completely violence, so I won't escape through ideals". Now I am faced with violence in myself. Right? Now is that violence a word? Wait sir, don't say 'No', let's go into it step by step. Is it a word to which I have become so accustomed that you say, "I am violent" - you use the word before you have the feeling. You are following? Does the word encourage the feeling of violence? Look at it, please look. Why do I use that word violence?

Because I have had that feeling before and have used that word, and that word is convenient to identify the past with the present - you are following all this? So I am using the word as an identity, as a remembrance of an experience of violence I have had and so use that word now. So what takes place when I use the word and identify that present experience with the past, what takes place? I strengthen that violence - no? So can I observe that feeling without the word? And if I don't use that word and identify that feeling with the past, does the feeling exist?

Q: I hit somebody then.

K: No please, you don't hit somebody. Just listen. I am violent, angry and I say, "I am angry". When I am learning I say, "Why do I use that word anger?" Why do I use words all the time with regard to certain feelings, why? Is it because I don't know what to do with the feeling, I don't know how to go beyond it, therefore I resort to the past and so thereby strengthen the feeling? You are following all this? Come on sirs. So can the mind, when this feeling of violence arises, not use any word at all? If I don't use the word, and if the past doesn't project itself on the present, does that feeling of violence exist at all? I am learning, you understand. I am not saying that feeling should exist, should not exist. I am learning.

Q: The mood exists, because it is this we become aware of, the label comes later

K: Yes, that's right, that's right. So can you observe your violence without the label?

Q: What if the mood leads to action before you have awareness?

K: If the mood leads to action before awareness, what am I to do? If the mood leads to action before awareness takes place what am I to do? Why need you ask me? That is what you generally do. You write off a letter, or hit somebody, or use a word and so on and so on.

Q: I think I saw something when you were talking. I feel violent, then half a second later I say it is violence, I put it off into a category which creates the opposite category of non-violence. And these two categories in my mind have to necessarily be in conflict, have to be violent. But the idea of non-violence is contradictory, it creates the idea of violence.

K: Quite right sir? Therefore we are only saying, freedom from violence, not becoming free from violence in order to be non-violent. Freedom from violence.

Sir, what we have said is very simple, what is the difficulty? Is it that you don't listen? Is it that you are not paying attention to what is being said? Is it that you want to keep your violence, put garlands round it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: One of our difficulties is that attention is devoured by a process. Awareness becomes a process, mechanical. Now why does the mind become mechanical? We have made our life mechanical - right? Sex, relationship, habit is mechanical, the way of our thinking, which is comparison, ideals, is mechanical, why does the mind become so easily mechanical, a process that goes on, why? Having a mechanical habit makes life easier, doesn't it? So the mind is seeking an easy way of living - right? I believe in god - finished. You follow? Believe in god, carry on. Or I say, "I am an Englishman" or a Dutchman or god knows what else, that is a mechanical habit, that is the easiest way of living. Which means what? The mind is seeking security - no?

Q: Conformity.

K: Conformity, of course. Conformity, security. Because when I conform with the rest of the world I am perfectly safe. So the mind is seeking security through conformity, through habit, through processes, through continual assertion of something totally unreal, because essentially it wants to be secure - right?

Q: Isn't this related to what went just before? The social system has a most powerful influence on the individual and generally we feel it is much easier to float with the river than battle against the tide.

K: Right sir. Please listen. We are asking, why don't we learn? Is it the new learning may be very disturbing, it may change the whole pattern of our existence? Therefore we are frightened, therefore we say, "Please make that new way of living a habit", "Tell me how to live in habit in the new way". And you tell me, sir, that you can't make the habit of a new way, you have to learn it, you have to keep moving. And that is what is taking place. You won't listen because of habit. And we say that way of living is the most disastrous way of living. Look where you are, what it has done, wars, misery, confusion - you know what is happening in the world. You say, "It is all right it is only happening in Munich, not here" - you follow? My house isn't burning, somebody else's house is burning. So you say, "Please leave me in my habits". Or "Please introduce me to a new habit, but make it a habit, so that it will be completely secure". So you are seeking security, and quite rightly too because the brain cannot function without complete security. Right?

Q: I don't understand.

K: I have just said sir, if you had no house, no home, no shelter and no food, the brain deteriorates. So it must have shelter, food, clothing of any kind, even a little room, it must have so that it feels secure, like a child. You must feel secure otherwise everything goes wrong for the poor child. Broken families and all that takes place and the child goes to pieces. So the brain must have security, but it has sought security in things that are not secure. It has sought security in god, which is an idea, it is not a reality. In the name of god probably Christians have killed more people than anybody else. Right?

Q: Sir, dismissing those ridiculous beliefs in politicians, in god, in all those ideals, surely people here can see that it is absolutely ridiculous to believe in all that nonsense. So my question is: how can I if my brain needs security, how can I provide it when the very activities are destructive?

K: I'll show it to you. If the brain sees those factors are destructive, what has taken place in the brain? What has given to the brain the capacity to see all those things are false? Go on sir, answer it. Wait. Watch it sir, don't use words yet. The brain has seen, the mind has seen god, nationalities, religious divisions, are disastrous for human relationship, what is the capacity that makes the brain see that? What is that capacity, sir?

Q: Awareness.

K: What is that capacity that you have, that says, "That is silly"?

Q: It is just a directness.

K: Is it not intelligence? Of course it is. When you say, "It is stupid to be a nationalist, stupid to belong to any organized religion" - it is your intelligence that says it is stupid. Therefore in intelligence is security. Wait, you are not listening.

Q: But it will also tell me that to be a business man you must exploit people.

K: No, it won't tell you. If your intelligence says, that is stupid, your intelligence also says, we must have money, we must have better... let intelligence operate not your idea of intelligence.

Q: I think that is baffling that last one, if you don't mind me saying so. This question of security, the intelligence says...

K: Is that intelligence? Now wait a minute. Go into it. Is that intelligence. I will be a better business man, I will have more money, I will cheat, I will do everything - is that intelligence?

Q: It is the opposite.

K: Why do you say it is the opposite? Sir, listen to it. What tells you it is the opposite?

Q: I can see it is destructive.

K: What makes you see it?

Q: It just is. I look at it simply and I see it.

K: That's right sir. So you see we have sought security in things which are not intelligent - right? And we are learning to seek security in intelligence and let that intelligence operate. That intelligence is not yours or mine, it isn't the communist, or the Catholic, it belongs to nobody, it is intelligence. When that intelligence operates, in that action there is security. Got it sir?

Q: So education is contrary to what you have just said.

K: That's right sir. That is just it.

Q: What we have called intelligence, what we were trying to look on as intelligence is unintelligence.

K: That's right sir.

Q: So we are standing on our heads.

K: Ah no, we have been standing on our heads, now we are standing on our feet.

Q: It's like when you think things for yourself, understand for yourself, people, especially when you are young, people say you are being selfish.

K: No, no. What were you going to say sir?

Q: There is one question that worries me. If we come here to listen to you sincerely, lecture after lecture, but go away and can't put this into practice - what is wrong?

K: Sir, I'll tell you what is wrong. Don't put anything into practice. The moment you put it into practice it becomes mechanical. But if you see the facts of it, you understand, if you see the truth of it it acts.

Q: That is what I mean, we don't see it, otherwise...

K: That's right sir, why don't you see it? Is it that you are not listening properly? Is it that you are frightened? Is it that you have not enough energy to listen? Is it that you don't see the world and everything collapsing, burning, you don't see it, you don't feel it, it is not in your blood?

Q: We might be just too far gone.

K: Yes, you might be too far gone. Our brains have gone to pieces, that might be true.

Q: I don't know about other people here, but I'm not too far gone. I can see that clearly the world is collapsing, there is terrible destruction, and people are fighting with each other in various ways and I ask myself where do I come into this, how do I fit in? I obviously can't just provide for myself, it is meaningless for me to provide for myself.

K: Just listen to this. The world is fighting - right? Killing each other. There are the Catholics, Protestants, Communists, Hindus, Muslims - you follow - appalling things are going on. My guru is better than your guru - right? All that kind of thing is going on. What is my relationship to all that? Right? I think - not think - I see all that is most destructive, which is, my intelligence says it is destructive. Now what is that intelligence to do and what is its relationship to all that is taking place? Right? What is the relationship? Look at it carefully sir. What is the relationship of that intelligence to a world that is insane?

Q: There is no relationship.

K: No relationship. Right? How can sanity have relationship with insanity? No, it can't. Therefore what will you do? You must do, you must act, you must live, what will you do? What will that intelligence do?

Q: Act the same.

K: Wait. See it sir.

Q: I don't know.

K: Why do you say I don't know?

Q: Because I find myself here in this tent examining this question, my whole being is fixed on this question of what will I do.

K: I understand, what will you do? I'll show you sir. Go into it, take time, look at it. What will you do? You say intelligence is sanity. They are living unintelligently therefore insanely. And you say sanity has no relationship with insanity - right? Then what will sanity do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madame, are you listening to the question he has asked? The question he has asked is, what am I, who have seen the unintelligent world as it is, the insanity that is going on, intelligence says, I am finished with that, I have no relationship with it. He has asked that question and we are asking, what is that intelligence to do? Because it must act, it can't say, "There is tremendous intelligence" - it must act. Go slowly sir. Are you acting, or intelligence is acting? If you are acting, or intelligence is acting? If you are acting, you belong to that. Listen sir. If you say, well what am I to do?, then you are putting a wrong question. What is the action of intelligence, is quite a different question. You don't say, what am I to do. Right? If you say, what am I to do, you are still playing with insanity. I wonder if that is clear.

Q: Is intelligence different from me?

K: Of course, for god's sake we have moved away from that altogether.

Q: Are you saying, how do I act intelligently?

K: No, on the contrary. I am saying, what is the act of intelligence which has discovered that the world is insane? Right? Do you see the difference sir? What is intelligence to do?

Q: It is choiceless.

K: Do listen sir. See what we have discovered. If you say, what am I to do with intelligence, then you belong to a group of people who use intelligence unintelligently - you get it? Whereas if you say, what will that intelligence do? How is that intelligence to act? Why do you even ask that question? Why do you ask that question? Because you are not sure of your intelligence. Look at it. You are not sure of that intelligence. If there is that intelligence it will act: but if you are not sure of that intelligence then you ask the question: how will that intelligence act?

Q: In other words we are so egotistic that we think this intelligence cannot act without us.

K: Yes, that is right sir. That is right sir. You have got it sir? So look what happens. There is the responsibility of intelligence, intelligence is responsible to act, intelligence has the responsibility of action - right? When I say, I have the responsibility to use action, then I am playing, I am going to use intelligence in my corrupt way. Whereas intelligence operating has its own action. Now is there that intelligence operating in you? Clear - you follow? - not uncertain, not saying, I am not quite sure, I don't know if I have got it, I am a bit hot under the collar but I am not sure. Which means you don't follow anybody, no guru, no authority, no system. All that is involved in that intelligence. When there is that intelligence there is sanity - right? Then a sane mind will act sanely. You don't have to ask, what am I to do. Got it? Right?

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 16TH SEPTEMBER 1972

What shall we talk about this morning? If I may I would like to talk about something that perhaps might be of value and significance. And then after I have talked a little we can ask questions and go over them.

Considering what the world is, the violence, the extraordinary indifference to what happens to other countries, to other people, the continuing wars, the utter immorality of society, the divisions which religions have created between man and man, the nationalities, the left and the right and all the rest of it, I wonder what our response is to all that. What is our responsibility? What is our action to the world around us, of which we are a part? We are the world and the world is us, the world is not separate from us; and looking at all this, not merely intellectually, verbally but observing it with care, with attention, with that sense of quality of a mind that really wants to solve all these problems, not superficially, but profoundly, what is our responsibility to all this? What are we to do in the world of chaos, this appalling suffering that is going on? People killing in the name of ideologies, in the name of a revolution, what is a human being to do and what is his responsibility? What is your responsibility? The word 'responsibility' - I looked it up in the dictionary just now - means to respond, to respond either totally or respond according to the immediate demands - political, personal, nationalistic, respond fragmentarily; or respond totally. Our responsibility in face of all this is either to act according to our temperament, to our conditioning, to our particular idiosyncrasy or to a particular belief, religious, political, or otherwise, and if we do respond fragmentarily that action obviously, as one observes, leads to more and more chaos, more and more mischief, more and more complications. I am sure we are all aware of this. And so one asks, at least one must ask faced with all this appalling misery, what is total action so that politically, religiously, economically, in our personal relationship there will be an adequate response, a total response? Can we go into that? Would that be of interest?

One can observe quite objectively how fragmentary responses, responses at different levels, breed not only contradiction in action but it brings with it inefficiency, contradiction and confusion. And if one is aware of all this, not intellectually or verbally, but actually feel all this, aware in the sense not only our own particular fragmentary activity, our own temperament and idiosyncrasies and characteristics, but also aware of our deeper levels of conditioning, in that awareness what is the right action? What is the adequate total response to a society that is so immoral, to morality that has no meaning whatsoever as it is, to a religion that has ceased to be really religious at all? And a response in our personal relationship to each other. Many people being aware of all this try to answer it by forming a community. I do not know if you have noticed young people all over the world saying, "This is all so ugly we are going to form a little community by ourselves". That community is soon broken because it is based on some ideology, or it is the denial of authority, which is associated with the establishment, and they themselves have to have an authority in the community, and when you reject authority without understanding it the community soon breaks up. Or you join some political party. Or you join the latest guru with extraordinary ideas. Or you take to drugs. Surely none of these are adequate responses - joining a revolution, which is a physical expression of violence to bring about a different kind of society and so on. We know all this. Again being aware of all this, what is one to do, you and I, not belonging to any particular organization, not believing in the religious doctrines, beliefs and saviours and gurus, not being nationalistic except perhaps carry a passport, what is your direct response to this challenge? How can you respond totally with your mind, with your heart, with your intelligence totally so that in the action there is no contradiction ever? I think this question is important to ask and to find out, or to learn what the answer is. Not come to any conclusion because the moment you come to a conclusion, how to act, then that very conclusion breeds contradiction between you who have one kind of conclusion and another who has a different kind of conclusion or opinion.

So how is one to act, being responsible, because freedom implies responsibility? When you put aside the religious doctrines, beliefs, political chicanery, political ideologies, communism or socialism, you know what they are leading up to, how do you, as a human being, respond to this? And to find what to do, one has to learn it, it seems to me, the whole process of living - what is implied in living, in existence, in our daily activity. Without understanding that, to try to answer a vaster question has no meaning. One has to begin very near to go very far - right? One has to begin with oneself to go very far. Unless one has this deep psychological revolution in oneself, to answer that question will inevitably be fragmentary and therefore mischievous.

So one has to understand psychologically, beginning with the psyche, the mind, and from there moving outwards. I don't know if we are communicating with each other. Communication means, as we said the other day, learning together, sharing together, observing together, creating together. That means communication. So we must, you and I, must both move together step by step, and not wait for somebody to teach you. We are learning together. That is real co-operation, that is a real community, this understanding together, travelling together, sharing together, learning together and therefore creating together. That demands naturally affection, love, care, attention.

So to answer this question, which everybody is asking, whether you go to India, or to America, or those people who are under tyranny, secretly they too are asking: what is this action that will be a total response to a world that is so insane, where freedom is denied and yet man is seeking absolute freedom? So absolute freedom implies absolute responsibility, that means absolute response totally to the problem. And one cannot possibly respond totally if one has not understood, not verbally, if one has not learnt to live a life in which love, death everyday living is understood, is learnt - right?

Now let's proceed. Having laid the foundation of that, that is you are laying it as well as I am laying it, together we are laying it. It is not I am laying it and therefore you build on that foundation your house, but we are together laying the foundation, it is our house. It is our earth to live in, to be happy, to enjoy without sorrow, pain, anxiety.

So we have to understand our life, the life that we lead, the life that has become meaningless, the life that is full of travail, sorrow, conflict, competition, dishonesty. And in learning about that we shall also learn what love is. And in learning what love is we shall learn also what death is, because life is all that - death, love, everyday living. And to merely concentrate on everyday living, that is, bread and butter, position, more things and so on and so on, and neglect the rest of it, which is what the world is doing, therefore it is imbalance, therefore it is contradictory, and therefore it is mischievous. So we have to learn about the whole thing - death, love and daily living.

First we must see clearly for ourself what our daily living is. What is our living? What is the thing that we call living? Do we live, or do we tolerate living? Do we live according to an idea, according to a conclusion based on a belief, a dogma, a memory? Because the mind is always concerned with remembering, imagining, contriving. Please we are moving together. If you have observed your mind you will see imagination plays a tremendous part, remembering and calculating, contriving. On that is based our life, the daily existence, the images which we have built about each other in our relationships with each other. And these images have their relationship and so we lose direct relationship. If I have an image about you because I have lived with you for ten years, or five days, and you have your image about me because you have lived with me for ten days or five years, our relationship is essentially based on that image. The images have relationship, not you and I, there is no direct response between each other. And therefore relationship comes to an end.

So our problem is - one of our problems unfortunately! - is how to end these images and how not to create these images in relationship, because all images are a kind of knowledge. And one must have knowledge but in relationship when there is this image between you and me which is the knowledge of you and me, then that image, that knowledge becomes an impediment in our relationship. I don't know if you see this. I hope you see it. See it in the sense that you feel hungry, as you feel so many things so strongly. So when you realize in our daily living, whether it is in the office, at home, with a neighbour, or playing golf, or whatever you do, how extraordinarily important these images are, which is part of remembering, imagining, contriving. So how can the mind be free of this image which it has built up, and how to prevent further images being formed. Are you asking all these questions or am I asking you these questions? Well it doesn't matter, I am asking you therefore you have to reply.

To understand this one has to go into the question of attention: to attend. We rarely attend to anything because we are lazy, accept so many things for granted and we do not want to disturb the pattern of habit, what it might reveal and we are frightened of it, therefore we are never totally attentive. You are not totally attentive now when you are listening. You are listening, comparing, judging, wasting your capacity of attention by distraction. So you are actually not listening. Now to find out, to go into this and learn how to end the formation of images and what to do with the images that you have already, one has to understand this question of attention. That means when you are attending - listen to this please - when you are attending no image is formed - do you understand? It is only in the state of inattention, when there is no attention, images are formed. Are we meeting each other? That is, when you, in our relationship with each other, insult me, I react instantly. That reaction is the habit. In that habit all kinds of other responses come into being. So when you insult me or nag me or whatever you do in our relationship, when there is attention, when I am listening to you totally, there is no necessity of image at all because I am listening to what you are saying.

We are learning this please; you are not memorizing this and practising it. Because the moment you practise it it becomes mechanical, then it is a remembrance, and when you remember something and then put it into action it is the past that is operating and therefore it is inattention. I don't know if we meet all this. We are meeting each other? And what do you do with all the images that you have about a dozen things? What will you do? Will you get rid of them one by one, becoming aware of each image and saying, I must not and so on? Or is there an action which dissipates all images, whether the past or the present - the images that one has formed and the images that one is forming? Attention means energy, energy in which there is no wastage - please see this. When you form an image it is a wastage of energy. And when you give complete attention there is no waste at all. So you have this energy operating and therefore the past images have no value. I wonder if you meet this. Because we are talking about relationship between human beings, and that relationship is not harmonious, real, truthful, honest, and you cannot be honest, truthful, if our relationship is based on images, which it is now. And to be totally completely free of the formation of images, the machinery that forms images, is attention. And in that attention you have energy to observe the images taking place and therefore dissipating them.

You understand this? Can we go on?

Are you listening and learning, which means learning as we go along, which is observing yourself and in the observation of yourself you are learning?

So in relationship, which is life, unless we live in relationship there is no living; isolation which is the forming of images is non-living, the non-living is living according to a conclusion, to remembrance, to memory.

So from that one asks: what is this relationship in which there is no image? Is that love? And we don't know what it is. We are going to learn. We are going to learn together, to learn together and come upon what is called love. We depend on each other, and it is necessary to depend at a certain level. I depend on the postman, the milkman, the builder; but when we psychologically depend on each other, because I am lonely, isolated, in my loneliness I need somebody to lean on, somebody through whom I can escape. Haven't you noticed all this? So I am attached to you. I am attached to you because you give me comfort, you give me companionship, you offer me sex, you give me a dozen things, and therefore I cling to you because you are my security, my hope, my pleasure, my escape from my isolation. And all the time the mind is isolating itself. See what is happening. I want to escape from isolation because I see where there is dependence there is pain, fear, and yet my activity is self-centred and therefore isolated. I wonder if you see all this?

So freedom means responsibility. Freedom implies absolute responsibility. That means absolute order, not order of calculation but order that comes when I understand disorder. And disorder is the image in relationship, disorder comes when there is dependency and attachment, which means the mind needs security in companionship, in you - are you following? And when that security is threatened, as it is all the time being threatened, then I become violent, vicious and all the rest of it follows. So one asks: is love dependency? Please we are learning together, not saying yes or no. And is love pleasure? Pleasure is the response of memory and the pursuit of that memory in daily life. Learn this sirs, you will see it for yourself. And so one sees love is not pleasure - not that there is not pleasure, not that there is not a sense of joy and real enjoyment of life, but when there is the pursuit of pleasure you deny joy, you deny really love.

So to understand what love is one has to understand the machinery of thinking. And thinking is the response of memory and in relationship when memory plays a part then that relationship ceases, therefore there is no love in that relationship. Right? Are we learning together as we go along, not merely accepting a lot of words that have no meaning? Because we see in the world the utter absence of that love, though religions, churches, human beings have talked about it. When they say to each other, "We love you", it is the love of that image which they have about themselves and about the other and hence endless conflict between each other. Although they may live together in the same house, in the same bed, they are always living apart, and therefore in that relationship there is no sense of real love, affection, care.

And we also have to learn about death because life includes death. Death isn't something apart from living. Death isn't something at the end of our life - old age, disease, accident, pain and then die. And we have separated death from living, from love, from the whole of our existence. Please see this. People are frightened even to talk about it. So we have to learn about it, as we have to learn about living, how to live without conflict, to live without images in our relationships, to live in the movement of learning all the time, which includes death. And to understand the movement or to learn about death, fear must be understood.

Because most of us, young or old, diseased or not, old age with all its difficulties, we are always avoiding that inevitable thing. And that inevitable thing is treated as something sorrowful, something to be avoided at any price. So we are going to learn together about it. It sounds funny on a lovely morning with clouds and blue sky and the pattern of leaves on the tent, to talk about death. But it is part of our life, you cannot deny it and only live in a secluded thing called living, you have to take the whole of it. And when you understand the whole of it then your responsibility, your action to the world is entirely different.

Why is man so frightened of death? Or not being frightened, rationalizes it, sees that it is inevitable, that it is natural, like the tree that falls in the forest feeds the new tree, there are dozens and dozens of explanations but at the end of it there is that thing called death waiting. And man wants comfort because he says, "I have lived 20, 40, 80 years; I have accumulated tremendous experience, knowledge; I have suffered untold agonies; I have fulfilled in this and that, and frustrated in this and that; I have never reached the end of things which I want to do; I have always lived with great burdens and great sorrow." And the mind wants comfort. Because if living is to die and the ending of the whole thing, it is rather an appalling thing to realize that. Therefore we say I must have comfort. And the man who seeks comfort will find comfort in an illusion, not in reality. For him it is more important to be comfortable, not to be disturbed, not to break down the habits which he has built for so many centuries. Therefore he invents a belief that there is a living after death, or that there is a resurrection after death, or that you are absorbed in the light of truth and so on - right?

To learn about death fear must end. Learning about fear is the ending of fear, and the mind that seeks comfort can never find the truth of death - right? Are you meeting all this? Are we putting too much in one talk? We are but it doesn't matter. It is up to you.

So we are learning about something which we don't know, about something of which we are afraid. And when one dies look what happens. You die with disease, unconscious, a burden on the rest of the family, or on the society - we don't die like wild animals, naturally, easily, we are always dying with fear and pain - haven't you noticed all this? In a hospital bed, and the little money that you have collected is dissipated on nurses and doctors. We have lived wrongly; we have never learned to live rightly. And we end up in a bed in a hospital, or in an accident, or in disease - right?

So to learn about death is to find out if death is at the end or at the beginning. If death is something to be avoided - or rather to live with it, knowing the inevitability of the mechanism of the body, the organism wearing out. It will wear out naturally if you live a natural life. If you live an unnatural life you will naturally end unnaturally. I do not know if you have noticed in the autumn a leaf turning yellow, how beautiful it is, full of colour and it falls to the ground its pattern is so clear and so beautiful, so alive. And we never die that way.

So one has to learn how to live with death, which doesn't mean you commit suicide, or morbid or any of that silly nonsense, but to live with death. You understand sir? Now what does that mean? To live with no image - we understand it very well, that is fairly clear, both intellectually and verbally and perhaps some of you see it very clearly because you are attentive and you have seen the truth of it in your relationships. And also perhaps you see, learn what love is. You see that it is not pleasure; pleasure is the pursuit of thought in things that have happened before and the demand for pleasure. One sees that very clear. And also one sees that where love is, will is not. But to learn what death is in living, to live with death is quite another matter. So we are going together to learn about it. What it means to live with death. You understand? I don't know if you have ever put that question. I'm afraid you have never put it. You have either put it in a morbid mood, depressed, or feeling utterly inferior because you have compared yourself with somebody whom you think is superior, depressed, agonized about some silly thing, then you say, "How am I to die" - which is the invitation to death. That is not what we are doing. What we are trying to learn is how to live with that thing which we call death, to learn about it. YOU learn about it is not to be afraid. You understand sirs? Therefore to be afraid implies that mind, thought, foreseeing its own end, and is frightened of the unknown, and therefore clings to the known, which is my family, my house, my property, my beastly little mind, my quarrels, my memories and all the absurdities which I have built up during, 40, 50, 60 years. And the known is familiar, and what is familiar is what I am used to, I accept it, the known is my home, my abode, my sense of security; the unknown I am uncertain of and therefore I am frightened. The unknown in comparison with the known, otherwise I don't know the unknown. I don't know if you understand this. Because I compare the known with the unknown, I am frightened of the unknown. If I don't compare, the unknown has no meaning. And to find out I learn, but when I compare I am comparing the known with something I do not know. I don't know if you see it, and therefore there is fear.

So what does it mean to learn about death and living? It is really rather a lovely question, isn't it? I don't know if you see the beauty of it. Why is the mind so attached to the known, to the familiar, to the habits, to all the memories which it has accumulated, the remembrances of things past? Why is it? And the things past are words. When I remember the joyful afternoon in the bright clear sunlight, and the shadows, that is a remembrance known, accepted. And I live with that memory because that is the most pleasant memory I have had during the whole of that summer, in the whole of that year. And in that memory the mind seeks, finds security. And so you can expand it, complicate it, put it in various forms. That is, the past is the mind - it may project from the past to the future, or operate from the past in the present, but it is always living in the past, the known, whether that known is conscious, or unconscious. And the unknown is death. As long as the mind holds on to the known it will always be frightened of the unknown. We are learning, please go on.

So can the mind free itself from the known? That is, the known is knowledge, whether personal knowledge or the accumulated knowledge of the race, of the culture, the known. And can the mind be free of it and yet use it? It can use it only when it is free intelligently. When it is not free it will misuse that knowledge, which is what is happening in the world. You have marvellous technology, go to the moon, and the extraordinary things they have invented. And also they have invented extraordinary instruments to kill each other, from all the accumulated knowledge of centuries. Knowledge is necessary, not to kill each other, knowledge is necessary, and it is misused, as it will invariably be misused when there is no freedom from the accumulated of memory, which is the mind. I wonder if you meet all this?

So dying is the ending of knowledge. Are you meeting this? Don't agree, you don't know what it means. The knowledge which I have accumulated about myself, the knowledge which I have gathered through experience during my life time of 40, 50, 10 years. The knowledge which I have invited, which has become my habit, the very structure of my being, and that is the 'me', and that is the 'you'. And that knowledge is always within the field of the known and I won't let it go because I don't know what the other is. I would rather have my furniture - or rather not have furniture, have an empty house.

So from that arises the question: whether a mind can ever be free from the known, and the freedom from the known and the known moving together? You understand this? Not keeping one in a watertight compartment and the other in a compartment, divorced from each other, but married together, living together, moving together. That is dying to the known, and that is to learn to live with death all the time, to the end of our daily existence. You understand? Move together in this freedom from knowledge and freedom. When you understand the whole of it - the living, the sense of love and death, when you understand the whole of it then your responsibility to society will be an adequate response, it will be a total response of a human mind that is really cultured, of a mind that has depth, meaning.

So without understanding the totality of existence, but only a part of it, it must inevitably lead to utter chaos. So when we see this it becomes extraordinarily important for each one of us to learn to live totally differently. Right?

Perhaps you can ask questions from this. Or is that enough for this morning? What sir?

Q: What is the place of literature in our daily life?

K: What is the place of literature with all its images in our daily life? Is that it? Is that it sir? You see I don't read books, thank god! I read occasionally detective stories. What place has literature in our life? What Shakespeare has written, what Aldous Huxley has said about The Doors of Perception, Durrell, Graves, T.S. Eliot - what place has all that in your life? The images, the poetry, the use of words, the beauty of the description - is that your life, or the life of the author who wrote them? Or through literature you enjoy life, through literature you see the beautiful tree, the mountain, the river, the description of the author of relationship between man and woman and all the tortures they go through, the boy everlastingly meeting the girl, in a thousand different ways. Is that your life?

Which means you have no life of your own. Not what life I want. We are not doing propaganda. If we live on literature you are a secondhand human being. If we live on what the churches have said you are a secondhand human being. If we live according to the Bible, or to the Bhagavad Gita, or to the Koran, we don't live at all, we are living according to what the prophets have said, or to what the psychologists have said.

So find out sirs what place literature, art, beauty, museum, all the things man has put together, has, the truth of them, or the falseness of them, or their relationship to your daily life - you have to begin with yourself. You have to find out what your relationship is to literature, what your relationship is to that thing which they call god, if there is god. Perhaps we will go into it tomorrow morning, that question. So unless you, as a human being, find out for yourself and learn what your relationship to the whole of the world is, if you don't find out, if you don't learn about it, you are bound to create the horrors that are going on, increase them.

Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Right sir. The question is - may I repeat it and if I don't repeat it please correct it properly.

In 1928, the questioner says, you dissolved the organization called the Order of the Star, of which you were the head, with thousands of members, property and so on - you renounced all that, put aside all that. (I don't use the word 'renounce' - put aside all that) As you were brought up to believe, or you were conditioned by the Masters - I don't know why you bring all that in now but it doesn't matter - and the essential teaching of a Master is to know yourself - isn't that it sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No sir. What I have said was - you see we are talking how to live without conditioning. And you are bringing in something which you think is conditioned response from me. Sir I have said Truth is a pathless land. You cannot come to it by any path, there is no path to Truth. And you can only come to it when the mind is free from all conditioning, and the conditioning takes place when there is an end in view, when there is fear, when there is pleasure, when you have not understood the whole meaning and the living of life, love and death. That is all we are concerned with. You see that needs no Masters, no gurus, no paths. All that it needs is your attention. If you are willing to learn, if you are willing to learn together that is all that is needed. If you don't, don't bother. Don't make your life more complicated than it is by introducing somebody else's teaching, including mine.

Q: Sir, may I ask you when you see a person in distress, or they come to you in trouble, it is very difficult to help them without relying on thought and memory to help.

K: I understand sir. When people come to you and you want to help them it is very difficult not to introduce images, conclusions, thoughts. When people come to you with their problems, are you trying to help them? If you are trying to help them, you will prevent their understanding of themselves. So don't - please don't misunderstand what I am saying - don't help them. Right? That sounds terrible, but who are you to help them? It is like the analysts who are analysing others, when they themselves need analysis! And they have analysis every year if they are good analysts, by another analyst who needs analysing and so on! Please just listen to it, listen. I come to you with my problems. My wife has run away, I feel despair, I am lonely, I am in great sorrow over many things. My brother, son is dead, I am exhausted with all the tortures of my mind. I come to you. And you feel you can help me. I come to you to talk things over with you, I want you to listen to my problems. And in talking over, and you are listening to me, something takes place. That is if you know how to listen. But if you say, "Well I must help you my dear friend", then our relationship is entirely different. You are the helper - I am the helper! Whereas if I come to you with real problems, and I have, you have - and I come to you and I talk it over with you and you are listening, if you listen without the image, without conclusions, without the supposition that you can help me, then in that listening and my exposing myself to you, in that relationship the understanding, the learning takes place. There is the fertile soil in which a new thing can take place. Isn't that enough for today?

Q: What do you mean by thought? Thought doesn't lead to violence.

K: Thought doesn't lead to violence, right. Sir you are not understanding what I mean by thought. That would be another literature, but you are trying to understand what thought is for yourself, aren't you? What is thought? You are trying to learn about it, aren't you? Therefore it is not mine, not what I think thought is. But you can see it for yourself very simply, what thought is, which is the response of memory. I ask what your name is and you say, 'Yes, my name is so and so. Or you have memories, knowledge and from that you respond. And the response may have an interval between the question and the answer. In that interval, in that gap of time, in that lag your mind is searching for the answer in memory, or in a book, or in whatever it is. So thought is always the response of memory, therefore thought can never be free, thought can never be new. Only when thought comes to an end something new can take place. That is quite a different matter.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH SEPTEMBER 1972

I believe this is the last talk. So what shall we talk about?

Q: Could we go into the question of fear?

K: I thought we went into the question of fear the other day, and on several occasions.

I think we ought to talk over together the question of immortality: if there is a state of mind that is without time, not science fiction timelessness, and a quality which is not measurable. And in this perhaps we can also talk over together the question of meditation, and if there is something beyond all thought, imagination, memory, all the contrivances which man has put together in order to find something which is imperishable. Perhaps we could talk these things over this morning, because we have not touched upon these things before. So may we go on with those.

You know wherever one goes in India, America, all different parts of the world, one observes from the very crudest form to the most subtle, the endeavour of the mind to find something that is sacred, that is really holy. And it takes so many different forms - the temple, the church, the primitives who worship a tree and are frightened of the thunder; wherever one goes there is this constant enquiry of the human mind, whether there is something really sacred, divine, that is not corruptible. And in the search of that the priests throughout the world have said you must have faith. Faith in what I don't know, but faith in god, in something that man has called god. To find out and to learn about it, whether it exists or doesn't exist, whether it is merely the invention of a mind that is frightened, the invention of a mind that sees everything in a flux, everything transient and seeks something which is permanent, which is beyond time, which is not at the behest of any particular religion or any particular belief. And to learn about it, it seems to me, if you are interested in it, and one must be interested in it whether you believe or don't believe, because unless one comes upon it, learns about it, life will always be superficial. One may be astonishingly moral in the right sense of that word, without any compulsion, without any interference from the environment, from the society, from the culture, really truly be moral, virtuous, which is really to be deeply within the area of order. However much one may be moral, lead a life that is fairly harmonious, not contradictory, not frightened, that is sane, balanced, harmonious, unless one finds that thing that man has been seeking life becomes rather superficial, however moral one may be, however socially active one is, trying to do good and all the rest of it.

So it seems to me very important, if one is at all serious, really concerned with the whole phenomenon of existence, one must find out, one must learn for oneself whether there is such a thing as something unnameable, beyond time, not put together by thought, which is not an illusion, an experience which the human mind craves beyond experience. One must learn about it, because that gives to life an astonishing depth, not only a significance but great beauty, in which there is no conflict, a great sense of wholeness, a completeness, total sufficiency.

Now if we can this morning go into this question, it might be worth while. Of course first one must totally discard altogether the whole thing of organized religions - right? That must be completely and totally set aside because if you are born in a communist country you are educated not to believe, if you are born in a Catholic country you are educated to believe, or if you go to the East there is also the same phenomenon going on - propaganda, education, conditioning. If a mind would find out, would learn about that thing, naturally it must set aside the things that man has put together which he calls divine, in which he is conditioned with all its religious rituals, beliefs, dogmas and all the rest of it. I hope we are communicating with each other, and I hope you have actually set aside, not merely verbally but deeply inwardly so that you are completely capable of standing alone and not depending on anything, psychologically.

If you are so inclined, if you have so perceived the truth or the falseness that exists in mythology, and most religions are myths, which have held together people for a certain period, because that is the function of all myths to hold society together for as long as it is possible, and when that myth is exploded society begins to break up, which is what is happening now. We have lived on myths of various kinds, and they have held man in a particular culture and when that myth ceases to exist there is no raison d'etre to continue, except along our own particular tendencies, characteristics, pleasures and so on, which is exactly what is happening in the world now. Nobody believes in anything anymore - thank the Lord! Which has its misfortune because doubt is a good thing - doubt but it must be kept on a leash. And to hold it intelligently on a leash is to enquire, but to doubt everything has no meaning.

Now if one has actually set aside all this intelligently, not that you drop one and pick up another, window shopping all the time, then it is utterly futile, but if you have enquired into it, seen the fallacy of it for yourself, seen the implications of all the structure which man has put together in his endeavour to find out if there is, or if there is not, an immortality, a state of mind that is timeless, which is not perishable, then if you have set aside this we can begin to learn.

First of all thought cannot find it because thought with all its cunningness, with all its imagery, with its various remembrances and conclusions, thought is time, thought is measure and thought, however subtle, however disinterested, however far reaching, can never come upon this - which doesn't mean that the mind must be thoughtless, which doesn't mean that the mind must forget everything. As we said the last few times that we met here, we said that thought must function within the field of knowledge, and it can only function efficiently, truly, beneficially when there is freedom from thought - the two must go together in harmony: the freedom, the absolute freedom from thought and thought functioning in the field of knowledge objectively, sanely, non-personally. So thought can never find it. I think this must be very clearly understood, if we are to go any further. Because thought is not only time and measure but also the whole content of the past, conscious or unconscious, and when thought says, "I am going to search out, seek, if there is something real", then thought can project what it considers to be real. Please follow all this. And therefore that becomes an illusion. When thought sets out to practise in order to discipline itself in order to find, as most saints, religions, doctrines, various gurus offer this - that is, train your thought, control it, discipline it, force it to the pattern that we give to you so that you will ultimately come upon the real thing. Right? And when one sees that thought can never find it because thought is essentially not free, thought can never be new, and to find that which must be totally something unperceived, unknowable, unrecognizable, thought must be totally quiet - right? Are we moving with each other?

So the question then is: can thought, without any effort, not be controlled, because the moment you control it, there is a controller who is also the invention of thought, and the controller then begins to control his thoughts and then there is conflict. Wherever there is conflict there must be the activity of thought. So can the mind, which is the result of time, evolution, which is the storehouse of great knowledge, which is the result of a great many influences, experiences, which is the very essence of thought, can that thought be quiet - without control, without discipline, without any form of effort, because when there is an effort there must be distortion? Please do see this. If you and I learn this thing then we will be able to function sanely, normally, healthily in everyday life, and at the same time there is this extraordinary sense of freedom from thought. Now how is this to take place - you understand the question? Because this is what man has been seeking, because he knows very well thought is a transient thing, thought can be changed, modified, enlarged and knows thought cannot really penetrate into something which is not perceivable by any process of thought. So then he begins to say, how can thought be controlled - you are following? How can thought be held? Because one sees very clearly that only when the mind is completely still can you listen to that aeroplane, only when the mind is completely still can you hear something clearly, or see something. I think that is fairly clear.

So how is the mind, which is the brain, in which thought as matter lives - how can this whole brain, mind be completely still - right? Are we following each other? I do not know if you have asked that question ever. And if you have asked and if you have found an answer, the answer must be according to your thinking. Now can thought naturally realize its own limitation, and realizing its own limitation be quiet? That is, can the mind, and therefore the brain - the brain cells themselves, if you have observed your own brain operating, are the content of the past, every cell in it holds the memory of yesterday because yesterday and its memory gives to the brain great security because tomorrow there is uncertainty and in the past there is certainty - in knowledge there is certainty, which is the past; so the brain is the past - right? - and therefore the brain is time; it can only think in terms of time, yesterday, today and tomorrow, the tomorrow is uncertain therefore the past, through the present make the tomorrow more certain - so can that brain, which has been trained, educated through millennia, be completely still - you understand the problem? Please understand the problem first. Because when we understand the problem clearly, see the problem with all its implications wisely, intelligently, the answer is in the problem not outside of it. All problems, if you examine, have their answer in themselves, not beyond it.

So the question is then: the brain, the mind, the whole organic structure, can that be utterly still? You know there is a different kind of stillness. There is the stillness between two noises - right?

Between two verbal statements there is a silence. There is a silence which can be induced. There is a silence which comes about by tremendous discipline, control. And all such silences are sterile - they are not silence, they are the product of thought which wishes to be silent and therefore it is still within the area of thought. Got it?

So how is the mind, which is the whole thing, how is it to be quiet without a motive - if it has a motive it is still the operation of thought? Do you know what the answer is? You don't do you? No. Good, I'm so glad! Because this requires tremendous honesty - you understand sirs? To really to find out if there is something not of this dimension but of a totally different dimension, you require great honesty in which there is no deception, therefore there is no wanting - you understand? The moment the mind desires to find that state it will invent, it will be caught in an illusion, in a vision. That vision, that experience is the projection of the past however enchanting, however pleasurable, however great it be, it is still of the past.

So if all that is very clear, not only verbally but actually, then the question is: can the content of consciousness, which makes up consciousness, can that content be completely emptied? Is this all Greek? Are we following each other? Do please.

Q: Is consciousness and the content the same?

K: That is what we are asking sir. Please do give me two minutes. Let me go on for a while.

Our consciousness, the daily, the unconscious and the conscious, the whole inward content of consciousness is its content, is what it has thought, what it has accumulated, what it has received through tradition, through culture, through struggle, through pain, through sorrow, through deception, the whole of that is my consciousness and yours. Without the content, what is consciousness? You understand? I only know my consciousness because of its content. I am a Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, Catholic, Communist, Socialist, an artist, a scientist, a philosopher - you follow? - I am attached to this house, she is my wife, you are my friend, the images, the conclusions, the remembrances, the images that I have built through 40, 50, 100 years is the content. And the content is my consciousness, as yours is. And that area of consciousness is time because it is the area of thought, it is the area of measurement - comparing, evaluating, judging - it is within that area. Within that area of consciousness are all my thoughts, unconscious, conscious, the future, within that area. And any movement within that area is within the movement of consciousness with its content Therefore space in consciousness with its content is very limited. Are you getting all this? Sirs, please learn this together. If we learn this together it will be yours not mine. Then you are free of all leaders, you will be free of all teaching, it will be your mind learning, therefore there is energy, you will be passionate to find out. But if you are following somebody like a dog, then you lose all energy.

That is, as we were saying, within the area of consciousness with its content, which is time, space is very small. You can expand the space by imagination, by contriving, by various processes of stretching it out, thinking more, more subtly, more deliberately, but it is still within the limited space of consciousness which is its content - right sirs? Are you getting it?

So any movement to go beyond itself is still within the content. That is why when you take drugs of any kind, LSD, marijuana and all the rest of it, grass, pot, hashish, opium and all the rest of it, it is the activity of thought within that consciousness, and when you think you are going beyond it you are still within it. It is only an idea. Or you experience more deeply the content. So one sees the content which is the 'me', which is the ego, which is the person, the so-called individual, within that consciousness, however expanded, time and space - limited space - must always exist. Right? So to consciously make an effort to reach something beyond itself invites illusion - I wonder if you understand this? To set out to seek truth, which is so absurd, to be told by a Master, a guru that you will find it, without understanding all the content, and without emptying that content, merely to practise in order to get something is like the blind leading the blind, and generally the gurus are blind anyhow, and so are the followers.

So that is the question: mind is its content; the brain is the past and from that past thought functions, and thought is never free and never new. So the question arises: how can that content be emptied? Not method, because the moment you practise a method, somebody has given it to you, or you invent your own method and that becomes mechanical, and therefore it is still within the field of time and limited space.

I do not know if you have ever thought or gone into yourself to find out what is space - not science fiction space, or time according to science fiction, or timelessness according to them, but to enquire, to learn what is space. We are going to do this. Can the mind see its own limitation? And the very perception of that limitation is the ending of that limitation. Not how to empty the mind, but to see totally the content of it and the consciousness - the content that makes up consciousness, to see that totally, and to see, perceive, listen to all this movement of that consciousness, and the very perception of it is the ending of it, not how to end it. You understand? If I see something false, the very perception of the false is the true - I don't know if you see it. Do you understand? The very perception of my telling a lie is the truth - you understand this? The very perception of my envy, is the freedom from envy, is the truth. That is, you can only see very clearly, observe very clearly when there is no observer - that the observer is the past, the image, the conclusion, the opinion, the judgement. So can the mind see clearly without any effort its content, the limitation, which means the lack of space, and the time binding quality of consciousness with its content - right? Can you see this? And you can only see the totally of it, both the unconscious content as well as the conscious content when you can look silently, when the observer is totally silent. That is if I want to see you my vision mustn't be blurred, I must have very good eyesight to see all the outline of you, the hair, the structure of your face, the bone and so on, I must look very clearly. That means there must be attention, and in that attention there is energy. Whereas when you make an effort to be attentive, that effort is a wastage of energy. When you try to control, that is a wastage of energy - control implies conformity, comparison, suppression - all that is a wastage of energy. When there is perception there is attention, which is total energy, in which there is not a breath of wastage of energy.

Now when you look with energy, the whole conscious as well as the unconscious content, the mind then is empty. This is not my illusion - you understand? This isn't what I think, or the conclusion I have come to. If I have a conclusion, if I think this is right, then I am in illusion. And knowing it to be an illusion I wouldn't talk. Because then it is like the blind leading the blind. But you can see for yourself the logic of it, the sanity of it. That is if you are listening, if you are paying attention, if you really want to find out. That is, how is it possible for the unconscious with its content to expose totally all its depth? You have understood?

First see the question and then we can proceed from there. Like everything else in life we have divided consciousness into the conscious and the unconscious, the artist, the businessman - you follow - this division, this fragmentation exists, induced by our culture, by our education, by all the rest of it. And you are asking a question, which is: there is this division between consciousness and unconsciousness and the unconsciousness has its motives, its racial inheritance, its experience and so on - all that - how can that be exposed to the light of intelligence, to the light of perception? Do you ask this question? If you ask this question, are you asking it as an analyser who is going to analyse the content and therefore division, contradiction, conflict, sorrow and all the rest of it? Or are you asking this question not knowing the answer? You are following this? Because this is important. If you are asking the question, which is: there is all this content in the unconscious, I don't know honestly, seriously, how to expose this whole structure of consciousness which is hidden, I really don't know. Therefore when you approach it not knowing, you are going to learn, but if you have any kind of conclusion, opinion, for or against, that it cannot be, that it can be, then you are approaching with a mind that has already assumed the answer, or no answer. Therefore a mind that says, "I do not know", which is the truth, which is honesty - I may know it according to some philosopher, some psychologist, some analyst, but it is not your knowing - it is their knowing it and you interpreting it and trying to understand them, not what is actual. So when you say, "I do not know", what is there then? Have you understood? When you say, "I do not know" the content has no importance whatsoever - you get it? Oh do see this sirs. Because the mind then is a fresh mind - you understand? It is the new mind that says, "I don't know". Therefore when you say it, not just verbally for amusement, but with depth, with meaning, with honesty, that state of mind that does not know is empty of its consciousness, is empty of its content. It is the knowing that is the content. You got it? Do you see it?

So the mind can never say, it knows, therefore it is always new, living, acting, therefore it has no anchorage. It is only when it is anchored that it gathers opinions, conclusions, and separation. Now this is meditation. Which is, meditation is to perceive the truth each second - not the truth ultimately. To perceive the truth and the false each second. To perceive the truth that, content is consciousness, that is the truth. To see the truth that I do not know how to deal with this thing - right? That is the truth, not knowing, therefore not knowing is the state in which there is no content. It is so terribly simple - that is what you are objecting to. You want something clever, complicated, put together, and you object to see something extraordinarily simple, and therefore extraordinarily beautiful.

So can the mind, which is the brain, see its own limitation - limitation of time, which is the bondage of time and the limitation of space? And as long as one lives within that limited space and time-binding movement, there must be suffering, there must be psychological despair, hope and all the anxiety, everything takes place. So when the mind has perceived the truth of this, then what is time? Then is there a different dimension which thought cannot touch, therefore cannot describe? Look sir, we said thought is measure and therefore time. We live by measurement, all our structure of thinking is based on measurement, which is comparison and all that which we have gone into the last few days. And thought as measurement tries to go beyond itself and discover for itself if there is something immeasurable which is not measurable. And to see the falseness of it is the truth. I wonder if you see this? The truth is to see the false, and the false is when thought seeks that which is not measurable, which is not of time, which is not of the space with its content of consciousness.

So, you understand, when you have put all these questions and have enquired, when you have learnt as you go along, then your mind and your brain becomes extraordinarily quiet, there is no need for any discipline, any teacher, any guru, any system to make you quiet. There are various kinds of meditation in the world at the present time - the Zen, the Alpha meditation - have you heard about the Alpha meditation? No? Invented by the gadgeteers, the Americans. Which is, they have an instrument, an electronic instrument, and they put electrodes on the brain and they watch in the measurement whether the brain is quiet or not. You understand this? And any silly ass can do this! And train himself to be quiet. These are games that they are all playing. And you go to Asia, or Japan, or various monasteries and learn there to be attentive - you know trained, like some animal trained to perform. And then there are other forms of meditation - the latest is Kundalini Yoga - have you heard all about that bilge? You know what that means? I won't go into it all because - you know there are certain things you cannot possible talk about because man is too eager, too greedy, to experience something which he doesn't know anything about. The whole idea of Kundalini in India is the awakening of energy - I won't go into all the details of it - and that energy completely held, no, that energy without any distortion acting. And some people in the West now, because it has been brought by some Indians, are practising Kundalini Yoga. And there is obviously the fashionable thing now - Yoga - right? You know all about it don't you? Yoga means, as it is translated now, joining, yoking two separate things together. I am sure it had quite a different meaning at the beginning. Yoga meant probably harmony, not bringing two things together, the soul and the body and the Atman - and you know all the rest of it. And I once saw at a station in India a beggar doing Yoga most beautifully. They were throwing coins to him from the railway carriages. And he was doing the most complicated Yoga with the greatest of ease. And that Yoga has been brought to the Western world to make people healthy, happy, young, find god - you follow - everything is involved in it now. Originally, from what I have been told, there was a certain weed, a certain leaf in the Himalayas which only a very few people chewed and it kept their brains and their minds tremendously alert. And as the vine or the bush disappeared then they had to invent a system called Yoga which kept all the glands perfectly healthy, operating efficiently.

And that is how Yoga came into being, which is exercises. And also in it is involved a way of life, not just doing some silly exercise, a way of life in which there are no drugs, morality, all the rest of it.

And also now there is the pursuit of the occult - don't you know all that? More and more because it is more exciting. I have seen everything in the world and I want to see something beyond the world, extrasensory perception and so on and so on. Sirs, a man who is pursuing truth, who is trying to understand life totally, who sees the false as the false and in the false the truth, to such a mind the occult things are fairly obvious, such a mind will not touch it. They are totally unimportant: whether I read your thought, or you read my thought, whether I see angels, fairies, some kinds of visions which I have not seen before. Because we want something mysterious and we don't see the immense mystery in living, in the love of living - you understand? We don't see that. And therefore we spread out in things that don't matter.

Now when you have finished with all this, there is the central problem which is: is there something which is not describable, because if you describe it is not the described, is there something which is not of time, which is without borders as space, which has immense space? I do not know if you have ever watched birds sitting on a telephone wire; if you have watched it you will see that each bird has space very carefully, because when your space is limited you become vicious, which is what is happening in the urban, in the cities, where there is no space you become violent, you want to break things - you know, you want space. The mind cannot, thought cannot give that space. Only when thought is quiet there is this space which has no frontier. And it is only the completely silent mind that knows, that is aware, not knows, is aware if there is or if there is not something that is beyond all measurement. And that is the only thing that is sacred, not the images, the rituals, the saviours, the gurus, their visions, but that thing which mind has come upon without asking, because in itself it is totally empty and therefore that which has emptiness, a new thing can take place.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH DECEMBER 1972

May we go on with what we were talking about yesterday afternoon? We were saying how very important it is to be very honest, not to some idea or to some behavioral pattern but the honesty and integrity that comes when you are completely faced with the facts as they are. This honesty and integrity is so necessary as we are going more and more deeply into the nature of our behaviour, our moral conduct, love, death and that extraordinary thing that we have been calling meditation. To penetrate into all this without any kind of illusion, any kind of deception, the mind must be capable of complete honesty to see exactly what it is.

Corruption is the pattern of our behaviour, as it is. Corruption, I am using that word in the sense, when the mind functions in fragments, when the mind is broken up into a political activity, separate from religious activity, from the family activity, or the artist separated from the business man, the religious man and so on. Where there is this fragmentation taking place there must be corruption. I am using that word literally, which means to break up. And when the mind lives in various categories of activity, various departments of thought, ideals, there must be corruption. Corruption ends only when the mind is integral, whole, not broken up.

We were saying yesterday afternoon, weren't we, that seeing what the world is, not an abstract ideal of a world but the actual world of our daily living, in our daily relationship, there is a great deal of sorrow, misery, confusion, occasional spurts of joy. And society as it is needs tremendous reform. And (song of bird) - nice bird, I hope you all heard it - and when the reformer himself is corrupt in the sense I am using that word then society will be corrupt. And our present political, economic, social, business, artistic world is corrupt because it doesn't take into consideration the whole structure of man, his whole nature. And we are concerned with the totality of the human mind, not one fragment of it. If you are concerned with one fragment, whatever it be, there must be division, conflict, and from it a great deal of deception, which is in its very nature corrupt. Right? Again we are concerned with actually what is, not with what should be, or what might be, or with the transformation of 'what is' but merely concerned actually with the facts as they are.

It's quite a nice evening, isn't it, I hope you enjoy it as much as I am enjoying it, the lovely birds, the trees, the leaves moving in the breeze and the strange quietness that comes of an evening before the sun sets. There is great beauty. And to see that and feel that great beauty the mind must be utterly total, unbroken, not fragmented. And we are trying - or rather we are together this evening exploring, which means communicating together over this problem of thought, its extraordinary capacity, technologically and psychologically, inwardly what misery, confusion, strife, despair it creates. And we are sharing this together, therefore you are not merely listening to a speaker, agreeing or disagreeing, which is comparatively easy, or being entertained. Entertainment takes many forms - religious, when you go to the temple or the church, when you go off chasing some guru and accepting his authority, when you take a drink, when you do any kind of ritual, those are all entertainments, in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of social reform. Because what we are concerned with, and man should be concerned, in bringing about a radical transformation in the whole structure of the mind, and when you are concerned with that totally every form of entertainment comes to an end, and therefore the mind becomes totally serious. And being serious it cannot deceive itself.

There are two varieties of seriousness, or perhaps many varieties of seriousness. The man who believes in something, identifies himself with that belief and committed to that belief, he is considered very serious. He is as the neurotic who believes in some fantasy and identifies himself with that fantasy and is totally sincere. Such people are not serious. A mind that is serious is a mind that is concerned with things as they are, with the misery, confusion, poverty, riches, the social appalling things that are happening in the world. Those are the facts. And a serious mind is concerned in going beyond that fact. And that's what we are going to discuss throughout these talks and discussions.

What is necessary is to have energy. We cannot go beyond 'what is' if we have not sufficient energy. We waste our energy in speculation, in abstractions, in trying to go beyond 'what is'. Please understand this because I think it is very important. Thought has brought about this condition in the world of which we are a part, we are the world and the world is us. That's an absolute irrefutable fact. And thought which is so capable, which is so alert, which has such efficiency in action, has brought about division between man and man. Again that's a fact. The religious, economic, social, political, governmental division. Now the question is: can the mind go beyond that, beyond this division and therefore beyond conflict? And to observe the fact you need energy. And this energy is wasted when you have an ideal. Please follow this a little bit, give your attention to it, because we are journeying together. When you have an ideal it is a wastage of energy, because the ideal takes the mind away from the fact. That's a wastage of energy. When the mind wishes to go beyond the fact, that's a wastage of energy. When the mind tries to control the fact, that's a wastage of energy. When the mind suppresses the fact, the `what is', then that's a wastage of energy. In this wastage of energy most minds are living. Right? Please, watch your own minds, not merely listen to the words because the word is not the thing, and the description is not the described. The described is your mind. And the described is the wastage of your mind. So don't get caught in the description or in the word but watch your mind, how it wastes its own extraordinary energy. It is not, how to stop this energy being wasted but rather to observe the wastage of energy. To observe. But in that observation if you say, `I must not waste energy and therefore I must control', then that very control becomes a wastage of energy. You are following all this?

Suppose you have a belief, and unfortunately most people have beliefs, opinions, judgements, conclusions, you hear the speaker say, that's a wastage of energy, he shows you the reason - the reason being that the mind refuses to face the fact as it is. It is educated not to face facts as they are. Through our education, social reform, society, culture, religion, all that has brought about a conditioning of the mind that accepts wastage of energy through these various channels. When the mind sees that it is a wastage of energy, a belief, then the reaction to that is, try to control or suppress or do away with that belief. That suppression, control, or doing away with that belief is a wastage of energy. Whereas if you observed the whole structure of belief, the nature of belief, what lies behind belief, the observation reveals the structure and nature of belief. Then there is no waste of energy. Right? Are we sharing this together? Not verbally, but actually are you doing this? Because we are going to go into something much deeper, and you need all your energy and attention to go into this.

So can the mind observe the fact, the fact being 'what is', your violence, your aggression, your desire for power, success, security, that is 'what is'. Can you observe that without any movement of thought which is conditioned to accept the various forms of escapes from the fact, and therefore wasting energy? Am I making myself clear? Yes? If I am not I will go into it again, over and over and over again until you are clear. Because, please, do see this, I am not your teacher, you are not my disciples - thank god, I wouldn't have you! Not because you are silly or grotesque, but to follow somebody is the greatest corruption, in that there is no love, in that there is separation, conflict, brutality, a hierarchical system of thought and action. Whereas what we are trying to do is to think out these things together, to be serious together, to unravel this very complex problem of living together, because we have created together this misery in the world, and together we have to undo it, not you alone, or I alone, together we have to do it. And this is not possible if you are not clear, logical, sane in your own observation. Therefore you become your own teacher, your own disciple, therefore you don't follow anybody. Then the burden is all yours. And you may not be willing to carry that burden. Whether you are willing to carry it or not, it is yours, you can't shirk it, you can't try to escape from it, it is yours. And nobody in the world, including specially the speaker can remove that burden from you. You have to go into that burden yourself, look at it, observe it, cherish it, be committed totally to understand it.

So the mind, being conditioned to the wastage of energy, is incapable of meeting actually `what is'. And to meet `what is' you need great energy. It is this great energy that goes beyond or resolves `what is'. Right? Look, sir, culture, I am using that word `culture' in its broadest sense, has conditioned the mind to be envious. Envy means measurement; we measure ourselves with another, compare ourselves with another, try to imitate, follow. So our minds are conditioned to live and function in the field of envy. That is a fact, both in the so-called religious world, when the priest wants to become a bishop, when the disciple wants to become the great master, when the business clerk wants to become the manager. So this whole conditioning of our culture is based on envy. You may ideologically say, one should not be envious, but the fact is, you are envious. Now to go beyond that fact, which means to be totally free of envy, is to observe how the mind regards this reaction called envy. How does it observe? It observes with another fragment of a mind which is conditioned, which says, you must not be envious, therefore control it, and if you would come near god or whatever that is, you must not be envious. So one part of your mind is envious, conditioned through culture, another part of your mind says, you must not be envious, again conditioned by a culture, so there is in this contradiction, and this contradiction is a wastage of energy.

So can the mind - please do this, as you are listening do it with your heart and with your blood, with your passion do it and you will see what happens - can the mind which has been divided to be envious and not to be envious, the 'not to be envious' is not a fact but the fact is envy. Now can you, can the mind look at that envy without its opposite, which is not to be envious? Or to control envy, or to suppress envy. All these factors of suppression, control, denial or rationalizing envy is a wastage of energy. Are we travelling together? Come on, sirs. So can your mind observe envy without any contradiction, without its opposite? Just stop a minute there.

Is there an opposite at all? You are following all this? There is the opposite, man, woman and so on, but we are not talking of that, we are talking of psychological opposites: courage is the opposite of cowardice. Right? And we are questioning whether there is an opposite at all. And when you have an opposite there is choice, discrimination between this and that. And when the mind is very clear, what needs there be to have choice? Please, go into it yourself. So I am questioning as an investigator, I say there is no opposite at all. There is only 'what is'. And therefore no choice. Come on, sirs. Whereas all your tradition, all your conditioning is the battle between the opposites: when you are passionate, sexual, to have the conditioning which says, you must not. The opposite has its root in 'what is', otherwise the opposite is not. I wonder if you are meeting all this.

So there is only 'what is' and therefore there is no choice, there is choice only when there are two or three things. Look, sir, when you are uncertain of a road you ask somebody, in that there is choice, you can take that road, or that road, or that road, but when you know the road there is no choice, you go straight. Choice only exists when there is confusion. And where there is confusion there must be conflict. So when you are observing the fact there is no confusion, no choice, no opposite. Do you see the beauty of this, sirs, do you? This is logical, you follow, this is not something that you have to think about, it is so. That is, envy is man's conditioning, for various reasons which we don't have to go into now. He doesn't know how to go beyond it without effort. So he hopes by having an opposite and using the opposite as a lever he can go beyond it. You are following all this? Oh, come on, am I talking to people that are not following? Please do. Look, sir: if one is a coward, that's `what is', why do you want courage, why do you develop courage? It is because you do not know how to deal with cowardice, if you knew how to deal with cowardice and go beyond it you don't have to have courage. You follow? But we are trained to develop courage because we don't know how to deal with cowardice. And I say, that is a wastage of energy because you have invented the opposite and you are caught between `what is' and its opposite. Therefore when you observe only `what is' there is no opposite, and therefore no conflict. Have you understood this? Have I made myself clear? Yes?

So thought has created division between you and me, we and they, the division between the business man, the politician, you know all that, the fragmentation of life is brought about through thought seeking security in different ways. And thought has not been able to go beyond its own structure, its own fragmentations. Now I am going to take one factor of the process of thought which has brought about this fact and go into it completely with you. The fact is that most human beings are frightened. Fear is there, in their hearts, in their minds, in their bodies, they are involved totally in fear; losing a job, losing your wife, your husband, afraid of death, afraid of not succeeding, afraid of so many things. Aren't you? Aren't you? No? Aren't you? Oh, for god's sake, you are frightened, you are frightened human beings, of being alone, frightened of not having psychological security or physiological security, of failure, of having no love, of not being loved, fear of loneliness, despair, not going beyond this everlasting sorrow and strife, and ultimately there is the fear of death. There is conscious fear as well as unconscious fear. Are you aware of all this, sirs? You know it, don't you? Nobody has to tell you that, do they? Do what you will, go to temples, go to gurus, do anything you will, that flower will keep on blossoming. Right? Whether you know it consciously or unconsciously it is there.

Now the mind living in fear becomes violent. Have you noticed that? Violent in speech, violent in so many ways. Violence is not merely physical violence, violence is conformity. You understand? When you conform to a pattern there is fear involved and therefore there is violence. Right, sir? So fear is one of our major factors in life, which darkens our life, which destroys, creates illusion, brings about neuroticism. Now can the mind go beyond fear? And to go beyond fear you need great energy. Right? And you cannot have that tremendous energy if you are wasting it by running away from it, trying to suppress it, trying to analyse it, trying various ways and means to overcome it. Right? So you have to observe it. And you have to observe it without any opposite, without a mind that has a fragment which is looking at fear. Right? That is, can you observe fear? What is fear? How does fear arise? Because if you solve this problem completely, if your mind is totally free from fear, do you know what takes place? You are the most marvellous human being, you are the flower, you are the light, you are the beauty. But a mind that is frightened is a dull mind, a stupid mind, a mind that lives in others, books and values and so on. So it is absolutely necessary for a man who is serious, for a man who is really religious - not the phoney religions that you have - a man who is really religious has no fear. And therefore we must understand it completely.

Now we are going to take a journey together into this. You understand, sir, together, take your fear, which you have, become conscious of it as you are sitting there, whatever it is - your losing a job, fear of being alone, fear of loneliness, fear, you know, of public opinion, god knows what your fears are. Take one of them, observe it. Can you observe it without any wastage of energy - which is to suppress it, go beyond it, naming it, all that - merely to observe. Which means give your total attention at the moment - at this moment, when you have invited fear, which is there, you have exposed it and say, 'I am going to look'. So when you are looking at it, what is the cause of fear? Not analytically investigating the cause. You understand this? Ah, I see you don't. What ignorant people we are. We are other people's knowledge, other people's information, we have never gone into our hearts and minds ourselves.

I said just now, what brings about fear. And I said, don't look for the cause, don't analyse fear to find out the cause. The word 'analysis' means the breaking up. When you analyse there is the analyser and the analysed. Right? The analyser - the analyser is the observer, is the experiencer, is the accumulated knowledge of the past, he is the analyser, and he separates himself from fear and says, 'I am going to investigate, analyse what is the cause of fear'. You follow? In that there is division: the analyser and the analysed. And therefore in that division there must be conflict. Right? You see that, don't you? And also when the analyser analyses, his analysis must be total and complete each analysis, otherwise he takes over what he has analysed, with that memory he analyses the next time, therefore all analysis is fragmentation. I wish you would see this. Therefore you will never analyse. Therefore you will be free of the burden which man has imposed upon himself which is to analyse his psyche, his inward states.

I am pointing out, not teaching you, but together we are investigating, we are showing, we are asking, what is the nature of fear, why does fear exist at all? You can find ten different causes, according to the specialists, the professionals, you know, many, many reasons they give you, but the reasons, the causes are not the fact. The fact is fear. Now I am asking, why does fear come? What is the source of it? You are asking too, are you? What is the source of it? The source of it is time. You understand this? I have a job, I am afraid I might lose the job, I haven't lost it but I am afraid I might lose it tomorrow or the day after tomorrow. So fear arises where thought is, which is time. Get it? You get it, sirs?

So time, thought is the factor of fear. Whether that fear is deeply rooted in the unconscious of which you are not aware, or consciously aware of your fear, that where the mind functions within the field of time there must be fear. The field of time is thought. Do get this thing. I wish I could give it to you. Because you see, sirs, if you understand this, you will leave this evening without a breath of fear and then you will know what love is, but not before because suffering and love don't go together, and fear brings suffering. So time is the factor of fear: death, which is over there, I am living, time involved, you follow, the postponement, the evasion, all that is brought about by thought, and thought is time because thought is the response of memory which is the past.

So to observe fear - please listen to this - without the movement of thought which has been conditioned to suppress fear, to observe completely fear without any movement of thought, which is past, which is time. Can you do it? Do it as you are sitting there. To observe completely. Then you will see that conscious and unconscious fear, however deeply rooted, however secreted, however hidden, is totally exposed. And that's one of our principles of life, which is fear. And the other principle is pleasure, the pursuit of pleasure. Haven't you noticed how you pursue pleasure? Sexual, pleasure of a good meal, pleasure of seeing a marvellous picture, the pleasure of a sunset, the delight of looking at a tree that is so alive, gentle, full of beauty, at that moment there is great delight. And that moment is gone, then thought comes along and says, 'How lovely it was, I would like to have that repeated again'. Right? Haven't you noticed all this? Your sex, on which your life is also based, is this pattern of the pursuit of pleasure. We are not saying pleasure is wrong, we are only pointing out the nature of pleasure, which is an incident that may give you great delight at the moment, unsurpassing joy, a thing that cannot be invited that comes in a moment of beauty, sacredness, then thought says, 'How extraordinary that was, how beautiful, I must repeat it'. And man is pursuing, hunting after this all the time. Which is, again, the movement of thought. Thought says, 'I have had that extraordinary delight yesterday' - whatever it is, and insists on having it today. The insistence of a past delight by thought is the pursuance of pleasure. Where pleasure is denied thought becomes violent. Haven't you noticed if you don't get your accustomed meal how angry, irritable you get?

So thought - just see the picture, sir, don't do anything about it, just look at it - thought is playing this game all the time. The ultimate pleasure is what you call god, what you call enlightenment. It is pleasure. As you cannot invite joy, so you cannot possibly invite enlightenment. So when you see this, see the whole picture, and to see that whole picture you need tremendous energy. You understand? And then you will see that envy, which has been the major factor of our life, which has bred so much conflict, misery and pain - because envy is measure, measuring yourself against somebody - when the mind is without measure there is no greed. You understand, sir?

Now for the mind to be in that movement in which there is no comparison, it has to face envy totally and completely, and it cannot face it if the mind wanders away by trying to overcome it. You have got it? You have understood it? Are you doing this? Or waiting to do it tomorrow? There is no tomorrow, there is only the moment when you listen to the truth of things. Therefore it is very important how you listen. You cannot listen if you are comparing what somebody has said with what is being said, you cannot listen if you are impatient, if you are trying to say, 'Well, I must have this energy to go beyond', you are not listening if you do not love that which you are listening to. If you are listening to the crows that are calling before they go off to sleep, as they are calling in the distance, if you listen totally, then you learn the beauty of the night and the clarity of sound. And learning is not a movement in time, learning is at the moment of actual listening and learning. You have understood this? Sirs, do it then you will see that a mind that is free of envy, fear, that is not pursuing pleasure - pleasure, enjoyment, delight is one thing, and the pursuit of them is another, the pursuit of them brings misery, mischief, confusion, but the mere enjoyment of a sunset, of a beautiful face, and a beautiful movement of a tree, in that moment pleasure doesn't come in, it is only thought brings it in as it brings in fear. So if you can look at all this then the mind is totally free from fear. Then you will put away all your gods, then you will be out of the stream, a totally different human being.

Do you want to ask any questions? Or this is enough? This quietness, this attention which perhaps has been stimulated, or this attention which you yourself have gathered now, you will perhaps like to remain quietly and not ask questions. If that is so, that's all right. So may I then go this evening?

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 16TH DECEMBER 1972

If I may this afternoon, or this evening, I would like to talk over many things: freedom, order, love and death. And in talking over together these questions, which are our daily problems of life, I think we have to bear in mind that together we are investigating, together we are taking a journey into rather complex issues of life, and to investigate together. As we said previously, there must be that quality of intensity, a quality of mind that is not tethered to any particular belief or a conclusion, but is willing to go very far, not in distance of time but in depth.

And if we may we will begin by observing certain things. One comes to this country, as one has done for the last forty years, except during the war years, and one notices the terrible deterioration, one notices disorder, not only in the streets and governments but also the great disorder in ourselves. Our culture is going, or probably has already gone, our standards, values, moral quality have disappeared, and in their place, if one observes quite objectively, money, position, status have become very important. It's a tragic affair to see a country losing its very roots, an ancient culture which has lost its mooring, and in its place every kind of disorder is going on. And as one observes, surely a new culture must be born, a new way of living, a mind that will not accept corruption, both outwardly and inwardly, an action that is whole, healthy, holy. That word `whole' implies that. The word `whole' means healthy, holy. And such a culture must be brought about for any community to survive.

And if one is really deeply moved by all the tragedy that is going on one has to do something, a totally different kind of action, a totally different kind of living, a mind that understands what is compassion, if there is such a thing as freedom from death. And this evening, if we can, as a group of people listening, and perhaps very, very serious, then we can together investigate these things, whether the mind which has been so terribly abused, which has born many hurts, many tragedies, great sorrows, personal and non-personal, whether such a mind can transform itself, letting all the conditioning disappear so that it is a total, whole, a holy thing.

