K: Now you have said something. Which is, escape, suppression, acceptance, which are all implied in analysis, time, which is what? A wastage of energy. I don't know if you see this. That is, I have done all these things, like a silly person because my wife has run away, I have been through all this. And I suddenly realize time will not solve this. So what has happened? I have wasted my energy through analysis, through escape, through saying, I will accept it, but ache inside. All that allows time. Right? And time is not going to solve it. So I must find a way of dealing with the problem immediately. Right? The immediacy implies what? Please follow this. I have wasted energy in all this, and when I say the problem must be solved immediately I have brought all my energy to it, that means all my attention, to it. Have you?

So that means, what is attention? This bringing together all your energy to look at the problem, and you cannot have that total energy if you are wasting it through analysis, through suppression, through finding the cause, saying, yes, time will solve the problem. Right? Is this clear? Verbally at least? Now can that be brought to reality? That is, can I, having listened to you, say, time will not solve it and, because I am fairly intelligent, I won't remain in my old groove, I say, yes, you are quite right. I say, now am I in that position when I bring all my energy to the problem? What do you say, sirs? My wife and I quarrel, that's a problem. I say, I won't allow time, which is the most destructive way of thinking. So what happens? As the wife and I begin to quarrel, the good old business, then if I give attention at that moment what happens? Come on, sirs, what happens? You should know!

Q: I...

K: No, what actually takes place? Would you please, sirs?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Unfortunately, sir, you don't seem to apply the question to yourself. That is, you and your wife quarrel, don't you?

Q: I become silent.

K: Don't say, 'I become silent', sir. You and your wife quarrel, which is the common thing in the world. As the gentleman says, a daily fact. What happens when you don't escape from that fact?

Q: I open myself totally.

K: No, no, you don't open yourself.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Would you stop talking with your hands. What are you trying to say, lady?

Q: I open myself totally.

K: You open yourself totally to your wife - what does that mean?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I'll wave the hands and you talk! This is most extraordinary. Have you done this ever?

Q: Yes.

K: Then, lady, you have solved the problem. Have you done this ever, if you are honest? That is, I and my wife quarrel, at the moment of the quarrelling not to allow time to interfere. Which means you give all your attention at that moment to the quarrel. What happens? Do it, sir, for god's sake, do it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I know sir, all that, we know all that. I know all that.

Q: Then what does it mean?

K: We know all that, sir. That's the common pattern we live by. And I am saying, forget the pattern and see what happens. Sir, please I am pointing out. Break the pattern, that is, the pattern is escape, time, all the rest of it, break it and say, I am going to give my full attention at the moment of quarrel.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Have you done it, sirs? Now wait a minute: you and I are quarrelling now, it is a quarrel, I'll show you. Will you give your complete attention? Then what happens? If you, as the husband or the wife, give complete attention what happens to the other person? Come on, sirs, what happens?

Q: I don't know what happens to the other party.

K: What happens to you?

Q: I look.

K: What are you looking at?

Q: At the pattern.

K: Sir, that gentleman is speaking.

Q: I watch.

K: That's all. That is, you and I are quarrelling, you are always quarrelling, this is an old game, not a recent game. Now I am paying full attention to what you are saying. Are you? No, no, don't be so quick. Are you giving complete attention when I am nagging you? Don't so easily agree, sir, wait sir. I explained what I mean by attention, don't say, yes, I understand. I am asking you: we are quarrelling, and I give my complete attention to that quarrel, and I mean by 'complete attention' I am not escaping, I am not analysing, all my energies are there, watching. So what happens here? I have stopped any sense of being hurt - being hurt - I am not building a wall against her, I am in a position of total attention. Now what's our relationship then? Sir, sir, if you don't talk somebody else will talk.

Q: I am absorbed.

K: No. You see you are using words, what do you mean 'absorbed', in what?

Q: I use words which may be incorrect.

K: Then use correct words, sir. It's not absorption.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, that's not the word. To be absorbed in something implies like a child being absorbed in a toy.

Q: I am one with her.

K: This is a hopeless conversation. When you are completely attentive there is neither absorption, nor one with that, you are attentive. Right? You attend. Now what happens to the person who is not attending? That's your relationship now. I am attending because I don't care whether you listen to me or don't listen to me, but you want to quarrel with me, argue, discuss, so what is your relationship to me. I am attentive, but you are not, then what happens? What happens between two people sir?

Q: There is a division.

K: That's all. What do you do with that division? She is attentive, I am not, she is full of that intense energy, it's only when there is inattention, when there is no attention the quarrels begin. Right? You understand this, sir? When there is complete attention on both sides, nothing, no quarrel, no division. Because we think attention means there is a centre from which I am attending. I say attention means there is no centre at all. Right? So will you please attend? Attend, which means give your total energy to listen to problems that you have - running away from your wife, from your husband, thinking you are frightfully superior than your wife and so on and so on. So as long as there is a division between you and your wife, or your whatever it is, in your relationship, there must be quarrels, there must be fight. Like two nations - look what is happening in the world, fighting, fighting, fighting. So in the same way can you abolish this division? And that can only be wiped away when there is complete attention. Will you give that attention to your problems? You see, sir, in the business world, as I have been told, and I have watched it, the executive finally decides, the top boss, but before it comes to that it goes through various stages. Right? Don't you know all this? The clerk, the minor, it's conveyed to the top, the boss, and he decides. You are doing exactly the same thing. Right? You don't say, this has got to be solved immediately. Our minds don't work that way. We are so traditionally bound that we can't think anything anew. And that's why we become so very dull.

Enlightenment, sir, according to tradition, will take lives, time, struggle, sacrifice, control, you follow. Suppose I don't accept time at all, and say, that's all nonsense - what happens? You do it, sir!

Any more things, sirs? It's a quarter to nine, isn't that enough? Have I answered your questions, sirs? Or are you still carrying on the battle? You can carry on the battle, sir, I won't, the ball is in your court.

Q: In the case of death, don't you think that time helps?

K: I don't. I have explained, lady, time is one of the most destructive factors. Time is death. Yes, sir, you haven't understood what I have said. Time is death.

Q: You have shown us the pain of...

K: Will you do it? Not, I have shown - I have shown you nothing because it is a problem for all humanity. Which says, one day I will solve it, one day I will go to the analyst, or I will take time to analyse it. All that is a wastage of energy.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What are you pointing at, sir?

Q: Could you explain what you mean by 'time is death'?

K: Sir, explanations are pleasant, but they don't meet the fact. I can explain to you how beautiful the mountain is. Right? How lovely the snow, the lines, the valleys, the rivers and the beauty of the sky, but unless you see it yourself it has very little meaning. Now in the same way, I said, time is death. Right? What do you make of it? Don't ask me to explain, I won't, but what do you make of a statement of that kind? You are allowing time, aren't you now? All your life you have allowed time, so you are dying now. Look at you, you are dying. You think death is the final thing. Death is when your mind has gone, when you are caught in tradition - the tradition of time, the tradition of evolution, the tradition of gradualness, the tradition of analysis, all those are traditions in which you are caught. You see you won't break those and you talk about heaven. Right, sir?

MADRAS 5TH PUBLIC TALK 5TH JANUARY 1980

I wonder what you are waiting for. It would be rather interesting also if you could find out for yourself why you come to these talks, what impels you, why you sit here for an hour or so and listen to something. And if you could find out the art of listening, perhaps one would have learnt a great deal. Not only listen to what is being said but listen to the whisper among the leaves. Listen to that so-called music. Listen to your wife or husband, totally, completely, with that quality of attention which is not attending to something; that is, directing your attention to listening, but rather the way you listen, with complete attention, not to what is being said, but to have this quality of attention. And if we could, as we have been doing in the last four talks, or dialogues, whatever you like to call it, I think we would learn a great deal, not from somebody, not from books, not from hearsay, or follow a particular tradition, but really to attend. That implies not directing your thought in a particular direction, with a particular motive, or intention, but merely to observe with total complete attention.

When you so attend there is no centre from which you are attending. I don't know if you follow this point. Because what we are going to talk over together this afternoon or evening, is why we live on concepts, on theories, on assumptions, why the mind, your mind, the human mind, whether in India, or Europe, or America and so on, whether the human mind can be free of concepts, and why we live in concepts. A scientist, for example, has a hypothesis, tests it, and it becomes either a fact or a non-fact. There it is beneficial, necessary. But in the psychological world, that is in our daily life, in our struggles, in our miseries, confusion and so on, why the mind lives in concepts. That is, to conceive an idea, as one has a child, a baby, conceive it, why does the mind, your mind, the human mind of which we are part, why do we live in concepts. Either the concepts have been thrust upon us through education, through tradition, or we conceive life as a problem and try to resolve that problem. First conceive, make an idea, a concept, and then try to resolve through that concept our problems. I don't know if you have noticed this. Please give a little attention if you don't mind.

That is, most people throughout the world, specially the philosophers and the so-called religious people, so-called moral people, who have great values and all the rest of it, first have theories, and then concepts, and then twist life to those concepts. Marxism - Marx - conceived a society, after historical study and so on, and then tried to fit man into that concept, into that framework. Mao, all scientists, all philosophers, everybody does this. I don't know if you are aware that we are doing it now. And what takes place when we act through concepts? You are following this?

Please as we said the other day, and I hope you will not mind if I repeat it again, this is not a lecture by the speaker, you are not being told what to think, or what not to think, it's not propaganda. We are together trying to observe, and therefore act with the extraordinary complex society in which we live, the complexity of our own minds, the narrowness of our own minds, which have become specialized - we are concerned with that, whether it is possible to bring about a mutation in the very nature of the mind.

Which means the senses, emotions, affections, care and the capacity to think very clearly, objectively, non-personally.

And we are asking why the human mind conceives an idea from study, from reading, from listening to philosophers, and listening as you are now. First you conceive an idea and try to put that idea into action. Why does the mind do this? All the so-called great philosophers have done it. All the religions, Christianity, Buddhism and so on, Zen, all those are based on concepts. Concept means to conceive - I won't go into the etymological meaning of the word. It means being either thrust upon by the specialist, the philosophers, the social experts and so on, or you, yourself, observing, hearing, make an abstraction of it, and from that abstraction act. This is obvious, isn't it. May we go on from there?

Now why does the mind do this? If you observe your own mind - I am not being disrespectful or impudent - if you observe your own mind, you live in concepts. The word 'idea' comes from Greek, which means to observe. To observe, not make an abstraction of what you have observed into a concept. Now why do we do this? Because I think it is very important because unless we understand this very, very deeply, the culture in which we have lived for three thousand years, whether you like that culture or not, the so-called Brahmanical culture - please, the speaker is not either for or against, so if some of you are anti-Brahmin don't jump up and fight it, or those who are rabid Brahmins, whatever that may mean, don't be encouraged by what is being said. We are enquiring why a civilization, a culture, which has existed for three thousand years and more disappeared over night. You follow the question? Why? The speaker has discussed this question with a lot of professors, so-called scholars, politicians - they are the last people, of course - various gurus - I don't know why they come to see me, but they do - and one has asked all these people, the experts, philosophers, why. Please follow all this carefully. I am not taking sides; I am neither pro, nor anti. We are enquiring why a civilization, pre-Buddha, has completely disappeared. Is it the western culture with all its vast technological knowledge - communication, railways, aeroplanes, science, medicine - the western culture, which is the technological output has smothered this country? Or they really have no culture at all? They have tradition, they have all kinds of theories. So one asks - please ask yourself, if you are anti-Brahmin or pro-Brahmin, that's totally irrelevant - why. If you observe your religion, like the rest of the world's religions, is purely conceptual, put together by thought. Which means this culture has lived on words. And a human being that lives on words, obviously goes down the drain. And that's what is happening in this country.

So it is very important to find out when we are in a crisis of consciousness - it is not an economic crisis, or a moral crisis, or a population crisis - but a crisis of consciousness, of the mind. A mind that lives on words - just think of it, sirs, what kind of mind it is. You specialize as an engineer, or a scientist, or a sociologist, or a businessman, fixed there, for the rest of your life you don't look at the skies, you never look at the beauty of the trees, you never look at a human being properly, even your wife or husband. So one is always asking why the human mind is living on concepts, what is the process of it? Why you live on words - Hindu, Christian, Buddhist, or any conceptual activity - why? It is very interesting if you go into it very carefully that concepts we believe will lead to action. That is, first conceive or plan a pattern of action, and then act. You are following I hope, all this. Why does the mind do it, your mind? Is it an avoidance of action because you can postpone it, that is, you have an idea of what you should do and you never completely act according to the idea. So there is a contradiction between conceptual action and action. Right? Are you following this?

So is that what is the root cause of any civilization which lives on words? All the symbols of Christianity are just symbols, ideas. When you call yourself a Muslim, or a Hindu, or a Sikh, or god knows what else, it is just a concept. You are essentially a human being first.

So is the making of concepts an escape from action? Has conceptual activity become much more important than action? A conceptual movement has cultivated the brain, the intellect, and the intellect dominates everything? The function of the intellect is to discern, to understand, to gather information to act. And when intellect, that is the capacity to think, conceptually, when that becomes all important, as it has in the world, because all our education is based on that, both in schools, colleges, and universities, then the rest of the area of the mind is disregarded. You can observe it in yourself.

So what then is action without the formulation of concepts? You understand? Are we in communication with each other? I hope so otherwise I will be talking to myself which is not much fun. Is there an action which isn't born out of concepts? The word 'action' means acting, not, having acted, or will act. Please understand this. We are used to this idea of acting according to a precept, to a belief, which are all concepts. And when you act according to an ideal, which thought has created, your action is limited. You are following all this? Your action is born out of the past and therefore it is not action. I wonder if you understand this. Because apparently we are incapable of applying. You hear, say for example, that it is possible to bring about transformation in the very structure of the brain cells and mind, you hear it. If you at all pay attention you hear it. If you watch yourself your immediate reaction is, how? Which is, when you ask the 'how' you have already entered into the field of concepts. Right? So then you have systems, methods, practices, discipline, the whole circus begins. Now can you listen and not make a concept, but apply? You understand? That is, most of us, practically ninety nine per cent people of the world, are caught in fear of some kind or another. We will go into it. And whether you can apply it instantly, immediately and not make a concept of it, and then try to translate that concept into action. You are following all this? I wonder. Right, sir, can I talk to you?

Is fear a concept? Go very slowly please, this is a very complex problem. Is fear born of a concept? If it is, and therefore we have never been able to resolve the problem. You are following this? Because we have carried this burden of fear for generation upon generation, it is born in us, part of our brain, part of our life, part of our activity. And from time immemorial this question has not been resolved. Man through fear goes to the temples, the whole business; fear of the future, fear of losing your job, fear of losing your wife, fear of not fulfilling, fear of not becoming a success, fear of the past, fear of what you have done, that it might catch you up and do something, and so on, this enormous movement of fear. Now we are asking whether it is a word - please listen carefully - which is a concept, or is there that reaction without the word? You are following this?

Look, sir, if you are a Hindu, the word has tremendous meaning, like a Christian, the word, not the fact. Now we are saying, we are enquiring together, observing, observing - now wait a minute, careful. We are not analyzing fear. We are not enquiring into the cause of fears because if you do that involves time. Right? That is, to analyze implies time. To find the cause also involves time, and each one will say my cause is different from yours, and so on, we will everlastingly struggle about it. But a man who says, is there an end to fear, in every way, both physically as well as psychologically, is there an end to it. If you enquire, then is fear a word? That is - I'll explain - that is, there this reaction and that reaction is associated with the memory of a word called fear. You are following this? So the response to that reaction, violence, fear and so on, is immediately taken over by thought as the word, and then the word becomes more important than the fact. Are you following all this? Please, do it as we are talking, otherwise it is no fun, it just becomes a tawdry lecture.

That is, can you look, observe, without an abstraction of what you observe? Are you following this? It needs great attention. You are afraid. That's the common lot. Can you observe it? That is, to look at the arising of fear, and then enquire, watch it, whether it is the product of a concept, a word, an association with previous fears, which means knowledge, and that knowledge then says it is fear. I wonder if you follow this? This is very important to understand, please spend a little time on this. Because it is possible to be totally free of fear: fear of examinations, if you are a student, and I hope you are not that kind of student who merely studies and passes a lot of examinations, then your brain is very limited, and you end up as a glorified clerk, or a glorified something or other. So it is very important to understand this question. One recognizes, if one observes, that the brain in its very process of responding to memory, which is thought, is thinking in words. Right? And the nervous response to any emotion is immediately translated in terms of concepts, and those concepts then act upon the fact. I wonder if you meet this. Right sir? So can you observe this reaction without the word? The moment you observe it with the word of fear, then the past memory, past reactions, past knowledge, has taken over. So then the past cannot act. I wonder if you meet this point. The past can only act according to experience, knowledge, therefore it is always limited. Whereas if you observe fear without the word - can you observe your wife, or your husband without the word. You understand? The image, the associations, the quarrels, the whole implications of a relationship between man and woman, which has been built up through a million years, can you observe your wife, or your husband, or your friend, the image that you have - image being the word, the concept. Right sir? Can you do it? No, don't - please.

We have learnt in this country, I think mostly, when we say, yes, we don't mean it. We say it, let's get on. Which leads to total dishonesty. So if you have integrity, don't say anything that you don't know yourself, that is not your own direct perception, not taken over by somebody else, experience. Because we have no integrity, we have lost it in this country, right from the top to the bottom. With money apparently you can do anything. So integrity means saying things that you actually mean.

So we are saying, that there is the possibility of wiping out totally, I mean by that word absolutely, all sense of fear. You might say, that's nonsense. Because you haven't tried it, you haven't applied. So can you observe your fear without its associations? Can you observe your wife or husband without the past associations - of pleasure, of comfort, bullying, of nagging, you know all the rest of that stuff that goes on between man and woman?

And physical fear, we generally don't meet a tiger so we are pretty safe; but the fear of pain, physical pain, which one has had - please follow this a little bit. You may have been to a dentist, to a doctor, had some kind of illness that has given you pain, the mind, the brain registers that pain, because the function of the brain is to register in order to protect itself. You are following all this? So you have physical pain, and it is registered as pain in the brain, and you are frightened that it might happen again. You follow? Now can you end that pain as it arises, when it is over, finish, not carry it over? You understand what I am saying? Please do it, you will see what extraordinary things take place. That's not a reward! I am pointing out, if you are interested, if you are concerned with the freedom of fear, which burdens your lives, narrows, it is the greatest shadow in life, it is the most destructor reaction. If you are interested, and if you feel the utter importance of being free from fear, you have to look at it without any sense of association. That requires a great deal of attention. Not attending to fear, but the quality of attention that observes. You understand what I am saying? Now you have heard this, have you made it into an abstraction, into a concept? And then say, please tell me how to carry out, how am I to be free of fear? You follow? You don't hear the whole thing but your mind is so trained, caught in this conceptual world and when you hear this, about fear, you have already moved into an abstraction. From that abstraction you say, please tell me what to do, how am I to get rid of fear about my wife. That is, you have not, if I may point out, you have not listened. When you make a concept, you are not acting. When you hear this whole movement of fear, the root of it, which is obviously put together by thought. Fear is time - fear of the past, fear of the future, fear. Time is involved. And somebody like the speaker says you can end it completely - what's your reaction to it? You understand my question? How do you respond to it? Or you are so caught up in concepts that you cannot free yourself from it, therefore you cannot act immediately about fear. Please examine your own minds. Time will not solve the problem of fear. Time, we say, will quieten the fear. It hasn't. It's like having cancer, it is there. You might postpone it, because you said, wait, but the disease is there, so fear is there, time will not solve it. On the contrary time will complicate the issue.

So when you listen, if you at all listen completely, then there is no movement of thought but merely observation. You understand this? As we said, observation is action, not observation, concept, action.

And it is the same with pleasure, it's one of your problems. The mind that is seeking pleasure is invariably attached. Right?

Attached to the action that brings pleasure. That's why sexually you depend, sexually, it is a mutual exploitation based on pleasure, and therefore the attachment begins. And if you observe the various forms of pleasure, pleasure of possessions, pleasure of achievement, pleasure of being able to control your body excellently, the pleasure of knowledge, the pleasure of those professors, philosophers, who have carved out a corner of this universe into a little hole, and there they remain. You know this.

So pleasure takes multiple forms. That is what? There is an action that brings pleasure - please observe it yourself, don't - that is an action that brings pleasure and that pleasure is registered in the brain, and thought says, continue, have more of it. That is, pleasure is always within the field of time. Am I making it complicated? And then one enquires, what is time. You follow? What is time? There is time which it takes for you to go from here to your house. Time is necessary for a seed to grow into a tree, biologically time is necessary. That is to cover the distance from here to there horizontally or vertically. Right? And we have introduced time as a means of psychological progress. Right? One is violent, I will take time to be non-violent. Like the League of Nations - I mean United Nations - all nations there are separate, but one day it will all be international, which never takes places. So time is a movement to cover from one point to another, both physically as well psychologically. Now we are questioning whether there is time at all psychologically. You understand? Question it, sir, ask it. Or it is one of our concepts that time is necessary. That is, if one is violent, one invents the non-violence, which is non-fact, and pursues the non-fact, which is illusion. The word 'illusion', ludere, means to play with something which is not actual. Come on sirs. The dictionary doesn't say so, I say so.

So is there time psychologically? Is there time for fear to end? Which is a psychological process. That is, can fear end immediately, the whole of it, not just one fragment of it? You understand my question, you are following all this? Are you all tired? I hope you are working. That is, our brain is conditioned to the idea of time, the brain itself has evolved through time, from the anthropoid ape down to now. And that same concept of time is taken over psychologically. That is, I will be, or I have been, and I shall be. Now our brain has used time as a means of healing the wound of fear. And we are asking, can the brain free itself from its tradition? You follow what I am saying, sir? You can free yourself from your puja, your rituals, and all the rest of it. That's fairly simple. You see the nonsense of it, a lot of words which have very little meaning, whether Christian, garbed in marvellous clothes, or a man who is half naked, it is the same thing.

So the brain has been conditioned, handed down from generation to generation: fear can be resolved only through time. Now can you break that tradition? You understand what I am saying? And see if fear, the complexity of it, not just one part of it, can be completely dissolved, immediately. The speaker says it can, otherwise you are playing with words. That means your mind must be extraordinarily alert. Right? Your senses must be fully active. No? Are you all asleep? Are you being mesmerized by the speaker?

Sir, look, our senses, which we kind of disregard, or cultivate one special sense, we have never looked or encouraged all the senses to be active, which means to be highly sensitive. Because we have never been able because of religious doctrines, and various forms of inhibitions, have never been able to say, now let's find out if all our senses, everything, can be physically, extraordinarily active. When there is such clear, sensory, total sensory response, there is no centre from which you are observing. Are you following this? Do do this, sir. When you look at a sunset, or at a tree, or at water, the sea, look at it with all your senses, not just with your eyes, optical response, but hear, smell, taste, the whole thing is operating. Then you will see that the centre which has been associated with the self, the self-centred activity comes to a total end. Now wait a minute. It may come to a total end for a second, but we say, can that second continue. Because immediately, see what has happened, you have made a concept of that second into a concept and want to carry that concept out. You are following all this? Which means you have moved away from the actuality.

So pleasure, like fear, is the movement of time. Got it? Look, go into it very carefully, you will see it for yourself. Sexual pleasure, the image, the thought, the thinking about it, being associated to it, being attached to that, then what happens? Where there is attachment there is no love. Right? Now just a minute. The speaker says, where there is any form of attachment there is no love. Now you hear that, how do you hear it? You understand my question? What is your response to that statement? Do you say it is nonsense? Or what do you mean by it? Which means, explain. Explanation, commentaries about that statement, is what you live on, because you live on commentaries. So you haven't listened to that statement: where there is attachment there is no love. I'll explain why, go into it, but the explanation has no meaning if there is not the immediate response to that. Right?

Sir, there's so much to talk about, there's today and tomorrow. I want to cram everything in these two days.

So can you listen to that statement: where there is attachment of any kind, any dependency, any memory of pleasure, it is not love. Now if one asked, do you love your wife or your friend, they would say, of course. And perhaps here in this country you don't even know that word. Because if you loved your wife really you would treat her differently. Right? Woman's place in India is really quite terrible. You have no 'Women's Lib' here. So when you ask, what is love, are you asking it to have a concept about it, to have an explanation about it? Then if you do, you are off. Right? And as we don't know what love is, because if we did there would be no jealousy, no hatred, no competition, this sense of ambition is gone, personal desire for fulfilment and all the rest of it, both sexual and otherwise, all that goes. So if there is to be that love one must be completely free of jealousy. Can you? Completely free of attachment. But you don't want to be free of either attachment, or the complications of your personal relationship, you would rather tolerate all that, put up with anything, as you do put up with everything in this country, from the extraordinary squalor, dirt, a government that is so corrupt, you put up with anything. So you say, 'This is all right, what about love, why should I have it, don't bother. I have carved myself an unpleasant corner in this universe with my wife, with my job, with my little children, that's good enough'. And that's death. That's why now you are all dying. Right sir?

So how will you have this flower, the great beauty of love? Beauty is not mere form - a beautiful tree with its form, with its trunk, with its leaves, the outward show of it; beauty comes with integrity, with freedom. The word 'freedom' originally, etymologically, meant love. So either you want to come to that water which is everlastingly pure, it can never be polluted by thought, and therefore your life then becomes like a flower, beauty. Or you want to live in the squalor that you are living in. Perhaps your house is fairly clean, but I doubt it. But a squalor of our minds.

So can all this end? You understand sir? Concepts, lack of integrity, having no fear of any kind - you don't know what it means even. And having this extraordinary jewel, which is incorruptible, love. Either that, or remain with this confusion, misery, sorrow. It is not a matter of decision, it is not a matter of choice, saying, I will choose this or that, but the man who is serious, who is concerned with the world, with all the terrible things that are going on in the world, and also the ugliness and the pettiness, and the shoddiness of our own lives, and seeing that, observing that, out of that comes complete action.

And what is the relationship of love to our daily life? Right? You know that is one of the most absurd questions ever put. What is the relationship of your breathing to your life. Right? Exactly!

And also there is this vast question, very complex question of death, sorrow. I don't know if we have time, not now.

Sirs, human beings right throughout the world are at a crossroads, whether one is aware of it or not. And all the scholars, and all those people say, scientists included, that the ascent of man depends on his knowledge. The more he has knowledge the greater the ascent. Knowledge is memory, past experience, collected in the brain, memory. Which is, if you are living in the past everlastingly, the past is ascending. Get it? Human beings are not ascending.

They ascend only when there is no fear, and they've understood the nature of pleasure and desire, and when there is love there is real explosion of the mind. And it's up to you whether you want to break the shackles of time, or live in it. Right sir?

MADRAS 6TH PUBLIC TALK 6TH JANUARY 1980 'SORROW, DEATH AND MEDITATION'

Shall we sit quietly for awhile, it would be rather nice. Not meditate or anything like that, just sit quietly, then we can probably observe our own activities of mind, our own behaviour, our own conduct, our ways of daily life, our relationship with others, our relationship with each other, intimate or superficial. We have hardly any leisure, we are so occupied, from morning until night. And even if we do sleep our minds, our brains are constantly active, dreaming, unresolved problems being solved consciously or unconsciously, and so on. And in the last five talks we have covered most of the complicated areas of our life. I think we ought to also talk over this evening sorrow, death and meditation. On a pleasant evening like this, a rather nice cool breeze, to talk about death seems rather irrelevant. A lovely sky and looking at the sky through the leaves, and the strange silence of an evening that seems to descend on earth about this time, and to talk about the ending of life, or death, though irrelevant, or may be relevant, it is part of our life, like sorrow. And we want solutions, answers immediately for all our problems. That is what we all expect, answers to a very complex life. We don't want to examine the complexity, the diversity, the enormous superficial differences, height, colour, capacities, skill. And we don't want answers for those superficial problems, like business, scientific research, social studies and so on, but we want answers, psychological answers, solutions for our problems. Probably that's why you are here.

These problems can be solved immediately. That is, if you immediately change your life, if you immediately behave righteously, if you immediately change your relationship with each other, completely. That is the final absolute answer for your problems. But we won't, because our brains are accustomed, trained, to postpone, to put up with, to acquiesce, to yield, never enquiring, never going into the problem very deeply. We want somebody to tell us what to do. And we have as human beings relied for thousands of years on somebody to tell us what to do - your books, your gurus, your philosophers, the Upanishads, all the rest of it. Probably most of you have read them, but you are where you are in spite of all that.

So the problem is how you approach the problem, not the problem itself but how you come to it. This is really very important to understand because we are going to go into problems like sorrow, death and meditation, which are very complex, it needs all your attention, all your care, all your passion. So how do you approach any problem, both physical and psychological: how you come to it, what's your motive, what's your intention, what's your end? Because the motive, the direction, the demand for an answer, those prevent the solution of the problem because your approach is already directed, is already conditioned, you have already come with a conclusion. The answer must be that, satisfactory, comfortable, if I can use the word, bourgeois, highly respectable and so on.

So it matters very much if you are serious, if you are willing to find out for yourself how you approach any problem. If you are a scientist you approach your problem with a hypothesis, and try to prove that hypothesis to be correct; or if it is not you reject that hypothesis and pick up another until through hypotheses you prove the fact. Then from the fact you move to another hypothesis, and so on, you build up a series of activities ending in knowledge. If you are an engineer, a philosopher, your motive is obviously to gain money, to fulfil your ambitions and so on. If you are a philosopher, I don't know if you are, I hope you aren't - if you are a philosopher there is not only your private life, which is already very complex, but you try to escape from that complexity of relationship through ideas, through a lot of reading and so on.

So what is your approach to this problem, the problems of sorrow, the problem of death and what is that thing called meditation, what is meditation? What is your approach? Is it traditional, it is an escape, is there a motive that is directing your observation? Or are you free to approach the problem? You understand my question? Because it is only a free mind that can look, that can observe, that can solve the problem. But if you have your prejudices, your conclusions, your concepts and try to understand the problems through the conflict, prejudices and conclusions, you will never solve them, because your conclusions, your concepts are going to dictate what the problem should be. So if you approach it freely then you can look at the problem. Then the problem itself has an answer. You understand? Are we following each other? I must find a face that can say, yes, or no.

If we have a problem of this kind, sorrow, whether there is an ending to sorrow, and the extraordinary thing called death, and the various forms of meditation that have been cultivated throughout the centuries, those are our problems. As we have dealt with other problems previously in the five talks that we have had here, we are now facing these problems. How do you come to it? If you are a traditionalist you will translate sorrow as something that is the result of what you have done in your past life, and you have solved the problem. At least you think you have. And so you say, next life it will be better. During this life you put up with sorrow, and say it's your karma, or whatever word you use, and you put up with it. Which is one of our peculiar habits, to put up with anything.

Now a mind that is traditional, that acquiesces, puts up with everything, how can it solve a problem, a human problem? Which demands that you enquire, that you look, that you exercise your energy. So if you will kindly find out for yourself how you approach the problem, because the approach dictates the answer or the solution. If you approach it freely the answer is in the problem. That's because problem exists only when you have not comprehended fully, when you have not seen the full context, the full implications, the consequences of all that, and that's why it remains a problem. I hope you are following all this.

So if one is at all serious, and one must be serious in a world that is so rapidly declining, degenerating, and if you are at all serious, not intellectually, not verbally, but serious from your heart, from your blood, from your guts, then you must enquire what is your approach to any problem. If you are free, that is, your mind is capable of observing without any pressure, which is very difficult because we always act under pressure because of over population, and disorder, you are acting under pressure. So if you are approaching this problem of sorrow with any kind of pressure, the very ending of it, which becomes a pressure in itself, if there is not any pressure, any urge to find a solution or an answer, then your mind is terribly alive. It's logical. If you are logically minded, which is verbally, carefully explain, then you might say, I intellectually understand, but I can't free myself from the pressures I have, the conditionings of my tradition, my beliefs. So your concern is not then with sorrow but with your traditions, which is much more important than the ending of sorrow. So you are caught both ways. You understand? Either you come to it freely, openly, without a single shadow of prejudice, or pressure; or you realize your own prejudices, your own conclusions and concepts, and end those. Only then you can understand the problem with all its implications.

So if you are prepared, not preparation, that means time, I don't mean that - if you have listened to what has been said, and that very listening has brought about your attention to your own prejudices, conclusions and concepts, and you put those aside, not for this afternoon, or for this evening, when you put them aside you put them aside, it is not a game we are playing, either intellectual, or emotional or romantic, it is a very serious affair.

So we are enquiring, observing, and following the movement of sorrow. You understand? It is not a fixed thing, sorrow. You have put it in a cage and you are observing it. It is a great movement of life, a movement that has been started from the beginning of time. So that movement we have inherited, and also we have acquired it. So it is this whole movement which we call, name as sorrow, grief, pain, it is part of our life, it is part of our daily, everyday life. If we approach it freely it means you are not escaping from it. If you approach it freely then what is sorrow? It's like the shadow of our life, you can't escape from it. That's the first thing to realize that there is no possibility of escape from sorrow. We have tried it, we have said it's karma, past life, but the sorrow remains in spite of your convenient comfortable explanations. Nor can you suppress it by going to the temples, night clubs, drink, drugs, women or men, whatever you do to escape, you can't run away, you can't escape from this thing, suppress it, deny it or put up with it. When you put up with something like sorrow it destroys your mind. When you put up with the dirt, the squalor of the street you are not sensitive, your mind becomes dull, you become insensitive. But if you rebel against it, if you say, I won't have it, then you begin to be active.

So our theories, concepts and our religion all over the world has made us insensitive, has made us dull. So here is the problem: what is sorrow? Why human beings throughout the ages have never resolved that problem. You understand my question? Why you, who have must have sorrow, grief, psychological pain, hurt, psychologically hurt, this is part of sorrow, why we go on with it? So one asks, is there an end to it? The ending doesn't mean an explanation, which is how am I going to end sorrow, which means you are asking for a solution of sorrow. And you will be satisfied, if the speaker is stupid enough to give a comfortable answer, to which you will naturally say, yes, quite right, I accept that. But the explanation, the answer doesn't solve your sorrow. A new explanation, a new answer, will become the old answer in a couple of days, so that will become the tradition. You are following all this? Please, move with me, if you are willing.

So we are asking what is sorrow. What is the relationship between sorrow and passion? I am not talking - we are not talking about lust. Lust is - you know what it is better than I do. We are asking the etymological meaning, passion and sorrow. When you enquire into the question of passion it comes with the ending of sorrow. You are following all this? Passion means suffering from which arises that passion which is not physical, which is totally the ending of a great burden which man has carried. You understand? Are you following this? Please, sirs, are we meeting each other? Please don't be so mesmerized! You see the word, we are examining the meaning of words, which is passion and sorrow are interrelated etymologically, the root meaning. Now when you suppress, or escape, or try to explain it away, you lose the immense energy that is brought about in passion. You understand? No, no, please verbally understand it first. That is, sorrow, like passion, are words to indicate a state of mind in which there is a great deal of pain, grief, tears, sense of immense loneliness, a sense of isolation. Right? That's how when that takes place you feel great sorrow. Now feeling that sense of great burden, great grief, pain, we don't know how to resolve it. We have tried explanations, causes, we haven't solved it. But not knowing what to do with it we try to run away from it, postpone it, you know all the tricks we play when we want to avoid something. Now if we don't avoid it, and see the full meaning of sorrow, out of that total comprehension, not intellectual comprehension, or verbal comprehension, but the total feeling of that brings about passion. And without passion you can never be free. Yes, sir!

Without passion you can never be creative. You may be creative when you are lustful, but we are not talking about that kind of creation, producing a baby, that's quite easy. But we are talking of something quite different. Which is, most of us have lost this passion because we are not passionate people, nobody is. They are passionate about something or other - a passionate scientist, a passionate writer, a passionate golfer. We are not talking of that kind of passion. A person who observes the movement of sorrow, which is the loss of somebody whom you love, or you think you love, the sense of loneliness, the great amount of shedding of tears, the weeping, the sense of isolation, having no relationship with anybody else. Don't you know all this? When you are completely isolated. And our minds are so trained, so educated that when there is this tremendous crisis in one's life we seek an immediate answer. We try to seek an immediate answer so we never face that crisis. You are following all this? Face it, as you are now, if you are listening, being forced to face it under pressure of the speaker. But if there is no pressure and you face it for yourself, then what is that pain? Is it something that man has inherited from time immemorial? Go into it sirs, go slowly. Like our brains which we have inherited through evolution. The human mind, which is not your mind or my mind, the human mind, is that part of its inheritance? That is, the remembrance from father's father down to the present generation, where man has solved this problem. Or is it self-pity? Which we are excellent at! Or is it the sense of deep abiding unconscious loneliness? Please, sirs, follow all this. I am not talking for my own pleasure. You understand?

So we are asking these questions. So find out sirs, and ladies, if you are interested, whether this loneliness if you have ever known it, if you have ever felt that desperate isolation. And because we have not resolved it that isolation is part of this sorrow. You understand what I am saying? That is, we are self-centred human beings. All our activities are centred in ourselves and we act from there. And this self-centred activity is a process of isolation. You see, that doesn't need explanation. Each person seeking his own fulfillment and ambition, his own pleasure, his own importance and so on and so on, all these are bringing about a self-centred, enclosing, narrow, limited, activity, which ultimately deeply unconsciously brings about this sense of terrible depressing loneliness. And can you face that loneliness? Not run away, just observe it. When you so observe you are bringing all your energy to that perception. You understand what I am saying? And when you bring all your energy to that loneliness then you will find, if you do it, your total energy, in which there is no escaping, no running away, no suppressing, no trying to solve it, but this deep perception which brings total energy, you will find that loneliness is dissipated. And the same thing, if you are caught in the explanations of your sorrow - karma, past life, circumstances, competition, you are not so good as your brother, or your uncle, you know, all the rest of it, this perpetual competition we indulge in, which means comparing, suppressing yourself in order to be like somebody, imitating, conforming - all that also emphasizes the narrowing down of this tremendous energy of the mind to a narrow centre from which inevitably action becomes limited and therefore painful. You are following all this?

And if it is immemorial, handed down from generation to generation, this sorrow, then can the mind break that tradition? That is, to observe that tradition, if it is a tradition. Then with that observation, that perception, is the gathering of all your energy to look.

So out of this perception, observation, staying with a thing, you understand, staying, that is staying non-moving from this sorrow, then out of that comes passion. And with passion goes love. Love is not lust; love is not pleasure; love is not desire. It is the ending of sorrow and the passion that comes with it which is love, compassion.

What's the good of my saying all this, sirs? The speaker, to him it is a reality. It is something that, to him is true, it is not false. He doesn't say anything that is not true to himself. It is not that I want to please you, I am not interested. You can go your way, and I go my way. I am not exploiting you as an audience. I am not relying on one's reputation, and all that nonsense. Because one lives this kind of life, therefore one is terribly honest.

And the next question is: death. The first thing is, to ask oneself, if you are interested, why human beings have excluded death from living. You understand my question? Why human beings from the ancient Egyptians to now, all the civilizations which have existed before, have put death at the end - fifty, ten, thirty, eighty, ninety, whatever age, and never said, why am I, why are we excluding death from living? You understand my question? Please understand the question first. Why? Which means, what is living which doesn't know the ending? You understand my question?

Sir, you understand what is being said? Why have people written so much about death, volumes, about reincarnation, remembrances of the past, the psychologists have mesmerized people and gone into the whole business of previous life and so on and so on. Philosophers, religious people, both Christian and Hindu, and all the so-called religious people, they have written volumes; but nobody has taken the trouble to write about life. You understand? Our daily, iniquitous, immoral, fantastically stupid way we are living. Nobody talks about it. Right? Only we say, you must behave properly.

So we are first enquiring what is living and what is ending? The ending is what we call death. So we are asking: what is living and what is ending? And why we human beings have put the ending as far away from us as possible? You understand my questions, sirs? Right? What is living? What is existence? What is our life? Not super consciousness and all that nonsense, but daily life, what is our life? Is there never - please listen - is there never ending to something in our life? You understand? Ending smoking, if you are a smoker, ending it. If you are a drug addict, ending it. If you are caught in the sexual imaginative pleasure, end it. So what is ending? You understand my question? And what is living? So I am saying to myself, asking, do not living and ending go together? You understand my question? You understand, sir? Are you interested in all this? Not up here, I know you are all very clever at this kind of thing, but I am talking much more deeply, that will affect our life, our daily behaviour, our daily conduct, our daily sense of existence.

So have you ever ended anything without pressure? You understand my question? Anything without finding a cause, analysis, wasting time on it, say, end it. That's what's going to happen when death comes to you. You can't argue with it, say, please give me a few more days. You can't analyse it, you can't discuss with it. I know the Upanishads discuss it, that's in poetic form, but if you are confronted with death consciously, not when you are unconscious, then you are out, but when you are consciously alive to death you can't argue with it. That is, there is the ending, which means the ending of your brain, your heart comes to an end, the circulation stops, and the brain collapses. Which is the ending of what we call living. And when you examine, if you will, your own life, your life, not my life, nor some saint's life, or some guru, or some other imaginary or real rather unevolved people - you accept all this? If you examine your own life, what is your life? A struggle, conflict, pain, sorrow, grief, and this ambition, competition, conformity, following a tradition blindly or accepting it. So that is business, going to an office from morning until night. Do you realize what your life is? That you go to the office from nine until five. Right? And there bullied. What kind of life do you lead? And you will say to that, we can't alter the society in which we live. A very convenient, comfortable answer. That society, you, your grandfathers and mothers, have created it. Right? Through their ambition, through their greed, through their conformity, through their tradition, and all the rest of it, they have created this thing. And so you are part of it, whether you like it or not. And to change it you have to change yourself. When you begin to change yourself, you begin to change society.

So when you examine your life very closely, it is really a very sorrowful affair. And you would rather go on with it and say, perhaps I will have a chance next life. If you examine the 'me', the 'I', the ego, the soul, the atman, you know, all that stuff, what is that? You understand my question? Are you following this sirs? You believe in some kind of permanency, don't you? Some kind of entity that will get more and more polished as it goes along through time, until it reaches the highest principle, Brahman, or Nirvana, or Moksha, or whatever you like to call it. So you believe that there is an ego, a self, a higher self, the atman, the soul, the principle, that moves from life to life. Right? Right, don't you? If you are honest. Now what is that? What is that thing that the mind clings to? Right? What is that? Have you examined it? Or you just say, yes, there is this permanent something marvellous, in me. When you examine it very closely, is it not the result of thought? The thought of your ancestors, the thought which has been put in the Upanishads, or the Gita, or some Bible, or some book, the poets that have written the Gita, and they have established that through tradition so that there is in you something that goes on through time. Right? Right sirs? Would you be honest? That's your tradition, handed down. And when you look at it very carefully, impersonally, sanely, you will find inevitably if you are an enquiring mind, it is nothing but the creation of thought. That is you, what are you? Name, a form, educated to have a degree, or not educated, you are a lawyer and all the rest of it, a fisherman - you wouldn't be a fisherman, no, sorry. So you are all that, your sorrows, your griefs, your Brahmin, non-Brahmin, this and that, you are the result of all time. And therefore the result of all thought. Thought is the response of memory, memory is the accumulation of knowledge as experience stored up in the brain. You may accept it, you may not, but scientists and the speaker - the speaker talked about it many, many years ago, and the scientists now are beginning to accept it. So you are that, you are nothing but thought. You don't like it, I know.

So, now watch it, sir. Knowledge can never be complete. That's obvious. Knowledge always goes with ignorance. Knowledge is always in the shadow of ignorance. Therefore any thought springing from knowledge must always be ignorant. Logical, sir. And so thought has created this entity separating itself from the rest of mankind as the 'me', the individual, who will go on. Right? Now your mind, observe it, sir, for god's sake, your mind, your brain, is the result of thousands of years of evolution, both genetically and in memory, tradition, your mind is that. The mind being your brain, your senses, your emotions, all that has grown through so-called evolution. Not 'so-called', evolution. So you are not an individual. Right? Yes, sir, you won't like this. You are part of this vast mind of man. You understand all this sir? Look at it. I know it goes against all your tradition, against your own desires, against your own comfort. But it is a fact. But when you realize the fact you enter into a world that is extraordinary: you are the entire humanity. You understand, sir? Because you suffer, you have agonies, you have doubts, you are hurt, you are ambitious, anxious, uncertain, confused, like the rest of the human beings in the world. You are part of that humanity, you are that humanity. You may be brown, or white, or pink, or blue, or black, you may be tall, or short, you may be an engineer and another a physicist. That's not what we are talking about - the human being inside, his brain.

So please follow all this. Then what is death? You understand my question sir? When you realize the fact, an absolute fact, irrevocable, that you are the rest of mankind, you are mankind, the man who goes fishing, naked, that poor woman sweeping a street, that little girl making a mess in the road, you are all that. You are humanity. This is not an humanitarian idea, it is a fact. If that is so

- not 'if', it is so, then what is death? You understand my question? Please sir, move. You are all so... Then what is death? Then is there such a thing as death? You understand what I am about? Come on sirs!

I, born in this country, educated abroad, at various colleges and all the rest of it, name, and certain qualities, like you, and one realizes that your mind, your brain, your feelings, your senses are the essence of humanity, then what is K? You understand? Do you follow what I am saying? Then what is K? Then what is death? If when you realize and end this concept - it is a concept, a conclusion put together by thought that I am special - when that ends, that's what I mean, ending. Then what happens? You have never come to that point, you see.

Sir, when you end something, it doesn't matter what, when you end an attachment, to your wife, to your belief, to your gods, to your guru, to your concept, when you end something, what takes place? Have you ever done it? When you end something the new takes place, doesn't it? Something totally new takes place. Doesn't it, sir? If one has a habit of smoking, and you drop it instantly, what happens? Your body rebels, you go through all that very quickly. Not that I have ever smoked or done all that stuff. It ends. Then you have lifted, the brain has freed itself from a certain burden. If you have ended an attachment, completely ended it, then that tremendous burden of attachment with pain, anxiety, jealousy, all the rest of it, when you end it something totally new is taking place. But you won't do any of that. You will listen, and say, "I quite agree, it sounds very nice, but I am too lazy, I am too caught up in my own tradition, in my own etc., etc." and remain there.

This is the game you play all the time, knowing the facts and refusing to face the facts.

So a man whose mind is the universe, the universe of humanity, to him there is no death. You don't get this. Because whatever he is doing he is ending, never carrying.

Then we must talk about meditation. It is seven o'clock, we will go on, if you are not tired. No? You jolly well should be! If you have exercised your minds, your brains, your senses, you must be exhausted. The speaker is not because he is, you know.

What is meditation? And why is it important to meditate? Why have human beings throughout the ages enquired into this? You understand this question sirs? Can we briefly examine, quickly, and set aside completely every form of systems of meditation? Zen, Buddhist meditation, the various types of meditation of the Hindus with their mantras, the repetitions of mantras, you know all that business that goes on, and the Christian form of meditation, the Tibetan form of meditation. They are all based, if you observe it closely, on concepts. Right? Concepts put together by thought. And thought says, I am restless, I am chattering all the time, there must be some time when it is quiet. So we begin with a concept - follow it, sirs - with a concept that it must be quiet, it must be still. So you practise, you follow the system of that person, or that person, that man who says, I know how to meditate, you do this, you do that. And we think he has got something which we want and we are willing to buy what he has, through meditation. Right? I am sorry to be rather... but that is what we do actually.

So if you can see that all those forms are the structure of thought, which they are, then will you end it? That is, no system, no method, no practice, yoga - oh, gosh, you know all the rest of it. Sir, it has been the speaker's misfortune, or fortune, to talk to all the experts about this - Zen, Tibetan, Yogi people, you know, they are all concerned with the control of thought, suppression of thought, following a system, practising day after day, day after day, making themselves into machines. And this is called meditation. Right? Would you acknowledge that? I know you practise meditation, you do puja, but it is all words. And you are like your gods, they are all put together by thought.

So can we see the whole process of that from the great Himalayas, East and West, and all that, and put all that aside? Then what is meditation? You understand what I am asking? Certainly not standing on our head, or sitting in a lotus posture, or whatever it is, not breathing. If you could put all that aside then you will inevitably ask: conscious meditation is not meditation. Right? Conscious, that is, the deliberate process of will, desire, compliance, imitation, practice, all that indicates a conscious effort by thought, by desire, desire with its strong will to achieve a certain result. That is, to have a mind that is absolutely quiet. Right? Now if you do all those things - practise yoga, you know, all that, what have you done to your mind? Don't you see what you have done to your mind? Look at you. You have become machines, you have established a routine. Right, sir? Do wake up for god's sake.

So - follow it carefully - conscious meditation, with all the implications involved which I briefly explained, is no longer meditation. Right? I know. So then what is meditation which is not conscious? You understand my question? Because man throughout the ages has searched for something beyond time. Searched, looked at, enquired, something that is incorruptible, something beyond all experience, beyond all knowledge, outside of all human endeavour. Because human endeavour is the movement of thought in different directions. And thought born of knowledge is very limited. So he said there must be somewhere, something that is not perishable, that is incorruptible, that is timeless, eternal. That seed has been sown in man from time immemorial. You understand sir? And we have got that seed moving all through mankind. And we have never opened, or looked at that seed. We have said what that seed should be. You understand what I am saying? For god's sake move sir. We have said what that seed must do, what its activities are, we clothe it with all kinds of ignoble or noble clothes, but we never said, "This thing which man has started from time immemorial, I wonder if it can ever flower, grow". You understand my question, sirs? That is meditation. That is, to be in a life, daily life, behaviour which is correct, accurate, right, in daily life, where there is no conflict, where there is affection, care - not for your children, care for the world around you; care for your woman, for your man, so that there is no domination of each other, no exploitation of each other. If that isn't laid down as a foundation, you can't move. Do you understand, sirs? What you are trying to do, you neglect all that and try to find some god somewhere. If you don't begin there, what you will end up with is an illusion. The word illusion means to play with something that is not real. The etymological meaning is ludere, to play.

So you are playing with illusions, or rather, you are caught in illusions if you don't have your house in order. And your house is burning, and if you don't begin there, which is bring right behaviour, right order, care, affection, love, compassion, which can only come when there is the ending of sorrow, then you begin to enquire when the mind knows what it means to die, ending everything everyday. Yes, sir! It is too long now, that is, the mind, the brain is registering, it may be quick. I'll show you. The brain is registering, registering in order to live, survive - engineer, scientist, philosopher, whatever it is, carpenter, fisherman, he must register, otherwise he can't be an engineer, but psychologically can we end registering at all? You don't know all these things. What kind of brains have you got? Sir, end your hurt immediately: the hurt which you have carried from childhood, or the hurt which you received from your wife, husband, office, or whatever it is, the hurt inside, to end it immediately. Which is not to register the hurt. That means to pay tremendous attention when the hurt is beginning to come into being.

So meditation can never be conscious, can never be thought out, premeditated. Then you will find very naturally and very easily there is a quality of stillness in the mind. And it is only that enormous sense of stillness and silence, and the brain then is in a vast space, then only truth can come into being. And that's real meditation.

May I sit still for a few minutes, a few seconds?

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 7TH APRIL 1979

I hope you are all comfortable, that you are used to sitting on the ground. You know wherever you go in the world life is becoming rather dangerous and there is a great deal of disorder, politically, economically and socially. Nobody seems to bring about order in all this mess. And human beings have many, many, many problems, psychological as well as problems of relationship, problems of meditation, problems of death and so on. And we are going to, during these six talks and four discussions, go into all these matters carefully, perhaps in great detail; and before we go into all those I think it would be wise if we could think over these matters together. We only seem to think together when there is a great crisis like war, or great earthquakes, epidemics, and the moment they are over we return to our own particular little desires, petty reactions, our own little conflicts, our own personal problems. We never seem to think together. And I think it is very important, if I may, that we should go into this matter first before we go into the human problems, which are very, very complex, that need resolution, that needs human endeavour and clarity.

So if we may this morning go into this question of what it is to think together. Please, this is a serious meeting, this is not an entertainment, something by which you are stimulated, or asked to believe. This is not a meeting for propaganda purposes. So if we may ask you to be serious because we are going to talk over a great many problems that affect our lives, so you must, if one may ask, give your attention, your care, your mind, your heart to find out the solution to all our problems. And there are solutions which we shall go into as we go along. But first it seems important that we think together. I mean by that word 'think together', by those words, most of us have our own particular capacities of thought, our own particular prejudices, our own concepts, ideals, beliefs, conclusions, and we hold on to them. They become far more important than to find out if we can communicate with each other, whether we can think together over our problems, problems which demand that we both of us together investigate, explore. And we cannot possibly do that if we do not know how to think together.

First it behoves us naturally that each one of us, if we are to think together, should drop our particular prejudices, your particular experience, your conclusion, your concepts, your ideals, even your experience, then only we can meet each other. I think that is fairly obvious, though perhaps some of you may not have thought about this matter at all, that where there is to be any kind of communication with each other there must be no barriers in sharing the problems together, no opinions, which is very difficult for most people because their minds are full of opinions, about this and that, about politics, about religions, about everything. We are not free to observe our own problems, we are not free to look at the complex society in which we live, with all its disorder, inanities, insanity.

So can we this morning think together? Which means that we must, if you will, if you are serious, put aside for at least an hour your particular experience, your particular opinion, one's own special reactions which are generally rather petty, so that both of us can observe, think together, so that our minds are capable of investigating together our innumerable complex problems. Can we do that? Can you, if you are willing to think over together our problem, put aside the conclusions that you have come to, the experience that you have had, your particular response or reaction, so that your mind is clear, so that we can look together? That's the first thing, I think, which is most important. Because after all you have taken the trouble to come here. I don't know why you come but since you have come, since apparently you have come, since you must be serious, then we must be able to communicate with each other. Which means that we must be able to think together. We are not persuading you to think what the speaker wishes to convey, he is not asking you to believe what he says, or convert you to a particular ideal, belief, concept, on the contrary we are together here to investigate, to explore our many, many problems. And you cannot possibly do it if you hold on to your particular vanity, to your particular idea. Please, this is very serious if you want to. So, will you be willing to think together with the speaker and look, to investigate, our innumerable problems? I hope that's clear. You may not agree, you may not accept, but if you are willing to think together with the speaker then you can go very far. Right? That's clear, I hope.

We accept, I think, the way we live. We may be dissatisfied, we may be discontented, we may rebel slightly against the way of our life but generally speaking we accept the society as it is, with all its immorality, with its disorder, with its extraordinary dangers that are taking place, with all the political nonsense, the divisions of people, religions and otherwise. We accept this because we do not know how to bring about a change. We want change, any intelligent man, aware of all the problems of mankind right throughout the world, a man who is intelligent, aware, asks naturally that the society must obviously change, must bring about some kind of decent order. And we do not know what to do. The world is too much, the pressures are much too great, the demands of our daily life, earning bread and butter, and all the rest of it, are excessively urgent. And if you observe, there are those who say that man is conditioned and he cannot possibly change that condition and he must make the best of it. I hope you are familiar with all this. Make the best of what there is of it, make the best of the society, the human mind is conditioned, it cannot possibly change. There is a great school of thought who believe in that, that the human mind is conditioned through many, many years, and cannot possibly break through. And so there are all those intellectuals, theoreticians, great philosophers, who assert that the human consciousness, as it is, can only make it slightly better, it cannot possibly undergo a radical change. There are those also who say, make the best of our society, reform it, better politicians, vote more sanely, and so on. And there is a whole religious group - and I am sorry to use the word `religious' because most people rather despise that word - there are those religious people who say you cannot possible make a paradise on earth, only in heaven. Only you cannot possible escape from your sorrow, from your misery, from your pain, but if you believe in some deity, in some figure then perhaps you will be saved. This is all taking place in the world actually; they are not describing something which is non-existent. And there are those who want to bring about a physical revolution - the communists, the terrorists, the revolutionists. And as one observes throughout the world that by changing the environment, by bringing about a dictatorship, a human being is not going to be changed. They may conform, they may adjust, but the human consciousness with all its complexity remains the same. So one is surrounded, as you observe, by these various groups, all urging that they have the right way, all asserting, including the gurus, that if you follow, if you obey, if you conform, if you accept, it will bring about a change in society.

Those of us who have lived sufficiently long have seen through all this. They do not offer fundamentally the transformation of human consciousness, of human endeavour to bring about a different human being. We are going to go into all that, whether it is possible for a human mind, yours, to undergo a fundamental, radical, psychological revolution. That's what we are concerned with, whether it is possible to bring about a good society. You know, ancient Hindus, the Greeks and the Egyptians, the ancient ones, have all demanded this, that there must be a good society. And the word 'good', the intellectuals rather despise that word, spit on it, they say, good is very relative, good is not absolute, it is just a modification of the bad. Are you listening to all this, are you interested in all this? I hope you are because you are part of this ugly society in which we live, with all its extraordinary misfortunes, accidents, disease, pain, suffering, and if you are not interested you are not a human being obviously, because it is part of our life. And if we are not interested in the way we live, whether we can bring about a change in that, in our lives, then we become merely a cog in vast machinery that is utterly meaningless. We have lost all value, life has become, if you observe, most people's lives, wholly meaningless. You may go to the office, you may earn a lot of money, live in an affluent society, have cars, splendid gardens, and pools and all the rest of it, but life is rather shallow, utterly meaningless, without any significance. This is our life. And we try to give meaning to it. The philosophers try in different ways to give significance to life, which then becomes theories, abstractions. And theories and abstractions in themselves are utterly meaningless.

So please bear in mind, if I may point out, that we are thinking together. You are not listening to a speaker who may have certain ideas, certain approach to life, but ideas are merely conclusions of thought. And if you have certain ideas, and also the speaker has, then there is no possibility of thinking together over this vast existence which you call living. So please, if one may request you, be serious for an hour. And that's very difficult for Americans because they are so used to being entertained - the cinemas, the books, the magazines, they try to entertain you, help you to escape from your own every day misery, confusion and pain. This is not an entertainment, intellectual or otherwise. You have to put your mind and your heart into this to understand our lives, so we must be able to think together.

So as we were saying, and I hope we are also seeing the same thing as the speaker is seeing, that there are these various theories, beliefs, dogmas, saviours, gurus, philosophers, exercising all their influence through literature, through personal expansion, through personal desires and so on and so on, have not fundamentally changed man. And one asks, why has not man - when we use the word `man' we also include the ladies, the women, so don't get upset when we say `man', it's a crazy world - why has not man, woman, been able to change? He changes a little here and there, and yet he demands that there be a good society, he wants order, not only in himself, in his relationship, however intimate or otherwise, he wants some kind of peace in the world, he wants to be let alone to flower, to have some kind of beatitude. This has been man's demand, if you observe, throughout history from the ancient of days, and yet man, the more he becomes civilized, the more he is creating disorder, the more wars. The earth has not known a period when there have been no wars, man killing man, one religion destroying another religion, one institution dominating, destroying other institutions, one organization suppressing others. This constant everlasting struggle. I do not know if you are aware of all this. If you are, don't you ask ever if it is possible to live in this world, not run away from it, not go off into a commune or become a hermit or a monk, but to live in this world sanely, happily, intelligently, without all this battle going on inwardly and outwardly. If you do, and I hope you are doing it now because we are thinking together, if you do then you must demand that there be a good society.

We will go into that word `good', if we may, because most people, the intellectuals, the highly cultivated minds, think good is rather an impossible word, they don't like that word because it is rather a shy-making word. Are you following all this? But I think we should stick to that word in spite of them. So we must go into the meaning of that word, to be good. Because you cannot have a good society which has been the dream of ancient Indians, Hindus, ancient Greeks and the Egyptians and so on, to bring about a good society. And a good society can only exist when there is good man, because being good he creates goodness, brings about goodness in his relationship, in his actions, in his way of life. So we must be very clear in the understanding of that word `good'. Don't despise that word. Good also means that which is beautiful. Good also means that which is holy, it is related to god, to the highest principles and so on. So that word `good' needs to be very deeply understood. When there is this goodness in one then whatever you do will be good, your relationships, your actions, your way of thinking and so on. So please as we are thinking together let us examine that word. Because one may immediately capture the whole significance of that word, the extraordinary quality of that word, instantly. But generally people don't, they want an explanation of what it is to be good. The speaker is not ashamed to use that word, you may spit on it. Generally the intellectuals do, they say such a thing doesn't exist any more. We are going to find out what it means.

Goodness is not the opposite of that which is bad. Please carefully let's think over this thing together because this is, if you really go into this very deeply, this is going to affect your consciousness, it is going to affect your way of thinking, it is going to affect the way of your life. So please give a little attention to the understanding of that word. First the word is not the thing. Right? I may describe the mountain most beautifully, paint it, make a poem, but the word, the description, the poem, is not the actual. But we are generally carried away emotionally, irrationally by the description, by the word. So please we are pointing out the word is not the actual. So we are saying, goodness is not related to that which is bad. Good is not the outcome of the bad. Goodness is totally unrelated to that which is ugly, which is not beautiful. So goodness is by itself unrelated to that which we may consider evil, ugly, bad. That's the first thing to comprehend in thinking over together. If you say, the good is the outcome of the bad, the evil, the ugly, then the good has in it the bad, the ugly, the brute. You understand? You understand this? No? The good must be, and is, totally unrelated to that which is not. And the good cannot possibly exist when there is any acceptance of any authority. Right? I am going to go into it. Please, we are thinking together over a very, very serious problem.

Authority is very complex. There is the authority of law which man has put together through many, many centuries; there is the law of Nature, there is the law of our own experience, according to which we obey, according to the law of our own petty reactions which dominate our lives. Then there is the law of institutions, the law of organized beliefs which are called religions, dogmas. We are saying goodness is totally unrelated to every form of authority. Please look at it, examine it, understand it, don't reject it, say, it is too complex, we don't understand - it is very simple if you examine it, if you apply your mind to it. Goodness is not the pursuit of conformity. If you conform to a belief, to a concept, to an idea, to a principle, that is not good, because it creates conflict. The essence is goodness is a mind that is not in conflict. Examine it, look at it. Goodness cannot flower through another, through a religious figure, through dogma, through belief, it can only flower in the soil of total attention in which there is no authority. You are following all this? Is this all too complex? And goodness implies great responsibility. You can't be good and allow wars to take place. So a man that is really good is totally responsible for all his life. So we will go into that.

So we are asking: can a man who has lived in a society where the pressures of institutions, pressures of belief, pressures of authoritarian religious people, can such a man be good? You are following all this? Please give your minds to this. Because it is only if you are good, if you, as a human being, are totally and absolutely good, absolutely, not partially, we will create a different society.

So our question then is: is it possible, living in this world, married, children, jobs, is it possible to be good - good in the sense we are using it carefully, in which is implied great responsibility, care, attention, diligence, love. The word 'good' contains all that. Is that possible for you who care to come here, listen, is that possible for you? If it is not possible then you accept society as it is. Please this is very serious as we pointed out, this is not for little children, it is not for those who do not want to think through a particular aspect of life. This demands your attention, that means your energy. Human beings have plenty of energy, when they want to do something, they do it. This demands immense energy, that is, if you want to create a different society, a society which is essentially good, in the context we are using that word.

Now having stated that what prevents us? Do you understand my question? What prevents every human being who is here from being utterly good, what is the barrier? What is the block? Why don't human beings, you, be utterly, sanely good? Is it we are caught up in our own petty reactions? Please examine it, don't throw it out. Our reactions: we say, I like, I don't like, I am angry, you know reactions, sensory reactions, which gradually become psychological facts which we accept. But all reactions, sensory or otherwise are really very petty and shallow. Is that what is preventing us? Please, this is not a group therapy. The speaker has a particular abomination for that kind of nonsense, we are thinking together, we are investigating together, we are not accepting what the speaker is saying, or denying it, but finding out. To find out one must apply one's energy. If one is satisfied with the world, because you have money, you have got a car, a nice wife or husband and everything is satisfactory then you are just a non-existent human being. The man who observes, who realizes what the world is, and he is the world, and the world is not different from him, he has created that world, he has created that society, he has created the religions, with their dogmas, rituals, with their separatisms, with their factions, with their innumerable dogmas and beliefs, human beings have created it. Is that what is preventing us, because you believe? Or you are so self-concerned with your own problems - sexual, fears, anxiety, loneliness, wanting to fulfil, wanting to identify with something or other, is that what is preventing a human being from being good? Please this is not rhetoric, we are asking something very, very serious. If they are preventing then they have no value. You will naturally put all that aside because you see that to bring about this quality of goodness any pressure from any direction, your own belief, your own principles, your own ideals, utterly prevent that goodness from being, when you see that you will naturally put it aside without any equivocation, any conflict because that is stupid.

So we are asking: is this what is preventing human beings right throughout the world? It isn't only in America, in this country, but there is this great chaos, disorder, a danger to life - it is in Europe, in India, everywhere it is spreading more and more and more. And any man, any serious observer of himself as well as the world must ask this question. You see, sirs, the scientists, the politicians, the philosophers - please listen to all this - the gurus, whether they come from India, or from Tibet, or from your own country, they have not solved our human problems; they give you all kinds of theories, nor the psychoanalysts, they haven't solved the problem, nobody will. We have to solve these problems ourselves because we have created the problems. And we are unfortunately unwilling to look at our own problems, to go into them, investigate why we live as we do, utterly self-concerned, selfish lives.

So we are asking: why do we human beings live the way we are living? Our education doesn't help us to solve our problems; you may get a good job, you may call yourself a doctor, a PhD and so on and so on, but our lives are not changed by them.

So we are asking: can this goodness, with its beauty, with its holiness - that word means that - can we live that way? And if we cannot then we will accept this increasing danger of chaos to our own lives, to our children's lives, and so on down the line.

So after listening, are we thinking together, are we seeing the same thing, you and I together, the same thing? Or we have explanations for all this, or we say, well somebody else is going to alter our lives, an external force, an external agency, god, ideas, principles, are they going to change our lives? So far they have not, and they never will because ideals, concepts, images all those are self-created, created by human beings out of their own confusion, out of their own misery, out of their own ugliness, confusion. So you see we are deceiving ourselves all the time.

So we come to the question then: what will make us change? You understand my question, sirs? More shocks? More catastrophes? Different forms of governments? Different images? Different ideals and so on? You have had varieties of these, and yet you have not changed. The more sophisticated better education, the more civilized we are becoming - civilized in the sense more away from Nature - we are becoming more inhuman. Right? So what shall we do? As none of the things outside of us are going to help, including all the gods, then it becomes obvious, only I have to understand myself, I have to see what I am and change myself radically. Then goodness comes out of that; then one can create a good society. So are we willing to go into this question to know oneself? To understand oneself because oneself is the world. You understand, sirs? Human beings whatever their colour, their religion, their nationality, their beliefs, human beings right throughout the world psychologically, inwardly suffer, they go through great anxieties, great loneliness, extraordinary sense of despair, depression, a sense of meaninglessness of living the way we do, right through the world psychologically they are similar to each one of us. That's a reality, that's truth, that's an actuality. So you are the world psychologically, and the world is you. So when you understand yourself you are understanding the whole human structure and nature, it is not mere selfish investigation. Because when you understand yourself you go beyond yourself, there is a different dimension comes into being.

So we are thinking together over this, and we shall go into it tomorrow, because you can't stand more than an hour of this kind of talk. May I get up and go now?

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 8TH APRIL 1979

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday? We were saying yesterday that throughout the world the religions, with their orthodoxy, rituals, with their beliefs and superstitions, have not fundamentally changed man; nor the scientists; nor the philosophers with their extraordinary theories, with their wishes, with their particular conditioning; nor the politicians. As you observe the world is becoming more and more dangerous to live in, more and more confused, disorderly, wars are going on all the time over the earth, neither the modern psychologists nor analysts have solved our human problems. Most people throughout the world, I am sure, desire to have a good society, to live peacefully, to live with certain tranquillity, with certain security; but all this is becoming more and more impossible, except perhaps for the very, very rich, but the average man throughout the world finds it extraordinary difficult to live, both outwardly where there is so much insecurity and danger, and inwardly, psychologically he is everlastingly in conflict with himself and with his neighbour, whether he is close by or a thousand miles away.

So when one observes all this, as I am sure you are all aware of all this, one asks, why human beings, each of us, do not radically change, why we accept to live this way, why we submit to this extraordinarily destructive disorder? Why we do not conserve, protect the earth, the air, the environment, which we are gradually destroying? I am sure you know all this. And man, human beings, have looked to some leaders, some statesmen, some heroes, some saviours, some agency outside of us, gods, and these too have failed us. Which again is an obvious fact.

So considering all this, what is a human being to do? Why do we accept all this? You are supposed to be civilized, educated, affluent, and that may be perhaps rather a misery, and we have practically everything that we physically want. Order can be brought about in society but to live in the society is becoming more and more dangerous. Which again is fairly obvious. So how do we human beings, with all our petty reactions, with all our beliefs and dogmas and prejudices, how do we become, or be good? Because this is really a very important question that one must ask.

As we were saying yesterday, we must think together over this matter. I mean by that word 'think', see the problems together, not have different opinions about it, see actually what is going on. And to observe clearly one must be free of one's own particular prejudices, particular narrow, limited, petty reactions. One must be free, obviously, from one's nationalities, the attachment to a particular part of the earth, geographically divided. This is what is separating, destroying human beings.

So how do we, each one of us, create, or bring about a good society? Please, as we said, we are thinking together, we are investigating together, though previously the speaker has said, thought is very limited, thought is fragmentary, broken up, but we must use thought, though it is limited, though it breaks things up because thought is in itself partial, but we must use thought, realizing its limitation we must exercise thought to find out, to observe very clearly, with reason, logic, sanity why we live the way we do; concerned with our own little problems, with our own sexual desires, with our own psychological conflicts and all the rest of it. So we said, goodness is not an abstraction, not an idea, not something ideal, actuality, to be good. Because it is only when individuals, or groups of individuals, human beings, are good, in the deep sense of that word, then there is a possibility of bringing about a different society. We were saying all this yesterday. And we came to the point that to have this sense of goodness, we carefully explained what that word means, which is, to have great sense of responsibility, to have certain care, affection, love - all that is implied in that word. And realizing that, the significance, the full depth of that word 'goodness', which is not the opposite of that which is evil - we explained that carefully - and we said, is it possible for a human being to bring about this goodness in himself? Because he creates the society, the society which we have is created by each one of us, we have contributed to that, by our greed, by our angers, by our hatreds, by our various forms of pleasure, ambition and so on, we have created this monstrous society. And unless we understand ourselves, what we are, and bring about a change in what we are, there can never be a good society. So we said, to understand oneself is important. The ancient Hindus, and the Greeks and others have said, 'Know Yourself'. Please, we are thinking together, we are investigating together, don't listen to the talk and go away; you are working as hard as the speaker. We are investigating, exploring, thinking, feeling together into this problem. Because any thoughtful man who is serious must find out for himself a way of living, surrounded by chaos, surrounded by disorder, immorality, to live a life that is essentially good. And to find that out we said, you must know yourself. Know yourself, not according to some philosopher, to some leader, to some analyst, to some guru, because they only inform you what they think you are, including the Freudians, the Jungians, and all the rest of it. If you discard all those - one must, if you want to discover what you are, and to bring about a change in what you are, you must investigate your own consciousness, your own mind, your own reactions, your way of life. That's fairly obvious, isn't it. We cannot possibly depend on others to tell us what we are. They have done this. I am sure you know all this but you have probably never thought about it.

And priests, the religious leaders throughout the world, have said, you can't possibly change yourself, but only if you can surrender yourself to the highest god, the highest principle, then perhaps you might change. That's not good enough. So we are asking: can you discard what others have said you are, and investigate for yourself what actually is going on within yourself, and look? I hope this is somewhat clear. That is, if you rely on authority to tell you what you are, you are then depending on the assertions, the speculations, the theories of others, however good, however reasonable, however logical. And when you accept them and through their eyes examine yourself, then you are looking at yourself through the authority of another. Please see this simple fact. If I tell you what you are - I wouldn't be such an idiot - then you would accept my theory, or my concept, my idea of what you are, and conform to that pattern. This is what we are doing actually. So gradually we become secondhand people. Right? Please see how important this is because as long as we are living with the authority of others, however intelligent, however much they have explored, we are then accepting their pattern of what our consciousness should be, what we are, and then use the initiative, the creative capacity to investigate and discover. I hope we are making this clear and I hope we are doing this. Because out of that comes freedom.

You can't possibly investigate without freedom. Right? This is obvious, isn't it? That if you want to know yourself one has to discard totally, completely what others have said about you. Can you do that? Or must you accept their theories, logical or illogical, sane or insane, and accepting what they say and gathering their information which may sharpen your own mind, and with that sharpened mind, sharpened at the expense, at the behest of others, look at yourself. You follow? Or is there a possibility of looking at yourself without all that? Right? Are we thinking together? I hope we are meeting each other. That is, one can know oneself very clearly, objectively in relationship. Right? Relationship is the mirror in which we see ourselves, actually as we are. Because we are apt to deceive ourselves. We are prone to create illusions. We have the tendency to create ideas, formulas, illusions, and they assume reality. Haven't you noticed all this? So one must be absolutely free of all illusion. Is that possible?

I hope we are meeting each other, that we are investigating together, because please bear in mind this is not a talk given by the speaker for you to listen and agree, or disagree, and go home, and carry on in your usual life. But on the contrary, this investigation together becomes very serious; and being serious it affects our lives. And if you don't want to be disturbed, then please don't listen. If you want to carry on your daily life as one does, probably you will even after hearing this talk, then shut your ears and don't bother. Go to a cinema or do something else. But if you are serious and I hope you are, then one has to look at oneself without any illusion in the mirror of relationship. There you discover all your reactions, objectively, without any distortion. That is if you want to discover yourself, that is if you want to bring about a good society, healthy, sane, moral human beings who have values, not imaginary values.

So we have to investigate, look together into this mirror. You see one of the difficulties is that our minds in observing in this mirror, dictate what the mirror should tell. You are following all this? Our minds, which is our thought, our desires, our pleasures, our fears, our anxieties, our groping uncertainties, dictate what that mirror should show. I hope you are following all this. So to observe very clearly in the mirror there must be a mind that is capable of observing without any distortion. Right? That is, what makes for distortion? Do you understand my question? The mirror is not distorted, obviously. Because in our relationship, wife, husband, whatever it is, in that relationship there is no distortion, those are facts, but the mind begins to distort, which is thought begins to distort. I hope you are following all this. Right? Are we going along together with this? So we have to investigate why the mind - we are using the mind in the sense not only the brain, but thought, emotions, sensory responses, all that is the mind, which is consciousness. I won't go into that, we'll go into that a little later. Which is, your mind is the product of the senses, emotions, thought, desire, and all the experiences, memories, are the content of one's mind. Right? It is very simple when you observe it. That mind with its thoughts, sensations and so on, that thought has created the sense of the self, the 'me' - the self. Right? So the self is always distorting. Right? Which is, the self, the 'me', is the product of thought, thought which is limited, obviously, thought which is the response of memory, memory being experience and knowledge, inherited or acquired, that thought has created this self. This self is always distorting: my desires, my wishes, my particular idiosyncrasies, my particular tendencies, my desires, my opinions, my longing, my fulfilment. And this self conceals itself in many, many ways. I don't know if you have noticed it? Have you noticed, for example, those who are greatly in the political world or the religious world, the self has concealed itself in the name of god. Right? I wonder if you see all this? Please don't accept what the speaker is saying, but observe the activities of this extraordinary thing called the self.

One can become a religious leader - religious in quotes - and talk about god, teach about god and all that kind of stuff, and the self is identified with that god and it gives him a great deal of position, money, all the rest of the nonsense in the name of god. Haven't you noticed all this? Or you have an experience, there is an experience and immediately the self takes that over, makes it into some philosophical concepts, some experience which it thinks is extraordinary and begins to talk about it, preach about it. And in the very preaching about it he becomes very important, gathers money, position, respectability, you know influence.

So to find out how to observe the mirror without distortion we must understand first the nature of sensation. You are following all this, may I go on? Please, are we meeting together? You see we have senses, that is, we are not using all our senses at the same moment; we are using the senses as a particular sense, partially. You may be an artist and what you see and what you observe, the colour, the beauty of the mountains, the shape, and so on, there you are exercising vision, you are not exercising all your senses. I wonder if you are following all this? So we are conditioned to function with one or the other senses, giving them importance. Haven't you noticed this? So that we are never operating with all our senses. So that's one of our difficulties. And is it possible to look, observe with all our senses. You are following this. Because this is very important. When you so attend with all your senses there is no centre from which you are observing. I wonder if you see this. Experiment with this, find out if either the speaker is telling some nonsense, or whether it has any validity. So to find out one has to be aware how your senses are operating; whether one sense, or one or two senses have become extraordinarily important and the others are being neglected or atrophied. Whereas if you become aware and find out, you then discover that you can operate with all your senses. Then when all the senses are in full operation there is no centre as the self which distorts observation. You will have to find this out.

So we are saying that as long as one particular, or a couple of senses are taking dominance over the others there must be distortion, obviously. So as we said, the mind is made up of these senses. Then one has to understand desire, because when you looking in the mirror clearly, if you want to look at it objectively, sanely, rationally, clearly, you have to understand the whole movement of desire. Are you interested in all this? Or are you going to sleep on a lovely morning? You know, I was thinking, should you be serious on a lovely morning? Or you are only serious when it is a rather misty, cloudy, rainy darkish morning? This is a serious gathering, not an entertainment, intellectual or otherwise. We are discussing the whole question of a society that is going to pieces, that is deteriorating, degenerating, and being serious people they are concerned with a different way of living, to bring about a different society, a different culture, not the culture based on waste, disrespect and so on and so on. And to bring about such a society each human being has to be fundamentally deeply good - good being sane, rational, care, sense of deep love. That is the essence of goodness.

And as we said, to observe in the mirror one must investigate the whole movement of desire because we are driven by our desires. Right? Especially in this country, we are encouraged through commercialism to such an extravagant explosion of our desires: we are told to buy, buy, buy - if you listen to the television and the commercials, my god! So the society around us, which has been created by us, by our greed, by our envy, by our anxiety, that very society, of which we are a part, encourages this drive, this energy which has become desire. Right?

And all religious organizations, the ancient Hindus and Catholics and so on, have always said to their monks who come to serve in the name of god, 'Suppress your desire, control your desire', or 'Surrender your desire to god' - give yourself, which is your desire, which is the energy which is expressed through desire, to the nameless, to the holy, to the ultimate. And human beings not being able to do that completely, control themselves, burn with desire, sexual and other forms of desire, and fight, fight, fight, struggle in the name of god. So such people obviously cannot look in the mirror without distortion - obviously. So we are saying, we have to understand desire, not suppress it, control it, or transmute it, or run away from it. Because when we understand something very clearly, then you can deal with it. It is only when we are not quite clear then we battle with it.

There is one problem in the understanding of this word 'desire: what do we mean by 'understanding'? Please follow all this. To understand means to comprehend, to know, to be aware, to have cognizance, to see the full meaning. But we are using the word in a different sense, if one may, which is, to understand something is to transform it, is to completely change it. I am going to go into this carefully, please we are investigating together, you are not just listening to me, that's useless, because it's your life, not my life. So we are trying - we are investigating the whole movement of desire, why man has never been able to understand it, give it its right place and be free of it. Do you understand? We have not been able to do that. And we are going into this question of desire, please, bearing in mind that we are not suppressing it, we are not trying to control it, we are not trying to surrender this enormous energy to some ideal. We are trying to comprehend this enormous energy of man, which is a driving force of our life, desire, with its will. Because will is the essence of desire - I want this, I will get it, I must be successful. You follow? All that is this enormous energy that man has expressed through desire - I hope this is clear - which has created extraordinary problems because you have your desire, another has his desire, and so there is conflict between the two. Your desire drives you in one direction, and the other in another direction, so there is never a relationship which is actual but each desire driving one another apart and hoping some day we will meet together, either sexually, or in some heaven - which is nonsense. I hope you are meeting all this.

So we have got this enormous energy, which is operating in the world. To go to the Moon you have to have enormous energy, the desire there. To be a good politician, to become a President, or whatever it is, you must have this extraordinary desire, ambition. And this ambition, which is an expression of desire, is cultivated to the highest degree in this country. And so there is constant ruthlessness in this drive. I hope you are following this. It is ruthless. I may have this tremendous desire and experience something and you know, imagine that I have achieved some extraordinary state and talk about it, preach about it, but it is still this desire that makes me sit on a platform and talk about it - not with me, and I mean it. Then you may ask, why do you talk? If it isn't your desire, why do you talk at all, why have you talked for over fifty years? Right? That's a logical question. Must I go into it? First of all this person talks because he is without any motive. Please understand this. I have no motive to convince you of anything - that I am great, that I am reputed, that I am this, that I am that, that's all beside the point. Nor do I want to convince you of anything, to make you believe in something other than what you believe. On the contrary, belief destroys people, separates people, it has no validity, it is not actual. And the speaker is talking because - I don't know - because it may be that one has love for one's fellow human beings, may be that one has compassion, and various other things. You never ask the sun, 'Why do you get up in the morning?'-or the sun set; you never ask a flower why it blooms: you either look at it, enjoy it, smell it and see the extraordinary beauty of it and every day look at it. Perhaps that why one is talking. Apart from that, there is much more to be said about it. I think man has lost the direction of life, and also to state something that is beyond all thought, beyond all measure, which no philosophy, nothing can explain, but one has to come to it. So let's get back to what we were saying.

We have this extraordinary desire, this energy which is driving, which is almost uncontrollable. I don't know if you have noticed all this? And we have never been able to give it its right place. So - please listen to this - what is the relationship between thought and desire? You understand my question? Where does thought and desire meet? If thought does not meet desire then what relationship is action without thought? You understand my question? Please I will have to go into it. Please have a little patience because we are investigating a very complex problem. You have a desire, and you act. You see something in the shop you desire and you buy it, or do something. What is the action of desire without thought? Is there an action of desire without thought? You are meeting all this? So I am asking - we are asking: what is the relationship between the two? You understand my question? Please understand my question first. That is, desire is sensation. Right? That is, you see something beautiful, there is perception, contact, sensation. If it is merely that then it is very simple, isn't it. Seeing, contact, sensation. If it ends there there is no problem. Right? I wonder if you understand this. Please go into it with me, it is really important this. You can see a beautiful vase, beautiful house, or beautiful woman or man, whatever it is, a beautiful thing - the seeing, the touching there is the sensation. If it ends there there is no problem, but when thought comes in and creates an image of having that vase, that person, or whatever it is, in your house then begins the problem. You follow? So I am asking what is the relationship between desire, which is, seeing, perception, contact, sensation, then thought taking that sensation over, creating an image, the vase in your house, the car in your garage, the man or the woman in your room, creating the image and then the whole movement of sorrow begins. I wonder if this is clear? Are you following? Are you getting tired?

So we are asking: what is the relationship between desire, thought and action? Can there be perception, contact, sensation, without the interference of thought, which then creates the image and the pursuing of that image? You get this? I wonder if you get it? The pursuing of that image is your desire to fulfil, and not being able to fulfil, frustrated, anger, jealousy, annoyance, bitterness, cynicism, the whole business of frustrated people, because they cannot fulfil their desire. You are following all this? It is extraordinary, if you observe desire very closely you can see this movement going on.

So desire is seeing, perception, contact, sensation, and can it stop there and not let thought create the image, and the pursuit of that image, and then fulfilment, frustration and all the rest of it? We are asking now: can perception, contact, sensation stop, and no more? Which means, thought has no relationship to desire which creates the image and the pursuit of that image, and fulfilment, frustration, all that follows. Have you understood this? This demands a great deal of attention; when there is this movement of desire, to be totally aware of all this at one glance. You understand what I am saying? That is, when there is clear insight into this - I am using the word 'insight' in the sense of when you comprehend the whole of it - then desire and will take very little part in life. Then there is something else operates, which is intelligence. You understand? This is perhaps a little bit - I am introducing something else. May I go on with this, or are you surfeit of this?

Desire has not been properly investigated by people, specialists - we are not specialists fortunately, we are ordinary people, laymen, we can investigate it without losing any face or losing money, losing position, or anything, we can just investigate it and see the movement of this whole desire, which is perception, seeing, contact, sensation, thought taking the sensation over and creating the image, pursuing that image and the fulfilment in that image or the frustration. When you look at this whole movement as a whole, holistically, there is an insight into it, you see the inward working of it, which is intelligence. So intelligence then operates, not desire, not mere sensation. You have got it? Have you understood something of this? That is, our action is now based on desire, the image created by thought, acting. Therefore your desire opposed to another desire and so there is conflict between two desires: when you are married, husband, wife, girl, boy, this is the operation that is going on all the time in every way - sexually, in ambition, this thing is moving all your life, which brings great conflict, various forms of neurosis and so on and so on.

So we are saying something entirely different: to have an insight into the whole movement of desire. That is, to look at the whole desire, and say, 'What shall I do without desire, it sounds silly, if you take away desire I can't act' - we are not taking anything away, we are merely looking at the whole structure and the nature of desire. When you look at it completely without any distortion that very looking is intelligence. You understand? No? This is difficult. Sir, what is intelligence? You say, he is a very intelligent man - I don't mean that, you can be intelligent and rather stupid too. The meaning of that word according to a good dictionary is: to understand, to read between the lines, to be able to comprehend non-verbally, because that is what it means 'between the lines', to understand without gesture, without the word, to grasp the whole significance of something instantly. You understand? That is intelligence. Now to grasp the whole significance of desire instantly, and see the truth of it, and that intelligence then will operate, which doesn't mean that you deny this, intelligence is operating. Right?

So are you now operating with intelligence or with desire with its image and fulfilment? Do you see the difference? When there is intelligence desire has its place, and thought has its place, therefore there is no conflict. This requires a great deal of enquiry into oneself to be so aware, so attentive to the arising of desire, that's perception, contact, sensation arising, and then thought instantly taking over, creating the image and the pursuing of that image - I must be the President, the whole business of it. When you understand this whole movement, have an insight into it, that very insight is intelligence which then functions, intelligence is operating, acting. Right? Have you captured some of this? I think that's enough for today, isn't it?

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 10TH APRIL 1979

Krishnamurti: I believe this is a discussion, rather - I don't like the word 'discussion' - but rather a dialogue. The meaning of that word 'dialogue' means conversation between two people. And it would be good if we could talk over some human problem and go into it very deeply to the very end, and not merely offer opinions, arguments, opposition and so on. Could we have a good dialogue together? So please, you choose the subject you want to talk about, or want to investigate, and let's go into it.

Questioner: Love.

Q: Why do you think that so many people killed themselves in Vienna last autumn because somebody told them to do it?

K: The massacre in Jonestown, why. Are you really interested in that?

Q: Sir, could we see whether it is actually possible for a mind that doesn't see clearly to bring about a transformation in itself?

K: Is it possible for a mind that does not see clearly to bring about not only clarity but a deep mutation, is that possible?

Q: Could we talk about passion in relationship?

K: Could we talk over together passion in relationship.

Q: Why do human beings get caught in various networks of escapes rather than face things out?

Q: Sir, what is the challenge of the man/woman relationship?

K: You should know!

Q: The right place for sex.

Q: Is there such a thing as soul?

Q: Is there such a thing as a soul mate and if so how do you meet your soul mate?

K: Soul mates? How do you meet a soul mate? I am sorry to laugh but it is quite amusing.

Q: Why is it that even though you have been speaking a very long time, fifty years, it seems to be that so very few people are really understanding deeply what you mean?

K: You have been speaking for over fifty years, why is it so few people throughout the world seem to be transformed? Is that the question?

Q: What is the beginning of division in consciousness?

K: Yes. Now enough questions have been asked so which shall we choose among those questions which will be worthwhile going into? Attachment, whether a mind which is clouded, dull, uncertain, can such a mind transform itself. Now which question do you want to discuss?

Q: The last one.

K: Why a mind that is not clear, uncertain, can such a mind transform itself? That's what you want to discuss, go into.

Sir, when we talk about not having a clear mind what do we mean by that? Do we mean such a mind is conditioned, enclosed, resisting, incapable of being not only free within itself but also go beyond itself? So we must be clear what we are talking about. A mind that is conditioned, can such a mind free itself? I think that would be a simple way of putting it. Would you agree to that, sir?

Do we know, or aware, that our minds are conditioned? And what do we mean by being conditioned? I am not giving a talk, we are two friends talking over together, trying to find out seriously whether a mind that is heavily conditioned can ever be free itself.

We are asking what do we mean by being conditioned.

Q: In order to find that out we must see what is the origin of conditioning.

K: What is the origin, the beginning of conditioning.

Q: A conditioned mind has a pattern to which it always comes back to, and all responses according to that pattern.

K: Yes, that's one aspect of it. What do we mean by being conditioned? And the gentleman asked, what is the origin of our conditioning.

Q: Any memory that is retained, any experience.

K: Would we say that human beings from the very beginning of time are conditioned by their immediate experiences? Immediate experience of danger, of security, of physical uncertainty, of survival, seeking protection, and not completely finding that protection being anxious, afraid, both neurologically and physically. Surely that is the beginning of human conditioning, right from the very beginning.

Q: No.

K: No?

Q: You made a jump there. The primal conditioning, food, clothing and shelter, to be secure physically, this is fairly clear. But when fear comes into that there is another dimension.

K: Physical necessity. Human beings right from the beginning of time have to have food, clothes and shelter. In the very searching of it, in the very hunting of it, in the very demand for food, going through various experiences in acquiring food, there began the conditioning. Conditioning, being hunted and hunting, the experience of fear, the experience of uncertainty, the lack of safety and so on. That is the beginning obviously of the human mind being conditioned. Physically most of us have this urge to be protected, find safety, security, certainty. Right? Obviously. So that is the beginning of it.

Q: Isn't it healthy to have an urge to live in safety and security?

K: Is it not healthy to have such an urge, to have food, clothes, shelter, that's a natural demand of every human being right through the world, whether rich or poor, that's natural. And that is being prevented by various categories of division: class division, national division, religious division, economic division, and so on and so on. That - please let's go slowly - that is, physical demand for food and clothes, has that-I am asking, please investigate together - spilled over into the psychological field? That is, one has food, clothes, and shelter, one needs that, but also one thinks one needs psychological safety, psychological security, psychological dependency, psychological anxiety and so on and so on. So I am asking - please listen to this - I am asking, I am not stating, I am asking you to find out if the physical needs with all their reactions have not entered into the arena, area of the psychological field.

Q: Yes.

K: Just find out, sir, before you say, yes or no. This is important because if we don't find this out then we mix the two. That is, one needs food, clothes and shelter with all its problems, with all its reactions, the work, the job, and so on. Now I am asking, that very same urge, has that entered into the psychological field, the inward field, inside oneself, which says, `Yes, not only I need protection, physical protection, security, safety, clothes and all that, but also I need somebody on whom I can depend, from whom I can have protection, security, safety.' You understand, the same movement has entered into the psychological world.

Q: Is not the desire for food and shelter a psychological thing as well as a physical one? Is it separate?

K: We are going to find out but I want to go step by step, sir. One needs food, that's natural, the desire for food, but that same desire might have entered into the psychological field and say, 'I need company, I am afraid to be alone.'

Q: He says the desire for food is itself a psychological device.

K: Is it? Is desire for food, is it psychological desire? I need food. This morning it was very cold one had to put on a coat. So that's not desire.

Q: It is not a psychological desire for you but is it for normal people? For us food becomes a psychological need.

K: Ah, for us food becomes a psychological need - why?

Q: I have had...

K: Just a minute, go into it, don't answer it immediately, find out: why do I psychologically need food. You understand my question?

Q: Something else is missing.

Q: The body needs a certain amount of food but psychologically I want more than it needs.

K: That's it. I need sufficient food, but my tongue dictates what kind of food I need, the most tasty - that becomes psychological. So one has to distinguish-this is very simple all this, I don't know why you are make a fuss about this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, we are discussing, we are talking over together as two friends about the problem of being conditioned. Don't forget, please don't go off to something else. Our minds are conditioned by our culture, by our race, by our climate, by our food, by our beliefs, and so on and so on, we are conditioned, our minds are conditioned through education, through experience, through knowledge and so on. And the question is: can such a mind free itself from its conditioning? That's the real central issue. Let's stick to that and not go off about food and something else.