So we will begin by enquiring what is freedom. Whether the mind, our mind, your mind, can be free, or must it always live within the prison of the known, which is the past, whether that past be tradition, knowledge, experience, the various influences, the education that it has received, the impositions, the suppressions, whether such a mind can be absolutely and totally free. We are going to enquire into that. There are many varieties of freedom: freedom of the press, freedom of expression, freedom of choice. I don't know why one uses freedom of choice as though it was a very great thing, because really a mind that is confused can never choose, and what it chooses must always be confused therefore it is not free at all to choose, but we will go into that. So there are many kinds of freedom, national, political, freedom of the press, freedom of the seas, and so on and on and on. But we are not talking about all those kinds of freedom. We are talking about a mind, your mind, our mind, which is in disorder, and whether there can be total freedom from that disorder. To us freedom is generally from something: freedom from anger, freedom from jealousy, envy, hate, and so on. I think there is a different quality of freedom, not freedom from something but the quality of mind that knows freedom - not from. When it is freedom from something it is the opposite, and therefore not free.

So we are going to enquire together whether in our life, in our daily life of relationship we can bring about order. Because relationship is society, the relationship between you and me, between me and another, and so on, is the structure of society. That is society, relationship is the structure and the nature of society. I am putting it very, very simply so that we can get on. And when there is no order in that relationship, as there is at present no order, then every kind of action must not only be contradictory but also producing a great deal of sorrow, mischief, confusion and conflict. Please, don't let me talk but share it together because we are taking a journey together, perhaps hand in hand, with affection, with consideration. But if you merely sit down and be talked at, or lectured to, then I am afraid you and I cannot take the journey together hand in hand. So please do observe your own mind, your own relationship, it doesn't matter with whom it is, your wife, your children, with your neighbour, or with your government, and see if there is in that relationship order. Because order is necessary, precision is necessary, order is virtue, order is so mathematical, so pure, complete, and we are going to find out if there is such order.

No one can live without relationship. You may withdraw into the mountains, become a monk, a sannyasi, wander off into the desert by yourself but you are related, you cannot escape from that absolute fact, you cannot exist in isolation. You mind may think it exists in isolation, or bring about through action a state of isolation, but even in that isolation you are related. And when one looks at that relationship, because life is relationship, living is relationship, we cannot live if you and I have built a wall around ourselves and just peep over that wall occasionally, but unconsciously, deeply, under the wall we are related. I do not think we have paid a great deal of attention to this question of relationship. Your books don't talk about relationship, they talk about god, practice, methods, how to breathe, don't do this, do that, and the everlasting back and forth. But I have been told, because I don't read books, thank god, I have been told relationship is never mentioned.

Relationship implies responsibility, as freedom does. And to be related is to live, that's life, that's existence. And if in that relationship there is disorder our whole society, culture goes to pieces, which is what is happening now.

So what is order, what is freedom and what is relationship? This is the first thing we are going to enquire into. And from there go into this whole question of what love is and if the mind can ever be free from this tyranny of death. Don't wait or neglect the previous things, that is love, relationship, freedom and order, because you may be only interested in death, and you say, 'Really I am not interested in all the other things, but as I am terribly interested in death and what happens after life and so on, I will neglect the rest and I will pay attention when you come to that part' - if you do that then you will never understand what we are talking about. You must take the whole thing together: order, freedom, disorder, relationship, love and death, they are together, they are not separate things.

So what is disorder? Because when the mind understands what is disorder, really deeply inwardly what brings about disorder, then out of that insight, out of that awareness, out of that observation comes naturally order. Not the blueprint of what order should be, because that is what we have been brought up with, a pattern has been laid down by religions, by cultures, what order should be, or what order is. And the mind has tried to conform to that order, whether it is cultural order, social order, legalistic order or religious order, it has tried to conform to the pattern established by the social activity, by certain leaders, teachers and so on. To me that is not order because in that there is implied conformity. So where there is conformity there is disorder. Where there is the acceptance of authority there is disorder. Where there is comparative existence, that is measuring yourself against somebody, comparing yourself with somebody does produce disorder. I'll show you why. It's not a wild statement. Need I explain all this? Have you caught on to it? Or must I go into it? I see I must go into it. All right.

Why does the mind conform? Why does your mind conform? Have you ever asked? Are you aware that you are conforming to a pattern, it doesn't matter what that pattern is, whether you have established a pattern for yourself or it has been established for you. We are always conforming - why? Where there is conformity there cannot be freedom, obviously. And yet the mind is always seeking freedom, the more intelligent, the more alert, the more aware the greater the demand. The mind conforms, imitates, obviously because there is more security in conformity, in following a pattern. That's an obvious fact. You put on all kinds of marks, on your forehead, all kinds of activities you do, because socially it is better to conform. You may be educated abroad, you may be a great scientist, politician, but you always have a sneaking fear that if you don't go to temples or do the ordinary things that you have been told to do, something evil might happen, so you conform. So what happens to the mind that conforms? Investigate it, please, together. What happens to your mind when you conform? First of all there is a total denial of freedom, total denial of perception, total denial of independent enquiry. When you conform there is fear. Right? Do you see all this? Are we going together? And when you imitate - and the mind from childhood has been trained to imitate, which is, conform to the pattern which society has established, pass through examinations, get a degree, if you are lucky get a job and get married, finished. And you accept that pattern, and you are frightened not to follow that pattern.

So inwardly you deny freedom, inwardly you are frightened, inwardly you have this sense of not being or being free to find out, enquire, search, ask. So that produces disorder in our relationship. Right, sirs? Do watch it. Sir, look, don't agree with the speaker, that's the least important thing. What you and I are trying to do is to really go into this so deeply, to have real insight, see the truth of it, and it is the perception of the truth that frees the mind, not your practice, not your silly activity of enquiry but the actual perception of 'what is'.

So in relationship both outwardly and inwardly we bring about through fear, through conformity, through measurement which is comparison, disorder. And our relationship is in disorder, not only with each other, however intimate it may be, but also disorder outwardly. Right? Now to see that disorder clearly, not out there but in here, deeply in ourselves, to see all the implications of it, then out of that perception comes order. Then you don't have to live according to the order. You understand? Because order has no pattern, it's not a blueprint. It comes out of the comprehension of what is disorder. The more you understand disorder in relationship the greater the order. Right? So we have to find out what is your relationship with each other. You are following all this?

What is your relationship with another? Have you any relationship at all? Or it is a relationship with the past image, with the past, the past with its image, experience, knowledge, brings about what you call relationship. Right? So knowledge in relationship causes disorder. Right? No? Look, sir, I am related to you, I am your son, your father, your wife, your husband, whatever it is, we have lived together. You have hurt me and I have hurt you, you have nagged me, you have bullied me, you have beaten me, you have said hard things behind my back and to my face. So I have lived with you for ten years or two days, and these memories remain, the hurts, the irritations, the sexual pleasures, the annoyances, the brutal words, and so on, those are recorded in the brain cells which hold the memory. So my relationship with you is based on the past. Right? The past is my life. If you have observed you will see how the mind, your life, your activity, is based, rooted in the past. And relationship when it is rooted in the past must create disorder. Right? That is, knowledge in relationship brings disorder. Sir, look: you have hurt me, I remember that; you hurt me yesterday, or a week ago, that remains in my mind, that's the knowledge I have about you. Right? That knowledge prevents relationship, that knowledge in relationship breeds disorder.

So the question is: you hurt me, you flattered me, you scandalized me, and can the mind wipe away at the very moment you are insulting, never recording? You understand what I am saying? Never recording your insult. Have you ever tried this? Yesterday - how lovely that moon is, isn't it, looking through the leaves and the cry of those crows, and the evening light, and that extraordinary moon through the leaves, a wondrous thing, look at it, enjoy it - yesterday somebody said to me rather harsh things, which are not true. What he said can be recorded, is recorded, and the mind, since it is recorded, identifies the person with that record and acts according to that record. And where the mind is acting in relationship with the knowledge of that insult, the harsh words, that untrue thing, then that knowledge in relationship brings disorder. Have you understood this? Right? Have you even verbally understood this? Now how is the mind not to record at the moment of insult, or at the moment of flattery? You have understood my question? Because to me the most important thing in life is relationship, without relationship there must be disorder. And a mind that lives in order, total order, which is the highest form of mathematical order, cannot for a single minute allow the shadow of disorder to come upon it. And that disorder comes into being when in relationship the mind acts on knowledge which is over. So how is the mind not to record the insult, but know the insult has been given, as well as flattery, it has been given but yet not recorded, so the mind is always clean, healthy, whole in relationship? You have understood my question?

Are you interested in this? You know if you are really interested in it, it is the greatest problem in life, how to live a life in which the mind has never been hurt, never been distorted, in relationship. Now is this possible? We have put an impossible question, you understand? It is an impossible question, and we must find the impossible answer. You understand what I am saying? Because what is possible is mediocre, is already finished, done, but if you ask the impossible question the mind has to find the answer. Can the mind - because this is love, sir, you understand - the mind that records no insult, no flattery, knows what love is.

We are asking a question which is, can the mind never record, never, absolutely never, record the insult or the flattery? Is that possible? If the mind can find the answer to that one has solved the problem of relationship. You understand? Because we live in relationship, relationship is not an abstraction, it is a daily every day fact, whether you go to the office, come back and sleep with your wife or quarrel, whatever it is, you are always in relationship. And if in that relationship between you and another, or between you and many or one, if there is no order you will create a culture that will ultimately produce disorder, as is being done now. So order is absolutely essential. And to find that out can the mind, though it has been insulted, hurt, brutalized - not brutalized - brutal things have been said to it, knocked about, never for a second hold it. The moment you hold it, it is already recorded, it has left a mark in the brain cells. See the difficulty of this question. So can the mind do this so that the mind remains totally innocent? You understand what I am talking about? No, don't shake you heads, you don't understand. The word 'innocent', a mind that is innocent means a mind that is incapable of being hurt. Because it is incapable of being hurt it will not hurt another. You understand all this? Now is this possible? Every form of influence, every form of incident, every form of mischief, distrust is thrown upon the mind. And can the mind never record and therefore remain very innocent, very clear? We are going to find out together.

So we will come to it by asking, what is love. We will come back to it, I'm not avoiding it. Is love the product of thought? Is love in the field of time? Is love pleasure? Is love something that can be cultivated, practised, put together by thought? So in enquiring into this one has to go into the question, is love pleasure, sexual or any other kind of pleasure. Because our mind is pursuing all the time pleasure: yesterday I had a good meal, the pleasure of that meal is recorded and I want more, a better meal or the same kind of meal tomorrow. I have had great delight, in the sunset, looking at the moon through the leaves, or seeing a wave far out at sea, that gives great delight, beauty, and that is great pleasure. The mind records it and wants it repeated. Sexually thought thinks, chews about it, wants it repeated, and that you call love. Right, sirs? Don't be shy when we talk about sex, that's part of your life, you have made it hideous because you have denied every kind of freedom except that one freedom. So is love pleasure? Is love put together by thought, as pleasure is put together by thought? You are following all this? Is love envy? Can a man love who is ambitious, greedy, violent? Go on sirs. You are ambitious, aren't you, all of you? Can you love when you are ambitious, when you are competitive? And you talk a great deal about love, don't you? Love of god, of course, I forgot that! That's your favourite slogan. When you don't know how to love man you love god. Oh, don't laugh, you are so immature, childish.

So can a man who is envious, who is greedy, ambitious, violent, conforming, obeying, totally in himself in disorder, can he love? So what is love? It is not any of these things, obviously. It is not pleasure. Please understand the importance of the pleasure; pleasure is sustained by thought, therefore thought is not love. You understand? Thought cannot cultivate love. It can cultivate, and it does, the pursuit of pleasure, as it does fear, so thought cannot create love, put together love. See the truth, see it and you will put away your ambition, your greed, altogether. So through negation you come to the most extraordinary thing called love, which is the most positive.

That is, disorder in relationship means there is no love, and that disorder exists when there is conformity. So a mind that conforms can never know what love is. Oh, come on! Conforms to a pattern of pleasure, or what it thinks is love. So a mind that has understood the whole ripening of disorder comes to an order which is virtue, therefore which is love. Do you see it, sir? It doesn't matter, I'll go on. It's your life, it's not my life. If you don't live this way you will be most unhappy people, caught in a social disorder and be dragged for ever in that stream. It is only the man who steps out of that stream that knows what love is, what order is.

Now let's go into the question of what death is, shall we, because they are all related. Now can the mind be free of death? Not what happens after life. When the mind is free of death there is no time. Have you understood? Oh, come on sirs! So time is death. Are we journeying together? There is time by the watch, there is time as space between here and death. The space between now and death is time. And the mind cannot and will not allow that space between now and that thing called death, the mind will not allow that time to disappear. And the mind says, I know the body dies through accident, old age, disease, an incident, there are so many ways to die, and the shedding of tears, the misery, the suffering, all that is involved in death, both physiological as well as psychological. And must death always exist, and can the mind be ever free of death? You are following? I want to find out. If you want to find out you must enquire what is freedom from death? Is freedom something from death, or is the mind free when death is not? The mind be free when time is not, not freedom from death. You understand? But when death is not there is freedom. That is real freedom.

Now we are going to find out whether the mind can be free of death. The mind being the whole structure of one's life, what you think, what you feel, what your envies are, the whole content of your life is the mind. Right? Your gods, your fears, your anxieties, your sorrow, the whole content makes up your life. Without the content you have no life. You understand sirs? Are we travelling together? Your house, your name, your bank account, if you have a bank account, the techniques that you have learnt, your relationships, the pettiness of your existence, all that is the content of your life and that content is life, your life, in which is included death. Right? Death is not something over there, it is here, because that is part of life, isn't it? So can the mind be free of the content, including death? You have understood? Be free of the accumulation which you have gathered through time? So time is the factor, the central factor of death. Are you meeting all this? Are you meeting all this, or am I talking vaguely to some abstract?

Look, sir, come with me, look at it, it's your life: your job, if you have got a job, the beliefs, the gods, all the things that thought has put together, the books that you have read, the Upanishads, the Gita, whatever the books, sacred - I won't call them sacred, they are just books - all that you have read is accumulated in the mind. This accumulation, including jealousy, what you think is love, and death, is the content and therefore that is your life. That content is fragmented, broken up - business, artist, dancer, businessman, scientist, and so on and so on - and so this fragmentation is brought about by thought, thought is time, and thought says, I don't want to die. Right? All the things that I have accumulated is me. So thought, which is the product of the past accumulations, and so on, is time. Memory is time. And thought which is the child of time maintains time as a means of avoiding death. Have you all gone to sleep?

Look, sir: you are caught in the social stream of life, aren't you? The social stream of Brahmin, non-Brahmin, the politician, the economist, the artist, that is the stream, endless stream. Your mind is caught in that. You are that stream. And we are asking whether the mind can be free of that stream, and if it is not free there will always be death. You understand? It's only the mind that is not caught in the stream, whether it is the technological stream, or the social stream, or the stream of this disorder in relationship, that stream is your life, that stream is you. You are the world and the world is you, that stream is you. Now when you die you still belong to that stream, don't you? Don't you? No? You are not an individual, are you? Individuality means indivisible, non-fragmentable, a human being who is not in fragments - fragments, broken up, contradictory - only such a person is individual. But when the mind is caught in the stream he is no longer an individual, he is just like a million other people only he has got his peculiar characteristics, peculiar tendencies, idiosyncrasies, which are the response of his conditioning. So your character, your temperament, your tendency is the reaction of your conditioning, and that conditioning is the result of your culture, your society, your economic position and so on. So your tendency, your idiosyncrasy, your character, is nothing, that's not individuality. I wonder if you get all this. It doesn't matter, I'm going on.

So as long as the mind flows with the stream, the whole idea of a permanent ego, which is the invention of thought, permanent entity in the human mind doesn't exist. You all believe, you all are greedy, you are all envious, therefore you are pursuing, following, caught up in this stream. And in this stream there is death. You understand? And when a man says, 'Will I be born next life?' - you are following all this? I must tell you a story afterwards, rather an amusing story. When a man asks, shall I be born next life, what is he asking? Who is he to be born next life? You understand my question? Is there a permanent you? Is there a permanent you? Look at it clearly. What is the 'you'? Your furniture, your ambitions, your greed, your envy, your disorder, your sexual life, all that is you. And thought invents a super you, super self, and thought says, there must be something which is permanent, I like the idea of permanency. And you hope that permanent thing will be reborn. Right? You are following all this? There is nothing permanent in you, obviously.

You know, I was going to tell you a story, rather an amusing

one. I saw a cartoon the other day of two dogs sitting on a pavement watching human beings go by, with their cigars, cigarettes, drunk, quarrelling, you know, the whole stream of them going by, the business man with his hat and with his bag, the sannyasi, everybody goes by. One dog says to the other 'Reincarnation gives me the creeps because I don't want to be born to be like one of those.' Do you see the tragedy of this?

So there is this enquiry whether the mind can be free from time, which is death. Not that there is immortality. You understand? There is something far greater than immortality. Immortality, the very word means mortal and not mortal. As there is nothing permanent, nothing, your furniture, your bank account, nothing is permanent. All your beliefs, your gods, are all put together by thought. And thought is time. Now can the mind be free of this quality of time? You have understood now? Therefore love is not time. Relationship, where there is disorder, is time. Where there is order time doesn't enter at all.

So we are asking whether the mind can be free of time. It can only be free when there is complete observation of facts as they are, and going beyond them, and that requires energy. When the mind is greedy, envious, brutal, telling things which are not true, fearful, then it is caught in the field of time. And to see this, see it, not merely verbally, with your eyes or with your mind, but to see the totality of it, then the mind becomes extraordinarily free of time. You can't practise this. You understand? There is no way to it. You can read all the books in the world, and follow all the gurus in the world, but this is the central factor of human existence, time. Time is knowledge, time is the past, time, the past through the present to the future, that is time. Thought has put together all our human behaviour, social structure, everything that man is doing is based on thought. And we are asking, though knowledge must exist to function, to go to the office, to drive a car, you need knowledge, there you need time, but we are asking a mind that is caught in greed, envy, ambition, violence, imitation, conformity, and all the rest of it, can that which is the product of thought, which is the product of time and therefore death, can the mind be free of time? Please listen to this. Because the mind itself is the product of time. Right? It has evolved, it has grown, it has structured in time. And the mind is asking itself whether it can be free of time. That's a wrong question. You have understood? All that it can do is to observe the movement of time. Just to observe without resistance, without trying to go beyond time, just to observe it. That means the mind being completely attentive and at the moment, at the second of attention there is no time. You have understood this?

This is meditation, sir. You understand? We will talk about it tomorrow evening, this whole question of meditation and the implication of meditation. But if you don't understand this, which is order that comes out of the flowering of disorder, not the suppression of disorder, seeing what is disorder, out of that comes order; without order you will never have love, there is no love. That means you have to understand relationship. Your wife, your husband, your children, how you bring them up, a new kind of education, not just the passing of examinations, getting a job and all the filthy business of it. And you have to understand the meaning of the content of the mind, the unconscious as well as the conscious content. And to see this as a whole, not as fragments, to see it as a whole is to be totally attentive, totally attentive to that insult or to that flattery at the moment of flattery or insult, totally attentive. You understand? Then there is no recording. Therefore in relationship, when there is attention, there is no image building, then you are related. That attention means love, care, responsibility.

So a mind that is free of time is a mind that has total order. Such a mind is really the truly religious mind.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 16TH JULY 1972.

I wonder why you have all come. I think that is a good question to ask you: whether you have come out of curiosity, or you have problems that you want to be solved by someone else, or you are serious, profoundly concerned with the happenings in the world, and being serious desirous earnestly to solve these appalling, frightening problems that one has around one. So one must ask oneself, it seems to me, why you are here - curiosity, wanting your personal problems solved, or seeing the extraordinary things that are going on in the world - the sorrow, the violence, the division of nationalities, political, religious, separative issues. So one must be, it seems to me at least, very clear for oneself why you are all here. I know why I am here: I want to say something very clearly and very definitely. I have spoken for the last fifty years, all over the world, except in Russia and China, and in observing all these years the state of the world, the state of human beings and their relationship with each other, one sees very clearly that the problem is not only external but much more deeply inward. And without solving the complex, inward issues, merely to be concerned with the outward phenomenon has very little significance. And I feel, observing all this, that one must take a totally different action, enter into a totally different dimension, neither belonging to any religion, organized religion, or any country, any politics, totally uncommitted so that one can look clearly, objectively, sanely at all the phenomenon that is going on around us and within us. That is why I happen to be here.

And obviously one cannot tell why you are here. It may be out of habit, it is a nice place, Saanen, lovely mountains, a holiday, beautiful mountains with snow - you know - all that. But if you are here, and I hope you are, for a serious purpose, then we have a relationship with each other, otherwise we have no relationship whatsoever. That is clear, isn't it? If you and I are both serious in understanding this whole phenomenon of existence, not only the outward but also much more deeply inward, and be totally concerned with the resolution of this problem, then you and I, the speaker and you who listen, have relationship, then we can move together, then we can think together, and share together. And sharing, thinking together, investigating together and therefore creating together, is communication. I hope I am making myself clear. We cannot communicate with each other if you are interested merely in trying to solve a particular little problem of your own, which we will deal with presently, later on during these talks, or if you are merely curious what that chap has to say from India with his strange philosophy, or exotic nonsense, then I am afraid you and I will have no communication. Because the speaker is not bringing or talking about any particular system of philosophy. Philosophy implies the understanding of truth in daily life, in daily action, which has nothing whatsoever to do with Christianity, with Buddhism, with Hinduism or any culture.

So if we are really very earnest, and the time demands that we be earnest, then we must see very clearly, objectively, non-personally, this whole world as it is - the world that is divided, that is broken up by nationalities, by religious beliefs, whether that religious belief be the beliefs of politics, ideologies, the communist, socialist, religious, sectarian beliefs, dogmas, each fighting the other and trying to bring about a unity and keeping themselves separate. There are wars, there is all this political chicanery and the slow speed of bringing human beings together through politics. You know all this. And I wonder if you are aware of it intellectually, verbally; or you are aware of it with your heart, with your whole mind.

So one has to first find out for oneself how deeply you are aware of this division between man and man, through nationalities, through religious beliefs, through belonging to this set, that set, following that guru, or another guru, this system or that system - they are all divisions. And through divisions there can never be unity of mankind. Now how deeply is one aware of this phenomenon? Intellectually, admit that it exists, verbally assert it, or does one feel this extraordinary division between human beings, between a wife and a husband, between friends, division of colour, race, classes and so on - how deeply is one aware of it? Then if one is aware of it in the normal sense of that word, which is to be concerned, to know all the implications of this division - then what is one to do? Right?

What is a human being, you, to do, act, in a world that is so divided - the outer and the inner, conscious, the unconscious, the division of the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the technician and the layman - you follow - the artist, the businessman, the hippie, the long haired, the short haired, the whole division. Now if you are aware of it, what is one to do? Do you ask that question casually, in the sense that this division will eventually end some thousand years later, therefore it depends on its outer environment, political, certain political systems and so on, therefore you take it casually? Or it is a problem that demands your immediate attention and action, which means you are intense about it, you want to solve it with your whole being? So that is why we asked why you are here? Are you aware of this division between man and man which has existed for thousands and thousands of years, not only outwardly but in himself divided, in himself in conflict, in himself fighting, battling to become, to be, to fulfil, to assert, to dominate?

And there is also this question which is: what is one to do, how is one to act? A collective response or the response of freedom of a human being, and therefore in that freedom act collectively - you have understood? We must act collectively because great changes are demanded, deep psychological revolution is necessary, not mere physical revolution, not throwing bombs and killing thousands of people in the name of order, in the name of a new society, in the name of peace. What is demanded, what is necessary as one observes, which is not a dogmatic statement on the part of the speaker, is that there must be deep, psychological revolution. Is that revolution to be brought about by a collective action? That is, through different types of education, so forcing the individual, the human being, through conditioning him to behave properly which they are doing, and therefore denying total freedom to the human being, though it may bring about a collective action. Or in freeing the mind from conditioning and therefore freedom, and in that freedom bring about a co-operative action. Are we communicating with each other? Am I making myself clear? Good.

So we are not emphasizing the individual or the collective, because the world is divided that way. Neither emphasizing the individual freedom and therefore allowing himself to do what he likes, or the collective action which will drown the individual. But we are talking about something entirely different, neither this nor that. Right?

You see human beings are so disorderly, so self concerned, so utterly selfish, and so religious throughout the world with their beliefs, dogmas, rituals, saviours, and all the rest of that circus, have tried to condition man to behave through fear. You can see it in Christianity, you can see it in Buddhism, you can see it in every kind of organized religion - you understand? Condition human minds through fear. And modern psychologists from what they have told me, and those psychologists who have come to see me and discussed the matter with me, they are the prominent ones who are trying to condition man through non punishment but through reward. It is the same thing. It is two sides of the same coin. Because man must behave, he must become sane, orderly, have right relationship with human beings, whether black, brown, coloured or whatever it is. And as human beings apparently cannot be controlled, cannot be made to behave, therefore they impose authority, conditioning through fear and reward, or offering security, physical or psychological - you are following all this? May I go on? I'll go on anyhow because it interests me tremendously because we must create a different kind of people, different kind of human mind, which doesn't belong to the past, which is neither left nor right, which is entirely different.

So seeing all this, there must be collective action in which the human being is totally free, and whether that freedom can bring about harmony in relationship and therefore in behaviour - you are following? So that is our problem: how a human mind, your mind, which has been so conditioned by the past, through the present to the future, how can such a mind be changed radically? So that is one question, whether it will take time, time being gradually, taking several years, or as the Asiatics say, several lives, which is the same thing. Or is it to be brought about by instant perception? You are following all this? That is, my mind, suppose, my mind is conditioned as a Catholic, Buddhist, Communist, whatever it is. I realize that it is conditioned, not as an idea or as a speculative formula, but actually I realize it is conditioned. Now will it change through analysis, analytical processes or through pressure, which is reward and punishment, or is there a totally different approach to this problem - right?

Please you are sharing this with the speaker, you are not just listening to his talk, which is not of very great importance if you merely listen to it as casually accepting certain words and denying it, agreeing, or disagreeing, but if you share in it, that means actually communicate with each other, sharing, then you will have to find out for yourself whether time is involved in this problem - time being a long period through which you have to go through analytically, either doing it for yourself or done by another, or compelled by circumstances and environment to bring about that change, all implying time. Or is there a totally different approach to this question? Have I explained the question properly? Good.

Now what do you think? What do you in yourself, how do you look at this problem because we are sharing this together, we are exploring this together. The speaker is not an authority, nor your beastly guru, nor are you his followers. We are human beings, trying to resolve this immense problem of existence; and therefore if you are serious we have to share this thing together. Therefore you have to listen - you understand? Listen not only to what the speaker is saying, but also to your reactions, your own thoughts, your own feelings. You have this problem put before you: man has said you cannot possibly change the human mind instantly but it needs time, gradually bring about this radical human revolution psychologically and therefore allow time. All that has been said in the past and in the present - you are following this? This has been their philosophy, their attitude, their assertion: you cannot change the human mind, which has been so conditioned, instantly.

Now we are going to find out whether this idea - it is really an idea, you follow, a formula that the human mind cannot be changed radically, psychologically instantly, it must have time. That is a concept, it is a supposition, it is a theory. Now the word theory means - the root meaning of that word means to behold - you understand? Theory means to have an insight. Now follow that. You have an insight into something, then from that insight you formulate an idea, a concept, and act according to that concept. Now how is a mind, that is so heavily conditioned as ours are, whether we acknowledge it or not, consciously as well as deeply - conditioned being the past, whether that past is of yesterday or a thousand yesterdays, that is conditioning - now how is that mind to free itself from its conditioning so that it is free to behave properly, to establish true relationship with another, to have relationship in which there is love, not division? Now how do you set about this? Now you have understood the problem, I hope, now how do you set about it? What is the truth of this? Not according to any psychologist, modern or ancient, not according to any religious teacher - wipe out all that, if you can, and look at it. Can you wipe out your associations with any group, with any particular system, with any particular ideology, can you? I am afraid you can't. To wipe out means to stand completely alone - right? Then you can face the problem. Are you doing this?

Q: Yes, I am.

K: No sir, don't say that. It is one of the most difficult things to stand alone in the world. You understand? Not to belong to any nation, except perhaps to have a passport, not belong to any ideology, not to belong to any particular kind of activity, left or right, not to repeat a single word that you yourself have not known. So that there is integrity, because if you belong to any organization, any group, follow any guru, anyone, you are not being honest. It means to be able to stand completely alone in a world that is so disorderly, divided, full of antagonism, bitterness and falsehood - can you do that? No, sorry, either you do it, or you don't do it. You can't say, "Well I just belong to this little particular group, but I really am free from all that". You know when there is no integrity, when there is no honesty and virtue, systems, organizations become tremendously important. Haven't you noticed it? Then the organizations, systems control the mind; but if the mind is really honest, straight, clear, then no system is required because it is totally virtuous. I wonder if you follow all this?

So we have this problem in front of us: how is a mind that is so controlled, shaped, by environment, conditioned by various influences, by or through the education that one has, competition, aggression, violence, you know all that, how is such a mind to free itself so that it is totally, wholly free and sane? Now how would you, who are also very intellectual, who have read so much, how do you solve this problem? You understand my question, how will you solve it? Wait a minute, madam, don't answer yet, we will discuss after I have spoken this morning, and also there are going to be discussions for a whole week after the first seven talks. How would you solve this? Would you rely on anybody to solve it? That means the authority - right? Whether the authority of the analyst, psychologist, the priest or the authority of a saviour, you know the whole business, would you put your faith, belief, in somebody to solve this problem? Go on sirs, answer it to yourself. You see unfortunately we do because we say, "I don't know, I don't know how to solve this problem, it is too complex. I haven't given enough time to it, I haven't really thought about it. And somebody has given time, gone into it greatly and I will accept what he says". And you say, "Why not, he knows, I don't". So you make him into the authority and therefore you are living a secondhand life - you follow? And this is not a secondhand issue, it is your issue, you have to solve it, not through somebody, not having faith in something. We have played that game for thousands of years, in your gurus, in your saviours, in your masters, you know in your professionals, we haven't changed, therefore it is your problem, therefore you cannot possibly rely on anybody, especially the speaker. Right? The speaker means me! (Laughter)

So can you discard what another says you should think or do, so that you are face to face with yourself, directly first-hand - you understand my question? Therefore you put aside all authority, except the authority of law, which says keep to the right of the road, or pay tax - you follow? I am not talking about that kind of authority. The authority on which you depend for your belief, in which you have faith, in whom you acknowledge that someone else knows more than you do about yourself. So it brings you totally to yourself and therefore you have tremendous energy - you are following this? I waste energy in listening to somebody else, following somebody else, putting my faith in something - in a society, in a community, in a person, in an idea, in some system. That is a waste of energy. Whereas when I discard totally the dependence on another for my behaviour, for my integrity, for my honesty, for my sanity, then I have tremendous energy to look at what I am. Are you doing this? Do it, then it is fun discussing with you. Because this needs tremendous energy, to stand alone.

So now we are asking the question: can this mind which has been conditioned, the conditioning is both at the superficial level and also at the deep unconscious level, the totality of it, can that be radically transformed? If you put that question seriously to yourself then you and I have a relationship in investigating the question - you understand? Therefore you are not taking sides. It is you who are investigating, not through the eyes of somebody else. Now how do you investigate? I have this problem, how do I investigate it? I cannot investigate it if I want to get through it to reach an end - right? I say that I will investigate it to find a different state, I will investigate it in order to be free - then it is not investigation. You have already started with a motive, and that motive is going to direct your investigation - right? Therefore the mind must be free of every motive in order to investigate. Are you doing this? Because you see one sees so much suffering in the world, the poor, the starving, the people who live in the ghetto, the overpopulated, underdeveloped countries, where poverty is a curse, there is all this physical illness, poverty. And there are other kinds of suffering - suffering created by man in his division, the wars - you know the sorrow, don't you? One sees this, feels this, one is aware of it, both the inward sorrow, as well as the outward sorrow. And one has to respond, one has to solve it, one can't just say, well it is part of existence, it is the inevitability of human nature and so on and so on and so on. You have to solve it, you have to go beyond it. And we have the intelligence to go beyond it. And that intelligence comes into being only when you don't depend on anybody, when you are face to face with yourself and with the problem. Intelligence is after all the capacity of total energy in application - you have understood?

So now I have the energy, I don't depend on anybody - right? Can you honestly, seriously, say that you don't depend on anybody - your friend, your environment, your guru, your book, have a faith in something, or believing in something - which doesn't mean that you become agnostic or all that silly stuff? You are a human being completely with yourself, resolving the human problem of existence and therefore not somebody else resolving your problems.

As we said, investigation demands energy, energy is the application of intelligence and intelligence cannot be if you are looking to another. He may be intelligent, but if you look to him you are ignorant. Right? Now how do you investigate? Who is the investigator? It is no good saying to oneself "I am going to investigate" without trying to find out who the investigator is.

Sorry, is this becoming too complex? All right.

I say I want to investigate into this problem of the mind, which is me, my mind, I want to investigate it - why it is conditioned, to what depth is it conditioned and whether it can wholly be free from that conditioning? Because then only I can have a right relationship with another human being. Because my conditioning divides me and brings about a division between you and me. My image of me is the dividing factor. So I must find out first who is the investigator. Is it one part of the many fragments of the 'me' who is investigating - you are following - one part, one fragment says, "I will investigate into the different fragments", which is the 'me' that is conditioned - right? So one part assumes the authority, the capacity to investigate the other part. One part is broken up and against the other part. So is that investigation when one part assumes the authority, or the part who investigates the other fragments? Therefore that is not investigation. It is a conclusion which says, I will investigate - you see it? Good. It is a conclusion, you follow? And that conclusion brings about a division. So to investigate there must be no conclusion, no hypothesis - if you have a hypothesis, the meaning of that word is foundation, if you start from a foundation, which is inevitably a conclusion, then when you investigate with the conclusion, it brings about a division, therefore it is not an investigation. Have you understood this? If you see this clearly you will proceed further.

So is my mind, which is investigating, free from a conclusion? Which is, I will investigate, a conclusion is the will - right? Oh come on sirs. When I say, I will investigate into myself, it is a conclusion brought about by my desire to understand, to go beyond, to reach a certain dimension in which all this misery doesn't exist, it is a conclusion, it is the action of will that says, "I will investigate" - right? So can my mind be free of that conclusion? Otherwise I cannot investigate. It is like a scientist, if he wants to investigate, he looks, he doesn't start with a conclusion, then he is not a scientist, he is just a - I don't know what he is.

So, to investigate, to enquire is to be free of any conclusion. Therefore the mind then is now clear, fresh. And when you proceed then is there an investigator at all? Then there is only observation, not investigation - you get it? Got it sir? Therefore such a mind is not broken up, only it is capable of observing. Observing, which means having insight without conclusion therefore continuous insight. Are you getting all this? So the mind is free to observe and therefore act totally.

Would you like to ask any questions? I am sorry to force you all to observe!

Q: Can you state more clearly, exactly your attitude towards psychoanalysis and neurosis?

K: I wonder how many of us are neurotic? - which means not sane. Obviously any man who belongs to any nationality is not sane, or follows any guru, or any authority, is not sane - right? Sanity means whole, the word means whole, healthy. How can a mind that is healthy belong to any group, to any tribe which is the extended nationalism, or follow anybody? Right? So when one says, who is neurotic? I am afraid most of us are.

And, the questioner asks, would you please explain clearly, more clearly your attitude towards psychoanalysis. Are you interested in it? I don't know why people get analysed. When the analyser himself is so terribly conditioned why should you put yourself in the hands of that conditioned human being? When you yourself are conditioned, slightly in balance, more or less, that is up to you, why should such a person hand himself over to an analyst, you know what he is, he is conditioned according to his study, his Jung, Freud, this, that and the other, and also he is conditioned by his own worries, his own family, his relationship, his position in society, you know all that.

So analysis implies examination doesn't it, to analyse means to break up. The word analysis means to break up, the dictionary meaning. And we are broken up human beings, right? - contradictory, there is self-contradiction in ourselves, we are different fragments, we are happy, unhappy, we are dishonest, honest, we hate - you follow? Broken up. And analysis implies the analyser, either outside, the professional, or the analyser who is yourself inwardly - you are following this? I analyse myself, I have to find out who the analyser is before I trot out the analysis. Who am I that is going to analyse myself. Right? Who am I? Well I'll examine myself why I behave this way or that way, why I do this or that. One part of me examines - right? And so that part brings about a division among other parts. Now is there analysis if there are no parts? Oh come on sirs. Of course not. So my concern is not analysis but to see if there is the possibility of bringing about total harmony. And this cannot be brought about by integration. That is putting, adding parts to the broken parts to make it whole - you are following all this? Integration implies adding parts to make a whole. And who is the person who adds - we come back to the same thing.

So to me analysis is a waste of time because I can go on analysing myself to the end of my days, creating conflict in myself by saying, this is right, this is wrong - you follow? Beating myself sick, which is neurotic. Whereas my question is: can I see, observe wholly without division? And to observe wholly is sanity. So I must watch how my mind is operating - watch, observe, not correct it, not shape it, not say I must be whole, I must be sane, which is insane, but watch. So it depends how the mind watches. Does it watch with a conclusion, with a condemnation, with a judgement, with evaluation, with previous memories? So it can only watch when the mind is completely free to observe. And you do that if you have got tremendous interest and vitality. Right.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 18TH JULY 1972.

We were saying the other day how important it is that seeing what the various types of organizations are, both religious, secular, and social structure, how corrupt they inevitably are, and to belong to any of them prevents not only the unburdening of one's conditioning but also prevents one from seeing things clearly. So we said that it is important to stand completely alone, not belonging to any group, sect, following any guru, or teacher, and being able to stand completely alone so that we can bring about quite a different kind of society. That is what we were more or less saying the day before yesterday morning.

I do not know if you see the importance of it. I do not know if you recognize, or have an insight into this question. Because most of us are very confused, we don't know what to do, there are so many demands, pressures, that most of us lean on somebody - we want to be guided, we want to be told what to do. In ourselves we have no clarity and naturally there are those who say that they are very clear, that they are in a state of enlightenment, or freedom, and so on. And being uncertain, confused ourselves we more or less yield to their persuasion, and so become not only more conditioned but accept a new form of conditioning. I don't know if you see the importance of this. Because if we are so conditioned it is inevitable that our mind becomes almost mechanical - right?

Please, you know as we said the other day we are sharing this thing together, and I really mean it. We are thinking over these problems together and therefore understanding it together. It is not, I telling you what to think or how to think, but rather together investigate, understand, have an insight into all these problems so that you are very clear at the end of it. So that in that clarity you stand alone. Because one must create, or bring about a totally different kind of society, a totally different kind of human being, and more and more as one sees what is happening in the world the greater demand of such a human being.

And it is only the mind that is really capable of standing alone, in the sense of not belonging to any group, to any party, any community, any set of dogmas, beliefs, conclusions, it is only such a mind that can be creative. I think we have to go into that question of what is creation, what it is to be creative because if that is not clear we are apt to follow those things that make the mind more and more mechanical, more and more dependent, more and more attached. You see this.

So what is creation? What is it to be creative? Because if you are not creative inevitably you will be fragmented, accept authority, follow all the absurdities of escapes. So one has to understand very clearly for oneself what it means to be creative in this world - right? I do not know what that word means to you. It is not, surely, creating some physical thing which is new - new invention, new mode of speech, new painting, new kind of music. We are talking of a mind that is alone and therefore capable of being creative - right? Most of us are in conflict, most of us are caught in various kinds of demands, not only physical but environmental, social and so on. We depend on each other both physically and psychologically and therefore our whole nature, psychological structure, is fragmented - right? You are following this? Please observe it in yourself. Can a mind that is fragmented, contradictory in itself, be creative? Or does creation take place when there is this absence of the continuity of fragmentation? I don't know if you follow all this? Does it interest you? Because you see if we are not creative in the deeper sense of that word, into which we are going, we are bound to escape from the central fact of deep frustration - right? And the escapes become very important, whether they are religious escapes, political escapes, sexual escapes, or escapes into good works. So the escapes become all important and not the factor of this fragmentation in which a mind is caught - right? Please do follow this. And observing this in oneself, how one is fragmented, contradictory, being pulled by different desires, demands, how is a mind to be free in which alone there can be creation?

First of all do you know what it means to have an insight? Do you know what takes place when you have an insight into something? Say for instance, you have an insight into the whole religious organization, let's take that for an example. An insight, see what is implied in it, how corrupt it is, how false it is. Now that insight you can only have when the mind is not conditioned, is not attached to any particular form of belief - right? Now having an insight into the religious structure, then you draw a conclusion from that - right? When you draw a conclusion you are terminating that insight - right? You put an end to that insight when you draw a conclusion which you perceive through the insight. Is that clear?

Now look: I must make this very clear so that you understand it. I see very clearly belonging to any political party, which is nationalistic, run by people who are utterly corrupt, people who are working for themselves in the name of the party, wanting power, position, and all the rest of it, I have an insight into that. Not through book knowledge, not through reading, but actually see it. From that perception I draw a conclusion - right? I see all politicians, all politics are dreadful. Now when I have drawn a conclusion I have terminated that insight. Right? So I act from that conclusion not from that insight. Right? So my action from a conclusion is mechanical - you follow this? And being mechanical then I say, "How terrible to live mechanically, I want to escape". I join a community, I become whatever I do, escaping from the mechanical process of living, which is the result of a conclusion which came when I had an insight into something. You get it? You see the sequence of it? So when I act on a conclusion my action must be continuously mechanical, though at the beginning I may have had an insight into it - right? Now if one doesn't draw a conclusion at all but only insight then action is non mechanical. Therefore that action is always creative, always new, it is always living. So a mind that has insight and doesn't draw a conclusion and therefore acts, is in the movement of continuous insight, constant insight. Have you got it? Have you understood this? Understand, not verbally but actually see the truth of this, as you see the truth of a precipice.

Now this constant insight without a formula, without a conclusion which puts an end to that insight, is creative action - have you got it? Please look at it, go into it yourself. It is astonishingly beautiful and interesting, how the mind, which is thought, is absent when you have an insight - you follow? Thought cannot have an insight. It is only when the mind is not mechanically operating in the structure of thought, then you have an insight - right? Having an insight, thought draws a conclusion from that insight. And then thought acts and thought is mechanical - right? Are we following each other? So I have to find out whether the insight into myself, myself being the world and world is me, and I am the world, having an insight into myself, which means into the world, and not drawing a conclusion from it, and if I draw a conclusion I act on an idea, on an image, on a symbol which is the structure of thought, and so I am constantly preventing myself from having insight, preventing from understanding things as they are. So I have to go into this whole question of why thought interferes and draws a conclusion when there is a perception? You have understood my question?

I perceive something to be true, I perceive that to control oneself - listen to this carefully - to control oneself brings about a division in myself - right? The controller and the controlled and therefore conflict. I have an insight into that, that is the truth, but my whole thinking process is conditioned on the idea that I must control, my education, my religion, the society in which I live, the family structure, everything says to me 'control', which is the conclusion which has been handed to me, which is the conclusion which I have also acquired, and I act according to that conclusion, which is mechanical. And therefore I live in constant strife - right? Now I have an insight into this whole problem of control. So I have an insight which came into being when the mind was free to observe, unconditioned, but this whole structure of conditioning still remains - you are following all this? So there is now a mind that says, "By Jove, I have seen this thing very clearly, but I am also caught in the habit of control". So there is a battle - you are following? The one is mechanical, the other is non-mechanical - right? Now why does thought cling to the whole structure of control - you are following? Because thought has brought about this idea of control - right? You see this? No?

What does it mean to control? First it implies suppression - right? Division in oneself, which is one part, one segment of me says, I must control the other segments. That division is created by thought - no? Are you clear? The division is created by thought. Thought says, I must control myself because otherwise I would not adapt myself to the environment, to what people say and so on and so on, therefore I must control. So thought being the response of memory, and memory is the past, memory is the experience, the knowledge, which are all mechanical, has such immense power. So there is constant battle between perception, insight and the conditioning.

Now what is the mind to do? You understand? This is our problem. You see something new but the old is still there - the old habits, the old ideas, the beliefs, all that is tremendously waiting. Now how is the mind to sustain an insight without a conclusion at all times? Because if I have a conclusion it is mechanical, the conclusion is the result of thought, is the result of memory - right? From memory there is a reaction as thought. Then it becomes mechanical, then it becomes old. Now you experiment with me please.

You understand the question? There is insight, seeing something new, seeing something totally new, clear, beautiful, and there is this past with all the memories, experience, knowledge, and from that the thought that is cautious, watching, afraid, how to bring the new into the old. Now when you see this question, when you see this problem clearly, what takes place? Have you understood my question? We are the result of the past, though the younger generation may try to break away from the past, and think they are free to create a new world, they are not free from the past. They are re-acting to the past and therefore continuing with the past. I don't know if you follow this - right? It is not a break with the past, but a modified continuity of the past. I see this: I see what thought has done, and also I see very clearly there is clear perception that insight exists only when there is absence of thought - right? Now how do you solve this problem? I do not know if you have thought about it, and perhaps you are thinking about it for the first time, looking at it for the first time, and how do you respond to this, how does the mind respond to this?

Let me put the question differently. Mind must have knowledge: I must know where I live. It must know the language it speaks. It must exercise thought - thought which is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, which is the past. It must operate otherwise there would be no communication between you and me, I wouldn't know where I lived and all the rest of it and the absurdities begin, if I am not capable of thinking clearly. So I see knowledge is necessary to function in the mechanical world - right? Going from here to the place I live is mechanical, speaking a language is mechanical, acting from knowledge is mechanical, acting from all kinds of experience is mechanical. And that mechanical process to a certain extent must continue. That is my insight. You have got it? So there is no contradiction between knowledge and the freedom of knowledge when there is an insight.

I wonder if I am making it clear.

The insight I have now, that knowledge is necessary, and there is also the insight which comes when there is the absence of thought. So there is perception, insight all the time, not a contradiction. I wonder if you see this?

See the difficulty of putting into words what I want to convey. I want to convey to you that a mind that is constantly operating upon a conclusion becomes inevitably mechanical, and being mechanical it must escape into some kind of illusion, some kind of mythology, some kind of religious circus - right? And you have an insight into that. You say, "By Jove, how true that is". Now if you draw a conclusion from that insight, you have moved to a different place but it is still mechanical. I don't know if you see it. So when you have constant insight without conclusion, that state of mind is creative - not the mind that is in conflict and through conflict produces pictures, books, you understand? Not the mind that is in conflict, it can never be creative. Now if you see that, that is an insight, isn't it? You can see it, we'll take that up.

You know in literature, in the world of art, and so on, people say, he is a great artist, he is a great creative writer - right? Now if you look behind the literature, the author, you will see that he is in conflict daily - with his wife, with his family, with society, he is ambitious, he is greedy, wants power, position, prestige. And he has certain talents for writing. Through tensions, through conflict, he may write very good books but he is not creative in the deep sense of the word? And we are trying to see if each one of us can be creative in the deep sense of that word, not in expression, that is, writing a book, poem, or whatever it is, but having insight and never drawing a conclusion from that insight, so that you are moving constantly from insight to insight, action to action. That is spontaneity.

Now such a mind must obviously be alone - alone in the sense of not being isolated. You know the difference between isolation and being alone? Do you? No? Oh good Lord, must I explain every word? I am isolated when I build a wall of resistance round myself - right? I resist. I resist through any criticism, to any new idea, I am afraid, I want to protect myself, I don't want to be hurt. And therefore that brings about in my action a self-centred activity which is an isolating process. Is that clear? And most of us are isolating ourselves. I have been hurt and I don't want to be hurt. The memory of that hurt remains and therefore I resist. Or I believe in Jesus or Krishna, or whatever it is, and I resist any question of doubt, anything criticizing my belief because I have taken security in my belief - right? That isolates. That isolation may be of thousands of people, millions of people, but it is still isolation. When I say I am a Catholic, I am isolating myself, or a communist or whatever it is, isolating myself. And aloneness is entirely different, it is not the opposite of isolation but having - listen to this carefully - but having an insight into isolation that insight is aloneness - have you got it?

So: I do not know if you have noticed - which we will go into much more deeply on a different occasion - mind is completely alone when it is in the state of dying. You know death is the final state of complete isolation - right? You are leaving everything behind, all your works, your ideas, you are completely isolated through fear of that thing - right? And that isolation is wholly different from understanding the whole nature of death. If you have an insight into that, you are alone. I wonder if you are getting this? I see you are not understanding this. Leave that for the moment, we'll come back to it.

So, a mind that is free has insight every minute, a mind that is free has no conclusion and therefore non-mechanical. Such a mind is in action, non-mechanical action because it sees the fact, the insight into everything each minute - right. Therefore it is constantly moving, alive, and therefore such a mind is always young, fresh and incapable of being hurt: whereas the mechanical mind is capable of being hurt.

So thought, upon which all our civilizations are built, becomes mechanical, all our civilizations are mechanical. I don't know if you are following all this? And therefore corrupt. Therefore to belong to any organization is to become corrupt, or allow oneself to be corrupted - right? Now that is an insight, isn't it? Now can you move from that insight to another insight and keep moving, which is living, and therefore relationship becomes a totally different thing - right? Our relationships are based on conclusions, aren't they? Do watch this, please do have an insight into this and you will see how extraordinary a change takes place in your relationships - if you have really insight into this.

First of all our relationship is mechanical, which means our relationship is based on ideas, on a conclusion, on images - no? I have an image about my wife, or she has an image about me - image in the sense of knowledge, a conclusion, experience - and from that conclusion, knowledge, image, she acts, and she adds to that image, conclusion, through action as the other does, as the man does. So the relationship is between two conclusions - I don't know if you see? And therefore mechanical. You may call it love, you may sleep together, but it is mechanical. Being mechanical then you want excitement - religious excitement, psychological excitement, and every form of entertainment, escape from this mechanical relationship. You divorce and try to find another woman or man who will have something new but it soon becomes mechanical - right? So our relationships are based on this mechanical process. Now if you have an insight into this, see it as it actually is - the pleasure, the so-called love, the so-called antagonism, the frustrations, you know the images, conclusions that you have built about her and about yourself. Now if you have an insight into that, all that disappears, doesn't it? You no longer have an image, which is a conclusion. I wonder if you are following all this? So your relationship is direct, not through an image. And our relationship is based on thought, on the intellect - right? Which is mechanical, and that has nothing whatsoever to do with love, obviously. I may say, I love my wife, but it is not the actual fact. I love the image which I have about her when she is not attacking me, you know all the rest of it. So I discover that relationship means the freedom from images, conclusions, and therefore relationship means responsibility and love - you follow all this? Which is not a conclusion, you understand?

So my brain is the storehouse of various knowledge, experiences, and memories, hurts, images, which is thought - right? Do see this. And my brain, which is yours as well as mine, my brain is conditioned through time, through evolution, through growth. And its function is to live in complete security, naturally, otherwise it can't function, and so it builds a wall round itself as belief, dogma, the prestige, power, position - all that, it builds that around itself as a means to be completely secure. I don't know if you have followed all this? Have you watched your own brain operating. Then you will find that it can function remarkably well, logically, sanely when it is not frightened. That means when it has complete security - right? Now is there complete security? So being uncertain of complete security, it then proceeds to conclude that there is security. It makes a conclusion. You are following this? So conclusion becomes its security. Is this too much? Are you following all this? Look sir, I am frightened, I see I can only function, the brain can only function, when there is really happy, enjoyable security. But I can't enjoy it because I am frightened, I may lose my job, my wife, this and you follow? I am frightened. And so through fear I invest my energy in a belief, in a conclusion, that becomes my security. Therefore that belief, that conclusion, may be an illusion, a myth, a nonsense, but it is my security. People who believe in all the business of churches, and all that, it is an absolute myth, and that is my security - right? So I find security in a belief, or in a neurotic behaviour - right? - because to behave neurotically is also a form of security.

So the brain can only function freely, fully in complete security - right? So it must have security whether it is real or false, or illusory or non-existent, it will invent a security - right? Now I see that there is no security in belief, in a conclusion, in any person, in any social structure, in any leader, in following anybody. I see that there is no security in that - right? So I have security in seeing, in having insight. I wonder if you see it? There is security in insight, not in conclusion. I give it up! Have you got it? Not from me, for yourself, have you captured it, is it real to you?

So we have this problem: this problem of a mind that, or the brain that can only function in complete order, in complete security, in complete certainty, otherwise it gets deranged, neurotic - right? Therefore I see that any person, myself included, who belongs to any organization, putting his faith in an organization, his faith in a leader, is a neurotic action - right? What is the security that a mind has when it has discarded all this? You understand? Its security is in the insight which brings intelligence - right? Have you got it? Security is intelligence - right? Not in knowledge, not in experience, but in the insight of the value of knowledge and therefore that insight is the capacity of sustained intelligence, and in that there is security. Therefore that intelligence, that insight is never frightened. I don't know if you get all this. Do you get it sirs?

I don't know if it is the occasion, perhaps next time we meet, to go into this whole problem of fear, pleasure, enjoyment and that thing called joy.

But it would be a tremendous thing if we could, all of us together, understand this one thing: the nature of awareness, nature of perception, nature of insight - you understand? Because then the mind is free to live - you understand? To live, not live in conflict, in battle, in suspicion, in fear, being hurt and all the rest of it, the misery.

Now sirs, have you any questions?

Q: Today we hear about the new Jesus wave acting in the world, for instance in the USA among young people. Is there a spiritual power, Christ, at present acting on this earth?

K: You know if I live in an Indian village, a remote Indian village, I shall never have heard of Jesus, will I? I wouldn't know anything about Jesus, but I would know about my particular Jesus, Krishna - right? Or some other deity in which I have been brought up - you are following? So those people who have been conditioned for two thousand years in the Jesus mythology, break away from it and come back to it. Have you noticed it? Haven't you noticed it? You give up Jesus for one year, and in a couple of years pick it up again. You become a communist or a socialist, drop it and then go back to church. Or join a new cult. So you look at it carefully, now we will have an insight into this.

The whole western world is conditioned on a religious concept which is based on an idea, on thought, on a personal worship, as the saviour and all the rest of it. In India and in Asia, they are conditioned similarly by a different series of images, ideas, conclusions - right? Probably they have never heard of Jesus. In a Buddhist world they don't even consider Jesus. You are following all this? So there are different parts of the world conditioned by a religious concept - right? And the questioner asks: is there a new spiritual awakening? Right? Is there a new spiritual wave? Obviously the wave of the Indian concept of religion, you understand - or the Christian concept, Jesus - is not a new wave at all - right? It is the continuity of the old conditioned responses acting differently, but it is still conditioned responses - right? Let me put it differently.

When the speaker goes to India, there are various gurus with immense following, and the followers say, "This is a new wave, new spiritual awakening". And because they follow their old guru it is not new, it is just a repetition of the old in a different form - right? So this is happening right through the world - the repetition of a conditioned mind, religiously, acting or not acting in a different way. To me, personally, that is not a spiritual awakening at all. Are you following all this? Obviously it can't be. If I become a Hindu, or I am a Hindu, I do all the circus involved in Hinduism, there is nothing new in it, I am going back repeating the old stuff. The newness lies in freedom, you understand? In freedom from being conditioned, so that I am neither a Christian, a Buddhist, a Hindu, nor Muslim.

Because to find out what truth is the mind must be free - right? It cannot be free if it accepts any authority of any church, or any saviour or any book. And a new spiritual awakening is only possible when there are some in the world, a few or many, or who have really gone into this whole problem deeply, and have freed themselves completely and stand completely alone, because it is only when people are alone, the human mind is alone, then it is possible to have real relationship with others. And it is only such a mind that can find out, can come upon that thing which is beyond time, beyond measure. Right? That is the real awakening, something totally new takes place. And that is your responsibility - right? Not just sitting here and listening to a speaker, agreeing or disagreeing, accepting a few ideas. But it is your responsibility to see that you, as a human being, are free from conditioning, stand alone and therefore live in integrity, honesty and virtue - and that is the new. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Our minds are automatic, limited, small, mechanical, how am I, the questioner says, to be free of it. I have just explained. All right, let's go into it.

My mind is petty, mechanical, small, what am I to do with it? Right? Do you know your mind is small, petty, anxious, jealous, envious, competitive, comparing? Do you know it? Are you aware of your mind being like that? Yes? Oh for god's sake let's be honest sometimes. Right. I am aware of it. What shall I do?

When you say, I am aware of it - what do you mean by that word 'aware'? When you say, I know my mind is petty - what do you mean by that word 'know'? Please, this is important. Do you know it because you have compared your mind with another mind which is not petty? You understand my question? I say my mind is petty, narrow, stupid, dull, idiotic, neurotic. How do I know it? Because somebody has told me? Because I have compared it with another mind which I think is not neurotic, which I think is free - right? So do I discover my pettiness through comparison, through measurement? Right? Now, measurement, comparison is the factor that makes the mind petty. I don't know if you see this. Now this is an insight. You understand? I compare myself with you who are very clever, bright, clear eyed and nice looking, you know, compare, measure myself with you. And I say, 'My god, how dull I am'. What does that mean? Through comparison I have found that I am dull, and this is my education - you understand? I have been educated to compare myself always - in the school, in college, as I grow, compare, measure myself with another. Therefore I say to myself, why do I measure at all? Are you following all this? Why do I measure? If I don't measure, am I dull? I don't know. I have assumed through comparison I am dull. Please follow this. This is an insight. And can the mind which is conditioned through centuries of education to compare - religiously, economically, socially, in every way to compare, measure - can that measurement come to an end? That is my first question. It can only come to an end if I have an insight into the stupidity of measurement. Why should I compare myself with you? You may be the most marvellous human being, the greatest saint on earth, or the saviour, why should I compare myself with you? I compare myself with you because I have been educated to compare - my brother is better than me, my uncle is much brighter than me - you follow? So I have an insight which says, don't compare, how silly. Now having an insight into that I stop comparing, then what am I? You are following? What am I? I don't know. Right? I really don't know. Are you following this? When you don't compare yourself with somebody, what are you? You are going to find out, aren't you? Right? You don't say, I am petty, small, bourgeois, limited, how ugly, this or that. I don't know. So I am going to find out - right? When I say, I am stupid, dull, narrow, I have come to a conclusion through comparison. A conclusion puts an end to insight. So the insight shows to me the futility of comparison. I won't compare. It is finished, forever. You understand? Therefore I am going to see what I am. The moment I reject comparison, I am no longer stupid because I have an insight into the whole structure of comparison. You have got it? Which is intelligence, which is greater than the comparative value of pettiness and greatness. You have got it? Right.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 20TH JULY 1972.

You know I hope we gather here to be serious, and this is not an entertainment, something that you can just cursorily, casually attend when you want to and discard, and do other things, but I am sure most of us are serious here and so please refrain from taking all these pictures, photographs, tapes, or even notes because what is important is that we should listen, not give your attention to something else.

If I may, I would like to talk about something this morning, which seems to me rather important and perhaps it is the most fundamental problem of our life. And we should understand it not merely verbally but also go beyond the words and have a deep insight into what is being said. I can talk about it for an hour or more because I have gone into it pretty thoroughly in myself, but I would like, if I may, to share with you what I think is really important. You know the word 'share', means to share the beauty of a tree together, look at the river together, take interest, see all the movement, the colour, the shadows, together. And sharing implies a responsibility, that you and I, both of us, sharing together something when we look at the mountains, that feeling of extraordinary beauty, of great height and nobility, majesty. And sharing can only take place if you are also looking at the same thing at the same time, with the same intensity, otherwise you can't share it. And sharing implies also, doesn't it, that one has to listen, listen not to mere words and their reference and their dictionary meaning, not giving a particular meaning to that word which you may have, but rather listening to that word and the meaning of that word in the dictionary. And when you can listen then we share something. And that I feel we should do in all these discussions and talks that we have here.

I think the central problem of our existence is thought, the whole machinery of thinking and, if I may, I would like to go into that because our civilization both in the east and in the west is based on thought, on the intellect. Thought is very limited, it is measurable, and thought has done the most extraordinary things in the world - the whole technological world, going to the moon, building houses that are comfortable for everybody if it is possible. But also thought has done a great deal of mischief - all the instruments of war, the destruction of nature, the pollution of the earth, and also thought, if one goes into it very deeply, has created the so-called religions throughout the world. Thought has been responsible for the mythology of the Christians with their saviours, popes, priests, salvation and all the rest of it. And also thought has been responsible for a particular kind of culture with its technological development, artistic, and the cruelties, the brutality in relationship, the class division and so on. This machinery of thought is mechanical, is a mechanistic philosophy, mechanistic physics, and thought has divided human beings as the 'me' and the not 'me', the 'we' and the 'they', the Hindu, the Buddhist, the communist, the young and the old, the hippies, non hippies, the established order and so on and so on and so on. All that structure is the result of thought. I think that is fairly clear, both religious, secular and political, including national.

Thought has created, as I said, an extraordinary world - the marvellous cities which are decaying, the quick transportation and all that. And also thought has divided human beings in their relationship. Thought, which is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, divides human beings. That is, in our relationship with each other thought has built, through a series of incidents, activities, the image of the 'me' and the 'you'. The images that exist through constant interacting relationship. These images are mechanistic and therefore relationship becomes mechanical.

So there is not only the division brought about by thought in the outside world but also there is division in the human being inwardly. And one sees thought is necessary, absolutely necessary, otherwise you can't do anything. You can't go to your house, you can't write a book, you can't talk, you can do nothing without thinking. Thinking then is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, which is the past. Thought projects the future through the present, modifying it, shaping it, designing it as the future. I hope you are following all this? We are sharing this together, you are not merely listening to me.

So thought has a logical function, efficient, if it is not personal and the accumulated knowledge as science, and all the accumulation of ideas. Knowledge becomes important. but knowledge which is the known prevents the mind going beyond the present and the past. Thought can only function in the field of the known, though it may call the unknown according to its conditioning, to its knowledge of the known and project the unknown - right? And you observe this phenomenon right through the world - the ideal, the future, the 'what should be', what must happen according to the background, to the conditioning, to the education, to the environment. And thought is responsible also for behaviour, the vulgarity, the crudeness, the brutality, the violence in all relationships and so on. And so thought is measurable.

Now I do not know if you have noticed, or thought about it, that the west is the explosion of Greece, which thought in terms of measure - right? Are you following all this? To them mathematics, logic, philosophy, all the things they discovered, which exploded on the west, is the result of measurement, which is thought. Right? Does this interest you? I am coming back to you presently.

Because without understanding the whole machinery of thought, what is its tremendous significance, meaning, where it becomes utterly destructive, meditation has no meaning. So unless you really understand, have a deep insight into the whole machinery of thinking you cannot possibly go beyond it. Haven't you noticed that in the east, India exploded over the whole of Asia, not the modern Indians, the ancient Indians - the modern Indians are just like you - romantic, vulgar, superstitious, frightened, grabbing money, wanting position, power, prestige, following some guru, you know all that business that goes on in the rest of the world, only they are a different colour, different climate, different morality, partially. So the ancient Indians, not that I have read any scriptures but I have observed a great deal, which is good enough. They said measurement is illusion because when you can measure something it is very limited and if you base all your structure, all your morality, all your existence on measurement, which is thought, then you can never be free. Therefore they said, at least according to what I have observed, that the immeasurable is the real and the measurable is the unreal, which they call Maya.

But you see thought, as the intellect, the capacity to understand, to observe, to be able to logically think together, to design, to construct, thought shaped the human mind, human behaviour, as it did in India, as it does in Asia. In Asia they said to find the immeasurable you must control thought, you must shape it through behaviour, through righteous conduct, through control, through various forms of personal sacrifices and so on and so on. It is exactly the same thing as in the west - you are following? In the west also they said control, behave, don't hurt, don't kill, but both the east and west killed, misbehaved - they did everything.

So the question is: as thought is the central issue of our existence, which we cannot possibly deny, we may imagine that we have a soul, that there is a god, that there is heaven, hell, invent all these things by thought, the knowable qualities and the ugly existence, all the product of the machinery of thinking. Right? So one asks oneself what place has thought if the world, the outer existence is the result of mechanistic philosophy, mechanistic, the result of mechanistic physics, what place has thought in relationship, and what place has thought in the investigation of the immeasurable, if there is the immeasurable? You are following all this? You must find out and this is where we are going to share together.

I want to find out what is thought, and therefore thinking, what significance in existence has thought, and if thought is measurable and therefore very, very limited, can thought investigate something which is not of time, of experience, of knowledge? I don't know if you are following all this? You understand my question? And both the east and the west have said, that to find the immeasurable, call it by different names it doesn't matter, the unknown, the unnameable, the eternal, the everlasting, you know they have given dozens and dozens of names to it, which is not important, can thought investigate it? Then if thought cannot investigate it, then what is the mind that is capable of entering into that dimension which has no word? Right? Because the word is thought. We use a word to convey a particular idea, a particular thought, a particular feeling. So thought, which is concerned with remembering, imagining, contriving, designing, calculating and therefore functioning from a centre, which is the accumulated knowledge as the 'me', can that thought investigate something which it cannot possibly understand? Because it can only function in the field of the known, otherwise thought is puzzled, is incapable of really thinking. Is this clear?

So what is thinking? I want to be very clear in myself and therefore you, to find out what is thinking. And to discover, or to find out its right place. We said thinking is the response of memory, experience, knowledge stored up in the brain cells. Therefore thought is the result of development, evolution, which is time. So thought is the result of time. So thought - can I go on? - thought can only function within the space it creates around itself. And that space is very limited, that space is the 'me' and the 'you'. Thought, the whole machinery of thinking, has a rightful place. And thought in relationship between two human beings becomes destructive. You see? You are understanding this? Thought, the product from knowledge, time, evolution, the result of mechanistic philosophy, science, which are all based on thought, though occasionally a new discovery takes place in which thought doesn't enter at all. You are following this? That is, you discover something totally new, and that discovery is not the discovery of thought. You translate what you have discovered in terms of thought, in terms of the known - right? The scientist, though he has great knowledge if he is really a top scientist - I am not talking of all the political scientists who panders to governments and all the rest of it - a great scientist though he may have immense knowledge, that knowledge is absent at the moment of seeing something new. He has an insight into something totally new, then he translates it into the known, into the word, into a phrase, into logical sequences - right? And such thinking is necessary.

So knowledge is absolutely essential. You can add to it, take away from it but it can be increased, decreased but the immensity of knowledge is a human necessity - right? Now is knowledge necessary in relationship between human beings? Right? Have you understood my question? We are related to each other, we are human beings, we live on the same earth, it is our earth, not the Christian earth, or the English earth, or the Indian earth, it is our earth, the beauty of it, the marvellous riches of it, it is our earth to be lived on. And what place has thought in relationship?

Relationship means to be related, relationship means to respond to each other in freedom, with its responsibility. I don't know if you are following all this? So what place has thought in relationship. Thought which is capable of remembering, imagining, contriving, designing, calculating and all that, what place has it in human relationship? Has it any place, or no place at all? Please we are enquiring into ourselves, not somewhere else mechanically.

Is thought love? Don't deny it, we are enquiring, we are going into it. What is our relationship when we live together in a house, husband, wife, friend or whatever it is, what is our relationship? Is it based on thought? - which is also feeling, the two cannot be divided. If it is based on thought then relationship becomes mechanical, mechanistic relationship. And for most of us that is the relationship we have with each other - mechanistic. I mean by mechanistic, the image created by thought about you and about me. The images that each one creates, defends, through a number of years, or through a number of days. You have built an image about me and I have built an image about you, which is the product of thought. The image becomes the defence, the resistance, the calculation, the building of a wall round myself, and as I build a wall, round you - you build a wall round yourself and you build a wall round me - this is called relationship, which is a fact. Right?

So our relationship is the product of thought, calculated, remembered, imagined, contrived at. And is that relationship? It is easy to say, 'No, of course not'. When you put it so clearly of course it isn't. But the fact is, it is our relationship, if we don't deceive ourselves that is the fact. I don't want to be hurt, I don't mind hurting you, and so I build a resistance, and you do the same. This process of interrelationship becomes mechanistic and destructive. And being mechanistic, destructive relationship we try to escape consciously or unconsciously - right?

So I discover - discover, I have an insight that any kind of interference of thought in relationship becomes mechanistic. I have discovered it. To me that is an immense fact - as a fact that a snake or a precipice or a dangerous animal is destructive, as destructive as when thought interferes in relationship. I see that. Right? So what am I to do? I see thought is necessary at a certain level, and thought in relationship is most destructive. That is, you have hurt me, you have said things to me, you have flattered me, you have given me pleasure, sexual or otherwise, all the rest of it, nagged me, bullied me, dominated me, brought about frustrations - those are all the images, conclusions I have about you. And when I see you I project all that. I may try to control it, I may try to suppress it but it is always there. So what is one to do? You understand my question? I see, I have an insight into the whole machinery of thinking - the whole machinery, not in one direction, the machinery of thinking in human existence, outwardly and inwardly, it is the same movement. And if the mind is to go beyond it, beyond and above it, how is thought to be controlled, to be given enough scope to play with without bringing about its own frustration. You are following all this? Come on sirs, see the beauty of all this.

Life without understanding, or without coming into that state of something which can never be entered into by thought, life becomes very mechanical, life becomes routine, a boredom, a tire, you know what it is. And knowing that it is boring, lonesome, dreadful, ugly, with occasional pleasure or joy, we want to escape, run away from this horror. And therefore we imagine - create myths, and myths have a certain place. The Christian myth has held people together - you are following all this? The Indians have great myths and these myths have brought about a unity, and when the myths go away, fragmentation takes place, which is going on in the world at the present time. You have no myth if you really think about it very seriously, you have no myths about Christ, Jesus or Buddha, you have dropped all that.

So how is the mind to bring about a harmony in which the division between the known and the freedom from the known doesn't exist? You have understood what I have said? The known is knowledge, the functioning of thought, and freedom from it. The two moving together, the two in perfect harmony, in balance, in the beauty of movement. Have you understood this? Have you seen the question first? And the beauty of that question? Not an integration of the two which is impossible, because integration means putting several parts together, adding new parts, or take away old parts, that implies an entity who is capable of doing this, who is an outsider, which is the invention of thought. As the soul, the atman in India, and so on, it is still thought. So my question is: like the two rivers joining together, moving together, the known and the unknown, the freedom from the known and a mind that has insight into a dimension in which thought doesn't happen at all. Have you got it?

So is this possible? Or is it merely an idea, merely a theory? Theory being, as I have already explained, the dictionary meaning, is to behold, is to have an insight. The word, theory, means to have an insight, to have the capacity to observe instantly the truth of it, to behold. Now that is the problem. Thought and non-thought. Thought - when I have to build a bridge, write a book, make a speech, calculate where I shall go - thought. And in relationship no thought at all because that is love. Now can the two move together all the time?

So thought says - listen to it carefully - I am asking the question: can the two harmoniously live together, so that behaviour is not based on thought, then it becomes mechanical, conditioned, then it becomes a relationship of images? So can this movement of knowledge - because it is always moving, it isn't static, you are always adding - this movement in which thought as image-maker doesn't come into it at all? If the question is clear then you will see thought, which is still operating, says, to do that you must control. You understand? You must control thought, you must hold it and not let it interfere in relationship, you must build a wall. So thought is calculating, imagining, remembering - remembering what somebody has said that these two movements must go together. So thought says "I will remember that, that is a marvellous idea" - so it stores it up as memory, and according to that memory it is going to act - you are following all this? Therefore it says, "I must control". And all mechanistic philosophy, civilization, all religious structure is based on this - control - after you have controlled, sufficiently suppressed then you will be free, which is sheer nonsense! Right? Are you working as hard as I am working? You should! I don't know if you see the beauty of this. I am absolutely delighted - you follow?

So thought begins to create a pattern of how to behave in order to have that harmony, therefore it has destroyed it - right? Now I have an insight. I have an insight into this question, that control is not the way - control implies suppression, an entity who controls, which is still thought as the controller, the observer, the see-er, the experiencer, the thinker. I have an insight into that. So what does the mind do?

How do you have an insight? What is insight? How does it take place? You know what I mean by insight - when you see something as the false and see something as the truth, see it instantly. You do, on occasion. You see something totally and say,

"By Jove, how true that is". Now what is the state of mind that says, "It is so?" - which has nothing to do with thought, which has nothing to do with logic, dialectic, which is opinion. Now what is the state of the mind that sees instantly the fact, and therefore the truth of it? Obviously if the thinker is there, there is no perception. Right? If the thinker, who is the creator of will, which is the product of desire, because I want to achieve that state, which must be extraordinary, and the mind then says, thought says, "I will bring about that state by suppression, control, by various forms of sacrifice, asceticism, no sex or whatever it is" - it goes through all that phenomenon, hoping to come upon the other. The other is accepted because this is limited, this is tiresome, boring, mechanical, in its desire to have more pleasure, more excitement, it will accept the other. The other is perhaps seen by very, very few, or seen as an idea by a few, and because of that idea they experience that, and then say, "I am enlightened", "I have got it" - and he becomes a beastly little guru.

So: we are now enquiring into what it is to observe without the observer? Are we meeting? Because the observer is the past, is the known, is within the field of thought, because it is the result of knowledge, therefore experience and so on. So is there an observation without the observer, which is the past? Can I look at you, my wife, my friend, my neighbour, without the image which I have brought about through relationship? Can I look at you without all that coming into being? Is that possible? You have hurt me, you have said unpleasant things about me, you have spread scandalizing rumours about me (I'm afraid you do, but it doesn't matter) - pleasant or unpleasant rumours are the same. And can I look at you without bearing all that memory? You are following all this? Which means, can I look at you without any interference of thought, which has remembered the insult, the hurt or the flattery? Can I look at a tree without the knowledge of that tree? Are you following? Can I listen to that sound of the river going by without naming, recognizing, saying that is that river that is making - just listen to the beauty of the sound? Can you do this? You may listen to the river, you may see the mountain without any calculated design, but can you look at yourself with all your accumulations, conscious or unconscious, look at yourself with eyes that have never been touched by the past? You understand what I am saying? Have you tried any of this? Sorry, I shouldn't have said 'tried'. To try is wrong. Have you done it? Looked at your wife, your girl friend, boy friend, or whatever it is, without a single memory of the past? So you discover that thought is repetitive, mechanical and relationship is not, therefore you discover love is not the product of thought. You understand? Therefore there is no such thing as divine love and human love, there is only love. Do you follow all this?

Thought, which is the whole machinery of thinking, on which our life is based, the whole machinery of words which we use to communicate through a novel, through a word - through word - without that word is there thought? Or is the mind such a slave to words that it cannot see the movement of thought without the word - you are following all this? That is: can I, can the mind observe me, the whole content of me, without the word? Do you understand? Observe what I am without association - the association is the word, the association is the memory, the remembrance - therefore there is a learning about myself with never a remembrance, without the accumulated knowledge as experience of an anger, or of jealousy, or of antagonism, or of desire for power - you are following all this? So can I look at myself - not I - can the mind look at itself without the movement of the word, because the word is the thinker, the word is the observer?

Now to look at yourself so clearly the mind must be astonishingly free from any attachment. You understand? Attachment to a conclusion, which is an image, attachment to an idea, which is the product of thought, idea being words, phrases, concepts put together as an idea, not attached to any principle, to any movement of fear and pleasure. This perception is in itself the highest form of discipline. You understand? Discipline in the sense of learning, not conforming. Are you capable of following all this?

We began with enquiring and therefore sharing together, what is the place of thought in existence? For now in our life all our existence is based on thought, that thought may imagine it is not based on it, that it is based on some spiritual, etc. but it is still the product of thought. Our gods, our saviours, our masters, our gurus, are the product of thought. And what place has thought in life, in existence? It has its place logically, sanely, effectively when knowledge functions without the interference of the 'me', who is using knowledge. The 'me' who says, "I am a better scientist than that person," "I am a better guru than that guru". So knowledge when used without the 'me', which is the product of thought, which creates the division between me and you, then knowledge is the most extraordinary thing because that will bring about a better world, a better structure of the world, a better society - you understand? We have enough knowledge to bring about a happy world, where we can all have food, clothing, shelter, vocation, no ghettos, but that is denied because thought has separated itself as the 'me' and the 'you', my country and your country, my beastly god and your beastly god, and we are at war with each other.

So thought has, as memory, remembrance, imagination, design, a logical healthy place but it can never come into relationship. If you see that, not logically, not verbally, not with the sense "I will be happier if I do that", not through words, through imagination, through formulas, then if you see the truth of it, you are there. Then there is no conflict, it happens naturally. Like the fruit on a tree that ripens. Right?

Are there any questions?

Q: I feel that I am real.

K: You feel you are real? The gentleman says he feels he is real. I wonder what we mean by that. I am real. I am sitting here, I have got a body, I see things about me, my thoughts are real, the words I use are real, I like and I don't like - real. You have hurt me, you have flattered me, that is real. My gods, I realize, I have invented them. It is me out of fear that has produced these things. It is my pleasure that makes me attached to them, and therefore out of that pleasure I say, "I love you". In a certain way they are all real. Words are real. And if you are caught in words then they create the illusion. So there is a certain reality which is obvious, and the illusion begins when thought produces, out of fear and pleasure, the image of reality.

Q: What is the relationship between the body and thought?

K: If I had no body would I be able to think? - body, all the organism with its nerves, with its sensitivity, with all the operative mechanical processes of the physical system, without that would there be thinking? If I had no brains, which is the cells, which hold the memory, which is connected with the whole body through nerves, would there be thinking?

Now listen to all this carefully. When the body dies - you see, now we sit up! - when the body dies what happens to thought which we have created - you understand? Are you following all this, does it interest you? I have lived 50, 30, 100 years, I have worked, most of my time spent in an office, god knows why, earning a livelihood, fighting, quarrelling, bickering, jealous, anxious, you know, my life, the dreadful thing that I live. And I die, the body dies, which is inevitable, old age, disease, accident, pain, and I remember all that. All that is me. Is that 'me' different from the body? Go into it very carefully. Is that 'me' different from the instrument? Obviously it is different. The 'me' is the result of my remembering the hurts, the pain, the pleasure, all that, the remembrance, which is stored up in the cells as thought - right? Will that thought go on when the body dies? You are following all this? You have asked that question sir - will my brother and my friend whom I have remembered, loved, walked with and enjoyed things together, that friend, the brother, the son, the husband dies - do I remember him and does he exist? You are following all this? And I am attached to him and I don't want to lose him. But I have lost him physically. But I don't want to lose him. See what takes place. I don't want to lose him, I have a great memory, experience, pleasure, pain about him, or her, I am attached to that, and I hold on to that.

So thought says, "He does live, we will meet next life, or we will meet in heaven. I like that idea, it gives me comfort" - and you come along and say, "What nonsense, it is just superstition, old man" and I fight you because this gives me great comfort. So what I am seeking is comfort, not the truth of anything, but comfort. Now if I do not seek comfort in any form - which is the fact - if I have lived a shoddy narrow life and petty, jealous, anxieties, like millions and millions and millions of people do, what is the importance of me? I am like the vast ocean of people. I die. You follow? But I cling to my little life, I want it to continue hoping that at some future date I will be happy. And with that idea I die. And I am like a million others in a vast ocean of existence, without meaning, without significance, without beauty, without any real thing. And if the mind steps out of that vast stream, as it must, then there is a totally different dimension. And that is the whole process of living: to move away from this vast current of ugliness and brutality. And because we can't do it, we haven't got the energy, the vitality, the intensity, the love of it, we move along. Right sir.

Q: Why do you speak of a blissful state? It holds out a promise of something other than 'what is' for us. If thought is not there consciousness can never know about it, so why talk about it? Your talk of a blissful state is what keeps us all coming.

K: Do you all come because I talk about a blissful state? Oh my god, I hope not! Look sir: what is important is not the blissful state of somebody else. What is important is to understand 'what is'. 'What is', yours - not my blissful state or X's blissful state. And if you understand that, and to understand it you must have tremendous energy, and that is what we are concerned with, not a blissful state. And I hope you are here for that, not to achieve somebody else's blissful state, which is then an illusion. You want to kick that overboard. What we are concerned with is the understanding of 'what is' and going beyond it. The understanding of thought, which is 'what is', the structure of thought, the nature of thought, which is 'what is', and seeing its right place and its destructive nature, and to see the freedom from the known and the known moving together, whether you can find out, because it is your life, it is your existence not mine, not somebody else's, it is yours, not Mr Nixon's or Mr Heath's or Mr somebody else's or the communists or the pope's, or even of Jesus - it is your life. And if you know yourselves actually 'what is', then you will be beyond it.

Q: I who am neurotic wonder if being around a person who seems to be sane can help me to become sane also?

K: If you know you are neurotic you have already stopped being neurotic. But most of us are not aware that we are neurotic, and being unaware that we are neurotic, we hope to become non-neurotic by being with somebody else. But with somebody whom you think, you who are neurotic, you who think somebody else is sane, is also neurotic. This is not just a clever statement. If I am neurotic and I think you are sane, how can I know that you are sane because I am neurotic? (Laughter) No, please. How do I know that you are enlightened - please listen to this - that you are the saviour, that you have achieved heaven, when I am in misery? How do I know? I can't. But I would like to think you are in heaven because it gives me comfort. On that all our religions are based, which is so utterly silly. So if I am aware that I am neurotic that is enough?

Now at what depth are you aware that you are neurotic? Who told you that you are neurotic? Have you found that out for yourself? Or your friends kindly told you that you are neurotic? (Laughter) Have you found out for yourself that you are neurotic, that you act not sanely? Or you think you have watched people who act sanely and compared yourself with that person and therefore say, "I am neurotic". You are following all this? So when you compare you are neurotic - right? When you assert that somebody else is sane, when you yourself are neurotic, that person is insane.

So what is important is to be aware deeply, profoundly that you are not balanced. Aware - that very awareness dispels neuroticism. You understand? If I am aware that I am angry, which is a form of neuroticism, or jealousy, or the search for power, position, prestige, all forms of neuroticism, if I am aware of that, I want to find out if I am aware verbally, intellectually, or just a conclusion, an idea, or have I gone beyond it, deeper? Then if words, conclusions, ideas are pushed aside then I am really aware that I am. In that awareness am I insane, am I neurotic? Obviously I am not. It is these things that make me neurotic. Have you got it.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 23RD JULY 1972.

We were discussing the last time we met here, the nature of thought, memory, experience and knowledge, what place has thought in daily relationship, and how deeply it is destructive in that relationship; and knowledge as thought and expression in action is absolutely necessary. I do not know how deeply you have gone into it since we discussed. And it seems to me, if we are at all serious, and not only the times demand that one be very, very earnest but also as one leads rather a superficial life - superficial in the sense, give full vent, full expression to the whole field of thought in every day, which I call superficial - I do not know how deeply you have gone into it. If you have, what place has thought in the whole of consciousness? How deeply the unconscious, the hidden parts of our minds, the secret recesses, how deeply they are contaminated by the environment, by the society in which we live, by or through education and so on. How deeply the whole mind is polluted and whether it is possible to free the mind altogether from this pollution of civilization. Whether the mind can ever be really, in the true sense of that word, be free. And that can only be understood when we understand, have an insight, into the whole question of thought, which we discussed the other day, more or less.

But what I would like this morning, if I may, is to go into this question of how deeply thought has conditioned the mind, how deeply our culture, in which we live, has shaped the whole consistency of thought, for thought is matter.

If I may I would like to point out again, we are not merely indulging in theories, in speculations, in concepts, but rather going together, sharing together, exploring together into this question, whether the mind which has been conditioned through millenia, through every form of culture, society, environmental influences, how deeply this conditioning has taken place, and whether it is at all possible to cleanse - of course, if one uses the word 'cleanse' there must be a cleaner - how deeply we are affected by whether it is possible to expose the deep contents of oneself so completely that the mind is really totally clear, and therefore free.

You know, we shouldn't say anything verbally that we have not actually directly perceived, otherwise we become hypocrites, otherwise we use other people's ideas, conclusions and their illusions. They become the authority and we merely follow. Whereas if we could for ourselves, putting all the outward authority of another and their knowledge, investigate into this question, have direct perception ourselves, then what you say will be true for you. And then one acts tremendously honestly. And I feel, if we could this morning, spend a little time together enquiring how deeply we are secondhand, how deeply we accept what others say and repeat so glibly and easily, cleverly, in reacting to what others say.

So what we are going to find out together, if we can this morning, is whether the mind, your mind and the mind of the human being, can be totally unconditioned and therefore act in freedom and yet together? Society, the culture, the various economic divisions, social activities have created in us an image - right? Please don't accept anything that the speaker says unless you see it for yourself completely, deny everything everybody says, psychologically, especially the speaker, so that you don't set him as an authority, so that you directly for yourself see and therefore it will be yours.

As we were saying, the culture in which we live - culture being the economic conditions, the religious divisions, the class struggles, the various forms of conformities, imitations - has created in each one of us an image of ourselves - is that so? That is, you have an image about yourself, haven't you? Not one, perhaps half a dozen. How do these images come into being? Who has created these images? Surely the culture in which all the influences - religious, psychological, educational, environmental, economic movement - living in that culture it has created in the human mind the image of what I am, or what I should be - right? I think there is no question about it. If I am born in a particular environmental state, I accept that from childhood - I am a Catholic for the rest of my life, or a Protestant, or a Hindu or a Communist, or whatever it is, a Nationalist. And that image is deeply seated, it is the formula on which I live. The 'me' is that formula. Please observe this. Not my description of it but the actual fact of it. You understand? The description is not the described - right? I can describe the mountain but the description is not the mountain.

So this image is the whole of our consciousness. The content of this consciousness is consciousness - right? We are sharing this together? It is a lovely morning, really we should be out, looking at the deep shadows, lovely mountains, the flowing waters and the still quiet woods, damp, which have an odour of their own, a beauty that is not there but here. But here we are trying to be awfully serious, and we should be terribly serious because we have to create a totally different kind of civilization, a totally different kind of human being - not a freak, not a Jesus freak, or Krishna freak, or a Marxist freak but a totally different kind of human being who has completely, totally understood himself and has gone beyond himself.

So we have an image of ourselves. That image is part of our thought. That image shows superficially, outwardly, very little, but inwardly it is deeply seated - right? Whether that deep conditioning, that deep roots of the image can be exposed, understood and gone beyond. That is the problem that I would like to discuss this morning. You have understood my question?

I show myself very little outwardly, like an iceberg nine-tenths of it is below and one-tenth is above. What is below, hidden, secret, unexplored, never seen consciously, can that be completely exposed so that there is no contradiction between the outer and the inner, so that it is a total awareness, a total insight, so that the mind so fragmented, so broken up, can be free and whole, sane? That is my question. I do not know if you have ever put it to yourself and if you have not, we are putting it now and you have to face it. How you regard it, how you face it, depends on your intensity, on your interest, on your energy and vitality.

This image, this conclusion, which has various symbols, various names, which are irrelevant, we'll keep to that word image - those two words image and conclusion. This image is constantly receiving impressions, both outer and inner - right? Every word that is said in friendship or enmity has its effect. That image gets hurt from childhood - you are following all this? We human beings hurt each other terribly. That image which society, which thought, created gets not only hurt but also gets flattered. So there is this constant process of being hurt, resisting, building a wall round myself and whether the superficial hurts can be dealt with, which is comparatively easy, and we are asking whether the deep hurts of the human mind can be wiped away so that no mark of hurt is left - right? You are meeting me? You are hurt, aren't you, from childhood, when your mother, your father, your teacher, your aunt says, "You are not as good as your brother", "You are not as clever", "You don't look so nice", "You look like your aunt who is ugly". Don't you know all these things? And then at school you are compared with another boy, the marks, the standards, the comparison hurts you very deeply. When you compare one boy against another boy you are destroying that boy. So all those hurts remain, which in later life expresses itself in violence, in anxiety and so on - escapes from this hurt. And it escapes in illusion, which is another form of image, where in that illusion you will never be hurt, which is a state of neuroticism - right? Please look at yourself.

The words which the speaker are using are a mirror in which you are looking at yourself. Now whether those hurts can be freed completely, wiped out completely so that there is not a single mark of hurt left. And a mind which has been hurt and has understood, can never be hurt again - you understand the question? Because, after all innocence is a state of mind in which there is no hurt. The word, the meaning of that word 'innocent' means not to be hurt, not to hurt. Not the Christian meaning, the lamb and all that stuff. A mind that is not capable of being hurt and therefore doesn't hurt. You have understood? We will go into that.

How is this possible? I have been hurt all my life, I am sensitive

- you know what hurt is, the wounds that one receives, and what effect it has in later life. I have been hurt. I can deal with superficial hurts fairly intelligently. I know what to do. I either resist, build a wall around myself, so isolate myself so that I will never be hurt, grow a thick skin - which most people do. But behind that they are wounded deeply. One can deal with the hurts superficially, that is, not to build up any resistance, be superficially vulnerable - you are following? Because it is only a mind that is vulnerable that can never be hurt. You are following all this? Have you ever noticed a spring leaf? A new leaf just coming out after a heavy winter with the bright sun, and light and warmth, and that leaf is so tender, so alive and there are breezes, winds that can never tear it, it is there. That is vulnerable - you understand? I think one can intelligently bring this about outwardly, superficially. But the question is: how deeply can all the hurts be wiped away? That is: how can the unconscious hurts, which are deeply rooted, be wiped away? You understand? Can it be done through analysis? Please watch it carefully. If you see the truth of it once, you will never do anything but the right thing. Can these hurts be wiped away through analysis? You understand? The word 'analysis' means to break up, the root meaning - right? Break up. You have broken it up in analysis. Who is the entity that is analysing the broken parts? You are following all this? It is another part of thought, isn't it? Right? Thought itself is a fragment of the total. You are following all this? So one thought examines, analyses, the various fragments of other thoughts, which is to continue fragmentation. If you see that - you understand - if you have an insight into that you will never analyse. Have you got an insight into that?

Analysis means the analyser, time, and each analysis must be complete otherwise there is a remnant, and that remnant the next day examines - you follow? Therefore you are always dealing with the remnants, not with the complete end of analysis. You get it? And if you analyse, it takes months, days, years. So if you see the truth of it, the danger of it, then you will never indulge privately or publicly in any form of analysis. Can I go on from there? That means you have stopped analysing, collectively, individually or through a professional. So analysis is not going to expose the secret deep hurts - right? Then what will you do? I'll take, after hurts, other things, so please follow this carefully; what will you do? I will not analyse, I see the foolishness of it - not because the speaker says so, you yourself see it. Therefore what shall I do to expose it? Will dreams expose it? And are dreams necessary? The professional analysts and psychologists say, that you must have dreams otherwise you will go mad. Dreams are the continuation of what we are doing during the day, obviously. If you are not conscious of what you are doing during the day, our thoughts, our feelings, our reactions, playing with them, watching them - you know? - not taking them terribly seriously, watching them, then are dreams necessary when you go to sleep? You are following all this?

Then if analysis, dreams are not the way, then what is? How does the mind wipe away all the hurts, the hurts that one has received from friends, from casual acquaintances, from intimate relationships, how do you do this? Are you awaiting an answer from me? Are you? I am afraid you are. Now just a minute please, if there was nobody to answer it, you understand, nobody, what will you do? You have discovered for yourself analysis is not the way; you have discovered for yourself dreams have their value at a certain period of life but intrinsically they have no value. If they have no value, if during the day you are alive, watching, listening, you know, taking everything into account, going beyond the words, then dreams have very little value because during the day you are awake, during the day you are alive, full of energy, without any contradiction, watching every kind of contradiction, then when you go to sleep you will find dreams become unnecessary and therefore the brain has complete rest. It is the conflict during the day that destroys the mind, the brain. Oh, come on sirs.

And if you put order in your life during the day the brain hasn't got to put order during the night. You have understood? Come on, sirs, move! And order can only be brought about when you understand the disorder in which one lives. You understand? Understanding disorder, not, what is order. If you create order then it will be a blue print, won't it? Right? Whereas if you begin to understand the nature of disorder, about one's life, in one's life, the ugliness, the pettiness, the quarrels, the nagging, the gossip, the stupidities that go on in our life, everlastingly talking about opinions, and offering opinions - in understanding disorder naturally order comes in.

Now, if there is nobody to answer you, to tell you, and you are faced with this problem, which is: the deep hurts, how are they to be wiped away so that the mind can never be hurt - right? What is your answer? You, who are very clever people, read a great deal, can quote Freud, Jung and all the professionals, what is your answer? Please be honest, what is your answer? Would you honestly say that you don't know? Can you honestly say, "I really don't know how to answer that question". Can you? Now please be careful, can you, with truth, with integrity, say, "I really don't know"? Or is your mind still searching to find an answer in books, or in people who have said there is an answer. Are you following all this? Come on sirs. Can you say with truth that you have no answer for this, you really don't know? Right? If you really truthfully, honestly say, 'I really don't know. I have no answer. I have only the problem, I have no answer. I know what the problem is, I am fully aware of the meaning of that problem, the significance, the depth of that problem. I have looked at it, I have watched it, all round it, from different angles, I have looked, worried, examined, but I have no answer.' - right?

What makes it a problem - please listen carefully - what makes it a problem? Do you understand my question? A problem exists only when you want to resolve it. Right? Please listen carefully. I have a problem: my problem is I want to have a mind that is so clear, unhurt, not polluted, free, vital, full of beauty and energy. And I have examined, I have looked at it and I see analysis is not the way, dreams, examinations, going off to somebody to say, "Please help me" or following some guru who will say, "Forget all that, think about god" and all the rest of it. I see all that is of no value - right? So I have this left with me, and it has become a problem. And I say why has it become a problem. If I can't do anything about it, it is not a problem. You are following all this? It is only when I think I can do something about it, it becomes a problem. I don't know if you understand this?

If I actually know when I am confronted with a gigantic mountain, and I can't do anything about it, it is there, with that great height, dignity, majesty, full of stability, splendour - why should I make a problem of it? It is only when I want to go beyond it - right? Climb it, go beyond it, then it becomes a problem. You understand? But when I see that I can't do anything about this, is it a problem? You have understood? If it is not a problem then it is resolved, isn't it? This is not a trick please. It is the truth. It is not a trick. A river is flowing by, full, strong, heavy with water, it is only when I want to cross to the other side where I think there is more freedom, there is more beauty, there is more loveliness, peace and all the rest of it, the crossing the river becomes a problem - right? But I see I can't cross the river, I haven't got a boat, I can't swim, I don't know what to do. Therefore what happens to my mind? It is not content with remaining on this side - you understand? It has no problem. I wonder if you are getting all this? So my hurt is not a problem - right? Therefore I am not hurt - right? Oh, it is so simple if you see this. It is so simple that we refuse to see it.

Now leave that for the moment and look at another issue. Our image which we have about ourselves is created by society, by the culture in which we live. The culture says, compare, measure yourself against another - right? Compare yourself with the hero, with the saint, with a clever man, with a man who puts words onto pages, or sculpts, compare yourself from the beginning to the end - you are comparing, aren't you, no? Measuring yourself. And this measurement is part of our culture. And so you say to yourself, "I am clever, or I am dull" - you are dull in comparison with somebody who is clever. You are following all this? More learned, more subtle, more intelligent - when you have a measure there must be more or less. Right? That is part of our culture. Now I am asking myself: why do I have this measure? It has been given to me. Or I have carefully cultivated it myself - the bigger car, the bigger house, the bigger mind, the gradual process of attainment - you know. The whole process of our existence is based on measurement - the rich, the poor, you know, build it up, the man who is healthy, the man who is unhealthy, the man who is a saint and the sinner. Now can the mind live without measurement, which means comparison? Can you? Have you ever tried psychologically never to compare? You have to compare when you get a cloth, I am not talking about that. You have to compare a house, there it is necessary, but psychologically, which is part of our inheritance, like Jesus, like the Buddha - you follow - it is our inheritance. We are brought up from childhood to measure, which is part of our hurt - you are following? If I have no measurement, I am not hurt. Now what am I to do? I measure. You sit there and the speaker sits on the platform, there is a division, height and low - you follow? And you say, "By Jove, how does that man sitting there know so much? I know so little." You are following all this? This comparison, everlasting. And when you compare you become inferior or superior.

And in comparison you come to a conclusion, and that conclusion brings about neurotic habits. I conclude about something - right - through comparison and I hold on to that comparison, that conclusion, irrespective of facts, of what is real. Because I have compared, I have watched, I have learned, I hold on. Haven't you noticed it? And that is a state of neuroticism, isn't it? Now why do I compare? Partly habit, partly inheritance, partly it is profitable, and through comparison I feel I am alive because I am struggling - right? I am fighting to be like you, and that gives me vitality. I get depressed and all the rest of it. So I am asking myself, is it possible to live a life in which there is no comparison at all, and yet not be satisfied?

The moment I do not compare is there satisfaction in 'what is' - you follow? Or when I cease to compare then I am face to face with 'what is', and when I compare it is an escape from 'what is' - right? And therefore it is a waste of energy and I need energy, there must be energy to face 'what is' - you are following all this? So am I dissipating energy through comparison? And if I am, and I have an insight into all this, which is your insight, not mine, then you have energy which is not wasted through comparison, measurement, feeling inferior, superior, depressed and all the rest of it. Therefore you have energy to face what actually is, which is yourself. How do you know that you are dull, or unintelligent? Because you are comparing with somebody else and therefore you say, "I am unintelligent"? If you don't compare, are you dull? Only you don't know so you begin to face things. Come on sirs, move!

So we have many, many images, a collection of images, religious, economic, social, images based on relationship and so on. These images are deep down conclusions. And if I do not analyse or use dreams as a means of analysis, if I am awake during the day and watch, then the problem is non-existent. I wonder if you see this? Thought has created the problem. Thought that says, "Yes, that is so, I compare, I have images, I have been hurt, I must go beyond it" - it is thought that is saying it, it is thought that created these images - right? So thought is creating the problem about the images - you are following? And when you see the truth of it, then thought doesn't make it a problem - right? For god's sake see how extraordinarily simple and subtle and beautiful it is. If you see that once, it is finished. Then you have energy to face actually what is.

So then you can say, "What am I?" If I am no longer comparing - you follow? - no longer imitating, comparison means imitating, conformity, if there are no hurts, no conclusions and therefore no image, what am I? I am all these things - right? The thought that says, "I must analyse, I must go beyond this, I am in conflict, I must" - you follow? It is thought that created all these images, divisions, and it is thought that says, "I must go beyond all this to live a peaceful, heavenly, quiet life of enlightenment". It is not enlightenment, it is just an idea of enlightenment. And then: what am I? Do you understand? Am I the word? Am I the description? You understand? Am I the thought, which is the response of accumulated memory, experience, knowledge, which are all words - you follow - symbols, ideas, you are following all this? Then the mind is completely empty - right? Can the mind face this complete not being? You have understood? It is the wanting to be that is the problem. I wonder if you are getting all this? If you can't I must go on, so. Take what you can, what you can't, let go.

Civilization says to me: be something, success, join this community, grow long hair, short hair, take drugs, don't take drugs, go to church, don't go to church, be free, think independently - you follow? The society, whether it is small or large, is forcing me to conform to a pattern. And the pattern is my image, I am that image.

I am the image that is described by the professionals, by myself, when I am alone, the agonies of that image, the jealousies, the fears, the pleasures; when I see all this image is what makes the mind so utterly superficial - right? Do you agree? Are you aware that your mind is superficial? Or are you agreeing with the description of the superficial mind?

So can the mind be without comparison, without conformity? I conform when I put on trousers - right? When I go to India I don't conform, I put on some other cloth. I have to conform at a certain level - right? Keep to the left side of the road, or the right side of the road - you are following all this? But psychologically there is no conformity any more. Because this urge to conform is the product of the society in which I live, the image which I have built in myself with the help of others. And I see that image can be hurt, it is the image that is hurt. And it is that image that in comparison feels great or small, inferior or superior. And when there is no measurement, is there an image? Therefore the mind is capable of living without a single image, and therefore incapable of ever being hurt. Do you see it? Then only can I have relationship. I may want that relationship - I have that relationship with you but you may be hurt, you may have an image about me - you follow - and you refuse to move from that image. Then the battle begins - you are following all this? You have no image but I have an image. And I refuse to give up my image because I love my image, that's my neuroticism, that's my conclusion. And where is the relationship between you and me? You understand? There isn't any. You say you must have relationship. The neurotic person says always that you must have relationship with everybody. How can you have relationship with me who have got an image, and I am holding on to that image. I don't know whether you follow all this?

So the mind is capable of living without a single image and therefore without any conclusion so it can never be hurt, or be in a state of measurement. It is only such a mind that is innocent and therefore free - right?

Do you want to ask any questions about this, about what we have been discussing?

You know the speaker said previously, the content of consciousness is consciousness - you understand? What it contains makes for consciousness - right? Have you understood that? My consciousness is made up of nationalism, I have been educated - you follow - innumerable things. The content makes up consciousness. And therefore the content makes the borders of that consciousness, fixes the borders, the frontiers, draws the line because of its content, how wide, how narrow, consciousness is - right? If there are no contents, which are measurement, ideas - you follow - then what is consciousness? Does this interest you? No sirs, it doesn't. I only know consciousness as the 'me' in conflict - right? If there is no problem, no conflict, what is consciousness? Then there is no border is there, there is no frontier is there? There is no demarcation made by the content. Then there is space, isn't there? Space without a centre, therefore no circumference. You see it, don't you? You know that is what love is - we'll go into it the day after tomorrow - because love has no dimension - I mustn't go into it now.

Q: All effort to unify in this conditioned state results in further diversity. If this is so, is it the negation you speak of, and if it is can one use the residual energy as one pleases or will it result in regeneration?

K: The questioner says: we are always trying to unify, to bring about unity in a mind that is conditioned - right? That is what the questioner says. I am conditioned and you are conditioned and we want to bring about a unity between you and me. I am conditioned as a drug taker - all my experiences, all my etc. And you don't take drugs but you are conditioned in a different way. And we are trying to establish a unity. You are a Catholic and I am a Hindu - you follow? Establish unity. You know the other day one of the high dignitaries of the Church, Anglican Church, very high, he was being interviewed and he was asked: what do you think of all the various religions that exist in the world? "Oh," he said, "they have some truth in them, they are all right." But the questioner said, "What do you mean 'all right'? What do you mean they have truth?" "Oh," he said, "partly probably, a great deal" and he began to expiate, enlarge on that. Then he said, "You know what is remarkable? We have the only thing that matters in our religion, which is Jesus Christ, and nobody else has got it." You understand? High dignitary, 20th century - I'll leave it at that!

Now can there be unity between two conditioned minds? Or will it not be inevitable that there will be conflict between two conditionings? You understand? Conditioning implies division. Where there is division there must be conflict. If you are my wife, I am your husband, or I am the wife, and you have your own ambitions, and your own greeds, and I have my own, I am conditioned, you are conditioned. So though we are married, we have children together, and all the rest of the business, we two are separate conditioned human beings - right? And how can there be unity between us? And because there isn't there is everlasting battle between us. Right? All the Women Lib., and all that is going on in the world.

So there can be unity only when there is no division. You follow? It is so simple. I am divided because of my images, of my conclusions, my opinions - right? When I have no conclusion, no image, there is no division. Sir, that is love, you understand?

Now we, being conditioned, spend our energy in strife - right - in wars, in battles, all that is going on in the world. And that is a tremendous waste of energy. Though that waste of energy may be productive - you understand? - because I may have a little talent to write a book and I become, you know, I sustain my vanity through the book. So when there is no division, because I see the fact, the truth, that where there is division, which is conclusion, image, comparison, all the rest of it, that division must inevitably create conflict - if I have an insight, if I see the truth of that - then I have an enormous amount of energy to act totally differently - you understand? Right.

Q: You say free and together. Would you please go a little further into this idea of together.

K: The idea of together! I can't go into the idea of together. You understand? Then it remains an idea and how can you go further in an idea, which means more ideas - you understand? - but you can't go into it. You can only go into it if you have no ideas. I don't know if you follow this?

Now I said this morning when we were talking, I said we are sharing together, aren't we, you understand? We are sharing together our problem. We are talking over together. That means you and I are both interested in the problem - right? We both are concerned with the problem, we both together are examining the problem - not you don't examine and I examine, then you share what I examine, that is not together - right? Together implies moving together, that is, thought with thought, feeling with feeling, intensity with intensity, together. Don't you know what it means to be together? I doubt it. That means sharing - right - partaking, investigating, examining, thinking together, therefore there is no division - the one who thinks, the one who doesn't think, then there is division. But we are both of us at the same time, at the same level, with the same intensity looking at a problem, we are together. Right? And this is possible only when you give your life to this - and this is our life.

Q: You speak of the authority of beliefs, but never, hardly ever, at great depth of all that is involved in the authority of money, slavery, oppression, fear and violence.

K: By Jove, you can ask questions, can't you?

The questioner says you talk about authority but you never, hardly ever go into the authority of money, the authority of domination, the authority of slavery, poverty and so on. Right?

Now what is the central issue in this problem? There is the authority of money, the authority of those who have power, religious and non-religious, the authority of the man who owns the property on which I live - right - the authority of social division, the authority of injustice and so on. The authority. What is the central issue involved in this? There is not only the psychological authority - you understand - of the priest, Karl Marx, you know, outward authority of knowledge, science, physics; then there is also inward authority - the authority which I assume, because I know better than you do, I see more clearly than you do, I happen to sit on many platforms therefore I assume tremendous authority. And there is the authority of the man who owns the house in which I live, he can throw me out any day - right? So there is this tremendous complex authority. Now where shall I begin? You understand? Are you meeting me? Where shall I begin to tackle this enormous complex authority which exists outside as well as inside? Go on sirs, tell me, where shall I begin. You have asked the question, I want to go into it. Where shall I begin? Out there? That is, the authority of the money, the authority of property, the authority which the poor have and the rich have? Where will you deal with it sirs? You are very silent. My question is sir: where shall I begin? I see there is the authority of money - keep to that one thing because money implies all the other things. Now there is the authority of money and then there is the authority of ideas, of beliefs, ideas. So there is the authority of money outwardly, and there is the authority of tremendous knowledge, of which I am part. Now I see the danger of authority, don't I? Right? You understand? The danger of authority, because it enslaves the mind. If I am born, as I was, very poor, poverty is a degradation, it destroys. So power of money is tremendous; so is the power of idea - right? Marx, Jesus, Buddha, whatever it is. So I say to myself, where shall I begin to understand this vast complex problem of authority? Where shall I begin? Attack money? You understand? Throw bombs at those people who have money, who have houses, burn them up, kill people because my authority says, that is wrong? right? So where shall I begin. There or here? There is created by this (pointing to here) because I want that authority, I want the authority of money - no? I want the authority of property.

So I have to tackle the authority from where I am. Where I am is the nearest, therefore I can begin there, not out there because I can't do anything about that. I can, I think I can by electing the right President, or the right Minister and when I put faith in any politician I am done, finished, I am destroyed. So I don't put faith in any politician, in any priest, in any idea, or in any power.

Therefore I say I must begin here. That is, I want to find out why my mind worships authority in me or out there. You follow all this? Why do I accept and worship and demand authority? Why do you demand it sirs? Don't you demand it? Be honest. You do. Why do you demand it? Is it the basic issue of great pleasure? To own property, doesn't it give you tremendous pleasure? Though you have all the complications of taxes. And does it give you prestige, a position - no? Oh come on sirs. Have you noticed a man who has got plenty of ideas, who has written books, well known, what power he has? And don't you want to be like that bird?

So we all worship power, in different forms. So to bring about a totally different kind of society, a different kind of culture, each one of us must understand, have an insight, into this question of authority. And to be free of authority, you understand? - not just talk endlessly about it. Right sirs.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 25TH JULY 1972

I would like this morning, if I may, to talk about something which seems to me rather important. We have been talking during the last two or three discourses about the whole structures and nature of thought, and what role, beneficial and destructive, it plays in one's life. I think we ought to go this morning into the question of suffering, not only the physical ailments, the pain, old age and disease and accident, but also the whole psychological meaning of suffering. This has been one of the great problems of human beings, and apparently one has not been able to solve it. One has run away from it, given various explanations - and the explanations are never the real thing. And one has avoided it, rationalized it, but it still remains. And if we could this morning spend some little time together over this question perhaps it might be very beneficial.

The Christian world has accepted sorrow and worships it in the form of a person. And the eastern world has various logical and illogical explanations. But man remains in sorrow, not only personal sorrow but also the immense collective sorrow - the sorrow of wars, what is going on in Vietnam, thousands are being killed, children are being burnt, not only in Vietnam but also during the last war millions were killed in Russia under Stalin - you know all that business. And there is this immense collective sorrow, it is like an enormous cloud. And also there is a personal, individual, human sorrow, which is caused by a sense of frustration, not being able to resolve any problems of our life, living always in ignorance - ignorance in the sense not of book knowledge but ignorance of oneself, of what is going on within? And apparently when one considers all this, quite objectively, non-sentimentally, why is it man, that is you and I, human beings right throughout the world, have not been able to resolve this question? Because without going beyond sorrow there is no love. Sorrow creates a circle round itself, either through self-pity, through a sense of frustration, through comparison - I was happy and I am not now - the sorrow of losing somebody whom you think you love. This whole question of human sorrow - collective, the result of human appalling behaviour towards other human beings, what the wars have done, what tyrannies have done, not only the recent tyrannies but of the past - when you put all this together, your own particular sorrow and the enormous sorrow of mankind, one observes how mankind, how human beings, you, escape from this, avoid this, never come directly into contact. And without understanding it, going into it, resolving it, however much one may seek or demand, or enquire into the nature of love, it seems to me that it is impossible to find out what love is without the ending of sorrow. And if we may this morning, let us go into it.

What is sorrow? You have suffered, both physically and psychologically. You have suffered when you have seen children starving, poverty, what human beings have done to animals, to the earth, to the air, how they kill each other at the least provocation - for their country, for their god, for their kings, queens, for their religion. And one has suffered oneself - someone whom you love, whom you think you love, has gone and there is this sense of enormous loneliness, isolation, lack of companionship, the utter sense of feeling forlorn. I am sure most of us have felt this at a crisis or vaguely in moments of unawareness. Unless one totally understands it, goes beyond it, there can never be wisdom. Wisdom comes with self knowledge, or with the ending of sorrow. Wisdom you can't buy in books or from another. It comes only when there is self knowing and therefore the ending of sorrow.

Now why does one suffer? One can understand when we have physical pain, we are not talking about that, you can do something about it, or put up with it intelligently without becoming neurotic. That is, if I have constant physical pain, a sense of agony during the day and night, without distorting the mind that pain can be understood and lived with, without bringing about an action which is not only neurotic but also contradictory, aggressive, expressing itself in violence and so on. That kind of physical pain we can bear, tolerate, understand and do something about it logically and perhaps also illogically, which is sanely and insanely. But we are talking about together, it is not my problem please, it is your problem, we are discussing it together: what is sorrow, why does one suffer? Will the discovery of the cause of suffering end suffering? One may suffer because one is desperately lonely. In that loneliness one has no sense of relationship with another, it is a total isolation and one feels this perhaps when you are alone in your room, in the middle of the night, or when you are in a crowd, sitting in a bus, or at a party, you feel suddenly utterly, hopelessly deserted by everybody and there you are utterly empty, utterly isolated. Haven't you felt all these things? This loneliness is very painful and we escape from it through various forms - churches, social work, marriage - you know - children, companionship, drugs, anything to escape from this great sense of isolation.

Now how do you resolve this? We will go into it step by step. We are doing this together please. It is not that I want to speak about it, therefore I am pushing it on to you, but it is a problem of every living human being whether rich or poor, whether tyrants, or the most dominated slavish people. Now how does one go beyond this sense of utter loneliness, which is one of the factors of great sorrow? I don't know if you have gone into it, if you have even looked at this problem. Our gods, our churches, our literature, our ceremonies - you know, all the circus that goes on round us, (including the Olympia Circus - I saw an advertisement this morning, as we were going along) is brought about to give us comfort. That has been the function of the priest, to help us tolerate this ugly life and promising a new life in heaven. And so that becomes a marvellous escape from this sense of utter despairing lonely existence. Although we may be married with children and all the rest of it, there is this isolation, which has been carefully built up through our daily activities, the self centred existence culminating in this isolation. Now what is one to do? You understand my question? What is one to do? How is one to resolve this problem?

First of all, just look at the problem clearly. I am lonely because in my life, daily life, I have been ambitious, greedy, envious, making myself terribly important, isolating myself, although I might have a wife or husband and all the rest of it. And this self-centred activity ultimately brings about this isolation, this sense of utter empty loneliness. If you have not felt it, you are not a human being. Right? Because we have escaped from it and so you are blind. And we escape in various forms from one of the central issues of our life - religions offer - you know the whole escapes that we have very carefully established through thought - our religions, our systems of meditation, our social work, the despairing, destructive, appalling wars, killing animals and all the rest of it, is the product of thought.

Now what is a human being, you, to do when you are confronted, when you are aware of this sense of loneliness, which is one of the factors of sorrow? You understand? During our daily existence we expend energy in being concerned with ourselves, and that energy is dissipated in activities which ultimately block all expressions of energy, and that is loneliness. I don't know if you follow all this? You are with me? Shall I go on? We are together in this? Loneliness is after all a blocking of all energy. Before I was aware that I was lonely and I expended energy in escapes of various kinds - trivial, nonsensical, brutal, so-called spiritual, which is nonsense. And this expanse of energy has kept me going, and I suffer through loneliness and the energy is completely blocked. I don't know if you realize this. It is quite interesting. And when this energy is not expended through escapes then energy is concentrated. And when you don't escape there is passion - you understand? Passion. There are various kinds of passion - sexual passion, passion for trying to be great, trying to be better, trying to improve, trying to become some idiotic person.

So I realize, one realizes that any form of escape, any form - subtle, conscious, unconscious, deliberate, by act of will - any form of escape doesn't resolve this problem. On the contrary, it makes it worse because from that escape you do all kinds of absurd irrational activities. Whereas if there is no escape because you see the truth of it, you have an insight into it, then this whole sense of loneliness disappears and something else takes place, which is that sense of passion. You know that word 'passion', the root meaning of that word is sorrow. It is rather curious, isn't it? When there is sorrow and no escape from it - there are very subtle forms of escapes - when there is no escape whatsoever that sorrow becomes passion.

And we are enquiring also, why one suffers, apart from loneliness, why does one suffer? Through self pity? Do you know what self pity is? And is that one of the reasons why one suffers? Again self pity is concern with oneself: you have such a beautiful life and I have not. You are so brilliant, you are so famous, you are so etc.etc., and I have nothing, my life is shoddy, petty, small. So through comparison, through measurement I feel small, inferior, and that is one of the causes of sorrow. You are following all this? Now can the mind put an end to itself, that is thought as measurement and therefore no self pity whatsoever? So please do this as we go along.

What are the other factors that bring sorrow in human life? I want to love. I love you and you don't love me, and I want more love from you, I feel I must be loved by you, you are the only person who can love me and nobody else. I shut the door on everybody else, but I accept you, I will keep my door open to you; and you look the other way. Doesn't this happen to all of you? And you spend your life in sorrow, in bitterness, in anger, jealousy, you know, fury, frustrated, because you insist on going through one door! And you find that you are not loved. I don't know if you see what a terrible thought that is: that you are not loved. You understand this? Isn't it appalling to feel that you are not loved? Have you ever noticed a flower on the wayside, the beauty of it, the colour of it? It has a perfume and it isn't asking you to look at it, it isn't asking you to smell it, it is there. But we human beings have this machinery of thought, which says, "I must be loved, I haven't got enough love", or "I must love you". So one of the factors of our sorrow is the sense of not being loved. Isn't that so? Right? And we demand that love be expressed in a certain way - sexually or in companionship, or in friendship, platonically or physically. Which all indicates, doesn't it, a human mind demands that it have a relationship with another based on its own urgency - right? - and so this prevents the love coming into being. We said: there is love only when there is the ending of sorrow. Love cannot exist within the circle, or within the field of sorrow.

And sorrow exists also when there is fear. So one has to go into this question of fear. Why are human beings, or a particular human being, why does he fear, what does he fear? What does fear mean basically? The sense of insecurity - right? Are you meeting me? A child demands security, complete security: and more and more the mother and the father are working, homes broken up, the parents are so deeply concerned about themselves, their position in society, having more money, more refrigerators, more cars, more this and more that, they have no time to give complete security for the child. Don't you know all this? Security is one of the essential things of life, not only for you and me, but for everybody. Those who live in the ghettos, those who live in palaces and so on, security is absolutely necessary otherwise the brain can't function efficiently, sanely. Watch this process, how this happens - I need security, I must have food, clothes and shelter, so must everybody. And if I am lucky I can arrange it physically. But psychologically it becomes much more difficult to become secure, completely. So I seek that security in a belief, in a conclusion, in nationality, in a family, or in my experience, and when that experience, when that family, when my belief is threatened there is fear - all right? There is fear when I have to face danger, psychological danger which is uncertainty, meeting something I don't know, the tomorrow, there is fear. And there is fear when I am comparing myself with you who are, I think, greater.

So can the mind have security? Can the brain have complete security in which every form of fear has come to an end? Please listen to this. I am afraid because I demand, I see that security in the sense of a brain that cannot be disturbed, so that it can function effectively, sanely, rationally, and when it cannot there is fear. I see that, very clearly. Now how is the brain to find complete security so that there is no fear - you have understood? Please meet me. How is your brain, from which your thought, your existence, your whole being, begins, how is that brain and the mind, which are the same thing, how is that to have total security so that at no time consciously, or unconsciously, it is ever caught in fear, fear which is uncertainty, fear which is not knowing, or incapable of finding out? Now how is this to take place? Will there be security in any belief, in any conclusion, in any opinion, in any knowledge? Obviously not, though human beings have tried those things.

So can the mind realize that there is no security in the things that thought projects? You understand? Thought has projected belief, thought has projected conclusions, thought has created the dogmas, the rituals, the saviours, you know this whole psychological outward conclusion upon which it relies. And when those are threatened there is terrible fear. And most intelligent awake people have put all that aside, not perhaps completely but some of them have. They no longer go to churches, no longer accept any form of Marxian theory and so on and so on.

So how is the mind to be secure? Because that is absolutely necessary, because that is one of the major causes of fear. So what is intelligence? You understand? Because if the mind is intelligent there is no fear. If the mind is capable of meeting life intelligently (I am going to find out what intelligence is presently) - if the mind is intelligent, awake, then it can meet any situation without fear, therefore the mind itself becomes the sense of security - you understand? The mind, as it exists now, is confused. We don't know what to do, we don't know what to think, we have put our faith in something and that has failed, we have believed in something that has broken down. We have relied on tradition, that has gone. We relied on friends, on relationships, on family, everything is broken down. And the mind is utterly confused, uncertain, seeking, asking and that is why most of you are here - no?

So what shall a mind do that is confused? A mind that is confused mustn't do a thing - right? I don't know if you understand this. Because whatever it does out of that confusion will be confused. Whatever choice it makes must be confused. Whatever leaders it follows it must be confused. The leaders must be confused too otherwise you wouldn't accept. You are following all this? If you are following somebody, your guru, the guru must be confused because you are confused, otherwise you wouldn't follow him - right? Oh do see all this! Give your heart to this, be passionate about it and you will find out. So what do you do when you are confused? We generally ask somebody to help us to be clear, read some philosophy and escape through that and so on and so on, which are all the actions of confusion, and therefore are bound to lead to more confusion, more misery, more conflict. So what am I to do when I know I am confused? I know there must be complete security. I am confused therefore I will not do a thing. You understand? I am confused because I thought I could do something to clear out this confusion - right? You understand? And I thought I could go beyond confusion but the entity that says, I am going beyond my confusion is part of the confusion, and is the creator of this confusion. I don't know if you follow all this? Therefore thought, which has brought about confusion, says, "I can't do a thing about it" - you understand? The moment it realizes it cannot do anything about it, it is out of confusion. So the mind then becomes very clear.

And as we said, we have put our faith, our belief in something, faith in education, in science, in politics, in religion, everything has failed. If you don't see that you are not aware.

Now where shall the mind find its own security? It finds its own security when it sees what is false, what is illusion, when it has no insight - the moment it has an insight that very insight is that security, which is intelligence. You have got it? I see, have an insight, I am aware, I see the truth that any kind of organized religion is destructive. That is the truth. And the very perception of that is security. I see very clearly, have an insight that in relationship if there is an image between you and me, that image prevents relationship. The insight into that is the security. I see, there is the perception, that any form of escape from loneliness is destructive, has no value, that very perception is security and this is intelligence. So there is complete security in this intelligence. You are getting it? Therefore fear doesn't exist. You are following this?

That is, one is afraid, not only of darkness, not only of physical pain, not only of what people say about you, there is fear of death, of life, of almost everything, and there is not only conscious fears but the hidden fears, which you suddenly discover. And you don't know what to do, how to deal with them - not only the conscious fears but also the unconscious deep rooted fears. Now how shall the mind deal with them? Because I see very clearly that any fear, any fear, physical or psychological, any fear brings about a state of darkness, a state of misery, confusion, ugliness, sorrow. You know all this. I see it - you understand? It is not an intellectual perception but actual perception that fear in any form is the most destructive thing. And there is deep rooted fear inherited through the culture, through my family, through the religions and so on - fear. Now how shall I deal with them? Has fear many heads or only one head? You have understood my question? Has fear many expressions, or only one expression which seems different? Are you getting tired of all this? You are following all this? Shall the mind analytically pursue every fear, every form of fear, every expression of fear? Or is there only one central fear? You have to find out, haven't you? Do the many facets of fear make the whole of fear, or is there only fear, one root of it that expresses itself in a different variety of ways? I can see that tracing one fear, expression of fear, comes to a central issue. Take one fear which you have and go into it very deliberately watching it, if you can watch it, if you can objectify it and remain with it, not escape from it, look at it, go into it step by step and you find the root. And you take another fear and are the roots different? Or is there only one root with different branches, like a tree? If I can understand that one root completely then it is finished. You are following all this? Fear of death, fear of loneliness, fear of losing my job, fear of not being able to talk the day after tomorrow. You understand? Fear of falling ill. Are they the various movements of this central fear? Or there is only one fear, the root of it, like an expanding tree. And if the mind can go into that deeply, into the very complex root system, then the examination of various fears has no value - you are following this?

Now can the mind - listen to this - can the mind look at this total root, not the various expressions of that root but the total root system? It can only observe that root system completely when the mind is not concerned with the solution of a particular fear - right? Oh come on sirs. I am afraid of what my wife is going to say, I am afraid of losing my job, I am afraid of not being able to fulfil myself in some blasted little work. And I examine each one of them and I come to the root thing, which is the desire, the will to be - please follow this - the desire to be, the will to assert. And this desire to be, this demand for existence in that root system is the factor that brings the various other fears. So can my mind look at this fear, live with it, not try to change it, because the moment I exert will upon it, or choice upon it, my mind is working from a confusion, from a conclusion, trying to go beyond it, therefore conflict and conflict feeds fear. Come on sirs.

So is the mind capable of looking at this whole fear, not only the expressions but the root? You understand what that means? Looking at the whole tree of existence in which one of the factors is fear. Now how do you look at something totally, you understand? - not only the particular fear but the root fear, not only your particular idiosyncratic fears, your fears of various kinds, but the total human fear. How do you look at it? So we have to see what does it mean to look at something totally? You understand? Come on sirs. We are meeting each other? Or are you going to sleep?

We are asking the mind, which is fragmented, the 'me' and not the 'me', 'we' and 'they', my house, your house, my god, your god and my system and your system, my guru and your guru, my politics - the mind fragmented, how can such a mind look at the whole thing, at any whole problem? Unless it can look at the totality of it, it cannot resolve it, it cannot go beyond it. So how is - not how, not the means - when does the perception of the total take place? That can only happen when thought, which in its very nature is fragmentary, which in its very nature must create confusion, and because of thought I am frightened of tomorrow - you follow - when that thought realizes that it is fragmentary, it cannot perceive the total, then that insight is perception of the truth - right? You see it? By Jove I am working very hard. I wonder why I am working so hard, don't you? I don't want a thing from you, not your money, your looks, your flattery, your insults, nothing. Thank god! Therefore I can talk because I want to - you follow?

So, can the mind observe without the observer, which is thought, can the mind observe the total fear? And when the mind is so capable of observing total fear, is there fear? Do please look at it - total fear which means not only the unconscious but the conscious fears, the total. That means the mind is the total - I don't know if you see this - not the total fear. The mind that is capable of looking at something wholly, that mind has no fear, obviously.

You know when we are talking about fear we must also go into the question of pleasure, enjoyment, joy and a sense of beauty in which there is no demand for expression. Does this interest you, all this? You see most of us pursue and cultivate pleasure. We are not saying pleasure is right or wrong. We are just investigating, looking at it. Our philosophy, our religion, our social structure, our morality is based on pleasure - the ultimate pleasure is god. Now what is wrong with it? What is wrong with pleasure - which everybody wants? And in the pursuit of it, if there is no fulfilment of pleasure then there is pain, there is fear, there is violence, brutality - everything follows. So the mind must always find out about fear and pleasure - the two dominating factors in our life.

What is pleasure? We have sufficiently enquired into fear. What is pleasure? Is it related to love? Is it related to enjoyment? Is it related to joy? Or is pleasure, the pursuit of it, the product of thought? You are following this? I enjoy tremendously looking at a mountain - the delight of it, the beauty of it, the dignity of it, the majesty of it, the glacier, the deep valleys which are blue and the upright standing pines, the whole beauty of it I enjoy, looking out of the window or from a height to see the beauty of all that. There is a stimulation which brings a great delight. I go away from it but the memory of that delight, of that mountain remains. Then the memory, as thought, says, "I must go there again tomorrow morning and look at it" - that is pleasure. You have understood? That is, a delight that is natural, normal, healthy, sane, a delight pursued by thought turns into pleasure, which must be repeated, and when it is not repeated there is pain, frustration and so on and so on and so on - right? So again there is an insight that thought breeds fear as well as pleasure, gives it a continuity. The insight into that brings about an intelligent awareness of fear and pleasure, not the denial of one or the other. Are you following all this? Am I saying too much in one talk? I must go on.

Then what is joy? Is pleasure desire, love? And there cannot be love if there is not the understanding of going beyond sorrow, the understanding of fear and pleasure.

And what is joy? Can the mind invite joy? Or does it happen when you are not looking for it? And when it does happen then thought steps in and says, "I must have more of it", and therefore it becomes pleasure. I don't know if you are following all this? See how extraordinary the whole thing is, what thought does. So love can only be when the other is not - right? Through negation you come to the positive. The understanding of fear, of security, of sorrow, the whole pursuit of endless pleasure, when you see the totality of all this and go beyond it and you know what love is.

Perhaps you would like to ask some questions.

Q: How may one help another in a given crisis?

K: I object most strenuously to the word 'help'. Who am I to help you? Do listen to this carefully. You can help me in the kitchen, you can help me in driving a car. The questioner is not asking that. He says, how can I help another in a crisis? Who am I to help? Why do I think I can help? Please I am asking this seriously, don't brush it aside. I say, "I can help you" - is it my vanity? Do I know more than you do, and if I do know more about the crisis than you do, can I help you to understand that crisis? I can only verbally talk about it. You understand? I can communicate with you about the crisis verbally, but can I help you to go beyond the crisis? Or you have to do it. It sounds cruel.

So what am I to do when you are suffering? You understand? Crisis is some kind of sorrow, some kind of pain, some kind of fear. What am I to do to help you to understand that crisis? That is the question, isn't it? What am I to do? Come on sirs. I talk to you about it. It matters very much how I talk to you about it - sentimentally, emotionally, trying to comfort you - does that help? So what shall I do? Give you my sympathy? Hold your hand? Does that help you to face the crisis? Can I give you so-called strength to face the crisis, cheer you up? What shall I do? Come on, please tell me. I am in sorrow, my son is dead, gone, or my husband or whatever it is, what will you do with me, I am in tears, full of self pity, sense of loneliness, I feel I have lost everything that I had? You can hold my hand. Give me a book to read that will give me comfort. Will that solve any of the problem for me?

All perhaps you can do is to be quiet and if you love, you know what that means to love, be in that quiet affectionate state, you can't do any more can you? But to love is one of the greatest things in life. And to do that, to have that sense of compassion, passion for everybody, love, you must understand yourself, you must know yourself - yourself who is in sorrow, self-centred activity, lonely, miserable, frightened - you follow - you are all that. If you understand yourself then you will have wisdom how to deal with another. But don't if I may suggest, don't start out wanting to help somebody. The missionaries want to help people. You ought to go to the eastern countries and see them. They do help people, only they bring another burden with them for the people to bear. They have their own burdens, their own gods, their own beliefs, so they bring another set of beliefs, another god. And there begins a lot of misery and confusion.

Q: Is it because we have not your insight that we ask you to do something that we cannot do ourselves?

K: I have no insight. Who told you I have insight? I really mean it. Who has told you? We are sharing the insight together, it is not mine, nor yours. Do please see this. It is not my insight I am sharing with you, it is insight for both of us; then it is not mine, or yours. It is insight. It is intelligence. If there is that intelligence between us then we will do the thing, then we will do the right action, then we will create a new world, a new human being and so on.

Q: Could you please talk a little about the nature of indecision.

K: That is not being able to decide, indecision. It is only a confused mind that wants to decide. Right? Do you see it? If I am confused I say, "I must do something". If I am clear there is no decision, there is only action. Oh come on sirs. It is only when I am uncertain what to do, what to think, how to act, uncertain, when there is uncertainty there must be choice. Then choice is based on my uncertainty, which is indecision and being undecided I decide to do something. I don't know if you all following all this. So out of confusion you must have a choice of decision. When there is clarity there is no decision. Right? Isn't it simple? Really it is extraordinarily simple if you look at it, live with it.

I have never decided anything in my life - coming to the talks, or not giving talks, nothing in my life. I didn't say, "I must give up property" - you understand? Or I must do this, or I must do that, or I must not - never. There is beauty in that because decision means will, doesn't it? I decide. Decision implies contradiction. Between two things you have to decide - who is that entity that decides? Thought? Of course. But thought has created this division - right? Thought has created this uncertainty between whether I should do this or that.

Q: Is indecision not there at all?

K: Of course there is. I am pointing out that there is indecision only when there is no clarity. You know, look I don't know how to go to Bern or Montreux, I don't know how to get there so I ask - right? If I know it, I don't ask, there is no decision, I follow the road. Now can my mind be so clear that there is no asking, deciding anything - you follow? That is freedom isn't it?

So can my mind, which is so confused, so fragmented, so broken up, can that mind be completely clear? It can only be clear when I see the totality of my mind - the totality, not the various fragments of it, or put all the fragments to make a whole. When I see, when the mind sees the total fragmentation, how these fragments are brought about, why they are in contradiction, non-analytically - you understand - you can see all of that at one glance - you can do that only when the mind doesn't allow thought to come into it, when thought doesn't interfere in your observation, because thought is the entity, is the factor that brings about fragmentation.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 27TH JULY 1972

We have been talking over together the whole nature of thought. And we ought to talk over together this morning and try to discover for ourselves, what is the state of mind that is not afraid, that is not pursuing the demands of pleasure, that can enjoy without making joy into a pleasure; and what is the quality of a mind that can understand, have an insight into the question of death; what it means to live completely totally; and perhaps also come upon the question of what is love.

We have been talking in fair detail how our brain and our mind works, how important it is to have complete security; it is only then that the brain can function normally, sanely and healthily. We said that the brain tries to find out if there is a security in belief, in dogmas, in conclusions and hopes to find it in them, and so becomes terribly attached to them - attached to a belief, dogma, conclusion, to opinions. And discovering, if it is at all awake, that security, certainty, the quality of assurance, doesn't lie in any of these, then it tries to invent an illusion, an illusion that intellectually, emotionally, will be satisfactory. I don't know if you have not observed this process that is going on all the time in our life: trying to find in relationship security, certainty and not finding it in them, then come to a conclusion and it becomes attached to that conclusion and when that conclusion is questioned, disturbed, then it runs away from it to another series of conclusions, and gradually the mind begins to attach itself to things - right? So there is attachment to property, to people or to ideas.

And as we grow older there is this question of death. And I think we shall understand the deep meaning of that word if we could go into this question of attachment. Why the human mind, our mind, your mind, is attached to property, to people, to ideas - ideas being conclusions, opinions, traditions, a formula, which are all put together by thought, either in the form of an image, symbol which is the word, or a nebular visionary illusion. Why is the mind attached to all these things? If you are not attached to an illusion or to a person then you are attached to property - property whether it is a house, a piece of land or accumulated furniture - you know all that kind of stuff - why? What makes the mind, the thought cling to something like property, money? When we use the word 'property' it includes all that - why? Because as we said the other day, mere enquiry into the causation doesn't free the mind from the cause. Intellectually you can break down by analysis why the mind is attached to property, but at the end of it there is still attachment. That attachment comes to an end if we have an insight into the whole structure of attachment. Because to have an insight into something, to see the truth of something brings its own freedom, brings its own intelligence. Now why does the mind attach itself to property? We will investigate why it is attached to people and to conclusions, ideas, symbols, visions and all the rest of it. Why?

You understand that property is not only things but also the attachment to one's own body, which is also a thing. You see we get attached to a property and then safeguard it and when we realize that it is not worth it then we try to cultivate detachment - attachment then detachment, and the conflict. Please, as we have been saying during all these talks, we are sharing this thing together. You are not merely listening to a series of words, ideas, conclusions, but we are sharing the thing which we are talking about. Sharing implies listening and enjoying the thing that we are examining, because when you enjoy something you learn much quicker, but if you make a problem of it you won't learn. To me it is very enjoyable, if I may use that word, to find out why my mind is attached to property. I want to learn about it and therefore I am not going to make a problem of it. If I make a problem of it then I want to go beyond it, then the mind creates the idea of detachment. Then in that there is conflict between attachment and detachment. And the mind that is in conflict can never learn. It can learn the results of that conflict but not the root cause of attachment.

I do not know if you have gone into this question of enjoyment. There is a vast difference between pleasure and enjoyment. Pleasure has a motive. The pursuit of pleasure is the memory of a previous pleasure, and enjoyment is from moment to moment. You can't cultivate enjoyment, but you can cultivate pleasure. And when there is enjoyment then the brain relaxes. You watch it. But when it is pursuing pleasure then it becomes tense, it becomes purposeful, thought then cultivates determination, will. Whereas if there is enjoyment the whole brain cells relax. I was told the other day by somebody who seemed to know something about this, that recently scientists have discovered that when there is an enjoyment a new gland, a gland at the very centre of the back of the head, functions and brings more activity to the brain, which is not the activity of strain - are you getting it?

So to learn there must be enjoyment. One must enjoy that which one is learning. And you cannot enjoy, be happy in the act of learning when you are comparing, judging, evaluating; or when what you are learning you are storing up in order to enjoy more. Right? Please watch your own brain cells in operation. Which is really a part of meditation, it is to observe completely without the act of will. When there is the act of will then there is conflict. And what we are trying to do this morning - not trying, sorry - what we are doing - I don't like the word 'try' - when you try it means an effort. If you do it actually, it is going on. What we are trying to... (Laughter) What we are doing is, to observe happily why the mind is attached to property, because unless the brain cells understand, the mind understands why there is this attachment death then becomes attachment - right? Why is the mind attached to so many things? Is it because there is nothing so permanent as property? There is the house, there is the furniture, the carpet, the picture, they are solid, and in that solidity the mind can take rest and be attached to it. Look at it, go into it fairly deeply and you will see for yourself.

Human relationship is uncertain, in that there is conflict, in that there is every form of struggle, jealousy, anxiety, fear, pleasure, sexual or otherwise, companionship and so on and so on, and that is an uncertain quantity; and ideas too are rather uncertain, unclear, and property is the only thing that is solid, that I can see.

Q: It is bombed so many times it is not solid, not solid at all.

K: Of course not sir, wait a minute sir. It has been bombed so often, destroyed so often, but human beings go back to it, you and I intellectually may say, "Well property doesn't matter", but if we look into it very carefully, property, it doesn't matter what it is, a pair of boots, one gets terribly attached. Perhaps those poor people in Vietnam may say that property doesn't matter, but it does matter because otherwise they would have nothing.

So is that the reason? Is that why mind gets attached to property? Mine or yours, or property of an institution with which it identifies itself as, my property. And also is it because mind needs to be occupied? The mind is never in a state of not being occupied. Please watch all this in yourself. And occupation becomes extraordinarily important. The man who goes to an office for forty, fifty, sixty years, when that occupation comes to an end, he also comes to an end. So occupation becomes extraordinarily important and the mind can be occupied with property, looking after it - you know all the business of owning something. Now if one has an insight into it that the mind needs to be occupied, it demands occupation whether it is occupied with furniture, with social work, with a book or with an idea of god, it is exactly the same, because it demands occupation. And is it because also the mind in itself seems to have no existence apart from the thing to which it is attached? Right? What is the content of my mind, of my consciousness, or your consciousness, the content? The property, the idea, the images that I have built about another or about myself. So the mind in itself has no existence apart from its content, and one of its contents is the furniture. You are following all this? And so it is not a question of being attached - furniture is the mind. And when the mind has no quality of itself then attachment becomes extraordinarily important. Please observe this in yourself.

So the material existence of property, and being occupied with that property, the mind being lonely must have occupation, and so property takes a great deal of time with which one can be occupied, and the loneliness and so on, and the mind having no existence of its own finds existence in the content, in the attachment, in the idea - right? And why are we attached so much to people - this is much more interesting. Why are you attached to a person? Are you really attached to the person, or to the idea, to the image of that person? I am attached to you for various reasons, which is: my attachment to you gives a quality, an existence to the mind, and my attachment to you is its existence. Now I am attached to you because I love you. You give me pleasure, sexual or otherwise, you give me something to which I can cling to, a companionship, an existence with you gives more certainty to the mind - you are following all this? And without you I am lost. And being lost I have to find another companion, another attachment. Or if there is trouble between you and me, which is between the image I have of you and the image you have of me, which is called relationship, if there is in that relationship conflict, I try to break it up and establish another form of relationship, which is another image. You are following all this?

So again I see the mind having no quality, vitality, existence, energy of its own, it tries to find in relationship all that. Please watch this in yourself, not what the speaker is saying but actually what is going on in your mind when you are attached to a person, as obviously you must be attached, which you call love, with all its responsibility, with all its neurotic behaviour and so on and so on. Then there is this whole gamut of ideation, mentation. That is, the images that thought has created and put together as an idea, an idea is the reasoned out, verbal assertion of a thought - right? Can I go on? You are following all this?

And we live on a formula, on conclusions, which are put together by thought. Thought being memory and the past, so we are living in the past, which may be projected into the future but has its roots in the past, so our attachment is to the past. Now why does the mind live, act, behave upon a series of conclusions which thought has come to - why? I don't know if you have not noticed this in yourself, you have experience, it doesn't matter what it is, however trivial, however great, you have an experience and that experience becomes the memory and that memory with its knowledge is the process of thought, which comes to a conclusion, and according to that conclusion you live. The conclusion is non-physical, non-existent, as the furniture, it is still an idea. And the mind having no vitality of its own has to depend on ideas, formulas, beliefs, doctrines and all the rest of it, and therefore there is constant division between the conclusion and the act. Are we all asleep? I want to be quite sure.

So I see the mind is its content. The mind is not without its content. And it is afraid to let go its content otherwise it has no existence. And so it has got to occupy itself with its content - furniture, the people, the person or the idea, idea being god, you know all the rest of it. You see how extraordinarily interesting it is, because meditation, what they call meditation, is the cultivation of an occupation with an idea, and the practising of that idea, which is not at all meditation - we'll discuss it perhaps on Sunday - but see how the whole thing hangs together like a marvellous structure.

Now one has explained all this: the attachment to property, attachment to people, to conclusions, to your images, symbols, ideas. To have an insight into that, into the whole of it, is the liberation from attachment, not at some future date but instantly. This is really important to understand. When you listen to this do you say, 'I will think about this a little later. When I go out of this tent I will go into this much more. Because here there are too many ideas, too many being poured out, I must take it up and think about it later' - which prevents you having an insight now. And if you are sharing this thing together there is no time for you to think about it later.

We are sharing the food together because you are hungry, and the speaker is also hungry, we are sharing the food together, eating together. You don't say when you are eating together, or when you are hungry, "I will eat later" - you are sharing it, actively eating. And if you have no insight into what has been said, why? Are you frightened of not being attached, not being occupied, not finding out what happens to a mind that has no attachment - and therefore fear. Because the mind is incessantly occupied, whether with the house, with sex, with god, with drink or with your politics, with your guru - occupied. And that gives it a vitality, a certain quality of energy. And one is afraid if there is no occupation at all what is going to take place. Therefore when there is that fear you will not share. That fear will prevent you. Therefore you have to have an insight into that fear, which is far more important to have an insight into attachment. So there is constant insight. And when you have such an insight attachment altogether is gone and a different quality comes into being, the quality which the mind itself has, if it has understood, is aware, has an insight into the whole process of attachment. That is love. You understand? How can I love you, or you love me, if I am attached to you? My attachment is based on my pursuit of pleasure, which you give me, your images and so on. I am attached to that image of you and you are attached to the image of me. And the image is the past, is the response of experience, knowledge. So is love the past? Is love experience? Is love memory? Is love the reaction to that memory as pleasure? Follow all this.

So one discovers, or one comes upon, the mind comes upon that where there is attachment of any kind there is no love. It is not a statement, an idea, but an actual fact which the mind has discovered, which the mind, having an insight into attachment, sees the truth of it. And seeing the truth of it, it is not occupied with the person, or with furniture, or with the idea, and therefore it has its own energy. I wonder if you are meeting all this. It is that quality of energy which is love. Right? And therefore love can never be hurt. Oh, you don't see all this, do you? Can never be jealous, never lonely, never asks to be loved - what a horror that is.

And one observes what one's life is. What is our life? What is our existence? Look at it please. Your existence, not mine. Which is: what is the existence of the 'me' in the field of knowledge? What is my living in the field of experience? What is my actual activity with the whole structure of memory which is the past? Is my life based on the past - the past being yesterday, or ten thousand yesterdays? Please look at it. I want to learn about myself and I have learned happily what my attachments do to the mind, and I want to find out also what my actual life is, not the imagined life, not the life I would like to have, not the life that depends on environment, on stimuli but actually what is my daily existence based on? You are following all this? Am I living in the past, is my life the past? Operating, reacting to the present, based upon the past and therefore projecting that to the future - you are following?