Q: Memory.

K: Memory, that's knowledge. So we are conditioned by knowledge, which is experience, which is stored up in the brain as memory, thought, all that. By all this we are conditioned. The question is: can we go beyond, can the mind go beyond its own conditioning? You understand this question, sir? It is a very serious question because there are those, very scholarly, very well-known people who say that it cannot, you can modify it, you can bring about certain changes within the conditioning, but it is impossible to go beyond, to break through, to be free of one's conditioning. You understand? This is not just a game we are playing, this is a very, very serious question. So we are saying, are you aware that your own mind is conditioned? This is very important, please answer my question. Are you aware that your mind is conditioned?

Q: No.

Q: That is the only mind we know.

K: That is the only mind we know. Now just listen carefully please. When you say, that is the only mind we know, are you different from that mind? You understand my question? Look: suppose my mind is conditioned because I was born in India, educated abroad in England and in France, in Italy and so on and so on, in the Eastern culture and the Western culture, and partly living in America, the Western vulgarism and so on and so on. So this mind is conditioned. How do I know - please listen - that it is conditioned? Because you tell me? Or I discover - the mind discovers, not 'I discover', but the mind discovers that it is conditioned by the culture of India, of Europe and partly, very lightly by the Americans.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait! Please follow this for two minutes and then you can ask. How do I know that my mind is conditioned? I have accepted it, I have lived that way for twenty, forty, a hundred years. I have lived that way. How do I know that my mind is conditioned?

Q: Unhappiness.

K: Unhappiness? That means if I am happy in my conditioning there is no problem.

Q: But we are not always happy, sorrow is coming always.

K: So you are aware of your conditionings, sometimes being happy, sometimes being unhappy. Is that it? Go into it, sir. Is that it?

Q: I was born in Finland and I may feel homesick, so it tells me that I am conditioned to live in Finland, that sorrow tells me.

K: So you are aware that you are homesick. Is that the indication of your conditioning? That's only a part. Right? You are conditioned by your religion, you are conditioned by your literature, the propaganda that is going on, the books that you read.

Q: Our relationship.

K: All that is your conditioning. You are not answering my question. Please be patient with me. I am asking you, how do you realize that your mind is conditioned?

Q: By the repetitiveness of it.

Q: If I see that it is conditioned by reflecting on it, and looking at the thought I am conditioned, aren't I looking at a thought which is imagination essentially. But I am not seeing it with any of the senses, or with sense?

K: That is - let me repeat the question, please. What he says, perhaps it is true, we are going to find out. He says, I think I am conditioned, I think. So the thinking is separate from being conditioned. You understand the difference? I wonder if you do.

Q: Thinking is the act of memory.

K: Yes, sir, thinking is the act of memory, is the response of memory. And memory says to me, I am conditioned; but that is not the actual realization that I am conditioned. See the difference? I think I am riding a camel, actually I am sitting here. I think I am conditioned.

Q: Sir, is not the memory itself conditioning?

K: Wait, sir. First see the position we are in, actually, and then we can proceed step by step. I think I am conditioned, but I am not sure. So there is a division between the thinker who says, I am conditioned, and the actual realization that the mind is conditioned. That is, I can think I am hungry but actually I may not be hungry. Make it as simple as that. Is this clear?

Q: If you go on thinking and think hard enough.

K: No, you are missing my point.

Q: Sir, it seems like there is a kind of innate drive to be free.

K: This is very interesting how you cannot see this very simple point. I think I love you, I may not actually love you. The actual feeling of loving is different from the thought that I love you. Is that simple, clear? Right? Keep to that. Perhaps you will understand this better. So the realization of being conditioned is different from the idea that I am conditioned.

Q: In what way is it different?

K: One is actual, the other is imaginary, maybe, I don't know.

Q: Imagination is all I know.

K: So is the tree imagination?

Q: No.

K: No, it is an actuality, you are sitting there, you can touch it. The idea you cannot touch, it is not as real as the tree. So I am asking, please have patience with this until you find out for yourself that thought imagines or conceives that it is conditioned, but the actual fact of being conditioned is different. Let me put round the other way, perhaps you may get it. Thought is the response of memory. Right? That's fairly simple. Memory itself may be conditioned. You understand? It is, obviously. No? Q: But sir, thought is so devious, so clever that it says...

K: It is not clever. Be simple, sir, begin simply and you can work very, very deeply if you want to go into it. I want to find out if my mind is actually conditioned. And I say, yes it is conditioned because I have lived in India, born in a certain category of social status, educated here, there and so on, so by its very living it has been conditioned. Obviously. Now can the mind - please listen - can the mind realize that it is conditioned, or have I to tell the mind that it is conditioned? You see the point? If I tell the mind that it is conditioned then I am playing with words.

Q: Isn't it the same also if I tell my mind and thought that I am conditioned, that really I am not seeing it directly?

K: That's right. Can you see directly that your mind is conditioned?

Q: Sir, if I watch my actions then I know I am conditioned.

K: That's all, that's all. So you realize through action that your mind is conditioned. That is, you say, I am an American, and you are proud of that, etc., etc., or when the Indian says, I am an Indian, it is part of his conditioning. When a man says, I am Catholic, it is part of his conditioning, two thousand years of propaganda that you are a Christian and all the rest of it, this pressure has been imposed on your brain for two thousand years, and you say, yes, I believe it. So, wait. Look at it, sir, look, look at yourself.

So we are asking, can such a mind free itself from its conditioning? That's the basic question: can the mind, which was born in India, with all the superstitions, you know all that business, can that mind free itself from that? Obviously it can.

Q: I have to actually see the limitations of my conditionings.

K: That's right, that's right.

Q: So I can change it.

K: Of course you can change it.

Q: Yes.

K: The speaker was born in India, with all the conditioning there, I can say, well, nonsense, and drop it.

Q: What is the spiritual world?

K: What is the spiritual world? The spiritual world is beyond all conditioning.

Q: If I think the conditioning is on a spiritual level, if I think that it is not actually physical, then won't that throw me off?

K: Of course. But, sir, please, you are missing it. Go step by step you will find out for yourself. If you are born in America and you are conditioned to the American pattern of society, you know all that goes on in America, believe in this, and not believe in that, and so on and so on, your mind by your education, by your parents, by your friends, your mind is conditioned by the culture in which you are living. That's simple. Now can you break that down and go beyond? If you want to.

Q: It needs ordinary awareness.

K: That doesn't need great awareness, it needs simple observation.

Q: What am I going to do?

K: What am I going to do with regard to what?

Q: My culture.

K: Sir, I am born in France, the French culture, they think they are the most intelligent race in the world, supreme, la force, la voix, and all the rest of it! And I have been brought up in that. See what happens; I look down upon others, I create a division between myself and others, I have a sense of superiority, I am extraordinarily intellectual because I have passed in lycee and all the rest of it, and I think I am better than anybody else. Now that's my culture, I can break that down.

Q: But sir, that is fairly easy like with nationality.

K: I am going into that. You are all so impossible, you don't want to go step by step. So can I drop my French culture, Indian culture and see what happens.

Q: But there is the conditioning that we have already had.

K: Sir, we are saying, sir, conditioning divides people: you are a Catholic, I am a Protestant, you are a Baptist, I am a Lutheran, you are Buddhist, I am a Hindu. It is so obvious, this division is destroying people. No? Hundred years war, thirty years war, you know, all the rest of history, you can see it. The Jew against the Arab, the Arab against the Jew, they are the same people but one has been conditioned by Islam, the other by Judaism, so they are at it. And you see this phenomenon going on right under your noses and we don't see the absurdity, the cruelty of it, and say, look, for god's sake drop your nationalism, drop your Judaism and Islam and let's talk as human beings. They won't because they are going back to Islamic law, you follow, maintaining this division. So one sees this, at least being intelligent I drop it. So watch it. I drop nationalism, the culture in which I have been born, I don't call myself a Hindu or a Jew or an Arab, I drop that. That's fairly easy. The outward expression of this conditioning is fairly easy to drop, but inwardly it is quite a different matter.

Now if you haven't dropped the outer you can't go to the inner. You can pretend you are going to the inner. I don't know if you see that. Because I must test this, that I have dropped it. You follow? That's the proof of my freedom from that conditioning, I have tested it. I have tested it by saying, I am not a Hindu. I don't go to their temples, to their beliefs, to their books, nonsense, I put it aside. I don't belong to any of that, which is an actual act, not just a theory. Right? Because I don't want to deceive myself therefore I am very clear on that matter. So I now say, I am conditioned, am I conditioned psychologically? You understand? You understand my question? Are you? Go on sirs.

Q: There are patterns of knowledge which we seem to be trapped in.

K: So why have human beings given such extraordinary importance to knowledge? Please listen carefully. Knowledge, which is the accumulation of experience, whether the accumulation of experience of the scientists, or of the businessman, or of the artist, why have human beings - please listen to this, find out - why have human beings given such extraordinary importance to knowledge?

Q: Because we don't know where its place is.

Q: Knowledge works in a physical world. It is useful.

Q: It is necessary in life.

Q: There seems to be security in knowledge.

K: What do you mean by knowledge? I insist on going on slowly, otherwise you will go off. What do you mean by knowledge?

Q: Memory.

K: No, sir, go into it a little bit, don't immediately answer, go into it. To know. What do you know?

Q: I know how to act in certain situations in order to get the result which I want.

K: Yes, so you know how to act in certain situations because you have learnt previously how to act in that particular situation. Right? Right, sir? So what you know is the past. You have experimented, found and remembered and stored up, and that has become your knowledge in that field. Like a technician, a plumber is excellent in that field because he has worked and so on and so on. Right? So that is his knowledge. Which is, through skill, through practice, through action, he has acquired certain information about that, stored it up and that has become the knowledge. Right? So knowledge is always in the past. You can modify that knowledge, you can enlarge that knowledge, but it is always in the past. Right? Please, careful, go into this very, very carefully because it is really very important for a human being because if we are always living in the past, as we do, which is to act from knowledge - you understand what I am saying? Please follow this for your own sake - if I have skill, if I am skilful in becoming a carpenter, a plumber, or a businessman, or a politician, or a scientist and working along those lines I have acquired certain information, I have learnt certain things and I know now how to be a good plumber, or a good scientist or a good carpenter or a good professor, doctor, surgeon and so on, which is, I have acquired knowledge. From that I act. Right? Right, sir? That's simple. So knowledge is always in the past. Obviously. Right?

Q: Isn't there a form of knowledge, inner knowledge, that goes beyond time, and is actually prior to the conditioning?

K: Yes. Is there knowledge which is not of time. Yes, I will come to that. Unless I understand this knowledge I can't find out the other. You want to jump to the other without knowing this. That's an escape. I refuse to enter into a theoretical world. So I say, now I live my life in the past. See how strange it is. I live in the past and meet the present - right? - the present happening, the present incident, the present event, which modifies my past knowledge and I proceed. So knowledge has always been modifying itself but having always its roots in the past.

Q: When knowledge modifies itself it is in the present.

K: But it is modified. I said that. The past meets the present, the past modifies itself and still it is the past.

Q: Well, it is modifying the past in the present.

K: Modifying itself is progress?

Q: While it is modifying itself it is the past in the present.

K: Of course, it is the same thing we are saying. So one realizes that all our actions come from the past; or the past projecting an idea, ideal, and acting according to that. Obviously. I am married, I am not, but I am married and my knowledge is based on my experience with my wife, sexual, comforting, security and so on and so on, which has become my knowledge, which is my remembrance that she is my wife, or my girl, whatever it is. So please follow all this carefully. That's my conditioning. Right? The past knowledge has conditioned the mind. Now the question is, can the mind be free of the known, knowledge? You understand? It cannot. Please follow this carefully. It cannot free itself from the known because it must know how to get to my home, how to do my job, how to do various necessities of life. So knowledge has its place. Now you say, why is there knowledge continuing psychologically? You follow what I am saying? I wonder if you get this. Wait, wait. I am describing, you are just following, you don't follow the actuality, you are merely following the description - if I may point out.

Q: What is the place of the psychological realm?

K: Without memory? Without remembrance? Please you have asked a question, listen to it. What place has the psychological realm without knowledge? Is that it? No, please you have asked a question, a very good question, you don't stop there, you move.

What place has knowledge in the psychological world? Right?
Now may I ask you something? Is remembrance of your wife, or your husband or your girl, which is in the psychological field, is that love?

Q: No.

K: How do you know? You see you are so eager to answer.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That is an idea still, sir, I am just asking a very simple question. You are not really answering it - not you, sir - we are trying to evade it. You see we say, knowledge is necessary at a certain point, at a certain level - going home, driving a car, doing your job, being a plumber or a cook or a carpenter or a businessman or a scientist, knowledge there, which is partial, is necessary. Right? I am asking, is knowledge necessary in the psychological field at all? I am asking, just listen to the question first before you jump on me.

Q: What do you mean by the psychological field?

K: I am going to tell you. That is, anger. I get angry, at the moment of anger there is no remembrance as being angry. Right? Have you followed this? At the moment of getting violent you don't say, 'I am angry', it's only a second later. Which is, the recognition of that feeling which you have had before. Right? You follow this, sir? So the recognition emphasizes, gives strength to the present response, reaction. I don't know if you are following this? Are you getting tired?

Q: How can you have anger without thought first?

K: Is that so? You call me a fool; I get angry. Which is what? I have an image about myself that I am a great man or that I am not a fool, and you call me a fool. The image is the response which gets angry. Right? You are not quite sure.

We are asking, what is the content of the psyche? You understand, sir? What is the content of your psyche, that is, your psychological world?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are too quick. Ask yourself, if you will forgive me, ask yourself please, what is the content of your psyche, what is the content of your psychological world.

Q: Conditioning.

K: No, madam.

Q: The problems of the world.

Q: Sorrowful evolution of humanity.

K: Isn't the content of your psyche your belief in god, or your not belief in god? Isn't the content of your psyche that you must be somebody? Isn't the content of your psyche the desire to be happy, the conflicts, the joys, the pleasures, the fears, the anxieties, the greed, the envy, the violence - isn't that the content of your psyche? That you must achieve enlightenment, that you must meditate in a certain way, that you are an American, or that you are black, that you are white, that you are purple-you follow? Isn't that the content of your psyche, the content of your consciousness?

Q: The result of your past experiences again.

K: We have said that. So we are saying, can your psyche, with its content, anger, jealousy, hatred, hurts, envy, greed, you know, all that, can that be free, can that totally be emptied? Right? The content of your psyche is I and you, we and they, I, a Catholic, you, a heathen - this is the whole phenomenon of the world. You don't see this.

Q: Is the psyche because of the ideas that we have that we separate ourselves?

K: Obviously. Beliefs, your ideals, your concepts, your conclusions, your opinions, all that divides us. So I am asking a very, very serious question. And there are a great many people - please listen to this - a great many scholars, writers, philosophers who have given their life to this, and they say, 'It cannot. Accept this condition, make the best of it, don't be violent, do be kind - you know. But you cannot escape from this prison.'

Q: Sir, when you asked the question can the mind be free of its content, then we are conditioned to think 'how'.

K: The moment you say, 'how', it is part of our conditioning that demands a system.

Q: There is one question along those lines: if it was possible to free oneself would it be done point by point?

K: I am going to come to that, madam. The content of my consciousness, my psyche, is the various divisions in itself, conscious, unconscious, anger, not angry, be good and at the same time be violent, there is contradiction, opposition, resistance, desire to go forward and recoil, hurt, all that is my consciousness, my psyche, that is me. I am that. Now I am asking, is it possible to take one of these, one aspect of me, one aspect of my psyche, one aspect of my consciousness, take that and unravel it and finish it. As there are so many things in my consciousness, in my psyche, in the self I am, is it possible not to go bit by bit, part by part, but totally? You understand my question? Are you interested in all this?

Q: Yes.

K: Please, you understand, great minds have applied to this. We are fortunately laymen, we are simple people, we are not specialists, we are not great authors, well known people, just ordinary people. And the specialists have said, impossible.

Q: Sir...

K: Just listen, sir. They have said, no. And we laymen, ordinary people, say, yes, let's find out. You know what that means? You don't even see the colossal impertinence on our part! The courage, the denial that they may be wrong. You follow? All that is implied. That you are not willing to be subjugated by specialists, that you are not going to be frightened by these great scholars and intellectuals, you are willing to go against the current.

Q: Sir...

K: Sir, did you listen to what I said? Are you in that position?

Q: We are not.

K: The other night on television in an interview of a great writer, of great authority in this country. I won't mention names. And he was ascertaining, `it is so, it must be`, and all the rest of it. And listening to him one says, why do human beings accept authority. You follow, sir? Why do human beings subject themselves to this enormous weight of knowledge? You are not seeing what you are up against when you really go into it. So can you find out in spite of what Freud, Jung and all the scholars, intellectual people say, and say, look, I want to find out if the psyche with its content can be completely ended. Or must this everlastingly go on. You understand? The Hindus have said, life after life it must be gradually wiped away, life after life, you cannot possibly do this in this life, but you need time, you need many, many lives to do this. And the Christians have also said you cannot do this, only in paradise you will do it, when you are resurrected, when you meet your god or your christ and all the rest of it. It is the same thing.

So we are asking, being laymen, non-specialists, ordinary people, can you, is there a possibility of freeing the psyche completely, putting everything aside, its own content?

Q: That means to end the psyche itself?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: But sir without any system what happens in the consciousness when it comes to an end?

K: What happens to consciousness as we know it when it comes to an end. Right? What happens? Find out! Sir there is a mountain here called Topatopa, six thousand five hundred feet; you sit here and say, what is beyond that.

Q: I don't say that. I mean when my mind is able to come to an end, once it has made it - I am not asking for a system - once it has made it what has been done in my own mind?

K: That's the point, sir. First can you see clearly the facts that your mind is conditioned by your culture? That's a fact. By your religion, by your language, by the food you eat, by your wife or your girl or husband, whatever it is. Can you see that fact?

Q: It seems to be that we see quite a lot of facts, but we don't see the root of all this conditioning.

K: I'll show it to you in a minute. But first do you see these facts in your psyche?

Q: All the time.

K: Some of the facts, many of the facts, as many as you can. Your anger, your jealousies, your hurts, your anxieties, your fears, your pleasures, your beliefs, your opinions, your judgements, your egotism, your violence, your arrogance. You follow, the whole of that.

Q: I want to step out of it.

K: You are that, you can't step out of it. You see, that's just the point.

Q: If you are that how can you...

K: I am going to show you in a minute. You see you are always wanting to go ahead without starting.

Q: But, sir, the difficulty is that I don't know if I see all my conditioning.

K: At least you can see one, sir. Now take one - what? Take one aspect of the content of this psyche, of this consciousness, of this egotism, which is all the same. So take one aspect of it, one quality of it, one reaction of it. Go on, sir, take it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Now just a minute, sir. You get hurt, don't you, not physically, inwardly. Right? Don't you get hurt. No?

Q: Yes.

K: It is a common factor of every human being. Right? You are uncertain about it, sir. You get hurt. You call me a fool and I get hurt. My mother says to me, you are not as good as your brother, you are not as clever as your elder brother, so I get hurt. Right? This is a common factor. Right? Now take that one thing and go into it very, very deeply, and see if you can be free from the past hurts and never to be hurt again, without resistance. Find out. You see you don't go into this. If you go into this one thing completely you may end the whole thing.

Q: If you go into one thing completely you may wipe it all away?

K: Perhaps.

Q: You need awareness but the attention itself resolves it.

K: Look, sir, may I ask you - forgive me - do you get hurt? You have been hurt, not physically, you have been hurt, haven't you. Yes sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Why? What causes this hurt, and who is hurt?

Q: We have images of ourselves so we get hurt because we are not so good as we thought.

K: No, madam. You get hurt, don't you? We have said, yes. Right? What is it that is hurt?

Q: One's ego.

K: What is this ego? All right, I'll have to tell you and you will agree! Or disagree! You don't investigate, you don't look. One gets hurt because one has an image about oneself. Right? If I have an image about myself as being extraordinary this and that, a great man and a reputation, blah, blah, blah, and you come along and say, 'Don't be a fool', I get hurt. Right? Which is what? I have an image about myself. Right? The image created by all of you, and also created by myself, my image I have about myself and when you call me a fool that image reacts, that image gets hurt. Right? Now listen carefully. Can I live without that image? Can I live without any image? That I am good, that I am happy, that I must find god, that I must be a great success, I must - you follow - no image at all. Then nobody can hurt you and you can't hurt anybody. Can you? See the logic of it first, the reason. You get hurt because you have an image-the image created by your parents, by your society, by your friends and by yourself, whether the image is small or big is irrelevant. So that image gets hurt when you say something ugly and it builds a wall of resistance round itself, it doesn't want to get hurt more and so there is fear, anxiety, a withdrawal. And you see this logically step by step and the consequences of it, and you say, right, finished, there won't be any image.

Q: Is that an act of will?

K: No, mere perception. The danger.

Q: What if we haven't clear perception?

K: You see it, sir.

Q: Logically you see it.

K: Do it, do it!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, if you see danger you act. If you see a dangerous snake, a rattler, you jump, you do something.

Q: I become aware...

K: No, don't use that word, aware, just see the rattler. And the rattler, which is a danger, and getting hurt, image, and you see it is impossible to live that way, getting hurt, restraining, fighting, quarrelling, so the whole of that you see clearly, it is finished.

Q: But only a very small part of you sees that and sees it clearly. I understand what you say very well, but a great part of me apparently does not understand what I am doing.

K: That's the whole point, sir, why doesn't it? Why doesn't the whole of you say, 'Yes, that's right, finished', only a part of you.

Q: Well...

K: Just a minute, madam, why?

Q: Only the part that hurts.

K: Sir, when you see the rattler, only part of your acts? Why?

The whole of you acts.

Q: Because...

K: Why? Why, sir? Because you see mortal danger. Right?

Danger. You don't see the danger of having an image about yourself, totally. Why don't you see it? You don't see it because part of you says, I like my image, it's nice to have an image, I am rather a clever chap, I am rather clever, I look rather beautiful, I like that. Part of me, which is not pleasant, I say, yes, I want to get rid of that. Now just a minute, sir. What time is it?

Q: Seven minutes to one.

K: We will stop in a minute. Sir, when you hear a statement like this that the image gets hurt, do you listen to it, or do you make an abstraction of it, an idea of it? When you tell me you get hurt because you think you are a great man, and I listen to you because you have stated something which is very important, you follow, and I listen to you, not only with the hearing of the ear but also hearing inwardly: the actual fact that the image gets hurt. What we do is, we listen, create an idea, and act on that idea and so we have gone away from the fact. The fact is I have an image, and that will always be trodden on by somebody much cleverer than me, so I am always nervous, anxious, fearful, resisting, isolating myself. I see the danger of it, so it's finished. That means I listen with all my heart and mind, with my blood I listen, as you listen to the rattler.

Right, sir? You listen with all your energy otherwise you are going to be killed.

Q: How do you know the rattler will kill you unless you remember the rattler kills?

K: Have you ever met a rattler? I have, high in the mountains. You don't remember it, you see the danger there, instantly. So we had better stop. Sir, we have spent an hour and a half, what have you understood out of this? Are you free from your conditioning? Even the most simple conditioning, smoking, being identified with some belief. It's like a man who wants to climb Everest, he must climb with few things, not carry all his burden. Right.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 12TH APRIL 1979

Krishnamurti: What shall we have a dialogue about?

Questioner: Psychological pain which goes into physical pain.

K: Psychological pain which goes into physical pain, psychosomatic pain. Q: It seems to me that there must be a contradiction between choice and responsibility, as I don't understand how a person who is conditioned has choice. Or how is there responsibility, and how can a person be good or evil?

K: Isn't there a contradiction between choice and responsibility.

Q: Lack of choice.

K: Lack of choice and responsibility.

Q: Can we have a dialogue about ageing.

K: About getting old. These words, how we avoid that word. 'Ageing', why not say we are getting old.

Q: Let's talk about the images.

K: Image-making. Is it possible to understand the making of images and putting an end to them - is that it?

Q: Can we talk about how it comes to happen that thought went into the wrong place?

K: How does it happen that thought moves over, or enters, or takes over in the psychological field.

Q: How did it begin?

K: The origin of this.

Q: What is meditation and why it is important, what it is?

K: What is meditation. Now which of these would you like to have a dialogue about?

Q: Meditation.

Q: Meditation.

K: Do you want to talk about meditation?

Audience: Yes.

K: Do you really? Or is it just a fanciful introduction to talk about something quite irrelevant, apart from our life? If you really want to talk about meditation let's do it, but we must be very, very serious to go into that question. So which would you like? Do you want to talk about it?

Q: Yes.

Q: No.

K: No!

Q: Krishnamurti, last Tuesday we talked about conditioning and one of the conditionings we have to deal with is the conditioning of authority, and when somebody like me thinks about speaking up here he really gets into an authority problem, such as the authority I give you, out of respect, the authority I give the group, and my own authority, which I am not so sure about. Everybody has to deal with that that sits here.

K: Do you want to speak about authority? The authority of the man sitting on the platform, the authority of the public, the authority of the specialists, the authority of one's own experience which becomes inward authority. Do you want to talk about that?

Q: Yes

Q: No.

Q: Could we talk about meditation at a later meeting. That may be more appropriate.

K: All right.

Q: Let's talk about our ability to experience that about which you speak? Or our inability to live it?

K: Would you talk, or could we have a dialogue about that which you are talking about! What a strange crowd we are!

Q: Could we talk about what it is that we really want, what is our over-riding interest?

K: Could we discuss that, what is our search, what it is we are seeking and what is the inner urge to find something - could we talk about that? Do you want to talk about it?

Audience: Yes.

K: All right, sir. You know, I do not know if you have not noticed, specially in California which spreads to the East and also further East, that most Americans are seeking something, are experimenting with various religious ideas, psychological pursuits, group therapy, you know, this whole phenomenon of seeking, wanting something. Is that what you want to discuss?

Audience: Yes.

K: You are sure?

Q: Yes.

K: All right, sir.

Q: Could we talk about respectability?

K: Talk about respectability. All right, sir, we will introduce that word, what is the content of that word, in going into this question of what it is that you are all wanting, that we are all seeking, why you all come here and listen to this man. What for? I think this is really a very good question, if we could have a serious dialogue about it.

Q: To distract us from ourselves, that's why we come here.

K: You come here to escape from yourselves, to avoid our own daily complexities - is that what we are wanting?

Q: I would like to find out about attention, desire and will?

K: We will do that, sir, on Saturday, we will go into the whole question of desire, the implication of desire, the arising of desire and the interference of thought with its image which is pursued through will. So we will discuss that, if you don't mind, on Saturday, the day after tomorrow morning. But let's go into this question: what is it we are all wanting? More money, if you have enough money? Obviously one must have more money if you haven't got it, that gives us food, clothes and shelter. Apart from that, and if it is possible that all human beings right throughout the world have enough food, clothes and shelter, that would be a marvellous world because there is a great deal of poverty, of which you hardly know in this country, where there is degradation, destruction, of absolute hopelessness, not having a job, food, clothes and all that. We can go into that. But apart from that, in an affluent society where most of us have some kind of assurance of food, clothes and shelter, apart from this, what is it we are seeking?

Q: Completeness.

K: It is suggested that we are seeking completeness. Go into it, sir, a little bit, step by step, go into it rather deeply. What is it we want? Happiness? Because most of us are discontented, dissatisfied with things as they are, both in our private life and in public life, and we want to bring about some kind of inward peace, tranquillity, a sense of order, not only in society but in ourselves. What is it one wants? And if one has this social order, which doesn't exist, if one has it, we want something more: we want god, we want enlightenment, we want a kind of mental peace and so on and so on - what is it each one of us wants, craves after, pursues? I wish we could discuss this.

Q: We don't even know what we want because we give a label to god, or enlightenment.

K: Is that it? We do not know what we want, therefore we go window shopping.

Q: I think we do know what we want. That's why we want it because we know what we want.

K: You know what you want? Then there is no problem.

Q: Not really, there isn't, is there? Probably there isn't.

K: I mean if you know what you want you can get it, only the trouble is getting it. Then there is no problem: you say, look, I want money, I want to be happy, I want some kind of order in my life, then you work for it. That's very simple. But we aren't satisfied with that, we are always wanting more and more and more. What is this `more'?

Q: If we work at it to include a physical security, and I think we have to start out with that, and also include - I don't know if I can call this psychological security but psychological serenity, if there could be that and physical security, because I think the two have to go together.

K: It is suggested that both physical as well as psychological security must be sought out.

Q: Well, it might be that there has to be physical security, we have to want that, and not just want that and in a sense I want physical security...

K: Sir, are you saying for most people in the world, the increasing population, the destruction that is going on of the earth, the air, everything, to have physical security is becoming more and more difficult. That's one point. Second, psychologically, inwardly we all want some kind of attachment, some kind of comfort, some kind of release from our own daily routine, turmoil. Now are you saying, cannot these two go together? Just enquire into it, sir. You may be well fed, have clothes and all the rest of it; the vast majority of people in the world, specially in Asia, including India, life is becoming enormously difficult, poverty, the degradation of poverty. What is preventing this? What is preventing a human being to live on this earth, having plenty of food, clothes and shelter for all human beings, what is the cause of this prevention? We are enquiring, we are not accepting, we are thinking the problem over together. Q: Is it that some amass such wealth and food and power?

K: Is it that some people amass enormous wealth and are only concerned about themselves? Is that the cause? Or is it also nationalities, economic divisions, political divisions, religious divisions, all these factors and some others prevent human beings coming together, organizing it so that we all have enough food, clothes and shelter? Obviously, because we are not concerned about others, we are only concerned as long as I have my security, leave me alone.

So that's one problem. Most of us here at least are not seeking physical security, otherwise you wouldn't be here. But we want psychological security, we want something inwardly. What is it you want?

Q: When you say psychological security is that the same as spiritual security?

K: Oh, I am not using the word `spiritual' at all, that's rather an over used word, a rather superstitious word and rather a catchy word.

Q: Psychological.

K: I am using the word `psychological' in the sense there is inner demand, I want something, not I, people want something, what is it you want.

Q: We want to realize our potential.

K: You want to realize your potentials. What are your potentials? If you say, I want to realize my potentials, first I must find out what my potentials are and then I can put all my energy into that. But what is my potential?

Q: Happiness.

K: Happiness? Is that a potential, or is that an end, is that a by-product?

Q: Maybe he feels that our potentiality is god because all the religions have told us that.

K: Is that it? Our potential is god. I am lost! We are not clearly thinking about this matter.

Q: We are all seeking eternal life.

K: We are all seeking eternal life - what do you mean by that word `eternal'? Eternal, which is beyond time. Eternal we generally understand to mean a continuous existence, eternal - is that what you want?

Q: Sir, I want to end my wanting.

K: Ah, you want to end your wanting.

Q: I want to end my confused mind.

K: You want to have a clear mind, is that it?

Q: I have a confused mind.

K: Yes, my mind is confused, the questioner says, and I want clarity. Can we discuss that? You are putting so many things in this, can we discuss that, talk it over together? Most of our minds are confused. That's obvious. If your minds were clear you wouldn't be here. You wouldn't attend any meetings, you wouldn't have to go to any guru, to any philosopher, to any recent man who says, 'I know what I am talking about'.

Q: Maybe then we would just come for conversation and friendship, just to know you. You are a very nice person.

K: Maybe, is that what you want? So most of us are confused, why? Please, go into it, put your heart into this to find out. Why are we confused?

Q: Sir, the world demands action, and we don't really know how to respond.

K: The world demands action, and we do not know how to respond. How can one respond at your excellence, at your highest capacity if your mind is confused? Please stick to this. Would you say your minds are confused?

Q: Yes.

K: Right, let's start from there, please. Why is it confused?

Q: We are constantly living in contradiction.

K: We live in constant contradiction, and therefore our minds are confused. That's one reason. Go on, go into step by step, sir.

Q: One reason is that our education has taught us about different religions, and different political ideologies, and that's why there is contradiction.

K: So are you saying, our education?

Q: Our conditioning.

K: Our conditioning, various people saying various different things, one philosopher saying this, the others saying contrary to that, a scientist and so on and so on, and therefore we listen to all these people and we do not know who is speaking the truth. Is that it? Give your thoughts to this a little, please.

Q: How can a confused mind recognize this?

Q: People tell us certain things are good like money, so we get those things and find out it is no good anyway.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: First I have to have the capacity for clarity, we must first see what is the cause of this confusion. Right, sir? What is the cause of it?

Q: Is it not the content of consciousness?

K: Is not the cause of confusion the content of our consciousness. Would we go slowly into this because it is very important for you if you could understand why our minds are confused. Is it because we are unhealthy physically and therefore that psychosomatic reaction makes us confused? That may be one thing. Second we listen, or we are educated and we listen to contradictory opinions, contradictory theories, contradictory religious ideas - you can only be saved through Christ, or you can only be saved through this, that, the other. So we are being pushed in all directions constantly. The latest guru, the latest philosopher, the latest psychologist and we listen to all these people and you say, 'Who is telling the actual fact, who is telling the truth?'

Q: If our minds are confused how can we recognize what is correct?

K: If our minds are confused how can we recognize what truth is in what the other's are saying. One cannot. But we are trying to find out, sir, what is the cause of this confusion, why do men and women live in this confusion. You don't give your minds to this, you just throw off things.

Q: We have been conditioned to seek things we don't really need, that's part of it.

K: Do you really want to find out why your minds are confused? Right? What price are you willing pay for it - not money, I don't want a cent from you, thank god! Please listen, sir, please listen. You have asked a very serious question.

Q: What do you mean by confused?

K: If I may ask, why are you here?

Q: Not to find out about confusion. I'd like to know what is compassion and what is love and how do we do that.

K: You see everybody has different `wantings'. You want to find out what is love, and somebody says something else, and something else.

Q: All these different things make for confusion.

K: Yes, sir. At the end of this meeting, this gathering you will be still left with your confusion. So what is important is, if we can clear up this confusion by really talking about it, going into it, really being clear.

Q: We want somebody to tell us what to do and that is why.

K: We are coming to that, madam.

Q: You asked what is the cause of confusion.

K: I am asking that, sir, you are all pushing in different directions. What is the cause of this confusion that man lives in, not only during this century it has been like that always?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You don't even listen. Sir, it is an historical fact that man has lived this way, in confusion, and we are asking why is he confused.

Q: I don't know.

K: If you do not know, don't you want to find out?

Q: The question was, what price are we willing to pay.

K: Yes, sir, I asked what price, not financial, what price in the sense what will you give of your energy, your intention, your demand, to find out whether your mind can be clear. Will you give your attention, will you give your energy, will you give your capacity to find out, that means your blood, your heart, your mind to find out.

Q: Yes.

Q: I don't know how to give those things.

Q: We do know, we are giving our attention now.

K: Are you giving your attention to find out, not to what I am saying.

Q: To the process of questioning and trying to find out.

K: Just a minute, sir. Not to what I am saying, that is totally irrelevant. But together to find out if we can clear up this confusion. That means talking it over together, not holding on to your opinion, and my opinion, but I want to find out what is the cause of this. You understand, sir? Is it because each one is so terribly selfish, each one wanting his own expression, his own pleasure and his own - all the rest of it, he is so self-centred - is that it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I have just asked a question, enquire into that question. You understand in this country, here there is freedom to do what you want. In a totalitarian state you cannot do that, here you can do what you want. And we are doing what we want, each one asserting himself, each one wanting his own success, his own happiness, his own fulfilment of his own ambition and so on and so on. Is that the cause of this extraordinary chaos?

Q: That's a by-product.

K: What is a by-product?

Q: A by-product of some cause, it is not the cause.

K: Selfishness is not the cause?

Q: Maybe selfishness is a by-product of the cause, whatever that is.

K: What is further? Your egotism, your sense of wanting to fulfil your own urges? If you are a Catholic you want that, you can only find grace, salvation through a certain person; if you are not you are something else. Don't you understand my question? Each one of us wanting something for ourselves - is that the cause of it?

Q: A sense of self follows the conditioning, sir?

K: Sir, find out. If we could all put our minds to this to find out.

Q: Sir, when you give yourself attention the unattention goes away.

K: Sir, I want to find out, apart from all of you, I want to find out why human minds are confused, the basic reason, the root of this, not just the expression of this confusion but the root of it. Is it that each one of us thinks that we are extraordinary individuals, separate, and therefore each one wanting to express his own urges, his own reactions, his own demands? Which can all be expressed in one word, 'self-centredness'.

Q: Yes.

K: Please, don't agree with me, it is not agreement, you have to find out.

Q: It's part of it.

K: All right, part. Now - listen to this for two minutes, sir - the parts don't make the whole. Right? Obviously. But through the part you can find the whole. Right? You understand? I want to find out for myself why my mind is confused. I say is it because I am really so self-centred? I think it is, I am so self-centred - my wife, my house, my ambitions, my god, my beliefs, my experience, I want this and I don't want that - you know self-centred action all the time. And this self-centred action is encouraged by the society I live in, encouraged by the religions - you can only save yourself through - Buddhism and parts of Hinduism deny all that. You follow? So I find by observing in the world very critically, historically, watching all the human activities, political, religious, nonsensical, communism, totalitarianism, communities and so on and so on, they are all in one way or another self-centred. That's a fact. I may be self-centred, but not knowing, but say, 'I am expressing God's wishes, I represent the eternal' - it is still self-centredness. So if that is the cause, and I am pretty sure it is the cause, then what shall I do to clear up that confusion whose cause is this eternal self-centredness?

Q: You said that that is part of the cause, and then through the part we find the whole?

K: Yes, sir. Through the part you can find the whole, but the part isn't the whole.

Q: I am confused because I don't know how the parts relate to the whole.

K: Forgive me for bringing that in. It is self-centredness. So if that is the root of it what am I to do? How deeply do I want to be free of this self-centredness? How deeply am I willing to put aside those things that create self-centredness?

Q: One can see the danger of it.

K: Therefore psychologically, inwardly, unconsciously, one may see the danger of not being self-centred, which may bring about such a deep psychological revolution, unconsciously one may be frightened of it, therefore you say, please, let me remain in my confusion, let me remain in my anxiety, in my uncertainty, I'll go on window shopping for the rest of my life but I see the danger of going very deeply into this. Is that the case with most of us?

Q: We fear the responsibility of clarity.

K: Of course.

Q: To fear the responsibility of clarity is once again to focus the attention on the self. Clarity does not exist in the self, where does it exist?

K: No, I am going to point out a different way of approaching the problem. Q: Ignorance.

K: Ignorance of my own selfishness.

Q: And the lack of love.

K: Why do I talk about love when I am selfish? For god's sake, how can I talk about love of god, or whatever all that stuff is, when my whole life is self-centred.

Q: Isn't that an indication that the completeness of the brain is conditioned and the mind is...

K: Sir, sir. You are moving away from the central fact that we are self-centred. We may move to god but it is still self-centred. The extension from the centre is still self-centred. So I say to myself, is it possible-I am asking, having a dialogue - is it possible not to be self-centred, what are the implications of not being self-centred? Which, if I do it by will, I am still self-centred. If I say, I must not be self-centred, the `must not' is still part of the self. Right? I wonder if you see that. I can renounce - not I - one can renounce property, beliefs, all that, the very renunciation in order to achieve something is part of this self-centredness. Right? So one wants to find out is there a way of living, daily life, not in heaven or in some kind of community, living where we are our daily life without being self-centred. Sir, this is an enormous complex question, you understand. There must be no escape into some kind of illusion, ideologies, into some kind of fanciful living, but actual daily living in which self-centred action doesn't take place.

Q: But if I have perfect attention to the present moment I am not self-centred.

K: Give your complete attention to the present. What do you mean by the word `present'?

Q: Right now.

K: Look, please sir. Right now, what do you mean `right now'?

Q: This very second, instant, now.

K: What do you mean by those words sir - instant, now, the present?

Q: Live right now instead of splitting.

K: No, no, I'm not splitting, I am not splitting words. I am asking a very serious question, when you say `the now', which means there is neither the past nor the future.

Sir, let's go back: is there a way of living in which this self-centred activity ends?

Q: Is it possible for the self to exist without self-centred activity at all?

K: Is it possible for the self to exist without its activities. Its very activities is the self. If the self has no activity it dies. Obviously. It has no substance. Please.

Q: Sir, the fact is we don't know what it means to live without self-centred activity.

K: We are going to find out.

Q: What is the self-centred activity?

K: You don't know what self-centred activity is?

Q: I mean in reality.

K: I am showing reality. My attachments to my wife, to my husband, to my girl, to my house, to my belief, to my nationalities, to my experience, to my dogmas, to my gods. My belief, my attachments, my activities of ambition, arrogance and so on, all that is self-centred activity. That's obvious, sir.

Q: What is the root of it?

K: The root of it is the energy, this vast energy channelled in a particular direction of ambition, of greed, envy, violence, belief, all that is all this energy channelled through all this. The very centre of this is energy, and this energy is now being used along particular, narrow, limited lines and therefore it is self-centred.

Q: Could we ask where thought comes in.

K: We will come to that. Madam, thought is part of this self-centredness. I identify myself with my group, with my society, with my wife, with my god, I identify, the identifying process is part of this self-centredness. Sir, I have said this, please I have said this, see if it is the truth, or false, you jump to something else.

Q: Sir, is energy somehow trapped?

K: All right, it is trapped by your desire. Where are you at the end of it?

Q: Sir, isn't part of this that basically you don't want to be alone.

K: Yes, sir. Part of this self-centredness is being afraid to be alone, being afraid of loneliness, therefore gather together, be attached to something, be entertained, television, newspapers, the preachers, you know, entertained, football. They are all the same whether it is the entertainment of the priest or the entertainment of football, they are the same because you all want to be entertained. Please, sir, just listen to what I am saying, for god's sake. Not that you must accept. We have come to a point where we see we are self-centred, and is it possible not to be?

Q: No.

K: You say, no. Then you are blocked, you have blocked yourself from finding out if it is possible. And if a man says, yes, it is possible, then he is also blocked. The man who says, no, and the man who says, yes, are both blocking themselves.

Q: The only way that we can try to understand this process of self-centredness is to go to the suffering process and remain with it, and do nothing about it.

K: Do it, sir. Are you doing it, or is it just talk?

Q: I am doing it.

K: Good luck! Yes, sir, I am glad you are doing it.

Q: You see the process of self-centredness yet you continue.

K: We have come to the next step: which is if you see the cause of this confusion is self-centredness, if you see the self-centredness with all its innumerable activities, then what will you do? If you say, it is not possible not to be self-centred, then you give it up. Right? But if you say, also it is possible, you have also encouraged it. So both are the same. If you discard both and then say, look, I am self-centred, let me find out if one of the expressions which is attachment - attachment to my wife, to my family, to my god, to my belief, to my opinions, to my judgement - you know attachment to something, whether I can be free of that attachment, without conflict, without renunciation, without exercising will, because that is part of the self still.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You haven't listened. Please listen to this. Which means can you observe your attachment of various kinds, not just of the wife or the husband, or the girl, attachment to a particular idea, to a particular opinion, to a particular belief, attached, and that very attachment implies you are that. You understand?

Q: No.

K: Just listen, sir. If I am attached to my furniture I am the furniture. You understand? Do you understand this simple fact? Because without the furniture I am lost. So can I observe this attachment to this or that or the other, and without conflict, without a motive, just drop it?

Q: How?

K: I am showing you, sir. The moment you ask 'how' - see the reason, sir, see the logic of it - the moment I ask 'how' you want a pattern, you want a system, that very system is the expression of the self. Sir, you understand, I want to understand the cause of this confusion. The cause of this confusion is this self-centredness; one of the aspects of this self-centredness is attachment; I see this very clearly, the logic of it, the rationality of it, I have exercised my reason, not my prejudice, not my callousness, I have examined it, and the very examination brings about a certain quality of intelligence. Right? That intelligence says, finished, I am not attached. It's not your will that says, I am not attached, it's the intelligence that has come into being through observation of being attached, all the implications of it: fear, jealousy, anxiety, and the loss which I call suffering, all that I see and the very perception of that is intelligence.

Q: We understand it.

K: If you like to use the word 'understand'.

Q: I don't see this clearly.

K: If you don't see clearly, madam, why? Which means you are not either hearing, or not following, you are not interested, you are distracted, your attention is not fully in the enquiry.

Q: I don't want to give it all up.

K: Ah, then keep it. Then keep it and live in confusion. Nobody wants to give up anything. I am not asking you to give it up. I say on the contrary, by giving up you haven't solved the problem. You can drop your belief, but you haven't solved the problem. The problem is self-centredness, and one of the expressions of that self-centredness is attachment.

Q: Sir, we come from the past to unravel the awareness of...

K: Don't bring in other factors, madam, just look at the simple factor that one is attached, and see the implications of that attachment. Suppose one is attached to a woman or a man, they both like being attached to each other, it is part of their sexual, personal, sensational demands. And if anything happens to one or the other, one runs away or chooses after three years another man, then begins the whole problem of jealousy, antagonism, or indifference because you can always pick up another man or another girl. Right?

Q: Sir, we are so secure in psychological terms I understand but in the reality we live not only in the psychological world, we live in the natural world as well. Our daily life has another aspect other than what you call psychological.

K: No, sir, we are not, we are living in both worlds.

Q: We do, agreed. That's what I am saying.

K: We are living both in the psychological world and in the physical world. The psychological world dominates the physical world. The physical world doesn't dominate the psychological world. You can have all the money, all the food, all the cars, everything, but you may be unhappy because your husband or wife has run away, you know, all the rest of it.

Q: I am a painter, when you talk about attachment I understand this in psychological terms but in my work when I try to realize myself on a canvas, to realize myself, to put myself on a canvas, to paint a picture, a painting, I don't see that as an attachment, I try to realize my potential, I try to establish a line of communication. So if I consider that as an attachment - perhaps it is, a sort of attachment in that - but in another sense it is not attachment.

K: Isn't it an attachment? When you say I want to achieve my potential, when I want to be a great success?

Q: No, no. I make a distinction between success and potential.

K: Sir, a distinction between potential and fulfilment.

Q: Yes.

K: Just a minute, sir, careful, careful, go slowly, sir, don't say, yes. You are differentiating between potential and fulfilment. If you have potential then it will operate, you don't search out its fulfilment. If you have a first-class feeling for music, you know, and you go on working, working - the moment you say, I want to fulfil, then the self-centred activity begins. It is like a violinist, sir, who has got great potential, and he uses the instrument to fulfil himself, to become rich, to become famous, to becomes this or that.

Q: Yes, sir, maybe. But we are together this morning talking about confusion, that's how it appears in our daily living. We hear that attachment is the source of our trouble, of our misery, and if we sense that what we are doing is a matter of attachment so we get confused, should we go ahead with what we want to do, or are we serving some kind of attachment in this way?

K: Sir, I said that is only part of it. Sir, self-centredness is also getting hurt. Right? Being psychologically hurt. That's part of self-centredness. Part of self-centredness is being violent. Part of self-centredness is, I must fulfil, I have got capacity, I have a certain potentiality in me and I must express it, and when there is no fulfilment in that expression then there is frustration, disappointment, depression, anger, all that is part of self-centredness.

So I say, when you observe this confusion, and man has accepted this way of living which leads to confusion, which encourages confusion, and we live with it, we never say, can this end. All we do is, not knowing how to end it, we run away from it - we want to know about meditation, we want to know about god, if there is immorality, if there is anything but this. So we are pointing out in a dialogue, I am not your authority, though I am sitting on a platform that is merely for convenience, so that we can see each other, being raised a little bit higher doesn't give one authority. One year I was in India, a very famous guru sent his disciples, wanting to see me. And the disciples came for three days and said, 'You must come and see our guru'. I said, 'I am sorry, I don't go out searching any guru'. And at last the guru came because he wanted to see me. We were sitting on a little platform, on a mattress about that thick, out of politeness we got up and asked him to sit on the mattress. Immediately he became the guru because he was a little higher! And he began to tell us what to do. You understand this, the absurdity of it. So sitting on a platform, as I am, doesn't give me any authority. But I am just pointing out certain things if you are willing to listen. That our cause of our confusion is this enormous deep-rooted, unconscious as well as conscious, deliberate selfishness, self-centred activity. And can one observe it not only in relationship intimately, but also in our work? One can observe this going on all the time.

Now please just listen, if you are interested. To observe, what does it mean? To observe either as though you are outside of it and looking in-you understand this? - or the observer is that which is observed, there is no division between the observer and the observed.

Q: This is not exactly clear for me, this division.

K: What division? I'll make it clear. What time is it?

Q: Quarter to one.

K: I'll make this very clear. When you observe the mountain, as you can observe it, in what manner do you observe it? Do you see the mountain as it is, or the word `mountain', the word, interferes with the observation? Because when you look at that thing the verbal reaction comes immediately, `that's a mountain'. So when you observe the word interferes with looking at that thing. Right? Do you see that, sir? That's simple. Now in the same way, can you observe your reactions without the past telling you, this is good, bad, this is right, this is wrong, just to observe?

Q: Without thought.

K: That's right.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look what happens. One is greedy, you see something, a dress, a pair of trousers, shoes, whatever it is, car, woman or man, you see it. And can you observe without the past memories interfering with it? When the past interferes you are not actually looking, are you. The past memories are looking, there is no actual looking at that which is happening now. So the observer is the past, the past is looking at what is happening now, so there is a division. You understand, sir?

Q: Is it possible to have that clarity one moment and not the next?

K: If one has clarity one moment and at another moment you have not clarity, it is not clarity. Clarity is clarity. No, please, just finish this. If you once understand the principle of this, not agree with me, but I am pointing out the logic of it, the reason of it, which is: we are always looking from the past.

Q: Would you say that the man, or the being who is looking, is himself the past?

K: Yes, sir. That's right.

Q: The moment before you named it mountain wasn't that clarity?

K: I named it for you to indicate it, but to look at it without the word.

Q: No, but if I look at it myself...

K: I am going to show you something, sir: can you look at your girl, or your wife, or your husband - please listen - without the past, without the past memories, past sensations, past disagreements, all that piled up, can you look at her or him without a single image you have built about her or about him, can you?

Q: I have never tried.

K: Never tried. Quite right. Never tried it.

Q: What did he say?

K: Just a minute, sir, listen to what that gentleman said just now: he has never tried. What does that mean? He has taken the past as granted: it's my wife, my girl, my husband, with all the past implications involved in it - probably he wasn't - not you, sir, I am just saying - aware of all the past incidents accumulated which has become the image, the picture, and so the picture says, 'I know my wife'. Like the pope saying, 'God exists'. Q: What if your wife is doing the same thing every time you see her?

K: Right, sir, can one observe without the past accumulation? If you cannot observe without the past accumulation it is not possible to observe at all. But with all of us the past is so enormous, our minds are burdened that we cannot see without the past, see what is actually happening. Find out. If you find this out to be true for yourself, I am not telling you, then there is a totally different relationship taking place. It isn't just routine, it isn't just a mechanical repetition of the past operating all the time.

Q: Sir, when you are asked a question, an answer from memory comes up and you try...

K: Don't. Don't try. Just see how the memory jumps immediately, pops up, so watch it. Sir, this requires a great deal of enquiry and attention, it isn't just, well I'll learn this by heart and something else will happen; you have to be very attentive, watchful. But if you observe the past is always meeting the present, the present happening, modifies itself, goes on; but it is still always the past. So man has lived this way; the great scientists, philosophers, say, knowledge is the only thing that will evolve man, the ascent of man through knowledge - which is, knowledge is always the past. So we are saying, on the contrary, man can only ascend if the past with all the knowledge of the past has its right place and is free of the known, then there is freedom to move.

Q: Sir, I was serious in that comment because it may be that my wife is mechanical and therefore when you look at her you see the same thing because simply the mechanical pattern is the same. Do you understand what I mean?

K: I think I understand, sir. Sir, our minds have become mechanical, haven't they, why? You don't observe all this. Why have our minds become mechanical? Our jobs have become mechanical. Right? Right? Get up in the morning, all the rest of it, office, the routine, the routine, our way of thinking is routine, always along a particular line, horizontal or vertical, aspiring or floating along. So our minds are caught in a groove of belief and so on and so on, so everything has become mechanical, your sex, your ambitions, your aspirations, your gods, everything. You don't realize this. So there is nothing new. So we are saying something contrary to all that. That is, to observe without the observer, which is the past. Even the quail agrees!

Q: But sir, when I try to observe 'what is' without the past, the past operates.

K: Then go after the past, find out why the past operates. Why the past has become so important in our lives. Sir, look, the past is important when you are driving a car. Right? Because if you are just put in a car, with a wheel, and you didn't know the technique of driving which you have learnt by constant repetition, which becomes the knowledge, you won't be able to drive. You may drive, you will kill yourself or kill somebody else. So knowledge in language, in business, in doing all the necessities of daily life - necessities - knowledge is important. But when the mind, which is the whole movement of thought, is a process of operating from past knowledge, past experience, past memory, then it becomes a dangerous instrument that divides people, that destroys people.

Q: Without meditation life has no meaning.

K: What we are doing now is part of meditation. This is meditation, to clear up one's mind. Sir, look, sir, if I am a Catholic my meditation would be confined to one particular pattern, and that isn't meditation. Meditation is something that has no limitations. I won't go into all that, you will want to escape into that. I won't because to meditate is an extraordinary activity. It can only come when the mind is completely free from confusion. A man confused meditating, his meditation is still confused, whether it is transcendental, or any other nonsense, it is still confused meditation, which only leads to illusions.

You see, sir, these various gurus have come to see me at one time or another. I am just telling you for the fun of it. The great ones and the little ones. And they all say, 'What you are saying, sir, is the greatest truth, is what you are living, it's a great privilege', and they go on their own way, because they say, 'Sorry, sir, we must help the poor people who don't understand'. You understand the game. Is that enough?

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 14TH APRIL 1979

I feel a bit shy! May we go on talking about what we were saying last Sunday and Saturday? We were saying, if I remember correctly, that we must see things together; see together the confusion of the world around us, the extraordinary danger, that is all over the world, to human life, how the religions throughout the world are breaking up the coming together of human beings. And seeing this vast confusion, misery, starvation and affluence, and wars, every intelligent man who is at all aware of the present state of the world outside of us must be asking if it is possible for human beings, each one of us, to have this quality of goodness. In the English language, specially in America, they are using words which are now becoming utterly meaningless; like security, like sincerity, they have lost their meaning. Since a man who wants to sell you something is very sincere, a man who is rather demented and does not know that he is somewhat unbalanced, he is very sincere. And a man who believes very strongly in certain conclusions, in certain beliefs, in god and so on, he is also very sincere.

And a word like honesty has lost almost its meaning. Because when we are living in a totalitarian state you cannot be honest, you have to tell lies, you have to be dishonest. But if you said what you wanted to say openly, it would be dangerous to live. So one has to examine all these words and give a different meaning to all of them: like the word 'love', is heavily loaded with all kinds of sensuous, sentimental, romantic nonsense. So one has to re-examine altogether these words. We are using the word 'goodness' in the sense that there cannot be a society outside of us unless each human being is very honest. I am going to explain what I mean by honesty. There cannot be a good society if it is merely accepting a state which he disapproves of and yet outwardly accepts it, he cannot possibly be good or honest. And the good family, the good earth, the good book, the good idea - we are talking about a goodness that is beyond all this, which we will go into as we go along during these three or four talks.

So we are now using the word 'goodness' in the sense that human beings, can they be totally honest, not only outwardly but especially inwardly so as not to be deceived, not to be caught in an illusion, not to hold on to some decayed belief? Because all these prevent this quality of a deep abiding sense of honesty. We are using the word 'honesty' psychologically in the sense of having no illusion whatever, a make-belief, or accept a concept created by others or by yourself, and if you are living according to a concept, to an ideal, it is divorced from actuality and therefore you cannot be honest, therefore it cannot have this quality of goodness. We are giving this word totally a different meaning. I think it is the right word, because throughout history - not that the speaker is a scholar, but he has observed a great deal - and history, throughout history man has craved to have a society that is peaceful, that is orderly, safe, where everyone is employed, where the tyrant doesn't rule and so on and so on, it has been the craving of man. All the Utopias are based on this, but they never come to fruition because man is so essentially dishonest, deeply, because he lives in a state of illusion, a make-belief.

So we are saying, observing all this, this total chaos in the world, practically anarchy where even the pope has to be protected when he leaves the Vatican, it is all becoming so silly and dangerous, seeing all this what is the right action for each one of us. Because we contribute to the chaos, there is no question about it, because we have created the society, we are responsible for the society. And if we do not radically, basically, fundamentally bring about psychological revolution, there cannot be a good society. So we are asking: what will make man fundamentally change? You understand my question? Please give some attention to it. We are - the speaker is not giving a talk, we are sharing together the problem - not the way you see it or the speaker sees it, the problems actually as they are, not what you would want them to be, or what I want them to be, but the actual happening in the world, outside of us, and actually what is happening inwardly, psychologically, inside our skin, as it were. Otherwise we cannot possibly communicate with each other. Communication implies sharing, partaking, the same thing together. If the speaker wants to tell you something, and if you are not attentive or if you don't care to listen, then there is no possibility of communication. But since we are all human beings concerned with the world that is degenerating, where there is so much danger, chaos, disorder, it's our human problem to resolve this, not for the leaders because we elect the leaders. If we are confused our leaders will be confused. It's so obvious all this.

So the fundamental question is: what will change human beings, their quality, their behaviour, their deep rooted selfishness and so on, what will change each one? Do we want more shots, more disaster, more wars? You understand, sir? Question all this, think it over, let's think it over together, let us observe it together, not I observe and tell you, or you observe and tell me, but together observe these facts. And having observed these facts impersonally, objectively, not as an American, as a Hindu, objectively, the question then is: what will change man. They have tried various systems, political, religious, economic - outside, the communist revolution, the French revolution, various other forms of revolution, the revolutions that have been going on in the world have not changed man. They have modified the environment, they have brought about certain conveniences, comforts, but basically man has remained as he was for the last million years or more. So what shall we do? What is man to do? What is his responsibility, what is his action?

Most of our actions are based on our desire. We went into that a little bit last Sunday. We said desire is the seeing, the contact, the sensation, and - please follow this step by step otherwise we shan't be able to communicate with each other - seeing, contact, response of sensation, the senses responding to the contact and so on. Then thought comes into action and says, to have that house, that car, that garden, creates an image, and the pursuit of that image is the activity of will which is desire. Are we going too fast? No, I can go very fast but are we meeting each other, not only verbally but actually, because one must find out together if even a small group, two or three who are serious find out together what is right action, living in this monstrous insane world, what is right action, to find out what is right action one has to find out what our activities spring from, our daily activities, and when you observe it, it is really our desire: I wish to gain, I wish to achieve, I am ambitious,

I am this, that - it is all the activity of desire with its will. Desire is contradictory: I desire one thing one year, later on another year there is opposing, contradictory desires. So our actions are also contradictory, because all our actions, most of our actions are based on desire with its will to succeed, to achieve, to fulfil, to have pleasure and so on. So your desire opposes another person's desire so there is conflict between two people, between two desires. This action born out of this contradictory desire creates confusion. Please, this is obvious, right, can we go on? No, I can go on but will you follow all this, actually doing it, observe it very carefully and find out for oneself what is right action.

We said, desire is the movement of sensation, having a good house, a big lovely garden, nice car, a beautiful person and so on and so on and so on, it is the movement of sensation as desire. Desire arises when thought creates the image and pursues that image. Now is there an action - please listen - which is not the action of desire, but the action of intelligence? I'll explain what I mean. Are we meeting each other, or am I going ahead by myself? All right, sir? You see, as we said the other day, sensations, the movement of senses, with most of us it is a part of the senses; there is no activity of the whole movement of the senses, as a whole, but only partially. And desire equally is partial. Right? So we are asking, if you observe, there is perception, contact, sensation, then thought comes creating the image and the pursuit of it. Now when you see this intelligence is born. All right sirs? All right, I'll go into it.

We observe right throughout the world that every human being is driven by his desires - the politicians, the popes, the religious people, the economists, everybody is drive by desire. And this energy of desire is opposed to another series of desires - yours and anothers. So this opposition creates contradiction, and therefore in action there must be conflict. That's clear. Now we are asking: is there an action which is not born of desire? Right? And we say, there is, if you observe it closely. Desire is the movement of the senses, which is the observation, contact, sensation, then thought taking over. Now if you can see the consequences of thought taking over the sensations, and the consequences of it are conflict, contradiction, fulfilment, and not being able to fulfil, fear and all the rest of it follows. So to see the sensation, the interference of thought, to see this whole movement is intelligence. And the action of intelligence is not your intelligence or my intelligence, it is intelligence, therefore there is no contradiction in our action. Do you follow? See, if you will kindly, it is logical, first see logically, verbally even. Then perhaps after seeing it logically then you can get the feeling of this quality of intelligence, which is not yours or mine, it is intelligence, therefore it is a common factor, and we are acting together from the common factor. Do you get it? That is the sense of goodness, because there is no contradiction, there is no 'my desire' pushing 'your desire'.

And goodness, which basically has this quality of intelligence, goodness cannot exist as long as there is fear. Do you understand? May I go on? Most of us have peculiar fears. I don't know if you are aware of your own fears. Right? If you are, what is the root of fear? Not how to get rid of fear - for the moment, we will go into it - but what is the root of fear. Most of us are concerned when we have fears, either to suppress it, control it, run away from it, or invent some rationalization which gradually becomes neurotic. And apparently throughout the ages man has not been able to be free of fear, both outward fears, dangers, accidents and so on, ultimately the fear of death, and we still live with innumerable fears, each one according to his temperament, character, idiosyncrasy, according to his peculiar experience, culture and so on. He is frightened, and not being able to solve this fear he looks to an outside agency, to the analyst, to the professor, to the specialist, or to god - god of course is the ultimate escape. Now we are asking not how to trim the various branches of fear, how to modify fear, or how to develop courage to meet fears - to develop courage is only a form of resistance to one's own fear, it's there, but you use the word courage and develop a form of resistance, but one has not solved the nature of fear.

So we are enquiring together. Please, I am not enquiring and you are listening, but together we are investigating what is the nature, the structure of fear? Can man, ordinary human being, be free of fear totally? You understand my question? Man has not been able to resolve it, so he wants to forget the fear in immolating himself to a certain principle, to a certain idea, Utopia, which is always escaping from the fact. So we are asking, what is the root of fear? If one can find out, discover for oneself what is the cause, the essence of fear then perhaps we can live a different kind of life altogether, which is the life of goodness, because goodness cannot contain fear.

To find out the root of fear one must investigate the whole movement of thought. I'll relate it, you will see it presently. What is the movement of thought, how does thought arise, the origin of it, the beginning of it, and what is the nature of this whole structure of thought upon which all our civilizations, all our religions, all our economic life and our jobs, everything is based on thought? Right? I wonder if you see that? And thought has created the marvellous cathedrals, great architecture, great poems, literature and so on, marvellous bridges across a vast expanse - thought has created all that. Thought has also created the technological world, the dynamo, electricity and so on and so on. And thought also has brought about division between man and man - my nation opposed to your nation, my god opposed to your god, my belief against yours, and so on. So one must in enquiring into the root of fear one must also go into this question of what is thinking, because if there is no comprehension of the movement of thought and the nature of thought fear may escape us altogether - the understanding of it and going beyond it.

So we are now enquiring into the nature of thought in relation to the question of whether man can ever be free from fear. I'll show you. The two are related, they are not separate. What is thought? What is our thinking process? The very nature of thought, not what I think or don't think, but the very thinking of man. Surely it is the response of memory, the response of experience as knowledge. Right? Man has accumulated vast knowledge, that accumulation has come into being through experience stored up in the brain as memory. And the response of that memory is thought. That's clear, isn't it? If there was no memory there would be no thinking, it would be total amnesia. And thinking based upon knowledge must always be partial, there can be no complete thinking because it is the outcome of knowledge, which is stored up in the brain, and that knowledge is the past. Right? This is simple. And thought is always limited because it is born from knowledge, and knowledge however extended, however deep, is limited. Right? One cannot have total, whole knowledge of anything, of the universe, you can't.

So thought is the response of memory, and memory is the outcome of knowledge which is the past, stored in the brain. We won't discuss the brain for the moment, I'm not a brain specialist, but I have watched very carefully, and talked to some of the brain specialists. So thought has created not only the marvellous things of the world - the cathedrals, the dynamos, going to the moon and so on, but also it has created wars, it has created divisions in religion, in relationship. So thought, being limited, though it can imagine the limitless but it is still limited because thought then thinks about the limitless and so the very thinking of the limitless is limited. I wonder if you see this. Man has created god - god has not created god, man has created god. Man has said he is omnipotent, universal, ever-loving, merciful - you follow - giving attributes to this thing which he has created, but it is still the movement of thought, whether it is the Hindu, the Islamic, the Christian, or any form of religious organization, it is the movement of thought. Not knowing how to solve the problem of fear I invent - thought invents - an entity which will help me to solve the problem, an outside agency, god, the authority, the specialist, the - are there any psychoanalysts here? - the psychoanalysts, the priests and so on and so on. Now if one understands the nature of thought, the nature, the movement, which is a fact, it is not my invention, it is the common fact, if one investigates into the nature of thought.

Thought is limited and never under any circumstances can it be free because it is born out of the known. The known is always the past and hence confined. Now what is the relationship between thought and fear?

One is afraid of death - I won't go into the question of death because that is very complex, we will go into it. We are asking what is the relationship between these two. Fear is time. Right? Must one explain this, can't we jump into it?

Time is movement, isn't it? Thought is movement. So thought is time. No? Don't agree with me please, just see it for yourself. To do something I have to think about it and then I act. To go from here to there needs time. Time means the movement from here to there, and thought is a movement also: from the known modified by the present, and moving. It is the same movement so it is time. Thought is time, and we are saying fear is essentially time. One is afraid of tomorrow, what might happen; or one is afraid of something that has happened in the past and that might happen again in the future. One has had physical pain last month, last week, it might happen again tomorrow. You are following all this? Are we communicating with each other?

So thought has seen there has been physical pain last week, it has been registered in the brain - please listen carefully to this - one has had pain last week, it has been registered, which is recorded as memory, and then thought says, 'I hope I will not have that pain again tomorrow.' Right? You are following this? This is an everyday occurrence. So the past incident, painful or pleasurable, is registered in the brain, then the memory says, 'I hope I will not have that pain again tomorrow'. Right? Which is, the 'hoping not to have that pain' is a form of fear. Right? And we are saying, thought and fear are closely related. So the root of fear is the nature of thought. Thought breeds fear. I am sure you have certain fears, I am sure of it. What is the cause of it? Your thinking about the pain of yesterday physically, thinking about not having it, or the psychological pain, inwardly, the fear of losing, the fear of not having security inwardly, the fear of loneliness, fear of isolation, all that is brought about by thinking. So the problem then is, if that is the root of fear, which is time as thought, then in what manner can thought end, or rather, the brain not register an incident which is painful or pleasurable? You understand this? One has been to a dentist - I am sure most of you have - and you have a great deal of pain. That pain is registered, and thought says, I hope it is all right, I hope I won't have any more pain. There is always this apprehension behind that pain, the recurring of it. Can you - please listen to this - can you go to the dentist and have the pain, and end that pain as you leave the office, not carry it over? Have you ever tried this? You understand what I am saying?

Q: More or less.

K: More or less. Are you following this? Because this is very important to understand. Our consciousness is made up of its content - greed, envy, your experience, your name, your form, your memories, your beliefs, your anxieties, your sorrows, your opinions, judgements, values, all that and more is your consciousness. That consciousness is conditioned. And acting from that consciousness must lead to confusion because the content is confused. I wonder if you see all this? I'll come back to this.

There is an art of listening. That is, to listen not only with the hearing of the ear, but also to listen to the meaning of the word, and go much deeper than the significance of the word, to listen totally. When you listen to music and a particular composer whom you like, you completely listen, your whole brain is in movement, there is no left brain and right brain. I mustn't go into all this. There is a total attention. Now in the same way to listen without creating an idea of what you are listening about, just the art of listening, as there is an art of seeing. To see without the interference of all your memories, of all your prejudices, just to see the beauty of this morning. And there is also the art of learning. I think that's rather complex, let's leave that for a while.

So there is the art of listening with all your attention, in which there is not an interference of your prejudices, your opinion, just to listen what the other person is trying to convey, to listen to your wife, or to your girl, or your husband, to listen - which we never do. Then communication is not only verbal, it is total. If I listen to what you have to tell me and you tell me 'I love you', I listen with all my attention, there is complete communion. So in the same way listen to what is being said, not as you listen make an abstraction of it into an idea and say, 'Well, I will think about that idea, later when I get home', but in the meantime you have gone off. Whereas if you listen completely then you will see that time, which is thought, is the essence of fear.

Then the problem arises: what place has thought? If thought is the root of fear - of course it is - I am afraid what might happen tomorrow, I am afraid of death, I am afraid of darkness, I am afraid of public opinion, I am afraid of my wife, I am afraid of somebody or other, which is, the movement of thought. The moment of fear there is no thought. At the moment of anger there is no saying 'I have been angry', there is only the state of that response. Then thought says, 'I know what that response is, it has been registered in the past, and I call that anger'. So we are asking, what place has thought, if thought creates fear then what place has thought in action? Of course if we act from fear, as most people do, then that action must create confusion because fear is a dreadful thing: because not only physically there is a withdrawing, shrinking, psychologically there is curling up inwardly. And when there is action from that it must inevitably bring confusion, conflict, misery. So one must absolutely find out if fear can end, absolutely, not occasionally escape from fear, the total absolute ending of psychological fears. Because if psychologically there is freedom from fear then one can deal with the physical pain quite easily. But when the psychological fear is strong and the physical pain also brings its own fear, then I am in total confusion.

So we are saying: what place has thought if fear is the result of thought? You understand? Thought, you know the word 'art' means not painting and all that, it really means to put everything in its right place. So one has to find out what is the right place of thought. Thought is necessary: otherwise couldn't you couldn't talk to each other, you couldn't write a letter, you couldn't go home, you couldn't do anything. So thought is necessary, but it must have its right place, otherwise thought takes all the movement of life over, and creates extraordinary chaos, misery, confusion, division, because thought in itself is limited. So can we find out, not arbitrarily, but absolutely, not relatively, completely, so to find out what place thought has. Has it any place in the psychological field?

Or it has a place only in the daily activities, not in the psychological realm at all? I'll show you something, please follow this. Physically one needs security, clothes, food and shelter, absolutely, for everybody, not for just the affluent people but every human being living on this earth must have food and clothes and shelter. That's prevented by our nationalities, religions, divisions, and so on - that's a different matter. Physically one needs security. Does one need psychological security? You follow what I am saying? Is there psychological security at all? Or the physical security with its movement has entered into the psychological area and taken that over and says, there must be psychological security? You follow what I am saying? Are you all tired?

Audience: No.

K: I am surprised! So we are asking: is there psychological security? Man says there must be because it is terrible to be utterly lonely, utterly empty, psychologically, utterly isolated, therefore one must have psychological security. So he says, there is security in belief - of course - security in some ritual, security in some concept, god, and there must be security in my relationship with another. Follow all this. One needs physical security, and that movement may have entered the psychological realm, so it has created the illusion that it must have security, and so creates the illusory concepts and becomes attached to them. You are following all this?

So we are trying to find out what place thought has. It is necessary. Thought has its place. And has it any place in the psychological field at all? We have assumed that it has a place, which is, thought has assumed it has a place, therefore it creates all these assurances. And are they illusory or actual? You understand my question? I rely on you as an audience to gratify myself. And somebody else has larger audiences and I feel jealous, and I feel anxious, I am annoyed, and I thought I had security here but I have lost it. I don't know if you are following all this. Or one has found one has security in one's relationship with one's wife, or husband, girl, boy. Is there any security there? Specially not in America. Or anywhere else as a matter of fact. But here every three years or so you change mates. Or you go to divorce and so on and so on. So we are asking - please listen carefully - is there any security in relationship at all? You want it, you crave for it, and so you use another for your satisfaction, to achieve your security; therefore you exploit another, and this exploitation is called love. Please, I am not being cynical, but this is a fact.

So what place has thought, and has thought any place in the psychological world? Or the realization - please listen - the realization it has no place is intelligence. You understand? I have relied - one has relied on psychological security depending on another, and when one finds there is no such security, either in belief, in god, or in this, the very perception of that is intelligence. So intelligence then says, thought has its right place, which is necessary but has no place psychologically. Therefore there is complete and absolute freedom from fear. Don't accept my word for it, please. I am not your authority, I am not your guru, I am not your leader. Thank god! So you have to find this out for yourself, because to live with fear is to create a monstrous world, a monstrous relationship.

And in enquiring into fear and the ending of fear, if you have gone into it very deeply, which you must, to bring about goodness in one's life, so that there is no senses of anxiety, no sense of loneliness, no sense of dependency on another - except the postman and plumber, and they are rather expensive! To realize this, to see the actuality of it, is intelligence. And that intelligence brings its right action, not your fear, not your desire. Right?

And also in investigating fear one must go into this question of the enormous pursuit of man which is his pleasure. What time is it, sir?

Q: Half past twelve.

K: So I have time. Is pleasure related to fear? What is pleasure? We know, we have gone into this question of fear, anxiety, despair, depression, all those are involved in fear. Being depressed, you know, or being elated, ecstatic - we have gone into this. And we must also find out what is the relationship between fear, pleasure and thought. Because man throughout the world, from the ancient times to the present day, is always seeking pleasure in different forms, under different guise, under different names. He pursues god in the name of pleasure. Of course. He is dissatisfied, discontent, feels hopeless, wanting something extraordinary, the mystic experience. I was looking up that word the other day, 'mysticism', it means mystery. The moment you discover the mystery it is not longer a mystery. And lots of people write a lot of books about mysticism. We won't go into that for the moment. But if you observe we want to be entertained, we want to be amused, we want to be free, we want to goaded, encouraged, all this is the movement of pleasure. Right? What is the relationship of that, this pursuit of pleasure, probably that's why you are here, you are all gathered here probably for that reason, deeply - and if this doesn't satisfy you, you go somewhere else, which is why it brings satisfaction. Satisfaction being more pleasure, more amusement, avoidance of discontent and so on and so on. So one has to enquire, if you will, together - together - why man pursues this extraordinary thing called pleasure. Not that one is against pleasure, we are investigating, therefore you can't be against or for. What is pleasure? Is it the operation, the movement of the senses? Please we are enquiring, go slowly into this, because it is a very important question. Because man is always seeking happiness in some form or another. Which is, pleasure, be happy, and one has to understand this because it may be related to fear, and it may be the movement of thought that creates pleasure.

So we are asking: is it a particular part of the senses, one of the senses seeking pleasure? Or is pleasure the whole movement of the senses? You understand what I am saying? Sir, when you look at the mountain, or these lovely trees, do you look only with your eyes, or do you look with all your senses in full movement? You understand? First understand my question and then we can perhaps meet each other. Do we function with one or two or three senses, or do we operate, function with all our senses together? Or only partially respond, not total response of the senses? Please carefully go into this, if you will, because in the response of the total senses there is no movement as pleasure. It's only when one of the senses operates then you pursue pleasure. I'll go into this carefully - if you will. Probably you have never thought about all this, you are much too educated, that's why. You have never gone into this question, how to observe the mountain, the trees, your wife, the girl, boy, observe not partially but totally, with all your senses in full flow. Then there is no centre which is pursuing a particular sense. Are you getting this? Among certain types of monks in India, the sannyasis, when they beg for food they mix all the various types of food together in the bowl so as not to taste one particular type of food, one particular dish, because then that gives a sense of pleasure of a particular taste and the demand for it more. You follow this? So they mix up everything. See the intent of it: to avoid the encouragement of a particular taste. If you encourage a particular state then you pursue it, thought pursues it, which then becomes pleasure. Which then you say, 'I must have more, more, more'. Then that becomes a habit, as sex. You are following all this, it is very curious, go into it. Whereas if you respond with all your senses then thought has no place to enter and say, 'I must have that particular form of pleasure'. Are you doing it as we are talking? To look at those mountains, or those trees, or your girl, your wife, or husband, observe with all your senses, which means with all your attention, care, affection, you know, to look. Then you will see that there is no interference of a fragment which is thought, and that fragment says, 'I must pursue that particular pleasure'. I wonder if you get all this?

So we are asking: what is the place of pleasure? What is the relationship of pleasure to thought, and thought to fear? They are all the same movement. I wonder if you realize that. They are all the same movement. If you pursue pleasure and deny pleasure, then you feel frustrated. Then feeling frustrated you are anxious, fear. So they are the two sides of the same coin. Please realize this. They are two sides of the same human coin. And all religions have said, don't pursue pleasure, which is, sex, various types of pleasure. I do not know if you have not noticed the robes, the monks with their eyes never looking at anything, it doesn't matter what it is, a lady, because they want to avoid every form of so-called distraction, which might be pleasurable, and therefore to be attentive only to the service of god, which is shut your eyes to everything else and burn inside. You understand 'burn inside'? Your demands, your sex, your pleasure, everything.

So we are saying that thought is the response of pleasure as for pain and fear. So can you observe the beauty of a mountain, the beauty of a lovely tree in a solitary field, just to observe and not register? The moment you register thought takes it over. I wonder if you are following all this? When you look at that mountain with all your senses, that is great delight, there is great joy in looking at something, some marvellous cathedral, marvellous architecture, lovely tree, a person, or the limitless sky, the evening stars, to look at it, great delight. I say, now at the moment thought takes it over, registers it, says, I must have more of it, and that becomes the pleasure. Then you feel when you don't have it you are frustrated.

So our consciousness is made up of all this - immense sense of isolation, loneliness, despair, depression, and exaltation, aspirations, anxiety, fear, pleasure, and the enormous burden of sorrow. This is our life, our consciousness; and out of that consciousness we act. And therefore, as our consciousness is in confusion, is contradictory, always struggling one against the other, all our actions must inevitably create confusion. And that's what we have created in the world around us. And if a group of us, a few of us, feel that, say, look, we will create a different world in ourselves, we will have a marvellous world. But none of us are willing to go to that extreme extent; you are all compromising, with our desires, not with the world.

So unless you understand all this very clearly, meditation has no meaning - which we will go into. We will also go into the question of sorrow and death. All this is merely to bring about order, not to invent order, not to say, 'I will do this, I won't do that, I will discipline', or 'I won't discipline, I am a free agent, I'll do what I like'. All this investigation into the whole movement of good, the sense of greatness, this real sense of sacredness, all this is to bring order in our life - in our daily life, in our relationship, in our action, all we do. That is absolutely the foundation of our life. From there we can move because then it is solid, firm, it is absolutely indestructible, it is like a tremendous rock in the middle of a vast stream. And that thing is goodness, and from that action springs.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 15TH APRIL 1979

May we go on talking over together what we were discussing, or enquiring yesterday and the last weekend too, may we?

First of all if one may enquire, I wonder why you all come. This is not asked as a flippant question but actually to find out why most of us take the trouble to come here. Is it because we are so used to being told what to do? We are not able to solve our own petty little problems, or great problems, or able to answer our own enquiries and challenges, so we look to others - the analysts, the priests, the specialists, and the gurus - they are always with us? And I'm asking why is it that we are not able to solve our own problems, why we enquire, or ask, or demand, or seek out, various types of analysts and psychologists and specialists and so on and ask them to help us. Is it because we ourselves are indolent, lazy, we haven't the time, and we think we have time when we pay others to tell us what we should do. And we have got into this habit, or into this conditioning that others have gone into the subject, have studied a great deal, know a great deal, and perhaps they will be able to help us. So we are always, it seems to me, relying on others to help us to escape this trap we are in. The religions throughout the world have offered this: organized, excellently put together, with their rituals, dogmas and so on, and we happily slip into that. And we are never able to resolve our own deep problems, we hand ourselves over to another. I wonder why we do this? It's all right physically when the organism is not healthy to go to a doctor, to a surgeon and so on, when you want to build a house, go to an architect. And so perhaps the same concept drives us to go to somebody else to help us. We are never able to read our own book, our own history, because we are perpetually depending on others - group therapy, the various types of psychosomatic treatments, psychotherapies, you know the multiplication of all that.

And we human beings, wherever we live, in Far East, the Near East and here, we are incapable of reading the whole story of mankind, which is ourselves. And is it possible for us to read this book which has been handed down generation after generation for many, many millennia, to read the story which we are? Not leave one chapter undone, unread, but read from the beginning to the end, the whole movement of mankind, his evolution, both physically and psychologically, inwardly. If we are able to read this book, which is astonishingly entertaining - if I may use that word - fascinating, it opens the door to enormous possibilities. So as we are the rest of mankind psychologically, and if we know how to read this book, then perhaps we shall be able to alter the course of our lives. Because that is what we are concerned with - at least the speaker is concerned about that, to bring about a radical transformation of the human mind and so bring about a good society: a society where there would be order, peace, some kind of security, some kind of happiness, and go beyond all that, enquiring into that which is immeasurable.

So we must first, it seems to us, learn how to read this book. So we must find out how to observe, not only visually but observe the whole movement of our consciousness, of ourselves, with all our complexities, with all our anxieties, fears, pleasures, joys, accumulated superstitions, both the superstitions of the scientists, of the psychologists, of the religious people, the whole thing, to be able to read very, very, very precisely, clearly and without any mistake. And that's what we are going to do this morning, if we can: learn, not that I am your instructor, we are doing this together, learn how to look in this extraordinary book, which is the self, which is the ego, the personality, the tendency, the characteristics, the impulses, the inhibitions, all that, which is our consciousness, to read that. And to read it one must have eyes and ears which are not dull, which are not blocked, which are not caught up in some kind of fanciful illusions - as most people are.

So one must obviously first enquire - we are doing this together, I am not doing this for you, or you are not doing it for me, we are doing it together, it's a dialogue between two people, there are many people here; it's a dialogue, a conversation between two friends who are concerned with the world, the terrible things that are going on in the world, and their own conflicts, problems of relationship, their sense of lack of love, and their burden of sorrow, and the problem of death. And as one has recently heard this word 'meditation' brought over from the East, though there has been in Christianity another form of contemplation which is totally different from meditation, and to find out if there is something beyond all this, not invented by thought, but something actual, something that is not an imagination, a thing put together by the mind or by the hand. We are going to read all that. And to do that one must have clear eyesight to read this vast book, which is ourselves.

Observation implies that there must be no distortion in our reading. Any form of distorted observation will prevent clarity of reading. So are we distorted? Is our perception, our enquiry, our observation, is it distorted? Please, we are asking each other this, I am not telling you it is, or it is not, but we are asking, enquiring, exploring, into this question. It is distorted if I have a motive in reading the book and wanting to change what is in the book.

Because if the observation has already come to a conclusion that the end of the book must be this, or that, there are certain chapters which the mind doesn't like in its observation, or that it must go beyond all this, all those factors bring about distortion. Obviously. I hope you are following all this. So before I begin to read the book there must be clarity, and the great energy that puts aside any form of distortion. That is, if one is already caught in an illusion, which most people are, then our concern is not the book but why the mind is caught in an illusion. Because with a mind that is already in illusion it can't read. Therefore my concern then is, why is the mind caught in an illusion. You are following all this? Is it fear? Is it that what I may find I may dislike, I may be disappointed, depressed and therefore I prefer to have my own illusions, my own concepts, my own conclusions about the book, and therefore I am incapable of reading it? So my concern then is to find out why this mind which is enquiring, which demands that it should read the book, why it is caught in an illusion. Is it fear? We went into it yesterday, the question of fear. And we won't go into it now because we have other things to go into. If it is fear, we explained fear is the movement of thought as time. If you have gone into it since yesterday.

And we said, the art of observation consists in giving thought its own place. Therefore the mind can totally, completely, absolutely be free from fear. Don't accept my word for this, but it is so if you have gone into it, psychologically there is an ending to fear. And there is the fear of pain, physical organic pain, which we also talked about yesterday, which is not to continue when the pain is over, as memory. Which is the registration of the pain of yesterday, and that registration is memory, and that memory hoping that there will not be pain another time. We went into that, and we will go into it much more in detail.

So when the mind is caught in illusion, is it aware that it is an illusion? You follow? Or it doesn't know at all it is an illusion? If the mind doesn't know that it is living in an illusion, in a make-believe world, how is it to become aware of it? You follow? You understand my question? Suppose I am caught in an illusion - the word 'illusion' means illudere, to play, to play with ideas, to play with things that are not actual, which are conceptual, a series of conclusions and beliefs which are not actual. I play with them. If this belief doesn't suit me I take on another belief. I play with beliefs and this playing is illusion, because I cannot face the actuality of what is actually going on. So the mind invents beliefs, dogmas and all the rest of it. Now to be aware of it, to know I am in illusion - when you know you are in illusion it is finished. You understand? It is only when I do not know that I am in illusion then there is no possibility of moving out of it. But the moment I am aware that I am caught in illusion, the very awareness dispels illusion. Obviously. So my mind then is capable of reading this book, because we are concerned with bringing about a radical transformation of the human mind which has lived for millennia, this way we are living - which is the quarrels, the anxieties, the violence, the brutality, all that is going on around us and in us, and such human beings can only live in disorder, and can never bring about a good society, a good human being, you will never understand what is goodness. So we are doing this, we are enquiring into this.

Then what is this book, which is myself, which is yourself, which is the story of mankind? Not the story of mankind printed in books only, the historical evolution of man, but also much more an unwritten book which nobody can ever describe, or ever print in a book, because this thing, this enormous evolution of man which is the result at present is always moving, changing, modifying itself; it is never static. So my mind - one's mind must be as alert, as clear to read this book. Right? So what does the reading of the book mean - the reading, not the book? You understand? The capacity to read, which is the capacity to observe, the capacity to listen to the story, the capacity to learn what the book is saying. Those three things are involved: that is, the seeing, the hearing what the books says and learning from the book. Right? You are following this? Are we doing this together? That is, are we together observing the book freely? Or we are interpreting the book? You understand this? I read the book but my mind is interpreting what the book says according to my desire, my wishes, my longings, my fears, my loneliness, so I am really not reading the book but telling the book what I am, what I think is. You are following this? So first I must learn the art - one must, sorry to use the word 'I' - one must learn the art of reading, that is the art of observing the book. That is, to observe, to see without the observer. I'll go into it, please have a little patience and go into it slowly. The observer is the past. Right? The observer is the experience, accumulated, the observer is the result of all the influences, pressures, knowledge, with that knowledge he is reading the book. Have you understood? But to read the book without the past. I wonder if you are following this, or it is too abstract? No, I don't think it is too abstract, it is quite simple. We think we know, we don't come to the book afresh. Like a schoolboy who goes to school for the first time, he doesn't know, he is fresh, he is young, he wants to learn. And one must read the book in the same way, you must come to it with a freshness, not with all the accumulated knowledge that we have acquired, which is the book itself. I wonder if you see that. So if you come to it, if you read it as an observer who already knows the content of the book, then you are incapable of reading what it says. So there must be the absence of the observer; there is only reading. Right? Not translate what you are reading into your own peculiar idiosyncrasies and illusions and desires. This is clear. So there is only reading, which is, only observing the book.

Then also the book is telling you a great deal. Right? And can you hear what the book is saying? You understand what I am saying? Hear the song of the book, it is telling you something, obviously, this enormous story it is telling you. But you must be capable of hearing it, not only reading it but capable of hearing this tremendous song of life that is going on. Right? So I can either hear with the ear, or hear without the noise of the outside. You understand what I am saying? I'll show you, I'm going to go into it a little bit. When you hear music your whole - music which you really love, has meaning, depth, vitality, and beauty, not just modern pop noise, sorry, you may like it, that's a different matter - then you hear it with all your being, absolutely you are with it, there is not a division between you and it, there is no sense of remembrance of something which you have heard before, you are with the whole movement. Right? When you hear Bach or Beethoven or Mozart, the real beauty of it, move with it. In the same way one must listen to the story that the book is telling you. May we go on? I hope you are following all this. That's why you are here, if you are not listening, don't waste your time. It's a lovely day, go and climb the hills, or play golf, or have a so-called amusing time. But you are here so please give your attention because it's your life.

And also there is the art of learning. This is a little more complex, I'll go into it. When we go to schools and colleges and universities we are learning, we are acquiring information, which is called knowledge, about various subjects in order to have a good career, a good job, or if you fail, you go to... and so on and so on, which is the accumulation of knowledge during a certain period of time, from boyhood until you leave university, which is the accumulation of knowledge, which can be used skilfully or otherwise. If you want to be a plumber, if you want to be a professor, if you want to be a scientist, if you want to be a mathematician, the whole process is the same, to learn. Which is to accumulate knowledge, and from that knowledge act. Right? And there is also act and from that action learn, which is also there. Isn't that clear? Of course. Which is, accumulated knowledge and act; act and learn; after acting, learning, accumulating knowledge, act. Both are the same essentially. But also there is another kind of learning which is a little more difficult. These two we know: accumulate knowledge and act; act and having acted learn from your action, which becomes the knowledge: so both are the same. We are saying something entirely different because this is mechanical. Are you following all this? Because this is a process of acting from the known - a conductor, a pianist, the plumber, the fiddler, the professor, the scientist, all these have accumulated knowledge and act. Therefore they are moving from the known, to the known, to the known, modifying all the time. Right? Now we are saying there is a different way of learning. I don't know if you are interested in this, because this requires a little more thinking together.

One sees the accumulation of knowledge is necessary, to drive a car and so on and so on; if you want to build a bridge you must know the stresses and the strains and the quality of the earth and so on and so on. That is, our mind has been informed, acquired knowledge and acted from there. This is the everlasting movement of man. You understand? That is, gather information, knowledge, act. So the knowledge is the past. Of course. And from that knowledge you act. This is clear, isn't it? Right? We must meet together otherwise I am talking to myself, which is no good, I can do that in my room. So we are saying there is a different kind of learning which hasn't its root in the known. Right? 'In the known' in the sense, knowledge and then acting. See the difference. I am going to point out carefully this. There is acquiring knowledge and then acting from it; so action modifies the knowledge, the knowledge modifies the action. This is what we are doing all the time, therefore it becomes routine, mechanical, there is never a freedom to enquire into something which is not known, a freedom from the known to observe something you do not know. You follow? Are we meeting each other, a little bit?

So to the speaker, the ascent of man does not lie in the accumulated knowledge. Right? Listen to it first, don't agree, or disagree, first listen. People, scientists, others have said, man can only evolve by having more, more and more knowledge, climbing, ascent. But knowledge is always the past. And if there is no freedom from the past, his ascent will be always limited. Right? It will always be confined to a particular pattern. So we are saying: look, there is a different way of learning, which is, to see comprehensively, wholly, holistically the whole movement of knowledge, where it is necessary, because otherwise you couldn't live. But the very understanding of its limitation is to have insight into the whole movement of knowledge. I wonder if I have conveyed anything at all. I'll go into it a little bit. Probably most of you have never even thought about this. We have taken knowledge as natural, and live with knowledge and go on functioning with knowledge for the rest of our life. But we have never enquired what is knowledge itself, what is its relationship to freedom, what is its relationship to the actual happening? You understand? We have taken all this for granted, that's part of our education and conditioning.

So we are saying: when you begin to enquire into the whole movement of knowledge, which is time, which is thought, and see the limitations of knowledge, for knowledge is always in the past, and therefore fragmentary. You can add to it, take away from it, enlarge it, but it is always the movement of the past modifying itself. And so in that movement there is never freedom. You may not have gone into this, so this may be new to you, so please kindly listen to find out, not to agree or disagree, find out. We are saying in that field there is no freedom for man. He may be able to have better bathrooms, better heating systems and so on and so on, but psychologically, inwardly there is no freedom if the mind is constantly being driven, or held, or in bondage to the past.

So is there a way of learning which is not merely acquiring knowledge? You understand my question? I wonder if you see this. Please listen. Is there a way of looking, learning, hearing which is not the constant accumulation of knowledge from which to act? Is there an action which is not bound by the past? I'll put it this way, then perhaps we will understand each other. That is, I have acquired knowledge - there is the acquisition of knowledge and from that knowledge act. And in that action, that very action is limiting itself, it is not holistic, it's not the whole - there are regrets, all kinds of travail in that action come into being. Now we are asking: is there an action which hasn't its roots in the past, because if my action is born of the past it is always limited, it is always broken up, it is never complete, whole. So is there an action which is free from the past? Do you understand my question? Just understand the question then we can go into it. You may say, that question is silly, it has no meaning, but it has meaning when you see the whole complexity of knowledge and its limitation. And the action that is born out of its limitation must be limited and therefore confusing, and therefore out of this knowledge a good society can never come into being. You get it?

So we are saying, asking: is there action without the movement of the past? I say, there is. Which is, to have an insight into the whole structure of knowledge - insight, a deep understanding, a total comprehension of this whole thing: knowledge, action, limited, no freedom, therefore out of that there can be no good society. To see that, the truth of it, the perception of that truth is the release of a different kind of learning which is holistic. I wonder if you get this? Are you working-are we working together, or are you just listening?

Look, sir: let me put it this way: what is the relationship between man and woman? What is relationship? Generally, as it is generally accepted, relationship means to be together, sexually, in action, you earn a livelihood and the wife remains or goes out to earn a livelihood, cooking, you know relationship implies all that: affection, irritation, nagging, changing if you don't like one girl, or one boy, you go to another. This process is relationship - is called. We are asking what is actual relationship, is there such a thing at all? I am not saying there is, we are enquiring. There's no dogmatic statement in this matter. What is actually our relationship based on? Please enquire into it. You, you are related to somebody, life is relationship, you cannot exist without relationship, but what is that relationship? You say, yes, it's love. One is rather shy of that word because love is loaded with all kinds of idiotic meanings, and generally goes with the word 'sex'. That love becomes mere sexual pleasure. But actually, when you go into the question of relationship, what is it based on? It is based, is it not, on the images that you have built about each other? Obviously. These two images have relationship. You are following this? No? I know perhaps you may not like this idea, or this actual fact, but you have to swallow it, whether you like it or not. The fact is each one creates the image about the other, and these images have some kind of relationship, because each one goes his own way - ambition, greed, you know, separating all the time, perhaps coming together in bed, but that's not relationship, it is superficial, sensational, pleasure. But actually this image is the divisive factor between the two.

Now the mechanism of this building images is the remembrance - remembrance of what she said, or what you said, the remembrance of your sexual images and so on and so on, the image of being kind, being angry, being nagged and so on, you have built a great image about each other. It is the movement of thought, which is the remembrance. Now we are saying, can there be a relationship without the image? And that is the only relationship. Now to see the truth of this, to see that where there is image there is division, and therefore if you have an image about her, and she has an image about you, these images keep people apart. If you see the full significance of this, which you can, then the mechanism of building images ends. Naturally, because all life is relationship, whether it is nature, with each other, it's a relationship. But if we have an image about the heavens, not the heaven, but heavens, the cosmos, the universe, if you have an image about it you have no relationship with it. You can have an image about nature, the image is more important than the actuality. So when you see the truth of this the image-making comes to an end, then there is a possibility of actual relationship with nature, with the universe, which is love - which we will go into another time.

So we are saying, there is a way of learning which is immediate action, it is not born out of knowledge. Which is not impulsive action, which is not emotional, romantic action, but it is the action born out of the comprehension of the whole movement of knowledge, which is the truth of the limitation of knowledge. Now my mind - the mind is prepared to read. You follow? Prepared to read the book without any distortion, because there is no illusion, it is able to hear the whole story completely, without saying, I like, or don't like. It reads it like music, there is no part saying, I don't like that part, it's music. And to learn from that book: in the very reading is action, not reading and action. Because if you do that it becomes memory, and limited, and action. I hope you are understanding all this - it's marvellous if you go into it.

So the mind is prepared to read. And it discovers - please listen to this-it discovers the book is the mind. Right? The book is the consciousness. The book isn't out there on a pedestal for me to read, the book is this whole content of my consciousness, of your consciousness - greed, envy, this, the other. So - you are following this? The book is not there, the book is here. Right? Then how will you read the book if it is here? You follow my question? We had thought reading is there, but the book is this, this quality of mind which is capable of such distortion, capable of such great events, technological, capable of disorder, capable of great fears, anxieties, brutalities, violence, affection, joy, all that. So the book is this. Right? So what am I reading? Before - see what has taken place- before I thought the book was out there for me to read, but now I have discovered the book is this thing itself. Therefore it can only read when there is absolute quiet observation in relationship. You understand? You are following this? It is only in relationship the book can be read. The relationship is my actuality - with my wife, my friend, my dog, my nature, the hills, the beauty of this valley and so on. Right? So there is no conflict. I am not telling the book what it should be, then there is conflict. But if the book is me, there is the end of division. Right? The end of escape, the end of inhibitions, the book is me. So there is no control, there is no desire different from the book itself. I wonder if you are capturing this? Because then the whole movement of conflict, struggle, becoming better, trying to, in a group, understand myself - you follow - all that ends because the thing is there. And then you discover the whole movement in daily relationship. But in that relationship you are observing, there is no conflict. Right? What is the time?

Q: Half past.

K: If this is clear we can go into the question now of something totally different. Which is, why has man throughout the ages, from the ancient of days, suffered? You understand? This is really a very important question. And apparently man has never ended sorrow. Right? Christianity has escaped from it by saying, somebody else suffers for you - the redeemer, you know, the whole business. And the Asiatics have translated it by saying, it is your past karma, which is past action, past life, for which you are paying now. If you behave properly the next life you will live in a palace! Or better, you know instead of becoming black you will become a lawyer, and so on and so on. Which is self-improvement. See the danger of both these tricks we play upon each other: escaping through an ideology, from somebody, through a concept, through an image; and the other explanation of sorrow because of the past. That is, the cause, the event. But the event becomes the cause. Of course. No? Have you understood this? Must everything be explained? Look, there is the cause and the effect; but the effect modifies itself which then becomes the cause for another effect. So it is a constant cause/ effect, the effect becomes the cause all the time. And man, you, we human beings, whether we live here, or in Asia, or in India, or anywhere else, we have this extraordinary burden of sorrow, not only this so-called personal sorrow, but the collective sorrow of mankind. You understand? The poor man in a little village in India can never have a hot bath, clean clothes, have knowledge, can never ride in an aeroplane, can never see the beauty of the earth because he is toiling, toiling, toiling. And the thousands of people who have been killed in wars, and the mothers, their girl friends, their wives weeping. You follow? There is the sorrow of the world as well as your own little sorrow. I don't know if you have gone into this, or even thought about it. We are only concerned with our own little sorrows, with our own tears - this is hay fever only!

So there is not only personal, immediate sorrow of various kinds, the ultimate sorrow is death, death of someone whom you think you love, on whom you have depended, who has been a companion and so on and so on, but also there is this immense collective sorrow of mankind. So we are asking whether this sorrow can ever end, because if it doesn't end there is no love, you cannot have a good society, there can be no goodness. So one must find out, not only one's own personal sorrow whether it can end, but also not to contribute to the vast collective sorrow. Please, sirs, this is very, very serious, this is not a thing you play with, this is not a thing you argue and have opposing plans about sorrow. Nobody, no redeemer, no saviour has ever helped man to be free from sorrow; they have helped you to escape from sorrow. So we are asking a very, very serious question, and only a very serious mind, a mind that has gone through all that we have discussed, can find out, or ask the serious question whether sorrow, our own particular, personal, limited sorrow and whether it is possible not to add to the vast stream of sorrow.

So what is sorrow? You understand? Now, sir, in asking a question of this kind, and asking questions which we have asked previously, the question is not, and the enquiry, is not an analytical process. It is not analysis. You understand? I must explain this, a little bit. Analysis implies division, the analyser and the analysed. The analyser is the past. Right? What he has learnt, from childhood, you know, the whole psychological knowledge, and the various divisions in this professional, psychological structure. So the analyser is different from the analysed. Is that so? Or the analyser is the analysed? Please enquire sir. Of course it is. I am examining my inhibition - if I have any - and I am analysing it, go back to my childhood, or something or other, a past incident, and I am analysing it. So there is a division. And we are saying the analyser is the analysed. That is, seeing the truth that the division is illusory: the analyser is the analysed, the experiencer is the experience. Are you following all this? We say, I must have experience. We are searching for bigger, wider, nobler, extensive, godly experience, mystic experiences, which shows that the experiencer is different from that which he is experiencing. In that process the experiencer must recognize the experience, otherwise it wouldn't be experience, so the very recognition is the remembrance of something he has had. So the experiencer is the experience; the thinker is the thought. Thought is not different from the thinker. So the analyser is the analysed. That's good enough for the moment, discard it or take it, it is a fact, you go into it.

So when we ask a question we are not analysing. We are observing. In the observation there is no analysis because you are observing and the thing is revealing itself. You are not telling it, it is telling you. So there is only pure observation. So in the same way we are asking the question why man, human man, man who is the repository of thousands of years of sorrow, not only personal but this collective burden of sorrow, and why mankind has put up with it. Probably he has not been able to solve it, he hasn't the capacity to say, I don't know what to do with this. I suffer, I cry, I know I am lonely, I wanted success, I have failed, grief, sorrow, this sense of frustration, inhibition - all that is implied in that one word and more. And we are asking, we are observing, not analysing - why has man put up with this, tolerated it? You don't tolerate a toothache, you do something about it immediately. But man has not freed himself from this. Is it because he is incapable? Or he has so accepted it, it has become a habit, and so he says, I can't solve it, I can't free myself from it, as I can't, please help me? He says, god, Christ, Krishna, Buddha, somebody outside, please take away my sorrow. That hasn't worked either. One can escape into it but that is not an actuality - it is there. You may go to church every Saturday, or pray five times a day, but it is there.

So we are now asking why man, you, have not resolved it? What is sorrow? Please answer it, put that question to yourself: what is sorrow? The loss of somebody, the loss of your particular wishes, your desires, loss of somebody on whom you have relied, loss of companionship, is sorrow, this enormous sense of isolation, loneliness. So we are asking, what is the relationship between the `me' and the `you' in essence? The `me' that sheds tears when you are not there, the `me' that seeks fulfilment in something or other, noble or ignoble, imaginary or reality and the fulfilment is denied and I feel frustrated, inhibited, miserable, depressed. Is that the reason of sorrow? Or one has really never lived with sorrow - lived, not run away from it. You understand my question? Please understand this. One has not rationally explained it away, logically said, yes, that was the cause, this is the effect, therefore I suffer. You follow? We are asking, not analyzing, are all these the reason of sorrow, the cause of sorrow? Or is there something much deeper than the peripheral incidents that bring about sorrow? You understand? Most of us are caught in the peripheral incidents, accidents that bring about grief, and we are trying to resolve those outward incidents, and not being able to resolve them we escape; perhaps we have resolved them but there may be a much deeper cause to this enormous, endless sorrow of man.

What is that deep cause? You see, sir, I am enquiring, the speaker is enquiring, are you enquiring too? You understand my question? Or are you only concerned with the peripheral sorrows of fulfilment, non-fulfilment, I am angry when my wife leaves, when my husband goes away - the petty little sorrows that we have collected and say, that is sorrow, and we want to be free of those. That's very easy, those are petty, rather immature and they can be left aside, one can resolve them quite easily. But we are asking, is there a deep cause for this abiding, everlasting sorrow of man? If the speaker points out the cause, and there is a cause which the speaker has discovered, what value has it to you? This is not a trick I am playing. What will it do to you if I say, this is it, this is the real, this is the truth why mankind suffers - what will you do with it? You understand? Or will you say, oh, yes, that's a very good idea, I must think about it, it might help me to get rid of my sorrow? You follow? Sir, somebody gives you a precious jewel, what will you do with it? You understand? And what will you pay for it? If you are merely paying with the coin of thought, then it is valueless, it is no longer a jewel. But if you say, the jewel is the most precious thing in my life, I must hold it, I must look at it - then you are giving your heart, your mind, your blood, everything to hold to that.

So what is the deep cause of mankind, the cause that brings such an enormous burden of sorrow, not only the personal but this vast collective burden? Do you want me to tell you? Be clear, please, don't just shake your heads. Be very clear that you have accepted the question, that you have received the question with all your mind, with your heart, with your whole being because that's the most vital question that will totally resolve, not only the petty problems, resolve the conflict of man. If you receive that question completely, the question itself is the answer. Right? I wonder if you see this.

You see, sirs, if you ask a question, either you are expecting someone to answer it, or you are thinking, thinking, thinking, trying to find an answer. But thinking or waiting for somebody else to answer your question is not going to resolve it. Right? So how you receive the question is important, how you approach the question; if your approach is holistic, complete, then the answer is there. But if you say, well, tell me about it, lean back and wait, or ask your priest, or your guru, or your book, to tell you then there is no meaning. They have told you a thousand times. So it's like, you know, sir, like in a lake, you drop a stone, the lake is so still and you drop a stone and the waves go on, the question is that stone that is dropped in the lake. Do you understand? Right.

There are several things I meant to have talked about this morning, like love and death and meditation. We haven't time now but we will do it next Saturday and Sunday, because those are also very essential questions, questions that demand total answers: the nature of meditation, what is death, what is the movement of life and death, and what is the meaning of love. We will go into that next time.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 17TH APRIL 1979

Krishnamurti: This is a discussion or a dialogue and what shall we talk about?

Questioner: Last Sunday you talked about the art of observation and the art of learning. It seems to me that if we would find out exactly what that is perhaps we wouldn't have to come back every year and ask you. We could observe things ourselves.

K: If we could find out what you mean by the art of listening, the art of observation, the art of learning, if we could find that out we need not come back every year here.

Q: Would you be kind enough to give us the meaning of psychological registration?

K: Psychological registration, would you go into that.

Q: Sir, is there any relationship between love and freedom?

K: What is the relationship between love and freedom. Is there any relationship at all?

Q: Psychological death.

K: Would you discuss psychological death.

Q: Is silence of the mind possible?

K: Silence of the mind.

Q: The meaning of life.

K: The meaning of life.

Q: Could you talk about peace and order?

Q: Last Saturday you said god did not create man, but man created god. Would you elaborate on that subject?

K: Could we talk over together what you mean by man created god, god has not created man. Now which of these questions do you want to take up?

Q: Love and freedom.

Q: Could we talk about quietening the mind?

Q: Is there an entity which is responsible?

K: Is there an entity in us which is totally responsible for all our actions. Is that it?

Q: Is there life without an entity that is responsible?

Q: Would you talk about sex?

K: Talk about sex. I don't know what there is to talk about sex.

Q: What is responsibility?

K: Now just a minute, sir, you have asked about a dozen questions.

Q: Sir, what do you mean by the answer to the question is the question itself?

K: I don't know what you would like to talk over together this morning with all these questions: what do you think is the most important one of all these questions?

Q: Sir, freedom, love and responsibility.

K: Freedom, love and responsibility, is that what you want to talk about? I wonder what we mean by responsibility. The word itself means to respond, respond either partially or completely, wholly. That's the meaning of that word, to respond in our relationship adequately, completely, partially, in a limited way. How do we respond in our relationship - relationship being being in contact partially, wholly, objectively, or very narrow, personally, selfishly? That's implied in responsibility. I wonder what we mean, not only by the words but how inwardly we respond in our relationship with another. Do we respond to another according to our inclination, according to our tendencies, desires, or do we respond to the other's desires, to the other's idiosyncrasies, to the other's partiality, or do we respond totally, wholly, completely without being personal, selfish, narrow, limited? Right? So that is the question when we talk about relationship, responsibility.

And when we talk about freedom, what do we mean by that word? Each one translates that word according to his own opinion, experience, according to his own knowledge, conditioning, pleasure or displeasure. But does all that indicate freedom, I am asking. And also when we talk about love, what do we mean by that word? Love of the country, love of the family, love of the beautiful, love of one's wife, husband, children, the nation, love of god, love of virtue and so on, sexual, sensory, all that's implied. So this is a tremendous question, it is not just a thing to be played around with. What do we mean by these three words: love, freedom and responsibility?

Q: Love is the related to vice, desire, for itself.

K: No, sir, when you say, 'I love you', what do you mean by that word? And what is the relationship of sensory responses, sensuousness, sex to love? You follow? And freedom? That's a tremendous word, the content of that word. Love, freedom, is it possible for man to be free, or is he always free in the limited circle which he has woven round himself? And the word 'responsibility', if you undertake something to do you are responsible for doing it, and if you don't it you feel guilty. All that is implied in that word responsibility and relationship. And are the three of these words, love, freedom, responsibility, are they separate or one whole? Are they a unitary process, holistic, or they are three separate activities and human beings are trying to integrate the three? I don't know if you are following all this. Which is it you are, in this dialogue, attempting to do?

We are two friends, sitting under a tree on a lovely morning, a cool breeze and we are talking about these three things. We want to find out how serious we are because this is our life: love, freedom, responsibility and a sense of peace in the world, inward as well as outward. Two friends who are committed to the discovery, to the understanding of a way of living these three things separately or as a whole, indivisible. Which is it we are trying to do? You understand, sir? Which is it we are actually doing? Q: Sir, it is always our freedom and our love, it is limited love and we are always asserting instead of getting really out of it.

K: Sir, this question is tremendously complex, you understand, because everywhere throughout the world they talk about individuality; the individual love, the individual expression, the individual freedom, the individual responsibility and so on and so on. The individual has been given enormous importance - to the individual, to the you - and on that our civilization is based: individual freedom, individual expression, individual fulfilment, that's the culture in which we live. And on that all our social responses, economic striving and so on is based. What relationship has this whole individual concept to love, freedom, responsibility? This is a very complex and very serious question if you want to go into it fully. You may not want to, you may want casually to delve into something which demands all your attention and care. So I am just asking, if I may, when our culture is based on individuality - you understand - the voting, the elections, the whole set-up of governments, freedom of choice, freedom of individual striving, individual ambition, individual competition - all that is our culture, religiously, socially and culturally. Individual painter - the old cathedrals in Europe were not built by individuals, they were built and one doesn't know who built them and so on and so on.

So this question when we want to discuss it as two friends who really want to go into it, where shall we start? You understand?

Q: Let's start by what you would like to say from your heart about it.

K: As two friends.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, madam, this is our question: the individual, freedom and responsibility, love, and the individual, the `you', the `me', is given tremendous importance in the context of all this. And how do you approach this question? As a friend I ask you, I say, look, how do you come to this question, how do you receive this question? Casually, because there is nothing to do, there are too many players on the golf course so you say I must just as well sit under a tree and talk to you instead of playing golf?

Q: How do you approach this question and how is the answer in the question?

K: If you ask me how does the speaker approach the question, is that it?

Q: How is the question the answer to the question?

K: The question is, how do you approach? On that, if you can find out, the response will be right. If I approach it - if one approaches it, not I, if you approach it from a very narrow, selfish point of view, your approach is limited and therefore your answer will be very, very limited because it is a tremendously complex problem. So is your mind capable of meeting this challenge? Meeting it wholly or partially? Afraid that in answering fully your actions may bring about a radical change and therefore you are afraid and hold back? You follow? It is very important to find out how we approach a question.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I am not describing, that's a fact. That's your culture: the American culture, American civilization, American growth, evolution and so on is based on the individual. The individual achievement, the individual success, the individual competition, the individual creativeness, you follow, all that is there. And what is the relationship, please, between that individual, love, freedom and responsibility?

Q: Sir, the problem is that freedom, love and responsibility is an ideal, I feel that is not an actuality at all.

K: That's right, sir. For most of us freedom, love, responsibility is just an idea, an ideal, it has no value at all, these ideals. What is real in our daily life is our individual desires, individual sexual demands, individual urge for self-fulfilment, and in that desire one must be free to fulfil. That's all we are concerned with, not about love, freedom, responsibility. Those are all just words.

Q: Sir, we cannot answer the question because the question throws us into the distress of relativity and non-meaning, how do we deal with the stress of our incapacity to answer the question?

K: I am doing it, sir, we are trying to find out. Sir, are we really concerned as two friends, talking over this matter, are you really concerned to find out for oneself, not to be talked at or be preached at or persuaded to believe or not to believe, are we prepared to say, 'Look, let me look at my life first as it is and from there move'?

You understand my question?

Q: If two friends met and they were friends would they not be sensitive to one another's needs, to the whole of one another?

K: Perhaps. What has that got to do with this question?

Q: That's what love is, as far as we can comprehend it.

K: Sir, you are all offering opinions, judgements; let's find out. Are you responsible in the full meaning of that word to another, to your wife, to your girl, to your boy friend or husband, are you totally responsible? That means care, it means attention, love, in which there is no personal demand.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes.

Q: The individual in a group, the individual who is striving cannot have any relationship with the other people.

K: Obviously.

Q: Sir, I am involved in a relationship, and I see pain, and I began to respond to it and then my mind, thought came into my mind and I see that I am not responding fully.

K: First of all, sir, let's be clear, that this is not a group therapy, we are not confessing to each other our sins, our faults, and exposing each other, but we are trying to enquire into ourselves to what are we responsible for. Responsible, that word means to respond, sensuously, intellectually, emotionally, romantically, from your heart, from your mind, sensuously. Now are we aware of our responsibility to another, intimate or not intimate? What does that responsibility involve? If one has a family, please just go with me for a little, if one has a family, wife, children, are you responsible for those children? That you care, that you have love for them, that you are concerned with their health, with their clothes, with their education, are you concerned that they become healthy good citizens? Or you have no time at all for them because you have to go out and earn money as the man, and the mother, and the father, as they do now and have very little time for the children. So that's a fact. So where is your responsibility? You see, that's why if we don't face that it is no good talking about love, freedom and all the rest of it. The family is breaking up in this country. Right?

Divorce, after two or three years of sexual relationship with a man, or with a boy and a girl, it breaks up, and another relationship is formed, children may be born out of it, but there is a divorce so gradually this word responsibility is losing altogether its meaning. Please do pay attention to what we are saying.

Q: If I have a friend and I perceive a need that I see in this friend, my friend has a need, is this because I myself have a need, or is this responsibility?

K: Suppose, suppose, I am not saying this, suppose, if I need an audience like here for my fulfilment, for my pleasure, would you help me to fulfil my pleasure? My desire to have a large or a small audience to whom I can talk, would you help me, or would you say, don't be a fool? Then I am using you for my satisfaction, for my glory, for my aggrandisement and so on. Look, sir, he asked a question, let's finish it. Please stick to one thing, would you kindly. That is, are we responsible for the earth on which we live? You understand? The trees, the mountains, the waters, the forests and the beauty of the land, to maintain it, or are we gradually destroying everything because we must have more cars, more pleasure, more, more. Sir, you don't face all these things.

Q: I feel a special responsibility for my wife, for my child, for my piece of land, does that deny my responsibility for the whole?

K: No. On the contrary. There is - would you listen, sir? - there is feeling of responsibility and feeling responsible for. You see the two different things? That is, one feels responsible for this grove, for this beautiful place, or you feel responsible when you are walking down the road, you feel responsible to pick up a piece of paper that has been thrown down, you feel responsible. So wherever you are you are responsible for everything around you. But if you are merely responsible for this one little thing, that responsibility assumes a very narrow, rather shoddy little meaning.

Q: What is the greatest act of love?

K: I am showing it to you, sir. Do you, if I may ask, if one may ask, do you feel responsible that way for the whole of mankind not just your children - if you have children do you feel responsible for those children, to see that they have right education so that they won't be killed in a war, they won't become mediocre. Oh, you are not interested in all this. So one asks, what are you interested in? I think that is a legitimate question. You can talk about love, freedom and the beauty of the sky but it is only an outside interest, but basically what are we interested in?

Q: In ourself.

K: Yes, that's right, you are interested in yourself. Right? Wait, sir, perfectly right, each one is interested in himself. On that our society, culture, religion is based. Right? Each one interested in himself, his progress, his expression - you know, all the rest of it. Now what relationship has one's self-centred activity to freedom? You understand? I want to be - one wants to be free. Go on, sir, think it out.

Q: The relationship between responsibility to oneself and responsibility for the whole.

K: Responsibility to oneself and responsibility to the whole. What is yourself? Please, let's go into it, that one thing. What is yourself? Are you not the result of your parents, genetically, heredity, are you not the result of your culture, of your religion, of all the literature and so on; and you are that and the European is that, the Indian is that. Right? They are the product of their environment, of their culture, of their religion, of their social condition, economic and so on. And they have produced this society in which we live. Do you, as a human being, realize that we are all one basically, not as an idea, but as a fact. Because when you go to India, you see the misery, the confusion, the anxiety, the despair of people, running to their petty little gods whom they have created; you come to Europe it is exactly the same thing, they have got their Jesus, their Christ - you follow - the economic position, they are starving, they are miserable, unhappy, disorder; you come here it is exactly the same. So if you are responsible you are responsible for all mankind. You understand?

Q: How can you say that humanity is basically one? Do you mean that the condition is basically one? Or that beyond the conditioning we are one?

K: No, I am sticking to the conditioning, not beyond. You can only find out what is beyond when you are free from one's conditioning. So if one realizes that, that all human beings go through this extraordinary misery, confusion, anxiety, sorrow, right through the world. You understand, sir? Right through the world, not you go through it, but every human being goes through it - Africa, China, Australia, here, everywhere. And you are that also, you, you are part of all that. So if you are responsible you are responsible for all humanity in that sense.

Q: Sir, does irresponsibility relate to striving for individuality?

K: That's right. Is irresponsibility, the questioner asks, striving for individual fulfilment, is that irresponsible. It is, obviously. You understand, sir? First to realize not verbally but in your heart, in your blood, in your whole thinking, that human beings right through the world go through the same agonies that one goes through: the loneliness, the despair, the depressions, the extraordinary uncertainty, insecurity, whether they live ten thousand miles away or two thousand miles or here, they are all psychologically bound together. If one realizes that profoundly in your guts, in your blood, in your heart, in your mind, then you are responsible.

Q: What is it that stands in the way of our seeing our responsibility? Not only seeing responsibility but seeing the whole.

K: Not seeing. First does one realize this tremendous fact? You see, madam, if you realize that then what is your action?

Q: I will know when I realize that.

K: No, no, if you realize that you are not Mrs so-and-so, tremendously individual, but psychologically, inwardly you are like the rest of mankind, you may be blond, you may be white, you may be black, you may be brown, yellow, whatever it is, inwardly we are all similar though outwardly we may be dissimilar. If one realizes that, what is your action, what will you do? What's your responsibility? Wouldn't you then ask a simple question: is it possible for the person who sees this, is it possible for that person to change, not follow the current? That is the central question, that is the responsibility because if one can fundamentally change then you are no longer contributing to that stream, to that river, to that ocean of confusion, which is self-fulfilment. You follow? I must be better, I must do this, I must earn more money, I must have a swimming pool, I must have, and all the rest of the thing that goes on.

Q: Sir, some of the people here understand maybe intellectually that we have to change because we are the rest of the world. But then at the same time we are continuing our individual desire to change. That's the difficulty.

K: Ah, no, no, sir. It's not individual desire. This is important. Understand, look, sir: verbally, intellectually one may understand that psychologically we are all similar, that can easily be logically, reasonably, verbally clear, but the verbal clarity is not the feeling of it. You understand? The verbal statement, the acceptance after argument, reason, is not the fact or the feeling that you are the world.

Q: What makes one understand it?

K: Wait. First I must realize that. First it must be an absolute, irrevocable truth, then you ask, what is my responsibility.

Q: What is the responsibility if you see what is the entity that is the world? What is the world?

K: That's very simple: what is the world. There is the outer world and the inward world. Right? The outward world, you know what is happening, I don't have to describe the outward world, with all the confusion, anger, jealousy, arrogance, self-fulfilment, wars, whether you have a war here or in Vietnam, it is war on this earth; and inwardly we are confused, we are unhappy, we are disagreeable, we are selfish, you know. So this inner has created the outer, and the outer then encourages the inner. Right? It is simple, this fact. So I say, seeing all this, what is your responsibility?

Q: There is a transformation in ourselves.

K: Sir, there is no transformation of yourself - you haven't understand this thing.

Q: The anger in my mind looks at anger...

K: Sir, if you realize that you are essentially psychologically like the rest of the unfortunate mankind, what is your response?

Q: I observe it.

K: All right, sir, if you observe that and you realize that you have to bring about a transformation, right, sir, why don't you do it?

Q: I don't stay with it long enough.

K: You stay long enough with your job to earn a livelihood, you spend years and years and years, you get money, all the rest of it, why don't you spend a day with this? You understand what I mean? Give time to find out.

Q: Sir, people have real needs, part of our responsibility is to meet some of those needs.

K: Of course, we are saying that, we agree. But if you spend all your time, as one does, acquiring one's needs and giving perhaps an occasional glance at this misery of mankind, your occasional glance has very little value.

Q: Can love exist without freedom?

K: Can love exist without freedom - what do you mean by freedom? You have freedom in this country to do what you like. Right? Yes, sir. You have freedom, speech, opportunity to work if you want to, some kind of work, gardener, factory, cook, any kind of work, you have an opportunity. You are free to go from one place to another to get a job. You are free to think what you like and express what you think. People may not listen, that's a different matter, you are free. But go to Russia, you are not. So what do you mean by freedom? Freedom of choice? Freedom to choose what you want to do, which you are doing now. And is that freedom, to choose? If a man who is clear, sees exactly, he doesn't choose, there is no choice, he does it. So choice may be the denial of freedom. You don't see it.

Q: Excuse me, please, I think that we miss the central point of your statement that we are the world, and I think that is the central point.

K: Yes, sir, in this discussion.

Q: It is a verbal understanding.

K: So if it verbal, intellectual, how will you make or find out not to make this truth merely verbal. You follow? Sir, you tell me something very serious, something that is very, very important, and you want to convey it to me, and you express what you have to say in words, clear, precise, actual, the meaning of every word you have employed. I accept that, I say, 'You are perfectly right, I see your reason, your logic, there is clarity, there is sanity behind it', but it is all up here, I don't feel it. I don't say, 'By Jove, how true this is'. And to me the mere verbal expression and clarity of verbal statements have very little meaning if I don't live it, find out the truth of it. So is it one of our difficulties, amongst others, is it one of our difficulties that we have become so terribly verbal, superficial, intellectual in that sense that I understand words, one understands words very quickly, get on with it. There is no depth in our enquiry, is that it?

Q: There is no depth.

K: Yes, sir. How will you acquire this depth of enquiry?

Q: I am trying to understand what is standing in our way.

Q: We habitually approach the question with conclusions. If we don't find a conclusion on this superficial level then we wait for someone else to answer the question.

K: That's right, sir. You see, I want to tell you a story, will you listen to it? A story, not amusing or serious story, but I want to tell you something, will you listen to it? Listen not only with the hearing of the ear, which is, the meaning of the word, the intent of the expression, the feeling behind it, so that he wants to tell you something and will you listen to it completely with your heart, with your mind? Or will you say, 'Yes, I agree with you, what you have to say, it is a nice morning I am going back to my daily life'? You follow?

That gentleman asked at the beginning of this questioning if we could discuss seriously the art of listening, the art of seeing, the art of learning. If we could go into that, desperately, he wants to find out. You understand? If we could go into that, not superficially, to the very depth of it, perhaps it may solve our problems. Because that involves a great deal of attention, a great deal of comprehension together. I can't listen - one can't listen to one's own voice eternally. So could we go into that before you ask the question what is love, what is freedom, what is responsibility. You may tell me something true but I may not be capable of receiving it. I may not know what you mean by it, I must listen to you with empathy, with sympathy, with affection, with care, with real deep attention to find out what you are saying. You know, if you have a small child who wants to tell you a story or something that has happened to him, would you listen with care? Or you are so busy with your percolator, with your ambition, with your husband's quarrels that you have no time to listen? You understand my question? You'd listen to that child, wouldn't you?

Q: We always listen through conditioning.

K: Find out how to listen, sir. Not conditioning. Will you listen to the child completely? Or you have no time? To your daughter, to your son, he wants to tell you something and will you listen casually - and the child knows that you listen casually, so he loses touch with you immediately, he has no confidence in you because you are concerned about yourself and all the rest of it, so he goes to somebody else, or he runs away from it. You follow, this is happening, for god's sake. So will you learn the art of listening? As we said the other day, art means to give everything its proper place. You understand? Its proper place, everything, the word means that. Then I want to listen, the art of listening. When you want to say something to somebody will you pay complete attention or is it partial attention, disinterested, casual listening? Or do you say, `Please, I want to understand it, for god's sake tell me what you mean', so that you are fully, completely attentive to what is being said? You follow? Not interpreting, not saying, well, I disagree, you go off and talk about something else when he is telling you, 'I love you'. Will you listen? Or only listen when it gives you satisfaction? Or when something is said that will give you pleasure? You won't listen to a man that wants to hurt you. So listening implies a tremendous attention.

Q: Would you listen to a lot of small talk?

K: That depends, I wouldn't personally, but.

Q: There are two kinds of listening, you have to decide what you want to listen to.

K: Ah! That's just it. If you decide what you want to listen to you shut off listening altogether.

Q: As the man said, small talk is insignificant.

K: You are all talking small talk. Therefore I listen casually; but if you are serious and say, 'Look, I want to understand something completely, tell me', then we can meet each other. That's why, sir, do you remember that fact which is quite extraordinary if you go into it, you have heard of the Buddha, Buddhism? The Buddha, 500 BC, he talked about love and all the rest of it, long before Christ, long before. And he preached for fifty years and he had two disciples amongst many who really understood, not intellectually, understood him, lived with him, comprehended his depth, his beauty, and they came every day to listen to him. They didn't say, 'Well, I'll just listen to you, I've got it', and went away, they came because there was beauty in what he was saying. And these two disciples died before he died. You understand what that means? I wonder if you understand.

So, sirs, and ladies, do you want to learn how to listen? And the art of seeing, seeing something, the trees, the hills, the mountain, your wife, your friend, whatever it is, to see it as though for the first time, not the routine. To look at the familiar face, and look at it as though you are meeting it for the first moment. That can be possible only when all the memories that you have accumulated from that person drop away and you can look. And we went into the question of learning. If you have gone into it you will find out what it means. Learning which is not merely the accumulation of knowledge, and acting from that knowledge, and therefore that action is always, ever incomplete, and therefore it always brings regrets, confusion, misery. And we said there is a different way of learning which is not the action of memory. We went into that a little bit. So if you want to learn these things you become terribly serious, even for an hour.

Q: Would you explain how man created god?

Q: How helpful would the explanation be?

K: What would you say if you were not conditioned by your religion, by your fears, what would you say about god? Of course god is a marvellous investment, you can preach about god and you will make a lot of money - as they are doing. So - please listen to this very carefully - in India they are conditioned one way, you understand, they believe in different gods, you come to Europe, they believe in a certain god and in god's son, absolute, and so on. And there are people who have never, never, never heard of Christ, and they say, 'Who is he?' My god is more important than that man's. So it all depends on your conditioning. Right? One doesn't see this. When the mind is free from that conditioning what is god?

So that's why man out of his fear, out of his loneliness, out of his extraordinary hopeless state says, there must be something that will protect me. Right? The father image, he worships something. So man creates god.

So, sirs, we have come to a point - what time is it?

Q: Twenty five to one.

K: So would you, two friends talking over, are they listening to each other? Are we listening to each other?

Q: How did your question answer your question?

K: You are going back to that. Look, sir, I asked yesterday, no, the day before yesterday, we said what is the root cause of sorrow. You understand? Can sorrow ever end? We put that question, not only personal sorrow but the sorrow of mankind, the collective misery of mankind. And if one answered it, you understand, the root cause, it would become an argument and you would say, how am I to go beyond that. You follow? But if you really asked the question with all your heart and mind, that very question will answer, because in the question is the answer, not outside the question. Look, what is the root cause of sorrow? That's the question. That's the challenge. How do you respond to it? Either you say, 'I don't know', which would be logical, sane, I don't know because you may never have even asked such a question. But if you are here, you are good enough to be here, and you say, 'What is the root cause of it?', I will tell you, I can tell you but it will become intellectual, then you will say, if that is so, then find out how to be free of this thing. Back again. You follow? If you put this question with all your intention, with all your seriousness, the question then begins to reveal.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, questions can be silly, very, very personal, or very superficial, or meaningless questions, but if one asks such a serious question as this, whether mankind, whether you as a human being, related to the rest of the world, whether you as a human being can end your sorrow, which means to discover the root of sorrow, then you have to give your tremendous attention to a very serious question, it isn't a casual superficial question. Mankind has asked this question, you may not have. Men who are very, very serious, who have devoted their life, given up everything, you follow, to find this out. What is the root cause of it?

Q: When I see the problem I am not capable of solving it. What then?

K: I have understood your question. That is, I see - you are saying - I see the problem, I am incapable of solving it. I see the problem very clearly but I am incapable of resolving it. Right? Why? Why is one - please listen to this - why is one incapable of solving a psychological problem, why? Is it that you are educated to rely on another to solve it for you? You understand?

Q: We rely on you.

K: No, just look at it. Why is it that you are incapable of solving your own human anxiety? Let's take anxiety, that's a common problem of all mankind, anxiety, anxious of tomorrow, anxious about, anxiety, you understand that word. Why can't a human being solve it?

Q: Because of its magnitude.

K: No, you have already come to a conclusion that it is enormous. I am asking a question, is it that you have been educated, conditioned to rely on another, psychologists, psychotherapists, Gestalt, Freudian, the latest and so on, the priest, the pope, the professor, the specialist, so we are always relying on somebody else. If you don't rely on somebody else what will you do, and you have got to solve it. You understand my question? There is nobody on earth who is going to solve for this you. You have tried all these methods, you have been to Japan, Zen, every type of search you have done and you haven't solved your anxiety, so you realize that nobody can possibly help me with this. I have got to solve it.

Q: Beethoven, he had many problems, he didn't solve them, instead he created music.

K: He had a great talent for music, marvellous, I have heard them, marvellous, but his life was like the rest of mankind. So what are you trying to say? Talent is a danger. Right? Because through that you can escape from yourself. So, sir, as nobody can solve your anxiety, group therapy, all the things that mankind has tried, not only this generation, through past history, you understand, for thousand of years they have tried, always saying 'God help me, please help me somebody', and nobody has helped you. They help you to escape, so you are left with this thing, what will you do? You don't say then, 'I have no capacity', you have got to answer it. Or you just carry on, say, 'I am anxious, I can't solve it' and die that way. That's what most people do. But life isn't just anxiety for the rest of my life, I am going to resolve it. Then you begin to find out what anxiety is. The moment you apply you have capacity. But one loses that capacity when one depends on another. That's common wisdom, common sense.

Q: We all have that capacity?

K: Absolutely. Sir, haven't you a capacity to earn a livelihood, money, cars, sex, houses, swimming pools? One has tremendous capacity and energy, only we apply it in one direction and not to this at all.

Q: Shall we give up listening to you?

K: Perhaps we should give up listening to you - perhaps you have already given up! No, sir, just listen, would you go and see something beautiful every day? Wouldn't you? Beautiful trees, the mountains, every day the light changes, different shadows, the wind, the breeze moves through different leaves, you go and see it every day. In the same way, when somebody is telling truth, you go and listen, there is such variety, such shapes.

Q: Maybe we are depending on you.

K: You see I said it carefully, I said when you look at those mountains every day, they are not mountains, they are beauty, the rocks, hills, valleys, shadows, the movement of the clouds over the mountains, the line of the mountains, the depth, the variety of light, all day it is changing. But if we say, 'It is mountains, I have got to go and play golf' - it is finished. But if you are interested in beauty and seeing beauty then you go there every day, or look at it out of the window. In the same way when you are speaking something extraordinarily beautiful, like Beethoven, sir, you hear him every day, every day you hear and every day it is different.

Q: Sir, thank you for sharing your great enlightenment with us. Now what do you say to that?

K: I don't understand. I think we had better stop, we will continue on Thursday.

Q: You spoke of telling a story, is that the story about Buddha?

K: No, just a story. You didn't hear? That child wants to tell you a story, how you listen to that story. That's all.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 19TH APRIL 1979 'ON TRANSFORMATION'

K: Do you think it is worth while to have these discussions?

Q: Yes.

K: Because apparently we never resolve any question or come to the very end of it. We have so many questions, each one saying what he wants to - irrelevant. So could we, as this is the last discussion, could we talk ever together, as two friends, have a dialogue and choose a subject which is common to all of us and go to the very end of it, step by step. Could we do that? Would that be worthwhile? Then please choose your subject.

Q: You have been talking to people for over fifty years, and also there are these schools, this one and those in other countries, in all of this time, out of this talking, out of these schools has there come about the total radical transformation of even one single human being?

K: You have had schools here in this country, Canada, England and five or six schools in India, and you have been talking for over fifty years and has there been one single human being who has been transformed? Do you want to discuss that?

Q: Sir could we have a discussion as to what is impeding this transformation. We are coming here, I think, many of us very serious, who want to transform.

K: Could we discuss seriously what do you mean by transformation.

Q: No. What is it that impedes this transformation?

K: What impedes transformation. What impedes human minds from really bringing about a mutation in themselves? Do you want to discuss that?

Q: Yes.

K: So do you want to discuss, talk over together, and go step by step if we discuss anything together, to the very end of it: which is: if you want to chose that subject, is it possible to bring about a radical transformation and what are the things that block us?

Q: Yes.

Q: And not only that. Can we talk about observation without the observer?

K: That is a very good question: the art of seeing without the observer. Perhaps we can include that question sir in discussing about is it possible to bring about a change and what is preventing us. Right? Shall we discuss this step by step and go to the very end of it, not stop in the middle of it and talk about something else? Could we do that?

Q: Please.

K: At last. First of all what do we mean by change? What do we mean by bringing about a transformation, a mutation in our consciousness? That is what it means. What does it signify, what is the meaning of change, mutation? They are all the same words - transformation. What do we mean by that? May I proceed a little bit?

Is it change if you know what you are changing into? Do you understand my question? If one knows what you must become, is that change?

Q: No.

K: Go slowly sir. Think it out carefully. If one has an idea, a concept, a conclusion, an end to which you conform, to which you change to, or from this to that, is that change? Or is it a continuation of the same thing but modified? You have understood my question? One may project what one should be, the projection of that is from one's own desire, from one's own belief, from one's own demands and you project that. And when you want to become that you are becoming what you are, perhaps slightly modified. Is that clear? So when we have an object, or an end in view, projected by our own experience, from our own knowledge, from our own belief and conclusions and opinions, such movement is not change at all. Let's talk that over before we take the next step.

If one says "I must change myself in order to be good" - that goodness is a concept, is an idea, or a series of conclusions to which you are conforming, or to which you think you are changing from this to that. We are asking: is that change at all?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: It is part, is it not sir, of a continuation of what has been? If one desires a new experience - I am taking that as an example - and strives after that experience, and when you do experience that thing after which you are striving, you must be able to recognize it, you must be able to say "This is the something which I am feeling, which I am experiencing," which means that you have already recognized it and therefore recognition means that you recognize again that which you have already experienced. I wonder if you see that. Right? Are we meeting each other there?

Q: It is easy - well I can understand it intellectually and then it is easy to deceive yourself that you are not doing that and go on wasting a lot of time.

K: I quite agree, sir. Therefore, do we see this fact, as a fact, not as an idea? That to change from this to that, that being a projection of this, then it is not change at all. It is like moving always in the direction of north, going further and further and further but in the same direction and therefore it is not change; but it is a change, a mutation when you are going north and you go diametrically opposite, south, or east, or west. You have moved from one direction, from one dimension to totally another direction, another dimension. That is a change. But if you keep on going in the same direction of course there is a modification, there is a change of scenery, change of experience, but it is in the same direction. Is that clear sirs? Can we go on from there?

Let's talk it over.

Q: I know what the mind does project.

K: Of course, of course.

Q: It says, OK, the change I want is to go south.

K: Of course. Therefore find out sir. Look one is going north and you realize going the same direction is no change at all. So you say then change means going quite the opposite, which is south. But if you keep on going south it will be the same thing.

Q: It is no change.

K: Just go slowly, slowly. Right? So one has discovered something very serious, which is to have no direction.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just go step by step sir. The first step is that one desires, one wants to change. That is a fairly intelligent demand if one is at all aware. Then one asks: what do we mean by change? Generally it implies from the known move in the direction of the unknown. I am using different words. I don't know what the unknown is but I try to move towards it. But it is the same direction. So to discover change implies not having any movement towards any direction. Which doesn't mean you stay in the same place. I wonder if you get this?

Q: You don't stay in the same place but it seems like you have to stop or begin.

K: All right. If you stop - you have been going north - and if you stop, why do you stop? To go in another direction?

Q: Because going north is...

K: Listen. Find out sir. One stops going east and if you stop going in that direction what takes place, actually?

Q: You cast about for another direction.

K: Yes. That is right sir. You are looking for directions, whether it is south, south-east or south-south-west and so on - always moving in a direction. And we are saying such movement doesn't bring about a change at all. See how very complex this is first of all, and requires a little subtlety, which is: the mind has always moved in a lateral, horizontal or vertical, with all the degrees, variable degrees. Right? So it is now conditioned to move within that circumference, horizontal, linear, vertical, and the various degrees between linear, horizontal and vertical. That is what we are used to and that is what we call change, and that is what we call progress. Right? I wonder if you see this?

Q: Does the mind have to move to take care of the biological process?

K: We will come to that sir, we will come to that. First just see this, see the significance of this, the meaning of it, the inwardness of it.

Q: Is this not our habitual thoughts, the outer and the inner?

K: I know. Of course that is what we said. This is our life, this is where we live. One is pushed in this direction by various influences, desires, purposes, and if that isn't suitable one is driven in another direction. And this constant movement from one degree to another degree is called progress, change and all kinds of things, acquiring knowledge, moving. Right? So we are asking if that is change at all? We are discussing change in the sense of a deep fundamental mutation, transformation, psychological revolution. That is what we are talking about. We must bear that in mind constantly.

Q: The trouble is the idea of not moving, not taking a direction and not standing still.

K: That is just it. Wait sir. Find out. See what is implied in it. You know sir this is a very serious question because - I mustn't go into this too deeply, too quickly - if this is clear that any directional movement is not change, is not mutation, the very word is something totally different. Is this clear? Can we go on from there? Sir, not verbally, for yourself.

Q: Sir, it doesn't seem clear because if we have no direction then don't we become rather apathetic?

K: No. Wait, wait. Listen to this. Isn't apathy going the same direction? See that sir. You asked a question: if you have no direction don't you just collapse, isn't there apathy, no activity. You see? Which means one is really apathetic when you are moving in the same direction. It is routine, mechanical. I have learnt a lesson, one has learnt a lesson and you keep on repeating it. One is a Freudian, carry on; a Gestalt, or some other latest psychologist and you follow that line, it is much easier. But to say: look, let's find out if there is any possibility of movement - just listen to it - of movement in which there is no direction.

Q: Sir, would enlightenment have anything to do with what you are talking about? That if we are aware that we are already are a part of that which is, there is no direction.

K: There is a danger in that sir. That is what the Hindus have been for three thousand years, or five thousand - we are inwardly Brahman, God, the Highest Principle, and through various lives and experiences we are going to peel off our ignorance until we achieve that ultimate thing. That is a supposition, that is a belief, that is an idea. And also it is directive. Right? This is really rather difficult. You have chosen a very, very difficult subject.

Q: What is the nature of direction?

K: Physical direction is: go towards Ventura, or Santa Barbara or Los Angeles, take a road and go, because your house is there. There is a direction. And if you are educated, have degrees, that is a direction to get a particular job - professor, scientist, psychologist and so on and so on and so on. So please culturally we are conditioned to function in a direction, in a particular, or obscure, or meditative, cosmic direction. Right? You become a first-class engineer and for the rest of your life you pursue that. You are a brilliant physicist and there you are - Nobel prize and all the rest of it. You follow. And the religious groups have certain concepts, follow that. This is a very, very difficult subject you have chosen. If you want to go into it very deeply you have to apply your mind to this, not just romantic entertainment.

K: So we are asking: transformation implies, does it not, uprooting that which has been, not modifying that which has been.

Q: Are you implying that we cannot know change?

K: That's right. The moment you are aware that you have changed you are not changed. That's the beauty of it. If you see this.

Q: There is no pleasure, no fear.

K: Haven't you noticed the moment you say, "I am very happy" - have you not noticed this? Something has escaped from you.

Q: What we call change, what we call growth, dissipates the capacity for transformation.

K: Yes sir. There is biological growth. Right? From the child to adolescence, manhood and dying, the whole process. You see you have got something terribly difficult which you have entered into. Which is: there is biological process of evolution, the cultivation of the mind, the brain. And that perhaps, that idea that man grows from childhood to adolescence and so on, that may be our idea of change too. You follow? Being a child, growing into - psychologically you may have the same idea. And this biological growth and evolution and decay will also have psychologically the same thing. So we are saying: transformation implies non-movement as time and measure.

K: We are always measuring, aren't we? I have been, I shall be. Right? I don't know if you have gone into this. The whole western philosophy and psychology is based on measurement, both technologically - right - if you have no measurement you can't produce a man-of-war, or an aeroplane. You must have the rule, the measurement. Right? The whole of the western civilization is based on that. Because thought is measurement. Right? Do you see that? Anything that moves from here to there is a measurement. Is this too difficult? Sir this is the real meaning of meditation, to go into it.

So the eastern world has also said in the ancient days, measurement is illusion. To discover the immeasurable there must be no measurement. Naturally. But they employed thought to achieve the immeasurable. You must control, you must meditate, you must sacrifice, you must behave, all the pattern laid down through measurement, which measurement is thought. Are you following all this?

Q: It seems to me sir that a sort of physical measurement is necessary...

K: Of course. Physical measurement is necessary; to build this chair you must have measurement.

Q: When I think I am religious I might quit measuring to build a chair.

K: Oh, no, no, no. The religious man may measure and build a chair. No, you are mixing up so much. That is why sir you are not thinking consecutively. That's the worst of it.

Q: What is the nature of time in its movement from the past to the present?

K: Look sir, we started out asking: what is change? As long as there is the more, which is measurement, the comparison which is measurement, I have been, I shall be - is a measurement. Right? So long as there is this faculty of the mind to move from this to that and to that and to that, which is a continuation of measurement, there cannot be change.

One wants to change because one sees that one is ignorant. You may have a great deal of knowledge of outward things, how to go to the moon and create a bomb and build a man-of-war, or become an excellent plumber, electrician or a physicist - one realizes that must be done. And also one says to oneself: how am I, how is one to change? And what does it mean to change? That is what we are concerned with. What does it mean to change? And we have always changed from this to that, from that to that. In the same direction. That is clear. Right sir? Whether the direction be north, south, east, west or south-south-east or southwest, it is always directional. Right? Now is that change? We think it is change. But is that basic change? Or that is not change, but to have a mind that has no directional movement at all, but has movement.

Sir, look, we expend our energy in a particular way, sexual, ambitious, competitive, greedy, engineering, success. Right? And we are saying all these have not changed man. Right? Would you agree? They have modified - they build better roads, better cars, better aeroplanes, better way to kill and so on and so on and so on. But psychologically, inwardly man has not changed. He has been afraid from the ancient of days until now. He has been violent from the ancient times until now. He has been envious, brutal from immemorial time. So man has not changed deeply. And one asks why? Right? Man being you and I, human beings - why? Is it because he has always considered movement must be directional, growth must be directional. It is biologically. You follow? You plant an acorn it will be an oak. It will take time. So why has not man, human beings, changed fundamentally? I am asking you why?

Q: Because we haven't wanted to.

K: Oh, you have plenty of energy. When you want something you get it, whether it is sex, money, position, anything you want, you have immense energy.

Q: Pardon me. She said, because we haven't wanted to. We haven't changed because we haven't wanted to.

K: If you wanted to, what will you do? It comes to the same thing, you see.

Q: You wouldn't know it if it did happen.

K: Sir look: if you wanted to changed what would you do? I am asking you. You would exercise will. You would say, "Well, I must achieve that" - which means you are already moving in a direction, which you have done for a thousand years.

Q: What we have said is that the only thing we know is that we don't change, what is not changing.

K: Madam, that is what I am asking you: why you, human beings, have not changed? You are not meeting the point. Find out sir, look, look. You may smoke, that has become a habit, nicotine and all the rest of it. And you know it is very harmful to your health, for your brain, for your heart but you still go on. And you don't say, now let me observe why I don't drop it. If you drop it because of your health, because of some other reason, you are not actually dropping it. Right? You may drop it but the motive is not to change radically, just drop the cigarette. You understand what I am trying to convey?

Q: Could you explain that a little better?

K: A little better. All right.

Why do you smoke? It must have tasted for the first time rather unpleasant. Right? But people around you smoke, it tastes perhaps good - so the commercials say so. So first you smoke and it is unpleasant and then you get in the habit of it. Then doctors come along and say it is very bad for your health, for your lung, cancerous, for your brain, it does, etc., etc. All the doctors are saying this. And for what reason will you drop smoking? You are frightened and so you say, "By Jove, I will have pain therefore I mustn't smoke". But the desire to smoke may be stopped. But you have other desire. Do you follow it? Which has its own habits. So you are always moving - we come back to the same point - you are always dropping one thing and picking up another and this is the modern world. Go from one guru to another, one better guru than the other, or one religion better than the other, one sect is better than the other, and so on and on and on. Which is always from one centre to another centre. Right? Is this clear? Let's move sir.

So we are saying: any movement of thought projected in a particular direction, and achieving that end is not basic transformation of man.

Q: What you are saying is that we mustn't look for gratification.

K: Yes sir. No - you see you have reduced it to some little affair. Gratification. Why do you want to be gratified? Who is to gratify? You follow? Why?

So change implies non-movement of thought. You see. Because thought says, "I want that. I have had that and I have had sufficient, I must have that." And so it is constantly moving from this to this to this. And that is what we call change generally. And we are saying, no, that is not change at all. Change implies when thought has no object towards which it is moving. It has projected enlightenment. Right? God - whatever it has projected and says it must be achieved, therefore I must sacrifice, I must do this, do that, but it is in the same direction.

Q: One can see that this is what one has done, moved in direction. One can see that movement in direction is all the same and yet...

K: Wait, wait. Is that so? Have you seen it verbally, intellectually or as truth?

Q: Apparently one has not because...

K: That is the point. Let's stick to that. Why? You say - may we talk to each other? You say I see verbally, intellectually clearly this thing.

Q: And I can also see factually that this is what I did do in the past. That is a fact.

K: Yes, that is a fact. And I say why don't you see it as a whole, with your whole being? Why prevents you?

Q: It seems that at the moment of movement there is no awareness of movement.

K: Yes, go on sir, explain a little more.

Q: At the moment that the movement in a direction is taking place there is no awareness that this is movement.

Q: You mean there is no awareness of direction when the direction is taking place.

K: I am not sure.

Q: There is no centre.

K: I am not at all sure what you are saying. I am not saying you are wrong, but I am not sure. Which is I want - one wants to be a congressman and, you know, you work for it. You know the direction you want to go, you are aware of all the implications, all the mischief, etc., etc., you are going in that direction. You also want to be enlightened and you read books and you study what is implied and you say, to achieve to enlightenment I must do certain things - celibacy, poverty, etc., etc., etc. So you conform to that pattern, if you want that. And you know you are deliberately doing this.

Q: At the very moment of wanting it.

K: You may be unaware of it, because - you have understood his question? - at the moment of wanting enlightenment - I am taking that word, please that word has lost its meaning, every Tom, Dick and Harry of a guru talks about enlightenment, it has lost its vitality, its depth, its beauty. So we will use that word as it is used commonly, enlightenment. Now you seek enlightenment, one seeks enlightenment. What was the cause of the search? You may be conscious of it, or unconscious of it. Right? So before you move towards enlightenment obviously a sane man asks, "Why do I want it?" What is the reason? "Am I bored with life? Am I bored with my job? Am I bored with my wife, my girl friend?" and so on and so on. "And I have experienced so many things but this may be totally different kind of experience, so I would like that." So consciously or unconsciously there is a cognizance of this movement. You may not be actually aware of this whole structure of this movement but obviously, whether one is aware or unaware this movement takes place from being this to that. So, if I may point out, one cannot possibly say one is not aware of it.

Q: We are aware even though we may be unconsciously aware. You see my difficulty?

K: I understand sir. That means you are being driven in a particular direction without knowing it. See the danger. You are being coerced, pressurized, driven, brainwashed in a particular direction.

Q: It is like when we become angry, at the moment of anger you are not aware, it is only after you say, "I was angry".

K: Yes, that is right. But we are talking of something different from that. That is, sir, don't you know when you are greedy?

Q: Afterwards.

K: No, wait. See the reaction. You see something in the window and you want it. What has taken place? The seeing of that dress, that trouser, that coat, that car, that woman, that man, or whatever it is, seeing, the sensation, the contact and say, "I like that, that's exciting." - which is thought creates an image of you sitting in the car and driving. You follow? This whole movement is obviously either it is so quick or you observe as it is arising. That is seeing, contact, sensation, thought creating the image of you in the car and driving it - all that is so quick.

Q: One can see that.

K: Yes if you observe. If you are very aware of this movement, then you can see how it arises. And also you can see that the moment that thought comes in with the image the trouble begins.

Q: Further than that - there is nothing further than that.

K: Than?

Q: The seeing.

K: I am only saying the seeing, the contact, sensation, if that is all then it is very simple. But the moment thought takes over and creates the image then you want it.

Q: I understand that. You said before we may be unconsciously aware. Could you just describe...

K: Unconsciously aware in the sense one is not aware of the quickness of this movement. It takes over so quickly, in a second it is there. But if you slow down the process...

Q: Having the energy.

K: ...slow down the whole process, then you see like a cinema at the movie, the film, you can turn it very fast or very slowly, then you will see everything in action. That is all I am pointing out.

Q: In slowing down does the thing that moves become aware of its own movement?

K: Yes sir.

Q: How do you slow it down?

K: Sir, look, there is no 'how', because the moment you have a 'how' you have fallen into a system, you have fallen into a direction, you are lost. You have begun the same game again. But see, sir - look, I want to see something - one wants to see a picture of a painting. One goes to a museum and sees some painting and you want to see the whole of it so you look very, very carefully don't you? Every part of it, detail, different depths, different quality of colour and the movement of colour, you watch it slowly, you watch it and then you go further back and see the whole thing. There is no slowing down because you want to see the details. You understand? Therefore there is no effort made to slow down, you want to see it clearly, that is all.

So we are talking about change: why haven't you changed? What is the block, blockage, the impediment that prevents you from changing? That is the question we are asking, let's stick to it.

Is it fear?

Q: Partly the unknown.

K: Is it laziness? Is it the mind has so conformed to a pattern of living that it refuses, and says, "This is all right, why do you want to change it?" Because change might imply insecurity. Therefore you say, "Look, sorry I can't be insecure." Do you follow? There may be many, several reasons for not changing. And the reasons are fairly logical, fairly clear and so you say, "Please, what is wrong?"

Q: Does that mean that we don't actually see the danger of it? The danger that if we dared to change...

K: Sir, isn't it very dangerous, the way we are living? To the things of the earth, to the things of the air, to the things of the sea, isn't it dangerous the way we are living?

Q: Are we afraid of dissolving ourselves and losing ourselves?

K: Yes, sir. We are so selfish that we don't want to change. That is the basic reason. You see if you go into this very carefully a great many things are involved in this, extraordinary things if you go into it. Which is, first of all to live without any comparison. Right? Can you live without any comparison, both physically as well as psychologically? Find out what it means to compare. Which is, one is this, the example is perfect, I must become that. Or, compare oneself with something higher, both economically, socially, physically. Right? This comparison is measurement, isn't it? So stop measuring. Can you? Never to compare. See what happens to a mind...

Q: The 'never' is here. When you say 'never', the 'never', is here happening now.

K: Don't compare. Finish.

Q: No direction.

K: No, no direction, don't compare. I am taking that example. See what that means. What is implied, what a mind is that has no sense of comparison. We think through comparison is evolution, growth, progress, change. We say, on the contrary, comparison is merely a projection in the same direction. I am this, I must become that. Right? The example of nobility, greatness, spiritual and all the rest of that - to have no sense of comparison. Doesn't that bring a tremendous freedom?

Sir, look, in a school when you compare A with B what happens to A ? You destroy A , don't you? You are always telling him, "You must be more clever, you must be like B who is clever, who is bright and active, and you are lazy." Fight, compare, competition. So if you don't compare what takes place? You have never tried these things.

Q: The mind doesn't move in that direction anymore.

K: So what takes place?

Q: There is a change.

K: No, no. You are too quick. You don't investigate. You compare, don't you sirs? Don't you? No? You are all so silent. Obviously. Now if you don't compare, what takes place?

Q: Nothing.

Q: Confusion.

Q: We have to look at everything by itself.

K: Sirs, look, if you don't compare, that is a change, isn't it?

Q: There is space.

K: Don't compare. That is an absolute change, because your minds have been comparing, comparing, comparing. And knowledge is comparison too; more knowledge, less knowledge - the professors with their immense knowledge, history, physicists, biology and so on, great knowledge. Knowledge is progressively comparative.

Q: We compare 'what is' with our knowledge.

K: Yes. But you compare one material with another material. Quite right, you should, one is poorer than the other. For the money you choose the better and so on. But we are talking psychologically, not to have this burden of comparison.

So when you don't compare you have stopped wasting your energy in a particular direction - haven't you? Right? You have that energy. So what takes place? So you have discovered that when you drop completely comparison you have this immense energy, quick, alive.

Q: If we don't take that energy and waste it.

K: Wait, wait Madam, you are too quick, you don't do the thing step by step. As we said, go slowly, you will discover things for yourself, which is important. Not what I have discovered and tell you, that is silly. But to discover all these things for oneself, first hand.

Q: The moment the idea of non-comparison comes in it sets up a whole new chain of comparison. The mind is comparing that which is suggested by you.

Q: He says we make an idea of non-comparison.

K: Of course, of course. Sir when you go to a museum and watch several pictures - Picasso, Michelangelo - I withdraw Picasso (Laughter) - Michelangelo and so on and so on. When you are all the time comparing you never observe one completely. Because in comparison when you are comparing, somebody has told you this is a better painter than that and you want to accommodate yourself to the better, to the man who specializes in pictures he says, "This is the best picture" - so you are conditioned - you follow? By propaganda, by other people and so on and so on. So you never look at a picture completely, forgetting who has painted it. In the same way if you are always comparing you never look at yourself completely. Right? You understand sir?

Q: Are you saying that as long as there is comparison there is division?

K: No, not only division but there is never total observation of the thing which you are looking at.

So, let's proceed. What is blocking you, each one of us, from change? Radical change. Is it we are always dealing with parts - you understand sir? Or, taking the whole structure of our psychology and ending it, not bit by bit by bit, taking one part after another. Is that one of our difficulties?

Q: It seems that the self can take refuge anywhere and that as one moves step by step, dealing with an aspect here, an aspect there, the self will take refuge somewhere else.

K: Yes sir, so it will take the rest of our life.

Q: In fact it will never take place.

K: That's right.

Q. So how can we move to the centre.

K: I am going to show you, sir.

Q: Relationships are a...

K: In relationship, sir, what is your relationship with another?

Intimate or not intimate. Be actual. Put your teeth into it and find out. Is it sexual? Is it comfortable? Is it convenience? Is it that you are using another for your own benefit? Is it that it gives you satisfaction? Fulfillment? A sense of well being because being together and so on and so on? Which is, we are exploiting each other. Is that it? See, you are all too frightened to go into this.

Q: No.

Q: We are not afraid, sir.

K: Wait sir, I am going to show you something. That is only part, isn't it? Just look. Observe the part and go through the part completely to the end and then you will cover the whole. Look I will go into it. Take relationship, go into it thoroughly.

One is related to another through attraction, sex, convenience, comfort, encouragement, escape from loneliness. So all these and other reasons make you attached to a person, or to a thing. That is, you have a great longing because you feel lonely, desperately depressed by yourself. And you do not know how to solve that, so you accept another to escape from this. Right? That is, you are the centre always from which you are moving. Right? That is clear, isn't it? Are we meeting? That is, you have an image of your own loneliness, your own anxiety, your own sense of importance, your own impediments, your own inhibitions and so on and so on and so on. And you do not know how to solve this inside you, so you either go off to somebody to solve it - psychologists and so on and so on - or you get attached to somebody to escape from this.

Now we are saying, go through the part - this is only a part, relationship - go through a part completely to the very end, that means not theoretically, not verbally but actually end your attachment, completely. You follow? Completely end it. Face wholly your loneliness. That may be why you got into sexual habits and to escape from the loneliness that becomes the pattern, mechanical. So face this extraordinary sense of loneliness.

Q: I think most people encourage it.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: You say go slow.

K: I am doing it. I have taken one part, relationship - right? I am going through that part. I am related, is it because I am lonely, I am frightened to be, I want comfort, I want somebody to help me. You follow? Psychologically, all this. I need a postman, I need a plumber - that is not what we are talking about.

So through the part I can go step by step and drop it as I go along, not just theoretically, play with it and carry on. Drop it, seeing I am lonely. I am going to understand what this thing is, to be lonely. Why am I lonely? Is it all my activities are self-centred? My seeking god, my seeking a position, power, my seeking clairvoyance, my desire to heal others. You understand? Is this all a means of avoiding actually what I am? Which is my extraordinary sense of idiocy - I am taking that. My vanity. So if you can drop those things actually, then what? Then I have discovered a state in which there is no direction at all. There is only dropping away of everything that I have held. You understand what I am talking about? Can you do this?

One holds furniture, a piece of furniture and you identify with that piece of furniture and you are that furniture. I was told by a lawyer once, a man and a woman were seeking a divorce and they had been wrangling about this and that, this property, that property

- you know - they go through all that mess - and they had settled most things and the last day the woman said, "I must have that" - it was an ashtray! And they fought over it and the woman wanting it and the man wanting the ashtray. It was an ashtray - you understand - nothing important. So the lawyer took the ashtray and broke it. You understand all this?

Q: How petty.

K: We are petty sir. So we are saying, change implies a state of mind that is not moving from a centre to another centre. Right? Can you do it? That is a centre which is lonely and moving to a centre which is not lonely. Right? Do you understand this? The centre is lonely and to move to a centre which is not lonely is still the movement of loneliness. Just see that. See the truth of it. If you see that then you enquire why this loneliness. Is it that my actions are self-centred which are isolating me all the time? You understand sir? Do you follow all this? I am ambitious, I am greedy, I am this, I want that, I must have this - all that. In the world outwardly and inwardly. So the essence of loneliness is this movement of isolation. Right? So is there an action which is not self-centred? Right?

Q: Are you asking that now?

K: Yes sir.

Q: One of the things that slows us down is our need for security, is it not that that slows us down.

K: Now wait a minute sir, this is an important question again. You must have physical security, obviously, clothes, food, shelter. But security we mean not only that but inwardly we want security. And we never question whether inwardly there is security at all.

Inwardly one has found security in a belief. Right? In god, in some fanciful idea. Is that security? You may find security in your wife, in your girl friend, husband, boy, is that security? And when you have security in a person see how dangerous it is. If you have sought security in that woman, or in that man, then you become attached, jealous, angry, you follow? The whole agony begins. Don't you know all this?

Q: If there is no security then there is no need for security.

K; That's right sir. When you see psychologically there is no security, the very seeing is intelligence. Right? Obviously. In that intelligence there is tremendous security.

Q: Sir, you asked if there is an action that is not self-centred. Could we return to that question? The only action I know that is not self-centred, is surrender.

K: Now, just a minute sir. The only action which is not self-centred is to surrender. Surrender to what?

Q: To everything.

K: Wait sir, look carefully. Go into it slowly sir. The Christian world has said, surrender to God. See the danger. Which is, surrender to the idea of God, surrender to what people have said about God, Christ - you follow? - surrender. So I am asking: to whom are you surrendering?

Q: The higher being within you.

K: The higher being - you see, that is you have created the higher being.

Q: What about to 'what is'?

K: I am concerned at 'what is' - it is there. You don't surrender to the sunshine. Marvellous. You see we use words that are so meaningless when you examine it.

Q: Perhaps we should discuss this in terms of psychological pressure.

K: Are we, in discussing the psychological pressures, are we having a dialogue about why human beings don't change? Sir, all right, take that one fact of pressure. Are you being pressurized by the speaker here?

Q: No.

K: Go carefully sir. Are you being pressurized? Are you under pressure by the government, by institutions, by your education, by your priests, by your gods, by your beliefs? By the newspapers? So can you be free of pressure?

Q: You will be pressurized by external circumstances, they won't go away.

K: No, wait. Yes maybe you may have pressure because you are in a crowded city, underground tube or whatever it is called. So physically, but psychologically. Come sir, can you be free of pressure? From your wife, from your husband, from your girl, from your own urges? After all your own desire is a tremendous pressure.

Q: Yes. You can be freed of that pressure psychologically.

K: Are you saying you are free from psychological pressures?

Q: No, that is why I am here.

K: Therefore what will you do when you realize - please just take that - when you realize that you are under pressure by your wife or girl friend? Will you stop that pressure? Your own sexual demands, your own loneliness and say, "Well, I can't".

K: You see sir, we never - if I may point out sir, I hope you don't mind - if I may point out we never look at a thing, at ourselves without saying "I am...", just to look. You follow? I am attached. All right. Let me look at it. Let me find out what it means. You say, "No, I mustn't be attached, I mustn't". You understand. We are always moving away from that thing.

Q: But when I look I don't see anything. There is nothing there.

K: Find out, is that so?

You see sir. Mutation implies non-movement of the activities of the self. Which means all measurement as comparison, measurement of the more, you understand, the more, the less, the desire to fulfil, all that is movement in measurement. So a mind that has no measurement of any kind, that doesn't say I am ignorant, I am going to be enlightened. Find out sir, slow down the whole mechanism of thinking, and observe.

Q: One would easily end up with pressure.

K: Observe. Observe.

Q: Which means that all our activity ceases.

K: Oh no. Then activity may begin. Our activity is completely destructive when it is self-centred - obviously. Look what is happening all over the world.

Q: At the moment of observation, doesn't the activity of the mind...

K: Activity, sir that again is very difficult - we must first find out what action is. What is action? Do we act from a centre? From a belief? From a concept? From a principle? From an ideal? Which is always a centre. Right? Do we act from that? And the nobler the principle - which is still the centre - we think that is extraordinary. So there is action without the centre.

You see sir, let me put it differently, if you don't mind listening. We consider all self-centred action positive. Right? Achievement is a positive thing. We create a dynamo which is very positive. And to be psychologically active and act from a centre, to be a businessman, to be this or that, is very active, positive action, which has resulted in chaos in the world. Right? In misery, confusion. So there is an action which is non-positive. I wonder if you see this.

Q: Is observation part of this?

K: Pure observation without any movement is action. Observation is action. If one observes very clearly attachment, watch it, not do positive action about it, through negation, negation is the most positive, not the other.

Q: When one is observing, totally observing the action, is that the end of all that activity?

K: Yes. So: have you changed? At the end of an hour, is it?

Q: One o'clock.

K: After an hour and a half have you caught the truth that change is non-movement in any direction? Right sirs. Even intellectually grasped it. That means, change implies absolute observing 'what is'. You understand? Observing one's greed, one's loneliness, despair, depression, watching it without any desire to change this or that, just watch it. Sirs, you are watching this shade. You can't change the shade. You can't change that shadow. But we want to change the shadow which is ourselves. Just to watch it, and the very watching of it is the ending of it.

OJAI 5TH PUBLIC TALK 21ST APRIL 1979

In India instead of having a loudspeaker we just wear garlands!
May we continue with what we were talking about last weekend? I hope some of you who were here will tolerate certain repetition, a resume of what we were talking over together. And I hope seriously, most earnestly, that some of you are really serious and do not make these meetings into a kind of entertainment, a picnic place, an intellectual amusement.

We were saying the last two weekends that we must have a different kind of society, a totally different religion - if I may use that word `religion' which is for a great many people an anathema - a totally different kind of religion and a society that is essentially good. The word `good' is rather shy-making, and an old fashioned word, but as we explained very carefully during the last four talks and discussions, good, or goodness, is absolutely essential to create a new society. Goodness in the sense that we live together in a world which is ours, this earth is ours, not the American, or the Russian, or the Indian, or the European, it is ours, to be lived in, happily, without violence, without the contradictions of various beliefs, dogmas, rituals, gods, without the national economic divisions, and a good man, a human being can only create a good society. A good society is not born out of theories, either the Marxist or Mao or some other theories; it comes into being only when human beings are essentially good, orderly, peaceful, honest in themselves. It is only then you can have an extraordinary just society. A good man needs no - goodness needs no justice because justice is good. It is only the dishonest people, the criminals, the terrorists that need laws, controls. So we were talking about that.

And this morning we must go into, as we have done in previous talks, fear, pleasure, and other things. So this morning if you will we will go together into the question of what is order, not only outside, external to us, but also what is order inwardly. And also we must go into the question of what is love and we must enquire together into the whole structure and nature of death. And when we are investigating together we must have one mind. Our minds must be together, that is, one must have certain quality of seriousness, willing to listen to another, not projecting one's own opinions, judgements and prejudices, one must be willing to listen so that we can both together investigate these enormous problems of our daily life. And perhaps if there is time we can go also into the question of what is meditation.

So first can we have during this hour, perhaps more than an hour, one mind, a mind that thinks together, that enquires together, that explores and sees the same thing together, not you see something different and the speaker sees something different, but together see what is actually going on, what is happening and whether it can be transformed, whether it can be brought about, a radical psychological revolution. So it must be, if one may point out and ask if we can, whether it is possible to have one mind, because when you have one mind thinking together we can go very, very far. But if there are different opinions, judgements and distractions then our minds don't meet. What we are trying - what we are actually doing is that we investigate together, not I investigate and you listen, but you and the speaker together investigate into this problem of order, disorder and the whole complex problem of love and the full significance of the meaning of the word 'death'. And if there is time we can also go into the question of what is meditation. Perhaps we can deal with that tomorrow. So please bear in mind, if you will, that we are investigating, therefore we have one mind so that we both of us seriously, precisely, very, very carefully investigate, explore what is order.

In a world that is so utterly disorderly - we mean by that word 'disorder' contradiction, dishonesty, lies, each one pursuing his own pleasure, his own fulfilment, ambition, seeking success for himself, or for his family, or for his nation, or for his particular psychological belief, or as many are doing now, the psychologists and so on, the therapists, they learn from a particular - they follow a particular line and accept it, and for the rest of their life they follow it because their whole investment is involved in it, including cars and swimming pools and all the rest of it. So each one, as you will observe, is pursuing his own particular limited demands, desires and that is creating chaos in the world, whether it is a religious pursuit or the pursuit of a particular guru with all his absurdities, with his traditions, with his disciplines. So there is this vast splitting up of our human endeavour to bring about a world in which we can all live in order, without violence, without this terrible sense of insecurity and danger. So can we together have one mind, not that you agree with the speaker because when you investigate there is no agreement; it's only when you are investigating, exploring, your personal desires, your personal activities, all those are affected then you stop investigating. Then we break away. But if we are both interested, as we must be, living in this insane world, it is quite insane, we must be able to think together, have one mind to find out if we can live in this world with great order, peaceful, without any sense of violence. So that's what we are going to do together.

The speaker is not investigating but you and the speaker together are walking the same path, the same road, you are not going south and the speaker is not going north, we are both of us going together, we must both observe the same thing together. Do you understand this? So please, if you are at all serious and are concerned with the world and one's own life, please give some serious attention to what is being said.

What is order? It is very important to find this out. The army with their extraordinary discipline has certain order. The priests, the monks, the so-called religious sects with their discipline, if you are practising those, brings about a certain order within their group. And every activity demands its own discipline: if you are a plumber it has its own discipline, if you are a scientist it has its own discipline, if you are an artist it has its own, and so on and so on. And the word `discipline' means to learn, not to conform, not to conform to a pattern set by society, or set by yourself, or set by the pope, or by some religious group or some other person. The word `discipline' means the disciple who learns, who does not merely follow, imitate, conform. But that word `discipline' has become rather an ugly word, specially in this country where you have no sense of discipline, you want to do whatever each one wants to do, from the age of five until you are ready to die.

So order according to various groups and types and characteristics has its own meaning. To find out what is true order, actually in one's life, we must find out not what is order, but what is disorder. Because if one understands the nature of disorder really, from that comprehension, from that insight, from the total holistic view of disorder, then from that arises order. You understand? It is not that one seeks order, then you follow a blue print, then you look to somebody else to tell you what you should do - that is again what is happening in this country, also in the rest of the world, the priests, the scholars, the psychologists, the psychotherapists, all of them tell you what to do. Instinctively you say, 'They know better than I do' and you follow and thereby bring about what you consider order. Whereas that acceptance of authority, acceptance of a certain type of psychology and so on and so on, is bringing about disorder. The very following of another is disorder. Whereas if we can enquire together seriously, find out what is the nature and the structure of disorder, not in the world but in us, because we have created the world, we have created society, there is no such thing as the society independent of us, we are responsible for it, we have created it - 'we' in the sense all human beings with their many, many ancestors and so on, generation after generation, we have created this society. And in this society, if one observes very carefully, there is not only immorality in the sense of doing exactly what each one wants to do; most people are pursuing pleasure, hooked on pleasure.

So we must enquire into what is disorder. From the negating of disorder you come to the positive which is order, not the other way round. Is that clear? Am I making this clear? That is, we want rules and regulations, a set pattern, or we rebel against that set pattern and create our own pattern. And if everyone creates his own pattern, his own way of living naturally there must be disorder, each person must be in opposition to another. So what is disorder? Do you understand? Please understand this. From investigating the nature of disorder, not only verbally, intellectually, but deeply, actually in one's life from enquiring into disorder and bringing about an understanding and therefore from disorder order, then that order is living. I hope you understand this. It is dynamic, it is actual in one's life.

So what is disorder? You are following all this I hope. What is disorder in one's life? May one ask, is your life in perfect order? If you are asked that question seriously by a good friend of yours, what would you answer if you were at all thoughtful, if you are not all concerned with this mad world, what would your answer be? If you were honest one would say, our own lives are in disorder: disorder being contradiction, say one thing and do another, think one thing and conceal what you think in order to conform, imitate, compare, all this brings about disorder, obviously. The very nature of desire is disorder. Are we all following this? We went into the question of what is desire. It is important to come back to that because desire may be the cause of this disorder, which doesn't mean we must suppress desire, we must understand the nature of it, how it is built up, what is its movement. The word 'structure' means movement. So we must understand the nature of desire then we may find in the very root of desire there may be disorder.

So we must again go into that question: what is desire which drives most of us, which is canalized in some form of fulfilment, which is our very nature, drive, the desire - what is desire? We said during the last talks that desire comes into being when there is perception, the seeing, contact, sensation. Right? Then thought comes into that field, into that movement of sensation, with its image, and then begins the urge of desire. I'll show it to you. You see a beautiful car, or a beautiful woman or a man, or a beautiful house, with a lovely shady garden full of perfume, a sense of great beauty and peace. You see it: the seeing, visual, optical, then the very smelling, the very touching, creates the sensation - I hope you are following all this - then thought says, I wish I was living in that house and thought then creates the image of you living in that house and enjoying yourself, having parties, whatever you have, good meals, good dishes, lovely furniture, beautiful curtains, the whole movement of thought enters into the field of sensation, then desire is born from that. You understand? That is, seeing a beautiful lovely architecture, beautifully built, good space and proportion, and lovely garden. The perception, the contact, the sensation. Then thought comes in creating the image, you in the house, and then desire to have that house. You have understood this? This is very simple. We must understand this because the monks throughout the world have denied desire, they have suppressed it, desire for a woman, desire for man, they say if you come to serve god you must give all your energy to god - and you know all the things they have said, rather absurd, unrealistic, because when you do accept that then you burn with your desires inside. Outwardly you may be very peaceful, quiet, but inside you are boiling. The speaker knows many monks throughout the world and they have talked.

So it is very important to find out whether desire is not the root of this disorder, which doesn't mean that one suppresses desire, but if one understands the relationship between sensation and the activity of thought capturing that sensation then one can have the sensation but not let thought create the desire. I wonder if you follow this? One can see the house, well kept, clean, very dignified proportioned house. The seeing-please listen - the seeing, contact, sensation, and not let thought come into it. One can see a beautiful garden, that's the end of it; but the moment thought comes in and says, I must have it, then desire begins. If one sees the truth of that, the inward nature of that, then perhaps that is the beginning of order. Are we following each other? You may not be able to do this because we never observe very carefully, slowly, precisely the movement of this whole structure of desire. You see it and you want it instantly, there is no interval between the seeing, contact, sensation, an interval between thought. You follow? So that in the holistic observation then desire has its minute place. You understand? One needs food and clothes and shelter, that is essential. Right? You are following all this? But we are saying when the contradictory desires - desire for pleasure, desire for your particular experience, desire for god, desire for various gods, and various beliefs and so on, that is the very nature of contradiction. Are you following? That is, if we both of us have one mind, if we both of us see the actual fact that we are driven by desire, each one of us, whether the desire for pleasure, desire for success, desire for various forms of fulfilment, which are all born out of desire, then if you see actually how desire comes into being then you are concerned then with the movement of thought. You understand this? Are we following this together? Yes, or no?

Then we are saying that thought also may be one of the factors that contributes to disorder. We are saying something so totally contradictory to everything you have heard, so please give your mind to this. We are saying, thought, the whole thinking process, may be the cause of disorder. I am going to go into it. We pointed out how desire may be one of the factors of disorder because contradictory desires in our life, opposing desires, one desire fighting another desire, struggling, you know all that, and also we are saying thought may be in itself the cause of great disorder. We are going to go into it, don't accept what the speaker is saying, we are investigating together. That is we have one mind to investigate, not saying, you are wrong, you are right, but together we are having one mind, investigating, looking into this nature and the structure of thinking.

Thought arises only out of memory. If you had no memory there is no thought. Memory is the residue of experience which has knowledge. Right? Knowledge, accumulated knowledge of the plumber, the accumulated knowledge of the scientist, the accumulated knowledge of the various forms of disciplines and scholars, and also one's own accumulated knowledge of various experiences, so we are the result of the collective experience, knowledge and added to that our own particular knowledge. So knowledge is that which has been accumulated through various skills, through various disciplines, through various studies and so on and so on. So this knowledge is stored up in the brain, obviously. And with that knowledge we act, we think, we operate. So all our activities, all our architecture, everything that we have done is based on thought. Right? Please this is very important because we are going to enquire after we have done this, what is the nature of love. Please together find out, give some time and your energy and your earnestness to go into this because it affects one's life seriously if you go into it, and therefore it may bring an extraordinary sense of order, and therefore where there is order there is freedom, where there is order there is peace. It is only the disordered man that has no peace. The man who is neurotic, who thinks this, or who is selfish, utterly concerned with himself, he is not living in order.

So we are saying that one of the factors of this disorder may be desire, and the other factor may be the very movement of thought because thought, as we pointed out, is born out of knowledge. The primitive man has knowledge, it may be very, very limited, and the most sophisticated person has also a great deal of knowledge and his memory is still born out of knowledge, whether a little knowledge or great knowledge it is still born out of knowledge therefore out of the past. Please follow this. Out of the past, therefore thought is limited, therefore its actions are limited. It may imagine that its actions are complete, whole, but it is actually limited because it is based on knowledge, and knowledge is never complete, whole. Of course not, you see that, right? Therefore all our activities which are based on thought and therefore limited, incomplete, partial, must create disorder. You understand? Must inevitably. I must be quiet, I am putting too much energy into all this.

So if you see the truth of this then one comes to ask: what place has thought? If thought is limited and therefore creates disorder, anything that is limited must create disorder. Right? If I am a limited Hindu, with my beliefs, with my dogmas, with my little rituals, with my little gods, I must create disorder round me. But I may have a great deal of knowledge about architecture and the way to build but that knowledge is not limited. You understand, I use it to build. But when I use psychological knowledge - I don't know if you are following all this - then it is inevitably limited. You understand this? I wonder if you do. I am afraid you don't.

Let's go into it. An excellent architect has a great deal of knowledge, he has acquired it, he has built many houses, cathedrals, halls and so on, that knowledge has been accumulated, he has read, he has worked at it, he has had experiences of various types of houses, halls, and so on. So with that knowledge he builds houses, there knowledge is necessary, obviously. But psychological knowledge, you follow, the knowledge that I want this, that I have experienced this, I believe this, this is my opinion, all that, the psychological residue of one's experiences, and the experiences of mankind stored up in the brain, from that there is thought and that thought is always ever limited, and any action born from that must inevitably be limited and therefore not harmonious, contradictory, divisive, conflicting and so on. Right?

So thought itself may be the root of disorder, psychologically. You understand the beauty of it, the fun of it, and also the logic of it, if you are willing? So then one asks: has thought any place in relationship? You understand? Relationship being intimacy with another, or superficial, be in contact with another physically, emotionally, intellectually. Right? Is our relationship with each other based on thought? We are asking this question, we are together exploring this, with the same mind to find out. If our relationship is based on thought, which is on remembrance, then our relationship must be limited. Obviously. Therefore in that limitation there is contradiction, you and I, me and you, my opinion, my ambition, you are not treating me - you follow - my sexual demands, and you opposing and so on. So we are asking - please, this is serious because we are going to enquire, what is the nature of love. You understand? Because if you don't understand this basic thing, which is, desire, thought, then order - the very essence of love is order. We will go into it in a minute. Why am I putting so much energy into all this?

So if thought being limited creates disorder, as desire does, then what place has thought in our relationship, not in walking, talking, driving a car, building a house, earning money, shelter, clothes, but in our relationship, man, woman, what place has thought? Please enquire, go into with me, together, don't wait for me to tell you. If thought is the ruling factor in our relationship then thought being limited, our relationship must be very, very limited and therefore contradictory, opposing, destructive. So is our relationship based on thought, on remembrance? Of course it is, if you are honest. So then one asks: is love merely a remembrance? A sexual remembrance? Is love the remembrance of a pleasure? For god's sake please pay attention to all this, it's your life. When here, in this country, one uses the word `love' it is so meaningless.

So I am asking - we are asking together because we are having the same mind to find out, because this may bring about order in our lives, then one may be able to live with an extraordinary sense of happiness - happiness is not pleasure, it is order, therefore with order comes freedom, and with order, freedom there is responsibility. So we are asking: is love a remembrance, is love desire, is love pleasure? Is love attachment? Please, sir, ask. And if it is a remembrance in which there is attachment, then there is anxiety, conflict, jealousy, anger, hatred. Right? And all this you call love. Right?

So love may be - the word `love', the word isn't the actual; the word `tree' is not the tree. You understand? So the word `love' is not the actual reality of it, which is, a relationship which is not based on remembrance. Is that possible? You may have a relationship with another, apparently in this country, for a couple of years, or three years, and drop it and have another relationship. You know, this extraordinary change of wives and husbands, or girls and boys. So I am asking, we are asking together: is love merely a fulfilment of desire? You understand? Desire we explained very carefully. Is love the pursuit of pleasure? Which is what you all want. And if it is based on remembrance then there is a contradiction, it is limited, therefore it is disastrous in our relationship and therefore we will create a society which is utterly destructive. You see, sir. So we are saying love is not desire, love is not the pursuit of pleasure, love is not a remembrance, it is something entirely, totally different. That sense of love, which is one of the factors of compassion, comes only when you begin to understand the whole movement of desire, the whole movement of thought. Then out of that depth of understanding, feeling, a totally different thing called love comes into being. It may not be the thing which we call love, it is totally a different dimension.

What time is it, sirs?

Q: Twenty five minutes after twelve.

K: We have talked for one hour. I am sorry, there is so much to talk about. You are not tired?

We were also talking the other day of the nature of suffering, grief, pain. What is the relationship of love to sorrow? You understand? How can a man who is suffering for himself, for his wife, for his family, psychologically suffering, going through agony, how can he have love? It's only when sorrow ends there can be the beginning of love. You don't understand all this. And we went into the question of sorrow, we won't go into it now because we want to deal with something else, which is death. You understand, this morning we were talking about desire, order and disorder, disorder may be - is one of the factors of desire, and thought, and what we call love. You understand? What we generally, commonly, use that word love. So these three factors may be the cause of our deep disorder. In the understanding of that, seeing the truth of this, then out of that comes love and compassion. And that compassion can only come into being when there is no sorrow.

Then we must go into the question of what is death. Are you all tired? What is death? I wonder why we human beings are so interested in death. You understand? Or are you not interested in death? Only old people are interested in death? And one must go into this very carefully, not only to find out whether human beings can be free from the fear of death, but what is implied deeply in ending, which is death, ending. Right? Have you ever ended anything, without motive, without coercion, without pressure, without giving up something in order to have something else? You understand? Ending. Have you ever ended a particular form of pleasure without any motive, without any suggestion, demands?

Just take for instance, attachment - attachment to a friend, to a family, to an idea, to a belief, to something or other. Can you end attachment completely? That is what death is, part of it. Right? Do you understand all this? Are you following? Can you end it without arguing? You can't argue with death? Doctors may prolong your life, I don't know why but they want to prolong it, they want to help you to live longer. You have never asked, what for. So we must first find out, not what is death, but what is before death. Right? You understand? What is before, not after, or during, because what is before is more important than what is after. Right? I wonder if you see? Can we go on with this together?

So what is your life? Actually? If you look into it very carefully, if you have ever done, what is your life? Not the American way of life, but your daily life of a human being living in this part of the world, what is that life? Is it not one of travail, labour, struggle, conflict, anxiety, fear, guilt, holding on to your own little experience, to your own little knowledge, and exploiting that knowledge for your own selfishness? The sense of frustration, unhappiness, great sense of guilt, anxiety, and so on, isn't that your daily life? To escape from that you go to analysts, psychologists, therapists, or gurus, or take drugs and whisky, you know, escape, escape from this. Or you have a little experience and go round preaching. You become a little guru. You might well say, 'That's what you are doing' - you must have a sense of humour, that is, one must have the capacity to laugh at oneself occasionally, or very often! So when one observes what actually is going on with one's life, look at it, how full of shadows, light and misery, confusion, uncertainty, tears, you know this, and what is it that we are ending?

You understand?

And there are those who say, 'This is merely a peripheral existence, deep down in oneself there is divinity, there is the essence of all mankind which is far beyond this petty consciousness.' I do not know if you know all these various explanations, which I am not going to go into. So we are asking, is this what we are afraid of ending? You understand my question, sirs? And if one doesn't end this - please follow this carefully, slowly, I am going into the whole thing very carefully - if one doesn't end all this pettiness, shallowness, meaningless life both outwardly and inwardly, if one doesn't understand it, resolve all the things one is caught up in psychologically, then what is death? You follow? Sir, this is a complex problem let me go into it a little bit carefully.

We are not talking of beliefs, comforts, we are not doing anything of that kind, we are observing very closely, we are not offering comforts because that leads to illusion, that's meaningless. Every religion has given comfort to human minds and therefore they have not penetrated deeply into this problem.

So there is this collective human river of confusion and sorrow. And when you have not ended it, your own sorrow and all the rest of it, you are part of that stream. When there is an ending of all that, the consciousness that we know of as it is - you are following this - the consciousness is its content. Right? Are you following this? One's consciousness is your anxiety, your grumbling, your guilt, your - all this is you, your consciousness. The content of that consciousness makes it; without this content the consciousness as we know it is totally different. You understand? Not being able to empty our consciousness of its content we then begin to invent a super consciousness, higher consciousness, subliminal consciousness and so on and so on. It is still the movement of thought. So we are saying that as long as human beings don't end their confusion, and go into it and resolve it and end it, that is, if you are attached to your pain, anxiety and so on, the fear of losing and so on, psychologically, if you don't end it you contribute to that stream. And when you do die - not you, please - when one dies that's the ending of not only your organism and the brain with all its content, the stream goes on because you are part of that stream. You are following all this? You are part of that stream, therefore that stream manifests itself in the baby, in the man, in the adolescent with varieties of names and characteristics - you are following all this? I wonder if you are. Careful, please. You must apply your mind to this. So that stream is enduring, and in that stream there is manifestation. When you have a baby that's manifestation. And in that baby as it grows older all the human collected misery, confusion, begins. Obviously, you can see it in each one, through education, conformity, society, all that. So we are asking, can you, as a human being, be aware of the stream, of which you are, and not contribute one iota to that stream? You understand the question? If you contribute you are part of it, if you don't contribute, not one single movement of-you follow - your problems, sorrows, anxieties, loneliness, none of that, that means you are out of that stream. Then death is merely the ending of the varieties and the peripheral activities. You understand all this?