I want to find out, please listen to this carefully - I want to find out whether the temperament and the idiosyncrasy are my life; or is my life my conditioned state; or the temperament, idiosyncrasy and the conditioning is my whole life? Am I making this complex?

What is temperament, what is idiosyncrasy? You understand? You have certain temperaments, you have certain idiosyncrasies - no? Temperament is, according to the dictionary meaning, as far as you can make out, based on experience; idiosyncrasy is something that is put together. We all have various kinds of idiosyncrasies and their idiosyncratic activity and temperamental activity, but basically we are conditioned though the temperament and idiosyncrasy may vary from person to person. Are you following all this? You and I are basically conditioned according to the culture, to the past and all that, deeply, conditioned consciously or unconsciously, conditioned deeply through inheritance, heredity, through culture, through a thousand years of man's struggles. That is our basic conditioning, add to it more, tradition and so on and so on. From that according to time, climate, culture, which varies the expression of idiosyncrasy and temperament. Because that is, you are different in temperament from me. You have your idiosyncrasies different from mine. And we try to balance these idiosyncrasies and temperament and try to bring harmony between us, which can never be done; whereas harmony between us can come only when the mind has an insight into the total conditioning. Right? Am I going on too much?

Shall we take a breath here for a minute? Because this is really quite important and rather interesting if you go into it. You see we are trying to bring harmony in relationships between temperaments and idiosyncrasies, outwardly. But inwardly, deeply we are conditioned, and we try to somehow to live together with our absurd idiosyncrasies and temperaments, and in that there is always a battle, a strife - I am trying to adjust myself to your temperament and you are trying to adjust to my idiosyncrasies - aren't you? This is what is going on in life. And there is this constant effort, battle, and I say to myself, "That is totally wrong somehow, it has no value". Because your temperament and idiosyncrasies can vary, change, that has no value. Therefore no character. So character has no value. Are you getting this? But what has significance, is to find out, have an insight into this whole conditioning. Then if the mind is free from its conditioning, which is its content, then our relationship is entirely different, then there is no conflict between you and me because it is not based on pleasure and all the rest of it. Are you getting it?

Now can I, can the mind see this whole business of conditioning, temperament, idiosyncrasy, how the mind is the result of the past, which is evolution, can it have an insight into that? Not tomorrow but now, instantly we have insight into ourselves and therefore that insight brings its own energy to transform 'what is'. Insight has its own energy, which is not dependent on any stimuli, and therefore that insight which has its tremendous energy, transforms what is observed, which is attachment. Have you got that insight, and therefore that tremendous energy to change actually your attachment totally? So the mind doesn't derive its energy in attachment, in conflict and all that but it has its own vital energy, independent of environment, of culture, of people. Come on sirs. Therefore living has quite a different meaning than the living which we do now, which is conflict.

Then we have to enquire into this whole question of what is death? Do you mind it, enquiring into that? Because a lot of people are young people and you may live very long, and there are a lot of old people here too, including myself, we are the people who are going and you are the people who are coming. But you are going and coming and you also have to face death. So we are going to enquire into it, which is, we are going to have an insight into it. And you cannot have an insight into it if there is any kind of fear, and fear comes only when you are attached to the things known, which is, the things known are your images, your knowledges, your attachments, your furniture, your opinions, judgements, culture, your shyness, politeness - you follow - all that is the field of the known. And if you are afraid you will never have an insight into this, into this whole problem of death.

I want to find out, as you must, what is death. Why am I frightened of death? Why am I so scared of old age and suddenly coming to an end? It is really a very complex business, the whole understanding of what is death, very complex. And the very complexity of it makes one frightened because it is like a very complex machinery, you daren't touch it, because you know nothing about it. But if you approach it very simply, which means really you are trying to learn about it, therefore you are enjoying it - not the idea of death but enjoying the investigation, the approach, the enquiry, therefore you are learning and you cannot learn if you are not happy, therefore you cannot have fear. That is the basic thing.

So if you really want to go into this you have to be very clear that your mind, which means your thought, doesn't create fear - fear of what it considers coming to an end, what it considers entering into something it doesn't know.

Now first of all I have to find out, because I am not frightened, you understand, I am not interested in fear at all, I want to find out if there is anything permanent as the 'me' - you understand? Permanent that is, which has a continuity. I can leave my furniture to my brother, son, or whatever and therefore it can remain in the family, or sold in an antique shop and somebody else buys it, and I want to find out if there is anything substantial, continuous, permanent as 'me' who is frightened of death.

Is there anything permanent in me, in you? - permanent in the sense a continuity in time, a duration in space as the 'me'. The 'me' is the name - right? Has that name any permanency? Or thought gives permanency to the name. In itself it has no permanency, but thought, identifying itself with the body, with the image, with the knowledge, with all the experiences, sorrows, pleasures, agonies, all identifying itself with that, that gives it a quality of permanency - right? Otherwise is there anything permanent? A thing that has a continuity in spite of the non-existence of the body? Are you interested in all this? You are going to face this, whether you like it or not. Either you are going to face it accidentally, or through disease, or the natural decay, the decay of the organism. It is inevitable. You can avoid it by living longer, healthier, taking more pills and all the rest of it - you know, carry on. But at the end there is this fact. Unless I find out for myself if there is something permanent beyond death - permanent which means timeless, which cannot be corrupted through civilization, through culture, something that in spite of all experience, knowledge, stimuli, reactions, it has its own existence, and goes on as the 'me'. So man has said, "There is not the 'me' but there is god" - follow all this carefully. In India, in Asia they put it differently, but it is still the act of thought, which says, "There is the soul", it is an act of thought, when it says, there is Brahman, as they say in India it is still the act of thought, thought which is frightened of the unknown, because thought is the known, thought is time, thought is old, thought is never free: because thought is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, therefore it is always old, never free, and being of time it is uncertain of the timeless, that is, beyond time. So it says, "I am not important, 'me' is transient, is being put together by culture, by time, by accident, by the family, by tradition, by the culture in which it has been put together, it has developed certain tendencies, idiosyncrasies, it has its conditioning but beyond all that there is the soul, there is something immense in me which is the permanent." All that is the process of thought. And thought confronted with the inevitable, which is death, the ending, says, "I can't tolerate this", therefore it says, "There must be a future life", or it says, "I believe there is a future life", or "There is heaven and I'll sit next to god" - it wants comfort faced with something completely unknown. And there are thousands of people who will give you comfort. All the organized churches offer that, and you want that, and therefore they exist.

Now if you see how it is still the action of thought and therefore based on fear, on imagination, on the past, that is the field of the known, which is: "I am attached to the field of the known, with all its varieties, changes, its activities", and what I demand is comfort, because I have found comfort in the past, I have lived within the field of the known, that is my territory, I know its borders, the frontiers - the frontiers are my consciousness which is its content. I am completely familiar with all that and death is something I don't know, I don't want it.

So I ask myself, my life has been the past, I live in the past, I act in the past, that is my life - listen to this. My life living in the past is a dead life. You understand? My mind which lives in the past is a dead mind. And thought says, "That is not death, the future is the death." So I see this as a fact - you follow? I see this as something enormously real, therefore the mind realizing that actually dies to the past; it will use the past but it has lost its grip, the past has lost its values, grip, its vitality. So the mind has its own energy which is not derived from the past. Therefore living is dying - you understand? Therefore living is love which is dying. Because if there is no attachment, then there is love. If there is no attachment to the past, the past has its value which can be used, which must be used as knowledge, then my living is a constant renewal, is a constant movement in the field of the unknown, in which there is learning, moving, therefore death is the ultimate aloneness. And therefore there is a totally different kind of life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Ah, I didn't use the words 'giving up' or 'surrendering'. I said the mind, consciousness is its content. Right sir. Its contents are the books, the televisions, the amusements, furniture and so on - all the contents which civilizations, cultures, have put into it. And if you say you must be unattached then it is an act of will by thought, and therefore there is no freedom in that. But if you have an insight into this then it is total. Yes sir?

Q: Is it not blind faith to accept that there is a different quality of mind?

K: The questioner asks: is it not a blind faith to accept that there is a different quality of mind? Isn't that it? How can you accept what another says? How can you have faith in what somebody else says? He may be mistaken, he may be trying to convert you to some idiocy, and all conversion is an idiocy. But he says to you: look at it for yourself, learn about it for yourself, have an insight into this whole process for yourself, therefore there is no authority. You don't have to have faith in something, in a belief, or in a person.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: How do images have real feelings though I know they are dead? Isn't that it sir? Look: I have images which are put together by thought, put together through experience, through reactions, through various crises. Those images are real because I accept them intellectually as being real. The intellect, which is part of thought, lives with those images and derives energy from those images and therefore they have a life of their own. They give you vitality, they give you feeling, they maintain you, nourish you, but that nourishment, that maintenance, that stimuli - (noises of aeroplane) - I can't compete with that! Intellect may say they are false, they are unreal, but unless you have deep awareness of the machinery that makes the images and are aware of it, have an insight into it, these images will go on giving you neurotic reactions. And they are all neurotic, every form of image that you have are bound to create a neurotic action and neurotic feelings.

Q: Sir, during sleep without dream there is no image. I would like to know if fragmentation and images are necessary in order to have an insight into them.

K: Sleep without dreams is a state of mind in which there are no images, no conditioning, no time. Now are you telling me that or have you heard somebody else tell you that?

Q: I think it is obvious.

K: The gentleman says, "I think it is obvious". Sir, the mountain is obvious, the beauty of it is obvious, the majesty, the depth of it is obvious, but I have to climb it, I have to live with it, I have to move with it. What is obvious is not necessarily real. What is real is to see if I have images, to see if the mind derives energy from those images, and to see in my daily life, in my every day life where these images play a part in my relationship. And what my day is, my night is. The movement of my daily life is the continuation in dreams when I sleep. To have no dreams at all - you understand - that is one of the most important things because when the mind sleeps, when it is absolutely in a state of quietness then it rejuvenates itself. But if it is a continuity of the day then it is struggling, and the struggle is to bring order. I don't know if you have not noticed it. The brain can only function normally, healthily, non-neurotically when it has no image, when it is not in conflict, when it has complete order. But if during the day you have no order then it tries to establish order during the night, which is part of the dream.

So if during the day being aware in learning, insight, enjoying the insight, trying to find out, learn, then during the night then the mind which has established order during the day, then it can sleep completely without a dream and therefore it has quite a different movement, quite a different vitality.

Q: I have a problem. Sometimes in life it seems to me that you have to be egotistic to go this way that you are talking about right now, because you have to change yourself in relationships and others may be hurt.

K: Sometimes in life, the questioner says, you have to be selfish. You may hurt others in that selfishness and they may hurt you. What is the answer? Is that right sir? Is that the question?

Q: You have to be egotistic to go the way of freedom.

K: You have to be egotistic to be free. You have to be egotistic to be free. I think we are misusing, or misunderstanding each other in the use of that word 'egotistic'. I see something which is true, not because of my temperament or my idiosyncrasy or my conditioning, but I see something to be real, to be factual. Now wait a minute, I'll show it to you. I see that to belong to any group, psychologically, that to hold any belief is destructive and I don't belong to any group, to any organization. You will call me very selfish, won't you? Because you think I am having my own way, I am following my idiosyncrasy, my particular character, and so you call me selfish. Am I, because I see something to be true? You don't see, for instance, nationalism to be a poison. I see it to be a poison. I say, I don't belong to any nation, and you say to me, "You are very selfish in following your own particular opinion", because you live in opinion and you think also that I am acting according to opinion. I am not. I see that it is a danger, like I see a snake to be a danger. If you don't see it as danger and I see it, why call me egotistic? I am not. So my mind must be very clear that it is not acting on idiosyncrasy, temperament, experience, but being aware, having an insight - which has nothing whatsoever to do with my past, with my egotism.

Q: Can you go into the question of words and concepts and the problems they cause in communication inside and outside oneself?

K: Can you stand anymore of this. We have talked for nearly an hour and a half, can your brains go on receiving any more. Don't say, yes. Well, this will be the last question.

Words are necessary, aren't they? Words are necessary to communicate aren't they? There are other forms of communication but we will take up with words first. I want to tell you something, I must use words or a gesture, or a look. So words become important in communication, that is, if we both speak the same language.

And words become important if we both give to that word the same meaning. If I call that an elephant when it is really a microphone, it has no meaning. So words have a meaning because they have a common reference between you and me. And words are also a danger because words are used to convey thoughts - I am thinking one thing, I put it into words and convey it to you. And if my thought is crooked, not clear, I use the words which are clear to you but therefore bring deception. I want to deceive you, consciously or unconsciously.

Words are put together by thought and are necessary, and is there another means of communication which are not words? Can you read my thought without that thought being put into words? That can be done, obviously it is done. When two people are fairly friendly, fairly sympathetic, fairly interested in the same thing, they can convey very quickly without words. And is there other means of communication beyond the words and thought? I can convey to you that those bells are ringing and it is 12.00 o'clock, I am using words because you are also listening to that bell. And also I can communicate with you through a gesture, through a look. And must thought always be expressed through words, and is there thought without the word? Then what am I communicating with you - you understand?

Look sir: is love a word? Is love a thought? Is love a sentiment? If the word is not the thing then how do I communicate the thing to you without the word, without the gesture, without holding your hand - you follow? How do I communicate that love which is not the word to you when you are used to the word, when to you the word has become tremendously important? I must keep on telling you, "I love you", "I love you", "I love you". And if I don't use the word and I have that thing called love, then how is it communicated? It can only be communicated to you if you are at the same time, at the same level, at the same intensity, then there is communication without the word. But to us the word is very important, naturally. And that word can be misunderstood and so on and so on.

But there are qualities, there are states, there are certain facts which are incommunicable through words.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC TALK 30TH JULY 1972

We have talked about so many things during the last six talks; and I would like this morning, if I may, to talk over with you the question of religion, what is meditation, and try to come upon something which may be not visionary, not visions, experiences, but an actual dimension which thought possibly cannot enter.

I do not know if you have not noticed that most of our lives are rather boring, tiresome, have very little meaning by itself. We try to give meaning, intellectual meaning to our existence - that too has very little meaning either. And we try to enrich our lives by studying or enquiring into witchcraft - which I believe is the fashion now - into occultism, which is as old as the hills, and not very, very serious either, and various forms of distraction. Because our own lives, as they are lived, are rather narrow, a repetitious existence, tiresome, fearful, anxious and so on. So when we talk about religion it becomes an escape rather than an actuality. And if we could this morning share together in the enquiry of what is actually religion, a religious life, a religious mind, a religious way of existence.

Obviously all the organized religions with their beliefs and dogmas, with their priests, with their structure which thought has put together - if we could put all that aside, because in themselves they have no validity, except what man has invented, or a few have experienced and assert that this is so or that is not so.

What is a religious mind? What is a religious way of living? I think we should go into this, because its a vital question, as love, as death, sorrow, and human relationship - it is as important, perhaps its not more important than all these, to find out for oneself what it is to live a life which is truly and deeply religious. The word 'religion' means - I looked it up the other day in the dictionary, and it says, 'tie together'. And the word 'yoga' - perhaps you know that word, do you, most of you? - also means joined together, like two oxen are yoked. So religion in the ordinary dictionary meaning, and yoga, imply the same thing, that is, bring together, tie together, yoke the higher part to the lower part, the spirit and matter, and so on.

First of all, that implies division. When you say bring together, join together, tie together, implies that there is a division in existence. Why is it that we have divided life into a religious and non-religious life, spirit and matter, the higher and the lower - why is there such fragmentation in our existence? There is the mind, the heart and the body. And this division has existed throughout the ages. They don't treat it as a whole. They treat it as a thing that is divided and must be brought together. That implies, the bringing together, implies, doesn't it, an outside agency or an agency in yourself. Please follow this a little bit, if you're interested in it. And we are sharing this together. It implies an outside agency that will bring the divided, fragmented existence together, through a religious activity, through yoga, through meditation, through various forms of exercises, control, and so on.

Now is there such a division? Or thought has divided existence, life, as separate from the higher state of thought. Thought obviously has invented the higher state. No? The soul, the Hindus call it the atman, and so on. Thought has brought about this. Thought is responsible for this division. And, not being able to bring this together, not being able to bring about a total harmony, it then invents a superior entity which is going to integrate the various fragments. Now that integrating factor is called god, outside agency, or your own will and so on.

One can see that one needs the total harmony, that is, a harmony between the mind, the intellect, the capacity to reason logically, sanely and the heart, which is to have compassion, love, kindness, consideration, and the physical, with all its complexities. One can see there must be a harmony. Then only the total existence can function healthily.

And we're asking, is religion based on belief, on an insight of the few who have established a church, organized priesthood and so on, is this structure, or can this structure, bring about harmony in you? Or it has nothing whatsoever to do with belief? You are following all this? It has nothing whatsoever to do with any saviour, with any guru, with any sense of an outside agency, or an inward effort to bring about harmony. Am I making myself clear? You look rather puzzled, don't you? All right, I'll put it this way.

For myself I see that the mind, with the brain, can function only when there is complete harmony inside - total harmony, not fragmentary harmony. Now how is this to be brought about? I don't know how, but people say, religions say, authority asserts, that there must be an agency outside of you - god, whatever name you like to give to it. And if you could concentrate on that, give your life to that, believe in that, perhaps you can bring about this extraordinary quality of harmony - they don't put it this way, I'm putting it that way.

Now belief is conceived by thought, belief is the result of thought and fear. I see that, therefore I reject totally, all belief, and therefore all authority. There's no guru, no teacher, no saviour, nobody outside that can bring about this extraordinary state of harmony. And I realize harmony is not integration of the various fragments. To bring about integration, that is, to put together the various broken parts, implies there must be an entity who, through act of will, or desire, or urgency, can bring this integration about. That is again a fragmentation. So I reject that too. You understand? I reject belief, I reject authority, the whole structure of a religious organization based on authority - all that goes. Then how am I, how is the mind to bring about this harmony, because I see that it is essential to be healthy, to have tremendous energy, and to have a mind that is extraordinarily clear?

Is harmony a thing to be cultivated? Cultivation implies time, doesn't it? I need time to cultivate a plant. So I say, I need time to cultivate this harmony, either through various forms of exercise - give your mind to it a little bit, please - share this together with me - either through various forms of exercises, mental, physical, or through control. Or set a course and follow that course, which is the action of will. I see that the mind, the brain, and the heart, and the physical entity can function beautifully, easily, smoothly, when there is complete sense of the whole, in which there is no division. I see that very clearly. First I see it perhaps intellectually, verbally, and I realize that has no value. Then how does the mind bring this about? Does this question mean anything to you? Because this is the religious life, not the belief in gods or disbelief in god or have your own experience of various attitudes, various visions, various experiences - to me that is not a religious life. So I have got to be very clear, I have to find out what it means to live a religious life. Because I feel, if that can be brought about, or comes into being, then my action at any level will always be harmonious, not contradictory.

So my mind has rejected the whole structure of belief, which is based on fear and therefore illusion. You're sharing this with me, please - we are walking together, thinking together, creating together, and therefore establishing between ourselves right communication. And therefore I reject also, completely, any authority, because it is still outside of myself, it is still the act of thought which seeks guidance from another. So that brings about a division, and hence a conflict - what I should do according to what another says, and try to conform to the pattern set by another, therefore that brings about a conflict, and therefore disharmony. You are following all this?

Then, I ask myself, will any act of desire, which is will, bring this about? Because will plays a great part in our life. Will is based on choice, on decision - I will do this and I will not do that. Will, that is, the concentration of desire, plays an extraordinary part in our life. Haven't you noticed it? I must do this, I must not do that, I will follow this. And this constant decision is part of our existence. And I see, where there is the act of will there must be division, and therefore conflict. And where there is conflict there can be no harmony. So is there a way of living without the action of will? As I said, will comes into being when there is choice. And choice exists when there is confusion. And you do not choose, you do not decide, when you see things very clearly, then you act, which is not the action of will.

So I am asking myself, why is it my mind cannot see clearly, all the time, not on vague, uncertain occasions - all the time function clearly? Why do you think your mind doesn't function clearly? First of all, it's confused, it's confused because our conditioning, which is the past, meets the present and is not capable of understanding the present, and life being so uncertain, people asserting, the authorities asserting so many things - work for this, don't work for that, this is true, this is false, a dozen gurus telling you what to do - and we're caught in all that.

And also confusion exists because we want clarity, we want clarity, we want to reach the other shore where we think there is clarity. So we are always making life, which is this shore, into a problem, because I want to get over there, where I think I'm going to be perfectly happy, sitting next to god, or entering in Nirvana or liberation of whatever it is. So the other shore makes the problem. And that is one of the causes of confusion.

So I have an insight, there is an insight into this question of the action of will. Have you got that insight, as we are talking? Therefore there is no conflict in the mind, it acts when there is insight - action is insight, not the action of will, or belief, or fear, or greed. You follow? The insight that comes when you observe very closely this pattern of existence established by will. When you have an insight into that your action is entirely different, and therefore non-contradictory, and hence that insight brings harmony. You are following this? I have no insight because I live in the past, your life is the past, isn't it? Your remembrances, your imaginations, your contriving, is based on the past. So our life is the past, which through the present, modified, becomes the future.

So as long as you live in the past, there must be contradiction, and hence conflict. You are following all this?

So, harmony comes into being when you have insight into all this. Now, you know, we are educated to control. Aren't you? To control ourselves. Or, having been educated in the structure of control, you discard all that and go to the extreme, which is happening also. And control implies again division - the controller and the thing controlled. The controller says, "This must happen, I must do this, I must not get angry, I must be" - all that. So there is a controller and the thing he's trying to control, and hence a division. Is the controller different from the thing he's controlling? Or both are the same? Of course both are the same. And not being able to go beyond the thing controlled, thought invents the controller, and hopes thereby to go beyond the thing which he is trying to control. Do you get all this? I am angry, and I say, I must not be angry. That is, instantly there is a division. But the entity that says, "I must not be angry" is part of anger, otherwise it couldn't recognize it as anger. Therefore the controller is the controlled. When I have an insight into that, that is, the division that exists when there is an act of will through control, in that division there must be strife, when I have an insight into that there comes a totally different kind of action which is not controlled or without any restraint.

Is this all becoming too much? Can we go on? Anyhow this is the last talk. Now see what my mind has done - I have an insight into belief, I have an insight into will, I have an insight into control, authority, measurement. And that is our social, educational, religious structure. That is our cultural background, religious, ethical, moral, social - that's based on that. And, having an insight into that, there is the cessation of all that. When I see something false, when there is a perception of something dangerous, it is dropped, you run away from it. So the false, the untrue creates disharmony.

Then mind wants to find out if there is something more than mere thought and its structure. Man throughout the ages has sought this. He has enquired into the known and is always adding more and more into the field of the known - more knowledge, more technology, better means of communication, pollution, you know all that is going on is within the field of the known, including your gods, your saviours, your masters, your gurus, your enlightenment - it's all within the field of the known which is the function of thought.

Are we communicating with each other? So thought is measurement, because to measure according to the known, according to the memory, according to knowledge, experience. So people say, "You must meditate to find out if there is something beyond the known". Are you following all this? So they say, "Control, control your thought, discipline your thought, become aware of your thought," so they are still dealing with thought - control by thought, discipline by thought. And through thought they hope to find the thing that is not measurable. And also they say, you must stop thinking, kill the mind. You are following all this? Now we're going to find out.

As I said, we were going to talk this morning about religion, meditation, and to come upon something, if it is possible, which is not measurable, which is totally a different dimension. We talked somewhat about religion. Now we are going to find out what it means to meditate. I don't know what it means to you. If you had never heard that word, if you had never heard any of the gurus telling you how to meditate, it would be much better, because then we could, both of us together, investigate it, not knowing. But if you know what it is already, then it becomes a burden, a block. Right?

So I want to find out what it means to a mind that is capable of meditation. The dictionary meaning of that word is "to ponder over, to be concerned with, to have an intellectual, an emotional grasp," and so on. That is the dictionary meaning.

And there is the meaning which all the religions have given to it, in different ways - contemplation, in the west, and meditation in the east. And, being a human, I want to find out, because I don't belong to the east or the west, I'm neither a Zen follower nor Krishnamurti follower. I don't know, and I've no authority because I've no guru, thank god. So I want to find out what it means to meditate. But I can see one thing very clearly, that as long as thought is functioning, it must function according to the past and project itself into the future - from the known to the known - I see that very clearly. As long as thought is in operation, nothing new can take place. Be clear on this. Because thought is based on the past, thought is the reaction of memory, thought is the outcome of the knowledge, of the experience, which is my background. So thought is the old, thought can never bring about freedom, because it is not in itself free. I see that very clearly, nobody has to convince me of it.

So I see, the mind has a perception, as long as there is the movement of thought it is living in the old, and it is incapable of perceiving something totally new. Right? Please don't be convinced by me, by the speaker - observe it for yourself. Thought has invented the whole structure of the religious way of life - monks, nuns, rituals, priests, the authority - the whole structure. And what they say is still within the pattern of thought, therefore I have an insight into the whole process of thinking, and the illusions that it can create.

So I see this, that there must be the emptying of the known. That is, thought must function at one level, because otherwise I can't do anything, but if we are to enquire and come upon this something, if there is something, which is immeasurable, thought must be completely still, then only it can see something new. The seeing of something new is creation - not my painting, writing a book or doing some silly thing, because that is still within the pattern of the known, within the pattern of thought, which has imagination, contrivance, remembrance. So I see the mind must be completely quiet, not that it must be made quiet - then who is the entity that is going to make it quiet? That entity is the desire that wishes to have a mind that is quiet, and therefore there is a division in that and hence conflict, and therefore disharmony. So how is the mind to be absolutely quiet, which means the brain cells themselves? Brain cells hold the memories, and these memories, if they are healthy, will react healthily. If they are not healthy, neurotic action takes place, or one is caught in illusion.

So the brain must be quiet, but active when demanded. So I have a problem - not my problem - there is this problem, which is to have a very quiet, extraordinarily subtle mind, pliable, quick, sensitive, and free of the known, and yet function in the field of the known. The two must go together all the time, otherwise there is disharmony. So how is this to happen? I can see very clearly, one can see very clearly that memory, knowledge, experience is necessary, absolutely necessary, otherwise you couldn't talk, you couldn't - you know, its absolutely necessary. But it becomes a danger when thought, in its desire to be secure, uses knowledge for its own self-centred activity. So one must be aware of that.

Now how is the mind to be quiet - is there a system, a method? Now look at it. If there is a system established by you or by another, a system being a method, a practice, the daily practising of that system to make the mind quiet. Now who is the entity that is practising the system? That entity is thought which says, "If I could practise this method, this system, then I will have a quiet mind, and then it must be a marvellous state. I want to experience that state". So thought invents its own system or accepts another system, other systems, in order to experience something totally new, in which thought can take pleasure. So that becomes a problem. So the mind has to find out why there is this constant demand for experience. Why do you want experience, any kind of experience? Either you have it directly or indirectly by reading novels or books or watching television. Why do you want experience? Have you ever gone into the question of it? There is sexual experience, there is the experience of so many kinds - why does the mind demand it? Because you're bored with every day experiences - it becomes a routine, a mechanical thing. And you want to experience something that is non-mechanical. And you set about it through a mechanical means, which is thought. Right? So through a mechanical means you hope to experience something which is non-mechanical. And if you do experience it, then it becomes mechanical because thought has invented that experience. So the mind says, I don't want any experience because I see its value - I need experience when acquiring knowledge in the everyday life. The more I have experience in putting machinery together, the more I can bring about a way of living which will be mechanical. Right?

So the mind says, any demand for experience, high or low, noble or ignoble, is still part of thought which wants to experience something in which it can take pleasure. You don't want to experience ugly things, painful things, you only want to experience pleasurable things. And god of course is the ultimate pleasure. So the mind sees that, therefore it is no longer asking for any kind of experience, therefore no illusion. The moment the mind wants to experience something great, it can invent that greatness, it can invent something which it calls enlightenment. But if there is a cessation of all experience, then what is the state of the mind that doesn't demand experience? You need experience to keep you awake. But the mind, having insight into all this, doesn't need an experience to keep it awake, it is awake.

We're asking, can the mind and the brain be completely still? And you want to know if it is still, don't you? I want to know if my mind is still. And there is a gadget in America which they use and they call it Alpha Meditation - that will tell you by electronic measurement that your mind is still. You know, Americans are good at gadgetry. And it's called Alpha Meditation. I can be silly, stupid, dull with it, illogical in daily existence, and I attach this instrument with wires to my head, and it tells me when I'm quiet.

So Zen, all these forms of meditation, mantra yoga, you know, the repetition of words - all those are means of knowing for oneself that your mind is quiet. Can you know your mind is quiet? Please, do think it out. If you know your mind is quiet, then there is no quietness because you are observing the mind that you think is quiet. So you cannot experience a mind that is quiet - see the beauty of it, sir. Anymore than you can experience happiness, anymore than you can experience joy. The moment you say, "I am joyous", it's gone. Or the moment you say, "How happy I am," it's no longer happiness. So the mind, when it is quiet, has no observer. Are you learning all this? Because you can learn when you are happy, not when you make a problem of it. And the problems only exist when you want to have a quiet mind. But when you're happy and want to learn what it means to have a quiet mind, learn, then you find out a quiet mind comes into being when there is no observer, when there is no experiencer, thinker. But you say, "How am I to stop the thinker from acting?" You can't stop it, but you can learn the whole nature and the workings and the movement of thought, learn about it. And when you learn, the other comes into being.

So when the brain and the mind and the body are absolutely quiet, that is, when there is no entity that is measuring all the time, comparing - 'I have had this experience yesterday and I'd like to have it more, or I would like to have further experience,' which is all measurement.

And this quietness implies space, doesn't it? Have you noticed in yourself how little space one has, both outwardly and inwardly?

When you live in a city, in a small flat surrounded by other flats, across the street another set of flats, living in a small, enclosed space, outwardly, you want to break things, don't you? That's part of our violence. There's not only hereditary violence derived from the animal, which is aggressive, which we are, but this living in towns, enclosed, with very little space outwardly - you can take a holiday once a year for three weeks. My god, what a way of living, and therefore your whole body revolts - this constant going to the office, 40 years of your life, all enclosed, in close contact with each other. And a strange thing - have you ever noticed of an evening when the birds are sitting on the telephone wire - have you noticed it - they have space between them, regular space, which they demand, which they must have. But we don't want space, we want to be close together, because we are frightened to be alone. There is that.

Then emotionally we have no space either, because emotionally we are attached - I must be with that person, I can't bear to be alone, I must have companionship, I must be occupied. So inwardly and outwardly we have very little space, and therefore we become more and more violent, or escape from this altogether, through sectarian attitudes, through various religious organizations, following all the bearded gurus and so on and so on. Escapes.

And space is an extension in which there are objects and no objects. Right, you are following this? Now for most of us, our minds are filled with things - things. Things are also thought, not only furniture and books and knowledge but thought is matter, thing. So inwardly we have very little space. And in that little space there is the movement of occupation, self-centred occupation, or put it outside and still occupation, from the centre.

So the mind, which is absolutely quiet, has space without any object in it. The moment there is an object, that object creates space around itself, and therefore there is no space. You understand this? The moment when there is, in my mind, in one's mind, an object, a chair, a belief, fear, the persistent demand for pleasure - objects, then each object creates its own little space round itself. And we try to expand these little spaces, hoping to capture the great space. I wonder if we are meeting this? So the mind that is completely quiet has space in which there is no object, and therefore an attention, not about something, or attention towards something, simply a state of attention. And if you notice, when there is attention there is extraordinary space. It is only when there is no attention the object becomes important. So attention is not a matter of cultivation, going to a school to learn how to be attentive, going to Japan or India or some Himalayan town to learn how to be attentive, which is all so manifestly silly, but attention is this extraordinary sense of space. And that cannot exist when the mind is not completely quiet. And this quietness is total harmony.

Then the mind is not dissipating energy. Now we dissipate energy - in quarrels, in gossip, in fighting each other, in dozens of ways. And we need tremendous energy to transform 'what is' - 'what is', is my anger, your anger, your ambition, your greed, your envy, the desire for power, position, prestige, the 'what is' - to go beyond 'what is', you need tremendous energy. But you have no energy if you are battling with 'what is'.

So life is a movement in harmony when there is this energy that has gone beyond 'what is'. Because attention is the concentration of total energy. And all this is meditation. And one asks, is there something beyond all thought, something which is not measurable, not nameable, that no words can describe - is there something like that? How are you going to find out? Will you accept what another says? Will you put your faith in the words of another? Or in the experience of another? Because if you put your faith in another you know what happens to you? You are destroyed, because the other fellow becomes all-important. So as you cannot put your faith in anything or anybody, there is freedom. And when there is freedom, the mind, which has relied for its energy through struggle, through conflict, through the pursuit of pleasure, the mind itself becomes extraordinarily full of energy, without any outward stimuli. Only in that state is there something which is not measurable and which is not nameable; and nobody can convey it to you.

Do you want to ask any questions?

Q: How does one go about finding what one loves to do, instead of just accepting an adequate job?

K: As things are now arranged politically, economically, with all the social injustices, you can't find a job that you love. That is, if you are an artist you say, "I love what I am doing." If you are an artist you might love your painting, or writing a poem, or shaping the marble, the clay. But you depend for your livelihood on another, you have to sell your pictures, your poems. So you have to accept what others have to say, whether your poem is good or not, to be published or not, or saleable or not. So you depend on society.

And if you become a monk, you also depend. So as things are, as the society, the culture, the economic structure of the world is, as it is, how will you find out, and how will you, if you really love what you want to do, how will you be able to live? Or is that the question? The questioner says, "I want to find a job which I really love," Is that the question? Or will you accept any job because you are not emotionally and psychologically dependent on the job? That is, through a job you are seeking a status - most of us are. We don't want to remain cooks, we want to become the chef, because the chef has a status. We don't want to be merely a priest, we want to become bishop, and then archbishop and finally the Pope, because that has immense prestige. So most of us are concerned not with functions but with status. Now if you can remove from your mind the status, not seek it at all, then you accept what job you can, don't you? And then that job becomes interesting. I don't know if you follow all this - somebody disagrees with all this.

Q: It's more complicated.

K: I know it's much more complicated. Because I'm married, I have children, I want more money, cars, position, you know the responsibility of having a family in the modern world. It becomes terribly complicated. How will you answer the problem of each one? I may want a very simple job, I don't care, I really don't care whether I'm a cook or a gardener or a Prime Minister - I'm not, thank god. I really don't care, because I'm not seeking status, therefore I'm only concerned with good functioning. Another may want a good position, he is driven by ambition, he's always competing, aggressive, and being aggressive he has his own problems, and so on and so on and on. Now how will you answer this question, that will answer every variety of human being, who wants a job? And for every job there are three thousand people who are after it.

I was told the other day, somebody advertised for a cook, and BA's and MA's came to offer themselves as cooks. Now how will you answer this question, that will be acceptable, true to each one? Then it won't be complex, will it? We're going to find out - I haven't thought about this before, enquired into it - we're going to enquire into it together - that will answer every human being. Does he seek a job according to his temperament? According to his character, according to the demands of the society - society demands that there should be more engineers or more scientists, or more artists - more artists because you have a better position then you are more respected, like in Russia, you have special, houses and special facilities.

Now are you dependent on your temperament in seeking a job, that is, according to your character. Please listen to this. We're enquiring, I'm not laying down the law, I'm not the Delphic Oracle - we're enquiring. So I am seeking a job according to my temperament, which is, I love that job. And my temperament, my character is the outcome of my conditioning. So according to my conditioning and character, according to that, the job is decided. Or my conditioning expresses itself in peculiar idiosyncrasies, the artist, the scientist, this or that. Shall I seek a job according to my idiosyncrasies, which means, according to my conditioning? You are following all this? The conditioning is the result of the society I live in, and that society says, "Prestige, status, is most important, not the function". And so my conditioning says, "I must be at the top of my profession." - the prestige.

So shall I, being brought up in the culture in which I have lived, follow the dictates of the culture, dependent on temperament and idiosyncrasy, or - what shall I do? Go on, sirs, what shall I do? So I ask myself, what is a human being to do who is very, very serious, living in this society, with all the complexity of it - perhaps you see more of the complexity and I may not - but it is complex, what shall a human being do, knowing all this, knowing what is relationship, in which there is no image - we went into that - knowing that knowledge is necessary, having an insight into the whole process of thinking, what it means to lead a religious life, what it means to live meditation - knowing, observing all this, what shall he do? Just go and seek a job which he loves, dictated by his character, temperament, conditioning? Or when he realizes the whole, when the thing is laid out - all the things we have discussed, talked about - very clearly laid out, what will he do? Please look at it. What will he do?

Can I leave that question with you or do you want the speaker to answer it? Look, sir, what will you do? You, who have listened for the last fortnight - we have discussed, gone into the question of psychological revolution, and that's the only revolution, not violence. We discussed, went together, shared together the whole question of relationship; we talked about knowledge and the necessity and the importance of knowledge, and at the same time, freedom from the known, two together living, moving together. We discussed, we have talked over religion, authority, love, death. And a mind that is so marvellously clear, lives in a different dimension and so on - we've discussed all this. What shall I do, after hearing all this? What's my job after hearing all this? Well, sir, what do you say? You want me to tell you? My job is what I am doing - you understand? To teach, to learn, to bring about a different human being - that's my job. If you have listened carefully right from the beginning, that will be your job. And if you don't love that job, don't do it.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 2ND AUGUST 1972.

I think we have to lay ground rules before we begin to converse together. I think the word 'discussion' is rather misplaced.

Discussion means explanation or examination through argument, opinion against opinion, judgement against judgement, one's characteristic conclusions against another's. I think that word 'discussion', we shouldn't use, if I may suggest. But rather use the word 'dialogue', which means converse together, talk over things together.

So what shall we talk over together today? I mean by talking over really as two friends with a very serious problem. As two friends, companions, with affection, with consideration, with attention, really talk over what they feel, what they think, what their problems are, how to solve them. If we could do that during these seven days I think it would be worth while.

So we need in order to talk over things together a certain quality of affection, not tolerance, because that's an ugly word, because then you put up with each other - I tolerate you and you tolerate me. Whereas if we could seriously, with consideration, with a great deal of affection, and naturally, attention - talk things over, then perhaps we could come to some kind of resolution of our problems. May we do that? So what shall we talk over this morning - one problem, you know, one thing, let's go to the very end of it, each day, you understand - then it will be worthwhile.

Q: Sir, there seems to be a distinction between the older and the younger people. And there is a difference in time between some people. There is also a distinction between long hair and short hair. Now, of course, this distinction exists within our minds, but when we stand in front of people, perhaps this distinction doesn't necessarily enter into our relationship; these are only sort of boxes that we put people in in our mind. There are sort of partitions we put them in which only exist as a sort of dictionary existence but not as an actual existence when we face these situations with another person. But there is also within our minds distinctions.

K: So what is the question, sir?

Q: The question is: how shall we go beyond this division?

K: Obviously many so-called young people, short hair, long hair, whatever it is, asked if they could have a discussion, a dialogue together in the tent, here, and so I thought we should have one meeting of that kind. It isn't that there is a time-lag between the young and the old, but just the feeling that young people have their own peculiar problems and they want to discuss. That's all.

Q: I did not want to say anything against that, I only wanted to make this question about the compartments that we put in our minds.

K: I understand sir. Right? So what shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: Is it possible to transform the human mind?

Q: I'm wondering what it is that prevents a person from being aware of his own inward state. He says he is going to watch himself and he's not going to escape. And one wants to run away, smoke a cigarette or whatever it is and he says, "I won't run away; I'm going to watch myself." And yet one still doesn't watch oneself, one doesn't see...

K: Now we can take that. One question, which is, he asks - how is it possible for me to watch myself, not force myself to watch myself, not deliberately avoid escapes, but just watch myself. Can we discuss that? Do you really want to go into it? Right?

What is the necessity of watching oneself? Why do you think one should watch oneself?

Q: To learn about oneself?

K: I watch myself in order to learn what is actually going on - factually, not theoretically, not in abstraction, what is going on in myself. I want to learn. Now what does that word mean, to learn, because I think we ought to be clear when we use words that have different meanings. What do we mean by that word to learn. I want to learn about myself. First of all, myself is a living thing, isn't it? Right? Or you don't think it's a living thing.

Q: The word myself?

K: No, not the word but the fact - myself, the 'me'. I want to learn about myself. Right? We are examining the two words 'learn' and 'myself' - not the word but the content of that word. Myself is a living thing, isn't it - I'm adding, taking away, there is - it is a living, not a dead block of material or wood, because it is always moving. Are we clear on that?

Q: Why do we want to be concerned with ourselves at all?

Q: I want to watch myself and learn about myself but let's say I'm unhappy, and I'm running away and always...

K: Wait, sir, we're coming to that.

Q: ...it has no meaning and I want to be able to learn about myself.

K: And the lady asks, why are you so concerned about yourself?

Q: I didn't say that in answer to that.

K: No - she asks, why is one so concerned about oneself.

Q: Because we are unhappy?

Q: Because we compare ourselves with other people.

K: Is it a habit? Is it a necessity? To be not concerned, to learn, is different from being concerned, surely. I am concerned about my property, to hold it. I'm concerned about my dog. I'm concerned about my garden. But here we are trying to learn, which is entirely different from being self-centred, in a self-centred way be concerned. So that's clear.

Now I want to learn about myself. What do I mean by that word to learn? Is there a difference between knowing myself and learning about myself? I'm sorry to be - this is not splitting hairs - I want to learn, I want to find out the meaning of words, you understand, sir - otherwise we'll talk two different things. So when I say I want to know myself, and when I want to learn about myself, is there a difference between these two words?

Q: To me there is - knowing is something dead, final, and learning is a constant movement.

K: The lady says, knowing myself is a dead statement, whereas learning about myself is a constant movement. That is, I know you because I met you yesterday, or know you because I've seen you for several years. I have an image about you and I can add to that image, then I say, I know you. But in the meantime you might have changed, but I retain the picture of you which I have had for the last five years. So when I say, I know you, I am judging you from my dead conclusion about you. So we can leave that word 'know' aside. So what does it mean then to learn?

Q: To be aware of what you are thinking and feeling every moment.

K: To be aware of what you are thinking and feeling every moment. Learn.

Q: I guess to learn is to collect information.

K: Learning means collecting information. You see - let me go on, may I go on a little bit and then you can. I want to learn about myself. Myself is a living thing, though myself is the result of various experiences, memories, conclusions and so on, through those conclusions, memories, experiences, one adds all the time, it isn't a dead thing. So it's a living thing. I want to learn about myself - learn means, doesn't it, learn about myself who is living, all the time changing, adjusting, conforming, denying, pushing, aggressive - I want to learn about that.

Now to learn I must have curiosity, mustn't I? Right? Because I know nothing about myself, I'm going to learn about it. But if I come to it with a prejudice - prejudice being a previous judgement, previous opinion - I can't learn about it. So to learn about myself I must come to it without any prejudice, without any conclusion, without any judgement, otherwise I can't learn. I want to learn Italian or Russian. I must come to it afresh, because I know nothing about it.

So if I want to learn about myself I mustn't come to it with a conclusion. Right? Now this is going to be the difficulty. Because when I look at myself I say, "How ugly", "How beautiful", "This is rights; this is wrong." Those are all conclusions which I have arrived at previously, therefore I am not learning. Right?

Q: We must approach without pre-set limitations.

K: That's right, sir. Now can I observe myself without prejudice, for or against. If I can't there is no learning. Now please begin - we are talking over together. You want to learn about yourself and I want to learn about myself. First of all I want to learn about myself because there is a division between you and me, not only biological differences but psychological differences, which bring about a division between you and me and therefore there is a battle between you and me, we and they and so on. So I want to learn about myself to see why there is this division. To learn. Now to learn implies, doesn't it, that it is a constant movement and therefore it is not an accumulation of knowledge about myself. Please see the difference. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's what we are doing now. Wait, I'm coming to that, madam - go slowly. I want to learn about myself. First I see that myself is a living thing. And if I come to it with any prejudice, I can't learn.

Q: That question about myself: To learn about myself, I feel I wish to be myself. If there's learning, then there's a separation and that's what's painful, the separation.

K: I'm coming - wait a minute, sir. You're all too quick for me. I want to go into it step by step and then see for myself why there is a division between the observer, who is trying to learn about the observed. Now is there a division between the observer and the observed? We're going to find out, sir - go slowly. We must be clear on this because then we can proceed quickly. Learning implies that any form of accumulation as knowledge will prevent further learning, it will be only an addition to what I already know.

So I am looking at myself with the previous conclusions which I have had about myself. Is that learning? Look, I want to learn about myself, and to learn about myself I must look at myself without any conclusion, mustn't I? No?

Q: When we say I am a living entity, we have there an assumption.

K: No, when I say I am a living entity, is that assumption or is it a fact?

Q: But as we understand ourselves, when we say we are a living entity, then we mean we are living, conscious?

K: Yes, living.

Q: And so we are discovering ourselves in life.

K: We are discovering ourselves, we are observing ourselves, we are learning about ourselves. There is no discovering of ourselves factually if we come to it with a prejudice.

Q: What is the difference between a fact and a conclusion?

Q: Please look at the yellow question, the yellow piece of paper on which he has written his question.

K: He has written a question on a piece of paper - I won't. Sorry. This is a friendly discussion, a dialogue, communication, talking things over - how can you give me a piece of paper, when we are two friends sitting here.

Q: I have no microphone, so he cannot talk from so far.

K: I don't know what to do.

Q: How do you know when you're seeing a fact and how can you distinguish that from when you come to a conclusion? I don't see the difference between a fact and a conclusion - seeing a fact about yourself and coming to a conclusion.

K: The gentleman says, I don't see the difference between a fact and a conclusion. Good Lord! Wait, I'll tell you. A fact and a conclusion. A fact is that I have a toothache. Right? The conclusion is, I must go to the doctor, dentist. One is a fact, the other is a conclusion, I must go to the dentist to have something done about it. Now a conclusion about myself prevents me from looking at the fact. That is, if I have a previous conclusion, which is a prejudice, I cannot see the fact. That's all we are saying.

Q: But that is an example.

K: I don't like examples, but he wanted to know the difference between a conclusion and a fact.

Q: I understand what you are saying better, that is, any prejudice about myself will prevent my seeing myself.

K: That's all. And am I looking at myself with various conclusions? Then I want to find out, who is the entity who is looking, learning. Who is that entity?

Q: Are you suggesting that this process is a lifelong process, never at any time must we have a conclusion?

K: Are you saying, the questioner asks, that throughout life one mustn't have any conclusions? You will find out. Please, you are not following step by step, you're going, thinking, that's the difficulty when we're talking with so many people.

Now let me begin again. I want to learn about myself. I cannot learn about myself if there is any form of conclusion. And I see I have got a great many conclusions about myself - good, bad, that I am great, ignoble, this or that. Now who is the entity that is gathering all these conclusions. Right? You're following? And so these conclusions divide from the fact. Right, sir?

Q: Sir, when I say I'm bad, is that a fact or a conclusion?

K: How do I know when I am angry - is that a fact or a conclusion? How do I know that anger is a fact and the opinion about anger is a conclusion. Right? Don't you know? The opinion, the judgement about anger is a conclusion. And the fact I'm angry is a fact.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand that, sir. There are two things involved, aren't there - the observer and the thing he observes. The observer says, "I must learn about myself." And so there is a division between the observer and the observed. That's a fact. The observer says, "I must learn about what I observe." That is, the observer says, "I must accumulate knowledge about myself." Please think, look at it. There is myself and the observer. The observer says, "I must learn about this thing which is myself." Now is there a division between the observer and the observed?

Q: To my mind there is.

K: Why, why do you think that there is a division? Is the observer the entity that concludes, that says, "I must learn about myself"? The observer is the past, isn't it? The observer is saying, "I know a great deal and I must learn more about myself." The observer doesn't say, "I know nothing." The observer says, "Yes, I know about myself a little, because I've been angry, I've been prejudiced, I've been hurt, I've got a great many images." And with those images, hurts, with those judgements he looks at the thing he calls himself. No? So I say to myself, who is this observer who is saying, "I must learn; I must do this," you follow - who is this observer? Until I'm very clear about that I can't move any further.

Be clear on this point.

So who is this observer?

Q: It is ourself.

K: Wait, go slowly - don't jump to conclusions, go slowly. Who is the observer in you?

Q: If you say, who is the observer, maybe it depends how you say it, but usually if I say that it is just another observer saying it.

K: No, just look at it slowly, take it slowly. I have my make-up which is divided, fragmented - the body, the heart, the mind. I have the image I have been hurt and I love - I'm broken up into a great many fragments. Now go slowly, please. Now who is the observer among those fragments.

Q: My parents.

K: Yourself.

Q: No, my parents.

K: Your parents. Your parents are the observers, are they? Are you being serious, sir? Or pulling my leg. Yes, sir?

Q: That keeps up the division of the observer and the observed.

K: That's what we are saying, sir.

Q: This arises unless I get a kind of slap on myself, then I...

K: Just wait - I don't want to be slapped, I don't want to suffer and then find out, I want to intelligently observe. I don't want to be shocked into this thing, that's silly.

Q: It seems to me that the division between the observer and the observed arises just from thinking, when I think about myself.

K: Look at yourself, sir, don't put it into words yet. Look at it. You are fragmented, aren't you? Now which of the fragments is the observer?

Q: Sir, I am leaning, but it is with a fragment.

K: I understand that, sir.

Q: Why do you come to the conclusion that we are fragmented?

K: Aren't you?

Q: I do not feel fragmented.

K: Then you're a happy person. Finish. When you say I want to learn about myself, it is a statement of fragmentation. No? So one fragment has assumed the power or the authority as the observer. That's all. Be clear on this. I am fragmented because I hate, I love. I am ambitious, I am greedy - you follow, fragmented, I am - it's not a question of why do I say it, it is a fact. We are not a harmonious whole - that's a fact.

Now, being fragmented, one of the fragments assumes the power as the observer, and therefore he maintains the division. Now, keep to that, see the fact of that - as long as one of the fragments assumes authority, as the observer, that observer maintains a division. Now, my next question is, how is the observer not to divide himself apart from the other fragments?

Q: By seeing himself as the cause of the division.

K: By seeing himself as the cause of division - do you see yourself as the cause of division? Sir, I'm not asking an impudent question but is it a mere verbal statement, an intellectual concept, or as an actual fact, that you see that the observer is the cause of division. Do you see it? Do you feel it?

Q: I feel it, sir.

K: Then there is no observer. If I see the cause of division is nationalism, you understand, and therefore war, all the rest of it, if I actually see the danger of it, its finished, isn't it? - I'm no longer a nationalist. Now in the same way, if I see very clearly the observer maintains, sustains, nourishes this division, the danger, then the observer is not. There is only the observed.

Q: Yes, but only momentarily - tomorrow it comes back again.

K: It may be momentarily we discover the danger of it. Now is that so? Do you momentarily see the danger of a precipice, do you momentarily see the danger of a wild animal, or you see it at all times?

Q: I don't feel this as my opinion, I feel that life is demonstrating this everlastingly.

K: Yes, sir. Look, though we say this, nationalism is a poison, we contribute to war by being a national. So we never realize the danger of the observer who maintains the division. That's all I'm saying - do you see the danger?

Q: No.

K: No. Let's be honest. You don't see the danger. Why? Go into it, take time. Why don't you see the danger of division?

Q: Because we...

K: Wait, don't please find excuses. See the fact first. There is Germany and Russia, divided, England - you follow - Italy, India and Pakistan, divided, divided, divided. That causes conflict, war, hatred. And one feels that division is the most deadly thing. Now, why don't you feel this? Why don't you see it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, don't you see the danger of nationalism?

Q: Yes, I do.

K: Then are you national?

Q: No, I'm not.

K: That's very simple, because you see the danger. That's all - keep to that. What, sir?

Q: As soon as we see that you come to a conclusion about it...

K: I understand, sir. See it without a conclusion. The moment you conclude, that conclusion becomes the observer. You follow this?

Q: The conclusion observes.

K: Be simple, sir - step by step. I am asking, who is the observer who says, "I must learn about myself." The observer is one of the fragments of which I am, so when there is an observer, he maintains this division. That's a fact, not a conclusion. Right, sir? That's a fact, that as long as there is a division between India, Pakistan, Russia, China, there must be conflict. Wait, sir. There must be conflict. As long as there is a division in myself there must be conflict.

Q: Sir, does not the State depend on nationalism?

K: Why do you make it so complicated, sir? I'm just going from one fact to another. One fact is that there is an observer and the observed. When I am angry, I say to myself, "I must not be angry." A division. That's all.

Q: When I feel very unhappy I say, "I must work; I must see what it is, why I am unhappy..."

K: Wait, that's good enough. When I am unhappy I say to myself, 'Why am I unhappy, what is the cause of it?' So that is the division, isn't there - there is an observer who says, "I must examine why I'm unhappy." Now, is the observer different from the thing he observes? Wait, madam, take two seconds to look at the question.

Q: It is the observer who is unhappy.

K: Look, I am angry, there is anger. At the moment of anger there is no observer. Look at it. At the moment of your happiness, there is no observer. Only a second later, you says, "How happy I have been." At the moment of anger there is no observer, only a second later there is the observer who says, "My anger was justified or I mustn't be angry."

Q: A child developing...

K: Leave the child alone - you see how we cannot stick to one thing - you.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, of course we are showing, trying to find out if life can be lived without conflict. Don't just say, yes, and pass it off as a theory we're trying to find out.

Q: Is this an automatic thing?

K: Madam, look at it - you don't have to ask me - look at it. I am happy. At the moment of happiness there is no observer, is there? Don't say hesitantly - either it is or it is not. When you are happy, when you are angry, when there is tremendous sense of sorrow.

Q: But it doesn't last, always something happens.

K: It's only a moment after that you say, "I have been happy. I have been angry." So division arises. Watch it - please go slowly. At the moment of enjoyment, at the moment of great delight, there is no observer. That delight has moved, gone. Then you remember that delight. The remembrance is the observer. Listen to it, please just listen to it.

Q: One can be aware...

K: Please just listen to what I am saying. I have been happy, and it's gone. The memory of that happiness remains, the memory. That memory is the observer who says, "I would like to be more happy." So memory as thought is the dividing factor.

Q: One can be aware of enjoyment, one can be aware of it.

K: I did not say - when you are not aware of it, then begins the problem of separation. Why can't we be simple about this. Look, sir, You hurt me, you have hit me. At the moment of that - you follow - then the memory of that remains. Then I say, I must hurt you back. So the memory is the observer. Please apply it to yourself, sir - look at it for yourself. When you have great joy you don't think, do you? It is there, the full delight. It has gone. Then the memory of it remains, and you want more of it.

Q: No, it's not necessary.

K: It's not necessary, always, of course not. You've had sex, and at the moment of it there is no observer. Later on, the image, the picture, the remembrance, the imagination is the observer who says - what?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is memory part of the present? It's there, but memory is the result of an incident which has taken place, which has gone.

Q: But you don't always long for it.

K: Madam, don't you long for something?

Q: Sometimes yes.

K: I'm asking sometimes - yes. Now why do you long for it? Because you have a remembrance of something that was pleasant. That remembrance is the observer who says, "I wish I could have that again." That's all we are stating.

Q: I say that it's possible to have a memory and not long for it - one can have it or not to have it.

K: Of course.

Q: Why make a problem of it?

K: Who is making a problem?

Q: Well, you - that's what we're talking about.

K: Are you taking a superior attitude? (Laughter) I am asking something very simple. I want to find out, who is the observer. And can I look at the fact, is there observation of a fact without the observer. That's all I'm asking. You've got it, sir, up to now?

Q: Yes, for a moment, for example yesterday, there was observation of myself without any observer.

K: That's right, sir.

Q: For an instant.

K: That's good enough - wait a minute. Look, sir, for an instant there was an observation without the observer. It happens to all of us, it's not something mysterious. Now, what takes place, after that? Once for a second, five seconds, or a minute you observe without the observer, which is the past. You observed. Now, what then takes place next?

Q: Thought.

K: Wait.

Q: It seems that if one can only observe like that...

K: I'm going to show you something, sir. You have a memory of that, haven't you? And then you say, "I wish life could be lived that way." Which is what - listen to it carefully - that experience has left a memory, and that memory says, "Life should be lived that way." which is a conclusion. Therefore that conclusion prevents you from experiencing that thing next time. That's all. So don't conclude - you had that moment of extraordinary clarity - finished. Don't say, "I must have more of it." The 'more of it' is the observer who says, "How delightful that was; I must have more." He makes the problem. Yes, sir?

Q: I watched a movie on television - there's no observer at that time.

K: Quite right.

Q: Is that all we are talking about?

K: Oh no - not the movie. No, no.

Q: Then there is something else that we are looking for while we are watching that movie.

K: Sir, when you watch the movie, a film, what is taking place?

Q: There is no observer.

K: Wait, look at it, let's see. There it is, you're watching it - what takes place? It's an exciting scene.

Q: You're completely absorbed.

K: You're absorbed, aren't you. Wait, go slowly, sir. You are absorbed by that incident, by the things that are happening on the screen. A child is absorbed by the toy.

Q: An observer.

K: Just - you are absorbed. That is, the film drives out all your thinking, all the observer, because it's so exciting, if it is exciting - as the boy is absorbed by the toy. Now life isn't that film.

Q: At that moment it is.

K: Wait - because that's an escape. You're being absorbed by something outside of you.

Q: There is no 'you' escaping.

K: Sir, you are absorbed, aren't you?

Q: There's no observer. There's no you that's absorbed.

K: Wait, go slowly. You are absorbed, aren't you, by that scene.

Q: The statement is loaded because you say 'You' are absorbed.

K: No, the scene is so exciting that you for the moment cease to exist. Put it ten different ways. What has taken place there? That scene has pushed away all thinking, for the time being. When you have finished with that film and gone home, it is what you are at home what we are talking about, not about the film.

Q: I don't want to talk about the film.

K: Wait. So you are absorbed by the film. Another is absorbed by going to church, another is absorbed by a book, another is absorbed by Billy Graham. Wait, go step by step, sir.

Q: I think we should talk about why I went to the movie...

K: No, I'm not going to talk about why you went to the movie, I'm not interested.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am saying that, sir.

Q: Well, how can we discuss this together, because I'm saying that at that time there is no observer.

K: Quite right.

Q: We reached that point in conversation.

K: Quite right, I agree with you, sir.

Q: Now my next question is, are we talking about something more than that?

K: Much more, much more.

Q: That's what we want to know.

K: Much more. My life is not at the cinema, my life is not consumed by a book, my life is not absorbed by looking at a mountain, my life is what I am. They may absorb me for the time being, but I am back to myself when that is not. I am talking about myself when that is not. I don't say it's an escape, why do I go - I'm talking about myself when I am not at the cinema, when I am not reading a book, when I am not listening to some excited idiocy - I'm just watching myself, that's all.

Q: It is your idea, about the observer and the observed - it's not our learning, it's not our factual spontaneous idea.

K: That's fairly simple. So I am asking you now - forget your spontaneity, look at yourself, watch yourself - is there not an observer who is different from the thing he observes. That's all, sir - that's a fact, isn't it? When you look at yourself you don't have to have a subconscious or be told, it's a fact when you observe. Look, you have a mirror - when you look at yourself in the mirror, what takes place? The image is not you. And the image is different from you inwardly, though it is as if you look at it at yourself in a mirror, inwardly there is the image and the maker of the image.

Q: May I suggest that we are inundated by environmental pressure.

K: Sir, of course, that's one of the factors. We are inundated by external pressures. Who has created these external pressures? Go into it - who has created it? Society? The politicians? The doctors? The scientists? Yes?

Q: All of us.

K: Which is you.

Q: No, not necessarily.

K: So you - listen to this, watch it - you say there are external pressures all the time forcing us. And these external pressures are the politicians whom you have elected, the warmongers, the army, the businessman - of which you are part. No? Wait - so you are compressed by the pressures which you have created.

Q: Yes.

Q: Sir, I see many motives in myself, and each motive becomes the observer.

K: I quite agree, sir.

Q: And when I see that and I see that all observers are these motives. Also is the observer always false?

K: Yes, sir, I understand it, sir. Now look we have listened to each other for an hour - what have you learned. You learned, not what I have told you - what have you learned? Learnt means as a fact, that you know it as a fact, for yourself. Have you learnt for yourself as a fact that the observer is the past? Wait - have you learnt that? Now what do you mean by learnt? Have you learnt it, have you seen the fact that when there is an observer there must be division, there must be conflict? Do you see it as factual as you see a thunderstorm, a danger, an animal - it's real, not a conclusion, an idea? That's all.

Q: We don't see it.

K: That's right, sir, you don't see it.

Q: What is it that prevents it? What is it that prevents us seeing it?

K: Why do you ask it, sir? You're asking, what prevents you? What prevents you? Wait a minute - I've asked you what prevents you from seeing this fact as you would see danger, a precipice, as you would not swallow a poison, because you see the danger of it. Now what prevents you from not seeing this as clearly as that?

Wait - take it to yourself, don't answer me yet. Is it laziness, is it that you have no energy, or is it that you don't want to see it, because if you see it, things may alter, you follow? Your life may be changed. So you are frightened to see it, so you say, "I don't see it; I don't see it; I don't see it."

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please, sir, I'm asking you, the gentleman asked, why is it I don't see this clearly. Is your mind lazy, you understand - active, hasn't got the energy to say, "Well, I must find this out," because the mind has been fed on other people's ideas, you understand, lives on quotations, has become a secondhand instrument. Therefore it says, "I cannot see this." Therefore forget if you can't see it, but find out if your mind is secondhand. You understand? That's it. And to see that you must have energy, mustn't you?

So why is it that I don't see this thing which is so prevalent, which is so persuasive, which is so factual - all my life it is that way. I'm a Hindu, I'm a Buddhist, I'm a Christian, I'm a Communist, I'm young, I'm old, I'm good, I'm bad, Jesus is right and I'm wrong - this division. And why don't I see that this division in any form, outwardly, politically or religiously or psychologically, it's a deadly thing - why don't I see it? The Jew, the Gentile, the Arab - you follow, sir? Why don't you see it?

Q: Is it because we are subscribing to it and won't accept responsibility for the subscription.

K: That's right, sir, I'm saying that. And yet this thing creates war, this thing is going to destroy you.

Q: Because we have not learnt to think and we think we are able to thin.

K: We are not able to think? Why are you not able to think?

Q: We have never practised it.

K: We are doing it here. You see - do it, sir, find out, take time. You're here, sitting down, talking over - why do you not see this. You're lazy? Are you lazy? Yes, that's a factor. You're lazy. Why are you lazy? Go to the end of it, don't just say, "I'm lazy" and sit back. Why are you lazy? You've overeaten, over indulged or you've not enough of the right kind of food - find out.

Q: Because of this conflict that the observer brings about.

K: So you say, "Well, this conflict is destroying our energy." Then why don't you stop it, find out how to stop it. I'm asking, therefore, enquire, go into it. That is, as long as there is an observer, there must be conflict. As long as there is nationality there must be conflict, as long as you are a Christian and somebody else is a Muslim, there's going to be conflict.

Q: So why is it so hard to enquire?

K: Why is it so hard to enquire? Because you have never done it before, because you've always been spoon-fed, because you've always accepted what others have said, what the psychologists, what the religious people, what the priest says, what the professor - you don't say, "I know nothing and I'm going to find out. And I'm not going to repeat a word which I don't know."

Q: Sir, it makes it difficult for me to understand this at the moment but as you say, it is dangerous, there is a second observer saying that the first observer is dangerous.

K: No, sir. Look - you've heard about the recent war in India between Pakistan and India? Haven't you? War between Israel and the Arab world - that's a fact isn't it? And the fact shows, as long as there is an Arab way of looking at life and an Israelite way of looking at life, there must be conflict. That's all.

Q: It seems like a new observer saying, that observation was wrong.

K: No, no - that's a conclusion. Do look at it, sir - you, not you - one is married - you have a relationship with a man or a woman. There are two entities, aren't there? As long as there is a division, not biological, but psychological division between the two, there must be conflict. You have an image and she has an image, and there must be conflict. Images are your conclusions - that she's good, that she's bad, that she thinks you're an absurd idiotic man, or whatever it is.

Q: Where does the awareness go when the body dies?

K: Where does the awareness go after the body dies - we haven't come to that point. Please stick to this thing; if you once understand this deeply, when you see this fact, you will see for yourself that you have not to depend on anybody. Come on, sirs.

Q: What happens to memory without having had an observer?

K: Yes, sir, I'm going to show you - that's a good question. Can you have knowledge without that knowledge being used by one of the fragments. Right? Have you understand my question, sir? Have I translated your question?

Q: Will you please repeat it, I couldn't follow you.

K: Would I repeat it. I have knowledge. There is accumulated knowledge which is part of the brain - the memories, which is knowledge, experience, the past. Now one of the fragments uses that memory, knowledge, for its own benefit, it exploits that knowledge. I see you are not getting it - let me begin again. The questioner asked, can knowledge, memory, all the scientific, technological personal memories that have been gathered through centuries, can that remain without an observer using that so that it creates a division. You've understood the question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right. Have you understood the question? There is all this scientific knowledge, all the knowledge which human beings have gathered, through millenia - which is the past. All knowledge is the past. I can add to it, more and more, but it is always in the past. Now when that knowledge is used in our relationship with each other, there is conflict. No?

I have lived with you, as a friend, as a wife, as a husband, boy or girl - I have lived with you. I have images of you, I have built a series of memories, incidents in our relationship. Those incidents, those experiences, those images are the knowledge. That knowledge divides you and me.

Q: Why should it?

K: Why should it? Because I'm living in the past.

Q: But everybody isn't living in the past. Everybody is not living in the past, why should we be living in the past - you take it for granted that we are living in the past.

K: I don't say that - I am pointing out, madam - I'm not saying you are living in the past - don't get angry with me. I'm just pointing out that as long as you have these memories, these images about me or I have about you, there must be division. I don't say you are living in the past - I'm just pointing out. Now, knowledge is necessary, otherwise I can't build a bridge, I can't go home, I can't ride a bicycle, I can't talk English. But that knowledge which is the past, when it interferes in our relationship, brings division. That's all. And that division is conflict. I don't say you have no conflict or you have conflict - it is up to you to find out. So knowledge can be used totally impersonally. But when that knowledge is used personally it creates a division. That's all.

Q: Who uses that knowledge?

K: Who uses that knowledge? Listen to the question - who uses that knowledge. Tell me, who uses that knowledge.

Q: You can't say who uses that knowledge. It can't be said, what is using that knowledge.

K: We're going to find out if it can be said or cannot be said.

Q: It's a trap to ask the question.

K: Wait - he has asked it. He has asked it. Either you say, 'Look, that question is not valid,' or it is valid.

Q: It is an improper question.

K: We'll find out.

Q: I see it.

K: You see it. If he saw it he wouldn't ask it. Since he has asked it we must find out if that question is valid or not. His question was, who uses that knowledge. There is the knowledge, consciously and unconsciously, which is the 'me'. Right? The culture in which I have been brought up, the tradition, the religious beliefs, the superstitions - all those things are the knowledge which I have. There is that knowledge. Right? Now who uses that knowledge? Look at it - who uses that knowledge? It's there - I can't deny it, I can't say it doesn't exist - it is there. When does that knowledge come into operation? Go on, investigate, don't wait for me to answer it. When does that knowledge come into action?

Q: When the observer takes the memory out of the knowledge.

K: Make it much simpler, sir. My question was: you have all this accumulated knowledge, consciously or unconsciously, which is the content of your consciousness - I say to you, when does this knowledge precipitate in action? You answer it to yourself - you're not relying on me or some book.

Q: When I need it.

K: Wait - when you need it. What do you mean by need it? Wait - please, sir, do talk slowly - I don't understand you. Unless you actually do it, don't repeat something which is not yours. I am asking, when does this knowledge come into operation.

Q: When action needs it - when action needs this knowledge it comes into action through my speech.

K: Yes, sir - when does it come into operation? Why do you take such - I mustn't be impatient. Go on.

Q: When you want...

K: Sir, I ask you what is your name. Don't you tell me?

Q: The answer comes from external stimulation.

K: He says from external stimulation. I ask you what's your name: the memory, which is accumulated, responds. Watch it - go slowly. Because you know your name very well, you have repeated it a thousand times. There is the knowledge - it only responds when there is a challenge. Now, go a step further: I ask you, what is the distance, or what is something more complicated, and you take time between the question and the answer, don't you? What takes place between that question and answer - the time lag - what takes place?

Q: Thought.

K: No.

Q: memory.

K: What takes place, sir? I ask you what is the distance between here and Geneva - what do you say? What takes place inside you? You are trying to remember, aren't you? You say, yes, somebody told me its 90 kilometres or is it 80, I'm not quite sure - you follow? The mind is investigating, isn't it, looking at it, trying to find out. And you say, yes, it's 90 kilometres or 100, whatever it is. Now I ask you something much more complex and you say, I really don't know. That is, immediate answer because you are familiar with it, with the question what's your name; a more complicated question and you take time. It may be one day, you look at books, you ask people - you take time. Then there is a question to which you say, "I really don't know how to answer it because I have no knowledge." So knowledge responds according to a challenge. If that response is not adequate, complete, then the observer comes into being. I wonder if you see it.

I've got something new - you see what I'm talking about? Now - I'm glad, I can explain it. Look, sir, when I ask you a question, what's your name, it's an adequate, complete answer, isn't it? Right? In that there is no conflict, is there? Now, I ask you something much more complex which needs time, and if you can find the answer to that challenge, that is a complete answer, in that there is no conflict.

Now, if I ask you something to which your answer is not adequate, complete, what takes place? There's conflict, isn't there? No? Come on.

Q: I give up.

K: You give up. But if it is a question that has to be answered, life and death, it's a crisis, and in that crisis, if you don't answer completely, there is conflict, isn't there? Come on sir. And that conflict is the inadequacy, which is the observer, who depends on memory. Come on - that's simple - I've got it.

K: So there is, to any challenge, if there is complete response, there is no observer in operation. That's a conclusion to you, not to me because I see it, it's a fact. So I say to myself, is there a living in which every challenge is met totally, not mathematical problems - any challenge in relationship, which is the most important thing in life, not mathematics only, because in that relationship there are challenges, can I, can the mind respond totally. Then if it can respond totally, there is no conflict and therefore there is no observer. Just see the fact, sir, see it, swallow it, chew it, let it be part of you.

So in your life, daily life, which is relationship, can you live in a way in which you respond totally to every relationship? That means you have to be extraordinarily sensitive, energetic and aware in that relationship - when you're talking to the cook, or to your servant, or to your boss or the factory etc.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DISCUSSION 3RD AUGUST 1972.

We were yesterday trying to talk over the observer and the observed, and I'm afraid it was rather complicated - I'm not at all sure each one of us understood what was said. But I'm afraid you're trying, aren't you, to understand what the speaker is saying. Don't bother. That's not at all important, what the speaker is saying. What the speaker is saying is: we have this problem of existence with all its complexities - there is war, there is violence in our daily life, there is the religious divisions, there are the divisions caused by priests, by their idea of what god is and so on. There are the divisions of nationalities, there are the divisions of racial hatreds and so on and so on.