So can a mind, realizing all this, seeing the depth of this, seeing the implications of death, the ending, and while living, which is the period of time from adolescent, from baby to adulthood, during that given life end every day as the problem arises. You follow? Psychologically end everything every day. Because it is very important. As we grow older our brains get worn out. Obviously, you can see it. Right? Haven't you noticed in yourself as you get older your capacity to think clearly, to be aware, to attend, the sharpness has gone. So one of the problems, if you go into it, is, is it possible to keep the brain young? You understand? Not get old, worn out. Are you following all this? Ask yourself: is it possible for a brain not to get damaged, first - through drink, alcohol, you know, smoking, you know all that is going on with your lives, not to have friction, because that's wears it out. To resolve a psychological problem immediately, not to let it go over to the next day. You are following all this? So that this constant movement of a psychological problem, or even mathematical or any other problem, this constant usage wears the brain out. We won't go into the question of what the brain is, because it is very interesting. I am not a great specialist or I am not a brain specialist, I have talked with them, enquired a great deal into myself and also talked to others who are specialists. So we are asking, can the brain from the moment it is born until it dies be totally fresh, young, undamaged, unhurt? And it is possible only when every issue is resolved instantly. You understand this? Every issue: your sexual problems, your anxiety, your guilt, your inhibitions, your this and that, end it, not go to a specialist to make you end it, they don't end it because they themselves are blind. Right? It is like a confused person helping others to be unconfused. It's a lovely game you are all playing! So we are saying something, which is, death and living are very close, they are not fifty years ahead, but together. You understand? Live with death, that is the ending of everything that you hold psychologically dear, or every problem that you have, psychologically. Then you will see your brain and your mind - no, sorry - your mind has a totally different quality, there is a totally different dimension, which is the dimension of truth, it is not your personal truth, but it is absolute truth. Which we will go into when we talk about meditation. I think that's enough, don't you.

OJAI 6TH PUBLIC TALK 22ND APRIL 1979

This is the last talk.

We have been talking over together during the last five gatherings here, apart from the discussions, whether it is at all possible to bring about a good society. That has been our chief concern in our talks, whether the human mind which is very old, which is so heavily conditioned, whether it is possible for it to radically undergo a transformation, a change, a mutation. Because the society in which we live is so frighteningly destructive, it is becoming degenerate, if one is at all mature one wonders if one is at all serious, and one must be serious under the present psychological crisis, whether it is possible to be a totally good human being. Because a good human being creates a good society; society isn't created by itself, it comes into being through the activities of the human mind. And we have been talking over together during the last three weekends - and this is the last one - about many things which affect our daily life: fear, pleasure, and anxiety, loneliness and a sense of great depression, sorrow, which we all know. And yesterday morning we talked about order, love, compassion, and the very complex problem of death. And we said this morning that we would go into the question of what is truth, if there is anything that is absolute truth, and what is the nature and the movement of meditation.

We are apt to think that meditation is something apart from our daily life - give twenty minutes during the day to sit quietly, or whatever one does, and the rest of the day do all the mischief you can. But meditation, I think, is something entirely different which we shall go into presently. But one cannot fully comprehend the deep significance of meditation unless one has within oneself complete absolute order, in our relationship, in our activity. We went yesterday morning into the question of what is order, and what bring about disorder. When there is the ending of disorder then there is naturally the flowering of order. We said that there are two major causes of disorder: desire, which we went into very carefully not only yesterday morning but the previous mornings, and also the very structure, the nature of thought, we also went into that. And without this order, which has its quality in its expansiveness, it is not an order within a certain area, order throughout our whole life in all our activities. And order is not only personal, but also it becomes social, and out of that order comes goodness. Therefore such human beings who are capable, aware of the present world misery, confusion, uncertainty, insecurity, such serious human beings must inevitably enquire into this order which must not be merely relative, circumstantial, environmental, but absolute order. There is such a thing as absolute order, like the universe. There is order. And if our consciousness is in disorder, which it is at present, however much one may investigate the order of the universe we have very little relationship with that universe. Are you following all this?

If I may again point out that we are thinking together, that one is not listening merely to a speaker, but together with the speaker we are exploring into the nature of order, which we did yesterday morning, and the futility of enquiring into the universal order, cosmic order, it merely becomes theoretical, telescopic and not actual. But if one has this absolute order in one's life then one has a relationship with the cosmic order. One can see that logically. But most of us, though we may intellectually comprehend the meaning of the word, the clarity of the statement, but to bring about such order in our lives seems almost impossible because we are not concerned with the mutation of our consciousness, of our minds.

So this morning we are going to enquire together the question of time, space, and whether there is anything which thought has not touched upon. Time, space and whether there is a state of mind, a state of consciousness other than this which is not put together by thought. We will go into that, I'll explain as we go along.

Because meditation is not merely repeating a certain formula, taking a certain posture, breathing properly, or repeating for twenty minutes in the morning, or afternoon and evening a mantra. You have heard that word, haven't you? Do you know what that word means in Sanskrit? Probably you do not. It means actually, ponder or meditate upon not becoming, and put away altogether self-centred activity. That's the meaning of that word, 'mantra'. But the racketeers have used that word to capture the gullible mind of this country and also in India, and it is taking place in Europe too, unfortunately. Those people have made a lot of money out of it, and that is now going out of fashion. They will introduce something else and you will follow that too because we do not understand, I think, the fundamental nature of meditation. Without laying the foundation of right relationship between human beings mere meditation, or contemplation, or handing yourself over to some idea, or ideal, or some projected image as god and so on, only leads to various forms of illusion - which is obvious. So it behoves us if we would meditate seriously we must lay down in our lives a foundation that is not broken down or shaken but a foundation that is lasting, enduring. The foundation is right relationship between human beings. That's clear. If that is not established then you might sit everlastingly in a certain posture and think you are meditating but you are merely pursuing an illusion, or your own desirous projections and so on. But that is obviously a childish game.

So if you would understand what is meditation, and the depth of it, and the seriousness of it, one must establish naturally the order of right relationship. That's natural, isn't it. And we went into that question of what is right relationship. We said as our present relationship is based on pleasure, sexual, a relationship of comfort, dependency, attachment, born out of this great sense of loneliness, and without grasping the full meaning of this loneliness we escape from it through various forms and thereby bring about a relationship in which there is always division, contradiction, jealousy, anxiety, inhibitions and the desire to run away from what we have. This again is obvious, what is going on. So unless a human being, you, establish this order in relationship, right order, do what you will, stand on your head, or retire into a monastery, meditation has no meaning whatsoever because you must have solidity, there must be firmness, there must be a sense of endurance in a relationship.

If that is clearly grasped, and you see the truth of it, then we can go into this question of all the various forms of meditation: the Tibetan, the Hindu, the Buddhist, the - what are the other forms - all the latest gurus with their little gadgets of meditation. I think one can brush those aside because they have very little meaning. A man gets up and says, 'I have a certain experience, I'll tell you about it', you get excited, he gives you a formula and you practise this. And the very practice of it makes your mind more mechanical than it is, more narrow, more sectarian, more limited. We can brush aside all such forms of meditation, because they lead nowhere, because they are not based fundamentally on right relationship between human beings in which there is no jealousy, anxiety, fear and the desire which becomes pleasure.

And also we can brush aside the whole occult phenomena that is going on in this world, the search for it. You know about it, don't you? That is, having certain powers, in Sanskrit it's called siddhis, capable of reading other people's thoughts, seeing through various - you know all that stuff. Because the speaker has been involved in all that, he knows something about all that. But a man who is very, very sensitive, a human being who is sensitive, not self-centred, egotistic, has certain quality of sensitivity, and that sensitivity can apprehend, can see, can read, can do certain forms of healing and so on, but they are all irrelevant and dangerous because they emphasize and give importance to the self. Right? I wonder if you understand all this. One may be able to read other people's thoughts, and what of it? One may be able to see beyond the material, that is, thought forms, various kinds of - you know all that - I won't go into all that, it is not important - but such human beings, though they have gone into this fairly seriously, do not radically change society, they are not necessarily good people, they are really pursuing a form of materialism. I mean by 'materialism' the cultivation of the process of thought because thought is a material process. I don't know if you are following this. We are investigating together, you are not listening to me, the speaker, the speaker is not important. And the speaker really means this. The speaker as a person is totally irrelevant. What is important is that you and the speaker investigate together, think together, have one mind together, then if we have one mind we can act together. We can bring about a different society together. So the speaker is totally irrelevant.

So having put aside all these trivialities - they are trivial - then we can proceed to enquire into the nature of time, because to us time is very important. Time by the watch, time as yesterday, today and tomorrow, time as achieving a result, acquiring a technique, learning a language, going from here to there physically needs time. Right? That is chronological time on which we must depend, it is necessary, otherwise you and I wouldn't be sitting here. And we have cultivated also psychological time; that is, one is this, one needs time to become that; one has not knowledge and you require time to have information, to gather information; one is angry, lonely, anxious, to get over that we think psychological time is necessary. You are following this? That is, one is ignorant of oneself, the very movement of the egotistic, central movement and being ignorant of all that, self-knowing, one thinks one requires time to understand oneself. So there is the actual need of time to learn a language, to learn how to drive a car, to learn any skill, you must have time, days, years. If you want to be a first-class physicist you devote your time to it, days, years. But we are asking: is there psychological time at all? You understand? Please this is very important to understand if you want to go into things seriously; if you don't it's all right too. If you want to go into this question whether this idea that one needs time to evolve, evolution is based on time, evolution of the acorn into an oak tree needs time, it will take many years. And perhaps that same concept, concept made out of a fact, an acorn needs time to become a full grown tree, that concept, the fact made into a concept, then psychologically one accepts that fact, then says, 'I must have time to understand, to change, to become'. You are following all this? Are we meeting each other? We are moving together, are we? I hope so.

Now we are questioning, asking together whether there is psychological time at all. Or it is an illusion which has become almost a reality for all of us. You understand? Are we together in this? That is, our idea of hope is based on that. That is, I am hoping - one is hoping to arrive, to be happy, to have enlightenment, to be good, in the future, and so one has thought time is necessary. Right? You are following this? So we are questioning that very thing. And if one has the courage, in the sense real serious enquiry into it, it may be merely a projection of thought which has realized that to learn a skill you need time, and so thought says, perhaps it is the same process psychologically. You are following? Are we together? But it may be totally unreal. I am going to go into it.

That is, to be aware of 'what is' in oneself. Right? One may be conscious that one is envious, or violent, and to change, to bring about a change in that violence you need time. Is that so? You are following this? Please, are you? Is there somebody to whom I can talk and they can tell me they understand? One is violent, which is a psychological urge from various forms of inhibitions, frustrations and also the observation of a rotten society desirous of changing, changing through blood, which is obviously impossible and cruel.

And so being violent one says, one needs time, is time necessary? You follow? We are pointing out when one is violent can you observe that violence without the idea of changing it to something else? You understand? That is, to observe actually `what is' without any movement of change, resistance, denial, acceptance, just to observe `what is', that doesn't need time. But the moment you want to change it to something else that requires time. Whereas if you observe closely without any movement away from it, the very observation of `what is' undergoes a radical change, which denies time altogether. I wonder if I am conveying this. Have we understood, some of you?

That is - I will put it in another example and perhaps you will see it. We compare ourselves with somebody else; that has been our tradition, our education, our conditioning, this comparative observation, comparative effort. Comparison implies measurement. Right? The more, or the less. Now can you see the consequences of comparison, logically, which is, you are comparing yourself with somebody, therefore you are not important, somebody else is important, so you are always imitating that and therefore there is frustration, anxiety, jealousy and so on. Now can you observe comparison, the whole movement of comparison, and end it instantly, not let it carry on. The carrying on of comparison needs time, implies time. Right? Are you seeing this? I wonder, you don't. Right, let me take another example, which is, human beings right throughout the world are attached, dependent, attached to another human being, the consequences of that attachment are misery, anxiety, jealousy, hatred, anger and division. Now to be free of these consequences, which are dangerous in human relationship, to see the total implication of attachment and to not allow time for the mind to say 'I will get over it'. But the very observation of that attachment, which is 'what is', without any movement away from it, then 'what is' undergoes a deep change. You observe it. Because when you observe 'what is' you are giving your whole attention. Right? Are you doing it now? You are giving your whole attention, and that very attention is light, and that light dissipates what is being observed. Have you understood this?

Sir, you see we are enquiring into the nature of attention. I will put it that way. Because that is part of meditation. We are enquiring into the nature of attention. And to attend now, attend to 'what is'. Right? The 'what is' is your problem. Right? Emotional, sexual, intellectual, mathematical, whatever the problem is. To attend to it totally, and not allow the problem to go on until the next day, which is time. You follow? I wonder if you see this. So when you attend completely to the problem, psychological problem, completely, then you will see that all that energy which has been dissipated by time, which is, I must get over it, I must suppress it, I must run away from it and so on and so on, all that energy is now concentrated in that attention. And when you attend - when there is this energy totally in attention, then that which is being observed explodes, it reveals all its contents and therefore dissipates. I can't put it any more.

Are you doing it as we are talking, or is just it an idea? Because this is your problem. We are saying psychologically there is no time at all. Which is a tremendous discovery. You understand? Because to us tomorrow is all important, sexually, the desire, the desire that you must be a success tomorrow. You follow?

Tomorrow becomes fascinating, important, all consuming. And so psychologically we are saying there is no time at all. Can you face that? We were discussing this with some friends some time ago, last year, and the person said to me, 'My god, if there is no tomorrow how am I going to meet my husband?' Which is - watch the whole phenomenon, you understand. Do you understand? Need I explain that statement? Physically, psychologically if there is no tomorrow what am I. You understand?

So we are saying that time is necessary at a certain level, and at the psychological dimension there is no time at all. Time is necessary to learn a skill and there is no time at all when you observe 'what is', that is what is going on, happening in yourself. And to attend to that completely is to dissipate 'what is', that needs no time. This is a little more complex because time is movement. Right? Time, going from here to your house needs time, ten minutes, an hour, two hours, time. And also we think we need time to become happy. We are saying there is no such thing as time. Time as movement must end psychologically. That's part of meditation.

And also time involves registration. I'll explain this. Our brains are registering all the time, aren't they? You have an incident, a happening, and the brain registers what is happening. Right? Can we go on with this? You are following this? Like a computer you programme it and it will tell you what you have told it and you can switch it off any time you want; but our brains are not quite like that. It registers and you can't turn it off because the whole mechanism is to keep on registering, which is to remember, to register that which has happened, pain, pleasure, an incident which is exciting and so on and so on. As long as the brain is registering that implies time, doesn't it. You are following this? Now we are asking, please, whether it is possible to register only what is necessary and not register anything else. You understand? Are you following all this? We are enquiring together, please. Say for example, someone psychologically hurts you. You know that, most people do. So that hurt is registered in the brain. Thought has created the image of you being important and then one says something derogatory to that image, that image gets hurt. That hurt is registered. You are following? Like a person whom I know, has held for sixty years he has held a particular hurt, like most of you do. It may not be sixty years, it may be ten days, it is the same thing. Now not to register that hurt at all. You understand? First the question, that is, your being hurt by an incident, by a statement, somebody calling you not a nice person, or this or that, and the image which you have created about yourself gets hurt, that hurt is part of the brain, part of the thought which says, 'I am hurt'. Right? So there is this registration of an incident in time in the brain. Got it?

Now we are asking: is it possible not to register that hurt at all. But one needs to register how to drive a car. You understand? To learn a language, but why should there be registration of your hurt? You follow? Is it possible not to register the hurt at all, any more than you would register flattery? Right, you are following this? Is that possible? Because if it is not possible then the brain is merely a constant mechanism which is registering all the time, and therefore it has no tranquillity, which has no sense of elasticity, then it becomes merely mechanical. The brain is partly mechanical but psychologically the brain must be free of this registration of hurts, of flattery, of this or that. Now we are asking is that possible? You understand? See the consequences of being hurt psychologically. You have been hurt, you resist further hurts, you are afraid of being more hurt so you build a wall round yourself, isolate yourself, and from that isolation act which brings more hurts, more anxiety, so you become more and more and more withdrawing from the world, from my relationship. You know all this. Until you become a neurotic and then you go to a psychologist and he hopes he will cure you; probably he is also hurt. So the blind leading the blind! Whereas we are asking: is it possible not to registers that hurt at all? See the importance. So that the brain is free to have its own rhythm, not the rhythm of the hurt, the memory. You follow? You don't know all this.

We are saying, it is possible. Because we are investigating, and I am showing it to you, it is possible. Because one has been flattered up to the skies, or one has been insulted, the speaker has had both. So not to register either, which means not to have an image about yourself. You understand this? Right? Now to be free of that image one says, 'I must have time'. Whereas if you see the fact that you have the image, and the consequences of that image, and the result of that image, when you see the whole of that, give your whole attention to that, it dissipates. You understand? Do it and you will discover for yourself psychologically the brain need not register but only register what is physically necessary. Right? So that the brain - I mustn't go into this - so that the brain is not under constant pressure of the past. You know they are saying now the brain has the left side of the brain and the right side of the brain, they have divided the brain, the left side, the right side. I have been told this, I am not an expert, I don't read these things. And one side has skill, memory and on the other side appreciates music and all that. Again division. Whereas we are saying the brain, when it is not recording, lives as a whole, has its own extraordinary rhythm. That you will explore and find out.

So that's one thing. Then we must enquire also into what is space, because it is important to find out what is space. For us space is from the centre to the periphery. Right? You understand? Am I using the English language all right, we are understanding each other? You have a centre, which is you, your ego, your conclusion, your belief, the centre, and from that centre to the periphery there is space, which thought has created. Right? And we live in that, that's our life. And so that space is very limited. Right? As long as there is a border, a frontier, there must be space and therefore always limited. You are following this? Please follow this a little bit, this is important because it is part of meditation, what we are doing is part of meditation. The speaker is not going to say at the end 'meditation', this is part of mediation because we said right relationship, time and now we are enquiring into time which is part of registration, the capacity of the brain to be free from the psychological pressure of time. And therefore, still talking of the brain, most of us have dreams. Right? Why? The experts say you must dream, but why do we dream, what are dreams, apart from what the specialists talk about dreams, and the psychologist's interpretation of dreams and so on, you and I, the speaker and you are laymen, not specialists, thank god, and we can then enquire without any commitment into what are dreams, why do we dream.

Because this constant activity of the brain must be very, very destructive to the brain. It must have some quiet, it must have its own rhythm, its own way of action, but if there is constant dream activity during the day and during the night the brain has now rest at all. You are following? So is it possible not to dream at all? I am asking the question please explore it. Apart from the rhythm of the brain itself, which it has, and I am sure the experts would agree to that too, but we are asking, apart from that why do we have to have dreams at all? Is it possible not to have this constant movement? Right? Constant activity during the day, during the night, the brain has no rest. So we are saying it is perhaps possible. Which is, if one is aware, attentive during the day, that is, attentive to the problems and the ending of the problems as they arise every day, then when you go to sleep the problems which have not been solved the brain tries to solve them, and when you wake up you find your problems have been either solved or are going to be solved. You understand? Are you following all this?

So we are saying, solve every psychological problem, and perhaps other problems as they arise, and end it, and not take it over, not allow the brain taking it over while you are asleep. So the brain is free, so that it can become young, fresh, you understand, active in a different sense. So we are enquiring into space. Because one must have space. When you are crowded in a city, as most people are, living in a small flat, having not enough physical space, part of our violence is that. And if there is no space in our mind, in our heart, space, then being crowded with so many other factors, then from that lack of space you have violence, psychologically. Lack of space brings about various forms of inhibitions and anxieties and so on. So it is important to find out if we can have space without the centre. You understand my point? Am I talking to myself? Look: isn't your mind occupied all the time with something or other? Yes? See the tragedy of it. If you are a housewife you are occupied, a businessman occupied, a physicist occupied, personal problems, political problems, it constantly has no space but occupied. You understand? Now can the mind not be occupied? And that is only possible when you end the problems. Most people are occupied because if they are not occupied what will they do. Either they want to be entertained, or they see themselves being so hopelessly lost and they get depressed, or they say, 'Well, as I am not occupied I will go and gossip with somebody' - you follow - this constant occupation with something or other. Are you aware of this fact? Therefore when a mind which is your consciousness, is occupied there is no space and therefore it is only in space something new can come into being. You understand? And that space cannot be created by thought. But seeing the truth that occupation denies space, and being occupied implies constant mechanical movement which is very destructive to the whole human nature and the brain, seeing the truth of it you will end it. So you are not occupied except when it is necessary, otherwise space. You understand? I don't think you do. Because then in that space you have enormous sense of energy. That energy is not the energy of self-centred activity. Right? So now we have gone into this question, relationship, time, not registering and space. The next question is: why has man, human beings, always talked about religion? You know I must tell you something: two friends were walking one day in a nice street, and one of them sees something, picks it up from the pavement. And the moment he looks at it his face lights up, he is delighted, something extraordinary takes place in his eyes, and puts it in his pocket. And his friend says to him, 'What did you pick up? And why did your face become so marvellously beautiful?' And the friend says, 'Ah, that was truth I picked up and put it in my pocket. I am going to keep it, it is a marvellous thing.' And the friend says, 'Let us organize it'. That's what religions have become. Right? And therefore religions have become an anathema to most intelligent people. But beyond that word, beyond all the ritualism, and all the crosses and all the circus that goes in religions, is there anything untouched by thought - thought being a material process - is there anything which is timeless, is there anything which is absolute truth, something which is wholly sacred? You understand? Human beings have sought this at all times, they want to enquire, they want to find out but they get trapped into something or other - into Catholicism, into Protestantism, into Buddhism, into some 'ism', and then they are lost. But if one puts aside all that and one begins to enquire if there is, or if there is not, to find out one must have a mind that is absolutely silent. Right? It must be under no pressure, under no motive, without any direction, otherwise you can't explore, otherwise your mind is incapable of discovering something totally timeless - if there is.

So to find out, for that extraordinary thing, if it is, to happen, the mind must be in a state of complete absolute silence. Obviously. Is that possible? Man throughout the ages has tried this, he said, 'You must control thought, you must control all your emotional responses, your desires, control, so as to bring about a mind that is without a sense of struggle, a sense of effort, and perhaps out of that you can have an absolute silence.' You are following all this? Man has tried this, you may not have. This is part of the old tradition that to find out something that is immeasurable all measure, which is the movement of thought, must end.

Now we are asking: can time, thought come to an end, not science fiction time and space, but time as we have explained, which is the movement of thought, can thought come to an end, or must thought keep everlastingly moving, moving? You understand? To find that out you must understand, as we did, went into, the nature of thought, which we did. So can thought, which has built up our world, outward world and also the inward world, thought has been responsible for it, thought is a material process, thought is the result of all the knowledge, etc., stored up in the brain, which is matter, therefore thought is a material process. Anything that thought tries to discover which is beyond itself, thought itself must come to an end. You understand? This is logic. You understand, sir? So can one find out if thought can completely end, except where it is necessary? That is, learning a language, talking, and so on. How will you find out? How will you enquire if there is something beyond all this confusion, misery, sorrow, this travail of humanity, of which one is, find out if there is something that thought has never, never touched? How will you find out? That's part of meditation, not only to have the body absolutely quiet, absolutely, and also to have a mind that is not occupied with anything, with your personal problems, with world problems, because you are the world, the world is not separate from you. So to find that out, if there is or if there is not something beyond all this, that's part of meditation. It is not part of search; if you search, then you are searching with a motive and a desire. And what you will find is what you have already found.

So meditation is the ending of all the content of one's consciousness-anger, jealousy, anxiety. You follow? Which is our consciousness. The freeing of the mind of all its content, then only there is that absolute silence, not brought about by will, by desire, by thought, then only it is possible for something, that which has not been put together by thought, can come into being.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 8TH JULY 1979

I didn't expect so many people. I wonder what we shall talk about!

It seems to me that our self-centred problems and the problems that lie beyond our own personal crises, disturbances and miseries, the world about us is more or less in chaos, in great confusion. I think everybody will admit that without a great deal of trouble, with a great deal of investigation. And nobody apparently sees a solution for this, neither politically, nor religiously, nor economically. That again is an obvious fact. And nobody asks if there is a way out of all this, the trap in which human beings have been caught for millenia, if there is any way out of this mess, confusion, turmoil, terror. Not finding an answer many people resort to the old traditions, join old religions, or form a small community hoping thereby to solve their own particular problems. And if I may suggest, there is a way out of all this, out of our present continuous misery, conflict, strife, various forms of terror and the threatening wars, not only near but far. So to investigate all this and find out if there is a solution, a way out without suppression, without escape, without any kind of illusion. And if you will have the patience, energy and the serious responsibility that is involved we can think together. I hope you are prepared for that - thinking together.

There are two different kinds of thinking: one, thinking about something, about the problem, about a personal issue, or about the world and so on. That is, thinking about something. And is there another kind of thinking which is not about something? Please, carefully - I will go into this widely and deeply if I may.

So we are asking: our minds are accustomed to think about something, about a problem out of our personal desires, fulfilments, sorrow, anxiety and so on, about something. And we are accustomed to that, 'thinking about'. We are asking not about something but thinking itself. If this issue is clear, not about something which will come later on, but thinking together. Please see the difference: thinking together does not mean that you agree or disagree, accept or reject, defend or offend, but together find out if it is possible by thinking together we can act together, not about something - please apply your minds to this a little bit - not about something which we can more or less do. We can agree to act in a certain way, we can put our minds together to investigate a certain problem but we are not going into that for the present. But we are asking: thinking together without any barriers, without any inhibitions, without any prejudice, letting go your personal experiences, your personal urge to fulfil. Which means you and the speaker together be free to think. Is this somewhat clear?

Please this needs a great deal of investigation because we are conditioned to think together about certain ideas, about certain conclusions, philosophical, historical, and so on. Then there are those who agree, and those who disagree. They form two camps, each opposing the other, which is what is happening in the world. The Totalitarian, the so-called Democratic, the Capitalists and the Marxists and so on agreeing and disagreeing, opposing and defending. Whereas we are asking if we could think together freely, you letting go all your experiences, your conclusions, your desires, prejudices and so on, putting them aside so that together we can think. Will you do that? You and the speaker putting aside his beliefs, his opinions and judgements and evaluations, his hopes and so on, and together think, not about something but think. Shall we do it? Which means that being free of our own personal problems, urges, demands, fulfilments and so on, being free to investigate together, not investigate into something but the capacity, the spirit of investigation. Is this somewhat clear? Which requires not only that you listen, not to what is being said but to listen to the quality of a mind that is thinking, not with regard to something but listening to the whole quality of thinking, which requires certain awareness and attention. Right?

Where there is attention there is no centre from which you are attending. I wonder if you are doing it as we are talking. That is, when you attend, in which there is no division, then in that attention thought is not your thought or my thought, it is thinking. Can we proceed along these lines? Are we following each other?

When you give your attention, which means to give all your mind, your heart, your nerves, to completely give attention, do you find that there is a centre from which you are attending? So in that attention there is not you are thinking and the speaker thinking, there is only a quality of total attention - right? Don't look so mystified it is really quite simple!

You see our thinking, ordinary everyday thinking, is with regard to a certain subject, to a certain action, to a certain problem, thinking about something - right? That thinking is from an experience, from a memory, from a knowledge, therefore it is your experience opposed to another's experience. So there is always division - right? Please follow this. You have your opinion and another has his opinion and the two divisive opinions, dividing opinions can never come together. If you believe in something and another believes in something else strongly, then there is wide cleavage. To that way of thinking we are accustomed - right? Now we are asking: that thinking can never be together because it is always either opposing, defending or accepting. Whereas we are saying something entirely different. Thinking together implies that you and the other have let go all their prejudices and all their thinking together because in that thinking together there is no your thinking and my thinking separate, it is together thinking - right? Have you understood this?

Now please this is very serious because it is either you accept it as an intellectual concept, which then becomes your concept and his concept. If you merely accept the verbal explanation and draw from that explanation a conclusion according to your experience, knowledge, prejudices, and the other does the same, there is no coming together. You are following all this? It is important that we come together in our thinking so that there is no barrier between your thinking and my thinking, his or hers. Can we do this together? Because from this we can proceed because your mind then has a totally different quality. It is entirely objective, nothing personal. The self-centred problems with which we are burdened can never be solved unless there is a different quality of thinking or a different quality of perception, a different quality of insight into the problem - right? I wonder if you are following all this?

So our question then is: is it possible that two people, a group of people, undertake this responsibility? That putting aside your anxiety, attachment and so on, and the other meet so that there is never a question of division, opinion opposing opinion, knowledge opposing knowledge, experience contradicting another experience - you are following this? So that our minds are together. The Totalitarian States want this, they are the authority and they lay down what people should think, act and so on. That is what is happening. If you disagree you are shot, sent to a concentration camp, or exiled. We are not saying that at all. On the contrary. Two minds educated, concerned with the world and are committed to find out whether there is a way out of this, out of the trap, out of this terrible mess that man has created for himself and for others. Can we do this together? You understand the question now? Together our minds are equal so the speaker is not telling you what to do and you obey, or disregard, or accept, but our minds are together being free to solve our problems. Right? Can we do this? Will you give up your Zen meditation? Give up your particular guru? Give up your belief, your own experience to which you cling to, your own personal self-interested problems, let go and then meet together.

Do you see what takes place when you do this? Then we can investigate together every problem very simply and clearly and directly and act. That is clarity, to observe, to see without any distortion, to listen completely without making an abstraction of what you are listening to into an idea. Therefore there is only listening, there is only then seeing, not you see and I see differently, there is only seeing together. Right?

You see we have instantly moved away from our own little sphere, from our own backyard, from our own self-concerned innumerable problems. Have you? Please this is serious, we want to talk together, this is really important. Or do you carry the burden of all the troubles, anxieties, griefs and sorrows, and try to listen to another fellow, to what he is talking about? If you do that then you are trying to conform to the pattern set by another, obviously and so there is always division - right?

So we are asking something very serious and as you have taken the trouble to come into this tent, expenditure, energy, petrol and all the rest of it, are we together thinking? Not you think and I think, thinking together. Then we can go into this question of time, thinking together, not your time, or my time. It is very important because we are going to find out if we think together whether there is psychologically tomorrow at all, because that may be either an illusion, or a reality: if there is psychologically tomorrow - tomorrow means many, many, many tomorrows. Either that may be an illusion and so being an illusion we can put that aside and face this question whether there is psychologically a progressive evolutionary movement, which is time. I wonder if you follow all this?

Are you used to my language and therefore you can go to sleep? You might say, "Oh yes I have heard all this before." If you so think then you are not discovering for yourself, you are not thinking together. You have already stopped thinking together and say "I have heard it before." Because we are going very, very deeply into this therefore it is the first time you hear it. The speaker has been talking in this tent for the last nineteen years, next year it will be twenty years. And probably you will all turn up and say, "Oh, lord, he is back again, caught in a rut." We are not caught in a rut. We are free to listen, to observe and that very observation, listening reveals the truth, not the idea about truth. So we are asking a very serious question because all our conditioning, all our education, both religious, personal and worldly is allowing or giving time to achieve something; one needs time to learn a language, one needs time to learn how to drive a car, time is necessary for acquiring skill, technological skill. To be a good carpenter you need time. But we are asking something entirely different. There time is necessary. Psychologically, please bear in mind we are thinking together, not what you think, time is necessary or not, we are investigating together, therefore you are free to look, to question, ask. You cannot enquire, demand, be sceptical if you just say, "I'll hold on to my knowledge, I think time is necessary" and so on - then we don't meet together. We are thinking together about the whole question of psychological evolution. Because man throughout the millenia, has been accustomed, is used, conditioned to think that he will evolve. "I am this today. Give me time to change. I am envious, frightened, burdened with enormous sorrow and I must have time to get over it, to go beyond it." This is what we are used to. So the speaker is saying whether such psychological evolution exists at all. Or it is the invention of thought because it says, "I cannot change today, give me time for god's sake, tomorrow." The everlasting becoming. "I will be successful as an executive, as a first-class engineer, or a first-class carpenter." All this needs skill and you need time. But we are asking: is there psychological evolution at all, the 'me' becoming something? You understand? We are thinking together, not about whether time exists psychologically or not. We are thinking together, therefore there is no opposition - right?

So let us examine the whole conditioning of becoming, together, you understand, don't come to any conclusion. Or if you have conclusions let go and find out. You see the problem. If one's conditioning allows time then you are caught in the whole movement of becoming. That is, I am angry, one is angry, allow time to dissolve that anger. That is one's conditioning, one's habit. And if you cling to that we cannot think together. Therefore it is important to find out if you are clinging to something and at the same time trying to think together - right? If I cling to my belief, to my experience according to that belief, and you likewise, we can never think together, we can never co-operate together, there is no action which is not divisive. You are following? So are we prepared to investigate together - investigate implies looking, observing, thinking, rationally, sanely, patiently, deeply. Is one free to enquire into this question: the me, the self-centred activity, the constant movement, whether you are asleep, awake, walking, talking, it is this constant central activity of me? Has that a tomorrow, a progressive ending of it? Or a progressive continuity of it, a refinement of it? All that demands tomorrow.

Now psychologically, is there a tomorrow? Please this is a very serious question. The speaker put this question to somebody some time ago and the person said, "Oh, lord, I am going to meet my husband tomorrow." You understand? Oh come on, don't be puzzled! All hope, pleasure, you follow, the whole memory of the husband, and if there is no tomorrow what is my husband? Right? Please together. We are free together to enquire into this question. The speaker is not imposing a thing on you. But it is very important to find out if there is a tomorrow. If there is no tomorrow what takes place? We know what takes place when we have allowed multiple tomorrows: postponement, laziness, indolence, gradually achieving something, enlightenment. You understand? Nirvana and all the rest of it. Through many lives progress - do you follow? I wonder if you follow all this? The seriousness of this investigation. If there is no tomorrow psychologically then what happens to the quality of your mind? The mind that is thinking together, what is the quality of the mind - the mind, not your mind, my mind, but the mind - that has seen the whole progressive movement of the 'me' becoming, that has seen what is involved in this self-achieving, self-becoming and what is involved when psychologically there is no tomorrow, no future. Do you understand sirs?

Psychologically then there is a tremendous revolution - right? Is this taking place with you, that is what is important, not the words, not what the speaker is saying, but actually - actual means that which is happening now, the actuality - is the actuality that in investigating together the mind has discovered the truth that there is no tomorrow psychologically? Then what takes place with the quality of one's mind? You understand what I am saying?

All religions, the Christian, the Catholic and all the rest of it, have all said tomorrow is important. Tomorrow in the Christian world, one life. When you die one life only. The Asiatic world says multiple lives. Probably you neither believe or accept either of those two - I don't know. But when you begin to investigate the whole psychological movement the me, the 'X' becoming, becoming - you follow? - what is involved? Gradually you suffer and go on gradually lessening suffering until ultimately you are free, either in this life or in successive lives. The Christians accept this life, one life and the Asiatics accept many, many lives - you follow? That is psychologically one life and psychologically multiple lives. And together you and I have looked at it without any prejudice, without any conclusion, we are observing the fact, how people are caught in this.

And also we are asking: if there is no tomorrow psychologically what has happened to your mind, to your action, to your behaviour, to your responsibility? Do you understand my question? Have you understood the question? What is your conduct if there is no tomorrow? Conduct implying responsibility with regard to another in action. Do you understand sirs? Then what is your relationship to another? Please together we are investigating, don't look at me and say "Please tell me". Because there is no you and I in this thinking, in this observation, in this quality of listening. What is your relationship with another when there is no tomorrow psychologically? Either you despair, because this is a shock to one, do you understand, either you despair or you give up and say "I don't know," and throw it out. But if you are committed to this thinking together and enquiring into the progressive business and ending of today psychologically, then what takes place actually - actually in the sense of that which is happening now in your relationship with another? Relationship being not only physical contact, sex and all the rest of it, but also the psychological relationship of dependence, attachment, comfort, loneliness and all the rest of it, what takes place? Would you tell me? Or is this totally new to you? You are listening for the first time and therefore there is no immediate response - right? And why not? You are following all this? I wonder if you are?

If there is no future, no future, the future to which you are accustomed, we know very well, the picture, the image, the pleasure, desire for success, spiritual and worldly, the priest wanting to become bishop, bishop wanting to become the cardinal, the cardinal becoming the pope, the whole racket of it, and in the world too, then if you see that implies constant strife, constant battle, a ruthless sense of me aggressively pushing, pushing, pushing. And so in that aggressive achievement there is security, hoping to have security. And in relationship also security in another, with all its implications; anxiety, jealousy, displeasure, tears - we know all that very well. But if there are no progressive tomorrows, what is one's relationship to another, intimate or not? Go on sirs, find out.

You see if you have understood the quality of thinking together - thinking together, not about something, but thinking together, you and I - then where does that thinking together lead in my relationship to another? You are following? The other doesn't know anything about all this, suppose. The other is attached and all the rest of it, what is your relationship to the other if there is this quality of thinking, which is absolutely together, which is not divisive? Do you want me to tell you?

Questioner: No sir.

K: Quite right sir. When you said "No sir", then we are together.

Q: Not quite sir.

K: You see that is our difficulty. You want to think together with me, and I can't let go my ambition, my vanity, my prejudice. I can't let go because you say, "Look, let's think together so that we have this quality, this spirit of actual co-operation in thinking".

And I can't because I am attached to my thinking, to my memories, to my experience, to my accumulated knowledge. So it is I who have created the division, not you. You understand? You understand this? Are you doing that? Because if you are thinking, having that spirit, then if there is no tomorrow, what? You are missing the whole thing, come on sirs.

This is exactly what is going on between you and the speaker. The speaker says, "I have no personal problems", which is a fact. "I have no belief", which is fact. "I have no experience." I have had a great many but I don't carry them, they have gone. I am not entrenched in my particular opinion, prejudice, evaluations - right? Which is a fact. I would be a hypocrite if I said something else. So I say let's think together and see the beauty of thinking together. And you say, "How can I let go my knowledge, my experience, I can't, I love them. This is my life." So you create a division in the world - German, national - you follow? Both outwardly and inwardly. And where there is division there must be conflict, that is a law: the Catholic, the Protestant, the Communist, the Totalitarian. So the speaker says, please my friends let's think together. You understand sirs what has happened? When we think together you have lost all your personality. Ah, you don't see it. You follow? You are no longer Mr.Smith and Mr.K. Oh, come on sirs. What time is it sir?

This is the purpose of these talks and dialogues, that we together dissolve all our problems because the self-centred problem is greater than the problems of the world, political, energy, various countries divided, that is nothing compared to this. Because once you have resolved this you are master of the world. You understand? Master. Don't go off into some...!

I think that is enough for this morning, isn't it?

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH JULY 1979

May we continue with what we were talking about on Sunday morning? Would that be all right?

I wonder if you have thought any more about what we were talking of on Sunday morning? Whether you have gone into it deeply by yourselves and have come to a certain point beyond perhaps which you may not be able to go, and if so we could go into it much further. What we were saying on Sunday morning was that we must have the capacity to think together. The capacity comes naturally and inevitably if one sees the importance and the necessity in a corrupting world, that to think together does not imply agreement or disagreement, but putting aside one's own particular point of view, one's own particular prejudice, opinion, judgement and having the capacity thus to think together. Because when we think together there is no division, you are not thinking separately from the speaker. If we are able to think together, the division between you and another comes to an end. There is only thinking, not your way of thinking or another way of thinking, just the capacity to think together. But that is not possible if you don't put aside your own particular conclusions, your own vanity, your own personal demands, otherwise there is no coming together.

The word 'together' means walking together, being together all the time, not you walk ahead and the other walks behind, but walking together means we are both going along the same way, not thinking different things, observing the same thing, not translating what you observe in your own particular inclination or prejudice, but observing together, listening together, walking together.

I wonder if you realize, when that takes place, what happens between two human beings? There is great demand, a great urge in this present permissive society that each one of us must fulfil, sexually, emotionally and so on - the desire to fulfil. And with it goes naturally the whole problem of frustration. Please listen carefully to what I am pointing out. Don't accept or deny what we are talking about but we are thinking together, and I mean thinking together.

When one is seeking fulfilment in another or desiring to be and become and therefore act, which is a form of fulfilment, then in that movement there is frustration, all kinds of neurotic ideas, neurosis and so on and so on. But when we think together, that is, you have dropped your particular opinion, judgement and so on, and the other has also dropped his, there is no division and therefore there is no sense of fulfilment. I wonder if you get this? And therefore no sense of frustration. Please this is not a verbal conclusion, an idealistic concept, something to be achieved, but the realization of the actual fact that as long as we are not thinking together about everything, politics, religion, economics, personal relationships, and so on, thinking together, there must be division and out of that division there arises the desire to fulfil, and the inevitable sequence of that is frustration with all its neurosis and all the inevitable reactions. When we think together all that comes to an end. I wonder if you are following this?

If one may ask: you have, perhaps some of you, listened to Sunday morning's talk and have you inwardly dropped your personal opinions, your conclusions, your experiences? Or you hold on to them consciously, or unconsciously, and make an effort to think together? And of course that is rather childish, which only maintains a certain verbal communication, but in actuality there is division and therefore there is conflict. When we think together conflict comes to an end. I wonder if you see this? Please you must get this, because we human beings for millenia upon millenia have lived with conflict, struggle, strife of various kinds, physical, psychological, emotional, exploiting each other; the whole human relationship is based on that. And in thinking together relationship undergoes a fundamental change because there is no division. If you are ambitious and another is not ambitious, there is division. If you believe in god or in Jesus or Krishna, or whatever it is, and the other doesn't there is division, and therefore there is conflict. You may tolerate each other, that is what is happening now, but division exists - nationalism and so on. So if we could during these talks - I don't know how many of them there are, ten or so - if we could, a group of us, all of us if we can, at least a few of us, apply our minds to find out if we can absolutely think together. Therefore when we do that the relationship between us completely undergoes a change - right? I wonder if you see this?

And also we were saying on Sunday, psychologically thought has accepted the progressive evolutionary process and therefore it is always trying to become something, or be something. And we talked about time, if there is - please listen, play with it - if there is psychological time at all tomorrow, if there is psychologically the future. If there is not then what is the relationship between two human beings who have no future? You understand? You are following my question? - not my question, it is your question. You may not have put it to yourself but it is being put forward. So you have to look at it.

We have, throughout the centuries, religiously, politically, and in different ways, accepted this idea of gradualness - right? That is obvious. Gradually I will become perfect, gradually I will be less this and more that. In this gradational conclusion and evolution measurement has become important. Naturally - you follow all this? That is measurement, what one was, what one is and what one will be - which is a measurement. Measurement is time and we are questioning, questioning together, if there is psychological time at all. There is chronological time obviously because we are going to meet, if you want to, the day after tomorrow morning, that is obvious. If you want to go and play golf or go to the cinema, or whatever it is, there is the day after tomorrow. But psychologically, inwardly, is there time? Or thought has invented time, psychologically, because it is too lazy, indolent and also because it doesn't know how to deal with what is actually happening.

Therefore it says give me time. One does not know how to be free of envy, but I will think about it and work at it and gradually get rid of it - if you want to. But if you like to keep it that is all right.

So this has been our conditioning - right? You are following this? Not verbally, please watch it in your own self. This has been your conditioning, and somebody comes along like the speaker and says, "Is this so?" You have accepted it, this has been the tradition, educated tradition, not a superstition, because all people, scientists and others have talked about the ascent of man through accumulation of knowledge, which is time, and so on. You have accepted it. And the speaker comes along and says, "Look, you may be all wrong, question it?" So he says perhaps there is no psychological tomorrow. You understand this? No, see the importance of this question. What happens to you if you put that question very seriously, not as an idea but as an actuality? Actuality means that which is happening now - right? If you put that question to yourself then what is the quality of the mind that does not think of tomorrow psychologically? You follow? You have got my question? Right? What happens if there is no future psychologically - there is a future, you have to go and have your lunch, you have to sleep, you have to do this and that but psychologically there is no future - what is your relationship with another? You have got this? You have understood this? Have you solved this question which was put forward yesterday? What is your relationship with your wife, or girl-friend, or etc., if there is no tomorrow? If you have tomorrow psychologically, then you create the image, you pursue that image about her or him, you have a memory cultivated in relation to that person, and you act according to that memory, to that experience. You pursue that - right? So when there is psychologically a future then it becomes mechanistic. You follow what I mean by mechanistic? - routine, repetition, acting on remembrance. Now if there is no psychological tomorrow, what has taken place in your relationship? - in your relationship, not as an idea, in your actual relationship to your wife, to your husband, to your friend, to your boy, to your girl, what actually takes place? You understand this? Are you interested in this? Which means you have not only investigated the concept, the conditioning of psychological future and have understood the whole significance of it, rationally, sanely, logically and said, "That may not be". So you have hesitantly moved away from your conditioning. And when you put this question your mind is free to observe, is no longer tethered to your conditioning that there is a future. You have got it?

What is your relationship to another when tomorrow psychologically is not there? Perhaps we could approach - I don't want to answer this question, we'll find out for ourselves as we go along. I know you are waiting for me to answer it, there is no point, it would become verbal, rather silly. But if you could pursue that thing in a different direction perhaps we will catch the inward significance and the beauty and the truth of it.

The ancient Hindus and the Greeks formulated a concept of a good society. Don't get bored with this. They said a good society is this, this, this. The Greeks said a good society is justice and so on and so on. The ancient Hindus said a good society is only possible if there are a group of people who have renounced the world - please, careful, I am not asking you to do anything, I am pointing out - who do not own property, who are outside society, and being outside society they are responsible to the activities of the society - do you follow? Not that they withdraw, but being outside society they are morally incorruptible, because they didn't own property of any kind. And they were morally, ethically, religiously clear. They would not kill and so on and so on. And for a certain time probably that existed. Then it, like everything else, it degenerated into what the world knows as a Brahmin.

The Greeks had the same idea: that a good society must exist in the world. And it was an idealistic, formulated, ideological society. Ideas - you understand? - ideals and according to them they formulated very carefully, the Aristotelian and so on and so on, society, that never existed.

Now we are saying - please listen - can we bring about a good society, not ideologically, not as a Utopia, not as something to be done, achieved, but a society, which means a relationship between two people is society - you are following all this? Can we as a group create such a good society? Now wait a minute. The Greeks formulated, the Hindus formulated and probably the Chinese, but we are not formulating anything. We are not saying the ideal - society must be this, this this. We are not saying that because that becomes a Utopia, an ideal to be pursued - you are following all this - something to be done. We are talking about a good society which can only come into being when you as a human being, representative of all mankind - I will come to that, hold on to it - are responsible to another human being. When we say you are the whole of mankind, psychologically you are - right? You may have a different shape of head, lighter skin or darker skin, better food therefore you are taller, in a temperate climate, your name may be different but psychologically we live at the same level - sorrow, pain, anxiety, frustration, a sense of hopeless loneliness, great sorrow, you follow? This exists right through the world. This is a fact, it is not an idea which you accept. If you go to India you see the same phenomena there as here. They are darker people, over populated, poverty but psychologically they are anxious, insecure, confused, miserable, worship something which they imagine, just like here. So there is great similarity. And psychologically it is the same movement, varied, modified but the source of this movement is the same for all mankind - right? Do you see this? - not as an idea but as an actuality, that is, what is happening - right? So you are the rest of mankind. If you see that you won't give such tremendous importance to yourself, your personal anxieties, your personal fulfilment, you know all the self-centred egotistic problems, because you are like everybody else. But you have to solve it. Right?

So, we are saying - I am getting rather tired, are you? - we are saying a good society can come into being immediately, not something to be achieved in the future. That good society can come into being only when we think together, which means no division between you and another. Then our whole conduct changes - right? Do you see that? Then one does not exploit the other, either sexually, or in various psychological subtle ways. Right? At least verbally follow this: but verbally means nothing, it is like following empty air, holding empty ashes in your empty hand.

So we are saying: a good society, which must exist in this world, in this murderous world, immoral society, if a group of us can think together, therefore I ask: what is the relationship of you to another if there is no psychological future? You see, you understand what has happened? What has happened to a mind - please listen - what has happened to a mind that has been accustomed, trained, educated, conditioned, to accept the whole pattern of a life which is based on the future? That has been your way of life. In that is involved the constant effort to become, to achieve, competition, comparison, imitation, the struggle. If intelligently you don't accept that way of living, which means that you do not accept in your relationship with another the future, then what takes place in your mind? What has happened to your mind? This is an important question if you can solve it for yourself - not solve it. If your mind has that quality that is not acting - please listen - from an ideological point of view, having an ideal and acting according to that ideal which means division, therefore no ideals whatever, and therefore no attempt to achieve something other than understand what is actually happening. Have you understood this? Are you all asleep?

You come and tell me that there is no tomorrow. I listen very carefully to what you say because perhaps you have something, a way of living in which there is no conflict. You come and tell me that. First I ask myself: am I listening to you? Am I actually observing what you are saying? Or am I translating what you are saying into an idea and accepting the idea - follow it carefully - and rejecting or accepting that idea and then say: how am I to live according to that idea? You follow? That is what you are all doing. Whereas the man says: don't do that, but just listen. Listen to the fact that you have lived this way, see all the consequences of living that way, what are the implications, logically, step by step. You have lived that way and therefore you have become, your mind has become completely mechanistic, routine, repeat, repetition, following. If you see that very carefully, he says to me, find out for yourself what happens if you do not think in terms of the future. What happens to you in your relationship with another? When the other is equally thinking with you? You understand? He also says, "Yes, I see that." So let both of us think together. I drop my opinions, drop my prejudices and so on, so we are together thinking. Do you follow? Then what happens? Because all of us want, desire, long for a good society, where we don't hurt each other, kill each other, maim each other, go to war against each other, live in perpetual insecurity, frightened. We all want a society of a different kind. Some have said - please listen - some have said you can have such a good society if you alter the circumstances, the environment. The Communists, the Socialists, all the rest of the world, says: change all that through law, democratically if you can, if you cannot be Totalitarian and suppress, conform, force, but change the environment. They have tried it in ten different ways and it has never happened. Man has not changed, either as a Christian human being, or a Hindu, he has not changed radically. Why? Is it an economic reason? Is it a matter of belief? You believe in Jesus and another doesn't. Why? Why has there been in the world thousands and thousands of years this constant division? The Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Persians - you know, the whole division. Why? Is it because no two human beings have ever found out how to think together? You understand my point? You and I can't think together. I want to. The speaker says, "For god's sake let's think together, because we will create a different world altogether." But you say, "Sorry I want my opinions, I like my opinions, I cannot let go my experiences, my pleasures." So it keeps that division going.

Now we are saying: can you put aside all your stupid, you know, worthless things, opinions, experiences, they are dead, gone, finished, and say, "Let's think together." So our minds, not your mind is different from mine, there is only one mind when we are together - do you understand this? - then what is the relationship of that mind to another mind in daily life? Go on sirs.

Questioner: Is that a rhetorical question? If not I would like to reply but I don't want to interrupt your talk.

K: No it is not a rhetorical question.

Q: So you want to get an answer from the audience, not from yourself?

K: That is why I am waiting sir.

Q: I will give you one now sir.

K: Oh no. Not one answer.

Q: I can only give you my answer. I can't answer for anybody else.

K: Ah! Then we are not thinking together. No, no, that is the whole point sir. Please forgive me. There is no your point of view and my point of view.

Q: I never said point of view.

K: Your way of expressing it.

Q: What I wanted to say was just this. You said if there was no psychological time what is your relationship with another? My answer to that is: wait until Thursday and I will tell you because right now I can't tell you. I have quarrelled with my wife for twenty years.

K: Sir, are you saying sir that I cannot tell you about it now. I have done this for twenty years, I cannot tell you now but perhaps later on in the future?

Q: On Thursday sir. In the past I have listened to you in a way that is not listening at all. Right now I feel maybe I am on your wavelength, but I need a little bit of time to experiment with this. I cannot give you the answer immediately and tell you what is my relationship with another when I have not had the opportunity to observe what is happening in daily life.

K: That is what I am saying sir. Yes sir, I have understood your question. I haven't had the opportunity to put this question to myself, I must have time and then I will answer you. I say you are wrong. I say you are then not meeting. I love you. And what happens to the mind that says, I have no division? Now, not I will think it over, I will work at it - then you are not meeting my point sir.

Q: I don't know what my relationship is.

K: Do you know what your relationship is with another now?

Q: No.

K: You don't know what your relationship with another is now? - with your wife, your friend, your girl or boy, do you know what it is now? You don't know?

Q: We know but you mean in a different way.

K: I am asking you, so you know it.

Q: I don't know.

K: The lady says she doesn't know. Will your boyfriend and husband accept that? (Laughter). You are playing games.

Let's put the question differently. What shall we do together to bring about a change in the world? We all say change is necessary. We see things are degenerating, you know what is happening in the world, terrible things are happening in the world. And what shall we do together - please listen - to change this?

Q: We have to change ourselves.

K: No, wait, wait. I am coming to that. Don't say change ourselves. You have had fifty years.

Q: Fifty two.

K: Fifty two! (Laughter). You have had fifty two years, why in the name of heaven haven't you changed? So it means you are accepting the future. Something will happen to make you change. My question then is sir: what shall we do together - please listen. Though we have listened to the speaker for fifty two years or ten years, or five years, what shall we do together to bring about a new society?

The Catholics at one time in history, they were terribly united. Anybody who disagreed was tortured, inquisitioned, burnt. But for a time they held it, because they had the same belief, same - you know all the rest of it. Now all that is gone, nobody believes in anything. And we see the society as it is. What shall we do together? When one is put that question, each one has different plans - right? Different ideas, different concepts, do this, don't do that, we must all join together to elect a new president, new politician - you follow?

So I am asking: will a belief bring us together? Right?

Q: No.

K: It can't. Wait. Will authority bring us together?

Q: No.

K: I promise you a reward?

Q: No.

K: You will reach Nirvana if you do this. Or if you don't do this you will go to hell. Reward and Punishment, on which we have lived.

So what will bring us together? Belief won't, authority of any kind is rejected, the reward by another as a means for you to change is also rejected. And if you say you are going to be punished in heaven for not obeying, you say "Go away, don't be silly". So what will make us come together?

Q: Right listening.

K: But you won't listen if you are prejudiced - right? So will you drop your prejudice? You have come back to the same thing. Will you drop your personal desire for some extraordinary evolutionary Utopia? Enlightenment? Drop your idea of what meditation must be? Can you let go of all that? And will it take another fifty two years and you say, "Yes, at the end of it I will be dying but I hope I will give it up." You follow? Sirs, what will bring us together. Put that question.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Only when we are able to think together. Right sirs? When you and I see the same thing. Not you see the thing differently and I see it differently. When both of us see something actually happening as it is then we can both look at it. But if you say that is not happening, only it is imagination, or it is this, that or the other - you follow what I am saying? So what will make us come together? I am not talking sexually, in this permissive world that is the most silly obvious thing, and we think that is being together.

Let's put the question differently: if there is no tomorrow psychologically, in the future, what is my action towards another? The future implies no ideals, and no past either. You understand this? If the future you deny psychologically, you also must deny the past. I don't know if you follow this? Gosh! Will you let your past go? Your hurts, the wounds that you have received, the unfulfilled desires, the anxieties - which is the past. Psychologically if there is no future, it implies psychologically there is no past. I wonder if you see this? You can't have one and reject the other, they are the same movement. And that is our difficulty. Our difficulty is to let go, either the past or the future, because we are frightened. I won't go into that now but look at it, what we are doing. We want to change the world. It is necessary for our grandchildren. You know sirs, if you love somebody with your heart, with your blood, with your whole being, love somebody and you have a small child whom you love do you want him to enter into this world? So what shall we do? But you are not interested in this.

Q: But do you think it is really possible to do it totally? Is there someone you know who has done it?

K: Is this possible to do this totally, the gentleman asks who has heard me for fifty two years. And do you know anybody who has done this. It would be impudent on my part - please listen - impudent, impolite, incorrect to say I know somebody. What is important is: are you now? Not do you know somebody. That is escaping from yourself when you say, "Well show me somebody, a result." And the speaker is not interested in results. If he is then he will be disappointed, he will be exploiting, he will enter into quite a different world.

So what shall we do together? You see if you understood that word 'together'. You know when you hold your hand with another whom you like, you may be holding hands and each person thinking differently - right? But they are not together. Together means having the same quality of mind. When they love each other it is the same quality. You understand? To love somebody so completely - oh, you don't know. In that there is no future is there? You don't say "I will love you tomorrow".

So what shall we do to bring about a feeling that we are not separate, we are together, the feeling, the quality, the feeling of it - you understand? It is quite phenomenal that this gentleman has heard me for fifty two years, and another gentleman over there for twenty years and some of you have heard me for ten, five or for the first time, what will make you change? Being hit on the head? Offering you a reward? What will make you change so that you say, "Look, it is the greatest importance in life to be together"?

Q: Letting go of fear.

K: No fear. Is that it? Or is it - please listen - or is it we think we are secure in our separateness? Just listen madam to what I have said. Each one of us thinks, because we have a particular name, a form, a job, a bank account, belong to a particular nation, particular group, we are safe, secure. And I say: are you secure? Obviously you are not. So you follow? You want to be secure completely in your isolation, and the moment you are isolated you cannot be secure. That is what each nation is saying, we must be secure, we must build up arms, we must protect ourselves against you. So each human being wants to be secure in his isolation. Oh for god's sake! And when you are isolated you can never be secure.

Isn't that a fact? Therefore, if it is a fact, don't be isolated. You see you won't accept the fact and say it is so and yet you keep to the fact, hold on. It is a hopeless generation, is that it? No sir.

So we are pointing out there is complete, total security when we are together. You understand? When we are thinking together. And only out of that can come a good society, which is righteous, which is moral, which will have peace - you know. In that there is security, not in what you have now.

We will meet the day after tomorrow, I believe, don't we?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 12TH JULY 1979

Shall we go on with what we were talking about the day before yesterday? Shall we? It seems to me that we never seriously think things through. We go half way and give it up. And I think we are not sufficiently serious enough to go into this. I would like to discuss or talk over with you, if I may, not only what we have been talking about, thinking together, but the problem of security, why human beings throughout the world seek psychological security. One needs physical security. One must have food, clothes and shelter. And apparently throughout the millenia man has not been able to organize a society so that everybody could have enough food, clothes and shelter. There have been many, many revolutions to bring this about, Totalitarian, this and the other but apparently they have not been able to succeed. And is it because we seek physical security, and that desire for physical security has psychologically taken over the physical demands? You understand my question? One needs physical security and that is the function of a good society. Which we will go into presently: what is a good society. And why have not human beings been able to arrange, they have capacity to organize, enough energy to see that all human beings have enough food, clothes and shelter. That is one problem.

And the other is: each human being seeks psychological security, inward security, relying on belief, holding on, hoping thereby in a belief to find security, in an ideal, in a person, in a concept, in an experience and does he ever find security in any of this? Do you understand my question? And if he doesn't why does he hold on to that? You understand my question?

If one may, let us think over together this question, that is, if you are willing, put aside your particular vanity, your particular prejudice, your own conclusions and let's think over this problem together. Which means you are not accepting what the speaker is saying, nor are you accepting your own conclusions because you have none, you have put them aside. So let us think this over very carefully, and this may be one of the factors, that human beings are so frightened. Why does the mind cling to a particular memory, to a particular experience, hold on to a belief which has lost all meaning, why? Let's talk it over together.

Either he is incapable of seeing the facts, or he likes to live in an illusion, in a make-belief which has nothing whatsoever to do with actuality: the actuality being what is taking place now. Or he separates the experience, the idea, the ideal, the belief, as being not accurate but holds on to them because intellectually he is incapable of investigating. You follow? Now if we may proceed step by step.

Have you any belief that you hold on to? And if you hold on to a belief, what is that belief? How does it come into being? Either through centuries of propaganda, as most religions have done, that is their metier, that is their investment. For centuries a belief has been created and one accepts it naturally from childhood, and it is easier to follow what has been the tradition rather than to break away from it. You are following all this? If you have no particular beliefs, then ideas. The word 'idea' I believe comes from the Greek, which means to see, to observe. You understand? Not observe and then from it a conclusion, which becomes an idea. The word 'idea' actually means to observe. Now have we ideals, which is the future? The future which is going to be achieved. The ideal has been projected from the experiences of the past, from certain conclusions which have been gathered and from that you project an idea, historical, worldly, or personal - right? That is the past projecting a concept as an ideal, which is in the future, and conforming to the future, to that ideal. It is the same movement from the past, modified through the present, and the future. Right, that is clear, isn't it? Now if you see that, that when you have an ideal there must be a contradiction in your daily life because that ideal is something non real - right? Non factual. But the factual is what is happening and hence a conflict, an adjustment, an imitation, a division. So there is constantly approximating one's actions to something which is not factual. I wonder if you see? That is illusory, this is actual.

Now after explaining that very carefully we can go much more into details. Do you actually see this fact? Or are you already translating it into an idea? You are following? Please observe yourself. That is, if one has a belief, an ideal, and you see the nature of the ideal, how the ideal comes into being. Lenin, all the Marxists, have their ideals, after studying history and coming to their own particular conclusions about history and then projecting the ideas, and then making human beings conform to that ideal. So have you, as a human being, thinking this out very carefully, do you see the falseness of it and therefore letting it go? Or you feel if you have an ideal you are doing something, you are active, you are accomplishing, fulfilling your ideals. And that gives one a great satisfaction, vanity, a sense of purpose. You are following all this?

So after talking over together, together, does one put aside ideals? If you do, then you say, is it possible then to face actually what is happening? Not in contrast to the ideal and measuring what is happening according to the ideal, but have the capacity to face what is actually going on? In that observation of what is actually taking place there is no conflict, you are watching. I wonder if you see this? Are we together in this or am I? Please bear in mind we are thinking this out together.

It is very important that we not only learn to listen properly, but also have the capacity which comes naturally if you are interested, in being able to see that is false and it is finished. I will put aside my opinion, I won't let that interfere and can we together put aside all our ideals? Because we are thinking this out together, because we are enquiring into the question of security. We think we are secure when we pursue an ideal, however false it is, however unreal it is, which has no validity, it gives a certain sense of purpose. And that sense of purpose gives a certain quality of assurance, satisfaction, security. Right? Can we go along? Not go along verbally but actually you have to put aside your ideals.

So now we are enquiring into the question of security. And why do human beings, right throughout the world, hold on to experience? Please ask yourself. Not only sexual physical experiences but also so-called spiritual experiences, which are much more dangerous. You walk along by yourself or with others, you suddenly have some kind of ecstasy, some kind of delight and that experience you store it, hold on to it. The thing is over - right? There is the memory of it and one holds on to that memory, which is called experience. The actual word 'experience' means to go through. To go through and finish with it, not carry on in your memory that which has happened. Now specially in so-called psychological experiences, or religious experiences which are very, very subtle in their happenings, the human mind takes delight in something which is not ordinary. Ordinary being that which is happening everyday. And that which has happened suddenly, or which has happened after unconsciously working at it and then happening - I hope you are following all this - and holding on to it - why? Does that give one a certain sense of having experiences, known? That which is something not ordinary and that gives one a delight, a great pleasure, and in that experience there is a certain quality of security because you have experienced something totally other than 'what is'. Right, are you following all this?

And does belief, ideal, experience, remembrances, do they give security? Actual security, as physical security - you are following all this? Or does the mind like to live in a certain area of illusion? Please we are thinking over together, we are not doing propaganda or trying to convince you of anything. But we are trying together to find out why human beings hold on to illusions, which are obvious to another. Now is it, as we said, it gives them a great sense of superiority? I have had something which you fellows haven't had. That is the whole gamut of the gurus, you know, all this. "I know, you don't know." And why do human beings live in this way? Why do you or 'X' live this way? Please think it out. Let's think it over together because your experience is personal, enclosing, self-centred and the other is the same. So there is always your experience is different from mine or another, and mine is better than yours so there is always this division going on. So are we, in thinking this out together, holding on to our experiences, our beliefs, our ideals, our conclusions, knowing that they are merely verbal structures, knowing that they are merely a thing that is gone, finished, in the past? Why do we hold on? Is it we want to live with certain illusions in which we take delight? So does security lie in illusions? Apparently a vast majority of people in the world like to live in illusions, whether it is scientific illusions or the religious illusions, or economic illusions, or national illusions. They seem to like it. And perhaps we are serious, not wanting mere entertainment, we are deeply concerned with the social structure which is destructive, dangerous, and we human beings say we must bring about a different quality of mind and a different society.

So we are asking: why do we find security in illusions? Please find out. And why is it that we cannot possibly face facts? Say for instance, envy is the common lot of all mankind - right? Envy being comparison, measurement from what I am to what you are. This measurement. Now in thinking over together why is it not possible to end that completely? I am asking. I am not saying it should or should not. The fact is the reaction which we call envy. That is the fact. But the non-fact is I should not be envious - right? Do we meet this? The fact of this reaction which we call envy is what is happening, but the mind has projected the concept that one should not be, which is unreal. So you are struggling to move from the fact into non-fact. I wonder if you see all this? Right sirs? Are we meeting each other? Whereas to face the fact without the non-fact. Are we meeting? I don't know. Are you all tired?

So we have been so trained, educated to accept non-facts as being far more important than the actual. And in the non-fact we think we shall have found security. Right? Now when you hear that, is it an idea, a concept, or you are really listening and therefore you see the non-fact and finish with it? I wonder if you see this? Right?

So we have to go into the question: what does it mean to listen? You have listened now for nearly half an hour. Have you listened actually for half an hour to what is being said, which is what you are saying to yourself, not what another is saying - right? Are you listening so completely you see the illusion actually and see the absurdity of living in an illusion and finish with it? Which means can we stay with the fact and have no relationship to non-fact? Because our minds, as we said, are conditioned to non-facts. Just see what we have done.

The other day a man said to me: "I can't bury my son in the cemetery because he is not baptized". You understand? Do you understand what I am saying? Not baptized, you know going through all that nonsense. And he was horrified, miserable, unhappy that his son couldn't be buried there, in the holy ground as he called it. You follow? Please sirs, this is very serious. You may laugh at it, you may set it aside because you say it is nonsense, but you have your own nonsense.

So can we hear, observe so closely, so attentively, give all our attention to this and therefore all illusion has gone? And this illusion is part of our conditioning. If you are a Catholic, look at the illusions you have. Or a Hindu and so on and so on. We don't have to go into all that. Now a mind that has sought security in non-fact has dropped that, has discovered that there is no security there, then - please follow this - what is the state of the mind that is observing what is happening, the actual? You understand my question? Have I made my question clear?

All right. Suppose I - not suppose - it is finished, I have no illusions. Which doesn't mean I am cynical, which doesn't mean I am indifferent, or I have become bitter, but illusions no longer play a part in my life. Then I ask myself: what is the quality of the mind, your mind, together, what is the quality of our mind which is facing that which is happening? You understand my question? Do you understand my question sir? What is the state of your mind that is free from all kinds of illusion? National illusion, scientific illusions, of course all the absurd illusions of religions, and the illusion that you have been carrying as your own experience - right? What is the quality of a mind that is free? It is only such a mind that can observe what is happening, naturally. You follow this?

Now the question is: the mind is seeking security - right - it wants security, it has not found security in any illusion - right? - but yet it says "I must have security." I wonder if you are following all this? So it says, "I must find security in my relationship." Obviously. "I have let go of beliefs, ideals, the experiences, the remembrances, all the nationalistic nonsense, they are all gone". But one's mind is not free from the idea of security. And from that may be the beginning of all fear. So it says, "Is there security in my relationship with another?" Go on, you are the people who are caught in this. Is there security in the image I have created about my wife? Or my husband, my girl? Obviously not. Because that image is the projection of past experience - right? And the past experience has brought about this image, and according to that image I act, which is the future. Right? Am I making this awfully difficult? So the mind is now saying: there is no security in any form of image - right? Not in relationship but in any form of having an image which thought has created from the past experience. Right?

So if you have not an image, then what is relationship in which the mind is still seeking security - right? Come on sirs. Is there a relationship between two people when they are not absolutely thinking together? In thinking together there is complete security - right? That is, one has let go all his opinions, judgements, experiences and all that, and the other has also, so they can think together - right? That is the actual relationship in which there is no division as my personal thinking and yours. Right? So we are saying: there is security psychologically, total security when the mind is freed from all illusions, and doesn't seek security in any form of relationship as attachment - right? Because attachment is one of the illusions in which we think we will find security. I am attached to you. I am attached to this audience. I come here, the speaker comes here and wants to talk, express himself, fulfil himself, and therefore finds a certain security in that. Which is, the speaker is exploiting you for his own security. And when the speaker is honest and fairly decent he says what rot it is and he moves away from that kind of nonsense.

So in attachment we want to find security. And when you don't find it in a particular attachment you try to find it in another attachment. One is married to one person for twenty years and you are bored and you suddenly run off with somebody else which is what is happening in society, and there you are hoping to find some kind of security, excitement, sex and all the rest of it. See what we are doing sirs. Or you are attached to your present lady or man and are satisfied - right? - which is another security. I wonder if you see all this? I wonder if you see how your mind is playing tricks on yourself all the time. This is called love.

So we are saying: is there security at all psychologically? Think it out. One has invested the desire for psychological security in belief, in ideals, in experience, in remembrances, in attachment, in god and so on and so on, and is there security? Or it is all illusion? And one can have tremendous comfort in any kind of illusion: that Jesus is going to save you, marvellous! Comfort, save you from what, god knows, but it doesn't matter! And so on and on and on. The Hindus have it, the Buddhists, the same pattern is repeated throughout the world. Which means we never face the fact but would rather live in non-fact.

And when we do that our minds are torn apart - right? We become very cruel, we think conflict is inevitable, it is part of life. When you put aside all that, now how do you put aside all that? That is the point. You understand? You have listened to this for three quarters of an hour, and in what manner, if you have discovered your particular illusion, in what manner have you set it aside? You understand? Please follow this. Is it an act of determination? Is it an act of choice, seeing this is illusion, I prefer that? Is it an outcome of somebody else's concept imposed upon you? Is it your own clarity of observation? That is, you yourself see it?

Then the question arises: How do you see it? You are following all this? You are not getting tired? One sees one is caught in an illusion, an ideal. How do you see this phenomena? Is it a reasoned out conclusion? A clarity of verbal explanation? Is it that you are being skilfully persuaded? Or you yourself see this fact? Now we are asking: how do you see it? Do you see it merely as visual perception, the facts in the world, and therefore from visual perception, reading books, newspapers, magazines, discussing, you have come to the realization that ideals are rubbish? That is merely an intellectual process and therefore you are merely living in a concept and therefore non-fact, however logically, sanely, rationally you may observe it and then say: "I will drop it". But the dropping of it is not actual because you have other illusions around the corner. But whereas we are saying - please listen to this - if you observe without any remembrance in your observation - I must make this clear otherwise you will think I am crazy. We are talking over together the question of seeing, whether you have come to the conclusion that illusions are nonsensical and therefore you won't be involved in them. Or do you have an insight to the whole movement of illusion? You understand my question? I can take - one can take one kind of illusion, belief, investigate it, go into it, and say, "Well, it is finished." And investigate your ideals and so on. That doesn't really free you, does it? Investigate it. Does it really free you when you have rationally, logically, sanely investigated into the various forms of illusions? Which means, how do you investigate? You investigate through thought? Right? Thought has created these illusions and with thought you are examining these illusions, which again is a trick you are playing. So thought can again create other illusions and say, "I won't have these illusions". But thought has not understood the very nature of illusion and creator of illusions.

Now if you see thought itself is the creator of illusions - you are following all this? - then when the mind itself sees that thought is the creator of illusions then you have an insight into the whole nature of illusions. It is that insight that is going to dissolve all illusions. I wonder if you have got it? Should we discuss, or go into the question of insight? We have got seven minutes.

Sirs, insight is not intuition. Intuition may be a refined form of desire. Don't accept what the speaker is saying, investigate it. Intuition or apprehension may be the unconscious projection, which is taken as something extraordinarily real - right? So we are saying insight is not related to any form of desire. "I want to understand. I must go into it." The motive behind is desire wanting to comprehend - right? Desire saying, "I must find this out." So if you want to go into it very carefully, insight is not the activity of desire. Insight is not the projection of past experience. Insight is not a remembered action. That is, I am going to show you something. That is: when instantly you see that all the religious organizations, not logically, step by step, which you can do afterwards, if you see that all religious organizations are based upon thought and therefore have nothing whatsoever to do with actual, the sacredness of religion, you have an insight into it. You understand what I am saying?

Now is your action with regard to illusion the action of insight? You understand my question? Or you are still analysing it? You are still mentally active in exploration? Or you see instantly the nature of illusion and finished? You are following the difference? One is determination, choice, a subtle form of conclusion and action. So action takes an interval, there is a time interval. We are saying: in insight there is immediate perception and action, in which there is no regret, no turning back, it is so. Have you got this? Sir, if you want to go into this, one has to be very careful not to deceive yourself, because our minds are so quick in their capacity to deceive. I can say, "Yes, I have got insight into this."

And out of that insight you act, and then you find "I wish I hadn't done that." Regrets - you follow? - all the sequence follows. But insight is something entirely different. There is no time interval between insight and action, they are both together.

Now after explaining all this, which is a verbal form of communication, have you listened so carefully that you see instantly the whole structure of illusion? That is wisdom. Right sirs. May we go?

Sirs, when we sit together like this, fairly quietly and silently, listening, is the silence contrived? Or you are so concerned, not to solve your own personal problems which will inevitably finish when you have understood the act of listening, the act of observation; the act of listening, in that there is no desire, just you listen. But if you listen to Mozart and say, "By Jove, I had a lovely evening the other day listening to that music and I want to play it again," you have lost something. And if you listen so completely, then the thing itself is like a seed dropped into the earth, it flourishes, you don't have to do a thing about it. In the same way if you observe closely, in which there is only observation, only observation, not the observer saying "I will observe", then in that observation and listening there is a strange quality of attention which is insight. Right sirs.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 15TH JULY 1979

We should go on, I think, with what we were talking about the last three meetings here.

Each trade, each skill, has its own discipline. If you are a carpenter it has a particular discipline, scientist, architect and so on, each function has its own discipline. And human beings throughout the world are used to this idea of discipline, not only in the technological field but also in the psychological realm. And we are, through education, through our culture, in every form of relationship there is, as we have accepted, a certain discipline. I would like, if I may, to go into this question rather deeply: why human beings need discipline at all. Please carefully listen. Don't jump to any conclusion and say there must be no discipline, we must live in a permissive society as we are now, and any form of restraint, any form of holding, is inhuman and therefore the other extreme.

As we were saying the other day, we must all have the capacity not only to be able to listen, to observe together, but also think together, which apparently is much more difficult because we are so trained through our religion, through our culture, to think individually, separately. And so there is always diversity of opinion, judgement, evaluation - your belief opposed to another belief, ideals opposed to other ideals and so on. These differences, contradictory, opposing, keep the individual separate and when there is separation there must be conflict, which is so obvious: national conflicts, racial conflicts, class conflicts, ideological conflicts and so on and so on.

Now we are asking, we are thinking together if that is possible - I think it is possible when you put aside your own particular opinion, your particular evaluation, experience, conclusion and feel the necessity of thinking together - right? Please do this as we are talking, not when you go home, or later on, but now as we are sitting together let's find out if it is possible that we can communicate with each other so that there are no barriers. The speaker is only sitting on the platform not to assume any authority but it is convenient because you can all see the man. That is the only reason he is sitting on the platform. And is it possible to think together about this whole question of discipline, effort, and whether it is possible at all in life to live without a single effort? Effort means strife, struggle to become something, to achieve something, not only in the psychological realm, but also in the physical realm. Is it possible to act without effort, to have a relationship with each other in which there is no strife whatsoever between two people, and no conflict within oneself, to think clearly without the determination to think clearly? All that implies conflict. Can we together think out this question, and as we are thinking it out eliminate as we are going, so that we can together put aside through our clarity of perception, clarity of hearing, clarity of thinking, that very movement sets aside the contradictory elements. That's what we are going to discuss this morning, if we may.

Like the soldiers throughout the world are highly disciplined people. And that very discipline encourages violence. I don't know if you have thought about this? A soldier is trained, day after day, month after month, suppressing his personality, suppressing his desires, conforming to a pattern, and there is this very, very strict discipline. And that discipline when it is in action against somebody it is violent, that is war. Obviously. The word 'discipline' means to learn, not to conform, not to suppress, not to imitate but to learn.

Now in our thinking together we are going to observe whether there can be an action in our daily life without this quality of conformity, without this quality of imitation to a pattern, to an idea, to a nationalism, and so on and so on. I hope you are following all this. For some this may be totally new so please have the goodness to listen. To listen implies that you are interested in trying to find out. You know you have listened to yourself probably many times. You have listened to others but one always listens partially. And when you listen partially you don't listen at all. When you listen, you listen - right?

Now we are going to find out why man has submitted himself to a series of disciplines, not only in the physical world, technological world, but also psychologically. And is this discipline helping man to free himself from his idiosyncrasies, his conflicts, his problems, his relationship and so on? Do you understand my question? Right? Are you all very hot?

Can one listen without effort, first? Not to the speaker only but to learn the art of listening, which means not creating an image about the speaker, about the person who is speaking, your wife, your husband, and so on, not to have an image when you are listening - right? Not to have a concept, not to hold on to one's own knowledge and as you are listening interpret what is being said according to your knowledge. All this denies actual listening. If you want to see something very clearly you must give your attention. Attention implies not concentration, just observation, to see what is actually happening. Like a good scientist looking through a microscope, he must look at what is actually taking place. But if he has a hypothesis, a conclusion and with that he is looking, then he is incapable of pure observation of what is going on - right? Please. Therefore there is the art of listening, the art of observing, seeing, then there is the art of thinking together. From that arises the art of learning. We will go into all this presently.

We are now going into the art of thinking together. You and the speaker having put aside their personal problems, issues and all the rest of it, so that we can think together, to observe our problems. Not the problems that the speaker imposes but the human problems. Right? So we are saying: why has man throughout the ages lived in a constant state of conflict? Whether he is seeking god, whether he is seeking heaven, whatever he does, both in our relationships outwardly and inwardly with each other, there is this constant struggle, strife. How has this come about? Why can't we live completely without a single shadow of strife? You understand my question? Please put that question to yourself. And let's find out the true cause of it, together.

Strife must exist where there is division. That is obvious. Division between the guru and the disciple, between our nationalities, as long as there is a division of any kind there must be conflict. This is obvious - right? Do we see that? As long as one thinks one is superior to another there must be conflict. As long as one asserts one's opinions, judgements as opposed to another's opinions, another's judgements, there must be division and conflict.

In relationship between two people, each pursuing his own ambitions, his own fulfilments, his own desires, division exists and therefore there is conflict - right? I hope you are following. You are observing it not verbally, not intellectually but actually as it is taking place in your daily life - right?

Now we are asking: why has this division come into being? There is the sunset and sunrise, darkness and light, the stars in their great brilliancy and beauty and the dark earth, there is the man and a woman, there is nature and technological improvement. All at that level, which is actual. And inwardly, if you observe carefully, inwardly there is also division. "I must", "I must not", "I have been", "I shall be", "I shall achieve", "I may not achieve". So there is always this inward division as well as outward division - right? Right sirs? Some of you at least agree or disagree with me.

We are asking why? How has this come about? Is this the normal state, natural healthy state? Or it is really abnormal? Really non-existent? This is what we are going to find out. You are following all this? First of all we are asking: is this normal? - this division. Why does this division exist between god and man, the good and the bad, the better and so on, this constant division, comparison, conformity to a pattern, and so on and so on? Is this normal? We have accepted it as normal. Like war - please follow - like war, like the man who says, "I know, you don't know", "I interpret god and you listen". We have accepted nationalism, division of classes, hierarchical outlook, as being normal, healthy, necessary because we think that is progress. Right? That is evolution, that is achieving the good - right?

Now we are saying is this normal? We are questioning to find out together - together, not the speaker says something and you accept or reject, but together we are investigating into this question, which means we are thinking together, not you think and I accept, or I think and you accept, or you reject or I reject, but together we are thinking and exploring - right? Please. Because we want to point out that there is a way of living without a single effort, both physically as well as psychologically - right? So is this normal? We say, "Yes, it is normal because everything struggles to exist. Nature is in constant battle for survival, the tiger killing the deer and so on and so on. That struggle, strife is normal. Because it exists there it must exist naturally here. And without struggle, without comparison, without competition, you cannot progress." Perhaps that may be so in the technological world but we have accepted it also psychologically - right? That the more knowledge we have the greater the ascent of man - right? The more one knows about the universe, about the environment, the more and more, the more cultivated, the more educated, the more enlightened the human being becomes.

All that implies struggle. Why is there this division? Have we taken it over from the actual fact that I must struggle with the earth and cultivate it to produce what one can eat? Is it the struggle in the outward world for sheer existence, has that concept, or that actuality slipped into the psychological world? You are following all this? Or is this too brainy, all this? I don't think it is too brainy, just clarity of explanation, verbal clarity. We must begin with verbal clarity otherwise we cannot communicate with each other. If you say that is all too complicated for me, too highbrow, too intellectual, you stop investigating, finding out for yourself why human beings have lived like this, through millenia, struggling. Is that the reason? We see nature in struggle, in conflict, we see to learn a new language implies a certain amount of strain, conflict, attention, to learn a skill requires effort, so perhaps that movement has been accepted in the psychological field. That is one fact. We are asking that.

Or is it that human beings throughout the world have emphasized in their culture, in their religion, in their activity, the ego, the me, separate from you? Do you follow? So culture, religion, economics, politics, everything has educated man to the idea, to the concept of the me and the you, therefore there is a division. And in the me there are innumerable divisions - right? The 'me' not wanting and wanting. The 'me' that says, "I shall be, I have been, I must be in the future." So is that the reason why, is that the cause of this division which is brought about by culture, religion, and so on and so on? That is second.

Or is it that each human being is seeking salvation individually, seeking security individually, seeking Nirvana, Heaven, Illumination, by himself? And the idea that when you reach that then you are all one? You follow?

So this has been what we have been taught, encouraged, learnt, conditioned - right? And a man, or rather when I say a man there might be ladies as opposed to man and all the rest of it - why has a human being not gone into this question? No saint has gone into it. No religious teacher has gone into it, they say ultimately you will be without effort, but you must make effort to reach the ultimate, therefore you must struggle, you must conform, you must discipline, you must starve, you must fast - you know, all the rest of it. You must follow, accept authority. Seeing that, one begins to question it. One asks: is it possible? One sees the causes of this division, political, religious, national, the Arab, the Jew, the Hindu, the Muslim - you follow? - all that, the Totalitarian, the Capitalist, they are all the same!

So is this normal? Or we have so given to this individual, isolated, self-centred problem, seeking security there and never finding it because when one is isolated one can never be secure. Right? I wonder if you see that? Now when one country is isolating itself from another country how, can they co-exist? There must be war, you know, the whole thing that is going on. But yet we, as human beings, are isolating ourselves in all our activities, and trying to find in that isolation, security, and have a relationship with another who is also seeking, isolating himself, there must be inevitably conflict. And therefore no security - right? Security implies a state of mind in which there is no conflict. Are you following all this? Right sirs?

Is this an illusion, this division, a delusion that man, thought has invented? Or is it an actuality in the sense real, true? Right? Is it the result of thought? You understand? We have the capacity to think, at least most people have, to a limited or to a wide extent. To think clearly. Or think in illusion created by thought - right? Are you following all this? Thought, as we have been saying, is the response of memory, experience, knowledge - right? You have stored up through experience certain knowledge, that knowledge has become memory and that memory responds as thought. This is obvious, we don't have to discuss this point. Which is, knowledge is the past, experience is the past, memory is in the realm of the past, and so thought being in the past is limited - right? I wonder if you see all this? Yes sir? Please don't agree. Watch it. It is so obvious. So thought is the movement of the past, movement modifying itself in the present, going on, but always rooted in the past. Therefore it is limited - right? Isn't that so? Please, come on.

So has thought invented this idea as the 'me' separate from you? You are following all this? Has not thought created nationalities? Has not thought created the Catholic and the Protestant? Has not thought created the Jew and the Arab, the Muslim and the Hindu and so on? Has not thought divided this? Right? It is obvious. So in this division thought hopes to find security - right? Of course. If you found no security in isolation you would have some other quality. You are following? So I am asking: as thought is limited because it is the response of the past and therefore it must always, under all circumstances, be limited, has thought brought about this isolating existence of each one separate, in order to be secure in this isolation? You are following all this? Are we following this?

And what thought has created is also actual: the tent, the electric light, the whole technological field, that is actual, real. And is the 'me', the ego, real? You understand? Thought has created the world of technology, architecture, poems, statues, beautiful gardens, excellent carpentry, great cathedrals, and also thought has created the things in the cathedrals - right? I wonder if you see? Obviously. All the rituals, dogmas, the whole circus that goes on in every church, in every temple, in every mosque, this is the whole process of the movement of thought. Right?

So I am asking, we are asking: is the 'me', the ego actual? Or is it an illusion? A delusion that has been brought about by thought, thought being limited? You understand? In its limitation it has created the thing which is limited. Do you see this? Or you are rejecting this? Because we are thinking together. And we are saying: where there is division there must be conflict, there must be strife, there must be this constant battle going on outwardly and inwardly - right? Take a very simple example: man and woman. In all relationships, as it exists now, there is conflict - right? Would you agree to that? At last! (Laughter) At last everybody agrees about something!

You have accepted that conflict, that strife in relationship and you either escape from it through entertainment, drugs, various forms of fulfilments and all the rest of it, run off to a monastery, to gurus and all that - you know all that is happening. And one has never asked in that relationship whether you can live with another perfectly peacefully, not indifferently, not callously, but caring for each other, being tremendously affectionate, being responsible but without a sense of conflict. Right? Now can we think this out together now? Not go home and think it out, now sitting here, can we together think it out so that you can totally end this conflict in relationship?

Questioner: It could depend,...

K: Wait, wait.

Q: Only for me and also for the other one.

K: I am going to go into that. A moment. We will go into it.

First of all do we see actually, not verbally, actually that which is happening in our relationship? Right? That is obvious. Go slowly, go slowly. Why has this division in relationship taken place? Go on. Don't say, "If we loved each other it would be all right". But we don't love each other. That is obvious. So don't bring that in, it has no meaning. But the actual fact is conflict. I am saying why? Isn't it fairly obvious that each one, man, woman, each one is exploiting each other, each one using each other, trying to fulfil sexually, non sexually in each other, and each one being ambitious in different directions, pulling away all the time from each other and meeting perhaps in bed and thinking they love each other. Now I say: what is the root of all this? Ask yourselves: what is the root of all this? Apart from man, woman, nature, you know the difference in sexes, apart from that why is there this division between you and me? Between the woman and man, in their relationship? Is it - we are asking, please enquire with me - is it our culture, our education, which has so emphasized the 'me', so strongly, and the 'you' equally strongly? You follow? That is, my ego and your ego - right? The ego being created by thought, thought which is limited.

Now when you look at yourself as an ego, the self, the self-centred entity, what is it? Actually, what is it? Is it the name, the form, the shape, the idea, the concept, the image - right? That is the 'me', with all the tendencies and all the rest of it. Essentially it is the product of thought. Do you see that? Or do you say, "No, no, that is not it. It is god in me, and god in you"? That is too silly. To maintain this division man has invented so many concepts - the Hindus have extraordinary concepts, the Atman and so on - I won't go into all that. You follow? To maintain this division and to continue in the strife and no way out of it, man has invented gods and all the rest of it, the saviours, all that nonsense to me.

So can you observe this 'me', which is created by thought, observe it without introducing the movement of thought in that observation? Have you got it? Please see first of all the logic of it. The logic. Thought is the response of knowledge and memory, which is the past. So thought is the past, modifying itself all the time, but it is rooted in the past. And therefore it must always be limited, narrow, can never be whole - right? And thought has created the division in its action, the 'me' and the 'not me', the 'you' and I, we and they. And has also created various kinds of divisions: the technological action, the personal action, the ideological action, the supreme action and so on and so on. Right? That is a fact. Now can you observe that fact - please listen carefully - can you observe that fact without thought entering into that observation?

Q: It is the only instrument I have.

K: One moment sir. I am coming to that. First go slowly. The gentleman says it is the only instrument that I have and therefore how can I look without employing that instrument? You have understood? Right? That is a wrong question you have put. Because we have not clearly understood the limitation of thought. If you see clearly the limitation of thought, you recognize the instrument is itself limited - right? And is it possible not to employ that instrument? If you find a particular drill cannot dig a hole, you find other means to dig a hole. But if you say, "I have only this instrument" - then you cannot dig a hole. You understand? So do we realize the instrument itself is useless to investigate into this question of conflict? That is the whole point. You understand? I wonder if you understand this?

Sir, you see we are so used to a particular form of action, which has not produced results but we hold on to it. We don't say as it has not produced results I will put it away, throw it out, let me find out another. You follow? That is our struggle. You want to employ the instrument of thought, and through thought you hope to resolve the problem, but thought itself is limited and therefore it is not the instrument. Right? Do we see that? Do we see in our relationship that there is conflict, each one having his own image and therefore division, and these images have been created by thought and thought is limited and cannot solve the problem.

So we are acquiring a new instrument, which is to observe without the old instrument interfering. You have got this? You see you won't let go of the old instrument. You think that old instrument will help you, but you don't see that old instrument has created such tremendous problems in life and you keep on employing that instrument. Once you see that then you are looking in other directions - right? It is like a good carpenter, the chisel doesn't work so he either throws it away or buys a new one, or sharpens it, but he is rejecting it. But you won't, because we are not clear, we don't think clearly. Or we are afraid if the new instrument comes things might break up: frightened. Which means you have already projected, thought has already projected an idea that it might not. You are following all this?

So can you, after this, can you observe without the old instrument of thought the actual relationship of two images, between two people and the division that exists? Look at it, observe it, see it. Then what takes place? You can only do that when you have put aside the old instrument. Look sirs, if I want to understand what you are saying I must listen to you, I must listen to you with affection, with care, with attention, because I want to find out what you are saying. But if I say, "Yes, I agree with you. I have heard this before." Or, "You are saying something new which is impossible." - you are not listening. So listening implies sir, a great sense of attention, love, care. But if you haven't got that your old instrument is in operation. And then you say, "How am I to pay attention? Tell me the method, the system". Then thought invents the system, then you become a prisoner to the system and you go on with that. Whereas if you see the importance, the danger of separation in relationship, the real danger, we are destroying each other - right? The terrorists, the Capitalists, all the rest of it - we are destroying each other because each one of us feels he is separate. And if you see the danger then you will listen, you are already in a state of acute listening to find out if there is a way out of this. Right?

Are you listening that way? That means to observe silently. Silence means not just going off to sleep or this or that. Silence is tremendous attention. That attention is complete energy. All the energy that you have, with all your mind and heart. That is attention. Then you listen, and that very listening, that very observation dissolves the limitation of the instrument.

But we have not touched upon this question of discipline because if one understands the nature of discipline, the 'me' and the thing to be achieved - you understand? To achieve that I must discipline myself. If I am to reach god, whatever god may be, which again is the invention of thought - do you accept all this? (Laughter). You see, we discipline ourselves to be good. You tell the child, "Be good. Don't do this, do that". Is goodness born out of discipline? Have you ever asked that? Is love born out of discipline? Is charity, humility, generosity born out of discipline? And is truth to be found by discipline? Enlightenment through discipline? - which means conformity to a pattern, which is conforming, the ego, the 'me', to another pattern, that pattern invented by another ego. Are you following all this?

So when you see all this, the basic question is: can one live in this world without the 'me', without the ego, without all the things thought has created, the gods, you know, psychologically? Thought has created the postman - right? The engineer - you need the postman, you need the engineer, but you don't need the things that thought has created in its desire to be secure psychologically. And in that there is no security. Security exists only when there is no division - right?

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH JULY 1979

Before we go on with what we were talking about at the last four talks, one has been wondering, and you must also have been asking yourself, why we, who have gathered here, who have listened for so many years, why don't we change? What is the root cause of it? Is there one cause? Or many causes? We know what the world has become outwardly, more and more fragmented, more and more violent, more insane, one group fighting another group, where one cannot share all the energy of the world for all people - you know what is happening. And what is our relationship to that, to the world and to oneself? Are we separate from all that? If we are, which I question, if we are, are we so very radically different from the world about us? The competing gurus, the competing religions, the contradictory opposing ideas and so on, what shall we do together to change ourselves? I am asking this in all seriousness: why we lead our lives as we live, our petty little ideals, vanities, and all the stupidities that we have accumulated, why is it that we go on in this way?

Is it we are frightened to change? Is it we have no desire or intention or urge to find a different way of living? Please ask yourself these questions. I am asking these questions for you, I am not asking for myself. Why? What is the essence of this deterioration of the human mind, and therefore the disintegration in action? You understand? Why is there this mind that has become so small, inclusive, not bringing everything and operating from the whole, but living in a small little courtyard? What is the root of it? Go on sirs, let us talk it over a little bit.

The other day you were asking: why is it that I have heard you for fifty two or forty years and I have not changed at all? There have been little changes, modifications, perhaps I am no longer a nationalist, no longer belong to any particular organized group of religious thinking, don't superficially belong to any sect or to any guru - to all that circus that goes on. But deeply one remains more or less the same. Perhaps more refined, the self-centredness is a little less active, less aggressive, more refined, more yielding, a little more considerate, but the root remains. Have you noticed this? Why? We are talking about the eradication of that root, not the peripheral frills and the peripheral clipping. We are talking about the very root of one's active conscious, or unconscious, egocentricism.

Is it because we need time? Please go into it. Time. Give me time. Man has existed for millions and millions of years, that root has not been uprooted and put aside. Time has not solved it. Right? Please give your mind to this. Evolution, which is the movement of time, has not solved this. We have better bathrooms, better communications and so on and so on, but man, the human being is essentially what he has been a million years ago. It is a tragic thing if one realizes it. And if one is serious, not just while you are here in this tent, serious right through your daily life, don't you ever ask: can this self-centred activity with all its problems, can it ever end? If you asked it seriously, as if one realizes time, thought - we went into it the other day - time and thought are similar, they are the same movement, and thought and time have not solved this problem. And that is the only instrument we have. And we never seem to realize that instrument, which is the movement of thought, however limited, that movement cannot solve the problems. And yet we hold on to that. We hold on to the old instrument - right?

Thought has created all these problems - right? That is obvious. The problems of nationality, problems which war creates, problems of religions, all that is the movement of thought which is limited. And that very thought has created this centre - right? Obviously. And yet we don't seem to be able to find a new instrument - right? We don't find a new instrument but as we cannot let go the old instrument, and holding on to it we hope to find the new. You follow? You must let go something to find the new - right? If you see a path leading up to the top of the mountain and it doesn't lead you up there, you investigate. You don't stick to that path. So one asks: what is it, why is it that human beings are so incredibly stupid? They have wars, they have this fragmentation of nationalities, of religions, all the rest of it, and yet they live in this miserably, unhappy, quarrelling, conflicts, strife - you follow?

Now what will make a human being let go the old instrument and look for the new? You understand? Look for the new. Is it that we are lazy? Is it that we are frightened? Is it, if I let go of this will you guarantee the other? You understand? Which means one has lived with this limited thought and one thinks one has found security in that, and is afraid to let that go, and it is only when there is abandonment of the old you can find the new. Obviously.

So is it, we are asking, is it fear? Because you observe the multiplication of gurus all over the world guaranteeing security; "Do this, follow this, practise this, and you will have something at the end of it". That is, reward. The promise of a reward has a certain fascination and you hope you will find in that security. But when you examine it a little more closely and are not so gullible, not swallow the whole thing the other fellow says, then you find very clearly that the reward is the reaction of punishment. Because we are trained to the idea of reward and punishment - right? This is obvious. So to escape from punishment, which means pain, grief and all that, we search for a reward and hope thereby in that to find some kind of security, some kind of peace, some kind of happiness. But when you go into it you don't find it. The gurus and the priests may promise it but they are just words - right?

So how do we, human beings, go into this question together as to whether it is possible to eradicate totally this poisonous self-interest, self-centred activity? Right? I do not know if you have ever asked even that question? When you do ask that question you have already begun to be a little more intelligent. Naturally. So we are going this morning together to think this problem over, together. Thinking together, not I tell you and you accept, or reject, but together find out if this movement of the ego, the self, can ever end. Right? Are you interested in this? No, no, don't nod your heads. This is a very serious problem. You may be stimulated while you are in the tent by the speaker - and I hope you are not. But you may be stimulated and therefore rather excited and say, "Yes, I agree with you. We must do this," - and when you leave the tent you forget all about it and carry on in your old ways. So together, you putting aside your particular prejudice, your particular gurus, your particular conclusions, together we are going to investigate this question.

To investigate you must be free - right? It is obvious, isn't it? You must be free to examine, you must be free from those blocks which impede your examination. The impediments are your prejudices, your experience, your own knowledge, or other people's knowledge, all those act as impediments and then you cannot possibly have the capacity to examine or think together. Right? At least intellectually see this. The speaker has none of these problems: he has no prejudices, no beliefs either. Finished. Only then we can meet together if you are also in that same position.

So let us examine, think over, think together. To think together over the question why human beings, right throughout the world, have remained self-centred. Knowing all the problems it entails, knowing all the confusion, misery, sorrow it involves, they hold on to it - right? Now we are asking: is it desire? You know what desire is? We are asking is it, the root of this self-centred activity, desire? What is desire? You all desire so many things: desire for enlightenment, desire for happiness, desire for good looks, desire for what - a world that will be peaceful, desire to fulfil and avoid frustration - you understand? - desire by which all human beings are driven. Do you follow this? We are asking, is that one of the root causes of this self-centred existence with all its confusion and misery?

And religions throughout the world have said you must suppress desire - right? You must become a monk, in the service of god, and to attain that supreme thing you must have no desire. You understand? This has been the constant repetition of all the so-called religious people in the world. And without understanding what is the structure and the nature of desire, they have had this ideal that to serve the highest principle, Brahman, in India, god or Christ in the Christian world, or other forms of religious sectarian nonsense, suppress, control, dominate desire - right?

Now we together are going to look into what is desire. Now when you examine what is desire, please listen carefully, when you examine what is desire or analyse, you are using thought as a means of analysis. That is, going into the past. You are following this? And so you are using the old instrument, which is limited thought, and looking into the past, step by step, which is the whole psychoanalytical process. You are following all this? But to examine desire you must see the actuality of it, not step it back. You understand what I am saying? Please come with me a little bit. You must be very clear on this point. The psychoanalytical introspective self examination process is going backwards, and thereby hoping to find the cause - right? To do that you employ thought - right? And thought is limited, the old instrument, you are using the old instrument to find the root of desire.

Now we are saying something entirely different. Please give a little attention to it. We are saying analysis by oneself, or by the professional, doesn't lead anywhere, unless you are slightly neurotic and all the rest of it, then it may be a little helpful. Perhaps we are all slightly neurotic! We are saying: observe the nature of desire. Don't analyse, just observe. You understand the difference? Is this clear? I am going to show it to you. Must everything be explained, which is too bad. You don't jump to it and say, "Yes, I have got it". All that you say is, "Explain, and I will get it. Explain the whole movement of desire, employ the words, correct words, describe it precisely and I'll get it". What you get is the clarity of explanation, clarity of words, but that doesn't give you the total observation of the movement of desire. You have got this?

So can you stop analysing but just observe? Have you got it? Are we meeting each other? One can describe the beauty of the mountain, the white snow, the blue sky, the marvellous dignity and the glory of it, the valleys, the rivers, the streams, the flowers, and most of us are satisfied with the explanations. We don't say, "I'll go, get up and climb and find out".

We are going into this question of desire very carefully, not the movement of tracing it back and thereby hoping to find the nature of desire. You understand? But actively together look at it. What is desire? Look at it yourself. Together we are doing it. What is desire? You desire a dress, which you see in the window, and there is the response. You like the colour, the shape, the fashion, and desire says, "Let me go and buy it". So what has taken place actually at that moment? Which is not analysis, but actually observing the reaction to the seeing of that dress in the window, and the response to that. You are following this? Yes? You are following this? Don't go to sleep please. You see that dress, you like the colour, you like the fashion - what has taken place there? You observe, there is the sensation - right? There is contact, you touch it, then desire arises through the image which thought has built, you putting on that dress. Do you understand this? Seeing, sensation, contact, then thought imagining that dress on you and then desire. You follow this? No, not follow me, the fact of it. I have only given an explanation, the words, but the actual response, we are talking of the actual response; the seeing, contact, sensation, thought imagining that dress on you and desire is born. You understand? Have you got this? No, no, yours, not mine.

Now wait, follow this carefully. The moment thought creates the image, from that image desire is born - right? You understand this? Please understand this. I am bored with explanations! I will stick to that dress, or the shirt. You see there is perception of that in the window, the seeing, the visual optic response, then go inside, touch the material, then thought says, "How nice it would be if I had it". And imagine that you are wearing it. That is the moment of desire - right? Do you see this, actually, not my explanation and through the explanations you see? Is that clear, that you yourself observe the happening?

Now the question is - please go into it carefully - why does thought create the image of you having that shirt, that dress, and then pursuing it? Watch it. Think it out. Go into it. Exercise your brains. One sees a blue shirt. Then you see it, go and touch it, feel the material, then thought comes and says, "How nice". Then the question is: can thought abstain itself from creating the image? You understand my question? I will explain, take time, I will go into it.

We are examining the whole movement of desire because we are asking: is desire the very root of this self-centred, egotistic existence? And from that we are asking: is it desire? And then we say: what is desire? And the speaker is totally opposed to suppression because that doesn't solve the problem, totally he says don't run away from it into a monastery, into taking vows and all kinds of things - that is merely avoidance. But what we are saying is: examine it, look at it, not analytically but as it is taking place, observe. The observation shows, the optic response to the blue dress, blue shirt, the contact inside, going into the shop, touching the material, then thought creates the image and desire is born. It is only when thought creates the image, desire comes into being.

Otherwise it does not. Are you now together in this? Right?

So desire comes into being and flowers the moment you create the image, thought creates the image. You have had a pleasant experience, sexual or whatever you have. And it has created an image, a picture and you pursue it. One is a form of pleasure, the other is the movement of contradictory desires - right? You desire that dress - or desire great success and so on and on and on. Now can you observe this fact that the moment when thought creates the image, desire is born? Are you aware of this? Do you see actually as it happens how thought creates through its imagination the desire to pursue the very end - right? Do you actually now sitting there, observe this fact for yourself? Obviously. It is very simple. Right?

The question arises then: can thought not create the image? That is the whole point. Do you understand? Am I making this terribly difficult?

Questioner: May I suggest that the new instrument is the object?

K: Just a minute sir, let me finish then we can carry on. May I finish? May I finish what I am saying? And then you can ask questions if there is time, and we have five discussions after the talks are over. Then you can bully me! So till then have patience.

We have come to the point when you yourself observe the springing of desire - right? Perception, seeing, contact, sensation. Up to there there is no desire. It is just reaction. You follow? But the moment thought creates the image the whole cycle begins. Do you see this? If you see it clearly then the question arises: why does thought always create this image? Do you understand my question? Why? You see a shirt, red, blue, white, whatever it is, instantly like and dislike, which is, thought has its previous experiences, liking and so on. So can you observe the blue shirt, dress in the window, and realize the nature of thought and see that the moment when thought comes in the problem begins? Not only the blue shirt or dress, your sex, your sexual experiences, the image, the pictures, the thinking over. Or the image that you have of a position, a status, a function. Do you follow? So desire is that. So can you observe without the inflaming desire coming into being? You understand my question? Go into it, you will see it. You can do it. That is the new instrument, which is to observe.

Then does desire for security - they are the same thing, security in terms of big house, little house, bank account, which may be necessary, and also security, desire has created about oneself, the image that you have about yourself, and the fulfilment of that image in action, in that is involved many kinds of frustration and in spite of the frustrations, in spite of conflicts, misery, desire pursues, because thought is always creating the image where there is sensation involved - right? I wonder if you see this?

So we are asking then, the next question is: is desire responsible for fear? We have sought security through desire and the fulfilment of that desire, in god - psychologically, I don't want to go on and on about this beastly stuff - and unconsciously, deeply one may be aware that the things in which you have invested, desire has invested have no value at all. And having no value, you are frightened. You understand? Are you following this, because again we are not analysing fear. That is a stupid old game. We are observing the actual fact of fear. And as it arises, to observe, ask, what is the root of it? Not analytically discover the root of it, but in the very observation of it you discover the root. You get it? Are you following all this? You seem rather doubtful. I am going to go into this.

Man has accepted and lived with fear, both outwardly and inwardly: fear of violence, fear of physically getting hurt and so on, outwardly. Psychologically, fear of not conforming to a pattern, fear of public opinion, fear of not achieving, not fulfilling and so on, you know, psychologically. We are asking, which is a fact, can you observe that fact without the analytical mind operating on the fact and observe the whole movement of fear as it exists? You understand?

(Are you getting tired? Ten minutes more. Bear up with it!) Because you see it is possible to be absolutely psychologically free of fear, absolutely. Don't accept my word for it, it is your life, not mine, it is yours, you have to find this out.

So you have to ask: what is fear? Has it roots in desire? Go into it slowly, don't say no. Go into it. Desire being what we have said: thought creating the image and then pursuing that image that it might fulfil, and might not. You follow? If it fulfils there is no fear, or at least there are other calamities involved in it. But when there is no fulfilment there is frustration and the fear of not being able to fulfil - you understand? This whole complex sexual fulfilment, which apparently the world is now just discovering, and making a lot of noise about it - promiscuous and all the rest of it. So we are asking: is fear the product of desire? Desire being the image formation and the fulfilment of that image in action. Right? Or is fear - please follow this carefully - part of time? You understand? Is fear the movement of time? So are desire and time responsible for fear? You understand? Oh, my Lord! I will explain. I will explain. Go slowly.

Desire is the movement of thought with its imagery. That is, the movement of thought creating the image and the movement of that image, which is time - right? No? Not chronological time, psychological time. And we are asking: is time responsible also for fear? The time of desire - ah, I am getting it. You get it? The time which desire creates and thought, which has created the desire, and thought being also time, so thought and desire are responsible for fear. You see that? I am afraid what you might do to me. I am afraid you might hurt me psychologically. I am afraid that dog will bite me. But at the moment of biting, time has come to an end. You understand? It is only the dog might bite me. I have created the image, thought has created the image, that dog biting, which is time, in the future. You are following all this? So desire has its future and time is naturally future, the past, present and future.

So the question is: can thought realize its own movement creating fear? You understand? Thought realizing its own nature. When it realizes its own nature, as the active principle in fear, what takes place? There is only then what is actually happening. I wonder if you see that? Do please, come. Because it would be worthwhile if we could think together about this matter. Then you will leave the tent having understood the movement of fear and realizing the nature of desire and the nature of limited thought creating time, which is fear. You understand? Do you realize it? Or have you merely accepted the words? You understand? If you realize it the thing is over. There are no gurus, no gods, all that nonsense.

Q: My thought does not stop.

K: No, no. It is not a question of thought stopping. No, no, don't say thought - we will discuss that a little later when we talk about meditation, if you are interested. But that is not the point. I am saying: does thought itself realize what it is doing? That it has created the desire and the fulfilment of that desire is time. And in that is involved fear. And also thought has created what might happen. There has been pain, I hope there won't be pain again, which is in the future. So thought has created the future - right? And the future is the very nature of fear. I wonder if you get it?

Look sirs: if I die instantly there is no fear. If I have an immediate heart attack - phst, gone, there is no fear. But my heart is weak, I might die, which is the future. The future is the movement of fear. Get it? See the truth of it, not your conclusion. Not your saying, "Yes, I see it". - the truth of it.

Then that very truth operates. You don't have to do a thing. If you see that truth and that truth being the fact, then thought says, "All right, I have finished". Thought cannot operate on a fact. It can operate on something which is non-fact. So can you after having listened to this verbiage, have you realized the nature of fear? See the truth of it. If you really see the truth of it, fear has gone. It is not that you control thought. You are the thought. You understand? This is one of our peculiar conditioning that you are different from thought, and therefore you say, "I will control thought". But when you realize that thought itself is the 'me' and that thought has created this future, which is fear, and see the truth of it, not intellectually see the truth, you can't see the truth intellectually, you can see intellectually the clear, verbal explanation, but that is not the truth. The truth is the fact that the future, the whole movement of the future is giving birth to fear.

Now you have listened to this, perhaps in different ways, and different explanations on different occasions, and you are gathered here again, and you have listened this morning to a very clear explanation, which is not analysis, and are you free of fear? That is the test. If you are still carrying on, you say, "I am afraid of..." - you know, all the rest of that business, then you haven't really listened.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 19TH JULY 1979

I wonder if we could forget all that we have been talking about during the last five gatherings here and begin as though we are meeting for the first time. And not having heard what has been said, start anew, start afresh so that perhaps we may be able to find some abiding truthful solution to all our complexities and problems.

What is the central issue that we would, if we went into it carefully, diligently, hesitantly, come upon, which may resolve all our sorrows, griefs, anxieties, the depressions, the failures, the fulfilments, the frustrations and all that? Is there one solution, or one observation, one insight, one comprehension that will bring about a total revolution psychologically in each one of us? You understand my question? One answer, absolute, irrevocable, not relative, but complete, whole, lasting, and yet timeless. Is there such a solution?

If each one of us put that question to ourselves, would we answer it according to our particular pleasure, to our particular experience, to our own knowledge? Or would we, if we are at all serious and not too flippant, investigate together to find out a remedy that will enlighten our hearts and minds? Can we look at the whole of life, not one particular segment, one particular part, one idiosyncrasy, try to find an answer politically, religiously - I am using the word 'religiously' rather sceptically - economically, and so on? Can we look at all these divisions which man has brought about as a whole? To look at this world outside of us with all its innumerable divisions, and inwardly, psychologically we are fragmented, broken up. And one asks oneself if it is possible to see the whole of this outer and inner as a total movement, indivisible, as a whole structural movement of thought? Is that possible? Or our minds are so broken up, so fragmented, so divided, that we are incapable of seeing the whole movement of life as one unitary movement. You understand?

Please, as we said the other day, and if I may repeat: we are thinking over together this question, together, not that the speaker investigates and you listen, but rather together you and the speaker find out for yourself if there is a way of living which is comprehensive, which is whole, which is not yours or mine, but a life that is a movement without a beginning and without an end? To find that out, I think it is important, if one may point out, to be aware of one's own fragmentary outlook. You are either a psychologist, psychotherapist, and you are trained along that particular line, and so one's brain, one's conditioning, is already established, and therefore one cannot see the whole. Or you may be a businessman, again the same phenomena takes place. Or if you are a politician then you are doomed. Or if you are a religious man, inclined to be religious, not accepting any particular dogma, creed, ritual, and all that. Or an ordinary human being, of which you are all part of this, with all his anxieties, with his sorrows and pleasures, and fears, competition, comparison, measuring himself against others, and always trying to reach something which he has projected, and hopes to find.

So are we together aware of our fragmentation? Actually aware of it? Not imagine that you are fragmented and then think that you are? You follow? Either the idea of fragmentation is so strong, and that idea shapes our thinking, then you think that I am fragmented. Or one observes the actual state of the mind which is fragmented, broken up, shrivelled. Can such a mind observe this extraordinary complex movement, with its great beauty, subtlety, can one observe this totally? You understand my question?

Please, you are not listening to me. I only happen to be sitting on the platform for the convenience of you all so that you can see the speaker, but the speaker is not the authority. In spiritual matters, in the matters of the spirit, in the matters of the investigation, there is no authority, no guru, which is obvious. That is, if you carry the knowledge of the others - and perhaps all knowledge is the result of others - and add your own particular knowledge to the accumulated knowledge there already in your brain, then to find out if there is one act, one state of mind that will solve all our problems. Do you understand what we are talking about? Are we meeting each other about the question itself?

Ignorance is part of knowledge - right? I wonder if you see that? You know the whole concept of a priest, the guru, the one who knows, in that concept, in that conviction, there is the one who is enlightened, clear, and helps the other to free himself from his own ignorance. And generally, and often, and very, very, very rarely, the authority who has knowledge tries to dispel the ignorance of the other but his knowledge is still part of ignorance. Are you following all this? And here, in these gatherings that we have had for the last nearly twenty years, there is no authority whatsoever. Because authority of any kind in spiritual matters makes you a prisoner to another system, conviction, ideas, knowledge. In that there is no freedom. And to find out if there is a solution to all our complex innumerable problems, is there one seeing, one perception, one observation that frees completely the whole of this structure which man has put together, psychologically? You understand? Are we meeting each other?

You see to go into this one must have great humility; not humbleness, not psycho-phantasm, not searching somebody's robes and saying "I am very humble". That quality of humility that has had no vanity, that has never known vanity. You understand? Otherwise it is not humility. Go into this carefully. Those who are vain, arrogant, full of their own importance and their own knowledge, their own realization, and all that business, in that there is a sense of self-importance. And that state of mind then cultivates humility. Haven't you known all this? So a mind that has known vanity in any direction - scientifically, religiously, politically, the sense of achievement which gives one a great self-importance and arrogance - such a mind can never comprehend a quality which is totally free of vanity. We are meeting all this?

And people have also tried, for millenia upon millenia, to find that absolute solution to their lives through austerity. Austerity is harsh, strict, severe, stridently noisy, stridently strict: putting on robes - sorry, I am not talking of those gentlemen here - putting on robes of different colours all over the world and imagine that they are stridently simple. It is only the noise of their simplicity that prevents them from being simple. Because when you are simple it doesn't matter what clothes you have on. But clothes have become extraordinarily important in the world, in the religious world, indicating a tradition which you accept and thereby hope to lead a simple life. Man has tried several things, played so many tricks upon himself, and those of us, if we are at all serious, are efficiently, honestly trying to find out a way of life and therefore a way of action, which comes from the comprehension, from the perception of that one solution - right? Are we meeting each other? Don't be angry with me please, those of you who have got this, different robes and so on, we have been through all that. It doesn't mean a thing.

I once followed in the Himalayas a group of monks. It was a beautiful country, wild rhododendrons, lilies, the flowers of the alps of that altitude, and the great pine trees shooting into the heavens, blue skies and the birds were singing. It was a lovely day. And these monks never looked up, never looked at the trees, the flowers, the skies and the wonder of the world because they were concerned about their own ritual, about their own mantras repeating. And they think through that way they will find the heavens.

Here, if one may point out, the meaning of the word 'mantra'; probably you all know about it. It is a Sanskrit word which means - please listen - which means consider, meditate, ponder over not becoming, and also put aside all self-centred activity. That word mantra means that. Consider, go into your own becoming and put aside every form of selfish activity - that is the real meaning of that word. And look what these yogis have done to that word! You understand?

So seeing all this, the various forms of physical torture in order to find enlightenment, the various forms of rituals, robes, repetitions, and these have not in any way changed human beings and their relationship so that there is a new good society. We mean by that word 'good' not the nursery meaning, "Be a good boy", it is not a respectable word, it is not a word that you can say, "Well it is old fashioned, throw it out," but that word 'good' has an excellent meaning, significance. And man through all these endeavours has never brought about a good society where people live happily, without conflict, without violence, with a great sense of responsibility, with care, with affection. That is what we mean by that word good. Man has not been able to achieve it. One of the main reasons for this ugliness in the world is that all of us, most human beings, probably 99%, are fragmented, broken up. And when one realizes this, that one is in a state of fragmentation, one is cognizant, aware without any choice, it is so. It is not that the speaker is imposing this on you, but it is a fact. And can that mind which is fragmented, can that heart which is also caught up in various romantic, emotional, sentimental, illusory nonsense, can that mind ever come to this, to find a solution that is everlasting? You understand my question? Right?

How shall we find out? Is it dependent on another? Follow this carefully. Can another, however much he may think he is lord, and this and the other, can another lead you or help you to that? Right? Please ask this question? Can a group, can a community, can a series of ideas, conclusions, help you to that? Or one must be a light to oneself, not the light which has been kindled at the other's lamp or candle, or fire. You are following this? Please give your heart to understand all this. Which means not only your heart, your mind, your brain. Freedom is not acting according to whatever you like. That is too childish, which is what is happening in the world, everybody is doing what they want. And any prevention, any restraint on that is considered lack of fulfilment. Therefore permissiveness in every direction, religiously, socially, morally, is encouraged. And this permissiveness, that is doing exactly what one likes, or saying "It appeals to me, I feel good in that", denies freedom - we are talking psychologically not freedom from war, from the policeman, from taxes - but freedom from the dependence on another psychologically, because the other, when he instructs you from his knowledge, from his position, from his status, that knowledge is still part of ignorance, because knowledge can never be complete, therefore it is always part of ignorance. Right? I wonder if you see that? Of course.

Knowledge can never be whole, can never be complete, total. And therefore in it there is ignorance. When you realize that, when you see that, that you cannot possibly have an authority in matters of the spirit, in matters of the psyche, in the matters of deep religious enquiry, there is no dependence completely on anybody. That is freedom, with its responsibility to be a light to oneself. Are you following all this? Are we like that? Because we are going together to find out, please find out for ourselves, not at the behest of another, not stimulated by another, not encouraged by another, but find out for oneself totally, completely, which is not egotistic, so that one can be a light to oneself - right?

Are we together in this? - not agreeing, not being cornered in a tent and therefore you are forced to agree, or stimulated by the speaker with his intensity. If you are, then it is just a flame that can be blown out by the next wind.

So having said all this, is your mind - your mind being your brain, your senses, the quality of your thinking, knowing its limitation, being prepared - not prepared, I won't use that word 'prepared', preparation implies time, that is one of our pet theories that we need time to be a light to oneself - are our minds after listening to all this, even though you are listening for the first time, and it is only if you are actually listening for the first time that you are really paying attention. You know it is like looking at the sunset or the sunrise, the beauty and the extraordinary light is never the same. You can see it day after day, day after day, month after month, you never say, "I have seen it once, it is enough". If we have paid attention to what is being said, and what is being said is not a repetition, beauty is never that which is constantly happening, it is always new. A marvellous classical painting, or if you listen to music, it is new all the time. But our minds get so dulled by words and by the repetition of words you say, "I am bored with it. You have said all that before". But if you listen there is always something new, like the sunset, like the evening star, like the waters of a river. (We have still time!)

We are asking you together if our minds and therefore our hearts, our whole being, senses, the quality of the senses which are not divided - you understand? - which are together, and a thought and thinking, knowing that it is limited, fragmented, always of time, and a brain that is the result of millenia, conditioned, full of memories, knowledge, experience, like a computer - of course it is much more capable than a computer, the brain has invented the computer, but the brain also is active as a computer. So we are saying the whole of this, can we enquire with this quality of mind? Or just be in a state of observation, just to observe without the observer? Because the observer is the past, the observer is the result of all the experience, senses, responses, reactions, memories, he is that. To observe without the observer, so that there is only pure observation, not distorted, not broken up, not the result of choice, like and - you know, just to observe.

Then in that state of pure observation is there one act, one insight, one total perception of something that will resolve all these problems? You have understood? There is. Be careful! The speaker says there is. You know nothing about it, naturally. If you are aware of it you wouldn't be here. The speaker says - and please listen carefully - it is not authority, it is not the result of experience, it is not the result of accumulated knowledge, it is none of that. The speaker says there is a solution, a way out of all this terrible confusion and misery and fear, torture and terror. Right? So don't accept it. Where are you at the end of this? Please I am asking this - the speaker is asking this very seriously. We have talked for fifty minutes; at the end of it what is the quality of your mind that is capable - please listen - capable of receiving something and you say, "Yes", and the 'yes' is your own discovery, your own light, your own total attention which you have given to find this out.

Let me go into it carefully. One must have intelligence. Intelligence different from knowledge. In knowledge, as we pointed out earlier, there is ignorance - right? Whereas intelligence is free from ignorance and therefore free from illusion, and it is not the result of accumulated knowledge - right? - intelligence. The quality of intelligence comes when there is perception and action. That is, perception and no interval between perception and action. You see/act. I wonder if you understand this? Are you following this? You see danger - right? - like a precipice. And the very perception is action, you move away instantly. That is intelligence. That is part of that intelligence. You see a dangerous snake and instant action - right? That's fairly simple because there it is a physical response. And the physical reaction is self preservation, which is intelligence. It is the unintelligent that sees the danger and pursues it. You understand? Intelligence is the perception of that which is psychologically dangerous and acting instantly. That is intelligence. Psychologically it is dangerous to depend on another: for affection, for love, for comfort, for enlightenment, that is dangerous because you are not free. And therefore the very perception of that danger and the acting is intelligence. Right?

One must have that quality of intelligence. That intelligence is denied when you are conforming to a pattern laid down by the gurus, by - it doesn't matter who - some idiotic person, or conforming, imitating, following. Therefore there is the ideal and the action which is different from the ideal, or conforming, or adjusting to the ideal - which is lack of perception - right? Lack of seeing the actual movement of this. And when there is perception, the ideal, the imitation, the conformity, following, totally ends and that is intelligence. You are following all this? I am not defining intelligence. It is so. It is only the neurotic that sees the danger and continues. The neurotic, the stupid, the thoughtless, the man who just follows his own particular idiosyncrasy, pleasure, and gives it a rational meaning and so on.

So one must have this quality of intelligence. Then with that intelligence is there a state, a movement or whatever you like to call it, which can solve all these innumerable conflicts and miseries? You are following all this? The mind that is totally intelligent. And that mind is enquiring.

Questioner: The quality of the mind is not violent.

K: Sir, if I may point out most respectfully...

Q: You cannot define intelligence in such a violent manner.

Violence towards yourself, violence towards others. Honestly.

K: Sir, there are going to be five days of dialogue. Then please raise this question. The speaker is not preventing you from asking questions, from doubting what he says, from questioning everything that he has said. But this is not the occasion. So please have patience and consideration.

With that intelligence we are enquiring to find out if there is, there may not be, if there is an act, a state, a quality that resolves every issue of our life. Surely - I am hesitant because one has to use words that have been spoiled, one has to use a word that has lost all its meaning. A word like love has become sexual, sensory, sensuous, with it goes pleasure, fear, anxiety, dependence and all the ugliness that takes place in the so-called relationship. So one uses that word very, very hesitantly. It is in no way related to jealousy, fear, or sorrow. It is total responsibility, not only to your immediate person but the total responsibility to the whole of life, not only your life but the other life. I say that love is the total answer. Without that, do what you will, stand on your head for the rest of your life, sit in a position, lotus, or whatever you do. So with that intelligence goes the other. You understand? Without intelligence you cannot have the other. They are inseparable. And that is why compassion has this quality of great intelligence. And that is the solution which will solve all our problems. Right sirs.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC TALK 22ND JULY 1979

I believe this is the last talk. On Wednesday we will have some dialogues for five days. Why are you all sitting so quietly?

I wonder if you have ever noticed our minds are very rarely quiet, silent, having no problems, or having problems putting them aside for a while, and having a free mind, a mind that is not cluttered, a mind that is not stretching out, not seeking anything; but absolutely quiet, silent, and perhaps observing, not only what is happening in the world but also what is happening in the inner world, in the world of one's own existence, one's own attitudes, travails, just to observe. I wonder if one has ever done this kind of thing. Or, are we always seeking, searching, asking, analysing, demanding, trying to fulfil, trying to follow somebody, some ideal and so on, or trying to establish a good relationship with another? I wonder why there is this constant struggle and strife and seeking? One goes to India, I don't know why, seeking something extraordinary that is going to happen when you go to that country, follow somebody who tells you to dance, to sing, to do whatever you want. And there are those who try to force you to meditate in a certain fashion, accept authority, do certain rituals, shout when you like and so on. Why are we all doing this? What is our everlasting thirst? What is it that we are seeking? If we could go into that a little bit, try to find out for ourselves what it is that we are longing, searching, seeking, trying to fulfil, trying to become something.

Apart from the religious beliefs and dogmas and rituals, which fairly intelligent people have put aside, and not going to Tibet or to Japan, or trying to do Zen Buddhism, you know the whole business of it, but remaining quietly at one's own home, or taking a solitary walk, can one ask why there is this everlasting thirst? Could we go into that a little? Because we have talked about most things during the last six talks. We have talked about fear, thinking together; we have talked about sorrow, pleasure; and we have also talked about intelligence and love and compassion. As we pointed out, without intelligence, which we carefully went into, there cannot be love, or compassion. They go together. Not the intelligence of books and cunning contrivance of thought, nor the intelligence of the very clever, subtle mind; but the intelligence that perceives directly what is not true and what is false, what is dangerous and immediately lets it go, such a quality of mind is intelligent. And if we could go into that this morning, not only into what is it that we are all seeking, longing, but also perhaps as we go along find out for ourselves what is the quality of a mind - mind being all our senses, all our reactions, all our emotions and the capacity to think very clearly, all that is the mind, the essence of which is thought. And perhaps we could talk over together what is the nature of meditation, and if there is anything in life, in our daily existence, not only material activities and material possessions, money, sex, sensations, but also beyond all that, if there is something really sacred, not put together by thought, not the images that thought has created in various forms, in various cathedrals, temples and so on, but actually, for ourselves, find out, perhaps through meditation, being free of all illusion, deceit and thinking very honestly, if there is something that is really sacred, which is the movement of meditation.

So first let us enquire, if we may, think together, what is it that we are hungering after? Most people have had various types and varieties of experiences, not only sensual experiences but incidents that have brought about various emotional, sensational and romantic movements, but also these experiences that one has had are rather trivial; and perhaps all experiences are rather trivial. And when we begin to enquire what it is that we are all seeking, wanting, longing, is it a superficial, mere sensory experience, or something which desire seeks, which must obviously be rather superficial? And can we in thinking over together move from the superficiality to a deeper, wider enquiry? Right? That is, we are, you and the speaker, are thinking out together if all our longings are merely superficial, sensory demands, or is the longing, the searching, the thirst for something far beyond all that? You understand my question?

How do you enquire into this? When you have put this question, whether your enquiry, your longing is merely superficial, such as wanting more money, better relationship, trying to fulfil, trying to become happy, you know, superficially, on the surface - how do you enquire into that? Through analysis? Analysis is still the same movement of thought, looking back. And analytically thought examining itself with its accidents, its experiences, its examination will still be limited because thought is limited. That is clear. But that is the only instrument we have, and so we keep on repeating, using the same instrument, knowing that it is limited, and knowing that it cannot solve the problem, or have the capacity to enquire very deeply, and yet we keep on doing this - right? We never realize, I think, that this instrument however blunt, however used up, cannot solve the problem and therefore put it aside. We don't seem to be capable of doing that - why? Please enquire with me. You understand my question?

Thought has created the technological world - right? Thought has created all the divisions in the world. Thought has created not only national divisions, but religious divisions, ideological divisions, every form of division between two people, however much they may think they love each other, there is still this division, and thought is responsible for that, which is obvious. Would we accept that - that thought in its activity will inevitably, being limited, being the result of the past, must inevitably bring about a division and therefore limited. Thought can never see the whole - right?

Now can we ask is such activity superficial? Or can thought with its limitation enquire more deeply? You follow what I am saying? Have we understood each other? Can we go on? Please it is not verbal explanation, it is not that verbally we are clear, but rather together find out for ourselves what is the root of this hunger, great desire to search, to find, you know this constant movement out and in. This is obvious, right?

Is observation, to observe, the instrument of thought? You follow? Please go into this a little bit with me. To observe: does that involve the movement of thought? You may observe, then conclude, conceive, create through that observation. The creation, the activity through that observation is the movement of thought. That is what we generally do. I see that colour, one sees that colour, there is the observation of it, then like and dislike, prejudices, all those are the movement of thought. Right? Can one observe without any of the movement of thought? Does that require a kind of discipline? Discipline, the root of it, is to learn. To learn, not to conform, not to imitate, not to make the mind dull, routine - all that. But to learn. Now can one learn that the activity of observation, without the thought creating the image out of that observation, and acting according to that image - right? Can one merely observe? Which is to learn, to observe and to learn or to be aware of the movement of thought interfering with that observation? To learn about it. Which is, actual discipline, to learn. I wonder if you have got this? Are we following each other? Are we doing it as we are talking, or you are going to think it over? Please we are all doing it together, thinking it out together.

So we are saying: when there is observation into say, our longing, our thirst for something, can you observe without any motive - motive being the past, which may be the desire, the conclusion of thought - without the past interfering with the actual observation? Can you do that? That is to learn. This whole movement, the observation, the interference of thought, and what the result and the effect of all this movement is, just to observe. One wants to learn. Learning is the accumulation of knowledge, generally - right? School, college, university - or learning about relationship and so on, learning. Having accumulated knowledge then act - right? The purpose of learning is to accumulate knowledge, and from that act skilfully, or unskillfully, it depends. Or you act and then learn, which is from action accumulate knowledge. You have understood? You are following all this? So our action is always based on the accumulation of knowledge - right? Acting and learning from acting, and accumulating. Accumulating knowledge and acting - right? So our actions are always based upon the past, or the past projecting the future, and acting according to the future. It is the same movement, modified but it is still the same movement - right? I wonder if you are following all this? You are doing it sirs?

We are pointing out something entirely different - you understand? Accumulating knowledge and then acting. Accumulating knowledge and projecting from that knowledge the future and acting from the future. So our actions are invariably the result of the past or the future; that is, action based on time, yesterday, today and tomorrow. Yesterday meeting the present, which is today, modifying itself and proceeding - right? Our action is based on that. So our actions are always incomplete, obviously. Because in that there are regrets, a sense of frustration, they are never complete, obviously - right?

Now we are pointing out something else, totally different. Which is, an observation in which the past and the future doesn't exist. Just to observe. As one observes if one is a good scientist through a microscope, observing what is actually going on. Right? When he observes what is actually going on, the thing which he is observing undergoes a change, undergoes a movement - right? Please listen to this. Can one observe the longing, the seeking, the urge, the intense energy that is demanded, just to observe that without the movement of the past? You have got it? Are you following all this? It is not terribly intellectual, please. It is merely logical, merely reasonable, and therefore rather sane. Sane, which means healthy. So can one do that? To observe our longing, what it is we want out of life, what it is we are seeking, hunting - most of us are, otherwise you all wouldn't be here. That is - please go into it a little more - you read books, philosophy, psychology, doctorate in this and that, or so-called religious books. In those they are always pointing out that there is something beyond, parapsychology - you understand? - more, something more and more, deeper and deeper and deeper. And having read those one would say, "Perhaps there is, I am going after that". And then one gets caught by the priests, by the gurus, by the latest fashion and so on, till you think you have found something which is satisfying and you say "I am perfectly happy, I don't have to seek any more". Which may perhaps be an illusion. And most people like to live in illusions.

And all your search and your demands, your hunger has not solved or brought about a good society - you understand - a good society, a society that is based on peace, there is no violence, there is no each one trying to fulfil his own ambitions and all the rest of the violence. The purpose of our enquiry into all this is to bring about a good society in which we human beings can live happily without fear, without conflict, without all this striving, struggling, all the brutality and all the rest of it, because that is the intention of enquiry, because a society is built out of the relationship of people. If our relationship is not correct, precise, actual, then we create a society which is as it is now, which is what is happening in the world - right?

So our enquiry into this: which is, why human beings separate, you are seeking something, another is seeking totally different, each one is asking something different - right? And therefore there is always this self-centred movement. And the society which we have created is based on these self-centred problems, self-centred ambitions, fulfilment and self-centred discipline which says, 'I must', which brings about violence. We are enquiring into all that, which we have, and also we are enquiring into a mind - your mind - mind - you understand? When we use the word 'mind', it is not your mind, or my mind, but mind. Because your mind is like the mind of thousands and millions of people - right? Striving, struggling, demanding, following, accepting, obeying, idealizing, belonging to some religion, sorrow, pain, anxiety, your mind is that and the other minds are like that - right? So your mind is not yours. It is the mind. I don't know if you see this? You may not see this because your vanity, your sense of individual importance may prevent this observation, which is actual. Right? I wonder if you see this? That is why, until we really understand this, that we human beings are so similar psychologically, we human beings right throughout the world are so unhappy. They all pray, but prayer doesn't answer this problem. They are still unhappy, still striving still despairing. This is the common mind. And so when we are enquiring we are enquiring into the human being, not me and you. We are human beings. I wonder if you see all this?

And enquiring into that, can one observe the outward world, the divisions and all the rest of it, the terror, the danger, the politicians with their criminalities - can we observe all that, just to observe, not draw a conclusion? If we observe what is happening out there, and equally observe what is happening inwardly, then our actions are not your action and my action. I don't know if you follow all this. We are then acting together - do you understand? - because we have observed the same thing together.

Now we are asking what it is that we are seeking? You understand? If you ask yourself what is it you are seeking, is it money, is it security, is it to be free from fear so that you can have everlasting pleasure, is it that you are seeking to be free from the burden of sorrow - not only your burden but the world's burden of sorrow? Or are you seeking - apart from all the religious nonsense - or are you seeking something which is timeless, something that thought has not touched at all? You understand? Something essentially original? Something that is absolutely incorruptible? So find out for yourself, as a human being, like the rest of the other human beings in the world, what is it one is longing, seeking, hungering after.

If one is wanting experience because one has had sensory experiences, sexual experiences, the experiences of various kinds, and one has said, "That is enough, I have had all those but I want some other kind" - you follow? Some more. Is that what you are seeking? Some experience which will give you great delight, great understanding, an illumination, a transformation. How will you find out?

First of all to find out one must be free of all illusions - right? Which means terrible honesty so that your mind doesn't deceive itself - right? Not to deceive itself one must understand the whole nature of desire - right? Because it is desire that creates illusion, through desire one wants fulfilment, one hopes for something more. So unless you comprehend the whole nature and the structure of desire it will inevitably create illusion. And we went into the question of desire. So can your mind, having understood the activity of desire, know its relative value and therefore be free to observe? Which means you observe without any kind of illusion.

Nationalism is an illusion - right? Obviously. That is very easy. The illusions that thought has created - right? Is one aware of illusions? Come on sirs. And when the mind is free of illusions, and so being absolutely without any hypocrisy, being clear, honest, then you can begin to enquire: enquire into something, asking whether there is a timeless existence. You understand? A timeless truth. That is, this is where meditation comes into being - right? You are following all this?

Have any of you done meditation? Probably not, or probably have - transcendental meditation, Tibetan meditation, the Hindu meditation, the Buddhist meditation, the Zen meditation. Probably you have played with all those. Seriously or flippantly. All those, as far as one can understand, and the speaker has discussed this question with all the scholars of all the various circuses, and their whole concept is: that thought must be controlled, that one must have discipline, one must subjugate one's own feeling to something other than 'what is', through awareness, through control, through constant alertness - you know all this, don't you ? And repeat certain mantras, slogans: you can repeat 'amen' or 'coca-cola' or what you like (Laughter) - don't laugh, they are all similar. So what we are saying is: meditation has been accepted to be all this.

Now if you want to find out what is meditation, not just accept what somebody says, if you want to find out certain obvious things are necessary. There must be no authority, because then you depend on that - right? Obviously. Therefore you are struggling, you are imitating, conforming. And one must understand the nature of control. Who is the controller? You understand? Do you understand this? I wonder if you understand all this? No? Are you interested in all this? Because it is your life, not my life. It is your everyday life we are talking about. What is involved in it, whether one can be free of all this chaos, confusion and misery. And this is the enquiry, you are enquiring, not me enquiring and you accepting; we are together enquiring, we are together taking the journey.

So first, as we said, no authority, which means cease to be secondhand. You understand? We are all secondhand people, because secondhand is tradition. We never say, "Look, I have put away all that, let me look."

The next question is control: from childhood we are trained, educated to control, to suppress; or the other extreme, which is what is happening now, do what you like, do your own thing! Which is the opposite of the other. So one must understand the whole movement of control. Is there a way of living - please listen to this - is there a way of living without any form of control? Which doesn't mean doing what you like, either permissiveness or the other, indulgence. Is there a way of living - please enquire into this, perhaps this is something new to you - in which there is not a shadow of control? So to find that out one has to ask: who is the controller? Right? We are enquiring into what is meditation, because perhaps if one can understand the nature of meditation, not the meaning of the word, the meaning of the word is very simple - to ponder, to think over, to enquire and so on and so on - but apart from the word, to find out what is meditation. It may, in this enquiry, resolve, bring about a life which is extraordinarily sane, extraordinarily rational, and you may be able to find out something that is nameless, timeless. We are leading to that.

So who is the controller who says, "I must control my feelings," or "I must allow my feelings to flow" and so on, who is that entity that says, "I must control"? You understand? Control and the controlled. The controller and the thing to be controlled. Therefore there is a division. Who is this controller? Is it not still the movement of thought? Thought has said - please follow this - thought has said, "I have experienced this, I have learned this" and all the rest of it, which is the past, so the past is the controller - right? And that which is happening now has to be controlled by the controller - right? You understand? Are you following all this? Or are you just going to sleep?

Questioner: Following.

K: Actually doing it sir. I am not talking for my benefit - right? I have talked for fifty two years - 'basta' for me. I am not interested in talking. But I am interested to find out if you can also discover the same thing so that your own life will be totally different, transformed, so that you have no problems, no complexities, no strife, longings, and all the rest of it. That is the reason the speaker is talking, not for his own gratification, not for his own enjoyment, not for his own fulfilment - all that nonsense.

So the controller is the result of thought, thought based upon knowledge, which is the past. And that thought says, "I must control that which is happening now" - right? The actual. The actual is being, say for example, envy or jealousy, which you all know. And thought says, "I must control. I must analyse. I must suppress it, or fulfil it". So there is a division - right? The division created by thought. Are you following? So in this there is deception - right? The deception lies in the idea that the controller is different from that which is to be controlled. Both are created by thought - right? So the controller is the controlled. I wonder if you see this? Right? So if you really understand this, go into this very seriously for yourself, you will see that the controller is unnecessary, only observation is necessary. You understand?

When you observe, there is no controller or the controlled, just observing. Observing your envy, say for example, envy, observe it, without naming it, without denying it or accepting it, just see the sensation, this reaction, which arises, which has been called envy, and to look at it without the word. You are following all this?

Then when there is no word, because the word represents the past - you are following all this? - and when you use the word 'envy' it strengthens the past. Right? So there is a possibility of living without any sense of control. I am saying this not as a theory but actually. The speaker says what he has done, not what he invents, that there is a life without any sense of control and therefore no sense of conflict, no sense of division. That can only come into being when there is only pure observation. Got it? Do it and you will see. Do it. Test it out.

When there is no conflict whatsoever what takes place in the mind? You understand? Conflict implies movement - right? Movement is time - right? Time being from here to there, both physically and psychologically. That is, the movement from the centre to another centre, or the movement from the periphery to another - you follow? There is this constant movement in our lives. Now if you observe this movement very carefully, and as you observe what takes place in the mind? You are following all this?

First you have understood no authority, the nature of thought, thought being limited, and knowledge which is stored up in the brain as memory, and that memory acting as thought in action. So knowledge is always part of ignorance - right? We went into that. So what takes place in the mind? You understand? The mind as we have gone into it is not only the capacity to think clearly, objectively, impersonally, and the things that thought has created, technologically and all the rest of it in the world, and thought has also created all the inward problems - right? When one observes all this, the mind has the capacity to act not from thought but from pure observation. Do you get this? I wonder if you understand? Please sirs, all this is logical, there is nothing sectarian, nothing of Eastern philosophy - none of that. Though the speaker is born in that country called India, he is not an Indian. He has got a passport, that is all. So he is not involved in exotic, romantic, nonsense, or some strange philosophy. We are only examining what is actually taking place. And to observe what is actually taking place one must look, without the response of the past shaping it. From that pure observation there is action. That is intelligence. And that is also the extraordinary thing called love and compassion.

So the mind has this quality of intelligence and naturally with that intelligence goes compassion, love. Love is not mere sex, for god's sake brush all that aside. Love is something other than mere sensation, totally unrelated to our demands and fulfilments and all the rest of it. So the mind now has this quality, this stability. It is like a rock in the midst of a stream, in the midst of a river, immovable - you follow? So such a mind, because it has understood relationship with each other, we went into that - relationship is not based on image, you have an image about me and I have an image about her, and our relationship is that, from image to image. You know all this, don't you? And therefore there is no actual relationship. There may be the relationship of touch, of the senses, but that is not actual deep, profound relationship with another. If there is not that profound relationship there is conflict, and out of that conflict we create this society which is utterly immoral, violent, murderous.

So the mind now has this quality of great stability. And that which is stable is silent - right? Are you following all this? Have you gone into this? Do you understand? To be absolutely clear, to have clarity which can then examine any problem. That clarity is stability. You understand? It is only the mind that is confused, contradictory, broken up that is unstable, neurotic, seeking, striving, struggling. So we come to a point where the mind is totally clear and therefore completely immovable. You understand? Immovable not in the sense of a mountain, but immovable in the sense that it has no problem, all that, therefore it is extraordinarily stable and therefore pliable. Right?

Now: such a mind is quiet. And you need to have a mind that is absolutely silent, absolutely, not relatively - there is the silence when you go of an evening in the woods, there is great silence, all the birds have gone to bed, the wind, the whisper of the leaves has ended, there is great stillness, there is the outward stillness. And people observe that stillness and say, "I must have that stillness", and therefore depend on the stillness of being alone - you understand? - being in solitude. That is not stillness. And there is the stillness created by thought. Which is, thought says, "I must be still, I must be quiet, I mustn't chatter," and gradually it produces a stillness. But that is not it, because it is the result of thought operating on noise - right? So we are talking of a stillness which is not dependent on anything. And it is only that quality of stillness, that absolute silence of the mind that can see that which is eternal, timeless, nameless. This is meditation - right? Right sirs. Finished.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 25TH JULY 1979

For the next five days, every morning here, we are going to have a dialogue. A dialogue means conversation between two people. Two people who are concerned about their life, about their way of living, the world about us and serious enough to resolve their problems, and so they are investigating together through a dialogue. Dialecticism is the art of investigation, the truth, of opinions. The truth of opinions, that is called dialectics. And opinions, our judgements, personal evaluations, points of views and I don't think you can find truth through those means. But perhaps if we are serious enough and concerned and committed to the investigation of our own problems, not theoretically, not in abstraction but actually that which is happening. And two friends are talking over together about their problems, investigating and hoping thereby to resolve their problems. I hope that is clear. This is not a talk by the speaker but together have a conversation, a friendly, not antagonistic, not opposing points of view but together go into our problems. So that is the intention of these morning meetings here for the next five mornings. And I hope we will do that.

Now what shall we talk over together this morning?

Questioner: Sir, is it possible to observe thought as it occurs in the present, or when there is observation the thought is already past?

K: Is it possible to observe thought as it is happening, or to observe thought as it has past? To observe what is thinking as thought arises, and observe that; or investigate thought which has already happened?

Any others? Please, let's put lots of questions and see which is the best of them and take one and work it out completely together. Go to the very end of it. So that is the first question.

Q: I was struck by an automobile when I was seventeen years old and I have had a great deal of difficulty with energy. And I have listened to you for quite a few years and understand about not identifying with the problem. I wonder if you could go into personal mental cripples, like me.

K: Could you discuss, have a conversation about physically being incapable, or having pain and does that affect the mind. Does that affect the quality of thinking, quality of feeling, quality of affection?

That is two questions. Go on sirs.

Q: (Inaudible - about the psyche.)

K: The psyche of the mind and universal psyche. Is that it?

Q: The difference between the 'me' and the individuality.

K: All right sir. The me and individuality.

Q: Would you speak a little bit more about action which is not based on recording?

K: Would you talk, or discuss, have a conversation about what is action, whether there is an action which is precise, accurate, and does not bring about further actions which will demand greater sorrow, greater problems and so on.

Q: What is the relationship between love and death?

K: What is the relationship between love and death. Now just a minute, just a minute!

Q: Could you speak more about the relationship between fear and dependence? I am concerned about dependence in my own life and my relationship with my girl-friend. Sometimes I see it and yet it still continues. Somehow I don't become free of it. Many times I think of just leaving and going away to live on my own. Yet somehow I sense that is not the answer. And yet there are other times when I see my own dependence and yet I am not free of it. And there is tremendous fear.

K: You must make the question, please, short.

Q: The relation between fear and dependence.

K: Fear and dependence. What is the relationship between fear and dependence.

Q: Ambition and why we are so insensitive in our daily life.

K: Ambition and insensitivity in our daily life.

Now just a minute. Which of these questions shall we talk over together? That gentleman asked, is it possible to observe thought as it is taking place, or observe thought as it is over? The other question is, one is physically affected through an accident, a disease, certain forms of illness and does that affect the mind? And the other questions is, what is the relationship between love and death? And you said, is the personal psyche, or the universal psyche? And that gentleman asked, what is the relationship between fear and dependence? And your question sir, which was action, is there an action which is so totally complete that doesn't leave regrets, anxiety, pain and sorrow and all that. Now which of these questions would you like to talk about?

Q: If we discussed dependence would that cover many of the questions?

K: If we discussed dependence would that answer many of the questions. Or would you discuss action, action in daily life, the doing, the way of behaviour, the way of conduct, the way of a relationship in which all action takes place, is there an action that is so totally complete that it doesn't leave a sad remembrance? Is that the question? Shall we discuss that, or do you want to discuss something else? Would you like to discuss action?

Q: Yes.

K: It is whatever you want. All right, let's talk about action. Perhaps in that we will include thought, what is the relationship between love and death, fear and dependence, and physical illness affecting the mind, and the psyche and universal. Can we do this? Do you want to do this?

Q: Yes.

K: Right. What do you mean by action? What do we mean - please, this is a conversation, don't go to sleep, this is a conversation between you and the speaker together. I am not investigating and you are just listening; together we are going to find out if there is an action which is so whole, complete, total that it doesn't leave a single shadow of pain, regret, grief, hurt and all that - right? So what do we mean by action? Please sirs, join with me.

Q: Action must be a creation.

K: Action must be a creation? You see you are now making a statement like, action must be creation, and it is finished. There is no dialogue. But if you say - that is why I am asking please don't offer opinions right off, what you think is action and hold on to it. Let us take it, examine it together - right sirs.

So the first thing is to find out what we mean by that word action. The doing. Do we mean that which has been done, or that which will be done, the action in the past, or the action in the future, or the action which is now taking place. This is action. Action isn't moving from here to there physically, or taking a hammer and a nail and putting it in a wall, or driving a car. Actually action means that which is happening - right sir? Not the action which has happened, or the action which is going to happen. All this is also action: that which has happened, that which is happening, and that which will happen - right? Do we agree to this, please? So what is the action that has happened? What is it the result of? What is the motive of that action? What is the impetus? What is the conclusion from which an action takes place? You are following all this, or are you getting tired already?

Action has some kind of motive, pleasant or unpleasant, rewarding or painful, or under pressure, driven by various influences. So one has to find out what we mean by action. Is there an action which has no motive, which is not under pressure, which is not frightened and therefore act, which is not rewarding and therefore painful? So one has to look at the word very, very carefully, if you are willing. This is a conversation - right?

Most of our actions, as one observes, are based on a remembrance - right? Or on a desire, or on personal reward, or punishment, or an action based on an ideal, or on a belief, and so on. Right? So please watch this, let's examine it together. If an action is based on an ideal, on the future, that action is conforming, adjusting, or imitating the ideal - right? Therefore is that an action which is whole, complete, without leaving any mark of hurt, regret, and so on? You follow? So what is our action, yours and mine, the speaker's, in investigating, what is our action based on? Pleasure, fear? Go on sirs, examine it. I am investigating, you are all silent.

Q: It is based on necessity.

K: Necessity. That is sir, I need food so I go to the market, if I have money, buy it, that is an action. I need clothes, if I have money I go and buy them. Shelter and so on. So on necessity, the needs, physical needs, and then psychological needs - right? Right sir?

Q: Do psychological needs exist?

K: That is the question which we are going to find out. There are physical needs and actions, and actions based on what we consider psychological needs. One needs somebody to give one comfort, therefore dependence and action based on that dependence - right? I need somebody to tell me how to live a different life and I depend on that person.

Q: Is it possible for an action not to have a cause?

K: Is it possible for an action not to have a cause - we are going to go into all this. Go step by step please. You see when you make a statement like that: is there an action without cause, you are asking a question which is hypothetical, and the answer must also be hypothetical. But if we go step by step, slowly, examining, and doing it as we are going along, then there will be no theoretical problems at all. Right? So please in discussion, in dialogue, don't jump to something. See what our actions are based on first, what is actually going on; either physical needs, food, clothes, shelter and the labour required to earn the money to have those, and psychological needs. It is a fact. This is what we have, physical as well as psychological and our actions are based on these two. One recognizes physical needs are absolutely necessary, either you work - factory, digging in a ditch, teaching, carpentry, science, business, doctors, not politicians!, and so on, and that is necessary. As society now is organized we all have to work from morning until night for years and years and years. Just look at the tragedy of it. You may not like it but it is a fact. One goes to the office, factory, whatever one is doing physically to earn money, from the age of twenty, fifteen, until you are almost dying, day after day to the office, and so on and so on. That is how our society is organized. That is a fact.

Q: Do you call that action or is it reaction?

K: Do you call that action or reaction. It is both because I need food and if I don't get proper amount of money, labour, I am jealous, anxious, and all the rest of it begins. Therefore it is a reaction. So there is the physical need. Then one's actions are based on psychological needs. Please go into it.

Q: Psychological needs are different from desire?

K: We are coming to that sir. Are psychological needs different from desire? Perhaps not. Or they are. Let's examine it. Let us first see, or recognize and accept as a fact that we need, apparently man needs, human beings need - the need may be false, we will find out - the need for action based on psychological needs. That is, one needs belief, one needs certain forms of conclusions, certain opinions, points of view. You need nationalities, hierarchical approach. You need all this. Please don't deny it, it is a fact for most people. You may not, and say, "I have no psychological necessities", that would be a most rare thing to say. Right?

So we must find out for ourselves: do we have these things as a need? Belief, opinions, judgements, conclusions, images, religious and otherwise, religious and images created by the hand and by the mind - you follow? Are these needs?

Q: What about despair? Does action come from despair?

K: What about an action that comes from despair? Sir, look, first let's look at ourselves sir. What are our psychological needs, and are there actions born of those needs?

Q: Sir, I think from what I have heard so far it seems that the necessity has to be there for an action. There is always a necessity for action in some way or another.

K: You are saying there must be some kind of necessity, need, for action. We said for physical needs there must be. But we are questioning whether we need, or are there necessities, psychologically, for action. I question it. I am not saying you must accept it. I say I doubt it. I am not sure. You understand? I am examining it. One is not dogmatic, I don't take a position, I don't refuse to move from one conclusion.

What we are trying to find out is, what is action. You see action in the physical needs, and action based on various forms of opinions, judgements, conclusions, convictions, experiences, beliefs, dogmas, dependence and so on and so on, psychologically. And the speaker says he questions it, you understand?

Q: First of all if action is not based on these and it were based on true observation then there may not be so many problems. But most action is based on desires, on our conditioning, and on our needs. So what is the right means to base on action on?

K: You are asking, are you sir, please if I am putting your question wrongly please correct it - are you saying that we need psychological...

Q: No, I am saying that all action is not based on needs. What would determine what is a correct need, instead of desire and so on?

K: Yes what is the correct need. Just wait a minute please. What is one's correct need physically - right?

Q: In other words, is there a strict separation between the one and the other? Is there a right separation between the two or...

K: Is there a strict division between the psychological needs and the physical needs. Now to answer that question, do physical needs go over to the psychological needs? I need a house - one needs a house, or a room to stay in, then in that room one gets attached to the furniture, the attachment to the furniture is a psychological need - right? Because without that furniture I feel a bit uncomfortable. So is there demarcation at all? You see unless you please go into this step by step you won't answer this question so quickly.

We are talking over together as two friends, investigating together, as a dialogue, as a conversation, what is action. We have said so far there are the actions based on the needs, on physical needs. One needs a shirt, a pair of trousers or a dress, one needs that, unless you are a nudist, then it's all right! You need to have food, and to have food you have to work, have enough money to go to the market and so on. And you need a roof, a house, but the need for a house becomes very important. One isn't satisfied with a room, one wants a beautiful room, one wants pictures in it and old antique furniture, if you can afford it. Then as you have invested money in the antique furniture, in a lovely room, with a lovely vase and pictures, you are attached to it. And then you say, "I need those." Right? "I can't live without a picture in the room" - and it must be either a copy, an original and so on and so on. That is, gradually I begin to depend on those things. So the furniture is me - right? Do you question that? I am attached to the furniture and I don't want you to spoil it - don't put it in the sun, don't scratch on it, I hold it dear. And that furniture has become me. Right? And I act from that.

So we are going the next step: is there a necessity for psychology to exist? Are there psychological necessities? We say, yes, it is a fact. The necessity of a belief, the necessity of dependence, the necessity of sex, the necessity of ambition, achievement, success - right? And on all that my actions are based. That's obvious, isn't it - right? Is this all wrong? Please look at it in yourself. One goes to India - sorry! - because one feels the need for instruction, for wisdom, for knowledge, for enlightenment, because the western world is too worldly, not interested in religion, and they go to India where there is dirt, romance, and squalor and gurus. Then you say, "I need those". You follow? This is actually what is going on.

So we are now questioning why we consider that psychologically we need things. Right? That is what we are investigating. Don't go back to the physical needs, we have finished with them. Now do we need beliefs?

Q: No.

K: The gentleman says, no. That means you are free of beliefs. Now see what we mean by belief. Belief in something that cannot be proved. I believe - one believes in god - it can't be proved. One believes in heaven - it can't be proved. One believes that there are people living on the Moon - not on the Moon, somewhere else, one believes that, it can't be proved. So we believe in nationality - right? No? You are French, German, English, Indian, and god knows what else. Follow it step by step. Either you relinquish all this as you go along and say, "Sorry, I am not a nationalist" - finished.

Q: May I ask a question? Don't we have to ask ourselves first where those needs come from?

K: We are going to find out, we are going to go into that. How do these needs arise, what is the cause of them? We are going to find out in a minute if you have patience. So beliefs have become necessities. Talk to the Catholics, to the Protestants, to the Christian world that believe in Jesus, a saviour and all the rest of it, they believe. Right? And you go to India, they also have their gods, they believe. So why do they believe in something that cannot be proved - you understand? - that has no validity. Why do they believe?

Q: Because they love that form of action.

K: The gentleman says because they love that kind of action. Why do they love that kind of action?

Q: It gives them security.

K: Go into it please. Enquire into yourself. You believe, don't you, if you are honest, in something or other. Or you don't believe and you go to the other extreme, which is the same. You understand? "I don't believe in god, I am an atheist". And both take a stand. You understand? You know what I mean, 'take a stand'?

That is, both remain convinced of their conclusions.

Q: Sir, belief in oneself is the same thing.

K: Belief in oneself. All right, let's take that, belief in oneself.

What is oneself? What is oneself?

Q: My contents.

K: No, investigate it, please talk it over with me.

Q: We try to find security in something else, like a belief.

K: Sir, the gentleman says, "I believe in myself", so what is the thing you believe in?

Q: My fear.

K: Just look at it sir, look at it, examine it. Do you believe you exist because you have a body?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes. Do you believe in yourself because you have certain emotions, certain conclusions, certain points of view, certain way of behaving, certain idiosyncratic activities, name, form, bank account, or no bank account? All that you believe in? You don't even... please examine it. When you say, "I believe in myself", I say it is a strange thing to say, what do you believe in? In the knowledge that you have acquired?

Q: Which is myself.

K: That is what I am examining madam.

Q: May I suggest that we take an actual example. Most of the people who are present in this tent believe that you are enlightened.

Q: How do you know?

K: Sir, we are not talking who is enlightened, who is not enlightened and how do you know. But we are talking about a man who says, "I believe in myself", I say, what is this strange conclusion? Then I say, who is yourself in whom you believe?

Q: Let's us say that I believe that you are enlightened.

Q: All right, sit down again!

Q: Let us say, I don't believe you are enlightened. I don't believe that you are going to help me. I don't have to believe that you will in any way help me.

Q: Why are you here?

K: I am sorry sir, I don't quite understand.

Q: I would suggest that I, being this person, am the only one who can find out. I don't think any of this is very important.

K: Sir, one has to find out for oneself who he is. Now, two friends are meeting and talking over, and say, look, who am I, in whom I believe so strongly? Right? He says, let's investigate it. Don't say, I am god, and stick to it, or I am the environmental reactions, or this or that. Don't hold on, or take a position, let's enquire into it, let's go into it. Not that I am superior, you are inferior, or you are superior, or I am inferior. Two friends. So I say, I am asking, who is this entity, myself, in whom you believe?

Q: A piece of the absolute truth.

K: Oh, a piece of the absolute truth. You see, and then you are finished. There is no discussion possible.

Q: Well if you say you believe in yourself, doesn't that generally mean that a person lives life, he has certain challenges in life, he has overcome some of these challenges. And from overcoming these challenges or whatever the experience was he forms a certain image of himself and when says he believes in himself, or she believes in herself, it is that image that they believe in.

K: Is this dialogue worthwhile?

Q: If we could go on.

K: As we are going on, is it worthwhile? It is a lovely morning, you could go out for a walk. So I am asking you please, is it worthwhile going on with this dialogue?

Q: Yes.

Q: I don't know.

K: You are quite right sir.

Q: Let us go back to action.

K: I am coming to it.

Q: What is oneself, that is the real question, I think it is worthwhile.

K: That gentleman asked, amongst other questions, what is action? Is there an action that doesn't bring sorrow? Is there an action that doesn't breed contradictions? Is there an action that is so complete, so whole, that it is finished without leaving nay shadow of regret, of saying to oneself "I wish I hadn't done it", and so on? That is the question two people are discussing, you are the one and the speaker is the other. We are having a dialogue about it.

Q: Action issues from spontaneity.

K: Action is born out of spontaneity. Are we ever spontaneous? You see!

Q: Sir, this is my action: what am I to do?

K: I am going into it sir, that is just simple. The gentleman asks, I have had an accident, a car accident, my body is affected, and it is affecting my mind, what am I to do? Right? He is asking that question because he has to find out, because he is in pain, he is confused, he says, "Tell me what to do". Right? Are we in that position, any of you? Or is it all so casual a dialogue that you will listen and you will do nothing about what you have listened to?

You know we have spent fifty minutes and we haven't come to any point. So I am asking, is it worth going on like this? So what shall we do?

Q: Let's investigate the point that we arrived at when we discovered something instead of going to something else.

K: Sir, that gentleman is concerned about himself, his pain, his anxiety, his nervous reactions from this motor accident. He is concerned. He doesn't want theories, he doesn't want about enlightenment, all that business. He says, tell me. Right? And are you in that position? I hope you have not had an accident, but are you in that position and say, "Look, I want to find out. I want to give my life to find out if there is an action which is really whole" - right sir? Are you giving your life to it? Or you are just sitting on the river bank and looking at the waters go by, never entering in the stream?

Q: There is no complete action.

K: Very few are concerned really about it. I am just questioning whether these dialogues are worth it at all.

Q: Why don't we change from discussions. You are one and we are a thousand. So technically discussion is not really possible. Perhaps you have to announce them in another way.

K: The gentleman says, you are one and we are a thousand, and you can't really have a conversation with a thousand people. Just listen. You can't have a conversation with a thousand people because there are a thousand opinions, a thousand ways. That is why I said at the beginning sir, please let's think together. Let's us put aside our problems, our opinions, our judgements, our way of thinking, our conclusions, put all those aside and let's think together. You won't even do that. And when we meet two, or half a dozen, it will be the same problem. We have done all this; in India, in Holland, in America, small groups, big groups, but nobody gives his life to find out.

Q: Can you not just discuss one problem?

K: I am doing one problem.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That is the one problem I am discussing still. That is, when a body is affected by an accident, why does it enter into the psychological mental state - right sir?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Haven't you such problems?

Q: Is it a false means of protection from facing?

K: Look: my nerves have been shattered through an accident - right? A car has run over my leg and that leg is paralysed, I can't walk properly. And that affects my thinking because I can't get a proper job - right? You don't see all this. I depend on somebody to help me, so gradually I become anxious, I become frightened, I develop nervous ticks, and what am I to do?

Q: The question is, is my body myself?

K: That is what we are discussing madam. We talked about it, but you all refused, you want to go off in different directions.

Q: Sir, I would like to suggest that there are a lot of us here who are in the same situation as the gentleman, but not physically, but in other ways also.

K: Yes, sir. The gentleman says there are a lot of us here in that position, but not physically - right? Now how will you talk over it, have a dialogue?

Q: The conversation is very useful for me.

K: Look sir, one's problem is both psychological and physical - right? One is affected physically and therefore the nervous organism has been upset, crippled and it affects one's thinking, one's feeling, and one is frightened. That is one problem, which is the result of a physical accident. And the other is, equally one is crippled psychologically - right? Psychologically one is crippled by belief, dogmas, and all the rest of it, dependence, attachment, fear and so on. Now can we see these two facts first, not move away from that? The fact one is physically crippled and the other psychologically blunted, crippled. Now what shall we do? Or you say, I am perfectly healthy, therefore I will walk out. That's all right too, you understand? You understand what I am saying? Are you in that position, and say, "Sorry I am not crippled physically, I am not mentally, psychologically, there is no ugliness, there is nothing crippled, and therefore I am perfectly healthy" - right? That is a very rare person.

So we have got these two questions. What is the action - please follow it - what is the action with regard to the one who has had physical calamity, which is affecting his nerves and therefore his brain, his thoughts, his emotions and all the rest of it, a result of an accident. And the other psychologically crippled and equally frightened, equally nervous, equally inhibited, equally anxious and developing neurotic attitudes - right? Both are similar. One you think is physical, the other is psychological, but both are similar. Right sir?

Now what is the action with regard to this one thing? Physically affecting the nerves and the brain, and the other, crippled by tradition, crippled by belief, crippled by attachment, crippled by various pressures, job, you follow, they both come to the same thing. Right? Do you see that, please? These two are not separate, they are one. Right? One is physical, one is psychological. The physical brings about the psychological results, which is what has happened to most of us, which is psychologically we are crippled. Now what is the action? Right sirs? Shall I go on with it?

Audience: Yes, yes.

K: Ah, you see. Conversation, you and I are together sharing it.

Q: Sir, from this would I have an insight?

K: Just a minute madam. Look, I will go into it. But we are going into it together. Not I go into it, you listen, then make an idea of it and then pursue it. We are doing it together now - right?

Shall we go into it. That is, we are having a conversation between you and me. Don't bother about that gentleman, please. He is tired, he has had an accident, he is in pain, he must be quiet, leave him alone, don't project your ideas onto him. Gosh!

So what is action with regard to this one thing? Human beings are crippled - right - both psychologically and physically. Some are extravagantly crippled in both ways, others are medium, partially, and what is the action which will correct this thing? Is this clear?

Q: Yes.

K: Now let's talk it over together. Why do we - no, wait a minute. Which is most important, this psychological aspect of this, or the physical aspect of this?

Q: Psychological.

K: If I know, or am aware, that I am psychologically crippled, and because I am psychologically crippled it gradually affects my body. I have nervous responses, my nerves are on edge, I gradually develop a sense of isolation - you follow? And all the rest of it follows. If I am physically, it is the same thing. So I am saying which is more important to consider first? The psychological state of being crippled, or the physical state of being crippled? You understand? To which do we give importance? I know the man who has had an accident, he says, for god's sake don't talk to me about psychology, I am in pain, I have had an accident.

Q: I am psychologically aware.

K: I am asking you sirs, and ladies, to which do you give importance? To the physical or psychological?

Q: Both of them.

Q: Psychological.

K: Careful, careful. If I am physically affected would I consider psychology? See the difficulty. I have been run over, I am crippled and it is affecting my mind. My mind has already been affected by society, by my parents - you follow? Only this incident has added more to it.

So which is more important? I don't neglect the physical - right? I say I will go into it. I will go into after I have understood whether I am crippled psychologically, or the physical is making me crippled, psychologically. So I am investigating being psychologically crippled, the result of a physical accident, the result of living in a monstrous society, the wrong kind of education, wrong kind of acquiring knowledge and so on and so on, that has crippled my mind. So I see psychologically if I can understand the whole structure of the psyche then I can attend to the physical. But the man who is in pain, he says, "No please give me some kind of drug, some kind of opiate, some kind of thing that will quieten me down" - right? Then the doctor is important, not me - right? But if his psychological state, psychological crookedness, unclarity, crippledness, I think that can be cleared - you follow? That can be completely made whole. Then with that clarity of mind I can attend to my physical ailments. Do we agree to this?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam I can't hear. Perhaps somebody who has heard, sitting near to you, can explain what you have said. (Pause)
Nobody is willing to translate so I can't help you.

So I am saying myself, being crippled psychologically can they be made whole? That is the question, which needs action. I can't sit down and say I will make it whole. Or go off into a monastery. It can't be down. It needs action, I have to do something. Right?

Q: Sir, I am sorry to interrupt but I feel that now we are putting our foot into an old, old trap. And the trap is that we sit here and watch you perform. We are perfectly sure we know it, we have seen you do it a hundred times. We know that in half an hour you can totally break out of all psychological problems, and probably physical and spiritual and everything else. Unfortunately sir, maybe I am odd man out, if so I may sense a certain hostility on the part of some members of the audience, who may feel that I am throwing a spanner in the works. They want to watch you break out onto 'Cloud 9' - if so I don't want to interfere with them, I am happy to leave.

K: Go on sir. I am listening to you.

Q: I can leave immediately.

K: Come on sir.

Q: Ten minutes ago, after having spent fifty minutes, you came to a point where you felt that we were all just pussy-footing around with the thing, talking theoretically, not really having the least bit of gumption to get into this thing. All we wanted to do was to take a ride and watch you do the trick. Then in despair perhaps you seemed to have washed your hands of the whole thing, resigned yourself to the fact that we were a lot of useless nincompoops, and decided to have a dialogue with yourself, which is what you have been doing for a long time. If so it seems to me that it can only harm me because watching you have a dialogue with yourself is very entertaining, may be a bit instructive, I have seen you do it a lot of times, but it is not going to get me anywhere.

K: No, sir. Quite right.

Q: Since it seems this is the only choice: either we have got to have the gumption...

K: ...guts.

Q: ...guts to have a dialogue with you, which means we have got to care about this thing. It means we have to stop saying how much benefit we are getting and please go along and carry on and nobody should interrupt and so forth. I mean even when our friend interrupted and said that he feels that most people here look on you as an enlightened person, you didn't want to go into all that, but it is perfectly true. We do look on you as an enlightened person. Unfortunately the fact that we do so means that we can't listen to you at all. And I don't think we are listening to you.

K: That's all. Yes sir, I know this.

Q: So now just tell me what I should do, put me out of my problem because to carry on sitting here, I feel I just have to listen while you do your act, it is a marvellous act, I want to be in that chair, I don't want to listen to you do it, I know you can.

K: Sir. I have made it perfectly clear, all along I have said please, there is no authority, don't say the other is enlightened, and all the rest of that business. I say, look at yourself, be serious, be committed, put your whole mind into it - right?

Q: Quite right sir.

K: I have been saying this at every meeting.

Q: I don't blame you at all sir.

K: I have been saying there is no authority. I have been saying, please, the speaker is not at all important. You are important as a human being, let us talk about that. But apparently we don't do that. So what shall we do?

Q: I don't know.

K: I do know.

Q: You do? What is it sir? Give me any answer other than having a dialogue with yourself.

K: No, I don't want to have a dialogue with myself. I can in my room, or on my walks, or with some few people, I can have that dialogue. That is not the kind of dialogue one wants. What is important, what is necessary, is that you, all of you, put your mind, your heart into this, not say, you are enlightened, we will listen to you. Wipe all that out. Right sir?

Q: Quite right sir.

K: Sir look at it. I keep on, the speaker keeps on insisting on this, every day of his life: don't follow, don't imitate, don't conform, think it out, observe. But our whole conditioning is the other - right?

Q: We have to an authority, there are too many people here.

K: Is it a question of too many people? Sir there are not too many people if you really want to find out for yourself, then your whole attention is drawn and you are examining.

Q: Somebody must be in charge, so it stops us from really listening.

K: I am not the chairman. I am not taking the chair for each of the audience. I say, please let's work together, I say, let's think together. Putting the speaker on a platform has no meaning because it is only for convenience, forget all that and let's think together. But you won't even do that. What am I going to do?

Q: I experience you are doing it again. You are expressing your frustration, expressing perhaps your disappointment about the audience as it has been for years and years and years. I think the same thing will probably happen tomorrow and the day after. I will be finished quickly. I have been waiting to meet you, in person for quite a while. I have read a book written by ? about his meeting with you maybe forty or fifty years ago, the same frustration, the same anxiety, the same disappointment you expressed to him then that you are expressing now. What I experienced in the book was a man of real love, of real humanitarian concern. What I experience now is an older man who makes side comments, who is frustrated, who says what is going on. I think that we can continue but it is not going to change. There has to be a different format. The question has to become more pertinent, more vital.

K: Right sir. You say the question should become more vital, more personal, more intense, I will do it.

Q: Why don't you stop speaking and leave us to it?

K: Delighted! Why don't you stop speaking and leave us in the tent. Is that what you want?

Q: Yes.

Q: I think a few minutes ago we were talking about psychological and physical division and how they were both a kind of... the psychological was a form of the physical process. The first point that I thought was important was that everybody had realized that they had this psychological incapability. How many people realized or even looked at our psychological shortcomings. How many people realize exactly what that all involves? That is the point.

Q: How can they acknowledge the fact that they are psychological cripples?

K: You can't. Unless I say I am blind, please help me, then I can do something. But if you say, no I am sorry I see quite clearly, there is no point.

Q: Most people were saying that they realized they were psychologically crippled but at the time I felt the question was what to do, how to get over it.

K: I will point it out to you and you will have to do it yourself. Is that right? Will you listen then and do it?

Q: What happens?

Q: How do you know?

K: What am I to do?

Q: Just leave it now.

K: No, please, this is a serious question. You won't even have the courtesy to listen, to find out what the man is saying. And then see if it applies to you. If it applies to you then say let me put my energy, my guts, my whole heart into it to be free of it. You don't do that. What am I to do?

Q: Some of us do that Krishnaji. I have done it.

K: If you do it so much the better.

Q: We can't.

K: I can't do what you are saying?

Q: Can we ask why the people who cannot do that and keep on coming here year after year, they come here to say they cannot do it, but why can't they do it? Can they tell us why they can't do it.

K: Sir. It will be another dialogue with myself. Will you listen why you cannot go into it yourself, go into the cause, break the cause and move out of that? If it is pointed out will you do it?

Q: Yes.

Q: It won't work.

Q: No.

K: I don't know but will you do it? I want to be a good carpenter and I go to the man who is an expert, a master carpenter, or I learn from a scientist because I want to be a scientist, I want to learn, I want to have a clear mind. But apparently you don't. Or you go half way and stop. Will suffering help you? Will somebody hitting you on the head? Offering you a reward of heaven if you do this, this, this?

So one says to oneself perhaps somebody amongst you will catch this - right? Like grain thrown out, it might fall on the rocks, or on a fertile field, or just die by itself, but the man who is throwing out the grain he can't help it. You understand, he does it. He does it, maybe out of affection, compassion, love and all the rest of that business. And so he is not concerned where the seed drops - right?

Q: We must put some fertilizer on ourselves.

K: I am doing it sir. I am doing that. Will you listen? Will you say it is my problem, I have got to solve it? I will put my life into it, my energy into it, my guts, my feelings to find out. Will you do it?

Q: Yes.

Q: Sir, I would like to ask the gentleman a question: why does it not work? Could you answer that question?

K: Please sir let's get on with what I am saying. You expect your energy to change somebody else, it can't. Will you, as a human being, listen and put your whole energy into this, as you put your energy into earning a livelihood, when you want sex, when you want this, or that, you put your guts into it. Why don't you do it?

You see at the end of nearly two hours, an hour and a half, we haven't even discovered for ourselves, not I have a dialogue with myself and give a performance like an actor, I am not that. I would walk out of this tent if I felt it was hopeless and you will never see me again. I mean it. But I feel somebody amongst you will take the coin, somebody will say, yes, I have got it, let me go with you. And I will go on doing this all my life. Somebody will catch some fire. If you don't, you don't. That is not my business.

Look sir, an hour and a half. What have we done? You, not me. I am very clear what I am doing. Whether there are two people listening, or a thousand listen, I will go on, or nobody listens, it doesn't matter, I will go on. So leave me out of it. But if you are willing to listen, go into it, we will go together into the very depth of it. But you must give your energy. It is like those people, having their own particular guru and coming here, and saying, yes I will listen to you. Or having their own opinions, conclusions and not letting them go. Our relationship is together - you understand? You and the speaker together take a walk into the whole psychological world. It is not my performance, it is you have to act. Right?

So shall we go on tomorrow? If we go on tomorrow let's do it properly: that you are really serious and want to go into it to the very depths, you, not me. Right sirs.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 26TH JULY 1979

Before we begin our dialogue I think we ought to clear up some points that arose yesterday towards the end of the meeting.

We seem to be blocking ourselves. Some say it is not possible, what you are talking about can never be put in daily life. "I have listened to you for twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years and nothing has happened, I am just the same as before". That is a block that prevents each one, or the person who says these things, it prevents him from investigating himself, he has blocked himself, saying, "It is not possible". That's obvious.

And also there are those who say, "I understand partially, I want to understand the whole before I can do something about it." - again that is a block. Again that prevents your own investigation of yourselves, you are blocking yourself.

And there are those who say, "What you are saying is totally impractical, why don't you stop talking and go away?" Such people, and I have heard this very often, not only prevent their own investigation of themselves, but also because one person can't do it himself he condemns the rest of the world - "If I can't do it, you can't do it". And so this goes on.

Let me talk a little and then we will have a dialogue. If we could this morning, and the next four mornings, realize, if I may point out, that we are not a whole thousand or two thousand people in the tent but we are talking to each other, a single person - you understand? You and the speaker are talking together. When we two talk together it includes all the others, it is bound to. And I would like to point out, if I may again, please don't hinder yourself by blocking yourself, by saying, "I can't do this, it is impossible. You are a biological freak and this is not applicable to ordinary people". Or, "You have to have special genes to understand all this". One finds innumerable excuses, one finds every form of avoidance of looking into one's own hindrances, observing them closing, understanding them and trying to put them aside. If we could do that then perhaps we could have better communication with each other. Please.

And also I would like to point out: I think we don't listen, we don't really try to find out what the other person is trying to say. And listening requires certain attention, care, affection, if I want to understand what you are saying I must listen to you, not block myself all the way, all the time. I must care for what you are saying, I must have respect, I must have affection, love, otherwise we can't communicate certain things which are really very, very serious and require a great deal of enquiry. So if I may suggest that we listen with affection, with care. All these dialogues, and what happened yesterday, indicated that we have very little love for each other - right? We want to assert our own points of view. We want to exercise our own opinions and dominate others by our judgements, by our conclusions, by our asserting that we have to listened to you for so long, why haven't we changed. All that indicates, it seems to me and I may be wrong, that there is no real love. I am not blaming anybody, I am just stating this. Don't get angry. Don't ride the high horse!

And I think we should go into this question very deeply, why we don't listen. Or we say, "Yes, I have listened" - finished. "I have already listened to you for twenty years, it is all over. I am not going to listen to you any more". You don't say that to a child, do you, whom you love? He wants to tell you something. He may be telling it to you ten times, he has already told you, but the next time he says something you listen. You don't brush him aside. You are not impatient. You love that child. And I think in all these discussions and dialogues and talks we are missing that essential perfume. I don't think we know what it is to listen with love, which doesn't mean that we shouldn't be critical, which doesn't mean that we should accept everything that is said. It doesn't also mean that we agree or disagree. You listen, listen with care, with affection, with a sense of communication with each other. And for that one must have love. And probably that is what is missing. We are all too terribly intellectual, or too romantic, or too sentimental. All that denies love.

So perhaps, if we could this morning have a dialogue of whatever you want, whatever subject you want, bearing in mind that without this quality of affection, care, love and compassion, we merely play with words, remain superficial, antagonistic, assertive, dogmatic and so on. It remains merely verbal, it has no depth, no quality, no perfume. So bearing that in mind, what subject would you like to talk about this morning?

Questioner: Sir, could we continue with our discussion of yesterday, of action, and how to deal with mental and physical disability?

K: Could you go into again, as we began yesterday, when a questioner asked, could we discuss action?

Q: Is it possible to have thinking together if only one person wants to have it?

K: Is it possible to think together if the other person refuses to think together?

Q: I have difficulty in understanding what you mean by registration. In English we use the word meaning to become aware of something, to register an impression, register discomforts. But you seem to use, or classify this recording. Would you go into that?

K: Would you go into the question of what you mean by registration? To register something, to remember something, to acknowledge, like a tape on which you register - right? Could we go into that?

Q: Why are we satisfied with the way we are living?

K: Why are we satisfied in the way we are living.

Q: What is the relationship, or the difference, between the nature of thought and the mechanics of thinking? One thought appears to follow another even for no special reason, and the movement of thought can be violent even if the content of the thought, you thought was positive.

K: I have not quite understood it, sir.

Q: I am interested in the mechanics of thinking, and the difference or the relationship between the mechanics and thought itself.

K: You would like to examine the whole structure of thought.

Q: Not the structure of thought itself but the mechanics of thinking.

K: We are using the word perhaps differently. We will use the word, the mechanics of thinking.

Q: Because I notice that it is possible to have neutral or positive thoughts but the mechanics of this thinking is...

K: I am not quite sure I understand it, sir.

Q: I think he is saying that there is difference, inside the thought could be positive but in the way it expresses itself negative.

Q: Yes. Maybe thought is fighting like animals in the jungle, even though the content of the thought is positive.

K: Ah! Is thinking always mechanical, or is there a different kind of thinking which is non-mechanical.

Q: No. That is not the same. My thinking often doesn't flow very well. There is violence in the thoughts, in the mechanics but not in the content of the thought. Positive thought can be violent.

K: Positive thought is violence too. All right sir. I think we see.

Q: Why is love missing? Why don't we love?

K: Sir, when you put a question like that, are you saying, why don't I love? Not why don't we love? Why isn't there love in my heart, or in my being? Would that be right sir?

Any other questions?

Q: You said that thought is limited and yet if we look around thought has contributed to humanity.

K: You say thought is limited but every action is based on thought, all the activities, social, economic, religious, personal, are based on thought.

Q: And it is the common factor of all humanity.

K: And it is a common factor of all humanity.

Q: It has conquered the whole of humanity.

K: It has conquered the whole world. All right, sir.

Q: Could you go into how one is blocking oneself?

K: Yes sir. The gentleman he is still interested in that question, where he has had an accident, it has affected his whole nervous system, and therefore his brain and his activity in life.

Q: Is it possible to know something without having to show something?

K: Is it possible to know something without having to demonstrate it?

So out of these questions which shall we take? Action, why isn't there love in my heart, what is the meaning of registration, the significance of registration and is thought everlastingly mechanical and is there something non-mechanical. So which of these questions? If we take them all together which is the central question in all these?

Q: The question of love, sir, it would answer the others, I think.

K: Could we go into this question, why is it that we human beings have no sense of love? Perhaps if we could go into that very deeply - again together please, not I talk and you listen, but together - then perhaps in the investigation of that we will be able to find out what is thinking, what place has thinking, whether it is mechanical, or non-mechanical, and why the mind is always registering incidents, accidents, hurts, all the experiences of man stored up, and what is action that will be so complete it won't leave a mark of misery, confusion. Could we take this one question, which is, what is love, why don't we love? Would that be all right?

Q: Yes.

K: Please, I don't mind. Do you want to discuss that?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? I wonder how we approach this question. What is your approach to it? You understand? How do you come to find out what is the meaning of love, why you, as a human being, have not this perfume, this quality that perhaps may answer all the other questions in life? Now what is your approach to it? How do you come to investigate that problem? Or it may not be possible to investigate that, but one can find out what may hinder it - you understand? What may prevent this extraordinary thing that man seems to be longing for and doesn't seem to have it. Could we do that?

So what is your approach to it? You understand my question? Because how you approach a problem is really important. Not the problem itself so much but how you come to it, how you look at it, what is your intention and all that. So please find out, if I may request, what is your approach, how you receive that question, whether your mind is romantic, sentimental, whether it is born out of desire. So you have to go into this very carefully if you want to go very deeply into this question because one may in going into this perhaps we will be able to answer the whole nature of thinking. Right? So are we clear how you approach it, each one of us? Or have you certain conclusions already about it? Certain opinions and your experiences, will they block you, will they prevent you from going into it very, very deeply? Right? So please we are talking together, not to each one, together. You understand? The speaker is talking to you personally, you. So what is your approach? Are you aware of your approach and how you approach it? Are you aware of your prejudice, your images about it, your conclusions about it, or what people have said about it? Can you put all that aside and try to find out?

Q: What is love?

K: What is love. That we are going to find out sir, that is what we are doing. You know sir, first the word - let's be clear that we both have the same meaning about that word, not that you may have a different meaning from the speaker, or the speaker different from you - you understand? So we must be clear about the word itself - right? Generally in a good dictionary the origin of it is desire. In Sanskrit it is, he desires. You follow? Love is associated with desire. Please I am explaining the dictionary meaning of that word. It is not my concept or your concept, but what is the common usage of that word. So if we are clear that we both recognize that the word is not the thing - you understand? You understand what I am saying? The word is not the thing. The word 'microphone' is not the actual microphone - right? So we must be clear always through our discussions, if I may point out, that the word is not the actual fact. Right? So we are enquiring into what is love.

Q: You say that a child, a baby loves its mother because it needs its meals. So in this case we say love is a fact of necessity.

K: The mother loves her baby and the baby loves his mother and that is a necessity so the baby can eat. Is that so? You make a statement, you don't investigate it. Is that so? The animals love their babies. The lowest form of life, manifestation of life, loves its young. And this is a movement from the animal to the man. And is that love? I am not saying it is not, or it is. Or is it the instinct from the animal carried on through the human and - please follow this step by step - and attachment, the animal brings up the cubs up to a certain age and then forgets about them. Right? They have gone from the nest. With a human there is tremendous care until they are three, four, five, nursing them, looking after them, cleaning them, cuddling them, holding them, that is if you love the baby, which most people don't - it becomes a plaything. Or they have not the occasion, not the time. After that they send them off to school, to a boarding school and so on, gradually push them away - right? And we are asking, we are not saying it is, or it is not, is that love? I know the mothers will say, "How can you say such a thing?" And we are questioning, we are enquiring, we are not saying yes, or no. Because we are thinking, observing together to find out for ourselves what is this nature, the beauty, the quality, the extraordinary thing called love. If a mother and the parents loved their baby, looked after them, there would be no wars - right? There would be the right kind of education. There would be the right kind of society. So we are asking when a mother, when the parents love their baby, is it just for a short period? Or right through life? Which means that they must have right education, bring them up with right behaviour, without violence, without conflict, not train them to kill each other, organized war, which is respectable, accepted - you understand? Would a parent who really loved his children do this? Go on sir, you are parents, think it out.

Q: There is a moment where separation comes in.

K: At the moment there is separation. The mother, the father separate themselves from their children - right? And the children go off. They are attached to the children. Is attachment love? Don't please, go into it.