The house is burning, not only your house but everybody's house is burning. One may have put away a little money for old age, or bought a house or flat or this or that, hoping to survive the chaos, and instead of understanding what the speaker is trying to convey, wouldn't it be better, far better if we, each one of us, looked at the problem of the world in which we are, of which we are a part. The world is not different from you, the world is you, we have built this world - the chaos, the uncertainty, the misery, the sorrow, the confusion - we have put it together, it is our world. So instead of trying to understand what the speaker is trying to convey, wouldn't it be better if we took one of those problems, which is your problem. Wouldn't that be better? Or are you rather uncertain about it? Haven't you problems? I don't want to put on to you what I say, to make it into another problem - you have enough problems.

So in understanding your problem, really going into it very, very seriously, you and I will meet, completely. But if you are trying to understand the observer and the observed, and all that I want to convey, you'll be confused still further.

So what I propose, with your - what is it, goodness, kindness - that we take the problem of existence - your problem, your house, your relationship, your daily, monotonous, lonely, unacceptable existence. Can we start from there? Wouldn't that be much wiser? So, now, this morning, what shall we talk about, discuss - not discuss - converse together.

Q: Could we talk about the problem of over population?

K: Overpopulation. Fortunately I have no children. What am I to do about it - what are you to do about overpopulation? You go to India, which I do every winter, except last year, and there are 570 million people, crawling. For one job there are about 5,000 people, people sleeping in the streets. Tremendous population - China is the same, go to the East, it is burdened, and in Europe too. So what are we to do - you and I, not somebody else - what are we to do about it? Join the Family Planning Board? Advocate which is the best contraceptive and so on? Is that your major problem? Come on, sirs, is this what you want to discuss, talk over together, how to prevent...

Q: That's not what I mean, sir, but in connection with talking about life and death, there is a connection with death and multiplying. Not how to solve the problem of over population...

K: Connection between life and death and the overpopulation. Is that it? I don't quite understand the question then.

Q: You have talked in the past days about life and death.

K: Yes.

Q: And our connection with death. But it is the necessity of nature to multiply.

K: Yes, nature multiplies. And then what - what is the question, sir?

Q: I think the questioner wants to say something about procreation, and the necessity of procreation.

K: Why do we procreate? I think it is fairly clear, isn't it? Is that your problem?

Q: I have a problem: in the process of learning about myself there arises something which distorts it eventually - an active movement which seems to be fear, which seems to turn round the whole thing, as I watch that

K: Have I understood, sir - I'll have to repeat it. What is the factor of distortion in our life? Is that it?

Q: Yes, for me it seems to be fear.

K: Wait - what is the factor of distortion in our life? I want to go straight, or walk easily, quietly, happily, with great energy, vitality and so on, but certain factors enter and distort the whole movement of life. There are certain seeds in one, conscious or unconscious, that bring about chaos, misery. Is that what you mean? That's right. Now shall we discuss that? Is that your problem?

Q: Can I give another example? We buy food and the shopkeeper has to pay tax. The tax goes for nuclear weapons and so on.

K: Yes, sir, yes.

Q: And also by the revenues we pay we are contributing to war.

K: By buying a stamp, you're contributing to war.

Now, you understand his first question. What are the factors that distort life? What are the seeds conscious or unconscious in one that brings about such a disgraceful existence? Do you want to talk it over together? It would be rather fun, if we could go into it. Now how do you find out? I want to lead a good life, a sane, balanced, healthy life - intellectually, emotionally, and I want to have a very good physical body so that I function harmoniously, happily, easily. I see this as an idea, or as an ideal, or I have a feeling for it, not as something outside but inwardly, innately. I feel this would be marvellous, if I could live like that.

Now what happens? What happens so that things go wrong? I take to drink, you follow - everything goes to pieces. Go on, sir, discuss with me - let's talk it over. Is it a factor of heredity, the genes? Is it that there is a seed in me, in one, that has been so overlaid by environment, by the culture in which I live, and that seed begins to grow and distorts everything, all my life? Now what is that seed?

Q: I project ideas and ideals.

K: He says ideals. I have no ideal. I see the futility of ideals. I've dropped them. I want to lead a really good, sane, balanced life, a happy life. But something goes wrong. I want to find out if it is a seed in me, in one, that gradually puts out its destructive force. I'm enquiring. Is it my parents, is it the society, is it the culture that I live in, that has compelled me to conform, shaped my mind and my heart, and when given an opportunity it breaks through? Which is it? I've seen so many people - I've lived a long time - from the age of fifteen, I've seen this happen, with people of my own age - begin beautifully, you know, and gradually finish, destructive, cruel, brutal, self-centred, ugly, drunk.

Q: For me it's habit.

K: Habit?

Q: That seems to stamp on the...

K: Have you understood my question, air? You say ideals create this horror. I have no ideals, I don't look to a future life or to a future action - I want to live a life now, from day to day, happily, energetically, clearly. But at the same time there is a flowering of the ugly - the religions have called it the devil, the evil one, and the Hindus and the Asiatics explain it as karma - the word 'karma' I believe means to act, and that action is conditioned by your past actions. So your actions control your life, therefore behave. If you don't behave properly this life, next life you're going to pay for it, therefore behave, and all that's involved.

So I want to find out why a human being who wants to live a straight, harmonious, active life, totally, all round, gradually goes to pieces? You've understood my question now? That was his question.

Q: In birth itself is the propensity to respond to the existing environment.

K: You're saying, at the very birth itself there is this destructive element.

Q: Not necessarily destructive, but the propensity.

K: Yes, the propensity is there. Sir, don't give me explanations. I don't want explanations - there are about one thousand or nine hundred people here, we'll all give explanations - that doesn't solve my problem. My problem is, there is in me some seed which begins to flower over which I have no control, and that destroys my life. And I want to find out if I can wipe that seed out, destroy it. And I want to find out if that seed in me can be understood, resolved, so that I can live a normal life, and all the rest of it. That's my problem - don't give me explanations. I'm thirsty - you understand, sir - don't give me ashes which are explanations. What am I to do?

Q: Sir, when things start going wrong it's because one starts to compare oneself with others.

K: Yes, sir, you compare yourself, you imitate others, you conform to the social pattern, or reject the social pattern and react against that and try to form your own pattern. We know all this. But the seed goes on. Yes, sir?

Q: Does one recognize what it is?

K: Look, sir - I've been brought up fairly well, educated, so-called educated. And it happens I take to drink. And gradually I drink more and more and more, which destroys my brain cells. What was the origin of it, why did I do this, when I could have walked as - you know - why did I take to drink, destroy myself? Doesn't this happen? Some of you take drugs, LSD, marijuana, pot, all the rest of it. Why? You know very well it destroys your mind and you keep on taking it. I want to find out what is the factor in human beings that brings about this catastrophic activity.

Q: It seems to me that people don't see that it destroys.

K: I know - yes, sir. You see it outside, I don't see it. Why don't I see it? It comes to the same thing.

Q: It seems to me a person takes to drugs or drink because the seed which he has - the centre which is separating him from everything makes existence so intolerable, he has to put himself out of his misery.

K: That's an explanation, isn't it? I want to find out why it happens, why do I do this thing? Is it inevitable because the seed has been planted - put yourself in somebody's place, sir.

Q: The seed can be a conditioning of the past.

K: The seed can be the conditioning of the past, some weakness in the character, some unsolved desire - I want to be great and I can't be great. I see somebody capable, full of life and beauty and I would like to be like him but I can't. I'm jealous, I begin to hate, and escape through drink. I know all this, I conform, or I compare myself with somebody and in that comparison I hate everything, because I can't reach up to that level, I'm jealous. So I take to drink, or drugs, or sex, or whatever it is.

Now after explaining all this, what am I to do?

Q: Become aware of your negative side and it would disappear.

K: If you would become aware of your so-called negative side, then perhaps it would disappear.

Isn't this one of your problems? You may not be so violently destructive, but there are these two sides, aren't there? I want to be kind, generous, I want to have deep affection. At the same time in its wake comes jealousy, antagonism, hate. Haven't you noticed all this? Now how does this happen?

Q: Pursuing pleasure brings about all this. There is no pleasure in duty...

K: I don't know - we're not meeting each other.

Q: Sir, is it because we identify with the seen instead of the seer.

K: You're not meeting my point. I want you to help me.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, I understand - I want you to help me. I want to lead a good social life, and I suddenly become antisocial. I'm taking a different example.

Q: Nobody can help me.

K: Nobody can help me - can't you help me?

Q: How?

K: No? Then what is the point of your existence? I come to you with a problem, you're a human being. You are educated, you have lived a long time, you've seen life. And I say to you, "Please, for god's sake help me." Have you a right to say, "No, it's your own job, you have to go through it."? Because you are also exactly in the same position, you're not different from me. In you there is that seed, in you there is the opposite of what you want to be. So don't say you can't help me - that's an easy way out.

Q: It might be the right way out.

K: It might be the right way out - is it?

Q: Why is my solution good for you?

K: No - you have this problem, haven't you?

Q: You have it.

K: I haven't got it, sir - this gentleman asked this question, and he says, "What is the factor, what is the seed in me that makes all life so destructive, so ugly - which all of us have, either hidden or actively in operation?"

Q: Is it because we look for the happiness outside instead of inside?

K: Is it because we look for happiness outside instead of inside.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Let's settle this first - aren't you exactly in the same place as the questioner? Haven't you got this dual factor active in you? Wanting to be kind, generous, affectionate, full of beauty, and at the same time there is an ugly thing going on. Haven't each one of you got this? So your problem is his problem - don't say, "Well, I can't help you." We have to solve this problem together, that's why you are there and we are sitting here.

Q: I feel there are very great individuals who are also very destructive. And that this destructiveness comes from a fear of not being perfect, of searching for perfection in oneself.

K: Please, I understand this. I can give explanations. I say, one of the reasons is the desire to be secure, another reason is the pursuit of pleasure, another reason is fear, the desire to have somebody to help you or to lead you, or some element in you which wants to escape from all this chaos. I can give a dozen explanations. At the end of it I'm still there. Look sir, haven't you been through all this before, haven't you heard inside yourself, or seen your friends going to destruction - haven't you observed all this, of which you are a part?

So what will you do, how will you stop the seed from operating, but only one movement, not double movement? How will you do this?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: First, don't answer my question yet - please just listen to my question first. One sees this dualistic activity going on. I am asking myself: how is this dualistic, the opposites to stop, only one continuous activity, not an activity which distorts the movement?

Now what am I to do? Go into it - I'll show it to you in a minute.

Now first of all, is there a duality? You understand? The good and the bad, love and hate - is there this dualistic reality? You've understood my question? Or there is only one factor, not its opposite, because the opposite contains its own opposite. Have you understood? When I say I must not hate, the 'must not' is contained in love. So the opposites contain each other - is that a fact, as it is a fact that it is raining? Do you see it as a fact, or is it just an intellectual concept with which you agree? It is not an intellectual concept when you hear that rain on the canvas. It is raining. You don't speculate about it - it is so. Now, do you see it as clearly as you hear that rain, that the opposites contain each other? Therefore there is no opposite at all. Right?

Look - I am jealous, because my friend or my girl or my wife does something of which I disapprove, or goes away from me. I become furious, angry, jealous. And I fight with jealousy, I rationalize it, I say, "How stupid of me, let her go, what does it matter." But the thing is boiling. Now I say to myself, the fact is, I have never loved her. You understand? Otherwise I wouldn't be jealous. We have taken for granted jealousy is part of love. I heard a friend say the other day, "Oh, without jealousy there is no love".

Now take that - love and jealousy. I'd better begin at the beginning. There are opposites, aren't there? Sunny day and a rainy day, night, darkness and light. There is a man and a woman. Now psychologically are they opposites? Or only one factor and because I do not know how to solve that one factor, I invent other factors. Are we meeting each other? No. All right.

Look - I am angry, that's the only factor, isn't it? When I say, I must not be angry, that's a conclusion, that's an abstraction. But the fact is I'm angry. If I know how to resolve that anger, its opposite wouldn't arise. Are we meeting each other? I am angry. Now can I solve that anger without resorting to its opposite, saying "I must not be angry." The 'must not be angry' is its opposite. And that comes only when I can't understand the whole structure of anger and go beyond it.

So I say, can I understand anger, not control it, not reject it, not yield to it, but understand it, have an insight into the whole structure of anger? If I do, then the opposite doesn't exist. You're meeting my point? Please do come. Shall we go on?

Q: If I don't control my anger I'm afraid I'll kill someone.

K: Look: before you kill somebody, try to find out if you can resolve the anger. To control it is to suppress it. To say, I must not be angry is to create the opposite, and therefore a conflict between 'must not be' and the fact that I am. Or if you try to escape from it, anger is still there.

So now I do not escape, I do not suppress, I do not say, I must resort to - there is anger. Now how am I to go beyond, how is the mind to go beyond it, without creating its opposite? You've understood? Please come on, sir, some of you understand this? Good, then come with me. Then what am I to do? Look what has taken place. Before I tried to control it, which is a wastage of energy. Before I tried to suppress it, which is a wastage of energy. Before I tried to escape from it or rationalize it, which is an avoidance, an escape from the fact. If I don't escape, control, suppress or try to rationalize it, all that energy is concentrated, isn't it? So I have got that enormous energy to deal with one fact, which is anger. Have you got that? Please, otherwise we can't go on - if you haven't got it then it becomes merely verbal. You understand? You're angry, your tradition, your culture says, "Suppress it, control it, escape from it, and rationalize it." I say, that is wasting your energy which prevents you from observing the only factor, which is anger. So anger has no opposite, there is only that, and you have the energy.

Now, next step. Why do you call it anger? Because previously you have been angry, by naming it as anger, you have emphasized the previous experience. So you are observing the present factor with the previous experience, therefore conditioning the present factor. Are you meeting this? So the naming is a wastage of energy. So you do not name, no control, no suppression, no escape, and you have the energy. Then, is there anger? Don't say you don't know, because you are then facing the only factor. And when you are facing completely that factor, the factor doesn't exist, because it exists only when you are escaping, fighting, controlling, suppressing. Right, you've got it?

So, there is in me, in one, a human being, this duality. And I ask myself, "Is there a duality at all?" There is man, woman, sunshine - that's obvious, but psychologically, are there opposites? Or only thought invented the opposite because it could not solve the one factor. Have you got it? Please. And this requires attention, doesn't it? Because to see this clearly you need to observe. And you're prevented from observing when thought says, "I must do something about it." It is thought that has said, "I must control, otherwise I'll kill somebody." It is thought that has said, "I must suppress it, I don't know what to do about it, I must run away from it, I must watch it". These are all activities of thought - when you say, "I must watch it".

So thinking about the factor is a wastage of energy. You understand all this? There is no wastage of energy when there is only observation.

Q: Do you mean by observation that you are that?

K: You've understood the question? Do you mean by observation you see you are that? Aren't you that? Do see it clearly - aren't you that anger? It's part of you. So thought says, "I must do something about that part." So thought begins to function - I must not, I must, it's right, it's wrong, it should be, you follow? So to observe without thought. You've understood, sir?

Now can you listen to that rain - please listen quietly - can you listen to that rain without thinking about the rain? You can only listen to the rain completely when you are not resisting it - when you say, "I can't hear it, I must hear." So you listen, observe, when there is no resistance of any kind. Now are you free of the opposite? Are you free at the end of this talk, are you free of it, never enter into the field of the opposite? Come on, Sirs. Yes, sir?

Q: When I see anger or confusion - when I see confusion very clearly - the thing that I see very clearly is clarity, then it's not confusion, it's clarity. Clarity is the end of confusion.

K: The gentleman says, when I see confusion, observe it totally, not wanting to get beyond it, not trying to find a way out of it, or ask somebody to help you to clear up the confusion, when you see it clearly, then there is clarity. There is clarity, obviously no confusion.

Q: May I ask the question - when I see the brutality of war clearly, it is not the end of the brutality.

K: Of course not. Wait, sir. I see brutality, war, very clearly, all the reasons, the whole structure, the army and the navy, the investment, you follow? - the whole of it, the nationality, pride of leader, white and black and all the rest of it - I see it very clearly. In that perception there is clarity, but war still goes on. Then what is your relationship to the war? You see it clearly, you understand? First of all, do you see it clearly? Or is it just an idea that you see it clearly? To see it clearly you cannot belong to any group as nationality - to any group, politically, religiously, economically - to any group. Then if you see clearly, because you do not belong to any group, to any religion, to any leader, or to any community, then what is your relationship to the fact of brutality, which is war?

Q: I was not talking about the brutality within.

K: No, of course not.

Q: When I see that brutality clearly, that brutality is finished.

K: Yes, I said that. I've no brutality - please listen - I've no brutality because I see the whole business of it and I've finished with it and for me I've finished with it, you understand, not just verbally. Then what is my relationship to the brutality, to the war, to the killing?

Q: You have none - none - it is finished.

K: Have I any relationship with that? Obviously not. Wait - go step by step. I have no relationship, but it's still going on. But I have to do something about it, I can't say, "I've no relationship," and walk off. Right? So what shall I do? I'm very clear - I don't belong to any group, to any race, to any culture, to any religion, to any leader, because all that is part of brutality, and that brutality has produced the war. I see it very clearly - see in the sense, feel it, wipe out the whole thing. Then the brutality exists - what's my relationship? I have no relationship in the sense I don't participate in it, I am not related to it, I have no connection with it, though I buy a stamp which goes to create a war, psychologically I have no relationship with it. But I have to do something, I can't say it has nothing to do with me.

So what shall I do? Are you in that position?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes, sir - are you? Don't say so easily you are. It means that you stand completely alone, don't you? If you have no authority, if you are not following anybody, you are not dependent or attached to anything - because attachment to a group, to an idea, to a person, breeds antagonism, breeds brutality. So what is your relationship if you see clearly and you say, "I have no relationship, but yet I have to do something, I have to act in this world, I can't just sit back and say, well I have nothing to do with it, with this beastly world." So what shall I do? Is it your problem? You're not a pacifist, you follow? So what will you do? Come on, sirs. Tell me, what am I to do? Go for a walk? What shall I do?

Q: Sir, if the understanding is clear I think the action also would take place.

K: Yes, what is that action?

Q: It would be an individual action.

K: Wait - will it be individual? Or will it be non-individual but human - you see the difference between individual and the human? I want to make a distinction there, if you don't mind. What is the difference between an individual and a human being? Look, sir - you live in Europe, another lives in India, Asia - each of them have the same problems as you have, though modified, but the same problems - hunger, starvation, pleasure, sex, war, worrying about tomorrow, uncertainty, you follow? - the agony of existence - it exists there, it exists here. They are human problems, aren't they? But I can, the individual can translate it as a particular issue. The individual is his temperament, his character, his idiosyncrasy, depending on his conditioning.

So the human is much bigger, wider, whether you're brown, black, purple, Indian, you belong to the whole collective human race, human beings. But the moment you separate yourself as an individual, you are creating a division, and hence conflict and all the rest of it.

So what are you to do as a human being when there is this war going on. Go on, sir.

Q: You identify with it.

K: I can't - how can I identify myself with it? That has been created by nationalism, by the military, by the engineers, by the scientists, by the - you know, all the rest of it - they have invested a tremendous lot of money in the material of war. Each nation does this, it's their peculiar dirty game. And I see the whole thing, I say, "Out." Now what shall I do, as a human being - you understand?

Q: It is very hard to understand the nature of the conflict. But you will attempt to bring out the nature of the conflict, of the duality.

K: What am I to do, sir? This is not a question of duality - what am I to do?

Q: Would it not be better to try to decide what I should not do?

K: What I should not do? All right, let's begin - what should I not do. Should I not buy stamps? Should I not travel by car? Not pay taxes, go round doing propaganda for anti-war, demonstrations, all the rest of it? You follow? You are not answering my question - what am I to do?

Q: I don't see the point of trying to decide the way I am now what to do about that. When I got there, if I got there, I would do it, whatever it was, corresponding to that understanding.

K: I understand your question, sir. He says, why do you put that question when I am not there. What do you mean, you are not there? You mean, you do not see this thing clearly?

Q: That's correct.

K: Therefore why don't you see this thing clearly. People are shedding tears, you understand, sir? Children are being burnt, whole forests are being destroyed; and we sit here and say, "We don't see this." What's wrong with me, when I say, "I don't see it", what is wrong with me when my house is burning, and I don't see it. Is it an avoidance?

Q: If you see this activity going on, one has to resist it, one has to fight against it.

K: Sir, look - please, don't you read the newspapers. Don't you look at what is happening around you? Why do you say, 'I'll wait till I get there.' It is there, it is now, not tomorrow.

Q: We know - it is very easy to become pessimistic about it.

K: Sir, you're not - don't tell me, wait till it happens to you, then I can wait till I die. It's happening now.

Q: What is one to do?

K: I'm asking this - what am I to do? I have no relationship to the war, I can't just sit still and let the war go by, I'm part of this, I've cut myself completely off, and yet I must act. What shall I do?

Q: If one is really gentle inside oneself, then doesn't this bring about a healing action in one's everyday life?

K: Yes, but the war goes on. I can probably talk to you or to a friend and say, "Look, let's..." - you follow? - "Let's understand all this business", but is that all I can do? Put yourself...

Q: You have to die but we don't know how.

K: You have to die, you don't know how?

Q: The individuality.

K: Isn't this a problem for you?

Q: Yes, of course.

K: Then what do you do about this problem? Just let it remain and go on with the problem till you die?

Q: Can one find a different kind of life without any brutality?

K: I am leading a different kind of life when I don't belong to any country, when I don't belong to any group, when I don't have any kind of relationship with any kind of brutality - I'm leading a different life. And yet round me the misery is going on. What am I to do?

Q: Just try to do as you are doing as far as we have understood.

K: All right, as far as we have understood, we'll do, but have you understood this thing totally? Why don't you see totally, that as long as you have any feeling for nationality, you are breeding war. Why don't you see clearly, that as long as you belong to any sect, any group, any religion, you're breeding war. What prevents you from seeing this? Lazy?

Q: Survival.

K: The Bible. That's a good idea. (Laughter) That's a marvellous idea. I like that. And in India they would say the Bhagvad-gita, which is the same thing - what a lovely idea, sir.

Q: Survival - the necessity of survival.

K: I haven't understood, sir.

Q: You state that we should hold merely a passport. What nationality would we be allowed to put on the passport?

K: I've got a passport which says I'm an Indian - I'm trying to change it, the passport. (Laughter) It's an awful nuisance when you have to get a visa for every country in the world.

Now let's come back - what am I to do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, listen to this - what is action? Action means the doing, doesn't it? Which is always in the present. Right? The acting is always in the present. Now what is my action based on? On the past, isn't it? No? Please discuss. Isn't my action based on the past, on my memory, on my experience, on my idea of what I should do, on my conditioning? So when action means the present, and what I do is related to the past, then it is not action. If my action is shaped according to my remembrance, then I am acting according to the pattern which my memory has set. Therefore there is no action taking place. Wait. So when I am acting according to a principle, according to an ideal, which is the future, it is no action either. Do you see that? See the reality of it? When you do, then I'm asking myself, what is my action in relation to war, though I'm not related to it. What is my responsibility?

Q: Isn't it to be what you are, having shed these things, then you are free to be what you are?

K: I don't know what I am. I am not all these things, but I don't know what I am, I am not interested, for the moment, what I am. That's not the question. My question is, when I say what am I to do, am I thinking in terms of what to do with regard to the past, or with regard to the future, or only what to do now? You see the difference?

Q: As long as you are acting there's a problem, but if you just live so intensely, and not asking the question what to do but you are living.

K: Yes, quite, that's quite right. I want to - the lady says, if you are living, then there is no question of what you are going to do. But do we live, or do we live in the past, or in the future and therefore we do not live. And therefore the question is - I won't put it yet. Have you understood the question? Look, there is this war, any war, not my favourite war, or my not favourite war - war. I see all wars are caused by many things. And I don't participate in any of them psychologically. Then I'm asking myself, "What is action?" One always acts according to the pattern of the past, a repetitive or non-repetitive action, based on memory, the past. Or action based on a future ideal, or a principle, which I have established as a concept and according to that, act. Now is that action? You follow? Or is action only when there is neither the future nor the past. Therefore there must be an insight into the past, and also an insight into the future, therefore then only there is action. Then when there is that action, I will then relate it to the present.

Has somebody understood?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, Signora, I understand that. Please apply this to yourself, look at it: do you act or are you acting according to a memory? Do you act or you are acting according to a concept, belief, a conclusion, a principle, an ideal - find out. And when you find out you will see that's not action, it's either a continuity of a dead thing, or a future thing which is not now. Now, if you see that very clearly, then what is action? Action then is what you are doing now. What you are doing now, is it related to war? Or is it something totally of a different dimension? You've understood, sir?

Q: Seeing all this and the fact that the Vietnam war is not over there, it's everywhere, is the action...

K: Sir, I don't know - I only know what we call action is either the projection of the past in the present, modified by the present, or I am acting according to a principle or an ideal, which is the future. So my action is always there or there, behind me or in front of me, but never in my lap, never acting.

Till I find that out, I can't answer what shall I do with regard to the war. Do you understand my question? I'm not avoiding my action with regard to war. I want to find out what is action.

Q: Isn't the acting according to a principle or an idea, the past or the future, the major factor of war.

K: Obviously, sir, that's just it. You've understood what the gentleman said? Acting according to a principle, to an ideal, or acting according to your conditioning, is perhaps the major factor of war. So till I have really grasped the whole nature of action, any answer will be contributing to war. I don't know whether you see that. Because if I act according to the past, the past says I'm a national. The past says you must be loyal to your country, the past says this is a good war, this is a bad war, the past says, your memories, the inheritance of your race says you must fight to survive.

So if I act according to the past I am contributing to war. Or if I'm acting according to the future ideal, I'm contributing to war, because my culture in which I've been brought up emphasizes these two. So I have to find out for myself what action is. I see these two are not action, which are contributing to war. So my action then doesn't belong to this dimension.

Q: Action in the present is love?

K: Is that an idea? How do you know? If you are acting in the past or in the future - why do you call it love? It may be, but why do you - unless you actually live it, don't call it anything.

Q: I don't even call it war.

K: Don't call it war. War means destroying, war means conflict - give it another name but it's there. Now, sir, have you seen this, have you seen the beauty of this? So a mind that is acting in the past or in the future must contribute to war. A mind that is caught in nationalism, in religious beliefs, rituals, sects and so on, must contribute to war. So have you a mind that doesn't belong to all this? Then if you have, you are doing the right thing. You are acting.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 4TH AUGUST 1972.

K: What shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: I'd like to enquire into every facet of myself to see if 'I', the sense of 'I' could come to an end.

K: You said the other day that observing what is happening in the world around us and also what is happening inwardly, and understanding it, having a deep insight into it, from what you said, should one go out and teach, or just live? You've understood the question? I'm not quite sure if I understand it yet.

Q: She's asking whether one can teach what one has understood through one's own being, or through words and...

K: Yes, sir, the same thing. I wonder if that's a problem. As we said yesterday, surely what we have been talking about from this platform, for the last ten meetings - surely it's much more important, isn't it, that you understand and live and act in a totally different way, to bring about a psychological revolution in yourself, through your own observation, and from that revolution, various kinds of social activity and all the rest of it will take place. It's your life you're concerned with, not with what I'm talking about. I made that quite clear from the beginning that we're concerned, aren't we, with transforming our own life, the life that we lead, the petty, narrow, stupid life of business - you know, the whole thing, moneymaking, only be concerned with that, or be an artist, only be concerned with that, or so-called religious person, only be concerned with that, what he considers is a religious life and so on.

Surely it's much more important to understand what is happening outwardly and inwardly, and from there, act. Because it's yours then, nobody else's. But if you are trying to merely understand what the speaker is saying, then you are trying to understand what he is talking about, not your own life. But if you deeply seriously go into your own life, into your own activities, your own thought-processes, then you and I will meet, it will be the same.

Now what shall we discuss this morning?

Q: How does one to bridge the gap between the individual life which is so superficial and narrow, and the vast complex life.

K: How is one to bridge the gap between the individual life which is so superficial and narrow, to the vast complex life, that's going on around one. Is that the question, sir? The human life. Is that what you want to discuss?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand. When I observe myself, I see the observer is absent. And to remain in that state you require a lot of energy, a great deal of vitality. But at other times, the image comes into being, and so destroys that which has been perceived. Now, is that what you want to discuss, all of you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is that the question, sir? I'll put it fairly simply, if I can. When you observe the mountains, the trees, the river, or oneself, when you give sufficient attention, and therefore energy, the observer, with all its conditioning, with its past, is absent. And can one maintain that, can one sustain that sense of total attention continuously? Is that the question? Shall we discuss that?

What do you mean by attention - let's begin with that. And what do you mean by giving total attention. What do you mean, sirs? When you attend, what is involved in that? Help me, please. Sir, let's begin very slowly - the question has been put, which is, when there is total attention there is no division as the observer, there is only observation. When I look at that mountain, with the snowcap, completely, with all my energy, interest, vitality, intensity, then the past as the observer, with all its content as the word, conditioning is not. Now, what is that attention? Is it brought about through practice, the repetition, following a particular system, a method - will that bring about attention. What do you say?

Q: No.

K: Why? Why do you think a practice, a method, a discipline, a continuous, mechanical repetition - will that bring about attention?

Q: It comes sometimes fortunately, and other times it doesn't come.

K: Is it a matter of chance, or is it a matter of insight, perception? Is it a matter of chance, as the gentleman points out, or you give total attention in which there is complete insight into what you are observing. Look, sir, you're listening to what the speaker is saying. How are you listening? Are you giving total attention? Or the part of you listening to the noise of the river, part of you saying I must pay attention to what he's saying, part of you trying to translate what he's saying according to your own understanding, interpreting, explaining, judging - all that indicates lack of attention, surely. Which is it you're doing? When you look at a tree, do you look with total attention or only give a very, very partial, passing interest. When you look at the blue sky, do you see the vast space or only a colour which is a rather beautiful morning, isn't it, and pass on. Which is it you do?

Q: The moment we answer that question we are not attentive.

K: He says, the moment we answer that question we are not attentive. I'm not asking you to answer that question. I'm asking whether you are attentive, which you can answer for yourself. How can we go about this - it's really quite interesting if we can go into this. Look sir, let us take something which is much nearer. Most of us have fears. Right? Of various kinds. Now unless you comprehend the whole structure and the nature of fear, it will go on. Now can you investigate into the whole structure of fear attentively, investigate in the sense, observe the nature of fear. Shall we go into that? Would that be of interest? Because I think most people have fears of some kind or another, haven't you? No?

Q: Yes.

K: I'm so glad. Now what is fear - we are non-analytically observing, non-analytically. Analysis means to break up, the meaning of that word means to break up. We are not trying to break up fear into various causes and how to get rid of them but merely watching the whole nature of fear. Have I explained what I mean? Look, I am frightened, consciously and unconsciously, deeply I'm frightened of superficial things, I know, I'm aware of it - nobody has to tell me that I'm frightened. May we proceed - we are sharing this together, we are investigating this together, we are being aware of the whole nature of fear together, we are sharing it. So don't sit there and let me go on talking - we are moving together. Right?

Now I say to myself, what is the cause of fear? Why am I frightened? Which is an investigation into the cause, therefore an analytical process. Aren't you frightened of something?

Q: Yes, but I don't know what it is.

K: Oh, you don't know what you are frightened of? Losing a job, not having money - investigate it, sir, look at it - don't say, no, right off - fear of death? Not coming up to the ideal which you have set up for yourself? You have measured yourself against another and you feel that you cannot completely fulfil, completely reach that point. Or you are frightened of what others say, you're frightened of your wife or your husband or somebody. Don't you know all these things? This is a common thing, isn't it? We're talking this over together, it's a dialogue, conversation - you don't have to sit quiet and let me go on talking. I did that last week, last two weeks. Now we are trying to meet each other and try to find out the nature of fear and to see if the mind can go beyond it.

Q: Sometimes there is something we want to ask but we're all afraid to talk.

K: Yes, we have some kind of fear.

Q: I think that the reason why we are afraid is we're afraid of the unknown, afraid what the other person's going to think or what's going to happen in the future.

K: We're frightened of the unknown whether it's in the distant future or in the immediate - I don't know what you are going to say, I don't know, you might hurt me, and so on. There is fear.

Q: I'm shaking just from saying that.

K: How is one aware of this fear? Why do you call it fear? You see, you're not following this, you're sitting there like - I've no contact with you.

Q: There is a physical reaction.

K: Now what is your reaction.

Q: I said there is a physical reaction.

K: There's physical reaction, I know all that, sir - you sweat, you get nervous, you kind of tighten up.

Q: That's how you know - you asked how you know.

K: Proceed a bit further, don't stick at the obvious - go on. It has happened before. You recognize it - press it further, go into it, sir, go on, move.

Q: I know that I'm afraid often because I have a compulsion to escape in various ways, in various kinds of pleasures and pursuits. And the compulsion seems to prove that I'm running away.

K: That means you want to conquer it or run away from it, because you don't know what to do with it - is that it? One doesn't know what to do with fear. Therefore one runs away, one explains it away, or one tries to control it, suppress it, develop its opposite, which is courage - we go through all those processes, don't we. But yet fear remains.

Q: It seems to remain because I'm not aware that I am fear myself.

K: I think it's very important to understand this, because fear is a destructive thing, it blinds you, both physically and psychologically. So one has to go into it very, very deeply, understand the conscious as well as the unconscious fears. Right, sir.

Q: Is it possible that many times when one tries to face fear, when one actually does, it's useless trying to look at it because then thought comes in. So thought is there more than the total awareness.

K: Yes, sir - look.

Q: There are two points, one is aware that fear is passed on to us but I think basically its because of the duality of being and non-being. This is basically at the root of every fear.

K: But you still at the end of it have fear, haven't you? After giving me that explanation there is fear still.

Q: Yes but that's not what was meant. You suggested the possibility...

K: I'm afraid of various things - public opinion, what you might say to me, I'm afraid of death, the unknown, I'm afraid of losing my job, I'm afraid that next year you won't all turn up, I'm afraid that I might get ill - I've got dozens of fears. I'm as good as you at explaining why fears come into being. I want to find out how to be free of it, how to go beyond it. That's all my concern, I have no other concern. I don't want explanations, I don't want a verbal description of my fears, and I see how dreadful, how calamitous, how destructive fear is. Now I'm asking myself, how is it possible to go beyond it - that's my whole concern, you understand - that's all I'm interested in. I'm giving my total attention to it, because it's a crisis in my life, because I see how it perverts every activity, how neurotic I become, how in comparison with somebody I further this fear. So my concern, my interest, is, I'm asking, can I, can the mind, this mind, be totally free of fear and whenever fear arises in the future to meet it totally? That's all I'm concerned about and nothing else. Are you?

Q: But when you give your whole attention to fear you are not afraid.

K: I understand, madam, but I don't know how to give my - that's again, if you give your total attention to fear, then you're not afraid. But I don't give total attention.

Q: Didn't we go into this two days ago instead of fear we used anger.

K: Yes, sir, I'm doing the same thing in different ways.

Q: Why?

K: Why? Because the gentleman raised a question, how am I to maintain a continuous, total attention. To him that was a problem.

Q: Was his problem fear or attention?

K: Both are involved in attention.

Q: Fear is involved in attention?

K: Obviously - if I am deeply unconsciously frightened I can't give attention.

Q: If you're angry you can't give attention.

K: Obviously.

Q: And if you're in love you can't give attention.

K: Wait - if you are in love, what does that phrase mean? I am only taking one thing at a time, which is, we discussed the other day anger, jealousy, and I'm saying today that wherever there is any form of fear, conscious or unconscious, attention is not possible. Don't expand that more by saying, if you're in love, or if you are lame and so on.

Q: Yesterday we went into anger, today we are going into fear, are we performing analysis or by going into one are we in reality going into all of them?

K: Sir, aren't you frightened? Isn't there fear in you? No?

Q: Sir, the other day we paid attention to anger and we came to a point where anger or confusion or whatever it was, was gone. Now the attention has turned upon itself and said, "How can I maintain myself?"

K: Yes.

Q: A new condition has come in, attention which was - I don't know how to put it - attention has now split itself and looked at itself.

K: Sir, he is saying - listen to his question, he says, I can give total attention but I can't maintain it. Wait. How am I to do it? I have a feeling that it's a marvellous thing if I could give total attention to everything I'm doing.

Q: And now the attention has turned upon itself - attention is now part of thought, not pure attention.

K: That's so - we are pointing out - quite right. So attention gave him pleasure, or rather, in that state of attention there was nothing, there was attending. Then thought comes in and says, "That was a marvellous state - I'd like to have more of it, a continuous momentum of it." Which is, thought has made that attention into a pleasurable thing which must be continued. That's all.

Q: It doesn't seem quite that way - the other day I had a certain insight into fear, I saw that I was afraid and I saw that I was the fear, and now it's gone. But it was only for a flash. Now I'd like to learn more about my fear - it wasn't enough, the attention wasn't long enough so that I could learn about it.

K: Now, all right, I won't discuss fear. Is it possible to maintain continuously attention? That's the question he asked. Now why do you want to maintain it?

Q: To learn.

K: Wait - in order to learn you want to maintain attention. Is that it?

Q: Because I am aware of a lot of thoughts which destroy the attention and prevent me from looking.

K: Yes. When I am not attentive, the whole momentum of thought comes into being, and there is a division between the thinker and attention. Now - please just listen - we've all understood this question now. How is one to maintain attention? Can you maintain it? What is involved in that statement, which is to maintain, to sustain, continuously, attention? That involves time, doesn't it. Right? I have been attentive now for a few minutes and it's gone, but I would like that attention to last, to go on. Now when you are attentive, is there any question of time? No. Then why are you asking that you must have time to be attentive, or time must be given for its duration? When you are attentive, there is no time. Then who is asking that it must last a long time?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: He says either there is attention or there is no attention. But he is asking, when there is attention there is no time. He says that. But at the same time he says, I wish I could continue in that state of attention.' That's his problem.

Q: There is another problem.

K: That's what I'm pointing out.

Q: There are two problems.

K: When you are attentive there is no time, there is no wanting for it to continue, thought doesn't come into being. When you are not attentive, the whole process begins - thought, time, wish, will, all the rest of it begins. Now, why aren't you merely attentive at that one moment - that's enough, why do you want to have more of it?

Q: Because most people have moments of attention, flashes of attention, and then the rest of the time they are inattentive and in conflict. And those flashes for just a moment, for a second once a week, is not enough to transform your life. You go on in the same old way. So therefore one asks, how can one be attentive more and more.

K: I see the questioner says, at the moment of attention there is a sense of vast change, but that doesn't last, and one falls back into the old rut, into the old routine, the old habits, and therefore there is no change in life, in one's ways of living. Now what are you concerned with, attention or with bringing about a revolution in your life, psychologically - which are you concerned with?

Q: Obviously psychological revolution.

K: Are you?

Q: I would like to have it.

K: You would like to have - that's a lovely thing. Which is important, sir - attention or psychological revolution?

Q: Are not the two not connected?

K: I don't know.

Q: I think they are.

K: Sir, are you really concerned with psychological revolution, deeply, will you give your life to it? Or is it just a theory? So you want to give your life, your energy, your whole being into bringing about a psychological change. Do you, sir?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Do you know what it means to give your life, your attention, your love, your energy, your whole life to find out if you can change yourself radically? Do you want to do that? Or do you say, "If I have attention then this will happen"? You understand? "I have attention at rare moments, and it's marvellous. If I had that attention, then it will bring about a deep psychological change." So your concern is to have this attention. Not - please listen - not the bringing about psychological revolution in yourself.

Q: That would be an ideal.

K: Yes, that would be an ideal.

Q: (Italian)

K: They are all very clever, these birds. What he's saying is, if I have that attention, then I will change psychologically.

Q: (Italian)

K: If I have attention, if there is that state of attention, then I can cancel with that attention, fear. You see, what is important, attention or fear?

Q: Attention.

K: Yes?

Q: Attention to wipe out fear.

K: That's lovely - look, I'm going to show you something. You say, attention is important and not fear, not the psychological revolution, because you think, through attention you will bring about this revolution inside. You don't know anything about attention, it happens very rarely, occasionally it bursts, but it soon goes away. But the constant thing is your daily, miserable, suffering, petty life. That is important, not attention. If you want attention, then as it has been pointed out, it becomes an ideal, and then you have to fight for it, seek a method to achieve it and all the rest of it.

So I am not concerned with attention. To me, that's nothing. Sorry. That has no value because my life is ugly, petty, narrow, stupid, jealous, fearful, frightened, competitive and all the rest of it - pretension. Now in understanding that, the very nature of understanding it is attention. I don't have to seek attention.

Q: Sir, with this degree of fear and the possibility of reversing the trend, can I suggest it is the attention which prevents the psychological revolution, I don't know.

K: I don't understand your question, sir.

Q: Is it the attention that prevents the psychological revolution?

K: Is it attention that prevents psychological revolution? If you are seeking and making attention into an ideal, then it is preventing psychological revolution. You won't let go attention, will you? You are so attached to that word because perhaps I've talked a great deal about it. But that's not important - please, sir, just listen. I am concerned with the world, what's happening in the world, the wars, the brutality, the appalling things that are going on, the ugly things of the politicians. And from there I see what I am. I am the world, you understand, sir? You don't feel that, do you? I am the world, because I have created this monster. No? It's so obvious. Right. And without a radical revolution in myself, I can't do a thing outside. So my concern is: is it possible to bring about this deep revolution in myself? That's all my concern, not how to be aware.

Q: I say, in order to change...

K: Wait. No. Find out if you can change, and then see what is implied in this revolution.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, I am saying, sir - I have no attention, I don't know what it means, but I do know and I can go into my sorrow, my competitiveness, my violence - not into something I don't know.

Q: Can we say that every person in this room is really responsible for the whole world situation.

K: The questioner asks, do you mean really, all the people who are in this tent are responsible for what is happening in the world? Aren't you?

Q: We are sharing the responsibility.

K: Yes, but first of all aren't you responsible?

Q: If I say that it is wrong...

K: I don't say it is wrong - responsible. I am the world.

Q: But if I am the world...

K: I don't condemn the world.

Q: Then how do I act?

Q: Who is this 'I' who is the world?

K: Now we're off!

Q: The word 'I'...

K: The 'I' is only a means of communication. When I say I am the world, the 'I' is the world, the world and the 'I' are not different, they are one.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir. You see, we are going off always from the central issue. If I had that energy, if I had that attention, if I could see clearly, tell me, you follow? - out there. You don't face the fact, of what you are.

Q: May we come back to the point where we were talking about attention and of being aware of inattention.

K: Sir, look, please, let us once and for all drop attention, shall we? If I had that energy, that interest, that vitality, I would do this. That's sheer speculation.

Q: I can't see that.

Q: Could we go back to the only thing we're sure of, which is fear.

Q: If I understand you aright, if I look at inattention, then attention comes. My only problem now is to look at inattention...

K: I have said on previous occasions, don't bother about attention, be aware of inattention. If you are aware of your inattention, there is attention, that's all. But sir, that is not the problem - how you refuse to face this thing.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Right, sir. Look, sir - let's forget the ifs, the attention, the ideals. Now take one thing, which is common to all of us, and go through right to the end of it, and see if the mind can be free of it. You follow? Nothing else. Now I'm going to take one thing, which is, we all live in comparison, don't we? We're always comparing, aren't we? No? Both outwardly and inwardly. And this comparison breeds in me, not only fear, the sense of inferiority, the sense of wanting to be like him, imitation, conformity, acceptance, depending on what I think is much better than 'what is'. Right? Shall we take that one thing and go to the very end of it, and see if your mind is completely free from all comparison. You understand my question? Shall we go into it?

Q: It's no question, we just have to be free. This is not a question, it is a fact that you have to be free.

K: Right. Why does my mind, your mind, compare? Look at it, sir. Why? Is it from childhood we have been taught to compare? That's one factor. All our social structure is based on that too. Our religious environment is based on that - you are nothing, you must be like a saint, this whole business is based on comparison.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madam - take one thing. You do compare, don't you, yourself with another. Now look at it and find out why this momentum exists in you - this constant measurement, not only with somebody else outside of you, but also the measurement that you have established according to your memory, the past. So you are always measuring, comparing, conforming. Are you aware of it? Wait, just hold on a minute. If you're aware of it, what do you mean by that word 'aware'? Just the word, don't say "It should be, it must be". What do you mean by being aware, I am aware that I am comparing.

Q: I see that I compare for a second.

Q: It may be that I don't get pleasure enough, so I think I will look at it and get more pleasure.

K: Is it that you don't look at this measurement of yourself, because if it gave you a lot of pleasure you would look at it longer? That's what the questioner says. Can you look at it, sir, do you know you are measuring yourself all the time? - 'I must be, I will become, I should not, I have been happy,' measure, measure, measure. Now can you look at it - which is a fact. I am looking at that microphone and I look at it. Now, when you look at it, what takes place? Go on, sir.

Q: I think I find excuses.

K: You find excuses for being, for comparing.

Q: We don't want to look at it.

K: We don't want to look at it. What are you going to do with such a - what shall I do? I know I'm comparing - my life, my education, the culture in which I have been born, all bring about, or shape the mind, the brain, everything, to compare myself with others, or compare myself with what I have been. Compare in the present, in the future, and in the past. And when I am aware of it, I find excuses for it - why should I compare, what's wrong with comparison, all the world compares.

And then I condemn it - how terrible to compare myself, why can't I be myself, I won't compare any more. You say you won't compare yourself any more because you say, "I'll be myself." Right? Then you say, "What is yourself?" You are following all this? I won't compare, I will not compare, I'll be myself, then you say, "Who is myself, what is myself?" Go on, sir. Myself is this comparison. No? If you don't compare, what takes place - you're not yourself, there's something else. Is that clear? Now are you like that? - that you say, "I have lived a life of comparison, becoming a scholar, professor," all the rest, comparing, comparing, comparing. And you justify it, because everybody else is doing the idiotic thing. And you also, being an idiot - not you - me - I'm also an idiot, so I follow. Now I realize that.

Then I say to myself, but I'm comparing myself with what I was yesterday. I was so happy yesterday, I'd no problems yesterday, it was such a lovely time yesterday. So you look at that, and again go through the process - I must keep some of that and relinquish the other. So you are constantly in battle, between the past, the future, and what you have, what you think is right in comparing yourself.

All that is based on comparison. And then you say, "I'll be myself, I don't give a pin for others, what others - I'll be myself, identify myself." What is yourself? Yourself is part of this momentum of comparison. Now when you don't compare, what takes place?

Q: I am not myself.

K: You're not yourself? That's right, that's what we are saying. Please, just listen - when you don't compare, when you don't say, 'I'll be myself,' what takes place in the mind?

Q: There's a sense of detachment.

K: The gentleman says there's a sense of detachment - detachment from what?

Q: From previous comparisons.

K: Is detachment freedom? Sir, first we're talking about comparison. Then we say, "I'll be myself." When it is pointed out that yourself is the momentum of this comparison, comparative values and so on, then there is no detachment. I say, what takes place when you are not comparing? When you are not being, when you say, "I will be myself," - when all that's pushed aside, what takes place in your mind?

Q: Silence.

Q: There's attention to 'what is'.

K: Attention to what is - I don't know what that attention is. I'm going to cry presently.

Q: You're experiencing directly 'what is'.

K: What are you experiencing?

Q: There's no centre. No 'I'.

K: Is it so easy to say there's no 'I', because I've just learnt from another...

Q: But there is no...

K: Wait a minute, madam - I've just learnt from another, this whole momentum of comparison, and therefore I say I'm no longer, there is no 'me'. Who is saying there is no 'me'? I want to find out what happens to my mind when there is no comparison at all - and I don't say, "I will be myself" - all that's part of comparison. What takes place there?

Q: Silence.

Q: That's the psychological revolution we're talking about.

K: Psychological revolution of which you're talking about. I want to find out for myself what happens when there is no comparison. Listen quietly for two minutes, please. Just take two minutes to look at it. The mind is free of one burden, isn't it? It says, "The thing which I have carried about all my life, I've put it aside." So the mind, by examining, observing, being aware what the content of comparison implies, suddenly realizes the futility of it, the stupidity of it, the utter unintelligence of it. Therefore the mind has become intelligent.

Q: Before you spoke about comparison, I saw this in myself and I realized the comparison by sort of - not pushing it away but embracing it. Going with it - I am it. And then it disappeared.

K: Sir, by looking at comparison I have an insight into comparison, haven't I. I have an insight, I see it has no value, it has no meaning. The seeing is the intelligence. That's all. Now I want to have an insight into fear, into attachment, so I don't condemn it, I don't say I must be free of it, I just look at it, I want to learn about it. Therefore when I want to learn, I'm curious, I don't say, "I must have no fear, I must go beyond it, fear is this and fear is that," I want to look at it. Therefore when I look at it with that curiosity, with that affection, I begin to see things very clearly. Therefore the mind, unburdening itself of something it's carried for years and years, is free of it.

Now are you free of this comparison?

Q: No.

K: No. Why not?

Q: We always want to do something about it.

K: You always want to do something about it - we've been through all that. The gentleman says, "I really don't understand what you're talking about", let's go into it again. There is comparison between two things, when I choose between this cloth and that cloth, between this car and that car, between, I don't know - physical things - between material things there must be comparison. We're talking about psychological comparisons, psychological measurements. Psychological measurement comes into being when thought says, "You are much better than I am, you look so much more beautiful than I am, you are clever, I am dull," so I compare myself with you and I have made myself dull. Am I dull if I don't compare? I don't know. So I won't call myself dull any more. So is your mind, after listening to this for half an hour, free of comparison? Find out, not yes, no, it should be, it should not be - find out. And if it isn't, why isn't it? Is it because through comparison ambition takes root. And ambition is part of the social structure, religious, all the rest of it.

So I compare myself with somebody who is great or successful, has a bigger car and all the rest of it, because it gives me energy in my drive to be like, go beyond, which is ambition. Is that why you cling to comparison, because in that there is great pleasure?

So when you don't compare there is no ambition. Which doesn't mean you become a vegetable, or you accept things as they are - on the contrary. Now, are you like that, that when you see something through you've dropped it.

Q: Right now, as I hear you say this and I think to myself, immediately I look around me and I see another person, and I'm comparing already. Again. The very instant that I'm understanding. I'm looking at you on the stage and I can understand as clearly as possible what you are saying, and I say to myself, "That man's wiser," It doesn't simply stop for me.

Q: Isn't it that we all experience it but we don't know we are because we do not experience and know it, so we talk about it, we identify ourselves with the conditioning. But we are free.

K: We are free?

Q: Yes, when we are...

K: Oh, Lord, don't let's go back to that.

Q: Listen, I want to ask you something, because I've heard thousands and thousands of people for years talking, and this is a very vital question.

K: It is.

Q: When I talk to you, I'm asking, I identify myself with the conditioning, don't I? Because I have to work by intellect, I am forced to do that.

K: So you're saying, madam, that I am basically free, we are basically free, we are basically god...

Q: No.

K: Wait - it comes to the same thing. We are basically beautiful

- when you say free, all these things are implied - not just free and then it has no meaning.

Q: God, freedom...

K: No, these things are implied when you say, "I am free." You say you're free, basically. In Asia they say, basically they have the elements of God, Atman and all the rest of it. I don't accept anything I don't know.

Q: You're not understanding me - what I mean is, in the instant when I look into myself and I don't identify myself with my intellect, in that second I am free, that's what I meant.

K: If you don't identify yourself with your intellect you are free.

Q: With the mind.

K: With the mind.

Q: No, listen - I'm trying to ask you something which is very important.

K: I understand, madam.

Q: And I'm very unhappy when I listen to you, and I feel it in myself and I'm trying to explain that I cannot...

K: What is that? What are you trying to explain?

Q: I'm trying to explain this, if we go on saying, we go on and on getting more and more concepts. But if I look really at myself, it's not...

K: Madam, that's what we are trying to do.

Q: Well look, you explained this - but when you look into yourself when you are not identifying, comparing, you are free.

K: When you're not identifying yourself you're free. Then the question arises, why does the mind identify, why do you identify yourself with your furniture, with your house, with your belief - why do you identify?

Q: Another habit.

K: Is it a habit? If it is a habit, seeing it is a habit - drop it. Why don't you?

Q: What I mean is, if I say I am identifying, I am identifying. If I'm not I'm free, that is completely free. Look at the picture - I come here and see Krishnaji for ten years and look...

K: I'm so sorry.

Q: And I'm very unhappy because Krishnaji is not there and I feel deep sorrow because he's not there. Well, what can I do about it, I can't bring you there. So I'm there and I see the same scenery and you're not there.

K: Look, madam, you've stated two things, or rather one basic thing, which is, don't identify, then there is freedom. That's the basic thing. Don't identify, but all the time I am identifying myself with something.

Q: All the time I am not identifying.

K: All the time I'm not identifying - so some of the time I'm identifying, at other times I'm not identifying. The times I identify when it becomes very important, I identify. Other things I don't identify with because they have no importance, so I'm playing this game all my life. Now, I say to myself, "Why does the mind identify itself with something, with my country, with my god, all the rest of it." Why? It's not only an intellectual question, but if I put that question to myself it brings about an awareness why I identify myself. Why do you identify yourself?

Q: Because without identify there is no one.

Q: I want a continuity of me.

K: No - what would happen if you didn't identify yourself?

Q: How can I answer that question?

K: Wait, I'll show it to you, sir, don't be so quick. I have identified myself with my books, with whatever it is, family and all the rest of it, country, belief and so on. Now first of all, in asking myself why I identify, I am not looking for the cause of my identification, but by putting that question there is not only the intellect operating, but also my emotional nature comes, and says, 'Why am I doing this?' which is an awareness, which is a total awareness, both intellectual understanding and all my emotional feelings enter into it. Why do I do this?

Q: Sir, is it because we are seeking a relative reality? A reality that is relative.

K: I don't know anything about reality or relevant - why do I identify myself with something?

Q: Security.

K: You say it is security.

Q: I get pleasure.

K: Pleasure - look at it, please go into it, see the answers - security, pleasure.

Q: If I got pain I wouldn't do it.

K: If you had pain you wouldn't identify yourself with it. If somebody kicked me I wouldn't identify myself with it, but I would identify myself with somebody who gives me great pleasure. So watch it, sir, go into it. I identify myself because it gives me pleasure, gives me security, makes me feel certain, gives me comfort, satisfaction and so on, and I don't identify with anything that is uncomfortable, not pleasurable. That's a simple fact, isn't it?

Q: Sir, we identify and compare with ideals. Then if you see that ideals aren't very important, what's the conflict between the others, the conflict between ideas?

K: Just a minute, sir - how can I answer that question when we are discussing this. So I see this, that identification takes place when there is pleasure, pleasure is involved in security and all the rest of it, and there is no identification when there is pain. The one I want, the other I don't want.

Q: Isn't it the same thing?

K: Wait - it may be the same thing. Now what am I to do? What is my mind to do when it has been trained, when it has been educated, when it has been brought up in a culture which says, "Identify with everything that is pleasurable, that which is rewarding, and don't discard everything that gives you pain." Now what am I to do? Go on, sir, this is your problem. The more you identify with the things that give you pleasure, the more you are attached to it - your beliefs, you follow? Because it gives you pleasure, it gives you a sense of stability, security, gives you a sense that you are living. The other does not. Now, do you see this, do you see it intellectually, therefore verbally, or as a fact? Then if it is a fact, what takes place? Are you getting tired? We'll stop in five minutes.

What takes place if I see the meaning of identification, and therefore attachment? Then are you attached, identified with something, attached to something? I am attached to my wife, or I am attached to my house, or I am attached to a belief, because the belief gives me pleasure, the house gives me pleasure, though there is a lot of pain involved in it, insurance and all the rest of it. And also I am attached to a person, because that person gives me pleasure, comfort, flatters me, occasionally nags me, all that. But I put up with it because the pleasure is greater. So I'm attached to things, people and ideas. That's clear. And I see where there is attachment, identification, there must be also pain. I might lose my property, I might lose the person I'm attached to, or I must protect the belief to which I am attached, with which I have identified myself, therefore I'll fight you.

So I see where there is identification, however pleasurable it is, there is also in it pain. No? So I can't keep one and discard the other - they both go together. Do you see this? When you see this, are you attached, have you identified yourself with a person, with a property? When there is no identification, no attachment, what takes place in the mind? You've got rid of another burden, haven't you? The mind says, "All right, I've lived in a kind of fantasy, in a myth, which has given me tremendous pleasure, also it has given me a great deal of pain, so..."

Q: It is a shock when you stop.

K: Then it has no identification. Then what takes place? You don't know it, so you don't invent it, don't speculate about it. So your only concern is with identification, with attachment, not what happens afterwards. Then you're dealing with facts, and that will give you tremendous vitality.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE (WITH YOUNG PEOPLE) 5TH AUGUST 1972.

We said this morning would be reserved for the young people. I wonder what we mean by young people. What do we mean by youth - youth is supposed to be vigorous, enthusiastic, vital, with their weakness and unpredictability, with their curiosity and quick decision. That is more or less what is implied by youth. Youth is supposed to start a new kind of revolution, outwardly, and they are attempting to do it, right throughout the world. Youth has experimented with drugs, hard and soft drugs. And they're generally supposed to be anti-establishment. Am I correct? Am I giving the right description?

And they've started student revolutions, demonstrations, they've formed communes, gone to India, Asia, in search of reality, walked across the Continent of Europe and Turkey, Afghanistan, and landed in India - I've met many of them there. And they are supposed to be seeking new truths, having been fed up with the old. They are trying again throughout the world, to bring about a different kind of government, more honesty in politics. And there are all those who are called Jesus freaks, the people who get terribly excited about Jesus, and so on. I think that covers the field, doesn't it? Right? No? You're uncertain? More or less.

So what would you like to discuss after laying down the ground rules, what shall we do? May I unroll it a little bit, may I? How does the youth, the young people, respond to the modern challenge? The challenge being not merely social reform, not merely a political revolution with a different kind of politics, honesty, more or less incorruptibility, there are all these vast changes technologically and physiologically taking place, there is the breaking up of religions, and it's a tremendous challenge. And how does youth respond to it? Is that right? Is that a fair question? You're supposed to be young and how do you respond to it? Respond to the total challenge, not just form a little commune, or take to drugs, or say, "Well, the old people don't understand young people," there is the generation gap. But there is this enormous challenge. And how does youth, you, young people respond to it? Go on, sirs - discuss it.

Do you form a commune? Withdraw from society, from the whole structure, and buy a piece of land, if you're lucky enough, and establish a commune there, a commune being, a new kind of commune being, no authority there, all working together freely? But soon they find they can't work freely, they may exchange their wives, all the rest of it but they need some kind of order, and gradually authority steps in, and they break away. Haven't you noticed all this?

And they vote for McGovern, or a new leader or whatever it is, politically, because they're fed up with the other gang. Or they join a monastery - very few - go off to India, and there are, I believe, fifteen or twenty thousand young people, foreigners in India. And I have met several of them. They put on Indian clothes, grow long hair - you know that's one of the things Indians can beat you at because they've got tremendously long hair, and long beards. And there are some of them quite clean and some of them quite dirty, just like the rest of us. And you find them at various Ashramas, retreats, practicing what the guru teaches, you know, all the rest of it. And they are anti-war, and few of them are anti-all wars, or perhaps they're anti-war of this kind but they may have their own favourite wars.

So there is this enormous challenge, you understand - the world broken up, fragmented, injustice, political chicanery, economic division - there is this vast house on fire. And how does youth respond to it? By acting fragmentarily? Joining the Red Revolutions, beating Mao, more Mao than Mao himself? So when you face this enormous challenge, what's your response?

Q: Sir, I think it's very important to find out how to be alone.

K: He says it's very important to find out how to be alone. We'll come to that, sir, if you don't mind. How do you respond to this, actually - do you respond fragmentarily or do you respond totally to the whole problem? You understand my question? What, sir?

Q: I don't understand.

K: You don't understand my question. There is political action, there is business action, there is artistic action, literary action, theatrical action - all fragmented, not interrelated. And I, being a youth - what shall I do? Take part in politics and forget the rest? Or become anti-establishment, and revolt against the whole thing? Or run off to some fanciful Jesus mythology. And apparently that's what we're doing, not a total action. I don't know if I'm making myself clear.

Now how do you react to this - is that a fair question?

Q: Sir, I'm going to become a schoolteacher and be working in schools, and I don't want to start with a kind of fragmentary education. I want to teach differently.

K: So the questioner says, I'm a schoolteacher, education now is fragmentary, and I want to teach differently. In my teaching I want to include the whole problem of existence, not just passing some stupid little examinations. Please, this is a dialogue, a conversation between you and me - we must both go together - what do you say?

Q: Sir, you're asking us all the questions we've been asking ourselves.

K: Good.

Q: So we are trying to seek the answer ourselves - that's one of the reasons, why we're here.

K: Good. That is, you're asking all these questions yourselves, education, how to bring about a different kind of education so that there is a new generation, new kind of educated people, who are not merely caught up in technology, who are, may be, interested in technology, but also interested in the whole problem of existence. Now how do you as a youth respond to this? Take one fragment and devote your life to it? - school, new kind of education, or just a political action, irrespective of all the others? Or do you take the whole thing and consider what is a total action, in which all these are included? You follow, sir, what I mean? Right? How do you respond to that - is it a fragmentary response or a total response? You know what I mean by total.

Q: What do you mean by, total action?

K: He says, "What do you mean by total action," He doesn't understand that word 'total', a whole action. Do you want me to explain it. Why? Sir, look - I am a politician - god forbid - I am a politician, then I am not interested in anything but politics - left, right, centre, extreme right, extreme left, and forget all the implications of existence. Or I might be a businessman, and I forget everything else except making money. Or I might be interested in religion and get caught up in one of the sects, whether it is a large sect or a small sect, they are all sects. Or I might say, 'I must be alone, I must leave all this and go away by myself.'

Now all those are fragmentary actions, aren't they? Now if you deny all such fragmentary action, then what is a total action? You've got it?

Q: I think for the most part we do see that they are all connected. For the most part, I think most young people see that each field is connected, you know, politics, education. But we are looking, I feel, for a new idea to be born.

K: So, are you saying, sir - we see this, most young people are aware of this, at least intelligent youth - they are aware of this, so they're waiting for a new idea to be born. Is that what you're suggesting?

Q: More or less, yes.

Q: We see this intellectually, but not actually.

K: Oh, you want an intellectual concept, is that it?

Q: Yes, not actually. You see that actions are fragmentary, and then you don't want that, you see fragments are false.

K: So, you see the fragmentation of the world, and fragmentary activity. And you're saying, "What is a total action?" Isn't it? You are enquiring, what is an action which will include all this, as action which will be whole in each action? Is that what you're asking?

Q: Sir, many of us are involved in trying to create a self-image because we are being moulded into images that possibly our parents created for us, or we create self-images of others and we place them into those categories and then deal with them as such, rather than as human beings. Would you discuss that?

K: You mean, sir, that we just follow or live, accept the images that our past generation have given to us?

Q: And we create synthetic self-images of ourselves.

K: We create synthetic images of ourselves - all images are synthetic, anyhow. Now is that the problem?

Q: We don't know how to act totally, so that now what we do in the meantime...

K: Wait, we'll find out now, this morning, talking over together, what it means to act totally. But we must first see how we act now, otherwise asking, what is total action, has no meaning. We must see how we are acting now. And we are acting fragmentarily. That is a fact. So I want to find out why this fragmentary action exists - I'm sorry, I have to go into this. It's not an intellectual investigation but an actual enquiry - investigation means to trace it right through, not just stop in the middle of it. You must have sustained interest to go into it and trace it right to the end.

As a youth - I am not a young man, I'm 77 - so I'm saying, if I'm a youth, I would be concerned, seeing this fragmentary action, I'd say, "How am I to act, which will be so intelligent, that it will respond to every challenge - political, religious, business - an intelligence that will be whole." Of course, intelligence means a wholeness, a sanity, healthy. How is the mind, which is so fragmented, to acquire this intelligence, that will act intelligently politically, religiously, economically, psychologically and so on? Right, sir? Do you see that? Fragmentary action, however vital, however enthusiastic, however popular, is unintelligent. Do you see that?

Q: Sir, I'm frightened so I see it fragmentarily - I can't see even that totally, I can only see it as fragments.

K: But first, sir, see the fact, the fact acting fragmentarily, is an unintelligent action. Let's begin with that. I act politically, forget about psychology, forget about religion - I act, I have got blinkers and I only think in terms of politics, politics means government, government means my party, or the tyrannical party - I join that. I'm only concerned with that and not with the rest. Now such action is unintelligent action.

Q: But my mind is fragmented.

K: Wait, we'll come to that. You see the statement.

Q: But seeing it isn't the point.

K: Wait, you see it intellectually, which is fragmentary - but you see it, you understand it. Now, I, you, or young people, live and act fragmentarily, and do you see it as not an intelligent action, related to yourself? You follow? And do you see it as being stupid action, or is it still a concept, an idea? Which is it? Is it still an idea or is it an actuality, which you yourself see in your life? Look, sir, this opens up a tremendous lot - I don't know if you want to go into all this. Are you thinking in terms of formulas, concepts, ideation, - which are fragmentary, aren't they? Or, I have an idea that I must act wholly - that's just an idea, somebody has told you, and you think that's a very good idea but it is not an actual fact to you, but it is only an idea. A fact becomes real when you have pain, doesn't it? In that there is no formulation, a concept, you have actual pain.

Q: Sir, my mind takes in what you say and...

K: Wait, sir, I took that only as an example. When you are hungry, really hungry, that's not a formula, a concept, it's an actuality, it's not an abstraction, it is a fact that you are hungry.

Now, is it a fact to you that fragmentary action is unintelligent action, or is it just an idea? Which is it? Is it just an idea or is it, say, "By Jove, that is so, I see it. I see it intellectually, I feel it emotionally and it is so." That means, for you it is a fact, not an idea. I can't explain any more than that.

Q: I see that if I continue to act...

K: Wait, first see it. Now you say, "I see it as an intellectual idea, but I don't relate it in my daily life." So you have a gap between the idea and the action. That's what all people are doing, which is fragmentary action, therefore it's stupid action. So I'm asking, has youth, that's you, who have devoted the whole morning for this, do you see for yourself when there is this challenge - the challenge, the house is burning, the house, politically, religiously, socially, it's burning - and do you respond to it, that challenge, partially or wholly, wholly being intellectually, emotionally, with your body, completely? Or do you say, "Well, I have a religious idea, I believe in Jesus, therefore I will act according to my belief." Therefore such action would be fragmentary, wouldn't it? Or I believe in Communism, Marxism, and I, being committed to that idea, will act, when this challenge comes. Which is also fragmentary, isn't it?

And I'll act wholly, thinking I'm acting wholly, when I go and join a commune. There I can live with half a dozen people, fairly co-operating, being friendly, being affectionate to each other and all the rest of it, and I won't accept any authority because if I accept authority I'll go back to the old establishment. And gradually if I don't accept authority there, gradually disorder comes in. And that breaks it up. All such activity is fragmentary, and therefore that is stupid.

Q: Sir, on a financial level most of our requirements are making money, making a living...

K: Yes, sir, we're coming to that.

Q: Can we do this together, both economically and intelligently, in a practical way?

K: It is. I want to find out, sir, how to live so that when I earn money - that means, I must have food, clothes and shelter. And in the demand of it, in the necessity of it, that doesn't become fragmentary action. You follow that? And also I see there must be a social revolution, a new kind of order must come into the world. And I must find out how to bring about that order. Is it a total order that would be order everywhere or only in a particular direction?

So the challenge is, that you respond totally, wholly, and not fragmentarily. You've got it now? Now how do you get this total action, how do you come by it?

Q: By seeing the fragmentation.

K: By seeing the fragmentation you come upon the action which is whole. And do you see it, or do you see it as an idea?

Q: I see that I see it as an idea.

K: Wait, you see it as an idea.

Q: I'm seeing it, I'm watching it.

K: You're watching as an idea. Then how will you feel it, how will you incorporate that idea with your feeling, with your vigour, with your, you know, with your whole being - how do you relate your whole being to that idea?

Q: Sir, isn't wanting to relate to that idea with your whole being, isn't that rather like having a technique again?

K: Quite right, sir - I'm just asking for you to investigate. Are you interested in all this, young people? Or are you thinking of having a nice walk on this lovely morning?

Q: Sir, I think the difficulty is being interested in all this about social ideas. When we talk about personal tragedies then I can really feel inside of me, but not with ideas of social problems.

K: Sir, first of all, do you see what's happening in the world? How do you respond to it? Not as an idea, not as a concept, how do you say, "By Jove, the house is burning, what am I to do?" Not as an individual, as a Christian, as a Buddhist and all that - as a human being, do you see this thing burning and what is your response? Do you respond to it as an artist, or as a whatever it is? Or you say, 'All that is silly, I must respond with my whole being.'

Q: I respond in different ways.

K: No.

Q: I think the problem is that we don't know how to respond.

K: Just listen - look, we human beings are conditioned, aren't we? Whether the young or the old - they're conditioned. They are conditioned according to the culture they live in. They can react to that culture and form their own conditioning but it's still conditioning, isn't it? Now from that conditioning there comes character, there comes temperament, which is character, and according to that temperament you act, and you call that individual action. Are you following this? Please do follow this. I know the child is crying - in fun, let it cry, but do please pay attention to this. You understand what I said?

I am conditioned as a Hindu, brought up in a certain class, very orthodox, very religious, superstitious and all the rest of it. That's my conditioning. And when I meet this challenge I act according to that conditioning which is my character, my temperament, my idiosyncrasy and I say, "I am acting as an individual." And you are acting also on the same principle. Therefore you say, "Now how are two individuals, you conditioned and I conditioned with my temperament, my characteristics, and you with your idiosyncrasy, how are these two people to co-operate?" You follow the problem. And I say that is not possible, cooperation or working together or living together, having good relationship with each other is not possible as long as my conditioning, your conditioning exists, which makes me act fragmentarily. You get it? It makes me act according to my temperament and I think it's marvellous.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Which is another conditioning.

Q: It's conditioning but it's the same, so we can co-operate.

K: They don't co-operate, they soon break up. They are breaking up also, they are criticizing the government, they are having trouble, being put in mental hospitals because they criticize the government. So you must first see the importance of being conditioned, we act thinking that we are free according to our temperaments, characters, idiosyncrasies.

Q: You speak one language and I speak another - you have certain kinds of words and I have other kinds. But that's not what should be happening.

K: Wait, sir. But first see that predominates our behaviour, our relationship. I'm answering that question of that lady there. So what we are saying is, do you respond to this enormous challenge as a conditioned human being, with its peculiarities, and those peculiarities have become so important because you say, "They are mine I am an individual, I have identified myself with it." Do you respond to the challenge according to your cultural conditioning, or do you respond without that conditioning? I'm putting the same thing in different words.

Q: I think we respond to our conditioning. I think that most of us feel that we can conceive it first, and then we try to make our lives more radical because we can't conceive of a full, total action.

K: I know that, we can't. We want to conceive it first and then act according to it, that's what I'm objecting to. We want the picture of it, the description of it, the verbal explanation of it, but the picture, the description, the word, is not the thing. So I am saying, how do you respond? If you don't respond totally you are creating great mischief in the world, though you're young - growing a beard, long hair, is not a response; taking drugs is not a response, total response; or running off to form a little community - that's not a total response. Or joining god knows what, all that. I say that's not total response, that is a response according to your tendency based on your conditioning, and therefore it has no value at all.