Q: The parents get something from their children, and the children get something from their parents, so...

K: Yes sir, I know all that. The baby needs a great deal of affection, care, if the parents don't give affection, care, love to the child, the child withers. It is a well known fact. But generally the parents have their own problems, their own anxieties, fears, sorrows and business worries - you know, all that. And they give the child a little of what they can when they have time. You understand all this, this is happening in the world. And so is all that love?

Q: No.

K: Don't say no, madam. But will you do something about it, test it?

Q: I think we should approach it a little bit negatively, like love is not that.

K: We are doing that. We have just done it.

Q: Well to look at this kind of thing that is one of the ways of approaching it. Time, space, and the whole human and animal race...

K: We are coming to it sir, slowly, slowly.

Q: I think the parents even defend themselves against the child.

K: Of course, that always happens. You follow? The parents are against the child, and the child becomes... you know what is happening in the world. For god's sake, look at it.

So from that arises the question: is attachment love?

Q: Many people think so.

K: I know, many people think that without jealousy there is no love. If you don't struggle, fight, if there is no conflict, if there is no jealousy, a sense of each one asserting, people imagine that there is love, that this state is love. Right? So I am asking from that: is attachment love? We are thinking over together, you and I. So are you attached to your children?

Q: Is there a care and affection that makes you attractive to somebody else at a neutral level as opposed to an attachment that...

K: When you dominate your children, or your wife, or your husband, or your girl, or boy when you possess them, all that, say, "They are mine" - is that love?

Q: No.

K: Sir, when you ask that question, is that love, when you say, "No, it is not", do you mean it is not in you - you understand? You are free of it, not just verbally say, "Yes, I am not". So that is why I asked at the beginning, if I may point out, unless we do this actively, see, aware that it is so in us, and being aware look at it, go into it, search out why human beings hold on to this attachment. Why you are attached as husband, wife, furniture, book, belief, it doesn't matter what, attachment. And if you are attached to one thing and another is attached to another, there is division - you understand? And is this division love? Please go into it.

Q: I said they even defend themselves against their own children.

K: Madam if you read the newspapers and magazines, and social workers and all those are saying, after a great deal of attention, after a great deal of study, that unless parents really love their children, really love them, have time with them, spend their energy with them, the children either generally die, the babies, or mentally psychologically they are warped. And you see this lady was pointing out that some parents are opposed to their children. They are, they beat them, they force them, they do all kinds of things to them. That is what she was pointing out.

Q: From what you are saying I think we might get the idea that we should love. I think most of us have the idea very strongly that we should love. And most of us are very afraid that we don't love. Perhaps that is the barrier.

K: Yes, sir. The speaker is not saying that you should love. That would be silly because it has no meaning. And because we see that we should love we feel guilty. And being guilty we force ourselves - right? So please. I hear you telling me, love is not attachment. I hear you. And because I really am in earnest, serious, I want to find out. I really want to find out. So I give attention to what you are saying. And when you say, is attachment love, I say, am I attached to my daughter, to my wife? I investigate in myself - you understand? I say, am I? And if I am not attached will I become irresponsible? You understand? I have so far said, as long as I am attached to this person I am responsible, I have to look after her, I have to care, I have to earn money, you know, together because I am attached to her, she is mine, I must protect her. And you are telling me, asking me, is that love. And I begin to enquire and I say, if I am detached will I neglect my responsibility - you understand? Will I be indifferent, will I get bored and chase another person? You follow? So I am looking at both, whether attachment is love, in attachment there is fear - I know, I feel it. In attachment I must possess, I can't let her go, or him, because in attachment I find security. And you come and tell me, or ask me, because I am listening to you, I care for what you say, you have gone into it, you have searched out, you may be wrong, you may be right, but I want to find out, so I examine, and I say, what happens if I am not attached. I get frightened - aren't you? I get frightened, and that very fear makes me more attached. So I have to face the fear and see if I can go into it and see what is implied in it and then I can say, "Well all right, I see the danger of attachment, but what then?" You follow? I am not attached. Do I live in a vacuum, when all people around me are attached? Am I antisocial? You understand? Go into it with me as I am doing it.

So my enquiry in listening to you is, I want to find out what love is. To me that is very important to find out because that may solve all my problems if I know how to love - right? It may. Everything has failed: I have tried gurus, I have tried everything but nothing has come, nothing has resolved, nothing has created something new in my life. So I am listening to you very earnestly, carefully, with affection. So I say, I understand that love is not attachment. Understand in the sense I have seen it, not verbally, in action. I say, "All right, my girl, I am not attached to you". I am watching it - you understand? I see the danger and therefore I am holding it - you understand? Keeping a watchful eye. Are you doing all this?

Q: Can we determinate what is not love?

K: I am doing that sir, please. You are finding out what is not love. Attachment is not love. I have just discovered that. It is a tremendous discovery for me. Because I have so far accepted attachment as love, and you come and say, "Find out, look at it". I look and I find yes, you are perfectly right because in attachment there is fear, and fear cannot go with love. So I have discovered this. I haven't been told by you, it is part of my blood now. Right? Are you doing this with me, or are you just verbally playing around?

Q: You are going over a very serious problem with these people. Have you ever really considered that there is a very simple statement which tells you all about love, and that is found in the bible. And the simple statement is, that god is love.

K: Madam, please.

Q: And there is no love to be found in man himself. God loves man. And man can look outwards to god, not inwards and then find love.

K: Madam. If you make your question very short then it will be possible to answer it. But if you make a long speech it is impossible to understand even verbally.

So we are through the negation of what is not love finding it out. Do you understand? Negation, attachment is not. But with attachment I have felt responsible, but also if I am not attached will I be irresponsible - you understand? So I have to find out in action, not just verbally. I see I am attached, I see the dangers of attachment, like fear, and I understand the nature of fear and I say, all right. Now am I responsible being free from attachment? Is then, I am asking, is responsibility necessary to love? You understand? Through negation of denying attachment, and I have found responsibility, and is responsibility part of this strange thing called love? You understand? Being responsible, not only to my wife, to my children, having the feeling of responsibility. You understand what I am talking about?

Q: You make it sound like an obligation.

K: Responsibility is not obligation. Obligation is gone. If I am obliged to you, I can't love you. I am obliged to you because you give me money, you give me sex, you give me comfort - you know

- then where is this thing? It is a merchandise. Right?

Q: I think there is another danger: are we becoming indifferent, you know, to become casual? If you see the attachment you can begin to become indifferent. And that is another trap.

K: Oh yes, sir. That's is why I am examining all the traps. So I have realized love implies responsibility. Go a little further.

Q: It means to respond.

K: Responsibility as you say, comes from the word to respond. Now in that responsibility, is the response sensuous, sensory - you understand? Does this responsibility contain desire - you are following all this? Please, I am talking. I am not talking to myself. We are doing it together, you and I. You and I may be all of you. So I am asking, in that responsibility is that responsibility limited to my girl, wife, husband, or the feeling of responsibility - you understand?

Q: There is a centre from which responsibility comes into being.

K: I examined it sir. I am attached. In that attachment I have felt responsible. I go out, earn a livelihood, earn money, come back and I feel responsible for the woman, or the man. And in that responsibility there is attachment, fear, and you point out to me fear and love can't go together. You see it. It is so clear. And I say, quite right. So I am saying, is responsibility just to those few, or responsible for all human beings - you understand? Is love - follow this - is love this total feeling of responsibility?

Q: I see that if you are attached to somebody...

K: Sir, unless you go through this in yourself, work it out, test it.

Q: I test it every day and I think I test it too much sometimes. I think that attachment, as long as I experience attachment I am not able to be responsible to the rest of the human beings in the world.

K: Yes sir. So I have gone much further in my investigation with myself. I hope you are doing the same thing. Which is, do I feel responsible not only for the few, with whom I am associated, or is there the feeling of total responsibility for the earth, for the trees, for the mountains, for the water, for other human beings - you follow? Total feeling. And is that love? Don't say, yes, or no, unless you do it.

And also I find in my investigation that I like to possess. I like to belong to somebody. Don't you know all this? So belonging, which is to be identified with something, - you understand? - identified with the nation, with the group, with a person, with an idea. So as I have lost every form of identification I feel I must be identified. Don't you know this? And in that identification I must possess. I can't identify myself with the wind.

Q: We are brought up in this way.

K: Yes sir I know. I am breaking my conditioning. I am breaking down what I have been brought up to.

Q: Sometimes your conditioning is that you are able to watch it, the conditioning, you can listen. The conditioning is sometimes very strong. You are able to watch it, you are able to be aware of it, but the conditioning is very, very strong.

K: Yes. I am aware that I want to possess. And in that possession there is domination. And possession and domination, does that contain love - you understand? So I discover it does not. So I will not possess. You understand? I can't possess, because my interest, my pride, my intensity to find out this thing called love.

So I have found attachment is not love, possession is not love, nor the instinct which has been derived from the animal to the humans, the mother, the parents saying, "I love my baby" and then neglect them for the rest of their life - right? That is not love. So I have out for myself these things are not love.

Then I want also to enquire - I hope we are doing it together. I am not talking to myself. If I am, stop it.

Q: What about attachment to the idea of independence, which is the other side of the coin? Aren't we often attached to the idea that we should be independent? This creates a problem also.

K: Yes sir. That means attached to the image you have about dependence. So is jealousy love? You understand? Or you say, "It is not, but I am jealous". So my saying, it is not, has no meaning. So I have to say, "Why, why am I jealous?" Go into it, look at it. Why am I jealous?

Q: Because I am frightened.

K: Because I possess. Why do I possess her, or him, why do I hold on? Is it that I am lonely - you understand? Desperately, deeply lonely, separate?

Q: I think love is a sort of... of life. For example, now at this moment together, and the sounds outside playing on the tent, the water on the roof, the whole of life, that is love. I think so.

K: You have described what love is - right?

Q: Like for example, I think love is an instant internal perception of life.

K: But you haven't got that intense perception of life. Yes, madam, I understand that, but I haven't got it. You people make a statement and let it go at that. I don't know what you mean by 'intense perception of life'. I am caught in this thing. You are giving some description what life should be. I am not going to be caught in that trap of descriptions.

So is jealousy love? And I am jealous, so I become aware of it. You understand? I go into it, I don't just say, what am I to do, tell me. I am seeing jealousy is not love and I am jealous, so I go into it, work it out, think it out. Which means I am attached to her, or him. So I have not escaped from attachment, I have not really resolved it. So I must go into again, look at it carefully because my intention, my whole search is find out this perfume. So I have put that aside.

Then I see that I have my ambitions, my beliefs, my dogmatism, me first and her second - right? Or she first and me second. And I say, is that love? Which means when there is separation between that and this, is that love? Sir, don't say, no. Go into it, look at it. Because if you don't, you will say at the end of twenty years, "I have done nothing". At the end of ten years you will say, "You have talked enough, get away from here. Stop talking". Because you don't apply.

Q: This is the only difficulty: we don't apply.

K: Apply. I am doing it.

Q: But I have the intention to apply myself but there is something else that I don't know that prevents me to deeply see all these things and not develop annoyance.

K: Then find out what is impeding you. Go into it. Don't say, "I don't know, I am going to give it up". Find out what is the barrier. Is it laziness, is it acceptance of things as they are, not to be disturbed? Sir, go into it. Test it out. Break down, cry, do something to find out. At the end of it don't say, "I have listened to you for twenty years, or fifty-two years, and I haven't changed". It is not my fault, it is your fault. Don't put the blame on me.

Q: Sir.

K: Just a minute sir. I am answering your question sir. So I have discovered attachment in any form is not love. Jealousy is not love. Possession is not love, me and her, fulfilling my desires in her, or she in me. So desire - go into it carefully - desire is not love. Right? You don't accept it, you won't see this. Desire, sexual desires, desire for comfort, desire for various forms of encouragement, you know, desire. Is desire love? Don't say, no. Because I am desiring that woman, or that man. I desire to be a big politician, or a guru, or I desire enlightenment. I desire to become better. I desire to overcome this and enter into something else. All this movement of desire, the becoming, the fulfilling, is that love?

Q: What shall we do with it?

K: I am telling you, sir. Look at it, investigate desire. Desire. Why is the mind, which is the result of the sense, you follow, you understand this, the senses, so the response of the senses with its desires, is that love? You follow?

Please follow all this. I am investigating all this so that towards the end I begin to see that everything that thought has created, or desired, around this word, is not love. And in the perception of that intelligence is taking place - right? Right, sir?

Q: Is love the same as understanding?

K: No, sir. Love is not the same as understanding. Love is something totally different. You see I am describing it. I can use a Greek word, agape, or French word, or Sanskrit word, but it won't convey the thing. The description in Sanskrit I can tell you, it won't. Or in Italian, or French, it is not that. So please sir, do it.

Q: Sir, you talked about love.

K: I don't talk about love. I am talking about the barriers, the things that prevent this thing taking place.

Q: Well I am blocking it.

K: You told me that sir.

Q: What shall I do? I mean, I want to love.

K: That's just it. I want to love. The very desire of wanting to love is the denial of love.

Q: Well how shall I get rid of that desire?

K: I am not saying you should get rid of anything. I am just pointing out how to investigate desire, to look at it. All right, I will show it to you sir. I have desire. I desire that woman, or that man, I desire to become something, I desire to be very healthy, I desire a better life, more money, I desire. And what is this constant urge - right? - for nirvana, for enlightenment, better life, what is this desire? Please I am not talking to myself. I can do this anywhere.

Q: In order for the desire to transform into the passion to investigate, something has to take place.

K: Is there desire for something? Desire can not be transmuted into something else, it has to be understood. It has to be exposed to the light of investigation.

Q: How do you expose it?

K: I am doing it. I am doing it. I went into carefully the other day, what is the movement of desire. The response of the senses - right? The response, I see something, a blue shirt, I want that blue shirt. The response of seeing, the response, contact, sensation, then thought comes in and says, "I would like to have that shirt". So thought when it takes over the response of the senses creates desire. Test it out.

Q: I want the tension that you have sir to see that desire.

K: So I am left with this sir: I see love is not desire. It is a great thing to find out for oneself and if love is not desire then what is love? You understand? Love is not mere attachment to the baby, love is not attachment to any form, love is not jealousy, love is not me and my ambition, my fulfilment, my becoming, and you also becoming, this constant division, that is not love, nor desire, nor pleasure - right? The fulfilment of desire, which is pleasure, that is not love. So I have found out what love is. It is none of these things. And have I understood these elements and am free of them. Or just say, "I understand intellectually, I understand verbally, but help me to go deeper", I can't. You have to do it yourself.

Q: How do you do it, sir.

K: I am doing it sir. So in this investigation, in examining all these things quite impersonally, objectively as they are, I have got that quality of intelligence now. You understand? It is born out of this investigation, it is born out of this seeing the truth of each thing - right? And therefore out of that there is intelligence.

So I am asking, is this intelligence necessary for love? I am using the word intelligence, not intellect, not the cunning, twisting subtleties of the intellect, the verbal play, but totally different. The seeing and the doing; the seeing attachment is dangerous and the doing of it, which is the ending of it, that is intelligence. So there is intelligence and therefore it is love, that quality of love, which is compassion. Not compassion as an idea, a thing that is in one's heart, burning, alive. And compassion, love and intelligence go together. Without intelligence you can't have compassion, this intelligence of which I am talking.

Now we have talked for an hour and twenty seven minutes, have you tested it out? Have you freed yourself from this attachment and therefore total freedom of immense responsibility? Or will you say the day after tomorrow, "I listened to you, nothing else happened"? That very statement indicates that you have not investigated yourself, gone into yourself. You expect somebody to do something for you.

Q: Krishnaji, that may not be quite fair. I have listened to what you are saying and feel now I must test it out.

K: Test it out. No, do it as we are talking, don't wait until the day after tomorrow.

Q: Sir, as I reject every attachment, or desire, I feel tremendously empty in myself, so I can't see intelligence.

K: Sir, emptiness, what does that mean? Lonely, separate, isolated, a sense of being cut off, not having any kind of relationship with another, is it the result of drugs, is it the result of various forms of marijuana, grass, weed, and all the rest of it? And also is it the result of your vows, your meditation, your acceptance of authority? You follow? Has made you the sense of absolutely worthless, empty, lonely. So at the end of an hour and a half nearly, have you got this quality of love and compassion? If not let us tomorrow talk about it, investigate it, go into it much more deeply. But don't say ever, "I have listened for so long and I haven't got it". You can listen to that river endlessly, but the waters are not what you listen to.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 27TH JULY 1979.

We are having a dialogue, that is, a conversation between two people, friendly, serious and wanting to solve their own intimate personal problems. And so they go for a walk in the woods and talk over things together. And we are in that position, you and I, the speaker and you, we are out for a walk, lovely stream, marvellous pine woods full of morning scent, and we are talking over together. And each one of us know that words have a particular definite meaning, and that each one of us understands the meaning of the words they use. They know the words and the content of the word, the meaning of the word, the significance of the word, so they use the word which is common to both of them. And they also know that the word is not the thing and the words do not actually convey the deep inner feelings. They are feeling it out together because they are good friends, they are not opposed to each other, they are not trying to trick each other, they have known each other for long years and they have often talked about these things and so they are willing to expose themselves to each other; point out their difficulties, their problems, and each one is trying to understand the other, and hoping to help each other. That is really a dialogue. They have established a good relationship between them. So can we this morning have such a dialogue?

And we talked about yesterday, the nature of attention, care and love. So what shall we talk over together this morning?

Questioner: Could we investigate why it is so difficult for us to actually experience here and now all the psychological inhibitions we have that block us from loving?

K: Could we investigate together our psychological inhibitions, our psychological barriers now. Talk it over together, the gentleman asks.

Q: How can the mind be free of cunning intelligence which society pushes on us?

K: How can the mind be free from the cunning which thought has put together there?

Q: What is the quality of the mind that observes silently? Is it something probably new to us, or is it something that we possess already but we have forgotten?

Q: Could you say what is intelligence?

K: Could you discuss what is intelligence.

Q: Is there a difference between voluntary isolation which obviously creates conflict and the involuntary isolation, such as being blind?

K: Isolation through some kind of illness, which is forced, and voluntary, willing isolation. Is that it?

Q: Could we discuss the mechanical activity of the brain, it is shouting all the time?

K: Why does thought always occur, why is there not a freedom at any time from the movement of thought?

Q: You often tell us that fear is produced by thought but I myself have experienced that fear manifests itself with thought and it wants to structure and limit itself, and escape from itself, by thinking.

K: You say fear is the result of thought, produced by thought...

Q: No, thought is the result of fear.

K: Thought is the result of fear - you follow? He is putting fear first and thought afterwards - right?

Q: Could we talk about identification?

K: Could we discuss why the mind seeks identification, why we seek identification.

Q: I find it extremely difficult to take part in these discussions because I am always in doubt whether it is a right or a wrong question. How can I find out myself, are there any guidelines?

K: How can one find out for oneself what is a right question, and a wrong question. Is that is sir?

Q: Sir, I asked why do you call the usual meditation which is sitting down with closed eyes, self-hypnosis? I asked this question because I have the feeling that it is through that that I can understand when you say beauty is something entirely different, love is something entirely different.

K: Why are you saying that sitting down quietly, crossed legs, closed eyes and going through all that is self-hypnosis. I somehow feel that I am very close to what you are saying, why are you saying that is not meditation? Why do you say that is self-hypnosis?

Now which of these shall we take up? They are all connected with the mind. All these questions, I don't know if you have observed, listened, are dealing with the nature of thought, the nature of the mind. What is intelligence, and what is meditation - right? Now which of these shall we take?

Q: Can we go on with yesterday's talk. I had the feeling we didn't go over it completely?

K: Could we go on discussing, talking over together, yesterday's meeting because the questioner says, "I don't feel we have gone through completely to the end of it".

So we have got two questions, fundamental questions: thought with all its complexities, its mechanical habits, its constant activity, never a moment that it is quiet, meditation, and what we talked about yesterday, love, intelligence, compassion. Now which of these do you want?

Q: Love.

K: One is rather shy of that word because it is so spoilt - love of god, love of my family, love of poems, go for a lovely walk - you follow? Sex, the politicians use, the love of the country, love of god, love of Jesus, love of Krishna and so on and so on. So one is hesitant to use that word. So perhaps, if I may suggest, we will talk about that question which you have asked by enquiring first - we are discussing, we are talking over together, it is not a solitary conversation with oneself - if we could go into this question of meditation, then we may be able to understand whether it is possible for thought to be absolutely quiet, and not compelled, coerced, forced and all the rest of it. And perhaps we could take that question and go into it very, very deeply then perhaps we can also enter into the field of what is intelligence, love, compassion. And without those, which is the essence of that love, the mind can never be totally free from all its manifestations, its trickery, its deceits and dishonesty. So would it be all right if we talked about that?

Q: Yes.

K: You are not pleasing me, I don't care, if you want to talk about something else we will. All right.

The first question, if I may ask: is it possible to have a brain that is not twisted, that is not neurotic, that is very healthy, young? I am asking that as the first question. Do you understand? I am asking, to put it very simply: can the mind remain young, and not grow old, decay, corrupt, but keep its quality of youth? - youth being decision, action and vitality. Right? That is generally accepted as the meaning of youth, to have an enormous amount of energy, decision, action, and that sense of freedom. That, I think, would more or less describe what is a young mind. Would you agree to that? A definition, we can change it, I am not sticking to those words, but to have a mind that is extraordinarily clear, simple, having great energy, vitality and capable of instant decision and action. Right? Would you agree to that?

Q: Yes.

K: That is only a definition, you can change the definition, change it how you like, but let's all agree, if you accept that, that is the quality of a mind that is young, that is not hurt, that has no problems, that is living, living not in the future or in the past, but actually living in the present. That is, again I said one is using words to convey a quality of a mind that is youthful. If we agree to that definition, that definition can be changed as you like.

Now how can that mind come into being? That is the first thing. You are following?

Q: Wouldn't you need to use your body intelligence and not your mind?

K: There is the intelligence of the body, the intelligence which has been spoilt by indulgence, by drugs, by drink, alcohol, all that extravagance. Also the intelligence of the body, the body has its own intelligence if left alone, not destroyed, not corrupted by taste, by desire and all the rest of it. The body has its own intelligence, if you have observed it. So we'll leave that for the moment. All right, we must go into it much deeper, we will.

Our mind is the result of our senses - right? Isn't that so? This is science, this is just natural. And we don't exercise all the senses together - right? Are you following this? But exaggerate one or two of the senses and so there is never a balance. I don't know if you have experimented, or watched this, or are aware of your senses. Either one or two senses dominate and the other senses are in abeyance, or not totally functioning, and so there is always inequality, always imbalance in the activity of our senses - right? You are following all this, please do follow this. Don't go to sleep because we are coming into it.

So is it possible that all our senses work together totally, harmoniously? That is the first question, because our whole structure is based on senses, perception, taste, touch and all that. Now if there is imbalance in our senses, our brain, our mind is affected naturally. And from this imbalance there is neurotic activity. So is it possible - please go into it with me, it is a dialogue, I am not giving a speech - can we see the movement of the sky, the clouds, the shadows on the mountains with all our senses together? You understand my question? Will you do it as you are sitting there, observing yourself? Please, as I said yesterday, unless you apply, actually apply, do it, you can sit there for the next fifty years you will do nothing. But if you apply, actually work it out, then you will see for yourself that as long as there is imbalance in the senses the mind, which is also part of the senses, part of thought, then that imbalance invariably creates disharmony - right? Do it please, as you are sitting there, observe it, actually apply.

Q: Could you give a concrete example of what you mean by the imbalance of the senses?

K: Concrete example of imbalance of the senses. I am not good at giving examples. I think examples are wrong because you have to find out. If one gives an example that becomes the pattern. You follow? And then you say, "I must conform to that", or "No that example is not good, a better example" and so on, we battle with examples. I hope you understand this. I can think out an example: sex, drugs, various forms of sensory entertainments, where only the eye or the ear functions, not the totality of all the senses. You understand all this?

So the mind - am I, as the gentleman pointed out the other day, I am performing. He said that, I am performing and doing an excellence performance, it is a rather unpleasant word but there it is. And this is a dialogue between you and me, so don't please become quiet and just listen. So that is part of the mind.

Q: Can we explain the brain when we talk about the mind?

K: When we use the word 'mind', sir, we are including in the mind all the activity of the senses, all the activities of thought, all the activities of emotions, whether imagined or real, romantic, sentimental, all that, the whole of human activity is the mind. At least I look at it that way. You may look at it differently, but as we are two friends talking over together I change my vocabulary, you change your word, but we mean the same thing. That is, the mind contains, holds, all the senses, all the emotions, all the romantic, sentimental attitudes, values, and also the enormous complexity of thought, the memories, the experiences, the hurts, the wounds that one has received from childhood, psychologically, inwardly, and the intention, the motive, the drive, the desires, all that is the mind.

Q: Is love part of the mind?

K: We are coming to that: is love part of the mind? Do you understand the question? Is love contained in the mind? What do you say? A dialogue please.

Q: No.

K: No?

Q: It is not in the mind.

K: The lady says, it is not in the mind. Then is it outside the mind? Sir go into it for yourself, it is a dialogue.

Q: Perhaps the mind is part of love.

K: The mind is part of love? Go very carefully into this please. You think it out sir, go into it, dialogue.

Is love remembrance? Go into it madam, just look at it. I am asking you. Is love something that has happened and you remember it? Therefore I am asking, is love part of remembrance? You have been kind to me, I remember it and therefore I have affection for you. You know, remembering. Is love a remembrance? If it is not, is it then within the structure and nature of the mind? This is a very difficult question, please don't just slip it by. That is why I want to go into this carefully.

We have defined more or less, that definition can be changed, the nature of the mind, with all the senses and so on and so on. And all this is predominated by thought - right? That is the central activity - right? - that controls the senses, exaggerates the senses, gives importance to a certain sense and not to the others, that creates images, conclusions, aggressiveness, assertiveness. All that is the activity of thought - right? So thought predominates all our activity, including the senses, dominating the intelligence of the body - you are following all this? So thought is the central factor that is constantly operating, controlling, deciding, changing, modifying, pursuing, establishing a goal and driving towards that, and the past, with all its memories, anxieties, all that, the whole of that is the activity of the mind, which is thought - right? You are quite sure? Please discuss with me. Please.

Q: All the senses are the same.

K: All the senses in the mind are equal.

Q: The same value.

K: Same value?

Q: Yes.

K: To the mind, but the thought says this is better than that.

That is all, we are saying that.

Q: When thought is dominating the senses, the senses become dull.

K: When thought exercises, dominates, the senses become dull.

Could we move from this - right sir? Can we go on?

Now meditation is part of thinking, otherwise you wouldn't meditate - right? Would you? No?

Q: Is meditation the activity of thought?

K: We are going to go into it. But first see when you start meditating, sitting quietly, closing your eyes, it is the activity of thought. First because you want to achieve, or feel good in that position, doing something. So thought has brought this about through desire. No? Please this is not very complex. I am sitting in that position, cross-legged, or whatever it is, in the lotus position, close my eyes because I have been taught, or I have read, or I have heard somebody that if you do this, you will have a marvellous experience.

Q: No sir. I do it in order to watch my thoughts.

K: Wait. That is a different matter sir. You see the difference? I do it because I want to achieve certain experiences, because I have read about it, or have been told about it, and it gives you certain pleasure, you feel rather relieved, relaxed - right? And I maintain that, giving more and more importance to my feeling of certain pleasure, certain experience, certain state of mind. And I go on doing it. But the origin of that is the movement of thought - right?

Q: What you are talking about is the practice of meditation, but within this practice meditation can come about. But there is a difference, suddenly something else could happen.

K: Yes, this is the practise of meditation and in that something else can suddenly happen. Right sir?

Q: Yes. What happens is real meditation. I mean it is just a question of words.

K: Sir, we are investigating. You are jumping to conclusions, you are saying it happens. I question the whole thing.

Q: Sir, when we sit quietly to watch our minds, our eyes get naturally shut and we are quiet. We don't sit with our eyes permanently shut so as to come quiet.

K: Sir, the speaker has played with all this. Right? This is not something new you are telling me. So have patience. I have been through all this: sitting quietly, breathing, repeating, hoping for something to happen! Nonsense.

You are not meeting my point: why do I meditate? Why does one meditate?

Q: Because we are agitated.

K: When you are agitated, nervous, anxious, crowded with innumerable problems, by sitting quietly you hope to get away slightly from that.

Q: Not forced sir, just quietly.

K: Yes, just relaxed until you are overcome again. But - forgive me - you are missing my point of view, what I am saying, which is, all this is the origin of thought, origin of desire. No? Right sir? Why are you hesitant? What's wrong with it?

Q: Yes.

Q: Can thought not see without doing it and stop because it sees it is stupid?

K: You seem to think madam, and the others, that I am opposed to meditation. I am totally, completely opposed to the meditation that you are all doing because that is not meditation, because I have been through all this.

Q: Maybe we must investigate what you mean by meditation.

K: We explained what the word means, madam. The word means to think over, to ponder, to investigate, to concentrate in order to look at your problems, and all that is involved in that one word.

Q: Sir, if you are opposed to our meditation are you not creating a division?

K: Excuse me, I withdraw that word 'oppose'. What you are doing, what is called meditation is not meditation. All right. It is the same thing sir. I am not opposed to it. I am just saying what one considers meditation, if you willing to examine what the other person has to say, he says that is not meditation. Meditation is something much more complex, more etc. So we are two friends talking over, I am not opposing you. We are talking this over. We say meditation begins with desire, with thought - right? You hear somebody from Tibet, from India, from Zen, from god knows whatever place, and he expounds what meditation is. He says, "Sit down quietly, I will give you a system to make you calm, restful, relaxed". So your thought accepts it, desires to achieve it, and you sit in that position - right? This is so obvious, what are you objecting to?

Q: Would you say because an idea started a meditation, all meditation is your own ideas?

K: That's right. That's what I am saying differently. So meditation begins with thought - right? And desire says, "I must achieve that something which I experienced yesterday when I was sitting quietly, and I want that, I want it to continue". I practise, I force, I follow a system, all the activity of thought. That's all. What are you. objecting to?

Q: Sometimes I meditate to go out from identification.

K: I have meditated for a couple of hours, the questioner says, to get away from myself - right? Is meditation an escape?

Q: A temporary relief.

K: Then take a drug, take a thing that quietens your nerves. You see you are not following all this, you are wasting time. Temporary relief, temporary excitement, temporary experience, temporary quietness, all that you call meditation. My lord, how that word has been misused. Could we get on with it a little bit?

Q: It could be you that force meditation because you say that you want to be free and therefore you look at your problems.

K: I am not sir. I am sorry you have misunderstood. I am not doing that.

Q: Could it be that one cannot force meditation, but it is automatic?

K: Sir, could we stick to one thing? We are saying, we are asking, we have gone to far, which is, what is the nature of the mind? We talked about that. And that mind is dominated by thought. Thought is perpetually in activity, when you are sleeping, when you are awake, when you are walking, when you are by yourself, it is constantly moving. And that becomes a strain - right? That becomes nervous, anxious to bring about a quietness, a relief, a sense of peace you try to meditate - quotes meditation. And achieve a little bit of that, and you practise it, and you call that meditation. I say please that is not meditation, it is something much wider, deeper, that requires a great deal of enquiry, so please listen, exchange, not say, meditation is this, meditation is that, it appeals to me, it doesn't appeal to me. Then we stop discussing. Whereas if we say, look, let's find out - right?

Q: Krishnaji, I don't know what meditation is. Could we come to what meditation is?

K: I am doing it sir.

Q: Is it possible to know what meditation is at all?

K: Is it possible to know what meditation is at all.

Q: Know it all.

K: That is what I am saying. Could we put it this way: when you deliberately set about to meditate, it is not meditation - right? Because behind that deliberate act is desire, behind that is thought having come to a conclusion, pursuing that conclusion. We say that is not meditation. You may say, you are wrong. I say, all right, let's talk it over. So thought dominates - right? That's simple and clear. No? All our activities, whether you meditate, whether you sit down, you practise, you try to force the mind to be quiet, all that is still the activity of thought.

And is love the activity of thought? Right? Go on sir. Let's talk it over. Does the activity of thought bring about right relationship between two people? Because if you haven't established right relationship with one another you can sit on your legs crossed for the rest of your life. Unless you lay the foundation of relationship, having no conflict and so on and so on, any form of meditation is just an escape into another series of illusions.

So is love the activity of thought? I love you. I really do. Isn't it strange!

Q: ...some of us do not know love.

K: How sad it is. Somebody, sir, somebody comes and tells you "I love you, old boy, I love you", you don't go on with your thinking do you? You just listen to him. You don't.

Q: Isn't that...

K: You are all so infantile.

And we are asking, is love the activity of thought? Is love the activity of the senses? Is love the activity of desire? Please find out, investigate in your life. When you are controlled, when your sex becomes all important, which is the activity of the senses.

Q: We have to be aware of this activity then.

K: One has to be aware sir, but first know the nature of one's mind. Through awareness one discovers this, that means you have to look at it, look at your desires, the sensory desires. Wanting food, the taste of food, compulsive eating food of a certain kind because it tastes nice, exercising a certain capacity of the eyes, optical, seeing something always, or the sensory responses of sex. These are the dominant factors in our life and you are trying to move away from that.

Q: Love for me can only be without thought.

K: Are you saying sir, thought is part of love?

Q: No, I am saying love is the product of thought.

K: Love is the product of thought. Sir, when you say, it can only be, it must be, you have already come to a conclusion, you have stopped investigating.

Q: You asked the question, is love part of thought?

K: Yes, is love part of thought? Which means does love contain the whole movement and the complexity of thought? You understand? If it contains thought, is that love? You don't even go into it, look at it.

Q: It is a state of being. Anicca.

K: Steady, you are using Sanskrit. Careful! I am also pretty good on languages sir, don't play. You are all so... We have gone beyond this madam. Please go on.

Q: I just wanted to ask you a question about meditation, if I may. I seem to have been under the illusion, the delusion, that the best things of which I do has effortless meditation. Now is this my illusion completely?

K: We must understand when you say, "I meditate effortlessly", what do you mean by that word 'effort'.

Q: The mind now begins and ends with a process, in which all I need do is release the mind, my thinking process to it. I don't make any effort to release, it just happens.

K: Sir, when you know you are meditating, it is not meditation.

Q: I don't know I am meditating.

K: Have you listened to what I said sir?

Q: Yes sir.

K: When you know you are meditating, it is not meditation. Oh, you don't know. You don't see the beauty of all this. You are just going on and on and on.

Q: I am trying to find out, sir.

K: Why do you meditate at all? You have never even asked that question. What you call meditation, why do you do it? Is it that they have brought it from India, from Tibet, from Japan and you like to play with it?

Q: Sir, when one is angry, for example, when I have been angry, or I have a problem, I am in conflict. If I do, we are both agreed it is not meditation, but just sitting down quietly to watch my thoughts.

K: Yes sir, that is just when you are angry, to examine it, to go into it, it is not meditation.

Q: It is not meditation, but it is useful.

K: Yes, sir, yes sir. I agree. To be aware that you have been angry, to go into the whole question of anger, that is not meditation.

Q: But is that useful Krishnaji?

K: Not the meditation that you are talking about. I said when you know you are meditating, it is not meditation. Swallow that pill and look at it!

Q: Cannot it take me away from the realm of thought?

K: Meditation helps me to get away from myself, from my thoughts. Then go to a cinema.

Q: That can block me, not help me.

Q: Can love take him away from the realm of thought?

K: Can love take him away from the realm of thought - you understand the question? Can love bring about freedom from the realm of thought? Can love free the mind from the activities of thought? What do you say? Don't look at me. What do you say?

Q: Sir, thought itself...

K: It is a very good question. The mind is incessantly active, sleeping, waking, day dreaming, sitting quietly, when it is not under control up pops the thought. So does love free the mind from the activities of thought? No. You see what you have done? You are using love as a means of escape from thought. But if you have understood the nature of thought - please follow this - and thought gives its own right place, then you don't have to move away from it, thought has established itself in its right place. You understand this? Love is not an escape, or an avoidance, or moving away from thought.

Q: Is that meditation?

K: Sir, as I said, when you know you are meditating, sitting in that position, breathing, repeating a mantra, and all that, when there is that activity, it is not meditation. I will tell you why, if you will listen. All that is the activity of desire and thought. Obviously. A guru comes along, I don't know why they do, unfortunately they do, comes along and he says, "Do this and you will have the most marvellous experience of god", or of enlightenment. "You will have extraordinary experience". And he lays down certain systems, methods, practices, and we being gullible, not having the quality of scepticism to question him, we say, "All right Swami," - or Lord, or whatever you call him and we practice it. And in the very practising of it you have certain quietness, certain experience and that delights you. You say, "At last I have got something". Right? And I say that is the activity of desire, activity of thought, which has projected an image of something to be experienced. And that image can be experienced only through certain practices, certain repetition of words, especially in Sanskrit, that sounds far better! So we repeat it. But it is still the activity of thought and desire. So unless you understand this, what is the nature of thought, what is the nature of desire, and thought gives itself its right place, then you will be everlastingly battling with thought, with all the images that it has created. That is very simple. No?

Q: Is love denied by thought?

K: He asked, when there is thought is there love? No. But if there is no thought you can be in a state of amnesia.

Q: Is psychoanalysis a form of meditation?

K: This is getting worse and worse! Is psychoanalysis a form of meditation? Do you know what psychoanalysis is? Investigating into the past. Psychoanalysis, analysing oneself, either by the professional, psychotherapist, psychologist, psychoanalyst, Freudian, Jungian, Adlerian and innumerable names, or you investigate yourself, analyse yourself. Who is the analyser and what is he analysing? Is not the analyser the analysed? So he is playing a trick upon himself. You don't see all this. So analysis, and the psycho-therapeutics of various group therapies, you know all that is going on, various forms of psychotherapy, is not meditation. Good lord! Think what we have reduced meditation to.

Q: Sir, isn't this process of observation which you have been talking about for the last ten days, is that not also thought?

K: As we explained earlier in these talks, there is only observation, not the observer - right? You are agreed to that? You know what that means madam? The absence of me. The absence of all the past, just to observe without the word, without the name, without association, without remembrance, just to observe.

Q: Meditation is a sort of process.

K: Look sir, there is no process - you see that is what I am pointing out, sir. The moment there is a process for meditation that process is the result of thought. And thought has laid down the process in order to achieve something. You people don't listen.

Q: You never decide to start meditating? How do you start meditating?

K: Does the speaker decide to meditate? I have answered the question. We have said, sir, that when you decide to start meditation, it is not meditation. When you put yourself in the hands of another who will teach you how to meditate, it is not meditation. When you follow a system, it is not meditation. When you accept the authority of another who says, "I know, you don't know, I will tell you what to do", it is not meditation. And so on and so on and so on.

Q: Please when you go out walking you don't think about meditation, but when you see something very beautiful you have the feeling...

K: That's right. The lady says as you are walking in the wood, quietly not carrying all the burdens of your problems, suddenly you have a certain sensation, feeling, and you are watching, and thought comes over and takes charge and makes it into a memory, and wanting it more. All that is not meditation.

Q: Is it not love just to observe?

K: Is pure observation love? You see. Look sir, have you observed that way, pure observation? To observe without remembrance, without naming, without a conclusion, just to observe.

We have spent an hour and a quarter nearly, discussing verbally what is mediation, what is love. We haven't come to anything.

Q: Are we trying to get somewhere?

K: I am not.

Q: May I say something?

K: Delighted!

Q: (Mostly inaudible, but the essence seems to be: that there is a thought that is unconditioned)

K: The gentleman says, in essence, that there is a thought which is unconditioned. There is a thought, or there is thinking which is unconditioned. I don't know anything about it.

Q: Sir, but thought must find its own place.

K: Thought has its own place. Not what you said sir, the lady says that. Is there a thought which is not conditioned, is there a thought which is not limited? There may be, but I wouldn't call it thought. Thought, as generally understood, is the process of thinking. Thinking is the movement of memory, movement of experience, movement of knowledge. The whole process of that is thinking.

Q: I don't use thought as you describe it.

K: Right sir.

Q: I would ask what does intuition mean to you?

K: Intuition can be projected by desire.

Q: Not only.

K: You don't even listen. It is so impossible to discuss when you are so definite about your point of view, then I am afraid that becomes a barrier and one doesn't investigate the other.

May I finish this strange dialogue that we have had up to now?

Q: Yes.

K: We started out by asking: what is the relationship of thought to meditation and to love? We went into the question that our mind contains, or is the result, of the senses, the emotions, crooked, sane, irrational, illusory and so on, the sentiments, the judgements, the evaluations, the memories, the hurts, the anxieties, all that, which is under the umbrella of thought. Thought is the central factor. And as thought is the result of knowledge, and knowledge is always limited and therefore with knowledge goes ignorance, thought is fragmented, broken up, limited. And when thought says, "I must meditate, I must find out truth, I must achieve enlightenment", thought is playing games with itself. That is obvious. So meditation has nothing to do with thought. When you sit down and deliberately meditate, it may be pleasant, it may give you certain relaxation, you may have certain pleasurable experience, but all that is a deliberate action by thought and desire to achieve a certain result. Therefore that is not meditation.

And what is the relationship of thought to love? That is what you were asking madam. Love - this becomes rather difficult - love is free from thought. Love is not the product of thought. If it is, it is still part of desire, obviously. So love is independent, is free from all the activities, and chicanery, dishonesty, desires, sensations, sex. That is not love. Where love is the 'me' is not. Obviously. The 'me', the ego, with all its arrogance, conceits, aggressiveness, humility, pretension to humility, rather, all that is the ego. What has that got to do with love - you understand?

So love is beyond thought. Then what is the relationship between meditation and love? When one deliberately, purposefully, actively participates in so-called meditation, that meditation leads to illusion, and that illusion has no relationship with love.

But there is a meditation, if you are interested in it, which is not deliberate, which has nothing whatsoever to do with desire. There is a meditation which must be totally undesired, totally free of thought. And to find that meditation - I am not offering it as a reward - if you are interested in it you have to go into the question of desire, give it its right place, whether desire has any place at all, and also thought has to find its own place and remain there. Then meditation becomes something totally different from what you are doing.

That is, one has to find out what is reality and what is truth. Reality is also an illusion - do you understand? The reality of these mountains, the hills, the groves, the meadows, the river, that is reality, you can see it. And also reality is all the illusions, like nationality, like your beliefs, your dogmas, your rituals, your saviours, your Krishnas, all that, those are all illusions. They might have existed - might - but what we have made of them is illusion. That's a reality. Go into a church, into a temple, into a mosque, that is a reality. That is all the product of thought. Right? Of course. So reality has to be understood, seen. Reality, everything that thought has created, the atom bomb, the atom existed before thought investigated and created the bomb. Thought did not create nature, but thought has used nature. The chair that one is sitting on is made by thought out of wood. And truth has nothing whatsoever to do with reality. To find that is meditation. To begin to establish right relationship with human beings, not the everlasting battle between sexes, between human beings, killing each others, terrorizing each other, destroying the earth and so on. If we don't stop that, what is the good of your meditation?

Sir, first you have to be good, by your goodness you can bring about a good society. And if you are not good inside, good, I am using that words specifically because it is not the goodness, "Be a good child", I don't mean that. We will go into that perhaps tomorrow, another day. But if there is not goodness in you, you cannot produce a good society. And without goodness in you, you can meditate until Doomsday, go to India, go to Tibet, where you visit various monasteries, and attend various gurus who say this, and deny that, you know play that game. It amuses you but don't deceive yourself saying "That is meditation, I have meditated". Right? So if you have no love in your heart, your meditation will be destructive.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 28TH JULY 1979

We are still continuing with our dialogues. Unfortunately it seems to me that I am talking most of the time, that you are not sharing, or having a conversation with the speaker. If I may, I would like to suggest something: we have been talking about meditation, love, thought and other things, but it seems to me that we are not talking about our daily life, our relationship with others, our relationship to the world, our relationship to the whole of humanity. And we seem to be wandering away from the central issue all the time, which is our daily life, the way we live, and if we are at all aware of our daily turmoil, daily anxieties, daily insecurity, daily depressions, the constant demand of our daily existence. Shouldn't we, I am just asking, be concerned with that this morning and tomorrow morning, and not go off into all kinds of vague, idealistic, theoretical pursuits? Could we, I am just asking, perhaps you would not like that, I am just asking whether we could not this morning talk over together as friends about our daily life, what we do, what we eat, what our relationships are, why we get so bored with our existence, why our minds are so mechanical, and so on, our daily existence. Could we talk about that? And restrict ourselves to that only. Could we?

Questioner: Yes.

K: At last!

What is our daily life, if you are aware of it? Not escape into some fantasies, cut all that out, what is our daily life? Getting up, exercise, if you are inclined, eating, going off to the office, or to the factory, or some business or other, and our ambitions, fulfilments, our relationship with another, intimate, or not intimate, sexual or not sexual and so on. What is the central issue of our life? Is it money? Central issue, not the peripheral issues, not the superficial issues, but the deep demand. Please look at it yourself. What is it we demand, we ask? Is it we want money? Don't say, no, we need money. Is money the central issue? Or to have a position? You understand? To be secure, financially, psychologically, to be completely certain, unconfused? What is the main urge, demand, desire of our life? Right? Go on sirs.

Q: Joy of work.

K: Joy of work. Would you say that to the man who is turning the screw day after day, day after day, on a moving belt - joy of work? Or to a man that has to go to the office every morning, be told what to do, typing, every day of one's life? Please face it. That is what we are asking: is it money? Is it security? Is it lack of work? And having work, then the routine of work, the boredom of it, and the escape of it through entertainment, night clubs, jazz - you follow? Anything away from our central existence. Because the world - I am not preaching, you must know all this - the world is in a horrible condition. You must know all this. So as fairly intelligent, serious, human beings, what is our relationship to all that? The moral deterioration, the intellectual dishonesty, the class prejudices and so on. You know all this. The mess that the politicians are making. The endless preparation for war. What is our relationship to all this? Please let's have a dialogue about it, a conversation. You see when we come to that point we are all silent.

Q: We are all part of it.

K: We are all part of it. I quite agree. Do we know we are part of it? Aware of it, that our daily life, you understand, daily life, contributes to all this? And if it does, what shall we do? Take drugs? Get drunk? Join some community? Go off to a monastery? Or put on yellow, purple, bright colours? Would that solve all this? So please I would like to discuss. What shall we do? What is our daily life, of which the society is made, the politicians are thoughtlessly using us for their own power, for their own position? So being aware of all this, what is our relationship to that, and what is our life, which obviously is contributing to that? Right? Am I saying something extravagant?

Q: We would like to change it, but we don't know how.

K: We'd like to change it but we don't know how. What is the it?

Q: The way of living as we do now.

K: The way we are living now, we don't know how to change it. Therefore we accept it - right? Why is it that we can't change it?

Q: Perhaps we wait for someone else to tell us.

K: Are you waiting for some miracle to happen? Are we waiting for some authority to tell us what to do? The priest, the guru, the whole racket of that? Or go back to the bible? There are people are doing it; the so-called intellectuals, having written something anti, or pro communism, totalitarianism, are going back to god. You follow? Because they can't find an answer to all this, and they think through tradition it will all be solved. You know all this.

Now why can't we in our daily life change what we are doing? Let's come back: what is our daily life? Please investigate, this is a conversation, I am not the only speaker.

Q: It is not only we are contributing, but also we are active in what we contribute.

K: Yes. So I am going back, madam. I am asking if we are part of society, and society is becoming more and more horrible, more and more intolerable, ugly, destructive, degenerating, as a human being is one also deteriorating? You follow?

Q: I think we don't see it.

K: The lady says, we don't see it. Why? Don't we know our own daily life?

Q: No.

Q: Yes, because our daily life is a kind of self-centred activity.

K: I know. Our inner life, our life is self-centred activity, he says. And if that is so, and if that is contributing to the monstrous society in which we live, why can't we change that central activity, egotistic activity - right? Why can't we?

Q: We are unconscious of our own lives. Until we become conscious of everything that we are doing we can't change it.

K: I understand. That is what I am asking sir: can we become conscious, aware, know the activities of our daily life, what we are doing?

Q: Being a mother, and having children, it is very difficult.

K: All right. Being a mother and having children it is a very difficult life. Is that one of our problems? You see, come and join in the game sir, don't just... I am a mother. I have children, and are they growing up into monsters, like the rest of the world? Do you understand? Like all the rest of you: ugly, violent, self-centred, acquisitive, you know what we are. Do I want my children to be like that?

Q: You cannot isolate children but you have to face that you are like that and you cannot change...

K: I know all that.

Q: Could we at least try perhaps to short circuit the negation of our past conditioning which we should know in its entirety by now, not fragmentarily, and think how in our everyday lives each one of us can put a sort of universal love into service without any motives, to our fellow human beings.

Q: I would say it is not jobs in the big cities that are the problem, but I think my problem, because I have this problem with my children, for me it seems that I have to wake up to the quality of my conditioning in relationship with my children and everything around me. This seems to be my problem, not the outside conditions.

K: What shall we do together?

Q: Can we look at fear?

K: We can look at fear. Sir, if you loved your children, loved them, you understand, not just they are born, and sent off to school, they must be conditioned this way, if you really loved them, what shall we do? Apparently it is not a problem to you. You talk about it, but it isn't a biting, demanding, urgent problem.

Q: Sir, to go to work everyday, most people just go to work and they don't carry on when they get out of work. In other words there is no blending of their work and their recreation. In other words they go to work, it is learning all the time and when the bell rings and you are free to leave you can still learn. You may adapt your job to your recreation, you can adapt your recreation to your job, but there is always a learning process going on, which doesn't seem to be happening at all. It is not just going to work and doing a job, it is going to work and learning. Then when you are out of work you continue this learning. You can adapt your free time to your work time. How many people go home and consider their jobs when they are not at their office. How many people go home and try to learn more about their lives whether they are at work or whether they are at home.

K: Having said that, where am I? Where are you? Are we still dealing with what might be, what should be, what ought to be, or are we facing the fact? You understand? Facing the fact.

Q: We are facing the fact there is a big separation between our work lives and our free time.

K: Sir, do I face the fact, please kindly listen, do I face the fact, you and I, that we are part of this society? We have contributed to it, our parents have contributed to it, our grandparents and so on, they have contributed to this, and one is contributing. Is that a fact? Do I realize that?

Q: It is very, very clear that that is so.

K: Let us take that one point and work that out slowly, please. Do you and we together realize, in the sense as you realize pain, as you realize a toothache, do we realize that we are contributing to it? Right? Do we?

Q: Yes, we do.

Q: Yes, we are contributing to it with eyes of our own past conditioning if we are still involved in it and don't see what is not right for now, for our present position. Yes, we are in that case.

Q: No, I don't see. If...

K: That's if, ought, might.

Q: Sir, we must know how we are contributing to it, why we are contributing to it, the whole effort of what that contribution involves. How do we contribute to it?

Q: If you analyse it, you must look at it, understand it, and say, "Look, I understand it, I won't contribute to it and I am going to go out of it." You can do it in an instant.

Q: Sir, I cannot see the fact because thought intervenes.

K: Can't you face the fact? When we say, "I am part of that society", what do we mean by that?

Q: I don't see it at all. I am facing the fact.

K: Sir, how are we going to talk over together when each one of us is pulling in different directions? Can't we think together about this one thing: that is, we human beings have created this society, not gods, not angels, nobody but human beings have created this terrible, violent, destructive society. And we are part of that. When we say we are part of it, what do we mean by that word 'part'? You understand my question? Just begin slowly, please. What do I mean when I say I am part of that?

Q: Sir, isn't the approach you are taking already setting up a division between me and society? In other words is there such a thing as society, or is this here society, and not I and you society? When you set up this monstrous, horrible society it is an abstraction that is different from the people in this room.

K: No, sir, I am saying that. I am exactly saying that: society is not out there, society is here.

K: Yes sir, right here.

Q: Well then can't we all work together and lose our past conditioning of these words that you have been saying to us for all of these years, and begin to act on sample, in some form or other that is new and creative?

K: Madam, we can't work together. That is a fact. We can't think together, but we don't seem to be able to do anything together, unless we are forced, unless there is a tremendous crisis, like war, then we all come together. If there is an earthquake we are all involved in it. But remove the earthquakes, the great crises of war, we are back to our separative little selves, fighting each other. This is so obvious. I saw a woman some years ago, who was English, aristocratic, and all the rest of it, during the war they all lived in the underground, you know the Tube, and she said it was marvellous, "We were all together, we supported each other". When the war was over she went back to her castle and finished!

Can we just look at this for a minute. When we say we are part of that, is it an idea, or an actuality? - idea, I mean by that, a concept, a picture, a conclusion. Or is it a fact, like having a toothache, it is a fact?

Q: No.

K: No? Right? Is it a fact to us that I am part of this society?

Q: I am that society.

K: I am that society. Then what is happening out there to which I am contributing? Am I seeking my own security, my own experiences, involved in my own problems, concerned with my own ambitions - right? So each one is striving, for himself - right? - as society exists now. And probably that has been the historical process right from the beginning, each one struggling for himself. Right? And therefore each one opposed to another. Now, do we realize that?

Q: Yes.

Q: We don't know what to do, but most of the time...

K: We'll find out what to do, madam, first start from that which is very near, and then we can go on - right? We are talking about our daily life. And our daily life apparently, or is, not only part of the society, but also we are encouraging this society by our activities - right? Do we know this, do we say, "Yes, by Jove it is so". Then what shall I do as a human being, being part of this society, what shall I do, what is my responsibility? Take drugs? Grow a beard? Run off? What is my responsibility? Yours? You don't answer.

Q: To do something about it.

K: What?

Q: First to see. I see...

K: I can only do something about it when I am clear in myself - right?

Q: Is it not astonishing if we are clear and logical about it, we can be excluded from the society.

K: All right. So let's find out how to be clear in oneself. How to be certain about things. Let's find out if one can have security - right? Both psychological and physical. So how does a mind which is confused, as most people's are, how is that confusion to be wiped away so that there is clarity - right? If there is clarity from there I can act. Right? Is that clear?

Q: Yes.

K: Now how am I, a human being, to have clarity about politics, about work, about my relationship with my wife, husband, girl and all the rest of it, relationship to the world, how am I to be clear when I am so confused? The gurus say one thing, the priests say something else, the economist says something else, the philosophers say something else - you follow? The analysts say something else, primordial pain, or whatever it is. So they are all shouting, shouting, writing, explaining. And I am caught in that and I get more and more confused. I don't know who to take to be clear, who is right, who is wrong - right? That is our position, isn't it? No?

Q: Yes.

K: So I say to myself, I am confused, out with all these people. Right?

Q: And then you become alone.

K: Look, I want to clear up the confusion - right? That confusion has been caused by all these people, each one saying different things - right? So I am confused. So I say, please, I am not going to listen to any of you, I am going to see why I am confused. Let's start from there - right?

Why am I confused? Why are you confused?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, stick to one thing sir. Why are you, as a human being, confused?

Q: Because I accept.

K: No, look into yourself madam. Don't just throw out some word. Why am I confused? What is confusion? Let's begin with that. What is confusion?

Q: Contradiction.

K: You say, confusion arises when there is contradiction, not only out there, right in the world, but also in me. The world is me, therefore there is in me contradiction. Now please go slowly. What do we mean by contradiction? Go into sir, look at it, take time. Why am I confused? You say because there is contradiction. I say, what do you mean by that word 'contradiction'? To contradict, to say something opposite. Right? That is, I say something and do the opposite. Right? I think something and act contrary to what I think. That is one part of contradiction. I imitate because I am not sure about myself. There is a contradiction. I follow because I am uncertain. I conform, both psychologically and environmentally because that has been my condition. So I realize contradiction means conformity, imitation, saying one thing and doing another, thinking one thing and quite the opposite. I believe in god, and I chop off everybody's head. Right? So this is what we mean by contradiction - contra dicere, to say something opposite to what is.

Now are we aware of this? Let us start with this: are we aware of this? In ourselves we are contradicting all the time. Now wait a minute. If you are aware of it, then what shall we do? You understand my question? I am aware that I am contradictory: say one thing on the platform, go home and do quite the opposite. (Personally I don't, if I did I would never appear on the platform). So I do something quite different. And I say, why am I doing this - you understand? I say one thing and do quite the opposite, why? No, find out madam, go into yourself, find out. Is it, I say one thing to please you, to make myself popular, to have a reputation of having immense knowledge, and go home and do everything contrary to that? Because I want to impress you, I want to show I am much bigger than you, I know much more than you, and go home and behave like a child. Now why do I do this? Not I, why do you do it?

Q: Can I become aware of my conditioning while speaking about my conditioning, is it possible not to verbalize it. Because you are all saying, go into yourself, and I try to do that, and I seem to have a great need to speak and to try to discover myself while there is a listening, and I am listening myself. Is this correct, or is this an illusion?

K: When I ask, why do I do it, please listen for two minutes - am I looking for a cause? You understand my question? I say, why am I contradicting myself in my life, one thing and another. And so I say, when I ask the question why, my desire is to find a cause - right? Please listen for a few minutes. I discover the cause through analysis, and will that discovery of the cause finish the contradiction? You understand my question? I have discovered the cause, why I contradict, because I am frightened, because I want to be popular, because I want to be well regarded, I want public approval, and inwardly I do something else. The cause is, perhaps, that in myself I am uncertain, I depend on you, or on something else, so in myself I am absolutely uncertain. So I say one thing and contradict myself - right? Take it from me madam, step by step, for god's sake. And I discover the cause and the cause is not going to finish the contradiction. Would you follow something? The cause and the effect are never the same, because the cause becomes the effect, and the effect becomes the cause. It is a change. I wonder if you see that. So I find it is futile to find the cause. The fact is I am uncertain, and therefore there is a contradiction, wanting to be certain. Inwardly I am uncertain, and wanting to be certain, which is a contradiction. Right? So why am I uncertain? Uncertain about what?

Q: Have you not contradicted yourself? Looking for a cause is running away.

K: The gentleman says I have contradicted myself, which is where? I'd like it to be pointed out. Don't just say you have contradicted yourself. I'd like to find out where I have contradicted myself. It is so hopeless. I am uncertain.

Q: Perhaps I may say something?

K: Delighted sir.

Q: I don't know why I reacted to it but you said looking for a cause is running away from the fact, the fact of whatever you are looking at.

K: Quite right, sir. Looking for a cause is running away from the actual.

Q: But then the next thing you say, is why. Looking for a cause!

K: I have explained very carefully that I am not looking for a cause.

Q: But you said why.

K: I explained that. I am not dumb! I know what he says. I purposefully put that question, why? When you use that word 'why', you are looking for a cause. Please don't nod your head, madam.

Q: Sir, if we are not looking for a cause, why are we in the tent?

K: I explained, sir, when we ask the question, why, we generally enquire into the cause. And I explained the cause and the effect are never the same, because the cause brings about an effect, and the effect becomes the cause. So to enquire into that change is useless. But when we use the word 'why' I am using it in a special way, which is I am enquiring, not seeking the cause. See the difference, please, if you will be good enough. If you don't like the word 'why', just say, "How has this happened?"

Q: Sir is it possible to enquire verbally? I really would like an answer to this. I keep asking and you don't answer, and I feel it is because you want me to find my own answer. What I am really thinking is, is it possible to enquire into the problem, while expressing the problem?

K: No, first of all understand we are using words verbally. Sir, please don't go off like this. We have spent forty five minutes. We haven't even touched and gone into the way of our daily life. We are again going off. So please hold on to this. I am asking myself, what am I uncertain about? You, what are you uncertain about? Or, are you completely certain?

Q: I find myself listening to many people, and this must bring confusion in myself. So I know that all I have to do is to listen to myself. But what I am saying is, how can I listen to myself. I am making a law. I must listen to my parents, everybody else, and so there is my problem. Who should I listen to?

K: You are saying, are you sir, that by enquiring into uncertainty, you have found certainty?

Q: No. Who shall I listen to, my parents say one thing, you say another thing.

K: That is what I said. The parents say one thing, you say something, the philosophers say something else, the politicians - right? They are all saying something different, each one. Each guru is competing with the other guru, saying something entirely different. Now - must I go back to that? - this is brought about by the constant pressure of other people - right? The pressure of the politician, the economist, the philosopher, the guru, the priest, the parent, the grandparent, and your own - right? So please proceed. What am I confused about?

Q: About the future.

K: About the future. I am uncertain about the future, the future being what I have been, what I am now, what I might be - right? That is the future. The future is physically uncertain, psychologically uncertain. So my mind is seeking certainty - right? Being uncertain it wants to be certain - right?

Q: We are not aware of what we are in the moment, otherwise the question about the future wouldn't have come, I think.

K: I wonder what is the point of this discussion. What is the point of our having a conversation, which we are not. We are saying it must be, it is so, it is not so.

Q: We might have seen a way of living now.

K: I am doing it. Each is interrupting according to his own way. We are not thinking together.

Q: You asked, what are we uncertain about. At one point I thought we were uncertain about different things, then the problem is not to ascertain what we are uncertain about but the fact of that, which I think arises from our unclearness about the composition. And if we look at it and see the composition, then the uncertainty would disappear.

K: We are doing that, sir. I see it is impossible to have a conversation with anybody.

Let's begin this way: are we certain in our relationship with each other? Certain in one's relationship to one's husband, wife, girl, boy? I am asking you please.

Q: No, no.

Q: Uncertain in our relationship?

K: Yes, uncertain in our relationship with each other.

Q: And society.

K: Our relationship with each other creates the society - no? Of course, obviously. If I am against you, then I create a society which is divisive. It is so obvious this. So what is our relationship with each other? You and the speaker. Let's take that. Very simple. Or what is your relationship with your neighbour, with your wife, or with your husband, girl and so on? What is your relationship? I presume you all have a husband or a wife, haven't you?

Q: What about children?

K: Or a girl or a boy.

Q: And children.

K: Sir, please answer this: what is your relationship with another?

Q: Very poor.

K: Poor? What does that mean? You want to exploit the other one, and he wants to exploit you, is that it?

Sir, look, when you look at one's relationship with another, is there any quality of certainty in it? Therefore in that there is no certainty in it. You might think at the beginning of that relationship there is certainty but gradually that certainty peters out. So in relationship there is no certainty. Why? Not because. I am asking the 'why' in the sense, how does this come about? Why is there uncertainty in our relationships? Pursue that, please stick to that one thing and work it out.

Q: Lack of engagement.

K: Lack of communication?

Q: Lack of engagement.

K: Lack of engagement.

Q: We are selfish.

Q: We do not know what we really want.

K: What shall we do? I can explain it. What is the point of it?

Will you see the actuality of it? That is, sexually one is attracted to the opposite sex. Then gradually the fascination of sex, the excitement, and all that, peters out. But there is an attachment formed. And the attachment causes fear - right? And when there is fear love has gone overboard - right? So there is constant division between you and the other, constant division. You are asserting, and he is asserting. You dominate or he yields, or the other way round. So there is always this contradiction in our relationship, which is a daily fact.

And how is it that this comes about? You understand, that is the next question. Is it because each one is concerned about himself - right? Why is each one concerned about himself? How? You understand my question? What is the importance of being concerned about oneself? Is it because we are conditioned that way, we are educated that way, our whole environmental, social pressure is that way - you understand? So then, can one break away from that? Break away from the self-centred relationship. You are following? Can one end this self-centred relationship? Now how is that to be done - right? Now let's stick to that.

That is our daily life, and therefore why is one, one human being, so terribly self-concerned? Is it his nature? Is it his biological necessity? Because when one is primitive one has to look after oneself, or one has to look after the few. And from that one may be so conditioned one is carrying on right? Can that condition be broken, finished? Right?

Q: We have projected the animal instinct into the psychological field, and that has created the 'me'.

K: Yes, sir I know that. We have said that before. Now one has come to the point that in our relationship, each one is concerned with himself. And this conditioning, can that be broken down, changed?

Q: We have to understand it.

K: No, madam, not understand it. All right - what do you mean by understand it?

Q: See the whole thing.

K: I can't see the whole thing because my mind is conditioned. That is just an idea. You are off on your own, you see. So I am conditioned because I have been brought up that way - right? My parents, my society, my gods, my priests, all have said, "You first", your success, your business, your happiness, your salvation, you. Now, can that conditioning be broken, changed? Just a minute, I want to go into it, please follow this, step by step.

Will you do it as I am talking? How do I know that I am conditioned, first? Is it that I am accepting the word and then imagining I am conditioned? You follow what I am saying? Or is it a fact? Is it an idea? Or is it a fact? You understand?

Q: Accepting the word and imaging our own conditioning - is that correct?

K: Look sir, I think I am conditioned. I think. But I don't think I have pain when somebody hits me. See the difference? When somebody hits me and there is pain, I don't think there is pain, there is pain. Right? Do I similarly see that I am conditioned? First listen to this. Or do I think I am conditioned? The thinking "I am conditioned" is not a fact. But the conditioning is a fact. Right?

Q: Yes sir.

K: I am going on. So I am only dealing with facts, not with the idea. The fact is I am conditioned. Now, go slowly. In what manner do I look at the fact? That is very important - right? You are following this? In what manner do I observe the fact? In observing the fact do I say, "I must get rid of it"? Or do I say, "I must conquer it, I must suppress it" and so on? In what manner do I look at the fact? You have understood? How do you look at it?

Q: With fear.

Q: I am it, sir.

K: Is the fact, please follow this, separate from me who is observing the fact? Have you understood my question?

Q: No.

K: The fact is I am conditioned. I am saying, how do I look at the fact, in what manner do I look at it? Do I look at it, the fact, as something different from me? Or that conditioning is me? Please go slowly. Right? How do you look at it? Do you look at it as though you were separate from the fact? Or you say, "Yes, that fact is me"?

Q: At first you are involved in it.

K: Look, madam, is anger different from you? Obviously not. So is your conditioning different from you?

Q: No.

K: That's it. Now you are getting it. So you are now observing the fact as though it was you, you are the fact. Now wait a minute. So what happens?

Q: We observe the fact that we are living in the field of ideas.

K: Sir, your minds are not trained. Your minds are vague, you know, moving all over the place. Here is a problem, look at it. That is, anger is you. You are not different from the anger. Wait. Wait. When you are angry, you are that, then thought comes along and says, "I have been angry". So thought separates anger from you. You understand? So similarly, you are conditioned, and that conditioning is you. Wait. What can you do, please you. Watch it. The speaker's skin is a little brown - right? That's brown. But when he says, "I must change it to something else because white people are better", then I am in conflict. But when I say, "It is so", what has happened to my mind?

Q: Thought has...

K: Sir, don't jump into it yet, enquire. What has happened to the mind that has said before, "Anger is different from me", but now the mind says, "That is silly, anger is me". Now similarly the mind has said, "Conditioning is different from me", and realizes the conditioning is me - right? So what has happened to the mind?

Q: It is clear.

K: Please don't jump to things which you don't see actually. Don't repeat anything, don't say anything which you yourself have not seen.

The mind now is not in contradiction. That is all I am pointing out. It is no longer saying, "I must do something about it". Get it?

Q: Yes.

K: So the mind now is free from the idea, from the concept, from the condition that I must act upon it. Right? So the mind is now free to look. Are you following this? Just to look. What is that? The mind says, "I am conditioned", not the mind is conditioned, but the whole thing is conditioned. Now it says, "Observe that conditioning". What takes place when you observe? There is no observer because the observer is not different from the thing observed, there is only observation. Right?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Are you following this? No, not verbally, actually. Then what takes place when you observe? Observe purely, not give it a distortion. Distortion takes place when you say, "I must change it". Or, "I must suppress it, I must go beyond it". All that has ended because you are merely observing the fact that the mind is conditioned. There is pure observation. Right? There is no effort made. Then what takes place? The thing that is observed purely undergoes a change. Right? You follow this? You won't, unless you do it you won't. Unless you apply, do it, you will say, "I don't see it."

Look, under a microscope you can watch the cell. If you watch it carefully, without saying, "It is a cell, it must not be this, it is that", you will see then the cell undergoing change. But if you come to it with an idea the thing is not moving. You understand? The moment you come to it fresh and looking through the microscope at the cell, the cell is itself moving, so the conditioning is changing. You get it? If you observe purely.

Now to come back: I observe, one observes one's relationship which is in daily life, to observe it purely. Can you observe your relationship with your wife, husband, whatever it is, without the image, without the idea that it is my husband, my wife, and all the rest of it, without the remembrance of sex, and all the rest of that, just to observe your relationship with another? Will you do it? Or your attraction to the other is so strong that it is impossible to look. I see what is happening here: holding hands, hugging each other, all that is going on. So those people cannot obviously observe. So if you observe very closely, without the observer, who is the thinker and all the rest of it, the thing itself changes. My relationship with you, or with another, husband, wife, if I observe it quietly, without any pressure, direction, the thing itself changes, and out of that love is. You understand? Love is not the product of thought.

Q: What is wrong with holding hands sir?

K: Oh, for god's sake! What is wrong with holding hands with another. You have such infantile minds.

Q: When you look at this thing under the microscope, without thought, the thing is changing, but the thing is changing even when you are not looking.

K: Of course. Of course. You see what you have done sir. You are not applying. You have gone off to the self. You don't say, "Look, I am going to apply this. I am going to watch this. I am going to watch my relationship with my wife" - or husband. The fact is we are separate. He is ambitious, I am ambitious, he wants this, and all the rest, separate. I am watching this separation. I don't want to change it, I don't want to modify it, I don't want to push it aside because I don't know what is going to happen. So I observe.

Not I observe, there is observation. Do it, sir.

Q: Sir, the problem is when I want to observe, the thought is there.

K: No, sir, I have explained it. I can't go back to it sir.

Q: But it is a problem for us.

K: What sir?

Q: That is a problem for us.

K: What is the problem?

Q: That we can't observe, we don't know how to do it.

K: I am showing it to you.

Q: We don't live it.

K: Then you are not listening.

Q: I am listening.

K: Sir, food is put before you. Either you eat it, or don't eat it. If you are hungry you will eat it. If you are not hungry you will say, "Well that doesn't mean anything to me". Are you hungry to find out a way of living, in daily life, without conflict?

Q: Yes.

Q: Go on.

K: I am pointing it out to you. So there is a way of living in which there is no confusion, when the mind is able to observe without direction, without motive, which is the movement of thought, just to observe. Observe the roof of this tent, the height, just to observe it. The colour of your dress, not say, "I like it, I don't like it, I wish I had it", just observe. In the same way if you can observe your whole psychological movement, then the thing itself changes radically. You don't have to practise anything, gurus, you can throw all that aside. Right sirs.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 29TH JULY 1979

If I may I would like to, the speaker would like to talk over with you a question which perhaps might be of vital interest - perhaps. Why is it - this is a question mark, not the cause - why is it that two people are not able to think together? You understand the question? They think together when they are frightened. If two people are frightened they think about it together. Or when there is some kind of physical catastrophe, they forget their personal prejudices, judgements, hopes, their own problems, and face it together. And if there is some impending danger, they again come together in their thoughts, in their feelings. You must have noticed all this. Why is it when we have no catastrophes, physical dangers, or something threatening us, we are not able to come together and think the problem together? Is it that two people, if they like, or have great affection for each other, or love each other, then there is a possibility of thinking together? Isn't that so?

Can we this morning spend a little time on this question? Perhaps this will help us to understand the confusion and the misery of our daily life. Because we have not been able, so far, in all these discussions and talks, to meet actually together. Is it that we don't love each other? You know, this has been tried very often in various ways to bring people together, round a belief, round a person, round an ideal, round a concept. You must have noticed this, it is so. But each person translates the concepts, the ideals, the persons, the authority according to his own inclination. Therefore the person, the authority, the principle don't bring them together, which you have seen again. Why is this? In what manner does this happen? You understand my question? Because I think if we can think together we can then investigate more deeply into our personal lives, into our confusion and face the world with all its monstrosities, with its horrendous degeneration, then perhaps we might investigate together how to bring about a good society, a good way of living. You have understood? Can we go into this?

Can we think together, first?

Q: Could be look at the differences between catastrophe, shared catastrophe and the shared belief? The differences between these two.

K: Could we go into catastrophes and belief. When there is a war we are all together, unless you are a conscientious objector, or a pacifist, then you have a terrible time, you are shot, or sent to prison, but the vast ninety nine person say, "Hurrah, let's all fight". You know all the rest of it. But a belief is much must subtle. You may believe in god, or in Jesus, or Christ, or whatever it is, but each one translates that belief in his own way, in his own pattern, according to his own experience. And so there is always a division. Even if you follow somebody whose authority you accept, again there is division between people. You have seen this all over the world.

So we are asking: is it possible to think together without authority, without a belief, without a crisis - the world is in a crisis anyhow - but putting all that aside, can we, you and the speaker, think together? What we mean by thinking together, meet at the same point, meet at the same level, with the same intensity, which is not possible if you hold on to some belief, if you hold on to your own particular opinion, if you have certain experiences and say, "That's much better than anything else". So can we, this morning, somehow put aside our personal beliefs, experiences, judgements, points of view, and meet together?

Q: Can we be open enough?

K: No sir - yes. I wonder in what way you are using the word 'open'? Because that is rather a difficult word. I think I am open but I am really closed inside. So can you and I put aside our particular point of view, our particular opinion, our experience? I met the other day a man who said, "You will solve all these problems if you are a vegetarian" - you understand? All your problems will be solved. And you could not convince him. He was absolutely hooked up in it - to use a modern word. And most of us are like that, only it isn't vegetarianism, bananas, or something but our own deep conclusions which we have come to, for various reason. Can we let all that go, at least for this morning, set it aside and meet together? You understand my question? Can we do it?

Q: Let us try.

K: Not try, do it! When you try you can't do anything. I don't say, "I will try to climb the mountain", I climb the mountain. So can we, this morning, go into this question: is it possible without any pressure, without any kind of persuasion, without any reward or punishment, say, "Look, let's come together and think about it" - can we do it? Please! Because if we can then together we can investigate our own personal problems, our own personal lives, together. But if you withhold, and others examine, you are not part of it. Can we do this?

Which is, would it be possible to talk over together, together, whether it is possible to bring about a good society. The intellectuals throughout the world have given up that idea, it is hopeless. I don't know if you are aware of it. Nobody talks about a good society any more. Right? They are taking about existentialism, new kinds of philosophy, go back to the bible, the new gods, and all the rest of it. Nobody, as far as one knows, is concerned with bringing about a good society in which we can live happily, without fear, without terror, without all the horrible things that are going on in the world. Can we do this, this morning? - not a good society in the future, then the future would be an ideal - right? Then we will discuss endlessly which is the better ideal. But whereas if we could investigate together whether human beings, you and the other, can we live a good life, not in the future, now? You understand my question? Please this is very important because around us morally, physically, intellectually there is disintegration. You must have observed this. And any serious person being concerned with all this, he must demand not only of himself but of others whether it is possible to lead a good life and therefore bring about a good society. You have understood?

Now let's begin.

Q: What means a good society?

K: You have already gone away. We will find out what is a good life if we are able to think together. Right? If I define or describe what is a good life, then you will disagree, and I will disagree, or somebody else will disagree, or say, "That is not good enough, we must add a little more to it". And we shall be wandering off. That's simple.

Q: Share your being and not your thinking.

K: To share your being, not your thinking.

Q: Could we, sir, look at the obstacles to leading a good life?

K: We will come to that sir. I wish I hadn't mentioned the good life, I am sorry! Or a good society. Let's leave that for the moment. Let's find out whether we can think together. Which is, the speaker is not persuading you to think in any particular direction, he is not stimulating you to think in a certain direction, or coercing you, influencing you, stimulating you, then we can't think together. Whereas if you and I see the necessity, the absolute necessity, of a group of people, or a set of people, thinking together. That is, thinking about something - you understand? Thinking about - god, what is good, what is bad, whether it is possible to create a good society, or not - thinking about is not thinking together. You see the difference? I wonder if you see this.

Thinking about involves opinions, evaluation, because you might think about it and others will say, "It is not quite like that", so there will be divergence of opinions and points of view, if you are thinking about something. But we are not thinking about something but thinking together. I wonder if you see the difference?

Q: We don't see the urgent necessity of this. The question is, why?

K: I know why. Because we are not interested. Sir, look at it carefully. Is this point clear? To think about something brings about divisions of opinion - right? If you think about god, think about it, then you will think your way, and I will think my way, and another will think his way - right? And we shall be tearing at each other with our own judgements, opinions, conclusions. But if we could think together, not about something, but the see the necessity of thinking together. Is this difficult?

Q: Yes.

K: Am I putting it all right? Or would you like to put it differently?

Q: Put it differently.

K: Just a minute.

Q: Investigate together.

K: Before you investigate together you must think together.

Q: Thinking is really the barrier.

Q: (Inaudible).

K: Look here sir, if you and the speaker loved each other - loved in quotes - we would be thinking together, wouldn't we? No? What do you say?

Q: The problem is that we don't love each other.

K: Just a minute sir, please, let us consider this. I want, the speaker wants to think with you. He says, if I could think with you, the thinking is common. But if you and I were thinking together about something it is not common. You understand? This is clear, isn't it?

Q: This is clear. But is it possible to think without the object and the subject?

K: Our friend says, is it possible to think without the object and the subject. Which means can you think without those two? Of course you can. You are missing it. You see how difficult it is to be able to feel the common necessity of being together, to act together - right? Won't somebody help me?

Q: When you and I think together, it doesn't matter whose thought it is, we both are enjoying - the thought comes first, it doesn't matter if it is my thought, or your thought - is that it?

K: Would you kindly learn, learn what it means to think together - right? Learn. We have discussed about listening, the art of listening, the art of seeing, the art of learning. And now we are going to learn together about the art of thinking together - right? Could we do that? At least learn, not object, not project. You don't know what it is to think together, so we are having a class in a school and the speaker happens to be the teacher. And he says, please you come here without knowing what it means, you are going to learn because you are curious, you want to find out what the speaker, the teacher has to say, so you say, "Please, I am prepared to learn" - right? Are you?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, wait. Keep it to that, at that very, very simple level. If I happen to be a professor of biology and you didn't know anything about biology, you would come fresh, curious, perhaps bored, but you want to learn because if you learn you will pass exams, get a job and so on. So you are forced to listen - right? But here we are not forcing you, we are together trying to find out what it means to think together. And the speaker unfortunately is the professor, and you are the students. Are we in that relationship? Which is, the professor is not authoritarian, he wants to teach, and you are the students, about physics, mathematics, or whatever it is. So you don't know but you are going to learn. Right?

So let's start from that. You don't know, so you can't say, what do you mean by that, what do you mean by this, if so why, because you don't know biology - right? So you are prepared to listen - right? So we are in that position, are we?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes, please go on.

K: No, no, please. Don't assume it, don't pretend. Don't put on a mask. We are in that position. If we are in that position then the professor says, do you know anything about thinking? The western thinking, and the oriental thinking: the western thinking conditioned, pursuing technology, and the eastern thought doesn't know what it is pursuing - right? There is the western thinking and the eastern thinking. The world has been divided that way - right? You are learning. And he said that division is wrong, there is only thinking, which is neither east nor west. Thinking in the west has pursued a certain line. In the east, mainly in India, therefore spreading over Asia, it has pursued a different direction, but the source of the river is the same, taking two branches, which is, thinking - right? Is that clear? Right?

And you are western, and the speaker is neither eastern nor western. That is very important. He belongs neither to the west, nor to the east. So he is concerned only with the capacity and the energy and the vitality of thinking. Right? So he says, how is it, in what manner, does your thinking differ from the other's thinking? Even in the western world your thinking is apparently different from your fellow western being. You are following this - right?

Now he asks a question, which you must answer: how has this come? You understand? Let me put it differently. The western technology, western outlook, western culture, western philosophy, western religion, is based essentially on the Greek. They are the originators of the west - right? Democracy, analysis, science, philosophy, the dialogues of Plato and so on and so on. Greece was the origin of the west - right? There is no question about it, you don't have to doubt this. I am a professor I know! I am glad we can laugh. And Greece has said, measurement is the beginning of technology - right? That is, thought is measurement - right? You are following this? If you don't understand this the professor will explain it. So thought has become extraordinarily important because on that all architecture, science, mathematics, the whole technological development has come from the idea of measurement. Without measurement you can't do anything - right? You can't build a bridge, you can't build a boat, submarine, and so on and so on. Right? You are taking notes!

And the east has said, measurement is necessary but through measurement you can't find the immeasurable - you are following all this? So they said, thought, though it is necessary, is bound by time, the past, the present, and the future, which is time, and that process of thinking will never find that which is inexhaustible, immeasurable, timeless - right?

So these are the two movements in the world - you are following all this? Or you are getting bored? Because you are going to have an examination at the end of it!

Q: Professor, as I am a student I say, tell me what you know.

K: I am telling you what I know.

Q: The teacher/pupil relationship is to ask, tell me what you know. It is very simple. Does it happen that you keep something back? Are there secrets, or are you as a person totally available? Are you keeping something back?

K: No, I am not. I am a professor of mathematics. I am not keeping anything back.

Q: But we are not talking about that, about mathematics, but about life. If you are the professor, please tell me what you know.

K: I am telling you sir. I am telling you, sir.

Q: May I ask a question? Does it happen that you are keeping something to yourself, keeping it back?

K: Are you keeping something back?

Q: Does it happen? And are you totally available?

K: If I am not keeping anything back, am I available. For what?

Q: To give me secrets.

K: Sir, look, I have just told you.

Q: You are acting, you are not really giving answers.

K: I am not acting, I am not performing, I am not keeping any secrets.

Q: Never, or now?

K: Of course not, I said I have no secrets. It is not never, or now. I have no secrets.

Q: (Inaudible). Why don't you talk about the otherness?

K: The gentleman has read something which I wrote! And he wants me to talk about that instead of about thought. Perhaps we can talk about that at the end of the talk, at the end of this, which doesn't mean I am avoiding, which doesn't mean I am keeping it secret. You cannot possibly talk about the otherness, you cannot if you have read that book. If you haven't read it so much the better!

Q: Are you keeping something back?

K: Please sir, I have explained to you very carefully, I am not keeping anything back. I am approachable as you say, and so on. You see this is what happens.

Now, we have been distracted, purposely, perhaps rightly, but let's come back. So these two movements have taken place in the world. The western movement is gradually conquering the world, technology, measurement, precise thinking and so on and so on. And do our thoughts measure equally? You understand my question? No, you don't. The professor says, why is it, in what manner has this division between people taken place in their thinking? Is it education - you follow? Is it one group of people go from public school to college, to university and a good job, and therefore their thinking is different from the man who has not been educated so well, who labours, and there is the man who, educated, puts himself into the business world, and the man who is a scientist with technology and all that. Is that the origin of this division? You understand? You follow? The man who thinks entirely differently if he is educated to become a military, or the man who has been educated through a seminar to become a priest, his thinking is different from the businessman, from the scientists and so on and so on and so on. Is this the origin of this breaking up of thinking? You understand?

Q: You want to say that in this world every one of us has another kind of measurement?

K: Yes, partly. So I say is that the reason why you and the professor can't think together, because you are trained to think in one way, business, scientist, philosopher, or technician, and therefore we are all thinking differently. But the professor says, please, let us think together, not according to your way, or my way, or the scientist's way, but together.

Q: That would imply that we all have to be re-educated in exactly the same way.

K: No. No, sir. Suppose the professor has been educated in mathematics, and you come along and say, let us think together. It doesn't mean I drop my mathematics, I put it aside and see if I can think with you. Thinking together does not mean uniformity - right?

Q: It does seem that professional differences do make it difficult for people to communicate but it is much more their deep attitudes to life that prevent people from thinking together.

K: Madam, when you have learnt all the professor has to say, at the end of the class, you can ask him questions. I mean if you want to learn something you have to be quiet. If you want to learn how to play the violin you have to follow the teacher, the violinist, put your finger there, there, practise. But you are not doing that.

So we started. Thinking together does not imply conformity - right? Thinking together does not mean that you subject your own selves, put aside and copy somebody - right? You understand, sirs, we are learning. Learning to find out how to think together, which doesn't mean that we lose our - whatever it is we lose. Right? Can we proceed from there?

So thinking together, the professor says, implies that you and the professor, who has studied Aristotle, all the dialogues of various people - I have not, fortunately - the professor has studied all this and he says, I will put aside my learning, all that I have acquired, and you also put aside your learning, and let's meet. That's all he is saying. Right? Can you do that?

Q: The problem is putting it aside.

K: All right. The problem is putting it aside.

Q: Could we possibly look at how we put it aside.

K: Yes. All right sir.

Q: Don't let us leave that point.

K: I won't leave that point. You are a student, I am a professor, I have a right to answer it. The question is in what manner do you put aside your particular way of thinking? But first you know your particular way of thinking - right? Do you? Don't you know your particular way of thinking? That you are a follower of somebody, that you believe this, that you think this is right, this is wrong, and this should be, my experience tells me it is so. So are you aware of this fact? If you are aware, what does that awareness of the fact mean? When you are aware of the fact that you have your own particular opinion, and you are aware of it, what do we mean by being aware of your opinion? You understand? This is simple. Is that awareness a judgement awareness - you understand? You follow what I say? Is that awareness of your prejudice, an awareness in which you are judging your personal opinion, or just being aware of it? Not saying it is right, wrong, should be, must not be, just yes I have prejudice, I know I have prejudice - right? That's all. Wait, wait. Are you in that position now? That you know you have prejudices? Right? Then why do you have these prejudices? Is it your family, your education, your desire for security in a belief, in a point of view - right? You are following all this? You are going to have an examination at the end!

So are you aware of it that way? So you know, aware, that you have prejudices.

Q: We are but most of our prejudices are unconscious.

K: I am making it conscious now. And one is helping each other to become conscious of our thinking which has produced this prejudice. Right? So are you aware of these prejudices? And these prejudices are keeping us apart - right? Isn't that so?

Q: Yes.

K: Now these prejudices keeping us apart prevents our thinking together. Right? So can you see the necessity of thinking together, say, "All right, I won't have prejudices"? Because thinking together becomes all important, not your prejudices, therefore prejudices you put aside - right? Are you doing it?

Q: My prejudice is that I feel that you pretend. Can you help me out of it?

K: That I pretend?

Q: Can you help me out of it?

K: He has a prejudice, according to what I have understood, that I am pretending. I don't know what I am pretending about, but that is irrelevant. So he says, "I have a prejudice. Help me to see it is a prejudice and seeing the prejudice prevents thinking together, and thinking together is most important, therefore I will drop my prejudice" - you understand? The dropping of the prejudice is not important, what is much more important is thinking together - right? And you cannot think together if you have a prejudice.

Q: Can I express another possibility? Can we look closely at one point that you are saying? You say that thinking causes division. I think that only thinking can create again a unity. You don't agree with that I think because of your secret. I don't think you understand entirely your secret, which is love. You say if one has love, which a being like you has, then with this love that one has then one can think together. I think as a western audience we cannot grasp this kind of love as you can. One has to discover that through thinking together. If he had this love, which you can have, I think it can only be an illusion.

K: As I understand it, I may be wrong, please correct it sir, that the speaker is able to love and therefore is able to think together. And the western mind, which doesn't know what love is, therefore it is impossible without that love to think together.

I said at the beginning there is only thinking, not western thinking and eastern thinking. Western thinking has devoted all its energy to technological, scientific business. And the eastern mind says, through thinking, measurement, you cannot come upon that state which is immeasurable. And they said the principle of that is Brahman, that is a Sanskrit word, you don't have to learn that.

So we have come to the point that as long as we do not love each other then thinking is not possible together - right? If I love you and you are full of prejudices, however much I may offer my open hand to you, you will reject it because you have your own importance, your own knowledge, your own conditioning and you say, "Sorry". That is what is preventing us. And if we don't meet there we cannot possibly create a good society. And the speaker says if we do not create a good society we are going to destroy ourselves, whether you are in the western technological world, you are going to destroy the world, if you have not this communication of love. That's all.

Now can you, after listening to all this, naturally put aside your prejudices, because thinking together is important? The greater puts aside the lesser, obviously. Can you do it? Does your interest lie in bringing about a good society, knowing the whole intellectual, religious organizations, intellectual, philosophical, deny all this - you understand?

Q: If we want to bring about a good society we have to understand what you say. And I feel there is no understanding between you and I.

K: How can I help you to understand what I am saying? It is very simple if you listen.

Q: What I am trying to say, sir, is that unfortunately I am not listening. I am trying to work out why I am not listening to you.

K: Look, let me put it this way. The speaker wants to create a good society.

Q: So does the listener over here.

K: I want to create a good society and nobody will listen to me. What am I to do? Jump into a lake?

Q: I feel this as well, sir.

K: A good society is not some life in the future. It must be a good society now because I am living it here. I want to live peacefully, without danger, without terrorism, without being kidnapped, without being bombed.

Q: There seems to be a desire in that.

K: And I say to you as I want to create a good society now, will you join me?

Q: That's why we are here.

K: To join me, the speaker says, put aside your prejudices, your nationalities, your religions, your gurus, your this and that, and let us come together. And apparently you don't want to. That is the problem. Either - this is not an insult - either you are too old, or being young you are caught in something else, sex, drugs, your own gurus, this or that. So you are not interested in creating a good society. Right?

Q: Don't you understand what you are saying. You are saying what we all feel, we want to create a good society. You are saying we can only create a good society if we think together. You are saying we can only think together if we have love. The only kind of love we can get in order to think together is the kind of love which most of humanity, particularly western humanity, has to spend ten, twenty, thirty years in the Mysteries. They had to die to get this love. Sure, you might have it but that doesn't help us. That is the point this man is making, and the point that this man is making. You must respect us enough to think that we are sincere.

K: I understand sir.

Q: I think examples are not very good. We all came here to learn a new language and I would like all of us to be like new born babies.

K: The gentleman says that the western world has to evolve, go through a number of years and die to their own prejudices and all the rest of it. That means the western world has to go through a great deal of evolution before it can come to this.

Q: We can only get a good society if we think together, that is true. And the only way we can think together is if we have love. I am saying that what I think you don't understand is what is your secret, is that you may have this love. But what I am saying is that western man...

Q: You don't have that love.

K: I understand sir. One moment. I understand. You are saying western man must be this, and this. And so you are saying you represent the western man. Right? Are you the western man who represents the whole of the west?

Q: No, I am saying generally. Of course there are exceptions. There will always be exceptions.

K: Can we sir, if I may most respectfully point out, can you drop that conclusion?

Q: If you like.

K: It is not what I like, sir.

(A lot of people talking together).

K: Are we in parliament? Are we in a debating society? Please sir, would you mind sitting down.

Q: I am very serious. I want you to prove that you have love, right now.

(A lot of people talking together).

Q: Has everybody said what they wanted to say. I have said all I need to say. Let's listen to Krishnamurti now. I think I have learnt something from Krishnamurti and that is why I was able to stand up and express myself. And I think the fact that other people can do the same shows Krishnamurti has helped us to free ourselves.

K: I hope you are all having a lovely time! One of the questions that gentleman asked is that he thinks all my life is a pretence. Just a minute sir. You asked that question. I don't see how I can answer that question. I don't think I am pretending. So that is the end of my answer.

So let's come back. Please, let's stop parliamentarianism and let's talk over together in a friendly spirit, for god's sake. As we said, neither the east nor the west knows what love is. Don't say the west doesn't know it, the east knows it. Both are caught in this world.

Both have to live in this world. Both have to live on this earth, which is theirs, the earth is not west or east. Right? And the division has taken place for various reasons, which I have gone into, and can we meet without all these conclusions, that you are west, and east, that we must go through certain evolutionary processes, but know that we don't love and therefore we can't come together? And knowing that we don't love let's find out why, and if it is possible to love. It is only then you can create a good society; without that it is impossible. Various Greeks and others have postulated what a good society should be: justice, equality and so on and so on. All that is in the future. When you say what a good society should be, it means in the future - right? The very word 'should' implies time. And the speaker says that may be another illusion you are caught in. Whereas goodness born out of love can happen now. And from that a good society can be born. Instead of holding to that, going into that, we are dispersing our energies all the time - right? This is not impatience, or anger, or insults, we don't stick to this one thing.

So we have come to the point, can we think together because we love each other? That's all. Do you love anything, your children, your husband, your girl, your boy, your wife, do you love them? Or is it me always the first, and you the second? You understand? And where there is this division, me first and you second, it will never produce a good society. And therefore a good society can only come if you are good; which means you don't belong to any category of religions, of knowledge, of conclusions. You say, look, I want to become a good man. You don't. Please, you understand now? Will you do it?

We have had seven talks and this is the fifth discussion, and the last. If you observe, what have you learnt from all this - seven talks and five discussions? What is the treasure, or hot air, that you are going to carry out when you leave here? You understand? Have you found a jewel, an imperishable jewel so you can go off with it, or you are going away with a lot of words? You understand my question, sir? So the professor says at the end of the talks, "What have you learnt?" Have you learnt a lot words, east is east, and west is west, and all the rest of it? What we believe is better than what you say? So what have we learnt? Is there, out of all these talks and discussions and dialogues, that flame, the flame that lights the world - you understand? Lights our own life. Right sirs.

BROCKWOOD PARK DIALOGUE WITH STUDENTS AND STAFF 30TH MAY 1976

K: What shall we talk about?

S: Could we talk about happiness?

K: Do you want to talk about it? Or something else?

S: Experience.

S: The self.

K: The self, the 'me', the ego.

S: We leave the school, what is one to do in life?

K: Good Lord!

S: Could we talk about order?

K: Order; what is one to do in life; happiness; the ego, the 'me', and experience. Could we put all those questions together into one question, and then expand it? What would be the question that would include all the questions? Happiness, order, the ego, the 'me', experience, what should one do in life?

S: The question that we have talked about in the last few weeks, what is right action, it seems to include all those.

S: Right action in relationship.

K: What is right action in relationship? Shall we take, what is right action in relationship and work all the rest through that? Would you be willing, you questioners?

What is right action in relationship? What do we mean by action, the doing; not having done, or will do, the past action, or the future action, but what is action? To do. It must be always in the present, mustn't it? Now what is the present? You understand my question? If there is action according to the past - we are talking psychologically, is that understood, that is clear, isn't it, we are always talking psychologically. If there is psychological order inwardly then there is outward order. That's clear. So we are talking about psychological action, which is right, in relationship.

We say action is that which is taking place now. Right? One can say, "I have acted, I have done", that's in the past. Or "I will do something in the future", which is the past and the future, but not in the present. That's clear. That is, the past activity colours the present action, modifies it, somewhat transforms it and creates the future action. Right? Now in that movement of action, the past, modified through the present, creating the future, a movement of action, what is right in that action in relationship? You understand. Because unless you and I communicate verbally at least, and we are understanding each other, don't let's go any further.

So we are saying, there is an action which is a movement from the past, through the present, to the future. Right? Is there any other kind of action? We know this action, always in our life: the past, changing, controlling, shaping the present, and going on to the future. That's clear, isn't it? We all know that kind of action. Is that right action? That means, the past is always shaping the present and the future, always, changing the patterns, the style, the necessity, adjusting itself to environment, to pressures and so on and so on. The past moving through the present to the future, that movement of action we all know. Is that right action? You understand my question? What do you say?

S: ...coming in to the present and moving through to the future, don't the things that you have done in the past, wouldn't that damage all that you would do, will do?

K: Is that right action?

S: The past does the damage.

K: Yes, one does something in the past, whether right or wrong, and that passes, or goes through the present, and so modifies the future. So is that right action, we are asking? Because we are trying to find out what is right action, which is correct action, accurate action, in relationship. That's what we started out with that will include all the other questions.

S: What about saying if you tend to do actions now which will control your future then, as we have said, you are not living in the present.

K: So let's find out what it means to live, or to act in the present. You know this is an enormous question, you understand. It isn't just for amusement. This question has been asked by centuries of human beings, from the ancient Egyptians to the ancient Hindus and so on down to the modern age. So we are asking, what is right action in relationship, which is not modified, past. You understand? Be clear on this, don't agree with me, I may be wrong. You follow? So find out.

S: Well, when you are living in the present, would that mean doing any actions that you are doing - or let yourself be in a frame of mind that says, "All right, what I am doing now is for now".

K: Ah, but can you be free of the past?

S: No.

K: Then how can you say you are acting in the now?

S: If you see that the past is damaging, then you know, now is the time and present to say, "Right, I see the past is wrong and so now I am at present now".

K: That's right. That is, you say you have been hurt - let's take an example - you have been hurt in the past, by parents, by your friends, by your environment, psychologically deeply wounded in the past. And that past meets the present somewhat healed but goes on to the future. So can you be free of that hurt which has been given to you in the past?

S: It is a very difficult thing to do.

K: There is no action, no right action, is there?

S: You would be looking for the right action, or you should be anyway.

K: To find out right action the hurt which you have received in the past, it must be healed, cured, it must be wiped away. Can you do that?

S: This is where the difficulty seems to lie because how can I, who am the hurt, end it?

K: That's right. So one has to go into the question, who is it that is hurt? You follow? Please, this is very serious, all these questions, don't play with it. One has been hurt in the past, and that hurt acts in the present, and that present is somewhat changed, that wound is not completely healed, perhaps more hurt and you carry that into the future. Now we say, is that right action? You say that cannot be right action because it is still a movement of hurt. Right? Though somewhat modified, or exaggerated, or deeper, it is still the movement of hurt. A person who is hurt, what happens to such a person? He isolates himself, resists, feels frustrated, anger, violent - right? All this follows. So you say, seeing all that, you say that is not right action.

S: Sooner or later it is going to catch up with you.

K: That's right. Exactly.

S: And when it does I should think you would feel, well this is going to catch up with me, which is going to make things worse.

K: So how will you be free of the hurt that you had in the past? You have been hurt in the past, how will you be free of it? She says, isn't there a difficulty here: how am I to be free of the hurt? And is the hurt me? You understand my question? Be careful. Go slowly, go slowly. I understand. I'll explain. I have been hurt in the past - right? Now who is the 'I' that has been hurt? If I am not clear on that point, who is it that is going to free me? You understand, you get the point? Right? I have been hurt. You have said something to me which has hurt me, and I realize to find out right action I must be free of this hurt. Right? If not there is no right action. But I say to myself, who is it that is hurt? Right? And I say, "I am hurt". So who is the 'I' that is hurt? We are answering that question, the ego, me. Who is the 'me', the ego, that is hurt? Go slowly. Don't hurry.

S: You said that the image that is hurt.

K: I know what I said, but what do you say? Don't repeat what I said a few weeks ago, that would be just useless. What do you think? Because if you repeat what I say then I become the authority, don't I? Then you become the parrot, you are the follower, then you lose everything.

So who is the 'I' that is hurt? You say it is the image, the picture, the pattern, the shape which I have made that is hurt. Right? Are you clear? Be clear. I have built an image about myself through my parents and grandparents, through society, through school, college, university, and society helps me to bring about this image. Right?

S: You are the parent of that, aren't you?

K: Wait. So this picture has been built, and is the picture, the image different from me? Go slowly, watch it carefully in yourself. Who has built this picture, this image? You understand? I think I am a great man, or a fool, whatever I think. Now who has built this picture?

S: You have.

K: Who is you who have built it?

S: All of what society has put there.

K: Society, the name, the physical form, the shape of your head, the colour, the stature, the shortness, or the fatness, whatever it is. So the name, Mr So-and-so, the form; then psychologically, inwardly you have been told that you are somebody, or that you feel you are somebody. You are attached to this - a toy, a house, a wife, a husband, furniture, you are attached, that is you, isn't it? What you are attached to, you are that. Wait, go slow, go slow. Have you understood that? If I attached to this house, I am the house. Right? Wait, get one thing at a time, don't generalize and try to capture everything at once.

So I am the result of human struggle, pain, fear, sorrow, whether I live in India, here, or in Europe, or in America, wherever I live, I am the result of humanity - right - which is sorrow, struggle, pain, anxiety, fear, all kinds of psychological disturbances. Who has created this, which is the image I have - I am a great man, I am nobody, I must be somebody. You follow? Who has created all this?

S: Thought.

K: Are you sure? Or are you guessing?

S: I would still say it is still all those things.

K: All those but who has produced this strange mixture? A ratatouille! You know, ratatouille? Who has produced all this? You say, thought. You are quite sure? Don't back out of it. So you say, thought - thought being the thought of the past, all the generations which have thought. So you say, thought has created the picture, the image, and that image gets hurt. Right? Now I am asking you, is that image different from the 'me'? Or the image is me? You have understood my question? Now listen carefully, listen carefully. If the image is different from me then there is a division, isn't there, between the image and myself. Right? When there is a division what takes place?

S: Conflict.

K: Right. Muslim, Hindu, Arab, Jew, communist, socialist - you follow? You are British and somebody else is German. Wherever there is division there must be conflict. Right? So when the image is different from me then there is a conflict between me and the image. Right? Conflict which takes the form of saying, "I must control it", "I must alter it", "I must struggle with it", "I must suppress it". All that conflict goes on, doesn't it? Right? Have you understood this? So I am asking, is the image different from me?

S: I understand what you mean by picture, but I don't understand what you mean by 'me'.

K: Is the 'me' not the picture?

S: The 'me' is the picture, yes.

S: I think there is a lot of confusion that arises from even the way we use the language when you say, "I have built a picture".

K: I didn't say that.

S: But we tend to say, "I have an image".

K: There is a confusion, a semantic confusion that is, when we use words like 'I' and 'image', there is a difficulty. Now let's be clear. We know we have images, don't we, each one of us, about oneself. No? Right. Now I am asking you, is the image hurt? Who is hurt? Is the image hurt, or somebody who says, "I, different from the image, am hurt"? You understand my question?

Let's go slowly. You say you are hurt. Right? What is hurt, who is hurt?

S: My image.

K: Your image is hurt. You are sure?

S: All that you have made of yourself.

K: Yes. Now is that image different from the idea that there is a different 'I' from the image?

S: Well one likes to think that the 'I' is a permanent entity which is producing the images, and that the images can be changed.

K: One likes to think the 'I' is a permanent entity, which controls everything else, shapes. So I am asking, is that 'I' who thinks it is permanent, different from the hurt, from the picture which is hurt?

S: If you are the image, no.

K: Are you the image? Or are you different?

S: Both are the image.

K: So you are the image. The 'I' is the image. Be clear on this. Right? Wait.

S: I mean what is the 'I' besides the physical shape, I mean it is thought and thoughts are the image.

K: That's what I said. I said the 'I' is the name, the form, the shape, the body, the biological structure, and then the psychological structure - I am good, I am not good, I am better than somebody else. So the 'I' is the image. The 'I' is not different from the image. You are clear on this?

S: Is it the 'I' that gets hurt?

K: The image gets hurt, which is the 'I'. Right?

S: Through the body, or the idea of the body?

K: The idea of the body, of course. I said the name and the form. Right? Sanskrit has got different names for it but I won't go into all that. The 'I' is the name, the form, the biological structure of the form, the psychological content. All that is the 'me'. And that 'me' is the image. So when you say something to me which is unpleasant and there is hurt, it is this whole entity which is the image that gets hurt. Right? Be clear on this because the next step is going to be rather difficult. Sure?

Then what is to take place? When the image is hurt, how is that hurt to disappear, if there is no 'I' who says, "I must get rid of it?" You understand what I am saying?

S: No.

K: Wait a minute. Go slowly. I am getting hot, are you getting hot too? It is rather exciting isn't it? Good! It is rather fun to look at it.

We said we are trying to find out what is right action in relationship. We took an example of hurt, if that hurt continues through the present, modified to the future, that movement of hurt cannot bring about right action. That's clear. Who is hurt? We said the hurt comes when there is the image. That image is the 'me', the 'me' is not different from the image. Before we separated the 'me' from the image, and then the 'me' said, "I will make an effort to get rid of that hurt". Right? "I'll battle with it, I'll suppress it, I'll go to an analyst, I'll do anything to get rid of that hurt". But when we discover that the 'me', the 'I' is the same as the image then what takes place? You understand my question? Before you made an effort to get rid of it, the effort came from the 'me', who said, "I must get rid of it". Now what will you do? You understand the question?

Because before you made effort, the 'I' said, "I must get rid of it. I see in order to have right action I must get rid of hurt", and so it made an effort. But suddenly you realize the 'I' is the same as the image. Right? And where is effort then? You understand my question? If you don't understand stick to that question. I make an effort to learn a language, to learn about driving a car, mathematics and so on, I make an effort. And there that is a form of learning, I learn how to drive a car. Here I have always thought the 'I' is different from the picture, so the 'I' says to itself, "I will make a tremendous effort to get rid of the wound" - right. So it made effort - it suppressed it, it battled with it, it said, "I must get rid of it in order to have right action", and so on and so on. But suddenly someone comes along and says, "Don't be silly, the 'I' is the image". Right? Then what happens? You have taken away all effort from it. You understand?

S: The most difficult thing is that if you are doing it from image any effort that you put into it from your image will be only what you want to put in to it.

K: So where is your effort? I made effort before in trying to get rid of the image and the hurt. Now I find that I is the image, which is a fact. Right? Which is so, which is 'what is', which is accurate. So what am I to do? What is there? Be careful! Before I made effort to get rid of the hurt; now I see how silly it is, then what am I to do with it? What action takes place?

S: If you see it's silly, why do anything?

K: What does that mean? Keep at it, keep at it, keep at it. Go slowly, go slowly.

S: It's silly.

K: That's it. If you see that it is silly...

S: If you can see that it is silly you just drop it.

K: Do you see it as silly? Or do you have an insight into the truth that the image and the 'I' are not separate? When you have an insight what takes place? There is no hurt, is there? You have got it?

S: What do you mean by an insight?

K: You know what it means to have insight - sight into. Right? Which means see what is in, what is reality, what is the fact, in which there is no illusion, but see actually what is. That is what it means to have an insight. To have an intelligent perception of 'what is'. I wasn't intelligent when I separated the 'I' and the image. Right? It is not being accurate. So I was caught in an illusion. When I see that it is an illusion I am intelligent to see the fact.

S: (Inaudible)

K: That's what I am coming to. Go slowly. I don't want to press it.

S: It is useless to say, "I see the image", because the 'I' is the image.

K: Let us start it again.

S: Perhaps we will have to change our language.

K: Change the language, all right we will change it.

S: Could we also go into why should one get rid of hurt.

K: Why should one get rid of hurt? Tell him. Will you answer him instead of me

S: It's because of what I said earlier that when anything from the past comes into your present it is going to create more conflict and problems and nothing else.

K: Quite right. So there it is. That if I am hurt - in my relationship with you I have been hurt, and that hurt goes on, though I say I am your friend, I love you, but that hurt goes on. Right? What does that hurt do between us? It separates us, doesn't it? Right? So there is conflict then between us two. I am more and more withdrawing from you, more and more frightened that you might hurt me, so I get more and more resisting, so conflict grows more and more. Right?

S: Why say, "I must get rid of it", what makes you?

K: I'll show it to you. One has to be free of hurt because unless you are free relationship between two people becomes a continuous conflict. That's obvious. No? Don't agree.

So, let's go back: before I made - I am using the word 'I' specially there - before I thought I was something different from the image, and so I made an effort to do something about the image which has been hurt. I suppressed it, I confessed to another that I have been hurt, I went to an analyst and talked about my hurt, and I controlled my hurt, I resisted it. All that is a struggle, a conflict, a battle between me, between the 'me' that says, "I must get rid of it" and the image. So you come along and tell me, "Look, it's all wrong. Are you different from the image?" And you show me it is not. So I say, "By Jove, how true that is". When I say, "By Jove, how true that is", I have an insight into it, I have understood it. Right? Not, "I have understood", there is an understanding of the fact. So what happens then?

S: Is insight turned into memory?

K: No, insight is never memory.

S: No, but it might be if you say, "I have an insight" then...

K: Ah, insight is not, "I have an insight", it is an insight.

S: You might say there is an insight but then the image comes back up.

K: Just a minute. Have you understood this fact, that the image is you?

S: You tell us that I is different from the image.

K: I don't tell you. I don't tell you anything. I say to you right from the beginning, let us in all our discussions, in all our dialogues, say, "Don't accept anything from the speaker" - right? I am not your authority, I am not your guru, you are not my followers and so on and so on. I say, let's investigate together. Right? Now we have been spending nearly forty minutes investigating into this problem - the problem being, what is right action in relationship. The right action cannot take place in relationship when there is any kind of hurt. That hurt, who is hurt? You are investigating, we are not accepting what I am saying. Who is hurt? We said, the image. Is the image different from me? And we said, the image is created by thought and the 'me' is created by thought also. Am I going too fast?

S: Why do I think I am an image?

K: Aren't you the image? Have you got a name, a form, all the psychological structure, the content, when you say, "I must be better, I am not good, I must be taller, my hair is not right" - the whirlpool that is going on all the time. Isn't all that your image about yourself? And yourself, is that different from you who are looking at it?

Now look, you look at me, don't you, because unhappily I am sitting on a platform, you look at me. Right? Have you an image about me?

S: Yes.

K: Then you are looking at the image, aren't you, which you have built about me. Right? So you put a mask on me and are looking at the mask. Right?

S: That creates a lot of conflict.

K: Sir, so remove the mask and you will see me, if you can. Right? So if the image is the 'me' then what takes place?

S: To remove the mask...

K: That's an image, drop it, don't take it too seriously. You understand my question? Answer my question: if you are the image, what has happened? Is the hurt there? Is the conflict there between the 'I' and the image? What takes place? Before there was an illusion, that me is different from the image, but suddenly that illusion has gone, and only the fact remains. What is that that remains?

S: The real you.

K: What is the real you?

S: I'd say a real illusion.

K: What is the real you? You have suddenly introduced a new word - the real you. This is a trick played by the ancient Hindus, which has been knocked on the head everlastingly. But we still carry on - not that you are a great Hinduist, or Buddhist, but this sense that there is something behind. So I am asking you what remains, what is there when you realize, or when you have an insight, when you really understand - to understand implies no illusion - when all that isn't there, what is there then?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Careful, careful. No you are missing something, go slowly.

S: There is a whole, one unit.

K: There is the whole. What do you mean by that? Do you mean there is sanity? Right? Which means there is no fragmentation. Right? Careful. Look what you are saying, observe it, don't just spin it out but watch it carefully. No fragmentation between the 'me' and the image, which are fragments, two fragments. So there is no fragmentation, therefore there is sanity. You are saying where there is sanity there is no fragmentation. So you are sane, therefore there is no insanity in you as a person. Yes. Wait. So I am asking you - don't let's accept the word 'whole' yet - I am asking you, what is there? You understand? We said the image and the 'me' is the name, the form and the psychological content of the image, all that is the 'me' and the image. Right? What is that? The name, the form, the content. Are they not just words? Are they not just memories? Are they not some things that you have remembered, past experiences? Is not all that the past?

S: I think that is all it is, because that is a fact.

K: So you are apart from your organic biological thing, what are you? Just a lot of words, memories?

S: It seems like it.

K: Not, 'seems like it', is it so? If it is so, if that is the truth, then how can words affect other words? You follow? You understand? So - you don't see it - therefore you are completely free, except biologically.

S: Physical things may hurt me but names will not.

K: Words will not.

S: If there is no I.

K: That's right, there is no I, therefore nothing can hurt you. Which doesn't mean you have become callous, indifferent, on the contrary you may become much more compassionate, tremendously affectionate. Right?

So what is right action then? If there is an image between you and me there is disorder in our relationship. Right? You talked about order, you wanted order. How can there be order in our relationship if we are constantly at battle with each other, because the images are fighting? Right? So there can only be order when there is no image. Right? And therefore when there is no image, in our relationship there is right action. You don't have to say, 'Well, what is right action', there is right action. You have understood it?

S: What is that which is doing the right action?

K: No, there is right action, not, "who is it that is doing right action".

S: What is doing the right action?

S: Are we just a bag of protoplasm?

K: I don't quite understand.

S: What is carrying out the action, the right action?

K: I get it! What do you think? Don't shrug your shoulders. You understand this is a very important question. And we have gone into it very deeply, if you have gone with it, shared it together. We said, we are name, form and psychological content, you follow, all that. Memories, brain, I remember my name, I identify the name with the form, and the name and the form carry on to the psychological thing, and they are the content of all that. All that is me, the image. Now what is all that, apart from the biological structure and nature and activity, which has, if one observes carefully, its own intelligence, if you have gone into it. That is, we have destroyed the organic intelligence. We have destroyed it by drink, by giving in to taste, "I like, it tastes better, therefore I am used to that", so gradually we have destroyed the biological, instinctive, its own intelligence.

Now we are saying, psychologically we have destroyed the deeper intelligence. Let me go into it slowly, slowly. I am investigating. Don't accept what I am saying, right? We are investigating, we are sharing together. I am saying all that psychological content is the 'me' and the image. What is that content - memories, past experience, knowledge, words - the past. Now when there is the realization that the whole thing is put together by thought - thought being the response of the past, because we said thought - now let's stop there. What is thought? What do you think is thought?

S: It's what you said, it's all from the past.

K: What is thought?

S: A movement in time.

S: The actual brain trying to balance itself.

K: Now just a minute. I ask you what is your name, you answer it very quickly, don't you? Why?

S: The memory responds.

K: Go slowly. I ask you, what is your name, you answer very quickly, don't you, why?

S: You are familiar with it.

K: She says, you are familiar with it, you have repeated it a hundred million times. So immediately you answer. Just a minute, go slow, go slow. I ask you, what is the distance between here and London - what takes place?

S: It takes longer.

K: What do you mean by longer?

S: It takes you a certain amount of time.

K: I know. What is happening in your mind?

S: You are searching in your memory.

K: Slowly. What is happening in your mind, in your brain?

S: Thinking it out.

K: Thinking, what does that mean?

S: You are searching out the right information.

K: Yes, thought is searching out information. Right? In a book, or trying to remember how many miles it is, or wait for somebody to tell you. Right? You follow this? So I ask you, what is the distance between here and London, and thought is immediately active, it says, "I have heard it, I have forgotten it, let me think for a minute. I don't know, but I will find out, I will ask somebody, I will look in that book." So thought is movement, searching in its own memory, or looking somewhere to find out. So thought is in action. Right? Are you sure?

Now I ask you something else. I ask you a question to which you say, "I really don't know" - which means what? You are not searching, thought is not in movement, thought then says, "I don't know, I can't answer you". You see the difference? Familiarity and quick answer, then time interval when thought is searching, looking, asking, expecting, and thought says, when you ask a question which it really doesn't know, in any book, nobody can tell, it says, "I don't know". Thought stops there. You understand? See the difference. Quick response because you are familiar, time interval when thought is in operation, and a question which nobody can answer thought says, 'I don't know'. Thought is then blocked.

So what is thinking? I have said it to you, come on.

S: Thought is the response of memory.

K: Memory is what?

S: Symbols.

K: Symbols, pictures, information - right? Pictures. We said thought is the response of memory. What is memory?

S: Knowledge.

K: Knowledge, experience stored up in the brain. So the brain retains the experience, the knowledge, how many miles between here and London, and responds. Right? So you have found out something: that thought is a response or movement of memory. Right? Response of memory. When I learn how to drive a car it is the response of knowledge, which is stored up and I drive. So thought has created the image and because thought is a fragment it has created the 'me', thinking the two are different. Thought has created the image, and thought says, "The image is very transient, it is always changing, but there is a 'me' which is permanent." Thought has created both. Right? So when thought sees this, that it has created both and therefore they are both the same, what happens?

S: Thought stops.

K: Thought is blocked, isn't it? It says, "I can't do anything." No? So what is there? You understand? Please understand this tremendously important thing in your life. For god's sake understand this. Get the principle of it, the truth of it, see the fact of it. Thought has created the image, thought has created the 'me', and thought says now, "I have created the two, battle". Right? And thought suddenly says, "By Jove, I see what I have done". Then what takes place?

S: You don't think about it.

K: There is no image at all. When thought stops, what is there? There is no illusion, there is no image, there is no me, therefore there is no hurt, and therefore out of that comes right action, which is intelligent, intelligence says, "This is right action". You understand this? Intelligence doesn't say it, intelligence is right action.

S: Don't you need thought for intelligence?

K: On the contrary. I have just shown it to you. Please listen carefully - listen, not to your opinions, not to your conclusions, not to what you have understood, just listen, find out. We said thought is the response of memory. Right? Thought has created the whole psychological structure, the 'me' and the image - the image that says, "I am good", "I am bad", "I am superior", etc., etc. And thought also has created the 'me', and says, "I am much more lasting, I will endure death", etc. So thought has created both. You come along and say, "Look at it carefully, thought has created both, so they are both the same. There is no division between the 'I' and the image. There is no division between the observer and the observed, there is no division between the thinker and the thought, there is no division between the experiencer and the experience."

Sorry I am ramming all this into you.

So suddenly thought realizes how perfectly true this is. It is true, thought doesn't realize it, it is true. Right? The perception of the truth is intelligence, and that intelligence then says, 'Whatever I do is right action'. Because there is no image, there is no me, there is no psychological content, only intelligence operating. Do you get this?

S: If thought has stopped, or is blocked, then it is obvious that you don't use thought for your...

K: ...except to drive a car, to use a language, to do technical functions and so on. There is no psychological content. You understand this is a tremendous thing to discover for yourself. Therefore you can live a life without conflict, therefore live a life with tremendous compassion and all the rest of it.

S: I have the impression of using thought to discover all this.

K: No, we are using words to convey the meaning, which has thought has created. Look, I describe to you something. The description is the movement of thought. Right? The description is the movement of thought, but the description is not the described. The described is not thought. The tree is not thought, but I have described it. Get it?

So what is left is complete freedom from the image and me. You understand? This is what all the saints, the serious ones, and what all the great teachers have sought, so as to be in a state where there is only intelligence operating, which is the intelligence of perception of truth. Have you understood all this? Have you got an insight into it? Not a verbal description, you understand?

S: Is that why we call it 'holiness'?

K: That is holy, that is intelligence is sacred - not the things created by the hand or by the mind, the statues, the temples, the churches, that's not holy, it is the product of thought. The architect who had an image as a design and put it down on paper, or form, in design and then built it, it is all thought. That's a reality, you follow? This building has been put together by the architect and it's a reality, it is so, it is there. But the 'I', the image is not there.

S: What is the difference between reality and the 'I'?

K: Look, the organism - are you the body?

S: Yes.

K: You are. What do you mean by that?

S: Two arms, two legs.

K: Yes, and the name, Jean-Michel, the form, the shape of the head, the shape of the eyes, the shape of the nose, the height and breadth - right? That's a reality. The organism is a reality, but the psychological thing which thought has created is not a reality.

Wait, wait, go slow.

S: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, the body, the organism, the biological structure is not the creation of thought.

S: No.

K: The tree is not the creation of thought. Right? Now thought has created the psychological structure. Right? That's also a reality. Wait. But it is an illusion.

S: Is the illusion in the fact that you don't realize it is created by thought?

K: Of course. Is not illusion created by thought, all illusions - I believe in perfect State, perfect government, the communists have the most perfect organized capacity, etc., etc., I believe. That's an illusion. But what they do is a reality. You have got it? I disagree with them, they send me to a mental hospital. The hospital and me in the hospital is a reality, but it is brought about by an illusion.

So we are going to find out - go slowly. That is, whatever thought has created, whatever, is a reality, though thought says, "I am Napoleon" it is an illusion, but it is a fact, I think so. But it is an illusion, you understand. But the tree is not an illusion, it is a fact, it is not created by thought. So intelligence is not created by thought.

S: That's what I was saying, if your thought stops how could it be.

K: Therefore it is intelligence that operates when there is a relationship which is not based on images. Right? Then that intelligence in relationship brings right action. Got it? You have understood a little bit of it? Hold on to the tail of the tiger, don't let it go, because you will see if you hold on you will enter into quite a different dimension. But if you let go it is like coming back to living with the beastly life of struggle and conflict and battle with each other. You understand? We had better stop.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 7TH DECEMBER 1974

I wonder why you come to listen to me. Is it out of curiosity or you have nothing better to do? Or do you want to find out what the speaker has to say? If you want to find out what he has to say you have to listen. To listen is an art. The word `art' means to put everything in its right place, that's the real meaning of the word `art'. And if you are going to listen this evening to a discourse, and if one may suggest one has to listen not with your own opinions, your prejudices and your conclusions and ideas but rather listen neither agreeing or denying, disagreeing. To listen requires a certain form of communication between the speaker and yourself. Communication implies not only a verbal exchange but also to think together, actually think together and share together not ideas, not words but rather the thing that lies behind the word, to read between the lines, to have an insight which we both share. So listening is not only an art but a responsibility.

And if you are at all serious, not merely intellectually amused but serious in front of a declining and degenerating world, specially in this country then a quality of mind that demands to investigate, to explore, to examine, not merely the description, the verbal picture but rather to investigate together why this country is becoming daily more and more confused, more and more corrupt, a way of life that is becoming mechanical. And when we use the word `degeneracy' we mean what the dictionary says, an inferior state of mind which is not excellent. And together, if you will this evening, go into this problem because it is very serious why a group of people, a community, living in this country, and this is happening all over the world, and we are not comparing India with the rest of the other countries, but merely taking the country as it is, which is the people as they are, which is yourself, and to find out why, what is the central core of this terrible decay, of this degeneracy, of this mechanical way of life. We have not only personal problems but also we have peripheral issues, like inflation, over- population, economic chaos and so on and so on, they are all peripheral issues. And a serious mind demands and must find an answer why there is this decline both religiously, and that's the first degeneration, there is no religion in this country at all. We are going to talk about it, so don't be shocked. There is a sense of totally unrelated to world events, each one is concerned with his own little problem, with his own survival, with his own security, with his own personal salvation. All this indicates a mind, a heart that is becoming more and more incapable of dealing with the problem as a whole. And we have to find an answer because there is so much suffering, incalculable misery, a despair of which one may not be aware, or conscious, but it is there. We are not exaggerating nor being pessimistic, but merely stating what is going on. Technologically there is extraordinary improvement, things are going so fast but human beings are not keeping up with that rapid growth in technology.

So seeing all this, wars, violence, corruption, a social structure that is totally immoral, division, conflict, suffering and the brutal violence that is spreading throughout the world, seeing all this, one wants to find out if one is at all really serious, not playing with words, not playing with ideas or speculating about the problem but if one really earnestly enquires into it, which we are going to do, then that enquiry demands on your part an observation which is not prejudged, which is not prejudiced, which is not parochial, which is not Hindu or any other particular race or caste. So to investigate there must be freedom otherwise you cannot investigate. That's obvious. If I want to find out something my mind must be free to enquire, must not be caught in its own prejudices, in its own beliefs and conclusions. And that's the first requirement of any enquiry, of any examination. And I hope together, being free if that's at all possible, that is not being a Hindu with all your ugly tradition, your superstitions, and all the rest of it, and being free to look, to observe, to find out. And I hope we can do this together.

What is the reason of this decay? Not peripheral reasons, not reasons which are superficial, which any economist, socialist or philosopher invents or describes, but rather together face this question, why you in India, living in this country, not comparing India to Europe and America or Russia, this country why, what has happened? You know this is a question one asks after fifty years of coming to this country every winter, and seeing the decline every year. What is the reason, what has happened to the mind? As we said, please neither agree nor disagree but examine. Which is, examine not the words, the ideas, the speculative inferences but why this has happened. And where do you enquire? Do you enquire after some philosophical assertion, or do you enquire an idealistic formula, or do you enquire what you are, what you have become. Right? That's where the enquiry has to begin, otherwise it has no value, otherwise it becomes merely an amusing entertaining enquiry without any result. So to enquire you have to enquire within yourself why human beings living in this country have allowed themselves to be what they are, what they have become - non-religious, though you may do puja three times a day, go to temples, follow innumerable gurus, read the Gita, Upanishads, those are all extraneous events, what other people have said. And by reading those books you think you are religious, by going to some guru and worshipping his nonsense, his systems, his meditation, you think you have become suddenly extraordinarily religious. Or somebody who does some miracle, and you think by attending those tricks you suddenly have found religion.

So if you observe yourself very seriously, are you religious? The word `religion' means according to the dictionary, not what you think religion should be, because your opinion of what you think religions should be may be just your own hope, your own wish, your own longing, your own prejudice and therefore it has no validity. Religion means gathering all your energy, both intellectual, physical, psychological, all your energy so that it is totally aware of all its activities, not fragmented but as a whole, a holistic activity. That's what religion means. Are you so religious?

And the next question is: thought plays an extraordinary part, thought has done most extraordinary things technologically, it has constructed the aeroplane, everything, thought has created that, the whole scientific field of knowledge, the whole world of medicine and so on and so on. Thought also has created wars, divided people. Please observe it for yourself, don't agree with me, the speaker has no value at all, he is not doing propaganda. Thought has divided people, thought has separated religions, thought has created the gods which you worship, the saviors, the gurus, the masters, the whole field is the projection of thought, your ramas, sitas, and gurus, you know the whole world of that. So you have created your gods whom you worship. So you are worshipping yourself in a round about way. Are you observing all this? Are you aware that what the speaker is saying is a fact or non-fact? That thought, your thought, your daily thought, not your idealistic thought which is still part of thought, that thought has accumulated tremendous knowledge in one field and that knowledge is operating in that technological world and thought as knowledge is destroying the human beings. I'll explain as we go along.

Have you ever observed yourself, that you are functioning, thinking, acting according to knowledge. Knowledge means experience, accumulated memory, and you are acting, functioning, according to that memory, which has become mechanical. Right? You are following this? And as thought is fragmentary, thought is never whole, all action becomes fragmentary. So knowledge in one field, in one area is absolutely necessary and when mind merely functions on knowledge as most do, then it becomes mechanical and the decline begins. Right? Am I talking Greek? You understand the question? Knowledge to which you give such tremendous importance, is always in the past and part of that knowledge is tradition, and when you are acting, living in that area as you do then the mind must become mechanical. Right? That is, memory is experience and knowledge stored up in the brain and that knowledge is reacting all the time. You can observe it in yourself. And we say that one of the basic reasons for the decline of people in this country is that they are living in an area of mechanical knowledge. And therefore the mind must decline, the mind must degenerate, when you are living according to the knowledge of others, the Gita, the Upanishads, you know, all the books that you read, you are living on the knowledge, or the experience, or the say-so of other people and therefore your life is second-hand. Right? Aren't you surprised, or you just sit there listening to all this? You understand what I am saying? I am not insulting you, I am just pointing out, you are second-hand people, or third-hand people. And when you discover that, not because the speaker tells you but you discover it for yourself, the truth of it, the fact of it, that you are living on knowledge, on tradition, which is a continuity of knowledge. And therefore a civilization, a culture, a people that live merely on knowledge must inevitably decline.

And to find out a way of living which is non-mechanical, which is not based on knowledge, is the regeneration. That is, in one area knowledge is essential, otherwise you can go home, otherwise you can't understand English, otherwise you can't recognize your wife or husband. Knowledge in that area is necessary. But when the mind merely lives, nourished by memory, by knowledge of others, specially, then the inevitable decline takes place. So is it possible, please do listen to this for two minutes, if you will - is it possible to live a life where the area of knowledge is sustained and to act in relationship, because life is relationship between you and another, in that relationship no continuity of knowledge from day to day? You understand my question? Because you see I am using the word 'knowledge' in the sense as accumulated experience in human relationship which becomes memory stored up in the brain and according to that memory responds. It's excellent in the field of technology but in the field of relationship between human beings then it becomes a destructive and a mechanical thing, which prevents what one can call love. Right?

I wonder if you are following all this? Are we communicating with each other or not? I think you are used to going to meetings, aren't you, being lectured to, talked at. And here one is saying things which apparently you don't catch, apparently you haven't even thought about all this, you haven't even enquired. Do you understand my question? I am asking very seriously, why you as a human being living in this country are declining, degenerating, why your minds are not fresh, why there is no love at all. And that may be this mechanical activity of the brain, of the mind, of ideas, and the utter lack of what one can call deep affection, compassion. These two factors may be right through the world the essence of this decline. You understand?

Haven't you got a problem of this kind? Isn't it your problem? Or are you merely concerned with over population, inflation, and how to get on with your wife or your husband, get a better job, corruption, you know, all the superficial things, which dominate most people, and if you are enquiring you must go very much deeper, not merely find superficial answers to superficial issues. Aren't you concerned? You understand my questions, my problem? It is not mine, it is your problem, I am putting it to you for you to face and answer. How can human beings live on tradition, which is a mechanical process, on mere knowledge? Which makes the mind mechanical therefore it has no energy.

Leave that for the moment, and look at something else. Have you ever gone into the question of what love is? Or you don't even think about it? Have you gone into to find out that extraordinary thing which one calls love, compassion. Is compassion knowledge? Is compassion the cultivation of thought? Is love a mere remembrance of certain incidents, knowledge? You understand my question? You have to answer this. So one asks: is there love in this country? Please, I am not saying it does exist or doesn't exist in Europe or America or Russia, I am asking you who live in this country non-comparatively. Or you have reduced love to sex, pleasure, or it has become duty, responsibility, a thing which is the outcome of a comfortable life, or something which you call devotion. You understand all my questions? Because it may be this factor, that in your heart there is no love, and you are living entirely within the field of knowledge.

Let's go into it a little more. You see when one observes what is going on in the world, the political division, the wars, the Arabs and the Jews and the Russians and the Chinese, and the Americans and the constant strain, and struggle and the brutality, the threat of war, starvation, all that, when you consider all that, not just your little problem, your problem is involved in all this but you have to take the whole thing, the whole thing, not just one fragment of it. Now when you look at all that non-personally, objectively, the chaos, the immense suffering not only personal but the collective suffering of man, what is your answer to this? For god's sake. What do you say? Retreat into some philosophical jargons and slogans? So if you are at all serious you have to find this out, whether human beings, that is you and I, whether we can bring about a total revolution in ourselves psychologically because when you change fundamentally you affect the whole consciousness of the world. You understand sirs? God! You understand this? Look: Lenin, whether you agree with him or not agree with him, has affected the consciousness of the world. Right? Stalin has, Hitler has, and the priests have affected the consciousness of the world by their belief, by their saviors and all the rest of it. Every human being - please look at it for yourself, it's the truth, it's a fact - every human being when there is a fundamental change in himself affects the consciousness of the world because you are the world, the world is you, you are India, geographically as well as psychologically. And when you change not at the superficial level but fundamentally, radically, because you are the world, because the world is you, you affect the consciousness. That's a fact, isn't it? We don't seem to be communicating with each other at all. Haven't the inventors of Rama and Krishna affected your consciousness, everlasting songs about them? Of course it has affected your consciousness. And so if you as a human being transform yourself you affect the consciousness of the rest of the world. It seems so obvious.

And can knowledge transform man? Do you understand my question? Oh God! You have knowledge about so many things, you have read so much, you have philosophies galore, after all philosophy means the love of truth in daily life, not theories, not speculative concepts, it is the living, the love of truth in daily life, which means tremendous honesty. And the love of being honest. So can the human mind, your mind, transform itself through knowledge? Or knowledge has no place in the regeneration of man. Knowledge is mechanical, you can add and take away from knowledge, and when you live in that area as most people do - memory, experience, knowledge - if you live in that area the mind must inevitably become mechanical. That is, in your relationship, in daily relationship between man and woman you function on knowledge, don't you? No? Don't you have an image of her and she has an image of that person, which is, essentially the image is knowledge, and you live in that relationship based on knowledge and therefore there is no freedom. Are we meeting at all? So I am asking you: what place has knowledge in the transformation of man and society? We are saying knowledge has no place because knowledge is mechanical, which I have explained. Then what is the element, what is the core, the root, which is not the product of thought and therefore a factor which is not knowledge? You understand my question? Please do. Look, sir: I want to transform myself because I see what I am, miserable, confused, ugly, brutal, avaricious, hateful, jealous, ambitious, cunning, deceitful, say one thing and do another, double talk, an idealist and that ideal has nothing to do with my daily life, I see all that, this contradiction, this conflict, this struggle from the moment I am born until I die. And I say to myself, how can I change all this? That requires not slackness, laziness, I must find out, not according to some philosopher, not according to the Gita, that doesn't interest me at all because that's rather a bore. I want to find out. What am I to do? Now put yourself in that position, please put yourself in that position and see, ask yourself seriously what are you to do. That is, can the knowledge that you have acquired either through self-knowing, understanding yourself, or the knowledge that you have acquired from others, the knowledge that you have gained through experience, whether this knowledge is going to transform you. You understand? Or a different energy, a different factor is necessary to bring about a transformation?

So we have put this question unconsciously perhaps, then we say, 'Yes, I cannot do it by myself, therefore I need a guru' and the guru is of my choice, who must please me, I don't go to a guru who tells me, 'Get to work'. And I escape into ideas, ideals and so on and never face this. Now since you are here, you are good enough to come this evening to listen, look at it: can your knowledge that you have acquired transform your envy? Take that one factor. Can you totally be free of it? That is, can your knowledge of what it is to be envious and the results of envy, and the cause of envy, you know all that because your minds are very good at analysing, most minds are if they are given certain opportunity, you have that knowledge and will that knowledge transform your envy? Please, look at it, go into it. What will end envy? You know what envy has done in the world, you know the cause of envy, which is pleasure, and so on - we won't go into the cause of it now for the time being. And all that knowledge, because knowledge is time and the mind that seeks cause of envy is caught in time, so I am asking will time solve it? You follow? I am putting the question differently.

And if you are serious and want to find out how to end totally, so that it never comes back again, this problem of envy, because our whole social and religious structure is based on envy, the hierarchical outlook, the one who knows, the one who doesn't know, all that is based essentially on envy, with all its competition, with all its ruthlessness and so on. Now after examining all that, not only verbally, descriptively, and you know that you are envious, can you end that envy through the information you have all about it? You understand my question? For god's sake say, yes, or no. Then what will end it? Determination? Now when you determine to end envy there is a conflict, isn't there. So you may suppress it, you may overcome it, you may escape from it, but it is still there. So knowledge will not open the door so that you are free of envy.

Then the problem is: what will? Please ask yourself. Because envy, with jealousy, is hatred in a different form, and a world that lives on hate, a human being is nourished by hate cannot bring about a different world, a different culture, a different existence. So it is absolutely necessary - I am taking that as an example - to end envy. Now how is this done? You understand my question at least? May I go on? Right? At least some do.

Now how do you look at envy? Please watch yourself. You know you are envious, don't you, and how do you observe that envy? How do you see it? How do you know it? This is really a very important question. When you say, I am envious, is you who says, I am envious, different from envy? You are following this? Is the feeling of envy different from the observer of that feeling? You understand my question? If the observer is different from the feeling then there is a division therefore there is a conflict. Right? There is conflict. So wherever there is a division, Arab, Jew, Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist and non-Buddhist, Christian, non-Christian, wherever there is a division politically, inwardly, psychologically there must be conflict. That's a law, that's the truth. So when you observe envy, is the observer different from the observed? Or they are both the same, the observer is the observed? Do you understand? So when the observer is the observed conflict ceases, doesn't it? And what happens? When conflict ceases between the observer and the observed because the observer is the observed, the thinker is the thought, the experiencer is the experience and so on, when the observer is the observed, when the observer is the envy, therefore there is no division and therefore there is no conflict, therefore what has taken place? Do you want me to tell you? Or are you again becoming second-hand? You understand my question?

We live in conflict, we are nourished in conflict, and the conflict comes about when there is division. And I took the feeling which is called envy, and one sees the result, the effect and the cause of that envy, the effect in the world, the effect in oneself, the bitterness, the anger, the jealousy, you know the hatred that is born out of envy, the bitterness, and will knowledge resolve that envy? You may rationalize it and say, 'Yes, we need envy to live in this world otherwise I am destroyed', you know all the reasons, you give false reasons to enjoy your own envy. Now, then you ask, is the observer different from the observed. If he is different there must be conflict, suppression, rationalization, overcoming it and the battle begins, all that. But the fact is the observer is the observed, the observer is envy itself. Now when you realize that what has taken place? What has taken place when you have dissipated your energy in conflict, in suppression, in rationalization, in overcoming, what has happened to that energy when you are not doing that? You have all that energy collected, haven't you? And when you have that energy, complete energy which is not dissipated, then what takes place? You are still waiting for the second-hand mind? Good god! What takes place? Don't theorize, don't say, love. What actually takes place in you? You understand? Before you said you are aware that you are envy and you say, how terrible, I must control it, I must suppress it, one must have envy otherwise one can't live in this world, which is rationalization, and you have done that all your life. And when you realize that the observer is not different from the observed, the observer is the envy, therefore what has happened?

Q: Transformation.

K: Oh, come off it, sir! You are just talking, has it disappeared in you? Second-hand mind in operation! You don't do it and that has been what has happened to this country, they talk and they invent ideas or repeat somebody else, they never go into it to find out. You observe yourself and you will find the answer, it is very simple. When you are not dissipating energy through suppression, overcoming and all the rest of it, you have that tremendous energy to deal with the fact. The fact is envy. You are that envy, envy is not separate from you, your consciousness is its content. I won't go into that now. Your consciousness is made up of its content, you are envy. And you say, 'All right, I am envy' and your whole mind if you are serious is giving all its energy to this question of envy. So what takes place?

Sirs, look what you are doing, you are going to repeat it after me, discuss it, reject it or accept it, or say, yes, somebody else has said the same thing and you think you have understood. That's the tragedy of this country, they have never gone into themselves, they have never found themselves in that reality of knowing what is actually going on. I'll show it to you. When the observer is the observed, that is, the envy is the observer, the 'me' who says, I am envy, that 'me' is envy, that's a fact, not knowing what to do we invent an outside agency, 'God will resolve this', an analyst will resolve this, somebody else will do all the trip for us and that means you are accepting authority. In spiritual matters there is no authority, including your gurus, your Bhagavad Gita and your Upanishads, nothing. That makes you, if you rely on that, you are second-hand human beings, which you are. Now what takes place? I feel envy, that's a fact. How do I know that it is envy? Please follow this a little bit. How do I know that it is envy? Because I have previous memory of that feeling. So instinctively the previous experience recognizes envy, and that recognition strengthens the envy. Right? Do you understand what I am saying? That is your previous knowledge, your knowledge of envy recognizes the present envy, therefore it says, yes, I know all about it, and then it accepts it and goes on. Look, you see what the mind has done, when it recognizes that envy it is memory that is operating, which is knowledge and therefore it cannot deal with the present feeling with a past memory. It only strengthens that feeling.

So the problem then is, can the mind, can that feeling be observed without any recognition? You follow? Which means not bringing your previous knowledge into it. Therefore the previous knowledge is the observer. And so you create a division. Now when there is no division, when you see all this, you have abundance of energy. Then that fact of envy can be dealt with instantly, it's gone. It is only the lazy, inattentive mind that knows the cause, the effect and goes on. But the attentive mind, which means the mind that has seen the whole nature and the structure of envy and therefore has gathered that energy and can deal with that fact, the fact being the observer is the observed, the observer is envy, therefore there is no movement at all. Have you learnt it by heart?

And when you realize this then the question arises: is there a way of living - please listen - is there a way of living daily life without a single conflict? Not as an idea, not as a slogan, not something you repeat and so on, but to find out for yourself a way of living in which there isn't a shadow of struggle, except in the technological field which you carry over into the psychological world. So I am asking you: in the realization that the observer is the observed, that is, the `me' that says, I am envy, that `me' is envy itself. Then there is no movement away from it, because you can't move away from it, you are it. Therefore you have all that energy, that energy dissipates the fact of envy. Have you understood? Have an insight into it, not my explanation of it.

So is conflict part of affection, part of love? We have to find an answer to this, you as a human being, individually as well as collectively - you are collective, you are not individual, sorry, individuality means a non- fragmented human being - you are the collective; now you have to find an answer how to live a life without a single conflict. And you will find it when you understand this whole problem of the observer and the observed, the experiencer and the experience, because the experience is the experiencer. You understand this? Because after all you are seeking experience, aren't you? When you go to your guru, aren't you seeking experience? You want experience and how do you know that experience unless you recognize it? Therefore the experiencer is the experience. So the mind finds then there is no questing after experience.

So a mind that lives mechanically in the field of knowledge, technologically, such a mind does not necessarily deteriorate; but a mind that lives in the field of psychological knowledge, the knowledge of experience, either your own or of another, the accumulated tradition or the tradition of a day, such a mind living in the field of its own particular knowledge brings about its own decay, which is what is happening all through the world, and especially in this country because you have never gone into yourself, and said, look, I have to find an answer to all these problems, not through books, and through teachers and through others. And this requires energy. And you have abundance of energy when you want to do something, you have plenty of energy to earn money, to go to the office day after day, but if you applied that same energy, that same intensity to go into yourself and find out how to live a life without a single shadow of conflict, then you will affect the whole consciousness of the world. Right, sirs.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH AUGUST, 1971

Shall we turn this morning's meeting into a young people's dialogue? Would you like that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Are the old people saying, yes, or the young people? Shall we do that? Right. It's up to you. And also, if I might point out, there are a lot of cameras about - you want to take photographs - I know, I know. We are serious people, we are not taking photographs, autographs, and all that nonsense, so please, I beg of you, don't take photographs of me at all. Take photographs of yourselves, or of each other, but not of me. I know people have been taking cinematograph, and although they have been asked not, they go on. So please, I beg of you, don't do it.

Q: Is there any difference between the young and the old people?

K: Oh lord; Is there any difference between the young and the old. I am afraid there is. We are older and they are younger. We are going and they are coming. And they may be like the rest of us when they grow up. So shall we make this morning's discussion or dialogue for the young people? If that is what is generally desired then what shall we talk over together?

Q: The sense of humour and laughter.

Q: How to avoid growing up in a hypocritical world.

Q: The conflict between the observer and the observed, does this lead to self-centred activity?

K: Does this awareness, does this watching, lead to self-centred activity more and more, does it make one more self-centred. Is that the question sir?

Q: Action in daily life.

K: Action in daily life. Go on Sir, what is it you want?

Q: Sir, we discussed a couple of days ago the harmony between mind, the heart and the body. Most of your discussions have been concerned with the mind, in that quarter, so could you perhaps go a little deeper into the relationship of the heart, whatever that is, and the body.

Q: What does it mean that we are false?

K: Shall we begin by that question, what do you mean by harmony between the mind and the heart and the body? Shall we discuss that? That might be rather fun. There is your answer, harmony, laughter. And the gentleman said you have been talking, mostly, about the mind, and rather neglecting the heart and the body, the organism. So he says, please go into this whole question of harmony between the three. Is that right sir?

Sir, what do we mean by harmony? Balance, non-contradiction, not in opposition, not fragmented, all the three working simultaneously, easily without any friction, a sense of unity, not comparing, not directed, not controlled, but flowing easily, harmoniously, fully, deeply without any sense of distortion. Would you say that is somewhat what we mean by harmony - would you say that? In which the mind, the capacity to think, neurotically or sanely, objectively or subjectively, which doesn't pull in opposite directions from the heart, and the heart doesn't pull in opposite directions from the body and so on. So there is no contradiction, there is no tension, there is no sense of imbalance between the three. Right? Do we see, understand verbally, what we mean by harmony? Do we agree to that? The definition, I am only defining, we are not saying what it is, or what it is not, we are just examining the word harmony.

Then are we harmonious? Taking the mind, the mind being the brain, thought, the intellect, with all the memory, experience stored up, and the heart - you know, that's a façon de parler, vous savez?, heart - not desiring one thing and suppressing it, suppressed by the mind, not being jealous, not envious, but quiet, you know that sense of richness, beauty, perfume, love, a sense of you know, heightened perception, and the body quiet, functioning easily, not having eaten too much or too little, not too much indulgence or too much restraint, eating the right kind of food so that all the stomach, the intestines and everything functions easily, with some fullness. Right? Do we live that way? Let us state the fact, actually what we are. For most of us there is no harmony, harmony in the sense that we have used that word, between the mind, the body and the heart, because most of us are torn apart. We over indulge, we eat the wrong kind of food, our body has been neglected and therefore it has lost its intelligence, and we smoke, we drink, take drugs - you follow - the whole of that, over active, over stimulated, sexually; and the heart never constant, never steady, pursuing emotional expressions, satisfying demands and so on, jealous, envious, comparative; and the mind living in the past - what a lovely day it was yesterday, what lovely memories I had when I was young - you know the whole of that. That is our life, isn't it? No? Is that the life of the older people, and is that the life of the younger people? Are the younger people different in that sense than the older people? Are the younger people living a harmonious life? Or a life of laissez-allez, permissive, a life of revolt against the established order, and revolt in not revolution. Right?

So do we start ideologically, saying we must be harmonious, having the definition and making that into a formula, a concept, and then trying to live according to that? Or state facts as they are, that one does live rather a shoddy, unhealthy, contradictory, distorting life, sexually, and mentally incapable of consecutive thought, reason, capacity, that is a fact isn't it? Do we state facts as they are, as we are? Or do we pursue an ideal of what harmony is and try to imitate that? Go on sirs. If I have a concept of harmony - you understand what the word 'concept' means - to conceive a formula, to project an idea of what I should be, live a harmonious life, and the projection becomes the ideal; and according to that ideal projected by my desire to live an harmonious life, and trying to live according to that formula, concept, there is this constant imitation of what I should be, and therefore in that there is conflict, isn't there? Right? So, the very concept is disharmony. Right? Isn't that so? That is, I have an ideal that I must lead a kind of life, eat the right food, not drink, not whatever it is, after experimenting with myself, I must not, and I must have a loving heart, and I mustn't be jealous, I mustn't be envious, I mustn't be ambitious, I must be a vegetable. And I must not live in the past. You follow? All these are projections of what I should be. Right? Right? Do please. This is yours. And the ideals are fictitious, is not a reality, but what is a reality is 'what is'. Right? Can we start there?

Now my question is: how am I, who lives a life of disharmony, how am I to live a harmonious life? Not, how am I to copy a harmonious life - you understand the difference? Are we clear on this? We are not discussing 'what should be', what kind of ideals we should have and live according to those ideals, that is the culture in which we have been brought up. And if you are really young, you are in revolution, not in revolt. Therefore seeing the falseness of ideals then you deal with 'what is'. Right? So reject - please bear in mind we are discussing this - we are rejecting the harmonious ideal of life but we are talking over together whether it is possible to live now a harmonious life. If you have an ideal you are trying to imitate that ideal, and where there is imitation, there is not only conformity, there is conflict, there is fear that you are not living up to your standard, so you feel inferior, so all the complexity of inferiority, from that inferiority all kinds of neurotic action. So when you understand really the falseness of ideals, then you see actually what you are. Right? Is that clear? Can we start from there? Or do you want to start with ideals? Please don't come back to ideals, you are finished with it, that is a game of the old people. Sorry old people!

So one lives a life in which there is no harmony, a life of contradiction, a life of hypocrisy, thinking one thing, doing another, saying something else - all those are indications of contradictions, imbalance, a life of no harmony. That is a fact. Now I want to find out how to change that fact, not how to become the ideal which I have projected - you see the difference? I am concerned with changing 'what is' - and is it possible to change a mind, a heart and the body which have acquired a great many habits - smoking, drinking, you know, habits. And when you are young the desire to follow the crowd, the young crowd - you know.

Shall we discuss that? Right? What do you say, shall we? I am not discussing it, you are sharing with me.

Q: The young is always conforming to the old crowd.

K: The young crowd conforms to the old crowd. The young generally conform. A group of long haired people, if I come there I feel rather lost because I have short hair, they have certain habits, certain ways of dressing, certain ways of walking, dirty - you know whatever they do, and if I don't fit in, I feel rather left out so out of fear, out of the desire for conformity, out of belonging, I identify myself with them, I grow long hair and all the rest of it.

Now these are all obvious facts. Now how am I, who lead a life of imbalance, not a balanced life, what am I to do? Shall we start from there? Right? Now shall I start with the body - listen to it carefully - with the body, with the organism or with the mind? The mind being the capacity to think, the capacity to understand, the capacity to be logical or illogical, the mind that says, I must, I must not, the mind that says, I must control my body - where shall we begin? With the body? Or with the mind?

Q: With the heart.

K: With the heart. Right. Shall we begin with the heart?

Q: Isn't there an intimate relationship between them all?

K: That's what I want to find out. You are saying there is an intimate relationship between them all. And to understand that intimate relationship between them all where shall I begin? You know, sir, consider this. The monks you may say, well they are silly people, and brush them aside, don't do that - examine it. The monks said let's begin by taking a vow of chastity, poverty, humility - which is the same all over the world, this applies in India, in Japan, in Europe and so on. That is, they began with the outward thing. Right? The outward expression of their assertion that they are trying to live a life different from the rest of the world. You understand sir? In India a man who renounces the world puts on a loin cloth. Right? Or a robe and that shows that he doesn't belong to the herd, he is different. You understand all this? By putting on a robe, which generally goes with a monk, that very outward expression gives him a certain standing. Right? And wherever he goes in India, in India only, whether in the North, South, East or West, he is fed, looked after, that is the tradition. Because outwardly he has renounced the world: but inwardly he is full of - you follow? - poor chap, inwardly he is in battle. He daren't look at a woman and when he eats he must eat so much and no more. You follow? So he is in battle with himself all the time. So where do you begin? With the outward appearance of long hair, beard, dressing, or think any old thing, feel any old way, yield to sex if you like it and so on. Where shall we begin, with the heart, with the mind or the body? You decide.

Q: What is the relationship between social reform and unconditioning?

K: What is the connection, the relationship between social reform and unconditioning. Sir, please sir, we are discussing harmony for the moment, we'll come back to that question a little later.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is there such a difference, or is there not an interrelationship between the mind, the heart and the body - inter-related - you cannot separate each one as though it is some kind of - you follow?

They are all interrelated, obviously. Psychosomatic. Soma means the body and psyche - it is a psychosomatic movement. Now to understand - please listen to this - to understand this whole structure, in which there is the mind, the brain, the heart, the whole structure, where shall we begin? Shall we begin with any - it is a whole thing - you follow? If I begin with the mind or with the heart - it is the same - no?

I'll put it differently. I see the interrelationship between the body, the heart and the mind.

Q: What is the difference between harmony and egotism?

K: Egotism is disharmony. No? If I am thinking about myself - how big I am, how small I am, what are my problems, I should be this way, I should sit that way, I must meditate, I must not meditate, there is no god, there is god - you follow - thinking about myself, my problems all day long, obviously that brings about a sense of isolation and therefore no relationship with another, and also it brings about an exaggeration of myself and therefore disharmony. That's fairly simple. The egotistic person is essentially a human being who has no harmony. Full stop. Don't let's waste time on that.

Now - you see sir this is really an important question. Do pay a little attention. Shall I begin by watching the body, what it should eat, why it eats, why it indulges - you follow - I yield to the taste of the tongue and eating more and more? Of shall I watch it, shall I watch this whole structure from an emotional standpoint because I am an emotional person, I love people, I have pleasure seeing people, I look at the mountains and say, how lovely they are. And also I look at my thoughts and say, how stupid these little thoughts are. So knowing all are interrelated with each other, where is the central clue, central point from which to start understanding of the three - you have got it? Have I made it clear?

Q: Sir, would it be possible to examine this thing in such a way that it would happen now?

K: That's what I am doing sir. Just hold a minute.

Q: So that there is no time involved.

K: Of course - no time. Do listen sir. First listen to my question. I know your question sir, hold to your question but first listen to the speaker's question. Listen to it first. There are these three elements which compose the human being - the mind, the heart and the body, the whole of that. Is there a point, or a central point, which awakened, will deal with the three as a whole?

Q: Surely it is the mind.

K: You have understood my question?

Q: Sir if you are watching your body, your emotions, watching yourself...

K: Therefore what does that mean? This gentleman says, watch it. Watching the body, watching all the feelings one has, which is called heart and all that, love, jealousy and watching the operation of the mind - watching - right? That is, being watchful, being alert, being aware. If I can be aware, be aware of the operations of the mind, the operations of my feeling and how I eat, what I eat - aware - perhaps then I could understand each one. So the importance is watching - right - being aware of the mind with all its thoughts, its cunning, its motives, its deceptions, saying I won't take photographs of you but subtly taking photographs of me - you know - all the rest of it - watching. And also watching my feelings, how easily I am hurt because I just can't get my way, I am hurt because I want to be a big man and you treat me like a little man - hurt. So watching. Watching how I eat, how quickly I eat, what kind of appetite I have - you follow, watch it. Now if that is the central thing - you understand - watching - then my next question is: how am I to watch? You follow? What is implied in watching? Go on sirs.

Q: Acceptance.

K: The gentleman says, acceptance. Is that watching? When I accept 'what is' - is that watching? No, don't say, no. Look at it. You are doing it with me, please do it with me.

Q: Sir isn't watching the problem?

K: That is what I am coming to. How do you watch? Because the manner of your watching teaches you everything. The manner of watching helps you to learn but if you don't know how to watch you can't learn. If I don't know the art of listening, I can't learn. So I must find out what it means to watch, what it means to observe, mustn't I?

Now the next question is: how do I observe my mind - please listen to it. How do I observe the mind? How do I observe the movement of my demands for happiness, pleasure - you follow - excitement? And how do I watch the body? So I must find out the art of watching. Now is the art of watching to be cultivated - please listen - cultivation implies time - doesn't it? I will watch today a little bit, tomorrow I will watch a little more and at the end of the year I shall be completely watching. That is, the cultivation of watching takes time - right - which means when you take time you are not watching. Right? When you say to yourself, look, at the end of the year I will be very good at watching, in the meantime you are not watching - are you? So watching, observing, seeing, is not the result of cultivation, system or time. Right? Please, come on. Right? Be quite sure that watching doesn't imply any kind of time. So I must find out what it is that doesn't imply time. That is, when I watch myself - this is very complex, please - when I watch myself, which is the mind, the body, the heart, which is myself, how am I watching? Am I watching in order to change what I see? Right? Change, which means reject and keep some, saying to myself, this is good, this is bad, I'll throw away the bad and keep the good. So if I watch myself with the eyes of condemnation, judgement, evaluation, then I am watching myself with the eyes of the past. Right? You see the truth of that? That is, when I watch myself with a condemnatory attitude, then I am not watching, I am judging. If I am watching in order to overcome it, I am not watching. Right? So if you see the truth that in watching if there is any kind of judgment, any kind of evaluation, trying to overcome, escape, that prevents watching - if you see the truth of that immediately you will watch without any of that. Right?

So you want to do something without time - I am showing it to you.

Q: Sir, along with the evaluation, condemnation, does also recognition of what you see imply time?

K: Recognition. Look, he says, apart from condemning, judging, evaluating, what part does recognition play in it. I'll show you. I am angry. I have said I must not judge, I mustn't condemn - you follow - I see the truth of that therefore it has gone. I am no longer judging, evaluating, but there is the recognition of anger.

Right? Now what takes place there, when I recognize? I have named it, haven't I? Right? No? Come on, don't go to sleep please. I have recognized it, haven't I, as anger? That means I have been angry before many times, and that has left a mark on the brain, and that brain now says that is anger. Verbally it has stated it is anger. The very word anger has connotations, that is, don't be angry because that is part of our culture, part of our inheritance, we mustn't be angry. Or indulge in anger? You follow? Are you following all this? Yes sir?

Q: In the rejection of condemnation, evaluation there is no long hair or short hair.

K: All right. Of course, of course. You have got long hair. But in that recognition there is no judgement.

Q: Why not?

K: I can't help it. That's a tall tree. I don't mistake the tree for an elephant. But - just a minute, go into it. When I recognize that I am angry that is quite a different movement taking place. The very naming it is condemning it, because I have named it in order to fix it as anger, which generations have said, don't be angry.

Q: Then there is condemnation.

K: Therefore I am saying that. So is there an observation without judgement, evaluation, though I recognize it and not attach it to the past. It isn't as simple as all this.

So when you see that, the truth of that, then you are watching completely without any obsession. Now can you do that now? Don't say, no.

Q: There is a tenseness in the body when I am watching.

K: Now wait a minute. He said, when I am watching, the questioner says, there is a tenseness in the body. Are you watching with your body? Are you watching with the eyes? Or are you watching, not with the eyes - you understand sir what I mean? How are you watching sir? Are you watching yourself with eyes closed? Or watching yourself with eyes open? You can do both, can't you? So what do you mean by watching? Go on sir.

Why should the body be in tension when you are watching? Which means either that you are watching with tension in your mind, and therefore the tension is transferred to the body. Or you are watching without any interference of the mind, just watching. When you are watching with an image, when you are watching yourself with the idea that there must be change then there is tension. Right? But if you are just watching. Look sir, suppose I have a habit of scratching myself or fiddling with my fingers - haven't you got habits like that, fiddling with your fingers, or doing something - can you watch it without wanting to change it, without wanting to stop it? Just watch it. Haven't you done it? Oh lord, you don't mean to say, please! Then you will see, if you watch it, there is no strain. But if you say, I must not fiddle with my fingers - right - I tighten up. But if I just watch it, in that there is no tension. That is simple enough. Let's go on.

So what is important is how I watch. That is really important. So watching - listen to this - has it anything to do with the mind, with the heart, or with the body? I am not saying it has, or it has not. We are enquiring. I am watching. Is watching a conclusion by the mind, I must watch, determination and therefore will. If there is will in operation there must be tension. Right? Oh lord!

Q: Isn't one of the problems of watching...

K: I am going to go into that. Sir, go slowly with me. So I am asking: what is watching? Is watching the result of determination therefore it is part of the mind - right - it says, I must watch because I must lead a harmonious life? That is, thought says to itself, I must be harmonious, therefore thought is watching. You are following? Is that clear? When thought is watching there is tension. Thought says, I must watch, I must sit still, I mustn't fiddle with my fingers. Then thought exercises its determination to watch and in that watching there is the operation of will, and where there is the operation of will there is resistance, and when there is resistance there is tension. Right? So I am asking: are you watching with the determination of thought? Right? Or, are you watching independent of thought? And therefore what does that independence of thought mean? Please sir let us go into it. You see, you can't sustain a long steady enquiry, you go to pieces in the middle of it. Just a minute sir. You see, I am saying, listen. You can't sustain sequential observation, step by step and sustain it. Because I see you give attention for a couple of seconds and gone! This requires watching. Not concentration but watching, in watching you are learning. I am doing that now. I say when I am watching if there is in that watching any operation of thought, that must inevitably result in tension, in contradiction, in resistance, because it is the determination of thought to achieve harmony, and therefore it says, I must. So I have learnt.

I am asking myself then what is watching, if it isn't thought, then what is this quality of watching in which there is no thought? Go on sirs. Is it the heart watching? Emotion, the desire, the feeling how beautiful it must be if I live a harmonious life, what a lovely thing it will be - getting excited by the image of harmony, which is also resistance. So am I watching with any kind of resistance? You are following? And is that watching related to the mind, to the heart, or to the body? Or is it something outside of it? Wait, wait. I don't know. I am not saying it is, don't jump to it. I am asking, enquiring. When there is no resistance, no operation of will, no acceptance or denial, just watching, is that watching the exercise of thought? We said no, right? Are you quite sure? Oh lord! If it is the exercise of thought, then thought is watching. Right? If thought says, I am watching because I want to get somewhere, I must get rid of my imbalance, I must not be neurotic, thought is in operation because thought has been instructed by listening to this talk that it must live a harmonious life. And thought according to that instruction is trying to live because it wants to live a harmonious life, it doesn't matter what it means but it wants to. So thought is not watching. Right? Emotion isn't watching, obviously. If I say I love to watch - you follow - then it is lost. So then what is watching, what is the quality of watching? Do live with it for two minutes. Don't answer me please, just look at it. It is not thought, obviously, right? You are quite sure? The moment it is thought - thought is memory, the old - thought then says, I must, I must not, then in that there is contradiction and therefore that is not watching. We have been through that. Therefore watching is not the product of thought. Listen to it carefully. You have it if you go step by step. It is not emotional, aggressive assertion that I must watch. It is not getting enthusiastic about watching.

So what is watching? Now listen to this carefully. I'll repeat this. You will see it. It is not thought because thought has said, I'll watch, in watching it has discovered it is operating from the past. Right? That it must achieve harmony because it has heard some person say, you must live a harmonious life, therefore it says, I must, it must be a marvellous state. So thought wants to live a life of harmony and thought cannot live a life of harmony because thought is the response of memory which is the past. Right? Harmony means living now. Right? So it is not thought. I have learnt that. The mind has learnt it is not thought. Therefore what is it? It is intelligence, isn't it? Right?

Now it is intelligence that is watching.

Q: This watching is impersonal.

K: Sir, don't bring in impersonal or personal. First see that when thought interferes there must be tension, there must be the operation of will, there must be resistance, there must be overcoming because thought can only function in terms of the past. Obviously sir. Right? Unless you see that, see the truth of that you will still be watching with thought.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right. Now. Sir look.

What is analysis? I am going back, you follow, a little bit. Analysis is observation, isn't it, a form of observation. Right? No? I watch and watching myself I say, I have been angry. Why have I been angry? The explanations. The cause, the justifications, all that is part of analysis, which is part of thought, isn't it? And analysis takes time. And at the end of it I say, that anger was justified or that anger was not justified, therefore I must be watchful next time, I will only get angry when it is justified - righteous anger and unrighteous anger! So look what is happening. Then thought is awakened to anger and watching anger. Right? Then what takes place? The thought is the observer, isn't it? Then the observer is different from the thing which it observes, his anger. Right? In that observation there is contradiction and therefore conflict; therefore the observer says, I must get rid of anger. So in looking at thought, observing not saying, I must not use thought, I must use thought, in observing thought and all the activities of thought, out of that observation comes intelligence. This intelligence is the result of observation of the workings of thought.

So, now, that intelligence is watching. Right? Is watching the mind, watching the body, watching the heart. That intelligence says, don't eat that food - listen to this - because yesterday you had pain, give it up. And because intelligence is in operation you give it up instantly.

Q: That's memory sir.

K: No, wait, listen carefully. I said sir, intelligence is not thought. Intelligence comes into being in observing the operation of thought - Observing, not condemning it or accepting it, just watching thought. Right? How thought operates. You know, watch it yourself, you will see it. In that watching intelligence comes. Now that intelligence is watching. Right? And I eat the wrong things, when that intelligence is watching - listen to it - it's also aware of the causation which is the past. So intelligence doesn't neglect the cause, is aware of the cause and the result. Oh, you won't get it. But it is not memory, it is intelligence which perceives the whole movement of causation.

Q: Is watching the same as intelligence?

K: Watching. Yes that's right. Watching, if you have understood the whole process of thought, is intelligence. Watching is intelligence if you understand the whole movement of thought.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Don't twist words.

Q: I just want to see.

K: I know sir. I am moving it away from it. Watching is intelligence. But mere watching is not intelligence. But watching the whole movements of the operations of thought - you understand - seeing how it works - haven't you done all this?

Q: It seems to me you need something more.

K: More than intelligence.

Q: Something more...

K: ...mysterious?

Q: No, no. Immensity.

K: Wait, wait, wait.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No sir. Let's begin slowly. Thought is measurable isn't it? Be clear. Thought is measurable. I can measure thought. My thought is better, wider, nobler - you follow - comparative. Is intelligence measurable?

Q: Yes.

Q: No.

K: Yes? Don't say yes and no. Let's find out. You see your mind is so conditioned you can't go through with it. I want to find out whether intelligence is limited, conditioned - born in India it is more intelligent than born in the West, or more intelligent because it was born in the West than in India, is intelligence personal, impersonal - you follow - all those are measurements. And that measurement is thought. Thought is deciding whether it is personal or impersonal intelligence. Oh come on sir. Right?

Q: We don't know what intelligence is therefore...

K: No, therefore find out if you are watching with thought. Right? Don't bother about intelligence. You see that is another trick! Find out how you are watching: whether you are watching with thought. And most of us are watching with thought.

Q: Doesn't one have to be silent before there is intelligence?

K: The question is: hasn't thought to be silent when you are watching - right?

Q: Yes. Perhaps there must be silence before intelligence can operate.

K: Quite right, but the silence can only come when you understand the whole machinery of thought. Therefore when you understand the whole machinery of thought, thought becomes quiet and when it is quiet intelligence operates. That's all!

Q: Sir, when you use the word intelligence it has certain associations.

K: Wait sir. I understand. To you that word intelligence has certain associations. If I use the words, 'god is watching', you would object to that because you have other associations with that word.

Q: Well then, not quite.

K: Wait sir. I am going to expand a little more. If I say the higher self watching...

Q: ...atman.

K: There we are! Or if I was in India, the atman is watching then they would accept it. Therefore we are not associating intelligence with any particular conditioning. You cannot associate intelligence with anything. If you do it is not intelligence. Ah, you've got it!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, please don't be so categorical. Examine it, play with it, go into it.

Q: Sir, the mind looking at awareness, looking, seeing continuous flow or movement and then it seems to stop at a certain point. At that point the observer seems to come into being. Can intelligence come into being instead?

K: No sir. Certainly not. It is like saying, when you are aware of danger can you at the moment not be aware of it at all. You are walking down the street and you are aware at one moment that the bus is dangerous and the next moment you are not aware of it and you will be killed.

Q: Has intelligence a past and a future, or is it free of past and future?

K: Or is intelligence free of the past and the future. Please be careful. Does intelligence only function in the present, independent of the past and the future. Which means is intelligence out of time. That's right? Thought is in time. Right? Thought is in time, thought is time. And is intelligence time?

Look, may I go back to what we began with? I must stop in a minute or two because the tape cannot go on more than one hour and fifteen minutes. And I have nearly come to that.

We began by asking what is a harmonious life. We said we more or less defined it verbally, and what is described is not the described, the description is not the described, and we said we live an unharmonious life. And that is a fact. And the ideal is out, that is gone, because I see the truth of the ideal. Now I am left with this, that I live a life which is not harmonious and I see why it is not. It is contradictory and so on and so on. Then I say who is watching all this? If thought is watching it is still the past watching the present, and so there is division between the past and the present. Then the past tries to overcome the present, therefore there is resistance against the present, therefore there is strain. And then what is watching? Is there a watching which is not the result of thought? Right?

Q: Is there awareness of the thinking process?

K: Awareness of the thinking process. Go slowly. The past, if thought is watching then there must be division, the past watching the present. Right? In that watching there is contradiction, therefore there is conflict and all the rest of it. So is there a watching - please listen - without the past thought coming into it? I see that there is such a watching and that watching is an awareness in which thought doesn't come into it at all.

Q: How do you know?

K: I am telling you. You can do it, not how do I know, do it.

Q: Are you telling me, or are you just stating facts?

K: I am just stating a fact.

Q: Are you?

K: How do I know. Look sir, how do I know. How do I know this exists. I am saying how do I know this exists?

Now here, I have explained for an hour and a quarter in discussion, the nature and structure of thought. Right? And when you watch the nature and the structure of thought, see where it is important, where it is not important, see the truth of that - you follow - the truth of its operation and its non-operation, then there is a different kind of watching. That is all I am saying. That watching has no time. It is not based on time. It is not what I discover. If you apply your mind, your awareness you will discover it for yourself. Full stop.

Q: You are stating a fact or what is your fact?

K: Oh no, I am just stating a fact.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 9TH AUGUST 1971

Q: Sir, I think most of us in this tent are completely and utterly out of touch with reality - we have too much money, we have too much food in our stomach, when we leave here we go back to a hot bath. What does this freedom mean compared to a man who can't have this. Here in this tent we don't want to find out what it is like.

K: Let me repeat that question. The gentleman says that we are well fed, we go off when we leave the tent, we go and have coffee and tea or smoke and we have got money. And what does freedom mean to us - and probably we are prisoners and we don't know it and so on. He wants to discuss that.

Q: Does love exist?

K: Does love exist between man and woman.

Q: This is a personal question only. As a psychologist I have to deal with a great many marriages which are entirely wrong and the children are not being cared for. Could we discuss what happens to these unfortunate marriages and their children.

K: We said the other day - we will come back to your question, sir - we would devote a whole morning to the question of education - not only education of our children but also the education of ourselves. Can we discuss that and include the two questions that have been put: what is the relationship between man and woman and love; and the children involved with marriages that go wrong, and the whole problem of freedom and fear, and therefore education - can we take that sir, can we discuss what is education, not only of the children but also of the grown-ups? May we? Do you agree?

Q: Is there a difference between education and learning?

K: We will go into that - take the whole problem of what it means to learn and what it means to be taught, and the teacher relationship with the student, you know the whole problem, we will go into it. Do you all want to discuss this?

It is such a big question I don't quite know where to begin. I wonder what we want our children to be, or what is going to happen to children as they grow up. That's one problem. And what is the relationship between the parent and the child, and what is the relationship of the family to the community? What is the relationship of the community, the nationality to the rest of the world? And why do we have children at all? And also we have to go into this question of sex and so on, the whole problem.

I think we have to begin observing actually what is going on, the actual fact. We have children and we send them off to school as quickly as possible. We have our own private life independent of the children and we think we love our children and we have really very little relationship with our children. That's the actual fact - no? So one wonders, as one sees not only in India and the East but also in the West, why we educate children at all. Is it merely to acquire knowledge so that they can earn a livelihood and therefore conform to the pattern of society which the elder generation have established? You have to discuss this with me please. The elder generation is responsible for the total mess the world is in. Right? Not only the parents but the grandparents and the great-great-grandparents. And do we educate the children to conform to the pattern which the older generation have established. That's one point.

And actually what is going on in the world - the parents have very little time with their children - they have their offices, their factories, and the mother and the father have to earn more because the society, the expansive society, buy more and more and more. So the parents have very little time with their children and so they are sent off to school as quickly as possible. These are all facts. And when they come home, the children, the parents are tired, and fortunately or unfortunately there is the television and the children are put in front of it and it's "For god's sake, don't bother me because I am tired." Right?

The children lead their own life and the parents lead their own life - their clubs, their factories, their books, their worries, their sexual life, their position, the office, in the factory, and so on and so on. Right? The parents are concerned with their own lives, their own miseries, their own positions, responsibilities, and the children are out of that. Haven't you noticed all this? And as the children grow older, as one observes in the West and in America, the children break away and revolt from the older generation, grow long hair, become dirty, wander around, permissive society, sex is a casual affair, not very important, drugs, marijuana, you know the whole permissive society, there they conform, they don't want to conform to the old pattern, but they have their own feeling of unity with the long haired ones. Right? So there is a wider and wider gap between the children and the parents.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We are going to find out sir, we are going to go into this. First look at the whole picture, not what we should do. See what is happening in the world. That's the whole picture in the West, more or less - wider, deeper division between the parents and the children. And the children have nobody to go to, to talk over things, and they talk over things amongst their own group, they experiment with sex, drugs, utterly confused, uncertain, unstable. That's what is happening in the West.

And in the East, India, the whole system used to be family, all the family lived together. The daughters went off to the husband's house and the boys remained with the parents, married but yet lived in the same house as their parents. For economic reasons that is breaking up. And so again though it is not so urgent as in the West, the mother remains at home with the children and the father goes out to earn money, comes back tired - you know, the whole business. But only the mother remains at home to look after the children. That is what is going on in the world.

Education, as we see it now, is to make children conform to the pattern established by the society, by the culture. That is, competitive, aggressive, ambitious, each one, parents and the children, out for themselves, selfish, arrogant, aggressive and frightened. And they resort, the children, the younger generation, to gurus, to mysticism - I won't call it that, mysticism is rather a good word - to occultism, to mysterious black magic, occult stuff, you know, Jesus loves us, you know, all that is going on. And strangely, in the East, in India, there is not this revolt against order, against the established order because of over population, there are five hundred and seventy million people and probably twelve million every year added to that. So the parents are concerned with their children, see that they have a good job, get married, get a job and for god's sake don't get into mischief and then forget the children - just their grandmothers and mothers worry about them.

So looking at this whole picture: in the West there is the draft, conscription, and in India there is no conscription, because there is so much poverty, the poor, the uneducated, or so-called who joined the army, the officers and so on, that's a career. They are paid there, they are happier, they have food, clothing, shelter. So there is no conscription. So society, as it exists, encourages war, and all the horrors of it, violence, brutality, and the younger generation do not want war, they demonstrate, you know what is going on in the world. So when you look at this whole picture - not my picture, you understand, it is not my picture, it is your picture, it is there in front of you, when you look at all this, the revolt, the drugs, the permissive activities of sex and everything that's going on, one wonders how can all this be and why is it like this? Right? Are you interested in all this? You are parents, aren't you, some of you - I am so sorry, I am really. I have watched it in India, I have watched in America, in Europe, and if one is at all sensitive one has tears in one's eyes, at the appalling things that are going on.

So seeing all this, what is the purpose of education? Just to earn a livelihood, go to college, university, win a degree in some technological subject and forget the vast field of life in which you are not educated at all? Right? Is that education? One must have technological knowledge, otherwise you can't survive in this world as it is. You know in ancient India, and it still exists, if you leave the world and take the robe of a monk, a tradition has been established through thousands of years, that a monk who has renounced the world outwardly has to be fed, clothed, and in any village, there are seven hundred thousand villages in India, any village however poor it is, will support this monk. These monks wander all over the country, and of course in the West it is not allowed, vagrancy.

So what is the purpose of living, what is it all about? When you meet students all over the world who have gone up to a certain point in university, say, "What is this, what am I doing? They are destroying me, stuffing me with a lot of knowledge and what is the point of it all?" and they walk out of the university.

So what is a parent to do and what are the children, the students, what are they to do? You understand the question? What are we to do? You have no answer, have you? There are parents who encourage their children to take drugs. Think of the horror of it.

Q: Think of the horror of prohibiting children to take drugs.

K: I am not at all sure.

Q: It could be better than...

K: Sir, the question of drugs, in India - I am not talking of better or worse, just looking at it - hashish - you know what that is, of course, part of all that, derived from hemp and all that, only certain types of ignorant people take it. It is tradition that you must not take it, and they don't take it, unless you are a little bit odd - only people who are ignorant, very little money, they generally indulge in all that kind of stuff. Now in the West...

Q: Sir, youth or not, hashish is no longer confined to the West.

K: Wait sir. Those who have money - very few drink whisky in India, fortunately, or beer, only the well-to-do because it is too expensive. Probably when whisky and beer and all the rest of it become cheaper they will all begin to drink. And the question is in the West whether these drugs should be allowed or not. It is allowed to have tobacco, drink, why not also allow this. The scientists, the doctors have not examined as yet fully, though they have up to a point, that marijuana does affect the brain cells greatly. You understand? The brain cells toxically are infected by marijuana as well as LSD. They are discovering what tremendous damage it does to the brain. They will examine it much more, they will establish it and they will say it does damage it, like smoking cigarettes does harm to the lungs, that's obvious, and yet we go on smoking.

Q: Alcohol.

K: No, alcohol is a different matter. Wait sir, go slowly, go slowly. If you take a little of it - I don't take any of these things, so I am not advocating one or the other - if you take a little of it, it may help perhaps a little to stimulate, very little, sir. Don't object to this, look at it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Of course, of course, we know this. But to allow children at the age of 15, 14, 13, 12, 16 or 18 to take drugs, to buy them - you follow? See what happens, it gradually destroys their brain. Haven't you noticed that people who take drugs, and I have unfortunately, or fortunately have come into contact with a great many of them in the West, they can't reason, they are not responsible. I won't go into all that. Let the doctors go into it and then you will all accept it.

Q: Sir, may I ask you one thing. Even though I know in America drugs are illegal, it seems to me that the whole pattern of life is encouraging people to take drugs.

K: Of course, of course. So there is this whole miserable state - children, the students, the parents. Now what is education? Is it to prepare the children, the students, to conform to the pattern established by the old order; or is education meant to create a totally different kind of human being? Please, sir, answer.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, sir, we are going to find out, don't state anything, you are not enquiring then.

Q: It is more in the sense of learning, not acquiring.

K: Wait, wait, madam. You refuse to go step by step, and we all jump ahead. So how can we, grown-up people and fairly advanced students, how can we change all this? You understand? What is our responsibility? You have no answer, have you? You would rather theorize about all this rather than really finding out what to do.

So what is education and what is learning? What is the acquisition of knowledge and freedom? What is learning, and can such a mind that is always learning, conform to any particular pattern of society? I am doing all the talking, I wish you would discuss this matter.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right sir. Killing animals for food. Don't take one little thing, take the whole thing.

Q: And intolerance.

K: Of course, the intolerance.

Q: And violence.

K: Of course.

Q: It is my opinion that education as understood formally is entirely wrong. We have to bring up our children and let them have the opportunity to be new human beings.

K: Sir, that's what I am saying. I am asking how, seeing things as they are now, the intolerance of the long-haired ones or the short-haired ones, the intolerance of the people who eat meat for the vegetarians, who don't eat meat, those who say vegetarianism is like a filthy creeping disease that is spreading all over the world, and so on and on and on. Seeing all this, the wars, the intolerance, the division between people, between the parents and children, the misery, the divorce - you follow sir, all that, don't just take one thing.

Q: We should abolish centralized authority.

K: Sir, all that is involved in this. You may abolish centralized authority but you have your own authority, over your wife, over your children, you have the authority of the guru. So we have to understand the problem totally, sir, not just one part of it, not one fragment of it. Our culture has broken up life into fragments and we look at one fragment and whine over that fragment and discard the rest, or be totally indifferent, or intolerant of the rest. So please consider the whole problem. Now what are we to do?

Q: Stop.

K: He says, just stop.

Q: We have to stop.

K: Wait a minute. Will you stop being intolerant, stop killing animals for your food, stop taking drugs, stop smoking? You see, you won't do it.

Q: If you are aware of what is going on.

K: You are aware of what is going on, not "if we can be aware". Why aren't you aware when the house is on fire?

Q: If you see fire you put it out.

K: Don't take up one thing sir, look at the whole problem. You think in terms of fragments, that's what we are trying to do, to prevent you from thinking in fragments. There is this whole problem, so complex, so divided, so contradictory, don't take one fragment and with that beat the rest of the fragments. Because you don't drink don't curse anybody who drinks. It all becomes too silly. So take the whole problem, and as human beings, concerned with their children, with society, with what is happening, what are you going to do? The gentleman suggested, stop. Will you stop? Stop sending your children to war?

Q: Try to resist propaganda.

K: But accept another propaganda.

Q: If I can see all the things that have conditioned me, I won't impose that on another.

K: That's all. So what are we to do, sir, how are you going to educate, teach, the new generation that will create a different society, not this thing. You see you don't answer.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, look: you want to create a new generation, a generation that will not think in fragments. Right? Like our society thinks in fragments, we want to create a generation that does not think in fragments, that looks at the whole of life, not just their job, their little family, their little sex, their little children, but the whole of life. Right? Now how can we do that? That is education, isn't it?

Q: Teach the reality of things.

K: Do you know it? You see, the vanity of the parents - teach them the reality. What do you know about reality, when you are fragmented, when you are battling with your husband, or your wife, when you are seeking money, position, prestige, acting selfishly?

Q: I would eliminate the impact of society because, myself first. I can defy the impact.

K: Sir, do you do it, do you do it?

Q: Sir, as we are we cannot do it.

K: Yes, sir, you can do everything. We can't wait until we reach perfection.

Q: Once you start out, like myself, with perceptions but my body goes on in the same pattern.

K: That's what I am telling you, sir. Please go into this with me. Sir, first see there is this whole picture of life. We are responsible for it. Right? Each one of us is responsible for this awful mess in the world - in education, in every way, in our relationship with each other, with the misery, the suffering of it all, we are responsible. Now we are asking: how is it possible to educate the coming generation in a different way? Have I to wait - please listen to this - have I to wait until I am free of my conditioning, free of all my problems and become perfect and then teach the children? Or - please listen - or in the very act of teaching of the children I discover my own imperfections and correct them as I go along? Will you do that? No, you are all asleep.

Q: You need to know the actions of life, the essence of a human being.

K: Sir, we have to know the essence of life. Now who is going to tell you the essence of life?

Q: We can't ask a leader.

K: Therefore what will you do?

Q: Find out for ourselves.

K; That's what we are doing now.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, sir, I have been connected with several schools - two in India, one in the north and one in the south. I go there every year and spend about three weeks to a month talking to the students, to the teachers, practically every day discussing. The parents want their children to get a job, that's the only thing they are concerned with. See the problem of this. Overpopulation, and jobs are awfully difficult to get. And during these thirty, forty years that I have been talking to them, they all sit round me on the floor, we discuss for an hour, they say, "You are quite right sir, what you say is perfectly true, thank god you are leaving in a month's time and we can go back". Because the pressure of life is so strong, the tradition is so heavy, and they say, "Lovely to hear what you are saying, what you say is perfectly true, but..." We are connected with a school in California, that's gone. There is a school in England, we are trying to build it up. Now what is a teacher, what is a parent, what are you to do seeing all this?

Q: Sir, is it possible to allow, to create an environment where one can go beyond oneself?

K: Listen to that question. Is it possible to create an environment which will help you to go beyond yourself? All the religions have tried to do this with their monasteries. Right? The communist society, which worships the State, said, go beyond yourself, the State is more important. But the 'me' operates all the time - in the monk, in the commissar, in the politburo, in Mao, everywhere. So we say, create the atmosphere. Now who is going to create it?

Q: Sir, hang on. I didn't say that. Remove the false relationship between the student and the teacher.

K: That's what we are trying to do, to remove that false relationship. Then what happens? Then the student who has been free to do what he likes says, "You have become authority" - if you correct him.

Q: Why do people have children at all?

K: Don't ask me.

Q: In spite of the problem, because you posed a question, one of the questions was why do people have children at all.

K: I asked that, sir, because I want to find out - the parents who have children, what responsibility they have towards the children. What responsibility have I if I have a child, a girl, a boy, what is my responsibility? Am I going to educate them to send to these monstrous schools - you follow - in which nobody is concerned about anybody else, they are only concerned with themselves, you know, all the rest of it. What is my responsibility?

Q: Sir, if you...

K: Sir, answer my question: what is my responsibility as a parent?

Q: Show them how to live.

K: Do you do that if you feel responsible? You know what responsibility means? I feel tremendously responsible sitting here talking to you, and I really mean it. And when I go to these schools, face them, you know crying, I'd do anything. I feel so tremendously passionate about all this.

So what is my responsibility towards a child whom I have begotten? And do I want him to fit into the society?

Q: Sir, if I see that dealing with my child, or friend, I play on their fears...

K: Sir, I am asking you, you are not answering my question.

Q: I don't do it. I don't make them dependent on me, I don't...

K: Sir, would you mind answering my question first.

Q: I teach them how to learn.

K: Not 'how'.

Q: We can't only be responsible for our own children.

K: Sir, begin with your children, that's good enough. If you love your children, you will expand the whole thing. I am asking a question, please hold a minute. You have children, either grown-up, married and put away, or you have children now, students, young people, what is your responsibility towards them? Wait, sir, please, give me two minutes, will you. What is your responsibility? Do you feel responsible? Not financially - of course, send them to school, give them food, clothes, I am not speaking of that responsibility, of that kind, but much more deeply. What is your responsibility towards them? Do you want them to be like you? Wait. Do you want them to conform to the society in which we have been living?

Q: No.

K: Wait, you know what it means? Do you want them to take drugs, do you want them to have sex at the age of thirteen, fourteen? Do you want them to become wandering people all over the earth - there are twenty thousand so-called hippies in India. I am asking what is your responsibility?

Q: Sir, isn't it possible that many of us are asking the question, what should our responsibility be, rather than being very honest in getting at the way it actually is. Most of us are very, very dishonest.

K: I am saying that, sir. I don't want to use the word 'dishonest'. I am saying what it is now, actually? If you can't face that you can't face anything else. You become dishonest.

Q: You have got to find out what responsibility is.

K: Sir, not what it is to be responsible, then you have the picture of what it is to be responsible, and try to conform to that picture, but actually do you feel responsible? You know what that word means? To your children.

Q: We don't want our children to grow up like us.

K: Please, madam, you are not answering my question. Please stick to my question. Do you feel responsible?

Q: I should try to...