Q: But sir, you think living in a city, having to go to work...

K: I'm coming to that, sir - let's take that up.

Q: I find in order to survive I need plastic money. What can you do?

K: I'm coming to that, sir.

Q: Sir, you have to go in the old people's patterns of the past.

K: So what shall I do?

Q: You go about in the country, you get together a couple of people, and you have fun, you find out things, you make experiments.

K: The gentleman says - just a minute, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: He's off, I know this chap.

Q: And then you might have time to do something about one's responses. But living in a small little town, it's very difficult.

K: Right. Now this is what he is saying - I live in a city, or one lives in a city and there you have to earn a livelihood, follow the old method, live in the old pattern of going to the office from eight to five, for the rest of your life. And you have no time, no time to think. So you abandon that and form a little community where you have time to think. Try to find out in that little community how to live totally. This is the problem.

Q: You are seeing this from the psychological point of view.

K: Not at all. The questioner says you only look at it from a fragmentary point of view, which is a psychological point of view.

Q: Of course.

K: You say of course. Of course.

Q: In this sort of discussion isn't there is a certain danger if you put the problem...

K: I don't put the problem, I have not put the problem.

Q: When you say, my point of view, then we have just to survive in this society without working...

K: We're going to find out, sir. I said at the beginning, earning a livelihood is a problem, which is not psychological. I said at the beginning, you have to live in this world, you can't run away from it - that's not psychological. You accused me of fragmentary psychological activity, while you yourself are fragmentary.

Q: If you say...

K: Wait, I don't say anything. I beg your pardon, sir.

Q: I would like to ask the question of whether it is possible to act completely without being fragmentary, and to go into the question of whether it's possible to go into a school, an establishment type of public school where it is like a gigantic machine, a programme, whether it is possible to go into such a school and somehow actually do something.

K: The question is, I'm a teacher in a school that is mechanical, that is over-weighted, all the rest of it. And how am I to act there totally, without being crushed by this vast structure? Where I have to teach fifty boys in a class, or sixty, and the boys being rowdy and all the rest of it, how am I to deal with that? How am I to act totally in those given circumstances. Right, sir? Now this is not psychological, is it?

Q: No, but I can see...

K: Wait - what am I to do. I must answer this question, please. I earn my livelihood at teaching in a school, in a system, that is overburdened, that is mechanical, that in every class there are fifty to sixty students, they have no order, each rushing, all the rest of it. How am I, given this condition, to teach wholly? Can you do it there? Wait, find out. Can you do it there? Where - you know all the system, how it works, but then I do - can you do it there?

Q: Let's say that I've not so far succeeded, in fact I've been fired.

K: Quite right, sir. You can't do it. It can't be done. Look, teaching fifty boys in a class, where you want to teach them, what, mathematics, and you're not merely concerned with teaching mathematics, you're concerned with their mind, bringing about their intelligence, making them behave properly, the whole of it - with fifty boys you can't do it. Therefore you're fired - wait - therefore what will you do? Wait, sir, find out - what will you do? Just go into another profession? Or say, "By Jove, teaching is the most important thing, because that deals with young people, creating new - all the rest of it, tremendously important, I'll find out with others, with the few who feel this thing, and start a school." Wait - which means tremendous energy, which means you are giving your whole life for this, not just casual action. Now wait a minute, we'll answer that gentleman who says, "I live in a city and I have to earn there a livelihood, I have no time, therefore I withdraw and form a little commune."

Q: No, not withdraw, go away.

K: Wait - go away.

Q: Listen to the words: you are putting it into a 'little commune'...

K: No commune, a few people living together.

Q: But why...

K: I don't condemn it.

Q: Then why did you use the word 'little'?

K: Call it big. Call it small, big, it doesn't matter - I go into a commune, where I have time.

Q: That is a fragmentary kind of thing.

K: Would you mind letting me finish what I'm saying? I have no time to think in the present business livelihood affairs, I go away with a few friends if I can, and we live together, cultivating our own garden, or living in town, come back to that, earn a livelihood, live together and have time to think how to bring about this total action. That's what you said. Is it my intention when I go and live with a few people, is it my true, real intention to find out a way of life in which there is total action? I don't say, I've no intention - is it my real intention. I abandon or call it what you like - I go away from the present structure of society, and try to live a life in which I comprehend this total movement of existence. The monks have tried to do it, various communes have tried to do this; they either accept an authority of a person, or the authority of a belief, or the authority of the necessity of working together. Or does one go, discarding all authority, belief, person, or the necessity that we must live together in order to give me time to think - do you discard that and therefore find out for yourself what is the way of existence, living, that will not be fragmentary, that will act, both economically, psychologically and more, in a whole manner? So it depends on you what your serious intention is, whether psychologically as well as outwardly, inwardly as well as outwardly, you want to live differently. Come on, sir, you are one of the young people.

Q: Sir, are you saying that the making of a commune or going to business are the same thing. It is no action at all but realizing that this is action.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It is not just giving up, but on a practical level...

K: You do it, you do it on a practical level, but that practical level depends on your intention, on the depth of your honesty.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: It may be, you have to live, find out.

Q: Does all intentional behaviour have some ideal behind it?

K: That's just it, sir - you follow. How do you respond to all this, sir? You're young, you see how we've spent this morning, someone saying, "Oh, you're only concerned with psychological", somebody else saying, this that and the other - when you see all this, how do you respond? Run off to a church, join a political activity, become a Communist, Mao, this or that, or lead a completely irresponsible life because your father, some friends will give you money, therefore you don't care?

Q: So there's nothing you can do?

Q: Do I not first have to see my own conditioning?

K: That's what I've been saying during all these talks, madam. Sir, look at it - you see or act what you think is a total action when this challenge is given to you. And I don't see it, I act fragmentarily. What is your relationship - I want to act fragmentarily, you want to act as a total human being, including physical survival, psychological understanding and all the business of it, and also want to find out something beyond all this? And I say, "Look, please, I'm only interested in political or a narrow, or big, or little action." What is your relation, how can you co-operate with me? I'm young, I'm just like you, long hair, short hair, whatever it is, sex-ridden, or not driven by sex - I'm like you. So I say to you, "Where do we meet? At what level? At the verbal level, intellectual level, psychological level, or in the level of earning a livelihood?"

Q: At the psychological level, but very few people do this. But what you have to do all the time is to live on the practical level, so in the meantime you live on the practical level, you sleep in the barns or you sleep in a hotel, or try to do something. But if you don't have money...

K: Sir, I know a young boy, twenty one - I saw him in India. He made his way across the continent, hitch-hiking from California to New York, took a boat from there as a sailor, came to India, worked in India, across India, and I met him on the seashore. To him what was important was to find out what truth was. You may say, how silly that is - he wanted to find out. Therefore he gave his life to it, he didn't talk about practical life and he didn't say this - he worked. Wait, sir.

Q: Last night I was asked to move on.

K: Please, sir - would you mind.

Q: It was by a policeman - very nice. He said go into any of the big cities.

K: If you have money or if your parents have money or friends give you money, then you have no problem. Or you have the problem of depending on somebody, your parents. Then you can play around with all these ideas. And most, some of them do.

So we are coming to the point again: are you aware as young people, and also the old people - there isn't much difference in this - that any kind of fragmentary action is really the most unintelligent, mischievous action? That's what the old establishment has done. That's their way of life: keep the business world in one way, religion for Sunday, and politics on Thursday, you know, all the rest of it. And you are doing exactly the same thing only call it by a different name. And I say you, as the youth, which is supposed to be vigorous, enthusiastic, though in spite of the weakness, in spite of unclarity and all the rest of it, you're supposed to have tremendous vitality to act - act, knowing what the older generation have done. And you are as confused as the others. Therefore there is no generation gap at all. Sir, do you see that makes me realize how hypocritical one is - you deny the old establishment and you are doing exactly the same thing as they do, only in other words. So as we are young - not I, sorry, I don't belong to you - as you are young you have to create a new world. You are responsible for a new world. And if you say, 'Well, I'm only concerned with money or with only psychological things, or only - it has no meaning.

Q: If you are concerned with total action, you don't act fully, I mean...

K: I understand. One realizes, you realize, we act fragmentarily. Let's stick to that thing. Do you realize it as an idea or as a fact?

Q: Yes, as a fact.

K: If it is a fact, then you are already acting non-fragmentarily.

Q: Yes, for a long time I have been concerned with acting totally and that is preventing me from acting totally because it is a concept.

K: Yes, quite. You're saying, as long as it is an idea, there is no total action. Why do you see it as a concept, as a formula, as an idea - why do you see that? Why does that thing happen first? You understand my question sir? Why do you see everything as an idea first? Is it because intellectually we are overdeveloped? Is it because we are afraid what total action might involve, therefore an ideation, a formula, over there, which I am going to live presently, therefore I continue the way I am. So I'm asking, why do we always see the thing in words first, words being idea, thought, formula, and which then becomes a remembrance? Why do we do that? Why don't we see it right away, non-verbally?

Q: Because we're sitting here listening to you talking about it - I mean, if we had never heard of you in our lives and had just come upon it all by ourselves, it'd be one thing, but we are listening to you, therefore...

K: Look, you say, if I hadn't listened to you and I came upon this myself, it would be much better. A friend also said this yesterday - he said, "I must find this out for myself - I wish I could do it."

Q: For most of us here, we never had any idea that anything else was possible but that same kind of fragmentary existence. So then you come along and you say something else is possible and so then we sit here and listen to you talking about it, but we have only the words.

K: Sir, why should you listen to another? Here you are listening to me, why are you listening to me? Why don't you find it all out for yourself? Come on, answer it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I'm not saying that. Look, he says, "Why have I got to listen to you? Why can't I find it out for myself?"

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Answer the question, madam.

Q: Sir, for the same reason that you can't follow - the same reason - if I could find out for myself I could...

K: Why can't I find out all this by myself?

Q: Is it an idea that there is something to find out at all?

K: All right - why can't - I don't know how to put it, sir - let's put it this way. For the first time, perhaps, you hear, non-fragmentary action. Why didn't you think of it yourself and live it, work at it, and live non-fragmentarily? Why didn't you do it? Why do you have to listen to somebody? And what's wrong with listening to somebody?

Q: I didn't say there was anything wrong with it.

K: I'm putting it, I'm going the other way, putting it the other way.

Q: Sir, I'm happy to listen to you - you're not a conclusion of mine.

K: But the others are not. They say, "I wish I could come upon this by myself."

Q: We all wish that.

K: Which means, sir - listen to this - which means, I want to find out everything by myself. Can you?

Q: It's the only way of finding out.

K: Of course, the only way - but if you put it that way, it's wrong, isn't it?

Q: You have to learn.

K: I haven't conveyed it properly, then. When I say to myself, 'I have to find out the whole thing by myself, and not listen to anybody,' that very statement is a false statement, that's all I'm saying. Because then you become tremendously important. You don't say, "Well, I will find out, somebody will tell me, not tell me, I'll move, I'll walk," and in the process of that I'll discover or not discover. But to say, "Well, I will only move till I find out by myself," then you're dead.

Q: Sir, it seems that the 'I' who sees the fragmentation is itself a fragment.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: So if I see this fragment...

K: That's what I said, sir - how do you see this thing?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand, madam. What are you to do? Look, sir, I want to convey something to you. I want to convey, not that you must accept it, as a friend I want to tell you something. First of all verbally, then non-verbally. I say to you, I want to convey to you that acting without a formula is complete action. I say, "This is in my heart," as a friend I say, "Look, if you do this, you will live a totally different kind of life. Whether you have to learn a livelihood, whether you have to paint, you lead a totally different life". To you, you receive it as an idea. I say, "Don't receive it as an idea, but move with me, don't turn what I'm saying into words, into a formula which you are going to accept and follow presently." But move together, see the thing together, which is, don't live in formulas. I want to tell you this, not because I want you to join my group or - I just want to convey this to you. But you don't receive it, you see - you immediately turn it into an idea. And are ready to fight over that idea - psychological, business, non-business, all the rest of it.

So how am I - see my difficulty - you're there and I'm sitting here: I want to convey this to you non-verbally, through words. You understand what I mean? I want to convey to you that there is an action which is immediate perception, and therefore non-formula. And I tell this to you, seriously, with all my affection - I feel it strongly. I'll do anything to convey it to you. But you receive it as an idea. And I say, "Don't do it, it is this idea that is separating, it is this idea that is fragmentary." So can you listen to me who wants to tell you that there is an action which is totally complete only when there is no ideation or a formula or a prejudice. Then you say, "I am prejudiced, everything turns into words for me. What am I to do?" I say, "Don't do anything about it, but just listen."

You see, sir, I have no formulas, I don't have a concept and then act, but only I see, act. I don't say, "By Jove, if I act that way I'll lose my popularity, I'll have nobody, or I won't have money", all the mentation that goes on, which prevents direct action.

So you, being young, can you listen with a mind that is young, or is your mind already the old mind, which always thinks in formulas, in categories, in divisions, in fragmentation? Young mind means, it sees, acts. And that acting is rational always, whether you've got to live in a commune, whether you have to live in a town - it is altogether total.

Is the youth meeting over?

Q: Can we have another day for the youth?

K: Sir, every day is a youth meeting. This is what we've been saying for the last three weeks: how to communicate without the word, and therefore the idea.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH AUGUST 1972.

You know this is a dialogue, a conversation between us, between two friends who are seriously interested in all the problems of existence. So it is not a talk by me, but together to converse, to go into amicably, without any aggression into all the problems that perhaps one has. So what shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: (Italian)

K: Why don't we go straight to the point. We always go round and not come to the central issue. That's the first observation.

Q: (Italian)

K: I'm glad it's a nice morning, anyhow. We've know each other for the last forty years?

Q: Forty five.

K: Forty five - he says, why shouldn't we spend these three mornings talking over the question of how to look. If we had the key to that, then we can open any door. Do you want to discuss that? Yes, sir?

Q: It seems to me that one of our problems is that we have so many powerful motives to understand ourselves, and very little simple curiosity to learn the truth, find out the truth.

K: So what is the question?

Q: You have said several times that the motive to understand hinders understanding.

K: Quite. Now which do you want to discuss, talk over - observation? Yes? And we could include all the others in that, shall we? M. Ortolani asked if we could find out for ourselves how to look, how to observe, not only the world outside but also the world inside. And if we are capable or if we know or are aware how to look, then we have the key to many, many problems. And he wants to discuss, talk over what it is to observe. And I think if we could go into that, then the question of why don't you start from the unknown, but always have started from the known, then perhaps we shall be able to understand much more. And the relationship between thought and feeling - so perhaps we could include all those questions in this one question of his, which is: is it possible to observe or learn what observation is? Shall we start with that?

I wonder why we find it so difficult, this question of observation. To understand what observation is, we must also go into the question of abstraction, and 'what is'. Most of us live in abstractions. That's right isn't it? You know what I mean by abstraction. A formula or a belief, not entirely based on proof, short of proof. I looked up that word this morning in the dictionary - it says exactly that, and the root of that word is to stretch. Most of us look at things, at people, or ideas, with a mind that has already acquired a series of abstractions. Don't we? That is, abstractions are concepts, formulas, opinions, judgements - judgements which are contrary or acceptable.

So we have these abstractions, these images of words, ideas. We are sharing this together, please, you are not just listening to me - we are sharing together. Have you these concepts, ideas, beliefs, abstractions, which are short of proof? I have an opinion about you. I don't know you, I met you once or twice, but I have already opinions. I say, "You should or you should not." You know, you should do this or you should not do that. A judgement. You have opinions, haven't you, galore, about everything, almost - what I should do. Have you?

Q: Yes.

K: Now, how can you observe when these act as a screen between you and the thing which you observe? I've an opinion about the politicians, I've an opinion about the gurus, I've an opinion about, you know, dozens and dozens of things, of which I really don't know - I've no proof, but I have opinions, conclusions.

Now I'm asking myself why do I have opinions about anything, that is, images about anything? That lady asked, would you talk over laziness in relation to fear. Why have I an opinion about laziness? How do I know I am lazy? Discuss with me. How do I know that I'm indolent and therefore afraid to learn? When I say, I am lazy it's already an opinion, a conclusion, a judgement, which prevents me from looking at the fact that I do not want to learn, or that I want to learn. I've interposed the idea of laziness and fear.

Please, we're understanding, I'm not laying down the law, I'm not saying one should or not be lazy, I'm just looking at the fact that any abstraction, any image, any conclusion, and therefore any previous knowledge prevents perception. If I have an opinion about you, because I met you two or three times, next time I meet you the image which I have about you comes between you and me, therefore I do not perceive you, but I perceive you through the image which I have about you. Right? Wait, first see it. Then we will discuss what to do, how to prevent, or what is the mechanism which creates the image and see if that mechanism can lose its energy.

Have you images, conclusions about something? You have, haven't you, galore, dozens of them. Can you drop them? The next question is, how is it that these images come into being? What is the mechanism that produces these images? - images being conclusions, words, opinions, judgements, saying so and so is like that. Or so and so didn't listen to me while I was talking, and I'm hurt, because the person to whom I'm talking may be tired, may have been seeing all kinds of things happen to that person, and I want to hurt, or him to pay attention to what I'm talking about. So if that person doesn't, I get hurt. All these are abstractions. Are we sharing this, going together? Which means, you see the fact that you have images.

Q: (Italian)

K: Wait - he says, this applies to a false image, not to a right image. Wait - that's good enough, sir. There are good images and bad images, false images, and worthwhile images. Right? We are talking about all images, not the good and the bad.

Q: Is the structure of technology image-building?

K: Is it? I learn how to run a motor, and I have acquired knowledge of piston engines, internal combustion machine. And that knowledge is my memory, I've cultivated memory about that engine. And when I see another engine, a similar engine, my previous knowledge helps me to undo it or put it together again. That is, a mechanical thing, isn't it? We are talking not only of mechanical knowledge but psychological knowledge.

Q: If we're talking about psychological problems, knowledge, that doesn't seem to me that same, it isn't a formula.

K: Yes, it's a formula. But I need that formula to run a machine.

Q: That seems to apply only to mechanical things.

K: If I had no formula about a machine, must I learn each time? Must I each time forget what I've learnt and come to it new - about a machine?

Q: Obviously you couldn't.

K: Wait - obviously I couldn't, it would be absurd, wouldn't it? Now in human relationship, between you and me, you're not a machine, I'm not a machine.

Q: It seems to me you are avoiding the question, because if I have images about machines...

K: Wait - the gentleman says you are avoiding my question. We said, we need knowledge to run a machine, knowledge or a formula or previous examination and a remembrance of that. I need that to run a machine. Now between you and me, two human beings, you're not a machine and I'm not a machine. If I have a formula about you, a remembrance about you, a conclusion about you, or a judgement about you, that is the image I have about you. And you have an image about me. So what happens - the formula I have prevents me from meeting you anew.

Q: I still think the question is being avoided.

K: What do you mean - we are going into it, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I want to know out of curiosity how to go to Montreux. I go and get in the station, get into that train, and the train is a mechanical thing that's moving down, going down, to Montreux. Now you and I are not, you are not a station, I'm not a passenger - we both are human beings - isn't there a difference between you and me and the train and the technology?

Q: Obviously there is.

Q: Obviously there's feeling.

K: Not only feeling, but we are such complex entities, aren't we? What is the difficulty in this?

Q: You know that a man has been in a concentration camp and certain subjects must not be spoken about. Isn't it a good thing to know this?

K: One has been to a concentration camp - and one has gone through hell. And isn't it good to remember - is that what you are saying?

Q: No, isn't it good for the other person to know that there are things not to be spoken about?

K: I have been to a concentration camp and it is good for another to know about it. Is that it?

Q: What the lady said was, if there was a man who had gone through concentration camp - isn't it a good to know certain things about this so that you do not touch on certain subjects.

K: That's it - you have understood the question? If a man has been to a concentration camp and you know that he has been there, you don't touch certain things - his experience, because it's painful to him, so you don't enter into that. So you have an image about that man which prevents you, or helps you not to enter into all his pain and revive his anxiety and all the rest of it.

Q: Sir, is it because we are either seeking expansion or avoiding contraction from the environment - the 'I' seeking expansion.

K: Look, sir, I just want to know, as the gentleman asked, how to look. What it is to look at trees, mountains, at the whole technological world, and also at the world within - I just want to look. And he wants to know, what does it mean to look. And we are making this tremendously complicated. I can't look at you if I have any opinion about you, that's a simple fact.

Q: Doesn't technology, the train and the passengers, force you to have opinions.

Q: (Italian)

K: He says, it's fairly obvious that opinions, judgements prevent understanding of each other. That's fairly obvious. And why don't we go further beyond that. You can't go beyond that if you haven't dropped your prejudice.

Q: (Italian)

K: I don't know how to deal with all of you - I'm lost. For me, it's very simple. May I state it, very simply? If I look at a tree, to me the seeing of a tree is the non-interference of thought. When thought interferes between my observation of that tree, I am not looking at the tree. Right? Thought is the knowledge of that tree, which is useful when I am classifying what kind of a tree it is. But before I classify it, I just want to look at it. And I cannot look at it if there is any form of image about it - that's simple. The same with the mountain, with the river and the green meadows. That is, when I look without the interference of thought, which is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, then there is a totally different relationship between me and the tree. I do not identify myself with the tree, but the observation is much more intense, the observation is completely total. So I observe without the interference of any conclusion - the mountain, the tree, the sunset. I don't know if you saw, yesterday evening, the sunset, on the hills. It was a marvellous sight, just to look at it, without saying how beautiful, how lovely, what extraordinary Alpengluehen, what a beautiful thing it is - just to observe, without a word, then you see much more, the intensity is much stronger. I do not know if you have ever done it.

Now, I want to look at you - you've hurt me, you've praised me, you've talked behind my back, you've said you should, you should not do that, this, you are an idiot, you are a great man, you're a saint, you're an ass - you've said all these things. And I look at you - should I look at you with all the incidents, accidents, words which you have used against me? If I look at you with all those, I don't see you. That's fairly simple, isn't it? I don't see you, I don't understand you, I have no relationship with you, though you have called me all kinds of things, pleasant, unpleasant, talked, scandalized me or whatever you do - that's your affair. And if I accept all the gifts you have given me, the insults, the flattery, the gifts become more important, don't they - I don't see you. And I want to see you. So any image that I have about you prevents me from looking at you.

Similarly, any conclusion I have about myself, that I'm good, that I'm bad, that I'm noble, ignoble, there is great nobility in me, but I act ignobly - all that kind of thing - all that is an image, a conclusion about myself. So I can't learn about myself if I have any previous opinion about myself. That's all. Wait. The world outside, technology, the trees, the mountains, science, all that, I want to look at it as though I'm looking at it for the first time in my life. If I do I see things much more vividly, more intensely. I find new things in that look. And if I want to look at you, if I have an image about you I can't see you, I have no relationship with you, the image prevents me from having a contact with you. Inwardly if the mind has any opinion about itself, then it can't learn about itself.

That's very simple.

Now is that clear? Clear both verbally and intellectually - we're not talking about the feeling about it, the feeling that how destructive it is in relationship to have an image. We'll come to that. Now I say to myself, why do I have opinions or knowledge about the tree? You understand? I'm beginning with the most simple - why do I have knowledge about the tree? It is useful to have knowledge, it gives you interest, what species of pine, species of oaks and so on. It's fun to have knowledge about it. But when that knowledge comes between me and the tree, I don't see the tree. And to me the tree is extraordinarily important, the beauty of the tree, and so on and so on.

Now the next question is, why does the mind prevent direct contact with the trees, mountains and so on, but always it creates an image about it? Why does it do it? You've understood my question - you answer it, sir. Don't listen to me.

Q: Sir, is it possible to look at the image of the tree with the same intensity that I look at the tree?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: In other words, it's not the way of looking.

K: The capacity to observe - wait. The capacity to observe the image that you have about the tree, and the tree. To look, is what the question is. Now what happens, see the logic of it. To look at a tree without the image requires energy. To look at that tree, which is alive, which is moving, which is marvellous, with its branches, its leaves - to look at it you need energy. But that energy is dissipated when you have a conclusion about the tree, when you have knowledge-knowledge is useful about the tree, but when you're looking and that knowledge comes in, that knowledge prevents you observing with your total energy.

So laziness comes in when you have this conclusion, opinion and so on about the tree. Laziness is a conclusion. Right?

Q: I think it might be useful to look at why society educates people to think in terms of cliché.

K: Why does society train people to think in clichés? Why do you blame society when you have them. Just a minute - stick to one thing, please.

Q: Sir, to look I must be present. To look, to observe, I must be there, I must be present. I have had also the feeling, I am present - it may be imagined but I don't think it is - this feeling, I am present, I am here.

K: Yes, sir, I understand your question but we'll come to that presently. For the love of god, stick to one thing, step by step into it.

Q: Sir, when you look at the tree, you suddenly see that you're looking at it through the image, a cliché - you can see that - I think it's very disagreeable so you drop it.

K: But do you drop it?

Q: I do.

Q: May I ask if perception is the same thing as the energy for perception? Does this happen the same with emotion?

K: Sir, go slowly with me, will you? Will somebody protect me?

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: (Italian)

K: No, I made that clear, sir. May I go into it a little bit - give me a little hearing, lend me your ears! Really, it's a very interesting problem, tremendously interesting, because we have made life so dull, so boring, so mechanical, there is nothing new, it is always secondhand. And to see a tree as though for the first time in your life - you understand what that means?

Q: (French)

K: He says, why do you talk about the mountain, trees, why don't you see the fact that we are here. The fact that you are here is because you have an image about me. Come on, sir. You don't know a thing about me, but you have an image about me, because you have read books, there has been propaganda, articles, all the rest of that rubbish. So you have an image.

Q: No, not necessarily.

K: Wait, madam. You have an image about me - why? What right have you to form an image about me, not knowing a thing about me. I may be a crook, I may be, god knows what - but why do you have an image about me?

Q: Don't you have an image about your secretary, sir?

K: Could I have an image about my secretary? I have no secretaries. Why should I have an image about my secretary? You don't meet it - you are avoiding the issue. You're all here because you have an image about me. Right?

Q: No. I mean, if you hear Beethoven once and you like music, you want to hear the music again - that's nothing to do with an image of Beethoven. If I am touched by your words, it's nothing to do with an image of you. Simply I'm touched by your words, as I'm touched by music.

K: Madam, just listen - I understand that. I took the train, the mountain, the river, the bird, because it's fairly easy to observe the images that we have about them. It's fairly easy. And I do not know if you have ever experimented with yourself to look at all that without a single word. Then if there is no movement of thought, which is the word, then you see the thing entirely differently - that's all my point.

Now you are here because some of you have an image about the speaker, and therefore you don't listen to the speaker at all. You are interpreting what he is saying according to the image you have about him. Now if you are listening for the first time, as though for the first time, then what is the relationship? Then you are curious. The next moment you and I are going to die, and then you would listen, wouldn't you? You'd put your heart and mind, you'd have no image, you'd say, "What are you saying? I want to find out." You won't be interpreting, you won't say, "Well, Jesus said that, the Buddha said that and Jung said that or Mr Smith said that." You don't listen.

Now, to come back to the question, why does the mind create these images, and live with those images, and project those images? Find out, sir, why. Why have you an image about the speaker? Or you may not have an image, you say, "By Jove, he's saying something, I'd like to find out, I like to hear music, I like to see that tree, it doesn't matter, a dozen times - it's different each time." Because each time I look at it without a single word, without a single thought, therefore it's always new. And therefore it's always my friend.

Now I want to find out why the mind creates these conclusions, images and holds on to them. And they are abstractions, they are not facts - the tree is the fact, not an abstraction about the tree. And I live in my abstractions. I don't know if you follow all this. Why do I do it? Why does the mind insist and sustain the images - what is the meaning behind it?

Q: Because we are taught to do so, we are trained to do it.

K: We are trained to do that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, just let's take that one question, please. We are trained, from childhood, by the culture we live in, the religions, with the image, all the rest of it. We are trained. And so you retain them? And if you see what it does, will you drop them?

Q: If...

K: Wait, find out, do listen to this. I've been trained by the society, the culture I live in, to have the images about my saviour, my god, my belief, my wife, my husband, my neighbour. I have images. I say, why do I have images, and I blame it on society, or I say, examine it, analyse it, but at the end of it I've got the images still.

Q: After...

K: Wait - I'm going to show you - be patient. I want to see why my mind creates it, and why it lives with these images. It lives with these images because it's essentially lazy - it's easier to live with an image than with the fact of a tree. Therefore I say, "By Jove, my mind is lazy and therefore it lives in abstractions." You've understood what I've said? Because it's easier to live with an idea, with an image, rather than with the fact which is always changing. It's easier for me to live with an image about you, because I've come to a conclusion, and, you know, I don't want to think any more about it. I think you are a great man and that's the end of it, or I think you're an ass, a fool, and that's the end of it?

So to learn means the image comes to an end, which means the mind must be active, alive, and it cannot be alive if there is an image.

Q: Sir, that simply means that the image is also a fact, but that fact doesn't observe the tree first.

K: Of course, sir, I'm telling you that, I've said that previously.

Q: Then the image disappears...

K: Wait, it doesn't disappear - look at it, take time - all that you are concerned about is how to get rid of the image. I'm not, I want to see why it comes into being, what is the machinery that builds the image, if that machinery has no energy it comes to an end naturally. So I want to see. Look what takes place. If I have an image about you, I'm in conflict with you, and I like that conflict. It says, "That keeps me alive". Which is part of my laziness.

So I see first of all, the mind is lazy and likes to live in a rut - the rut being the belief, the opinion, the conclusion. I've talked to several people, and they've formed an opinion about somebody, and you can't shake them - you show the facts, you show the logic of it, the truth of it, nothing doing, because their opinion is right. Haven't you met such people all your life? Christ exists and that's the end of it. Marx is right and that's the end of it, the Little Red Book is the most marvellous thing - that's the end of it. So why does the mind do it? Because it finds in the Red Book, in Marx, in Jesus, complete security, which means complete laziness - it hasn't to think any more. And it's afraid to learn any more, because to learn something more means disturbing 'what is', what is your conclusion, your image. So I see the brain likes to live in security, in abstractions. So abstractions are more important than the fact. I have formed an opinion about you, rightly or wrongly. And that opinion is a conclusion, and to change that, and say, "By Jove, I'm mistaken, you are different," that needs little thought, a little energy, that is, I don't want to be wrong. I would rather you be wrong.

So the brain, says, "I want security, and my security is in a belief, in a conclusion, and don't disturb it." Right? So having found what it imagines to be a belief and having found security and therefore becoming lazy, it doesn't want to be disturbed. Watch your own mind, sir, not mine - I haven't been through all this mess.

Q: It seems to me, sir, that when one observes something, say a mountain in all its glory, one receives an impression. Can you tell us what an impression is, it doesn't necessarily leave an image.

K: Of course, sir - an impression. I have an impression about the mountains, I have an impression about you - I don't know you, I have an impression, a vague feeling, you have impressed me, you've left a mark on me, pleasant or unpleasant. Next time I meet you, that impression is strengthened, and I say, "By Jove, he's a nice chap", or not a nice chap, and from that, the third time, the image is concluded. Please look at it - the brain would rather live in an abstraction, in which it finds security, and though it is very disturbing, that is the only security it has.

So the brain needs security. And therefore the image becomes the most important thing. I have formed a conclusion that there is no life after death, or there is life after death, it gives me tremendous comfort, don't talk any more about it. I live in that belief. It gives me tremendous security, whether that belief is neurotic, real, illusory, doesn't matter. So I've found out an image about you, about anything, gives security to the mind, to the brain, and therefore refuses to shake it. And that's what's the matter with all of you.

Q: Must we not see if there is such a thing as security, or it is just another concept?

K: I'm coming to that. So as I said, the brain needs security, otherwise you can't function properly. You understand, sir? Like a child given complete security, it's happy, it learns quicker. And when the family is broken up, when the father and mother are quarrelling, the poor child feels lost, gets neurotic, and becomes violent, begins to shoot, kill people. You've seen all this.

So do you find security in an image? Go into it, be aware of it, don't talk about good image, bad image, people who have been to concentration camps and all the rest of it - do you have images, conclusions, in which you take security - have you?

Q: Temporary.

K: Temporary security.

Q: Or if you are separated from your beloved, you have an image.

K: Yes - when you are separated from your beloved. That is, when you love somebody in America and you're here, and you feel separated, and therefore you have an image about him and temporarily that image gives you comfort. But my beloved over in India might be chasing another girl!

Q: Sir the whole of science is based on images, and that's natural.

K: Sir, keep it simple, it's complex enough. Do you have an image in which the brain, your mind, your feelings have established vested interest in them and therefore they won't break away, you won't drop them. And therefore your mind is lazy. Then you say to yourself, "How am I to stop image-making? How am I not to conclude at any time but always a mind that is completely free, so that it meets everything anew - the tree, you, everything anew, fresh, free?" I have seen how the machinery builds the image. Have you seen it? Have you really seen it, that is, to observe? Have you observed, have you an insight into the image-making? If you have an insight into it, you won't make any image at all, because the insight is the security. Do you get it? No, sir, don't shake your head.

Q: Is it your memory makes you aware of the image?

K: No. Is it your memory that makes you aware of the image? Not at all - I've been through this. Need I go through all that again? I've an impression about you, from the first time I meet you - impression, pleasant or unpleasant. That imprint may be very, very light, like a light footprint on the sands, but the next time I meet you that footprint has taken a little more shape. And the third time it's solid. Now, that impression has become strong by my contact with you, because if I had no impression I'd have to look at you each time anew, have to watch you, listen to you, have to feel you anew each time - which is much more troublesome, rather than say, "I've an image about you, you are this" - finished. And having established that image, it gives me security and I don't want to learn anything more about you.

So I see from that, I observe from that, the mind, the brain, having established a belief, finds in that belief security, whether it's real or unreal, and acts according to that belief, and therefore acts neurotically. I'm a Muslim - that's just an idea, and I take security in that. And because it is divisive it is neurotic action. Do you feel all this?

Q: Could we say that the energy to meet each new experience is our security?

K: No. Each new experience is our security - no, there is no security in that at all.

Q: No, the energy to meet the new experience is our security.

K: The energy to meet that experience, in that energy there is security.

Q: That is the security.

K: That is security. That is, to meet each experience anew demands energy, that energy is security. What do you say?

Q: (Italian)

K: He says - I understand what you have said very clearly. It is my laziness. And what is wrong? If I like my laziness, why should I change? I say, "Don't."

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The same thing.

Q: I don't go on...

K: Madam, you understand what that question was? He said to me - I understand what you have said very clearly, but I like to be lazy, and most people are.

Q: (Italian)

K: That is, when the security in illusion is convenient, happy, why leave it? Wait - don't leave it, stay with it, stew in it, boil in it.

Wait - so you boil in your security, and the other has his security, and when you meet you have battle. The Communist finds in Marxism complete security, and the capitalist in his, and when they meet there is war. If you like it, keep it.

Q: (Italian)

K: Therefore I say that is no security at all. Security lies in the insight to see where there is no security. You have understood?

Q: Is there not the danger of the word?

K: The word also becomes illusory. Sir, have you understood this so far? Understood, that means you have insight into this, therefore you have dropped your laziness and your image. Have you? If you have not, why not, what's wrong? You've spent money, energy, sitting in a hot tent, and you leave it today with your images back. What's the point of it? Why do you go on when you see for yourself the stupidity, the lack of security in the things in which you have put your faith, your security in? Don't you, sir - the Stock Market, if you have any stocks, when you see danger in the Stock Market, don't you sell? Buy something which is much more secure? Why don't you do the same here - not that this is a Stock Market.

Q: Sir, if I drop my beliefs, my images now that I've seen them, there is nothing there. And I'm scared of having nothing.

K: I see if I drop my images, my conclusions, my laziness, I've nothing left and I'm frightened. Why do you drop them? Because somebody says drop them? Or you drop them because you have insight, you have an understanding in that, therefore your understanding is your security. Therefore there is no fear. You understand, sir? Once you have the key of observation, which is insight, which is the capacity to look, understand intelligently, then that intelligence is the security. And you're lazy, that's why.

So observation means non-abstraction. There is only observation, not the observer who is an abstraction. The observer is an abstraction, is an idea, is a conclusion, is the past. And through the eyes of the past you are looking at the trees, the mountains, your wife, your children and all the rest of it. And it's part of your laziness. Now to see that, to have an insight into it, to be aware of this extraordinary structure of illusion, which is an abstraction, that observation in itself is the total security. You've got it?

So can you leave this tent this morning happily, free of all the images, and therefore only have this light of insight? Have you?

Q: (Italian)

K: Madam - you've understood? I'm not going to translate, I'm sorry. She says - I must translate - The mountains and the trees, the rivers and the green meadows are different from man, and the collective man, the mass, the mass of people. Now what is my relationship with the mass? What is my relationship with this total seething mankind, with all its miseries, and all the rest of it? Is it laziness that I don't find my relationship with it? Is it my indifference? Or in asking that very question I have activated my energy to find out? Don't look at me, sir - what do you say? You understand? The lady says, it's easy to talk about the hills, the trees and the mountains and the flowers, but when it comes to human relationship, whether with one or with many, life becomes very difficult. It is difficult, as we said, because we have no relationship with anything - we have relationship in abstraction. And therefore we live in abstraction - the mass, the 'me', the conclusion, the image - we live in abstraction. Do you realize what it means? That we don't live at all but live in images, in conclusions which have no value.

Q: Sir, how can we get rid of all that?

K: I've shown it to you, sir. What shall I do? Look, sir, let me make it very simple - keep it very simple. When you see a physical danger you react, don't you. Why? When you see danger you react instantly, because you are conditioned to the danger, whether it's a wild animal, a bus or somebody trying to hit you, you react instantly. That is, you react according to your conditioning, instantly. Now you are conditioned psychologically, mentally, intellectually and in the cell, you are conditioned to live in speculations, in concepts, in formulas - you're conditioned to that, and you don't see the danger of it. If you saw the danger of it as you see the danger of an animal, you'd drop it instantly. So you say, "I don't see the danger of it, therefore I can't drop it. How will you help me to see the danger of it?" Are you doing the work or am I doing the work? I am doing the work, you are just listening. You're not working. You say, "Now tell me how to break down these images." That is, you are not exercising your energy to find out. That means you're being lazy, and want to be told. Then you can say, 'Well I agree or disagree, it's not convenient, it is so - ' you play with it. But if you say, "Look, I want to find out," because you see the truth of it - I can't live with images because they are destructive, they're dangerous. And you, to see that you must have energy, you must work, it isn't a matter to be told by another. I've told you, but you don't put your vitality into it.

So the mind, the brain, which is old, conditioned, and always living in the past, or projecting in the future from the past, cannot face something that is living, because it means you have to apply, you have to move, you have to watch. And so the mind says, "Please, I am lazy, don't, I'd rather live with my images, face the dangers, dangers of everything, but rather, please, I like to be comfortable." That's all you want.

But, sir, to find the truth you have to live tremendously, without a single security. That means, only security in intelligence that comes through insight. Then you'll be a first-class technician, because you don't project your image into doing a technical job. Then you have a marvellous relationship with each other.

Q: (French)

K: Madame, listen. Some author has written a book in which the author says that man must live alone now, not depend on Jesus, on Marx or this or that.

Q: (French)

K: Yes. God, heaven, hell, all the rest of the works. Now isn't it very strange that you read a book and learn from that? No? Somebody tells you, a first-class biologist, or a first-class physicist, or a first-class psychologist, that you must throw away all these cultural inhibitions, and fears and stand alone. And you read it, and you say, "By Jove, I must stand alone." Suppose there were no books at all, suppose there was nobody to tell you, what would you do? Which indicates you will accept a first-class biologist because he is a first-class, and therefore you don't live it yourself - you're all secondhand people.

Now what would happen if there was no Marx, no Jesus, no psychologist, you'd be left, wouldn't you? You have to solve this thing yourself. And that's what we have been trying to do, during these eight or nine talks, to force you into a corner so that you look at things. And if there is no speaker sitting on the platform, then you'll have to face it yourself - and we are too lazy to face it ourselves, we'd rather be told - and then make that into a problem.

So I hope this morning, after listening for an hour and a half, whatever time it is, that you walk out leaving all your images behind, and look at the tree as though you were looking at it for the first time. Then you will have tears in your eyes because of the beauty of the tree. Then you will see the mountains and the hills and the shadows as you have never seen them before. Then you will see your wife, your friend, your husband for the first time, and the beauty of that first time. And then you will see yourself without any image and you realize that you are nothing. And in that there is vast beauty, being absolutely nothing. Then you will know what truth is.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 7TH AUGUST 1972.

K: We have two more discussions, this morning and tomorrow morning, two discussions altogether. So what shall we talk over this morning?

Q: Sir, I spend one third of my life, approximately a third of my life, sleeping every twenty four hour period. And as I have got older I have found that the ability to sleep with harmony with myself seems to be less and less so that the quality of the rest that I get doesn't really prepare me too well for my day.

K: Would you like to discuss what is the function of sleep?

Q: Yes.

Q: Could we talk over the problems of existence.

K: Problems of existence - that's what we have been talking about for the last ten days, haven't we?

Q: Sir, how can we gather enough energy for meditation.

K: How to gather enough energy to meditate. Do you want to discuss meditation? Be quite sure, please, because it is a very serious subject, and don't kind of say, "Well, that's a nice subject to talk about". If you are really interested in it, we have not only to go into the question of energy, harmony, and what is the function of sleep - all these are involved in meditation, not just sitting cross-legged and going off into some fantasy. So do you really want to discuss this?

Q: Yes.

Q: Could we talk about education in the same way?

K: Could we not deal with education in the same way?

Q: Together.

K: Whom are you educating? The children or the educator?

Q: Both.

K: Wait - both. Is the educator capable of really educating the child? No. You say no? She agrees - no. Which is, the educator has to understand the whole problem of existence, not in departments, not classified as technology, science and so on. He has to understand, if he is to be a really good, efficient, worthwhile educator, he has to understand the whole problem of existence. Now during the last three weeks, we have been talking about existence - we have not perhaps mentioned the word education, but the educator is being educated here in this tent, if he would listen. Shall we go on with the other - which is part of our education.

Q: Sir, have we not been talking about meditation the last three weeks?

K: Yes, sir - he says, haven't we been talking about meditation for the last three weeks.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The capacity to understand existence, does it depend on individual, biological structure, or on his tendency, character and idiosyncrasy, or does the understanding of existence...

Q: Is it common to all human beings.

K: Is it common to all human beings - I should have thought it is common to all beings. I may have my peculiar tendency, my peculiar idiosyncrasy and character, but surely understanding must go beyond all that. So it is common, it's not restricted according to one's character, body, and so on.

Q: Can we talk about death.

K: Death - you're quite young, aren't you? She wants to discuss death.

Q: And to talk about health and disease, accident.

K: Health, disease, accident and all that kind of thing. Now how can we put all this together - health, disease, death, education, thought killing feeling, sleep, meditation, and death? How can we put all this together.

Q: Curiosity.

K: Curiosity. Put it all in.

Q: Isn't it all in meditation?

Q: For me, the house is still burning and I feel that there are many people who have clear eyes in the world. But the people in power can't bring about a change. How can we bring about a change in the people in power?

K: Yes, I understand, madam. There are some people who see clearly, but that is very limited and how to affect, how to bring about a change of heart in the people who are in power.

Q: What is the meaning of freedom?

K: What is the meaning of freedom? Lots of it now.

Q: Sorrow and education.

Q: For the ending of the image is it sufficient to have love?

K: Is the ending of the image, is it sufficient to have love? All right, sir.

Q: Is meditation an effort?

K: Yes, sir, meditation and good old effort. Throw it all in, sir, let's all get together.

Q: Sir, it seems to me that we have every variety of motivation to understanding, except the very simple one of curiosity, the desire to find out. Why does the motivation prevent us from understanding these questions, and why do we have so little curiosity, desire to find out?

K: Look, sir, all these things are involved, aren't they - curiosity, death, education and sorrow, sleep, the whole mechanism of thought, feeling, and so on - all these things have a central issue, they have a central point from which we can start. Can we do that?

Now what is the central point, the root which has the trunk and many branches and leaves. If we could understand this whole process of living, which is the root, then we'll deal or have the capacity to deal with all the branches, with all the leaves, with the dying leaves and the new leaves, and the spring leaves and old leaves. Now what do you think is the central issue?

Q: Love.

K: Don't jump, and say, love. It may be love, but consider it for a few minutes. I want to find out if there is a source, a fountain, waters that once drunk will bring about such intelligence that will reply, answer, solve, all the problems. You understand my question?

I want to find out if my mind can live both at the level of knowledge and also at the same time, move with knowledge the unknown, so that both of them are living together, moving together, in harmony? You have understood my question? Now if I can find that out, then I'll have answered all your questions - you'll have answered for yourselves all the questions. How to deal with the known, known being the accumulated knowledge of centuries, and also at the same time, enter or allow the unknown to move also, so that the two together function, in harmony. Would that answer all your questions?

Q: Yes.

K: Don't say, 'Yes' too quickly and then bring up later on, what about physical existence. I've a problem, one has a problem, which is, sleep, death, education, strong emotions, passions, controlled by thought and thought gradually getting stronger, and destroying all one's feelings, sensitivities, intuition, curiosity - all these are the problems of life. If I have a mind that's very clear, not corrupted, not polluted, not distorted, then such a mind will answer all these questions.

Now what is that mind - don't say it is this or it is that, because the description is not the described, the word is not the thing. So I want to find out, what is that mind that whatever problem it faces it resolves it and goes on, it doesn't become a burden, it doesn't become something to worry about endlessly.

Now can we together this morning spend a little time in trying to find out what is the quality of that mind - mind being, the brain, the feeling, the whole physical organism, the total thing, not the body, the emotion, the intellect, the brain, divided, but the total entity. Now how do you set about trying to find out? Existence implies jobs, food, clothes, and shelter; existence implies all this travail, this battle, this struggle, the pain, the anxiety, the guilt and the sorrow. Existence implies relationship between two human beings; existence implies the hours we spend in sleep; existence implies love, which is translated as jealousy, hate - all that, and sleep, death, and meditation - all that is involved. I want to find out for myself, not having read a book, and I don't want to read any books about all this - I want to find out what that mind is, I'm very curious. Shall we discuss that? Please don't be casual about it.

Q: Yes.

K: I don't want your encouragement, you understand - I do this in my walk. Now how shall I find out, a mind so clear, a mind that has no conflict - not an ideal, actually has no conflict - a mind that can be completely quiet, a mind that when it sleeps, makes itself new, that lives in complete absence of the 'me', which is the essence of conflict. Now how am I to go about it, because I'm curious, I've got enough energy, I am not frightened, whatever the consequences of my enquiry is, I don't depend on anybody, for money, food - it doesn't interest me. If you give me food I'll take it, if you don't, it's all right, I'm not interested. My whole concern is this.

Q: Sir, I'm not curious - I'm scared, I want to attain it.

K: He's not curious but he wants to attain it. I don't want to attain it. How can my stupid little mind attain that - it can't, can it, because I think in terms of attainment, in terms of success, in terms of getting something. That's my motive. But I say, I've no motive, I want to see what such a mind is like. You see the difference?

Q: If there is such a thing.

K: I'm going to find out, sir. That's just it, I don't know if it exists, because I have no guru, thank god, I have no teacher, I don't accept any description or whatever another says about that - I brush all that aside. They may be an illusion or they are racketeers, so I'm not interested in them. I just want to find out, if there is such a mind.

Now how am I to begin, how am I to start? Please, go on, help me. Where am I to start? At the unknown end, which I can imagine and therefore not real? Or where am I to begin to discover this mind that can respond without contradiction, without effort, without denial, sacrifice, forcing? Where am I to begin?

Q: Begin by asking why all these problems have arisen?

K: Would you begin by asking why all these problems come into being. Look, sir, we've talked for ten days or three weeks, we've been through all that. I start enquiring if there is such a mind, and to find out I must start not knowing. I don't know a thing about it, do you? Come on, sir. You may have read what people have said, you may have heard what people have said, I discard all that. All that I know is, I don't know. Are you also in that position, that you don't know if such a mind exists, and if it is at all possible to come upon it. You don't know - don't pretend, that's all. I don't know. A mind that says, "I don't know", therefore it is free to enquire.

There is freedom, that is the first step and the last step. Take it slowly. When I say, I don't know, I do not depend on anybody, on any circumstances, on any environment, either of the past or of the future. When I say, I don't know, I really completely mean it - I don't know. Are you in that position? Or you have your hidden masters, your hidden guides, your hidden memories, and pretend that you don't know.

Q: I think that I really don't know whether I know or not.

K: Please, this is too serious, don't play with words. Can you honestly say to yourself, I don't know whether there is such a mind? And therefore I'm free to enquire. Therefore enquiry demands that you be free first. Free first, not at the end - free from your Zen, free from your meditations, your systems, your gods, your myths, your gurus, your concepts - out, out of the window all that. You're neither a Christian nor a Buddhist nor a follower of Jesus - out. Then you're free to enquire. That means the mind is not frightened, frightened to be alone.

Now I'm going to enquire, because I don't know what's going to happen. I'm not looking for a result. I don't want to find it or not find it, because my insistence is that mind must be free to enquire, and therefore never a moment of distortion. There is distortion when there is a motive. I've no motive, I don't care. I don't care, if that mind exists, doesn't exist, my enquiry is motiveless, endless, and has no authority whatsoever, past or present, therefore it's free to enquire. Come on, sir, will you move with me.

Now what am I enquiring into? I'm free to enquire - enquire what? Sleep? You're all very silent.

Q: Free to look?

K: Free to look - look at what? The tree, the mountain, the green, lovely, sparkling meadows.

Q: It's automatic to...

K: Don't speculate.

Q: I'm not speculating. When there is something you see immediately that creates space, and the mind has to be empty all the time.

K: When you say, "I don't know" the mind is empty. When it says, "I'm enquiring," it says, "What am I enquiring into." Am I enquiring into death, which is part of living? Am I enquiring into sleep, which is part of living? Job, fear, what am I enquiring into?

Q: The fact that I'm bored...

K: Yes.

Q: ...and I'm asking myself whether it is possible to live differently, and I really don't know.

K: You don't know, so why don't you start from there? I don't know how to end conflict. I live in conflict, contradiction, all the rest of it - we won't go into all the details of it - I live in conflict, I'm enquiring into that because I don't know what's going to happen. Wait. I'm enquiring into conflict, with a mind that says I really don't know if I can ever go beyond it. But you start with a mind which says, "I really don't know. I live in conflict but I don't know how to solve it." Wait, go step by step into it. But you start with not knowing, and therefore you start with freedom.

Q: If you enquire further into an idea...

K: You're going to find out, sir - don't verbalize it yet.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madam. We had all these questions, hadn't we: life is death, sleep, conflict, suffering, education, thought opposing feeling, feeling opposing thought. We've had all these questions. I said, where am I to start, in the resolution of all this - in the understanding of all this - where am I to start? I say I really don't know whether I should begin here or there, therefore not knowing, I meet them all. You get it? Because I don't know, therefore I have the capacity to look at them all. This is not mystifying - how can I go on with all of you? You know, this is really a marvellous subject if you go into it - with two or three people we could do a great deal, but with so many contradictory problems and all the rest of it, it becomes extraordinarily difficult.

I don't know what meditation is, I don't know what death is, I don't know if life can be lived without strife, without any kind of strife. But I am free to enquire. Now I'm going to enquire, being free, what is the significance of sleep? I'm taking that. The sleep which most of us have is a disturbance. No? Isn't it a disturbance, with dreams, with pictures, nightmares, all kinds of things are going on, aren't they?

Q: There are other kinds of sleep, too.

K: Do you know it?

Q: Yes.

K: What is that?

Q: When I did not know anything about dreams and all that.

K: So, when the brain gets tired of dreams it becomes quiet, is that it?

Q: Yes, probably - yes I suppose.

K: You're enquiring, you can't suppose.

Q: He has to suppose because you can't ask him while he's asleep, he's awake now and he has to answer you.

K: That's what I mean, sir. Look, we're enquiring into the question of sleep. I'm asking myself, during the day, my whole day is a disturbed existence. I'm disturbed all day long, I've got a job where I'm insulted, I accept great confusion during the daytime. And at night the same movement is going on, it isn't a break, which is translated into dreams.

Q: You asked if there is another kind of sleep.

K: I don't know - I'm going to find out. I see that during the day my life is disturbed, my brain is in conflict, I'm pushed around, I'm dominated or I dominate - it's a constant threat, constant pain, constant pleasures and so on. It is the same movement carried on when I go to sleep, that is when I dream. So I say to myself, "I'm enquiring, can I during the day bring order in my life, because when I sleep dreams are a means of bringing about order." Have you noticed, just before you go to sleep sometimes the brain says, "What kind of day have I had? It's time to bring about order before going to sleep." Have you noticed it? Oh, no, don't tell me - come on. Some of you have, therefore before you sleep, the brain tries to put order. If you don't put order, then while you sleep the brain is trying to create order, which are dreams, interpretations, all the rest of it. Is that clear? I'm enquiring, I don't want to know what happens - I see this fact.

Now can I bring order during the day in my life - if not I'll dream, if not my brain will have no rest? And it must have rest, otherwise it's like a machinery that's working for seventy years, it wears itself out. So it must have complete rest.

Q: Scientists say that dreams are necessary. Scientists also say that there are states between dreams. Now we can enquire as to whether the mind is so completely tired it has given up trying to put order, really it's too exhausted.

K: That's right.

Q: And I think what you are asking is, there is a third kind of sleep.

K: Yes. I put my life in order during the day. I have - not you. To me it's tremendously important this, not to have conflict. So I have the order and this order can be brought about only when I see how chaotic the disorder is. Through the understanding and examination, enquiry into disorder, order is brought about. Order isn't a pattern, which I follow regularly, a blueprint which I accept blindly and go on. Order is something that comes out of the understanding of the insight of disorder. Therefore my life during the day is orderly. Then at night, what takes place? Sleep then is without dreams. Am I telling you and therefore you're accepting it, or is it a fact to you?

Q: You are telling us because the very fact that...

K: Therefore leave it.

Q: That's why we can only talk about the day, the waking state.

K: That's all - so my enquiry goes much further than yours.

Because I think I have brought order in my life, and I know if there is disorder what to do; and I say the brain then, when it sleeps, is absolutely rested. And what happens during rest, and further, that's my enquiry, it's not your enquiry, therefore I won't go into it. I know it's exciting for you to listen to what happens but that's of no value.

Q: Some scientists have made experiments where they keep somebody awake.

K: I know, sir, I know all that.

Q: And then they conclude from that that you have to dream. Of course that only shows you are disorderly during the day and then you...

K: So my question is, have you put order during the waking hours of your life?

Q: Obviously not because I dream.

K: Therefore obviously not, therefore why don't you put order?

Q: I don't know how.

K: Wait, I'm telling you.

Q: But there's so much to cope with. Isn't there disorder to cope with?

K: No, there isn't. The lady says there is so much to cope with - there isn't. What you're coping with is disorder.

Q: Well there's this disorder to cope with. Isn't there disorder to cope with?

K: No, disorder has many forms but it is disorder - sexual disorder, mental disorder, disorder in our relationship with each other, disorder in my body, disorder - psychological, physiological, psychosomatic, whatever it is - disorder. Why don't I bring order into all that?

Q: Sir, because I don't know how and I want you to tell me.

K: I'll show it to you, sir. Are you aware of this disorder?

Q: Yes.

K: Now watch it, sir. You are aware of this disorder - what do you do about it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look at your own disorder - not that gentleman's disorder. His disorder is your disorder. He says, "I'm in disorder, I don't know what to do with it." Why not? What is disorder - contradiction, isn't it? Basically, disharmony - disorder - I think one thing, do another, say one thing, act in a different way, I feel and I mustn't feel, I want peace, I'm violent, which are all contradictions. Therefore my life, which is disorderly, is the result of contradiction. When a neurotic person believes in something and holds on to that, for that person there is no disorder, because he says, "This is so." I believe tremendously in Jesus or Buddha and that's finished - I've no disorder. Because that to me is real, everything else is unreal.

So if there is to be order you have to examine disorder in your life, which is brought about by contradiction, which is not seeing actually 'what is', wanting to change 'what is' into something else. That is disorder. Come on, sir.

Q: As I walk along I am aware of a centre which is the essence of disorder. And I want to change it, I still want to get rid of it and find order.

K: Do listen to what I am saying - you are aware of your disorder, disorder basically implies contradiction, which is, not facing 'what is', not looking and moving away from 'what is'. When you move away from 'what is', that is disorder. When you try to go beyond it, that is disorder. When you try to suppress it, that is disorder. But when you look at 'what is', you've all the energy to go beyond it. That is order. Have you got it - not my verbal explanation, actually, have you got your teeth into it.

Q: Sir, what about compromises? It is sometimes necessary...

K: What about compromising - sometimes it is necessary. All right, compromise. Why do you make a problem of it - I have to compromise in putting on trousers, I have to compromise when I have to put on leather shoes. Why do you make a problem of compromise - because one has a principle that you mustn't compromise?

Q: Well...

K: Wait - follow it up. One can compromise about little things, but is there compromise when you see the fact that war is caused by nationality, one of the causes. Is there any compromise there?

Q: Yes.

K: What?

Q: Yes, the consequence if you won't fight is that they take your passport and nationality.

K: Then let them take my passport, but fortunately they've given me one. And if they say you can't travel, all right, I don't travel, I stay where I am.

Q: But I might starve.

K: If I starve, I starve, all right - you people are so frightened. Let's move. So I've brought order in my life, daily living, waking hours, there is order and therefore the brain is absolutely quiet, incorruptible in that state. And when it wakes up, it's got vitality - that is, not yours, but what I am saying.

Now I am enquiring because I don't know - I am enquiring into meditation. What does it mean? I see at first, the mind must be absolutely quiet, because if it is not quiet it cannot see clearly. That's all.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I see if I want to listen to you, I must hear what you are saying - I can't be distracted. I want to listen to you, therefore my attention is effortless, because I'm curious, eager to find out what you want to say. Therefore there is no effort. I see very clearly that to listen, to see, the mind must be completely quiet. That's all. And my interest is to listen to you, my interest is to see clearly, therefore the mind is quiet.

Q: I think we're going to enter some difficulty...

K: Lots of difficulties.

Q: ...at this point because we're going to start talking in contradiction as words. In order to listen, the mind is quiet, but listening, listening to what - sound? That sound emphasizing the quiet - so once again. So you said that the mind must be quiet in order to listen, but that's a contradiction in terms - quiet for listening.

K: No, sir.

Q: The words are contradictory but not the actuality.

K: All right, if you have understood it, then it's simple. To see clearly...

Q: ...there must be no colour in the mind.

K: That's all, sir. And to make the mind quiet is absurd. To force the mind to be quiet is absurd - it's not quiet. Or to follow a system which will make the mind quiet, is absolutely silly - whether it is offered by the greatest guru or the lowliest of the gurus.

So I see, in my enquiry into meditation, I see, there is an insight into the quality of a mind that is quiet. Have you? No? You haven't, have you? Why not? If you want to see the tree, your girl, the mountain, hear what others are saying, you have to be quiet, haven't you? What is the difficulty? Therefore your difficulty is, you don't want to listen, you don't want to see.

Q: You see for an instant and then it disappears.

K: Why does it disappear - you see it for an instant, it disappears. All right, let it disappear. You want to have the whole thing, don't you? You're so greedy. Just one second of perception is enough.

So I'm enquiring into meditation. I see my body must be quiet, relaxed. Then in that state of relaxation, the blood goes much easier to the brain. Therefore they advocate sitting in postures, you know, sitting cross-legged, all that game. Or you can lie down or do anything, walk, it doesn't matter. So the body must be sensitive, alive, quick, supple, mustn't it? Is your body quick, supple, sensitive? Obviously not, because you overeat, not enough exercise, smoke, drink - carry on, and yet you say, "Now I'm carrying on my daily life, I want a quiet mind. Tell me how to work at it." So you want all your pleasures and get the other pleasure. Too childish all this! Now, the problem is, can thought be still? Mind means thought, the whole mechanism of thinking. How is thought to be still?

Q: You just said that thought is still, when you are really interested to observe.

K: Yes, sir, I'm examining - is your thought quiet?

Q: No.

K: Therefore you're not enquiring.

Q: That's right. There is a part of me which just sits there.

K: Therefore you're not enquiring - I say I'm enquiring. I say, can thought be quiet, operate when necessary, logically, sanely, impersonally, vitally, and the rest of the time - quiet, not all the time operating?

Q: Sir, if you are enquiring, it is already quiet.

K: Sir, if you're doing this thought is quiet, but you're not doing it, are you? No, therefore we are enquiring - I'm enquiring for you. Look, all our life is spent in thinking, isn't it? Most of our life is the activity of thought. Thought is going on endlessly, consciously or unconsciously. Is that so or not? Now how do you bring this mechanism to an end for a while?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Therefore what do you do about it - therefore don't talk. I want to find out, I want to put my blood into it to find out, if thought must all the time go on. Or I say, "Is there an interval between two thoughts. Or is thought one continuous movement taking different forms?" You're not enquiring, you've never done any of this.

Q: There's an interval between thoughts.

K: There is an interval between two thoughts. The lady says yes, I know that interval, she says. Now what happens in that interval? Is it an interval of tiredness - please enquire - don't say no or yes - an interval caused by tiredness, by boredom, by daydreaming, or is it a conscious interval?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking the question for you, not for me.

Q: You're not asking it for everybody?

K: I'm asking for everybody who is here.

Q: Then you say you're asking for you, that's for you. Are we moving together?

K: No, we're not, for the simple reason, you have never gone into this question: whether the mind, which is the instrument of thought, which is, thought being memory, experience, knowledge and all that - all the time operating? And I say I am enquiring for you. Do you find any time that this thought naturally comes to an end? Or is there an interval between two thoughts? Or if that interval is laziness, slackness, tiredness, or are you aware of this interval? And if you are aware of this interval, then what takes place?

Q: There's energy in that interval - that's what energy is.

K: Energy is in that interval. To pick up again another thought? Are you guessing? Unfortunately - this is our trouble - you've not gone into this.

Q: We recognize what solution and what you are saying at the same time.

K: So you recognize it.

Q: As far as I'm concerned, what you are saying is, if I give my whole mind and everything I've got to enquire, then my mind is still.

K: I didn't say that, sir. I simply said, if you want to listen to somebody you have to be fairly quiet, haven't you? That's all.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait. And I want to listen, listen, not I want to - is there a listening without a word?-

Q: There may be.

K: I give it up. Experiment, sir, do it now, find out if you can listen without a word. Find out what is the quality of that listening, and find out whether that quality is imagined or real.

Q: Sir, when one tries to do this, the weakness I have is that the mind gives instructions to itself.

K: Yes, sir, that's part of thinking. You see, I wish you had never heard the word 'meditation'. I wish you had never heard what it is to be quiet. I wish you'd never heard what may happen beyond, when the mind is quiet. If you had never heard any of these things, but only had to deal with your life as it is - as it is - that is, our conflict, our misery, our sorrow, in the resolution of that, the other thing may happen. But you haven't solved it, but you want the other. That's why I said, if you could start with not knowing. I don't know if there is a reality which is not touched by thought - I really don't know. I don't really know if there is a mind which is so religious - not in the orthodox sense of that word - religious, that is capable of seeing what is sacred. Is there anything sacred in life? Will you enquire into this? Can we go together into this to find out if there is anything sacred in life? If we don't find it life becomes meaningless. No?

Q: Maybe that's why it is meaningless. It is now and I don't know anything else.

K: You people don't know, can't move. Look, I'll go on. I want to find out if there is anything sacred in life - sacred not in the image which man has created, not in an idea that there is sacredness, not in the religious books or their idols, because all that has been put together by man. Jesus, Buddha, they've all been put together by thought, by thought which is in agony, which is in despair, which is tremendously in sorrow and pain and fear, and therefore it says, 'That is sacred.' Isn't that clear? And I say that's not sacred, obviously. I used to know a friend - as he was walking one day in the woods he saw a piece of wood which had the face of a human being. So he took it home and put it on the mantelpiece. He looked at it and said what an extraordinary thing that is, because it had vitality - rain, people walking on it, had produced this shape. And one day he brought to it, that piece of wood, a flower, and put it beside it. And it still looked more beautiful. So every day he added a flower, and gradually within a year that became the most sacred thing in his life.

Therefore that is not sacred. I can make that piece of wood into the most sacred thing, like the altar put together, or, you know, the Christians, their myths, their idols are just the fantasy of the mind. That's not sacred. I want to find out if there is anything sacred in life; that is, in living, dying, in love. Are we walking together?

Now how do I find out, because I see that if there is no discovery of that beauty, life becomes rather shallow and empty? I can invent a lot of things, sit meditating endlessly about something, all that becomes very, very superficial and rather childish and stupid. So I say, out. I push away all that. Then what is sacred? Is love sacred - the love that has anxiety, fear, jealousy, that dominates, that possesses, the human relationship which is called love which is sex, pleasure, pain, anxiety, all that - is that sacred? I don't know - what do you say?

Q: Obviously not.

K: Obviously not, why?

Q: Because you have shown it to us.

K: I didn't show it, sir, watch it. You say, why. I'll show you. That piece of wood became sacred. So thought made it sacred. Thought has made love into what it is. So thought cannot make anything sacred. Come on, sir. Whether it is the Buddha, Christ, Krishna, whatever it is, an idea - thought cannot make anything sacred. You understand the beauty of this, sir. To discover that, to come upon that - feeling, thought can never make the tree beautiful, the mountain beautiful, your face lovely, thought cannot make it, therefore thought, which is the response of memory, thought which is measurable can never be sacred.

So that which is sacred is the moment when thought is not. And at that moment, thought says, "I'll measure and I want more of it" then it becomes pleasure. And thought pursues endlessly pleasure. And so all the temples, all the churches, all the mosques are put together by thought for pleasure, therefore there is nothing sacred in it.

Q: How can...

K: Wait, I'm showing it to you. So can the mind be without thought, and use thought when necessary? Which means, the mind being empty of thought can use thought, and live with thought, in harmony, not one and the other. And this is meditation. So that the mind has no illusion; and illusion arises when you want to achieve. When you say, "I must attain that," and then you can invent something which you will attain and think you've got it. But always if you can remember that piece of wood on the mantelpiece - you follow?

So my mind, so the whole of my mind is sacred - not it's content is sacred. I wonder if you're meeting all this - but that quality of mind that's completely empty. And out of that emptiness, space and silence, thought can operate. This is all my description, you understand - it's not yours.

Now if a few of us see this together, and it is not mine or yours, but it is so, then we create a new generation. And then you won't be bothered about changing the people, changing the heart of the people in power. They are not worth changing. Any man who is in power is corrupt.

Have we any of us travelled together? Up to a point. Is that good enough?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Let them destroy. They are destroying.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: They are destroying the world, all the politicians put together are destroying the world. What are we going to do - wipe them out? You and I vote against them - 90% of the people want that kind of thing, they want power, position, prestige. We want to change the heart of others, without changing our own hearts. Don't bother about the others, begin with yourself. That sounds a cliché but it isn't.

Q: I would like to clear up a point. You said, I think, that nothing is sacred. And then you went on to say, about the pursuit of pleasure and I didn't understand how you connect that.

K: I don't remember that, sir. I can't repeat it.

Q: You were talking about the enquiry into what is sacred. Then you followed on and you said that nothing is sacred.

K: I know - I've got it, I understand. Look, sir, when there is happiness or great enjoyment, you learn a great deal. It is only when the mind is happy, relaxed, enjoying, you learn a great deal. And in enquiring into what is sacred, perhaps there is a second when you see, when the mind sees itself completely without being anything. That moment is the most extraordinary moment. And having seen that thought comes along and says, "I must have more of it", and that is the beginning of pleasure, and not enjoyment. You understand? Joy is something beyond pleasure. But once having smelt, tasted it, thought says, "I must have more of it". Don't you know this? You have had sex and once you have had it thought says, "Let's go on with it". You see a beautiful sunset, at that moment there is no thought at all. There is complete enjoyment of that beauty. Then thought comes along a few minutes later and says, "Let's go back to that mountain, it was such a lovely thing." So thought is always avoiding pain and pursuing pleasure. This is so simple.

To find out what is sacred the mind must know the total content of itself. And its content makes consciousness. You understand, sir? Consciousness is its content. If there is no content there is something else, isn't there? If my content of my mind is worry, resentment, wanting to fulfil, bitterness, anxiety, fear, afraid of so many things, wanting to do this and that, that is the content of my consciousness. When the content is not, there is something entirely different. And we try to make one of the contents into the sacred thing. You understand? That's why one must know the total content, consciousness or unconscious. And that's another problem.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 8TH AUGUST 1972.

K: As this is the last discussion or dialogue, what shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: Could we continue with yesterday's discussion, the understanding of order and what is order?

Q: What is a religious mind and is it possible in this day and age to live such a life?

Q: How can I ask the right question when my mind is so confused?

K: How can I ask the right question when I've got a rather confused mind. Is that it? But we do ask questions, don't we, though we have confused minds and rather disturbed minds, we ask questions. And the gentleman asks, what is the right question to ask when one is confused.

Q: (Italian)

K: You have affirmed that love is without object and without a continuity. What is this statement that has been made, that love is without object and has no continuity?

Perhaps we can answer all these questions if we go into the problem of time. Would you like to go into that? Does that interest you, because that will include, how to understand order, and perhaps we can then find out for ourselves if there is such a thing as love without an object and without time. Because love without continuity means love without time. Right? Are you interested in this?

Q: Yes.

K: You see, we've always been brought up in the prolongation of time, using time, which is measure, as a means of achievement, both outwardly, physiologically, as well as psychologically. (I see two or three people who are yawning - I hope you had a nice night). You know, it is really a very important question, this, because if we could understand it, really, deeply, then perhaps we'll solve this question of love, order, and what it means to live neither in the past nor in the future. So I think it is important to go into this question.

We use time as measure, both outwardly and inwardly. We use time as measure as going from here to there, that is, covering the distance needs time, physically. And we also think or have been educated in our culture, we think that psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin as it were, we need time to understand, we need time to conquer, we need time to break down our bondages, we need time to understand sorrow. So we use time as a measure both outwardly and inwardly.

This is a dialogue, please - I'm not talking by myself, which I can do in my room. We are discussing, trying to take the journey together. I need time to go from here to Geneva. I need time if my body is rather unwilling, the muscles are rather hard, I need time to make them subtle - it will take a week. That is, the week is the measurement of time which is necessary to make the body a little more subtle.

Q: Is it a fact that it takes?

K: Is it a fact that takes place in time. The fact that one's muscles are rather unyielding, it takes time to make them more subtle, there needs to be time. The fact is the muscles are rather hard, not soft, and to make them so you need week. The week is the measure, the week is time. To learn a language there needs to be time, two months, three months or six months.

So to cover, from a certain point to another point needs time, which is measure. Now we apply the same measurement inwardly. I need time to get over a habit, I need time to stop smoking, I need time to conquer my anger, I need time in order to achieve a certain psychological result, I need time to find enlightenment, I need time to get over my sorrow. So outwardly we apply the measure of time, and inwardly we do the same, psychologically. Gradualness is accepted as a fact. To put machinery together it must be done gradually, I can't all of a sudden put it together. Time is necessary, as a gradual process, in order to learn a language.

Now I ask myself, and I suppose you must have, whether time as measurement exists at all and is there psychological evolution at all, evolution being time? The brain has evolved through centuries upon centuries, to come to this unfortunate point. And it has evolved under great pressure, great uncertainty, calamities, pains, suffering. And it has achieved a certain result - it has evolved. And to have evolved up to this point you need time.

To learn a technology one needs time. Now we are asking if time is necessary at all for psychological understanding, for being free of a habit, habit being the conditioning. The mind, the brain is conditioned in the culture it has grown - religiously, psychologically, socially, economically, family and so on. That conditioning, does it need time to break it down, to go beyond it?

Q: But understanding itself, or the insight, does not need time, although a lot of work is necessary to come to that point.

K: Is insight time - does perception need time. Or time is not necessary for perception. That's what the questioner says.

Q: That wasn't the question - I was saying that insight itself is instant but there's a lot of work necessary.

K: Insight is instant but to carry it out needs time.

Q: No, not to carry it out.

K: To work it out. Look, I'll make it very simple. I have an insight that I shouldn't smoke, but it takes some time for the body to adjust itself because it has been drugged narcotically for many years, and it takes time to get over it. Is that what you were saying?

Q: The insight is instant but to come to the insight, that's what I think he wanted to say.

K: Insight is instantaneous but to come to that insight needs time. Let's put it that way, he says. I am lazy, one is lazy. And laziness prevents insight, obviously. But being lazy, to dissipate that laziness needs time. To approach insight, the approach needs time. That's what I've understood from his question.

Sir, let us go slowly into this, because we can ask all kinds of questions a little later, but let's get the simple fact. I need time to learn a language, and I'm asking myself, and we're asking ourselves, whether time is necessary to bring about a radical revolution psychologically? What do you think?

Let's begin: the brain has been conditioned in the culture in which it has grown. Does that conditioning, the freedom of that conditioning, does it require time - time being, being conditioned it'll take some time, days, years, months, to be free of that conditioning - now I'm asking, does it take time?

Q: Whatever takes place in time must cause more conditioning.

K: Whatever takes place in time must be more conditioning.
Let's begin much simpler: one smokes, there is a habit of smoking - the abandonment of smoking, the giving it up, does it take time? I don't know, I don't smoke but tell me.

Q: No.

K: You say no. Why do you say no?

Q: I did it.

K: Because you did it. What is implied in that - the body has been accustomed, has acquired a habit of nicotine. And the body demands it, though intellectually you may have decided to give up smoking, the body being accustomed or used to nicotine, demands it. So there is the bodily demand and the decision to give up smoking. So there is a conflict, isn't there? And to overcome this conflict you say, I need time. Are we meeting each other - please let's get going, not let's stop at nicotine. And is there a way of giving up totally smoking without this conflict? Conflict implies time, the body, being used to nicotine, demands it. But the mind has said, 'How stupid, how dangerous it is to smoke, it will affect my heart - I won't do it.' So the decision and the fact, the fact being the body is used to nicotine, so there is conflict. And to overcome that conflict you need time. So you say, "I will gradually get over it." Now I'm asking myself, is there a way of dropping the habit totally without conflict, in which the body has accepted the fact?

Q: It seems to me that just as the body requires a week for its muscles...

K: Wait. I know that. We know this - I'm enquiring, don't assert anything. My body used to take nicotine, and the mind has said, "No, I won't do it." The body says, "I must have more of it." Now can the body be so intelligent that it sees the danger of it and drops it, doesn't demand it?

Q: Nine years ago I used to smoke. I had this battle between the body and decision. And suddenly I dropped it.

Q: Casually?

K: Is it casual or there was an instant co-operation of the body with the perception. Give a little time, please - time in the sense, you are impatient, you want to get ahead. I want to go into it step by step.

Q: It seems to me that in giving up smoking the conflict is not so much between the mind and the body as with the pain on the one hand and my decision to give up smoking, and the fact that I need to smoke as an escape.

K: Yes, sir, all that is implied. I want to find out if the body can also see as intelligently as the mind does, and give it up without the least friction. You've understood my question? How is this to be done? Take any habit, doesn't matter what habit, and there is the momentum of the body, the momentum of the mind that says, I must give it up, or I am afraid to give it up because I'm escaping from a particular thing. So can the body and the mind together see the fact and drop it? Discuss it.

Q: There is a separation between the mind and the body, therefore there is conflict.

K: There is the separation between mind and body, that's why there is this conflict. But the fact remains that nicotine has become a habit for the body, though the mind says, "I will drop smoking." There is this conflict.

Q: This 'I' makes the conflict.

K: No, don't reduce everything to that - haven't you got habits? And haven't you noticed to break a habit it takes time? The decision, you are aware of the habit, and you know, all the rest of it, it takes time, doesn't it. And I'm asking, why is there not a complete perception by the body as well as by the mind, so that it's finished?

Q: There's no doubt too that the nicotine causes some physical effect. But I wonder how much effect it really causes and is it perhaps possible that the mind or the body can cause conflict too.

K: Of course. You're conditioned, aren't you, as a Catholic, as a Christian, aren't you all? No? All right, some are not, some are. Or you're conditioned in another way. Now take your conditioning, if you're aware of it, and see whether that conditioning can be dropped instantly.

Q: Sir, it takes time, it takes time to make it, so it can't be dropped instantly.

K: Please, don't speculate.

Q: Sir, doesn't the word instant imply time?

K: Heavens, look, everything, conveying through words implies time. Instantly may be two seconds or a millionth of a second, but let's go beyond that word, if you don't mind.

Q: Then why do you stay with nicotine when you know that to give up nicotine the body itself has its own metabolic process and will not give it up. So why not go beyond. It is possible to stop smoking with no bad effects, but with a hard drug...

K: Hard drugs, that is heroine and all the rest of it, the hard drugs have affected the body, the cells. I wish we hadn't entered into the nicotine and the hard drugs, but because that needs a lot of time. I want to get at something much deeper than that, sir. Does the freedom from conditioning take time?

Q: May I say something? I was standing on a rock one day, there was lichen and rock and moss. This may have taken a million years or a billion to grow, but it seemed to me that in that moment the lichen and I existed together. Is there anything in this?

K: I don't know, sir. I'm only concerned with one thing - I am conditioned, brought up in the culture in which I was born. That culture has conditioned me, with its illusions, superstitions, with its myths, with its gods, with its economic and social status. And I want to find out if my mind can drop that conditioning without conflict, without time. I won't even use instantly, because then you'll say, instant is one millionth of a second. That's my concern, because I see that is the most important thing in relationship, that's the most important thing in the world where human beings have to live, not to be conditioned.

Please is this simple. Can I go on? Will it take time? That is, will it take time to see that I'm conditioned? And, the next step is, the decision to uncondition myself, and the effort involved in the unconditioning, and so on - all that is a progression in time. I want to find out if it can be done without time. Don't say it is possible, it is not possible - don't theorize about it, find out for yourself you're conditioned - to find that out, does it take time? It will take time if I tell you you're conditioned, then you accept the fact that you are conditioned, or disagree, or argue, and decide later that you are conditioned - all that implies time. But if you yourself see directly that you're conditioned, that doesn't take time. To see for yourself that you're hungry, it's a fact, you're hungry. But to be told that you are hungry, you say, "Am I really hungry?" You evade the question - how do you know I'm hungry? Does my face show it, my behaviour, and so on - you take time to be told that you're hungry and then say, "I'm hungry" takes time, but to see for yourself, to be aware for yourself that you're hungry needs no time. That's one fact - is that clear? Proceed, sir.

Q: It doesn't take time to see one single factor, but each moment is linked by thought, we don't see the totality of it.

K: Sir, you've gone ahead of me - come back where I am, which is, I said, to be told that you are conditioned and then be aware that you are conditioned takes time. But to be aware of conditioning needs no time. Now what is it with you? The speaker has said you are conditioned, and therefore you realize you are conditioned. And that realization comes through time - verbal message, arguing, disagreeing, but all that takes time. But to say, "Yes, I'm conditioned," that needs no time. Now which is it with you? Go on, sir. Move from there.

Q: I've already formed an opinion because you have said for many years that one must be free of the conditioning. And that doesn't need time. So I have accepted that as an opinion - I don't know. So that opinion now I have formed and to break it down needs time.

K: But if you are aware that you are conditioned, that needs no time. Look, sir, I say to you now, please listen very carefully, give your attention for two seconds, I say to you now, you are conditioned. How do you receive those words? Do you see instantly that you're conditioned, or do you say, "What do you mean by that? What's wrong with being conditioned, conditioning has helped to hold people together?" A myth, Jesus myth or any other myth has held people together for centuries. It's an historical fact. So I say to you, "Are you aware now, as you listen, that you're conditioned." Wait, please take a minute - are you aware? That has not taken time, has it? You see it.

Then, go the next step: is that conditioning to be broken down bit by bit, layer after layer, fragmentarily, or is it to be broken down instantly - not instantly, without time?

Q: If one sees the reason for conditioning.

K: Look, don't, please don't use the word if, when, those conditional clauses, then you'll never do it. Please listen to what I'm saying. I say to you that you are conditioned. You see that fact - without argument, without going all round it, say yes, that is so, it's so obvious.

Now my next question is, do you break down that conditioning fragmentarily or do you break it down totally? Listen quietly. Our mind is used to breaking down bit by bit.

Q: You put us in front of this problem. Our response to that problem is not adequate.

K: I'm making your mind adequate to look at it - I'm helping you. Stick to one thing.

Q: Sir, to say you are conditioned is wrong, you are wrong as you're saying it, because as you're saying it and see the conditioning it's gone.

K: Don't complicate it, sir. I say to you, are you aware of your conditioning?

Q: But you are conditioning.

K: No, I've been through all that, I'm asking you now, are you aware of your conditioning now. That's all, sir - skip the words.

Q: Just what do you mean by, am I aware of my conditioning - could you tell me that? When I came into this tent and I looked at you and I had a sort of hardness in my eyes, and I said, I'm being conditioned by Krishnamurti. Now when I saw that, was that being aware of my conditioning?

K: Obviously. Now you are aware of your conditioning as being competitive. Will it take time to be free of that conditioning, of that particular conditioning.

Q: Sir, when you say free, do you mean never do it again?

K: I mean, free means never again. Listen to it: when you see a poisonous snake, you're always careful, aren't you, after that. You're free to face danger, and to know what to do. I am asking if you are aware of your conditioning as being competitive. When you are aware of it, does it take time to be completely free of it? Go on, sir, help me.

Q: (Italian)

K: Need I translate it? Yes? Somebody understands Italian and English - why don't they translate it. I'll do it. I want to go ahead - we are sticking at such small things. All right, sir - what did you say?

Q: (Italian)

K: What M. Ortalani is saying is - I'll put it very briefly, sir, correct me if I'm wrong - that if I am aware of one conditioning, a particular conditioning, does it mean that I comprehend the total conditioning? Through a particular conditioning, will that make we aware of the total? Right?

Sir, I am aware that I am competitive, and does that awareness free the mind from all competition hereafter, there is no competition in my nature at all? I'm taking that one thing, for the moment. And the next question is, through a particular perception, will it reveal the whole structure of conditioning? I'll come back to that. That is, I am aware that I am conditioned to be competitive, will that awareness free the mind from all competitiveness, or will it take time to be free of that particular conditioning?

Stick to that one question, please. I am aware that I am competitive and I say to myself, I know that I am competitive, I see the effects of it in the world, logically, it's most destructive, it leads ultimately to war, both economically, socially and so on, I see, intellectually, verbally, I see very clearly the structure and the nature of competition. And does that wipe away altogether competition from my nature? Wait. I'm asking you. Or do I need time to wipe it away? Stick to that. Were you aware that you are competitive because you were told? No. Because you are competitive you are aware. Then what is the next step? We're all competitive, it isn't only that gentleman - everybody is competitive in some way or another, wanting bigger, better, nobler - this whole momentum of competition, which is really measurement. What is the next step when you are aware of it? Does that awareness wipe away competition from you?

Q: Apparently not.

K: Why not? That means, you are not aware, as you are aware of a poisonous snake. When you see a poisonous snake your body, your mind, your emotions, altogether move away. So you only perhaps saw - I'm not criticizing you, sir - perhaps you, many of us only saw intellectually that you're competitive.

Q: But the snake is outside, that is not competitiveness inside.

K: Yes, both outside and inside. I am competitive, one is competitive - do you see it completely, or do you see it partially?

Q: Like the nicotine, if you can't see it poisoning you, you can't stop.

K: Like nicotine, it can't stop, it's poisoning you and you go on smoking.

Q: No, you must feel the poisoning, you must not only think it.

K: That's right, sir, not you must, do you - don't preach to me.

Q: Yes, I must, I do.

K: Do you, when you see competitiveness and realize that it is poisonous, drop it altogether? If you don't, why don't you, is it that you see intellectually, verbally, that competitiveness is ugly, and you haven't related it to your heart, heart in the sense of feeling, you don't feel it? You verbally state it but without any content behind those words. If there is a content behind those words, which is, that you feel very strongly that competitiveness is destructive, if you see it, it is finished.

Q: Sir, who are the selves that are competitive? It's measuring.

K: Yes, I understand that, sir.

Q: If...

K: Not 'if', madam.

Q: Either you do see it, understand it totally, or you don't.

K: Wait - the lady says, either you see it, feel it, understand it totally or you don't. So it's much better to say, "Look, I haven't seen it, I don't feel it totally, it is only a fragmentary part of me that sees it, the rest of it is in darkness, the rest of it is not aware of the danger." Now why? But you are aware of the danger of a snake.

You are aware of it because you have been conditioned to it, haven't you? Danger, a precipice, a bus, a poison is a frightful danger, and there is instinctive protection. Now you are not conditioned to the danger of competition. If you were conditioned to the danger of competition, you would not touch it. Wait, look at it. Consider it for a moment, don't raise a question, go into it. You are conditioned to the snake, you are not conditioned to the poison of competition. So if you were conditioned to the poison of competition you would react and say, "That's terrible." Listen to it carefully - but we are talking about conditioning, not competition to this or that - the fact of being conditioned. Do you see the difference, sir? Go slowly - I am conditioned to the snake, I'm not conditioned to the poison of competition. If I were conditioned to the poison of competition, I would avoid it, I would run away from it. Of course, it's an obvious fact.

So we act only according to our conditioning. Wait. But I'm questioning all conditioning. There with the snake I see how the mind has been conditioned, through centuries of experience it has been said, snakes are dangerous. And I say, "My god, I must be careful, I mustn't go near it" - tiger, crocodile, whatever it is. But I have not been conditioned to the poison of competition, so I go on. Wait. I go on.

So my mind depends for right action on conditioning. See the importance of that. My mind has been conditioned in a myth - Christian myth or Hindu myth or whatever it is - and that has held people together, all myths have held people together for some time. And that myth has conditioned me, and I act according to that myth - communist myth or any other myth.

So I realize my mind functions only happily when it's conditioned. No? Because then I'm sure what to do. There is no uncertainty in it. Snake is a snake, dangerous. Competition is poisonous. To follow anybody is poisonous. So your mind constantly functions only and happily in the field of conditioning. So I am questioning the whole field, not whether it's useful or not useful. If you haven't got it, I can't go on.

Q: Sir, the poisoning of the snake is there for everybody to see - you'd get plenty of support for that. But to see the poisoning of competition, you must see it for yourself.

K: Yes, sir, but I'm not...

Q: It seems I want to be competitive so I've allowed myself to be conditioned because that will help me to be competitive.

K: Right, sir, put it that way if you want to.

Q: I can't see my conditioning.

K: Don't you see your conditioning when you meet a snake - have you never met a snake, except in the Zoo? Then don't you react to it? So you're conditioned.

Q: You have told me I am conditioned.

K: No - I said you were conditioned with regard to the snake. You're conditioned, you're conditioned in a different way to competition - you accept it, that's your conditioning. So you function only according to your conditioning. Obviously, sir. If you're conditioned through reward and therefore behave, you're conditioned, aren't you? If you're conditioned through punishment to behave rightly, that's also conditioning. So I am saying, look what happens when you are conditioned, your mind is mechanical.

Q: Sir, is there any action at all that is not conditioned?

K: We're coming to that, sir. So your action is always based on your conditioning, pleasant or unpleasant, rewarding or unrewarding. That's a fact. And if one's life is based on conditioning, life becomes mechanical. I'm a Christian for the rest of my life, I'm a Communist or whatever it is. I don't want to think, I don't want to observe, I don't want to go beyond the little narrow field of my conditioning. And I say, in that lies sorrow.

So I say to myself - follow this - one conditioning I can understand, two I can understand, but I want to understand the whole complex conditioning. Is that possible with one glance, not take little by little, but at one glance see the poisonous nature of all conditioning? You've got it now?

Q: (French)

K: I didn't say it was difficult. You are saying it is difficult. The moment you say it is difficult you are blocking yourself.

Q: But you can't say that this conditioning is dangerous. You can see the conditioning, but you can't say the conditioning is dangerous.

K: I'll show it to you. Isn't nationalism one's conditioning? Isn't it dangerous. Isn't the conditioning about some god, a belief in something - isn't that dangerous? Because you believe in something and I believe in something else, and we are at each other's throat. So it is dangerous, isn't it?

Q: Can't I have my own space so that I don't interfere with you?

K: You have that space in tolerance, you tolerate me outside your little space. Isn't that dangerous?

Q: You've got to see that all your pleasures are dangerous.

K: It is so.

Q: Why is it so?

K: Because if you don't get your pleasures you're annoyed, aren't you, you get angry, you get frustrated, you begin to hate - depending on the denial and the strength of your pleasure.

Q: How can one be aware of one's brutality?

K: Don't ask that question yet, but first see how your mind operates. It functions what it considers happily in conditioning. The snake, and you're conditioning to be competitive, and you say, "Let's be competitive". You are conditioned to be nationalistic and you say, "Let's be nationalistic," wave the flag and fight each other - these are facts which are dangerous. Do you see the danger of it, not verbally but actually as you see the danger of the snake? And you may not see it as the danger of the snake because you're lazy, you don't want to see it, you've all kinds of objections and reasons for not seeing it. Now to get rid of all those objections, formulations and reasons, takes time. You're meeting all this?

So you would rather live and continue in the state in which you are, conditioned, creating mischief, not facing danger, and ready to be killed.

Q: (Italian)

K: He says, why don't you talk about the conditioning here - I'm doing that. You are conditioned, aren't you - as a Frenchman or as a whatever it is - you're conditioned. And the mind takes shelter behind its conditioning because that is safe. It is safe for me to call myself a Hindu; I feel protected, and in that conditioning I accept and I live within that. But I don't see the danger of it.

Q: You are conditioned in this tent to listen to the speaker.

K: Are you conditioned by the words of the speaker?

Q: We are free to come or go.

K: We are free to come and go, the lady says - I'm not talking of that - of course you're free, nobody asks you to pay or whatever it is. Are you being conditioned by the words that the speaker uses? Are you being conditioned by the - not ideas, the idea - I'm not conveying ideas, I'm only conveying facts, and you turn it into ideas. Facts cannot condition you. What conditions you is the opinion about the fact.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, madam.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, the fact is that the mind functions in habits. That's a fact. No? But you don't see what that fact does, mechanical business, all the rest of it. Then if you see it, then you ask, how am I to get rid of it. So you're bringing an opinion or a desire to get rid of it, whereas if you merely look at that fact without any motive, then that fact undergoes a radical change. You don't listen - all right.

Q: I'm aware of the fact that to approve or disapprove of behaviour is conditioning. If I don't do one or the other, the children may beat each other up. Would you please speak about raising children?

K: Could you talk about raising children - please. You know, that's one of the things we could talk about, which means really, are the parents educated - educated in the deep sense of that word, not passing some exams, getting a job and all that - I mean educated. And the parents are not educated therefore the children are not educated. So the problem arises, how to educate the parents. Right, sir? You're a teacher. And how do you educate the parents? They don't want to be educated, because they're completely satisfied with their jobs, with their little house, with their gossip, all the rest of it.

So what is important is, the few of us here in this tent, listen to all this, not to the words, but to what is behind the word. And to see whether the mind can comprehend or be aware of the total conditioning. Not one should be free of it, one should go beyond it, or break it up, but to be aware of the totality of this conditioning - which means, mechanical habits, mechanical activities, slogans and all these things that follow.

Q: (Italian)

K: Of course, sir. That's quite right, sir.

Now - we'd better stop, and this is the last discussion. What have you, as a human being, after listening to the seven discussions and seven talks, what have you learnt? Please just find out - take two minutes and find out - what have you learnt during these fourteen talks and discussions - what have you learnt? Not verbal conclusions, not ideas which you have picked up, but what have you actually learnt from it, which is yours?

Q: To be watchful all the time.

K: Is that all what you have learnt? What have you learnt so that your life is different?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please don't tell me what you have learnt. I'm asking, during these fourteen talks and discussions, has your life changed? Is there a psychological revolution which will affect your outward activity? Or you have gathered a few ideas - and I am not a conveyor of ideas, I'm not providing you with intellectual words and statements

- we're only concerned with facts. And during these fourteen days and fourteen discussions and talks, has your life changed, deeply? If not, why have you spent your time here? Just for amusement, curiosity?

So you have to face now for yourself, find out if your life has radically, deeply changed, or you are still playing with ideas. And if you are playing with ideas you have wasted your time - your time, your money, your energy. And that is not the reason why we gather here every year. Why we gather, as far as the speaker is concerned, is to bring about a different generation who see things directly and act directly. Not see and act - the interval, between seeing and acting, and during that interval, all the mess arises.

So can you, when you go home, or when you walk this afternoon, find out for yourself how deeply your life is changed, or not changed. When the house is burning there is no time to discuss about the man who set it on fire - the colour of his face, whether long hair or short hair - you put it out. And your house is burning. So it's up to you?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 1ST SEPTEMBER 1973

I think we should be rather clear that we are not doing any kind of propaganda, that we are not trying to convince you of anything, nor are we forming any kind of sect. Because to me sects, propaganda and trying to convince somebody of certain ideas, seems so utterly foolish and meaningless. So if we understand that from the very beginning, then we can go into this whole problem of our relationship to the world, and the relationship of the world to us, and whether human beings, as we are, can ever radically change. Or must we go on endlessly, caught in the trap of this so-called miserable, confusing, conflicting life?

I think it is very clear that our relationship to the world, that is, the world about us - the world of nature, science, politics, economy, education and all the corruptions that are going on around us, the pollution, the over population, the corruption of various kinds of governments - when we observe all that, one inevitably asks what is one's relationship to it? In what way can we, as individual human beings, bring about any kind of change in the social structure, in the Establishment, in the religious field? Can any human being bring about a radical change in all that? That is one of our problems.

And the other problem is: what relationship has our thought and action with regard to what man has sought throughout the ages as something beyond and above the daily monotonous, lonely, boring life?

And the other much more deeper fundamental question is: what relationship has the human mind to that which man has called timeless, the nameless, the eternal and so on?

And also we are going to consider during these talks and discussions whether the human mind, our mind, can ever, through meditation, through deep contemplation, come upon that reality?

So these are the things we are going to consider. And to go into them deeply one must have a very serious mind. I mean by that word, a mind that is logical, sane, healthy and is capable of thinking logically. And a serious mind perceives that which is true and acts instantly. Perception and action are together, and that is what one can call a serious mind, a mind that is committed, wholly given over to the enquiry, investigation, into all these problems, objectively, sanely, without any neurotic pursuits, can think directly. That is what, if I may, I consider is a serious mind. Because throughout the world now there are all kinds of degenerate gurus, philosophies, brought over from the Orient, and people being so very gullible, so willing to be entertained - let's rather put it that way - that they accept all this without real enquiry, without deep investigation. We accept too easily because it is rather comforting. We live a rather miserable life, a kind of bourgeois life and anything that will give us a little excitement, entertainment, a new kind of idea, we eagerly accept.

So if we can during these talks put aside all that; that we are not accepting any kind of authority, except in matters of science, mathematics, and so on. In so-called spiritual matters - if I may use that word without being misunderstood - there is no authority whatsoever. There can't be. If there is, then it is not a reality, it is just a form of acceptance of a guru and following him blindly, or willingly, or all that silly stuff that is going on in the world.

So we are together this morning, and the following morning, going to commit ourselves, if you are willing, to this enquiry, which is: whether the mind, the human mind, your mind, one's mind can radically undergo a revolution so that our whole life, the way we live is completely transformed. That is going to be our deep fundamental enquiry. Right?

To enquire into any subject one must approach it with a mind that is willing to observe exactly 'what is'. You cannot possibly observe if you have any opinion, any conclusion, any thought that distorts the perception of 'what is'. Are we sharing this together? Or am I talking to myself? Because we are sharing this thing together. To share something really you must be equally interested in what you are sharing. You must have the same intensity, the same attention in sharing, otherwise you can't share. You need a certain affection, care, otherwise there is no possibility of sharing. And as you have taken the trouble to come here on a windy morning, if you are willing to share these things together, you and I, then it is worth while. If we are merely looking at it as though from outside, not very deeply interested, rather curious, seeing what this man has to say, then the sharing becomes impossible.

So to enquire, which we are doing together, means not only sharing of the problems involved, but also investigating, that is, to trace out, that is what that word means, to trace out logically, sanely, objectively all these problems which we are confronted with every day of our life. So to enquire demands a mind that has set aside its opinions, its judgements, its evaluations and is capable of observing exactly 'what is', both outwardly and inwardly. That is what is implied in enquiry and in sharing. Though the speaker is sitting on a platform a little higher than where you are sitting, he has no authority. The platform doesn't give him authority, or the name, or the reputation, all that tommy rot. So we are enquiring very seriously into these problems.

First of all one must, I think realize, or rather feel also, that we are the world, and the world is us. There is no separation, division between you and the world, because we are the product of the environment, the culture, the economic structure, government, religious sanctions, images, authority, and all that, which is generally called culture. We are the result of that culture. If you are born in this island, in England, you are the result of the culture in which you have lived - the religious culture, with all its images, superstitions, propaganda, authority, fear, punishment, and also the culture of a comfortable, affluent life. The more you are affluent the more worldly. These are all facts. And you are also the result of technological development. The more technology develops, the more our life becomes superficial and mechanical. We pursue greater pleasures and that is what we want. We have created this society, this structure, this culture, religious as well as literally artistic and scientific. And we are part of that culture. So there is no division between the world and oneself, whether you live in India, in Japan or Russia or America or here. I think that is one of the most fundamental things to realize, feel, not as an idea, but actually, as strongly as you feel your pleasures, or your sexual urges, to realize that we are the world and the world is us. You know when you feel that very strongly, not merely as an idea but in your heart, in your whole blood, then this division as 'me' and 'you' ceases. You understand this? Then when you realize this you become utterly responsible to whatever you are doing, whether in the area of science, politics, religion, what you will, then your actions are totally committed to the transformation of oneself, not as an individual, as a human being improving himself but an individual, a human being that has to transform himself completely so that there can be a different kind of human being in the world, and so a different kind of structure - right?

I think that is fairly clear, that the human mind has divided the world, politically, economically, religiously, socially. It has divided the world in its desire to be secure for itself. It is much more pleasant, more secure both economically and psychologically to say, "I am an Englishman held in this country", or an American, or an Indian or whatever you will. Please don't listen to this merely as a series of ideas, but observe this about you and in yourself. And this division both outwardly and inwardly has brought about great calamity, great wars, great conflicts, racial, linguistic differences, the limitations of complete total political action.

So where there is division - nationalistic, or economic or religious - where there is division outwardly or inwardly there must be conflict. I think that is so absolutely true. The division in me and in you as a Christian, a Hindu, or this or that, Communist, Socialist, you know what is going on in the world, black and white and purple and blue - all that - this division is creating immense conflict, outwardly. And inwardly the division between the observer and the observed. So before we go into that, it is an absolute truth - the realization of it is that any division both outwardly and inwardly must inevitably bring about conflict. And a mind that wants to live completely without conflict, because it is only a mind that is capable of living totally without any kind of conflict, it is only such a mind that can observe what is truth, what is reality. And it is only such a mind that can have total peace. Are you all going to sleep?

So outwardly, that is outside of our skin, outside of our mind, the world is destroying itself - the world, which we have created, for which we are responsible, a world in which man is seeking more and more pleasure under the guise of religious pursuits or mere physical desire, over-population - you know all that. And inwardly if you observe, and if you are capable of observing yourself without distortion, without desire, without the desire to change 'what is', to observe exactly 'what is' within oneself, you will see how extraordinarily contradictory a life we lead, how broken up we are, fragmented, pursuing various contradictory desires; and so our life inwardly and outwardly is a series of conflicts, contradictions, vast division between an idea and action, and enormous sense of loneliness, sorrow, despair, agony, and our pleasures are the continuation of the desire to find joy - and joy has nothing whatsoever to do with pleasure. So we are that.

Now can that structure of the human mind, this contradiction, this division, the division between the observer and the observed, the division between me and you, or we and they, the bigger guru and the lesser guru, the better meditation and - you know all that business, can all that be totally transformed so that the mind is entirely new, fresh? You know this has been a problem for the scientist throughout the world, and also for those people who are really religious, not the phoney religions of belonging to something, of following a leader, of being conditioned for two thousand years or five thousands of years, to a certain series of beliefs, dogmas. The concern of religion is the total transformation of the human mind, and nothing else. Not what you belief in, whether you are a believer in Christ or Krishna, or some latest guru, but whether your mind, which has created this monstrous ugly world, immoral world, whether that mind can be wholly transformed, so that it can live in peace, not only within oneself but also in all its relationships. That is the function of religion - not the religion of authority, of image worship, of rituals, of dogmas, that is not religion at all. Because you have lived with that religion and where are you? You have had wars and you are preparing for wars. In yourself there is no peace, no quietness, no sense of wholeness.

So our concern then is, if you are at all serious, if you have observed the world and observed yourself, our concern then is, can the mind, which is so fragmented, which is so broken up, can that mind become whole, sane, non-contradictory and therefore a mind which is whole is a sane mind, a mind which is whole - the word implies holy h-o-l-y. So our concern is that. Can the mind, which is so fragmented, which is so broken up, dividing itself as the observer and the observed, dividing itself as pursuing one pleasure and denying that pleasure through fear, contradiction, can that mind be made whole? Right?

You know there have been so many methods, systems, philosophies to bring this about. The word 'philosophy' to me means the love of truth in daily life; not the philosophy of ideas, concepts, but the love of truth in daily life. And is this possible? I do not know if you have ever put that question to yourself?

Realizing for oneself how contradictory, neurotic, how fragmented our minds are, I do not know if you have ever put that question to yourself, and asked, can this mind be made whole, without splintering, without breaking up? If you have then what is one to do? We are going to share in this question, and see what we can do. I think the first thing to realize is the division between the observer and the observed. Is there a division between the observer and the observed? Because the observer is always controlling, shaping, trying to change 'what is', he sees what he is and the observer says, "I must change that". He sees the social structure outside him, the Establishment, political, religious and all the rest of it, and the observer says, "I must change this system", "I must bring about a different system" - right? Is the observer different from the thing he observes? Please this requires a great deal of enquiry, a great deal of attention to find out why this division exists and if that division is false, if it is false, then to see, actually feel, come upon this reality that the observer is the observed. When you realize the observer is the observed then the wastage of energy comes to an end, the energy that we dissipate when there is division between the observer and the observed. I wonder - are we meeting together in this? I am going to go into it much more.

Because this is one of the most important things to understand, not because the speaker says so but when you observe yourself, your relationship to the world, the world that is outside you, the culture, is that culture different from you? And the religions, economic structure, is that structure different from the thing that you are? So we are going to go into that.

When you observe a mountain, a tree, the flowing of waters, surely the observer is not the observed - right? Are you following this? When one observes a tree or a mountain, and you say, "Yes, the observer is the observed" - that becomes too absurd, you are not the tree or the mountain, I hope not! So there is a division, which is natural, which is inevitable, it is obvious. May we go on? Are you following this? But the division as the observer and the observed which is essentially psychological, inward, then that division brings about great conflict between the observer and the observed. You understand? All right? Have we understood each other? Look, sirs, I watch you, I observe you, obviously you are different from me, taller, shorter, or bigger, better brains, or whatever it is, better position, more money, I observe. There the observer is different from the observed who is outwardly different. I am not you. I have got short hair, long hair, purple eyes or whatever it is, I am different from you; but psychologically, is the observer different from the thing he observes in you. or in himself? Psychologically, that is inwardly, go to India, the problems there are the same kind of problems as here - anger, jealousy, fear, pursuit of pleasure, wanting to find out more. The human problems all over the world are essentially the same. So my problem is your problem. My problem is not different from your problem, and to observe that problem without the observer becomes the most important thing.

You understand sirs, when I observe a mountain, I am not the mountain, the observer is not the observed. But when I observe myself, the observer is the observed: the observer is not different from the observed because the observer has created the observed. That is, the observer perceives, observes, is aware that he is jealous

- I am taking that one thing to look at it completely. He is aware that he is jealous, so there is a division between the observer and the observed - you are following this? When he says, "I am jealous" the observer thinks he is different from the thing he observes - right? But is the observer different from the thing he has observed? If that division can be totally eliminated then there is no conflict - you follow? But there will be conflict as long as there is the division between the observer and the observed. So we must investigate what the observer is - you are following all this? Come on sirs.

Who is the observer? Or who is the thinker, the experiencer from the experience, from the thought, from that which he has observed - now who is the observer? Is not the observer the past? The observer who has accumulated experience, knowledge and has great memory, which is the past - right? - the past as the observer is memory, experience, knowledge. So all knowledge is the past and with that he observes - you understand? Right sirs? I hope somebody is coming along with the speaker. So he observes, observes that which is. That which is, is the present. That which is, is what he has created - right? Look, I'll go into it. He says, the observer says, "I am jealous" and then he says I must conquer it, I must overcome it, or justify it, or get bitter, angry, furious. So there is a conflict between the observer and the observed, which is jealousy. Now is there a division at all? Or the observer is the observed? Now just a minute. The observer, the thinker, says, "I am jealous", the moment he uses that word 'jealousy' he has put it into a framework of words which are the result of past experience - right? Are you following this a little bit, please, give a little attention? When I say, "I am jealous", I recognize that feeling, I recognize it because I have had that experience, that sensation, that feeling before. So I have used the word 'jealousy' in the past, and I apply that word to the present - right? And the application of that word to the present feeling brings about a division between the observer and the observed. Are we sharing this together? Right?

So as long as there is a division between the observer and the observed there must be conflict. And that is a wastage of energy, the overcoming, the indulging in hatred, the justification of jealousy, all that is a wastage of energy because it is the outcome of conflict. Whereas when there is a realization that the observer is the observed then you have all that energy, which is not being wasted - you follow? Then what takes place? When the observer realizes he is jealous, not jealousy as something apart from him, then what takes place? You understand? I, the thinker, the observer, is jealousy. Then what has transformed, what has taken place? Is there jealousy at all? Or to put it differently: when there is no division, what takes place? There is only then 'what is' - isn't there? There is no trying to overcome it, trying to destroy it, trying to change it, there is only 'what is' - right? Can the mind - please follow this a little bit - can the mind remain with 'what is' without any movement of changing it or undermining it, or overcoming it, just be with it? You understand sirs? I am ambitious - I am not, but I am taking that - I am ambitious, I want to be something enormous, you know. That is a fact, if I am. Before I wanted to fulfil my ambition: I became brutal, ruthless, self pursuit of self-fulfilment, bitterness, frustration, all wastage of energy, and ambition is cultivated in this culture. And I am ambitious, with all its conflicts, frustrations, bitterness, anger, you know - you all know it very well. I realize I am ambition, there is no division between the observer and the observed - right? There is only ambition. Can the mind remain with that? That is, can the mind not escape it, try to transform it, try to deny it or suppress it, but to see exactly as it is. Then what takes place?

As long as there is a way out, as long as there is the desire to overcome it, or to rationalize it, or to suppress it, there is conflict, but when all that ceases because the observer is the observed, then is there ambition at all? Or a total summation of energy, and no longer called ambition? You understand what I am talking about? No longer this pursuit of its fulfilment. Are we sharing this together? Not as an idea, that would be hopeless, but as an actuality: take your own ambition, take your own whatever it is, look at it, see all the implications involved in it - always wanting to be powerful, you know what ambitions is. It is a self-centred activity, in the name of society, in the name of god, in the name of whatever it is, it is self-centred activity. And when it is frustrated there is anger, bitterness. And in seeing all that, which is a wastage of energy, the mind then says, then realizes the observer is the observed, there is no division, therefore there is no conflict. And then is there ambition, or is there an energy which has come out of this observation? You understand? It is no longer ambitious, it has tremendous energy, which you are wasting now in conflict. Right?

Then the problem arises how does the energy express itself? You are following all this? You understand? Being ambitious, competitive, seeking power, position, all that is self-centred activity - right? One may write a marvellous book and one may write it through desire to fulfil your particular talent, or it may be desire to have more money - you know all that business. And you have spent a great deal of energy on all that. And when that self-centred activity comes to an end you have an extraordinary sense of energy - right? How does that energy act? We know how ambition acts, we know how self-centred activity acts - jealousy, you know all that, now when there is not that self-centred activity, and therefore a great, total summation of energy, without the 'me', you understand all this, then what is its activity? Will you go and join Communism, Socialism, become Catholics - you are following all this - go to church, temple, mosque, follow some guru? Come on sirs. What will you do with that energy? This is one of our problems, please you understand? You realize how one wastes energy, in conflict, in battles, it took tremendous energy to kill people, wars, now you have no war - actual physical war - but you have economic war going on - right? You have religious war, we know how all that energy is being wasted. Now you say, "I have this energy", there is this tremendous sense of vital energy which is no longer wasted - what is its action? I wonder if you have asked this question, have you? I am asking it for you.

Now how does this energy come about? You understand my question? It comes about only when it has observed 'what is' and remains with 'what is', and it can only do that when there is no division between the observer and the observed. Are you coming with me? The mind has examined what is implied in jealousy, examined what is implied in ambition, and various problems, one can examine them all, look at them, observe them, feel them, investigate them, and through that investigation and observation comes a realization that there is no division between the observer and the observed. And that can only come about, and the summation of that is intelligence isn't it? Are you following this? The summation of that energy is intelligence, it is not your intelligence or my intelligence, or the racial intelligence, it is something entirely different. And that intelligence will operate, not doing something silly, neurotic, selfish. And that is the real transformation of the mind. You are following all this?

And that involves, all this involves a mind that is capable of observing - observing without any distortion, without any neurotic illusions. Can you observe without any colouring, observe your life exactly as it is? How silly, absurd, or how beautiful, whatever it is, exactly as it is, narrow, petty, ambitious, greedy, frightened, competitive, wanting position, you know all that, caught in a network of fears. Can you observe all that without the division as the observer and the observed? If you can, really, not as an idea, actually, if you have done it, if you do it, then you will see that out of this observation comes an extraordinary sense of great creative intelligence, and that operates in our relationship. Because all life is relationship - right? You can't live by yourself, although we try to. We enclose ourselves with our ideas of how important we are, or how little we are, and we enclose ourselves. It is this part of self-centred activity which destroys relationship.

So as our life is a movement in relationship, movement not just a static state of relationship, it is a movement, and as our relationship in our daily life is so terrible, so ugly, so contradictory, such a battle - probably you know this better than I do, what your relationships are, the fight between man and woman, the attachments, the dominance, you know what goes on, the sexual pleasures and you know all this don't you? And if there is no right relationship, which can only be brought about when the observer is the observed - you understand - when relationship isn't based on an image, the image which you have created about another, and what the other has created about you, and in that there is division and therefore there is conflict. So as life is all a movement in relationship, to understand that relationship is to understand the self-centred activity, which separates you and me and therefore conflict between you and me. And that conflict is essentially between the observer and the observed. The observer is the past and he tries to control the observed, he tries to change the thing that is 'what is'. But when there is only 'what is' then there is complete change of 'what is', and therefore complete summation of energy, which is intelligence.

Would you like to ask questions about what we have talked about this morning? Just a minute.

Q. How does one find the energy to...

K. Just a minute sir. Before you ask questions, take a breath, will you, because you have listened to the speaker for an hour and ten minutes. So just take a breath.

Now to ask questions is very important, isn't it? And to whom are you asking the question? To whom are you putting the question? To the speaker? Or are you putting the question as a means of enquiry? Which is different from putting the question to another from whom you expect an answer. You understand sir? Are you putting the question as a means of enquiry and therefore your enquiry may lead to something totally different from what you expect. Or are you putting the question to the speaker to find an answer? You see the difference? So find out before you put the question whether you are putting it to find an answer from the speaker, or you are investigating by asking. In investigating by asking we are both sharing the thing together - you understand? Otherwise you put a question and the speaker says, yes this is the answer, then that is too silly. So we are putting the question in order to enquire, and that enquiry may lead to something totally different from what you want, and you must be prepared in putting the question to see something which you totally detest, or don't want. So your mind then is free to enquire. Right? What do you want to say sir?

Q. (Inaudible, about thought in the past)

K. Are you asking sir, what is thinking - are you asking how to pursue one thought?

Q. To be aware of each thought and to...

K. How am I, the questioner says, to pursue each thought? To be aware of each thought? That is the question. Now why do you want to be aware of each thought? Do you know what is implied in that, to be aware of each thought?

Q. It is very difficult.

K. Very difficult - why? Why do I want to be aware of each thought?

Q. Self knowledge, isn't it?

K. Wait. Is that self knowledge? He says that is self knowledge, to be aware of each thought, that is self knowledge, knowing oneself. Now let us find out, may we?

I want to know about myself because that is very important, to know about myself. Because if I don't know about myself I know nothing - right? I then only repeat what has been said. I just automatically act. In knowing myself, why there is suffering, why there is contradiction, why I am jealous, why I pursue that pleasure and avoid the other pleasure, why my mind is caught in a network of fears - I want to know all that - right? Because without knowing myself I have no raison d'etre. I don't know what it means to live, I just react. So I see the importance of knowing myself. Now shall I know myself by pursuing each thought, being aware of each thought? And therefore I must find out what it means to be aware - right sir? And also I must understand what thought means - right? I must not only know, understand what is awareness but also what is this thing called thought?

So what does it mean to be aware? I am aware, there is an awareness of this tent, of this marquee, with all its posts, people sitting in it, the w'nd, the movement on the canvas, the shadows and so on, I am aware of that. I am also aware of the people sitting there, their colour, their posture, their indifference, their yawning, their scratching, their lack of attention - sitting here I see all that. I am aware of it, outwardly. And also awareness means to observe what is going on inwardly, the reactions to what has been observed outwardly - right? To observe, to be aware: to be aware implies to observe without any choice, doesn't it, otherwise there is no awareness, is there? Are you getting tired? I see people yawning therefore I must stop.

If I have a choice in my awareness then it is not total awareness is it? So why does the mind choose? You follow all this? This is part of awareness. Why does the mind choose? Is it part of its culture? It chooses between various materials, it chooses different cars, it chooses different kinds of hats and dresses and houses and this and that, but also it chooses its pleasures - I prefer to go to a guru and sit and listen to his tommy rot, or I go to church and listen to all the repetition, you know all that, or I go and sit in meditation which is a form of hypnosis, and I play with all this. Why do I choose? What does choice mean? Are you following all this? What does choice mean? Because we choose we think we are free - right? I can go from this country or to another country, from this work to another work. I can write what I like. You can't do that in Russia or wherever it is. So we think there is freedom when we can choose - right? But why do we choose? Do you choose when you see something very clearly? Is there any choice when there is complete perception of something? So the lack of total perception makes you choose. And makes you choose when you are confused. If you are not confused then there is no choice - right? I wonder if you get all this?

So awareness is attention in which there is no choice and no analysis. Analysis implies the observer and the observed - right? Analysis implies time. The observer who is analysing needs time to analyse the various contents of his mind, his consciousness, his activities. And that is one of the things we accept very easily, we must analyse, and that is the fashion. Awareness is total attention, a complete, whole thing in which there is no choice and no analysis, because analysis I see is a wastage of energy. And choice exists only when there is confusion. So I am beginning to have an inclination, a perception of what it means to be aware - right? Not a practice for heaven's sake, that becomes mechanical, stupid, but see what takes place.

Then there is this whole question of what is thought because the gentleman said I must examine each thought. Do you want to go into all this? Isn't it your lunch time? If you examine, investigate what the whole movement of thinking is, you have to go into the question of what is memory, what is knowledge, what is the thing that accumulates, from which you act? You understand? What is the brain, where memory is stored up? I haven't read books about it, but you can observe yourself, you can do all this for yourself without reading books and going into all that. There is an experience, an incident, and that incident, that experience leaves a memory, pleasant or unpleasant, that is stored up in the brain cells - right? You can see this, it is so obvious. The very obvious thing becomes very simple, then you can go along with it. So the brain stores memory, memory is the result of experience, incidents as knowledge. So thought is the response of memory. If you had no memory there would be no thinking? Please, come on. Right? Your memory is your conditioning. You are a Christian, an Englishman, an Indian, whatever it is. And from that conditioning you react. To understand this conditioning is also to understand the 'me', which is the self. The knowing of 'me', is the freeing of the 'me'.

So thought, which we won't go into now, perhaps we'll do it tomorrow, or another day, thought is the response of the past. So thought is never new, thought is never free, it can talk about freedom - see how deceptive thought has become. Because it can choose it thinks it is free. You see this? How illusory it is. But whereas, where there is clarity, where there is perception, total attention, there is no choice, and that is real freedom. So awareness of each thought means, awareness of the whole movement of life in action, in relationship. I think that is enough for today, don't you?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 2ND SEPTEMBER 1973

Shall we go on with what we were talking about yesterday, if we may? We were concerned yesterday with the question of thought and what takes place when there is only 'what is'. If you remember that is what we were talking about yesterday morning. Thought, as we said, is the response of memory; memory is experience, knowledge; and we said also that knowledge is always the past; and all action takes, as far as we see now, from the past, from this memory, whose response is thought. And all our actions are based on thought, conclusion, idea and 'what should be'. Thought itself is fragmentary, thought is never whole, thought is always from the outside, and as long as we are dealing with thought, concerned with thought and idea we cannot penetrate very deeply. That is one of our problems. We hear a statement, as you did yesterday, and you say, "I can't go into it very deeply, I can't get at it in depth" - why? Because I think what we hear is a series of words and from that you draw an idea, and a conclusion, and act according to that conclusion or idea. So one remains always on the superficial, one never penetrates very deeply, because thought in itself is not only fragmentary, but is always from the outside - right?

Please, I would repeat again that we are sharing this together, you are not merely just listening to a series of words, or ideas or conclusions, or descriptions and explanations, but we are sharing together the actuality, what is implied in all this, sharing. Therefore we must not only hear and have the meaning of the words, but also there must be a verbal communication, as well as non-verbal communication. Communication means thinking together, sharing together, building together, understanding together. That is what communication means - if you look it up in a dictionary, that is what it means. So we are sharing these things together, You are not merely listening, accepting or not accepting, but when you share something together it is yours. And what is yours comes when we are working, thinking, acting together. Please do bear this in mind all the time, that we are not indulging in ideas, in descriptions, in analysis, in conclusion, but rather investigating, enquiring into this whole problem of a way of living in which there is no conflict, in which action is of supreme intelligence. Now that is what we were talking about yesterday briefly. Now we will go into it.

We said thinking is the result of memory, stored up in the brain, and the brain can only act in the field of knowledge, always within the field of the known - right? And that is why in the known there is so much security for us. That is why we live in the past. All our traditions, all our knowledge, all our conclusions are the result of the past. So our action is based on the past. So what place has knowledge in the transformation of a human being? You are following all this? I see in the world as it is - corrupt, immoral, preparing for war, preparing to destroy human beings, socially, economically, physically, dividing the people religiously - and so there is in the world outside of me, there is always conflict, always battle, strife, pain; and inwardly there is this battle going on in myself and in my relationship with others. This is obvious. And I say to myself, what place has knowledge, which the mind has accumulated for centuries, in which it has evolved, grown, acted, created a structure of culture, what place has that knowledge in the transformation of my mind? You understand my question? What place has tradition, which is part of knowledge, in the transformation of the mind? And there must be transformation, there must be complete change, because otherwise one lives constantly in pain, in suffering, in misery, in confusion.

So what place has knowledge? Has it any place at all? And what is the function of knowledge? That is, the known, knowledge is the known, and thought always functions within the field of the known. It must, it has no other field. It can invent a field. It can suppose a new field, create a new field, but it is always acting from the known - right? Are you following all this?

So we are asking: what place has idea in the transformation of man? Because we have built our religion, our culture, our whole social economic system of thought, on idea, whether the Communist or Socialist, and so on, idea. The root meaning of that word 'idea' - which we looked up this morning - is to see. You understand? The meaning of that word 'idea' is to see. And from the seeing we have drawn a conclusion, an abstraction, the perfect idea, the perfect form, the perfect society, the perfect god, the perfect human being - you are following all this? From the word idea, which is to see, we have drawn a conclusion, an abstraction, and from that abstraction we act, not from the seeing. I don't know if you follow all this. So we say action can never be perfect, man can never be happy, man can never be peaceful, because we have drawn an abstraction from 'what is', and tried to approximate our action to that, and therefore there is never a complete action. All our philosophies are based on that, from the ancient Greeks to the modern, from all the ancient Hindus, the Buddhists, and so on, are based on this. Seeing and drawing an abstraction from what you see and from that conclusion act: not from seeing acting. You understand? See what we have done. There is 'what is', 'what is' both outwardly, and inwardly, actual. And the mind doesn't know what to do with 'what is', therefore it draws a conclusion, an abstraction, and from that abstraction it tries to act, therefore action is always incomplete and therefore contradictory, therefore bringing about misery, confusion. That is what we are doing all the time. That is what you are doing now. You are listening to words and to the explanation - and the explanation, the description, is not the described, and you are satisfied with the description, from that description is an abstraction, and you say then, "What am I to do with the abstraction, how am I to put it into action?" - you are following. Whereas the speaker is saying there is no abstraction, there is only 'what is', there is only the seeing, and when you see you act; not the division between seeing and acting. I wonder if you get all this? Are we together in this? You know if you once see this, really see this then our whole movement in action is entirely different. There is no postponement of action. When you are at the edge of a precipice, which is a fact, you don't draw a conclusion, you move. Therefore action is immediate. When you are in front of a snake, a poisonous snake, there is not an abstraction, an idea, a conclusion and then movement. There is instant action. But that instant action is part of our conditioning which has told you precipices are dangerous, snakes are dangerous, therefore avoid them. Either you act from a conclusion, or from seeing 'what is' and act instantly. I don't know if you follow all this? Are we sharing this together? Please move.

So thought is a response of memory, experience, knowledge. So what place has knowledge in the transformation of man? See it. This is your problem, you understand sir? You have accumulated tremendous knowledge, psychologically, scientifically, in every field of human behaviour, human existence. You have tremendous knowledge about meditation, Zen, Transcendental, all the latest idiocy, all the absurd things that are going on, you have accumulated a great deal. You know what war is, you have suffered tremendously with the last two wars, accumulated all that knowledge, and yet you are going on in the same pattern. You are following all this? You are sending your children to be killed, educated to destroy. The other day I turned on the television and young people were being interviewed and they asked, "Would you fight for your country?" - everyone of them said they would. Not like the people before the war, they said they wouldn't fight for King or country, or for anybody. Now they would. And you know what war is, what an appalling thing it is, and yet you are sending your children, educating them to destroy each other. That is a fact. And what place has that knowledge in your life? Will it transform your way of thinking because you have experienced two wars? Come on sirs. Will you change the whole system of your education, the division of nationalities, sovereign governments preparing for wars - it is a game you are all playing. You are not serious - right?

So let's go back. What place has knowledge in the transformation of your mind, of your behaviour, of your conduct? Knowledge may be a symbol, an image, a conclusion, a field of the known. And why does the mind always cling to the known, which is knowledge, you are following all this - why? You have had experiences of war, the suffering, the torture, the fear, the appalling noise, the destruction. And has that changed the human mind? Has it changed your mind? And why hasn't it? Why does the mind, your whole being cling to the known? Is it fear? Or is it the pleasure in the known? Or the feeling of security in the known? After all when you are brought up in a culture - and all cultures are the known, obviously, because they are based on thought, thought may imagine a perfect god, a perfect saviour, perfect human being, but it is still thought - and has it any place at all except in the field of action where the known must be applied, technology, medicine - please follow all this, it is your life, don't waste it, we have a few years to live, don't destroy it. Knowledge has its place, when you drive a car, when you speak a language, when you function in the field of technology, there, knowledge must exist - science, all that is based on knowledge.

So where does knowledge begin to destroy the human mind? We see the importance of knowledge, otherwise you and I couldn't understand each other, because we both speak English, or if we were both speaking French it would be all right, we both speak English and that implies knowledge. Knowledge has its place and when that knowledge is used for self-centred activity - the 'me' and the 'you', my country and your country, my government and all the rest of it - then that knowledge becomes a destructive knowledge - obviously. Right sirs, you are following all this, not verbally but with your heart, with the depth of your being.

So we see that idea, the meaning of that word idea is to see, and the mind sees very clearly, but immediately draws an abstraction from seeing. Why does it do it? I see that I am a Hindu, it is stupid to call oneself a Hindu or a Christian. Probably Christians kill more than anybody else. So don't call yourselves Christians any more, or Hindus any more. I see that I am Hindu, I call myself a Hindu, I see very clearly what it does. It separates me from another, separates - my tradition, my upbringing, my culture, separates me from you. I see that very clearly, actually see it. And then I draw a conclusion that it is terrible to be divided, it destroys people. An abstraction from the seeing. Then I ask myself now how am I to put that abstraction in action? You follow? Then I want a method to put that conclusion in action; then there are a dozen people who will give you the method, the Socialists, the Communists, the religious people, the latest gurus and all the rest of it. You are following all this?

So can the mind observe, see and not draw a conclusion? And why does the mind draw a conclusion, an abstraction from 'what is'? Is it an evasion of action? Because if you saw and acted, that action may lead you to all kinds of trouble. Therefore an abstraction is a safe thing to do because you can postpone action. Therefore you live a very, very superficial life. You can never penetrate in depth because you have always this conclusion. So in conclusions, in formulas, in symbols, in the known there is safety. And the mind says, the brain says, I must be completely safe otherwise I can't function. You are following all this? If it is not safe, secure, it cannot function effectively, therefore it seeks security in a belief, in a conclusion, in an abstraction, in a symbol and in neurotic behaviour. Because if I act neurotically there is safety in that! In a conclusion that I am a Hindu, in that there is safety. So the mind sees absolutely 'what is', it can't help it, it is all in front of it, the war, the stupid religious organizations, all that is very clear, and yet the mind accepts that, lives in that because it feels completely secure. And when it discards the old, it joins the new, the new gurus, the new racket, the new circus that is going on.

So can the mind see and act? That is the real problem. So will knowledge prevent the seeing, and therefore acting instantly? You are following this? Because life is action in relationship; and what place has knowledge in action, in relationship, because we can't live alone, it is not possible, you may think in the abstraction that you live alone, you cannot live alone. You live in relationship with another, and in that relationship between human beings there is constant battle, between man, woman, husband, wife - the whole field. And what place has knowledge in relationship? Because if knowledge cannot transform, bring about harmony in relationship, then why do we cling to knowledge? So in relationship, we are asking, what place has knowledge - knowledge being the symbol, the image, the conclusion? I know you, the image which I have built about you, which is knowledge, which is based on thought, a conclusion, and that image I have built about you and you have built about me. Don't you know this? Don't you do this all the time? Oh, let's be honest for goodness sake. And that knowledge, that image, that symbol, the word which is the known, the knowledge, isn't that a barrier between you and me? Come on sirs. So can there be a relationship in which the past never enters? Isn't that love? Oh come on sirs. Are you working as hard as the speaker to convey something which is so simple? Because we are so conditioned by ideas, by conclusions, by abstractions, by symbols, by images, which are all the known, built by thought. Can there be a relationship in which the image is not? Have you ever tried it?

Now listen: you know what your relationship with another is very clearly, you see it, the quarrels, the indignities, the flatteries, the sexual pleasures, the comfort, you know, the relationship between you and another. You see it, don't you? Why do you draw a conclusion from it? Is it because you are trained, educated to live in strife? Because you know nothing else and therefore you accept this misery, and therefore the fear of a relationship in which the known, the image doesn't exist. That is one of the causes of fear isn't it? That is, we said idea means - the root meaning of that word is to see - I see what my relationship is, I don't draw a conclusion, an abstraction, I see exactly what it is - the pleasure, the comfort, the escape from loneliness, the attraction, companionship, friendship, sense of security - and the seeing of it doesn't eliminate all that - why? You are following all this? Because the seeing produces the fear of living a life of relationship in which there is never the image. So I have to grapple with fear - you understand all this? I have fear of loneliness, fear of not having somebody to lean on, fear of standing alone, being self-sufficient, which doesn't mean being selfishly isolated. I have fear of things I have not known, I only know this, this relationship in which there is constant battles, quarrels, misery agony, jealousy - you know this better than I do, I don't have to keep on describing it.

Why do we put up with it? Is it because we are educated to it? Because there is comfort in it, security? And there isn't security in it, what security is there in battle, in conflict, in misery? And yet that is the field of the known. So we are asking: what place has knowledge in relationship, in the transformation of that relationship? Right? None at all, has it? Don't say 'No' - which means your relationship with another has undergone tremendous revolution, and that revolution is love. I don't know if you understand this? Not all this rot talked about love. So the mind, thought can only function within the field of the known. And thought, not knowing any other kind of relationship, except the relationship of conflict, misery, agony, suspense, suspicion, jealousy is afraid to move out of that field. And being afraid it must seek more pleasure to counterbalance, it must have much more pleasure. And the pursuit of pleasure, the principle of pleasure is the action which is brought about by a conclusion. You understand?

Q: Is memory...

K: Just a minute please. Let me finish and then you can ask questions afterwards.

So see what the mind has done, or thought has done. The seeing which is obvious, which is clear. I can see very clearly the results of war, what war does. I see very clearly, the mind sees very clearly what relationship actually is now, the mind sees very clearly where there is division there must be conflict, not only inwardly but outwardly. And not being able to deal with what it sees, it draws a conclusion and from that conclusion it acts. And we have built our whole moral, religious, social structure on this. Oh come on sirs! Now can the mind see clearly in relationship how destructive knowledge is in relationship? See it! And the seeing is the action. Not I see, draw a conclusion and from that conclusion say, "I don't know what to do". Whereas if you saw clearly, see clearly what your relationship is, not drawing a conclusion is action, therefore action is complete and immediate. So not being able to act so drastically and immediately the mind escapes from it, escapes through pleasure and because it cannot act completely, there is fear. You follow? See what thought has done. And then we say, "How am I, who are caught in a network of fears, how am I to get out of it?" - "I am afraid of my wife, my neighbour, my job, my future, what is going to happen" - you follow? Again thought is responsible for fear. I don't know if you follow all this.

You see very clearly thought is responsible for fear - do you? Do you see it absolutely clearly, in the sense you are caught in a network of fears, aren't you, old age, death, pain, loneliness, boredom, laziness, anxiety, everything, innumerable fears. Do you say then, "How am I to get rid of it?" Or do you see actually the fear - the fear which is brought about by thought, fear of what has been and what might happen again? So do you see the network of fear, as you see clearly a poisonous snake, or a precipice? If you see it clearly it is finished. I wonder if you see this. Then you walk out of this marquee without a single shadow of fear. But as long as you see your fear, then draw a conclusion and say, "How am I to get rid of it?", "Tell me the way to do it, I know I am frightened of this and that and the other" - then you are living in abstractions, and from that abstraction there is no end to fear.

But the mind is not only avoiding fear but pursuing pleasure - right? Have you noticed how the mind is always looking, pursuing, searching for pleasure? Why? What is pleasure? Is it the desire that says, "I must have fulfilment" - you are following all this? And then you say, "How am I to stop my desires"? - you follow? You have quantities of desires and when that desire is not fulfilled there is fear and the pursuit of pleasure - right? Look at it yourself, it is very clear. So can the mind be aware of that desire, not cut it off, be aware of it, see what its whole nature and structure of desire is, and in the very seeing the action, the acting? You see a beautiful thing, man, woman, car or whatever it is. The seeing, the sensation, the contact, the desire - right? Move along sir, let's move. And that desire needs fulfilment, whether sexually or in any direction. When that desire tries to fulfil itself in pleasure and when there is no fulfilment there is fear. Right? There is frustration, anger, jealousy, and all the rest of it begins. Now can the mind be aware, see totally the movement of the desire, see it and therefore the perception is the action?

So one begins to observe, see, be aware, of the movement of thought. See, aware, observe that knowledge is supremely necessary to function efficiently. And in relationship, and our life is from the beginning to the end a matter of relationship, and in that relationship when there is the image, the knowledge, then all our agonies begin. To see all this, not, "Oh, I have heard you say that, now how am I to carry it out?" - that is silly. But to see it, see this fact and the very seeing of it is the action. So do you see it? Or do you still live in abstractions - Platonic or other kinds of ideas and conclusions, the perfect Master, the perfect Guru, your Guru is better than my Guru - you follow? - all that business.

And is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love an action in the field of the known? So what place has knowledge, or what is the relationship of knowledge with love? Can knowledge transform the human mind? Obviously not. What transforms the human mind is the seeing and the action - not the seeing and the conclusion, the abstraction. Is this fairly clear?

K: Now we have talked an hour about this perhaps you want to ask questions. Yes sir?

Q: How can a prisoner in a jail, and I'm tempted to insult one of the guards, now if I insult a guard he will beat the hell out of me. So I have a greater conflict to behave in jail, and a lesser conflict to get out of jail. So by allowing thought to paralyse my action I avoid the greater conflict.

K: But surely sir you are not in jail now, are you? (Laughter). I am not being cynical but that is an abstraction you are dealing with, aren't you?

Q: Some people concretely are in jail now.

K: Surely. Look, are you aware that you are in jail? Living outside, not actually within four walls. Are you aware that you are in jail? Listen to it. Jail means you are conditioned - your culture has conditioned you, your gods, your saviours, your corrupt governments - no? The environment of which you are, that is the prison you are in. That is the prison which you have created, of which you are a part. Are you aware of it - aware totally, completely? Not the reformation of the prison - better toilet, more freedom, less freedom, you know, better, bigger yards to walk about in, bigger golf courses and all the rest of it, within the prison.

Q: What you say seems to sound so clear but I ask is it practical when people are being terrorized excessively?

K: What you are saying is not practical.

Q: No I do not say that.

K: Then what do you say sir?

Q: What I say is, is what you say practical?

K: That is the same thing. (Laughter) Is what you say practical. Wait sir. When people are being terrorized, when Russia is killing all the good writers, you know, all that - is what you are saying practical? Do you think what is happening is practical?

Q: No what I think is practical...

K: Just a minute sir, I am asking you. Is what you are all doing, is it very practical? With your sovereign governments, preparing for wars with your lovely armies, a great deal of fun these army people must be having inventing new gadgets to kill, and you know what is actually happening right throughout the world - is that very practical? People starving. Oh come on sirs. Obviously that is not practical is it? And you say what we are saying is impractical, or not practical. On the contrary, this is the most practical thing because you eliminate conflict in relationship - you understand sir? You eliminate all your structure of religious, psychological, non-phantasies, you are functioning efficiently, completely practically within the field of knowledge, and eliminating totally every form of image in relationship. That is the most practical thing isn't it? But you can't do it and you won't do it, and that is what makes it impractical. If you did it, it would be the most practical thing alive.

Q: Sir, I was wondering from those two gentlemen that were speaking, I was wondering if people that are concerned about the evils that are abroad, if it is just to avoid looking at the evils that are right here now.

K: The gentleman asks are you asking these questions from abroad, what is going on outside, abroad, avoiding what is going on in yourself? That is the game we all play sir. You are educated to this kind of activity.

So please let us be practical. Which is, to see what is impractical - your gods, your saviours, the images that you have built, they are totally impractical. What is practical is to see the false, see it and the seeing is the ending of that which is false, that is the most practical thing to do. And that is complete action. What is impractical is the fragmentary action, acting irresponsibly, you act fully in one direction and incompletely in another direction. Contradictory, that is most impractical, that is devastating.

Q: We can see the falseness but how to apply the other.

K: How to apply?

Q: I mean the first question was sir that when thought arises it is from the past, to be aware of that, and also are we aware of the action of the past?

K: Sir, just listen sir. I have explained that very carefully. Don't apply anything that you hear. You have heard a great deal from everybody, from philosophers, from the politicians, from the priests, all the rest of it. Don't apply: look, observe, see clearly what is going on under your nose.

Q: I am talking about the observation of thought.

K: Yes sir. Now when you observe thought, observe thought, how do you observe thought? Is there a thinker observing thought? Come on sirs. When there is an observer observing thought, the observer is thought, one thought looking at another thought, one fragment of thought looking at another fragment of thought, and saying "I must be aware of that thought" or "I must control that thought, I must suppress that thought, I must overcome that thought". But the observer, the thinker is the thought. That is a fact. That is, if you see that, not abstract, if you see that then you will see the place of thought, the necessity of clear thinking. And what relationship thinking has in relationship? You understand? What place has knowledge in relationship?

Q: Sir, as an organism that can't see, it can only attempt to see, surely it has got a double agent.

K: An organism that is incapable of seeing itself, it can only attempt, that brings about a duality.

Q: Listening to your talk, I have no question to ask, you can tell by my voice, the solution is here, right? It doesn't solve my problem. O.K. you can answer me that I can't observe. And I tell you I observe and I say to you, well all right I am not observing. It seems to me that the state of being whatever that may be, is in itself, it is the problem, and the problem is trying to separate from the problem. I mean it can only separate with the part of the organism that is the problem.

K: Sir, what is a problem? Just a minute sir. What is a problem?

Q: Surely it is not seen.

K: No, no. I am trying to understand, we are trying to understand what the word means first, problem. What does it mean? Something you have not dissolved, that is that you haven't understood, that you haven't resolved, that you haven't - it exists. I have a problem, we have a problem, why does the problem exist? I am jealous of you. I make that into a problem, don't I. Because you are clever, you are nicer, in every way you are more etc., and I am jealous, I like to be like you and I am not like you, and I have that problem. That problem implies comparison, imitation, conformity to what I think you are, and wanting to conform to that. I make a problem of it - why?

Q: Sir you are right, but as a phenomenon, as...

K: Yes sir, go on.

Q: As a phenomenon, as something living, as I am walking about here, talking to people - reducing this - I can't tell it to you any other way - I see what you are saying but again I am talking through my head. I am introducing this idea as a phenomenon.

K: Yes sir, that is just what we are saying. Don't do that.

Q: Precisely but...

K: I know, I know sir.

Q: But not doing it is doing it.

K: I understand that. That is why...

Q: It's a monkey. You are telling the monkey, you are giving him two messages. This is a schizophrenic situation.

K: I understand this, I understand this very well. Then what do we do? You won't listen. Of course sir.

Q: I want to listen but I can't listen.

K: That's it. I want to listen but I can't listen. And you make that into a problem. Don't listen, go out, forget it. (Laughter)

Q: Again that is a thought, because I wouldn't be here.

K: That's it. If you want to listen, listen completely with your heart, with your mind, with your nerves, everything that you have got, with that listen. If you don't want to listen, go out, forget it, but you can't forget it because the seed is sown. And that is what happens with all of us, with most people. The seed is sown and they can't remove that seed. That seed is an idea, is a conclusion, which has no reality. Wait, wait! Therefore live in a world of non-reality, if you want to live that way. Forget the rest. And if you want to break it, break it, get away from it by seeing actually what is.

Q: One is still concerned with want.

K: I am using the word sir, want, don't stick to words, get the meaning of the words. Look. I want to listen to you. I say if you want to listen, listen, with your heart, with your mind, not only to the words but to the non-verbal statement. That is real communication. Then you listen completely, not partially. If you listen so completely there is nothing more. That is the greatest miracle. But if you say, "Well I am really not interested in this but I like what you are saying, it is a very good idea, it is so good", this, that and the other - then play with it, go out and do something else. But that has no reality, you haven't solved a thing. And when we are talking about human transformation you have to give your blood to this - you understand? - blood in the sense of your whole life to it.

Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I see. Lust is not related to thought, and lust must fulfil. Is that what you are saying sir? One example is good enough. Lust must fulfil irrespective of thought - right? Is that it? I never heard this strange statement before. Let's examine it. Lust, sex, it must express itself - why? Is lust like hunger? Hunger, when there is hunger there must be food, otherwise if food is not given the organism gets weak, can't function and so on. Is lust independent of thought?

Q: We only know it as thought.

K: I am asking you sir. Is lust independent of thought?

Q: I think it is, I don't know.

K: Don't you know? Look sir, what is lust, what is sex, why do we give such tremendous importance to this thing? Why? Have you noticed? More and more sex - magazines - you follow? You are supposed to have discovered it recently!! Is it because you have nothing else in life? Is it because everything else in your life is uncreative, destructive, meaningless? Your gods, your society, wars, nothing has any meaning except this? Intellectually you are secondhand, you repeat what dozens have said, therefore there is no movement there, you are merely repeating, therefore there is no vital, creative, directive energy in that. And you have this left. You go to the office, which is a boredom, go to work, live, everything is meaningless now. And to this you give a tremendous meaning, out of proportion. This has become all life. You see that and you don't do a thing about it. You don't say, "Well I'll find out why I imitate, why I think what others think, what my conditioning is" - you follow? - break up the structure of one's own life, living. And if you don't, your life becomes monotonous, meaningless, useless, and you have this one thing left. There at least you think you are free. And you blow this up out of all proportion. And that you call love.

Yes sir, now if you see that, see that your mind, your brain, your mind, is so secondhand because your mind is full of what others have said, your education, you know the whole business. And when you see that you begin to find out why you conform, why you imitate, what are the implications of imitation. And whether the mind can be really free of every kind imitation. And where there is the necessity of imitation, keeping to the left side of the road, and when you go abroad keep to the right side of the road. Where conformity, comparison - you don't look into yourself, therefore one leads a superficial, meaningless life. And it is a very short life.

Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible - About inside and outside impressions)

K: But sir...

Q: You get the feeling, I am something because I am not alive. You see those who go to the Maharishi and you say well I am not one of those - you understand?

K: I am going to repeat it sir. You go down the street, you are stimulated by the people you are seeing, short skirts, nakedness, and also you see further along, as you walk along, you see the people of Krishna consciousness, Maharishi Yogi or some other guru, and you say to yourself, "Thank god I'm not any of those people" (Laughter). You are neither associated with the Christians, with the Protestants, with the Catholics and so on and so on. And then you feel alone, and you are frightened of being alone, therefore you cling to something that your mind says you will find there security, whether it is a woman or an idea, or a man, or an image. Now to see all that sir, to observe all the stimuli from outside and how the mind depends on stimuli, and whether the mind can keep awake totally without any stimuli. You understand sir? That is the real thing. We need experience to keep us alive, therefore we look to experience, to outward stimuli, but to have no stimuli from outside, which means to be a light to oneself. A light to oneself.

Q: Surely you can isolate yourself.