K: Madam, that's not my question. Answer please my question. If you feel responsible for your children, how does that responsibility show?

Q: You let them make their own decisions.

K: They are doing it. Sir, you are not answering my question.

Q: I feel the responsibility when I am with my children, that responsibility is that I feel completely in despair when I am with them.

K: Be honest, for god's sake. Don't let us imagine.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, please. I would feel responsibility if I had a child, a son or daughter - thank god I haven't got either - if I had one I would feel responsible. I would want to know what they are doing. I want to see how they walk, how they dress, how they talk, how they eat, what are they thinking about, what company they keep - you follow, I am responsible, I want to find out - not tell them, don't do this, do that, become this, become that, I want to see what is happening in their mind.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please, I am asking one question, you are saying something else.

Q: We must listen to them.

K: We must, we should - everything is that you are not responsible. If you feel responsible then you are open, then you are watching, then you are listening, you are caring.

Q: But we are not like that. We don't see what we are.

K: No, I am sorry, you are not answering my question, you are saying, don't be like us.

Q: What about ourselves, sir.

K: No, I have asked you before, what do you say about this? You kept quiet. I am asking you - your question will be answered when you answer this question - do you feel responsible? If you feel responsible you will see that there is no war, you will not allow your children to be destroyed. For god's sake what human beings you are.

Q: Even though I feel responsible I can't do anything about it. Governments ask that your children be sent to schools.

K: Madam wait. Governments ask that your children be sent to schools, they form a gang, you know the whole thing begins. Right?

Q: The only thing to do, as far as I understand, is to be in right relationship with them.

K: Are you in right relationship with your husband, with your wife, with your children? Of course not. We said we must be, we should teach them, don't be like me.

Q: Sir, I think it is part of responsibility for the children to feel responsible too.

K: I know that, that is part of the game. The parents depend on their children, use them as toys and all the rest of it. Please, you are just avoiding the issue.

Q: If I had children I'd want to know where they come from.

Q: Sir, I would have thought that the parents themselves are responsible for their children, and that is a reflection on the parents.

K: The children are the embodiment of their parents. If that is so, even then I say to myself, if I have children, what is my responsibility? There is war, there is conscription, draft, children like to conform - long hair, short hair, worship Jesus revolution, Jesus freaks, they like to conform. That's what Hitler, Stalin, Mussolini did, conform, make the children - you know, all the rest of it, put on uniforms, march - that is part of the parents. Now seeing all this, all the picture, not just your picture, or my picture, all this picture in the world, what am I to do with my children? Yes sir?

Q: My responsibility is to be totally free of the world.

K: Seeing this whole picture, shall I cry for the rest of my life, get terribly depressed, in despair? I can't do it, it isn't in my blood to get depressed about this thing. So I say to myself, what is my responsibility - there is war, there are drugs, in education there is no learning at all but merely cramming knowledge, which is necessary, and there is no learning about life, the beauty of life, the extraordinary thing that lies beyond thought and all the rest of it, what is my responsibility?

Q: If my mind is fragmented, conditioned, then it is not possible to do anything.

K: That is so sir. But I am asking you, you have children, what will you do with them?

Q: Love them.

K: You love them, you say. Do you love them? If you love them will there be war, will you send them to war? If you love them will you allow them to take drugs? Not 'allow' - you understand? See that they don't take drugs.

Q: Grow with your children.

Q: Our responsibility towards them is to show them that responsibility is in both directions.

Q: Sir, what do all these answers tell you about us?

K: They tell me very simply that you don't face facts.

Q: My responsibility is to talk the whole thing over with my children, to live with them.

K: Sir, just take a simple thing. There is war. There is conscription - in France, in England, not there, in America, conscription. Now what will you do as a parent?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Face it, sir, what will you do?

Q: We have to die psychologically to all this.

K: You are not dead, you have to. I am not interested in what you are going to do. I am asking you what you will do now.

Q: Change myself.

K: You have been talking about changing yourself for the last forty years. Will you change?

Q: Don't tell us the answer. We should go away and try to find out.

K: I am going to show you. Take one fact: what am I to do with my child, boy, who is growing up, who is going to be eighteen, and so on - he is going to be conscripted, sent to war. What shall I do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What am I to do? How am I to teach him, or help him to understand to extraordinary thing to kill somebody?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Are you doing that with your child? Are you doing that with your child? Will you do it with the child? Please see what it means sir: to show your child not to kill.

Q: But when they grow up they are doing the same thing to animals as they are to human beings. They see how animals treat each other, how we treat animals, and that is all instilled in them. Maybe it is impossible for us to change this - what can we do?

K: That's just it. I am asking.

Q: Can you tell us what to do, and what we shouldn't do?

K: Can you - please listen to the question - can you tell me what to do or what not to do?

Q: Obviously you can't tell us.

K: All right sir, I'll show it to you in a minute. When you stop yelling at me and giving me explanations, and not facing the facts. Here is a fact: I have got a child, I have got a son. I think I love him. I want him to grow up to be a totally different being than this modern generation - what am I to do?

Q: Listen to him very carefully and go with him as far as he is willing to go.

K: But he is not going to listen to you because we have no relationship with him. I have been saying that.

Q: I have to have so much love that he will listen.

K: Sir, if you have no love then you are a lost soul, then why do you have children? Having children, what am I to do? You are not facing the problem. I have a child, a son, who is growing up. I want him to be a totally different kind of human. Just listen sir. I want him to be a totally different kind of man, not aggressive, not violent, not frightened, not conforming, living in a totally different dimension. I want him there, that's my love for him. Right? My love for him is not to teach him what he should do, but he should grow up to be a human being totally different from the rest of the gang. Right? Now how am I to do it?

Q: Sir...

K: Wait sir. You haven't even listened to what I have said. What am I to do? I see that the other children with whom he runs and plays, their parents are not concerned about this. See the difficulty sir. Their parents are not interested, so this boy, my son, goes and joins that group, and he begins to conform, he comes home already changed slightly. Haven't you noticed it? Day after day his face changes. No? Up to fourteen he is an angel, beyond that he becomes - you know what he becomes. So what am I to do? The government says, you must send him to school, educate him in the pattern. So what am I to do? How am I, who want him to be totally different, different not in a reactionary sense, totally different, a revolution that is different, psychologically above all this stupid horror. And I see what is happening. So when he comes home I have to talk to him. Right? I say, look, you are conforming. Discuss with him, talk with him, but have I the time? I have been working in the office all day, being insulted, conforming, being bullied, you follow, and I come home tired. And the wife has her job, her career, because she loves careers, the Women's Lib - you know that. And she hates the house. So she comes home tired. And I have no time with the child, nor the mother. So the tendency is for the child to conform to the pattern set by the elder generation. And my desire, my love for him is destroyed because I can't do anything. Right?

So I say now, what am I to do? So I say, I will not go to clubs. Right? No bridge, I am going to spend my life looking after that boy, although I have to go and earn a livelihood. You won't do that because you want to go to clubs, you want to have your hair curled, you want to be fashionable, you want to be - you know all the monstrous things, and yet you say, "I am responsible". So you won't give up one thing and yet you say you love your children. No, sir. And if you loved your children do you think you would have wars?

Q: You must teach the child to learn about himself.

K: Are you learning about yourself? You may want to teach your child about himself, which means are you learning about yourself, how you dissipate your life, how you indulge in life, how you drink, gossip, waste energy.

Q: Sir, as I sit here I realize that I am not responsible and that brings me to a tremendous stop.

K: That's right. First face the fact that you are not responsible. So if each one of us in this tent really did, do you know what we could do? If each one of us felt responsible we would form schools, we would sacrifice, we would sell our jewels, not sit comfortably back and say, "Oh, we must teach our children to be different" - you know all the things. So it is up to you sirs.

So all this shows that we don't feel responsible. And that's why the coming generation is like us, only with longer hair, equally unhappy, discontented, trying to identify themselves with something, or with themselves, saying, "I must be myself" - I don't know what that means. So they will be like us when they grow up - confused, unhappy, uncertain, tremendously caught up with their own misery, and their children will be like them. Socrates, I am told, in 500 BC complained about the children - how that they were rude, how they didn't behave, how they were concerned with themselves, with their looks, with their sex, and we are still doing exactly the same. Right?

So sirs, you have listened to the speaker for an hour, or more, do you feel responsible at the end of it? Don't answer me. You know to feel responsible means you have to change your whole way of life. Which means you are not concerned about yourself but about the child. You know love means that, love means the concern for another. You know when you plant a small tree you look after it, don't you, you water it, you protect it against the sun and the wind. And the child needs security. You don't give him security. You have no relationship with him. He becomes as confused as you are, and he does wild things, he becomes violent.

So can we, listening to something that is true, change our whole way of living and be totally concerned with the child?

ROME PUBLIC TALK 31ST OCTOBER 1971

If I may I'll first talk a little and then perhaps you will be good enough to ask questions.

I wonder what you would like me to talk about, because we seem to have so many problems in the world, and also personally. Vast superficial, circumstantial changes are taking place. Technology has gone so rapidly ahead bringing about a great change in that field. And human beings throughout the world are caught in violence, in confusion, and a great deal of sorrow. One observes, looking at all this phenomenon in the world one realizes there must be a great revolution, not physical revolution of killing each other, destroying a particular system and setting up a new one, or destroying a particular way of thinking, but a revolution that is total, deeply psychological so that a human being is totally changed, not only in his way of thinking, but also in his actions. This is, I think, fairly obvious to any one who is observing or seeing or in contact with what is actually happening. There are wars, there are the division in religions, in superstition, and there are nationalistic, economic, social divisions and injustice. There is poverty, perhaps not so much in the western world but in the east, there is vast confusion, lack of food, the degradation of great poverty. So any person who is at all responsible, who is at all aware of what is happening in the world, must surely ask himself what he can do as a human being, not along a particular system of thought, or according to any belief, or to any nationalistic end because systems of thought have not brought about peace to man. Please do listen to all this seriously, if you will. Systems of belief, ideals, have not brought man together, on the contrary they have divided people. Systems of ideological concepts in the east and in the west, whether it is communist ideology, or a Catholic ideology or a Christian ideology have not brought peace to man. On the contrary they have brought wars, conflict.

So if there is to be a fundamental revolution, as there must be, it doesn't lie along a particular system of thought, nor does it lie according to any particular formulation or concept. Because all our concepts and our particular points of view are conditioned by the culture in which we live, in which we have grown up. So the culture conditions thought, conditions our behaviour, and our culture whether in the east or in the west, has conditioned man, and he behaves according to a certain pattern. Now either of these two, a system of thought, or acting according to a particular conditioning, have not solved our problems. I think again that is very clear. The modern psychologists, what one has been told, observed and talked to, are concerned with man's behaviour, because man has become more violent, he lives in a permissive society, disregards totally the world as it is, the beauty of the world, and so he is polluting, destroying nature. So the most advanced psychologists are saying, man must be conditioned to behave - please follow this carefully - he must be conditioned through reward and not through punishment. The old religions with all their beliefs, dogmas, superstitions, have made man behave, or forced him to behave according to a pattern of punishment, fear. All religions, yours of this country, or in India, or in Asia, or in the West, are based on the cultivation and the perpetuation of fear. And their behaviour pattern is based on that, reward and punishment. And so there are those who say that man, seeing what he is, his ugly nature, his brutality, his violence, his ambition, his competitive spirit attitude and action which is destroying the world, must be conditioned, shaped, totally so that he establishes a pattern of right behaviour. Which means again subtly establishing a pattern of fear, because he will behave, being conditioned, according to the pattern of reward and not punishment. But when man is seeking perpetually reward, behind it there is always the fear of not having. So the patterns are the same, the religious pattern, the cultural pattern and the psychological pattern established, or trying to be established by the psychologists. So that is our problem.

I hope we are communicating with each other. The word 'communication' means to understand each other, to share the problem with each other, to think together, not accepting or rejecting but to think together, and therefore share. The word 'communication' means that.

So that is our problem, how is man, who is so conditioned, logically and illogically, sanely in one direction and insanely in other directions, so conditioned by religions, by nationalism, by his environmental, economic conditions and so on, how is such a man, who is destroying the world, and there is no question about that, polluting the world, destroying the seas and the living things in the water, how is this man, that is you and I, we, how are we to change so that we behave totally differently, behave differently in our relationships? Please, that is the problem. So that we are no longer competitive, we are no longer pursuing our own particular little interests, our own stupid forms of so-called fulfilment. All of that is based on either fear or on the principle of pleasure. So how is a man, we, to behave? Because the world is us, and we are the world. The world isn't something separate from us. We have created, brought about, the present condition in the world, we are responsible for it, with our separative religions, nationalism, wars and all the rest of the horrors that are going on in the world. We are the world, and the world is us. I think that is fairly obvious too, because the world is the culture in which we are born, and that culture shapes us. And having been shaped we act according to our conditioning.

So how is a man who feels responsible, who sees what is going on in the world, the misery, the actual misery, the suffering, the wars, the hatred, the violence - these are not just words, they are actual facts - how is he to change? You understand the problem? Do we see clearly, are we aware of our conditioning, and the results from that conditioning - all the absurdities that are going on in the name of religion, the circus, the utter meaninglessness of it all. Because that is not religion - god is not an idea. Though religions have tried brutally, violently, except perhaps one or two, Buddhism and another - not Christianity - they have tried to bring about a union, a feeling of brotherhood, together, but they have not succeeded, they have separated man more and more and more.

So one observes all this, as you must have observed also if you are at all aware, sensitive, enquiring, utterly serious, because it is only the serious man that lives, not the man who just amuses himself and does what he likes.

So our problem is, will thought bring about a deep psychological revolution? And that revolution is absolutely, urgently necessary. Will thought, on which the whole of the western world, and partially in the east also, the whole culture is based on thought. And thought is measurable. And the social, economic, and psychological structure of the world in which we live is basically measurable because it is the product of thought, logical or illogical.

May I point out in this, a rather interesting problem, issue, which is: the west, all its culture, its religion, is the product of thought - thought is always measurable because thought is the response of memory, memory as knowledge within the brain, the cells, which retain memory. And the east said, measure is an illusion, and we can only find the immeasurable, that is god, whatever you like to call it, not through measurement. Please see the difference between the two: here in the west, the result of thought has produced an extraordinary world - technologically, you can go to the moon, live under the sea, have the most extraordinary machinery, health and so on and so on; in the east, the search for the immeasurable has neglected the whole physical, psychological world. But they employed thought also, so through thought they hope to find the immeasurable. You see the deception. I wonder if you are following all this.

Q: Not really.

K: Not really? All right, I'm glad.

Q: Not very much.

K: Wait a minute. Wait, wait. You see, sir, thought has done marvellous things, and thought can do still more marvellous things, but thought cannot bring about right relationship between human beings. I'm going to show it to you in a minute, have patience. What we are concerned with is human relationship, and therefore in that relationship behaviour. This is a serious talk. One must give one's attention to a problem which is so serious because we are living in a world that has become so utterly mad. One's life has no meaning. The utter waste of one's life, spending years in offices, in factories, and all the circus that is going on in the name of religion, the wars, the things that are going on in this world between man and man, in this relationship. And until that relationship radically changes we shall never any peace, any happiness.

So as we were saying, thought has produced this culture, thought enclosing our feeling also, encased. And thought is very superficial, thought is based on knowledge, experience, which is the past - thought is the past. If you had no past, no knowledge, you couldn't think. You must have knowledge. If you had no knowledge you couldn't go home, you wouldn't know your name, where you live, nothing. So there must be this knowledge, more and more efficient, functioning, based on memory, experience, knowledge and so on. But that same thought destroys relationship. That is, relationship now, as it is, is based on the image which thought has put together in relationship. Isn't it? No? Are we meeting each other? Good. Not really. In our relationship, man, woman, boy, friend, whatever it is, in our relationship, knowledge becomes the image, the image put together by thought. It is so simple, let's get on with it. Between a man and a woman the relationship is based on the knowledge of each other. That knowledge is the past. If I am married, my image of my wife is based on all the things we have lived together, the nagging, you know, the domination, the sense of jealousy, insults - the image I have built about her and she has built about me. We both have images of each other. And the relationship is between these two images, which is the idea, which is thought. And so these images separate people. Right? Images which I have as a Hindu - if I have images, which would be totally absurd in the modern world, or at any time - if I am conditioned in the culture of India, as a Brahmin or whatever it is, I carry that image; and you as a Catholic, Protestant, whatever it is, you have the image of that particular culture. So the division is between these two images. Right?

Q: How do you get rid of them?

K: Wait, wait. First see it, not how to remove them. First see the problem. How thought must function in one direction completely, efficiently, impersonally, and see at the same time how thought destroys relationship.

Thought is not love, love is not an image, or pleasure, sexual or otherwise. So how can thought, which is measurable, and therefore thought cannot ever find the immeasurable. Thought is time; time is division and movement; and through thought we want to establish a different form of behaviour, a different culture, a different way of living. You see the difficulty? We use thought logically, or illogically. It is totally illogical when we are nationalistic, when we have certain beliefs, that you believe in god and I don't believe in god, one is a communist, one is a socialist, a division created by thought, which divides man.

So our problem then is how to live together, and act together, living together means acting together, having tremendous knowledge of the world as it is, and using that knowledge most efficiently without the division of nationalities, beliefs, your god, my god, your idol and my idol, all that rubbish. To let that knowledge function efficiently, and at the same time in our relationships to see how thought destroys relationship. You see the problem? Thought is necessary in one direction, completely and most effectively, and in relationship thought has no place at all. Now is this possible? Is this possible, that is, is it possible for knowledge of the world which we have acquired through centuries, through science, biology, archaeology, and mathematics, tremendous store of knowledge, which is the accumulation of thought in experience, using that knowledge to bring about a different world physically so that there is no nationalities, no divisions as the Muslim, the Hindu, their wars, their absurdities, their grotesque superstitions. So that physically, outwardly we live together differently, so that there is no division. Because the moment there is division there is conflict: if you are a Catholic and I am a Protestant there is division, and therefore there is conflict; if I am communist and you are something else, there is conflict. To see that, and to use thought so completely efficiently so that we can arrange a world in which human beings can live without wars, without hate, without division, without competition. And that is only possible when we understand how thought destroys relationship.

Now how can the mind prevent the formation of an image between two human beings? You are following this? You have an image about your wife and your friend, and she has an image about you and her friend - image, which has been built together by companionship, by various encounters, intimacy and all that. These images actually prevent relationship, don't they? If I have accumulated knowledge and images about you, and I am acting according to that image, then there is no relationship between you and me. So how can the mind prevent the formation of images? How can the mind prevent the machinery which builds images? Right? We are following this? So that I am no longer a Hindu, no longer a Muslim, no longer having a division between myself and you. Now how is this possible? That's your problem too, isn't it. Right? How do you propose to prevent the machinery that builds images? Do please let's think about it together, otherwise you will just hear it and it will have no meaning. But if you apply your mind, your energy, your attention, that is, examine together, you can only examine together when the problem becomes really intense, otherwise you play with it, verbally or superficially. And this is an intense problem, and unless we understand this we are destroying the world.

So how do you answer this? Or you escape from it?

Q: Through meditation.

K: Wait, sir, I'll come to meditation. This is a problem, sir, if you understand this problem we can go further into it, what meditation is.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, listen, please do listen to this, we will answer all the questions a little later. Do please pursue this line of thought, give your attention to this, not meditation, whether Christ exists, or something or other, but go into this first. How am I, knowing thought must function efficiently in one direction, impersonally, nonsuperstitiously, not according to nationalities and all the rest of it, there it must function most extraordinarily; and I also see how thought destroys relationship. Now how am I to bring about harmony - you understand? - functioning with complete objective action and also living a life in which there is no image-making at all?

First of all, is this possible? Wait, don't say, it is not possible. If you say that you block yourself; or if you say, it is possible, you block yourself also. But whereas if you begin to examine it, enquire into it, then you will find out the right answer. Now that's what we are doing, we are enquiring into it, which means the mind must be free to enquire. Right? Otherwise you can't enquire. If you are tethered to a particular belief, particular attitude of fear or pleasure, then you can't examine. So the mind to be able to examine must be completely free to enter into the examination. Look: I want to find out if there is god, I want to find out if there is, or if there is not. Which means, I must have no fear, I must put away all the thought, the structure of what the religions have said, be free to find out, not according to my pleasure or fear, but to find out if there is such a marvellous thing in life, something totally sacred, not invented by the mind. Which means I must put everything that man has invented aside, everything man has put together through thought, what god is or what god is not. That means I must stand completely alone to find out. In the same way, to find out how, to find out, to examine, the mind must be free. Therefore the mind must be free from fear. Right? Otherwise it can't examine. And also the mind must be free from this whole principle of pleasure because all our morality, all our social behaviour, everything, even the enquiry and the worship of what you call god is based on pleasure and fear.

So can the mind understand that pleasure is not love. And the pursuit of pleasure, whether it is the noblest pleasure or the ordinary pleasure of sex, having possessions, you know, attachments, all the rest of it, the pleasure principle - when you pursue the pleasure principle you must at the same time have fear. The two go together. That's obvious, isn't it. Yes? So I don't have to go into that. So the two go together, pleasure and fear. And the mind must understand pleasure, which is entirely different from joy, from ecstasy, from delight, from the enjoyment of something beautiful. And that enjoyment is not pleasure. Pleasure is the pursuit of an enjoyment which is over. Right? I enjoyed the sunset, and thought says, 'I would like to repeat that sunset' - over and over and over again, sexually, in different ways. So pleasure is the product of thought. Please follow all this. And also the fear is the product of thought - fear of what might happen, fear of death, fear of losing, or repetition of physical pain and so on, which is always thought thinking about the past or the future. So thought cultivates pleasure and fear. And to enquire into this question, whether thought - enquire whether the mind can be free from image, not only the image between two people, but altogether the structure of image-making. To enquire in that there must be freedom from the pursuit of pleasure and fear. Right, is this clear? Oh, I don't know. It doesn't matter, I'll go on.

So the mind sees this problem, all of this problem, not just one side of it, the whole of it; to see is to be attentive, isn't it. If you are not completely attentive you can't see it. You may see one part of it, and neglect the other part, or you may see one particular interest that appeals to you. In attention there is no centre from which you are attending, there is only attention. Now when there is that attention the image-making will never be formed. Right? If I am attending when you insult me, or flatter me, or dominate me, or this, or that, in that state of attention, because in that attention there is no centre as the 'me' which is attentive, there is only attention, in that state of attention there is no image-making at all. Right? Now what does this attention mean?

Now the gentleman asked, what is meditation. You see, meditation is not the control of thought. Right? Because when there is control of thought there is an observer who wants to control it. Right? There is a controller. So there is division between the controller and the controlled. In that division there is conflict. Because thought has created the controller who thinks he is different from the controlled, so the controller is the controlled. Right? So meditation is not the control of thought, but the understanding of the whole structure of thought - where it is important, where it is not important. So attention comes naturally and easily when you see the whole structure of living, your living, not somebody else's living. When you are totally aware of your activities, of your thoughts, of your behaviour, attentive, in which there is no effort to correct. I wonder if you see this. Because if you correct your behaviour, who is the corrector, who is the entity that says, this is good, this is not good, this must be changed, and that must not be changed? That observer is created by thought, isn't it. So thought divides itself as the observer and the observed. When I am angry at the moment of anger there is no observer, there is only a state of anger. A few second later the observer comes into being, says, 'I have been angry, I am so sorry, I should not have been angry', and all the rest of it. So thought divides. Right?

So a man who would live totally differently must understand the whole nature and structure of thought. Thought is measurement. And if we live only at that level, then our life is shallow, meaningless. You can go to the moon and kill each other, it has no meaning. Or go to the office everyday for the next forty years - just think of it! And that's our civilization, our culture, and we accept it. And if we are released from this activity everyday of going to the office, we die. All this has got to be changed radically. And to change it we must understand the whole structure of thought. Which is, to understand it, the structure of thought is yourself. And to observe yourself as part of the world; and if you observe as a Hindu, a Muslim, communist, socialist, or a Catholic, then you divide yourself. And in this division there is conflict. Whereas if you observe without the observer - you follow? - to observe without the observer, then there is a relationship in which there is love. Love is not pleasure. Love is not desire. It is something entirely different. And you can find it only when you understand the whole business of pleasure and fear.

Then there is this whole problem of the relationship between the measurable and immeasurable. Because we live now in the world of measurement, and that world of measurement has invented gods. Have you ever noticed how your belief, your gods, your saviours, have become your inner life, how they, the outer has become the inner. You understand? All right, I'll show it to you.

Suppose I was born as a Buddhist, or a Muslim, from childhood I have been told that there is god, or no god. The belief of god from outside has been put into me, and that belief has become a reality. You follow? And that reality is merely superficial, a result of propaganda of two thousand years or ten thousand years, and I accept that as reality. Which is the reality imposed from the outside. And to find out reality I must reject this principle of from the outer to the inner. I don't know if you follow all this. So I must find out a relationship between the outer and the inner which is not the result of the propaganda. You get it?

And also there must be harmony between love, death and living. Because our living is a torture, our living now is conflict, to which we cling desperately. And inevitably there is death, which is the tomorrow. So there is thought, which has created this awful mess in which we live, and thought says, I cannot let this go because I don't know what will happen. So I accept, thought accepts the misery, the confusion, the wars, the hatred, that is called living. And within that pattern we change a little bit here and there, socially, you know all the tricks one plays. And inevitably there is death, and so there is fear. So we don't know how to live, and we don't know how to die. If we knew how to live, which is to live without conflict, and to live without conflict you must die everyday. And in that there is love. This is living.

So one must find harmony between the living, dying and what is love. Then in this, the quality of the mind is entirely different. Then it lives in a different dimension which is not measurement.

Right, now we can ask questions.

Q: Living brings about conflict.

K: Obviously.

Q: Can it be without fear?

K: Madame, you think living necessitates conflict?

Q: In a way, it must, conflict is there.

K: Must we? No, madame, that's what we have been saying.
Conflict is there. Yes. And you accept conflict?

Q: Yes.

K: Therefore find out how to change it.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What are you saying, madame? Are you saying conflict is necessary?

Q: It is there.

K: It is there. That's what we have been saying all this morning.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I think both are the same, aren't they: if I have no fear I have no conflict.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, madame, let me be clear. First of all, 'what is' is the fact. The fact is we live in conflict. Conflict in our relationship with the outer, and conflict with the inner. We are perpetually in conflict, both outwardly and inwardly. That's a fact. Because conflict implies division. Right? Division - I believe and you don't believe, my opinion and your opinion is different. So where there is division there must be conflict. Right? Now how can this division end? It can only end when the mind is aware of its conditioning as a Hindu, Buddhist, whatever it is. And to be free of the centre which is the accumulative factor of greed, envy and all the rest of it. So as long as there is a division there must be fear and conflict. That's what we have been saying all the morning. And is it possible to live without fear? Right?

Q: Sir, what is fear?

K: I am going to sir, we'll discuss it. What is fear?

Q: Do you support the World Federation and organizations?

K: Oh, do you support World Federation. Oh, madame. First we are answering the question what is fear. And we are going off on somebody asking do I support World Federation. Look: when I am afraid, I won't support anything, though I pretend to support. I pretend a great deal, I become dishonest, hypocrite when there is fear in me. I'll support world movements, all the outward things - that doesn't change man. What changes man is to live without fear. Now is it possible to live without fear? What is fear? Take facts as they are, not an idea, not a theory, not your opinion or my opinion - because I don't indulge in opinions, that is the most silly form of thinking. What is fear? First of all, what are we afraid of? Fear doesn't exist by itself, it is in relationship to something. I may be afraid of the dark, I may be afraid of what public opinion says, I may be afraid of losing my job, I may be afraid of my wife, husband, I am afraid of so many things - aren't you? I am not, I am saying, go into it.

So what is fear? Do you know you are afraid? Please, sir, go into it. You asked a question, what is fear.

Q: I'm not at this moment.

K: Do you know you are afraid, first of all. Not at this moment perhaps. Either you are afraid consciously, knowing what you are afraid of consciously, or you are afraid of things you don't know about - unconscious. So there are conscious fears and fears of which you are not acquainted with. Right? Hidden fears and open fears. Do we go into this? Please do it, not verbally accept anything, go into it.

There is the fear outwardly of physical pain: one has had physical pain a week ago and you don't want it to happen again - the fear of happening again. Take a very simple example: there has been a fear of physical pain which happened a month ago, I don't want it repeated. Now at the moment of pain I act, don't I. There is some action. And when it is healed thought says, I mustn't repeat it again, it mustn't happen again. Right? Please listen to this - there has been an experience of pain which has left a mark on the brain as memory, and that memory says, don't let it happen again, I am frightened. So thought brings fear. Right? Superficially. There has been physical pain, and I don't want it repeated and I am frightened, because that incident of pain has left a mark, the memory, and the reaction of that memory is fear. Right, is that clear?

Psychologically, inwardly, one has hurt another, and you don't want that hurt repeated, therefore there is fear. Right? So thought is the means, or is the instrument of fear. Right? As thought is the instrument of pleasure. Of course, obviously. So thought is the instrument of pleasure, and thought is the instrument of pain, fear - consciously or unconsciously. Then there is the whole question of hidden fears, unconscious, deep rooted fears inherited through the environment, through culture, through the race, through family, you know, the stored up fears. Now how is one to be free of all that? If you are interested, if you are aware, if you want to go very deeply into it, because a mind that lives in fear cannot possibly look at life clearly, its life becomes distorted. All your religions are a distortion. So can the mind, the conscious mind examine the hidden, unconscious fears? You understand my question? Go on with me, please. If you are tired, let's stop. Can the conscious mind, as it can examine conscious fears, can that conscious mind examine the unconscious, the unconscious, deep, secret fears? Can it?

Q: No.

K: Wait, don't say, no. You are too quick!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madame, I have explained it just now. I want to go into this, please, let's go into this. Unconscious fears, now how are they to be exposed? You understand my questions? How are they to be exposed so that I can look at them, put them away, the mind can be free of them? Will dreams expose them?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait! I am asking a question madame, you can't say, yes. That has no meaning. Can a conscious mind expose the contents of the unconscious? Can it expose it through dreams? And what are dreams? Are not dreams the continuation in symbolic form, in a manner which needs interpretation, of your daily movement? Please think of it, look at it. I live a certain way, with my conflicts, with my anxieties, with my fears, guilt, ambition, competition, hatred, I live that way. And when the mind, the brain goes to sleep, that movement is still going on. And in that movement there are hints, warnings of a different movement. So dreams are the continuation in symbolic form of your daily life. That's obvious, isn't it? No. Look: the unconscious throws up hints, warnings, and you consciously, in the daily living consciously, you don't pay attention to it. And while you are asleep the brain is more or less quiet, more or less, not very quiet, more or less quiet, and these hints become the dreams also. So - please follow all this - so is it possible not to dream at all? Is it possible to examine, or to observe the whole content of the unconscious? And how is this to be done? Consciousness is its content, isn't it? Is this becoming too difficult, too abstract? I'm afraid it is.

Your consciousness, your thinking, your consciousness, is the content of that consciousness. Right? You are attached to your property, to your husband, to your wife, to your children, to your job, you know, attached. You believe, and you don't believe, you believe in this and you know, opinions. But the content is your consciousness. And you are trying to observe that consciousness from the outside. Right? The outside is part of that consciousness, so the observer is the observed. Are you seeing this? Come on!

Q: It appears that you use the word thought in a different way.

K: Thought? I explained it, sir, just now. Thought is the response of memory, memory being experience, memory is the accumulation of knowledge. And thought is the response of that.

Q: Can't it be creative thought?

K: Wait, wait. Let's find out what that word 'creative' means, don't, that's a difficult word. Let's finish this, sir, we'll come back to that.

I am asking whether the mind, which is its content, can the content observe itself without an outside agency observing it? Can the mind become aware of its whole content without the division as the observer? You get it? You will see it can if you are completely attentive.

Q: Our attention is not a hundred per cent.

K: Therefore wait, wait, your attention is not a hundred per cent, why?

Q: Because...

K: No, do look at it sir, don't answer it immediately. Why is your mind not completely attentive? What does attention mean? Does attention mean concentration? No, obviously not. Wait, look at it sir. Attention, we are talking about the meaning of that word 'to attend'. Have you ever given your total attention to anything?

Q: I think so.

K: No, no, you have not. And when do you give total attention - do listen to this, please - when do you give total attention, complete attention? When you are threatened. Right? When there is tremendous danger your complete attention is there. And when there is no danger you slip off.

Q: What is living?

K: Madame, we just now went into that. We are discussing, we are trying to find out what it means to be attentive. You see, we are attentive only when we are frightened, when our particular form of pleasure is taken away, when we lose our money, our position, then we are caught. Now we are saying, be attentive without being caught. That means be interested to find out how to live totally differently. The way you are living is destroying the world, whether you are communists, Catholics, whatever it is, you are destroying the world. And if you want to live differently, to bring about a world that is entirely different, attend to that. Attend completely, give your complete attention to find out a way of living in which there is no conflict, no fear.

Q: How can we find this?

K: Sir, look, I'll show it to you. I'll show you. I am saying something now, and are you listening to it?

Q: No.

K: That gentleman says, no. Are you listening to what is being said? Wait a minute, sir. Are you listening? Examine the word 'listening', what does it mean, to listen? To listen is to be free from distraction. Right? From any kind of judgement, comparison, you are just listening. Are you listening that way?

Q: No.

K: No. Therefore you are not attentive. Therefore you are not interested. It isn't a vital problem to you. To find out a way of living which is entirely different. If you are interested you will listen with your heart, with your mind, with your body, everything. Then you will be passionate, you will be intense. But you are not, because you say, please we want to go on living the way we do, it's too much trouble, we are lazy, or we are frightened, we are this, we are that, and all the rest of it. So you go on. But the moment you are interested, passionate, if your next meal is not coming you are very anxious! You are comfortable bourgeois.

Q: Tell us how to do...

K: I am showing it to you, madame. Wait, wait. Tell us how. Now see what is implied in that question. Tell us how - what does that mean? Tell us a system of doing it. The moment you have a system you become mechanical. And you have reduced life into a mechanical process. That's why you have your gurus, your whole set-up of priests, they tell you what to do. And so you go on living a mechanical life. But whereas if you see it, if you yourself see the problem, see the danger of the way you are living, that very danger will make you act totally. There is no 'how'. For god's sake do realize it. The moment there is a 'how' there is a system, and the practising of it day after day, repetition of some mantras, you know, all that tommy rot. That's not meditation. Meditation is something entirely different. Meditation must begin with the foundation of life, with behaviour. And behaviour means right relationship between man and man, not based on an image. If you have laid the foundation there, then begin. The laying the foundation is part of meditation. Then from there you can go. The mind can go infinitely, immeasurably. But there must be that foundation. And any flight from that foundation is an hypocrisy, is an escape, has no meaning. If you don't know how to behave, if you don't know how to love people, what's the good of your meditating, or running away into some transcendental nonsense?

So there it is.

Q: It is still a concept.

K: Oh, no, what is a concept. Madame, you are saying it is still a concept. Is it? The house is burning, is it a concept? When you have pain, is that a concept? When you are faced with danger, is it a concept? Concept only comes when you avoid the fact of 'what is'. When you are confronted with 'what is', there is no concept. You act, or you run away from it. Concepts exist only when you cannot understand the fact, the 'what is' and try to translate that 'what is' according to the background of your conditioning.

Q: But man has never done this.

K: Man has never done it, therefore is that not a good indication. Man has never stopped killing each other and therefore go on killing? Man has always been frightened, and therefore because he has always been frightened, therefore let it go on? Man has always been aggressive, therefore don't change. Man can't change? I agree, madame, you are saying man has to be put into a condition then he will change. Who is going to create the condition? Man, isn't it, not some outside marvellous agency, man has to create the environment, that means you.

Q: Why does he going to create the right environment?

K: Why is he going to create the right environment - is that it? Are you asking me why he is going to create it? Because he is suffering, he is miserable, he is anxious, he is being destroyed.

Q: How does what you are advocating relate to what Jesus said?

K: Yes, sir I have we understood. What you advocate, attention, how does that relate to what Jesus said. Now wait a minute.

Q: Watch and pray.

K: Yes, watch and pray. Yes, sir, I understand all that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand sir, may I answer the question. What you advocate - first of all I am not advocating anything. Right? I am just pointing out for you to look at, or not to look at. Then what is the relationship of what you are saying, attention, to what Jesus said. You have an authority, the Bible, Jesus, the priest, you have authority. And I have no authority. I don't want authority. Because authority cripples enquiry. Find out, if I rely on the authority of my guru, on Jesus, or on my friend or wife, authority - wait sir, wait sir, wait sir, then I live a life of fear. You know the word 'authority', the meaning of that word, the author, the one who begins something. And if you merely imitate that which has begun then you are merely living a blind life. You may be living the most extraordinary effective life, but it is all within the conditioned life.

So if you would enquire into what is truth, what is beauty, what it is really to live without conflict, the mind must be free from all fear of authority. Obviously.

Q: Can that be done through meditation?

K: Can that be done through meditation? What do you think we have been doing this whole morning? Isn't this part of meditation? Or meditation is something, you go apart and sit quietly, cross-legged and repeat some words, or get into some kind of fanciful stuff. This is meditation. What we have done this morning for me is meditation, because I'm finding out, enquiring, living, laying the foundation so that I will behave properly.

Q: For us Jesus has become an authority. Listening to you, are you not becoming an authority?

K: I understand. For us Jesus has become an authority. Here, listening to you, are you not becoming an authority also. Of course not, because I repudiate - follow this - because the moment you create the speaker into an authority then you are destroying truth.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Then you can pick up any book. You see, why do we need authority? Look at it that way. Why do we need authority? There is the authority of law. You understand? Because in Europe I have to keep to the right side of the road, in England the left side of the road. The authority is the left in England, the authority says, keep to the right in Europe. That is authority. There is the authority of governments. Right? Pay tax, you obey it. Now we are talking about psychological authority. Now why do you want authority, not that people have not created authority, but why do you want it? Because you are frightened, aren't you. You are frightened to go wrong, you like to follow, you like to imitate, you like to conform.

So authority is not there. When you have disorder in you, you create outer as well as inner authority. Right? When there is disorder in you, you inevitably create authority, outside. When there is confusion politically, somebody comes into being and he becomes the authority. You hope he will bring order and you give him authority. But inwardly when you are completely confused, disorderly, you create the authority of someone else whom you hope will give you order. That's so simple. So clear your disorder, then you will be free of all authority inwardly.

I think it is time.

BOMBAY 9TH SMALL GROUP DISCUSSION 29TH JANUARY, 1973 SILENCE AND DISORDER

Questioner: I wonder whether we can talk about silence and how it is reached, or whether silence has many facets and forms. Whether there is only one silence which is absence of thought; or whether silence which arises through different experiences or different situations is different in nature, dimension and direction.

Krishnamurti: Where shall we start this? There are so many things.

Q: What is silence?

K: Are you saying, is there a right approach - right in the sense, we'll describe what 'right' is - to silence? And if there is, what is that first? You started off with that, didn't you?

Q: Yes.

K: And whether there are different varieties of silence, which means different methods by which to arrive at silence, and what is the nature of silence. So, shall we go in that order first? Is there a right approach to silence, - 'right', we'll put it in quotes. What do we mean by 'right'?

Q: Is there the one, or if all silences are of the same nature then there may be many approaches.

K: Yes, but I'm just asking what do we mean by 'right approach'?

Q: That is what I mean by right, the one.

K: The only one.

Q: The one, as against the hundred.

K: Yes, therefore what is the one? What is the true, natural, reasonable, logical, and beyond the logic, what is that approach? Is that it?

Q: I don't know. I would say that when consciousness is not operating, then thought is not operating.

K: I would like to go into it.

Q: That is what is generally understood. We can define silence as the absence of thought.

K: I can go blank, you know, just without any thought, just looking at something and go blank. Is that silence?

Q: How do you know if it is true silence?

K: Let's begin by asking, is there a right approach to silence, and what is that 'right'? And are there many varieties of silences and is silence an absence of thought, which implies in that a great many things, such as 'I can go blank' - suddenly I'm thinking a great deal and I just stop and look at something, and go blank; daydream, vaguely daydream. That's why I would like to approach this question by asking, is there a true approach to silence? You started with that question, I think we ought to take that first, and go into the other things afterwards.

Q: You seem to be taking us to the true approach rather than the nature of true silence.

K: I think so. Because there are those people who have practised silence; controlling thought, mesmerizing themselves into silence, and control their chattering mind to such an extent that the mind becomes absolutely dull, stupid - and silent. So I want to start with the enquiry from this point of right approach. Otherwise we'll wander off. It seems more sane to find out is there a 'right' - again, 'right' is somehow not the word - is there a natural, sane, healthy approach - sanity is healthy - is there a healthy, logical, objective, balanced approach to silence? Right? Could we proceed from that? What is the necessity of silence? I know from what people have told me - and I've talked a great deal about it too, not 'I' but one has talked about it a great deal - what is the necessity for silence?

Q: The necessity for silence is very easy to understand. People, in ordinary day living, have constantly chattering minds, constantly irritated minds, when it comes to a rest there is a feeling of being refreshed, the mind is refreshed, quite apart from anything else. So the silence in itself is important.

Q: And also, even in the ordinary sense, there's no seeing or listening, there is no seeing of colour, there's no seeing of things unless there is a certain quality of silence. That's in the ordinary sense.

Q: And it's true there is a whole tradition that silence is important, is necessary, and therefore in all these systems there is the watching of time ... (inaudible). These are all related.

K: Yes.

Q: It seems to make people make use of the state of silence. It is not an unhealthy state of silence. But there is a state of silence.

K: Suppose you don't know a thing about what other people have said, why you should be silent. Would you ask the question?

Q: Even at the level of the tranquillizer, you would ask the question.

K: So, you asked the question in order to tranquilize the mind. Right? Because the mind is chattering and it's wearisome and exhausting, so you say, is there a way of tranquilizing the mind without the drugs? We know the way of tranquilizing the mind with drugs, but is there another way which will naturally, healthily, sanely, logically, bring about tranquillity to the mind? Right? How do you approach this? How would I, being weary, exhausted by the chattering of the mind, ask myself, can I, without the usage of drugs, quieten the mind? Is there a way of doing it? That's natural, I would ask that. Now, is there?

Q: There are many ways of doing it.

K: Ah, I don't know any way. You all say there are many ways. I come from a land, I don't read, except detective stories and historical books and so on. I come from a land where we don't know any of these things. Right? First hand, I'm talking about. So I say, now, can the mind do this? Can the mind, without effort, because effort implies disturbance of the mind, it doesn't bring about tranquillity, it brings about exhaustion and exhaustion is not tranquillity. It's like a business man, at the end of the day, exhausted, takes a drink, to be quiet, to calm his nerves, and so on. Conflict will not bring about tranquillity. Conflict will bring about exhaustion and the exhaustion may be translated as silence by those who are completely washed out at the end of the day, they say, 'At last, I can go into my meditation room and be quiet'. Right? So, is it possible to bring about tranquillity to the mind without conflict? I would put that question.

Q: Is it possible to bring about tranquility to the mind without conflict?

K: Without discipline, without distortion - all those are exhausting processes.

Q: Sir, this may sound absurd, but when I practice Pranayama there's no conflict in it, but there is silence; it doesn't exhaust you.

What is the nature of that silence?

K: There, you are breathing, getting more oxygen into your system, and the oxygen naturally helps you to be relaxed.

Q: So that is also a state of silence.

K: No, I am not talking of that. I want to find out. We'll discuss the state of silence afterwards. But I want to find out whether the mind can be tranquilized, become tranquil without any kind of effort, breathing, enforcement, control, direction.

Q: The mind asks such a question if it is possible to have tranquillity of the mind without any outside help?

K: No, no, I didn't say outside help. I said, without conflict - please listen, sir - without conflict, without direction, without enforcement, without control, practices of breathing, doing this and ... without any enforcement of any kind, which is, I can take a drug, a tranquillizer and make the mind very quiet. It is on the same level as Pranayama. And I can control the mind and force the mind; my mind can be controlled and I've brought about silence. It is on the same level as breathing, drugs. So I want to start from a point where the mind is agitated, chattering, exhausting itself by incessant friction of thought, and it says, is it possible to be really quiet, without any artificial means? Right? To me that is a central issue. That's how I would approach it if I went into this. I would discard any artificial ... I would consider, if I were investigating, I would consider artificial, control, drugs, breathing ...

Q: Watching the breath.

K: Watching the breath. Watching your toe, watching the light.

Q: Mantras.

K: Mantras. All those are artificial, which induce a peculiar kind of silence. So I would not consider - when I say I, I will use the word 'I' for the moment, with the understanding that K is not emphasising himself. K would consider ...

Q: And would you include the silence induced by nature to this list?

K: Which is all part of it.

Q: Externally.

K: That's it. I would consider all those artificial enforcements in order to induce silence.

Q: Krishnaji, when you look at a mountain you get silent.

K: Ah, wait no. When you look at a mountain what takes place? By the greatness, by the beauty, by the grandeur of the mountain, that absorbs you and makes you silent. That is still artificial.

Q: But that is only nature.

K: Like a child, given a good toy, is absorbed by the toy and for the time being, till it breaks down, he is very quiet. I would consider all those, any form of inducement to silence, to bring about silence, is artificial - for K.

Q: Seeking silence is a motive.

K: I am saying the motive too, the motive is artificial.

Q: Sometimes the bringing about of silence is accidental.

K: I want to find out, sir, whether it is accidental or is there a natural way, without inducement, without motive, without direction, without etc., etc., etc?

Q: Looking at a mountain, though it is a non-duality experience, you then would say, it is not silence?

K: I wouldn't call it silence. Because the thing is so great, for the time being that greatness knocks ...

Q: The absence of the 'me' is there, but the absence of the 'me' is not at the conscious level, but you say is it there? How?

K: Is it there? Look, you see a marvellous picture, a marvellous sunset, an enormous chain of mountains, and it's like the toy with the child. That greatness knocks out the 'me' for the moment and the mind becomes silent. Experiment with it.

Q: Yes, but you say that is not silence.

K: I wouldn't call that silence, because the mountain, the sunset, the beauty of something means, for the moment, the 'me' is pushed aside. And the moment that's gone, I'm back to my chattering or whatever it is. So, I want to be clear that any artificial, a motive, a directional, seems to K that it's a distortion which will not bring about the depth of silence, in which is included practices, disciplines, controls, identification with the greater and thereby making myself quiet, and so on and so on and so on. Then I ask myself, what is the necessity of silence? If it has no motive, would I ask that question?

Q: It is the state of mind that keeps silent.

K: I am not describing the mind.

Q: Not in the sense that ...

K: No, sir, no, sorry. I said, any inducement, in any form, subtle or obvious, I would consider doesn't bring about the depth of great silence. I would consider it as all superficial. I may be wrong. We're enquiring.

Q: That state of mind is already ...(inaudible).

K: Maybe. I don't know. So, what is the natural, healthy approach to tranquillity? Right? What is the natural approach?

Q: But then approach is motivation.

K: No. What is the natural - I won't use that word, even - what is the natural state of tranquillity? How does one come upon it naturally? As we have already said, if I want to listen to what you are saying, my mind must be quiet. That's a natural thing. If I want to see something clearly, the mind mustn't be chattering. That's a natural thing. No? What?

Q: Is it natural or obvious?

K: It doesn't matter which word - natural or obvious. We have used those two words before. We'll use those two words again, natural, obvious. Right? Why do we make - silence is something tremendous ...

Q: In that is all poise, is all sanity.

K: So I would say, the basis for the depth of silence is poise, harmony, between the mind, the body and the heart - division for the moment - great harmony. The setting aside of any artificial methods, including control and all the rest of it. I would said that is the basis, the real basis is harmony.

Q: It doesn't solve anything.

K: Wait, wait. We haven't solved anything.

Q: We've agreed on the word, 'harmony'. What is that?

K: We'll come to that. Therefore I say, this is the basis for silence, for right silence.

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: The whole thing is, I know conflict, I don't know.

K: All right. Therefore don't talk about silence. Deal with conflict, not silence. If there is disharmony between the mind, heart and body, deal with that and not with silence. If you deal with silence being disharmonious, then it is artificial. This is so. Now I am getting at it.

Q: I have an agitated mind.

K: So be concerned with the agitated mind, not with silence. Deal with 'what is', and not with 'what might be'. That comes logically, right. I'll stick to this.

Q: Are you asking, can the agitated mind deal with its own agitation?

K: That's a different question.

Q: She is saying that the agitated mind naturally asks the question, can there be silence.

K: Yes, so be concerned not with silence but why is it agitated?

Q: It can see the opposite state of mind.

K: Ah! That is then an opposite, a conflict, and the opposite has its roots within its own opposite and so on.

Q: Yes, the concept itself is part of the agitation.

K: So I would say, complete harmony is the foundation for the purity of silence.

Q: How does one move to the subjects of silence?

K: Let's go into that ... not into silence. We'll later on come to the question of the varieties of silence. So what is harmony? Right? Go on sirs.

Q: Harmony arises and comes again.

K: I want to find out, what is harmony? Between the mind, the body and the heart, a total sense of being whole, without fragmentation, without the over-development of the intellect, but the intellect operating clearly, objectively, sanely, and the heart, not sentimentally, gooey, emotionalism, outbreak of hysteria, but has a quality in it of affection, care, love, compassion, vitality, and the body has its own intelligence and uninterfered by the intellect or by taste - all that. The feeling everything is operating, functioning beautifully, like marvellous machinery. Even though it's not physically well. This is important. Yes, sir? You were going to say something? No. Now is this possible?

Q: Is there a centre in that harmony?

K: In that harmony is there a centre? I don't know. We're going to find out. Can the mind, the brain, function efficiently without any friction, distortion, and so the mind, the intellect, the capacity to reason, the capacity to perceive, is sharp, clear? And when the centre is there it's not possible, obviously, because then the centre is translating everything according to its limitation. Am I reducing everybody to silence?

Q: Why does this division arise, between the mind, the body ...

K: Arise, because through our education, where emphasis is made on the cultivation of the intellect as memory and reason, as a function apart from living.

Q: That is the over-emphasis on the mind. Even without education, there can be an over-emphasis of emotions ...

K: Of course, that's what I'm saying.

Q: Yes, so ...

K: Man worships the intellect much more than the emotions. Doesn't he? And emotion is translated into devotion, into sentimentality, into all kinds of extravagance of expansions of emotionalism, hysteria and so on, and so on, and so on. We have done this all along. No?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's fairly simple, sir. Why does the brain, as the repository of memory, why does it give such importance to knowledge? Technological, psychological, in relationship, why have human beings given such extraordinary importance to knowledge? I have an office, I've become an important bureaucrat, which is, I have knowledge about doing certain functions. And I become pompous, stupid, dull - why? Why do I give such importance to knowledge? Go on, sir.

Q: Is it the image?

K: No. It's very simple, security, obviously.

Q: To make oneself important.

K: Obviously. Knowledge gives you status. Don't you know bureaucrats, who are fairly high up, all they want is status.

Q: But that doesn't solve anything.

K: No, he asked that question. So, I must come back. Human beings have worshipped knowledge, knowledge is identified with the intellect. Right? The erudition, the scholar, the philosopher, the inventor, the scientist, are all concerned with knowledge. No? And they have created in the world marvellous things; going to the moon, new guns, submarines, Polaris - they have invented the most extraordinary things and the admiration, the sense of the marvel of knowledge, is overwhelming. And we say - we accept it. So, we have developed an inordinate admiration, almost verging on worship, for the intellect. All the sacred books and their interpretations, all that. Correct me, if I'm wrong. And in contrast to that there is a reaction which says, for goodness sake, let's be a bit more emotional about all this; let me have my feelings, I love being stupid, I love, you know. No? Devotion, hysteria, sentimentality, extravagance in expression. All that arises from this. And the body is neglected. You see this.

Q: And therefore Yoga and all that.

K: And practise Yoga to get the body well, and so this division takes place, unnaturally. And now we have to bring about a natural harmony where the intellect functions like a marvellous watch, where the emotions and affections, care, love, compassion, all those are healthily functioning, and the body which has been so spoiled, which has been so mis-used, comes into its own intelligence. So there is that. Now, how do you do it?

Q: I need knowledge.

K: I know, I made that very clear, sir. Don't let me repeat it all over again. I need knowledge, to talk to you in English I need knowledge of English. I don't know any other language in India, so I have to use English; that's knowledge. I have to ride a bicycle; that's knowledge. I have to drive a car; that's knowledge. I have to drive a motor; that's knowledge.

Q: (Inaudible).

K: Yes, yes, yes. That's still within the field of knowledge.

Q: I am concerned with the problem because I have to solve it. I have to solve the problem with disease so I go to knowledge.

K: I say that sir. Knowledge is necessary. But when knowledge is misused by the centre as the 'me' who has got knowledge, and therefore I am superior to the man who has less knowledge, knowledge then I use as a status for myself. I am more important than the poor chap who has no knowledge. I am a bureaucrat, soaked in some stupidity and I ...

Q: If I may say so, we started this discussion with silence, and the various ways in which we arrive at silence. Without dealing with the agitated mind, or the mind in conflict, he has pointed out that unless there is a harmony we cannot have the basis for even questioning or asking what is silence.

Q: Do you not make a distinction between knowledge and history and the new, the discovery of the new?

K: History? Of course, sir. Knowledge ...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sirs, when knowledge - just listen, sir - when knowledge interferes in the discovery of the new, there is no discovery of the new. There must be an interval between knowledge and the new, otherwise you are just carrying on the old.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's all that we are saying, sir. I want to get back. Radhaji asked just now, why is there division between the mind, the heart and the body. We see that; why? Now we say, how is this division to naturally come into deep harmony, naturally? Now, how do you do it? Enforcement? You can't do it. Ideals? Ideal of harmony, therefore I must lessen my intellect, you follow? It becomes too silly. Right? So what shall I do? Go on.

Q: Can I will it, or does it have to come into being by itself?

K: What do you say?

Q: I think I can't will it.

K: So what will you do?

Q: Go into silence.

K: Don't you know, sir - I mean, not you particularly. One is aware of this division, isn't one? Intellect, emotion, and the body, there is this tremendous division between all of them. A gap. How is the mind to remove all this gap, and be a whole mechanism functioning beautifully? What do the traditionalists say?

Q: Effort.

K: Effort.

Q: Only effort. Clench your teeth.

K: Clench your teeth and bite into it, is that it?

Q: You have used the word harmony.

K: Use another word.

Q: That's just it. We had silence and you said we won't touch it.

K: Ah! We won't touch it.

Q: Then we take the word 'harmony', we cannot touch the word 'harmony'.

K: Then what will you do? Why pursue silence?

Q: So we come back to the only one thing we can do - disharmony.

K: That's all. That's all I'm saying.

Q: There is this division.

K: Therefore I say, let's deal with disharmony and not with silence, so when there is the understanding of disharmony, from that may flow naturally silence.

Q: To know that you have ended disharmony totally.

Q: But we haven't come to that.

Q: This morning I told somebody, there is a Latin saying, 'I know what is right, but I don't follow it'.

K: Yes.

Q: There is a mechanism which seems to deny your statement that if you deal with disharmony, harmony is so.

K: Don't bring in something from Latin. Face the thing as is. Pupul says we started out with silence and we said, look it's no good discussing silence until you find out if there is a natural way of coming to it. The artificial way is not - we have been through that - therefore we said, what is the natural way? The natural way is to find out if there is harmony, but we do not know anything about harmony because we are in a state of disorder. So let's deal with disorder, not with harmony, not with silence. With disorder.

Q: I wanted to say that according to our experience the disorder never yields. The disorder remains disorder.

K: We are going to find out, sir. Don't maintain it.

Q: No, I don't maintain it; that's my observation.

K: Your personal observation, of yourself?

Q: My observation of myself. I look and I look and observe and observe the disorder - and disorder looks at me. I look at the disorder and the disorder looks at me.

K: Therefore there is a duality, a contradiction in your observation as the observer, and the observed. A division. We can play with this endlessly. I am asking, sir. Please follow what we have so far discussed. We started out with silence, what is the nature of silence; are there different varieties of silence? Are there different approaches to silence? We also said, what is the beginning of silence, the approach to silence? We said, perhaps there may be a right way - 'right' in quotes. And we said, let's find out. Any artificial means to bring about silence is not silence. Any artificial means, we made that very clear, don't let's go back to that. If there is no artificial way then what is - is it possible to come upon silence naturally, without effort, without inducement, without direction, without artificial means? And in examining it, we said harmony. To that Pupul says, we don't know what this harmony is but what we do know is disorder. So let us put aside everything else and consider disorder, not what silence is. Therefore, a mind that is disordered enquires after silence. Silence then becomes the means of bringing about order or escape from disorder. Silence then is imposed on disorder. As that gentleman said, impose it, or run away from disorder. We stop all that and say, why is there disorder? Is it possible to end disorder? Right?

Q: Disorder expresses itself.

K: I don't know anything about it. I wouldn't say that.

Q: I would say it is a matter of perception. Let's discuss it. Is there any other way it expresses itself?

K: What is disorder? What is disorder in me?

Q: Disorder in me is that when thought arises then I want something.

K: No, No, you are attributing a cause; you are looking for a cause. Give me two seconds. You want to find out what is the cause of disorder. Right?

Q: I don't.

K: No?

Q: I observe the nature of disorder; I don't look for the cause; I don't know the cause; I can never know the cause.

K: You observe disorder, right?

Q: I observe disorder.

K: One observes disorder in oneself, right?

Q: Yes. And I see that it is manifested as thought.

K: I don't know. I would like to go into that a little bit. I observe in myself disorder. Let's go into this very carefully because it's rather interesting. I observe myself in disorder. Why do I call what I observe disorder?

Q: A disturbance is disorder.

K: I just want to go step by step. Please I'm not trying to stop you, Sonaliji, I just want to find out. Why do I call it disorder? Which means I already have an inclination about what order is.

Q: Of course.

K: So, I am comparing what I have experienced, or known as order and thereby call 'what is' disorder. I don't do that. I say, don't do that; don't compare. Just see what disorder is. Can I know, can the mind know disorder without comparing itself with order?

Q: It might not know it is.

K: Wait, sir, I haven't finished; give me two seconds. So, can my mind not compare? Comparison may be disorder - comparison itself may be the cause of disorder. Measurement may be disorder. And as long as I am comparing, there must be disorder. I am a bureaucrat and I am comparing myself to a higher bureaucrat; therefore that is disorder. I am comparing my disorder at the present moment with a whiff of order which I smelt, and comparing and therefore calling this disorder. So I see - I am just looking at it, be a little patient - so I see comparison is really important, not disorder. As long as my mind is comparing, measuring, there must be disorder. Right?

Q: Sir, I look at myself and I see there is disorder because every part of me is pulling in a different direction.

K: I've never felt I'm in disorder.

Q: But we're not talking about K.

K: Wait, I know. I've never felt I'm in disorder. Except rarely, occasionally, when something ... and why? I say to myself, why are all these people talking about disorder? Do they really know disorder? Or you only know it through comparison?

Q: I know that I put it crudely but it is exactly the fact that when I don't get what I want, I call it disorder.

K: I don't call that disorder. That is - please, I want a Rolls Royce, I want to go to the moon, I can't get it but I don't call that disorder.

Q: There is no conscious comparison. You bring in words which I find very difficult. There is no conscious comparison of the mind itself which says, this is disorder and I want order.

K: No, I'm only asking how do you know disorder?

Q: Is it only a sense of uneasiness? It's very difficult.

Q: I see a sense of confusion. One thought against another thought.

Q: It is confusion. You will say the word confusion again is comparing.

K: No, contradiction.

Q: I don't any thing else but I know confusion.

K: We only know contradiction which is confusion. I stick to that. You said my mind is in a state of confusion because it is contradicting itself all the time. All right. Proceed from there.

Q: There is a real difficulty here. You see, you talked about silence, then harmony, then disorder. We are completely moving away - this way. Otherwise why aren't we with disorder? We leave a part in order.

Q: I'm not leaving a part in either harmony or silence. I observe my mind and I see disorder.

Q: Not only the mind but the disorder in the whole mechanism.

K: Yes, I overeat and then there is disorder.

Q: I see disorder in harmony - we are not talking of that.

K: You see disorder and then what? From there move.

Q: We are bound to ask. It is the nature of the mind to ask.

K: Ask.

Q: I ask. There must be a way of finding a way out of this.

K: Yes. Then what?

Q: And then I observe myself asking that question.

K: Yes.

Q: And then that, for the time being, comes to an end.

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: The question needs answering. Look, sir, I am not talking - these steps we can discover, we needn't come to it by these steps.

K: No, don't do it.

Q: But I thought it would be best to go step by step. There's an ending there. To someone else there may not be an ending, but to me there is an ending. I see that there is an ending. I say, what is the nature of this? Is this silence? Then I come back to it. Or is there an undercurrent still operating? You see, the need of different qualities and natures and dimensions of silence. The traditional outlook is the gap between two thoughts is silence.

K: But that's not silence, silence between two noises is not silence.

Q: That's what ...

K: Listen to that noise outside and there's a gap and you call that silence? I say that's nonsense. That's an absence of noise. Absence of noise is not silence.

Q: It's the ending of the perception of oneself in a state of disturbance.

K: Pupul, you are not being clear. Sorry. I'm questioning, when you say disorder, what I am questioning is - I'm not at all sure that you know what disorder is. You call it tummy ache - I over ate - that is disorder, I over-indulge in emotional nonsense - that is disorder.

Q: I catch myself talking very loudly.

K: That is disorder. Now, so, what? Disorder; what is disorder? No, no - how do you know it is disorder? I overeat and I have a tummy ache - I don't call it disorder. I say, I over ate, I mustn't eat so much. Full stop.

Q: But I am in normal health, therefore when we ...

K: No, no. I don't go through all these processes. I overeat, I have pain, and I say to myself, I must be careful at the next meal.

Q: We moved from silence, to harmony and we found that it was impossible to go into the nature of harmony without going into disorder.

K: That's all. Keep to those three points.

Q: Why do you call it disorder?

Q: It's not necessarily a recognition of disorder, because when there is a conflict between the body, the mind ...

K: Therefore conflict you associate with disorder.

Q: No. The conflict makes one weary, as you say, and you instinctively feel there's something wrong with it.

K: So, what you're saying is, if I understand rightly, please correct me - conflict indicates disorder, right?

Q: Partly indicates disorder.

Q: Even when you don't name it there is conflict.

K: Conflict indicates disorder. Whether it is two thoughts, whether it is the body - conflict. What are we saying? Conflict is disorder.

Q: Indicates disorder.

K: No, - conflict is disorder. Not 'indicates'. You translate it as disorder.

Q: I don't understand the difference between it: you translate it as disorder and it is disorder. It is disorder and then it helps to translate it as disorder. What is the difference?

K: All right. I'm only saying conflict indicates disorder. So. Then what? From there, move. Move. You keep on going around in circles. Move.

Q: I said, there must be a way of being free of this.

K: Of what?

Q: Of conflict.

K: That's all.

Q: Of disorder.

K: That's the same thing. No, wait a minute. Silence, harmony, conflict. That's all. Not disorder. Conflict.

Q: You can take the word disorder and go through the same gymnastics with conflict, and come to the same question, 'what do I do about conflict?'

K: Wait. That's what we are concerned about. Please. Silence, harmony, conflict, right? Now, how am I to deal with conflict non-artificially? You know nothing, you are listening for the first time, therefore you have to go into it with me. Don't say 'how do I know it's for the first time?' - you don't know. Somebody comes along and says, look, look at this marvellous machinery and you look.

Q: I see this much, that I can't think of silence or harmony when I am in conflict. That much I see. It's clear sir.

K: So, is the mind capable of freeing itself from conflict? That is the only thing you can ask, right?

Q: Then you ask it.

K: I am asking. Is the mind capable of freeing itself from every kind of conflict? What is wrong with that question?

Q: It's the mind again which is asking.

Q: It is exactly the same question as can the mind be free from this conflict. I can't see the difference.

K: But I'm only saying - please, Pupulji - we have reduced it to conflict, right? Now I say, look, stick to that one thing, don't let's go round and round and round. Stick to that one thing, conflict, and see if the mind can be free of it. And don't go around saying, 'how'. Can the mind, knowing what conflict is, and what conflict does, end conflict? Surely that's a legitimate question? No? Why are you silent?

Q: Because you assume that the mind can be.

K: I don't. We are asking.

Q: If we look into this question of conflict, or rather, look into the aspect of it which is comparison, because there is no conflict without comparison.

K: Conflict is comparison, contradiction, imitation, and conformity, suppression, all that; put all that into that one word and accept the meaning of that word, as we've defined it, and said 'can the mind be free of conflict?'

Q: Of course it can be free of conflict, but the question which arises is 'what is the nature of that freedom from conflict?'

K: How do you know before you are free? That becomes theoretical.

Q: There is an ending of the state of conflict. For a while, at least.

K: Is there an ending completely of conflict?

Q: What we are asking is what is the nature of this ending and what do we mean by total ending?

K: That's what we're going to find out.

Q: There is no ending of conflict.

K: He says that.

Q: The universe ...

K: Don't include the universe. In the universe apparently every thing is moving in order - Hoyle! The expanding universe.

Q: I'm talking of the mental universe.

K: Then don't use the word 'universe'. Let's stick to our mind which seems to be endlessly in conflict. That's all. Don't bring in universe.

Q: The universe which I am.

K: Don't justify it for God's sake. We are trying to get on with the stuff. Now how is the mind to end conflict, naturally, because every other method, system, is a compulsive method, a directional method, a method of control, and therefore all that's out. Now, can the mind free itself from conflict. I say, yes; where are you at the end of it? I think mind can be completely, utterly without conflict.

Q: Forever.

K: Don't use that word, 'forever', because then you are introducing a word of time, and time is a factor of conflict.

Q: Can that mind be totally conflict?

K: Can the mind be in a state of total conflict?

Q: Just be conflict?

K: Obviously. What are you trying to say? I don't quite understand.

Q: I feel myself totally helpless in a situation. The fact is there is conflict.

K: Yes.

Q: And the fact is that any operation of the sense on that conflict ...

K: We have been through all that, don't bring it in.

Q: Seeing the nature of that, can the mind say, if it is conflict it is conflict.

K: I see what you are trying to say. Can the mind be aware of a state in which there is no conflict? Is that what you are trying to say?

Q: No.

K: Or, the mind can only know conflict. Do you know, is your mind totally aware of conflict? Or is it just words?

Q: You see ...

K: Stick to one thing. Simple. I'm being simple. Is my mind totally aware that it is in conflict? Or is there a part of the mind that says, I'm aware that I'm totally in conflict, or is there part of me watching conflict? Or is there part of me wishing to be free of conflict? Which means is there any fragment which says, 'I am not in conflict'? Or is there any fragment which separates itself from the totality of conflict? If there is a separate fragment, that's is all foolwery, then that fragment says, 'I must act, I must do, I must suppress, I must go beyond'. So is the mind - please, this is a legitimate question - is the mind totally aware that there is only conflict? That is your question, right?

Q: You say that the mind measures itself and calls it conflict, but true conflict is ...

K: Yes sir. that's what we are saying. Is your mind totally aware that there is nothing but conflict? Or is there a fragment which kicks away a little path and says, 'yes I know I am aware of conflict'. I am not in conflict, but I know'? So, is conflict a fragment, or total? I will keep to the same word, only put a different word for the time being - is there total darkness or a slight light somewhere?

Q: If that light were not there, could we be aware of it?

K: I don't know anything about it. I'm asking you. Don't ask me that question. When there is a fragmentation of the mind, that very fragmentation is conflict. Therefore, the mind, is it ever aware - just listen - ever aware that it is total conflict? And Pupul says, 'yes'.

Q: You are getting into words.

K: No No. I'm not trying to trick you.

Q: I refuse to move away.

K: I have not moved away.

Q: Therefore, I don't know anything about total conflict.

K: Therefore, you only know partial conflict.

Q: Quite, whether partial or ...

K: No, that is important.

Q: The fact is, the conflict which it is. And I say, can there be a refusal to move away.

K: I'm not moving away; I haven't moved away. I haven't really moved away from silence, harmony, or conflict. I think it is an important question, because ...

Q: The very awareness of the mind indicates that there is a fragment.

K: That's all. Therefore, you say partially I am in conflict, therefore you are never with conflict.

Q: Total conflict cannot know itself, unless there is something else to know it.

K: We're going to go into that, a little bit.

Q: I am not making myself clear. Conflict is not necessary, why do ...

K: When the room is full of furniture - forgive this wrong example, a better example you may think of - when the room is full of furniture there is no space to move. I would consider that utter confusion - you follow? Wait, I am not finished. Is my mind so totally full of this confusion, so that it has no movement away from this, if it is so completely full of confusion, conflict and full of this furniture in the room, then what takes place? That's what I want to get at, not a partial this and a partial that and ... When the steam is full it must do something - explode. And I do not think we look at this confusion so totally; this conflict so totally.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Could I use a word, sorrow? May I? There is no moving away from sorrow. When you move away from sorrow, then it is just, you know, escape from it, or suppressing it - I won't go into all that. Can one be full of sorrow - not, 'can one'. Is there such a thing as being full of sorrow? Is there such a thing as being completely happy? When you are so aware that you are completely happy, it is no longer happy. In the same way when you are so completely full of this thing called confusion, sorrow, conflict, it is no longer there. It's only there when there is division. That's all.

Q: Then it seems to be a hopeless problem, because there is always this ...

K: That's why, remain with the truth of the thing, not with the conclusion of the thing. The truth of the thing is, until the mind is complete with something it cannot but create conflict. If I love you and there is attachment in it, it is contradiction and therefore no love. So I say, remain with the fact of that thing, don't introduce ... Is the mind totally aware, full of this sorrow, this confusion, this conflict? I won't move away 'till that is so.

Q: One peculiarity about your approach. When you draw a picture there is always a clear black outline, the colours don't match. In reality there are no outlines, there are only colours merging into each other.

K: This, to me, is very clear. This to me is very clear.

Q: That very clarity is ...

K: This to me is very clear. If the heart is full of love, and there is no part of envy in it, the problem is finished. It is only when there is a part that is jealous then the whole problem arises.

Q: Love is full of jealousies.

K: Ah. Therefore remain with it. Remain with that 'full' of envy, be envious. Feel it.

Q: Then its total nature undergoes change.

K: Tremendous change.

Q: No division.

K: It's when you say I'm envious and I must not be, somewhere in the dark corner, the education restraint, and then something goes wrong. But to say, yes, I am envious, and don't move from that.

Moving is rationalising, suppressing, just remain with that feeling.

Q: The rationalist says, without repentance, no salvation.

K: I don't repent. I don't want to be saved.

Q: What is the difference between you being fully aware of the conflict and repenting the conflict?

K: Oh, oh, oh! Repentance means there is a repenter. An entity who repents, who regrets. I must stop.

Q: Feeling it fully.

K: No, don't feel it. If you are jealous, then you are just jealous.

Q: Then that is not perception.

K: That is perception.

Q: That can break down.

K: Oh, no, sir. That can break down only when you are trying to suppress it, go beyond it, rationalise it, and all the rest of it. But it's so simple.

Q: When you are in a mess are you not sorry for yourself?

K: Good God, no. That is the after-thought; 'I wish I wasn't in a mess'. When you are in a mess, be in a mess; see it, don't move away from it.

Q: That is only the after-thought. The very idea of not moving away is the after-thought.

K: I'm saying that. You're repeating.

Q: Time is merciless.

K: This is merciless. All the rest is playing tricks. When there is sorrow, be completely with it.

Q: There is no time in the now. In the now there is no moment ...

K: I don't know what you are talking about. I'm talking about sorrow, not time. My son is dead; look at the beggar there; I am full of sorrow. I don't have to invent sorrow, there it is, right in front of my nose. I'm in it. I won't move an inch from it.

Q: An action takes place.

K: Sir, when you are with something, action has taken place. I don't have to do something. A total action has taken place, which is the ending of that sorrow.

Q: How can we have tranquillity when the beggar is there?

K: Tranquillity is the ending of sorrow.

Q: Is it the acceptance of sorrow?

K: No. It's the same then as the worshipping of sorrow.

Q: No, no.

K: Of course it is.

Q: No, no. You accept sorrow as a ...

K: Ah, worshipping sorrow is also a form of accepting sorrow.

Q: No, you have no business to introduce words like that.

K: Why should I accept it?

Q: I accept my crippled child without worshipping it.

K: No, why should I accept it? It is like that, because ...

Acceptance implies an accepter.

Q: Anything implies an operator. Anything implies an operator.

Q: If there is sorrow one is full of violence.

K: Be with violence.

Q: Won't there be a destruction with that violence?

K: No, that means you are moving away from the fact. When you are violent, be completely with it, which means not doing something violently is a moving away from violence. You've got it? Because you have moved away. Suppressing violence is also moving away, or trying to overcome violence, it is still moving away.

Q: You mean mentally be violent.

K: The state of violence you know it, you don't have to be.

Q: A distinction can be made, not being violent, but be with violence.

K: Be with, yes. That's what .. live with it, be with it, not be violent. Of course, we are violent, we don't have to be with it.

AUSTRALIAN INTERVIEW WITH MR SAUNDERS SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA 20TH NOVEMBER 1970

Mr Saunders: Our problem then is, as I see it, is that we are bound, weighed down by belief, by knowledge. And is it possible for a mind to be free from yesterday and from the beliefs that have been acquired through the beliefs of yesterday? Is it possible for me, as an individual, and you, as an individual, to live in this society and yet be free from the beliefs in which we have been brought up? Is it possible for the mind to be free from all that knowledge, all that authority? Krishnamurti, are you saying that it is wrong to believe in what you have found to be true?

Krishnamurti: Sir, surely, is belief necessary at all? Why do we have beliefs? Probably because mostly you believe in something because you don't actually see 'what is'. If you saw actually 'what is', 'what is' in the sense what is actually going on, both outwardly, in the outward phenomenon, and inwardly, then what is the necessity for a belief at all? You don't believe the sun is rising. It is there, and you have seen it. Therefore the whole problem of belief seems to me so utterly erroneous, it has no place with a person who is actually observing the whole structure and the nature of thinking, living, suffering, the agony of existence, the sorrow, and all the rest of it. Belief appears as a means of escape from the reality of 'what is'.

So to understand actually 'what is' one has to be rid of all these extraneous beliefs and fears, and hopes, and be able to look actually, not theoretically, not abstractly, but actually look at what is taking place in the world outside, with all the racial conflicts, with wars, the division between religions - the Catholic, the Protestant, the Hindu, the Muslim, all the divisions have created such havoc in the world. And by observing all that one sees how this has come about because in oneself one is conditioned by society, by the culture one lives in. If you live in India you become a Hindu or Muslim, or if you live in Europe you are a Catholic or a Protestant. It's the environment that conditions, the culture that shapes the mind, the culture being the knowledge, the tradition, the various beliefs. And surely a mind that is conditioned as a Communist, as a Catholic, or as a Hindu, what you will, surely is incapable of being free to observe: to observe the extraordinary complex structure of society; and also the still more complex, the psychological structure of oneself. Because oneself is the world. We have created the world, and the world is me and you, we cannot separate the two. And so to understand the world one has to understand oneself. To change the social structure, which obviously needs colossal change, one has to change oneself because one is part of this society. So the change must begin with the human being, not with the outward structure. Because the human being is confused, the human being is conditioned, he believes and therefore there is a contradiction in himself and therefore he is really deeply confused. And if he wants to change the social structure, the change from confusion only breeds more confusion. Whereas if he could bring about clarity within himself and from that clarity act, then such an action is really a deep psychological revolution. That revolution is absolutely necessary.

S: This means, doesn't it, a completely different view of education, for after all education is implanting beliefs.

K: Obviously. Education now, as it is, is really a cultivation of a corner of a vast field. We are concerned with that little corner, which is technological knowledge, condition the mind with knowledge, with information, and neglecting the whole field. And therefore there is an imbalance: technologically one has gone very far, and psychologically one is very, very primitive, one is still at the stage of tribal conflict, with their beliefs, with their gods, with their separate nationalities and armies and all the rest of it, which is really a continuation of the tribal existence. And apparently we don't see in education that it is immensely important to cultivate, to understand the whole field, not just one corner of it.

S: The other thing about this, Krishnamurti, is how can an individual, who is part of the system, get outside the system in order to observe it and himself?

K: You know, sir, the word 'individuality', the individual, means indivisible, an entity who is in himself indivisible, which means non-contradictory in himself. But the individual human being is contradictory in himself, he is not an individual; he is broken up, he is fragmented in himself. And so being contradictory, being divided in himself, his activity, his social structure, his morality is obviously fragmentary, contradictory, therefore he becomes a hypocrite. So the problem is not how to change the individual, but can the human being, who is part of this vast structure, which he himself has created, can that human being radically, psychologically change? Not the society. The society is the relationship between individuals. And can the human mind which is so conditioned after so many centuries, can it uncondition itself completely, be free from being a Catholic, a Hindu, a communist, a socialist and see that he is part of this human structure, part of the world, not the Catholic world or the communist world.

S: Well, if he can, how can he?

K: That's the problem: how can he see? First of all, one has to be aware of what is going on both outwardly and inwardly, aware - not theoretically, not intellectually, or aware according to some philosopher, or psychologist. Then he is aware according to their ideas, to their conditioning, whereas to be aware of what he is actually - his problems, his miseries, his sufferings, his extraordinary sense of brutality, violence, to be aware of all that. And from that awareness comes clarity, and that means he must be tremendously interested in life, not in some awful absurd theory, whether it be the theory of the Catholics or the Hindus.

S: Well then how do you get people to be aware in your sense?

K: I don't think you can get people - if they are interested, they will be. But if you force them to be interested through propaganda, then the propaganda becomes all important, not the people. After all, all religions have been that, they are instruments of propaganda. Christianity, with their belief, with their saviours, with their virgin - and all the rest of it, their saints, is the result of two thousand years of propaganda, dinning into people every belief - believe, believe, you are saved, you are this, you are that. The other day when I was in Rome, I speak Italian and so on, the priest was absolutely mesmerizing the people by repeating, repeating, repeating, going on for a whole half an hour, naturally the people were mesmerized into belief. So all that has to be set aside. Which means facing the fear, fear to stand alone, fear to discard all this absurdity, all this circus, if I may use the word, that has become religion. So to discard all that implies a man must be aware and so become very sensitive, very alert and therefore intelligent. It is that intelligence that is going to change society, not throwing a bomb at it. The response to a challenge, as violence, is a most primitive form of response.

Therefore the question really is whether the human mind as it is, living in this world, with wars, with the economic inequalities, with the immorality of society, and society is immoral, whether he can be totally good. Good in the sense, good, be free of violence, free of aggression, and violence is a form, is an outward expression of fear. I don't know if you have noticed that when whole cities are crowded, as they are now, overpopulated, the lack of space makes people violent. The very lack of survival is making everything violent. So I think one has to really go into all this, not as an idea, not as a belief, but one has to search, understand all this in oneself, one must have tremendous passion to find out all this, because self-knowledge is the beginning of wisdom. Wisdom, you can't buy it in a book, or from another.

S: In your travels round the world, Krishnamurti, have you found that the younger generation have got this kind of thirst for awareness and self-knowledge?

K: I think from what one has observed, both in America and in Europe and India, this sense of revolt, which most young people have, is a revolt because what has society to offer them, actually, except go into business, or join the army, or go to the moon, or where you will, but actually what has society, the culture to offer them? Nothing, if you look at it. And therefore the more intelligent, the more sensitive, the more alert, they say, 'This is all wrong'. We must change the very fabric of education, and the vested interests won't have it, the vested interest says, 'We must go slow', you know, the good old business, and therefore there is this conflict. Because, after all the human mind does seek more than bread and butter. It wants something beyond all this, which has meaning, which has significance, which has depth and passion and interest. But just when society, the culture says, you are going to become a business man, or a professor, or become a soldier, then... Therefore the revolt all through the world, they may not express it in so many ways, in such depth, but there are indications of that, but unfortunately they want to change society by throwing bombs and violence, and any physical revolution, as one has observed, must lead inevitably to dictatorship, either of the few, or of the bureaucracy.

So this psychological revolution, of which we are talking about is the most important. That will bring about a change in the world.

S: You have been rather critical of religions, you yourself must have a religious view of life. Would you tell me your own particular outlook on religion.

K: I mean, what is religion, actually what is religion? First of all, to find out what is religion we must negate what it is not. I don't know if you? What it is not, then it is. It's like what is not love - love is not hate, love is not jealousy, love is not ambition, love is not violence - so when you negate all that the other is, which is compassion. In the same way, if you negate what is not religion, then you will find out what is true religion. That is, what is the truly religious mind. First of all, therefore, belief is not religion, and the authority which the churches, the organized religions assume is not religion. In that there is all the sense of obedience, conformity, acceptance, the hierarchical approach to life, the division between the Protestant, the Catholic, the Hindu, the Muslim and all that, that's not religion. So when you negate all that, which means you are no longer a Hindu, no longer a Catholic, no longer belonging to any sectarian outlook, then your mind then questions, asks, what is then truly religion. This is not, with their rituals, with their masters, with their saviours, that is not religion. Therefore when the mind discards that intelligently, because it has seen it is not, then what is religion? Religion is - not what I think - but religion is this sense of comprehension of the totality of existence in which there is no division between you and me.

Then if there is that quality of goodness, which is virtue, real virtue, not this phoney virtue of society, real virtue, then the mind can go beyond and find out true meditation through deep quiet silence. You can find out if there is such a thing as reality. And therefore a religious mind is a mind that is constantly aware, sensitive, attentive so that it goes beyond itself, into a dimension where there is no time at all.

S: What you are saying, Krishnamurti, seems to me, that man has no need of any power outside of himself.

K: Obviously not, sir. The power of the outside agency is self created. I can't live properly in this world and I hope somebody outside is going to help me. But I have created as a human being, the social structure, the misery, the confusion, the enormous suffering. We have created this. Unless we change it, an outside agency is not going to change it, either the communist outside agency, the polit bureau, or the Hindu centre, or the Catholic centre. So one has to have the clarity to observe all this.

S: What do you make of death?

K: Sir, that is an immense question. Again, you see we have made life into a hideous thing, living. Life has become a battle, which is an obvious fact, constant fight, fight, fight. And we have divorced that living from death. We separate death as something horrible, something to be frightened of, and to us this living which is misery, we accept. If we didn't accept this existence as misery, then life and death are the same movement. Like love, death and living are all one. One must totally die to find what love is. And to go into this question of what is death, what lies beyond death, whether there is reincarnation, whether there is resurrection, you follow, all that, becomes rather meaningless if you don't know how to live. If the human being knows how to live in this world without conflict then death has quite a different meaning.

To understand death really one has to go into the question of what is it that dies. The physical organism obviously is going to end, because we have misused it, we have really destroyed the intelligence of the organism itself, and to us death is something to be avoided, and as it exists we believe, we believe in something beyond. There is something beyond far greater than any of our belief, there is something tremendously great which the mind cannot possibly grasp, a mind which is in such chaos, which is in such contradiction.

S: Krishnamurti, way back in 1929, that's forty odd years ago now, you dissolved the Order of the Star of the East, I'd like to read the words, some of the words that you said at that time. You said, 'I maintain that truth is a pathless land, and you cannot approach it by any path whatsoever, by any religion, by any sect. I do not want followers', you said, 'I mean this. If there are only five people who will listen, who will live, who have their faces turned towards eternity, it will be sufficient. Of what use is it to have thousands who do not understand, who are fully embalmed in prejudice, who do not want the new, who would rather translate the new to suit their own sterile, stagnant selves.' You said, 'I desire those who seek to understand me to be free, not to follow me, not to make out of me a cage which will become a religion, a sect, but rather they should be free from all fears; from the fear of religion, from the fear of salvation, from the fear of spirituality, from the fear of love, from the fear of death, from the fear of life itself.' Well, forty one years later how would you summarize your aims?

K: I think that is true. I mean human beings, whether they live in India, or America, or in the West, are really unhappy beings. They are frustrated, they feel life has very little meaning, the more intellectual you are, you say, it has no meaning at all. And therefore they begin to invent meanings. Whereas if you really understood oneself - oneself is so conditioned, oneself is so small, petty, bourgeois, then out of that understanding flowers goodness.

S: And so you are not setting yourself up as a great teacher?

K: No, no, sir. On the contrary. I say, be your own teacher, be your own light, don't look to somebody else.

S: And where do you find truth?

K: Only when a mind is completely - not only a mind - a life that is completely harmonious, not contradictory. It is only such a mind which is religious that can find truth, which can observe truth. Truth isn't something abstract, it is there.

AT BROCKWOOD PARK, 1975 (FILM INTERSPERSED WITH MUSIC)

Life is really very beautiful. It is not this ugly thing that we have made of it. And you can appreciate its richness, its depth, its extraordinary loveliness only when you revolt against everything, against organized religions, against tradition, against the present rotten society, so that you, as a human being, find out for yourself what is truth, not to imitate it but to discover.

It is a tragedy, I think, that man lives in constant conflict with himself and with the world. This conflict expresses itself in so many different ways - the conflict between two human beings, the conflict between ideals, the conflict between two beliefs, the conflict between two gods and gurus. This constant conflict which man has lived in is very destructive, it is not creative at all. Quite the contrary. It is a wastage of energy. And man apparently, you, have never been able to solve this problem at all. Conflict in relationship is really between two images - the image you have built about another, and the images he has built about you. So in relationship conflict is essentially between these two images. And can one live a life without this image - the image, the symbol, the conclusion, that you may have drawn from your experience. And I think it is possible, really it is possible to live without a single conflict. And that is possible only when you have no image about yourself - image as being great, or inferior, or something noble, or ignoble and so on, not to have a single image about yourself or about another.

Have you ever wondered why it is that as people grow older they seem to lose all joy of life. Why do so many of us as we grow into so-called maturity become dull, insensitive, to joy, to beauty, to the open skies and the marvellous earth?

You can cultivate pleasure, you can pursue it, you can subtly, consciously or unconsciously, maintain this pursuit, but pleasure is entirely different from joy. You cannot invite joy, you may experience a period of joy, and cultivate the memory of that experience and turn it into pleasure, but it is no longer joy. Joy cannot be invited, as you can invite pleasure. So the memory of joy remains, and the cultivation of that memory gradually becomes pleasure and prevents the joy coming in. So one has to be very much aware of these two, that joy cannot possibly be invited at any time, consciously or unconsciously. But pleasure in different forms can be pursued, sustained and nourished. So when this is very clear, the difference of the two, then joy becomes a natural event, and it happens quite often, when the whole principle of pleasure is understood.

Yesterday evening I saw a boat going up the river at full sail, driven by the west wind, it was a large boat, heavily laden with firewood for the town. The sun was setting and this wood against the sky was astonishingly beautiful, the boatman was just guiding it, there was no effort for the wind was doing all the work. Similarly, if each one of us would understand the problem of struggle and conflict then I think we would be able to live effortlessly, happily, with a smile on our face.

Our life, our everyday life is based on two principles: fear and pleasure, reward and punishment. From this arises this constant struggle. From this also arises the whole question of behaviour because our behaviour, that is conduct, how we treat others and treat ourselves, the manner of our speech, the activities of our daily life, are based on these two principles. And as long as these two principles, which is, fear and pleasure, reward and punishment, there must be not only contradiction in ourselves, and therefore in our actions, but also in our relationship with each other. And struggle and effort, to become something, to achieve something - psychologically we are speaking - becomes one of our major problems of life. I don't know if you have noticed how every human being right throughout the world, it doesn't matter where you go, whether you go in the Far East, Near East, or in the West, man is caught in this web, in this trap of endless struggle, struggle not only to live securely, physically, but also psychologically, the battle that goes on within oneself, which is most destructive. I do not know if you have noticed this in yourself, how your life, your daily life, is based on this extraordinary principle of fear and pleasure, and therefore one is trying to dominate the other, and from this arises this endless conflict. Is it possible to live a life without this constant battle, without this constant struggle, inwardly as well as outwardly?

To really understand this you have to see what your life is first. That it is a struggle, that it is terribly frustrated, painful. Be aware of that, be conscious of it. Then don't escape from it, don't run away from what you see, don't try to explain it, don't try to rationalize it, but stay with what actually is, that you are struggling, there is battle going on inside yourself, to be different, or to become different and so on. Just watch that. And in that watching, in that awareness you will find that by the very act of that attention the struggle comes to an end.

Silence has many qualities, there is the silence between two noises, the silence between two notes, and the widening silence in the interval between two thoughts. There is that peculiar quiet, pervading silence that comes of an evening in the country. There is the silence in a house when everybody has gone to sleep and its peculiar emphasis when you wake up in the middle of the night and listen to an owl hooting in the valley. And there is that silence before the owl's mate answers. There is the silence of an old deserted house, and the silence of a mountain. The silence between two human beings when they have seen the same thing, felt the same thing and acted. The meditative mind contains all these varieties, changes and movements of silence. This silence of the mind is the true religious mind, and the silence of the gods is the silence of the earth. And strangely that morning it had come through the window like some perfume, and with it came a sense, a feeling of the absolute. As you looked out of the window the distance between all things disappeared, and your eyes opened with the dawn and saw everything anew.

Love like most human issues is a very complex problem. I think we should approach it simply and look rather deeply into this question. Love isn't pleasure, nor desire, nor is it the romantic, fanciful affair. And we have made it either idealistic or a sexual affair. And I think when you go into it rather deeply you will find that when pleasure is identified with love it becomes very personal, and therefore it causes a great deal of harm. It brings about hurt, jealousy, anxiety, and pain. And in the pursuit of pleasure there is always fear. And where there is fear naturally there cannot be love.

And you are really destroying the world by your pursuit of pleasure, by your constant demand for the fulfilment of your own particular desires. And so you are limiting the extraordinary width and depth of love. And when you see this it naturally comes about, that is when you are not pursuing pleasure sexually, or ideologically, or make it into something romantic, as divine and human, then that quality which one may call love comes into being. I feel that is the only solution for this miserable confused, conflicting world.

That is one of the most extraordinary things in the world: man has never been able to resolve this question of death, he has never learnt about it. He has run away from it, or worshipped it from a distance, or frightened about it, we have never gone into it. We have never said, let's find out, let's learn what it means to live and what it means to die. We know what it means to live, a routine, as it is now, a great deal of suffering, a great deal of pain, and great boredom of life which demands the search for entertainment - night clubs, drink, drugs, and every form of amusement exploited. We never learn what it is to live without conflict, without struggle, without pain. And one must learn it, and it is part of our existence, as we must also learn what it means to die, because we are so frightened of death. Nobody talks about it, nobody says to you, find out what it means to live a life in which death and life are not separate, they go together, like love and life go together, like love and death go together. They are all together, they can never be divorced, put aside, broken away from each other, as we have done. So to learn about death, not believe in something after death, as the whole of Asia does, or believe in some resurrective processes and so on, but actually without any fear, without seeking comfort, learn what it means to live and what it means to die. And then you will find that life isn't merely a mechanical process in relationship but life is something immeasurable.

Philosophy means the love of truth, not according to some theory, or speculative concepts, or imagination, but to lead in daily life a truthful life. That truth is not according to some system, some guru, some pattern that traditionally has been established, but in the understanding of oneself, not according to some psychologist, or analyst, but understanding yourself in daily life, to see what you are, exactly, without any distortion, without any despair, or regret, just to see in your daily relationship what you are. What you are is the truth. Now that truth is denied when you follow somebody - follow a guru, follow a priest, follow a traditional concept of heaven or hell, or saviour and all the rest of it. Those are all the products of one's own thoughts, therefore one has to be free from this spiritual authority - if one may use that word 'spiritual'. Authority destroys, destroys not only truth but your understanding of truth. So don't follow anybody with regard to your understanding what truth is. Don't follow what the speaker is saying either; but what the speaker is saying is merely, to observe yourself, to understand yourself as you are. Therefore 'what is', is to be understood and gone beyond. And that is the whole problem of existence. That is, to understand our relationship with each other, however intimate, however distant, and in the understanding of that relationship comes the reality of one's own existence.