K: No, no. I have been through all that sir. Isolation is not a light to yourself. Isolation means withdrawal, resistance, conforming not to that pattern but to another pattern. But to be a light to yourself means you are a light to the world - you understand sir? - not to yourself, you are a light.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What am I to do with the world and myself? Right? You are not separate from the world, and you are the world. That is so. Now what is your action, not only with regard to the world, and what is your action in relationship? What is the practical action? Go into it sir, that is your question, I am trying to investigate that question. You are the world, and the world is you. Are you asking the question, what am I to do with the world, which is so confused, brutal, violent, sick, mad, and what am I to do with the world? But you are the world, you are mad. Yes sir! You are insane, you are immoral. Wait sir, wait. So you say, "How am I to help the world?" - you can't unless you become totally sane you can't do a thing, and the practicality is be sane, not become sane.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE

4TH SEPTEMBER 1973

K: What shall we talk over this morning together? It is really not a discussion but a dialogue, conversation between two or more people: a conversation between people who are really serious, who are dedicated to the discovery of what freedom means, what authority means - you know the whole problem of existence, what is involved in it. I wish we could talk over these things together simply and very clearly. So what would you like to talk about?

Q: The nature of thought.

Q: I have a question for you. You talk about approaching this with a serious mind, and I'd like to ask whether in attempting to discuss with you, in attempting to ask a question, or just a dialogue, there is on my part at least a kind of self flattery. Now with this self flattery there, just in participation, how can there be seriousness?

Q: Sir, at the basis of all this there seems to be a word, at least a reality to which the word points, and it seems that between those two points it needs a certain quality of seriousness to do it, to want to do it. Now if one hasn't got that quality of seriousness, if one hasn't got that passion that you talk about, as I think most of us haven't because we haven't gone beyond the word, you know, is it an impossibility from viewing this question from where we stand, so that we will want to look and really to enquire deeply into these things.

K: Need I repeat that question? Right. Shall we talk first about the nature of thinking, which was first asked? Why is the mind caught in a verbal dilemma, verbal cage, and how can the mind be serious if it is merely functioning at the verbal level? Shall we discuss that? Would it interest you? Has it any value?

Q: Yes.

K: Don't say 'Yes' casually but let us...

He wanted to know what is the nature and the structure of thought, and whether thought can disentangle itself from the verbal network it has created for itself and functions so superficially, and cannot go very deeply. Would that cover that?

Sirs, first of all to discuss such a subject one has to go into the question: why does the mind shape or form words, symbols, images? Is it the very nature of thinking - we are asking, please I am not laying down anything - is it the nature of thought to fragment, to bring about a fragmentation between the observer and the observed, between the word and the non-word, between the action and the formula - you follow? - is it the nature of thought? Thought in itself must function in a formula, in a framework of words, images, knowledge. I do not know if you have ever realized that we always have a formula, a conclusion, a verbal conceit? You have seen probably on television, and other places, a whole group of children being trained, trained to conform to the pattern of that particular State, or that particular ideology, whether that ideology be Catholic, Communist, Hindu and so on and so on. And we are all trained in that, aren't we?

Q: I was thinking that if a concept...

K: That's right, that is what we said the other day. It is so, isn't it? I see children, students, and I say they must do this, this, this.

Q: The lady said there was a difference between a concept derived from that tree, and a concept derived from an ideal that I have about something, because the ideal never has been, the tree is actually a fact.

K: Yes, is that what she said. As we said, look at that plant. Why do you form a verbal conclusion about that plant? Why can't you look at it non-verbally? Go slowly, we'll go into it very deeply a little later. Why can't I look at that plant without a formula, without giving it a name, a category, a formula, why can't I observe without all the movement of thoughts, words and emotions, all that popping in? Why can't I just observe?

Q: There is one thing, if you want to communicate with somebody else you have to have words.

K: Or is it that we have so cultivated our memory, cultivated verbally this whole verbal structure, created by thought, that we look at everything through the screen of thought?

Q: Sir you are talking about habit.

Q: Can you observe without being conscious that you really are observing?

K: Can you observe without being conscious that you are observing. Let's begin again slowly. We are going off.

The question is, we began: what is the nature and the structure of thought? Can the mind be free of this verbal structure, that was what you were saying, and not be caught in a series of words, formulas, repetitive memories - right?

Q: That is not quite what I asked.

K: All right, put it your own way, sir.

Q: It was a step before that sir. In order to ask that question it demands a certain amount of seriousness in one already to want to enquire. That is part of enquiry what you ask. I want desperately to find out that quality of passion.

K: I see, I understand, I beg your pardon. How do we get - that is a different question, isn't it? - how do we have this passion for enquiry? How do we have this passion to find out? Let's begin with that, shall we?

What brings about passion in one? I am not passionate, not in the lustful sense, I haven't got the feeling, the energy, the passion, the vitality, the intensity to go into something very serious, I haven't got it, and I see that quality of passion, energy, vitality is necessary. Like a scientist, if he hasn't got this passion he is not a scientist. Now how does it come about? Shall we enquire into that?

Q: Yes.

K: At last! (Laughter) Now let's differentiate between passion and lust. That is clear, isn't it? We know that, so we can put that aside, shall we? All right.

Q: One inspires the other.

K: Look at it. You say that lust can inspire passion. Can it? Sensual desire, not only sexually, sensual desire to possess a good house, a good something or other - possessiveness, you understand? - lust, lusting after what - not only man, woman, lusting after property, power, position, prestige; that is entirely different surely from having intense passion. No?

Q: It is, yes.

K: Look, the word passion comes from the word sorrow. The root meaning of passion is sorrow. And we all suffer, we all go through various categories of suffering, stages of suffering, but apparently that doesn't produce passion - right?

Q: Even if I look at a scientist I am not at all sure that he doesn't have, in a more higher way perhaps, lust.

K: Yes he may have lust, for wanting to be famous. I am talking sir, of a man who is passionate, not lustful. That is clear. Now we say, how does it come about?

Q: But are we all assuming that we all know what passion is?

K: We are not. Suppose I don't know what passion is. I see passionate people, people who are dedicated, they may be dedicated to some kind of illusion, some kind of stupidity, some kind of state and so on, but we are questioning a passion that is not attached to action.

Q: Not possessed.

K: Not possessed.

Q: Have we even established that passion is related to sorrow?

K: I said sir, the root meaning of the word passion means sorrow, from a dictionary, that is all. I did not say - I am just looking at the dictionary, and when I looked at it passion means, the root meaning is that it derives from sorrow. You see sir, it is so difficult to converse, or have a conversation with you if you have an opinion. If you have a formula that passion is this, passion isn't that, passion is not... you follow, you don't come to it afresh. We are enquiring, you understand sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look here, sirs. He suggested there is a great deal of wastage of energy in all of us. We waste a great deal of energy. And one of the great outlets of wastage of energy is having concepts - right? You see sir what is happening in the world? The Catholics, in the olden days, not so very long ago, they burnt people, they tortured people, Inquisition and all the rest of it, anybody who thought contrary - right? The Communists in Russia are doing it, anybody who thinks contrary is sent to a mental hospital. And this being trained, educated in a formula, my country is the greatest, the Soviet is the most marvellous, Mao is the greatest god on earth - and so on and so on, these formulas condition the mind - right? Please, that is obvious. Now is that not a fundamental reason for wastage of energy.

Q: Very often a pattern helps.

K: Therefore you say a pattern helps. Helps what?

Q: The pattern that is necessary at this particular period of time.

K: Conditioning the mind to a pattern is necessary at this particular time. So did the Russians say that, the Catholics said that, everybody has said that at the time it is necessary; and therefore you are saying that at this time it is necessary.

Q: I am asking if it is, I am not saying it is.

K: Sir instead of asking, let's first find out. Where pattern, conformity, formula, being trained to operate in a certain manner, is that a wastage of time? Or in certain directions it is necessary and in that field there must be certain conformity and so on, that is not wastage of energy. But whereas when the mind is in relationship with human beings, whether it is a child or a grown up man, when it functions with a formula it is wasteful of energy. That is all we are saying - right?

Q: Do you not see, do not all of us see, tremendous danger of 1984 becoming very close and all this idea of computerization, making each one of us in this tent puppets in the eyes of the authority, all authority, whatever it is, that will undoubtedly arise.

K: Sir, C.I.D. - you know what C.I.D. is, Criminal Investigation Department. They have followed me, FBI and so on and so on. We all may be conditioned in a certain direction, perhaps that is going to happen. We are now trying to discuss - please let's keep to this - what is passion, will it come about when there is no wastage of energy, and what is wastage of energy? Keep to that simple thing.

K: Look sirs, I see conforming to a certain pattern is not a wastage of energy, keeping to the left side of the road is not a wastage of energy, on the contrary if I kept to the right side of the road when the country says keep to the left, there is going to be an accident and that is a wastage of energy, and so on and so on. And it is a wastage of energy when I function with formulas in my action in relationship. Right? I see a group of children, students, I saw it last night, and you saw it here in the tent, and I saw it on the television, where in Russia, everybody is being - you know - put through the mill, to conform. To me that is a wastage of energy.

Q: I don't know anything else sir.

K: I know that is what we are saying. Of course we don't know anything else. We are so conditioned to accept formulas, to live with formulas, to function within concepts, conclusion, that is all we know, and we are monkeys. How do we break through that? As the gentleman pointed out, by 1985 we all may be so suspect by then - you know - the big brother will be with us.

Q: Sir, could we look at it like this? Between seeing and acting, I think the time creates an ego, which draws the conclusions.

K: That is right sir. Where there is a division between action and idea it must be a wastage of energy - right sir? The idea as we know is a concept, concept or a conclusion derived from perception. Seeing, drawing a conclusion from seeing, and acting according to that conclusion. That is essentially a wastage of energy. And when there is no wastage of energy then there is passion.

Q: This ego is created at that very moment. We feel it is permanent but if we watch it we learn it is created.

K: Look sir, let's go through it. Let's go into it. Do I, or do you, function from a conclusion? Children must work in the garden, students must do this, or you know, formulas, you understand all this, dozens and dozens of formulas we have. Have you? Come on sir, have you?

Q: We have any amount of them.

K: You have any amount of them, the lady says. And do you see that having these formulas is a wastage of energy?

Q: The conditioned formulas.

K: Wait sir, wait. I am just, step by step we will go into it. I have a formula, I function with formulas, from formulas, I look at you and I say you are an Englishman, or a German, or a Jew, or an Arab, or a Hindu, or some blasted race? (Laughter) Wait a minute, please. And from that I look at you - you follow? - I look at young people and say they must work, they must build, they must put their hands in the earth. I agree they should put their hands to the earth, it is marvellous to work with the earth, but I want to force them, I want to compel them - you follow? Now I am saying to you, asking you, having these formulas, opinions, judgements, is that not a wastage of energy? If it is a wastage of energy, why don't you break through it? Why do you keep on formulating?

Q: I don't see how that is a wastage of energy.

K: I'll show it to you. I see a snake, a cobra, a real poisonous snake, the seeing there is immediate action, isn't it? Right? That is not a wastage of energy, is it? Right sir? Now I see I am greedy, and I then begin to say, "I must be greedy, I must not be greedy," - I rationalize it - you follow. I don't say, 'greed', see the whole complex network of the action from greed, and seeing is acting, ending it instantly.

Q: Sir I'd like to say that you are skipping. You are saying that seeing is action. You are already at the end.

K: Wait. I know it, sir. Please just listen. I see a snake, a dangerous snake and there is instant action. That instant action has taken place because generations have said "Beware of snakes" - my mind, the mind is conditioned to snakes, and acts instantly. Follow this up. The mind is conditioned for generations to say, "Well be greedy, but get over it gradually". Have the ideal of non-greed or non-violence but do it gradually. The gradually of freeing oneself from violence is a wastage of energy. And we keep this going - you follow sir? Now some of us have these formulas. You listen to what is being said and you will go on with those formulas, and at the end of it you say, "I have no passion". Right?

So, can you observe, be aware that one has these formulas, concepts, opinions, judgements, which denies freedom, you follow, and it is only when there is freedom there is energy, there is this passion, obviously. Now are you aware of your conclusions?

Q: Sir, a minute ago you said that telling the children to go and work with their hands in the garden was a conclusion. But when you tell the children to go and clean the house and take care of the garden - it is probably a conclusion but a conclusion derived from absolute reality.

K: Now wait sir, I'll answer that question. You will see it. We have to face that question here.

Q: I know sir.

K: I have worked in the garden, put my hands in the earth, planted trees, dug, all kinds of things and for me it is a great joy to work with the earth. How am I to show the student the necessity of doing it without compelling him? That is the problem. Right sir? I see the garden - it is necessary to work. Now how am I without bringing about the compulsive authoritarian drive, to make that student do it naturally? Right?

Q: Let him go hungry.

K: No, no. You see? You understand sir? How am I to do it?

Q: Can't you say "I'll show them"?

K: You show them and they say, "Go ahead and do it" (Laughter).

Q: Isn't there a responsibility in freedom?

K: Please madame don't emphasize that. Look at it. It is necessary, essential to work with the earth. How am I as a teacher, in a community, how am I to help them to do it without any form of authority, without any form of compulsion, any form of imitation? Right? How am I to do it?

Q: I don't know sir.

K: I'll show it to you. We'll go into it sir. Does this interest you?

Q: Yes.

K: Why? Going away from ourselves? All right.

First of all, as we have done here, I would discuss it with them, talk over it. I would, as we have done, talk about authority, the dangers of authority, whether it is the authority of the older, the authority of the priest - authority. Then because they are not used to freedom, but are used to reaction - you follow sir - therefore they say, "All right, no authority, we will do what we like" - etc.etc. So we say, "You can't do what you like, etc., etc... This is a community, we all have to live together, if each one did what he liked nothing would happen". So we discuss, go into it; they begin to see. Then we talk about conformity, imitation, how destructive it is, how the mind seeking security will conform, through fear, through reward, through punishment, it will conform; so push all that aside, open the door to all that. Right sir? Some of them see, some of them don't. So we keep on and on, so that the mind, they themselves begin to see the importance of action without compulsion. Right? They do, some of them do, some of them don't. Out of a large number of students, out of a hundred there might be ten. So can we awaken their intelligence, which will then direct them, direct them to work with the earth, you follow, awaken their intelligence? That is the real problem. Not that they must work in the garden, in the vegetable or whatever it is, get up at a certain time, go to bed at a certain time. If we can awaken their intelligence their problem is solved.

Q: Why do you want to awaken their intelligence? Why don't you leave them alone?

K: Wait Sir. Why don't we leave them alone. I wish we could. But society has ruined them, ruined the parents, the grandparents, the generations after generations after generations, each generation has been ruined by their previous generation. And now you have got a product called a baby, a child who if you leave him alone he does everything opposite, contradictory. Did you see that cartoon in one of the magazines in New York: two little children, brother and sister standing looking down from a window, and the brother says to the girl, his sister, who is watching the hippies go round, "There goes the Establishment" (Laughter).

So our problem is, not only with the students, but also with ourselves, we are brought up to obey, to conform, to imitate, to compete, ambitious and all the rest of it, and all these are words as a formula which condition our thinking, and can the mind be aware of these formulas and be free of them?

Q: Don't we have to have the passion first?

K: No, I haven't got the passion. I see - please - if I have the passion then there is no problem.

Q: Do you know that you are free when you are aware?

K: No sir, please don't go into freedom and awareness. I am just asking you one thing. You have formulas, haven't you? For god's sake, let's be honest about this. Of course you have them. I am a Hindu and I have got a dozen formulas - how to meditate, how to sit when I meditate, what I should think when I meditate, how to control my thoughts and so on and so on and so on. Or if I am a Communist, the State is all important, the individual is not and so on and so on. I have got dozens of formulas. And I see very clearly such formulas in relationship destroy relationship, waste energy. Obviously. Now can you see your formulas and put an instant end to them? If you can't then you are wasting energy, you will never have passion.

Q: Now sir let me bring you back a little to what we were discussing before. Let's translate what we were talking about this garden, the children in this garden, to a national community anywhere in the world today. And then I question aren't a few of these formulas absolutely necessary, just for survival. There you are with eight hundred million people...

K: I agree sir.

Q: Let me finish please. And then let's say, let's remove all political ideologies and so on and let's just talk about the fact of survival. We have to feed half a million people and therefore we have to instruct them in agriculture - divide the country into so many areas and therefore we have decided that some of this area should be devoted to wheat, corn and so on and so forth.

K: Of course sir.

Q: We have four seasons a year and therefore during the winter time our efforts should be concentrated and so on and so forth because the computers and the science have decided. So I tell the people, the people in the north - whatever the case may be. Now this is a formula and this is a conclusion, as much as it is a conclusion to tell the children here to go and garden.

K: Not at all. I agree sir. I agree with you when you say the computer, political ideas aside, the computer says plant this in the north, that in the east, that in the sunshine, that is perfectly right. That is a necessity for survival.

Q: And it is a necessity for survival here for children...

K: Wait sir, now wait a minute. Now what happens? You have a group of students and they must survive. How will you bring about their survival intelligently? Not just survive.

Q: Why not?

K: Sir this is a problem, we have to meet it day after day as it arises. Not say well they must do this and they must not do that. So let's come back, sorry.

I have a formula or a thousand, or a dozen formulas, why does my mind refuse to be free of them? I know logically, that it is a wastage, I know in relationship with other human beings it destroys affection, love and all the rest of it, and it creates wars and all that. Why doesn't my mind break from it?

Q: Fear.

Q: Security.

K: In an illusion I take security, and that illusion causes me fear, and I know it has no reality, and yet I go on.

Q: Because everybody else does.

K: Why?

Q: You have got to identify with something.

Q: By looking at the formula I no longer have to observe 'what is'.

K: Sirs, please you are not answering my question, sorry.

Q: We feel safe.

K: You feel safe in a formula - right? Now what is a formula? What is a formula?

Q: The course of action.

K: A course of action. Now wait a minute. A formula in which you take security is the course of action. And before you talk about action, what is a formula?

Q: Words.

K: You are saying words? Hold on a minute. Are they words?

Q: They are distinct movements in the brain.

K: Look. I see the children, the students, and I say they must work in the garden.

Q: Memory.

K: No, please. I am asking you please what is a formula? What is the nature of a formula? Wait. Do you know what that word form means? It comes from the word form. Form means to give shape to something.

Q: An idea.

K: Wait. Idea means to see. Don't get away, please sir, do give me two minutes. Formula means form. Form means to give shape, give a contour to something. We give a contour, a shape by words - right? - to a thought. Thought is the word - right? Thought is not different from the word. I am a Hindu, the word makes me the Hindu - no? With all the memories, all the images, all this business, all that. So the form means giving shape to, by word to a perception - right? I see the tree, that bush, and the mind forms, gives shapes to a thought, a word. And the mind is caught in that word - right? This is step by step. Are you following? So formula is a series of words which gives shape to a conclusion, to an abstraction - that's right - right sir? Seeing, abstraction, the abstraction is the movement of thought in words. Oh come on sirs.

Q: This formula creates in my inertia the necessity of doing something.

K: No, I think formula makes me more inert. Please the basic meaning of idea is seeing. The seeing is the action and my mind refuses to act instantly because it has got formulas, conclusions, opinions, and therefore there is conflict between action and the conclusion. I conclude I must not be violent. But I am violent. I conclude that I must not be violent. The conclusion of not being violent is the postponement of dealing with violence immediately.

Q: Sorry sir, can you repeat that?

K: I don't know what I said. I'll have to repeat it differently. I am violent. I am violent because Society has helped me to be violent, from the higher apes I have learnt violence, all that. My whole structure of thought, being, is violent, and it has produced appalling misery in the world, division and so on. So observing, watching, learning, history shows that I must not be violent. The religions say "Don't be violent". So there is the conclusion of not being violent but I am violent. Now, that conclusion is the postponement of coming directly into contact with the feeling of violence and ending it instantly. That is my whole point. So conclusions, formulas, ideologies are idiotic and wasteful.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Don't accept this. This is how I live, this for me is reality, not just a verbal statement. If I am violent I look at it, I go into it instantly.

Q: Why does violence end if you are in contact with it?

K: I am showing it to you madame. Why does violence end if you are in contact with it. I am going to go into it.

First of all, see this fact, that being violent, my mind has been trained to an ideology of not being violent - right? Right sirs? I accept that, which means a gradual postponement of what should be done now. Evasion, escape. Escape, evasion, running away from 'what is', is a wastage of energy and I realize that for myself, not for you. I see that. Now what takes place? I have no ideology of non-violence. So I am violent, the feeling. Now what takes place? I am violent. What does violence mean? Anger, jealousy, all that, imitation, conformity, copying, ambition, all that is a form of violence. Now I am investigating, looking, at that word, the significance of that word, the nature and the structure of that word. Why does the mind identify itself when that feeling arises with a word which is called violence? You are following this? You understand? Are we sharing this together?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No sir, no. I'll come to it sir. We will see it in a minute.

Q: I'm sorry...

K: No sir, please don't be sorry for anything. Please sir. Now I want to find out why the mind, when this feeling arises, uses that word. It uses that word because it has had that feeling before, and each time that feeling arises it is identified by a word which is called violence. Now why does the mind do this? Are you following this?

Q: Why does thought do it?

K: Watch it sir, we are going into it. Why does the mind use that word? Is it a habit? Or by identifying through the word it strengthens that feeling, and gives it more vitality for it to continue, and also it gives it a sense of pleasure.

Q: Would it depend on...

K: Wait sir, you watch it in yourself. I am going into it. And in the process of recognition of that feeling through a word, the mind has strengthened that feeling, it rationalizes, or does something, all kinds of things it does. Now can the mind look at the feeling without the word? You understand sir? By looking at it with the word I have recognized and strengthened it - right sir? Now can the mind look at that feeling without the recognition of it?

Q: The...

K: Wait sir, wait, go slowly, do it. Do it as we are talking and you will see it. I understand what you are going to say. Go slowly sir. That requires enormous attention, doesn't it, you understand sir?

Look, you call me a fool, and I become immediately violent because I have an image about myself that I am not a fool, I am a great man. And I become violent. In that moment the mind operates with such rapidity, it says "That's violence". The recognition takes place instantly. I am asking myself: you call me a fool, the feeling arises and is it possible to look at that feeling without recognition through a word at that feeling?

Q: Can you look...

K: Look! Look at it sir. This demands tremendous attention, tremendous discipline - discipline, not conformity, discipline in the sense that you are watching to learn what is going to happen. The learning of what is going to happen is discipline. That is, I have become violent because you have called me a fool and I reject totally the ideology of non-violence, totally, not partially. It has no meaning to me. So I say why does the mind, with such rapidity, recognize that feeling through a word? Why does it want to recognize it at all? Come on sirs.

Q: It wants...

K: Watch it in yourself sir. Please watch it in yourself and don't answer.

Q: Are not animals in the same boat?

K: I am not talking of animals, I am talking about you.

Q: Surely one is conditioned to do this.

K: Please observe it. I am conditioned that way. Now can my mind be free of that conditioning, which is the verbal recognition of that feeling and say, let's observe without the word?

Q: Then you take the life away from it.

K: Please, do it.

Q: Yes, but this takes the life out of it.

K: Look madame, aren't you violent? Not you. Aren't you violent, sexually, ambitious, greedy, possessive - you know, violent? You want your opinions carried out, you want a position, authority, all that is a form of violence. Now it arises in you and the usual conditioning is to run away from it by having an ideology about it. Say I must not be violent, the ideal of non-violence is marvellous, so many people have preached about it, and it is excellent and I will gradually become non-violent in the meantime you are fully violent! Now you reject completely the ideology of not being - 'what is', is violence. Now move from there. Can the mind observe that feeling without the word?

Q: Sir, if you are calling me a fool, and at that moment I choose to observe there is in me...

K: Sir, you are missing something. That word is you.

Q: That's right. That's why...

K: The word is you. The word is violence, the word is me. I am getting at it slowly. Go into it sir, do it with me.

Q: Is the point to observe what...

K: Look sir, you call me an idiot, I agree with you, because you are my boss! You call me an idiot, my reaction, all my cockles rise and say "I am not an idiot" - you know, anger. Now can I look at that feeling without resorting to the verbal expression of that feeling? Come on sirs.

Q: If one observes...

K: Wait, wait. I am going to find out. So I am asking is the word different from the feeling? Or is the word creating the feeling? Or if the word is not, is there the feeling?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes sir, I understand.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes sir, I understand. But sir, look, mustn't the feeling arise?

Q: That is...

K: Wait, I am asking sir, do look at it a little more. How quick we are, do take time. Mustn't the feeling arise? The feeling won't arise if you are not sensitive. The feeling won't arise if you are not sensitive. You put a pin into me, I am - you follow? - I am sensitive enough to feel the pain. It is only a paralysed leg that won't feel the pain.

Q: But we are paralysed.

K: Wait sir. I am going into it. You call me a fool. The feeling arises because I have an image and so on. The feeling - if I had no feeling at all what would happen? I am dead! You are looking at it the other way round sir.

Look sir, you flatter me, say, you are a marvellous man. And I am delighted. You are my friend and all the rest of it. And if I listen to that flattery having been dead, not hearing at all, then there is no problem - you understand? - if I am dead.

Q: You can hear but it does not...

K: Wait sir, I am going into that. My god! I am being sensitive, that word awakens a lot of things - right? If I am not sensitive, dull, blind, deaf, then it is no problem. Then that feeling arises, that feeling arises because I have an image about myself. And I say, why do I have that image, because society - all that has been created in me, that is part of my conditioning, I'll reject that image, and really reject it.

Q: Then the feeling won't arise.

K: Wait, wait. How do you know? Look sir, look sir, It was a lovely morning this morning - right - marvellous, the sky was clean, blue, fresh, young - right? There was a great delight in looking at it, through the leaves - you know all that. What is wrong with that? There is nothing wrong with that. Wait.

Q: But you ask what is wrong with that.

K: There is nothing wrong with that, is there?

Q: That is life, which is a quality of joy in oneself. Think of something outside...

K: No sir, you are complicating it so much. I am just taking it so simply. I delight, there was that beauty in the air, fresh and the glory of a morning. Now that is spoilt by my wife, friend, who says, "Oh, go and wash the dishes" - it irritates me. I want to remain looking out of that window and enjoy myself and then somebody comes along and says, "Get the heck out of here and go and wash dishes". And I go and wash dishes - the thing has gone - you follow? The feeling of irritation arises, now can I look at that irritation without the word - that is all, stick to that simple thing. I understand your problem sir. Let us look at it simply first and then complicate it. Don't complicate it first and then...

Now, here it is: can I look at that irritation without the word? And therefore without the person who irritated me - you follow?

Can I look at that feeling? I can. Wait. I can, you are saying?

Q: No, it's much too difficult.

Q: Surely you can do anything you want to.

K: Ah, no. Not I look at anything if I want to.

Q: You must look, if it is there it is there.

K: Look. Because I am irritated I begin to get annoyed with her, or with that person, I begin to get irritated, I become rude, I say things which are ugly, therefore conflict arises. And I want to live without a single conflict.

Q: Why?

K: Why - it is a wastage of energy. It is like a marvellous motor running beautifully: I have got a marvellous mechanism, the organism of the body, the organism of the mind, the brain is a marvellous instrument, most beautifully sensitive, alive and I want it to function without the least friction, because the more it functions without friction the more energy etc. etc. That is real passion. Wait a minute.

Q: To look at something you have to be still.

K: Are you still?

Q: No.

K: Then - don't say you have to be still. Madame we are pointing out, I am irritated - can I observe that irritation without the word, without the formula, without anger and so on - which means can the mind observe that irritation out of silence. Put it any way you like. Can you do it? Not speculate about doing it.

Q: Can conflict ever be creative?

K: Can conflict ever be creative - that is what the modern literature says it can. They are in conflict with their wives, with their society, with their ambition, they are frustrated in themselves, they are contradictory, there is great tension and out of that tension they write a book. And that book becomes very popular and they call him a creative writer. You know the game that one plays, this is all very simple.

Now I am asking sir, let's come back to this thing - to observe means to observe silently. Can the mind observe the violence it has brought about in itself silently, without the word? When there is the word, which is the formula, the ideology, then there is division, then there is conflict and rationalization, in that conflict you do all kinds of idiotic things, that is a wastage of energy, and that prevents this extraordinary sense of passion coming into being.

Q: What about terror, for instance a very long standing fear, say of a phobia, a fear of spiders, that you've had over years, and you know you are wasting energy. But there is absolute terror.

K: I understand that sir. The question is - I must repeat it - one has absolute terror, say for example of a spider. You see the spider and you get terrified. And you don't know what to do with it, and that goes on year after year, year after year. How is that terror to be put away - right? That is the question is it not sir. How do you think? What do you think? Did that terror arise because your Mother put you on the wrong pot? You understand what I am talking about? Analysis, go back, back, back, analyse your grandmother, mother, pre-natal condition. You are afraid, you are terrified by some animal, darkness, a word, by something, by somebody, terrified. Now how will you meet this? You understand sir? Analysis is one thing and what we are doing is not - right? To me analysis is not an answer, it is an evasion. It is a postponement, it has no validity when you want to act - paralysis is analysis - right. Let's move from there. Now how is the mind to be free of some terror? Come on sirs.

Q: One is not different from terror.

K: No sir, don't. Look I am in terror, don't verbalize and say that terror is not different from the observer. I know nothing at all about all that. I am terrified.

Q: You watch the spider.

K: Look haven't you been terrified ever?

Q: I can get a picture from my experience.

K: Sir he has expressed his feeling, just a minute sir. He has expressed it and we are discussing. Haven't you experienced terror? You have said something, and the person is going to use it to destroy you, to hurt you. That is a form of terror, and every time you meet that person - em? And you know he is going to do some harm to you. Or you meet an idea, a priest, a concept that unless you do this you will go to Hell - you follow? - the Catholic idea of Heaven and Hell, and that is instilled into you from childhood. You may have left the church and all that but yet this feeling of going to Hell is tremendously strong. Now how will you meet that?

Q: With understanding.

K: Tell me sir, what to do, don't use words. What am I to do, I am terrified?

Q: Admit the terror first instead of just reacting to it.

K: Are you helping him sir. Are you helping me?

Q: Don't run away from it.

Q: Face it.

K: Face it, don't turn away from it.

Q: Accept it.

K: Now wait a minute. What takes place when I meet that spider or that man, or that woman, I am terrified at that moment. At that moment I am paralysed right through. Why am I paralysed? What has made me paralysed?

Q: I have an image...

K: Wait, don't. What has made me paralysed?

Q: Memory.

Q: Fear.

K: Look at yourself. Aren't you afraid of something? Aren't you afraid of something, terrified by something, loosing a job, loosing your wife or your son, or your house, or god knows what - terrified? So what do you do at that moment? You are paralysed, you can't do anything, can you? You can't say, understand, you are the word and the word is you. (Laughter) Take milk and everything will be all right! That has no meaning. At the moment I am paralysed, I can't do anything at that moment, right? The spider or the man, or the woman goes away, then I realize I am terrified, not at the moment. See what has taken place sir? At the moment I am paralysed, which I call terror - right? Later on I become aware of that terror, a second later it may be. Now what takes place then? I perspire. It has happened - you follow sir, I am not talking verbally, it has actually taken place when I was walking and a dog came and held my ankle - never mind. Now, so what takes place later. My whole body becomes aware, alive - right? And the terror is a remembered thing - right? Which has happened. I am out of it, then I say I have been terrified, now I am going to prevent myself from future terrors. I don't if you - right? Now I am going to prevent future terrors arising, therefore I won't meet that person, I am going to be very careful not to walk anywhere near spiders. I am going to be very careful of dogs, you follow? Which means what? Watch it sir. Which means what? I am not going to meet you any more, I don't want to meet you.

Q: Because you don't want to see him, you will bump into him in the street.

K: I know sir but I am going to avoid it. No. I don't bump into him at all because I am much more aware than he is. (Laughter). Oh, you don't meet all this. I see him far ahead therefore I turn, go away. Do watch it sir. Please watch it sir, what happens? When I say, I won't meet you, I'll be awfully careful of the dogs, I will be awfully watchful of spiders - what have I done? Wait. What have I done?

Q: Made a formula.

K: No. I have built a wall, a wall against you, haven't I? A wall against the dog, a wall against the spider - right? That wall is going to make me more frightened. So I have learnt something. Any form of resistance brings about greater danger of terror. I haven't solved the problem of terror. It is still there but I have built a wall, and that wall, I hope, is going to prevent it, but it won't. So I realize that building a wall is a great stupidity - right? I won't build it - finished. There is action. You see sir? I see actually building a wall against you does not free the mind from the terror. So the seeing is the ending of building that wall. If it has been built already, I won't build any more.

Then my question is: what am I to do with the walls which I have built? See sir what happens. I won't build anymore - what takes place when you won't build anymore? Is there anymore, old or new? Of course not, when there is no action of the wall, the Berlin wall, if it doesn't exist old - you follow? - so you have no resistance, I have no resistance against you. I have learnt that, I have acted on that. So what takes place? Come on sirs, I am talking. What takes place?

Q: What happens with somebody who has lost his memory by an accident?

K: That is a different question sir. What happens to a man who has lost his memory, amnesia. What takes place? That is a different question. Doctors, nurses if you are well enough, or a friend - that is a different question.

Q: If you don't build a wall you are alone with your fear, you have got no protection from your fear?

K: Have you stopped building the wall?

Q: Yes.

K: Not you, madame. Have you sir, have we stopped building that wall of resistance? Because you see though you have built that wall, terror still exists, it would be stupid, neurotic on my part to keep on building the wall. So there is the ending of building. If I don't build a new wall, the old wall is not. See. Right sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: If you stop building a new wall, you can only build a new wall on the old wall. If you are not building, the old wall is not.

Q: One gets frightened that one will be hurt.

K: No madame, we have been - you see how they go back and forth. I am afraid of you, terrified of you. At that moment I am paralysed. Follow it sirs, step by step and you'll see it for yourself.

Then you realize you are terrified and you say, "By Jove, I must be hereafter very careful not to meet that man again" - or the spider, or whatever it is. I have built a wall against you, hoping thereby to get rid of my terror, but it is there, I am always watching, in spite of the wall. So I see the wall does not prevent or free the mind from terror. So the ending is important, the ending of building that wall is finished. Do you see that?

Q: Yes.

K: If you see it, it has ended. Then what takes place?

Q: Do you mean...

K: Wait. What takes place? If I have no resistance what takes place?

Q: Then you confront...

K: Wait. Look sir, I used to be frightened of you, terrified. And I increase that fear, terror by building a wall. I don't build a wall anymore. Which is, I built the wall in order to protect myself against you. Now I don't protect myself, what takes place sir?

Q: I don't know, I'll find out.

Q: It has a different meaning now sir.

K: No, sir, I have no terror. The moment I resist, fear exists.

Q: Fear is gone.

K: The moment I resist fear exists.

Q: When I met you and felt the original fear, what is the image...

K: Of course, of course, you make an image, ideas, reputation, all kinds of things.

Q: Trying to...

K: Don't try. Do it.

Q: If you do precisely what you are advocating, fly to East Germany and convince them to take down the wall and you will have the thanks of the entire German nation.

K: Sir, sir. There is a wall between Pakistan and India. There is a wall between the Arabs and the Jews, there is a wall between the British and the French and the Italians, there is a wall between... and you are the Italian, the French, the German, the Hindu etc. Remove the wall and you will see what happens.

Now let's go back. Passion exists only when there is no conflict. Conflict exists when there is fragmentation in myself and when my mind is incapable of looking at life as a whole - right sir? Why does my mind not look at life as a whole? Why does it say, "I am terrified here, I have pleasure there and I want to be ambitious." - you follow, fragmented. Why?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH SEPTEMBER 1973

K: What shall we talk about this morning?

Q: You talked about how we waste energy through the mind. Could we say go into the question about the body and the mind and the heart? About health and so on.

K: You only talked about the mind, and you didn't talk about the body, the heart, health and standing on one's head.

Q: When one observes one's mind one notices a constant gossiping, a constant movement of thought. Is it possible at all to finish, to stop this movement of thought all at once, or do we stop gradually?

K: If one is at all aware, the mind is always chattering, and is it possible to end, to stop at once.

Q: Can we talk about the word responsibility?

K: Shall we talk over together the real meaning of that word responsibility.

Q: Seeing is the action - does thought try to get in, as we are all so conditioned by thought?

K: Seeing, it was said, is the doing. Can thought allow such doing because we are all so conditioned by thought.

Q: Sir could we go into this question of resistance?

K: Could you talk about resistance, which we discussed the day before yesterday.

Q: Can you talk about the conscious as well as the unconscious?

K: Talk about the conscious as well as the unconscious. Any more?

Q: Can we stay with that question? Can we find out about that passion which comes when there is no thought? Can we wait for that passion?

K: I didn't quite get it sir.

Q: That passion which you may come upon when there is the ending of thought.

K: Ah, talk about it. May we talk or wait till that real thing comes upon us. Now we have asked questions, what shall we discuss? Shall we discuss, talk over together, putting all these questions together? The body, the mind, responsibility, the chattering of the mind, the conscious as well as the unconscious, and the seeing and the doing without the interference of thought, and so on. Now can we put all that together and discuss it? What do you say?

What is the central issue in all these questions? What do you think is the central point in all the questions that have been put?

Q: The seeing of the problem and trying to find a way out of it.

K: We have problems and trying to get out of them.

Q: The question of change, when you put all the questions together.

K: When you put all the questions together, the person says, it is a matter of change.

Q: Why are all these questions being asked?

Q: Sir, is the central point the conflict between the observer and the observed.

K: The conflict between the observer and the observed.

Q: What is the difference between the observer and the observed?

Q: Are we not curious? Curiosity perhaps is the central issue, curiosity to know.

K: Curiosity to find out - from whom?

Q: We don't know.

K: There are so many questions that have been put, including the questions here and the one that was put the other day about consciousness. What happens when death takes place and naturally the brain cells die, what happens to consciousness, and what is the meaning of consciousness? That was the question that was put the other day.

So putting all these questions together, I wonder what is the central issue in all this. I would say, subject to your correction, that we have many problems, imposed by society or the culture in which we live, or our own individual personal problems. And we want to resolve them all, in which is included the observer, and the observed, conscious and the unconscious, the interference of thought in the seeing and acting. We have all these many problems, ill health, yoga, standing on your head, the meaning of responsibility, what is love, what happens when there is death, and so on. Now who is going to answer all these questions? These are all our problems, collective, personal, quite impersonal, objective and so on. Now who is going to answer all these questions? Suppose there was nobody to whom you could ask these questions? How would you resolve these questions and the problems that arise? That is the central issue in all this, isn't it?

Q: To be aware.

K: No, don't please - let us explore it. Don't say, "Being aware" - that stops it, please. Now first of all we are accustomed to ask questions and somebody to give the answers. The world is in such a frightful mess, the dictator says "We have the answer", or the politician says "We have the answer", or the economist, or the socialist, or the religious person. Now if you don't look to any of these people, because they have led us all up the garden, because they are responsible, as well as we are, for the misery, confusion and sorrow and starvation and wars and violence. If we don't look to any of these people, how will you find out? There is no authority - right? No book, no leader, no guru. How will you answer these questions? And I hope you are in that position, that you are not following anybody, that there is no authority that will say, "Do this" or "Don't do that". How will you set about to answer these many questions and many problems that arise in our daily life?

Q: Sir I ask of myself and I still find I have no answers. I don't expect there are any though, are there?

K: Madame, just wait a minute. Just hold on a minute. Are you in that position when you say, "I have nobody on whom I can depend for the right answer"? No book, no system and I am left naked, and I have got to find the answer, because my life is very short, I want to live a life that is completely full, rich and beautiful, all that, intelligent and nobody can tell me what to do - right? Are we in that position? No.

Q: Yes.

K: Don't say yes or no. It is one of the most difficult things to be in that position, isn't it?

So not relying on anybody, how shall I find the answer, or resolve the problems that arise, every day, there isn't one series, one set of problems, problems are always arising. Now how shall I meet them, resolve them, not be caught in the trap of all this?

Where shall I start? You understand sirs, what I am asking? Surely that is the only way to find out what is truth, what is a state of mind that has no problem, that is not in conflict, that is supremely sensitive, intelligent, and so on. Now where shall I start?

Q: By looking.

K: Looking at what?

Q: Looking at the problem.

K: Looking at the problem? Who is the creator of these problems? Where shall I look for an answer?

Q: Faith.

Q: In all that is good and true.

K: Oh no madame, don't say all that is good and true, and noble, please. Look I am asking you a very serious question and you say 'Look for all that is noble and true and beautiful'. Keats talked about it endlessly, all the poets, the philosophers and all the writers and intellectuals, but that doesn't answer my question.

Q: By seeing everything that the problem is not.

K: Look sir, I personally don't read any philosophy, psychology, don't follow any guru - no authority. To me authority is poison, either politically or religiously. And I don't read all the sacred books, in India, or here or in Japan or in China - they bore me. Now where shall I start? Wait. Where shall I start? I say to myself, I have no confidence in myself either - right? Because I am what the world has made me, so I can't rely on myself. I don't know if you follow all this? So I say to myself, I must understand myself - myself is the world, and the world is me. And I mean that, it is not just words. And in understanding myself I understand the world - the world about me, nature, the structure of human relationship, the divisions, the quarrels, the antagonisms, the wars, the violence and all that, it is all buried in me because I am the world. So I must start with myself - right?

Q: If you are the world and the world is you, how can you start with yourself?

K: If you are the world and the world is you, how can you start with yourself. I start with what I have sir. Shall I go on. Do please move. It is a hot morning, rather lovely. Let's get going.

I know nothing about myself. I don't start with a conclusion - I am god, I am not a god, I am the state, I am not the state, I am the world, I am not the world, or I am the world. I know nothing. Right? So I begin there. I know nothing. What I know is what other people have told me. Propaganda. What I know, what I am is the result of what others have made me. Or in reaction to the world I act. So I really don't know anything. Right? So I can begin to learn - right? May I go on? No please, share together. It is not just I go on talking. As I know nothing I begin to learn. So I must find out what it means to learn. What does it mean to learn, not knowing anything, what does it mean to learn? I know, I have to learn a language, Italian, Greek, French or whatever it is. And I store up the words, the meaning of the words, the verbs, the irregular verbs, and so on. So I know a language. I know how to ride a bicycle, drive a car, dig in the garden, or run a machine. I know all that. But actually beyond the technological knowledge I know absolutely nothing about myself. Can we start from there? Can you honestly say, "I really don't know anything about myself" - not out of despair, not out of a sense of frustration, not knowing myself I am going to commit suicide! You follow?

Q: What do you mean by saying you know nothing about yourself?

K: What do you mean by saying you know nothing about yourself - what I am. Why I do this. Why I think that. What are the motives, the impression. I know nothing about myself except the technological knowledge, the information, the activity in that field. So I know nothing about myself. I only know what people have said to me about myself. The philosophers, the analysts, the psychoanalysts, the mothers, the fathers, the books, I have put all that aside. So I am going to learn, learn about myself. And so before I use that word, I must find out what it means to learn.

Q: To discover.

Q: To wake up.

K: What does it mean to you to learn?

Q: To be vulnerable.

K: To learn.

Q: Isn't it a process of knowledge?

K: I have learnt how to ride a bicycle, I have learnt how to drive a car, speak a language, run a machine or whatever it is. If I am a bureaucrat I have learnt how to push a pencil around, I know all that. What does it mean to learn?

Q: I must be curious.

K: Curiosity. I know what that word means, but will curiosity teach me what it means to learn? I want to learn about myself - what does it mean to learn? If I learn about myself, does that learning lead to knowledge about myself, and from that knowledge I act - you are following? I want to learn about myself, learn. What does that mean? I have learnt a language, ride a bicycle and so on. Myself is a living thing, isn't it? Changing, demanding, asking, lust, anger, all that. I must learn about all that. Now if I learn about anger, that learning can leave the residue as knowledge - right? From that knowledge I act. Therefore I have stopped learning. I wonder if you understand? (The aeroplane must have its voice too, so let's listen to it).

Q: One mustn't accumulate.

K: Sir if the mind accumulates knowledge about itself, next action or next learning is from a knowledge.

Q: I said I must not accumulate.

K: That is just it. So learning is a process of not accumulating knowledge. I have accumulated knowledge - how to ride a bicycle, speak a language, all that. But when I am learning about myself, any form of accumulation as knowledge about myself will prevent further learning. Is this clear? Please. Because the 'me' is a living thing, it is not a dead thing, therefore the mind must come to it each day, each minute afresh, otherwise it can't learn.

Q: If it doesn't know, then it must come to it afresh.

K: Do listen sir, first listen to what I have said. Not that you must listen to what I say, but as I happen to talk please listen to it.

In learning about myself, in that learning, if there is any form of accumulation as knowledge, as experience, then further learning is impeded by the past. Therefore is it possible to learn without accumulation? That is very important for me to find out. Because if I am learning and if accumulation goes on, there is no learning. Because the 'me' is a terribly living thing, very active. So the mind must be as swift, as sensitive, as subtle as the living thing. Is my mind capable of that? You are following? Please follow this step by step and you will come to it yourself.

Q: Sir, when you look at something, as soon as you begin to think about it, life has gone on.

K: No sir. Look. You are saying life goes on so rapidly, so quickly, so subtly that learning is not possible. Is that it?

Q: No, I didn't say that. I said that the difficulty is that as soon as one thinks about something, that one has to be able to see something and immediately pass on without trying to think about it, or grasp it in any way.

K: The incident or the happening takes place so rapidly, that thought thinking about it is no good. Therefore I must learn to observe without the previous knowledge which I have accumulated - right? That is the act of learning. Come on sirs.

Q: Therefore one watches carefully one's motives in action.

K: No sir. We haven't come to that. I want to know about myself. I have to learn about myself. What does learning mean? Until I find that out I am merely accumulating knowledge about myself; and you have knowledge about yourself, haven't you? - what the psychologists have said, what the philosophers have said, what the religious books have said, what the speaker has said. So you have knowledge of all that. And when you brush aside all that you are left with nothing, therefore you have to learn. So I am enquiring what does it mean to learn.

Q: Sir, can we question this phrase 'learning about'. Is there a difference between learning about and learning?

K: Yes sir. Learning about and learning, is there a difference between those two? Learning about something, and learning.

Q: Would learning be a spontaneous realization, without reaction?

K: Spontaneous realization. I don't know what those words mean. I am sorry. We are not spontaneous - are we? We are so conditioned, so heavily burdened with the past, with all the knowledge, information, how can the mind be spontaneous? I wish you would...

Q: Is not the word learning associated with accumulation?

K: Therefore sir, knowing that learning is associated with accumulation of knowledge, we are trying to separate them. We can't use other words. So I am learning about myself, therefore I am not accumulating knowledge about myself, if I do then that knowledge will prevent further learning about myself. It is fairly simple sir, isn't it?

Q: To learn you have to have observation.

K: To learn you have to have observation. So how do I learn and observe? Right? Observe myself and in the act of observation learn? Now what does observation mean? Can I watch myself, all the movements of myself, without any distortion, without any previous conclusion, which will bring about the distortion that I am good, that I am bad, that I am divine, that I am marvellous, that I am the most beautiful, lovely person, etc. etc. Can I observe myself without any shadow of distortion?

Q: If I don't try to change myself.

K: Sir. Please do hold. Look at it sir. Can you look at yourself without any opinion about yourself?

Q: Learning is something that has to be practised, like a baby, a child learning to walk.

K: Now do start now. Don't let's talk about a baby, but do start learning now. Please listen to this. Can the mind observe its activity without prejudice? Prejudice being judgement, evaluation which has already been made and through those eyes I look at myself. Can I observe the movement of myself in daily life, cooking, washing, all that, the activity of the mind, observe without any conclusion, prejudice. You say that is not possible. Wait. Do it, sir, please sir do these things.

Q: How do you do it?

K: I am showing it to you, not how sir. I am showing it to you. Watch your mind without prejudice. Can you watch it?

Q: Can I watch my mind prejudicing, can I watch that with prejudice?

K: Can you watch your mind without a judgement?

Q: Making judgement.

K: Not making judgement sir. Look sir.

Q: Please excuse me - I find as I walk about here doing this and that and so on, there is a movement, a momentum of making judgements, prejudicing, that caresses my perception. I can feel its quality almost. Can I observe all that without judging?

K: That is what I am asking you sir? Can the mind watch its activity without any prejudice - prejudice, conclusion, judgement, evaluation, all that, the past, can it watch? So until it does it is not capable of learning - right?

Q: Do you mean observation without thought?

K: Right. Observation without thought. I didn't want to put it that way because then you will go off into: how am I to prevent thought from interfering.

Q: Isn't that what you have to consider?

K: What sir?

Q: How am I to look at thought interfering without prejudice, without judging it?

K: Now there is nobody to answer that question, what will you do?

Q: Squirm!

K: Squirm? Then squirm! (Laughter) But you have to answer that question, it is no good merely squirming, you have got to answer it. Life challenges you. You can't say, "Well I squirm" and leave it at that. Life says, answer it, you are a man, a grown up.

Q: What does squirm mean? (Laughter)

K: What does squirm mean - you have seen a worm squirm! No, sir please, just a minute sir. You see, sir, it becomes really quite impossible when your mind isn't giving complete attention to something that demands attention. I want to learn about myself, not through somebody else's eyes, whether it is Christ, Buddha, or the latest guru. I want to learn, the mind must learn about itself. So it says, how am I to learn, which means I must observe. How can I observe when there is so much prejudice? There are thousands of prejudices which I have, how can I observe?

Then the next thing is, there is nobody to answer, how is the mind to be free of prejudice? You follow? Otherwise I can't observe, the mind can't observe and therefore can't learn. You follow? So how is the mind to be free of prejudice?

Q: When I see something in myself I don't like, that is a fact, not a prejudice.

K: I am asking madame: you have a prejudice, haven't you? All of us have some kind of pre-judgement - that is what it means, prejudging something. So how is the mind to be free of prejudice, bigotry, conclusion, how is it? Nobody is going to answer me, because I have got to find out. I can't just squirm, lie under the question, I have got to answer it to myself. Life demands it.

Q: When you see the falseness of it.

K: You see the falseness of prejudice, don't you - but you are still prejudiced aren't you?

Q: I don't know, I can't answer it.

Q: You begin only by knowing...

K: You are not answering sir. Answer that question for yourself sir. How is the mind to be free of prejudice? You understand? A conclusion, an image which I have built about you. Do listen sir, I have built an image about you because you are a Christian, I am a Hindu, or I am a Communist and you are something else. Now how is that mind to be free of the image it has built, or the culture has built, or the society has built, which has been implanted in the mind? How is that image to be put away? It is a question sir, don't answer something else. The image is there, how is it to break down, to be free of it?

Q: Sir, that image is memory, so you are asking really, can one change memory.

K: I am asking a simple thing sir, please don't make it more complicated. I have an image, as being a Hindu, Communist, Socialist, whatever it is, Catholic, and I realize as long as that image exists, observation is not possible, and therefore learning then becomes merely accumulation of knowledge, which prevents further learning. So my question is: can the mind free itself from the image?

Q: You can become aware that it is just an image and not a reality.

K: Now, are you in realizing that, are you free of the image.

Q: If you actually see the image...

K: Not if, this is your question. It is your problem.

Q: If you...

K: Not if. Sir, I come to you and say: look, my friend, I don't know how to get rid of my image, I have got so many images, tell me what to do. And you can't answer because you don't know what to do. You say, well let's talk about it endlessly, and I die by the end of it. My problem is that I want to end it.

Q: Sir, who is the 'I' that asks the question?

K: Sir I don't want to go into that. You see. Can your mind be free of an image which prevents observation. Stick to that thing. Not who is 'I'. We'll go into that.

Q: I am that image.

K: Yes sir. Then what? You are that image. You are the image. Now how is the mind to be free of that image, which is you?

Q: If I am that image, then there is no more image.

K: Are you? Sir please, the house is burning. I must do something about it, I can't everlastingly talk about the man who put the fire there, whether he has red hair, brown hair, white skin, black skin, purple - the house is on fire.

Q: By accepting the image.

K: So you accept the image. It is there, why do you accept it? You see how you are totally unaware, if I may most respectfully point out, totally unaware of what you are doing, how your mind is operating.

Q: It comes from fear.

K: Fear. Is fear preventing the mind from putting away the image?

Q: Thought itself it preventing it.

Q: Sir, what is this image? I don't know - does anybody see this?

K: I have told you what the image is. Image is a prejudice, a word, an association of words - I am a Christian, or I am a Communist, I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, I am a follower of some guru - those are all images.

Q: But the idea that there is something to see gets in the way of seeing it. You know, if I say I am going to see how - you talk about being a Christian for instance - if I am going to observe myself as a Christian, that very idea to see something would stop me seeing it.

K: No sir. No, sir.

Q: The idea that there is anything to see gets in the way of seeing.

K: No. I am a Hindu, a Catholic, a Communist, that is an image, a verbal series of conclusions, ideologies, dogmatic and so on, those are the images that I have built by words. I am asking, can the mind free itself from that so that it observes without any distortion, otherwise I can't learn.

Q: When I see a prejudice, the only way I can work is to go on seeing it and not try to change it, because that is another prejudice, but to go on seeing it.

K: Now do you see your prejudice? Is the mind aware of the prejudice it has?

Q: Sometimes.

Q: That is the difficulty. Because I don't see that the particular knowledge - I see the knowledge that somebody else has is prejudice - but the knowledge I have of myself.

K: I am talking about yourself, not somebody else.

Q: Quite. Now I don't see the distinction. Some knowledge I have about myself I have in a sort of tentative way, not as a formed solid thing, I just observe certain things, like a scientist, not building it into dogma about it - is there a difference, or is all knowledge such prejudice?

K: Sir, we have explained, all knowledge is not prejudice. Learning to ride...

Q: Knowledge about myself, I mean.

K: Learning about how to ride a bicycle or drive a car is not prejudice. It is a function which I learn. But here I am learning about myself, not from what others have said about me, or through others - the mind discards all that, says, it wants to learn about itself. Now to learn is to observe. Now can it observe without any shadow?

Q: To observe my mind I have to use my mind.

K: No, no, I am asking you - not asking you sir - we are questioning, we are asking whether the mind can observe its conditioning?

Q: But I am using my mind to observe it.

K: Observe it sir. Look I have been brought up as a Brahmin in India, and I say, I am that. That is a deep rooted prejudice, brought about historically, culturally and tradition says, I am that. That is my conditioning. Is it possible for the mind to be aware of that conditioning? Just only that. No more. When it is aware of that conditioning, what takes place?

Q: You recognize that it is conditioned.

Q: It is no longer conditioned.

K: Are you saying this as an actuality, or a verbal statement?

Q: Well I see it with prejudice for instance.

K: Sir you are brought up as a Christian - right?

Q: Yes.

K: Now are you aware of that conditioning?

Q: Yes.

K: Now the next step.

Q: That is why I am here.

K: Wait sir, just a minute sir. When you are aware of that, are you trying to overcome it, change it, control it or break through it? Or are you merely aware of it?

Q: I am just aware of it.

K: Now what takes place then?

Q: I become free from it.

K: Wait. Either you are or you are not. You can't say, I become.

Q: I am - if you like.

K: Not what I like please. It isn't a game of what you and I like. The mind becomes aware that it is a Christian, a Communist, a Hindu, and so on. That is its conditioning. In becoming aware of that conditioning what takes place?

Q: Change.

K: No. I have to find out what I mean by aware, what I mean by observing that conditioning. Is the observer different from the conditioning? You understand my question? The mind is aware, or observes it is conditioned. Is the observer different from the conditioning? What do you say? There is nobody to answer you. How will you find out? Is the thinker different from the thought, from the conditioning, or the thinker is the thought and the conditioning?

Q: Do you realize your conditioning when you see that it is part of the mind.

K: Yes sir I understand. I am asking a little more. I am asking - we are asking, when you say I am conditioned, is the 'I' who says, I am conditioned, different from the conditioning?

Q: No, it is all in the mind.

Q: Certainly not.

K: Certainly not. So the observer is the observed. Now wait a minute. Stay there for a few minutes. The observer is the observed. Then what takes place?

Q: I have learnt what that thing is.

K: Then I have learnt - you are saying - what actually is. Is there a learning about 'what is'? I must stick to this one thing sir. Sorry. The observer is the observed - right. We see that. That is the conditioning and the observer who watches that conditioning are both the same. Both are conditioned. That means there is no division between the observer and the observed. Wait a minute sir. Which means there is no division between the experiencer and the experienced. No division between the thinker and the thought, they are one. Right? Then what takes place? Take time. Go slowly. When there is a division between the observer the observed there is conflict. Right? Trying to overcome it, trying to change it, trying to control it and so on and so on. Now when the observer is the observed there is no control, no suppression, there is no overcoming it, there is only this actually what is. Only the observer is the observed, the image is the observer - right? Now what takes place?

Q: Duality comes to an end.

K: Sir duality has come to an end when you say the observer is the observed. Duality exists and the expression of that duality is conflict. When there is no conflict between the observer and the observed what takes place? There is nobody there to tell you - you understand?

Q: You have immediate action.

K: Wait, go slowly, go slowly. What takes place?

Q: Because I am not different from what I am looking at.

K: Therefore what happens?

Q: Conflict has ceased.

Q: You have a passion for learning.

K: Yes sir, we have said that. When the observer is the observed conflict ceases. Which is the greatest thing, isn't it? You don't see it. Conflict ceases. Has conflict ceased with you when you realize the observer is the observed? Until that conflict ceases you don't see the reality that the observer is the observed. It is just words then. The moment you see that, the reality of it, conflict has come to an end, the 'me' and not the 'me'. The 'me' is the 'you' - you follow?

So what takes place when there is no conflict, which means when the observer is the observed? Have you ever meditated? I see several of you sitting under the various trees, (Laughter) with great attention. Have you ever meditated? This is meditation - you understand sir. This is the greatest meditation, to come upon this extraordinary thing, which is to discover for oneself - for the mind to discover for itself the observer is the observed, therefore no conflict, which means not just vegetation, you follow? Just doing nothing. On the contrary.

So I have to find the answer; what takes place when the mind realizes the image and the observer of that image are the same? And it has come to that point because it has investigated - you understand? It hasn't just said, that is so. It has gone into itself, it says the learning, observing, to observe there must be no prejudice, prejudice is an image, is that image different from the observer. All that is an enquiry. An enquiry in which there is attention, therefore that enquiry brings about the realization that the observer is the observed, and therefore the mind is tremendously alive, it isn't a dead mind. It is an original, unspoilt mind.

So then what takes place? You understand? It realizes the word Hindu, and the maker of that word are the same. So the image, the conditioning, is it there? Don't say no, or yes. Is it there? The mind is conditioned as a Catholic. When the mind says, I am Catholic, the 'I' is different from that which has been called Catholic, it is its conditioning. The observer says, I am different from my conditioning, and then he battles because he says, I must control, I must be generous, I must be peaceful, I mustn't kill, but I will kill when necessary but I won't kill and so on and so on. It plays a game with itself all the time. So when the observer realizes he is not different from the thing which he sees, that is the conditioning, therefore the whole thing is conditioned, you understand? The whole structure is conditioned. Then what takes place?

Q: Conditioning disappears.

K: Has it disappeared with you madame. Don't say things that you don't know.

Q: We are afraid of the consequences.

K: Sir, no. What takes place? We will come to that. What takes place? You understand sir? When there is an image, a prejudice, a conclusion, there is activity - right? I am a Christian, I must resist everybody who is not a Christian, I am a Communist, I will convert everybody to my ideology - socialism etc., there is activity going on - right. Isn't there? Come on sirs. The activity of the observer trying to convince others, or proselytize, threaten and all that, to become this. When the observer is the observed, all such activity ceases, doesn't it? No? So what takes place? There is complete immobility, isn't there? Oh you don't see the beauty of this.

Q: Marvellous!

K: Immediately put into words!

Q: Peace.

K: My darling sir!

Q: Summation.

K: You understand sir. Watch it sir. The mind when it is prejudiced is in movement - right? I am prejudiced against you because you have hurt me. I resist, that is a movement. The image which I have built about you is the movement of a prejudice against you. I am a Communist and my education is to convince, is to resist, is to bring everybody to that. So having an image indicates a movement - right? A movement from this to that, or from there to this. Change this to that, thesis and antithesis, and produce synthesis. It is a constant movement of the image, the word, the conclusion. So when the mind realizes, sees the observer is the observed, sees, not just verbally accepts some idiotic idea, but actually realizes it in his guts, blood, heart, mind, it sees that, that it is no division, therefore this movement of the mind comes to an end - right? The movement of the conditioning comes to an end. I wonder if you see this?

Q: My answer is...

K: No. Hold a minute. I want to finish this and then you'll get it. So there is complete immobility of the mind, which doesn't mean it is a dead mind. It doesn't mean a mind that has gone to sleep, it is a mind that is tremendously alive. It is alive because it is not moving in conditioned areas. I wonder if you get this? So what takes place when there is complete non-movement?

Q: The reaction ceases and action starts.

K: Madame we have been through all that, please don't go back to something.

Q: The mind is free of imitation.

K: Look sir, what has taken place.

Q: Silence should take place.

K: Yes sir. Unless it is the real thing, don't use words. Then one plays the hypocrite and says things one doesn't know.

Q: Well I just felt this silence...

K: Yes sir, I am not accusing you sir. Just see. Look sir it really is the most extraordinary thing one has discovered, if you have come upon it. That is, all movement is time, and time is thought, thought is conditioned, and when thought operates it can only operate in the area within the field of that conditioning. I am Catholic, Protestant, Communist, Socialist, Right Wing, Left Wing, or Centre, I am a Buddhist, I am nothing, or I must be something. All that is within the area of the known, the movement is in time, is time. Movement is time. Now when the observer is the observed there is no movement at all, there is only the observed. And when there is no movement at all about the observed, 'what is', what has happened? There is no movement, no chattering, no movement from the unconscious to the conscious. No movement at all. Therefore the mind sees, has the energy to look at 'what is', when there is a movement away from 'what is' there is desire to change it, control it, transform it. When there is no movement at all, it has the extraordinary energy to observe 'what is'. And what is there? Another series of words. I don't know if you see this.

Q: I do not understand intelligence.

K: I'll show you. The speaker is going into it, you are not. It isn't an actuality to you, it is just a verbal acceptance. You don't say, well I am going to look at this, put my energy into this, I am dedicated, I want to find out. And you can only find out when you have totally discarded everything that others have said.

Q: (Inaudible).

K: That is what I am saying. Unless you do this you cannot learn. You will repeat what others have said, which you are doing. And what others have said may be utterly silly, may be true, or may be false. Others have no meaning in this. They have meaning when the doctor says from his knowledge, take this pill, you have got cancer you have got to do something. That's different. But here I know nothing, I have to learn. Learning means to observe. There is no observation when there is the movement of the image. You see the beauty of it sir. The movement of the image, which means the conditioning. The movement of the conditioning. And that movement of the conditioning is time. And thought is time. So thought divides itself as the observer and the observed and the conflict. And this is the movement of our culture, of our religious activity, the conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be', between the observer and the observed. But when there is the realization that the observer is the observed then the movement of the conditioning comes to an end, because there is no movement. You understand? Therefore such a mind has come to it through meditation, enquiry, looking, asking itself, not anybody else. It has to stand completely alone, which doesn't mean isolated, sitting, becoming a hermit. On the contrary the mind empties everything of its conditioning therefore no movement of conditioning, therefore no movement of time. Then there is no 'what is', there is only something entirely different.

Q: Sir all of this sounds so dreary to me because I can't do anything except pay lip service to you and follow you.

K: Then don't pay lip service.

Q: I can't get beyond observer and observed.

K: Then take time, go into it. Sir you don't say that when you are hungry. When you are lustful, you don't say...! When the house is burning you want to act. And you act when you have pain, when you have toothache, when you have got some disease you don't say, play around.

Q: What you say about the thinker and the thought, the experience and the experienced, the observer and the observed, is this not really saying there is action without the 'I', without the self, then we are coming upon what you are talking about. In that state there is a possibility of love.

K: Yes sir. Of course sir. But wait sir. How is the self to come to an end? You say that, self is not.

Q: What I was going to say sir, there are moments in peoples lives when the self is not.

K: But that isn't good enough. There are moments when I am healthy, I say that isn't good enough.

Q: But in those moments, maybe a day...

K: A year, half a year!

Q: In those days, there is love.

K: Yes sir.

Q: And this is what you are talking about permanently.

K: No. The moment you use the word permanent, that means time.

Q: But this is what you are talking about.

K: Sir, please. Of course what I am talking about is the ending of the self. The ending of the self is the movement - no, the self is the movement of the image, of the environment which has conditioned that self. The ending of the self - how is it to be done?

Q: It can be done by what you are talking about, but it can also be done for maybe a limited time, when something comes in your way and the self is not.

K: Yes sir, I understand that very well. We have all had those moments when the self is not. Those are rare and happy, like marvellous days, without a shadow, lovely. But those days are rare. They are like English weather! (Laughter). But what am I to do? I can't wait for those days. Or remember those days and live in the past.

Q: Nor, can we keep coming to your conventions and listening and repeating like parrots.

K: Oh, that is silly. But for a man who is very serious, and it is important to find out how to end this movement of the self. What am I to do? Is the self different from the action? Or the self is the action? Sir that is all implied.

So the first thing is never to repeat what you have not seen. When you use the word silence, either there is silence, or you are talking about silence. So don't, if I may say, don't repeat something that you actually have not seen, not experienced. There is a vast difference between seeing and experiencing.

Yes sir?

Q: Sir, these moments of clarity that you say each one of us has, it seems that they, when you think about the observer and the observed being one - now one finds that it happens in a particular fragmented issue. Say I am jealous, and I can be the jealousy and the jealousy disappears, but I walk out and somebody insults me and I am hurt, which means that there was an overcoming or a dissolving of the one, but it seems - how does one be conscious of the entire content of one's consciousness?

K: That is just it sir. What time is it sir? I think we had better stop. It is ten to one. Perhaps we can take up this question on Saturday morning. That is: what does it mean to be whole? What does it mean to have this feeling of totality - you follow? - this feeling of complete non-fragmentation? I am all right in the tent but when I go out I am hurt. I am all right in the church, when I leave the church I hate people. I am all right as long as I have got my image, my bigotry and I hold on. But to be free of all that, to have a feeling of the whole - right? Perhaps we will discuss that on Saturday.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 8TH SEPTEMBER 1973

It seems to me that it would be a great pity if you made this place into a resort and an entertainment affair. It is nice to have a sun bath, nice to go about in the country. There are right occasions and wrong occasions. right time and wrong time. And if you made this lovely place into a place of entertainment, a social gathering, meeting friends, and endless chatter, I am afraid then you would not be very serious. And what we have been talking about, and what we are going to talk about this morning too, demands your seriousness, your attention, your care, your affection, so that we can share together, not merely verbally but also non-verbally the many things that our whole life is made up of - the many fragments, the many contradictions, the many crises, incidents, the vagaries and the vanities of our life. And if we are going to be merely entertained on a lovely morning like this, I think you would be wasting your time. Much better go somewhere else and enjoy yourself thoroughly.

This place is meant for those who are serious, for those who really deeply are concerned with the whole problem of living, which is becoming more and more difficult, more and more complex. And to scatter our energies socially, doing endless hours of yoga here at Brockwood, seems to me, if I may say so, such a waste of your time. But you will do what you please.

We have been talking, having dialogues, going into various aspects of our life, and I would like this morning, if I may, to talk about death - although it is a lovely morning - what is love and what is this thing called living? The whole problem of it, the various things that are involved in it; and how to look at life, live with life as a whole, non-fragmented, non broken up. That is what I would like to talk about this morning, if I may.

When one looks at one's own life, the everyday life that one lives and leads, it is so shallow, a verbal acceptance without any depth, a verbal explanation with which we seem to be so satisfied, a life that is so broken up - a life of the business world, the life of the family, the life of love, as it is called, the life of amusement, the life of a religious pursuit or entertainment or pleasure or conformity, and our own narrow limited self-centred activity, with all its sorrows, anxieties, fears, joys, and the agonies of relationship, the tortures of one's own doubts and peculiarities and tendencies. We have broken up life, and we think we shall be able to solve them fragmentarily, take each fragment, whether it be the artistic world, or the scientific world, or the world of science or religion, as though they were something separate, unrelated to each other, something that must be approached for themselves little by little. I do not know if you have noticed your own life. Education is something entirely different from our daily activity. Our activity, daily self-centred activity has nothing to do with the beauty of the world, beauty of the earth, the nature, the extraordinary quality of a world that is so full of joy, and when we lose touch with nature we lose touch with humanity. And yet all our life until we die, is this constant battle without and within. And the search to escape from that battle, through drugs, through sex, through power, money, position and all the religious fantasies, imaginations and amusements. That is our life. From the moment we are born until we die, a battle, a meaningless existence, a thing that soon grows old, decays, diseased and dies. I am sorry to talk about that this morning, when everything seems to be blossoming, when there is perfume in the air, when there are deep shadows and the leaves are dancing with the breeze, it seems rather strange to talk about all this. But that is part of our life - the wind, the flow of the waters, the blue sky, and the shadows with the clear lovely waters. So, if you would bear with me, we will go into all the difficulties, and the meaninglessness of our existence, and see if out of that there can come a beauty, something that is not perishable, something that is not put together by time and thought, something that might exist if man really goes deeply into himself and understands himself and goes beyond it.

A mind that is so fragmented, so broken up, can that mind observe the whole movement of life as one, as a whole? Because if one can look at it as a whole then there is no problem, then death is love, and love is death, and living is the dying and the loving. But the mind, that is, our own idiosyncrasies, our conditioning, our constant endeavour to change the conditioning, and the movement within that conditioning, is our life. And can our mind see the whole of life, not one fragment of it opposed to another fragment, one thought opposed to another thought, the intellect opposed to the emotions, the organism has its own desires and pursuits, and denied and controlled. But to treat, to live life as a whole. I do not know if you have ever thought about it, and what it means. The word 'whole' means sane, healthy, holy, that is what that word means, to be whole, non broken up. And can one lead such a life in the modern world - in a polluted world of a town, or in the country filled with smog, with all the competition, ambition, the wars, the violence, the bestiality of competition, can we live a life that is totally, completely, absolutely whole? Not as an idea, not as an ideal, because ideals are quite idiotic, they have no meaning. What has meaning is to see if it is possible - not a concept carried out and practised, or to live up to a formula. That is still fragmentation. Right?

I hope we are sharing this thing together, and you are not merely listening to a speaker who is using a lot of words to convey something very, very clear and simple, but you are also sharing, taking the same journey, walking together and therefore sharing, partaking in this problem. To share implies that there is no authority. We are both exercising our capacities, intellectual, emotional, our capacities to think very clearly and to see the logic and the limitation of logic, both verbal and non verbal, and to go beyond it. And to share something there must be attention, affection and great care, otherwise we can't share. And as this requires considerable enquiry, considerable investigation, which is to trace out for ourselves, with the help of each other, this question of living a life that is whole: that is never separate, that is never contradictory, that is a total movement.

Now it is one of the most difficult things to put into words, because words are a means of communication, as we both speak English we know the meaning of those words, at least we hope so, and we communicate not only through words but also through non-verbal perception. There must be both a verbal understanding and a non-verbal communication, they must go both together. Therefore you and I must not come to any conclusion, draw any abstraction.

If you do, your abstraction will be totally different from the other, and that brings about a contradiction, a division. And where there is a division there must be conflict.

So when one observes one's own life, and the life of the world in which we live, the daily monotony, a life of routine, boredom, anxiety, fear, in that world is it possible to live a life that is free of fear, free of anxiety, a life that has movement in which there is never a shadow of contradiction, and therefore remorse and the invitation to all kinds of violence and self-centred activity.
